"Religion," says Cicero, "is derived from relegere," which means "to collect again; to go over and over carefully in reading, speech, or thought." But this definition, expressing the nature of true religion, is also precisely accordant with the true scientific method. And so, in the ultimate analysis and clearest definition, we have the materials for a profounder synthesis. Out of the alleged duality and antithesis of science and religion there emerges a deeper unity, a unity foreign to all dogmatic assertion, at one with the conception of an integral universe, vital with one harmonious stream of tendency, manifested in one all-comprehensive method of evolution.

Nature's Long Preparation for Human Life.

Looking back over the long line of the ages, we may trace, in imagination, the growth of the physical universe out of the primitive fire-mist; the birth of the separate planets and systems of planets, and the gradual preparation of their surfaces for organic life; the slow development of vegetable and animal forms, prophetic of their final culmination in that wonderful being, MAN. In man, conscious of capacities for infinite improvement and culture, Nature, so far as we can see, has reached her ultimate. Has she expended all these æons of evolutionary labor, merely to produce the creature of a day,—a wisp of grass, that "to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven"? When the visible world, as prophesied by astronomers, finally grows old, and refuses longer to support the life of man, is the result of all this striving and labor of evolution to perish forever? Some one has termed animals "the abortive attempts of Nature to produce man." Is he, too, an abortion and a failure? Nay: this, surely, is not the answer of right reason or common-sense.

Meaning of the Universal Law of Sacrifice.

But, we are reminded by scholarly objectors, the entire process of evolution demonstrates that Nature is careless of the individual, and aims only at the preservation of the type. The sacrifice of the individual is the lesson of the universal law. Man can expect no exemption from this common fate. Herein, a disciple* of the Religion of Humanity, in a recent essay, found the most conclusive argument against the probability of individual existence after death.

But what is a MAN in the light of the philosophy of evolution? He is the product of the interaction between selfhood, or organism, and environment. The chief element in his individual environment is his ancestry, reaching back through long successions of human progenitors to animal, vegetable, inorganic nature, the primitive fire-mist out of which it sprang. At every step in its development, the environment of this ancestry has been nothing less than THE IMMORTAL AND UNIVERSAL COSMIC LIFE.

Individual man, then, is the coin of which the eternal environing universe is the perfect die. He is the microcosm, reflecting in his nature all the beauties and noble possibilities of the Kosmos. He is the upper half of Nature,—its fruitage and culmination. Is the universal evolutionary process to cease in him when "the dust returns to the dust as it was," or will it still continue to a higher fruition in an unquenchable individuality? May it not well be that he inherits immortality from his undying mother, Nature? On which scale rests the descending weight of reason?

To our mind, the whole theory of evolution is rendered luminous and completely rational by the conception of the eternal continuance of its processes in the nature of individual man, and in no other manner. The contrary hypothesis of a long round of development and dissolution, finally to be quenched forever in the dissolution of the world, is more accordant with the fanciful speculations of obsolete Eastern philosophies than with the rational and progressive philosophy of the nineteenth century.

The Infinite Perfectibility of Human Nature.

A strong argument for the probability of a future life is found in man's capacities for infinite improvement. All other forms of organic life tend toward and finally attain the likeness of a perfect type. Existing powers may then be perfected by training, but no new powers are generated. Evolution proceeds thereafter by the development of higher types, instead of the perfection of the old. The beaver built his house as perfectly in the earliest generations as he does to-day. The perfect horse existed in the days of Job. But how wonderfully has man unfolded higher and higher capacities for usefulness, virtue, and happiness, from age to age. Obedient to his investigations, how have new discoveries of the forces and utilities of nature assisted him in the promotion of a nobler civilization! And how, pace by pace with his development, has come the increasing perception that his present attainment is only the faintest hint and prophecy of what he may become, if only an eternity be given him in which to think over again the infinite thoughts of God! They who have searched most deeply into the secrets of the universe—the apostles of science, the most profound and thorough scholars—are they who stand most reverently before the vast unknown, to which the known is but a drop in an infinite sea. Is individual man, inheriting the capacities and hopes of all preceding generations, to stand, like Moses in the Hebrew legend, on the borders of this land of promise, and never to enter in and partake of its labors and its joys? Surely, the hope of personal immortality, though incapable of sensuous demonstration, is far more rational than a conception which would intensify with every development of man's nature the burden and disappointment of such a Tantalus existence.

Validity of the Emotional Instincts.

Then, there is that other argument which appeals to the strongest feelings of our nature, that continuity of love, generated and strengthened, through the inheritance of ages, which refuses to believe that the friend whose life and personality have become a part of our own, has passed forever from our companionship in crossing the river of death. I refrain from pressing what might be deemed as no argument, but merely an appeal to the emotions, though I cannot wholly admit the validity of this objection. Emotional phenomena are facts of our human nature, and, as such, are legitimate material to submit to the reason for the formation of a just judgment upon any question in which they are involved. The emotional instincts, too, are products of evolution, and, as such, are not to be contemptuously dismissed with a sneer, but to be accounted for by the rational intellect, in harmony with the conception of the unity of man with that universe out of which he has sprung. The dualism which would eliminate this emotional element as of no account is as false to the conception of a cosmic unity as is the dualistic separation of matter and spirit which the positivist so strongly decries.

Unity of Man with Nature.

So far as science pronounces upon this question, it declares that man is one; the universe, from whose motherly heart he sprang, is one; and the mother and child are not aliens. The longings which she has built up in his nature—which he has received with the life she gave him—she must be competent to satisfy.

I believe this ground of the unity of man with nature to be philosophically impregnable, and strengthened and sustained by all the analogies of scientific research. I care not whether you spell this conception of cosmic unity with six letters or with three,—whether you call it MATTER or GOD. If GOD, it is no far-off Deity,—no deus ex machina, no anthropomorphic being separate from the universe,—but a life immanent in every atom, unifying all things; a perpetual impulse toward a higher and more perfect material, social, and individual development. If Matter, it is a living matter, pregnant with thought from the beginning, and bearing the possibilities of more perfect life in the future than the past has ever known.

The Hope for Immortality Rational and Consistent.

I believe, therefore, that all we know of science, all we know of this wonderful universe of which we are a part, all we know of the infinite possibilities and the present capacities of our own natures, justify us in cherishing this hope for an immortal life,—a life in which all our desires for knowledge may be met, where there will be perfect compensations for the sorrows and trials and unequal conditions of this earthly existence. I base this belief on the steady growth of this hope, as illustrated in the history of its development out of rude beginnings, and upon the conception of cosmic unity, which regards man and nature as parts of a harmonious universe. The materialistic dualism which considers man an alien and helpless being in the power of a pitiless universe, living his little life of pain and misery or of selfish joy, and then dying as the dog dies, is closely akin to that older dualism which gave birth to the notion of a personal devil. These conceptions arise naturally enough in the early, immature phases of the evolution of man's moral nature, but they are quite unworthy of the intelligence and philosophy of to-day.

Lacking the knowledge of perception and complete demonstration, yet may we hope, basing our hope upon what we do know of the eternal order and unity and beneficence manifested in the universe. We know that the race has grown out of ignorance, degradation, and brutehood, up to its present estate. What has already been accomplished through the universal method of evolution is prophetic of greater blessings yet in store. So wonderful, so beneficent is this orderly progression, so satisfying its present results, that it offers firm foundation for perfect trust that whatever is best will happen to us all.

How to strengthen and cultivate this Hope.

"Friendship," says Emerson, "like the immortality of the soul, is too good to be believed." Nay, gentle prophet of the ideal! For once, your inspiration is at fault. Say rather that both are so very good that they must be believed. Not by gazing into the distant heavens at the full glory of the sun is the material vision strengthened, so neither may we win immortality or strengthen its glorious hope by persistent otherworldliness. "He who doeth the good law," says Zoroaster, "and teacheth it to the creatures who are first in understanding, even in this world he becomes an immortal being." So rather should it be our endeavor to pitch this life high;—to keep clear our minds from preconception, and seek earnestly for the highest truth; to do well the duties that are at hand, to render the life that now is richer and fuller of all strength and beauty,—build here a present heaven. So living, I cannot think that this hope will die away. Rather shall we grow to feel that not greater in mystery and divinity than present living is the conception of the life to come. In the high satisfaction of this present, we shall know, at least, that all is for the best. Whatever the future has in store for us will be better than our dream.

"O wealth of life beyond all bound!
Eternity each moment given!
What plummet can the present sound?
Who promises a future heaven?
Or glad or grieved,
Oppressed, relieved,
In darkest night or brightest day,
Still pours the flood
Of golden good,
And more than heartfelt fills me eye!
• • • • •
"All mine is thine, the Sky-soul saith;
The wealth I am must thou become;
Richer and richer, breath by breath,
Immortal gain, immortal room.
And since all His Mine also is,
My gifts outshine my fancy far,
And drown the dream
In larger stream,
As morning drinks the morning star!"

CLERICAL REASONING.

The mental legerdemain through which a theologian will pass to achieve a predisposed result of thought would surprise the modern world, if the previous centuries had not prepared it to believe priesthood capable of astounding intellectual seven-sidedness. Everything is sacrificed to the determination to prove a theory. Truth itself is credited with no weight as against their method. Falsehood, going their way, is preferable to verity going another. Careless of the inevitable destruction, that their palace may mount into the heavens, they are willing it should be reared on a rotten foundation. So, always, in smaller natures, for the moment's triumph the glad, final victory of the future is resigned. Prejudice ever has held present, generous hands out to pettifogging, legal or clerical, worked in its interest.

The clergy have two natures, neither rich in division. When the preacher goes into the pulpit, he breathes a different atmosphere. He becomes vitiated. He thinks best to judge those about him by standing higher and having them below. He wants the various natures in panorama. He fails. By his endeavor to see clearer, he sees less clearly. To judge another, one must approach, not shrink aloof.

In this wise has the preacher a foreign nature in the pulpit,—that he forces feeling and forces thought, that is so different and purer in his private hours, when spontaneous. He professes such views of man's destiny as would be judged cruel, if manifested in ordinary life. He has his fashion of argument, as the women of dress, that changes with the season, and would not be resorted to in his discussion of social problems. He brandishes follies that in general reasoning he would himself denounce as the powerless weapons of the fool. He forgets that bad argument never yet has bolstered a noble idea, and the sublime grandeur of a truth never yet has gone into partnership with Jesuitism.

The clergy do not commonly admit the open method of general thought into their controversies. Their most energetic sermons are strings of inferences. They are always ready to deliver the what is to the what might be. As, stepping upon his rostrum, the priest assumes an unnatural voice and manner, seemingly an inferred necessity to goodness and the true spirit of worship, so he attends this change with distorted impressions of life and far-fetched reasonings. This is not done by plan. There is a mental subjection in the very nature of the profession. He pleads a case. He rides a high-horse from which civilization beckons him to dismount.

Surely, all minds must not be sacrificed that one may have its pleasure. Surely, one mind must not be ruined that all may have their tyranny. Yet this is the communism of pulpit and pew. Priest and people must learn this. One cannot hold real freedom in triumph over the dead freedom of another.

There are no two right methods of reasoning in this universe. A sophistry is as much a sophistry in religion as in politics. The preacher has no more claim to argue from his passion than my down-town politician. A preacher must be the call, not the echo. Better pulpits did not exist than exist without free nature. Sincerity must kill expediency, whenever they conflict. There are no two ways to honor. A preacher must speak for himself. He must not relieve the people of their heads, nor they bestrew his brains in idiocy. The world wants less secretaries, more masters; less skilful policy, more simple sincerity.

How sad to sell one's intellect, dealing it out in seven days' particles! Natures are dissimilar in a free state. The mental world is thus as the physical. If one must think for another, he cannot truly think for himself. If I suppress your individuality, there are suspense and strain—that is, a break of nature's ease—in my own, as when I plant my foot to maintain my equilibrium against a threatened disturbance.

The moment you commission me to speak for you, my freedom is in harness. You rein, and I turn at your will. I am in bribery. In the present arrangement of pulpit and pew, some one's freedom must undergo sacrifice. There is slavery and a master. And even the master, to maintain his authority, will go to means that limit his liberty.

The maintenance of mastership constantly shifts. Sometimes it is the preacher's, oftener the audience's. One accepting clericalism engages to think on certain lines. Thus, at the outset, prostitution commences. Very often, brilliancy builds over the ruins of sincerity. The glitter for a day hides the certain weakness.

Men exchange freedom for comfort. Between the pulpit and pew there is mutual compromise of sincerity, of which the outcome is mental quiescence and decorum. The preacher that thinks is whipped out by the congregation. The congregation that thinks parts ways—in this age—with the Church.

An artist drawing always after one model is impoverished. Nature is rich in colors. She made us very divergent. When this is not plain in a body of men, when all seem of a tone, the divergency is in suppression, obscured by mists of dissimulation. It is always there. If it is not shown, life serves a hypocrisy, and not its pure purpose. You may hide the fact, but never utterly the evidence of its presence.

How is one rose like all other roses, yet so different? that great oak like all its fellows, yet so dissimilar? Out in the freedom of nature is our lesson. Yes, there is harmony, but not the product of a prison mould. The adjustment so beautiful reaches to our intellects, if we will. We love Marak's landscapes, because diverse features are there combined as in a oneness,—not all trees or all grasses, all earth or all sky, but trees and grasses, earth and sky, shown to form a gentle beauty by the very nature of their difference. It is a thought that thrills me, that freedom must by and by come to all, and that this lovely nature ever attends upon freedom,—yes, is freedom itself! Then men will own themselves, and so truly develop the one real harmony.

THE POPE AND THE SULTAN.

These two famous potentates, who a few centuries ago divided the empire of the world between them, are in these days getting to be so reduced in power and influence that they are evidently on their last legs. Both are cases of theocracy or theocratic rule; and both have got subjects enough, such as they are. The Sultan as Commander of the Faithful is recognized as their head by some two hundred millions of people; and the Pope in the various countries of Christendom in both hemispheres has about the same number of subjects, who constitute the ignorant, unprogressive population of the civilized area of the world, such as Italian, Spanish, and French peasants, the mongrel populations of Spanish and Portuguese America, the peasantry of Western and Southern Ireland, and the people of Southern Germany. The Pope's subjects are as a rule grossly illiterate, and in point of intelligence mere grown-up children. With all their adherents, neither Sultan nor Pope is happy. Both are sick men. Both are out of date and fashion, and liable to be abolished at any moment.

Wherever the Sultan rules, there is moral and physical blight. Countries once the gardens of the world and the seats of civilization in other days have been literally blasted by Mohammedan ascendancy. What an ignorant Arab enthusiast decreed twelve centuries ago, for the guidance of rude and ignorant Arabs, to borrow the language of another, must rule forever the conduct of the Mussulman world. So the Papacy which flourished as a spiritual power when Europe was morally, socially, and intellectually no farther advanced than Asia and Africa, a mere waste of ignorance, superstition, shiftlessness, poverty, and brutal violence, claims to-day the right to lord it over a civilization which is rapidly solving the enigmas of the universe and lifting the masses of mankind to a higher plane than that occupied by the privileged classes of other days. We are told that about three-fifths of the land in the Turkish empire is mosque property; and the whole of this property, which is secure against taxation and confiscation, is held in mortmain, or belongs to the Ulema or Mohammedan priesthood. Thus, it has been everywhere and always under theocracies or priestly rule. The priests have absorbed the choicest lands invariably, and held them free of taxation. A few centuries ago, three-fifths of the soil even of Great Britain were in the hands of Roman Catholic priests.

Priesthoods of every age and denomination, Egyptian, Mohammedan, and Popish, have been alike given to the absorption of land, and holding it as consecrated soil, which it was sacrilege to tax or utilize for ordinary purposes. Vast tracts of land even in ancient Greece were withdrawn from culture as temple property. The plough was not suffered to furrow them for tillage, nor was any useful industry permitted upon them. The Jesuits in this free country are owning already too much soil in the name of the Pope, whose subjects are allowed to be naturalized here, notwithstanding that they continue to bear allegiance to him, "foreign potentate" though he be to all intents and purposes. A great deal of wrath is expended on the Mormon Theocracy of Utah, whose adherents went off by themselves into the wilderness. But the Papal Theocracy thrusts itself everywhere under the noses of the American people, and with its squalor and brutal, ignorant populations is infinitely more offensive than Mormonism with its Old Bible institution of polygamy. Pope Brigham Young was an abler ruler and high priest than the late Pío Nono.

Mohammedanism, we are told, is a vast militant papacy, more compact and more powerful in its organization than the Papacy of Rome. The Sultan is the executive head of the Mohammedan Church. What we call "the State" does not exist in Islam. Its government is a pure theocracy, or god-rule, which means the rule of priests. The Koran is both its Bible and its civil code. The Sultan enforces this code under the sanction of the Sheikh-ul-Islam, or Mohammedan Pope or high priest. There can be no reform of Mohammedan institutions, for according to Mohammedan belief they were decreed by God himself audibly and visa voce to the Arabian prophet. For this and other facts in regard to Mohammedanism, the writer of this article is indebted to a most interesting essay on the hopelessness of reform under the Sultan in the August number of the Contemporary Review. Ibn Khaldoun, we are told, an accomplished Moslem historian of standard authority, says, "Of all the divine books, the Koran is the only one of which the text, words, and phrases have been communicated to a prophet by an audible voice. It is otherwise with the Pentateuch, the gospel, and the other divine books which the prophets received under the form of ideas." Here is plenary inspiration. God dictated the Koran directly to Mohammed as his amanuensis. But, according to all accounts, the Arabian prophet was illiterate. But a little miracle doubtless tided him over that difficulty.

Mohammedans hold our Bible, in respect to both the Old and New Testament, as genuine inspirations of Deity. But the Koran, a later version of God's will, superseded them, according to the Mohammedan idea. A Mohammedan Doctor of Divinity, it is needless to say, on the subject of inspiration is fully a match for a Christian Doctor of Divinity. Mohammedans are far better theists than the Papists are, who think a good deal more of the Jewish woman known as the Virgin Mary than they do of God. Mohammedanism to-day is more alive than Christianity, whether Protestant or Papal, because it is not confronted as Christianity is by science, enlightenment, and improvements and inventions of all sorts. Gross ignorance and stagnation everywhere still reign in Islam, while even in the most benighted Popish countries science, popular education, and the republican movement are yearly making inroads on superstition, ignorance, and priestism. Italy, the very seat of the Papacy, if it goes on improving, will shortly spew the Papacy out of its borders. The people of Christendom are no longer capable of the bloodthirsty fanaticism and religious bigotry which characterize the average Mohammedan. Men must be grossly ignorant to be intensely religious. The very sight of a Christian in unfrequented parts of Kurdistan will make a Kurd's moustache literally curl with ire. Layard gives a curious account of an experience of his own illustrative of the fact in an encounter which he had with a Kurdish horseman in a lonely mountain pass.

According to the authority of the essay already quoted, "the dominions of the Sultan are a part of one vast theocratic power, which claims the divine sanction to reduce all men to the alternative of embracing Islam or submitting to servitude or death,—servitude in the case of Jews and Christians, death in the case of all other non-Mussulman people, and of Christians who take up arms in defence of their liberty. The Koran accordingly divides the world into Dar-ul-Islam and Dar-ul-Harb,—i.e., the country of Islam and the country of the enemy; and it is the duty of the head of the Mussulman faith to compel the whole non-Mussulman world to embrace Mohammedanism at the point of the sword, "but the poor Sultan can no longer fulfil his duty in this matter, and the poor Pope, his theocratic brother of Christendom, can no longer burn heretics"; and there is beginning to be a solidarity of mankind, based on intelligence, free government, and a general perception that all men and races are really kindred, of a common family with common interests, and that it is folly for them to allow themselves to be longer split up into hostile divisions by differences of religious belief, especially because all the theologies and creeds are pure and arrogant assumptions and dogmatic assertions, which lack actuality. Communities now are divided not according to theological belief, but according to their degree of enlightenment and their enjoyment of a regulated liberty. The countries which are still swayed by the Sultan and Pope constitute dark spots on the map of the world, the regions where ignorance, cruelty, and despotism are the rule. When one remembers the millions on millions of men who have been tortured and slain by Sultans and Popes or by their minions in accordance with the dictates of an arrogant theology, one cannot help gloating over "the almighty fix" in which these two seely and dilapidated potentates find themselves to-day. It serves them right, for they are expiating in some slight degree the abominable cruelties of their predecessors of other days. One can hardly understand how enlightened mankind, in view of the hideous memories of the past, can tolerate the presence of a priest. B. W. B.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE BIBLE: What it is and How it grew. By S. J. Stewart. Delivered before the Independent Congregational Society, of Bangor, Me.

This pamphlet of sixty-six pages consists of two discourses, by the author, Rev. S. J. Stewart. The point of view from which they are written is that of the modern school of scientific historical criticism, as is indicated by the last clause of the title, How it grew. The Bible grew, it was not made. The treatment is radical and bold, and the style robust. Mr. Stewart is reverent; but it is truth that he reverences, and not old associations. He does not fall into sentimentalism. Here is an extract from the discourse on the Old Testament, which is a good specimen of both style and argument:—

It is wonderful what superstitious reverence men have for a book. Any man is inspired who tells the truth. If a preacher were to read the most devotional poems of Whittier or Tennyson or some Hindu in some churches on a Sunday morning, men would be shocked, although it might have infinitely more tenderness and reverence than some verses from an Old Testament. Some men think they feel exceedingly pious when they hear a preacher read, in a monotonous way, that some old patriarch begat sons and daughters and then died, and would feel hurt to hear a really religious literature. But I know not why a record of a babe born to Abraham is any more holy than the story of a babe born in the nineteenth century.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE BIBLE: Being a popular Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon. By Bronson C. Keeler. Chicago: The Century Publishing Co. 1881.

We know nothing of Mr. Keeler's qualifications for the task he has here undertaken, except what the book itself discloses. Judging by this test, his qualifications were ample. He seems to have made a thorough and careful study of the materials of the subject, and has given in consequence a book of real value for popular use. It is a volume of one hundred and twenty-six pages, neatly bound in flexible covers, and makes an excellent companion of the Revised New Testament. The price is seventy-five cents only, a small sum for so much information; and it is information of a kind that has not heretofore been within easy reach of the majority of Bible readers.

THE Catholic Review contains an earnest protest against Dr. Hale's view of church taxation, involving a provisional guardianship of church charities by the State. His suggestion, that those among the churches who can be shown to exert a full and impartial system of beneficence in the community shall be exempted, while those whose work is exclusively for their own parishioners shall be taxed, and the accompanying statement of the position of the Romish churches in this particular, calls from their patrons lengthy defence and complaint. For this purpose, they adduce cases of Catholic assistance for Protestant woe, and of denial to Catholics, when in Protestant hands, of the spiritual ministrations which they consider vital in their times of distress, and charge the proposition to levy tax upon the Catholic abundance as an expression of intolerance and greed. Were Dr. Hale's plans put to the test, the summing of evidence would require for impartial treatment a masterly discretion and surveillance not easily procured. But the agitation of the theme, even by suggestion of impracticable methods, is useful for calling notice toward the vital features of exclusively secular polity.

THE October issue of the North American Review is made up largely of papers bearing upon national affairs. These open with an enumeration, by Senator John T. Morgan, of some of the perilous elements in our governmental structure that call for the wisdom and integrity of the people to be applied for their abatement. An essay follows on "The State and the Nation," by Senator George F. Edmunds; "Why Cornwallis was at Yorktown?" by Sydney Howard Gay; "Shall Two States rule the Union?" by Thomas A. Hendricks; and "Washington as a Strategist," by Colonel Henry B. Carrington. The late concentration of the public eye upon the seat of government seems to have called these themes into a widening field of discussion. The two exceptions in this group of magazine papers are one upon "The Elements of Puritanism," by Professor George P. Fisher, and "The Ruins of Central America," by Désiré Charnay.

THE International Review contains a critique, by William E. Boggs, of Mr. Atkinson's article on "The Solid South," and a paper on Roscoe Conkling, by Frederick W. Whitridge. The other contributions are "The Treasury and the Banks," by H. W. Richardson; "The Southern Educational Problem," by Walter H. Page; "John Wesley," by William Myall; and "Immanuel Kant," by Edwin D. Mead. It is said that Mr. Atkinson's paper has awakened considerable excitement in certain circles at the South, thus calling out the reply of Mr. Boggs, of Atlanta, Ga., which was selected from a large group offered, on account especially of its Southern origin. The article on Education at the South is commended to particular attention.

WORDS.

Ἡρεπνῖτα ἔπα.—Homer.

Articulated air, we yet outlive

Memorial bronze and marble's sculptured brightness;
To thought of sages, bards, we pinions give,
And buoy them through the ages with our lightness

Through gates of sense, on airy plumes we glide

Into the unseen spirit's ædæd mansion;
With speed, its mystic valves unfolding wide
For our ingress with friendliest expansion.

Along sensation's thoroughfares we run,

Thought's dome our music thrills with sweet vibration:
Two worlds, matter and spirit, into one
Are knit and married by our mediation.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 6, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX: namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF RATIONAL RELIGION.

No. II.

In our article last week on certain fundamental principles of rational religious faith, we stated the first of these principles to be "Belief and Trust in the Universe." The second principle, which we are to consider in this article, is "Belief and Trust in Goodness." The first principle is intellectual, the second is ethical. Yet the two are intimately allied, and may be said to imply and sustain each other. And as we found that the validity of the first principle rests, primarily, on a necessity of human consciousness, and, secondarily, is confirmed by experience, so is the validity of this second principle established in the same way.

Our statement of the second principle, it will be seen at once, raises the question of the basis of the Moral Law; and our solution of the question is that the root or ever vital germ of morality inheres constitutionally in the human mind,—that is, is intuitive; but the development of this faculty, like the development of the mind in general, has been effected under the tuition of experience.

But to claim that the moral sense is intuitive is by no means to affirm that man must have begun his career on the earth with a fully developed conscience, or even with any apparent conscience at all. There are perceptions of mathematical truths, rightly called intuitive, which did not appear until humanity had made long strides in intellectual progress. There are impulses and sentiments in individual life admitted to be intuitive, which yet do not manifest themselves until the appropriate processes of physical and mental growth have preceded them. Whatever the mind itself contributes from its own inherent resources to the sum of life, whenever and however done, is rightly called intuitive: whatever is contributed by the environment might be called tuitive. But the two processes work harmoniously together to one end, both in the individual and the race; and that end is mental and moral development.

We accept entirely the teaching of evolution that conscience is a faculty of slow growth, which can be traced in the human race to a point that may rightly be said to mark its historical origin. According to the now commonly accepted view of primitive mankind, there was a time when man could hardly be said to be a moral being. The vital germ of the moral sense may have been lying within him, but it was unmanifested. He may have had the capacity for morality,—nay, must have had it, since he has become a moral being,—but it was an undeveloped capacity. The question is, How did this capacity become developed? in a way to indicate that it has its root in certain eternal and unchangeable principles, or in such a way as to show that it is only connected with transient and variable phenomena of human experience?

To answer this question, we go back with the modern students of anthropology to that remote era when man was only engaged in a fierce struggle for physical existence, amid savage and brute conditions of life. The deepest instinct he possessed was that of self-preservation. His all-dominant motive was to keep and defend his existence. Whatever threatened peril to life was shunned: it was an evil. Whatever was helpful to life was sought: it was a good. The primitive man, thus seeking instinctively to preserve the life with which nature had endowed him, would begin to classify things as good or bad, according as they helped or hindered this natural desire for life. And, then, he would classify persons in the same way. If another man attempted in any way to interfere with his existence, to deprive him of it, or to take from him any of those things which he had gathered for sustaining it, such a man was an evil man, to be resisted and guarded against. If any two men should come to see that they might help each other to defend their existence by joining their forces against a common enemy, each would regard the other as a good man, whose company was to be welcomed. But all this might go on without any active moral sense. The principle of social sympathy might thus be developed, as well as the principle of warlike hostility, both from the instinct of self-preservation, and yet no faculty of conscience appear. Instinct and experience have both been factors in this process of development. It is instinct that has furnished the motive to self-preservation. The very desire for life, inherent in man and compelling involuntary effort to maintain life, is nature's own self-perpetuating energy. But it is experience that has shown what conditions are favorable and what are unfavorable to this desire, and that has thus separated things and persons into different classes, which are necessarily regarded with different feelings, and are pronounced as agreeable and disagreeable, or as good and evil. Here are preparatory ingredients of morality, but not as yet morality itself. One vital ingredient is yet wanting. Thus far, life has developed by the line of the selfish desire to preserve one's own existence. Even when two or more of these primitive men may have combined their forces against some common danger, it has been a combination of self-interests for the better protection of the rights of each to his own existence. All this has been valid action, because in obedience to natural law; but it has not been moral action. Let us see then, if we can, by what steps this process of life development rose to the plane of moral principle.

We have said that, by the very necessity of the conditions of existence in the primitive state of mankind, one of the first elements of human consciousness must have been an instinctive feeling, on the part of each individual man, of a right to existence (not a moral, but a proprietary right), to be maintained against all external assaults. Now, as soon as there came to any one individual of this primitive race the mental perception that another man had as good a right to existence as he had, and that if that other man, his neighbor, had no right to take his life, so he had no right to take his neighbor's life, then dawned the moral sense. It began in the mental transference to others of the same kind of rights claimed for one's self. Man first said to his fellow-man: "You have no right to kill me! You have no right to carry off this food which I have gathered for my subsistence, or these boughs of trees which I have fixed for my protection!" But as the struggle for existence went on, and it dawned upon his growing intelligence that others had the same right to existence as himself, he began to say: "I have no right to kill you! I have no right to carry off by stealth your food or your shelter!" And, at the moment of that recognition, the Moral Law was born. It is man's intuitive perception of the equation of rights between himself and his fellow-men in their relations to each other. And this is a perception that must have come just as certainly and naturally, as soon as there was intelligence enough to comprehend the relation, as came the perception that two times three equal six.

Here is the rock-bed of all moral science. Upon this impregnable foundation has been actually built, stone by stone, room by room, the whole edifice of human morality, with its great departments of civil and legal justice, its commercial integrities, social amenities and good-will, and all its august obligations and sanctities. From this Mount Sinai of the human consciousness came the primitive commandments, "Thou shalt not kill!" "Thou shalt not steal!" "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor!" "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife nor house nor field nor any thing that is thy neighbor's!" Here, too, in this equation of rights between human beings, is the later rule which Confucius gave in one word for the conduct of life,—"Reciprocity"; and here, also, is the root of the Golden Rule of Zoroaster and Jesus,—"Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you." In the increasing enlightenment of mankind there has been an ever-widening and improving application of the moral law, because of a more accurate knowledge of the things that are good and evil, and hence special moral codes and precepts have been variable and progressive; but that constraining sense of obligation which the moral law carries with it as its peculiar characteristic is rooted in man's perception of an eternal equity,—a perception that is as inherent to his consciousness as is the perception of any mathematical truth. And this gives us a basis for morality as irrefragable as is the basis of mathematical science. The same mind cannot help believing and trusting in goodness any more than it can help believing and trusting the principles of arithmetic.

That this belief and trust are confirmed by experience needs hardly to be argued. If the aggregate experience of the human race, generation after generation, has taught anything, it has taught that obedience to right brings better and richer and more fruitful life, while disobedience means disorder, misery, sterility, clash of force with force, fratricidal strife among the very elements of existence,—a strife, indeed, that is suicidal and leads toward the abyss of annihilation. The very persistence and existence of mankind, and of the universe, have been conditioned on adherence to this law of equity. The ultimate welfare of the whole depends on each man's fidelity in completing his side of the equation. Hence, the morality that began with a perception of the equality in human relations opens into a perception of wider relations, and becomes a universal morality. There is an equation of rights which is also to be translatable into duties between man and the universe. As man has received his life from the universe, so does he owe his life's devotion to the good of the universe. From that primitive, instinctive feeling of a right to keep and defend the flesh and blood which nature had bestowed, has at last grown the law of righteousness, by which nations survive and a universe is completed and preserved.

WHERE DOES THE SHOE PINCH?

Among the brief articles of comment upon the grounds, origin, and prospects of civil service discussion, that have appeared of late in the editorial columns of the Index, some statements have elicited a letter of remark and criticism from a New York writer, which at its outset disclaims any purpose of publication. But, as this writer lays charge of "much party bigotry and ignorance even in the cultured ranks of Massachusetts liberals," and demands that "they should do justice to the memory of Jefferson," at the same time calling attention to the articles above named, and to that of the issue of September 1 in particular, it may not be out of place to reply briefly in these columns.

It is difficult to locate the ground of his complaint respecting justice to the memory of Jefferson; for, in the very article to which he points, this very one of the early presidential incumbents, although not mentioned by name, was accredited with extreme circumspection in the apportionment of civil service holdings, the statement running thus: "Washington's successors kept intact this high code of honor until the baleful administration of Andrew Jackson. One of them carried it to such an extreme as to deny office to any man, however meritorious, who was a family relative of his own." The writer's avowed familiarity, in other portions of his letter, with the history of those administrations, must have recognized the subject of that last citation. He further calls attention to prominent flaws in the recent administrations of our government (after ventilating troubled periods of the earlier ones), and, while admitting the justice of "charging Van Buren with political crime," "begs to know what was his share in late delinquencies which he specifies. It may not be irrelevant to remark that the shortcomings of this, that, or the other party in various particulars, whether in earlier or later times, can have little weight in determining a judgment of evil in the abstract.

If a claim seemed to be unduly set up for inviolate purity on the one side or undue severity administered in rebuke of the other, it is not impossible to descry the vein of predominating sentiment that pervaded the body politic in the one case or the other. Recent developments are hinting broadly at a state of public opinion that shall operate in wide areas toward the extinction of the sort of partisan affection that fosters or excuses any species of political trickery, and the old furniture will need a powerful revamping to hide the weakness of its joints from a newly awakened popular inspection.

Senator Van Wyck, of Nebraska, may urge that none shall venture into the water until they have learned to swim, reserving to himself and ilk the examination of those who would handle the government ropes; but it seems highly probable that classes may be established among the people at large for learning to swim in the natural way, whatever the risk to political jobbery.

THE SEARCH FOR A RELIGION.

Another large audience greeted Professor Adler at the Parker Memorial Hall last Sunday. The theme of the day, "The Search for a Religion," was pertinent to the religious condition of the time. There are those at the present time, said the Professor, who feel that something they have esteemed precious has gone out of their life. They have lost the religion of their childhood, and fear that there is nothing to take its place.

The old answers to the great questions do not satisfy them: they long to find something that corresponds to deep yearnings and longings within them, to find in nature that which shall be cognate with their own natures. And, if I rise to speak to-day of the search for a new religion, it is to say that I, too, am a searcher with others. There are those who cannot be counted in this search for a new religion. They are of three classes. First, there are those who are satisfied with the old religions. They afford them a feeling of security: they do not question or criticize its solution of the problems of life. Let us speak of them with respect. Let us avoid the denunciation of extremists, who think no one can hold to these beliefs who is not a knave or a fool. There are persons of exceptional intelligence who still cleave to the old beliefs. This is the case of a considerable number of men of science. The influences of early life are powerful with them, their feelings are stronger than their reason in this domain of thought.

It is supposed by such persons sometimes that the search for a new religion means simply hostility to the old. But it does not array itself against Judaism nor Christianity nor any of the systems of the past. Mankind is greatly indebted to Judaism. It was the first religion of the world to rescue the human mind from idolatry. It was the first ethnic religion that gave to it an ethical one. Neither does the search for a new religion proceed from an indisposition to recognize what is justly due to Jesus or Christianity. The question to be asked of the religions of the past is, Have they served mankind? Do they serve it to-day? Otherwise, they are worthless.

There are others who do not join in the search for a new religion, because they entertain the feeling that it is well for them to be on good terms with the old. Religion is to them like a rich heiress, around whom suitors sing her praise, but who despise her behind her back. It is not her they want. The young physician thinks it advisable that he should bestow upon her attention. It may help him to get started in his profession. The young lawyer joins in the company of her devotees for similar reasons. The banker concludes it will be well for the bank for him to have a pew at church. Others keep up a connection with it, because it is supposed to favor their social interests.

And as the people, so the priest. Many a man occupies the pulpit who disbelieves what he preaches. He justifies himself by saying the people are not ready for the truth, which simply means that he is not ready to meet the consequences of uttering it. It is said of such a one by way of excuse for him, "Oh, it is his business!" As though it were not the first business of the preacher to be sincere!

It is affirmed sometimes that religion was never stronger than at present; and, as an evidence of this, one is pointed to the wealth which it represents, the costly architecture and magnificence of its churches. But do we not know that there was never a time when the temples of Paganism were so magnificent as at its close, when the storm was about to break that was to shake them to their foundations?

A religion which is really strong does not lay such stress upon externals. Christianity was never stronger than when the babe Jesus lay in a manger, and it looked upon outward display with contempt.

The third class, who do not join in the search for a new religion, are those who have no interest either in the old religion or the new. Heine said he became disgusted with atheism when he found it was preached in the beer-shops. The condition of an immense mass of the people in this respect, at the present time, is by no means an exalted or happy one.

It is said that a very large part of the population of London, especially of the working-class, never enter the churches. Every one acquainted with Berlin knows how it is there. The material way of looking at every thing prevails; and the consequences are manifest in the life of the people, from the absence of idealistic views. The material side of science is emphasized. The anthropomorphism that once prevailed in religion is repeated in the personification of science. The unfathomable mystery that unites the operations of matter and force, before which the greatest scientists stand in awe, awakens no such emotions in this class of minds. The world is a machine. Life becomes blank prose. There is no such thing as morality. Any one has a right to follow the objects of his selfishness. There are a large number of such persons in all our great cities, persons whose interests do not go beyond their factory or daily occupations, and whose sympathies are limited to those of their most immediate relations. From whence, then, is to come the power to transform the lives of these persons to that which is worthier to impart the inspiration of loftier ideals?

The artist, though bound to the sphere of the sense, is above it and transfigures it. But neither knowledge, science, or art can satisfy the deepest need of human life. What is that which none of these can meet? It is impossible for one to contemplate the spectacle which the universe presents, without asking from time to time this question,—What does it all mean? Not what this nation or age means, but what does it all mean?

There are times when this question comes with terrible force. Such a time was that period of devastation and havoc known as the Thirty Years' War. The time of the French Revolution was another, when the edge of the guillotine became blunt with the number of its victims; another the time of the Black Plague, when all Europe was a charnel-house, and twenty-five millions were swept away by it. The question must have arisen before these appalling visitations, What does all this mean? But there are times of personal experience when this question presses upon us with ever greater weight, when the loss of even twenty-five million lives seems as nothing to our loss. You go to science for an answer. You ask of astronomy, and it will say, "I have scanned the immensity of space, and I can find no answer." You ask of geology, and it will say, "I have searched through the æons of change in vain for one." Biology will give the same reply. Religion alone can give an answer. It has always given an answer of some kind to this question, and thus has preserved its hold upon the human heart.

But it has been proclaimed, first in whispers and now upon the house-tops, that the answer it has given is false. Christianity answers that the meaning of this life is to prepare for another, a comfortable doctrine so long as believed. Theology answers that the meaning of religion is to reveal the will of God, and our duty is to do his will. But suppose I have lost faith in these old beliefs, and they no longer afford a satisfying answer. I treasure the answer that I have found for myself. It came to me many years ago, shedding into my mind the peace of starlight. The answer came to me that the purpose of the world is goodness. The purpose of existence is to make real the good, first in our own lives and then in the world. There is no peace, unless we believe that this world means something—that there is a power in it that can work for righteousness, that is capable of rising to higher and higher destiny. We say to those who are sick with doubt, Act out the good, and then you will believe it is the reality of all realities. Look into a city like New York, where thousands pass their lives in squalor and wretchedness, and no one raises a voice in their behalf.

Is it not a poor compliment to Christianity that, after eighteen centuries of its civilization, such things exist. Christianity says: "Be calm: there is a governor of the world who will right these things some time; if not now, by and by."

But who is there that believes in the power of the good to change these wrongs, who does not feel that he ought to try to do it? Man may be a world-builder of right and justice such as there has never been before. Thus, the new religion will summon us away from our selfish interests. As the stream rushes away from the fountain, so may we abandon ourselves to universal ends, and thus find in the happiness of others rather than in our own our real reward. ATTICUS.

AN effort is started this fall in Michigan to organize some effective action in the direction of a revision of the tax laws of the State, for the purpose of greater justice in their administration. Popular expression on this important topic is solicited, those who believe that church property should be taxed being urged to come to the front, and state fairly their reasons therefor. "They are virtually bidden, as at a marriage service, to make their objections known, or ever after hold their peace." It is declared that, if the advocates of equal taxation do not now establish a hearing, "it will be folly to agitate the question again for twenty-five years to come," as silence now stands for acquiescence in the existing policy of church exemption, whereas an effort at resistance, even though unsuccessful, leaves the ground open for future resumption. It is proposed to work on the single line of Equal Taxation; and, as money will be necessary to defray the costs of printing, circulation, correspondence, etc., memberships, with a fee of one dollar, are solicited in the "Michigan Equal Taxation Club." A list of some thirty names, from various portions of the State, the first being that of E. W. Meddaugh, of Detroit, foots a circular, which will be followed by a printed address in pamphlet form as soon as practicable. The provisional secretary is S. B. McCracken, 84 Seitz Block, Detroit.

A CORRESPONDENT inquires of the editor of the Investigator, "whether a Free Religionist is a Christian or not." The Investigator editor's reply is that "he is an infidel really, though nominally a Christian." If by "Free Religionist" is meant a member of the Free Religious Association, the editor will find, by reading the constitution of that Association on next the last page of the Index, that no question is asked or permitted as to the beliefs or disbeliefs of the members. So far as the requirements of the constitution are concerned, members may be either "infidel" or "Christian." As a matter of fact there are among the members both of these classes. There are some members, perhaps, who might rightly be characterized by the Investigator's phrase, "nominally Christian, but really infidel." But there are certainly many more who would not even nominally take the Christian name. Both terms, "Christian" and "infidel," have become in popular use of such vague significance that they do not render much aid toward accurate classification, unless one first defines them. The editor of the Index calls himself neither "Christian" nor "infidel."

THE political newspapers, and more especially their Washington correspondents, are very busy in reconstructing the Cabinet for President Arthur. It is probable there will be some changes, but at this writing President Arthur himself has not given any sign as to what they will be. The Senate has been called together in extra session, and is to meet on the 10th inst. By that time or soon after, perhaps, the Cabinet problem will be solved. But, whatever appointments the President may make to Cabinet positions or elsewhere, we do not see how, if he adheres to his inaugural address, he can favor one faction of the Republican party to the exclusion of another. Remembering how he has come to the presidential chair, he will naturally be on his guard against making appointments of such a character as would fulfil Guiteau's confessed purpose in assassinating President Garfield.

THE Tablet (Catholic) remarks: "The Methodist convention in London has decided against sending Methodist children to Catholic schools. That was the most natural thing in the world; but when Catholics, who are more firmly wedded to their religion than most people, object to sending their children to Protestant schools, they are denounced as bigots and propagandists." The Tablet is right; but the fairest way to settle the matter is to make the public schools neither Protestant nor Catholic. There are so many things that both Protestant and Catholic children need to learn that the public schools may well be confined exclusively to these things, while the teaching of Protestantism and Catholicism can be left to the respective churches.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

It is reported that Professor Laveran, of the Medical School of Valde Grasse, France, has discovered a new parasite, which he claims may be found in the blood of all persons affected with malarial fever. The organism is described as a minute cell, in general appearance somewhat like a white blood corpuscle, with amœboid movements, and having an animal rather than vegetable character.

It is getting to be quite universally recognized that neither epidemics nor the spread of disease in any of its forms are ever supernatural visitations, but the product solely of natural, if not wholly material, causes. The most prolific source of them in great cities is the overcrowded and unhealthy condition in which the population in certain quarters pass their lives. Professor de Chaumont, in a recent address before the Sanitary Institute of Great Britain, testifies as follows upon this point: "We are pretty certain of this, that diseases do not arise indifferently, but are due to certain causes, which we hope will hereafter admit of being traced out and analyzed. We have ascertained that certain conditions of existence are favorable to the development of certain diseases, that the living on a wet and contaminated soil, the drinking of polluted water, the breathing of a vitiated atmosphere, the crowding of human beings, all have their powerful influence in favoring the spread of disease." He insists that "we must scatter our town population by attempting to provide better dwellings and more open spaces to form lungs of towns." He quotes the statistics prepared by Dr. Farr to show that the death-rate in England corresponds very strikingly with the degree of the proximity of the population. London is the healthiest of the great cities of the world, and exceeds nearly all others in respect to space. "Liverpool, where the average distance from person to person is only seven yards, loses annually one person out of twenty-six, and the mean duration of life is only twenty-six years. Manchester, where the people are seventeen yards apart, loses only one in thirty-five, and has three years more of life. Nine districts, twenty-eight yards apart, lose one in thirty-six, and have an average duration of thirty-two years.

74 districts, 46 yards apart, lose 1 in 40, and live 35 years.
 137 " 97 " " 49, " 40 "
 53 " 147 " " 60, " 51 "

These numbers show the influence which crowding exercises on the health of the community. In particular instances, it has been recognized as one of the most disastrous factors in the propagation of typhus, plague, small-pox, and many other fatal diseases.

ROSAMOND DALE OWEN, who appears to have inherited the intellectual gifts and reformatory aspirations of her distinguished family, has issued a pamphlet bearing the title "Woman's Work," in which she outlines a plan for the improvement of the status of woman in all its aspects, that is entitled to respectful consideration on account of its manifest seriousness of purpose, the freshness of its views, and earnest and vigorous manner of presenting them. Miss Owen proposes a reconstruction and transformation of the whole industrial life of woman, in order that she may secure a wider margin of opportunity for personal culture and the better fulfilment of the various relations that she sustains to others. Miss Owen deplores the large amount of time that is consumed under existing arrangements in domestic labors and cares, and desires to diminish it, if possible. The mode through which she hopes to effect this is given in these words: "The question I wish to discuss in this paper is whether the principle of coöperation can be applied to household labor in such a way as to relieve house-keepers, reduce family expenses, open a wider field to woman, and still preserve home comfort intact." This proposition is worked out in all its details in a very clear and cogent manner. But, unfortunately, there are always, in all such cases, so many adverse contingencies which cannot be put on paper, though the theory appear never so plausible, that the mind naturally tends to hold itself in abeyance in respect to its feasibility, if not to wholly distrust it, until proved. The question, it seems to us, is a very complex one; and there is much that may be said on both sides. In the first place, with all due allowance as to the irksome and onerous nature of woman's work, there are some qualifications and considerations that should be kept in mind in speaking of it, which are often overlooked. We confess we deprecate the growing tendency to look upon woman's domestic work as drudgery and degrading. We know of nothing more disgusting, and few things more criminal, than for a woman, on account of a morbid egotism and desire for a career, to despise the common duties to her home and those nearest to her. Indeed, how often does this idea of the degradation of domestic work lead simply to a shifting of burdens. A large number of young women of the present day are willing to submit to almost any privation, and to even more exacting labors and humiliations in other spheres, if they can escape those of the household. It is no doubt desirable that there should be facilities devised for abridging and lightening the labors of the home. In this respect, it is true, as Miss Owen intimates, woman has been less favored than man. At the same time let it be remembered that there is a discipline of unselfishness accruing from the cheerful and faithful performance of these duties not to be despised, an attainment in which the mothers of a former generation not unfrequently exceeded those of the present. It is important, too, that in all schemes for coöperative housekeeping the family instinct should be considered, and the obstacle it presents to the success of such enterprises, which our modern life, by the way, tends to unduly override. There are several other topics which Miss Owen takes up in her very interesting pamphlet, such as the coöperation of sewing-women, coöperative hospitals with schools attached for physiological and medical training, brain work, spiritual work, the government of children and the government of nations, and suffrage. But we have dwelt upon only one of these, all of which, however, are fruitful in suggestion. D. H. C.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

MID-ENGLAND, July 9, 1881.

There are persons in the United States who would fain have a "National" Church; and many travelled Americans admire our "Established" one in England. Its connection with history, culture, and public order; its liturgy, ceremony, and architecture; the taste, good sense, and general amenity of its clergy,—possess a charm for them above the various heterogeneous and sometimes abnormal forms of worship conducted by ministers of less uniform training and ranker individuality to be found at home. They see Episcopacy, as they do some other of our institutions, through a too favorable, superficial medium, knowing little or nothing of its workings. To such persons and all who fancy that it is possible to crystallize religion instead of leaving it to its own natural development and the organization of such churches as it wants, a sketch of what I must be pardoned for calling the moral and religious aspects of life in an English village may be commended. On the principle that a chain should be tested by its weakest link, the picture should not be without value.

The village in which I have lived for over seven-teens is eighty miles from London and more than four from the market-town of Banbury, renowned in nursery rhyme. It has about seven hundred inhabitants. There are some independent private residents (one of social importance as the son and heir of the lord of the manor), half a dozen farmers, and twice as many tradesfolks, artisans, and shopkeepers, the large majority consisting of the peasantry, agricultural laborers, with their families. The latter are not so badly off as some of their class in other parts of England, but their condition is poor enough from an American point of view; and, like that of all who draw their sustenance from the soil in this country, not likely to improve until there is a radical change in our half-feudal system, now exposed to a crucial test by a series of disastrous seasons and your enormous competition, which threatens both to wreck the landed aristocracy and extirpate the race of tenant farmers. But that by the way. I wish to adhere strictly to my subject.

We have an old church, and almost equally of course, in an English village, a Wesleyan chapel. The rites, etc., of the first, are administered by a resident vicar; the second is supplied by circuit and local preachers. There is a good school on the national system for boys and girls, but no places of public recreation or entertainment, unless I should include under that designation two taverns (licensed to sell spirits) and two beer-shops, all four of which are unmistakable sources of demoralization and poverty to their ignorant frequenters. Most of these do what their proprietors would doubtless call a pretty good business; for the average British laborer has not yet risen above the idea that beer is a good thing per se, and desirable, if not indispensable, on all possible occasions. Still, we are by no means a drunken village, and have, I think, but one absolute sot. And teetotalism is making hopeful way among the rising generation, who sometimes get up a festival and procession with flags, hymns, and tea-drinking in honor of it, also addresses at the chapel. The movement, I am sorry to say, is confined exclusively to the "Methodists," the church folks taking no interest therein, and being, indeed, rather a passive and inert community in general. Which remark brings me at once to the core of my topic.

When I first took up my abode here, the "living," only £135 a year, was held by a mild and amiable middle-aged clergyman, who possessed scarcely any natural qualifications for his office. He had an impediment in his speech, and, whether from fear of exposing it or from diffidence, spoke so low as to be inaudible at a few pews' distance. There was a ridiculous, irreverent comparison which likened his preaching to "a bumble-bee buzzing in a bottle," to which indeed it did bear some resemblance. Truth to tell, the congregation lost very little in not hearing his sermons; for these were the dearest performances it was ever my lot to endure. They were mainly devoted to magnifying "the Church," which he spoke of as a miraculous eidolon and entity, divine, infallible, and supernatural. Apostolical succession, baptismal regeneration, the indissolubility of marriage, the "real presence," etc., in the sacrament,—the poor man believed all these exploded superstitions, and preached them according to his ability. He was, indeed, a ritualist, after the fashion of the late Bishop Wilberforce, who had ordained him and given him his benefice, and for whom, I believe, he entertained a reverence, admiration, and affection beyond all other feelings. I heard him preach on that prelate's death, when he spoke of the "seemingly cruel" accident which caused it, and shed tears. Never once do I remember his saying a hopeful or encouraging word, outside of his pitiful, anachronistic creed, to his fellow-sojourners in this beautiful and wonderful world, nor of the possibility of its becoming, solely by our own efforts, infinitely more and better than the dreary mediæval heaven to which he aspired. That was an idea, I think, which he could not have comprehended. "The Church" comprised everything.

The ministrations of such a man could benefit no mortal. He would have been at home in the bosom of an infallible Romish Church, of which he always spoke with great respect; but here he was utterly misplaced. Yet we mustered an average village congregation on Sundays; and three or four women commonly attended the saints' day performances, which he was so fond of celebrating. The resident gentry went because it was part of their position to do so, the farmers and shopkeepers because it was respectable and customary, a minority of the peasantry for much the same reasons, including propitiation of their employers. From their infancy, most of them had been accustomed to go to church without troubling themselves about the why or wherefore, and the practice had become habitual. It wasn't pleasant, but proper,—a dull hour and a half to be endured with the prospect of finally escaping to dinner or tea. To this, with the poorer folks, was superadded the sensation of resting from their working-day labors and better meals than common. As for understanding the vicar's preaching, could you have obtained a truthful answer from one of them, it would have been a paraphrase, in the Oxfordshire vernacular, of the lines in Tennyson's "Northern Farmer":—

"I 'eerd un a hummin' away loike a buzzard-clock ower my yeid,
An' I niver know'd whot a meän'd, but I thowt a 'ad summut to say,
An' I thowt a said whot a owt to 'a said, an' I comed away."

But for the school boys and girls, duly led by their master and mistress, I think we should have made but a poor job of the responses, etc. However, they went at them like any other task, and scuttled through the creed with a loud, mechanical unconsciousness that was amusing. Our vicar's Romish proclivities commanded no sympathy, except on the part of a silly woman or so,—a doctor's wife who thought it devotional to "flop" or make a low courtesy to the cross over the communion-table whenever she entered the church, and some idle farmers' daughters. The average Briton, whether rural or civic, has a deeply rooted distrust of "Popery," thanks to the Marian persecutions and Fox's Book of Martyrs,—a household volume in all old-fashioned families. But there was not much open dissent, beyond an occasional, "I calls that idolatry!" from some Protestant listener of the lower class, after the preacher had been touching on "Confession" and "the Body and Blood of our Lord." He seemed to have a real pleasure in pronouncing those words, as also in reading certain of the Old Testament "lessons,"—the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, for instance,—which some clergymen can scarcely encounter without blushing. Doubtless, he thought the greater the (apparent) scandal, the greater the merit. Such a slave to the letter was he that, on my suggesting that the appearance of the church would be much improved were ivy permitted to grow over its rather bare exterior, he answered that he doubted if the practice was canonical, and inquired, "Did I know what one of the Fathers had written on the subject?" And bare the church remains to this day.

Privately, he was not unkindly nor unsocial, but always from a stand-point which forbade anything like real conversation. As a non-communicant and an exceedingly irregular attendant at church, he unquestionably regarded me as outside the pale of salvation. I had, also, some connection with newspapers, which articles he distrusted, once cautioning an agricultural laborer who migrated to America "never to read any of them." Yet he himself greatly enjoyed the Times. Unlike most of his class, ritualists (in the country,—they do good work among poor folks in the towns), he did visit his humbler parishioners, which might account for a sort of negative popularity accorded to him; but his charity (entirely derived from the communion alms) was always regulated by the appearance at church on the part of the recipients. Hence, it frequently became a premium on hypocrisy. He knew as little (which is to say almost nothing) of the real characters and feelings of the poor as all the upper classes do in England; for, like the slaves in America before emancipation, our serfs are habitually and unfathomably distrustful of "their superiors." However, most of this kind of "parish work" was performed by our vicar's wife and some lady friends of hers, who regarded the "cottage folks" as dirty, disagreeable, and importunate human animals,—necessary, perhaps, like pigs, but more troublesome. These ladies administered the alms exclusively to their personal sycophants, until the scandal became so great that one of our gentry interfered, and took the business out of their hands by organizing a committee for fairer distribution, since which time there has not been much to complain of.

Mrs. — was a village Mrs. Prondie, and always reminded me of Trollope's Bishopess. In virtue of his office, she regarded her husband as the head of the community, and fought several battles in vindication of his right. All persons who did not defer to him and equally to herself she detested as ill-conditioned contemners of social order. She would, I verily believe, have liked to burn down the chapel and hang the "Methodists." In religious virulence, however, she was eclipsed by a corpulent spinster-friend and toady of hers, who talked so objectionably to them that somebody retaliated by sending her a post-card containing the following lines:—

"Miss —! Miss —! I write unto you,
You ugly old maid and mean old screw:
You go up and down a-prying and peeking,
In folkses houses a-poking your beak in.
You say chapel-folks will go to hell,
But you may go there yourself as well;
And won't you far frizzle and make a smell?"

I believe there was a reward offered for the discovery of the author of this libellous doggerel, but in vain.

The above would lead me at once to the "chapel-folks" and their belongings; but I must remember that the Index is not a large paper, and its space is proportionately valuable. If you care to print the foregoing, I will finish my account of our village in another letter. T. B. G.

AN EXPLANATION.

DEAR INDEX:—

The closing paragraph of my article on "The Right to Criticise Theology" should have been omitted. The article was intended for publication prior to my essay on "The Influence of Theology on Society." The editor changed the order, and overlooked the amendment suggested above. I mention it only because those who have taken the trouble to read my articles might misunderstand the intimation conveyed that something more was to come, when, in fact, the last of the series was published in the issue of September 22, under title of "Working Basis," etc.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES ELLIS.

724 Washington Street.

THE WORD-FETICH.

One step more, and we reach the highest grade of fetichism; rising insensibly from all before described. What is an orthodox creed, but a mystic word-fetich? Look at the wafer elevated by the Romish priest in the sacrifice of the mass, as a piece of God-man,—thousands prostrate before it, not daring even to look at it, so awful is their dread of its power to bless them and to curse them, to annihilate them instantly! Yet that is merely a thing-fetich. Look now at that dogma, elevated by the Protestant preacher before the logical understanding of his audience, whose souls lie prostrate in the dust before it, not daring to use their reason on it, or to look it for a moment in the face, believing, as they must, that to doubt it is to be damned! That is a word-fetich.

What is the school of Gaussen and Hengstenberg among theologians, but a sect of Christianity retiring from the noble reverence and practice of the Spirit of Christ and his apostles, and from the sublime conceptions of the Hebrew poets, and dropping backward and downward on to the ground of literal fetichism; worshipping the letter which, Christ says it, must kill; and converting the literature of all the Hebrew ages, from David and Solomon to James and John, into a gilt-edged quarto bound in calf, putting a more fatal stop to the progress of the Christian Church toward its millennial purity than ever did the golden calf which arrested the progress of Israel into their promised land! There are multitudes of Christians living now, who entertain so strongly the old Jewish reverence for the word Jehovah, that they bring themselves to pronounce it only with a strenuous effort of the reason and the will combined. It is not simply from reverence for the infinite God whose special name it is supposed to be, but reverence for the word; because it was for ages one of the great world-fetiches, and called "the unpronounceable." Laymen had no right to take it on their lips. It was a privilege of clergy. It was fetich, or tabu, for the outside masses. Why? Because it lay at the heart of the special religious system of the Hebrews: because it was the supposed formula of Unitarian doctrine as opposed to all idolatry; because it was translated "the living God," and itself shared a sort of weird life; because it was the word-temple in which dwelt the shekinah of all transcendental science; veiled, but ready to break forth in fire and light; veiled like Isis, but before which the initiated priests might worship, trembling and alone. It was, therefore, to the ancient Jew, and still is to the devout but superstitious Christian, an awful silent logos.—From advance sheets of "Man's Origin and Destiny," by Professor Lesley.

THE following is a brief digest of the new Irish land act, as published by the Irish land commissioners. It will be seen that, in theory at least, it secures "the three F's,"—fair rent, fixed tenure, and free sale:—

Fair rent. Every existing tenant, from year to year, in Ireland, of an ordinary agricultural or pastoral holding, is entitled to have a fair rent fixed for his holding either by the county court judge or by the land commission, or it may be settled by agreement with the landlord or by arbitration.

Security of tenure. Whenever a fair rent is fixed, either by the court or commission, or by agreement, or by arbitration, the rent cannot be raised or altered for fifteen years, nor can the tenant be disturbed during that period. In the last year of the fifteen years, the tenant can again get the rent settled and a new term of fifteen years granted, and so on. It is not, therefore, merely a term of fifteen years which the tenant gets, but, practically, a term renewable every fifteen years. It amounts to this: that the tenant, paying a fair rent, and treating the land in a proper tenantable way, and not subdividing or subletting his farm, will be safe from eviction or arbitrary increase of rent, and his rent cannot be increased by reason of his own improvements.

Sale of tenancies. Every tenant may sell his tenancy to one person at the best price he can get; but the landlord is to have first the right of buying, at a price either agreed on between the parties, or to be fixed by the court.

Acquisition of the holding out-and-out by the tenant. There are provisions in the act authorizing the land commission to advance money to tenants to enable them to purchase their holdings and become absolute owners of them.

Fixed leases. There are also provisions enabling tenants for life and other limited owners to give leases in perpetuity to tenants.—Boston Herald.

THE October issue of the Atlantic Monthly has a brilliant bouquet of graphic gleanings; some recollections of Carlyle, by T. W. Higginson, and a description of a South Sea Islander in a paper on "A Tropical Sequence," by Charles Warren Stoddard, standing among the most prominent. Phillips Brooks also talks of Dean Stanley, Richard L. Dugdale discusses the "Origin of Crime in Society," and a notable array of other valuable matters from eminent pens completes the list.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

SURGEON is accredited with replying to a rude street spokesman who called him "a very great humbug" that he was "only too happy to be a very great anything."

PROFESSOR LESLEY'S Man's Origin and Destiny, from the proof-sheets of which we make a striking extract in another column, is to be published at an early day by Geo. H. Ellis, Boston.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD will start on his lecture tour this month. He will extend his route as far west as Kansas. Applications for lectures may be addressed to him at Thorndike, Mass.

THE historian Freeman is giving his attention to the proof-sheets of a new book, Sketches from the Subject and Neighbor Lands of Venice, the result of a recent visit to the Adriatic. He starts for this country in September, and lectures in Boston on October 17th.

MR. J. L. STODDARD has commenced his brilliant delineations of foreign travel, the opening scenes being drawn from picturesque Scotland. It is a satisfaction to Liberals to reflect that work so pronounced and constant in its popularity as Mr. Stoddard's is not only free from a spirit of truckling to crude prejudice but bears ever the ring of manly and generous culture. The crevices are not few in the ranges of his descriptive scenery, wherein the audience must descry the gleaming vein of some radical truth and sentiment.

GENERAL WILLIAM BIRNEY, of Washington City, is preparing a work on the life and times of James G. Birney, or the rise, growth, and success of the anti-slavery movement in the United States. He requests all persons having in their possession letters from James G. Birney, or anti-slavery papers or pamphlets published between 1831 and 1845, to write, giving him details.

JOHN ALBEE is now at work at his Newcastle, N.H., home upon a novel. He will publish next winter a volume of poems, and soon after a volume of essays selected from his lectures on English language and literature. These lectures were delivered in the winter of 1880-81, in New York, St. Louis, and Washington, and are principally a study of the earliest period of English literature, from "Beowulf" to Spenser inclusive, carrying along an account of the contemporaneous growth and change in our speech. The volume will also contain the two lectures on "Faded Metaphors" which were delivered before the Concord School of Philosophy at the late session.—Commonwealth.

THE full text of the late Dean Stanley's will has been published. The gross value of the estate is sworn at £84,291 6s. 2d., the net value being £83,948 2s. 1d. Mr. Edward Hugh Leycester Penrhyn, of East Sheen, Surrey, and Frances Jemima Drummond, wife of Mr. John Drummond, of Megginch Castle, are appointed executor and executrix and trustees. The late Dean's papers, manuscripts, and documents are bequeathed to the Rev. Hugh Pearson, Mr. Theodore Walrond, and Mr. George Grove, for disposal, after consultation, if they think fit, with Professor Jowett, the Rev. Dr. Vaughan, and the Rev. G. G. Bradley (the new Dean of Westminster). Among Dean Stanley's bequests is a sum to be used for remunerating the guides of Westminster Abbey, and so abolishing fees; but that sum is to go to Westminster Hospital, in case the Abbey shall cease to belong to the National Church as now established by law in England. With respect to the appointment of Dr. Bradley as Dean Stanley's successor, it is mentioned that among the late Dean's papers there was found, after his death, in the shape of a letter addressed to a friend, an expression of his own strong personal wish that, in case of his death, Dr. Bradley might be his successor. This statement was shown to Mr. Gladstone, who communicated the substance of it to the Queen; and Her Majesty was of opinion that she could show her regard for her departed friend in no better way than by allowing his wish to be carried out. Mementoes of the late Dean have been forwarded to various members of the royal family, the Queen receiving a splendid case of binds.

FOREIGN.

Six descendants of Baron von Steuben have sailed from Hamburg to attend the celebration at Yorktown, all of them Prussian officers.

A NEW agreement respecting the naturalization and extradition of Polish emigrants to America is in prospect of negotiation by Herr von Schloezer before he leaves Washington.

THE Irish Land League are said to be on the keen watch for chances to trip up the new bill; but, in its experimental working, issues are possible that may take the starch out of their vigilance.

IT is hoped by the friends of Gambetta that a majority of the chamber of deputies will point him out to President Grévy as the suitable man to form a ministry, by naming him on the opening of the session as provisional president of the chamber.

A SCOTTISH land bill provides for "an adjustment of rents by arbitration, a revaluation of farms, and power in the tenant to sell his holdings." It is considered one of the most effective measures on the land question ever yet submitted to Parliament.

THE Hawaiian domain seems to have plenty of king, but a scarcity of subjects; and the deserted potentate is in search of replenished population to keep his legislative muscles from losing vitality by inaction. The material for such importation is not abundant, for many tribes are unavailable through inadaptation to a tropical climate.

REV. MR. KNOX-LITTLE, the fervent defender of English Church Ritualism, who was in this country last winter and especially distinguished himself by a silly and abominable lecture to women in Philadelphia, has been appointed by Mr. Gladstone to a canonry. He succeeds Dr. Bradley, who has been promoted to the deanery of Westminster as successor to Dean Stanley.

ST. PETERSBURG is on a continued strain of aggression and defence. The beloved sovereign is under the protection of an increased body-guard, and his officials are forced to grave and protracted deliberation over their responsible cares. The circulation of incendiary sheets is on the increase, and large numbers of students are visiting the city, and much apprehension prevails of secret plans.

THE canon of the basilica of St. Peter's, Rev. Sig. Campello, who lately abjured the Church of Rome, is on the point of publishing his autobiography. It is claimed that, in common with other high ecclesiastics, he has tried to "bring about a reform of the papacy, and to obtain a recognition of the right of the Catholic clergy and people to vote at the election of a pope, but that the policy of Leo XIII. has caused him to lose all hope."

THE recent convention in Dublin on the Land Question is said to have been the most representative meeting ever held in Ireland. It was an imposing exhibition of a nation's political strength and stern resolve to wage unrelenting war upon English rule and English despotism in that country. Over twelve hundred delegates assembled from all parts of Ireland to pledge their faith in the national cause and to bid defiance to England's manner of ruling Ireland by gag-law and coercion bills. A remarkable and promising feature of the meeting was shown in the fact that among the delegates, side by side, sat Catholic priests, Orangemen from the north, members of Parliament, Fenians, and even laborers. Indeed, it might be truly said that the millennium of Irish politics has arrived; for never in the history of the country did an assemblage so thoroughly representative come together to deliberate in the name of Ireland upon the affairs of Ireland.—Tablet.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Beaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Watson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. H. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Laker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and brief addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. H. Mills.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new concept on of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

LIVE THOUGHTS' OLD OR NEW.

THROUGH zeal knowledge is gotten, through lack of zeal knowledge is lost. Let a man who knows this double path of gain and loss thus place himself that knowledge may grow.—Buddha.

No WICKEDNESS proceeds on any ground of reason.—Livy.

OTHER men's sins are before our eyes, our own behind our back.—Seneca.

FIVE things are requisite to a good officer,—ability, clean hands, despatch, patience, and impartiality.—William Penn.

LET a man choose what condition he will, and let him accumulate around him all the goods and all the gratifications seemingly calculated to make him happy in it,—if that man is left at any time without occupation or amusement, and reflects on what he is, the meagre, languid felicity of his present lot will not bear him up. He will turn necessarily to gloomy anticipations of the future; and except, therefore, his occupation calls him out of himself, he is inevitably wretched.—Pascal.

WE are now in want of an art to teach how books are to be read rather than to read them: such an art is practicable.—Disraeli.

IT is an old saying that charity begins at home; but this is no reason it should not go abroad. A man should live with the world as a citizen of the world. He may have a preference for the particular quarter or square or even alley in which he lives, but he should have a generous feeling for the welfare of the whole.—Cumberland.

IT is for us to discharge the high duties that devolve on us, and carry our race onward. To be no better, no wiser, no greater than the past is to be little and foolish and bad; it is to misapply noble means, to sacrifice glorious opportunities for the performance of sublime deeds, to become cumberers of the ground. We can and must transcend our predecessors in their efforts to give peace, joy, liberty to the world.—William Lloyd Garrison.

THE essence of religion is the strong and earnest direction of the emotions and desires toward an ideal object, recognized as of the highest excellence, and as rightfully paramount over all selfish objects of desire. This condition is fulfilled by the Religion of Humanity in as eminent a degree and in as high a sense as by the supernatural religions even in their best manifestations, and far more so than in any of their other.—John Stuart Mill.

THE question, Has God spoken to men? no longer means, Has he once broken an everlasting silence? but does the race in all its higher progress manifest a consciousness of a veritable divine impulse to which all progress is due?—J. Allanson Picton.

THE religions of the world are less truly regarded as voices out of the eternal silence than as voices into the eternal silence.—O. B. Frothingham.

LET the free State make free religion, the nation of nations stand open to the coming God, whom the exclusive revelations could not reveal. Stand each in the spiritual freedom that is open eye and ear for the practical and intellectual service that shall further others, and soul and State are saved.—Samuel Johnson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Unitarian Ministers' Institute, held last week at Princeton, Mass., was voted, at least by those present, to have been a success. The attendance and the interest of the essays and discussions appear to have been all that could be hoped for. We especially hear Professor William James' essay spoken of with high encomiums.

THE Theological Faculty of Yale College has given a good lift toward the adoption of the revised version of the New Testament, by the passage of the following resolution: "Whereas, we believe the revised version of the New Testament to be better than any other English version, because it follows more exactly the Greek text as originally written, and is a more clear and correct translation,—therefore, voted that hereafter it be read, instead of the version of 1611, at morning prayers and other devotional services of the Yale Theological School."

WE fear that the Sunday-School Times is guilty of "hedging" in its argument on the efficacy of prayer. This is the agile way in which it meets the fact that all the prayers that were offered for President Garfield did not avail to save him from the fatal effects of the bullet: "Prayer is not to be depended on; but God is. Prayer is not to be tested; but God is. He invites all who will to put him to the test. Those who have hoped for a new argument against Tyndall and Huxley and Ingersoll, in the raising up of President Garfield, are disappointed. God declines to enter the lists for a local controversy on a question which is the subject of bitter personal dispute." Will the Times now give its exegesis of the New Testament promise,—"The prayer of faith shall save him that is sick, and the Lord shall raise him up?"

ANY one who has visited Niagara in recent years has been made painfully aware how much the place is desecrated by speculators and showmen, and that his own enjoyment of the wondrous spectacle has been not a little curtailed by the swindlers that beset him at every step. The effort which has been heretofore discussed, to rid the spot of such annoying and incongruous features by making it State property, is now to be more vigorously pushed, and, it is to be hoped, to successful accomplishment. We have received a circular on the subject, from which we intended to print some extracts; but it has been mislaid. It is our hope, however, to see the day when this magnificent wonder of the world shall be surrounded by an international park, owned and cared for by the Dominion of Canada and the United States.

PUBLIC attention is being aroused to the dangers involved in the increasing practice of carrying concealed weapons. The numerous homicides in late years from this cause, culminating in the killing of the President of the Republic by a pistol-shot, have started the question whether the sale of dangerous weapons cannot be guarded by law. Rev. Robert Collyer well says in a recent sermon: "This is not a land of peace. It is a nation of armed men. The farmer has a revolver in his bedroom, and the merest boy, on the slightest provocation, pulls out his pistol. Two hundred years have proved that, in civil life, at least, the Quaker is right. No Quaker ever shoots, and no Quaker is ever shot. There should be a general disarmament; and we should guard the sale of pistols, as we guard the sale of poisons. It is the brutality that comes from the possession of arms that does the harm."

A WELL-POSTED Liberal writes from Chicago, in regard to the Convention of the Liberal League held in that city recently, as follows: "The compromise bait-resolution was passed. Said resolution is simply a declaration that no resolution passed by the National Liberal League shall be made a test of membership, that it merely stands as an expression of opinion, and the minority voting against it is no way committed to it. Even this shallow thing met with fierce opposition, and a member immediately moved that the League reaffirm its action of last year, and declare in favor of 'repeal' of the offending postal laws. A hearty and nearly unanimous vote carried this resolution. After which the 'prodigal son' was escorted upon the stage; and he declared that, in looking over his past life, he could remember no hour so sad, so desolate, and so repented of as the hour when he withdrew from the National Liberal League. Said he, 'I went out with only three or four, but I thought, if I came back with twelve hundred, maybe you would receive me.'" Is this a portrait of the late chairman of the executive committee?

THE Boston Herald says: "A correspondent of the New York Sun, over the name of 'Christian,' says, 'Down to hell with Guiteau!' That is an unchristian sentiment to hold about anybody, and we hope none of our readers entertain it. Some of them, we know, would be satisfied to have him promptly sent to heaven, while others would like to give him a season of purgatory." We have noticed, even in the religious journals that are laboring in behalf of Christianity, scarcely a shred of "Christian" sentiment manifested toward Guiteau. Some one who looked over a large number of reports of prayers at memorial services on the day of President Garfield's funeral has announced that there was but one in which Guiteau was prayed for, and that was by a colored preacher in Kentucky. From our point of view, this seems entirely natural; but, to those who believe in the revealed authority of Christ, we cannot help putting the question, What has become of the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount, and especially of the precepts, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you?"

THE "SACRAMENT OF SORROW."

Memorial Discourse delivered in the North Parish Church, North Andover, Mass., September 26.

BY JOHN H. CLIFFORD.

We feared, last Sunday, from the sad messages of failing hope from the President's bedside that, before we should come together here again, he would be dead. Too suddenly was that fear realized. The whole week has been a season of grief, more and more profoundly felt, as day after day has passed, bringing the memories of that noble life and of that heroic death in thickening clouds about us, albeit with mournful beauty beaming from their sorrowful depths; days marked, from morning till night and from night to morning again, with the sincerest and saddest tributes of sympathy and esteem, from all parts of the world, that ever were offered by the nations of the earth to a country afflicted and overwhelmed with a universal bereavement. It is impossible that we should fill the accustomed hour with any thoughts but those which occupy the minds and move the hearts of so many millions of men and women, fixing at this moment, it is not too much to say, one and the same impression in the breast of mankind, in every quarter of the globe, where the human race is sufficiently enlightened to appreciate the cause of all this mourning. More than when the strong man was first struck down, more than in all those weeks of unavailing struggle for life, more than at that moment when first we knew that all was over, do we realize now, after days of reflection, of solemn pondering upon the significance of this dark event in our experience, what the nation has been through, what a spectacle the world has looked upon, and what a sacrifice has been made for manhood, for patriotism, and for high and sacred love of duty, that humanity might have, in the mysterious unfolding of the ages' far-reaching purpose, another example for its instruction and inspiration in the things that make for righteousness, for human welfare and peace.

There would seem to be something pretentious and shallow in any attempt now at eulogy of the character which has been lifted up by its own grandeur, and by the terrible power of envious, mad, and too-successful crime, for the admiring and reverential contemplation of mankind. The only helpful, the sole becoming thing that we can do is to seek the heart of all this marvellous experience, that we may draw thence the lessons we need and the consolations that we crave. But the very heart of it all is the sound and truthful core of that man's being who has given himself to his country and to his race, as costly a sacrifice as was ever offered on the earth. It is impossible to study that life at any of its stages, from childhood to martyrdom in the prime of its days, without conviction, steadily strengthening from the beginning to the close, that here were powers as rare, used with a devotion as lofty as ever it was given to man to possess and exhibit in the world. The life of General Garfield is so inscribed in true and generous actions that not even partisan enthusiasm nor personal favoritism could exaggerate the value of the simple, indisputable, self-written record. Nowhere could the praise bestowed equal the character or the conduct which it applauded. He was one of the men who are above all mere plaudits of their fellow-men, as virtue is above all tribute, so that we can only recognize it as we are able, and revere it and love it and strive to follow it. His "Deeds were like great clusters of ripe grapes, Which load the branches of the fruitful vine."

And, as the wine of such grapes needs no sign to make men prize or seek it, so the life that consists of such deeds requires no encomiums to make men love and honor it.

The more it was tried by the sternest tests, the more his character shone, throwing its pure beams further and further into the world, until when, like the sun, it reached its setting, all men united to speak its splendor, and those who had before detracted made haste to render tribute to its glories. Never did a cloudy day more suddenly give place to clearest sky, the sun sinking in all his brightness to his evening rest, than the misrepresentations, which men had but lately sought to fix upon our Chief Magistrate, vanished at that noblest act of all his life, his fearless and triumphant death, leaving him to shine upon the world with the radiance of a spotless fame. And although, in the very noonday brightness of that now newly risen career, we grope as in the night, shadowed in our souls with grief, vainly seeking to understand the mystery of this suffering which seems so cruel,—the emblems of sorrow which almost clothe the land with their sable coverings but faintly symbolizing the sadness of our hearts,—yet shall we find comfort and support, though knowledge may still be denied us of that which made a great blessing come in such shocking disguise, at first, in such execrable shape, when we realize that his spirit still shines forth, with all the great and true, to light our own and other "Nations, groping on their way,

Stumbling and falling in disastrous night,
Yet hoping ever for the perfect day."

The story of our last great martyr's life is so familiar that there is no need to repeat its details in order to impress upon every mind its grand lessons. And yet we cannot too often recall the leading outlines of that extraordinary career. There is something more than mere talk, more than American self-complacency, in the stress laid upon the fact that he was what we love to call a "man of the people"; that, from most humble birth and beginnings in life, he took his way, step by step, to the highest place in his country's service and honor,—may we not say also, since his great sacrifice, in the admiring and loving regard of mankind? Is it not our just pride that nearly all of our heroes have found their way to the stars along the track whose early steps led through darkness and difficulty up the rugged steep of poverty and toil and severest human trial?

But so perfectly do the laws of the world work with the true spirit and brave endeavor in men that, in spite of all which the great soul has done, we hardly know whether to say, at last, when he has reached the summit of his labor, that he rose by his own efforts or that he was borne aloft by the mysterious forces of the moral universe. "Himself from God he could not free," it is well written of the inspired worker whose work completed stands a grand expression of divine power and grace. And neither can we separate from the unseen powers that move and guide the world the man whom we call the architect of his own fortunes, but whose life we see is builded better than even he could know, built as only the world-shaping forces could build it, of the materials and the purposes which make the universal fabric of the soul. And, when we look at it so, we can partly feel what is in the mystery which shrouds such lives even from their own sight. It is no superstition to believe that Abraham Lincoln in his western wilderness felt obscure intimations in his soul of a destiny in reserve for him, whereby he should be called to do and to suffer for the cause of man,—for what he would have called the cause of God in man's earthly life. Nor is it any more unreasonable to suppose that his great fellow-servant and equal brother-martyr, the man whom we lament and love to-day, walked at times on his uncertain way under the shadow of dim promptings which he could not but regard as coming from the Divine Soul that leads men, as it were, blindfold from duty to duty and from height to height, and which sometimes catches them up in a cloud of glory whose trailing brightness keeps them in everlasting remembrance, and makes them an inspiration and a benediction to the race forever. The further behind we leave all notions of a personal Deity continually interposing his will to direct the course of individuals or of nations, the more profoundly may we feel that intimacy of true human souls with the order of the universe which such lives as these make so manifest and so real. It has been said that General Garfield often felt and told his friends that he might die on the anniversary of that battle in which he won honorable distinction, and from whose fire and smoke he emerged to do equal service in the councils of the nation, where he remained until he became the nation's chief, how soon to be cut off, and to become as a signet of virtue set forever upon the hearts of his countrymen. However that may be, on that anniversary he did give up his life for his country, and received a higher promotion for heroism than any human commander could confer upon the bravest of the brave. May we not think that such souls, walking in integrity and in awe in what they feel to be the law of the Eternal, do even catch some glimpses of the hidden necessities held in store for them by the destiny which shapes all human ends? Is it superstition? Is it not rather spiritual vision and inspiration, such as every pure soul possesses in its own degree? Is it anything supernatural? Or does it only prove that the soul is in its true natural relation to the laws of the world? The supposition of such deep spiritual susceptibility is at least no more difficult than the understanding of the great power which men of that order are capable of exercising over others, so as to change the whole course of some tremendous human passion or purpose, as when General Garfield, on that occasion now ever-memorable, rose from the crowd, and, like some heavenly apparition, stilled the raging of the multitude, and stopped the rush of the mob, bent upon destructive work in our metropolis, when Lincoln's body lay at the capitol, by simply repeating from the Hebrew psalm the grand and solemn words, "Clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne," and by assuring the people that God reigned, and that the smitten government still lived.

His whole life shows him to have been a man of utmost simplicity; and now we realize that he was, in words spoken of another, "as the greatest only are, in his simplicity sublime." And simple as he was in his words and deeds, in his whole character and life, so simple was he, too, I judge, in his religious faith, and in its sincere and modest confession. There is something touching, as there was in Lincoln's case, in the almost elementary character of his religious belief and feeling. It is something worthy of special regard that he continued to the end an humble and earnest member of a small and almost unknown sect of Christian brethren. Disciples, learners, they call themselves, and seek, in their way, to make religion a simple act of learning and of doing the divine will. And although one call himself not by that religious name, nor by that of any other sect, yet might one count it sincere and manly in him, and in the like of him, to walk consistently in the almost solitary road of their cherished belief and humble fellowship; and we may almost number him among those who have trodden alone the path of conviction, unrecognized and unrewarded by the crowds that too often estimate the truth and power of a religious belief by the multitude of its followers. The same quality which we see in him here is revealed by every situation of his life. If we were to follow that life in detail for illustration, we must make a biography of the man. But it is better to take it in its unity, as it has left itself in full view of all the world,—a constant, unbroken advance from one condition to another, in which the same moral powers, the same essential character, appear at every stage. A man sure of himself, because he was sure never to go further than he was prepared to go; whose self-reliance rested at every step upon a thoroughly tested capacity; who always proved his fitness to do by what he had done. Perhaps it might be said that the crowning glory of the man's life was his self-adequacy, which gave him adequacy for every work and responsibility to which he was called. From farmer-boy of the Western wilds to soldier and statesman competent and true; from the log-cabin of the frontier to that more than royal palace, the executive mansion of a great, free people, we trace throughout the whole course of his progress the footsteps of a man who trod the earth firmly yet cautiously, fearlessly yet modestly, as one whose constant purpose was to go right, yet who knew the danger of going wrong. And so he seldom made a serious mistake. He never signally failed. His ambition kept him facing toward loftier goals, but never betrayed him by overleaping itself. If he vaulted, it was with careful knowledge of what he was doing, and with a self-restrained ardor and measured leap; and he always mounted to the saddle wherein he rode to higher things. No man ever had honors more thickly placed upon him than he, when both Houses of Congress and the Chief Magistracy all claimed him, as it were, at once; and no man was ever less elated or bewildered by such multiplicity of duties, and of public tributes to his worth. It seems but a shallow judgment to say, as I have heard it remarked, that his wounding and suffering brought out the appearance of another and a different man from what he was before. The patient hero who lay upon that three months' death-bed, and whose sweet endurance seemed to add a new bravery and tenderness to the life of mankind, was the same hero, the same self-possessed, disciplined, high-souled man, with a woman's gentle affectionateness blended with all his manly strength, who had proved himself equal to a hundred trying situations before, and for whom it might have been already known that life could have no emergency which he was unprepared to meet. The man who died at Elberon was the same man who faced death as bravely at Chickamauga. The death was but the natural and fitting fulfilment of the well-nigh perfectly developed life, the last test of an already thoroughly tried soul, which set the stamp of completeness upon that which all his years had been rightly building up. As it was said of one of old, "he had prepared his heart to seek the law of the eternal, and to do it, and to teach statutes and judgments"; and he has also taught men how to fulfil in life the principles which he sought and proclaimed. Self-preparation is the great need of all men for steady advance in true and dutiful life. And never have we seen a better example of it than in him, whose career, so untimely ended as it seems, noble and full as it nevertheless appears, yet strikes us as being only a preparation for things nobler and grander still.

But we see, too, that there is other preparation for a man, and earlier than that which is of himself, the preparation of life in preceding generations, whereof a man inherits somewhat of his capacity and tendencies. Our President was fortunate in this, and it may be offset to some extent against the adverse circumstances of his early years. The ancestors, of fair, however humble record; the healthy blood of good English and New England, mingled with Huguenot stock; the father, who dared the perils and hardships of the wilderness; the mother, who shared his courage and his labor, and who bravely bore the widow's most arduous lot, safely and wisely rearing her children, in spite of poverty and remoteness from social advantages; the mother who still lives, loved for the simple pride with which she said of her illustrious son, "James is a good man,"—tribute which, we may venture to say, he prized as much as any of the honors he received from the world; the mother who doubtless values in turn, beyond all his public fame, the filial loyalty and tenderness which gave her his kiss as her natural meed in the fullest blaze of his success,—in all these, we trace sources of that character and life which generations to come will cherish with proud reverence and love.

How fortunate was he, too, in her, of kindred spirit, upon whom now the country and the world pour sympathy, which, could the will of humanity make it so, should be as healing balm to her broken and bleeding heart. What he was everywhere else, he was in his home. And deeply as his country honored and loved him, how must his wife and children have revered him in their proud affection! So worthy he of them, and they of him! What so lofty as such a spectacle of public greatness and honor and love and lamentation, culminating in the most sublimely simple and genuine domestic sorrow, sorrow of unutterable depth and bitterness, yet glorified by the sweetest resignation, the silent benediction of its mournful tranquillity blending in perfect beauty with his own un murmuring fortitude and surpassing peace? What scene in all history can be compared to this for tragedy, whose harsh features are all melted away into the serene depths of pathos? Of him, of her, and of their dear ones all, how feelingly can we say, in words long sacred by just applications, but for us more sacred still to-day and henceforth: "He was oppressed; he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." If now or hereafter there arise in our country any man to celebrate her great events in worthy song or drama, here surely is a theme surpassing all that time has furnished in some of the deepest and purest elements of human woe and human consolation.

Never was the lesson more sternly and more sweetly taught that character, and character alone, is the true foundation, as its lovely developments are the most beautiful ornaments of a great and helpful life. Well will it be for this country if it learn that lesson from this most afflictive teaching; and ill will it be, if it do not learn it. To put self by, and to do the thing that men require of us, this is one of the chief things we need to learn in our generation and to teach to generations following. General Garfield's unhesitating relinquishment of work which he had begun, and which promised something to his worthy ambition, when he was called to some more needful task, though it might lead not to fame, but back to obscurity,—let this show us what humility is required for duty and how to possess it. It will also show us, in the light of his life, the light which he followed when it was most dim, and found it ever growing as he followed it, until it filled the whole world, that men must be true to this great obligation of self-denying service, until, as in his case,

"In all lands and through all human story,
The path of duty be the way to glory."

He gave up his part in the war just when he had achieved so much of the soldier's success as seemed to promise the highest distinction, left his command, his own regiment of fellow-students and pupils, who might have been as another troop of Ironsides to this, in some things, more than a Cromwell. And he quit the field with the same motive which had made him leave the teacher's, the preacher's, the legislator's calling,—the feeling that he was needed more in another capacity. We may easily believe that the man, whose whole life shows self-abnegation, said truly, in his wife's dangerous illness, that he would gladly give up all his public honors to have her spared to him. And we may as safely believe that she, too, the worthy and morally equal wife, would now give up all his fame, pure as it is, and in some things unexampled, to have him back again in the dear, quiet country home. And yet we know that neither would—even to regain such sweet delights, and to have all this tragic suffering blotted out from their life and memory—take back from their country one act of needful service that could only have been rendered at such cost. Men and women who can drink the cup of woe with such submissiveness will never retrace the steps of duty, but will rather press on to meet fresh trial, when love and conscience beckon them the thorny road. It is told that when his wife was so sick that her true condition had been hidden from him, lest he should be made to suffer, upon being informed of it, he said: "Is it possible that people have so poor an opinion of me? I love my wife and children; but, if they are taken from me, I can bear it. I hope I am not too small to bear the worst a man can endure." Such a spirit could only be matched by that of the wife, who kept up heart for friends and for the people, who, it was said, sent nurses and physicians back to their post when they told her that hope was vain, and who—when she, too, at last found that hope was vain, that life itself was gone—proved herself not too small to bear the worst that a woman could endure. Renunciation is taught once more to all the world in a sublime example.

More than all that can be said, or for a long time done, will it profit our country, and even other lands, that such a man has so lived and so died, joined, in the very climax of his loftiest heroism, to another soul of like quality. His acts, of war or of statesmanship, are not the chief things to be recognized now or remembered in history. But the bequest of his character to his countrymen shall be honored and treasured in the hearts of many generations, with a love and gratitude as deep and sincere as that legacy is rare and costly.

Well may England's Queen give fairest flowers to deck the bier of such a man, in sympathy with such a wife. Well may kings and emperors send words of respect and sorrow for a kinglier man than often wears a crown. Well may the common people, the whole people, but especially the plain people, as the homely Lincoln liked to call them, shed tears of fraternal grief for one who shared in all the trials of their hardest lot, and honored in his heart, as he manifested in his life, their true virtues and best aspirations. Well may the bells of England's cathedrals toll to sound out the sadness of honest English hearts, for a spirit like the best of England's lineage has passed from earth. Well may mourning thousands crowd the track and strew it with flowers, over which his body is borne to its resting-place in his native State, and near his humble home. Well may the whole country participate in his funeral, and be his living monument. But better still may his countrymen, and all who share in our bereavement, find an inward peace like that which filled his breast in hours of anguish, as we leave him at his rest upon the western hill, beside the inland sea.

"Fear no more the heat of the sun,
Nor furious winter's rages;
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
Home art gone and taven thy wages.
Fear no more the lightning-flash,
Nor th' all-dreaded thunder-stone;
Fear not slander, censure rash,
Thou hast finish'd joy and moan."

"Quiet consummation have,
And renowned be thy grave!"

"DEALING WITH THE DEAD."

Under the above caption there appeared in the Boston Sunday Herald of September 11 a well-written and very sensible communication on funeral ceremonies and modes of disposing of the dead.

It was so replete with common-sense hints and suggestions that it is to be hoped it had a general reading, and produced the impression which, from the nature of the subject and the manner in which it was treated, it should have made.

The unwarrantable extravagance and vulgar display so frequently observed at funerals has provoked much comment of late, and many serious-minded persons are thinking that the time has come when an attempt should be made to create a more rational public sentiment touching this important question. There is a very natural and commendable desire among civilized peoples to give their dead decent and becoming sepulture; but, when this disposition degenerates into an ambition for mere vulgar show, it calls loudly for rebuke. If the practice of making burials occasions for ostentatious display rather than to show affection and respect for the dead was confined to those whose wealth justifies them in any expenditure their caprice inclines them to, no one would have cause to more than smile at the folly; but, unfortunately, such is not the case.

The silly multitude, most of whom in all communities are more or less restricted in fortune, feel it incumbent upon themselves to have the same fashionable and expensive trappings for their dead, and to clothe their own persons in similar costly habiliments of woe to those worn by their more wealthy neighbors. In thus attempting to keep up appearances and to deceive themselves with the idea that they are deceiving others in regard to their real circumstances, poor people often become involved peculiarly, with no other resource of extrication than repudiation or the charity of friends. Now, this is all wrong, and utterly inconsistent with what is due to self-respect and from the living to the dead. So imbued, however, is the mass of the people with false notions of propriety regarding burials that it will require a strong and united effort on the part of the more intelligent and influential classes to create a public sentiment that shall correct the evils complained of. If simplicity, delicacy, and inexpensiveness in the manner of dealing with the dead, instead of ostentation and extravagance, shall ever become the rule, and not the exception, a much-needed reform will have been inaugurated.

The communication in the Herald to which the writer has referred contains one paragraph to which particular attention is directed. It is as follows:—

An attempt has been made in England, with what measure of success I cannot say, to substitute coffins made of wicker-work for those ordinarily used, on the plea that this allows the body to speedily decompose and return to its natural elements, while it is essentially a cheap article of enclosure. Surely, this plan should appeal strongly to the minds of a practical community such as ours. There is a reasonable revulsion of feeling against tumbling bodies without a covering into a grave, in the way soldiers are buried after a great battle; but neither need we go to the other extreme, and insist in enclosing the bodies of our dead relatives in costly sarcophagi, after the manner of the ancient Assyrians, or in costly shroud coffins, as is the prevailing custom at the present time. What is needed is a light, inexpensive covering, which will allow of the necessary handling. Anything more than this is a waste due to false sentiment. Now and then, one hears of the burial of dead paupers and criminals in plain deal boxes, and one is somehow expected to think that this is a most melancholy fate. But what difference can it make whether a man is buried in a plain pinewood coffin, or in pinewood casket with black broadcloth tacked on to it? "To the dead all things are alike"; but it is only by a strange distortion of fancy that the living can find any wide dissimilarity between these two methods. I will yield to no one in reverence or respect for the dead, and in such a matter one must, perforce, always have in mind the fact that he will himself some time be a subject for the funeral treatment; but the folly of ostentation at such a time, often at the cost of comfort to the living later on, is one which well deserves to be checked and displaced by the growth of more reasonable tastes and simpler habits.

Since reading the above extract, I have conversed with a number of very sensible people on the subject, and find that, while the proposed innovation meets with some objection, it has also much hearty approval. For myself, I should prefer, before all other modes of disposing of the body after death, cremation; but, as at present, that method is not much in vogue, and is rather expensive, the substitution of the wicker-work casket for the customary coffin or casket would be satisfactory. Of course, it matters not to the dead what disposition the living make of their bodies, yet, if one desires a particular mode of sepulture, one's wishes should, if reasonable, be respected. For myself, I should not object to a soldier's burial; but inasmuch as there is a general repugnance to that form of interment, in peaceful times and among civilized peoples, a casket that would offer but little or no impediment to the escape of gases, as these are evolved by decomposition, would answer every purpose. My desire is that my body shall, after death, return as speedily as possible to its natural elements, and this with as little offensiveness as practicable. Now the deodorizing properties of earth are well known; and, if the body be placed in close contact with it, the repulsive idea of putrescence, which must always be associated with the ordinary modes of sepulture, would be much modified. It is probable that, at the first glance, the idea of consigning one's friends to the earth with only a light, openwork covering will strike the average mind with something like disgust; but I am convinced that, upon sober reflection, all objections will disappear. Not the least among the advantages to be derived from the proposed innovation would be its comparative cheapness, a consideration of much importance with a vast majority of our people. To this may be added another desideratum of a different sort, but of equal value. It will not be denied that funeral accessories are, at best, gloomy enough; nor that whatever will tend to give to these a more cheerful aspect, provided it be decent and respectful, might be adopted with manifest propriety. Now, no one who has seen much of the beautiful and artistic willow-work manufactured at Wakefield, Mass., will doubt for a moment the feasibility of constructing burial caskets of that material which shall combine beauty with utility, and have a cheerful look, quite in contrast with the sombre appearance of the heavy wooden articles now in general use.

To bring about a reform, however, in the direction indicated, or in any other, the united and persistent efforts of many earnest men and women will be required. Now, among the patrons of the Index there are, I am sure, very many sensible persons, who are not afraid to grapple with new ideas, however at variance they may be with preconceived notions; and it is to these, if to any, that we must look to take the initiative in this much-needed reform.

FRAGMENT OF THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

NO. IV.

The Cause of All,
The All-sustaining, All-controlling Soul or Energy of the Universe.

The principle of causality is that every event in nature, every change in the physical universe, must have an efficient cause in correspondence with it. Hence, whatever is created, whatever comes into visible existence, stands in direct relation to some cause or series of causes. "Just as correlatives imply one another, just as the father cannot be thought of without the mind reverting to the child," just as the part implies the whole and, conversely, the whole the part, so an effect invariably and inevitably is correlated with its cause. Spontaneous generation being equally impossible in cosmical evolution as in the production of animalculæ, cause and effect are so related that they stand as the invariable antecedent and consequence, one implying and necessitating the other; the effects, consisting of the properties and qualities of that which constitutes the cause appearing in a new form of action, modification, and transformation, being the result of combination.

There is the persistence of the energy, or creative force, which inheres in the cause translated into new forms and under other conditions into its effects. The cause of a thing is that which immediately precedes it; and, as spiritual energy is the ultimatum of existence,—the Alpha and Omega of life,—it follows that all existence is but an orderly succession of visible phenomena from the invisible. Just as matter and spirit are so related that, in their essence, they become convertible, matter, in its atomic, ponderable state, being resolvable into imponderable elements, and all elements into spiritual energy, so these two apparently opposing forces known as cause and effect are, in reality, supplemental one to the other, being so correlated in nature that any action in one necessitates a corresponding action in the other also, the effect being the cause in action, and the cause manifesting itself only through its effects. For a cause cannot exist without an effect, any more than an effect can exist without a cause. One presupposes the other. The moment we know that something at some time commenced to exist, we also know that that existence has been caused by something other than itself, and yet by something that stands so closely related to it that while, in a certain sense, it is apart, it is also one with it; the cause only being known through its effects, and the effects only being correctly apprehended as they stand related to their cause.

Hence, in order to arrive at a proximate knowledge of the cause of a thing, we must concern ourselves with its visible manifestations. The cause of a thing being always more or less deeply hidden, it is only to be discerned as it is manifested in action. Just as the emotions are only known as they affect the physical organism and thence express themselves in action, the action, or the manifestation, always being in correspondence with and related to the exciting feeling, while it is distinguishable from the feeling, so the effect of any cause stands related to it by the same invariable law of sequence, which never permits the existence of one without its correspondence in the other.

An effect is that which is in relation with the senses, which we can discern by means of its actual presence. Just as words are the formal expressions of informal thoughts, from which they were derived and to which they stand related, so the visible universe of matter is the formal expression of an informal, preëxisting spiritual cause, from which it originated and to which it is related. We absolutely know it to be an effect, because at some time, at some period, it had a visible beginning; because we can study it, can analyze it, can in thought resolve it through all its shifting grades of being to its constituent parts; because we can trace these parts home to an unknown, unseen energy or force, whence it must have had its origin; because we know that as a material universe it has attained its present condition through successive stages of development, that there was a time when it did not actually, substantially exist, but only potentially in unknown elements. We know that matter through various degrees is resolvable into gaseous and ultra-gaseous elements, and that in the combination of these elements we have the first traceable beginnings of life. It was the creation of a visible, material universe from an invisible, immaterial universe of spiritual energies and forces. Such a transformation of the invisible and spiritual into the visible and material necessitated a change of nature in the substance as well as a change of action. It was a correlation of the invisible energies of nature, and a transformation into other and lower forms of action.

For trace back matter to its ultra-gaseous state, to its original primitive constituents, so far as it can be traced,—and it cannot be traced back into nothingness: the law of correlation and conservation of energy forbids it,—trace it back, and it must be traced into the invisible, where it is not lost, but where it assumes other and unknown forms of action. Trace it back, and it must be traced to an energy commensurate with its present development and to all the unrevealed forces of the future; for the sum of universal energy is always the same.

The material universe is related, it cannot be otherwise, through various degrees of refinement, to the immaterial universe of spiritual force, as the effect is related to its cause. The spiritual universe, or the universe of force or energy, is related through successive degrees of development to the external world of form, as the cause stands related and embodied in its effects. And, although varying degrees of development intervene between the two worlds of cause and effect, still one unbroken bond of energy connects the visible with the invisible, the material with the spiritual.

From the action and interaction of these two forces, just as from the interaction of the unseen spiritual energy within ourselves and the bodily organism, life in all its varied manifestations proceeds. For these are the two worlds, the world of causes and the world of effects; and these two are so related that they are one. The cause passes into its effects, and the effects rise up and ultimate themselves into their cause.

Until an effect is produced and recognized, it is impossible to ask for a cause. Seeing the universe in constant change, knowing that those changes are occasioned by endless modifications, combinations, and transformations of eternally preëxisting elements, it is in those eternally existing elements, yesterday, to-day, and forever the same, under all their manifestations, that we find the ultimate cause of all existing effects. But of this infinite substance, this source and soul of things, while we can, with the certainty of conscious knowledge, say that it is, we still must aver that it can only be known through its manifestations. Save as it reveals itself in nature and in mankind as the highest product of nature, it is indeed the "Unknown and Unknowable."

With the Hebrew prophet, we can say, "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect [that is, undeveloped]; and in thy book [or remembrance] all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned [that is, in course of development], when as yet there was none of them."

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

EDGAR QUINET: His Early Life and Writings. By Richard Heath. With Portraits, Illustrations, and an Autobiographic Letter. London: Trübner & Co., Ludgate Hill. 1881.

This book reminds us of Mrs. Clarke's Girlhood of Shakspeare's Heroines. What Lady Macbeth was before she thought of making her husband king, that was Quinet before he lectured against the Jesuits, called Voltaire the sole spiritual ruler of his country and his age and the destroying angel sent by God against the sinful Church, fought in the Revolution of 1848, and was banished by Louis Napoleon. We hope that the last half of this life will soon be told with as much care and zeal as Mr. Heath has given to its first thirty-three years. Nearly one-half of the volume now before us is occupied by a very interesting narrative of the young Frenchman's childhood, and his efforts to reach his true vocation, that of a religious poet. Then follow one hundred pages, devoted partly to Quinet's personal adventures and partly to his trilogy of poems on the Wandering Jew, Napoleon, and Prometheus. The great philanthropist is represented by Æschylus as suffering cruel torments from Jupiter in punishment for the gift of fire to mortals, and as triumphing amid tortures in the knowledge of the limit fixed by destiny to the tyrant's sway. How Æschylus managed to reconcile this view of Jupiter with the reverence felt by his audience for the greatest and best of the gods, we cannot tell; for his drama on the unbinding of Prometheus is wholly lost. The problem, how our great martyr was set free, came down unsolved, until Shelley wrote his "Prometheus Unbound" to show that the chains cast about man by superstition must be broken by free-thought. Quinet, however, supposes that Prometheus has been delivered by Christianity, or rather that he is to be. Our author's Christianity is not in the past or the present, but in the future. "The Christ on the Calvary of Modern Theology endures to-day a passion more cruel than that of Golgotha. Neither the Pharisees nor the Scribes of Jerusalem have presented him with a more bitter drink than the doctors of our time have poured out. But those who wish to extirpate Christianity will not succeed, for it is founded upon the grandeur and independence of the person. Those who reject philosophy will be equally baffled, for it has revealed the laws necessary to the human race. Even to-day, the entire world is a great sepulchre, in which all beliefs, all hopes, seem forever buried. A great number of us weep in secret, having no longer any confidence in that we once most loved. But this stone which oppresses us all will, in the end, be broken. From the depth of the darkness, the God eternally old, eternally new, will be reborn, clothed in light more brilliant than that of Tabor."

This significant passage is from the abstract of the Examination of the Life of Jesus by Strauss, given by Mr. Heath, who says that the German critic "openly joins the crowd who mocked at Jesus as he hung upon the cross." Quinet was more just to Germany; for his own genius was essentially Germanic, as is well stated by Heine, in a lively sketch quoted at the end of the portion of the book we are now describing. This second part closes with the appointment of Quinet as Professor at Lyons in 1839. Here the narrative closes, and here the book might properly have found an end. Nearly a hundred pages more are taken up by an abstract of The Genius of the Ancient Religions. This work is full of interesting passages like this: "As the drama of Prometheus has no possible dénouement except in Christianity, so it is with the Book of Job. What makes this poem so grand is that it goes beyond the Old Testament." And much as criticism has advanced in the last forty years, there is still something for us to learn from Quinet's picture of those fallen religions which he calls the Old Testament of the pagan world. But the addition of this lengthy abridgment of a history to a book, made up largely of poems and anecdotes, greatly impairs the artistic beauty and interest of the volume, and makes it too much like a torso. Not only this epitome, but that of the Examination of Strauss, would have been more fitly published in the same volume with the translation of Quinet's Religious Revolution of the Nineteenth Century, which Mr. Heath has just given us separately. These works, together with the lectures on the Jesuits and those quoted at the beginning of this notice on the relation of the Roman Church to modern society, give material for a volume much more advanced in tone than the present, and not necessarily less interesting. We hope that Mr. Heath will interpret the mature results of his favorite author as carefully and successfully as he has revived the early visions. What he has already done to call attention to a brilliant champion of progress, who has been too little read, deserves our hearty gratitude.

ESSAYS AND LECTURES. By B. F. Underwood.

This is the title of a neat volume, containing thirteen of the lectures that Mr. Underwood has been delivering in city, town, and village, from Maine to California, in the ten years last past. Many of them have appeared in the Index, and all have been copied and published by other papers. They were gathered up, printed in pamphlet form, stereotyped, and at length brought out in this volume by a person who readily saw their value in a pecuniary sense. The volume was published without Mr. Underwood's knowledge and consent; and he is, therefore, not responsible for the imprint, it is but fair to say. Having come into possession of a lot, he now offers them for sale at the Index office at the low price of $1.00. A comprehensive idea of the width of range covered by the book may be gathered from the table of contents, which is as follows: "Influence of Christianity upon Civilization"; "Christianity and Materialism"; "What Liberalism offers in the Place of Christianity"; "Modern Scientific Materialism"; "Woman, Past and Present, her Rights and Wrongs"; "Spiritualism from a Materialistic Stand-point"; "Paine, the Political and Religious Reformer"; "Materialism and Crime"; "Will the Coming Man worship God?" "Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity"; "The Authority of the Bible"; "Our Ideas of God"; "Freethought judged by its Fruits."

As an historical study, the first lecture in the volume is worth vastly more than the price of the book to any person desirous of learning what has been said on the subject by the ablest writers. To people who have no libraries to consult, who want information upon this subject, but who have not time and means to buy books and study them, this lecture will be of value, not only as being instructive, but as containing many valuable references. The country heretic who is continually liable to be called upon to defend his opinions will find here an invincible weapon.

Brevity of space prevents little more than a passing notice of the book, but we must crowd in a "stick" from "Modern Scientific Materialism,—its Meaning and Tendency." It would be difficult to find anywhere a more clear and complete statement of the evolution philosophy than is here given in a brief lecture. Mr. Underwood is, in every best sense of the word, an evolutionist. Although he has called himself a materialist, he has always exercised the right to put his own interpretation on materialism. There is a class of men who were middle-aged, fixed and asphyxiated in their beliefs, before Mr. Underwood was born, and who have never been known for forty years or more to feel the thrill of a thought higher than their avarice, appetite, and passion, who are almost, if not altogether, unacquainted with modern thought, and who have tried to dignify the pessimistic mouthings of their disgruntled egotism with the name of "materialism," and so have brought deserved contempt upon the name. But, with this grade of materialism, Mr. Underwood has no sympathy, and is as little at home among them as he would be in the church. If he has at times grieved his friends by carrying his grist to their mill, it is but right to say that he took such avenues of communication with the public as he found open though not excellent, and often, doubtless, he has been ashamed of his company.

Mr. Underwood is as familiar with the thought of the most thorough of modern thinkers as any man of his years in this country. He is a careful, conscientious reader, compiler, and thinker. His mind is logical and his reasoning strong. His writing seldom rises to the sublime, poetic, and "inspired" or electric in style, but it is always clear, clean, sound, sensible, and convincing. These lectures will be found to be very attractive reading. The following brief extract will give some idea of the ethical side of the author's "materialism": "Materialism is sometimes charged with undervaluing the ideal. If this were true, it would be a very serious defect. The man of elevated mind lives not by bread alone, but by aspiration and hope. He is moved by ideals which restrain the lower impulses, invite him to the contemplation of the beautiful, the pure, and the good, and reveal to him the possibilities of human life, even if his infirmities do not permit their realization in himself. They thus offer the ennobling pleasure of the intellect and heart for the mere pleasures of sense which are shared with him by the brutes."

Of other lectures, we cannot speak in detail. We close with the suggestion that the book is one that every liberal thinker could read with profit and exhibit with pleasure.

THE Popular Science Monthly for October is heavier and more abstruse than its average numbers. Dr. Felix Oswald continues his interesting articles on "Physical Education," and lays much stress upon the bad effects of neglect of exercise and poorly ventilated rooms. Theodore Woble resumes the discussion of "The Practical Business of Life Insurance," and renders the subject much more intelligible than it is to the ordinary mind. "How the Earth is Weighed," by Dr. Otto Walterhöfer, requires close attention, but is one of curious interest. Herbert Spencer's paper this month, in the series of "The Development of Political Institutions," is on "The Militant Type of Society," and exhibits his usual characteristic research and vigor. The opening address of Sir James Paget on "The Cultivation of Medical Science," before the late International Medical Congress in London, and that of Prof. Huxley before the same body upon "The Connection of the Biological Sciences," are very able and interesting. The remaining articles of the number are of correspondent value. They are the following: "About Comets," by Aaron Nichols Skinner; Progress in "The Manufacture of Steel," by Prof. A. K. Huntington; "Intelligence of Ants," by George J. Romanes; "Forest-culture in Alpine Ravines," by M. J. Cleve; "Cattle-raising in South America," by M. Coaty; and a Biographical Notice of Prof. C. A. Young.

THE Wide-Awake for October presents, in addition to its usual attraction of beautiful pictures, charming little poems and stories, the first instalment of what is to constitute a permanent enlargement of the magazine. This will be distinguished as the Chautauqua Young Folks' Reading Union, and will comprise sixteen additional pages in each number. Chautauqua Lake, N.Y., has been the scene for the last few years of annual summer gatherings in behalf of certain Church and Sunday-school enterprises of an educational character. The idea of the Chautauqua Young Folks' Reading Union is an outgrowth of this movement. It is designed to encourage the formation of "reading unions," in coöperation with it, wherever the circumstances favor. The required readings for the year, which are begun in this number of Wide-Awake, are the following: "Magna Charta Stories," twelve papers; "Ways to Do Things," six papers for boys and six for girls; "Old Ocean," twelve papers; "The Travelling Law School," twelve papers; "Little Biographies," music, twelve papers; "Health and Strength Papers," twelve papers; "What to do about it," twelve papers; miscellaneous papers on natural history, natural philosophy, astronomy, chemistry, geology, botany, ornithology, and entomology, twelve in all. It proposed also to prepare and recommend books to be used on these studies.

THE Nursery is purchased by Our Little Ones. It is to be hoped the "fourteen thousand" patrons of the former will get an equivalent for its distinctive features that have cheered young eyes and ears for so many years.

An unusual amount of new literary matter is said to be forthcoming from American publishers this season.

THE International Review is to change its editorial charge after the November issue.

THE Presbyterian cites a spicy encounter between a Catholic priest and a medical doctor at the bedside of an Irish patient. The prelate, believing his parishioner to be on the verge of purgatory, commanded all to leave the room while he should prepare the dying man for his soul's journey. The man of pills refused to budge; and, when the successor of St. Peter threatened him with ecclesiastic curses, he proposed to the latter to sit on one end of the bed while he worked over his patient on the other, and see which could "swear the harder." The priest had to succumb, and Pat was restored, the former afterward pronouncing his challenger the pluckiest doctor he ever met.

CHAIRMAN DUNHAM gave the following sound doctrine at the late Democratic Convention at Worcester: "There is no sufficient excuse for any political party to live, unless its purpose, its aim, is to make the State and nation the better for its life. When party success is desired simply for the division of the spoils of office, then its obituary cannot be read too soon." The same changes were rung on the Republican bells at New York; and the agreeable disappointment of apprehension concerning those chimes gives, at all events, a temporary breathing-spot, whatever may be brewing in the distance. The label of parties in present indications does not greatly represent distinctions, while all are ostensibly claiming the same watchword. It remains to be seen where action will sustain the glittering promise.

GENERAL ARTHUR AS A STUDENT.—"General Arthur," says the Hour, "is better informed on American politics than any man who has ever occupied the executive chair of the nation. He has given more time to the study of the founders of the government and the public men of the country than any member of his cabinet, not even excepting Secretary Blaine, who is a political encyclopædia. President Arthur has been a bookworm all his life, and, unlike most men who toil over books and consume the midnight gas, he has mingled largely in the strife and turmoil of daily life. But few men are his superiors in historical reading, the classics, and belles-lettres. It is a great mistake to suppose, because he has been an active worker in politics, that he is not a student and a man of culture. President Arthur, as Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt observed, will be found 'more of a man than is generally thought.'"

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

SUMMER TO AUTUMN.

The thistle-down is buoyant in the air,
And all night long the tireless crickets sing.
'Tis summer still, but summer on the wing,
Before the impatient fall, her gorgeous heir:
Already crimsoned foliage hangeth here and there.
It matters not, for on September's brow
A softer and more golden sunshine lies
Than blazons hot midsummer's blinding skies,
And blander, richer days await us now,
And nights, that bring sleep's balm to weary eyes.
Even for listless age, the earth resumes
The fairy colors of romance again.
Afar through noontide haze the mountain looms,
With yellowing harvests shimmer vale and plain.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 13, 1881.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

THE THEOLOGY OF PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S ASSASSINATION.

Now that the nation has settled down to a more reflective mood concerning the causes and consequences of President Garfield's death, one may be permitted, perhaps, to criticise some of the theological aspects in which our national calamity has been viewed, without even seeming to be willing to degrade the lofty sentiment of sympathy and patriotism into which the nation has been lifted, down to the level of a paltry, theological discussion. It is, indeed, absolutely necessary to clear away much of the bewildering theology with which the event has been wrapped, in order to find the genuine lessons which are to be learned in this school of national sorrow.

We feel impelled, in the first place, to enter a solemn protest in the name of truth, honesty, and reverence, against putting upon Supreme Being the responsibility for the cause of the nation's calamity. A large proportion of the many official proclamations and resolutions of condolence that have been published concerning the dire event, from President Arthur's appointment of a day of public mourning down to the resolutions of a village charitable organization, have begun in some such form as this: "Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God, in his inscrutable wisdom, to remove from us the illustrious head of our nation," etc. Now, if this be merely the adoption of a stereotyped form of words which tradition has associated with occasions of affliction, then the words are to be impeached as a blasphemous trifling with a sacred theme as well as with the deep sincerity of the people's grief. If, on the other hand, the words have been adopted with a full comprehension of their import, then are they to be impeached as false in fact and as a monstrous libel on the character of Supreme Being.

almost instantly killed in the streets of St. Petersburg, being torn to pieces by the diabolical art of his assassins, his son, mounting the throne thus suddenly vacated for him, officially announced to the people the fact of his father's death in these words: "God's will has been done. At 3.25 o'clock this (Sunday) afternoon, the Almighty called the Emperor to himself." Some of us in this country read these solemnly intended words at the time with an amazed smile at their utter incongruity with the facts. What else could the new Czar have said, if he had himself been a conspirator with the Nihilists, and had believed that they were the chosen righteous instruments of God in slaying his father? And yet, if he did believe them to be the divinely appointed instruments of God's purpose, how could he pursue them with the vengeance that he showed toward them? The problem was one of the mysteries of theology, not easily solved by any common-sense rule. The best that we could say of it was that the form of words was a theological survival from an antiquated belief which did not really fit modern convictions, though, doubtless, better fitting the present religious beliefs of Russia than those of America.

But what advantage over the Russian Emperor's pious announcement that God had willed that his father should be torn to death by Nihilist assassins have the similar proclamations that have been made among us concerning the death of President Garfield, except that, in the President's case, death did not follow the assassin's act so immediately? Yet is there any one in this country who does not believe that President Garfield's death was actually caused by Guiteau's pistol-shot, and that, if it had not been for that infamous crime, the executive chair of the country, in all human probability, would be filled at this hour by President Garfield instead of President Arthur? And is there, can there be any one in the country who believes that God removed President Garfield by Guiteau's pistol? Yes, there is one who at least affects so to believe,—Guiteau himself. He claims to have been chosen and commissioned by the Almighty to do the foul deed. And if there be any other citizen who believes that it was God who removed the President, as the proclamations say, then such a one must take his place by the side of Guiteau, with the claim that God appointed the assassin for the bloody work. If it be true to declare that "Almighty God has removed President Garfield from us," then, by the plain force and meaning of the English language, what escape is there from the conclusion that Almighty God arranged and is responsible for the whole plan and means by which his death was effected? When the news of the assassination first astounded the country, the anxious inquiry leaped to the lips, Are there any conspirators behind Guiteau? This theological theory, which has even been put forth in the name and with the official seal of the United States, now answers the inquiry by declaring that the Almighty's hand was behind Guiteau's. In the shadow back of the weak, visible, cowardly instrument in the dreadful tragedy, it installs God as the chief conspirator and assassin. It makes the being whom the majority of the people of this country worship as Supreme Ruler of the universe to be the instigator of a crime which these same people are abhorring as blackest in the whole catalogue of atrocities.

Other features of peculiar theological interest have appeared in connection with attempts to interpret the providential lessons of the national bereavement. The idea promulgated by the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, before the President's death occurred, that he had been stricken down because God was angry with the nation for not putting his name in its Constitution, has already been commented upon in these columns. That such an ancient, Oriental conception of Deity should appear in a cultivated American journal in this latter half of the nineteenth century is, indeed, amazing. A later issue of the Statesman gives an account of a religious convention held after President Garfield's death, at which one of the speakers, a clergyman, is reported thus: "It is a severe judgment on a nation when great and good men are taken away. This nation has been peculiarly sinful in respect to the Presidential office." Surely, this preacher, we might expect, has touched the nation's sin in the right spot. He is going to probe it, and tell the people plainly how they have sinned against the Presidential office by exposing the President to the persecutions of office-seekers and to the corrupting perils of the spoils-system in the distribution of offices; and also, perhaps, he will have something to say of the wrong done by compelling the President and his family to live in a malarious district, where the seeds of disease and death are floating over them a great part of the year. Here, certainly, are concrete acts of wrongdoing, which the nation for many years has been committing against the Presidential office. But no: this theological interpreter of the national sorrow is not looking in this direction at all. Here is what he says: "The oath prescribed for the President by the Constitution contains no recognition of God. The Constitution says there shall be no religious test. God is saying to us by this event that we are not worthy of a good man for our Chief Magistrate."

Another preacher, elsewhere, arguing for the efficacy of prayer in restoring the President to health, stated that he had watched the President's condition as reported from day to day, and found it precisely parallel with the nation's attitude of prayer with regard to him. Whenever the people had been called together to pray for him and had responded to the call, the President's condition had improved; and whenever the people, having become hopeful again, had put their trust in other agencies and neglected prayer, he had soon suffered a relapse. And the same preacher or another added that, if the President should die, it would be because the people would not heed the New Testament injunction, "Pray without ceasing." According to this authority, then, it is not the Almighty who has caused the death of the President nor Guiteau, but the people have made themselves responsible for his death by not constantly importuning the Almighty to spare him.

It is humiliating to utter, even by quotation, such puerilities, especially on a theme so sadly solemn and with which all hearts have been so deeply stirred. And were it not that such opinions are put forth in all seriousness, as genuine explanations of the relation of the national calamity to Divine Providence, and that multitudes of people are trying to find consolation in them, it were better to pass them by in silence. But there is one feature in this bewildering maze of infantile theology which, though it may not command for the theology the respect of the intellect, cannot fail to make a pathetic appeal to our hearts in behalf of the sentiment underneath the theology. These theological efforts, audacious because of their very intellectual poverty, show, at least, with what yearning, clinging helplessness, the heart of humanity, under the pressure of its great distresses, flings itself upon the heart of the universe with a demand to be cared for. The great laws are not stayed. They work on in their un pitying course. The clouds gather, the heavens are opened, and the floods come. And yet the human heart is so bent on believing that good and not evil is meant that, though crushed under its agony, it sends up its cry to the Great Power, "Though thou slay me, yet will I trust thee!"

Now there is a way in which all national as well as individual calamities and sorrows are connected with the Eternal Power which makes for righteousness; but the way is not indicated by any doctrine of theological fatalism that makes the Eternal Power the instigator of human crimes. Evil men exist and do their evil deeds, not to work out any inscrutable purpose of Almighty goodness, but because it is absolutely necessary for the universe, as a whole, that moral laws, like material, should proceed in their natural, legitimate courses uninterfered with, even though they bring inevitable disaster in their track. But evil men and their evil deeds are as much opposed to the Eternal Power of righteousness as they are to good men. Every kind of evil action is a disturbing, corrupting force in the universe. In itself, it is an element of dissolution and death. The very essence of wrong action is that it is action against life, against physical life or mental life or moral life; action against some form of the all-abounding life and life-purpose of the universe. It is simply impossible, therefore, that such action should be caused or fore-ordained by the great Power which holds this life purpose of the universe in its keeping.

On the contrary, whenever an evil act is done, its consequences become material on which the life-forces of the Eternal Power are brought to bear, in order to overcome and annul the activity of this destructive element and heal the wrong it has done. And this healing, restorative work is not accomplished in any exceptional, miraculous way, but by the natural activities and methods of the vital energy that sustains the universe. What takes place in the human body when, from any cause, the poison of disease assaults its life forces, is an accurate hint of the process of moral restoration when assault is made upon the moral order and integrity of human society. In both cases, nature's vital forces are instantly on the alert, by the very force of the fact that their purpose is life, to conquer and expel the disturbing element, and restore the suffering functions to their normal activity. Moral disorder, no less than physical, touches the springs of nature's recuperative energies, and sets to flowing the needed currents of healing. It is thus that the Eternal Power that makes for righteousness is related to such calamities as that which has just afflicted our country; not in any way as responsible cause, but as a recuperative power for resisting and annulling the cause, which is always in man's short-sighted, selfish, and ungoverned will.

A NEW STEP.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, at their meeting last week, voted to appropriate five hundred dollars as the beginning of a "fellowship" for aid in training teachers for societies that wish to organize on a Free Religious basis. This sum is for the use, for one year, of some young man who is a college graduate, and who desires specially to prepare himself for this kind of work. Besides being a college graduate of fair standing, the qualifications for receiving the benefit of the "fellowship" are that the candidate shall be of good moral character, show himself intellectually competent (this to be determined chiefly by his preparation of an essay), and that he pursue his studies in accordance with the principles of the constitution of the Free Religious Association,—that is, without any sectarian or dogmatic presuppositions. The President and Secretary of the Association—namely, Professor Felix Adler and Mr. William J. Potter—were appointed a committee (with power to add to their number) to examine and decide on all applications for this fund. The appropriation as yet has only been made for one year; yet the understanding is, if the experiment is as successful as it is believed it will be, that it will be continued. The student who is chosen for this "fellowship" will probably pursue his studies in Germany, and have the benefit of the fund for two years. The course of studies deemed desirable will not only include the history of religions and the philosophy and history of ethics, but especially the history of human society and the social problems that are pressing for solution to-day; and the end aimed at will be not merely that the student be trained as a thinker and speaker, but as a practical worker for the amelioration of human life.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE CONGRESS.

According to the Chicago Times, which gives a list of delegates that attended the annual convention of the National Liberal League, lately held in that city, eighty-two delegates were present, from thirty-eight cities and towns and ten States. Some of the towns represented, we notice, are places in which there are no Leagues. We cannot, of course, vouch for the correctness of the list given in the Times; but, presuming it is approximately correct, it confirms the impression which has obtained, that the larger number of Leagues in the long list which has been published and triumphantly referred to the past year, as evidence of the sentiment in favor of the policy of repeal of the objectionable postal laws, are mere "paper leagues" that have no active or actual existence. Indeed, in the Chicago Times' report of the second day's proceedings of the recent convention, at which it is stated there were in attendance about fifty delegates, we read that "the Secretary estimated that there are about fifty good, active, solid auxiliaries," the others being either dead or in a state of paralysis. Many of the auxiliaries borne on the Secretary's published list have no sympathy whatever with "repeal"; and, although they have not formally withdrawn from the general organization, their apathy and inaction are in consequence of the position of the National Liberal League in regard to postal laws against obscenity. Several Leagues, for instance, have been organized in Kansas, and yet they are nearly all dead, and the two or three which are still alive sent no delegates to the recent convention. The Secretary of the National Liberal League, according to the Times' report, admits that when the Congress was held at Syracuse in 1878 there were "sixty-four local Leagues, almost four times the list of the previous year." Had not the National Liberal League, under the control of the men who are now at the head of the organization, committed itself to the unspeakable folly of demanding the total repeal of all postal laws against the circulation of obscene literature, it is reasonable to believe that its annual convention this year would have been attended by delegates from every State, and from hundreds of active Leagues thoroughly interested in the work of State secularization.

THE "COMPROMISE."

The leaders of the National Liberal League begin to see, evidently, that the policy which demands the total repeal of all postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails has not the approval, and is not likely to receive the support, of Liberals generally. At the annual convention of the League, held in Chicago last week, the following resolution was passed:—

WHEREAS, It has been claimed by some that the resolutions passed by the Congress of the League bound those who voted in the minority as well as the majority, and virtually compelled the minority to withdraw from the League,—therefore,

Resolved, That the following is declared by this Congress to be the permanent rule of this body: that resolutions heretofore or hereafter passed by the Annual Congress of the League are no test of fellowship in the League, but simply express the sentiment of those voting for them, and of the particular Congress of which they are a majority; that all who believe in the entire separation of Church and State, whatever their views may be on other questions, are earnestly requested to unite with the Liberal League movement and work for its advancement.

No one has doubted the willingness of the League to retain in the organization those who have withdrawn from it, or to receive new members regardless of their views on the postal laws; but when the National Liberal League, at its last two annual conventions, has declared unequivocally in favor of repeal, when its administration for the past three years has been one of repeal, when its organ, supported and sustained by the League, has advocated repeal and given prominence to it, is it not clear that all who have remained in this organization and supported it by their money or influence have been practically committed to the repeal policy?

The report says that, after the adoption of the above resolution, "Mrs. Dr. Severance moved that the Congress reaffirm the resolution adopted by the League Congress last year, and that it demand the repeal of the Comstock laws. The motion was carried almost unanimously." All the newly elected executive officers of the League are like Mr. Wakeman, its president, unqualifiedly in favor of repeal. And yet "all who believe in the entire separation of Church and State" are invited to join the organization, with the assurance that the repeal resolutions are "no test of fellowship in the League." Here, we have the results of the "compromise" proposed at the Hornellsville Convention, and against which the Index warned Liberals a few weeks ago. Let nobody suppose this organization represents the Liberals of the United States. The policy it has adopted and the course it has pursued have repelled thousands who would have been glad to work in the organization, and it is now controlled wholly by those with whom the repeal of postal laws against obscenity is an object to which every other object is secondary. The sincerity of the leaders of the League is not questioned, and the personal worthiness of many who still cling to it may be fully recognized.

CONSISTENCY.

The United Presbyterian Synod of New York, in a discussion of the National Reform question, showed marked symptoms of becoming disunited respecting the function of the "Lord Christ" in the secular state. Its moderator, the Rev. James Crowe, called one of the brethren to the chair in order to make "a strong and earnest speech," contending that "to bring this matter into this court was trampling upon the fundamental law" of their faith. The laws of that Church forbade its courts to act as an ecclesiastical body in civil matters, but, the question being up, he would speak to it. In the course of his remarks, he did not object to "the acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God, but the Lord Christ did not belong to the constitution, and he did not wish to go into it." It was evident by the tenor of his speech that he held to a different notion from the prevailing church view of the rule over nations conceded to the Mediator, and "moved to strike out the clause declaring Jesus Christ the King of Nations." He regarded Christ as the mediator for individuals, but not nations. A clergyman from California sustained the mod-erator's view; but others, preceding and following his remarks, contended urgently against robbing the Messiah of his imagined prerogatives. In a report of these proceedings, the Christian Statesman expresses unqualified disapproval of any attempt to reduce the temporal jurisdiction of the Christ, and calls attention in its columns to the "Spirit and Aims" of the "Opposition" to the movement it designates as National Reform. Probably it regards the controverted point, above described, as an insidious step, in the midst of its friends, toward the defiant attitude of the list of "Demands of Liberalism," which it prints in its late issues with these comments: "The only consistent and legitimate opposition to the National Reform movement proceeds from those who hold to the secular theory of government. This theory has never been so logically, consistently, or ably set forth as in the brief, well-known document, drawn up by Francis E. Abbot, of Boston, and entitled 'The Demands of Liberalism.'" Then, following its copy of these, it remarks: "No opponent of the constitutional acknowledgment of the connection of our government with Christianity can consistently stop short of these 'Demands.'" The editor of the Statesman thus gives full corroboration, from his own stand-point, of the legitimate outcome of the purely rationalistic argument woven and long ago insisted upon, as a prophetic certainty, by Mr. Abbot; but the latter embraced ground that set the Christian dogma alternative considerably back of the Statesman's point of departure,—namely, in the papal creed. If that end of the line of "consistency" is to retain its hold of the train of reasoning, there is no legitimate foothold for Protestant loyalty between those extremes. J. P. T.

A THRILLING and just appeal is made by circular to the patriots of Massachusetts for aid to the Soldiers' Home, for which the trustees have purchased the Highland Park Hotel in Chelsea, to the end that no Massachusetts soldier shall be left to become an inmate of the poor-house. It is stated that "between one and two hundred" Massachusetts "soldiers are in her poor-houses to-day, candidates for the dissecting-table and a pauper's grave," and that one might wish they had rather fallen victims to the exigencies of battle, and long ago rested with their smitten comrades. It is proposed to hold a bazar in the interest of this home, in the opening season, at the new Mechanics' Fair building on Huntington Avenue; and the generous contribution of money, or varied service in whatever capacity available, is earnestly solicited. No genuine sense of honor and gratitude can remain dormant in view of the quoted facts; and every sensitive nature must respond with energy to the call for payment toward this incalculable debt, in such measure as may be feasible. The abounding comforts and glories of our national prosperity must look almost ghastly to the old soldier, struggling feebly with the odds of poverty and broken health, after his early sacrifice of opportunities for the salvation of the Republic. No sadder scene can meet the eye than the cold indifference that lines the track of the crippled veteran who drags out a scanty living from his weary messenger rounds. The appeal above quoted bears eminent signatures, and the executive channels may be reached by address to James F. Meech, 53 Tremont Street, Room 3, Boston, Mass.

THE Independent is sorry that President Garfield was allowed no religious ministrations during his long sickness, and that the public were not informed of his religious feelings on his sick-bed, yet reconciles itself to the fact with little difficulty by remembering that "it is not the minister who prepares the soul for death," and that "we know what his faith was before his sickness." But suppose we did not know much about his "faith," and only knew about his correct life, would not that be quite as well? There is good New Testament authority, we would remind the Independent as an additional alleviation of its regrets, for not much blazoning abroad of one's "religious feelings." Jesus had much to say in favor of praying and performing other religious exercises "in secret," and Paul said, "Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God." President Garfield, though nominally and, we believe, genuinely a religious man, evidently heeded these injunctions. In his active life, he did not obtrude his religious views or feelings on public attention. In his sick-room, he doubtless could have had religious ministrations, if he had desired them. But his one supreme thought and duty there was the restoration of his body. All else, from first to last, he subordinated to that object. And this was natural and right. It was his one duty to get well, if possible. Not only was no "preparation for death" needed, but he did not wish to prepare for death. He could face death calmly, if it must come; but he hoped and struggled for life. His death-bed, therefore, so far as any thing has been revealed to the public, was not by any of the usual ecclesiastical standards a "Christian" one; but it was human and manful.

THE Christian Statesman says that, during the sorrowful season of President Garfield's prostration and death, freethinkers have kept becomingly quiet. "No ear has been turned to them for their interpretation of passing events; and, conscious that they have no message for the people in such an hour, they have maintained a steadfast silence." We also learn from the same paper that at the recent convention of freethinkers in London, when it was proposed to send some message of sympathy to America, Mr. Bradlaugh objected "that such an expression would hardly be deemed appropriate, since Mr. Garfield was a profoundly religious man"; that thereupon the subject was dropped, the members of the convention having an "inward consciousness that their words would be distasteful to the American people." To this, we have only to say that, if Mr. Bradlaugh's remarks are correctly reported, his reasoning is as illogical and narrow as is that of the Statesman. We know of nothing in their philosophy to prevent freethinkers from feeling as profoundly and interpreting as sensibly and helpfully as any other class of people the assassination of the President; and, as a matter of fact, we know that many of them have done so. They are not likely to fall into such theological inanities as are referred to elsewhere in our columns this week, but, while equally sympathetic, they may be more sound. There is one thing, however, that might have made a message of sympathy from the London convention "distasteful to the American people"; and that is, if Mr. D. M. Bennett, who seems to have been present as the chief representative and spokesman from the United States, had been made the purveyor of the message. This man's moral corruption has been so thoroughly exposed that, on this side of the Atlantic, any cause, however good, that sustains or uses him as an instrument, is thereby justly damaged in the court of public opinion.

WHEN Dean Stanley was Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Canon of Christ Church, some one raised the question in his presence whether the proper title by which to speak of him was Dr. Stanley, Canon Stanley, or Professor Stanley. He seemed quite uninterested; but, when one or two opinions had been given, he broke in, with that quick, eager manner of his, "There is only one appellation that I care to be known by." "What is that?" "Arthur Stanley."

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Co-operation in France.

THE Familistere at Guise, on the river Oise, in France, is a co-operative institution with certain limitations. Some account of it was given in Harper's Magazine, April, 1872; and the illustrations of buildings and domestic and educational arrangements that appeared there help to make attractive a recent pamphlet containing the "laws and regulations" of the Familistere, published by the New York Woman's Social Science Society, Room 24, Cooper Institute. Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol was sent by this society, in the summer of 1880, to examine the workings of the Familistere, and prefaces the pamphlet (which is a translation of the second part of M. Godin's Mutualité Sociale, made by Louis Bristol) with an interesting introduction. The Familistere was established by M. Jean Baptist André Godin, a manufacturer and resident of Guise, in 1867; its object being "to organize a community of interests among its members by means of the participation of both capital and labor in the profits," and more particularly to carry on the renting of the real estate constituting the Familistere, the commercial work of its wares and shops, and the industrial business of the iron works belonging to the founder and located at Guise and Lacken-lez-Bruzelles (Belgium). The "laws and regulations" were devised by M. Godin himself, and the association has for its legal name "Godin & Co." He is also the self-appointed superintendent for life, and has the power of appointing his successor, and reserves other important rights to himself (Part I., title iii., chap. ii.). These are limitations of the co-operative idea, though they may be practically necessary in initiating the enterprise, and are doubtless instituted with the purest intentions.

Co-operation, however, involves no methods which cannot be, as Mrs. Bristol says, engrafted upon the present industrial order, without revolution or disarrangement. In the preliminary "Declaration of Principles," land, labor, capital, and superintendence are given the place usually allowed them by writers on political economy. Returns are allowed to these according to ordinary economical principles, the new feature being that the net profits (i.e., the surplus after the payment of rent, wages, the ordinary rate of interest, and wages of superintendence) go to all who have been concerned in the production, and not to the capitalists alone. Of the net profits, fifty per cent. goes to capital and labor,—the distribution being determined by the interest on the shares and savings stock on the one side, and the sum total of wages on the other,—twelve per cent. to the superintendent, nine per cent. to other members of the general council, two per cent. to the council of supervision, and two per cent. to those employés and workmen who may distinguish themselves by exceptional services.

There are three grades of membership in the association: (1) the associates, who must have resided five years on the premises of the Familistere, must know how to read and write, must own stock in the association to the amount of one hundred dollars, and who constitute the general assembly, who guard all the interests of the association; (2) the societaries, who must have labored in the service of the association but three years, and must reside at the Familistere; (3) the participants, who must have worked but one year, and may or may not reside in the Familistere. The interested are those who simply own capital stock in the association, without having other rights. Auxiliaries may be hired by the association, and enjoy the advantages afforded by the "mutual assurances," but no others, though they may later be admitted to full membership in the association, and may, if they desire, reside in the Familistere. There is a written form of engagement for those wishing to enter the association, and expulsion may take place for any of six reasons, which it may be well to give: drunkenness, any slovenliness of the family or of the apartments that is annoying to the Familistere, acts of dishonesty, want of industry in labor, unruliness, disorder or acts of violence, and any breach of the obligation to give instruction to the children for whom the member may be responsible.

In addition to the general assembly, there is a general council, made up of the superintendent, who is president of the council; of three associates, selected by secret ballot by all the associates; of the commercial director; of the director of manufactures; of the director of the working stock; of the director of models; of the director of accounts; and of the steward, who is director at the Familistere. There are also special councils, as of industry and of the Familistere, and the council of supervision, which watches over the execution of the laws. The Familistere, strictly speaking, is the residence, or, in the technical language of co-operation, the "unitary dwelling" of the principal members of the association; that is, of the associates and sociétaires. In it, "each family enjoys the freedom of a home and apartments, quiet, and provided with the necessary furniture." Mrs. Bristol describes the buildings in her introduction, which consist of one central four-story building, with two large wings situated in advance of the central building so as to form an open square in front, all of which have interior courts; of a nursery, in the rear of the edifice just described, at which mothers may leave their children from ten in the morning to five or six in the afternoon, and which has between it and the river Oise "a lawn of soft, green grass, intersected by walks and shaded by trees"; and of the theatre, with educational departments in the right and left wings, which stands across the open square from the main buildings. The importance of education, of developing in the children "the feeling of the duties of fraternity which unite them to one another," and of making clear "the moral basis of the association," seems fully realized, and systematic training by special teachers is given in four successive grades from infancy to the age of fourteen. After that age, higher courses of instruction are to be given to those who seem to possess "special talents and faculties."

We have not left space to speak of other interesting features of M. Godin's enterprise, particularly of the system of "mutual assurances," the idea of which is probably not unfamiliar to our readers, and appropriations for which, as for education and the payment of interest on stock, are taken out of the profits of the association before net profits are reckoned up. We will close with expressing a query, which is hardly answered by the statements respecting "liberty of conscience" in article 104: What is the religious attitude of the association? Respect for liberty of belief and worship is declared to be an essential duty of the members in their treatment of one another. Yet no hint is given of any kind of religious services at the Familistere, and the principle of true religion is said to be "love for everything that serves efficaciously the progress and improvement of the general life"; and again, as if in defence of the secularist inclinations of some of the members, we are told that, "elevated to these principles by reason and conscience, the man who is but little impressed with the exterior form of worship holds the reality of it in his heart." Does this mean the abandoning of all religious ceremonial, or is it only indifference to present religious services, preparatory to the development of religion in some purer and higher form? In other words, is M. Godin's a purely secularist enterprise? Perhaps Mrs. Bristol can tell us.

Some figures may be of interest. There are some eleven hundred workmen in the iron foundries. In the nursery are forty infants, and sixty children between two and four years of age. In the higher grades of education are some two hundred children from four to fourteen years of age. Nearly every evening, forty musicians "meet to practise the special studies of their art" in the theatre. Here, also, in May the Festival of Labor is celebrated, and in September the Festival of the Children. We trust Mrs. Bristol is right when she says that not only the laboring classes, but some capitalists and leaders of great industries, are convinced of the faulty nature of our present industrial system, and are only waiting "for a knowledge of the right methods for the association of labor and capital to institute them in practice." If so, they will thank Mrs. Bristol and the members of the New York Woman's Social Science Society for the programme here outlined for them.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

ONE of the results of the development theory has been to render it more difficult to draw the line of demarcation between the different provinces and orders of nature; to determine where the one begins and the other ends. Among the "Scientific Notes" read at a late meeting of the Boston Scientific Society was the following on a lecture by Professor O. C. Marsh on jurassic birds and their allies, which illustrates this:—

If he were asked to state the difference between a bird and a reptile, he should be puzzled; for if the bones of each were crushed and scattered together, as they found them, it would be extremely difficult to say which was the bird and which the reptile. That he held to be a point of importance, and one which naturalists who had been engaged in Dinosaurs would appreciate. It appeared to him that feathers might have played a very important part in the transformation of the reptile into the bird. When they came to consider the four oldest known birds, they found them to be as distinct from each other as any of the birds of the present day. That fact of itself, therefore, showed that, in order to get at the origin of birds, they would have to look further back in the history of the world than previous workers, and thus they could not but feel great encouragement to further explorations.

GEORGE J. ROMANES, in a notice in Nature of the Student's Darwin, by Edward B. Aveling, D.Sc. (which is the second volume in a series that is being published in London under the title of International Library of Science and Freethought, by Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh), takes occasion to thus express his disapproval of associating science with what popularly goes by the name of freethought:—

The promoters of the series are mistaken, so far as they may have the interests of science at heart, in associating their endeavors to render science popular with their systematic onslaught against theistic belief. In itself, science has no necessary relation to any such belief. It is neither theistic nor atheistic: it is simply extra-theistic. It is but an extension of common experience, and as such has to deal only with the facts of ordinary knowledge without at any point being able to escape from the sphere of the phenomenal. In so far as any inferences are extended from this domain, they are not scientific, but metaphysical.

TO THE making of books for the purpose of reconciling religion and science there appears to be no end. One of the latest of these is the Bible and Science, by T. Lander Brunton, M.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., whom Nature pronounces no less of an authority than Dr. Aveling above referred to, in connection with a work from an opposite stand-point. It consists of seventeen lectures delivered before an Orthodox audience; and, while its main purpose is to show that science is not antagonistic to Christianity, the naturalistic admissions and mode of treating the subject of the author, who is distinguished for his scientific attainments as well as a graceful writer, would seem sometimes to add force to the opposite side of the discussion. We cite some examples of this. Speaking of the plagues of Egypt, Dr. Brunton says:—

Among these was one that used to puzzle me not a little, the plague of "darkness which might be felt." Why, thought I, did all the people remain in the dwellings? Why could they not take lanterns with them and move out? But a day which I spent at Port Said showed me what was probably the reason. On waking in the morning, it seemed to me that every thing had been turned into pea-soup. Above, around, and on every side was a thick, yellow mist, darkening the air like a London fog, but differing from it in this respect,—that it was a darkness perceptible, a darkness that might be felt, and painfully felt too; for it was caused by a storm of sand, driven by the wind, and every particle stinging the skin like a needle.

Again, referring to the passage of the Jordan by the Israelites, he writes:—

On standing at the river's brink, the whole scene appeared to pass before me. The country around is highly volcanic. Earthquakes occur with great frequency, and during such convulsions of nature we know that the relations of land and water become greatly altered. Here, I thought, we have the method by which the Israelites were able to pass over dry-shod. If the bed of the stream at this place underwent a sudden upheaval at the time of their passage, the consequences would be exactly those described in the Book of Joshua. The waters would rise up like a heap, filling the channel far up the valley; and those flowing down to the Dead Sea would be cut off. It is maintained that this explanation is confirmed in this citation from the one hundred and fourteenth Psalm: "Jordan was driven back. The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back? Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs? Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the God of Jacob." Here the psalmist seems to ask the question why Jordan was driven back, and to give us indirectly as an answer that the earth trembled, or, in other words, that there was an earthquake.

The author thinks that the doctrine of evolution agrees with the Mosaic account in reference to the place where man was created, whether that creation took place by special act or by evolutionary process:

It took place in a paradise where the air was balmy, where fruit-trees were plentiful, and where there were no carnivorous animals to prey upon and attack him. . . . According to the theory of evolution, he was forced to migrate from this sacred spot for the same reason that races have been forced to migrate ever since; namely, want of food due to increasing numbers. These increasing numbers would first of all consume the natural fruits of the trees, they would then be forced to till the ground, and finally some of them would be obliged to leave altogether. We read in Genesis that the woman was cursed in her conception being multiplied, and that the man was cursed by having to till the ground by the sweat of his brow. While in paradise he was naked, but after he left it he wore coats of skin. He had not yet learned the use of metals, and his tools and implements must have been those of wood and stone. For, according to Genesis, it was not until several generations afterwards that Tubal Cain taught man the use of brass and iron.

THE ministry must stop apologizing, if it means to be believed. We do not want apologetics half as much as the audaciousness of a vital faith. We need to rise above the petty stigma of being pessimists, and know that it is weakening to our mental natures and moral convictions to be minimizing every great truth because it may hurt somebody.—Presbyterian.

MAN.

Study 19.—The Vegetable Kingdom.

What Plants are for.

Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pp. 85-92.

We have now learned what about Plants?
How can Plants grow?
Where do they get this food?
Does a Morning Glory get its food in precisely the same way that an Oak Tree does?
Does either get its food in the same way that cats and dogs do?
Do Plants eat or only drink?
Why must that be so?
What part of the plant does the digesting?
While the Roots are absorbing, what is the stem doing?
How is the stem made up?
What does the sap have to do, in order to rise an inch?
After the sap is carried to the leaves, what happens to it?
Plants really, then, by means of their leaves do what? What has the sunshine to do with this process?
What is done with this newly made vegetable matter?
Vegetation, then, consists of what two things?
Assimilation is what?
Growth is what?
Plants alone have what powers?
While Plants are making vegetable matter, they do what?
The part of the air which makes it fit for a man to breathe is called what?
After we have taken in some of this Oxygen, what do we do with it?
Then what happens?
What prevents the air from losing all its Oxygen and accumulating Carbonic Acid?
And what do the Plants do with Carbonic Acid?
At the same time, they do what else for animals?
Do all animals receive this food in the same way?
What have Plants to do with our medicines?
What with our Clothing?
What with our building materials?
What with our Fuel?
What, indirectly, with the natural warmth of our bodies?
Does not the growth of Plants, then, come to have a new meaning to us?
How does this study bring us into closer relations with them?
This knowledge increases our sense of what?

SELECTIONS.

For thee the groves green liv'ries wear,
For thee the Graces lead the dancing Hours,
And Nature's ready pencil paints the flowers.

—Dryden.

Where'er you tread, the blushing flow'rs shall rise,
And all things flourish where you turn your eyes.

—Pope.

Ten thousand stalks their various blossoms spread;
Peaceful and lowly in their native soil,
They neither know to spin, nor care to toil.

—Prior.

Not Eastern monarchs, on their nuptial day,
In dazzling gold and purple shine, so gay,
As the bright natives of the unlabored field,
Unversed in spinning and in looms unskilled.

—Blackmore.

Everything in the Vegetable Kingdom, on the land and in the sea, tells of beauty and growth.

The good life in man, as in the plant, is a constant development toward the True and the Beautiful.

Suggestions to Leader.—This is the last study under The Vegetable Kingdom and as much of Review may be introduced as seems desirable. In showing the child the indirect relation of Plants to the warmth of our bodies, etc., care should be taken to give due credit to the other forces which cooperate to the same end. It is the intention to make the last impression here, as in the Studies of The Mineral Kingdom, that of intimacy and affection increasing the sense of Universal Relation.

Study 20.—The Animal Kingdom (Except Man).

Protozoa.

Text-books, Chambers's Cyclopaedia, Articles Protozoa and Sponge, and Wool's New Illustrated Natural History, Introduction and closing section.

We have now studied about what two kingdoms?
Which of these is the higher?
What is the next kingdom in order?
Does this kingdom include man?
In this division of our subject, we omit him why?
Is it easy to distinguish between the lowest forms of animal life and some forms of plant life?
What are Carnivorous Plants?
In what respect do these differ from the lowest known form of animal life?
What general name is given to this form of animal life?
Of what do these little animals consist?
Do they have any nervous system?
Do they have any organs of sense?
Do most of them have any mouth?
In what group is a mouth traceable?
What are they?
Where do most of the Protozoa live?
Where else are they found?
What size are they generally?
What exception is there to this rule?
What is now thought to be the lowest form of the Protozoa?
To what kingdom was this formerly supposed to belong?
Where are Sponges found?
Of what do they consist?
How do they grow?
How do they obtain sustenance?
For what are they used?
What instrument is necessary, in order to find out much about Protozoa?
And with this we learn what?
So that beyond the power of the human eye, wonderful as it is to see, and the human mind, wonderful as it is to understand, there are what?

SELECTIONS.

Despise not the day of small things.

Things of small semblance oft with import high are full.

Great things are only a series of little ones.

From little, oft repeated, much will rise,
And of thy toil the fruits salute thine eyes.

The forms of life which with the naked eye we cannot see,—how wonderful they are in structure, how they prophesy of greater things to come!

Who shall say where the universe ends and where it begins. We see but little and understand less of it. Lost in its immensity, the mind of man bows in admiration and awe.

Suggestions to Leader.—The illustrations of Sponges in article on that subject in Chambers's Cyclopaedia will be found of value. If you can command the use of a microscope and specimens, the interest in this lesson will be very greatly increased.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

HERBERT SPENCER is at work on a treatise of First Principles in Politics.

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY supplied the Parker Memorial desk last Sunday.

MR. RUSKIN is sufficiently recovered to resume literary work at Amiens.

MR. EDWARD A. FREEMAN is to begin his lectures in this country by a course before the Lowell Institute in Boston, on "The English People in their Three Homes." The opening lecture of this course of six will be given next Monday evening.

THE vigorous discourses of Minot J. Savage, the radical pastor of the Unity pulpit of Boston, are published in neat pamphlet form each week by Geo. H. Ellis. Titles of late issues are "A New Church in a New Universe," "Emotion in Religion," and "Our Dead President."

A COMPARISON is drawn by the Catholic Review between the words of the Rev. Mr. Talmage and those of the Bishop of Kingston on the treatment of Guleau; the latter expressing "nothing but pity for the miserable wretch," desiring, if his case was forced upon the attention, that he be "left to the justice of public law and the mercy of God."

REV. J. B. HARRISON, of Franklin Falls, N.H., believes in taking care of the bodies as well as souls of men. He advertises that he will examine drains, vaults, etc., and advise in regard to their building and care in that vicinity, free of charge. This is a modern addition to the ministerial office that is to be commended, though the plumbers may not like it.

MR. WILLIAM CLARK, who comes to this country from England with a high reputation as a man of fine resources of learning and as an able thinker and speaker, gave a lecture in Horticultural Hall, Boston, on Wednesday evening of last week, on the Irish Land Question. The lecture was a clear presentation of the subject, and well sustained Mr. Clark's reputation.

THE announcement that Mr. Octavius B. Frothingham is engaged upon a life of the late George Ripley, will be received, says the London News, with interest by many who are not Americans. Mr. Ripley had friends in abundance in all parts of the world, but the story of his life will have great attractions for a large number of readers who had no personal knowledge of the kind-hearted and cultured American scholar, and who knew of him only as the founder of the beautiful, impracticable scheme of Brook Farm, which has been immortalized by Hawthorne in his Blithedale Romance. Every one knows of the dream which a small knot of scholars and students dreamed, of founding the system of a newer and better social life in the Massachusetts woods and meadows. Every one who has read the Blithedale Romance will remember the loving tenderness with which the great novelist dwells upon the brief bright experience of "our beautiful scheme of a noble and unselfish life," and thinks "how fair in that first summer appeared the prospect that it might endure for generations and be perfected, as the ages rolled away, into the system of a people and a world." That the Brook Farm Utopia failed was hardly the fault of the thinkers and teachers who founded it,—of Ripley and Hawthorne and Margaret Fuller, who, though never an actual member of the community, did so much to help it on. In Hawthorne's words, they "toiled with their whole hopeful hearts" to effect the impossible, but for their "generous effort" their names are dear to us, and none more so than that of the good man and true scholar who was their leader.

FOREIGN.

A MONUMENT is proposed for erection to the memory of Dean Stanley in Scotland.

At the request of the British Ambassador, Lord Dufferin, a deputation of the Turkish Sanitary Commission has gone to Mecca for efforts in prevention of the spread of cholera in that region.

THE English estimate of eventual success of the French forces in Northern Africa is very decided. They see no obstacle of any moment while finance is secure, and they regard this to be already assured.

DESPERATE oppression by the acts of a ruler has its sure rejoinder in desperate resistance by the ruled, which in turn begets in the despot desperate measures for self-defence. The Czar is having his palace at St. Petersburg surrounded by a subterranean passage to be flooded in case of need, and the adjoining estates are to be purchased for added security. It is no wonder that, as rumor has it, "the young Czar is growing thin and melancholy since ascending the throne."

AN address has been given to the Irish people by the bishops assembled at Maynooth, on the subject of the new Land Act and its side issues. It is claimed that the Irish bishops have striven, with large success, to keep the agitation always within the bounds of order and law, and have constantly frowned upon any symptoms of reckless procedure or false alliance, while yet announcing boldly to the British government that no peace or contentment could be expected of the Irish populace while their liberties were outraged.

THE French will certainly be victorious in the end, and it depends on the vigor and wisdom of their counsels whether they bring the war to an early termination. When they have firmly established their power, they will have time to consider whether the enterprise was worth its cost. The finances are flourishing.

and it would seem that a large expenditure is not unpopular in France. The opportunity of administering a lesson to hostile tribes may perhaps confirm the security of French dominion in Algeria. Speculative capitalists will applaud the energy which has doubled the value of their investments; and patriotic vanity will be gratified by the rebuff which has been inflicted on Italy, and, in popular estimation, on England. On the whole, the result of the undertaking will probably afford little ground for the hope that it will be the last experiment of the kind. The revival of the French appetite for glory is a misfortune to the rest of Europe. —London Saturday Review.

MR. CHARLES DARWIN calls attention in Nature to a curious habit of plants, previously observed by himself and lately confirmed by a Brazil correspondent. The item referred to the position assumed by leaves at night, "during their so-called sleep, in order to escape being chilled and injured by radiation into the open sky." He cites the following from the Brazil letter: "We have had last week some rather cold nights (2 degrees to 3 degrees C. at sunrise), and these have given me a new confirmation of your view on the meaning of the nyctitropic movements of plants. Near my house there are some Pandanus trees, about a dozen years old. The youngest terminal leaves stand upright, whereas the older ones are bent down so as to expose their upper surfaces to the sky. These young leaves, though of course the most tender, are still as fresh and green as before. On the contrary, the older ones have suffered from the cold, and have become quite yellowish. Again, the leaves of Oxalis sepium were observed by me to sleep in a very imperfect manner during the summer, even after the most sunny days; but now, in winter, every leaflet hangs down in a perpendicular position during the whole night." Mr. Darwin states it to be a new fact to him "that leaves should sleep in a more or less perfect manner at different seasons of the year."

JESTINGS.

MR. ALCOCK, at the Concord School of Philosophy, said that during slumber the animal in our nature predominates. The "animal" referred to, it may be presumed, is the nightmare. —Catholic Review.

LOUISVILLE Courier-Journal.—Tourist: "Where is Block Island?" Polite American: "In Rhode Island." T.: "But how can you put one island in another?" P. A.: "Oh! that's nothing; we accomplish anything in this country."

HELLO!—Telephone conversation between the Pope at the Vatican, Rome, and the Czar, at his palace at Peterhoff. Pope: "Hello!" Czar: "Hellovsky!" Pope: "Area youa goinga outa to-daya?" Czar: "Notoff todayakoff. Too muchavitch dynamitisky aboutavitch. Are youimoff?" Pope: "Not to-daya. Some othera daya. Too manya ruda and godless mena abouta." —Ezchange.

The Congregationalist gives this instance of the latest confusion of politics and religion: "An anti-Baptist book and the acts of the Mississippi Legislature were being published by the same printer. Things got mixed, and this was the result: 'Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi, that bay means to put under the water, and tizo means to take out.'"

LESSONS

For Liberal Sunday Schools or for Home Use.

I. THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

A series of Twenty Lessons by Mr. LEWIS G. JONES, of Brooklyn. Written entirely from the Rationalistic standpoint. Prepared originally for use in Mr. Chadwick's Sunday School. Each lesson printed in a separate slip. Twenty-five cents for the series, including postage.

II. FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP, AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

A series of Five very suggestive Lessons, by Mrs. KATE GANNETT WELLS. Each lesson contains enough material for several exercises. Seven cents for the series, in separate sheets, including postage.

III. THE WORLD WE LIVE IN.

A Series of Elementary Lessons in Natural History, by Mr. FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY. Adapted both to interest and profit a class of children. To be completed this autumn. One cent each lesson, exclusive of postage, at present.

Supplied by FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wadson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and brief addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

Let whatever appears to be the best be to you an inviolable law. And if any instance of pain or pleasure, glory or disgrace, be set before you, remember that now is the combat, now the Olympiad comes on, nor can it be put off; and that, by one failure and defeat, honor may be lost—or won. Thus, Socrates became perfect, improving himself by everything, following reason alone. And, though you are not yet a Socrates, you ought, however, to live as one seeking to be a Socrates.—Epictetus.

I HOLD him to be dead in whom shame is dead.—Plautus.

He who has seen no evil and sorrow
May not become king on the plain of gladness.
He whose soul is not pierced with a diamond
Is still unworthy a royal crown.

—Amir Khusräu.

Few spirits are made better by the pain and languor of sickness, as few great pilgrims become eminent saints.—Thomas à Kempis.

If we are told a man is religious, we still ask, What are his morals? But if we hear at first that he has honest morals, and is a man of natural justice and good temper, we seldom think of the other question, whether he be religious and devout.—Shaftesbury.

The ideal of morality has no more dangerous rival than the ideal of highest strength, of most powerful life. It is the maximum of the savage.—Novalis.

The moment a man is satisfied with himself, everybody else is dissatisfied with him.—Arab Proverb.

It is a great error to imagine that high excellence can ever consist in a mere suppressing of some worse and lower tendency: the better part which we choose may be itself not very elevated. The soul may be freed from struggle, and the conscience be at peace, because its highest convictions have triumphed; and yet its highest may be far from high. Nay, the triumph may be due as much to the weakness of the inferior passions as to any energy of the spiritual nature; so that a comfortable mediocrity is all that will result, unless the moral perceptions keep rising, which is indeed the most healthful state. To this, it is probable that increasing mental culture is in certain stages essential. To destroy superstition does not impart religion; but the destruction is necessary, if religion is to flourish.—Francis W. Newman.

EVERY one must think in his own way to arrive at truth. But he ought to keep himself in hand: we are too good for pure instinct.—Goethe.

Virtue does not give talents, but it supplies their place. Talents neither give virtue, nor supply the place of it.—Chinese Proverb.

If you think you can temper yourself into manliness by sitting there over your books, it is the very silliest fancy that ever tempted a young man to his ruin. You cannot dream yourself into a character: you must hammer and forge yourself one.—J. A. Froude.

WISDOM does not show itself so much in precept as in life,—in a firmness of mind and a mastery of appetite. It teaches us to do as well as to talk, and to make our words and our actions all of a color.—Seneca.

Virtue is the beauty, and vice the deformity of the soul.—Socrates.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Pope, vicegerent of God on earth, asked last Sunday for the prayers of the faithful, that his liberty and independence might be restored to him!

THE Channing Memorial Church, which has been in process of erection at Newport the past year, is completed, and was "dedicated" yesterday.

THE call at New Haven for a civil service convention on the 25th instant announces the support of several ex-governors and prominent men of both parties.

THE English Secular Review defines secularism as "the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from purely human considerations."

THE Association for the Advancement of Women meets in Buffalo on the 19th, 20th, and 21st inst. to discuss "the increasing interests and responsibilities of the sex in education, literature, science, and art, especially in the practical duties of household work, health and dress, business, charity, penal reform, etc."

MR. DOWNING, of Flushing, L.I., is described as gaining a grand victory over the feminine contestant for his school-board position. The voluntary women voters pitted their candidate, Mrs. Judd, against him, on grounds of lacking fidelity on his part to the demands of his office, and turned out in good numbers to carry their point. But this lofty hero scooped up women from Hibernian and negro quarters, and conveyed them by hacks to the polls for the purpose of offsetting the intelligent ballots, and won his glorious cause.

A CLERGYMAN on Long Island has explained to his congregation "that the reason why the prayers of the people had not saved President Garfield's life was because the wound, as shown by the autopsy, was fatal from the first; and, moreover, that there was really no instance where a miracle had been performed in connection with gun-shot wounds!" This is delightfully clear and frank; but the sceptics will naturally say, "What chance, then, to get a miracle in anywhere?" We had supposed that it was just in such cases, where natural law, if left to itself, would bring an unwished for result, that miracles were of use."

CARDINAL MANNING, in a recent address on intemperance in England, said that "no nation on the face of the earth was so stained by intemperance as England. Take the Oriental world. They never drank intoxicating drinks except where individuals, faithless to their traditional duty and in immediate contact with our English civilization, had learned it from us; and he was sorry to say that many of them thought the name of Englishman and drunkenness were synonymous; and he was sorry to say also that the name of a Christian and the name of a drunkard were considered to be synonymous terms."

THE Jewish Advance, in noting "the obliteration of all national and sectarian lines" in the late tributes to President Garfield, gives an incident of the memorial gathering in Plymouth Congregational Church on the memorable Sunday, September 25, at which the various denominational representatives included Rabbi Hirsch. "Drs. Burgess and Hirsch were the speakers of the evening; and Dr. Hirsch's brilliant and eloquent tribute to the character of the illustrious dead made such an impression upon the vast congregation that at its conclusion, notwithstanding the place and occasion, deafening rounds of applause shook the mighty edifice."

AMONG all our national centennial celebrations, there has been none since the Fourth of July, 1876, so full of interest as that which is taking place at Yorktown this week. In the Declaration of Independence, Liberty proclaimed itself king; but not until the victory at Yorktown did it have power to mount the throne. As the French helped the struggling colonies to win that victory, they are now honored guests in the nation's celebration. The proposition that the British flag should be honorably saluted in the ceremonies has been protested against in some quarters. But, surely, the "unpleasantness" with Great Britain was so long ago, and there has been so much pleasantness since, that the nation could well offer this honor to the mother country without being misunderstood. Especially at this time when the English people, from queen to peasant, have been overflowing in sympathy toward this country in a manner unparalleled in history, such an action would be not only graceful, but just.

UNHAPPY Ireland! The Land Bill has not pacified her, but only seems to have whetted the popular appetite to demand more. If Land League methods have accomplished so much, why may they not accomplish much more, is the natural question which the Leaguers have been asking. And so they have pushed the agitation to the very verge of civil war. Parnell and other leaders have been arrested by the government, and are in prison; but a people cannot be imprisoned. England must give local government to Ireland before the Irish question is settled. One can hardly conceive a more painful position for a conscientious statesman than that in which Gladstone is now placed. His convictions and sympathies are on the side of liberty, progress, and peace; and yet by the hard fate of political circumstances he is compelled to stand to the Irish people as the representative of the strong hand of power that is suppressing these. A rousing meeting was held in Music Hall, this city, last Monday evening, to welcome Mr. O'Connor, M.P., and express sympathy for the Irish cause, of which he is a distinguished leader. Enthusiastic speeches were made by Mayor Prince and Wendell Phillips as well as by Mr. O'Connor.

TRANSIENT AND PERMANENT.

A DISCOURSE.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

"One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh," said, in his tone of despair, the writer of the old Hebrew book Ecclesiastes. The words with him represented only the transiency, the mark of dissolubleness and death, that was upon everything pertaining to earth and human life. They are a part of his lamentation over the hollowness and vanity of man's existence. Perhaps a more bitter wail in the name of religion was never penned than these chapters on the vanity of life. "All is vanity," "vanity of vanities," to this ancient preacher; "all the works done under the sun are but vexation of spirit"; even "wisdom" is but "grief" to him, and "he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." He is a pure fatalist. Man to him is the puppet and plaything of forces which he can neither understand nor control; and the forces to him seem to have no meaning in themselves, no goal, no purpose. They are but moving in an endless circuit of change, and that is all. "The thing which hath been shall be," and "there is no new thing under the sun." Decay, change, death, are written everywhere. The generations come, go through their little round of pleasures and pains, and pass away; and that is the end of them. Each leaves the earth as it found it; each makes its advent where every other has done before it, goes round the same circle, and vanishes by the same exit. All that he could say by way of balance to this changeless process of change was that "the earth abideth." Such was the philosophy of Ecclesiastes. There are nuggets of golden truth in the book; but its prevailing tone is that of a blasé man of the world, whose piety partakes of his general weariness and emptiness.

Yet what is noticeable in his book, and that which is the special point which has led me to head this discourse with his words, is that he could not even state the formulas of his philosophy of purposeless change and blank despair without implying that there is a power that abides; he could not speak philosophically of the transient without recognizing the permanent. Transiency of phenomenon, permanence of essence; changing process, abiding power,—these are the two sides of every form of world-life, material or human.

It is much to say, indeed, that "the earth abideth." Relatively to the changes that are ever going on upon its surface, it does abide, and represents that which gives to these changes unity and significance. In it are stored up chiefly the elements of all the varied forms of life that exist upon it. Out of its dust, the manifold races of animal existence that inhabit it are created. That same dust, under some different combination of vital atoms, appears in the equally manifold variety of the vegetable kingdom,—in grass, and tree, and foliage, and gorgeous color of the flowers. Amid all changes of spring-time and fruit-time, the coming and going of the seasons, the teeming refulgent life of summer, the apparent dissolution and death of winter, the different growths and productions of different zones, the earth itself stays. It has stayed amid even greater changes than these, as the birth and growth and disappearance of entire species of living creatures, the coming and going of the generations of men, the rise and fall of human kingdoms, and the whole vast procedure of human history,—amid it all and through all, the old mother earth, which has been the scene and sustenance of it all, abides. Through all the changes that happen upon it, the earth itself represents the principle of stability. In the face of death, it keeps the secret of an ever-renewing life. To facts of decay and destruction, it presents the counter fact of continued vitality. To all vanishings and burials, it opposes a resurrection. For the shifting scenes of the drama of existence, it offers at least a stage that is solid, and one that has now stood so long that, with all the variety of actors and action and strange mingling of comedy and tragedy upon it, we can yet begin to see the unity and meaning of the plot. Yes, the abiding earth itself, staying on after it has witnessed the coming and going of so many generations of its varied orders of life, reveals now to the observant eye, in its own solid sides and in the accumulated life, human and infra-human, upon its surface, a steady plan through all its changing phenomena. In all its incessant shift and transiency, the line of permanent purpose has been preserved; and the earth, in which the vital power is stored and whence the changing drama springs, to these transitory phenomena represents this permanence.

Yet a larger science shows us that only thus relatively can we speak of the earth as permanent; that on a larger scale of relationships even the earth might vanish away, and yet an abiding power and plan and purpose remain. Astronomers think that worlds as large as our earth have been destroyed; that possibly by some flaw of material or outward concussion a planet may be broken asunder. A theory has been broached, indeed, that the earth is approaching the sun, and must in the course of time drop as fuel into that luminary,—a theory, however, not supported sufficiently to give us any anxiety for ourselves or posterity. Another theory presented on the authority of great astronomers is that the earth has now reached its culmination in the line of the possibilities of life, and that henceforth its vital power is to decline until it shall become a "dead world,"—also however at a too remote period to alarm us. But it is evident, when we look into the heavens through the eye of science, that the earth does not exist by itself nor for itself alone; that it has relations to other heavenly bodies,—literally that it has relations in them,—brothers and sisters and cousins; that it is in very close and important relation to the sun, which has been proved to be the real source of all this earthly life and of those ceaseless metamorphoses of which we have been speaking, so that, if that sun ninety millions and more miles away were blotted out, all life upon the earth must cease to be and the earth itself fly away to we know not what destruction; while, if the earth should be destroyed, all the power and vitality on which it has depended would still abide in the sun, ample for the emergency of some new creation. Thus already we see that the sun represents a power more abiding, more permanent, nearer the source and centre of things than the earth. And when we look beyond the sun and our solar system to the innumerable suns and worlds and systems of worlds which stud the infinite spaces of the heavens, and think that our sun with its planets exists and moves and has its being in very vital relationship to these countless multitudes of bodies, and that all, small and great, are but parts of one stupendous plan and process of creation,—a process that has taken æons to reach its present stage,—and when we think that through the vast all there is unity of relationship, arrangement, operation, then we begin to catch glimpse of a power as abiding source of all changing phenomena to which our earth and sun are as nothing, and we feel that something would remain, even though all the heavens which our eyes behold should be gathered into a scroll and vanish away.

But the important fact which issues from this vaster survey is that the power that abides, the power that is permanent in the midst of the transient, is not something that we reach after we have got above all these hosts of worlds and passed any possible limits of finite space, not a power somewhere outside of the universe, a Being distant and solitary in his grandeur,—for, to this view, the universe has no outside, and there are no bounds where, even to the imagination, the world of matter ends,—but it is a power pervading, interpenetrating all this vast system of multitudinous activity and life; a power the same in the near as in the far, in the small as in the great, in the atom no less than in the solar system, in this moment of time no less than in any creative era in the past; a power that is really represented in and working through the vital forces of our sun and earth as much as in any distant heavens to which our imagination may climb; a power very real and very close,—there, indeed, in distant Sirius, guiding "Arcturus with his sons," and "binding the sweet influences of Pleiades," but here also, within this blade of grass that springs up so shapely at my feet, the very force that shapes and colors it, and works within all laws and processes to that end; the abiding power with which nature at this moment is everywhere alive, manifest in rock and moss, in flower and leaf, and in all the stir and thrill of nature's nerves; the power that is visible or invisible in all her ways, the constant beneath all change, the open or secret force behind all movement, the living principle beneath all rapidly changing forms of life, the life-power still beneath all apparent death. Or it is a power that we may see, too, and that our eyes may this moment look upon in still higher forms of manifestation,—as the power which works in childhood to develop it into manhood; which works in character, from all sorts of materials and conditions, to bring forth virtue; which works in nations, bringing them from small beginnings to great achievements; which works in human society, aiming ever, through all outward events and the changing conditions of experience and the successive generations as they come and go, to achieve a higher degree of civilization, intelligence, and morality; which works in the heart and brain of individual men and women, through the great sentiments of love and right, and justice and pity, and aspiration after truth, to make human life everywhere richer and happier and sweeter, converting the bad into good, and the good into a better, and the better into a better still, and a better still again, and so reaching on and up toward the Infinite Best.

Have we not here found something that is permanent in the transient; something that abides unchanged below all waves of change; something to which we can anchor safely; something that does not move with every changing phase of human thought or shift its ground with the fickleness of human passion; something that stays while generations come and go, outlasts the life of nations, survives death, makes the grave a cradle for new births, and converts all dissolutions into processes of vitality; something that is superior to disease, vice, bad blood, deformity, temptation, crime, and every form of evil, and able in time to reduce them all into conditions of physical and moral health; something that abides below all tragedies and miseries tenacious of a good purpose, and that would abide still unconquered, though a world should go to pieces? We have here the foundation rock of all that is, the veritable "Rock of Ages": to what can our faith more firmly anchor? We have here the root whence has sprung all intelligent purpose, all wisdom, all finite mentality: to what can our minds more rationally hold? We have here the source and perpetual sustenance of all genuine loves of the human heart, of all its pure generousities, sympathies, tenderesses, humanities: to what, then, can our hearts cling with greater assurance that all their interests will be cared for? We have here the productive substance and agency of every form and species of life that exists: to what, therefore, can our lives be vitally related and come into active communion with, with a more valid promise of safety for us here and hereafter?

But let us see how the presence of this abiding power in the midst of changing phenomena is illustrated in some of the more special phases of human life. Take mental progress,—progress in science, in learning, in experience, in knowledge of any kind. Intellectually, the race advances as a whole, as a unit; or at least that part of it does which comes within the limits of one order of civilization, or which is brought by social or material ties into a common intercourse. No generation begins its mental development anew. It begins where the preceding generation left off. No individual man begins his active life to-day as if he were the first man. The son begins where his father stopped. This at least is the normal order, the rule of nature, though of course we find exceptions to it. Any set of scholars or scientists who should begin their study de novo to-day would get but little way in it, and be really no scholars or scientists for this age. A scientific man to-day with only Newton's knowledge would be an ignoramus. The scholars, the men of science, the professional men, must all begin where their predecessors ended, and carry on their study from that point, if they expect to become proficient. They must learn a good deal that has been learned before them, it is true. Yet much of it they will learn as the commonplaces of knowledge, for it is in the social atmosphere; and much of it they will not need to learn, for it has already become obsolete; and all that they need to learn by study will be the easier for the years of general progress that have intervened since the original investigations were made. If the learner had to begin as if nothing had been done before him, to read and investigate everything, and everything as if it were fresh, wisdom would indeed be a "grief," and "increasing knowledge would increase sorrow"; and, since "of making books there is no end," study would become a terrific "weariness of the flesh," and the would-be scholar would sink hopelessly under the burden before he had fairly assumed it. But, as it is, knowledge accumulated in the past becomes a matter of inheritance. At least, the results of it are largely inherited by birth. They go into the blood, and help to make the mental tendency and capacity of coming learners and teachers. They are assimilated by general culture, and so affect large numbers who have never learned the facts in detail. And this is especially true of all matters of common civilization and social experience. People are doing hundreds of things to-day, and know how to do them well, not because they themselves ever learned to do them so well from the beginning, but because little by little the slowly accumulating and perhaps bitter experience of many generations has come down into their action, to give it ease, and grace, and efficiency.

And, besides this accumulating product of knowledge and experience that marks mental progress, the conditions of thought are constantly changing; mental problems are advancing to new planes; new phases of intellectual activity, new forms of investigation are ever appearing, so that each generation — each generation, at least, of vital thinkers — has a peculiar mental atmosphere and method. This is the ground of the saying that a man who does not anywhere mentally harmonize with the intellectual atmosphere of his own time is either before or behind the age; behind it, if, as is the case with the great body of theologians, he is busied with problems and uses a mental method that have, in all departments of vital intellectual life, become obsolete; before it, if by some idiosyncrasy of temperament he is a seer of truths which nobody about him is yet ready to accept, and which cannot yet be embodied in practice. Said a scholarly gentleman to me, speaking of a certain fine essay to which we had both listened, "I could not possibly have written that essay, though acquainted with all the facts and accepting theoretically the theory propounded in it, because I am twenty-five years older than the man who wrote it, and he has ripened into active thinking in a mental atmosphere that is peculiarly of this time, and is wholly different from that in which my thinking was moulded twenty-five years ago. Yet this," he added, "is the natural result of that." He exaggerated, perhaps, the difference in this case, yet spoke a truth. The younger men take up the work of thought-development just where, by the necessity of the case, the older men have to leave it. The generations pass one after another, but the thought goes on to its completion and fulfilment. That abides and lives, and grows and bears its fruit, though the individual men and women that cherish and carry it successively pass away and are known no more. By this continuous vitality of thought from generation to generation, the race progresses in mental development as if it were one man instead of many millions and billions of men. The generations vanish, but the power that stays is ever greater than the power that goes; and it so links the living and the dead together that the channels that supply ever-increasing sustenance for the mental progress of the race are kept unbroken. Knowledge is knit to knowledge, science to science, discovery follows discovery, problems which one generation starts and perhaps fails upon, the next solves, while this puts in turn new questions for its successor. The truths which some one man may plant to-day will come up next year in a social agitation, and the next century reap them in the form of a higher civilization or religion. Men die, the greatest as the least; but humanity is their natural heir, and all their mental wealth is saved in its estate.

Or look at the moral condition of mankind in farther illustration of the theme. Sometimes, perhaps, when we consider the actual state of human society, when we are forced to behold its moral corruptions, its prevalent vices, its license of passion, when we are shocked, as we are in these days again and again, by its flagitious and monstrous crimes, we are tempted to despair of man's moral future. Yet no fact in human history is plainer than that man has actually made moral progress. Paint his moral condition in the past, or in any epoch of the past, as black as we may, reckon up all the great eras of immorality, marshal together all the great criminals of history, and the fact still stands out in indisputable clearness that the race as a whole, taking its whole historical career into account, has been advancing in morals. Temporary and local causes may have brought here and there a temporary moral depression, when there has been alarming outbreak of corruption and crime. There have been, indeed, long periods when vice so prevailed even in the best portions of mankind that it seemed as if the race were morally retrograding. Yet after every such ebb of the tide of moral sentiment there has been a rebound which has carried society to a higher mark of virtue than was ever reached before. In spite of all transient retrogressions, and the influence of bad great men, and the power of corrupt leadership, in the midst of all struggles with passion and bitter encounters with the evil outward conditions of existence, through all the great social tragedies of war, vice, and criminality, in spite of all and through all, the moral sentiments of justice, honor, benevolence, temperance, purity, have been defining themselves with more and more clearness to the human mind, and taking a deeper root in private and social life. Whatever great reputations may now and then go to ruin, however overwhelming may sometimes seem the tide of moral evil, yet these great sentiments at least abide in the heart of the human race, and shine still with crystal clearness over all threatening floods of moral dissolution. There is, indeed, such native moral elasticity in the bosom of the race that I do not believe it is possible for any individual men, however bad, or any epochs of wickedness, however great, to drag humanity down to irretrievable moral destruction. This fact of moral progress, in the face of all the difficulties and obstacles, is the blazing fact of human history. And to my mind it is one of the highest possible proofs that the world is directed by moral no less than by intelligent purpose; that, welded in the very temper of things and ingrained in the mental constitution of man, there is a moral aim, which, whatever may happen, cannot be turned aside and prevented from ultimately achieving its object. Whatever goes down and perishes, this abides, — an indestructible inheritance from the primal Power whence the movement and drift of things first started.

Finally, we might say essentially the same thing of the religious condition of mankind. Many people are not a little alarmed at what seem to them the increasing evidences of religious scepticism, — the removal of ancient landmarks of doctrine, the vanishing of old forms and institutions, the growth of freer views on all the problems deemed sacred by the mass of people. But there has never been a time when changes of this kind were not in process. In one aspect, the whole religious history of man is the history of a change of view, as man, in various degrees and conditions of culture, has reflected on his relation to the universe and its mysterious cause. Even in the comparatively short period of Christian history, religious dogmas have been in a state of flux, as witness the many sects and churches that mark the successive waves of new thought. Institutions, too, in the domain of religion as elsewhere, have had their seasons of growth and decay. Even the stable Roman Catholic Church shows historically a gradual development of doctrine and ritual, and has admitted of some changes in our own day. Yet amid this flux of religious doctrines and forms none will deny that hitherto at least the sentiment of religion, the spirit of worship and faith, have remained. There has been the upward look, the soaring aspiration, the reverent loyalty to truth, the longing for a consecrated life, though creeds and ceremonies have been of the things that are born and die.

Of the changing doctrines themselves, though in the forms most familiar to us they may become obsolete, there is a sentiment or belief, a root-idea, of which these forms were the temporary expression, that abides and is universal and permanent. The doctrine of divine incarnation, for instance, is found in some shape in every religion, — perhaps, it may even be said, in every sect. The forms of it vary and change, and many of them have passed away. There are even Christian people to-day who deny that the popular Christian doctrine of incarnation, confining it to the one exhibition in Jesus of Nazareth, is true. Yet these same people, and the holders of the most radical faith, and material science itself, which so many good people fear as "infidel," are preaching a doctrine of incarnation larger and finer and more practical than anything the popular theology has taught; namely, that the eternal power and life are not in one man alone, but in all things and, to some extent and with possible increase of extent, in all men. So of atonement, regeneration, mediatorship, and others of the old doctrines. The doctrines in their old ecclesiastical shapes are doomed to perish. The very words as theology are vanishing. But modern philosophy and science are taking up something that was true in them, and that was always the sustaining power within them, and are proving that something to be dependent on no system of theology and no church, but to have a foundation in the very constitution of human nature and human society. Regeneration is a natural phase in the process of all physical and mental life, whereby the forces of material and moral health overcome the forces of disease and blunder and vice. Mediatorship and atonement are no far-off artificial drama, enacted once for the race, but represent natural sympathies and services that enter into every domestic circle, into every social bond. By the very law of mutual responsibility inhering in the organic relations of human society, we are atoning for each other's transgressions daily. In theological form and even name, these creeds vanish, but the substance of them abides.

If such changes have occurred in the past and yet no harm has come to religion, why need we fear for the future? Suppose even that the authority of the special religions should vanish, and that the religions themselves as separate organizations, should be dissolved. What then? Would all be lost? Nay, though the religions should go, religion would remain. The elements of it are inherent in the human constitution, and are the cause of the specific and organized religions, not the effect. That creative power which has produced the religious history of man, whatever be its primal source, is, in the domain of humanity, in the human mind, and is as inexhaustible in its vitality as is the human mind itself. The greatest religious souls, indeed, are of no sect, and stand at a height of faith where even the boundaries between the religions are invisible. Wherever we find heroic consecration to duty, nobility of self-sacrifice for high ends, fidelity to unseen ideals of right, affection that, in the face of all obstacles, clings to and works for others' welfare, aspirations that reach out unweariedly after truth in all its infinite heights and depths, and such love and devotion for truth as seeks it for its own sake and is ready to meet any cross and any death for it rather than it shall suffer dishonor, there, whatever old beliefs or forms we may miss, the best parts of religion abide and humanity's highest interests are safe.

RATIONALISM AND THE HIGHER SENTIMENTS.

Some liberal sentimentalists seem to be laboring under a false estimate of freethought and rationalism. Rationalism with them is only a very partial development, — a sort of "utilitarian materialism" that is satisfied with the grosser forms of animal life. They think "reason" has nothing to do with the higher sentiments of humanity. Ideality, love of the sublime and beautiful, poetry and the fine arts, are all to be ignored by "rationalists" according to their peculiar views. Mr. Henry Clay Neville seems to entertain this unique estimate of freethinkers in general. His views of Liberalism, as expressed occasionally in the Index, are very peculiar, so much so that it would be interesting to the believer in evolution to account for them.

It would seem that in our progressive mental transition from a state of sentimental superstition to rationalism there is a constant looking back to the long-cherished emotions of our mental childhood; and we fondly regret our old "homes of belief," until our new rational surroundings become familiar. Mr. Neville says "reason" would "despoil many of our noblest sentiments, if they were arraigned before that stern tribunal." But what does enlightened reason say against our loving the scenes of our childhood, or against our "respecting the graves of friends"?

That reason must be very unique and peculiar, which would abolish or annihilate, if it could, all the finer sentiments and affections of our nature. What does Mr. Neville mean by "reason"? Isn't it a very peculiar kind of logic that would do away with all the higher sentiments? Perhaps Mr. Neville has come in contact only with rationalists whose intellectual capacities have been developed, without a corresponding unfolding of the higher sentiments and emotions. More often, the emotional nature is in excess of the intellectual. Rationalists are not all perfectly developed in their emotional nature, any more than orthodox believers are in their intellectual.

We would reply to Mr. Neville's question, — Is life reasonable? — by asking him what he means by "reasonable." The highest emotions, the loftiest sentiments, and the noblest aspirations of humanity are all in harmony with an enlightened reason. True, there may be acute intellect and logical reasoning, without developed and cultured emotions and sentiments, just as there is great emotional development without a corresponding intellectual advancement. Mr. Neville, we think, illustrates very forcibly the need of a harmonious development of our whole nature. But why should he be more shocked at the sight of intellectual acuteness without an appreciation of aesthetics than he is at emotional superstition without intellect? In the good time coming, the moral and emotional will be equally developed with the intellectual in the perfect man. But, in the mean time, let us have by all means "the intellectual guide of life," even if it does shock our æsthetic sensibilities a little. We need such guide to get out of the wilderness of superstition. No doubt there was a beauty and fascination in the old Grecian mythology, which invested the shady woods and running brooks, the silvery moon and glorious sun, with attributes of Deity; but does Mr. Neville regret that humanity has left far behind those mystic beauties? HOW FAR IS EVOLUTION COMPATIBLE WITH THEISM?

Evolution to some extent, and that generally an indefinitely large extent, is now almost universally admitted among Theists. I have been led to doubt the propriety or consistency of this admission.

It is conceivable that the apparent evolution is only a divinely appointed order of succession. Now I wish my reader to consider whether this is not all that is compatible with Christian Theism? I beg my learned reader not to pooh pooh this at first sight without taking the slightest glance at the reasons I have to present for my suggestion.

You know there is a large number of Christian divines who deny all power or force to matter, or even to the human mind, unless the will be excepted. All these, of course must deny evolution everywhere. With them, all changes are the effects of divine, supernatural power only; and by this power the order of succession is fixed, not by any connection of natural cause and effect. These very persons do indeed, strange to say, affirm a limited evolution, which only shows that they do not understand themselves. Their inconsistency is very clear; but I am haunted with a feeling and suspicion that all Christians are inconsistent in admitting evolution, except as it is limited to the growth of each individual within himself, which is not the distinctive scientific conception of evolution.

A characteristic affirmation of evolution is the identity and continuity of all force and substance through all varying successive forms. The force and substance of the latest and noblest known form of life are the same as the earliest and lowest. The soul and body of man are only the transmuted force and substance of protoplasm and the primeval gas or gases. It admits of but one known force and substance. So far as evolution does extend, if it exist at all, so far there exists but one substance and there is but one force that operates, and its operation is always a transformation, which is an evolution when the transformation is in the direction of a greater heterogeneity. Hence, wherever evolution is admitted between any two beings, whether of the same or different rank or class or species, there is an admission of their identity of substance and force.

As Christians (and perhaps as moralists, as psychologists), we cannot admit this to be true as between any two human souls, whatever may be said of their bodies. Our souls are not modes or forms of one common force and substance. Though of the same general quality as to kind, they are numerically distinct as individuals proper. This is the acknowledged implication of Christianity and Theism, and it is the testimony of consciousness. As Christians, therefore, we cannot consistently admit that our souls have been evolved from anything below us, or even that children's souls are evolved from their parents. Evolution must here be absolutely denied in every conceivable degree, else our position as Christians is logically undetermined.

But here scientific difficulties begin to press us heavily. If we propose to cut off man from the law of evolution and admit that law everywhere below man, we can assign no reason but our creed for such a distinction, which is opposed by science, which shows apparently as much reason for affirming the law in one region as in another. However, we are not now considering the scientific but the Christian aspect of the question, and as Christians we must not compromise ourselves.

There are some in the ranks of Christianity who seem to think it enough if it is allowed that God may have created some low form of life in the beginning, and thence made all else a process of evolution. This saves creationism and supernaturalism so far. But, if this is the sum of supernaturalism (and it is if all else is naturalistic evolution), then all that is distinctive in Christian Theism is destroyed or precluded.

If we superinduce upon this the idea that God presides over the process of evolution and exercises a supernatural agency all along, and even a miraculous agency if necessary, the affirmation of evolution is nullified. We are not entitled to affirm its existence at all, for we cannot find it in discrimination from the alleged supernatural agency. If the alleged supernatural wrought differently from the natural, we could do this; but we find in fact a simple unity of causation which we take to be natural.

The most consistent course, therefore, for us Christians seems to be to deny evolution everywhere, and to disregard the fact that science is compelled to take the opposite path and affirm evolution everywhere.

"NOTHING TO SET UP CHURCH-KEEPING WITH."

Speaking of "Free Religionists," Mrs. Annie L. Diggs, of Kansas, mourns over their poverty. They have "no buildings, no organs, no music, no song-books, not even a steeple to begin with," nothing indeed "to set up church-keeping with."

This is sadly true of their material resources, but it has a truth deeper than this. Radicalism in theology has nothing whatever to set up church-keeping with. When men deny to the Bible all divine authority, when they have ceased to believe in an angry God, when they have blotted out hell from their creed, when Sunday is no holier than Monday, when the minister and the sacraments are no longer holy and have no special claims, when even prayer itself has become unreasonable, what in the world is there to set up church-keeping with? Of what use your body without a soul?

The future church—if we are to have one—must be vastly different from the church of the present. It will be impossible to keep men and women together from Sunday to Sunday, year in and year out, to listen to moral or theological essays from the same man, or to join in mere forms of devotion. If a preacher is a "Free Religionist," he must either possess extraordinary ability to hold a society together, or he must preach to a people who are church-goers from habit, or are still more or less under the influence of the old ideas and the old motives. Radicalism and churchism are not fast friends. The instances are very rare indeed of religious congregations being built up or held together by radical ministers. The facts are the other way. We are not blaming them. We are simply stating facts. The day of churchism indeed is fast passing away; and the grave question arises, What shall we have next? Whatever it may be, it will be the highest and the best for the time being.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

AMERICAN VERSION OF THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. (Second Edition.) With the readings and renderings preferred by the American Committee of Revision, incorporated into the text by Roswell D. Hitchcock, D.D., President of the Union Theological Seminary, New York. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert. All rights reserved. Cloth, red edges, $1.00; morocco grained leather, gilt edges, $1.75; full Turkey morocco, gilt edges, $3.25.

This may be called the American patriotic edition of the revised New Testament. It puts into the text such readings as the American revisers had approved, but which, for one reason or another, the English Committee of Revision did not accept, but printed in an appendix. Here, the corresponding English renderings are relegated to the back seat of an appendix. In general, it may be said that the English revisers were somewhat more conservative than the American. The American Committee, however, it should be said, have not issued this edition, and could not do so, according to the terms of their agreement with the English revisers, for at least fourteen years. Yet it has had competent supervision, and all proper care has been given to make it accurate.

GARFIELD'S WORDS.—A beautiful little volume, issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, bearing the perfect workmanship of the Riverside Press of Cambridge. It is compiled by William Ralston Balch, and is packed with choice extracts, skillfully arranged under appropriate topical headings. A brief sketch of President Garfield's origin and career precedes this collection of gems, of which a half-dozen below may stand as fair specimens. The first is sadly prophetic of the nation's late experience:—

"I have sometimes thought that we cannot know any man thoroughly well while he is in perfect health. As the ebb-tide discloses the real lines of the shore and the bed of the sea, so feebleness, sickness, and pain bring out the real character of a man."

"In order to have any success in life or any worthy success, you must resolve to carry into your work a fulness of knowledge,—not merely a sufficiency, but more than a sufficiency. . . . Be fit for more than the thing you are now doing. . . . If you are not too large for the place, you are too small for it."

"Great ideas travel slowly, and for a time noiselessly, as the gods, whose feet were shod with wool."

"Liberty can be safe only when suffrage is illuminated by education."

"We should do nothing inconsistent with the spirit and genius of our institutions. We should do nothing for revenge, but everything for security; nothing for the past, everything for the present and the future."

"In a word, our national safety demands that the fountains of political power shall be made pure by intelligence, and kept pure by vigilance."

THE POETS' TRIBUTES TO GARFIELD, issued by Moses King of Cambridge, commences with a few chapters of biography, followed by a collection of poems, mainly consisting of those written for the Boston Daily Globe, but including also a valuable collection from other journals. The contribution by Dr. O. W. Holmes closes with the following stanzas:—

"Not ours the verdict to decide
Whom death shall claim or skill shall save;
The hero's life though Heaven denied,—
It gave our land a martyr's grave.

"Nor count the teaching vainly sent
How human hearts their griefs may share,
The lesson woman's love has lent
What hope may do, what faith can bear!

"Farewell! the leaf-strown earth enfolds
Our stay, our pride, our hopes, our fears;
And autumn's golden sun beholds
A nation bowed, a world in tears."

From the lines of Joaquin Miller:—

"In centre land,
As in the centre of each heart,
As in the hollow of God's hand,
The coffin sinks. And with it part
All party hates! Now, not in vain
He bore his peril and hard pain."

From those of Marie E. Blake:—

"Thus fares it with our liege? Nay, doubting soul,
Not thus; but grandly raised to nobler height
Of strength and power and most divine delight,
At one swift breath made beautiful and whole!

"Nor mocked by broken hope, or shattered plan,
By some pale ghost of duty left undone,
By haunting moments wasted one by one,
But crowned with that which best becometh man.

"Holding with brimming hands his heart's desire;
While the fierce light of these last glorious days,
Blazing on each white line of thought and duty,
Touches his record with immortal fire!"

From the London Spectator:—

"Lo! along the street's he's borne,
Pale, through ranked crowds, this gray September morn,
'Mid straining eyes, and brows unbonneted,
And reverent speechlessness! a 'people's voice'!
Nay, but a people's silence! through the soul
Of the wide world its subtler echoes roll,
O brother nation! England for her part
Is with thee: God willing, she whose heart
Throbbled with thy pain shall with thy joy rejoice."

THE true scholar grudges every opportunity of action passed by, as a loss of power.—Emerson.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

HARVARD COLLEGE opens with the largest Freshman Class ever admitted, numbering two hundred and fifty.

DR. JOHN HALL will be Chancellor Crosby's successor in the University of New York, if he will accept the position.

MRS. J. T. SARGENT held an afternoon and evening reception at her new residence in Cambridge on the 19th inst.

MR. J. L. STODDARD has purchased the "Locust Grove" estate at Gilmanton, N.H., where he will pass his summer leisure in America.

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE difficulties have crippled its prospects materially at present showing, the admissions to the Freshman Class being much less than in former years.

WHEN the late General Burnside received a telegram from Governor Sprague, asking how soon he could be ready to take charge of the Rhode Island troops, he flashed back the instant answer, "In one minute!"

THE chime of nine bells, weighing from four hundred to three thousand pounds, now forging in Boston, and the gift of Mr. Alfred Smith of Newport to the Channing Memorial edifice, will ring out their initial peal on Christmas of 1881.

IN the committee report read by Dr. J. Heber Smith, at a medical convention held in Boston, concerning the establishment of places for homœopathic treatment of the insane, it was urged that women should form a part of the medical staff in the accomplishment of such a plan.

ORSON PRATT, the latest survivor of the twelve Mormon Apostles, whose death is now announced, is given credit for being the best of them all, and greatly esteemed for general uprightness. The elder Young was abusive in conduct toward him, as might be expected if his character served as a living rebuke in contrast to his own.

DR. J. G. HOLLAND, editor of Scribner's Monthly, who has died the past week, leaves behind him a glowing and substantial record of literary achievement, and an added proof of what industry and energy may accomplish under American institutions. His books had a great sale, and were always pure in tone, but were too deficient in virility to last.

MR. WM. M. SALTER has gone to New York to stay the greater part of a year, for the purpose of studying theoretically and practically certain departments of social science, in which he is greatly interested. He is to speak, however, for the Twenty-eighth Congressional Society, in Parker Memorial Hall, once each month, beginning on the second Sunday of November.

REAR ADMIRAL RODGERS, of the United States Naval Academy, deprecates the extreme views in circulation regarding its recent "hazing" affair; but the admissions of fact still adhering to the case leave it at only a lesser degree of just condemnation. When male students get a glimpse of the demands of honorable courtesy, like that exhibited at the late induction of a new class at Smith College of Northampton, they may be disposed to doff the clownish costume of senseless trickery.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR is getting a reputation as "the silent man." The correspondents of the press continue to talk volubly about the changes in his cabinet and other appointments; but he keeps his own mouth shut, and at this writing the cabinet remains as President Garfield left it. A prominent politician, who had an interview with the President the other day, is reported to have said: "You can't get a word out of him. He is a complete mystery. He is courteous, genial, pleasant, glad to hear everything, and is getting good advice in large quantities; but he gives no intimation as to his purposes."

OUR friend Photius Fisk, who tries very hard to be a pessimist in theory, but is ever contradicting his creed by his deed, has just added another to his list of quiet generousities by making a donation of Greek books to the college at Grinnell, Iowa. The Grinnell Herald prints a letter from the Greek professor of the college, which says that Mr. Fisk, who is a Greek by birth, though for more than fifty years a most patriotic American citizen and for much of that time a United States naval chaplain, received recently a list of works the college greatly needed, including some that were quite costly. Under the date of September 23d, he replies: "I have concluded that I must try and assist your college to the Greek books named in your letter. I have agreed with a house in Boston to import the whole set, and they will be here in about seven weeks. Upon their arrival, I will have them sent at once to your address." The books, we learn, will cost nearly $200, and will be a great help to the college. Professor Brewer, who has charge of the Greek department at Grinnell, is the son of the first teacher of Mr. Fisk when he came to this country as a boy.

THE Inebriates' Home at Fort Hamilton loses, in the death of Rev. John Willett, its founder and first superintendent, a man of rare character and worth. The Home, which has come to be second to no other in the country, was the outgrowth of Mr. Willett's unfeigned philanthropy applied to a class of persons for whom pity is but too often another name for contempt and unconcern. He believed something better could be done with an inebriate than subject him to confinement and disgrace, and it was this feeling, applied to the rescue of one and another, which at length developed into an institution which has restored hundreds of persons to manhood and self-respect. Such an institution required in a superintendent courage, firmness, patience, charity, and good sense; and all these Mr. Willett possessed in a remarkable degree. In treating the peculiar class of unfortunates who came under his care, he never resorted to nostrums and theories, but set himself to wean them from the cup and build them up in the very things which the cup had weakened or destroyed. This he did by means of good living, good company, diversion, reading, or whatever else might aid in restoring health, strength, and self-respect. The Inebriates' Home was known both at home and abroad for its successful treatment, and when Mr. R. Graham visited this country last fall he spent a week or two in the institution, in order to become familiar with its methods. One could wish the Home no greater good fortune than success in finding a man who shall possess the capabilities and virtues of its late superintendent.—Christian Union.

GEN. GARFIELD'S RECORD.—At fourteen, he was at work at a carpenter's bench. At sixteen, he was a boatman on the Ohio Canal. At eighteen, he was studying in the Chester (Ohio) Seminary. At twenty-one, he was teaching in one of Ohio's common schools, pushing forward his own studies at the same time. At twenty-three, he entered Williams College. At twenty-six, he graduated from Williams with the highest honors of his class. At twenty-seven, he was a tutor at Hiram College, Ohio. At twenty-eight, he was Principal of Hiram College. At twenty-nine, he was a member of the Ohio Senate, the youngest member of that body. At thirty, he was Colonel of the Forty-second Ohio Regiment. At thirty-one, he was placed in command of a brigade, and played a prominent part in the siege of Corinth and in the important movements along the Memphis and Charlestown Railroad. At thirty-two, he was appointed chief of staff of the army of the Cumberland, participated in the campaigns in Middle Tennessee and in the notable battle of Chickamauga, and was promoted to the rank of Major-General. At thirty-three, he was in Congress, the successor of Joshua R. Giddings. At forty-eight, having been continuously in Congress since he was thirty-three, he was elected to the United States Senate. At forty-nine, he was nominated for the Presidency of the United States. At fifty, he was President, and died beloved by the people.

A CORRESPONDENT wants to know if we indorse the sermon of Joseph Cook on Temperance, in our issue of July 7. Publication indorses nothing, and especially do we not indorse the following: "I think it is beyond dispute among the scholars of the first rank that at the passover the wine used was non-intoxicating, and that our Lord instituted the Supper with such wine." We do not believe there is in America or Europe one scholar "of the first rank" who would say that the Supper was instituted with non-alcoholic (which we suppose is meant by "non-intoxicating") wine. As to Cato, Columella, and Pliny, they gave no "recipes" of any importance for keeping must. They only say that it is possible to keep must "usque in annum," as we say, "the year round," till the next vintage, by sinking it, in a sealed jar, in a pond. They do not say that any one did this, nor do they say for what use any one would thus preserve must (they do not call it vinum, wine); but, probably, it was for medical use, if ever the method was tried. Pliny never speaks of must as a drink, but only places it among his medicines. We do not know of a sentence of any Greek or Latin writer which narrates that any person ever drank a single spoonful of must, on any account or for any purpose whatever. When the disciples "made ready for the passover," they, of course, procured the customary bread and wine; and the notion that fermented wine was excluded, under the head of leaven, is laughed at by our educated Jews. The exclusion related only to fermented breadstuffs, not to fermented juice of fruits. The raisin wine used by them is fermented.—Independent.

YEAR by year, on certain spots among the dales and mountain-sides of Switzerland, the traveller who is daring enough to wander out of beaten tracks, and to make his journey at unusual seasons, may look on a sight such as no other corner of the earth can any longer set before him. He may there gaze and feel what none can feel but those who have seen with their own eyes,—what none can feel in its fulness but once in a lifetime,—the thrill of looking for the first time face to face on freedom in its purest and most ancient form. He is then in a land where the oldest institutions of our race—institutions which may be traced up to the earliest times of which history or legend gives us any glimmering—still live on in their primeval freshness. He is in a land where an immortal freedom—a freedom only less eternal than the rocks that guard it—puts to shame the boasted antiquity of English dynasties, which by its side seem but as innovations of yesterday. There, year by year, on some bright morning of the springtide, the sovereign people, not intrusting its rights to a few of its own numbers, but discharging them itself in the majesty of its own corporate person, meets in the open market-place or in the green meadow at the mountain's foot, to frame the laws to which it yields obedience as its own work, to choose the rulers whom it can afford to greet with reverence as drawing their commission from itself.—Edward A. Freeman.

A CLOSE CONDENSATION.—Professor Huxley does not disguise his sentiments. He says: "It is the current belief that Adam was made out of the earth somewhere in Asia, about six thousand years ago, that Eve was moulded from one of his ribs, and that the progeny of these two, having been reduced to eight persons, were landed on the summit of Mount Ararat, after a universal deluge. All the nations of the earth have proceeded from these last, have migrated to their present localities, and have become Negroes, Australians, Mongolians, etc., within that time. Five-sixths of the public are taught the Adamic doctrine, as if it were an established truth, and believe it. I do not; and I am not acquainted with any man of science or duly instructed person who does."

INVOCATION.

O Light from out the eternal day,
Around our drooping eyelids play!
O Love from out the eternal soul,
Around our hearts thy gladness roll!
Let Truth our haunting fears dispel,
And Force divine our souls impel!

PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

"E venni dal martino a questa pace."

These words the Poet heard in Paradise,
Uttered by one who, bravely dying here,
In the true faith, was living in that sphere,
Where the Celestial Cross of sacrifice
Spread its protecting arms athwart the skies;
And, set thereon, like jewels crystal clear,
The souls magnanimous, that knew not fear,
Flashed their effulgence on his dazzled eyes.
Ah, me! how dark the discipline of pain,
Were not the suffering followed by the sense
Of infinite rest and infinite release!

This is our consolation; and again
A great soul cries to us in our suspense:
"I came from martyrdom unto this peace!"

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 20, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion; to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.: all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

To the subscribers and friends of the Free Religious Index, I have the agreeable duty to announce that, beginning with the next number, Mr. Benjamin F. Underwood is to be associated with me in the editorial management of the paper. From the time that the Index passed into the hands of the Free Religious Association, and I was persuaded to take, for at least one year, the responsible position of editor, the committee in charge of the matter have been, by my solicitation, on the lookout for some man to wield the laboring oar, who should combine editorial ability with special facilities for increasing the circulation of the paper and otherwise improving its business management. With other and prior duties devolving upon me, and these duties fifty-five miles away from the Index office, it has been impossible for me to care for all the interests of the paper as they should be cared for. Nor did I undertake to do it. I have, in fact, been compelled to assume much more of the burden than I had any thought of at the outset. The man sought for, it is now believed, has been found in Mr. Underwood. The committee, with great unanimity, have invited him to the post; and he has accepted the appointment, and will begin the service at once.

Mr. Underwood needs no introduction to Index readers. For a number of years, he has been a frequent contributor to the paper; and, for two months the past summer, he filled, with general acceptance, the editorial chair in my absence. To the general Liberal public, he needs even less introduction. He has been in the lecture field so long, and has won such favorable regard therein, that his name has become a household word in Liberal circles in a majority of the States of the Union; and it is expected that he will thus be able to introduce the Index to many persons to whom it is now unknown. As a Liberal lecturer, there is none in the country who has a better reputation for fairness, candor, and logical strength in argument. He is one, too, who keeps up with the times in his reading, and well knows that the problems pertaining to religion which confront the human mind to-day are not the same that they were a hundred years ago.

That Mr. Underwood will bring into the Index a somewhat different philosophy than has appeared in it editorially hitherto is a fact understood and admitted. He is a thorough student and admirer of Herbert Spencer, and may be considered as the popular interpreter of the Spencerian philosophy in this country. The Index has always been fairly open to writers of this school, but it has so happened that all those who have been associated with it as editors have been of a somewhat different philosophical cast. Yet, since the paper is now conducted under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, and since a large part of the constituency of that Association are believers, more or less fully, in Herbert Spencer's philosophical system, it seems but just that their views should be represented in the editorial management. It is believed and hoped, however, that, while the editors will, of course, be expected to write each from his own point of view and out of his own convictions, there will be so many topics of more immediate practical and common interest to occupy their pens that they will find little time for settling in the Index the exact boundaries of their respective philosophical beliefs. The question of responsibility will be solved by each editor attaching his signature to his own articles. And this not only solves the question of responsibility as between the editors, but as between them and the officers and members of the Free Religious Association generally. For the very reason that the Index is published by the Association, it is necessary that each contributor, whether editorial or not, should be understood as speaking for himself alone, just as, on the Association's platform, each speaker only represents his own views.

As to my own part in the paper, I expect to write as regularly for it as now, and also to share equally with Mr. Underwood a general supervision in editorial management. Relieved by him of the mechanical details of editorial supervision and labor, I shall, too, be more free for giving personal attention to the securing of matter for the Index columns of a kind to enhance their value. Already, measures are on foot for adding to the list of contributors the names of able writers, and for obtaining the best journalistic work in the field which it is the aim of the Index to cultivate. Though the time has been short for preparation, some of this work is expected to appear in the next number.

In fine, it is now proposed to carry into operation the plans contemplated last winter, when the effort was made to raise a special fund for use toward putting the Index on a self-sustaining basis. As those plans could not then be brought to a decisive point, owing to the difficulty of finding the right man, the appeal for funds was temporarily withdrawn. The fund, so far as subscribed, was collected and placed in bank on interest, and has not yet been touched. It amounts to $5,350. It was hoped to raise the sum of $10,000; and, when the new departure is fully inaugurated and its character indicated, the appeal to complete this sum, or, at least, substantially to add to the present amount, may be renewed. But no condition as to raising any fixed sum was attached to the subscriptions, and the trustees believe that the time has now come for putting the fund to use. In their judgment, the project of a joint editorship of the Index by Mr. Underwood and myself presents a very reasonable assurance that the Index can be made financially self-supporting, and will therefore answer the ends for which this money was raised.

Friends, let me thank you, one and all, for the generous confidence and help you have given me in the work I have here tried to do amid many difficulties; and let me bespeak for the enlarged, and, as I sincerely believe, more efficient management, a like generosity of sympathy and aid.

WM. J. POTTER.

STATE UNIVERSITIES AND RELIGION.

It need not be denied that a religious denomination, if it see fit, has a moral as well as legal right to establish a college in the interest of its special creed, provided it make its appeal to charitably disposed persons for funds with this avowed purpose, and openly declare its object to the students whom it attracts. The judgment of those who would thus cramp and maim the grand process of education by the exigencies of an antique theological faith may be impeached, and the kind of learning acquired in such institutions may be suspected as narrow and one-sided. But, in a free country, the right to found such institutions with private money given for the purpose cannot be taken away.

But with State Universities, which are supported with public funds raised by taxation of all the citizens or by the proceeds of public lands owned equally by all, the case is far different. The very same reasoning which would prevent the State from interfering with a privately founded and privately supported college, no matter what religious creed it should teach,—namely, because the principle of religious liberty denies the interference,—would prevent a State college from giving its aid for the support of any particular creed or sect. As citizens of all creeds and of no creed are called upon to contribute and are compelled by law to contribute for the maintenance of the State college, it is manifestly unjust and a violation of the principle of religious liberty that any of them should be compelled to pay for upholding and inculcating religious doctrines in the college which are contrary to their convictions. The only just ground in colleges maintained by public funds is to keep strictly to the field of secular instruction, and to leave the doctrines of religion where the churches themselves are left in this country,—to the voluntary support derived from self-taxation.

We have been led to these remarks by reading the account, printed in a circular report, of a unique struggle in the State University at Madison, Wisconsin, in behalf of the secular principle. It seems that in that university, within the past year, a Free Religious Association has been organized, which has for its special object the consistent secularization of the university itself. The first and second articles of its constitution are adopted verbatim from the constitution of the national Free Religious Association. The society evidently came into existence not only for the discussion of principles, but for the practical application of them. Two days after its organization, it addressed a letter to the Young Men's Christian Association in the University, asking them to relinquish their rooms in the university building on the ground that they had no right to use State property for a sectarian purpose. The right of the young men to form a branch of the Christian Association was not denied, only their right to use a State building free of rent. As the Free Religious Association provided and paid for its rooms outside of the college buildings, so, for like reason, the Christian Association should do the same.

To this letter, the Young Men's Christian Association replied in a communication not remarkable, certainly, for either consistency or candor. It admits that the general principle of religious liberty recognized by civil government in this country and binding upon State Universities, is "that freedom is to be granted to all creeds, philosophies, and theological systems, but that aid is to be extended to none." But then it goes on to argue that, because the State uses certain religious institutions for the promotion of morality,—appoints chaplains, for instance, in the army and navy, “not to preach specific doctrines, but because they are recognized as efficient in advancing the cause of morals,”—so the State University may aid religious organizations for the same purpose. And, thus having established a convenient major premise on the [State's inconsistency with its own principle, it proceeds to fit a minor premise to it by a course that either shows remarkable sectarian blindness or remarkable facility in pious prevarication. This, be it remembered, is a Young Men's Christian Association that is replying; and what the bond of that organization is, is pretty generally known. Yet it says: “We have practically no creed. We are organized solely for the attainment of purity of life and nobility of character.” On this argument, it declines to copy the example of the Free Religious Society, and take up its abode in hired apartments outside of the college.

But the latter society does not rest here. It sends a rejoinder to the Young Christians, which exposes not only the weakness of their logic, but the weakness, both theoretically and practically, of their claim to be solely a moral society, in the following style:—

You claim in another part of your letter to be organized “under no creed,” and state that the object of your association is one to which no “well-disposed person can conscientiously object to lend a helping hand.” To settle this point, we can of course only refer to the constitution under which you are organized. Art. II. of your constitution is as follows: “Our object shall be the quickening of faith, hope, and charity in our own hearts and the promotion of Christ's kingdom in our midst.” Article III., Sect. 1, of the same, is as follows: “Any person of either sex who professes SAVING FAITH IN CHRIST may become a member of the Association by signing this constitution. Thereby he or she is expected,” etc.

What per cent. of the people of the State of Wisconsin do you believe can conscientiously sign the above clauses of your constitution? Have you been able to obtain one-FIFTH of the students of the University as signers of the above-named clauses? You know as well as we that the University is supported at public expense, regardless of religion. Is it morally right, then, or in harmony with Art. I., Sect. 18, of the Constitution of Wisconsin,—to wit, “The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed, nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent. Nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted or any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. NOR SHALL ANY MONEY BE DRAWN FROM THE TREASURY FOR THE BENEFIT OF RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OR RELIGIOUS OR THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES” [Wis. Leg. Manual, 1878, Page 37]—to compel assistance, as you are virtually doing, from any of the following classes of Wisconsin tax-payers,—Jews, Free Religionists, Roman Catholics, Free Thinkers, or Atheists,—all of whom are dissenters from your belief?

The rejoinder closes by giving warning that the contest is not to be considered as ended, but that “all honorable means” will be used to accomplish the object of squaring the practice of the University with the principle of religious liberty.

A PLAIN WORD WITH SOME OF OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

We chanced the other day to look over a portion of the Index mail list, and were astonished to find how large a number of subscribers in the section that fell under our eye were in arrears on their payments. Some of these, too, we happened to know were persons of wealth, to whom the paying out of three dollars, and in some instances of a hundred times that, would be nothing. There are such delinquencies, our book-keeper says, through the whole list,—delinquencies of persons who are able to pay and who mean to pay, and yet from negligence do not pay. And here, for several weeks, we in the Index office have been anxiously planning and contriving how to make the ends meet! “Brethren, these things ought not so to be.” If you who are thus at fault would only send to the Index its just and legal dues, the ends would not only meet, but lap beautifully over on the right side. Let then every one who means to be honest look at once at the mail-tag on his paper, and act as it and an honest conscience shall direct. A word to the just is sufficient.

SAN FRANCISCO has just had an ecclesiastical trial which in local interest eclipsed that of Dr. Thomas in Chicago. The secular press of the city have devoted large space to the details of it. A lady, of whom it is stated that none in San Francisco is better known for devotion to philanthropic works, and who is universally respected there for her upright and benevolent life, has had a Bible-class of three hundred members in a Presbyterian Sunday-school. She was not herself a member of the Presbyterian Church, but was in general sympathy with its doctrines and methods, and was a very successful teacher. But, unfortunately for the ecclesiastical peace, the superintendent of the school, a deacon of the church, thought he detected heresy in her teaching. There was, too, at least to his mind, prima facie evidence against the lady in the fact that her husband is a regular attendant of the Unitarian Church, and that she occasionally has gone there with him, and that she herself is a cousin of Col. Robert Ingersoll. The deacon, therefore, made due complaint against her to the minister and the church for teaching unsound doctrine. But the minister and church sustained her. Not, however, to be foiled so easily in the cause of pure doctrine, he then complained of the church and its minister to the local Presbytery for aiding and abetting heresy. It is the trial of this complaint that has just come off; and the deacon has won the case. But whether it will be appealed remains to be seen. Meantime, the San Francisco non-religious papers are drawing the moral that the trial has not disclosed much prevalence of a Christian spirit, and are asking the question, What are churches good for, if not to encourage such good works as Mrs. Cooper is doing?

REV. DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, though convicted of heresy in the Local Conference that has been trying him, and sentenced to suspension from the ministry, evidently does not mean to let the matter rest there. He has two chances of appeal before the final decision of the whole Methodist Episcopal Church in this country has been given in the case. The ecclesiastical conferences are trying him, but he is trying Methodism. Personally, it would doubtless be much more agreeable to him to withdraw from the Methodist denomination without further contest. Nor would this, for him, mean withdrawal from the pulpit. With his talents and character, there would be no difficulty in his maintaining an independent position, or readily finding fellowship with some more liberal sect. But he sticks to Methodism, for the sake of testing it. He claims—and there is a “left-wing” party in the Methodist Church who support the claim—that Methodism does not mean a hide-bound creed; that its central motive-belief and power have always been the saving of souls through faith in Christ; and that, so long as this conviction has been held intact, considerable latitude in the details of theological opinion has been allowed. There is not a little in the history of Methodism to justify such a claim. At any rate there is no need to question the sincerity of the men who make it. Dr. Thomas, by continuing the contest, hopes to make the doctrines which he preaches, and which are now declared heresy, permissible in any Methodist pulpit in the United States. We much doubt his success. But the discussion and the agitation will be good for Methodism.

THE Nation finds Lord Derby's opinion of Irish land affairs quite corroboratory of its own view propounded weeks ago, to the effect that Irish discontent, instead of finding solace in the new provision by Parliament, would be tempted to more excited remonstrance. Emphasis is given to the peculiar conditions under which the passage of the bill was effected, furnishing to the heated claimants inferential confidence in their own political prowess, and whetting their zeal for larger victory in the culmination of legislative independence. It is held probable that Irish resistance will wax fiercer yet, and English power will correspondingly tighten the fetters. Mr. Gladstone is criticised by the Nation for admitting in the recent debates that England recognized the justice of certain concessions, that were at the same time to be postponed for indefinite and remote execution. It is judged that, if any adequate quietus is feasible, it should be applied promptly; that delay will make the difficulty immeasurably more complicated and incapable of adjustment. Exception is also taken to the choice of men in control of Irish affairs, as being in utter disregard of their national sympathies and preference,—measures that would provoke discord among even a people of far less irritable temperament than that of the Irish race. Under the cumulative force of diligently fed passion for severance from that which is felt—whether more or less reasonably—to be irksome control, it is hardly to be expected that even a timely or well-intentioned mode of concession could sufficiently allay the ferment to avert a crisis.

HENRY WARD BECHER, according to the extract quoted below from a recent sermon, does not have much faith in the creation of man in Paradise: “Men say, ‘Is there any use for anger? Is there any use for the feeling of resistance?’ Certainly. The law of anger and the law of destruction are fundamental to human nature. They refer back to the primitive man, if you believe in the unfolding of the human race, as I do. When men existed in their primitive savage condition, and were ignorant of natural law, and were set upon by wild beasts and by wilder men, and were liable at every moment to be exterminated, it was necessary that there should be given to them some weapon of offence and defence; and every man was his own fort, and the moment his adversary came it was a question of repelling him or being destroyed. Under such circumstances, combativeness and destructiveness were virtues; but when, in the growing development of men, they began to take care of each other, and each man had less to do in taking care of himself, and societies formed laws, and cities were surrounded with walls, these rights of self-defence slumbered except in extreme cases, when they revived once more; and yet the old passions remained constantly with natural, resisting force.”

MRS. ELIZABETH OAKES SMITH, in the Springfield Republican, says: “It is not intellectual but moral culture that we need. We know too much. Children can give the boundary of every country under heaven; but the boundary line between truth and falsehood, honesty and fraud, virtue and vice, they know nothing about. Let us give up all the isms, and let girls and boys be put down to the study of common honesty,—honesty in its ultimate and entire meaning.”

SOUTHERN EDUCATION.

In a social compact, bearing such relations as those which unite the American States, the culture and prosperity of one corner of the federation forbids that portion to rest in unconcern for the dearth of like advantage among even its remote kindred. For the threads of national welfare cannot be suffered to remain at any point in a hopeless tangle, without distortion at the common centre. And, on the other hand, the higher symmetry of the more advanced communities provokes in the less favored districts an uneasy sense of disparagement and desire for improvement.

A thoughtful and carefully stated article in the last issue of the International Review throws much light upon the problem of Southern schooling. It is quite evident that a very insufficient basis for popular training has existed throughout the Southern country, especially prior to the civil war. At that time, the simplest rudimentary teaching, and even that in very meagre amount, was dispensed to the common people; while the higher social grades were wholly in the hands of private tuition for elementary branches. Preparation for the universities was had through boarding-schools which existed solely for that end; and the universities themselves were confined to the objects of social or political ambition, completely ignoring the work of provision for accurate and independent scholarship.

With these conditions, it was impossible that an enthusiasm for culture for its own sake should become infused into general society. The inevitable result was rather a chronic indifference to the dignity and charm of vigorous and progressive attainment, obtaining to such an extent as to completely smother respect for intelligence among the humbler classes of society, while it lulled the wealthier ranks into a blind devotion to the glitter of social and political eminence.

Subsequent to the sectional war, whose disastrous effects overturned the material resources of the South, all effort for anything beyond the bare struggle for existence was, of necessity, paralyzed for a time; and, when the lapse of years brought a gradual recuperation of forces, it was natural that the line of action bearing upon mental growth should be resumed on the familiar plane at which it had been suspended. Hence, the disgust and perplexity that arose from the work of over-zealous Northern emissaries, who sought to right the inverted structure of educational polity by a clumsy and ill-timed bounce. But, underlying the mistakes and apathy prevailing in the South as a whole, some discernment of the needful spirit has not been wholly wanting. Even in the early years of this century, according to the records of competent investigators, a public-school system of some adequacy was planned by prominent Southern leaders, but met its doom in the absorbing issues of political corruption that gained such headway after the year 1820. And in the struggle for resumption in these later periods, marked by Northern interference, the Southern people themselves have developed a capacity for handling the problem that distances their advisers by evident odds, in practical sagacity and effective enterprise. Rev. A. D. Mayo, in recent statements of gathered data, claims that, in the past ten years, they have done more for popular education than was ever known among people of similar situation, having set up free schools in every State; that "the city of Charleston exacts a heavier per cent. of tax for her public schools than does Boston." But their manifestly hearty work for this end needs supplementing by aid which they solicit from the less crippled finances of other sections of the country.

The writer in the Review above named gives an amusing picture of the educational mosaic presented in the management of the university curriculum generally existent, combining the two elements of traditional and modern method; the elder holding its own with stolid unconsciousness of torpor, and the younger making many abortive attempts to break the crude spell, but yet destined to establish a new order of growth. When a sense of the need of mental stimulus overrides the mere effort for bulk of acquirement, a leavening spirit will go out from the higher through all grades of popular enlightenment. This writer gives credit in the mean time to a certain breadth of aim in the old method of Southern culture that, in contrast to the rigid details of the German method, which alone can furnish accurate scholarship, furnished the elements of manly character stamping some of our Southern-bred historic statesmen.

A hopeful view in the main pervades the discussion of this Southern question in other directions also; and it is generally conceded by thoughtful observers that the growth of material thrift among both white and colored classes of citizens will ere long present signs of unequivocal mental vigor, which, in the former at least, is pregnant with eminent probabilities of achievement. THE OUTLOOK.

The developments in New York politics afford considerable hope toward the disestablishment of party burglary. If it is not too good to be true that bossism is getting a rebuff from many of its former supporters, the country at large may well take a fresh breath of courage at such indications in its central metropolis, and arguments of manifold stress can thus be woven for the breaking up and prevention of intrigue in all lesser strongholds of political advantage. It seems to be getting well understood that no successful subvention of the rogues can be had, short of the faithful attendance to preliminary details by the rank and file of honest voters; and, if the greater evils of wholesale plunder and political debauchery are to be cast out of the republic, no true patriots will grudge the outlay of individual time and patience, or fret at the distasteful publicity of such personal duty. If by such means a definite vantage-ground has been secured in the central stronghold and accredited birthplace of our national fraud, there can be no sufficient obstacle to victory in its suppression at all lesser political centres.

The contagion of example in baneful successes has a mighty, virulent activity. Political corruption spreads its roots by sheer fulness of growth into affiliated commercial fields. Thus, in times of high-handed gaming in political stock, every cast of venal treachery gets added favor and support. Hence, it is natural to rejoice at the indications of retreat of this bloated vice apparent in certain quarters. The reported instructions of Judge Jamieson to the grand jury at Chicago, with reference to the wicked grain scandal, points to an awakening element of judicial security; and the inoculative power of wholesome investigation in this as well as in the larger prosecutions of fraud in the government service cannot fail of persuasive effect in the general estimate of public rectitude. The stimulation of this sentiment of a more honest and unselfish patriotism, fostered during the nation's late discipline of sorrow, needs careful and tireless feeding in the waning of attention to its immediate source, and the calls for local effort in establishing effective means of action in every portion of the land for political reform cannot be too faithfully heeded; nor can the lesson of reciprocal justice, apparently emerging from the confines of old-time partisan bigotry, be lightly passed by.

The country's weal seems trembling in the balance of more or less prevalent and just appreciation of her special needs at this auspicious hour, and a world's expectant gaze is riveted upon the national chance of possibilities so grand and enduring. May the hope not be disappointed!

NOTES FROM GERMANY.

Mr. S. B. Weston, who was lately minister of the Unitarian Society in Leicester, Mass., and who was removed from that position, not by the will of the society, but by the will of a deceased member of the society, interpreted by a committee of representative Unitarians, has gone to Germany to pursue his studies, with reference to fitting himself for a larger field of usefulness. He has entered the University of Berlin, and will probably remain abroad two years. For several weeks, he has been studying the German language at Celle, in Hanover. From a recent letter received from him there, we extract the following, that will be of interest to our readers:—

The Sundays in Celle are very little different from any other day. A few of the shops are closed; but, on the other hand, a larger number of people are seen at the "Canal," a place in the woods, about two miles from here, which the Germans frequent daily for a glass of beer and a social time. The principal church, which I have visited several times, seems to be quite well attended; but at least nine-tenths of the congregation are women. One Sunday, I could count only seven or eight men in the body of the church, while there were at least three hundred women. This church is a very old and wealthy one; and the Primarius, who preaches every other Sunday, has three subordinates, who preach in turn on the alternate Sunday. A few nights ago, the Primarius had a social gathering at his house; and late in the evening, while the party were enjoying their wine and beer, he arose, and read a chapter from the Bible, offered a prayer and then drank to the health of the company.

On the streets, one meets a great many Prussian soldiers and officers, several regiments being permanently stationed here. They are strong, able-bodied men, and apparently have nothing to do. Between the soldiers and the citizens there exists quite a hostile feeling; and, only a few evenings ago, some altercation arose, which resulted in one of the citizen's having a piece of his ear cut off by the sword of an officer. Notwithstanding the great mass of idle soldiers which the State is now supporting, it is said that Bismarck is endeavoring to increase the army, a movement which is murmured against by some of the citizens. One frequently hears in this section very bitter complaints against Bismarck. In fact, the peasants and the nobles of the Hanoverian Province are not at all reconciled to the Prussian government. I have met two of the Hanoverian officers of the war of 1866, who expressed their strong hope that the son of George V., the last king of Hanover, would yet ascend the Hanoverian throne.

Order, sobriety, politeness, and economy are very marked virtues here; but, on the other hand, excessive beer-drinking, the quantity of idle, healthy-looking soldiers, and the apparently hard condition of the care-worn-looking women, are by no means a credit to Germany.

The news of President Garfield's death is very sad. The Hanover Courier had a two-column article the morning after his death,—Tuesday morning's issue,—expressing deep sympathy. A. B. W.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE impression is quite general that vegetable food is deficient in the nutritive properties conducive to a high degree of physical energy. A writer in the Herald of Health for October, under the title of "Vegetarian Athletes," gives some evidence which tends to lead to an opposite conclusion. The instance is mentioned of a youth that had been delicate from his birth and afflicted with a complication of diseases, who, when about fourteen years of age, gave up meat (he was always a strict teetotaler and non-smoker), and soon experienced great improvement. Subsequently, he became an exceedingly expert bicycle rider, and was noted for his extended journeys by this mode of locomotion, and as a successful contestant in such races. Another vegetarian has acquired distinction as a swimmer. The writer says in closing, "I could give many more instances with which I am personally familiar of young vegetarians whose exploits in the athletic world are quite creditable to our cause." •

THE London Lancet remarks: "It will be a happy moment for the health interests of humanity when the process of 'education' is made to include training, with a view to the eradication of inherited disease, the repression of morbid idiosyncrasies, and the scientific—that is, physiological and psychological—culture of such faculties and attributes of the mental and bodily organism as shall conduce to perfect health. One step in this direction will be taken when the professional trainers of youth and managers of schools generally are brought to recognize the scope and importance of the work in which they are engaged. . . . In respect to the food, the clothing, and the habits of the young, much remains to be accomplished before we shall even approximate to a perfect system. Meanwhile, it is, perhaps, in respect to the ventilation of the school-rooms, the length of time spent in study, the method of studying, the posture of the body long maintained, and the management of light, with the consequent strain on the eyesight of children, and of growing youths of both sexes, improvement is most urgently necessary."

THE New York Board of Education employs eleven agents to hunt up children who fail to conform to the requirements of the law in respect to school attendance. The law provides that no child under the age of fourteen years shall be employed, during the school hours of the public schools in any factory or business whatever, in the city, who has not spent fourteen weeks out of the fifty-two of the year in a course of instruction under a qualified teacher. The instruction may be given at home, under a competent teacher. It must include, however, spelling, reading, writing, geography, English grammar, and arithmetic. Boys and girls, under the prescribed age, must present a certificate upon application for work, showing they have complied with the law in regard to their education. The penalty for the violation of the law by employers is fifty dollars for each offence. It is the business of the agents of the Board of Education to visit, twice a year, all establishments in the city, where children are employed, and ascertain whether the requirements are carried out. These inspections are made in the months of February and September. That for the latter month has just been made. The agents report that, though the disposition to evade the provision of the law in respect to truancy is quite prevalent, especially among the destitute class, whose necessitous circumstances compel them to depend often upon the contributions of the children of a family for its support, the condition of things, on the whole, is much more satisfactory than formerly. The employers appear more inclined to cooperate with the School Board. Of the one thousand and eighteen establishments visited, only one hundred and sixty-five children were found at work without certificates of education. There are, of course, possibilities of deception in the application of the law, that are exceedingly difficult to contend with. The age of the child may be incorrectly given, for example, by the parents, or the agent may be untrue to his trust, or in other ways the law may fail of effecting its purpose; but the effort seems to be to effect a genuine and thorough inspection, and with excellent success.

FOUNDATIONS OF MORALITY.

EXTRACTS FROM A DISCOURSE.

BY S. J. STEWART OF BANGOR, ME.

Because the world may be losing faith in dogmas concerning religion is no proof that it may be losing its morality. Morality does not depend upon revealed commandments of God, or upon a belief that any such commandments ever were supernaturally revealed. Morality has reference to conduct that can be found good here and now, during the life we know for certain. No matter if God never gave a command directly; no matter if when we die we sleep a sleep that never has a waking, there are reasons here and now for certain good conduct that furnishes the basis of morals. A man who cannot be persuaded to morality by the natural reasons would not be governed by a dogma of supernatural religion. It is wonderful that men do not see the superficiality of the theory that morality depends upon a belief in special revelation. But even men, who are intelligent enough to know that the idea of a supernaturally revealed moral law is false, still seem to imagine that there is nothing else. Even in the North American Review for May, we have an apparent argument for this theory from one who signs himself "A New Light Moral-ist." It is difficult to tell whether this writer is facetious or really in earnest. But he seems to be criticising the rational tendencies of our age, and at least makes suggestions which can be found on every hand. After many sensual "excesses," he says his conscience troubled him considerably; but as there was no more of the old "binding authority," and he could not be forgiven any more, he followed an "irresistible impulse." Now, before noticing his case, would it not be worth while to consider how many men who believe the traditions about Moses and Sinai and Jonah and all else that their mothers have taught them, have also followed irresistible impulses? "Irresistible impulses" do not depend upon creeds or the lack of them, but are occasioned by heredity and circumstances. But, to come to this case, what shall we do with a man who sees no reason for good conduct, unless conscience is the direct voice of God and the moral law the direct enunciation of Jehovah? As far as his own worth is concerned, we do not see much chance for him in this universe. The man who sees no reason for morality, unless he is supernaturally commanded, would not have much motive at best. If a man is sincere in such a theory, then, so far as the safety of society is concerned, the best thing that can be done is to put him in a place of confinement. If a child stands before a stone wall and threatens to butt out his brains against it because he has just discovered that God has made no special commandment against it, we would feel very much like letting him try it for his own satisfaction, or else sending him to a reform school. If a man threatens to jump overboard because he does not find that the ship captain has any printed regulations against it, we would be very much tempted to let him try it, for a time at least, and see if he found any other reason besides special commandments against such conduct. So, when a man sees no reason against drunkenness and sensuality, after he has discovered that the Bible is not an infallible book, we see little that can be done for him, except restrain him and keep him from injuring others. Among rational people, we would see some reason against the conduct of our Review writer in the wrath of the husband whose wife he proposed to marry, or in the bad effects of such conduct upon society; we would see some argument against his drunkenness in the fact that it would weaken his body and degrade him in the eyes of his fellow-men as a mere animal. If such realities as these had no influence, it is difficult to see how he could be helped by a belief that conscience is literally the voice of God, or that Moses got angry and broke the first table of stone on which the Moral Law was written by the finger of a God. A man who sees no good reason for morality, in a life which he expects to last seventy or ninety years, would see no good reason, if it were to be projected beyond the grave. Indeed, the dim distance of the life beyond would make a belief in it too weak to have much power. A man who sees no reason for good conduct in a personal child or a personal friend or a human society made up of persons would see no reason because he happened to believe in a personal God.

But we are asked, "Is there no danger to morality in the loss of old religious beliefs, even if those beliefs are false?" Most certainly there is always real danger in this universe with thoughtless people. It is a dangerous universe for people who will not open their eyes to observe consequences. Fire is dangerous, and water; and so are human love, and ambition, and passion, if men do not know what to do with them. Some people will likely become reckless for a time, whose morality has been built upon commandments, when they discover that those commandments were not supernaturally given. But who are helping to increase the real danger so much as those who are teaching men that the only basis for morals is a theology which is bound to be proved false. How is it to help weak men, to teach them that the only basis for good conduct is a theological system whose foundations are being destroyed by the stern logic of eternal truth?

Closely allied with this theory is the one that morality is created by artificial regulations. This theory assumes a variety of forms, some of which we can only suggest. It is supposed, for instance, that morality is arbitrarily created. This idea among religious people grows out of the theory that God has given certain external commands. He might have just as well commanded something else, if he had seen proper; but this is his scheme for making men moral. Morals are therefore purely the result of arbitrary decisions. Instead, therefore, of studying men and women to see what would really make them happy, and studying the natural law of things, reformers continually search about for written enactments, which are supposed to be divine. Instead of examining the nature of alcohol and its natural effect and its legitimate use, men are exceedingly anxious to find out whether the wine Jesus drank at Cana of Galilee was fermented or not, and also the exact meaning of Hebrew and Greek texts. Men think that morality so absolutely depends upon written and spoken precepts that, if those precepts should be proved fallible, then, all at once, vice and crime would be just as moral as purity and temperance. In other words, it is supposed that Moses and Jesus and Solomon, and possibly Manu and Manes and Minos, arbitrarily made morality for the world. Of course, with this idea, men very much fear any criticism upon old precepts, because they think if the precepts are proved not infallible there is no morality left. Even some, who do not believe in religion, think that morality is purely the result of arbitrary enactments. Hobbes thought that morals were made by acts of Parliament, or, in other words, that wise men must arbitrarily decide what is moral for the people. These general ideas are diffused, and appear in all kinds of forms. Among the masses there is a continual desire to do something to fix up a morality. Legislation is the great panacea. Vice and sin must be legislated out of existence. The worst of it is, they often come to their decision, as to what vice and crime are, by the most arbitrary methods. The Mrs. Grundys, of every town and village, cut out a code of morals just as arbitrarily—and sometimes across the bias of natural law just as arbitrarily—as the belle of Paris cuts out the fashionable dress for universal female society. It is thought that morality is just what noisy people arbitrarily decide it to be, and that men can only be governed by the most numerous artificial regulations. It is supposed therefore that morality is a system of checks and restraints. . . .

Against this whole confused theory of morals, the rational moralist enters a protest. Morality is not created by any flats of any God, or of any Mrs. Grundy, or any Parliament or any Congress: it does not depend on any ancient code or any infallible book. Morals grow out of the nature of things. A really moral man is one whose conduct is in consistency with moral law. . . . Morality is builded away down in the realities of human necessity, of man's nature, and of the laws of the universe; and nothing can prevail against it. Not only does morality lie in nature, but every attempt to check nature by artificial restraints tends to immorality. Instead of the moral man being the one who is restrained by others, he is the one who has the largest liberty. He has the liberty of his whole nature. . . .

Already I have suggested, in part, the rational theory of morals. In reviewing a church theory, too, I am not technically bound to give the scientific morality, even if it were possible in one address. But I cannot conscientiously conclude without stating, even in the fewest words, something positive concerning the morality of reason.

1. Men can be only absolutely moral when they have a moral nature,—a nature or organism capable of obeying natural laws. The Church of tradition believes in the invincible power of texts and commands. We believe in blood, in nerve-cells, in heredity, in well-developed minds. Some men are born even now with a tendency toward morality: they have inherited from ancestors such an organism that they can easily follow natural laws. We do not believe that men can be absolutely moral, while the majority are born with diseased organisms, and with vicious tendencies hidden away in their nerve-cells. We must do the best we can in our age, although we know some men cannot follow now the absolute moral law. We will teach men to improve on their natural condition. We will restrain criminals who are dangerous, and protect society in its rights. We will try to improve on the men actually alive, and leave a better organism to the next generation. We will seek by exercise and study and careful training to leave our children better than ourselves. We will seek to aid the future by transmitting a life-force in men and women that shall make it easier for them to follow absolute morality than for the men of this generation. Moral possibilities lie in the nature of men rather than in proof-texts or ancient precepts.

2. Morality will be advanced as men learn to use their intellect. There is such a thing as conscience; but conscience is not infallible, it is not the voice of God in the soul. Conscience is the result of inherited experiences by which ancestors have been moved to resist pain and to desire pleasure. Ancestors have felt certain things to be wrong and other things right, and we have inherited their organism, their impressions or feelings of "ought" and "ought not." We have something in us which repels pain and approves happiness, or, in other words, suggests right and wrong. But, although this conscience suggests that there is a right and wrong, it does not tell what they are. It is the province of the intellect to point out what is right and what is wrong. There are certain natural and eternal reasons why certain conduct is right and other conduct wrong, and the intellect alone shows what those reasons are. In order that there may be morality, it is necessary therefore that men should become intelligent, until they can see how things are and why they are, and found their conduct upon proved facts. The sentiment of Jesus, love to one's neighbor, can never be surpassed as a sentiment for social morality. But no sentiment, however beautiful, is enough. There must be the use of the intellect or science, in order to show at any time or place what conduct is the best expression of love to one's neighbor.

3. We will use all the knowledge of the world in our effort to teach men morals. There are multitudes of men who undoubtedly need the authority of great names. Young people and children, too, may be helped by the precepts and laws of men who are universally recognized as good. We will therefore be glad to quote from all the best literature of the world that expresses natural moral laws. Here we have a decided advantage over the Church of the Past. The Church is literally bound to accept all the moral teachings of a Book that, in our age, is proved in some respects to uphold cruelty, physical force, and tyranny. But we are not so limited. We are glad to use such Bible passages as teach truth on moral questions; but we do not stop here. We cull out of the best literature of all ages and religions. We find precepts in regard to kindness to men and beasts and birds as valuable in the teachings of Confucius and in the Book of Rewards and Punishments of Taoism as in the Bible. There are hundreds of books better than the Old Testament. The heroes of Plutarch are better than the heroes of the Old Testament, the teachings of Marcus Aurelius are better than those of David or the writer of Proverbs.

We will therefore cull from the best literature of all the ages, from Emerson and Lowell as well as David and Paul, from Mrs. Browning rather than from Deborah with her cruel war-song, from science rather than from tradition. Wherever we find anything that expresses the natural moral law, we will gladly use it for ourselves and our children. The morality of the liberal faith is expressed to-day in the best writings of philosophers and scientists and historians. It has not yet been culled out and edited in a simple form for daily use. Before many years, we may hope to have the best moral precepts of the best men collected and put into our hands, in order to be taught more directly. In the mean time, let us take courage in the thought that morality lies deeper than all books, and that whenever we give a child a healthful organism, or teach any one to observe and obey the fundamental laws of body and mind, or inspire others with a love of reality, we are helping to form the morality of the future.

FOREIGN.

CHOLERA is abating at Mecca.

THE great hall of the municipality of Berlin is offered by the council for a memorial celebration, in honor of our late President, on the 30th inst.

ST. PETERSBURG items include a statement that the purposed interview of the Czar with Francis Joseph is likely to be delayed for months, preparations for the journey having been countermanded.

ENGLISH dignity is asserting itself in a statement in the London Times, to the effect that, although the interests of France are very considerable in Egyptian affairs, England's share is greatly paramount.

IRELAND is in great excitement over the arrest of Mr. Parnell, and the accompanying events. The great agitator counsels his supporters to unabated exertion in their chosen line, and meetings for vehement resolutions are in progress.

THE jury of the International Light Exhibition at Paris has awarded gold medals of the highest class to Messrs. Edison and Brush for dynamo-magnetic machines, and a gold medal to Mr. Maxim. Gold medals were also awarded these gentlemen for incandescent lights. Mr. Edison carries off the palm, receiving five gold medals in all, exceeding those of any other exhibitor.

By edict of the German government, in and after February, 1883, the English language will be a compulsory branch of examination for entrance of officers into the army. The programme in this particular will comprise: reading of English at sight; translation of English into German, and of German into English; English syntax, and the grammar and etymological analysis of English phrases.

THE college for women, endowed by Mr. Holloway, is to be placed as far as possible in a position of the utmost advantage for liberal culture. The governing body of twenty-one persons, to be appointed jointly by the University of London and the Corporation of London, is pledged to contain a certain proportion of women, and religious opinions are not to stand in any wise against the qualification of a governor. The curriculum will not be modelled according to the limits of study in any existing university, but will be made to serve the most obvious interests of the students concerned, and will involve unrestricted advantage for such as desire scientific courses apart from the customary classes. The founder's design, if carried out, will embrace measures for securing, by act of Parliament, royal charter, or otherwise, power for the conferring of degrees after due examination.

THE case of Count Campello, as reported by current news agency, awakens sharp protest from the Catholic press, supporting its denial by the following quotation of the Observatore Romano: "Count Campello renounced his canonry of St. Peter's because the laxity of his morals, not amended, after repeated and formal admonitions, had determined his superiors to proceed to extremities against him, despite his patrician rank. His loose life incapacitated him for any ecclesiastical charge, and prevented him from being admitted into the Pontifical family; so he has no right to the title of Monsignor. The morning of the day he abjured Catholicism, he had formally assured the ecclesiastical authorities of his orthodoxy, repelling the charge of intended apostasy as a slander." This being so, the Methodists, or any other body of believers, however remote from Rome, can ill afford to swell its bulk by an accession of such unsavory material.

MR. MICHAEL WRIGHT, a prominent representative of English Liberalism, died at his home in Leicester, England, last month. The Secular Review of October 1 gives a full account of the simple but impressive funeral services. Mr. G. J. Holyoake gave a sketch of Mr. Wright's character, from which we extract the following: "He was always a pioneer. A conviction of what was right and true was to him an inspiration. Courage was as natural to him as his integrity. He always stood up for what he believed. It never troubled him that the party he joined was small: the difficulties before it never disconcerted him. Opposition or even personal peril (which he unhesitatingly encountered) only made him more resolute. The last time he found a public question to maintain, although the hand of death was then upon him, he was as eager on its behalf as, when a young man, he first took sides in defence of his opinions. He was a force in any movement in which he took part. In the hour of effort, he could always be counted upon. Years might elapse and a stranger to the town might have no knowledge of his activity, but he would never doubt that it was continued. When acquaintance with him was renewed, he was found still in the same field, rendering services of the same character as those by which he had previously been distinguished. He gave more than earnestness and persistency to his cause: he gave it character. His probity was never questioned by those who knew him."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

POPE LEO, on Sunday, September 11, presided at the publication of decrees of the Congregation of Rites, approving miracles and permitting farther progress in the cases of Blessed Lawrence of Brindes, and Blessed Clare of Montefalco. To both of these Saints, Pope Leo declared he entertained from his youth a special devotion. Blessed Lawrence was a humble Franciscan, who concealed beneath the coarse garb of his order singular qualities of mind and body. He was frequently employed by the Popes in the most delicate and dangerous missions for the good of souls, which he conducted most successfully, bringing peace and concord to States and communities. "For this reason," said Pope Leo, in raising this Franciscan to the honors of the Altar, "we are animated by the hope of seeing, thanks to his intercession, peoples and princes listen with docility to the voice of the Church, and thereby return to the right path and avoid the perils which threaten them with an irreparable ruin." The Blessed Clare of Montefalco, revered throughout all Italy, whose remains are miraculously preserved still one of the treasures of the Church and one of its safeguards. "Whilst we governed the diocese of Perugia," said the Pope, "we twice visited her sanctuary and twice offered the holy sacrifice on the altar where repose her mortal remains. Penetrated with admiration and love, we have venerated the precious and incorruptible relics of this illustrious virgin, and particularly her heart, so celebrated for the wonderful marks of the passion of the Redeemer, which she had received." Now that the Pope is at the head of the Church, he declares that his veneration for her has redoubled, and his confidence in her intercession is full and entire. The Pope pointed out how frequently God had used pious women in the accomplishment of his impenetrable designs for the good of the Church, and he instanced the case of St. Catharine of Sienna, whose centenary was recently celebrated, a holy virgin who was the intermediary of God to bring back to their true See of Rome, after a long absence, free and independent, the Roman Pontiffs. "In the sad condition in which we and the Church are placed, we do not know, nor do we wish to discover, what the decrees of Providence conceal. But we place well-founded hope in the intercession of the Blessed whom we are raising to the glories of the Calendar."—Catholic Review.

JESTINGS.

WHEN the Pilgrim Fathers first landed, they fell on their knees, after which they fell on the aborigines.

WHEN a New Orleans man wanted his picture in a heroic attitude, the artist painted him in the act of refusing to drink.

"It isn't that I care about a little work now," said an incorrigibly lazy fellow; "but I'm afraid, if I once begin to earn my own living, I shall always be expected to do it."

GENERAL LEE is said to have asked a straggler, whom he found eating green persimmons, if he did not know they were unfit for food. "I'm not eating them for food, General," replied the man. "I'm eating them to draw up my stomach to fit my rations."

"I don't think our minister prays very much," said young Smallboy to his mother. "Why, my dear? I think him a very estimable, pious man." "Well, the knees of his pantaloons aren't worn out so bad as mine, anyhow." "Sh! he doesn't wear his praying pantaloons out calling."

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—In Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

B. F. U.

THE brilliant address of Hon. Robert C. Winthrop at Yorktown, in which so many noteworthy things were said with force and eloquence on a hackneyed subject, fully sustains his reputation as a vigorous thinker, an accomplished scholar, and a finished orator.

REV. DR. LEONARD BACON recently treated ex-President Hayes to a Sunday ride, in violation of an old Sunday law forbidding travel. He is now reminded, not unfairly, of his onslaught, in 1879, on Sunday excursions, and of his appeal to this very law to stop them. "Dr. Bacon," says the Boston Herald, "should be punished, and the old law repealed."

ALLUDING to Col. Ingersoll's reply to Judge Black in the North American, the Springfield Republican remarks that "Judge Jere. Black is left in a plight that must excite pity even in unfriendly breasts. It was an unlucky day for that amateur Campbellite theologian when the North American asked him to champion the faith against the onslaught of Col. Bob."

DONAHOE'S MAGAZINE for October has an article headed "A Godless Town and its Punishment," in which the destruction of New Ulm, Minn., by a tornado, is explained by the alleged fact that the city was founded by "infidels"; but there is nothing in the article to prove that this circumstance really had any more to do with the course of the wind than did the presence of some Sisters of Charity referred to in the magazine.

THE two Civil Service Bills now before Congress are, taken together, quite comprehensive. Senator Pendleton's bill provides for competitive examinations, and that presented by Representative Willis prohibits the assessing of office-holders to meet party expenses. The people are deeply interested in this reform, and men of all parties should unite in making it a fixed fact in the administration of the government.

IN an address before the American Humane Association in this city last week, Mr. Henry Bergh claimed that vaccination is the perfect "summit of nonsense," and ridiculed the idea that the transmission of diseased mucus from an animal to the human system is a preventive of disease. On the contrary, said Mr. Bergh, "I believe that more than half the diseases common to human beings arise from this mistaken idea of physicians and surgeons."

MR. ALFRED PIDDERGTON, Secretary of the Freethought Association of Toronto, Ont., writes us: "We are just now having a hot fight in the newspapers about the seizure of Paine's Age of Reason by the custom-house authorities. Our Globe is, I am pleased to say, fighting in the cause of mental freedom against the clergy and the authorities, and doing it in a calm and dignified but very firm manner. I think it is ringing the knell of religious despotism, so far as the free circulation of freethought literature is concerned."

MR. GLADSTONE recently stated, with much terseness of expression, that the two main principles of his foreign policy were that "every foreign country should be credited with the same good motives as ourselves until it showed the contrary, and that every power was entitled to the same rights and privileges, irrespective of size." A statesman, who adopts and carries out a policy as broad, just, and humane as is indicated in these words, must incur the ill-will of the ignorant and the narrow-minded of his own country, but he will have the respect and gratitude of the enlightened minds of all lands.

MR. THOMAS has appealed to the Judicial Conference. If the verdict is affirmed, the accused must either appeal to the General Conference, waiting till 1884 for its decision, abstaining from preaching meanwhile, or accept the verdict of the Judicial Conference as final, and become, like David Swing, an independent preacher. The Christian Union, with much truth and liberality, says: "The only final effect of the case will be to add one more to the increasing number of useful and influential independent ministers, and to give notice to young men who have aspirations toward the ministerial profession that they enter it at the risk of purchasing peace by the abnegation of their manhood, or liberty at the hazard of a perpetual and bitter battle with their own brethren in Christ. Every such exclusion of one earnest but independent thinker from the order of the ministry shuts out a score of others whom the pulpit of to-day can ill afford to lose."

THERE is, it is very certain, a strong and growing sentiment in this country in favor of removing all that remains of the union of Church and State, which once, throughout Christendom, was as complete as it was universal. This reform is required by the very fabric of our government, and is demanded by the principle of equal and exact justice to all, and by the best interests of the people. Our public schools should be entirely secular; churches and other ecclesiastical property should be taxed; the employment of chaplains in Congress and in State legislatures should be discontinued; the appointment of days for religious service, by the President and the governors of States, should cease; affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury should, in every department of the government, be substituted for the judicial oath; all laws pertaining to Sunday as a Sabbath should be repealed; and such other changes should be made as are necessary to secure the administration of this government on a basis purely secular. The justice and importance of the principles of State secularization entitle them to the support of every liberal man and woman. This movement will receive its share of attention in the Index the coming year.

THE Irish tenant-farmers are subjected now to a most painful test. The Executive Committee of the Land League have called upon their countrymen, in retaliation for the arbitrary arrest of their leaders, to refuse the payment of any rent whatever. The object is, of course, to exert a pressure on the land-owners, and through them on the government. But, if the Irish peasants comply with this injunction, eviction on a large scale must certainly follow, and to thousands eviction means suffering and starvation. Although general refusal to pay rent, if persisted in, would doubtless soon reduce to bankruptcy the majority of the land-owners in Ireland, its effect, in this respect, would not be as speedy and deadly as the distress and starvation which ejection would inevitably involve. Contributions from America, so much relied upon, would no doubt relieve many thus ejected from their holdings; but, while the alternative of testing the Land Act remains, there is no probability that aid from any source can be obtained to sustain the tenants in a general compliance with the requirement of the Land League. The official proclamation of the League to pay no rent has been promptly answered by the British government with a proclamation declaring that the League is an "illegal and criminal" organization; and Archbishop Croke, a prelate who has been a supporter of the League, and who has great influence with the Irish people, says he has read the League manifesto with pain and dismay. The arrest of Parnell and his associates united the members of the League. The "No Rent" slogan is likely to divide them. Meanwhile, the land-commissioners for Ireland have opened their court, which is accessible to the poorest peasant; and we may expect soon to see some of the practical workings of that Land Act, to the preparation and passage of which Mr. Gladstone gave his great abilities and a prodigious amount of labor.

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH vs. PARTISANSHIP.

Truth means the actual facts of the universe, whatever they are. The spirit of truth means a disposition in man to know the actual facts, whatever they are, and to promote the knowledge of them. The spirit of truth is not anxious concerning the results of the knowledge. It rests serenely and confidently on the principle that, if only the exact facts are known, the results will arrange themselves surely and satisfactorily in harmony with them. And it clinches its position with the question, If the facts of the universe are not to be trusted, what is to be trusted?

From the timidity with which many religious people shrink from investigating the facts that concern their creeds, it might be supposed that they think that the evil one must have had the making of the facts of the universe, and that therefore some dreadful evil thing must ensue from inquiry into them. The majority of church-going people are not believers in truth, but believers in something which somebody else has said was true. They are not learners, but advocates; not searchers after truth, but partisans of a system already accepted as the sum of all truth. And here is the baneful result of sectarianism, the evil of all sectarian methods of education. The truth of things is not only not reached, it is not genuinely sought. The end of the study is assumed at the start. Certain foregone conclusions are already imposed on the search before it begins. Certain articles of faith are put before the student in the theological seminary, before the preacher in his study; and woe to them if they do not so direct their investigations and hold check on thought as to bring belief and sermon out at the prescribed goal of the denominational creed! The search for truth, instead of being an earnest effort of the mind face to face with the august problems of thought, becomes a farce, a play, sometimes a dire tragedy. What began in timidity is likely to end in insincerity and hypocrisy. The sectarian thinks toward the truth as it is in Calvin, or Wesley, or Channing, or Jesus, or Mohammed, or Buddha, or Moses, and not toward the truth as it is in itself, actual, unlimited, absolute. The spirit of truth cries, "Give me the bottommost facts, whatever they are; the utter realities, whatever cherished beliefs and supports they may cut across." With nothing else can it be satisfied. It puts all inherited faiths, all personal wishes and predilections, into the crucible of rational inquiry, to be tested anew. To it, nothing is more sacred than what is genuinely true. The spirit of partisan sectarianism cries: "Give me the creed, give me the sacrament, give me the prayer-book, give me the miraculously gifted prophet, the Bible, the Saviour. Touch whatever else you will, but touch not these. Inquire elsewhere as freely as you will or must, but inquire not here. Here is holy ground. To use free reason here is sacrilege, profanity." And so the young scholar is intimidated and driven back. The young preacher quells his questioning, searching, living thought, and struggles to harmonize it with the old faith of the pews, or dextrously to conceal it under the use of words with double meanings. The result is that not only is truth forsaken and betrayed, strangled in the house of its professed friends, but conscience is demoralized and the temple of morality desecrated.

Among scientific men, the spirit of truth has, perhaps, freer scope than among any other class of people. The genuinely scientific man cannot be a partisan of any theories until the theories are completely sustained by facts. He has no interest in the results of his inquiries, except to know that they are true. Whether the truth issues on this side or that of any predetermined line is to him a matter of indifference, so long only as it is truth. That simple affirmation, It is truth, is to him higher and grander than anything else that can be said. That is reality. That represents the absolute, the eternal, the thought and purpose of the universe. Yet there are men engaged in scientific pursuits who are partisans; who are committed at the outset to theories, and who work toward theories, and who often try, though it may be unconsciously, to stretch the facts to make them support their theories. There are dogmatists in science as in the Church; and they are to be found on both sides of the questions that divide the scientific world to-day. Indeed, it is a very rare thing, either in the realm of science or anywhere else, to find persons who, in their mental work, are entirely free from bias in favor of some preconceived opinion. When such persons do come and have an ability for investigation that matches their freedom from the authority of theories, they are the giants in the advancement of truth. Darwin stands preëminent for this type of mind and work. He has never shown any feverish or obstinate anxiety to sustain a theory of the universe of one kind or another, but is serenely content with patiently observing and collecting facts, and indicating the principles which the facts themselves appear to indicate. He has no pride of opinion to maintain; for he has always held his opinions within the limit of his facts, and made them changeable with the facts. Pride of opinion is necessarily an antagonistic and a frustrating element in the investigation of truth. Where it exists in large measure, it overthrows all the proportions and balance of truth, and makes a man's opinions, whether he be scientist or philosopher, utterly worthless. We even care little to know what such a man's report of facts may be; for we know that his opinion warps his perception of facts. Personal authority for truth can never outrun the authority of facts.

If, in these high domains of science and religion, the spirit of truth is so violated, how much more surely must we expect the violation on the plane of politics. Nowhere is blind partisanship so dominant as in the competition between political parties. In an exciting political campaign, the strain, which on this account is brought upon the consciences of those who closely participate, is enormous. The party candidates, the party platform, the party machinery, the party campaign speakers and arguments are to be sustained at all hazards. Nothing is too good to believe of one's own party, nothing too bad to believe of the opposing party. If any one offers an independent, unbiased criticism of both sides, he is declared a traitor to both. Even very reputable people do not hesitate to help along, without much scrutiny of its authenticity, a scandalous story that is likely to hurt the other side. There are hundreds of virtuous citizens in both the great political parties of this country who, if put upon the confessional, would probably have to admit that, in the Presidential campaign of last year, they could not resist the temptation to believe in the moral turpitude of candidates and actors on the other side, on evidence which they would at once have discarded as wholly inadequate if it had been advanced as proof of any delinquency in their own party, and that sometimes they have even detected themselves secretly rejoicing over the moral defection of their opponents, because of the added votes the exposure of it would bring to their own candidates. Nothing, too, is more difficult than to get at the real facts in charges of moral transgression or of malfeasance in office, where political bias is an element in the charges and in the defence. The facts are matters of observation or of record,—matters to be testified to by witnesses or by written evidence, as in the courts, and not matters of political opinion at all. Yet how frequently it happens, when such charges have been investigated by a joint committee of both parties, the committee have divided in judgment strictly by the line of their political differences! In such cases, it is evident not the spirit of truth, but the spirit of political partisanship, sits in the seat of judgment.

It might be supposed that people who profess to be Liberals would not fall into this error of partisan bias. But the flattering unction cannot be allowed without question. Liberal journals and speakers abound in expressions of judgment on persons, books, and measures, where the judgment is hewn not by the straight line of truth, but by the line of party affiliations. Liberalism no more than other forms of convictions has learned its full lesson, until it has been penetrated through and through with such supreme allegiance to truth that it think, speak, and act under the constant pressure of the legal injunction, "The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." This is an attitude that demands the heroic quality of mind, and that often leads to heroic exigencies of action; but there is no other attitude consistent with either the discovery of truth or with a complete manhood.

IS EVOLUTION ATHEISTIC?

The theory of evolution may hereafter undergo more or less of modification in minor particulars, but in its main outlines it is now as well established in the minds of competent judges as is the Kopernican system. No change so revolutionary and sweeping in its character as that which it represents has ever before so rapidly passed over the human mind. It has laid its modifying hand on every department of thought and life. History, politics, social science, ethics, even language and literature, must henceforth be studied from the standpoint it has established. And it follows, as matter of course, that theology cannot hope to escape.

It is no wonder, then, that men have been startled and troubled. When Newton demonstrated the law of gravitation, theology became alarmed, and declared that it was atheistic in its tendency, because it took the universe out of the hands of God, and put it into the keeping and under the guidance of a law. In a state of mind that could regard a law as a thing, and that for ages had been taught to see the divine only, or chiefly, in the capricious and the lawless, all this is not so very strange. But the theory of evolution puts not the planets only, but the whole universe of matter and man, under law. If, therefore, law excludes the divine, then God may as well be given up first as last. But under law,—it is indeed exceeding strange that men should allow themselves to be so fooled by words! What is it to be under law? It is only to say that things are intelligible, that the universe is sane, that there is order in its affairs. And a sane universe without God would certainly be better than an insane one with him. It passes comprehension, then, that sensible people should be afraid to find law and order the controlling characteristics of the world.

But on any theory, or through any change of theory, the facts of life and of human nature are the same, and will remain unharmed. If, for instance, man is an immortal being, he will still continue to be one, whatever theory of the universe is adopted. Men discuss these questions as if they thought man's nature and destiny would change with every change of opinion. But man is what he is, and will be what he will be. And even were there no God, in the ordinary sense of that word, still I, for one, fail to see how it would finally settle the question of human destiny. It would be no more wonderful for me to find myself alive in some future world than it is now to find myself here. If the universe is competent to the one, why may it not be to the other?

So much by way of general suggestion. Let us now look the main question in the face. There seems to me to be a profound misapprehension as to one important point, both on the part of many who attack and of many who defend evolution. It does not and cannot explain the ultimate origin of things. Neither is it incumbent on it even to attempt the task. Mr. Joseph Cook, among many others, loudly declared evolution a failure until it could bridge the gulf between the living and the not living. But evolution is under no greater obligation to do this than is any other theory of things. It is simply an explanation of the method by which the world of matter and man has come into its present condition. And even if "spontaneous generation" could be proved, and thus the gulf be bridged; or if it could be demonstrated that life was sown on this planet by the fragments of some wrecked world floating in space,—it would only be the solving of one more deeply interesting problem. We should not be perceptibly nearer the end of our infinite journey,—the ultimate origin of things. We might as well face the fact that the question of ultimate origins is, in the very nature of things, insoluble. No theory—theistic, atheistic, pantheistic, or materialistic—makes it in any degree even comprehensible. No imaginable growth of mind or advance of knowledge promises to make it conceivable. We can never escape the limits of our own natures, nor overstep the bounds of the universe. And, until we can do both, it is simple folly and mental confusion to talk of understanding the ultimate origin of things.

We are ready then for another step. Evolution does not necessarily touch the question of theism at all. It is purely a question as to how. A belief in it is certainly inconsistent with a great many popular theories of the divine nature. It overthrows and destroys a great many idols or images of God now set up in the minds of men. But the whole great problem remains. Evolution undertakes to tell the method by which the forms of matter and life have come to be what they are during the time that the scientific intelligence is able to survey. The undisputed fact that a power exists and is working is enough for evolution. Its work is to make it clear to us how that power has proceeded in the production of the results we see about us. The believers in evolution may go further, if they please, and give us their opinion of the nature of that power,—whether it is conscious or unconscious, whether it is matter or spirit, whether it is intelligent or unintelligent, whether it is moral, immoral, or unmoral. But they are under no obligation to do this. They have completed this task as scientific evolutionists, when they have demonstrated the law, the method.

This is the position on this point which I have taken for some years. But as I have often been told that I was teaching a kind of evolution that was not that of Spencer, and that he would himself repudiate, it may be well to put on record his own words. In conversation with him, about a year ago, I asked him directly what, in his view of the matter, was the bearing of evolution on the problem of Theism. His reply was, in substance, "It does not necessarily touch the question of the existence of God either way." Spencer's own personal belief as to whether or not God exists is entirely another matter. The reality of the inscrutable power back of all phenomena, and of which all phenomena are only manifestations, no man has more grandly brought home to human thought than he. He declares this to be the most certain item of human knowledge. And he told me that his sense of awe and wonder in the presence of this power grew on him year by year, the longer he lived and the more deeply he studied.

The ultimate origin of this power we shall not hope to solve, if we are not so shallow in our thinking as to fail to comprehend what the problem involves. If we study the matter carefully, we shall also probably arrive at the conviction that all our knowledge must be relative; that is, we must know as men, from a human stand-point, and as possessing human faculties. So long, also, as we are men, our conceptions of all things—God included—must be anthropomorphic. But that is only to say that we are human. Whether these facts preclude all that can properly be called knowledge, and drive us to agnosticism, is another matter. This is not the place, nor is there space in this article, to discuss it. One thing, however, seems to me perfectly clear. Evolution is a scientific theory of the method by which the universe has grown. As such, it is neither theistic nor atheistic. Whether God exists; and, if he does, his nature,—these questions still remain open.

M. J. SAVAGE.

DOES MATERIALISM DESTROY OUR MORAL IDEALS?

Modern materialism is a very distinct and imposing philosophical product. It has not been spawned from the brain of any eccentric theorizer. It is the legitimate and acknowledged offspring of science and philosophy. It comes with the best of credentials; and, as we unfold and read them, we find that England—cautious, oaken-hearted, and large-brained England—has stamped them with her seal. The intellectual systems which she has hitherto given to the world have been of the soundest. We have every reason to trust a philosophy which she indorses. Is it likely that this system of materialism, bearing the signatures of Mill, Spencer, Tyndall, Harriet Martineau, and George Eliot, will prove a fatal bequest? But intelligent and rational theists, in whom no taint of superstition lingers, have an honest solicitude lest human nature be endangered by this latest form of freethought. Mr. Mallock, too, has rung his loud alarm bells so furiously that they have resounded over two great continents. While common men and women, who still cling to the unphilosophical tenets of Christianity, are ready to clinch the argument against materialism with unanswerable facts.

What is this apprehended danger, and how does it imperil human nature? It is the possible destruction of conscience, the burning polar star to which men have looked from the stormiest seas of perplexity, and which has never once flickered falsely nor dipped below the horizon. The theist reasons that the love of right and the feeling of moral obligation are man's dearest treasures. The preservation of morality is the supreme care of all good men. We have learned that intellectual overturnings may take place without destroying the peace of society; yet with every new movement the old fear besets us. Most significant are certain features of the present protest against materialism. The danger pertains to this life only. Society, civilization, morality, human happiness, are the sacred things which the conservative thinker would defend. We hear no more of the wrath of Deity or of eternal peril of soul. This unconscious transfer of emphasis from the future to the present marks the general drift toward the materialistic stand-point; for materialism knows nothing of a personal deity or of an immortality for the individual. More than this, it takes away the supernatural conscience which men have cherished as a divine illumination. In a word, it eliminates the divine interference and supervision from human life. It reaches its conclusion by rigorous intellectual processes, by severe induction from ascertained scientific truths. In the review of history, it finds humanity everywhere, but God nowhere. If there be any weakness in such a system, it can only occur while the mind is passing from its theistic to its materialistic anchorage. Once safely transferred from doubt to conviction, and the feet are planted as upon an eternal rock. It is the luminous and satisfying safety of the intellect. It is not a matter of moods or of emotional variations. God is never angry, the divine favor never withdrawn. Man is left literally without God in the world. But man is here, and the problems of life beset him with ceaseless importunity.

Where, then, is help, and whither shall he turn for enlightenment? How shall he know the right, and what shall impel him to do it, since no God commands and no future life beckons? The answer suggests itself. What he once did for love of God he shall now do for love of man; and the inspiration he once drew from his vision of heaven he shall now find in his work for a redeemed society on earth. The light he once sought in anxious prayer he shall now look for in the rigid discipline of his own intelligence; or, when that fails, he shall supplement it by the intelligence of others. Individual development and race development (or, in briefer phrase, human happiness) shall be his ideal, and human experience shall be his guide in attaining it. The one thing which the materialist needs above all others is knowledge. He cannot attain the highest morality without the severest intellectual discipline. A selfish utilitarian is a plant of ready growth. Great prophets like Jesus have taught the principle of human brotherhood. The law has come to us with the sanction of their personal authority. Materialism teaches the indissoluble dependence of man on man as a scientific truth. The relation is as invariable as that of oxygen to hydrogen. Men thrive upon universal good-will: they deteriorate through ill-will. Universal happiness has good-will among men as its primary condition. But this is only the first step. If religion has disseminated good-will, its work is over. It has never been the function of religion to develop the intellect. But to desire the right and to discover the right are two processes. The materialistic philosophy of life impels men to seek out the highest law. Recognizing the reign of law everywhere, we are still prone to stumble darkly because we choose a course which shall bring a ready gratification at the cost of a wider principle. To say that materialism fails as a principle of action is to burden a generous system with the frailties of individual exponents. Christianity has always pleaded that it might be judged by its ideals, not by its individual failures. Materialists ask the same indulgence for their philosophy. There could not be a higher code of morality than that of utilitarian ethics. It does not prescribe special duties, but leaves the individual free to determine in each case what shall be his highest good. Only, if he exchange the higher pleasure for the lower, he must endure the pain of self-reproach. He feels the curse of a violated intellect; for this is but another phrase for conscience in its final definition. I violate conscience, when I do the thing which my judgment condemns; and judgment always approves that which, in the end, will secure the highest happiness. There is no darkness here. The reign of materialism means the subordination of the will and the emotions to the intellect.

Materialism strikes hands with religion wherever religion is identical with enlightened morality. To the materialist, religion is but one of the lesser features of civilization, and subordinate to the central purpose of civilization, which is human development: it is not a thing to be perpetuated as an institution, except while it shall minister to human good. With all its supernaturalism eliminated, materialism accepts it. After all, the simple duties of daily life have little connection with any lofty philosophy. The contact of human beings with each other awakens love and good-will enough to tide us over the solution of most social problems. The close relations of marriage, parentage, and friendship, furnish the most powerful moral stimuli in human experience. Yet all these feelings are generated without reference to any philosophy of the universe. They are the spontaneous products of human association. An appreciation of wider relations gives birth to wider obligations. A man loves his country when he realizes his indebtedness. Human relations have but to be studied, in order to call up the noblest moral enthusiasms. The inheritance into which we step at birth,—be it strength, beauty, opportunity, social prestige, the developed skill which clothes and shelters us, or hereditary genius,—all are the slow accumulations of human effort. Is not all this enough to awaken love and gratitude? Does not the sense of it knit us to the remotest toiler of antiquity? And shall it not make us eager to add our contribution,—to lessen our obligation, and to make the load lighter to those who come after us, as well as to those who live beside us? To such thoughts, the creed of materialism gives generous consideration.

Its demands upon human nature are severe, because it puts the whole burden of human redemption upon man himself. It takes his good-will for granted, and throws the entire problem of ways and means upon his intelligence. There is no call to implant in men the desire for happiness. It is their fortunate birthright. We are all only too eager to inaugurate the earthly millennium. But we lack instruction. Fortune, power, education, freedom, these are some of our common ideals of happiness. It is the office of materialism to apply to this problem of happiness the keenest intellectual discrimination. The coarse intellect will give a coarse solution, and we shall have selfish personal standards of morality. But the trained mind will see the farthest reach of consequences, and from it we may look for the noblest results. A large measure of political freedom is only safe in the hands of an enlightened people. Thus it will be with this complete responsibility to self which materialism confers upon every human being.

M. A. HARDAKER.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM, PAST AND PRESENT.

It has been said a thousand times, by the defenders of the Bible as a supernatural book and Christianity as a supernatural religion, that rationalism and infidelity have nothing now to offer which they have not always had,—that the objections of the most modern objector are only a rehash of those of the most ancient; Renan and Strauss are only Celsus revamped. Only the ignorance involved in such remarks palliates their dishonesty. Men who know next to nothing of either Celsus or Strauss may be excused, except for speaking foolishly where they have no right to speak at all. But all others are without excuse.

The protagonists of supernaturalism would do well to abandon this line of defence and with all possible despatch, unless they are content to hold their own with the most ignorant in the community, and have given up all hope of persuading the cultivated and intelligent. It is good to see that such abandonment has been advised by one of the most influential voices in the orthodox camp. Dr. John Cairns has published recently his Cunningham Lectures for 1880, Unbelief in the Eighteenth Cen- tury as contrasted with its Earlier and Later History. In these lectures there is the frankest possible avowal of the incalculable difference between eighteenth century unbelief and that of the early pagan protestants. There is not only avowal, but circumstantial evidence. But, if the unbelief of the eighteenth century was not that of Celsus and his contemporaries, still less is it that of the nineteenth century. For the method and spirit of the nineteenth century objector to the supernatural Bible and supernatural Christianity are widely different from the method and spirit of the men who gave to eighteenth century unbelief its characteristic tone.

Let us consider this difference, for the present, with exclusive reference to Biblical criticism. The names of Voltaire and Paine are those which were most representative of antisupernaturalism at the conclusion of the eighteenth and in the forefront of the present century. These men were not by any means alone. There were many outside the camp with them, sharing their reproach, and many more endeavoring to maintain their Christian standing; while seeking for a more rational conception of Christianity and of the Bible than that of the majority. It is to the latter class that we must look for the progenitors of our modern critics. Ingersoll and Bradlaugh maintain the tradition of Voltaire and Paine. Kuenen and Reuss and Davidson and Smith are of a different race. And it is to these and such as these that we are indebted for all that is most positive and orderly in our entirely rational and human understanding of the Bible's merits and demerits. The stand-point of sympathy has proved vastly more fruitful of results than that of antagonism. Nothing in Voltaire is so genetic with relation to our modern criticism as the discovery of Astruc (1753) that the Pentateuch was made up of different documents. Here was the beginning of a process of disintegration which in its progress has resolved the arbitrary structure of the Bible into a mass of building material, out of which a new organic unity is shaping itself by slow degrees.

Let us do no injustice to the sturdy protestants of former times. The writings of Voltaire and Paine, so far as they concern the Bible, contain many remarkable anticipations of the course of subsequent inquiry. These writings, in comparison with those of the contemporary orthodox party, are characterized by an abounding common-sense. If the poverty of their learning is remarkable, it is not more so than that of their opponents. One of Paine's reviewers was Bishop Watson, and another was no less a person than Joseph Priestley. Some of his grosser errors they corrected, but they matched them at every turn with greater errors of their own. Voltaire and Paine still have their readers. They have continuators in the flesh. But neither to their books nor to their imitators are we to look for the best results of their original work. They roused men from their mental lethargy. They set men to thinking about the Bible as they had never thought before; and from out the ferment of thought which they created, and which, since their day, has been steadily increasing, has come the orderly array of knowledge, which is now accessible to the humblest student of religion.

One of the most noticeable of the various differences between the Biblical criticism of Voltaire and Paine and that of our own time is with respect to the magnitude of the labor involved. The Biblical criticism of Voltaire was a lot of squibs, of paragraphs, of little essays, poured forth in an incoherent stream. Paine's Age of Reason was a pamphlet which a diligent literary craftsman might easily have written in less time than Johnson spent on Rasselas,—a single week. For seriousness, for comprehensiveness, there is no comparison between such brochures and such modern books as Strauss' earlier and later Lives of Jesus, Ewald's History of Israel, Kuenen's Religion of Israel, the new work of Robertson Smith, and scores of other books that might be named. Nothing was more irritating to Voltaire and Paine than the supernatural theory of Old Testament prophecy. But their attack on this, compared with Kuenen's exposition in his Prophets and Prophecies in Israel, was like an attack of Falstaff's "awkward squad" compared with an advance of Moltke's army. It would be impossible to exaggerate the difference between Voltaire's touch-and-go and Kuenen's remorseless comprehensiveness, which no aspect of the question can escape.

Apologists for contemporary Biblical criticism sometimes claim for it a less destructive method than was formerly in vogue. They do this without warrant. Voltaire and Paine allowed a hundred things to stand in the popular conception of the Bible, where Davidson and Smith and Kuenen do not allow one. Modern criticism has pulverized the Bible of the popular religionist. It has proved that only a petty fraction of the Old and New Testament books were written by the persons to whom they are ascribed. It has redistributed the books in a chronological order wholly different from that in which they now stand. It has proved that pseudonymous writings make up a considerable portion of either Testament. It has dissolved the integrity of many books into various fragments. And it has done all these things with a wealth of learning and a strength of argument to which the negative criticism of the eighteenth century furnishes no parallel.

The Biblical criticism of our own time, so far as it is rational and free, differs from that of Voltaire and Paine not in being less destructive, but in being more constructive. There is no Hibernicism or contradiction here. Voltaire and Paine, et id omne genus, contented themselves with negation and destruction. But negation and destruction are, for the critics of our time, only the tuning of the instruments before the symphony is played; and, what is more, many of these negations and destructions are seen to have a positive side. The negations are at the same time affirmations. The destruction is at the same time construction. The parts released from their present arbitrary arrangements fall, as it were of themselves, into new relations that are vital and organic. They become illustrations of a progress of ideas and events. The pseudonymous portions serve this end as well as the most authentic, in some instances (notably those of Daniel in the Old Testament and the Fourth Gospel in the New) even better. In this new order, everything helps. Nothing is common or unclean. The slaughter of the Canaanites is just as indispensable as the Sermon on the Mount.

But perhaps the most important difference between the new and the old criticism is this: the old held the Bible itself responsible for all the theories and doctrines with which its original simplicity has been overlaid. It treated it as a responsible being, that had itself advanced the claim of plenary inspiration. But this is monstrously unjust. The Bible makes no such claim. There is no Bible to make it, the Bible being an arbitrary collection of some seventy books written at different times along the course of a millennium. The old criticism had no historic sense. It demanded of the Biblical writers eighteenth century knowledge and refinement. It paid certain frigid compliments to Jesus, but it had no perception of his relation to the moral and religious aspects of his time. To the prophets, it was even more unjust; while the modern critic assigns to them an almost incomparable grandeur. Kuenen, when he has utterly demolished the claim of supernatural prescience made for them, accords to them a moral dignity that could hardly be surpassed. To the new criticism, "the mistakes of Moses" are not many, because it ascribes to him only the ten commandments. But the mistakes and contradictions of the Bible generally excite neither its laughter nor its scorn. They are what we should expect. Even the pseudonymous writings draw down no fierce denunciations, for literary morality was not then what it is now. The sense of property in ideas existed hardly in germ.

Our most learned modern criticism fails to discover a supernatural revelation in the Bible as completely as did Voltaire and Paine. But, as literature and as the raw material for history, it gives it a much higher place, yet not a place that Voltaire and Paine and their co-laborers would not willingly have accorded it, if they could have seen it in the light which has been thrown upon it by a century of laborious investigation.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

TO-DAY'S PROBLEMS IN ENGLAND.

It is a truism to say that the world is at the present time passing through a period of transition. The old order of things is breaking up, and the new order is slowly forming, the process being attended by a social convulsion which is likely to attain unprecedented development before society has completely reached its period of peaceful reconstruction. In no country is this state of things more marked than in England (including in this convenient term the whole of Great Britain). It is true that the strife has hitherto been more furious, more dramatic in its incidents, in some other nations. In France there is the death-grapple between clericalism and the Republic, waged by foes neither of whom will give any quarter. In Russia, the stern despotism, with its memories of Peter, and Catharine, and Nicholas, finds itself face to face with a revolutionary propagandism more passionate, more unflinching, than anything recorded in history, except in '93, the année terrible of the French nation. In Germany, a powerful monarch and a powerful statesman have been called upon to meet a new political force which strikes at the very fabric of society as hitherto constituted. Events in England may perchance seem to some tame and insipid, when compared with these tremendous outbursts of human force. But a careful examination will convince any candid person that the whole field of battle between the contending powers both political, social, and religious, may be more clearly surveyed in England at the present time than in any other country.

In the first place, England is more alive than any other nation except the United States. Her national life is more vigorous, her people more accustomed to act and speak and think for themselves than in any country of the European continent. Russia can hardly be said to possess as yet the elements of a national life. She presents merely a dull, monotonous, dreary level of abject, ignorant, superstitious existence. The pulses of her millions of peasants do not throb with a popular life, for she has not attained a self-consciousness. The revolutionary movement is confined to a small (though probably increasing) number of educated people in her few great cities. In France, the situation is, of course, very different; but, although universal suffrage obtains in France and a limited suffrage in England, there is far less of keen and widespread interest in national affairs in the former than in the latter country. France has upwards of five million peasant voters, who are mainly, and indeed, except at special seasons, wholly absorbed in the condition of their fields and vineyards. There are also no Protestant sects in France to cause ferment of thought upon matters of religion, as in England. The people are wholly indifferent, so far as the rural districts are concerned, strongly Voltairian and anti-Christian in the cities; but in neither case is there much friction of religious thought, as exhibited among the sects which hold so large a place in England. In Germany, the people have not yet advanced beyond the period when it is assumed that a special set of persons have to do the nation's political thinking. The Germans have exhibited as yet no organizing capacity, no political genius. The country swarms with parties; and the strong, semi-despotic government takes advantage of the confusion to tighten its grasp over the people, stifling freedom of speech and of the press, and violating every principle of civil liberty.

In the next place, England has long possessed a large measure of freedom, so that the people have been educated in the constitutional methods of agitation. This may be said in one way to produce quiet and order, as opposed to the violent and revolutionary methods of the continent; but it also tends to the enlightenment of a large number of persons, to the more wide-spread ramifications of thought, and consequently to greater popular intelligence. The people do not wait for the government to tell them what to do: they can and do act habitually for themselves. In brief there is more individualism in England than in Europe generally, and consequently a more active life. This activity is further increased by the immense commercial and industrial development of England, which is so gigantic that the commerce of every continental nation excepting France dwindles beside it into comparative insignificance. All these things combine to render life in England more intense, more varied, more active, than in any nation of the European continent. Thus, in England, we have all the forces necessary to illustrate the conflict between the new and the old in all its varied and intricate circumstances. Now let us consider for an instant the opposing powers.

Notwithstanding all the democratic innovations and the inroads made by modern criticism, conservatism is still strong in England, and privilege will not easily be dislodged from its strong positions. There is, first, an ancient monarchy, which has been skilfully modified from time to time to meet the demands and the spirit of the new era. This monarchy has now scarcely any political power, but it wields large social influence; and, so long as the present sovereign lives, agitation against it would be useless, since the temper of hostility to a monarch as such is not widely felt in England, and the particular monarch in question is rather popular than not. Her successor, however, will doubtless not have so easy a time. This monarchy is surrounded and supported by the richest, proudest, and only influential aristocracy in the world. Never, since the Roman senate, has any country developed so powerful an aristocracy as has England. It is that very element which has preserved the English social and political system in its integrity up to the present time. The Puritan Revolution did not affect it, indeed scarcely touched it; for the leaders of that movement, Pym, Eliot, Hampden, and Cromwell, were essentially aristocratic, while the doctrines of the "levellers," which would have been so powerful in France, fell flat upon the ears of the people. This strong position the English aristocracy owe undoubtedly to their good qualities, and to the fact that the nobility of England has never, like that of the rest of Europe, been of a close kind; it was always theoretically open to any man to enter the ranks of the titled class. How different from France, where the aristocracy constituted a close corporation! The English Revolution left the privileges of the aristocracy almost intact: the French Revolution levelled the aristocracy to the dust. This English aristocracy is wealthy, refined, cultivated, and socially powerful, as compared with the aristocratic class of any other country: it contains a considerable sprinkling of able men, who redeem the whole body from the charge of uselessness, frivolity, and hostility to progress; and it has been, up to the present time, idealized in the imagination of large numbers of the people. This aristocratic class is supported by the land system of the country, which is still largely feudal, the old custom of primogeniture being still in force. The whole land system of England, beyond that of any other country, exists for the benefit of the few. Then finally there is the Established Church, which has perhaps been the greatest bulwark of conservatism that England has had. That Church has in the past blended supernatural sanctions with political reasons for the maintenance of the old order; and, though the English people are no longer believers in supernatural interference, all parties instinctively understand that the Church is the key of the position. These are the forces on the side of what is termed the established order of things.

What are the forces on the other side? First, millions of landless people, who can do little more than earn their daily bread, and whose worldly prospects would probably seem dismal indeed to the average prosperous citizen of Illinois or Ohio. Next, an army of determined reformers, who are at their posts night and day, always organized for an assault upon the fortress of privilege. Further, the circumstances and spirit of the times are working in antagonism to the old order of things. American grain is destroying English landlordism, and there is no power which can arrest the process. France, too, is seen to be enjoying great prosperity under a republic which seems at last solid and enduring, and this tells against the English system. Again, the tendency of English contemporary thought and literature is toward radicalism, equality, and freethought. Never before were books so widely read, or the greatest authors so highly esteemed; and the writings of such men as Mill, Spencer, John Morley, Frederic Harrison, and others, have, directly or mediately, swayed the masses of the people as perhaps no writers have done since the era of Voltaire. The critical spirit is abroad in England, and that is unfavorable to any received traditions in politics or religion. The commercial and industrial movement is also instinctively hostile to the aristocracy and the Established Church; and the bitter opposition of the clergy to all political progress has made the bulk of the working-classes their enemies.

These, then, are the main forces at work in the England of the present day. In subsequent papers, I propose to consider various phases of the great movement directed against the land system and the Established Church. There are many other subjects of reform, but these are the central questions of English politics; and their discussion in England will open up the deepest problems of society, government, and—in my opinion—religion.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

THE Pope's discontent and dramatic account of weariness in his luxurious imprisonment reminds one of the attitude of Johnson's Rasselas. It might almost be suspected that his eminence were pining, like that young royal captive in his beautiful valley, for the relief of reaction, or some sort of action, beyond the rigid mountains of restraint, even should it involve the rigors of hardship.

TO THE READERS OF THE INDEX.

The full and clear statement by Mr. Potter, in the Index last week, of the arrangement by which I have become associated with him in the editorial management of this paper, renders unnecessary any additional words of explanation from me; and having been a contributor to this journal several years, and its vacation editor last summer, I must rely upon the acquaintance formed by these past relations to the readers of the Index to serve as an excuse—if, indeed, any excuse is needed—for dispensing with the customary formality of a "Salutatory," or any extended introductory remarks.

Under Mr. Potter's exclusive editorial control, the Index, as its readers all know, has been marked by genuine ability, breadth of thought, and such candor, courtesy, and uniform fairness and generosity in the treatment of all systems, schools, and phases of thought as are rarely witnessed in the field of journalism. If the project of a joint editorship of this paper by Mr. Potter and myself shall bring into its columns any qualities that will enlarge its circulation and increase its effectiveness and usefulness as an organ of Liberal Thought, I shall have no reason to regret the acceptance of the position to which I have been invited by the committee of the Free Religious Association, and upon the duties of which I have entered with the hope that the interests of the paper may be furthered by the new arrangement.

OUR PRESENT NUMBER.

We think we may properly call special attention to this number of the Index, not as by any means reaching the ultimate of our journalistic hopes, but as indicating the direction in which we would advance. An unusual number of well-known and experienced writers in the liberal ranks have been brought together in the free parliament of our columns. Mr. M. J. Savage treats the question, which is as close to his heart as it is clear to his brain, "Is Evolution Atheistic?" Miss M. A. Hardaker argues urgently and strongly against the very common belief that a materialistic philosophy cannot supply high "moral ideals." Mr. J. W. Chadwick brings his word on a subject in which he is perfectly at home, "Biblical Criticism, Past and Present," and shows how the new learning concerning the Bible has changed some of the old problems of scepticism. Mr. William Clarke, a new writer on this side of the Atlantic, comes from England equipped with a whole armory of solid facts concerning the relations between English religion and English social and political questions, and begins in this paper a series of articles which we are to print from his pen on this fruitful subject. Professor Adler discusses, in a lecture delivered before his society in New York last March, but not before printed, the old, but ever new problem of evil, and brings to it a treatment that may fitly be termed heroic, and that ends in a view of morality that is as bracingly invigorating as a north-west wind. The editors, too, in their different ways, have their say, and other contributors add their quota to the value of the paper which we to-day present to our readers.

W. J. P.

MAN is a being to whom his own nature is an object of thought. He possesses, as it were, a double existence. He can address himself in the first or second person. It is generally thought that no brutes have this twofold life. Metaphysician and philosopher have generally believed that self-consciousness not the consciousness implied in the feeling of self as an individual, as the common centre of successive sensations, which the lower animals unquestionably possess, but the consciousness of consciousness constitutes an important, if not the chief, intellectual distinction between man and the brute. Mr. Savage, in the first of his series of sermons on "Man," in this city, said, "No animal is self-conscious." But others maintain that this higher consciousness belongs to some of the animals. Mr. Darwin seems to hold the latter view. "No one supposes," he says, "that one of the lower animals reflects whence he comes or whither he goes, what is death or what is life, and so forth. But can we feel sure that an old dog, with an excellent memory and some powers of imagination, as shown by his dreams, never reflects on his past pleasures in the chase? And this would be a form of self-consciousness. On the other hand, as Büchner has remarked, how little can the hard-worked wife of a degraded Australian savage, who uses hardly any abstract words, and cannot count above four, exert her self-consciousness or reflect on the nature of her own existence." But, even if the higher brutes are not wholly destitute of self-consciousness, it is evidently vague and dim until it manifests itself in man.

At the late literary congress at Vienna, a proposal was made to petition the Czar to pardon Jehernitchewski, the novelist, who was exiled to Siberia in 1863, but no action was taken by the congress. There are thousands of exiles whose return to their homes is demanded by justice and the best interests of the people of Russia; but the Czar seems to be in dread of men who have the ability, courage, and independence to inaugurate reforms or even to suggest measures for the relief of the people. His policy resembles somewhat that of the Spanish rulers, who during three hundred years executed, tortured, or imprisoned, for their honest convictions, men and women, including the noblest and the best, at the rate of a thousand a year, thereby contributing in no small degree to the present degenerate condition of Spain.

ONE statement in the review of B. F. Underwood's Essays and Lectures, which appeared in the Index recently, conveyed a wrong impression. Although this volume was issued without the author's knowledge, he had consented some years previously to the publication by Mr. Bennett of any of his essays that had appeared in the Index, or in pamphlet form, that he chose to reprint. This correction is due the publisher of the Essays and Lectures, whatever has occurred since Mr. Underwood's consent was given.

"EIGHT in six you can't, and have nothin' left." When Mr. Gladstone announces at one point that he is ready to promote the conduct of Irish affairs by the men of their own blood, to whom alone they would yield quiet obedience, and yet forthwith establishes coercive restraints for the seething revolt at the retention of foreign governors, whose contempt of their charge is patent, he lays a problem before the people that somewhat staggers solution.

It is truly piteous that, when a fellow has decided to give up stealing and invest his wealth in honorable trade, he should be subjected to the ignominy and frustration of vulgar arrest. Niko, a brigand, who extorted a large ransom from England for one of her subjects he had captured near Salonica, and on returning from an extended tour on the proceeds, for the purpose of going into regular business, was arrested, complains of bitter treatment!

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

MUCH barking and little bite is commonly charged upon "sentimental" themes like the busy topics of the present civil service issue. It will bring one new substantial item into the field, if the Springfield post-office case gets a decisive boost.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

MAN is so great that his greatness appears even in the consciousness of his misery. A tree does not know itself to be miserable. It is true that it is misery indeed to know one's self to be miserable, but then it is greatness also. In this way, all man's miseries go to prove his greatness. They are the miseries of a mighty potentate, of a dethroned monarch.—Pascal.

THE scientific study of nature tends not only to correct and ennoble the intellectual conceptions of man: it serves also to ameliorate his physical condition.—Draper.

ETHICS, as it has been well said, are the finest fruits of humanity, but they are not its roots.—Mallock.

THE true scholar grudges every opportunity of action passed by, as a loss of power.—Emerson.

THE family is the centre and archetype of the State, and the happiness and goodness of society are always in a very great degree dependent upon the purity of domestic life.—Lecky.

I CALL to the world to distrust the accounts of my friends, but listen to my enemies,—as I myself do. I charge you, too, forever, reject those who would expound me,—for I cannot expound myself;

I charge that there be no theory or school founded out of me;

I charge you to leave all free, as I have left all free.

—Walt Whitman.

"LIFE itself

May not express us all, may leave the worst
And the best too, like tunes in mechanism Never awaked."

—George Eliot.

WHAT higher praise can we bestow on any one than to say of him that he harbors another's prejudices with a hospitality so cordial as to give him, for the time, the sympathy next best to, if indeed it be not edification in, charity itself. For what disturbs more and distracts mankind than the uncivil manners that cleave man from man?—A. B. Alcott.

I HOLD it truth with him who sings
To one clear harp in divers tones,
That men may rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selves to higher things.

—Tennyson.

NOT UNTO US.

Whirl, elemental powers!
Play your vast game!
Roll, hurl, your giant earths and suns!
Shift the huge scenery to and fro,—
Fire-robcs, vapor-curtains,
Purple-braided clouds, blue sea,
Art, passion, pain, and love!
Red sun-hearts, throb!
Thick, stifling sea-shroud,
Close cling to your dead,
Your pale, white, beautiful dead!
Cling close, rude serpent-coils of pain!
We cry not, resist not,
But only gaze in awe.

Not unto us the splendor of the dying day,
The freshness of the morn;
Not unto us the perfume of the wilding rose
That nods on yonder thorn.

The gods, the mighty gods, theirs is the flaming masque,
And theirs the joy and pain:
Man comes and looks a moment at the mystic play,
But seeks its end in vain.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 27, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

NO WRITERS in the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

IS THERE A GOOD GOD?

A Discourse delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture, New York, March 20, 1881.

BY FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

Can we reconcile the pains of existence with the belief that there is a supreme principle of goodness in the universe? On the assumption that that supreme principle is embodied in a loving Father, I fail to see how the reconciliation can be effected. If he loves us, why then does he so torture us? This question has been the cross of theologians from the beginning, and theologians must somehow answer it, or there will be an end of their theology.

The common solution of the difficulty consists in a denial of the fact that evil is evil, that black is black. All the pains of existence, it is said, are apparent evils only. All serve some higher interest of the person whom they afflict. "As a father chastises his child, so the Lord chastises thee." Pain is a means of spiritual education. But this answer is in no wise a satisfactory one, nor does it meet the difficulty.

There are two weighty counter-arguments, that deprive this attempted solution of the problem of all its force. The first is derived from the existence of pain in the lower animal and insect world. It is needless to describe the enormous amount of pain endured by the dumb brutes. We have but to listen to the howling that fills the nightly forest, we have but to note how the sick member of a herd is gored to death by his fellows, we have but to observe how birds and beasts and creeping things prey naturally upon each other, nay, depend for their own sustenance upon each other's destruction, in order to recognize the deep curse of suffering that has been fixed upon the lower creation. If God inflicts pain for the spiritual education of those whom it affects, what shall be said of the ceaseless pain endured by speechless yet sentient creatures! Is it also for the spiritual education of these that the Author of their lives has doomed them to such suffering?*

And the second argument against the theological proposition that pain is not really an evil, but is justified as an instrument for the moral purification and elevation of man, is to be drawn from the fact that the evils inflicted on man, far from tending always to insure his moral elevation, often tend precisely in the opposite direction. For it is with pain as with persecution. Persecution, carried only to a moderate limit, may rouse the power of resistance and help the cause which it was designed to hurt. But, if persecution is carried far enough, it will not permit the resilient energies of its victims to act, but will crush them. The same is true with respect to the persecutions which we endure at the hands of fate. Sufferings, when not too intense and prolonged, may rouse the moral energies within us to robust opposition and quicken the vigor of the soul. But when the blows rain down in too frequent succession, when evil, instead of being temporary and exceptional, becomes an habitual condition, we experience effects of a very different sort. Extreme grief frequently hardens instead of bettering. Protracted poverty degrades and weakens the morality of men. Surely, our courts, our prisons, the lazar-houses of vice, all the social pests with which we are afflicted, testify loudly and forcibly to that fact. And, if every other proof were wanting, does not the ghastly fact of insanity alone suffice to break the argument that suffering is intended for the spiritual education of the sufferer? Is insanity also a means for the spiritual education of the insane?

No: we cannot accept the reasoning of the theologian. The proposition that suffering is justified, because it is the means of bringing about the greatest good of the sufferer, falls hopelessly to the ground.

In modern times, Mr. John Stuart Mill has sought an escape out of these perplexities by suggesting that, of the two attributes of almightiness and goodness in the character of the Deity, hitherto deemed inseparable, the former should be sacrificed to save the latter. The evils of existence, he appears to think, can be reconciled to the goodness of God, upon the assumption that we deny his omnipotence, and in no other way. For the supposition that a beneficent being, who also had the power to make the world perfect, should not have made it better than it actually is, should have purposely arranged it so as to entail the most terrible sufferings upon his creatures, is inconceivable. We must maintain, therefore, that either he had the power to avoid all the pain he has inflicted, and then, though he may be omnipotent, he is not good, he does not care for us: on the contrary, he even seems to delight in hurting us, seeing that he could have averted all we suffer, and yet was stony-hearted enough not to do so. Or else we must suppose that he is deficient in the power to execute his purposes, either because matter is too intractable, or because there is some other force opposing his own, and then, though we may continue to conceive of him as the best God, full of the best intentions, he is certainly not an omnipotent God. And Mill himself evidently inclines to the latter of the two alternatives, and would prefer to believe in a good Being, who would do better than he can, but cannot,—the weak God, rather than in an almighty God who could do better if he only would, but will not,—the cruel God.

But it does not appear to me that this suggested reconciliation is ever likely to prove popular among the many, or even acceptable to the few. For how shall the idea of a weak God be to us the source of strength, which we need in the stress and struggle of existence? It is true, the philosopher may point out to us that this world-spirit, though not mighty enough to achieve perfect painlessness, perfect justice, perfect harmony, must yet be a very mighty spirit indeed, considering the degree of order, justice, and joy which he has achieved. But how shall this thought help us in the often undeserved afflictions that come upon us? Are not these very afflictions instances of the breaking-down of the power of the world-spirit? And how will it avail us to know that the world-spirit has succeeded in other cases, seeing that he has so lamentably failed in our own? How would it avail us if an engineer, by his shortcomings, had caused a terrible railroad collision, to go to those who are wounded and crippled, and to the relatives of those who were killed, and descant on the ability which that engineer had shown on other occasions, and tell them of the many other trains which he has run without causing disaster? What do these people care for the other trains which he has carried in safety, so that he has wrecked their train?

It has been said, indeed, that in the very insufficiency of the world-spirit there is an added glory for man, considering that man is needed by the Commander of the Universe, to be his helper in the fight for order and light. But again I ask, How can this thought be of value to us, unless we are assured that the issue of the fight will be a triumph for the cause in which we are engaged, and how shall we obtain this assurance, unless we believe that the spirit which is all-good in its aims is also almighty to achieve those aims? What, then, remains, it will be asked, but to return to the theological view, and say, There is a God, both all-good and almighty? Truly, then, the old question returns with added and keener force, Why, if he is good, and has the power to execute his good intentions, does he inflict such evil upon his creatures?

Is the main change which has taken place in our religious opinions, in other respects, likely to affect this fundamental question of religion among the rest? We are convinced that it is, and that the problem of the co-existence of Evil with Good becomes disembarassed of its greatest difficulties the moment we abandon the personification of the good principle in a personal God. From that moment, we are relieved of the necessity of explaining what no human mind will ever bring one jot nearer comprehension.

Let it be understood that the mere coexistence of Evil and Good in the same world does not in itself imply a contradiction. Only to describe the Source of the world as good according to our human way of understanding what good is, and then to suppose that this same Good Being has also put the Evil into the world, is an irreconcilable contradiction; is in philosophy what the attempt to square the circle is in mathematics. But if we avow, as we do avow, that the source of the world, in its essence, is unknown, that both evil and good are the phenomenal appearances of an ultimate entity, whose nature is inconceivable, then, indeed, the pains which we endure will not become less burdensome to the flesh and less a weariness to our souls on that account, but at least the presence of pain in the universe will no longer darken the whole face of the universe in our eyes, nor imply an accusation against the sanity of things, an inherent contradiction at the heart of the world.

And, though we have no light upon the ultimate mystery, we have sufficient knowledge concerning the course of events to console and lift up our souls in the endurance of pain, if only we will look upon pain in the right way. Let it be remembered that the great change which has taken place in our religious conceptions is the change in the relative importance that we ascribe to the individual man. Formerly, as the earth was supposed to be the centre of the universe, so man, the individual, was believed to be the end of creation. For his sake, the stars shone at night in the heavens and the sun traversed its path by day. For his sake, the seasons revolved and the rivers ran their course. Over him, a special Divine Providence watched; and an arm was stretched down from on high to uphold each human child. But the position which we must now assign to the individual is a different one. It is no longer the universe which serves the individual, but the individual that should serve the universe. If he has any greatness, his greatness consists in that service, that subordination of the personal to the impersonal. Applying this view to the problem of pain, it will aid us to lay hold upon a new support, a means of comfort, yes, and of enthusiastic self-sacrifice, which the old religions never fully emphasized. For pain is consecrated, not as the educator of the individual (which it cannot be proved to be in every case), but as the educator of the race; not as the means of securing the highest interest of the part, but of securing the highest interest, the constant and progressive elevation of the whole. Every sickness which man or woman or child endures is a means of averting sickness hereafter, and of learning more truly the laws of health; every error which we commit is a means for bringing to clearer recognition the truth. Even the moral faults and crimes of which we become guilty are a means for causing to be heard in more distinct tones the majestic voice of the eternal laws within ourselves, and of securing their more victorious ascendancy. In the lower animal world, pain and struggle have been the price paid for the evolution of the higher forms of life. In the world of man, the same price must be paid for the evolution of all that is great and noble, and worth having,—for the increasing liberty of nations, for the establishment of justice, for peace, for the recognition of the human rights of the weak and the down-trodden. We also, we individual men and women, must pay our share of the price that is demanded of our race. The universe demands it of us. There is no use in repining, in crying out, "Oh, why should such a price be exacted of us!" It is exacted, and the why and wherefore are not for us to know, and therefore not for us to ask. Only let us remember that it is for great ends that these heavy sacrifices are demanded. We see a part of the good and sublime things which are brought about by such sacrifices: the rest we do not see, and can only divine them in vague, blissful presentiments. Let us, then, school ourselves to regard all that we are called upon to suffer and endure as the price paid for the sacred and sublime ends of world progress. If we can only do that, how glorified shall our suffering be!

* If the Deity be less than omnipotent, what hope is there from the theistic point of view of the ultimate victory of the Good over the Evil, and what significance can any temporary ascendancy of the former have, while its final triumph remains uncertain?

* This argument is stated by Lotze in his Mikrokosmus.

The great change which needs to be brought about is a change in the feelings of men. Many persons have abandoned the old religious opinions, but they still retain the feelings corresponding to those opinions. They no longer hold as a matter of opinion that the individual is the end of creation, and that his happiness is the care of a special superintending providence; and yet they expect that the universe will conspire to secure their happiness, and are filled with keen disappointment, and a rebellious spirit if events prove the failure of their expectations. The doctrine that the purpose of the individual's existence is happiness, a doctrine which is everywhere taught,—in the pulpit, in the press, and in the school-room,—should be sternly dealt with; for it is utterly untrue, and to hold it is but to prepare for one's self unutterable mortification and unrest and disgust with life. Do we not see plainly enough that we were not put here primarily and chiefly to be happy? Health is an element of happiness. How many tens of thousands are there who, through no fault of their own, are deprived of its enjoyment, and born into existence with the seeds of disease already in them! The possession of the necessary means of subsistence and a decent comfort are elements of happiness. Look at the five hundred thousand inhabitants of New York city living in tenement-houses; look at the filth, the want, the haggard poverty of the hopeless masses in European cities,—and ask yourselves whether happiness is the purpose of the individual's existence. The love of our dear ones is an element of happiness. Listen to the cries of the afflicted; look at the hosts of heart-broken mourners who cry out in despair for those they have lost and yearn for and cannot get back,—and ask yourselves whether it was to be happy that these hosts were called into being. We are here to do a duty, to help in solving the world-problem, to work as loyal soldiers in the great army which is struggling for the triumph of righteousness and of justice in the universe. All our trials, all our burdens, all our losses, we must bear as soldiers should bear their burdens, their privations, and their hardships,—without repining, without yielding unflinchingly to the end, for the sake of the cause in whose service we stand. All our happiness is an incident, never can it be regarded as the end of our existence.

Would that teachers of the people, and teachers of the young especially, might have the courage to utter these truths that are so evidently proved by each man's experience and founded upon facts. How much bitterness would then be averted; how much added moral courage would be infused into the hearts of the rising manhood and womanhood; nay, how much would the actual happiness of mankind be increased, if happiness were no longer sought as the chief end!

The universal laws will not bend to us. We must rise to the laws. We must become public in our purposes. Then shall we be wooed from our huts and our littlenesses and our despairs, and shall discover the secret of a peace which no trouble can darken and no sorrow will break. The remedy which we have to offer to the sufferer is no quack medicine to be drained at a draught and to cure all ills. It is a remedy which requires the most patient effort on the part of each one who desires to obtain its benefits, the constant schooling of one's feelings in noble sentiments, the exercise of one's will in loving acts, and indefatigable persistence in the dire struggle for inward emancipation. Yet it is a remedy which is open alike to the most gifted and to the least gifted members of the human family. And herein lie the pledge and the glad promise of the final acceptance of our new form of religion among all men; for, in the sphere of morality, the high and the low can stand together. The loftiest mind is not lofty enough to appreciate the full content and grandeur of morality, while the humblest human being who in the integrity of his heart yields up the self to the unselfish can practise the sum total of the profoundest philosophy.

THE REFUGE OF INFAMY.

Writing of Guiteau is somewhat like taking disagreeable medicine. It is not pleasant to think of him. It is difficult to consider him even with the charity we might extend to a ferocious animal, where freedom would be dangerous to the community. Aside from the fact that having laws, it is altogether best to let them take their proper course, there is no reason why an hour should be spent in debating the guilt or innocence of this murderer, any more than there would be in having court sit to decide the fate of a rattlesnake, a panther, or a mail dog. He should be dropped out of sight as speedily as possible, dealt with according to the fullest rigor of the law, not because any possible punishment could lessen the horribleness of his crime, or in any way make amends to the family and the nation that have suffered such terrible loss by his act, but because laws are for the protection of society, and should be either executed or annulled. But the fact that men like Guiteau and Freeman can crimson their hands with the life of innocence and then claim the right to live and receive the protection of the society and the nation they have outraged, on the ground that they are doing the will of God, is something that claims attention vastly more than the execrable criminals themselves.

For ages, the man-made idol and image of man himself, projected in a blind guess into the skies of an infinite universe, has been the refuge of infamy. Thousands upon thousands of innocent men, women, and children have been murdered by fanatics, who sought to change their crimes into meritorious deeds by the claim that they were doing the will of God. The plea of insanity was not raised in their behalf, because they were so powerful that they could not be punished. They may have been sincere in their belief or they may have been actuated by sectarian zeal, that saw in the claim of divine control the strongest possible defence of their conduct. But they were not insane. Murderers became insane at a point of time when it became evident that society was determined to protect itself against dangerous people. While lawlessness abounds to such an extent that criminals escape restraint and punishment, the plea of insanity will not be heard. When it has become clear that law not only exists, but that it will act, and that its execution will make life answer for life, and the gallows rises in grim certainty before the window of the miscreant's cell, then kinship, sniffling presumptive disgrace in the air, raises the cry of insanity; and the old claim of the brutal fanatic and bigot of the past, that God has required this thing at his hands, is the strongest evidence adduced to prove the insanity.

If, now, such claims are to be allowed to influence public opinion, if their influence is to be felt in courts of justice, it is but reasonable and right that they should be weighed as other evidence is. It is not enough that the murderer should say, as Guiteau did, "The divine pressure on me to remove the President was so enormous that I had to do it, even if I had been shot dead the next moment; and the Lord took special pains to confirm my act by the gradual way he allowed the President to depart." Or, again, as he wrote: "The President's removal was an act of God." If God is to stand between a criminal and the execution of laws, whose object is the protection, well-being, prosperity, and happiness of society, made up, as it is said to be, of the "children of God," it is high time that God should be placed on the witness-stand; and, until that is done, all claims that crime was committed by direction of God should be no more considered as evidence of insanity than of villany. When God appears in court and declares that he destroyed Guiteau's sanity, in order to use him for the purpose of murdering President Garfield, the prisoner will be entitled to the weight of the evidence, and his claim must in justice be allowed. But, in such a case, the government would at once see the necessity of arresting the witness for the crime of murder.

I write this with full knowledge that I may be offending against widely accepted notions regarding God; but I do it in all sincerity, and because I believe, as before said, that it is time the folly and fraud of all excuses for crime, under the plea of being chosen by God and driven to the act in violence to the actor's own sense of right, should be exposed and exploded. The very fact that a murderer confesses that he perpetrated a crime, acting under control by the will of God which he dare not or could not resist, is evidence that even then, in the hour of his infamy, he knew that what he was about to do was wrong, and so proves his sanity. If we have men with brutal and fiendish propensities so strong that, under undue excitement, they will override the sense of right and lead them to the commission of crime, we may commiserate such, we may pity them as suffering from a heritage of woe, we may even refuse to execute the law against them; but in no case should we ever dare to degrade our conception of wisdom and goodness by admitting, for even the shadow of a moment, that God ever did or could direct the hand of an assassin. If we suppose that God can and does inspire men at all, it follows that he is either a murderer, or that he does not inspire men to deeds of blood. But, as it would be logically impossible to believe that a perfect God could even entertain a desire to commit murder, much less that he could compel a human being to perpetrate, against his own will, the evil deed which Deity could not himself execute, it follows that all claim to divine direction where the act is evil must be false. We therefore come logically to the conclusion that the thought, the design, and the act of murder are in all cases entirely human in their origin and inspiration. Recognizing this fact, the question arises, Why do men assert themselves to be the instruments of God for the commission of crime? In the two latest and most heinous crimes committed in the world, under claim of direction from God, both murderers steadily confessed to a terrible consciousness of the nature of the acts which they were contemplating. This clearly shows, as before stated, a knowledge of the fact that what they were about to do was wrong. An insane person is never troubled by such consciousness. Under his hallucination, he conceives his contemplated act to be in no wise criminal: the thought of wrong does not enter his mind. When, therefore, a man who is actuated by a desire to commit a desperate crime confesses himself conscious of the evil he is about to do, he is to be considered a sane man; and, when he resorts to the artifice of insisting that he was impelled by the will of God to the commission of the deed, as an excuse for his act, we can only add to the measure of his viciousness the depth of his cunning. His plea of control by the will of God is not the vaporing of a dethroned mind, but the deliberate and studied skill of a consummate villain. It is the thoroughly constructed plan of a mind which knows that the appeal to superstition is yet the strongest appeal that can be made in this world,—the plan of a mind which knows that so deep-seated is fear of God in human nature that the vast majority of people now living do not dare to question and deny the assumption of inspiration or divine control, no matter what its avowed purpose. It takes a shrewd villain to play the rôle of agent or tool of God successfully. He may simulate insanity; but, to be successful, there must be so much "method in his madness" that the actor is sure to discover himself somewhere, if we can look at him above the glamour of awe that he raises about himself by a cunning use of the name of God. It is about time that it should be generally understood that the claim of familiarity with God, and the assumption that he is the author and instigator of some of the most atrocious crimes and worst swindles perpetrated of late years, is evidence of nothing but the depravity of those who make it.

The length of my manuscript forbids that I should attempt any farther illustration of the subject; but I cannot close without referring to the swindle practised upon an estimable lady, Mrs. Phoebe Upham, of New York, and recently reported in the daily press. In a word, the case is this: Mrs. Upham had money, and was and is a very benevolent person. She became acquainted with Miss Mary C. Ward, a very pious person. Miss Ward became acquainted with Rev. John A. Lansing, a very divine person. Lansing and Ward prevailed upon Mrs. Upham to place in their hands $15,000, which Lansing was to invest in Cologne business, at ten per cent. interest. The result was that Mrs. Upham, after vainly waiting two years for the honesty of her pious and divine friends to appear and restore her money or pay up the promised ten per cent., had the swindlers arrested on a charge of obtaining money under false pretences. Mind you, this money was intrusted to these people by Mrs. Upham through her faith in them as very earnest members of the Church, Ward being a somewhat widely known exhorter and camp-meeting engine. They are mentioned in this article, not because they are Christians and exhorters, but because they made use of their pretended piety to dupe their victim. Well, Mrs. Upham had them arrested as swindlers. The following letter, written by the divine Lansing to Mrs. Upham, shows how he endeavored to convince his victim that God was responsible for "the plans and arrangements" by which the too confiding widow had lost her money:—

I cannot meet with your demands to-night. The plans and arrangements were all made in God, and I can move only as he commands. Can you not follow the word of God as it came to you first in Carrie Ward, and know it to be of God as you did then, and follow it as you did then? The papers were all drawn in God, and lie at his disposal.

Yours in Christ Jesus, the Lord God. Amen.
(Signed) J. A. LANSING.

Once more, God is compelled to become the refuge of infamy. Either theologians must speedily settle the question of inspiration, possession, or control by will of God, so as to put a stop to all such use of the name, or in these days of freethinking they must be content to see their conception of Deity become more and more an object of contempt and ridicule on the part of honest people, and a bulwark of crime on the part of scoundrels.

BOOK NOTICES.

J. B. ARNAUD. LE NIHILISME ET LES NIHILISTES. Ouvrage traduit de l'italien par Henri Bellenger. Paris: Maurice Dreyfous, éditeur, 13 Rue de Faubourg-Montmartre, Prix trois francs.

Here we have not only a mine of interesting facts, but a calm and thoughtful view of what Russia really needs. Thus, we find mentioned among the causes of Nihilism, not only the undeserved or excessively severe punishments inflicted by the government, but the intolerance exercised by Alexander II. especially toward Jews, the denial of promotion to non-commissioned officers, the preference given to the nobility in appointments not only in the army but in the civil service, the financial disorders resulting from the emancipation of the serfs, the inroad of socialistic ideas, and the encouragement given to these latter by the organs of the administration, which have spoken so severely of all institutions except the Russian that those who are dissatisfied with the latter are forced to the conclusion that all existing institutions are alike worthy of destruction. The party which such causes brought into existence received its nickname from Tourguénief, who introduced what he called Nihilists in his romance of Father and Son, published in 1860. Quotations are given not only from this novel, but from that for which Tchernishevski was sent to Siberia, and also from the protest against Socialism which Herzen, the editor of the Kolokol, wrote in answer to Bakunin. There is also a nearly complete translation of a petition which was presented by the provincial assembly of Tchernigof, and which is particularly valuable as a proof of the amount of reform needed in Russia. This public document admits that the revolutionists are not likely to be suppressed by punishment, though this is inflicted under the most cruel of all codes in Europe, asserts that Nihilism cannot be shown to be false except in the light of free discussion, deplors the restrictions on liberty of publication and petition, especially those imposed on the provincial assemblies, points out many defects in the schools as well as in the civil service, and thus exposes the folly of the government in making it so difficult even for the best informed and most loyal to make suggestions and criticisms. Indeed, this petition fully justifies the apology made for assassination in the Nihilist organ called Land and Liberty: "No other weapon is left for us to use." It is sad to read how Tourguénief had to leave St. Petersburg for saying that the only way to check revolution was through reform, and that it is the ray of light yet to be given by a constitution which alone can scatter all darkness, and reduce Nihilism to a nonentity. Rightly is the great novelist praised in this book for the wisdom with which he has maintained that Russia is to be emancipated, not through Socialistic conspiracies and assassinations, but through keeping all the rest of the world aware of the iniquities of her tyrants, and so creating such a pressure from without in favor of constitutional liberty as will make its friends strong enough to establish it permanently.

WORDSWORTH: HIS LIFE AND WORKS. By Andrew James Symington. 2 vols. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

The life of Robert Burns, by Robert Chambers, has long been to thousands of readers one of the most delightful of books. It is a biography interspersed with the poems of Burns in the order of their composition. Mr. Symington's life of Wordsworth has been constructed upon this admirable model; and, while he has not brought to his task anything equal to Robert Chambers' sympathetic appreciation of the poetry of Burns, he has brought a wonderful diligence and faithfulness, and the result is two volumes of the most instructive character. We have said that Mr. Chambers' Burns has furnished Mr. Symington with his model; but there is this difference: in the Chambers book, all of Burns' poems are given; in Mr. Symington's book, we have only copious selections. The minor poems are, for the most part, given in full; but, for obvious reasons, this method has been abandoned with the longer poems. The selections from these, however, are made with admirable taste. The circumstances attending the origin of the various poems, longer and shorter, are detailed, and add much to their interest. Beginners in Wordsworth will be particularly grateful to Mr. Symington for his excellent book, while they will go elsewhere for the finest criticisms on the genius of the poet.

AS LIFE itself is the most absorbing topic with all lovers in the actual drama, so with a multitude of readers the word pictures of imagined human lives are sure of the first welcome when the month brings around the magazine with one or more serials. But after the mock-heroes have recited their little parts, the generous leaves of the Atlantic give a rich record of fact and veritable research in solid fields of inquiry. In the November issue, Professor Fiske discourses with rare force and erudition upon "the theory of a common origin for all languages," demolishing with a master's hand the untenable grounds of former confidence. And, not content with replacing these by convincing historic groups of pertinent fact, he goes on with emphatic prediction concerning a common destiny as to the speech of the entire civilized world. Lucy Larcom concludes an instructive and diverting account of former years of Lowell mill-girls' experience with some considerations of social wisdom and humanity well worth serious pondering. And a brief chapter toward the close of the number drags forth with a dreary shudder the skeleton that lurked in a vacant corner of Goethe's character, the sadder and more chilling from its near contrast with the abounding wealth of associated qualities.

THE Modern Review for October, 1881.—We have first an exceedingly interesting article on "James Hinton as a Religious Thinker," by H. H. Ellis. It is much enriched by quotations from Mr. Hinton's various writings. An American contributor comes next, Joseph H. Allen,—his contribution an article on "Some Early Heretics," written with his characteristic judgment and penetration. A second article, by Dr. Hookyas, on the Ethics of Jesus, has, like the former, something overstrained in its interpretations. "The English of the Revised Version" comes in for some well-merited criticism from R. B. Drummond. Elizabeth Blackwell continues the discussion of "Medicine and Morality" in an admirable spirit. "Hellenic Thought and Modern Problems" is a suggestive article. "Theism and Atheism as Moral Influences," "judged as mere work, not as mere woman's work," is rather superficial. But the editor's article on Dean Stanley is wholly admirable, and the book notices are written with the usual discrimination.

THE Popular Science Monthly for November presents to its readers a feast of good things. We regret that space permits us this week only to give the titles of some of the articles. Herbert Spencer continues his series under the title of "The Industrial Type of Society." "A Half-Century of Science," by Sir John Lubbock, begun in this number, will be concluded in the next. "The Available Energy of Nature" is the title of an article by Sir William Thompson. "The Duration of Human Life," by M. De Solaville, is a paper of much interest. Edward C. Towne contributes an article on "American Climate and Character," in which he says: "The climate of America is as much better than that of England as American civilization is more advanced on the broad level of the common people. It would double the character of England in every respect to have the climate of America." Other articles, with the "Editor's Table," "Literary Notices," etc., make a most attractive number.

THE Catholic World for November opens with an article on "The Sentiment of English Radicalism," by A. F. Marshall. It denounces English Bradlaughism as "a self-devouring plague," and declares that it can be successfully opposed only "by that highest philosophy, that most refining of all sciences, which is summed up in one word, Catholicism." Hugh P. McElrhone, in "Catholic Musings on Tennyson's 'In Memoriam,'" says that "poem contains more sentences that will live as classical than any other poem written in this century, and perhaps more than all his other productions together." J. R. G. Hassard contributes a paper on "A Jesuit in Disguise. The Yorktown Centennial Celebration is the subject of an article by Right Rev. J. J. Keane, D.D. This magazine has this month a table of contents of thirteen articles.

THE International Review for November has a decidedly literary flavor. It opens with the second part of August Langel's "Victor Hugo," which completes an excellent estimate of that great French man of letters. Part second of William E. Baggs' review of Mr. Atkinson on the "Solid South" is also given. J. Brander Matthews has a critical article upon "The Plays of M. Octave Feuillet." Dr. W. A. Hammond discusses "The Punishability of the Insane" in a manner to interest not only the medical profession, but intelligent people generally. The other articles are "Our Exports of Breadstuffs," by Richard H. Edmunds, and "An Arcadian Governor," by James Grant Wilson.

THE North American Review for November presents the views of Lyman Trumbull, Judge Cooley, B. F. Butler, and Prof. Theodore W. Dwight on "Presidential Inability." "England's Hereditary Republic" is the title of a significant article contributed by the Marquis of Blandford. George F. Hoar furnishes a statesmanlike article on "The Appointing Power." Colonel Ingersoll discusses "The Christian Religion," and replies to Judge Black's strictures very effectively. It is announced that a reply will soon appear in the Review.

A SEVENTH series of Mr. Chadwick's sermons is being offered to the reading public in neat and available pamphlet form, issued by James Miller, 779 Broadway, New York, and also for sale by Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, Boston. The opening number, already printed, treats of the broad problem of "Origin and Destiny" in a style replete with Mr. Chadwick's well-known grace and candor, as well as the generally prevalent energy of modern thought in probing for the essential roots of this mighty theme.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

WITH reference to the struggle in Switzerland between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, the Christian World says:—

It is one of the curses entailed by the unnatural union so long subsisting between the two that the civil power cannot understand the propriety of permitting the spiritual functions of the Church to be discharged without the interference of the government. The Church is reduced to the necessity of becoming a slave, more or less distinctly avowed, of the rulers for the time being. . . . The case is more or less similar in both communions. Neither Protestants nor Roman Catholics have any rational prospect of regaining their religious authority, while consenting to eat the bread doled out to them by the State. Let men of the communions imitate the example set many years ago by Gaussen, Merle d'Aubigné, César Malan, and their brave comrades at Geneva, and more recently by the members of the Free Churches of the Cantons of Vaud and of Neuchâtel. Let them abandon the church edifices and endowments, even if morally theirs; and let their pastors throw themselves for their support upon the free-will offering of their flocks, instead of accepting the annual grants reluctantly made by the cantonal governments.

There is a lesson in the above extract to be commended to those who are striving in this country, not only to maintain the slight existing relations between the Church and State, but to increase them. The union of Church and State is a sword that may cut both ways. If the churches in this country are wise for their own interests, they will give up all thought of trying to secure, directly or indirectly, the authority or favor of government on their side, and throw themselves with confidence on the genuine American principle of free and voluntary popular support. The church that cannot live without the governmental pap of chaplaincies, remitted taxation, and publicly authorized days for "fasting and prayer," can be easily spared.

CONCERNING the recent appointment of committees, representing the Orthodox Congregational churches, to revise the creed, catechism, and confessions of faith, a Christian Union correspondent speaks as follows:—

Is there to be a new creed for the Congregational churches? Is there need for one? What shall be done with it, when prepared? We are not a church, but churches. Why should not each draw up its own statement of belief as formerly? Do we not hold "for substance of doctrine" the belief common to all the evangelical churches? Is it not the essential spirit of Congregationalism that it is truly Catholic?

THE Advance, on the other hand, thinks that the commission might do worse than adopt the following creed sent to it by Rev. J. G. Merrill, but thereby shows itself not very far advanced in the current of liberal Orthodoxy:—

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in God the Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, and in God the Holy Spirit, one God whose name is Love. I believe in our need of God, our weakness, and our sin, in a New Life, in sin forgiven through Jesus' death, in bliss eternal for all who love the Lord, and for those who will not love him everlasting woe. I believe in a life of love to God and men, in the Lord's Day, the Lord's Book, the Lord's House, and the Lord's Supper, in Baptism with water and by the Spirit, in the Church universal and the Communion of the Saints, in the coming of the King and the glory of the King.

THE Catholic Review scents trouble in Italy. It foresees a possibly speedy crisis in the contest between the papal power and the Italian government, but, like a faithful Catholic, thinks the temporal power will necessarily have the worst of it. Hear the Cassandra voice out of the Middle Ages:—

There is something bad brewing in Italy, and has been for some time. The danger, though immediately menacing the Holy See, is of far more consequence to the actual government of Italy. Wheresoever the Holy Father goes there is the Holy See. Ubi Petrus ibi Ecclesia. The revolution that is now thundering at the doors of the Vatican may enter in and dispossess the Pope for the time being, as it has already dispossessed him of the temporal dominion of Rome. He will move and carry the Church with him. The revolution will stay, and destroy the Italian monarchy. For what is the Vatican, what is Rome, what is all Italy to the Church of God or to the Supreme Pontiff? Were the Adriatic to sweep over the Italian peninsula to-morrow and blot it out forever, with all its mixed memories of glory and shame, of sanctity and sin, the Church of God would go on as ever. The Catholic Church is universal, and tied to no plot on earth.

THE Independent does not believe in that rationalistic interpretation of the doctrine of prayer, which, though the thing prayed for is not granted, professes that the prayer is answered by something else and something better being granted. It says:—

An answer to a prayer, in the accepted usage of the word, is not a mere response to it, of whatever nature it may happen; but it is a granting of the prayer. And it is, moreover, the granting of the very petition presented, and not of some other and different blessing. It is hard to see, then, what is really gained when, in response to the query why God does not hear and answer a certain prayer, we are told that he has answered it in a higher and better way than the petitioner imagined. It reminds one too strongly of that bewildering and disingenuous "cannot" of old-time theological controversy, which, when boldly challenged by common-sense as plainly irreconcilable with free moral agency, dexterously turned its Janus face, and was seen only as an invincible "will not." There are not a few plain people who deny now, as then, the expediency and even the right of such theological legerdemain, even in the interest of a sound form of words.

The Independent prefers the other horn of the dilemma,—namely, that God is not able or does not think it best to answer some prayers,—and, of course, is therefore prepared to abandon or rationalize away (which it could hardly consistently do) certain very definite Scripture texts on the efficacy of prayer.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DEFINITIONS OF RELIGION.—The true religious philosophy of an imperfect being is not a system or creed, but, as Socrates taught, an infinite search or approximation.—MacKay, Progress of the Intellect.

Shelley defines religion to be "man's perception of his relations to the principles of the universe."

The following definitions of religion are quoted by Theodore Parker:—

"A likeness to God according to our ability."—Plato.

"Reverence for the moral law as of divine command."—Kant.

"The union of the finite and the infinite."—Schelling.

"Faith in a moral government of the world."—Fichte.

"Morality becoming conscious of the free universality of its concrete essence."—Hegel. This is interpreted to mean "perfect mind becoming conscious of itself."

"Immediate self-consciousness of the absolute self-dependence of all the finite on the infinite."—Schleiermacher.

"The whole duty of man, comprehending in it justice, charity, and sobriety."—Jeremy Taylor.

"Religion is a state of sentiment toward God."—F. W. Newman.

"Religion is the culminating meridian of morals."—James Martineau.

REV. A. D. MAYO, who has travelled extensively in the South, observing the school system and its needs there, gave a lecture in Boston last week, in which he stated that he had examined all kinds of schools, from the negro primary in Louisiana to the University of Virginia. North and South have been prevented by the war from understanding each other. Education, as planned a hundred years ago in the South, was checked by the course of political leaders, who supported the policy of special schools for young men, to train them for public service, and for young women, to fit them for society. Critical is the situation in the South now. Northern adventurers and Romish priests are opposing its development. Help must be given by the North. Friendly relations must be cultivated with the teachers and young people of the South; and, as far as possible, people of the North should make themselves familiar with those of the South. Southern white children are as bright as white children anywhere. The negro has done remarkably well since his emancipation, and will do better, if the whites will have patience with him. Young women of the South are eager for a higher education. Normal schools and trained teachers are the first educational need of the South, and then is wanted the great uplifting work of teachers in the common schools. Higher schools and universities will come later. Mr. Mayo appealed for the forgetting of all the animosities of the past, and hoped that some generous and wealthy friend of education would found a Smith or Vassar College at Atlanta.

A NEW YORK correspondent of the Advertiser says of the late Dr. Holland: "With curious nicety of calculation, his name was estimated among his business associates to be good for twenty thousand subscribers or readers; but the Century has probably gotten quite independent of such personal strength, and will be carried on, from its pleasant new office, as well and ably as ever. Whatever differences of opinion there may have been as to his literary powers, the opinion is conclusive that his writing has always been in the interest of what is good and pure."

In reply to the inquiry of the Catholic Standard, why, in view of James' direction, Protestants do not "have recourse to anointing in the case of themselves or their friends when sick," the Independent says: "It is because of the progress of science (science! yes, science,—hateful word) since the days of James. Medical science has shown a better treatment than with oil. The medical profession has been created by Christianity. We now pray with and for the sick, and call the doctor. That is the plain truth." The Independent's reason for preferring the scientific rather than the oil treatment is good; but, from a Christian stand-point, the consistency of disobeying the positive directions of James is not so evident. The claim that "the medical profession has been created by Christianity" was intended probably to carry with it the implication that the believer who disregards the directions of James for the skill of the doctor still follows Christian methods. There is one serious objection to the claim: it is not true.

CANON LIGHTFOOT says that "hospitals were the creation of Christianity." But the fact is there were hospitals in India before the Christian era; and Prescott, speaking of the civilization of the ancient Mexicans, says: "I must not omit to notice here an institution, the introduction of which in the Old World is ranked among the beneficent fruits of Christianity. Hospitals were established in the principal cities for the cure of the sick, and the permanent refuge of the disabled soldier; and surgeons were placed over them, who were so far better than those in Europe, says an old chronicler, that they did not protract the cure in order to increase the pay."

THOMAS JEFFERSON ON CHURCH AND STATE.—Thomas Jefferson, when President, was applied to by a reverend gentleman to issue his proclamation, recommending that a day be set apart for fasting and prayer. He refused, and, in refusing, said: "I consider the Government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from meddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises. . . . But it is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe, a day of fasting and prayer. That is, I should indirectly assume to the United States an authority over religious exercises, which the Constitution has directly precluded them from. It must be meant, too, that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it; not of fine and imprisonment, but with some degree of proscription, perhaps in public opinion. And does the change in the nature of the penalty make the recommendation less a law of conduct for those to whom it is directed? I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercise, its discipline, or its doctrines; nor of the religious societies, that the general government should be invested with the power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises; the enjoining them, an act of discipline. Every religious society has a right to determine for itself the times for these exercises, and the objects proper for them, according to their own particular tenets; and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it. . . . Every one must act according to the dictates of his own reason, and mine tells me that civil powers alone have been given to the President of the United States, and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents."

PROFESSOR HUXLEY, in sketching the rise and progress of paleontology for the last half-century, has admirably summed up the whole fabric of the science in two propositions. The first is that fossils are the remains of animals and plants. The second is that the stratified rocks in which they are found are sedimentary deposits. From these two propositions, which are generally received as present axioms of science, the professor draws three conclusions. The first is that living matter has existed upon the earth for a vast length of time, certainly millions of years.

The second is that, during this lapse of time, the forms of living matter have undergone repeated changes, the effect of which has been that the animal and vegetable population at any one period of the earth's history contained species which did not exist at some antecedent period, and ceased to exist at some subsequent period. The third is that, in the case of mammals and of some reptiles, in which no one type can be followed through a considerable extent of geological time, the series of different forms by which this type is represented at successive intervals of the time is exactly such as it would be if they had been produced by the gradual modification of the earliest form of the series. These are facts of the history of the earth, guaranteed by as good evidence as any facts in civil history. In Professor Huxley's opinion, these truths point to two hypotheses. The first is that, in the course of the history of the earth, innumerable species of animals and plants have come into existence independently of one another innumerable times. The other hypothesis is that successive species of animals and plants have arisen, the later by the gradual modification of the earlier. This is the hypothesis of evolution, and, Professor Huxley adds, the palaeontological discoveries of the last decade are so completely in accordance with the requirements of this hypothesis that, if it had not existed, the palaeontologists would have had to invent it. Fifty years hence, he notably says, whoever undertakes to record the progress of palaeontology will note the present time as the epoch in which the law of succession of the forms of the higher animals was determined by the observation of palaeontological facts. Just as Steno and Cuvier, from their knowledge of the empirical laws of co-existence of the parts of animals, were able to conclude the whole animal from a part, so the knowledge of the law of the succession of forms has enabled their successors to reach out from one or two terms of such a succession to the whole series. Thus, Professor Huxley and his associates have divined the existence of forms of life of which, perhaps, no trace remains, at epochs of inconceivable remoteness in the past.—Boston Herald.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Banner of Light says: "In the Resources and Natural Wealth of Arizona, by R. J. Hinton, editor of the San Francisco Post, we find the statement that 'the Indians of Arizona are all Spiritualists. We are acquainted with the Yumas and Mohaves, and our acquaintance verifies the above statement. . . . They tell me their Indian doctors can talk to the spirits of the departed: one told me he heard the spirits talking to the Indian doctor: he said that the doctor stood away a little from them, and then away a little further were the spirits, that the spirits said they had better corn and melons and Mesquit beans than they (mortals) had, and did not want to come back.'"

PERSONAL ITEMS.

New editions of four of M. J. Savage's books have appeared this fall.

Moody and Sankey are in London, holding services at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

MARK TWAIN's new volume will be called the Prince and the Pauper.

EMPEROR WILLIAM and Prince Bismarck have offered the Pope an asylum at Cologne.

A PORTRAIT model of Guiteau has been placed in the Chamber of Horrors, at Mme. Tussaud's exhibition.

RICHARD GRANT GILDER will succeed the late Dr. Holland in the editorial control of the Century Magazine.

DR. EMILY POPE has been chosen Secretary of the Social Science Association, in the place of F. B. Sanborn.

PAUL B. DU CHAILLU's Land of the Midnight Sun will be published this month, profusely illustrated, by Harper & Brothers.

Gov. ROBERTS, of Texas, will soon publish a book, in which will be presented the advantages and attractions of the "Lone Star State."

The address of President Arthur at Yorktown last week was brief, comprehensive, and felicitous, and all the papers unite in praising it.

JOAQUIN MILLER and A. C. Wheeler have been arrested, at the instance of McKee Rankin, in the dispute over the authorship of the Danites.

C. D. B. MILLS will probably visit New England next month, lecturing in several places. He wins golden opinions wherever he speaks.

MISS MYRA KINGSBURY, who has been preaching in Vermont the past year, has been ordained as a Universalist minister at Sheshequin, Pa.

QUEEN VICTORIA's private fortune amounts to $80,000,000, and her annual income is $3,250,000. She was a poor girl till she ascended the throne.

DR. SIMS says there was no physician who could have saved President Garfield's life, and that Scoville will get no aid from experts on this point.

THE mother of Alexander Smith, described in his novel, Alfred Hogart's Household, has just died at Killmarnock, Scotland, at the age of seventy-five.

GUITEAU says that he is not actually insane. He is only "legally insane," because it was the Lord's will that he should "remove" President Garfield by shooting him.

DR. HELEN W. WEBSTER, professor of anatomy and physiology, and resident physician at Vassar College for eight years, has resigned, and resumed her practice at New Bedford.

A ST. PETERSBURG astrologer, who has cast the horoscope of Alexander III., says he will die in 1944, at ninety-nine years of age, and when he shall have reigned sixty-four years.

THOSE who heard the course of lectures in this city by Mr. Charles Ellis in the winter of 1877 will be pleased to learn that he will lecture at Parker Memorial next Sunday forenoon.

MRS. JENNIE MCGRAW FISKE, wife of Prof. Willard Fiske, has left to Cornell University $200,000 as a library fund, $50,000 for the care of the McGraw Building, and $40,000 to build a students' hospital.

MRS. GARFIELD announces that the work of producing an account of General Garfield's life she will cause "to be done at the earliest practicable time, after that careful consideration and preparation so manifestly necessary."

MR. J. VAN PRAET, of the royal household of the King of the Belgians, announces that Mr. H. M. Stanley, the African traveller, has suffered from bilious fever, but is now in excellent health and spirits, having quite recovered his strength.

MRS. ANNA L. DIGGS, of Lawrence, Kansas, gave an admirable discourse at the Parker Memorial last Sunday morning on the "Free Religious Movement." The Liberals of Kansas can justly feel proud of this representative from their State.

CHARLES DARWIN is in luck. The Illustrated London News states that Mr. Erasmus A. Darwin has left a personal estate exceeding £158,000 in value, and that all his real estate and three-sixths of the personal will go to his brother, Mr. Charles Robert Darwin.

HON. E. B. MORGAN, of Aurora, N.Y., who died last week, was a member of Congress at the time of Preston Brooks' assault upon Senator Sumner; and he, with Mr. Maxey, of the same district, interfered in Mr. Sumner's behalf, and raised him as he sank fainting under the blows.

"HERESY hunts," says the Springfield Republican, alluding to Rev. Dr. Thomas' formal complaint against Rev. Dr. Parkhurst of slander and lying, "resemble bear-hunts in one respect: the excitement is appreciably increased when the game turns round and begins hunting the hunters."

REV. DR. SEE, who was disciplined by the presbytery of Newark recently, for inviting women to preach in his pulpit, is said to have turned Swedenborgian. How a little "discipline" on any point of belief or policy does serve to revolutionize the entire theology of some ministers, always before thought to be sound in the faith!

THE Chicago Tribune, in an editorial concerning one of the lectures of Mrs. Amelia Bate of Milwaukee, says: "We hail the advent of such a lecturer as Mrs. Bate as the sign of that good time coming when the sphere of woman, now so much discussed, will be enlarged in the direction indicated by her admirable discourse."

FRANK HATTON has taken the prize in England for the best original investigation involving gas analysis. He is son of Joseph Hatton, an English novelist and journalist, is but twenty years old, and is the leading British authority on the action of gases on bacteria. He has been sent out to North Borneo and the Malay Archipelago on a scientific exploration.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may, at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

All letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to "Free Religious Association," at the office.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
 " 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
 " 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
 " 52 " " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

Send all orders for the above to GEORGE CHAINEY, 51 Fort Avenue (Roxbury), Boston, Mass.

Vol. I. is now complete, and has been handsomely bound in cloth. Price $1.00.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll says:—

"Mr. ChaNEY is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the Church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whitened sepulchre of superstition."

INDEX

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE most remarkable feature of the recent election in Prussia is the triumph of the Liberals, and especially those who are obnoxious to Bismarck.
The Progressist press is jubilant. The Zeitung says, "The result of the elections is a victory of constitutional principles over dictatorship and the persecuting spirit of clericalism."

PEOPLE are coming to the United States from the Old World at the rate of seven hundred thousand a year, the larger portion from Germany.
From Canada alone, nearly nine hundred arrived in New York the past month. It cannot be doubted that this country is destined to be the most populous nation on the face of the earth. But will increase of population contribute to increase of prosperity, freedom, and happiness?

THE dedication of the Channing Memorial Church at Newport, R.I., on the 19th ult., was a very pleasant and successful affair, although some of the notables advertised to be present failed to be there in person; but many of these, Whittier, Alcott, G. W. Curtis, E. E. Hale, R. W. Emerson, A. B. Alcott, Longfellow, and others, testified by letter their sympathy with the occasion. James Freeman Clarke, Robert Collyer, Dr. Furness, Dr.
Putnam, Dr. Hedge, Dr. Farley, Mrs. Lowe, and the pastor of the church, M. K. Schermerhorn, took active part in the appropriate memorial services.

THE Collector of the Port at Toronto has taken upon himself the responsibility of confiscating Paine's Age of Reason and a little work made up of extracts from Voltaire, entitled Pocket Theology, on the ground that they are blasphemous, immoral, and indecent. Not a few of the clergy applaud the act, and it is warmly defended by the Toronto Mail. But the Globe, the most influential journal in Canada, and nearly all the leading papers of the Dominion, unqualifiedly condemn the government official for his inquisitorial work, and it is now stated that he exceeded his instructions and will not be sustained in his arbitrary act.

OF A. S. Trude, of Chicago, the acute and eloquent lawyer who is to defend Guiteau, a daily paper says: "His acquaintance with criminal law is such that he has frequently cleared criminals in cases where their guilt was undoubted." In these cases, he has, of course, defeated the very object of the law, defrauded justice, and injured society.
What moral difference is there between the use of talent to secure the acquittal of a known mur-derer, and the use of strength and ingenuity to facilitate his escape from prison and the country?
In this age of revision, does not the practice of the criminal lawyer need a little revising to make his character and conduct conform to the principles of common justice, and contribute to the security of life and property?

MR. GEORGE T. ANGELL wants to organize an anti-vivisection society in Massachusetts. He says:
"I would like to have all vivisection prohibited in this Commonwealth, except by persons designated by and holding permits from our State Board of Health; and all vivisection without anæsthetics absolutely prohibited, except in cases clearly specified and by special permit of our State Board of Health." Scientific men, physicians, and many intelligent unprofessional people are in favor of vivisection in the interests of humanity. It was indorsed by the Medical Congress held in London last summer. Yet the infliction of unnecessary pain upon animals is a crime; and vivisection should be practised only by men of character and skill, and under conditions that will yield the desired results with the least possible suffering. A society organized to promote this object might accomplish much good.

MR. GLADSTONE, replying last Thursday to an address presented to him, contrasted the opinions and policy of Daniel O'Connell and Parnell, and said, "The point is whether Ireland is to be governed by laws made by Parliament, or by laws known to nobody, and written nowhere except in the brains of a few persons and enforced by an illegal, arbitrary, and self-appointed association which sought to override, by organized attempts, the free will of Irishmen." He concluded by declaring that the people who had been urged to pay rent were coming forward with their money, while the Land Court was working well, no fewer than thirty thousand applications having been issued under the Land Act, leading him to anticipate peace and prosperity. He thinks the people, so far as they attempt to follow the advice of the Land League leaders, act against their own interests. It may turn out that Gladstone is to-day Ireland's best friend.

A PUBLIC session of the International League of Peace and Liberty, which was formed in Geneva in 1867, was held in that city September 26. Letters were read from Gladstone, Garibaldi, Victor Hugo, Aurelio Safti, the friend of Mazzini, Alfred H. Love, of Philadelphia, and others. Charles Lemonnier, President of the League, and an excellent representative of French Radicalism, gave an able address, in which he advocated, as a means of putting an end to war and substituting permanent peace for an armed truce, simultaneous and proportional disarmament by all nations, international arbitration, and a federation of the free peoples of Europe. "There is," said he, "nothing to prevent nations already free, from forming, one nation with another, treaties of permanent arbitration for a duration of fifteen or twenty years. The United States are ready to conclude such treaties with all the governments of Europe which are willing to do so. The International League of Peace and Liberty and the Universal Peace Union of Philadelphia have already taken steps to bring about such a treaty between the American Republic and the French Republic. President Hayes did all that lay in his power to aid us, President Garfield was friendly, and we hope that President Arthur will imitate these two glorious examples. France, however, is not the only nation with which the United States may make such a treaty. Why may not the first treaty of permanent arbitration be between the American Union and the Helvetic Confederacy?"

THE Ninth Congress of Women was held in Buffalo, N.Y., three days last week, and was in every way a success. This Association, while not making Woman's Suffrage a sine qua non, is yet one of the most successful of all movements for the advancement of women. Its essays and lectures are always on timely and useful topics, the results of the best thought and experience of the most cultured women of America. Massachusetts has reason to be proud of the array of feminine talent which represented her in this Congress in the persons of Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Mrs.
Livermore, Miss Eastman, Kate Gannett Wells, and others. Miss Eastman somewhat surprised some of the temperance people by her views on the question of prohibition. Mrs. Wells, in the Sunday Courier, reports her as making a logical and brilliant argument "in favor of the universal and justifiable instinct against prohibitory law. The law being the deputed power of the individual, its province is no greater than the province of the individual who made the law. The law has no right to intrude on a person's individuality, but to protect that individuality from intrusion." Mrs. Ednah Dean Cheney's lecture on the "Ideal Home" was highly appreciated. Mrs. Chase, of Rhode Island, spoke on "Factory Girls," their advantages and disadvantages. Other papers read were on topics of importance to all women; and we hope to see some of the best of these given at length, for the benefit of the women who found it impossible to attend the Congress.

NATURE'S MORALS.

According to the theology that has been most dominant in the Christian Church, nature, no less than man, is under a curse: It "fell" with man from the condition of goodness in which it had been created, shared his degradation, became rebellious to divine law, and from being the purveyor of delights was transformed into a source of the direst evils. Falling because of man's temptation, it became in turn man's tempter and Nemesis. Everything natural has been regarded as not only depraved, but depraving. To be in a state of nature was to be, by consequence, in a state of wickedness. Nor was there any chance of escape from this state except by a supernatural intervention of saving power. All the depravity, all the sinfulness, was nature's. All the mercy, all the goodness, was outside of and above nature. The only hope of man was to discard nature and receive by direct gift from Heaven the supernatural aid termed, in ecclesiastical parlance, "grace." This contrast and antagonism between the two principles of evil and good, as represented under the terms "nature" and "grace," has appeared also in other religions besides the Christian.

In no proper sense, however, is there any conflict between nature and goodness. Science in later times has greatly extended the realm of nature, and shown no such sharp division in the universe as this old scheme of theology alleged to exist. Science has written a new and more authentic Book of Genesis. It has relegated the Hebrew story of the Garden of Eden and of the creation and fall of man to the fertile land of primeval myths and fables. It has discovered that this earth, which the old theology made the centre of the drama of the universe, is but an infinitesimal speck of dust in an obscure corner of space, compared with the gigantic orbs and the vast systems of suns and planets that are coursing through the visible and the invisible and unfathomable heavens. And, therefore, it raises the question, even admitting a conflict between "nature" and "grace," whether the "grace" that first failed in its creative plan and then summoned a God to die for the salvation of a puny race of beings on this small atom of a globe, and did not accomplish even that for all of them, could possibly be adequate for all the moral needs in this vast realm of nature, stretching in every direction through all the inconceivable infinities of space.

In fact, in a strictly scientific sense, nature includes man. She has nurtured him, and carries him in her bosom. Even if we are yet reluctant to admit what many scientific men of the first authority now believe, that in nature are the forces which originally produced man, and which have reared him to the height of commanding intelligence and power he holds to-day, we cannot escape admitting that science has been proving, in opposition to the old theologies, that nature is not man's enemy, but his friend. Science not only traces both to one source, but she finds one law and purpose and life running through both, linking them together as if by kindred blood and to a kindred destiny. If with man's advent on the earth any power came with him, as most certainly there did, giving him capacity to rise into higher realms of existence than had been possible to any species of brute creatures in the line before him, nature, surely, cannot be charged as having been hostile to this achievement, but is rather to be credited with carrying in herself the preparatory conditions of it, and with working persistently toward it through all her previous activities. That is, nature from the beginning has an intelligent and moral aim. She was not working for material ends alone. She was working toward personal consciousness and character; toward a finite being, who could consciously grasp her aim and the fundamental principles of the universe itself, and incorporate them in the spirit and activities of personal life. Man was the culmination of nature's processes. In him, her intent was revealed; her purpose, adhered to through vast epochs of conflict and struggle, was achieved. In man, nature blossomed into person.

In the light, therefore, of science and of a religious philosophy resting on a scientific basis, it is not possible to separate from nature any goodness or any good destiny that may be possible to man. Nature herself is seeking man's best interests. In the womb of her energies, she carries the immortal seed of everything indicated by the words goodness, virtue, grace,—all moral preservatives, all saving providences, all redeeming and health-restoring appliances that man has ever found of avail. Nature and grace are at one. Nature includes grace, and prepares the way for it. Not depravity, but integrity, is in natural law and process. Good-will and ultimate benefit are ingrained in the very constitution of things, and give the aim to nature in her long pathway.

It is all-important, however, to remember that nature is to be defined by its largest and highest aim, else will this philosophy be false in theory and pernicious in practice. It were better, indeed, to hold to the old theological idea of a conflict between nature and goodness (for that, at least, kept the moral side of life uppermost) than to place the law of life in the material side of nature alone. This is the peril that was concealed in the philosophy of Rousseau,—a man whose genius was often as erratic as it was fascinating. He was needed to make his indignant protest against the caricatures of nature and against the maiming and emasculation of her powers which the popular Christian theology produced. He saw truly that nature under the ban of the Church, and believed to be under the curse of the Almighty, did not have a fair chance. It was his aim to restore her to her rightful place and service in human life. But, in this needed office, he went too far, and affirmed too much of the sovereignty of the natural instincts and passions of men, declaring that barbarism would be better than the existing civilization, because it would be a return to the simplicity of nature and to a liberty denied by the traditional customs and laws of society. The evil results of such a philosophy are apparent in our own day in theories that give license to sexual passion and assail the marriage institution and attack the rights of property and decry civil government.

In opposition, therefore, to a philosophy of nature of this type, it must be said that it is not nature in its instincts that gives the law of liberty to man, but nature in its moral aim. All the natural instincts and appetites are in themselves true and pure, and are not to be reviled as profane or unclean. But they do not themselves furnish the law for their own best guidance and service. They give impulse and direction to be followed, but they have not the capacity for self-control, and do not fix the goal at which they shall stop. Reason and conscience must come in to give government to the instincts and appetites,—enlightened conscience, for conscience may be fanatical, and needs the guiding light of rational thought and knowledge. It is not nature on the material and instinctive side—or not there alone—that gives the authoritative law to human life, but nature as it rises in man himself into reason and moral choice and benevolence. In a word, it is nature informed and vitalized with an intelligent moral aim. To accept nature in its instincts as master is to go down to the level of the brute creation. To accept nature in its rational and moral aim as master is to rise to a joint sovereignty in administering the government of the universe.

LIBERALISM.

The word "Liberal" is applied in the Old World to political principles and parties, and in this country to unorthodox religious views. It is here used by, or applied to those who have discarded the Christian theology. In the large class thus designated are persons of every degree of culture and social standing, of different tastes, and of opposite views, on almost every subject outside the realm of demonstrated knowledge. Some there are who, although they have outgrown their former belief in dogmatic theology and the infallible authority of the Bible, yet feel an undefinable reverence for the Christian name, and derive satisfaction from the thought that this book, in which their fathers and mothers believed through all the tribulation of life and in the solemn hour of death, is inspired at least in a general way and to a greater extent than any other work. The name "Christian" has for them a fascination, and they emphasize the importance of distinguishing between the primitive religion of Jesus and the theology preached in his name.

Others reject, without qualification, the Christian religion considered as an extra-human or exceptional element introduced into the life of the race, yet recognize it as a great system that has been evolved in the providence of God to suit man's condition in different stages of his development, and in this age should be interpreted in the light of the largest knowledge, with the most liberal construction and in the most generous and catholic spirit. They are willing to permit the name "Christian" to stand for the highest thought and the noblest work of the age, the grandeur and glory of which they maintain are due in no inconsiderable degree to the powerful impulse received from the character and teachings of Jesus, which they think have been a most important factor in the progress of man. Others still there are who, rejecting not only the miraculous element of Christianity, but supernaturalism in every form, yet concede to Christianity, in common with Buddhism and Mohammedanism, an important place in the evolution of society and the growth of civilization, and, instead of regarding it with disdain, view it as a religion which, with all its imperfections, has persisted because it has represented man's best thought and aspiration, from which it grew as naturally as the flower grows from the seed, the soil, and the air. To others, Christianity appears an unmitigated evil, a superstition which, although it had its origin in innocent ignorance and credulity, has been the greatest obstacle to human progress that man has had to encounter.

Others still, although they belong to the class that has no conception of modern thought and that the science of the age is leaving far behind, think Christianity is an imposture, devised and designed by crafty men to enslave the human mind and to enable them to control it in their interests.

Some Liberals have a firm belief in, and a reverent regard for the name of God, and a strong and to them precious belief in a future life; while others are doubtful of the existence of an intelligence that directs the on-goings of nature, and are sceptical as to the continued conscious identity of man after bodily dissolution. Many are forced to take the position of Spencer, that matter and mind are both phenomenal existences and manifestations of eternal self-existent power, which is revealed to us in consciousness, and that we know only as matter and force; which in itself is utterly inscrutable, and can be known only as it is related to us and colored by consciousness; and that, although there is supreme power unlimited in time and space, it is, owing to the organic limitations of the constitution of man, unknown and unknowable; and that, therefore, the worship of an anthropomorphic God, notwithstanding it has a basis in man's undeveloped nature, and has been, and with many is yet, a necessity, has, in "pure reason," no foundation whatever; that, while the wonder and awe regarding the eternal mystery of being must continue unsolved and insoluble, the prayers to, and the emotions of gratitude and love now lavished on God will, as the mind outgrows its superstitions and fears, be bestowed upon man.

But there are others who think they are the radicals, who have no patience whatever with such words as the "Absolute" and the "Unknowable," and regard their use as a species of temporizing and as evidence of a disposition to fraternize with theologians and to compromise with theology. They declare that nature is the only existence, and that matter is the sufficient cause of all phenomena, and that he who refers to an unknowable or to a power behind nature has not yet outgrown the swaddling-clothes of his intellectual infancy.

Some there are who have acquainted themselves with the profound and erudite works pertaining to Christianity written during the past twenty years, while others have not advanced one step beyond Voltaire and Paine, and are actually offended by a suggestion that the works of these writers do not comprise the best thought of this generation. Some Liberals cling to the word religion as pleasant to their ears and dear to their hearts, and with such it represents whatever is grand in thought and endeavor; while others say, with Hobbes, that the only difference between religion and superstition is that the former is superstition in fashion, while the latter is religion out of fashion.

Some Liberals accept Spiritualism as a part of their philosophy, and not a few are as bigoted in their adherence to it as any orthodox Christians can be in their adherence to their creeds. Others are so unreasonable in their opposition to Spiritualism that they cannot bear to see anything pertaining to the subject in the books or papers which they read. Some call themselves "infidels," and are so tenacious of the name that, in utter disregard of its classical meaning, and with no consideration for the education and tastes of others, they construe unwillingness to use this word by unbelievers as evidence of moral timidity or the sacrifice of truth to prudential considerations; while the great majority of Liberals have an aversion to the word "infidel," convinced that it does not define their position or represent their principles.

Some think that the most effective way to destroy superstition is to assail it directly, with merciless criticism. This is generally the view of those whose conversion to Liberalism is recent or has been sudden, and whose acquaintance with science, history, and human nature is superficial. Others think the work of criticism, although important and valuable, should be, in this age, secondary to the presentation of those affirmative principles, of that positive thought which must ultimately replace the teachings of theology and the creeds of the churches.

Several journals are published in this country, representing these different views and methods, and it must be confessed with regret that there is as much antagonism and as acrimonious a spirit manifested by some of these papers as are exhibited by the organs of sectarian Christianity. Some of these journals are as thoroughly fossilized as any denominational papers we have seen; and some of them disgrace journalism by their exhibitions of ignorance, by their coarseness, and their spirit of intolerance.

In view of these facts, a theoretical or nominal classification of Liberals, as George Jacob Holyoake suggested in a discourse delivered in this city, might be of advantage. We do not, of course, wish to see Liberals separated and organized into cliques, but terms employed that will enable all to understand the positions and principles of the various classes of Liberals. Some who call themselves Liberals, and references to whom by the religious press and pulpit are frequent, are persons with whom right-minded men and women want nothing to do.

And it is persons of this sort who get indignant at the suggestion of any classification which will make a distinction between them and those to whom the name "Liberal" may be properly applied; for it is by constant reference to the liberal thinkers of the age, and by their nominal association with men and women of character and worth, that they get a recognition which they do not deserve. When representatives of matured and scholarly thought find themselves classed with all sorts of cranks and self-styled "reformers" under the general name of Liberals, and find their names used in connection with the crudest thought and the wildest vagaries, with which they have not the slightest sympathy, it is but natural they should wish some more definite name in addition to the general term Liberal. The words atheist and agnostic are expressive, although they have only a negative meaning. The words deist, theist, materialist, and spiritualist mean something, although the views of many who are thus designated do not accord with the connotations of these words. The word Free Religionist is not very definite, and was not intended to be.

With as much difference of belief, diversity of character, and variety of taste as there are among Liberals, it is folly to expect they will all unite in a general organization, and the formation into separate bodies of these different classes is certainly not desirable. We can only hope that words will be adopted which will make such distinctions as are necessary to a fair understanding of the positions of those whose views are anti-Christian or extra-Christian, and that will prevent the confusion of thought which in the public mind associates the best thought of the age with all the fantasies, follies, and fanaticisms that pass current under the name of Liberalism. Meanwhile, organization on the broad plan of the Free Religious Association, which invites to its membership earnest men and women of every belief, and encourages discussion of religious problems from the standpoint of every thinker, is worthy of all encouragement.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

AN ARMED CHURCH IN A DISARMED STATE.

This is the title of the opening article in the Revue de Belgique for September, and the number is mainly devoted to considering how the State should treat the Church. Recent books by Minghetti and Curci are reviewed in the essay just referred to; and full evidence is given of the intolerant demands made by the Church of Rome, not only in the fourth century, but in the nineteenth. Especially important is the quotation of the declaration of the bishops of Belgium in 1815, that their Church would be oppressed and enslaved by such provisions in their national constitution as: "Freedom of opinion about religion is guaranteed to all. Equal protection is granted to all religious societies in the kingdom. All subjects are eligible to office without distinction in reference to religious belief. Public observance of any form of worship cannot be hindered, unless it disturbs the peace. The king will see that all religious bodies yield proper obedience to the State. Public instruction will be under the constant care of the government." This language may seem trite to us, but it shocked the bishops so much that they declare that the Catholic who swears to obey such a constitution is a traitor to the Church. Rome has made intolerance an article of faith, and it is attacking her to proclaim liberty of thought and worship. No one can doubt this who remembers how Pius IX. cursed those who thought that the Pope ought to reconcile himself to progress, liberalism, and modern civilization, or how much hostility the Roman Catholics in this country have shown to our free-school system, simply because it is so free. Rightly did Count Henry von Arnim maintain that, where the Romish priests and bishops are suffered to act independently of all control or supervision from the government, they in reality form an armed Church in a disarmed State.

We Americans may well, therefore, seriously consider the necessity of having it provided in the constitutions of all our States, as it is in that of Missouri, that "no property, real or personal, shall be exempt from taxation, except such as may be used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, to this State, to counties, or to municipal corporations within this State." There is gross injustice in obliging people who do not believe in churches to pay for keeping them up; but this is actually done wherever churches are exempted from taxation, since every cent which the churches are thus released from paying has to be taken from individual tax-payers, and these latter have to pay just so much more than they would do if there were no such exemption. Thus, the Church succeeds in making men who do not care for her pay for having her property protected. And, so long as the State does so much for the churches, we have certainly every right to see that they are carried on by priests and ministers who are as well entitled as possible to the contributions we are thus forced to make. Here, in Massachusetts, it would be perfectly just to enact, as was done in Belgium more than fifty years ago, and has been done recently in Germany, that no pastoral charge should be given to any man not properly educated and qualified.

That it is the right and duty of the German State to satisfy itself of the fitness of the priests for their posts has but just been admitted by the Pope, after a long struggle with the Emperor, of which an interesting account is given in one of the closing articles of this number of the Review. There we read how the so-called Kulturkampf began in 1873, with the famous Falk laws. These required that the bishops should swear allegiance to the State, that they should give the public officials notice of all nominations to church offices, and that every candidate for a parish should pass an examination by which the government could ascertain his fitness. The passage of such legislation, together with the expulsion of the Jesuits, provoked the Roman Catholics to call their Emperor a second Nero. Pius IX. took the same ground. Leo XIII., however, has been more politic; and there is good reason to hope that these laws, which were fully ratified by the parliament on the 26th of June last, will be acquiesced in, for the present at least, by all the ecclesiastics. We cannot but long to have such a struggle carried through successfully in the United States.

A third article of the Review presents an unusually interesting variation of this not to be neglected theme, by translating from De Amicis, a liberal author, of whom a full account is given in the note prefixed, a story called "A Great Day," and relating how a young Italian, who had been quarrelling with his father, mother, and sisters, because he opposed the claims of the Pope to temporal power, rushed home after the capture of Rome by Victor Emanuel, and assured his family that the royal troops had been welcomed by the priests and the devotees, and that the national flag waved from the windows of the Vatican, which was illuminated in joy like all the rest of the city. All the family rejoice together at hearing this; but scarcely is their festive dinner over, when a priest marches in. He is told the news, but answers with a wicked smile; "This is all false, fortunately." Then, the young man begs him to show some regret that the Church is not yet on good terms with the State. All the rest of the family join in this request. The priest refuses scornfully. At last, the master of the house bids him leave it. Then, the son casts himself into the arms of his father, who says, "You are pardoned."

These three articles are the characteristic ones, though we have also a little art criticism, a discussion as to whether education should be carried on according to the theory that truth comes from observation and experience, or according to that of its being created by the mind's spontaneous power, and an account by the Count d'Alviella of a trip through the White Mountains into Canada. The last article is brought into full harmony with the rest of the number by the mention of the fact that the students of the Roman Catholic College of Laval at Quebec, incorporated in 1852, are forbidden to visit public libraries or to subscribe for any periodical without permission. A church which still shows such hatred of mental liberty does not deserve to have her property taken care of gratuitously by the State. We are solemnly bound to protect our schools and our legislatures against ecclesiastical influence, not only by wise and severe laws, but by individual fidelity to what the Nation, in its excellent review of Parton's Voltaire, calls "that system of open protest against all religious acts in which a man does not believe, which in the long run is the only effective mode of attacking falsehood or of establishing truth." The Romish Church is not the only one whose tendency to limit mental culture and discourage independence we ought to protest against by open non-conformity.

F. M. HOLLAND.

"NOTHING TO SET UP CHURCH-KEEPING WITH."

The article by R. Hassall, in the Index of October 20, headed by the phrase of Mrs. Diggs, quoted above, suggests to the writer further considerations not altogether in sympathy with his conclusions. Mr. Hassall states emphatically his opinion that "Radicalism in theology has nothing whatever to set up church-keeping with," and instances the fact of the indifference to church life shown by those who have outgrown superstitious views of religion as proof of his position. Granted that advancing applications of the principles of mental freedom, rejection of all but verified truths, and sovereignty of present reason over past faiths, have stripped many ancient temples of every rag of outworn dogmas and obsolete service; granted that, as this process of denial and destruction goes on, these denuded temples attract, for the most part, fewer and fewer worshippers; and granted that, so far in the history of radical religion, the affirmations involved in these denials, the building predicted by this destruction, have not generally made themselves manifest in action: yet, in spite of these facts, so sweeping an assertion as Mr. Hassall's must not be allowed to pass without closer analysis of the conditions which have led him to make it.

And, first, Mr. Hassall's assertion is founded on what seems to the writer a total misconception of the office and function of the Church, both in its old and its possible new form. A radical cannot properly shrink the word "church" to the dimensions of a certain set of opinions once taught by a particular branch of the Church, any more than a Christian can properly dwarf the word "religion" to fit into his "little Jesus chapel," his one historic room in the great temple of human faith and love.

What has been the office of the Church in our recently past civilization? We must answer this question, must know what we have had in the past few generations, before we can get any idea of "what we shall have next."

The office of the Church of our immediate past, as I conceive it, has included four lines of service in human advancement:—

1st. It has aimed to teach fundamental truths in their relation to human conduct.

2d. It has aimed to stimulate and direct the moral sense in the line of development of personal character.

3d. It has aimed to relieve all forms of suffering in individual cases.

4th. It has aimed to give innocent and elevating social enjoyment.

Doubtless, a point could be traced out in the history of the Christian Church when society was so simple in its organization, and the connection between church activities and the finest thought and culture of the time was so vital, that the truth it taught was the highest known, the moral ideal it portrayed was the most perfect in existence, its charitable and social offices the best suited possible to the needs of the period. But, so far as the great body of the Christian Church is concerned, that point is passed. The great law of development of the complex from the simple has split its unitary and centralized power into many diversified interests. And that other law of the self-limitation of fixed forms of organization has eaten at its heart from the moment when its truth, morality, philanthropy, and social helpfulness lagged behind, instead of keeping pace with the advance army of human progress. Now, the college is no longer purveyor solely, or chiefly, to the pulpit. The devotees of many-sided and newly revealed truths seek many shrines of worship and labor. Now, the moral sense is stimulated and directed not solely or chiefly by the general church life. The growing complexity of human relations, and the new light thus thrown on old problems of duty, stir up a varied host of special reforms, each marshalling its separate teachers and students to a work of purification and consecrated effort. Now, philanthropy is changing its face and becoming preventive of bad conditions more than, as in the past, curative or ameliorative of individual suffering, and, consequently, dividing its work into different classes of investigators and administrators. Now, "society," technically so called, is so divided into "classes" and castes that the old "meeting-house" intimacy is gone, and one's neighbor, whether of pew or house, is no longer necessarily of one's "set."

In these changed conditions, the old form of church life is of course impossible, quite as impossible in many important respects to the orthodox believer as to the radical in religion. The great modern movements of intellectual advance cut into the exclusive churchly devotion of other days as much in the evangelical as in the free-thinking ranks. The great modern movements of separate reforms, the great non-sectarian charities, the great secular social influences, all create centres of superior attraction outside the orthodox as outside the liberal churches.

The Church, as a spiritual despotism holding all seekers for truth, and devotees of right, and brothers and sisters of charity, to a single consecration, has passed away as truly for the average Protestant Christian believer in hell as for the average "infidel" denier of immortality.

What then? Is it true, as Mr. Hassall says and many others think, that nothing but the fears of superstitious believers hold them to the remnant of "churchism" left, and that remnant is doomed to disappear with advancing thought? Yes and no, I answer. Yes, if by "churchism" you mean only the half-rotten form of church life proved by its weakness to be no longer fitted for the home of rational thinkers and enlightened teachers of righteousness. No, if by "churchism" you mean the substance of Church relation. Let us refer again to the fourfold function of the Church as outlined above. We notice that it is not a school for the discovery, but for the practical personal application of truth. We notice that it is not a school for the perfecting of moral ideals and standards, but for the stimulation of the individual conscience in the direction of the highest ideals and standards known. We notice that it is not a school for the teaching of social science and the wisest methods of philanthropy and social help, so much as a stimulator of the feeling of human brotherhood and the personal element in charity which will not lose sight of the individual in the class. In short, the true Church is the force in human society which seeks to translate all knowledge of thought and action into individual character. What the wife and mother is to the home, it is to all specialized movements of education, reform, and philanthropy, namely, the nourisher of personal life. The distinctive office of the Church is not to teach "science," as some claim, or abstract philosophy, or any special set of opinions, or any particular kind of secular education, but to show how the great truths of all these stand related to each man's speck of life. Its distinctive office is not to carry on any particular moral reform, but to make a hospitable home for all, a home in which the drudgery of noble "causes" can be sweetened by healing visions of the righteous purpose which rules in human affairs, whether our little schemes of help fail or succeed. The distinctive office of the Church is not to seek to bring back beneath its roof its philanthropic children who have set up workshops of their own, in order to master more fully the problems of want and misery. Neither is its function that of competition with better equipped social forces in the line of theatrical and other entertainments, parties, and "shows" of various kinds. Its office is to fill all the newly discovered channels of brotherly help and friendly service with a warm tide of loving and constant feeling.

It is, however, true that, to do its distinctive work of personal character-building, the Church must often lead in the discovery of truth and its teaching, in all directions,—just as the house-mother adds to her legitimate work the bread-winning and the definite school-training, when necessity compels. And, since the decay of the old church forms has reacted upon secular education and organized specialties of benevolent work to their great injury, we have come to a point in religious development where many radicals and some liberal orthodox hold the duty of setting examples in these matters to be not only the temporary, but the permanent office of the rational Church of the future. I do not share this belief. The law of "every man to his specialty" rules us more and more. Ultimately, a sound educational science will dominate our schools; and we shall not need to try experiments or make up deficiencies in popular training, in religious societies like Professor Adler's. Ultimately, social science, pure and simple, will teach us all, better than any one man or radical Church can do, what is our duty toward our fellow-men. Ultimately, I believe, the Church, if it lives at all, must live as in the old time, not to discover truth, not to teach methods and systems of action upon the masses, so much as to inspire with devotion to the known truth and right the individual men and women it deals with. In country towns and small cities, this work includes, and must always include, a great deal of definite instruction. In large centres, on the contrary, almost all topics of knowledge are treated by their special masters, with whom the average, or even the extraordinary, Sunday preacher cannot compete.

But were all knowledge, in its acquirement and diffusion, provided for by special teachers, and all great movements of reform and benevolence in the skilled hands of their several experts, the application of this knowledge to personal conduct, the high emotional incentives to these reforms and charities, would still need to be provided for. And this fact makes the necessity for a "Church" in the future as imperative as it has been in the past. Changes of form it must experience. All new truth and new translations of duty must be worked into its coming life. But radicals are the last people on the wide earth to talk of spiritual poverty in this connection! Poor in material and mechanical home comforts we may be, since our religious parents have disinherited us for marrying a philosophy of belief, which, though kingly, is yet disguised to common eyes by ragged garments. But poor in truths to affirm, in glorious hopes to stimulate, in noble devotions to inspire,—the thought is blasphemy!

"Nothing to set up church-keeping with?" We have the heritage of all the past, the growing wealth of the present, the prophetic riches of a marvellous future, all of good and true and beautiful that man has achieved or poet dreamed! It is our own fault, if we are homeless.

ANNA GARLIN SPENCER.

"CRANKS."

Since the shooting of President Garfield by Guiteau there has been added a comparatively new word to the vocabulary of popular Americanisms,—a word which has been found to be very expressive of a certain class of minds met with in all communities. The word itself is in all our dictionaries; but in only one or two of the various definitions given by them does there seem to be anything at all applicable to its now generally accepted meaning,—i.e., "distorted" and "liable to be overset." The word "monomaniac" has sometimes been applied to some of these cranky minds, but that in many cases is too strong a term by which to designate these easily and often already partly "overset" intellects; and so the word "crank" is readily accepted in place of it, despite the decidedly slangy sound of the term.

The boundary line between sanity and insanity is not always easy to define. Dryden long ago expressed this thought:—

"Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide."

And not long ago I read a lecture which essayed to prove that all poets are more or less insane, or, as the lecturer would perhaps express it now, cranky. Conversing with an experienced physician of the insane, I asked him what proportion of humanity he thought really sane in every respect, and whether the asylums contain all who are in any degree unbalanced in brain. To the latter question, he replied: "Dear me! no, indeed. We who are obliged by our duties to pass the greater portion of our time in the society of those marked cases whose unbearable actions make their confinement in asylums an imperative necessity get to know better than most people the symptoms of unbalanced reason, and we notice more quickly than do others the evidences of anything akin to insanity in many men and women outside insane asylums. We perceive this tendency even in our own mind at times; and it is no uncommon thing to hear the attendants of the insane jokingly allude to one another's peculiar 'delusions,' and give warnings at any display of temper or strong emotion of any kind, that they are certainly getting too much 'excited,' as if they as well as those under their care were not wholly free from insanity."

Any great event which strongly excites the emotions, as the ruthless murder of a man high in position like President Garfield, brings to the surface in prominence the "cranks" of society, but does not really add to their number. Society is always full of cranky people who only at exceptional times find vent for their crankiness. Every new movement by awakening thought on any particular subject is sure to awaken a large proportion of hitherto dormant "cranks," either to assail, or, entering its ranks, to hinder the movement by their impracticable schemes and annoying vagaries. All new religions have been at first thus burdened, until they have grown strong enough in numbers to force the noisy minority of "cranks" to yield to the more potent will of the sane majority. Liberalism, though founded on reason, and necessarily demanding from and giving to all a careful hearing and untrammelled expression of opinion, is especially defenceless from the raids of "cranks" of all sorts, who claim the movement as especially their own, and, clamoring loudly of "reason," liberty, and "progress," yet stifle the voice of pure reason, misname license as liberty, and do their best to "crank" or "overset" the car of progress. But in this movement, as in all former progressive movements based on recognized truths, the eccentricities of these "cranks" must give way to the sounder reason and less noisy methods of true reform.

TWO QUESTIONS.

In the Index for October 27, Miss Hardaker speaks of Spencer as a "materialist." Since Spencer himself, and his personal friend and interpreter, Mr. John Fiske, both argue against the validity of materialism as a theory of things, will she tell us by what authority she makes him an indorser of what he denies?

2. Mr. Adler, in the same number, denounces the idea that happiness is a legitimate end in life for the individual to seek. He then goes on to say that we must devote ourselves to others, to the future welfare of the world. But, except as a matter of quantity, how is it that the welfare of all, in the future, is a more sacred end than the welfare of one, now and here?

M. J. SAVAGE.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

It is plain that the Presbyterian accepts Guiteau's theory of his assassination of President Garfield,—namely, that the Almighty commissioned him to do it; for it speaks of "the veil in which God, for the time, concealed his purpose in the removal from his place of the late President of the United States, and the direful means by which it was accomplished."

According to a report of a lecture in the Banner of Light, Mr. W. J. Colville, a Spiritualistic speaker, found one lesson in President Garfield's death which we have not noticed anywhere else. He says:—

President Garfield, having gone away from the earth, has done this good in addition to all the other good has proved to the world that physical science, with respect to health, is not enough, when it is not supplemented by spiritual power. . . Clairvoyance can reveal to you what the knowledge of the schools cannot, because the clairvoyant's eyes can see directly to the affected spot; and, perceiving the cause of the derangement, they do not stumble in the way whereby they shall do good.

which he has accomplished: he has demonstrated the necessity of the nation's recognizing clairvoyance; he

Mr. Colville also says, on the authority of the spirits who dictated his lecture, that, "if Garfield had been otherwise treated medically, he would have recovered. He was drugged to death."

THE Catholic Review thus laments the neglect of angels in these degenerate times:—

It is sad to think how little devotion is paid in these days, even by Catholics, to the Blessed Angels. Undoubtedly, the tendency of the times is to ignore the supernatural; and it would sometimes seem as if Catholics were almost as bad, in that respect, as Protestants.

As a reason for believing in the ministration of angels, the Review quotes from Mr. Boudon, an author who has written on the subject, this remarkable argument:—

The world is full of angels, and it seems that the sweetness of Divine Providence renders it necessary; for if, as some say, there be in the air so great a number of evil spirits that, if they were permitted to assume bodies, they would obscure the light of the sun, how could men be safe from their malicious acts, unless protected by the angels?

"FOOD FOR THINKING CHRISTIANS" is the title of a missionary journal published in Pittsburg, Pa. Its strong point appears to be the rigid literalness with which it adheres to Scripture. As a part of the nourishment it offers its readers, it discusses what it calls an important question, "Would there be room for them on the earth, if the billions of the dead were resurrected?" In answering the question, it has the advantage of believing in man's existence only about six thousand years. For this time, it makes the "liberal estimate" that there have been two hundred and fifty-two billions of human beings, and then it proceeds to dispose of them in the resurrection thus:—

Where shall we find room enough for this great multitude? Let us measure the land. The State of Texas (United States) contains two hundred and thirty-seven thousand square miles. There are twenty-seven million eight hundred and seventy-eight thousand four hundred square feet in a mile, and, therefore, six trillion six hundred and seven billion one hundred and eighty million eight hundred thousand square feet in Texas. Allowing ten square feet as the surface covered by each dead body, we find that Texas, as a cemetery, would, at this rate, hold six hundred and sixty billion seven hundred and eighteen million eighty thousand bodies, or nearly three times as many as we calculated had lived on the earth. A person, standing, occupies about one and two-thirds square feet of space. At this rate, the present population of the earth (one billion four hundred million) could stand on an area of eighty-six square miles,—an area much less than that of the city of London, England, or the city of Philadelphia, United States. And the island of Ireland (area thirty-two thousand square miles) would furnish standing-room for more than twice the number of people who have ever lived on the earth, even at our liberal calculation.

This "calculation" gives so much space to spare that, probably, there would be, at least, "standing-room" for all the ghostly bodies, even on the scientific theory that the human race has been in existence a hundred thousand years and more.

MR. FREEMAN, the historian, in his fifth lecture in this city, maintained that the Normans brought not destruction, but new vigor to the English people; and he eulogized William the Conqueror as the restorer of liberty to England.

THE commissioners at New York say that the intellectual standard of the immigrants was never so high before, and that the number of those who bring no means is small.

IT is a general belief that George Washington was a Free Mason and Master of a Lodge; but a writer in the Boston Transcript denies this, and says, "There is nothing to prove that Washington was a Mason before, during, or after the Revolution."

THE Boston Post does not concur in Henry Bergh's statements in regard to vaccination. It says that "never in the history of the world was disease better kept under than now, and never before have people lived to such extreme age, and for this we believe that no single cause deserves more credit than vaccination."

LEONARDO ARETINI, an Italian of the fourteenth century, predicted that on Nov. 10, 1881, men will become speechless (nothing said about women), that the tombs are next to open, the stars to fall, all the inhabitants of the earth to die, and chaos to come again; and on November 15 there is to be a resurrection and final judgment.

THE Christian Union, at the close of an article criticising Col. Ingersoll's last article in the November North American Review, says that "ministers should read his article; not to answer it,—the less they answer it the better,—but to see what mood of mind is produced by the effort to put the Christian religion on a dogmatic basis, and prove its truth by processes borrowed from Euclid and Laplace."

"THERE is in Kansas," says a religious exchange, "a company of 'Liberals,'—that is, unbelievers in Christianity,—who meet for 'mutual improvement.' They are too poor to get a song-book of their own, and they sing 'Rescue the Perishing' from the Moody and Sankey book, because nothing else is familiar to them all. Bravo!" A Christian ought not to reproach men with their poverty. Jesus was poor, and so were his early followers. And if these "Liberals" are familiar only with literature of the Moody and Sankey sort, their unadvanced condition illustrates the uselessness of that trash, and shows the need of acquaintance with some truly liberal works.

THE following reason against prayer, a rather practical and in one sense an æsthetic one, appears in the stanch organ of the Democracy, the Boston Post: "It isn't that a man doesn't realize the necessity of prayer: it isn't that he has an aversion to praying; but, good heavens, don't you understand that kneeling makes a man's trousers bag at the knees?" When Ingersoll was stumping Maine, a few years ago, for the Republican candidate for governor, he said his speeches had the effect to make the Democrats pious and "send them to their knees." Does the editor of the Post, in urging the above reason against prayer, speak from personal experience and wide observation?

MRS. KREKEL, editor of the Mirror of Progress, who attended the recent convention of the National Liberal League as a delegate from a Kansas city auxiliary, writes:—

Our duty, providing we had arrived in time, would not have been heavy; for the League which delegated us this year to represent it in convention sent us last year, and indorsed our course as a bolter. So the only course we could have pursued would have been to protest against the taking of work that, as Colonel Ingersoll said last year, belonged properly to local organizations, into the general convention; but that question was not up this year, except when it became necessary to vote on the resolution intended as a sort of healing balm for those who wanted to come back to the League, whether it (the League) came back to first principles or not. Then, we understand, the vote came loud and strong, as a reaffirmation of last year's position on the Comstock laws; but that reaffirmation was not to be a test of fellowship,—the bolters of last year could come in and work for what they voted against, if they wanted to. It is safe to say that the resolution didn't catch any but the "Green" ones.

But Mrs. Krekel "is not at all sure that all will feel obliged to go either with Mr. Green back to the League, or with Mr. Underwood entirely out of it." What will be the attitude of those who will neither go "back to the League" nor "entirely out of it"?

THE Unitarians are threatened with a new Year-Book controversy. A few years ago, an attempt was made to purge their annual statistical record, known as the Year-Book, of the names of those known to be, or supposed to be, non-Christian,—the word "Christian" being used in a technical or strictly theological sense. The names of a considerable number of ministers settled over Unitarian societies, or popularly regarded as Unitarian ministers, have ever since been omitted from this record. It is but just to these ministers to say that they have manifested very little concern over this omission; but some of their ministerial associates have kept up a quiet simmering of agitation with regard to it ever since, and the simmering is now passing into a bubbling which makes a perceptible noise. At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the Western Unitarian Conference, held at Chicago, a committee was appointed, as reported in Unity, "to consider the feasibility of publishing a Year-Book which will more adequately represent the Unitarian workers of America than any now extant." And at the Michigan State Conference, held subsequently, a resolution was passed directing the secretary to make out a list of the societies and ministers of the State, and to forward it to the editors of the Year-Book, with a request to publish the list as made out or to omit it all together. The design of these two resolutions is apparent. The platform of the Western Unitarian Conference is much broader than that of the National Conference, and some of the State Conferences are substantially in accord with the Free Religious Association. That of Michigan is as broad in its fellowship as the English language can make it; and in that State, in which five new liberal societies have been organized during the past year, every Unitarian minister (with the possible exception of one who is a missionary of the American Unitarian Association) is a pronounced advocate of Free Religion.

NO APOLOGY can be needed for presenting to our readers, and even at this late date, another discourse occasioned by the death of President Garfield. The lessons of such a life and death cannot be too long remembered. There is less danger that these lessons will be too much enforced than that the impression upon the country, profound as it has been, will be too speedily dissipated. Mr. Hinckley, in his discourse, presents with special vigor the argument that it was the Spoils System, in respect to the public offices, that was the real criminal which directed the assassin's arm; and he brings out the needed point that the people, with all their disposition to hope for the best, should not give their confidence too easily to President Arthur, who at the best is only entitled to their suspended judgment. Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer gives her reasons for the conviction that there is need of an organized church even for those who have outgrown the old creeds, and presents with strength and clearness her idea of what "The Rational Church of the Future" should be. Mr. F. M. Holland shows, by references to articles in the Revue de Belgique for September, the silent encroachments made, even now, by the Catholic Church upon political and intellectual liberty. Mrs. S. A. Underwood has a timely article on "Cranks." A number of other interesting contributions on different subjects, with editorial articles and notes, help to give variety to this number of the Index.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

WHEN motives of mere expediency are balanced against each other, it often happens that the wrong side can cumulate the weightiest, so far as mortal eye can see.—Springfield Republican.

THE science of right living has to take account of all consequences, in so far as they affect happiness personally or socially; and by as much as it ignores any class of consequences by so much does it fail to be science.—Herbert Spencer.

BE brave and strong through all thy wrestling years
A brave soul is a thing which all things serve.
—Alexander Smith.

LIKE the clown who believes that cold and darkness are something positive, and not merely the negations of caloric and light, we give to evil an affirmative existence, nay, a personified one. We believe that the universe contains not only one absolutely good, but also one absolutely evil. Not only a God, but a Devil. But these are visions of the night. The universe has indeed a sun of light and heat, but it has no sun with rays of darkness and frost.—Frances Power Cobbe.

TRANSCENDENTALISM carried its appeal to metaphysics. At present, physics have the floor. Our recent studies have been in the natural history of the soul. Its spiritual history is discredited. But the human mind ebbs and flows. The Bains, and Spencers, and Taines may presently give place to other prophets. Psychology may come to the front again, and with it will reappear the sages and seers. In that event, the religion of transcendentalism will revive, and have a long and fair day.—O. B. Frothingham.

AT THOREAU'S GRAVE.

"Nos tecta fovebimus ossa
Violetis et fronde frequente:
Tibulumque et frigida saxa
Liquido spargemus odore."—PRUDENTIUS.

Sleep, Thoreau, in thy quiet forest bed,
Thy bed above the dark and silent tarn.
Thou liest among the pine-trees' yellow roots;
Their rustling plumes above thee sadly wave,
And hang inverted in the pool below.
Breathless around thee leaning birches stand
In solemn pomp and state. The crickets cheep,
The maple burns, and glows the golden-rod;
While, touched with tints of sober Autumn sweet,
Adust and swart in hue, yet richly green,
And breathing deep serenity around,
The landscape lies,—thy splendid requiem.

Gently whisper, autumn breezes,
Through the sacred pine-tree tops!
Gently hold his priceless relics,
Golden, gnarled roots!

'Tis his blood burns in the maple,
His voice is in the stillly sound,
And his spirit lives and struggles,
Lives where right is found!

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 3, 1881.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

NO WRITERS in the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

The Nation's Grief and the Nation's Duty.

A Discourse occasioned by the death of President Garfield, delivered before the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I., Sept. 25, 1881.

BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

The bullet of the assassin has done its work. The nation's watch is ended. The President is dead. The life whose past had been so useful, from whose future so much was justly hoped, every one of whose eighty days of suffering had intensified the respect of the world, and brought it nearer than words can tell to his own people's affections, will be seen by the eye of sense no more. The manly form has wasted away, the strong mind and the brave heart have vanished, leaving a grief too deep for tears. Had he died at once, we should have mourned the loss of a great and good public servant. As it is, much of the agony of private affliction is added to the general sorrow.

"A nation mourns its dead,
Its sorrowing voices one,
As Israel's monarch bowed his head,
And cried, 'My son! My son!'"

What a deep thrill of satisfaction all felt when that son was nominated for the Presidency at Chicago! But we knew not then half his worth. He has held, as it were, two offices in one. He has been the executive head of the country, but more than that he has been a purifier and pacificator of the people. He has been so clear in both these relations

"That his virtues
Plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
The deep damnation of his taking-off."

How the echoes from the sick-room still linger in our ears! How many noble lessons of his own unconscious greatness passed before our minds, as the bells tolled the not unexpected, but inexpressibly sad, news upon the midnight air! The fortitude to bear pain was his. The courage to face the inevitable with a calm, unruffled spirit was his. The religious faith that all things finally work together for good in this universe of law and love was his. From first to last, from the moment when, with heroic philosophy, he exclaimed, "We will take the one chance," to the final expression of his agony of pain, more knightly heart never beat in human bosom. Braver fight with sickness and death was never fought; more touching surrender to the decrees of fate never exhibited; and that, too, in the face of a domestic love, oh, how strong and how beautiful! One hardly dare think, still less speak, of that exceptionally happy family; the parents counselling together on high themes of public as of private concern, so much to each other in life, so cruelly sundered now in serving the public weal. The halo of martyrdom crowns the ministry of suffering. May the peace that passeth all understanding attend him who has been summoned higher, and bless and strengthen her at whose fireside and in whose heart is now a void which no earthly power can fill!

What phantoms we are, he said once, and what phantoms we pursue! His life was full of strange contrasts. Like Lincoln, he first saw the light in poverty. A Western wild, a log-house, rough clothes, and homely fare, few books and papers, a district school, a canal-boat, pinching economy, and hard toil,—these are the elements of the picture which come at once to view. The man of culture, says one, is the man who has formed his ideals through labor and self-denial. How true that is, as applied to both our martyr Presidents! Their early surroundings were such as lay the foundation of a rugged manhood in all who are strong enough to survive them. And, while Garfield was broader, better educated, more cultured than Lincoln, both possessed, in a striking degree, a solid foundation of plain, upright, and downright manhood. It is interesting and instructive to see this cropping out in the whole of Garfield's career. It seems to have been his by inheritance, and to have grown in beauty and strength with his growth. President Chadbourne says of him, that "as a student, he was one who would at any time impress himself upon the memory of his instructors by his manliness and excellence of character. He has always been distinguished for hard work, clear insight into great questions of public interest, strong convictions, and manly courage." But it never seems to have hardened his heart, as such experiences so often do. He never forgot in after years how to sympathize with those passing through similar struggles to his own. With what keen appreciation he wrote to a young district school-teacher trying to find his place in the world of thought or work! "Tell me," he said, "do you not feel a spirit stirring within you that longs to know, to do, and to dare, to hold converse with the great world of thought,—a spirit that holds before you some high and noble object to which the vigor of your mind and the strength of your arm may be given? Do you not have longings like these which you breathe to no one, and which you feel must be heeded, or you will pass through life unsatisfied and regretful? I am sure you have them, and they will forever cling round your heart until you obey their mandate. They are the voice of that nature which God has given you, and which, when obeyed, will bless you and your fellow-men."

How much of real, genuine, healthy sympathy that letter contained, only such as have been moved by the Almighty summons, and struggled to answer it, can ever tell. In this friendly counsel, as so frequently elsewhere, he touched the inmost springs of living, because he was a natural preacher of character and morals. In his early days when he occupied the desk, he never had any ordination. His only commission as a minister was the inward call, recognized and approved by his fellow-men. Recalling his sermons at the distance of twenty years, says President Hinsdale, I should say they were stronger in the ethical than in the theological and ecclesiastical elements. In this, he was only acting himself. It was always the ethical element which predominated in him. It was inevitable that such a man should find his way into politics, if at all, as Mr. Sumner had before him, not because he sought office, but because office sought him. From his first active interest in political matters, consequent upon the Kansas-Nebraska agitation, through his election to the Ohio State Senate; his participation in the discussion of the right of secession; his service as Lieutenant-colonel, Colonel, Brigadier, and finally Major-General in the war of the rebellion; his entrance into Congress, his nomination to the Presidency,—through them all, we see always the man of character, whose integrity no greed for place ever smirched, whose fidelity to truth and duty no coward wavering ever dimmed. It seems as if, whenever he held an official position, it was because his fellow-citizens had a work on hand which he was the one to do. His first election to the lower House of Congress, by a spontaneous uprising of the nineteenth Ohio district, while he himself was at the front, fighting rebels; and the reluctance with which he gave up his command on the urgent solicitation of President Lincoln, in order that he might perform a greater service in legislation,—are conclusive proofs, if any were needed, of this truth. And surely his nomination at Chicago, to his own great surprise and against his own protest, was a summons in which one could easily imagine unseen powers participating. So hard is it to account for the inspirational wisdom of such spontaneous action on the part of so large a body of men. Still, the action was no sooner taken than it commended itself without argument to the good sense of the people. Every one, friend and opponent vying with each other, saw in it an emphasis of character, of intellectual grasp, of moral worth. Senator Hoar, a sound and critical judge, said during the campaign, "Since the year 1864, you cannot think of a question which has been debated in Congress, or discussed before the great tribunal of the American people, in regard to which you will not find, if you wish instruction, the argument on one side stated, in almost every instance better than by anybody else, in some speech made in the House of Representatives or on the hustings by Mr. Garfield."

The records show that he often risked his party reputation in deference to his own conscientious convictions, that he never hesitated to oppose his party when he thought it wrong. He seems to have been the living embodiment of President Hayes' maxim, "He serves his party best who serves his country best." "It has never been my policy," he says, in one of his Congressional speeches,— "it has never been my policy to conceal a truth, merely because it is unpleasant."

True to this rule, when popular opinion in his State on the financial question was running against him, his own election pending and most men in similar positions preserving what they considered a discreet silence, he, rejecting the counsels of his friends, went directly to his constituency, declaring that, before the nomination for representative was made, he wished it to be fully understood what his position was. And in the Ohio Senate Chamber, just after his election to the United States Senate, he said: "Whether I was mistaken or otherwise, it has been the plan of my life to follow my convictions, at whatever personal cost to myself. I have represented for many years a district in Congress whose approbation I greatly desired; but, though it may seem perhaps a little egotistical to say it, I yet desired still more the approbation of one person, and his name was Garfield. He is the only man that I am compelled to sleep with, and eat with, and live with, and die with; and, if I could not have his approbation, I should have had companionship."

This is no time, our hearts are in no condition, for that cold but critically just analysis of the life and work of James A. Garfield, which sooner or later impartial history will give. We are all members of one great family to-day; we stand in the hush and the shadow of death over the body of our own kindred. We could not discuss disputed points, if we would; we would not, if we could. Of this, however, we are certain: of all the Presidents since John Quincy Adams, he was the ripest scholar and the most experienced law-maker. And, what is far more vital, his sympathies were always with the poor and the suffering. He had a pure mind and a kind heart. As one has said, his moral character was the fit crown of his physical and intellectual nature. Who cares whether his judgment was infallible in all matters of detail. Being human, he doubtless made mistakes like the rest of us. But that is the criterion of little minds. It was the rectitude of his actions, the purity of his motives, of which we were always sure. It was that which inspired our confidence while he lived, it is that which touches the tender chord now that he has gone. "Every inch a man," that must be the verdict of history. And yet as humble and submissive as a little child. He was the greatest man as a patient, says Dr. Bliss, whom I have ever seen. Never a murmur from him. "Certainly, if it is necessary," was his invariable answer, when asked to endure any unpleasant or painful treatment. Great as a teacher, great as a soldier, great as a legislator, great as an executive, great even as a patient,—yes, great in all he undertook, in all he suffered. He takes his place with Washington and Lincoln, adding new glory to the immortal company. How well may we apply to him the words of his own decoration-day address! He "rests, asleep on the nation's heart, entombed in the nation's love! . . . A noble life, crowned with heroic death, rises above and outlives the pride and glory of the mightiest empire of the earth." His whole career, from the cradle of obscurity to the grave, has been a ministry of character. In this moment of universal sorrow, we can but feel that the nation is better, that we are all better, because he has lived and died.

And how came he to die in all the vigor and the pride of manhood? By what strange fatality is the nation that he loved and served so well deprived of her chosen head? Who and what is the miserable wretch who has done this evil thing? Bring him out, let him be drawn and quartered, let him be cut into inch pieces, are the words I hear frequently from human lips; and so say I. But where is he? Do you think you have him in the Washington jail? Do you think his name is Guiteau? You have only the vile instrument used in this terrible business. Do what you will with him,—and suffer the extreme penalty of the law he must,—do what you will with him, you will not touch the real criminal. The assassin of the President is older than the poor tool, to-day the object of righteous indignation and scorn. New York, the State which has had so many doubtful honors, has the dubious distinction of being the monster's birthplace; and Aaron Burr, Martin Van Buren, and Andrew Jackson divide the glory of bringing him to the light of day. Do you wish to know his name? It is Political Patronage. And the central point of his creed is, "To the victors belong the spoils." Vain will be the universal draping of buildings, vain the calling of public meetings, vain eulogy and dirge, if we do not avenge the martyr's death by taking the life of the system which was its guilty cause. Who killed Abraham Lincoln? Was it Wilkes Booth? General Garfield answered that question from his place in Congress: "It was no one man who killed Abraham Lincoln: it was the embodied spirit of treason and slavery, inspired with fearful and despairing hate, that struck him down, in the moment of the nation's supremest joy."

And now the nation is experiencing another moment of supreme joy, when another chosen leader is assaulted by another of its internal enemies. It was no one man who killed James A. Garfield: it was the embodied spirit of greed and bossism in politics which bought, loaded, and discharged the revolver,—that spirit which has become entrenched in our popular forms, even as chattel slavery had become entrenched, and so, like it, has its friends and apologists in high places; that spirit out of which has proceeded a whole brood of vipers,—a degraded civil service, senatorial dictation, the crack of the party whip, and servility to the party chiefs; that spirit which has produced what a modern writer calls "The Code of the New York Politician," but which code, unhappily, is not limited in its application to New York. The points of this code are:—

1st. Politics is a game. Its prizes, offices and contracts.

2d. All's fair in politics.

3d. In the language of another, the people are sovereign, as Queen Victoria is sovereign. Treated always with the profoundest deference, the sovereign is nothing. In England the ministers, in America the politicians, are everything.

4th. Faithfulness to party is the first of virtues in the politician.

From the practical acceptance of this code, alike in the smallest state and town elections and the presidential elections in the nation at large, has resulted the political infidelity of the hour. We have come to attach great value to place and to despise the greater dignity of simple citizenship. So that, in the general demoralization and indifference, a condition of things is allowed to exist, concerning public affairs, which would not for a moment be permitted, in this or any civilized community, concerning private affairs.

See how this demoralization and indifference have been brought about. During General Washington's administration of eight years, he removed nine persons from office; John Adams removed nine; Jefferson, for exceptional reasons well known to history, removed thirty-nine; Madison removed five; Monroe, nine; John Quincy Adams, two,—in all, seventy-three. Up to the close of the administration of Quincy Adams, the Presidents had been more than scrupulous in not interfering with the political opinions of government employes. It was left for Andrew Jackson to practically apply the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. His opponents charged him with making two thousand removals during his first year of office. His friends admitted that in that time he made nearly seven hundred, about ten times as many as had been made in the previous forty years of the government's history. This was a revolution. Observe the consequence. The civil service of the country at once became, what it has largely remained ever since, the politician's fund for the payment of political debts, and the political boss the man whose draft must always be honored at sight. I cannot to-day follow all the lines of demoralization which have resulted. I take only one of them, the degradation of the presidential office. The Constitution makes it the duty of the President to appoint directly a large number of the officers of the civil service and indirectly many more. It makes it the duty of the Senate to pass upon these appointments, approving or rejecting them, as the case may be. The Executive may consult the senator from Rhode Island or the senator from New York, if he chooses to do so; but the responsibility for the appointment is his. The responsibility for confirming or rejecting the appointment is the Senate's. But, in the course of time, the right of the President to consult an individual senator or representative has been construed to mean the right of the individual senator or representative to advise, and in some cases to dictate to, the President. Or, plainly stated, in the matter of appointments to office, it has made the local political leader a superior to the President himself. From this situation of things, it was but a short step, very quickly taken by many politicians, to the claim of ownership of offices; and, with official patronage at his disposal, many a senator has come to be, politically speaking, the State he was supposed to represent. This has invariably and of necessity, as I hardly need say, resulted in the overthrow of democratic government. It has made your vote and mine in the caucus and at the polls a farce.

Now, since the days of Jackson, some of our Presidents, like Grant for example, have acquiesced in, apparently approved, the Jacksonian rule. They have not only given up the practice of the early Presidents, but they have yielded their own constitutional prerogative in fact, though not in name, to what has seemed to them the necessary dictation of the local politician. Other of our Presidents, like Hayes, have felt the dignity of the office, and through it the sovereignty of the people, degraded and insulted by the imperious infringement of their rights by individual senators and representatives. It also needs to be said here that Congressmen have been divided on this question, the Senate itself adopting the custom, except on extraordinary occasions, of confirming or rejecting nominations according to the wishes of the two senators for whose State they were made.

Such, briefly and imperfectly stated, was the condition of things at the opening of General Garfield's administration. It was decreed that within the first few months the conflict between the two ideas should come. James A. Garfield represented in his own person, with remarkable clearness and purity, the original view. He was not, as we have seen, an office-seeker: office had sought him. He held office, not for his own aggrandizement, but as a sacred trust from the hands of the people. In accepting his position, he had pledged himself to discharge, to the best of his abilities, certain duties, among which were the appointment of numerous officers of the civil service, and the maintenance of a pure general administration of the government. That was to such a man as he the most solemn of obligations. That was the point where, at the moment, the whole demand for reform in political methods seemed in him to focalize. But the Spoils System came to him in the person of its leading representative, saying: This appointment is mine to make. I must name the man whom it shall be, or at least the man whom it shall not be. The President did not submit. He made no quarrel, he threw down no gauge of battle: he simply went straightforward in the performance of what he considered his duty. There were those who thought he committed an error of judgment in so doing. It is not in order to discuss that question to-day. Subsequent events have shown that he struck a blow at the Spoils System, which made it reel; caused its arrogant head-centre to drop the statesman's mantle in which he had been masquerading and to stand before the world the selfish politician which he was and is; and led, undoubtedly, to that madness of the corrupt elements in politics which nerved the arm of Guiteau to do the fatal deed. Looking back of men to underlying causes, as all thoughtful people must, I see in the situation another irrepressible conflict of ideas. Another evil nourished in the nation's bosom has its fangs upon her vitals, and slays, while he is engaged in defending her, another of her dearly beloved sons.

And now, in view of these facts, what is the nation's duty?

Its first and last duty is to recognize the real murderer, and to insist upon his utter extermination.

But how shall that be done? It will not be done at once, it will not be done at all, until you and I and all well-disposed citizens are stunned into a realization of our responsibilities. The Spoils System has a tremendous grip upon the national life. Its power is insidious, autocratic, and omnipresent. It is sometimes difficult for the unwary to recognize it, it appears in so many garbs and under so many names. We must remember that eternal vigilance is the price of purity as well as the price of liberty, and that while good people are asleep bad men are picking their pockets. We must remember also that to be too good-natured is sometimes a sin, that to sacrifice a high standard of public excellence to personal feeling is always wrong. The duty which the hour brings, or ought to bring, directly home to us, lies, in my opinion, in two directions:—

1st. It commands a critical and impartial suspension of judgment of the new President until he shows the policy of his administration. I say, with great deliberation, a critical and impartial suspension of judgment. He has no right to expect our confidence. We have no right to give him our confidence. We are bound to remember that he is himself the child of the Spoils System; that his associations have been with that wing of his party which upholds, and indeed lives by, the Spoils System; that from a politician's stand-point his obligations are as strong as any man's can be to the defeated chief of the Spoils System. We are bound to remember also that, at a most direful moment in our history, he forgot the dignity of the office to which the people had allowed him to be elected in serving the supposed interests of his chief. Standing to-day, as it were, over the open grave of the martyr, we are bound to remember all these things. That, since the assassination, he has behaved as any gentleman should and would; that he has seen fit to appoint to-morrow as a day of general mourning, as any gentleman should and would,—was to be expected as a matter of course. That the expectation has not been disappointed has been considered by some cause for congratulation. It cannot be considered by me any pledge for the future, it cannot blot from my mind the disagreeable memories of which I have spoken. This on the one side. On the other, natural good intentions, a large, warm-hearted disposition, and executive ability on the part of the new President, and an unmistakable indication of the course he should take on the part of the people,—these are pleasant and encouraging elements of the situation. That he may take up the work his predecessor began is devoutly to be hoped. That he will carry it on with vigor, in the same spirit and to the same ends, is hardly to be expected. If he shall do so, he will command the admiration of millions. If he shall fail to do so, he will simply be true to his political origin and his past political history. However, he is our President by no fault of his own. He has a most trying and difficult task before him. If he cannot have at present our confidence, let him have that which may be of greater benefit, our suspended judgment, while we watch with anxious eyes to see if he will follow where an all but unanimous public opinion is pointing the way.

That is one direction in which our duty leads.

2d. We have a clear and stern duty nearer home. This same assassin system has possession of Rhode Island. The high office of United States senator is about to be filled in this State. The General Assembly have been summoned to fill it; and yet I hear in common circulation the report that the matter is all arranged, that a trade has been made by which it is believed the representation of Rhode Island in the Senate has been settled for some years to come. A condition of things which permits that, such as exists and has for a long time existed in this and some of the other States, is a direct outgrowth of the same system which has caused the death of him we mourn to-day. And the clearness of our perceptions and the depth of our grief will be measured by the earnest devotion with which we resolve that these things shall no longer be. Lift your voices, O good men and women, cast your ballots, O upright voters, against the tyranny of Bossism in all its phases, and the immortal hero will not have died in vain. Over his grave, our young men shall be taught the simple grandeur of American citizenship, the oft repeated and yet oft neglected lesson that virtue is greater than power, fidelity to truth mightier than any worldly success. Then, as was said of another statesman, may we say of James A. Garfield, "that, although his body lies mouldering in the earth, yet in the assured rights of all, in the brotherhood of a reunited people, and in a purified republic, he still lives and will live forever." May a grateful nation cherish his precious memory, and realize something of his own high ideals!

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

New Views in Political Economy.

DR. HENRY CARTER ADAMS—whose article on "Payment of Public Debts" the Nation calls "perhaps, the most noteworthy article" in the September International Review—has printed (not published) for the use of students at Johns Hopkins University and Michigan University, where he lectures on economical topics, an Outline of Lectures upon Political Economy, some points of which may be of interest to Index readers. Somewhat novel, in the first place, is the definition of Political Economy, which is said to embrace "both the science and the art of Industrial Society," its great purpose, as a university discipline, being "to determine a scientific and rational basis for the formation and government of Industrial Society." This suggests ideal aims, to which Political Economy, in the ordinary sense, is quite indifferent. The ordinary economist is concerned only with the facts and the matter-of-fact laws connected with the production, exchange, and distribution of wealth, which he may study in as cool and realistic a manner as any observer of nature or experimenter in the laboratory. "Industrial Society" forms and organizes itself, without waiting for hints from the economist, in obedience to certain inevitable instincts and desires of its own; and for the economist to turn from a tracing of the actual industrial habits and arrangements resulting therefrom to the determining "a scientific and rational basis" for industrial life is to quite radically change, or at least greatly enlarge, his point of view. Carlyle, we believe, called Political Economy the "dismal science," and it is not uncommon to hear it characterized as "selfishness reduced to a system." Both characterizations may be true, and yet contain no just reproach. Meteorology has partly to do with dismal subjects, and why may not selfishness and its products as well receive scientific treatment as any other part of nature's processes? But Dr. Adams not only sets in order and analyzes the facts, he presumes to judge of them, to suggest what they might and ought to be; and Political Economy thus becomes to him not only a science, but a problem and an art. This of itself is an important advance; and, from writers of this attitude of mind, we may expect real help in solving our social and industrial problems.*

*He, indeed, says: "All economic study may be reduced to the four questions: What is? What should be? What means should be adopted to secure the desired reform? Can it, under existing conditions, be secured? Thus considered, Political Economy forms the basis of rational reform."

Dr. Adams closes his preliminary sketch of the history of economic thought with an explanation of the revolt against "English" Political Economy (Smith, Ricardo, Mill, Cairnes), partly by what is known as the "Historical School" (Hildebrand, Roscher, Knies) in Germany, and partly by those German economists who have been called "Socialists of the Chair" (Schäffle, Wagner, Held). The Contemporary Review, February, 1881, contains an interesting account of the "Socialists of the Chair," by John Rae. Their leading criticisms upon the doctrines of the English School are given by Dr. Adams as follows: They refuse to accept (1) that the State should be debarred from undertaking industrial enterprises, (2) that free competition is necessarily just in its distribution of products, (3) that each individual in following his own interests thereby promotes the interest of society,—i.e., the enlightened self-interest theory is flatly denied,—(4) that society should be considered merely as an aggregation of individuals, but it is claimed that society should be studied as an organism. As far as can be judged from this outline, Dr. Adams takes similar ground with the "Socialists of the Chair," who, he says, to avoid misunderstanding, might be more properly termed "liberal economists."

Especially interesting is Dr. Adams' exhibition of the connection between Political Economy and the legal structure or artificial conditionings of society. Laws, while they continue, act or tend to act even as laws of nature,—e.g., while private property in land remains a legal fact, it is as potential a factor in industrial society as the land itself. None the less is the distinction important between legal and natural facts; for the former may change from time to time, the latter remaining comparatively constant. Present society is apt to assume that private property is a necessary institution; but Dr. Adams tells us that "property is the right granted by law of ownership in and hence control over anything," that there is "no property without law," that it (i.e., property) is "a lego-historic, not a necessary economic fact," and that "the defence of private property from the economic standpoint is its necessity, and in its necessity it finds its limit." Again, he declares capital to be a necessary factor of production. To destroy it, he says, would be to destroy industrial society. But, on the other hand, capital and capitalists are not identical, but as distinct as land and landlords. The person, he says, in both cases, may be considered as the agent of society, given full property in the thing, because it is believed that thereby the highest interest of society is subserved. "The point of importance is that, while capital is an economic fact, the capitalist, as an individual, is a legal fact: hence, the question of doing away with the capitalist class is simply a question of the legal organization of industries. Again, the laws of the distribution of wealth—namely, of rent to the land-owner, interest to the capitalist, wages to the laborer—are a "matter of human institutions solely"; and such laws as obtain in any given state of industrial society serve as the best criterion of its character.

As to the now well-nigh universal wages-system, though Dr. Adams treats it as an advance upon slavery, even as slavery itself was better than the state of utter unprotectedness for the poor and weak which preceded it, he says that a condition of society in which strikes occur is condemned by economy for the same reason that it condemns slavery. The society, he adds, in which all producers share in profit is that in which incentive to labor may exert its maximum strength; and hence it is a cooperative system of industries, to which, in the future, the wages-system must give way. Cooperation he defines as "such an organization of industries that the employing class, as distinct from the employed class, shall be made to disappear, or, what amounts to the same thing, an organization of industries in which the undertakership shall reside with the laborers themselves." From the stand-point of production, he recognizes that cooperation can with difficulty be defended. The principal arguments for its support arise in connection with the problem of just distribution. Cooperation is said to be of two kinds,—private or contract cooperation, public or coercive cooperation. If this form of industry is to play any prominent part in the society of the future, it appears appropriate that private cooperation should embrace all those classes of business in which personal oversight outweighs capital; while public cooperation undertakes those industries in which there is an absurd tendency to an undue centralization of money power. We, with our traditions of liberty and individual rights, are naturally impatient of any State interference with industrial affairs. None the less must it be confessed that industrial freedom and unrestrained competition are hardly contributive to a desirable state of industrial society. Unlimited freedom is an opportunity to the naturally competent and strong, but not seldom reduces the weak to a condition little better than that of slavery. Not with a view to abridging, but for the very ends of securing freedom to all, it may then prove not to be unnecessary to return to some kind of connection of the State with industrial affairs. "Protection" in this country has meant protection to the few, the manufacturers and other capitalists; but, in its essential idea, the principle may not be wrong, and a new species of it may be a not distant necessity. And Dr. Adams indicates that a return to State control of industries, should it be deemed necessary, would now produce very different results from those produced when it previously existed, because the political idea has changed. "In monarchies, the King is the Law. Among constitutional peoples, Law is King." This is still more suggestive of the intimate connection between Political Economy and Political Science to which reference has been already made.

Of cooperation in general, Dr. Adams remarks that it is doubtful if the importance or the magnitude of this idea is generally understood. A realization of it would necessitate as complete an overturning of industrial methods and economic conceptions as was effected by the transfer of productive industries from the basis of slave labor to that of free labor. "In case," he closes by saying, "the ideal of cooperation meet general approbation, the practical question of the present is, What steps may now be taken toward that education, without which the cooperative plan may never be realized?" This comes startlingly near the point of view from which, in a measure, Professor Adler seems to be working in New York, whose undertakings, conceived as they are with a distinct consciousness of our social problems, awakened more than ordinary interest. We thank Dr. Adams for the hints he has thrown out in this little pamphlet, though we would by no means give the impression that he is a professional reformer, and have selected the "hints," with a purpose of our own, from pages which, for the most part, are devoted to a strictly scientific exposition of Political Economy, and are so simple and lucid in statement* that they may be commended to any student of the subject, whatever his interesse.

COMMUNICATIONS.

THE COMING STORM IN EUROPE.

An acute observer of current social phenomena in Europe says that never perhaps has the certainty of approaching trouble been more manifest than it is to-day. It is well known that the famous Earl of Chesham foretold the first French Revolution with all its horrors. Before the new order of things can be finally and fairly established in Europe, it is well-nigh certain that there will be one more social convulsion and battle of Armageddon to make an end of the rubbish of the past and have done with it forever. The weatherwise abroad see the storm gathering all round the European horizon. For the present, Bismarck, the chief engineer of the old order, has shut down the steam, and is sitting on the safety-valve. Bismarck is a heavy fellow, but he may soon find himself flying in fragments moonwards. We read in the history of Flavius Josephus, "that learned Jew," that, for years before the fall of Jerusalem, a wild, maniacal fellow used to roam about the thoroughfares and suburbs of the doomed city, crying, "Woe to Jerusalem!" The police of the period did not abate him and his yawp as a nuisance, but let him run at large, doubtless from the respect ever shown to madness in the East, as something prophetic and divinely inflicted. It was not a pleasant cry for scribes, chief priests, and Pharisees to hear, but they dared not to suppress it. Finally, Titus and his Roman legions arrived, and invested the Holy City. The prophet of doom fought on the walls like a brave man, to stave off the woe which he had been proclaiming. Suddenly, he shouted "Woe!" to himself, and was instantly cut in twain by a missile from a Roman catapult. Carlyle during his last days was just such a prophet of woe to the existing order of things in Europe. He constantly and in terms of loathing denounced the existing Church and State as shams and doomed to swift and irremediable destruction. He constantly foretold destruction; but he refused to see any prospect of a better social and political reconstruction on a free, popular basis. In one of his reported conversations, he said, "I see terrible calamities impending, a total severing of every tie and bond of the world as it exists, blood-shedding and destruction." In fact, Carlyle's inner eye during his last years was constantly clouded by a lurid vista of coming wrath and social convulsion. Dyspepsia and the gloom of waning life, bereft of its great mainstay and solace, the faithful wife, who preceded him into "the silent land," accounted for a moiety of his latter-day pessimism and prophetic black bile. But there was a method in his madness and virulent discourse to all visitors, our own Dr. Ripley, of the

*And we might add, so abundant in references to the most recent English and Continental literature. A valuable "List of Authorities" is placed at the end of the Outline, comprising between seventy and eighty names, and lacking completeness, to our knowledge, only in not containing that of Friedrich Albert Lange, who is best known as the author of the History of Materialism, but has made a valuable contribution to the Labor Question in a volume bearing that title, Die Arbeiter-Frage (4th Auflage, 1879). We may give some account of his views at another time.

New York Tribune, among the rest. There was a method and a persistency in it, which made it something more than the mere vent of age, spleen, and ill-humor. He was profoundly read in the story of man, and the sunset of life gave him mystical lore in connection with his vast knowledge. However terrible the coming European storm may be, there are sunshine and peace beyond its clouds. The world and man are tough-fibred, and have stood and can stand convulsions of unspeakable severity. We may well be optimists as to the not far-away social future of the civilized world. After Ragnarok, or the Twilight of the Gods, as described in the Edda, there is to be a universal good time. "There will arise out of the sea," replied Har, "another earth most lovely and verdant, with pleasant fields, where the grain shall grow unsown. Vidar and Vali shall survive: neither the flood nor Sartur's fire shall harm them. They shall dwell on the plain of Ida, where Asgard formerly stood. Thither shall come the sons of Thor, Modi and Magni, bringing with them their father's mallet. Mjolnir, Balder, and Hoder shall also repair thither from the abode of death (Hel). Then shall they sit and converse together, and call to mind their former knowledge and the perils they underwent, and the fight with the wolf Fenrir and the Midgard Serpent. There, too, shall they find in the grass those golden tablets, which the Æsir once possessed." The above is an extract from the old Scandinavian Scriptures, more fit to be quoted by one of Teutonic blood than the Hebrew canon.

THAT CHRISTIAN UTTERANCE.

That remark of "Christian" in the New York Sun, referred to in the Index of October 13, "Down to hell with Guiteau," is, no doubt, a very thoughtless utterance. In case Guiteau should be so unfortunate as to get to the orthodox hell; and then, if "Christian" could go and spend about fifteen minutes every morning, for the space of one short year, in witnessing the miserable man's punishment in those sulphurous fires, I must think that, even though a Christian, his heart would so far relent as to produce in him a desire to make some slight effort for Guiteau's relief. But then, unfortunately, you see, "Christian's" God will not relent, but, on the contrary, will insist on keeping him in these torrid flames forever and ever.

Alas for poor Guiteau! There'll be no let up for him, any more than there will be for the strictly moral man, who, relying upon his moral and virtuous life, fails of ablation in the all-cleansing blood of the Lamb.

REASON AND FEELING.

I have seen many things from the pen of H. C. Neville I admire and approve, but occasionally there are things I don't. In your issue of Sept. 22, 1881, is an article entitled "Is Life Reasonable?" I don't assent to. That reason and passion in the minds and actions of men are often at variance is certainly true; and in many such cases passion is in the right and reason wrong. Indeed, he thinks there is but little in the life of man, but of that kind, and asks, How little of what we call the true life of an individual soul can be sustained at the bar of reason! and gives the case where the mother loves more tenderly a weak and deformed child than the healthy and well-developed. My reason says to such a loving mother, You are right in feeling and bestowing such tender and careful love. He asks, Who dares listen to the voice of reason here? I answer, He would be a monster whose reason would not bow in humble adoration and approval of affection's spontaneous action. In some of the expensive and showy cares shown to the dead, reason might not concur, but in such cases should passion and not reason hold the sway? There are many extravagances dictated by passions in this life, that should be despoiled by reason. Mr. Neville should remember passions act both ways: passions hoard money, starves, lies, and steals to get it. Reason condemns all these things. Reason certainly does not condemn the affections which gather around the homes of our childhood, with their hills, lakes, fields, brooks, and their green grassy banks. My reason says it is a good and wise provision in nature to fix in the human heart a feeling more tender and appreciative for the scenes of our early homes than for any other spot on earth. Reason says there are many goods and blessings springing up in the world from such early and lasting loves. It is true that "passions sway many things which reason pronounces absurd." But it is equally true that they are absurd. Witness the absurdity, folly, injury, and costs of the passions of the world. But Mr. Neville says, "These things will not be suspended until reason has given assent to these states of feeling." So much the worse for reason. The question is not which will give way, but which should. It is true that now and ever will be "regions in nature that reason cannot explore and define," and the passions and superstitions of the mind has and will run riot in them. But reason has gained much of the ground once occupied by them, and is now, I hope, gaining, and will continue to gain, until there is small room for superstition to direct, unguarded by reason. I know that the great body of mankind are now travelling by scarcely any light but that of passion and superstition; but I also know the numbers seeking the nature of things and light of reason for their guiding stars are rapidly increasing.

TIPPECANOE, OHIO, Oct. 30, 1881. E. L. CRANE.

RELIGION AT THE FAMILISTÈRE.

The excellent notice of the Coöperative Association at Guise in France, contained in the Index of October 13, having just come to my observation, I hasten to reply briefly to the query therein addressed to me, which is, "What is the religious attitude of the Association?"

Had the question been, What is the theological attitude of the Association? I should reply that there are different phases of theological belief prevailing among the members, the majority holding to the Catholic faith. There are a few Spiritualists in the Institution; and, at the time of my visit, there were two or more Positivists in the General Council.

M. Godin, the founder, is a disciple of Swedenborg; and, under the inspiration of his convictions, backed by the forces of conscience and executive genius, he has, in the face of many obstacles and discouragements, constructed the Familistère as the first Temple of the Gospel of Life and Labor, and developed the Association to a financial, educational, and moral success.

There is neither priest nor clergyman residing at the Familistère, nor is there hall or chapel consecrated to religious service. These advantages are found in the city of Guise, and the workmen of the Institution and their families attend such places of worship as they desire. The funerals of the members are held at the Institution, and are conducted according to the form preferred by the friends of the deceased.

But in answer to the question, What is the religious attitude of the Association? I would say that, practically, it is one and uniform throughout the entire body of membership, being based in that vital principle which is not only the soul of all phases of modern theology, but is the living principle of progress from its lowest to its highest forms, even from the material to the spiritual. The principle of reciprocity and balance in matter, carried up into human society, becomes justice and equity, and up to this date has received its best formula in the Golden Rule. This rule, when applied to a secular enterprise, must inevitably result in business relations similar to those which have constructed the Equitable Association of Labor and Capital at Guise,—relations regulated by the principle of each for all and all for each.

VINELAND, N. J.

A CRITICISM.

I acknowledge a fondness for thy paper, though there is frequently much published in it with which I, as an acknowledged minister of the Society of Friends, cannot be expected to agree; and I shall endeavor to free my mind a little thereon. The late article by John Fiske, as well as an editorial of date 8th mo., 18, entitled "Kant and the Experimental School," made me feel very uncomfortable, they savored so much of the potshards of the earth clashing together. And this will ever ensue while men in the search after truth depend exclusively upon their outer relations and environment. Both the writers to whom I have alluded commit the same error. In boasting of evolution, they overlook involution. Now, such great souls as Socrates, Jesus, and George Fox, cannot be satisfactorily explained except by involution, or inspiration.

In Lord Amberley's work, which was loaned me some time since by my dear friend Lucretia Mott, in speaking of the Unknown Cause working in him, he quotes Spencer's First Principles, 2d ed., xxxiv., p. 123: "He may consider himself as one of the myriad agencies through whom the Unknown Cause works; he, too, may feel that, when the Unknown Cause produces in him a certain belief, he is thereby authorized to profess and act out that belief."

Amberley also, on page 707, in speaking on the same theme of direct relation between subject and object, further says, "The sense of an intuitional perception of that object, the sense of undefinable similarity thereto, the sense of inspiration and guidance thereby, are included under and rendered intelligible by the actual identity of the ultimate natures of the subject and object of religious feeling."

Now, what I object to in John Fiske and in B. F. U. is that they are too assertive for agnostics. They well know that we deal with the unknown as regards the ultimate in every grain of sand and every drop of water. Why, then, this confidence concerning the origin of the race? Why deny, counter to Kant, that the mind is an absolute entity? Kant knew this himself, as did Socrates and Jesus before him. How beautiful the declaration of the latter: "I proceeded and came forth from God. I came not of myself, but he sent me,"—speaking simply here of the divine procession in all things!

Mind defies all explanation by speculations concerning evolution. Mind is a priori to the individual as well as to the race. Differentiation comes in part from within. None saw this more clearly than Carlyle, when he ridiculed "the philosophy of dirt."

BOOK NOTICES.

MAN'S ORIGIN AND DESTINY. Sketched from the Platform of the Physical Sciences. By J. P. Lesley. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1881.

Fifteen years ago, Prof. J. P. Lesley, of the University of Pennsylvania, Secretary of the American Philosophical Society, gave a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute on "Man's Origin and Destiny" to audiences memorably large and enthusiastic. Two or three years later, while travelling in Europe, Mr. Lesley yielded to the earnest solicitations of Mr. Trübner, a personal friend, and gave him the lectures to publish in England. A large part of this English edition was exported to this country, and sold at $4.00 per volume. Prof. Lesley has revised the lectures, and has added six new chapters on Man's Destiny. As a geologist, Mr. Lesley is widely and favorably known, being member of many learned societies in Europe and America. The second geological survey of Pennsylvania, of which he has for seven years been director, is attracting much attention from scientific men. Over forty volumes of elaborate reports have already been published; and the work is of enormous importance, economically as well as scientifically. A man curiously well informed in the details of many sciences, Mr. Lesley has yet the broad outlook of the philosopher; while his enthusiasm is yet fresh and strong, and his spirit ever earnest and reverential. He is peculiarly well fitted to write upon the grand theme which he has chosen, and his work is interesting and valuable. The author's style is plain, and well adapted to common readers. Among the more interesting chapters of the book may be specified those upon "The Antiquity of Man," "The Early Social Life of Man," "On Language as a Test of Race," "The Original Destiny of the Race," and "The Future Economies of Mankind."

"THE DUTIES OF WOMEN," a reprint from the English edition, is just issued by Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, and comprises the substance of a half-dozen lectures delivered by Frances Power Cobbe in London, last year. These "Duties" are considered under the heads of "Personal Duty," to which is given the grand burden of responsibility; "Social Duties," involving parental, filial, and fraternal relations; "Duties of Contract," both as wives and friends; "Duties of Women as Members of Society," referring to conventional associates and immediate surroundings; and finally "Woman as a Citizen of the State," weighing her capacity and prestige in such service of historic record, and noting its progress in recent times. Miss Cobbe's personal influence and ample experience in the conflict for woman suffrage qualifies her for authoritative utterance on these topics, and her ripe scholarship and high moral standard lend peculiar vigor to the mode of treatment. Her strong bias in favor of certain theological tenets gives a less welcome flavor to some of the pages, notably those of the opening lecture, for such of her readers as decline adherence to those fundamental statements. But the reigning tone of the discourses lies in the direction of sound and helpful conviction regarding the possibilities and just demands of womanly achievement.

SOME CHILDREN'S BOOKS: Cross-Patch. By Susan Coolidge. Stories of Adventures. By Edward Everett Hale. Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances. By Juliana Horatio Ewing. The Two Cabin Boys. By Louis Rousset. Mammy Tittleback, and her Family. By H. H. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

Such is the variety which Roberts Brothers have set forth to tempt the appetites of boys and girls at the fall feast of 1881. It is a charming lot. A new book from Susan Coolidge is always an event in a child's life. This time, the choice and handling of her theme are alike fortunate. Mother Goose has furnished her with some half-dozen texts, with which the stories have about as much connection as sermons have with their texts. But very few sermons are as entertaining as these stories, or begin to preach so well.

Mr. Hale's Stories of Adventure is the third in his series of books designed to lead the boys into a first-hand acquaintance with the famous books of travel and adventure and discovery and courage and so on. The task is happily conceived and admirably done. We have choice selections from Marco Polo, Maundeville, Cortez, the Canada Jesuits, Humboldt, and several others, set in a frame of Mr. Hale's own making, that brings out the pictures to the best advantage.

It is enough to say of Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances that to the author, Mrs. Ewing, we are indebted for that charming story, Jan of the Wind Mill. In the present instance, we have a volume made up of five short stories, all well told and sure to interest the larger girls and boys.

The Two Cabin Boys is the boys' book of the lot, pre-eminently. It is full of moving accidents by flood and field, related with great plausibility. The moral of the book is that "happiness in this world is only to be attained by industry and honesty." But the innocent amusement of the book will avail more than the moral.

Last, but not least, comes H. H.'s Mammy Tittleback, and her Family. This is a story of cats and kitty-cats, very bright, very pleasant, very charmingly told. It is for the wee mites and little tots, and is admirably adapted to their taste and comprehension, this "true story of seventeen cats."

The October number of the Art Amateur is varied and interesting. While this journal may not come up to the standard of the highest art criticism, it is said to be doing a great deal of good in the country. A speaker at the recent Congress of the Association for the Advancement of Women stated that she had observed an evident effect on the women of Missouri from the circulation of this and similar journals. The ambition of the women was excited to make their homes more attractive, and they found much helpful suggestion and looked brighter and happier in consequence.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM has been added to Harvard's Committee on Languages.

DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and Tennyson are of the same age, seventy-two.

CHARLES ELLIS gave a radical and brilliant discourse at the Parker Memorial last Sunday morning.

GAMBETTA has been elected provisional President of the Chamber of Deputies by a large majority.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S portrait is to be placed upon the five-cent international postage letter-stamps.

HENRY WARD BEECHER has sold his interest in the Christian Union, and retires from the field of journalism.

WHITTIER, the poet, says he invariably receives two hundred applications for his autograph in the course of a year.

WALT WHITMAN has been asked by Swinburne to visit him, and it is announced that he will soon leave for Europe.

THE late Dean Stanley once said: "Only one man ever called on me whom I refused to see, and that man was Mr. W. H. Mallock."

REV. DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, who was expelled from the Methodist denomination, intends, it is said, to organize an independent organization.

M. ERNEST RENAN is staying in Rome, where he is receiving visits from all the principal men of letters and other notable personages in that city.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY has written a small work called The Epoch of Reform, which relates to the Irish movements from 1830 to 1850. It will appear next month.

ARCHBISHOP CROKE, whose action has excited so much interest in Irish politics, is fifty-seven years old, and regarded as the ablest of the Irish Roman Catholic hierarchy.

WILLIAM CLARKE, of London, contributor to the Index, lectured in Oberlin, Ohio, last Tuesday and Wednesday, and will speak in Cleveland Thursday evening, this week.

THE inscription on the stone placed over the late Professor Clifford's grave reads as follows: "I was not and was conceived. I loved and did a little work. I am not and grieve not."

GEN. FRANCIS A. WALKER retires from the head of the census bureau, his work being well along there, and will come to Boston to take the presidency of the Institute of Technology.

MR. GLADSTONE gives this account of himself: "By blood I am a Scotchman; I am by residence a Londoner; I am by marriage a Welshman; and I am by birth a Lancashire man."

LAST Sunday was the fourteenth anniversary of the death of John Albion Andrew, who is justly styled the great war Governor of Massachusetts, whose death was hastened by his exertions during the war of the rebellion.

THE name Frederick Douglass has borne the past forty-three years was given him by Nathan Johnson, of New Bedford, who took the name for his protégé from The Lady of the Lake. Douglass was originally named Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey.

EDISON has received a cable from Paris, informing him that he had been voted by the juries of the Electrical Exposition in Paris five gold medals, and that the General Congress of the Exposition had given him the additional and exclusive honor of a Diploma of Honor, being the highest award given.

FOR Mrs. Garfield, her mother and her four children, — six persons in all, — $330,345, or more than $60,000 each; for the Michigan farmers, their wives and children, — 15,000 persons, — $105,660, or a little over $7 each. "To him who hath shall be given, and from him who hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." — New York Graphic.

VENNER has addressed a letter to the Montreal Gazette, announcing the probability of "a continuance of heat or warmth and periods of considerable disturbance for the winter of 1882." He further says, "This hot and dry season has now passed," and "a winter of some sort has got to be experienced." The latter clause expresses the general opinion.

IN answer to the question, Is Max Müller a German or an Englishman? an exchange says: "He is the former by birth, by citizenship the latter. He is greatly honored in England, and rather criticised in Germany. If there be any difference between his English and German style, the former seems to be slightly preferable. He retains his German habits of patient plodding and impatient generalization; yet some Germans would not fail to detect the foreigner in him."

THE Milwaukee Daily News, in a report of a lecture on Harriet Martineau by Mrs. Amelia W. Bate, of that city, who is a correspondent of the Index, says that "it was well attended and greatly enjoyed. Mrs. Bate has a very pleasant manner of delivery, speaking low, but distinctly; and the appreciation of her hearers was manifested by the close attention with which they listened to her." The Racine, Wis., Journal says of Mrs. Bate's lecture on the family, which was a scientific argument for the evolution of the family from barbaric promiscuity, and presented a picture of the ideal family of the future, that "the lecture was replete with noble thoughts, beautifully expressed. Mrs. Bate's language is at once delicate and expressive. She held the attention of the large audience to the end of the lecture; and all went away wiser and better for the delightful lecture to which they had listened."

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Association shall be called the Free Religious Association, — its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief, — or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief, — or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote, — provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

Vol. I. is complete, and has been handsomely clothed. Price $1.00.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll says:—"Mr. Chaîney is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the Church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whitened sepulchre of superstition."

GOLDWIN SMITH says that the demand for cheap reading in America will prevent the establishment of an international copyright.

THE necessity of a land court to determine the rents of holdings in Ireland is very evident. In Cork, a case came up last week, in which a holding, where the valuation was only twenty-seven pounds sterling, rented at one hundred and thirteen pounds. We are not surprised that the justice admitted the statement "staggered him."

JAPAN has enacted a code of criminal procedure and a penal code based on the Code Napoleon, framed by a French jurist. The ancient laws of the empire, so far as consistent with modern jurisprudence, are retained. For beheading, hanging is substituted; and all classes, from the highest noble down to the poorest laborer, are subjected to the same procedure and punishment.

PRINCE BISMARCK recently entertained a prominent Jewish manufacturer, to whom he declared he would never entertain a proposition to curtail the constitutional rights of the Jews. Since election day, this adroit political manager has shown a disposition to make friends among all parties, except the Progressists, men like Virchow, Mommsen and Lasker, against whom he evidently intends to combine all the political forces which he can unite and direct in order to turn his recent defeat into a victory.

THE Transcript says "Washington is a wicked city," because, at the opening cases of the Star Route swindlers, the crowd came "to hear Bob Ingersoll," and were unmistakably in sympathy with the accused whom he defended. The class that a witty, eloquent pleader attracts in any city is in sympathy with him, whichever side he defends; and the applause is no evidence of the wickedness of the community or the justice of his cause. The "Star Route swindlers" are, so far as the public can judge, rightly named; but Ingersoll is their attorney, and he is an attractive orator. That is all.

HENRY BERGH says figures show that of all cities in the United States, Brooklyn has the largest number of instances of cruelty to animals. Yet this is the city of Beecher and Talmage. But possibly in other cities fewer protests and a smaller number of arrests are made in proportion to the number of the cruel acts perpetrated. It must be admitted that the progress of Christianity has not been accompanied by corresponding kindness in the treatment of brutes, for which indeed the Christian system makes no provision whatever.

THE Catholic priests in Canada are much disposed to meddle with political matters, and some of them have maintained that no good Catholics can sustain the liberal or reform party, appealing to the Vatican's condemnation of Liberalism to support their position. But Pope Leo, evidently seeing that such meddling on the part of the priests must increase opposition to the Church, has issued a decree stating that there is too much interference in politics by the clergy; and that in condemning Liberalism the Vatican does not mean to condemn all parties bearing the name "Liberal," but only those doctrines which are thus characterized.

THE confiscation of heterodox books by the Toronto custom-house officials brings to mind the following words from Macaulay in defence of the dramas of the Restoration: "To punish public outrages on morals and religion is unquestionably within the competence of rulers. But when a government, not content with requiring decency, requires sanctity, it oversteps the bounds which mark its functions. And it may be laid down that a government which attempts more than it ought will perform less. . . . A government which, not content with repressing scandalous excesses, demands from its subjects fervent and austere piety, will soon discover that, while attempting to render an impossible service to virtue, it has in truth only promoted vice."

"ZION'S HERALD" says that, if Dr. Thomas had simply "held" or but "occasionally" made evident his heterodoxy, he would not have been tried; but that he "openly and often affirmed and boasted that he held opinions upon vital points totally at variance with the standards of his Church." On which the Independent remarks that "the Methodist Episcopal Church is very tolerant of thinkers who do not proclaim their doubts from the pulpit." This is true of Christian churches generally. It is open and avowed scepticism and unbelief which they regard as especially sinful and deserving punishment. A premium is thus offered upon hypocrisy, and the result is that thousands of ministers preach and multitudes of people profess what they do not believe and privately condemn.

BISHOP HARRIS said, at the Episcopal Congress held recently at Providence, R.I.: "My purpose is to bring out distinctly the fact that Jesus is our contemporary and our King. The Christ is met to-day by the antichrist in those who deny his divinity as truly as he was met in this personal life in Judea; but none the less for this opposition is he the world's governor [and our contemporary and leader." We do not recognize Jesus either as a "king" or a "contemporary." If others so regard him, we insist only that in their recognition of him as a spiritual ruler they clearly distinguish between his declared province and that of the duly elected officers of this government, which derives its powers from the consent of the people, and that they in no way attempt to impose his authority upon those who regard him only as a brother man who lived and died nearly twenty centuries ago.

It is stated that more than two thousand converts to Mormonism left Liverpool the past summer to join their brethren beyond the Rocky Mountains. In Schleswig-Holstein alone, the Mormon missionaries have made three hundred converts. One steamer that left Liverpool for New York late in October had on board four hundred Mormons. Last month, twenty-four men, who came to this country a few years ago, newly-made converts to Mormonism, sailed from New York to labor abroad among people of their own nationality. The facility with which they get recruits and raise money in the Old World is remarkable. The Independent suggests "the formation of an anti-Mormon missionary society, whose object should be the sending out of missionaries to visit the countries where the Mormon agents are most active, and circulate information as to the true nature and designs of the Salt Lake emissaries." But the Mormons have methods by which they can easily reach the class from which they make converts, and arguments which appeal with peculiar force to the ignorant and superstitious; and they are not to be stopped or impeded in their work by the preaching or the ordinary representations of orthodox ministers, such as would probably go out from an anti-Mormon society. Indeed, it is probable that the movement suggested, if carried out, will give to Mormonism additional importance among the people, attract greater attention to the superstition, and result in enlarging the number of converts. The Mormon recruits come from those parts of Europe in which faith in orthodox Christianity is the strongest; and the mental condition of the people, which makes the work of the Mormon missionaries so successful, is due chiefly to the theological influences which have prevailed there.

WHO WAS THE FOUNDER OF CHRISTIANITY?

The course of lectures which Mr. J. W. Chadwick has just put into print under the title The Man Jesus, and which is commented upon in the book-notice department of this week's Index, forcibly suggests the question, though not directly raising it, how far Jesus can be considered the founder of Christianity. The special purpose of Mr. Chadwick in the lectures is to delineate Jesus simply in the character of man. Every thing supernatural concerning him is discarded; and the attempt is made to show how a purely human being, with a great genius for religion and a special instinct for goodness, could live as Jesus lived, and even proclaim himself the Messiah in a perfectly natural way. Mr. Chadwick accomplishes this purpose well. The new learning with regard to the origin and interpretation of the books of the New Testament makes it not impossible so to sift out the accretions of legend from the record as to leave a tolerably clear conception of what Jesus was and did as a natural human being. Yet it is one of the curious results of this work that, the more successfully it is done, the more completely does it isolate Jesus from the religion which professes to be founded upon him. As a man or as teacher and prophet of natural religion, he was as far from the standard of historical Christianity as he was from the Judaism which put him to death. And, in reading the sprightly pages from Mr. Chadwick's ready but well-equipped pen, one can but be impressed anew with the fact that all this fine manhood of Jesus appears to have held only a very slender relation to the inauguration and growth of the Christian Church.

The singular and often noted fact, for example, is pointedly brought out by Mr. Chadwick, that Paul, though preaching Christ (that is, the Messiahship of Jesus) as the sum and substance of his faith, had hardly a word to say about anything that Jesus ever taught or did in his human, living career on earth, and even boasted that he did not know him thus after the flesh, as if this ignorance of his simple humanity were an advantage. And yet, as Mr. Chadwick also says, it is altogether probable that, if it had not been for Paul, the movement that began with Jesus would have resulted merely in another Jewish sect instead of a new religion. It was Paul, who laid no stress on the human character of Jesus nor on his moral and religious precepts, but regarded him only in his official character as Messiah, who transferred the Christian movement from the narrow limits of Judaism to the broad world outside. The positiveness, too, of Mr. Chadwick in adhering to the theory which the latest criticism makes the more probable one, that the public career of Jesus was only a single year and confined mostly to his native Galilee, sets in still sharper contrast the smallness and simplicity of the beginning, with the world-wide and manifold complicated result called Christianity. Mr. Chadwick uses this theory of the brevity of Jesus' public life with epic effect in the development of the story. Yet it almost inevitably starts the question whether it is possible that one short year of one purely human life, however sweetly and grandly human, with no extraordinary miracle power to aid it, and with no extraordinary novelty of moral doctrine to teach, could have furnished the foundation of that mighty structure which became the Christian religion. Mohammed and Buddha founded religions, and Confucius partially reformed that of his country; but they each had many years for the work, and their respective characters and teachings appeared in the shaping of the work. Jesus labored at his mission for a single year in a small district; and, however noble his moral doctrine and his manner of life for that time, the religion that dates from him began with hardly an allusion to them, and culminated in a vast ecclesiastical and hierarchical system ostentatious in power and glory and the very farthest removed from his example and precept.

In truth, it cannot be maintained that Jesus, on the mere claims of his manhood, was the founder of Christianity. Paul, the first real organizer of Christianity, both in the sense of practically propagating it and of giving it a doctrinal system of thought, entirely ignored the mere manhood of Jesus. And historical Christianity has never shown that practical reverence for the human character of Jesus as to give it any right to the claim that it had its birth in his simple career as a prophet going about doing good and bearing witness to truth. Historical Christianity has always and naturally found the sources, both of its creed and its institutions, more in Paul than in Jesus. And Paul, more than Jesus, may be regarded as the actual founder of Christianity.

Paul built, it is true, upon a claim made in behalf of Jesus and which Jesus made for himself,—namely, that he was the looked-for Messiah. This, the official and not at all the human character of Jesus, furnished the foundation rock on which Paul built. But Paul himself was the founder and builder, the architect of the structure reared on this rock. The most that can be said for the fine human qualities of Jesus as an element in the origin of Christianity is that they drew people to the acceptance of him as the Messiah. And yet, when we remember how ready a multitude of people were at that time to flock to any standard that a claimant to the Messianic office should raise in Judea, we must be on our guard against asserting too much of the strength of this element. Possibly, Judas the Gaulonite might have been the accepted Messiah, if he had come at just the hour that Jesus did and met a similar tragic fate. And, in the aspects of his character as man, he would have made a more consistent head for the Christian Church than does Jesus. At least, amid the many uncertainties concerning the origin of Christianity, there is one fact of assured historical certainty, that it was not upon Jesus as man that Christianity was organized, but upon Jesus as Messiah. This opened the way for Paul's peculiar genius both as creed-maker and propagandist, whose Messianic theories in turn opened the way for the entrance of Greek philosophizing into Christian creeds, and whose abilities as an organizer led to the ultimate union of the Christian Church with imperial Rome.

WM. J. POTTER.

A REVIVAL OF DEMONOLOGY.

Rev. Austin Phelps, of Andover, in answer to the question, "How shall the Pulpit treat Spiritualism?" declares that there must be a revival of belief in a personal devil. He says:—

Make this kingdom of Satan a reality to the common mind, as it was two centuries ago to the ablest of the jurists and scientists of England; and then the common mind has a plain Biblical response at hand, when tempted to receive the revelations of Spiritualism as either an antidote or a supplement to the Christian Scriptures. The response is as philosophical as it is Biblical: "Get thee behind me, Satan."

Speaking to the same purpose in detail, I would say, Vivify the people's faith in the personality of Satan. Teach them that he is a Power in the universe whom God condescends to treat as a belligerent. Bring back the conception which the fathers had of him, as the head of an aristocratic empire, supported by a multitude of subordinates and auxiliaries. Revive the ancient faith in the intimacy of their converse with the minds of men, to the extent, possibly, of demoniacal possession. The Scriptures nowhere represent that infiction, be it disease or sin or both, as obsolete. Make it a reality to the popular imagination that we wrestle not with flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers. Instruct men to fear the craft rather than the force of malign tempters. Picture their power to charm men with fascinating revelations. Paint them as angels fallen, beings once of light and beauty; their sovereign, Lucifer, the light-bearer, son of the morning. Reproduce, with Biblical intensity, the great conflict of Right with Wrong in the Universe, as a conflict between God and Satan. Open men's eyes to the vision of this earth as the battle-ground of invisible combatants. Make them feel that the very air is tremulous with the march of spiritual battalions.

Here we see an educated theologian and a teacher using his position and his influence to revive the most frightful and pernicious superstition that has ever distorted the judgment of man and cursed the earth with cruelty and crime. During the years of the English Commonwealth, Lecky informs us "there is reason to believe that more alleged witches perished in England than in the whole period before and after"; and this "was simply the natural result of Puritanical teaching, acting on the mind, predisposing men to see Satanic influence in life, and consequently eliciting the phenomena of witchcraft." In this country, less than two hundred years ago, in consequence of the same teaching men and women were hanged, multitudes were thrown into prison; and "the evils of this epidemic," says Upham, "cast their shadow over a broad surface, and darkened the condition of generations." The ministers of Boston drew up an address to the commissioners, thanking them for their zeal and expressing the hope that it would never be relaxed. In England, witchcraft was defended by the clergy, "when the great bulk of educated laymen had abandoned it." In 1768, more than thirty years after the repeal of the disgraceful laws respecting witchcraft, John Wesley wrote: "It is true likewise that the English in general, and indeed most of the men of learning in Europe, have given up all accounts of witches and apparitions as mere old wives' fables. I am sorry for it, and I willingly take this opportunity of entering my solemn protest against this violent compliment which so many that believe the Bible pay to those who do not believe it." The last prominent trial for witchcraft in England was that of a woman, and a Hertfordshire clergyman was the prosecutor. In 1773, in Scotland, says Macaulay, "the divines of the Associated Presbytery passed a resolution, declaring their belief in witchcraft, and expressing deep regret at the scepticism that was common." And Lecky says this superstition "was produced by the clergy, and it was everywhere fostered by their persecutions; eagerly, passionately, with a thirst for blood that knew no mercy, with a zeal that never tired, did they accomplish their task." And now an orthodox minister and theological professor, in the State of Massachusetts, in the latter part of the nineteenth century, appeals to the pulpits of the land to exert their influence to revive the superstitious belief in a personal Satan "as the head of an aristocratic empire," and to make the people again "feel that the very air is tremulous with the march of spiritual battalions." What better proof is needed than that a merely theological education is worse than no education at all? It is no unimportant part of the work of Liberalism, by encouraging scientific habits of thought as well as by exposing the unfounded assumptions of theology, to neutralize and overcome such baneful influences as those exerted by men like the Rev. Dr. Phelps.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

"It is," says Paine, "necessary to the happiness of man that he be mentally faithful to himself. Infidelity does not consist in believing or in disbelieving, but in professing to believe what one does not believe."

SOME REASONS FOR THEISM.

In the Index for October 20 appeared an article entitled "How far is Evolution Compatible with Theism?" In this article, "a Methodist minister" concludes that the two are not compatible; and why? Curiously enough, because evolution does not seem to him consistent with his conception of Christianity. He thus naïvely identifies his view of a particular religion with theism,—as though the world did not contain several millions of theists who are not Christians at all!

On the other hand, many radical and self-styled scientific writers proceed to an elaborate demolition of some particular god or idol, and seem to fancy that they have thus abolished theism. Ceasing to believe in their own old conception of Deity, they imagine that any rational conception of God departed from the universe when their particular illusion vanished. If it shall turn out that there is no God, it will have to be made apparent by a sounder logic than this.

The above style of reasoning(?) makes it lamentably clear that what is needed at the outset is a definition. There is much discussion, which is like the Scotchman's definition of metaphysics, where one of the disputants "doesn't know what he is talking about, and the other one doesn't understand him." And the latter state of mind naturally follows from the former.

Let us then proceed to draw a few lines, and circumscribe our position.

1. A theistic belief is not necessarily a belief in the God of any particular religion, or the acceptance of any special theory yet advanced. Disproving hypotheses about God, or overthrowing mental idols of the past, is not the destruction of theism.

Yet many are called atheists, and many think themselves atheists, for no better reason than that they do not hold certain mental theories concerning God.

2. A theist does not necessarily believe in a God who existed before the universe and who made the universe, as a carpenter makes a house. Certain writers, when they have drawn an absurd picture of an idle God existing for an eternity in empty space, and then waking up and creating the world out of nothing, seem to think they have thus made intelligent theism impossible. They are only exposing the absurdity of popular fancies. And they make themselves as absurd when they suppose they are doing more than that.

3. Theism does not necessarily mean a God separate from, and outside of, the universe. When a man ceases to believe in a God having a definite form, seated on a throne, and ruling the world as a subject kingdom, he may not at all cease to be a theist.

4. Neither is theism disproved when it is shown that the universe does not appear to be governed as a perfectly wise and perfectly good man would be likely to govern it, had he the power. We are as yet hardly wise enough to know what a perfectly wise and good man would do, could he comprehend the universe and eternity at one glance. The question of theism is, Does God exist? not, Does such a God exist as we can at present comprehend and approve? Such a way of looking at it betrays a little of the geocentric egotism that forgets that there may be something else in the universe besides earth and man. It also overlooks the possibility that we may become wiser as time goes on.

As to the method of dealing with this subject, I believe there is only one. The whole domain of that which claims to be knowledge must submit itself to the scientific method. This method goes by the name of "scientific," for the simple reason that it was first applied and perfected in the domain of physical science. But it is the only method of knowledge, and it must come to be recognized in all departments of study if men are to succeed in discovering truth. Where there are no facts that can be observed, arranged, verified, there, in the proper sense of the word, there can be no knowledge. But thoughts and emotions—all we call mental and spiritual—are facts as truly as are rocks and fossils.

It follows, then, that dogmatism in either direction is ruled out of court. Atheistic or agnostic dogmatism is just as unscientific as is theistic dogmatism. If we cannot know that God is, surely no one, until he has fathomed the universe, is entitled to assert that he is not. And, until the ultimate capacity of the human mind is reached, no one is scientifically justified in saying, It is impossible to know.

One other preliminary point is important. If any one shall say, You are making your porch larger than the house will be, I will not defend myself as to the matter of proportion. I am not so anxious to get to my objective point as I am to walk an intelligible road and know where I am going.

Theological thinkers and writers have so long been frightened by the spook of anthropomorphism that it seems to me high time the spectre were laid. When any one attempts to speak of God, some "philosopher" straightway flings at him Goethe's phrase,—"Man never knows how anthropomorphic he is." And I am of opinion that the whole difficulty lies in the fact that he does not know. If he did, he would know that he is just as anthropomorphic in all other directions as he is in theology. And he would also know that, so long as he is a man,—anthropos,—he cannot possibly be anything else. And, more than that, I fail to see why he should want to be anything else.

Man exists only by virtue of being something, being limited, being individualized. He can only escape his present limitation by ceasing to be, or by becoming something else. If he knows at all, he must know as being something. If he does not know as being a man, it must be as being a horse or a dog or some other kind of creature. He must have some stand-point, and at present we know of no better one than that of a man. What, therefore, he knows in science, or in any other department of knowledge, he knows as a man: i.e., it is anthropomorphic knowledge.

But because he knows as a man, anthropomorphically, is it therefore not real knowledge? For us, it is the only real knowledge that is conceivable. The reality of pain is not less real, because it would not be pain to us if we were something else. We are what we are; and the only real knowledge for us is what things are to us. When men talk of escaping anthropomorphism, they are trying to lift themselves by their boot-straps and to fling themselves thus beyond the limit of the horizon. When, for example, we speak of intelligence, we mean that which manifests itself to us as such, and that is all we can mean by it anywhere.

We will now proceed to raise the question as to whether we know anything that bears on the problem of theism. I propose to simplify the matter as much as possible, and keep myself to two or three points.

1. We know that a power exists which is not man. To this power, we can set no limits. We cannot even conceive any limits. It existed before man, and would exist just the same were humanity swept off the face of the earth. By this power we were brought into being, have been made what we are, and on it we every moment depend.

2. This power manifests itself everywhere as a most wondrous order. Leave one side all talk of design, plan, purpose; intelligible order is everywhere. From dust grains under our feet to the arrangement of galaxies over our heads, from the first tiny globule of protoplasm up through the ascending ranks of life to man,—everywhere an order that only grows upon our wonder as we study it.

So much of course is undisputed. Have we now a right to speak of the power thus manifested as intelligent? If not, then we have no right to use this word at all. What do we mean by intelligence? What do we mean when we say a man or an animal is intelligent? We mean that his actions, words, movements, the manifestations of his life, correspond to what we call the rational order of our thought. That is all we do mean or can mean. Tried by this test, the universe, outside of man, is unspeakably a grander manifestation of intelligence than all that the history of humanity itself makes us acquainted with. And then, beyond that, we must not forget that humanity itself is only another manifestation of this same power.

3. What we call mind does exist. It is the one thing of which we are directly conscious, while matter is only an inference.

I wish here to fasten attention on two distinct points:—

(1) If man is only a bit of nature, and shows, like a specimen brick, the material of the whole, then mind also is in nature.

(2) A theory is good only as it explains, or may be conceived to explain, the facts. Now, it is asserted by such men as Spencer, Fiske, Huxley, Du Bois-Reymond, and others, that scientific materialism has broken down. It not only fails to explain consciousness, thought, love; but they declare that the gulf between molecular motions and mind is one the bridging of which is even unthinkable. On the other hand there are thinkable and rational theories for the explanation of "matter" from the stand-point of him who conceives the universe as essentially "spirit."

He, then, who stands by what is at present scientifically known cannot be a materialist.

3. The power that manifests itself through the universe is, then, intelligent, according to the strict and only proper definition of that word. But is there any rational ground for holding that this intelligence is conscious? Hartmann believes in the intelligence, but denies the consciousness. But it seems to me that here is unwarranted dogmatism of the negative type. The true method of science is to argue from the known toward the unknown. If, then, we keep ourselves to what we know, we shall stand by the fact that all the intelligence of which we know anything is conscious intelligence. Wherever, then, we find a manifestation of intelligence, we must hold the provisional belief that it is conscious until the contrary is proved.

4. The above points alone seem to me to prove the existence of a power to which no less a name is fitting than that of God. If the words "nature" or "universe" are used, they will need to be redefined so as to cover what, in their common use, is excluded by them. I care not for the name, if the reality is expressed by it.

But, before men can be persuaded that there is a being deserving of their adoration, they want to know at least one thing more, i.e., as to whether this power is good.

In the Index for October 27, Mr. Adler has a strong sermon on this very point. He thinks we have no right to believe in the existence of a good God. The sum total, however, of his argument is the fact that, as yet, our ideal of happiness and virtue is not realized in the actual universe.

But, to my mind, the simple fact that his grand ideal of goodness exists at all is a fact of some significance. How came it to be in a universe that, at heart, is either bad or indifferent? For this ethical ideal and demand are themselves manifestations of the power that exists in and works through the universe.

John Stuart Mill thinks we may believe that this power is good, if we give up the belief in its omnipotence. But evolution seems to me to meet and answer the difficulty of Mill. Things, as we see them, are only in process, not done yet. A luscious summer sweetening may be bitter the early part of June. Had a man never seen a ship except half done and on the stocks, what would his ideas of navigation be?

Consider two or three points in order:—

1. Things are growing. Finis coronat opus. Let him pronounce the work bad who sees it done.
2. The relative amount of suffering in the world is largely exaggerated.

"Nature red in tooth and claw," is a striking poetic figure. But, since all lower life must die, I believe it to be true that the animals suffer less as things are than they would if left to die of old age, of incapacity to get food, and so of starvation. And, since pain is an indication of disease,—physical, social, or political,—and so of disorder, it is scientifically demonstrable that pain is in the same relative minority that disorder itself is. That things exist at all is proof that good and order are in the majority. That things progress is proof that they are on the increase. The editor of the Popular Science Monthly, in the November number, expresses the opinion that the good wrought for man, by the natural forces that sometimes devastate and destroy, is at least a million times greater than all the evil.

3. It is inconceivable that a capacity for pleasure should exist without the possibility of its opposite.

4. Who knows enough to say that pain is essentially evil? So far as we know, it is only a signal marked "Danger," set up on the limits of those laws which are the very conditions of individual existence. Pain is the stern master that drives us away from those courses of conduct that threaten our destruction.

5. Both good and happiness are on the increase. And, when men shall have learned the art of life,—we are beginning to gain glimpses of its outlines,—there is hardly a conceivable limit to what is possible both of goodness and of gladness.

And, if any one says that we who live and die before that time refute the theory of the benevolence of the universe toward the individual, it will be incumbent on that person to prove two things: first that even our present checkered life is not worth while; and, secondly, that the well-nigh universal hope of a continued existence is not true.

M. J. SAVAGE.

BEGINNINGS.

The first thinkers were always talking about "beginnings," were always going back to a time or no time, when there was nothing except chaos, as it was called. The primitive theologians got over all difficulties by means of their imaginations, which called into existence a highly ingenious supreme personage styled a or the Creator. How he originated of course was never explained. Standing or sitting in the Néant or Void of primeval nothingness, the Creator by his mere fai summoned into existence Cosmos. Thus, the sum of things was accounted for without the least difficulty, if no impertinent questions were asked. Meantime, the metaphysicians tell us that an absolute beginning or end is unthinkable. Which was first the egg or the hen? We have at last found out that our minds are incapable of dealing with ultimate facts, of accounting for anything. Ephemerals, we come to consciousness in an environment of earth and sky and sea, with all their phenomenal belongings and characteristics. This Natura Rerum, which environs us,

"Was ere we were born,
And lasts when we are dead."

The oldest historic man and the prehistoric man found themselves in substantially the same natural surroundings which we of the current period know. For aught that any conscious being ever knew, nature always existed, as it exists now. All the cosmogonic traditions found in Genesis and other old documents were the merest dreams and imaginations of primitive poets and prophets, who must need account for the sensible world. "In the beginning" was the favorite formula of these old dreamers. The forces which pervade and constitute Cosmos were as fresh and vigorous a million years ago as they are now. They take no note of time. It is we ephemerals who talk about time, duration. The circle is the symbol of nature. It has neither beginning nor end. It is perpetually entering into and emerging from itself. Nature is in the present tense.

"No ray is dimmed, no atom worn,
My oldest force is good as new;
And the fresh rose on yonder thorn
Gives back the bending heavens in dew."

We have at last recognized the fact of our mental imbecility in the presence of the mystery of existence, the open secret; and we have ceased to say "in the beginning," for time is a mode of consciousness, a form of sensibility, and not something thetical and positive. Phenomena are undergoing ceaseless changes, but the forces pervading, upholding, and constituting phenomena are eternal.

"Still on the seeds of all he made
The rose of beauty burns;
Through times that wear and forms that fade,
Immortal youth returns."

Yes: immortal youth gleams triumphantly over the changing phenomenal universe, like a rainbow over a cataract. We cannot cease to use the language of personification; that is, to humanize nature or interpret it in terms of humanity. But we have at last grown wise enough to be no longer misled by our anthropomorphic tendency. We at last know that we are little ephemeral minnows swimming about in an infinitesimally little creek of Cosmos, and so we no longer undertake to account for the All in terms of our own narrow nature. But, small as we are, our consciousness can mirror in its depths a vast tract of the outlying universe. With a telescope, we can take in a tremendous amount of stellar space, which may be called a human domain, in virtue of our comprehending it in our vision. Thus, human nature is not without its grandeur. Our intelligence can partially comprehend and understand the world. Thus, ephemerals though we be, in virtue of our consciousness we are sublime.

"In the third drop himself he flings,
And conscious law is King of Kings."

Thus, it is on the moral side of our nature that we are consciously allied to Eternal Power, and transcend the petty limits of mortality. Our bodies, even in their prime of beauty and strength, are mere rags, perishing, noisome vestures of decay; but our regulative faculty, or pure reason, is a spark in us of that infinite might

"Which preserves the stars from wrong," and which keeps

"The most ancient heavens forever fresh and strong."

THE BATTLE BETWEEN ARISTOCRACY AND DEMOCRACY IN ENGLAND.

The land problem and the church problem in England suggest questions that touch the very root of society. In the United States there are no longer (since slavery received its death-blow) living issues in politics. A stranger finds Americans divided into two camps of Republicans and Democrats, but he finds no vital fact corresponding to these party watchwords. In Europe, it is different. There is to be heard constantly the loud clash of contending creeds: there is to be seen the death-struggle between opposing systems. Men of the same mental calibre, of similar education or attainments, might conceivably be Republican or Democrat. But, in Europe, the friend of progress is separated by a deep and wide gulf from the champion of reaction: they must fight, for they have scarcely anything in common. Now, England stands in this matter midway between Europe and the United States. There are not in England persons so devoted to Old World ideas as the French Legitimists, for instance, or the Prussian Junkers. At any rate, if there are, the number is so small as to be of no account. Every one in England is, to a greater or less extent, compelled to acquiesce in progressive doctrines; but there is a wide difference as to their application. The real truth is this: that the battle is between aristocracy and democracy, not between progress and reaction, in the Continental sense. The aristocracy are progressive in a sense in which the aristocracy of the Continental countries never have been; but the aristocracy will not submit patiently to any attack on their own position. They are quite willing that improvements should be made, that reforms should be effected, but they instinctively draw the line around their own fortified intrenchments. They believe in "government for the people," but not "of the people" or "by the people." They constantly aim at directing the movements of the people in accordance with the spirit and tone of their own system. Hitherto, the aristocracy have undoubtedly largely succeeded in preserving their prestige and position. They have accomplished this by tact, by partial concession to popular demands, and by the character and ability of those worthy members of the peerage who redeem the whole body from the possible charge of intellectual and moral insignificance that would otherwise be brought against them. But now the question is whether the aristocracy can hold their ground, in view of the onslaught on that land system on which English aristocracy is founded? Here, on the one side, are millions of landless people toiling for their daily bread, and with no hope of obtaining ownership in the land of their country; blighted agriculture and ruined farmers; a peasantry which is a scandal to civilization; and the commerce and industry of the nation impeded by artificial and preventable causes. On the other hand are a few landlords, their friends and supporters, who have managed by dint of every art which the strong can use against the weak to swallow up the greater portion of the land. The former have on their side the tendencies of the age, the Zeitgeist, the generous aspirations of humanity, and the reforming energy of England's most fertile minds. The latter have prescription, tradition, the existing law and social order, and the dead weight of inertia which innovators must meet in every land and every age. Can this latter body hold their own against the attack of the reformers? Can they secure compromise and conciliation, or must a bitter battle be fought out, resulting in the complete overthrow of landlordism? My answer is that it altogether depends on the degree of wisdom possessed by the aristocracy. Have they real public spirit, generosity, devotion to their country? If they can show that they are possessed by these ideas, it seems to me highly probable that their fall may be broken, and that no violent change will be made in England's internal polity.

If the aristocracy raise the flag of "no surrender," and determine to resist at all costs the attempts that are being made to modify the land laws of England, their failure, their humiliation, their ruin, is as certain as the dawn of another day. This is the calm opinion of one who writes from a non-partisan stand-point; sympathizing, indeed, entirely with the radical movement, but endeavoring to estimate clearly the real facts of the case, with a mind unwarped by prejudice. I will give very briefly my reasons for taking this view. In the first place, it is absolutely certain that great changes must be made before long in the system of land tenure; and, secondly, it is equally certain that these changes must be in the direction of what we somewhat vaguely call popular rights and democratic principles, from monopoly to the diffusion of wealth and resources. This is admitted by conservatives themselves. There is scarcely a man in England who would care to affirm his belief that the old semi-feudal land tenure has five years more of life in it. Farmers cannot make farming pay, unless they have control of large capital and are free from landlord dictation; and farmers cannot give to their laborers that rate of wage which is necessary to meet the ordinary demands of life. Under these circumstances, landlords themselves would be glad to see some change, provided their social position were not affected thereby; for rents are now reduced, and landlords must find it difficult (seeing how burdened their lands are with all manner of legal encumbrances) to keep up their great estates. Farms are now going begging; some of them being offered almost for nothing, but meeting with no tenant. Landlord pretensions are already lowered in the face of American competition and bad harvests. All these things show clearly that change must come; and, if I were giving advice to the aristocracy, I would suggest to them that they should put themselves at the head of a reforming movement, so as to limit this change as far as is consistent with the necessities of the situation. For on the other hand there is, as I believe, no general desire throughout the masses of the people for revolutionary change. I make this statement with all diffidence, knowing how difficult it is really to gauge the public sentiment, to understand (in the words of John Morley) the "strange voices and faint reverberations from out of the vague and cavernous shadow in which the common people move." But my experience of the English working classes—and I have had a good deal—leads me to doubt whether the revolutionary violence of Germany or France finds any real response among them. They are indeed progressive, and the thoughtful among them are nearly all radical; but they have no sympathy with violent methods, and it is all but impossible to rouse any such sympathy among them. Their present attitude on the Irish question seems to me to confirm this view. Whatever may be the errors and even crimes of the extreme Irish party, it is at least certain that they are fighting for the abolition of the aristocratic system of land tenure,—of "landlordism," in short. But how do the English workingmen regard them? The reception of Mr. Gladstone at Leeds indicates what their feeling is; for Leeds is a great hive of industry, a place which contains tens of thousands of workingmen. The character of the people's representatives in Parliament tells the same tale. After making every allowance for the difficulty experienced by a poor man in getting into Parliament, it must be admitted that the difficulty could be removed if the people liked; and the only inference one can draw is that they are contented to be represented by wealthy capitalists, and do not really care for poor radical authors, journalists, and workmen. A further proof of the attitude of the people toward the revolutionary party is to be found in the fact that at nearly every conference on the land question, attended by delegates who represent the people, proposals for what is called the "nationalization of the land" (i.e., for the abolition of private ownership) have been rejected by large majorities. I am not now concerned to approve or disapprove of this action of the people. I merely record it, as indicating, in my judgment, the essentially conservative character of the English people, and their aversion to new theoretical views. The inference I am compelled to draw from all this is that, if the aristocracy choose to settle the question by timely and judicious compromises, they have, in my opinion, a very fair chance of maintaining their position for some time to come. Whether we shall find them endowed with this wisdom is hard to predict. At present, it cannot be said that the tendency is in this direction; and in my next paper I shall point out the means they are adopting for staving off the inevitable crisis.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

NEIGHBORLY OPINIONS.

The wide stretch of water between America and Great Britain has dwindled to an insignificant barrier under the developments of modern commerce; and the broils of one section or another of the opposite shores become matters of daily discussion, wholly independent of the intervening miles. Very free judgments of what ought or ought not to be done are volunteered, with little allowance for insufficient means of estimate. However, a thoughtful English writer has said, in reviewing some time ago the attitude of home affairs, "Wise men of England perceived, long before O'Connell was heard of, that Catholics must be given the full rights of citizens"; and he quotes from Burke, "Our Constitution is not made for great, general, or proscriptive exclusions. Sooner or later, it will destroy them, or they will destroy the Constitution." Said Grattan, "Bigotry may survive persecution, but it can never survive toleration."

It is sufficiently clear that high-handed refusal in Ireland to meet the most obvious demands of social order must be dealt with summarily in some adequate fashion; and no one with average sanity expects to see a chief ruler lay his neck into the mud for the populace to march over. But any fair amount of candid reasoning will give a verdict against the attempt to govern successfully under protracted coercion. Even taking into view all the puerilities and stubbornness that crop out of the common surface of rational complaint, a certain proportion of inherent self-control and decent ambition in the whilom turbulent mass, surely existing, although latent for the excited moment, is the only natural and available ally for genuine legal management. At any rate, it is a questionable method of discipline to cut and slash toward all points of the compass, in order to hit somewhere the guiltiest victims. Neither is it precisely the most economical course to burn a house down for the purpose of fumigating some particular corner of the building.

The main aspect of English affairs in the bulk betrays the temper of enlightened suffrage and the tone of liberal yearning too manifestly for a fatal continuance of desperate measures. And the volatile dependants, beneath and beyond their rash demonstrations, are still human, still within reach in calmer moments for the infusion of essential principles of national vigor, when conveyed through channels unobstructed by an overbearing policy.

A recognition of the value of intelligence and a sense of shame at the pitiful figure made by untaught emigrants from her shores when landed beyond the seas, and the initial steps for reform in their school methods at home, are beginning to creep into the scene in the midst of Ireland's unfortunate turmoil. Let the principle of thoroughness in even the simplest foundations of mental culture once take root among the people there will be hope of the final growth of the crowning branch of all acquirements, rational self-government.

MR. SAVAGE'S QUESTION.

In the Index of November 1, Mr. Savage inquires why I class Mr. Spencer among materialists. Definitions are loose in formative philosophy. I am very willing to give up Mr. Spencer, if Mr. Savage insists. He (Mr. Spencer) is an evolutionist and an agnostic. He does not believe in a personal God or in the immortality of the soul; i.e., he thinks we know nothing whatever on these points and cannot discuss them; but he claims (en passant and not as a primary tenet) an "inscrutable power" behind phenomena. Elsewhere, he identifies this "inscrutable power" with force, calling the latter "the unknown quantity which must forever remain unknown." But in the very next paragraph he stipulates that the unknown force and the unknown power are not to be thought of as the same. Indeed, he has constructed a metaphysical trinity of his own, consisting of "matter," "force," and "power" (see First Principles, chapter iii.), just as unthinkable and illogical as that of Saint Augustine. But, while he is speculatively a metaphysician, he is practically a materialist; and, having tied himself into a most unphilosophical knot with his "absolute," his "unknowable," his "force," and his "inscrutable power," he wisely devotes the bulk of his writings to magnificent expositions of physics and of utilitarian ethics. The real point at issue between modern philosophers is whether the laws of thought demand an Absolute behind the phenomenal, or whether the phenomenal itself satisfies the mind. The truth is that some minds require this idea of the Absolute (which is the metaphysical equivalent of God in theology) and other minds stop satisfied with phenomena. Mr. Spencer's mind seems to require the metaphysical prop. On the whole, I think I will give him up.

M. A. HARDAKER.

In an able editorial of the New York Times is presented a comparative view of the Irish and American land system, showing that the Irish tenant has extraordinary rights and privileges under Gladstone's act, which American farm tenants have never enjoyed, nor once thought of asking; and in regard to the Irish tenant, who, it is affirmed, has a security of tenure at a rent which impartial tribunals consider fair and reasonable, who is compensated for improvements he has made, has the privilege of selling his rights of possession in open market, is protected against arbitrary ejectment, and enjoys unusual facilities in paying his arrears of rent, the Times says: "Nature may be against him, agrarian pauperism may have paralyzed his energies, but British law is now unequivocally on his side. His brethren may be prospering in America, 'the Irish paradise,' but they are dependent entirely upon their own exertions, and are not favored by exceptional legislation such as the Land Act."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates? We shall also be pleased to receive names and addresses of persons likely to be interested in the Index, to whom we can send sample copies.

"THE Rev. A. N. Alcott, of Fredericksburg, Ohio, says the Presbyterian, having withdrawn from the Presbyterian Church, formed a Cumberland Presbyterian church in that place, and joined a Presbytery in that church. Lately, he has become a correspondent of the Free Religious Index, and avowed his disbelief in miracles in the following remarkable way: 'While we negate much, we posit more. The miraculous and the final we negate.' The Cumberland Presbyterians, feeling restive under this advancement toward open infidelity, expressed themselves so distinctly that Mr. Alcott has withdrawn from that church, and his name has been stricken from the roll of Miami Presbytery. He proposes to take an "independent position in the ministry."

D. R. LOCKE, who has been to Ireland investigating the condition of the inhabitants of that "distressed country," writes thus to the Toledo Blade: "Irish landlordism is condensed villany. It is the very top and summit of oppression, cruelty, brutality, and terror. It was conceived in lust and greed, born of fraud, and perpetuated by force. It does not recognize manhood, womanhood, or childhood. Its cold hand is upon every cradle in Ireland. Its victims are the five millions of people in Ireland who cannot get away, and the instruments used are bayonets and ball cartridges. It is a ghoul that would invade graveyards, were there any profit to be gotten out of graveyards. It is the coldest-blooded, cruellest infamy that the world has ever seen, and that any race of people were ever fated to groan under. Irish landlordism is legal brigandage, it is an organized hell."

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal, referring to the public debate on evolution between General Garfield and William Denton, which occurred some twenty years ago, says of the former: "In this debate, he showed marked fairness and ability; but he gained new views which he never forgot, and which opened to new avenues of thought and study. To the Church of his youth, he always adhered, to the religious teachings of a deep-souled mother, he always paid reverent regard; yet he saw the light that shone out into wider and richer realms. No word of his is on record, condemning people for their religious opinions or sending them to perdition for heresy. He held sacred his own convictions, but held liberty of conscience for others equally sacred, and was free from Pharisaism or dogmatism. . . . He was a representative of a large class of men and women still in the churches, yet thinking far beyond them."

COL. INGERSOLL, in his second article in the North American Review, wrote, "Law does not cause the phenomenon, but the phenomenon causes the idea of law in our minds; and this idea is produced from the fact that under like circumstances the same phenomenon always happens." Judge Black, in his letter in the Philadelphia Press, in reply to Col. Ingersoll's article, says: "Mr. Ingersoll is much accused of plagiarism. Whether that be true or not of his declamatory spouting, this notion that the material world is not governed by law is, without doubt, original. It never entered any human head before; and I think that, in all future time, it will find no lodgement in the mind of any reasonable being." The mere fact that Judge Black had never before heard of this conception of law, and supposed therefore that it originated with Col. Ingersoll, is of itself sufficient evidence of his unfitness to discuss philosophical questions pertaining to the Christian theology. In an essay published several years ago, the writer of this paragraph presented the same thought on this subject as follows: "In the conception of the cosmos enters the idea of law. The word 'law' is a generalized expression of the manner in which phenomena occur." In strictness of speech, things are not subject to nor governed by law. We observe certain uniform processes, and these processes or modes of action we call 'laws.' They do not govern nature in any sense of the word, and to speak of nature as subject to law is to use an expression that is not only loose, but which involves a palpable error." This view of law was no more original with the writer of this paragraph than it was with Col. Ingersoll. It is presented with clearness and fullness, not only in Problems of Life and Mind by George Henry Lewes, but in the earlier writings of the same author. Of course, Ingersoll did not give this any more than the other thoughts in his article as original; but it was beyond the comprehension of Judge Black, and therefore seemed to him absurd; and he was very willing, while intimating plagiarism in other respects, to credit his eloquent antagonist with originality here.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Christian Union becomes very eloquent in denouncing Mr. Robert G. Ingersoll's reply to Judge Black in the last number of the North American Review. We agree with the Union that Mr. Ingersoll often seems to be wasting his argumentative energies against church creeds and views of the Bible that have become obsolete. But then we remember that there is still a great multitude of people who are not so advanced in rationalism as are the Index and the Union. Judge Black, for instance, is not. He still believes in the "medieval" Christian theology from which the Union is (largely) emancipated. And Mr. Ingersoll's article, though not to us specially instructive or enjoyable, is a fitting enough reply to these Christian representatives of mediævalism. There are many people, for instance, in Evangelical churches who will not yet accept the Christian Union's definition of Christianity, quoted below,—people who, doubtless, will think it heretical, and who might ask, if Christianity is thus defined, what is to distinguish it from the moral and spiritual substance of several other religions or from pure theism:—

Jesus has come to inspire moral and spiritual life in the hearts and experiences of men. He came neither to found a church organization nor to formulate a church dogma. These are no more the essentials of his religion than the binder's boards and the printer's ink are the essentials of literature. One is convenient to preserve it, the other is convenient to express it. But Christianity is neither in the body nor in the expression, neither in the Church nor in the dogma, neither ecclesiasticism nor theology. It is a new and divine life. It is courage, purity, truth, goodness, fidelity, trust, patience, love. It is doing justly, loving mercy, walking humbly before God. It is being faithful with Joseph in prison, and heroic with Moses in the wilderness. It is singing songs with David in sorrow, and proclaiming truth with Paul in Athens and Rome. It is living soberly, righteously, and godly. It is loving God with all the heart and soul and strength, and one's neighbor as one's self. It is the life of God in the soul of man.

THE Christian Register prints a prose-poem, by Dr. Bartol, in the shape of a sermon on Children, from which we take the following passage on their capacity as teachers:—

We neglect our opportunities, if we do not find out what they (the children) would say, here or there. O man, weaving your schemes for profit or fame, coming home from shop or exchange absent-minded and anxious, with the knots on your brow, too much absorbed for more than a moment's dandling or fondling of the child whose pupil you do not dream that you are or might be, would you be perhaps astonished to be told it is ordained as much as any minister to preach, that it is chosen as any preceptor or professor in college or academy, that it is indeed a living textbook, as truly as any Testament or catechism old or new, and that the members of the Sunday-class can return as much as they receive from superintendent or teacher; and the year-old boys and girls impart ideas, with an exchange in your favor of their questions and ideas and aspirations for your facts and thoughts? For these are live manuals for you: do not underrate, but improve your privilege.

THE religious as well as the secular press is administering deserved rebuke to the Rev. Dr. Hatfield, who was one of the prosecuting counsel in the recent heresy trial of Dr. Thomas, for his coarse and abusive harangue in closing the case. The Independent says, "It was nearly on the level, in language, of the ordinary police-court address; and we wonder how a committee of fifteen decent and sensible men could listen to it without uttering a protest against it." The same paper well adds:—

What sort of spectacle does this trial present to the world? Dr. Thomas was accused of heresy; and many seem still, although the Middle Ages have long been past, to regard a heretic as among the worst of mortals. His brother ministers sat in judgment upon him. In what kind of spirit ought they to have tried him? They were sitting ostensibly for the defence of the cause of Christ. The spirit of Christ is full of love and gentleness; and yet the unbiassed spectators of the trial observed with astonishment that there was more of this spirit on the side of the heretic than on that of the accusers. Heresy trials are not seldom demoralizing at best, and no church can afford to have many of them; but, when one accused of doctrinal unsoundness is pursued as men hunt a bear or a rabid dog, the cause of true religion must suffer.

Few journals have more to say about religion than the Boston Investigator. Yet we suspect it will object to being spoken of under the "Religious Press." In view, however, of a criticism it recently made of the Index and one of the editors, we wish simply to call its attention to the fact that the terms "Christian" and "Infidel" by no means exhaust the beliefs and attitude of people on this earth respecting religion; and that, consequently, one may not accept either of these names and yet not be chargeable with "non-committalism." Our venerable neighbor must have once known this obvious fact, but appears to have forgotten it.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 10, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

For the Free Religious Index. THE ETHICS OF SERVICE.

By W. S. KENNEDY.

In the second volume of his Democracy in America, M. de Tocqueville gives in a brief chapter a few hints toward a study of the relation of master and servant in the United States. Amid the great number of before-unheard-of social phenomena that have sprung out of the experiment of American democracy, this matter of the relation of employer to employed is one that is assuming very large and very disagreeable proportions. The whole subject is in a miserably unsettled and unsatisfactory condition.

The fact of the present disagreeable state of things is very patent, and the reasons for it are very patent: the cure is more difficult, because involving exertion of moral energy; and an increase of exertion is always distasteful. In a country like this,—where there are no well-defined and insuperable class distinctions, but where one who is to-day servant may to-morrow be master,—the public, for obvious reasons, is disposed to bear a great deal of nonsense from its servants. It is very tender of their feelings; and this tenderness only increases the sulkiness and surliness of the discontented. In business transactions, the good nature of those people who are likely by a reversal of fortune, or any other vicissitude, to pass from the ranks of the served to the ranks of the servers, is regarded by the employé as indicating an impertinent assumption of superiority and a secret chuckling over his subordinate position; while the good nature of the confessed superior is regarded as condescension and patronage. The result is innumerable collisions, flushed faces, flashing eyes, secret tears, and all sorts of disagreeable things. The clerk, shop-keeper, and car-conductor become suspicious, peevish, insolent, ill-natured; while the public, in self-defence, waxes wroth and hot and arrogant. Among servants, "no one knows exactly what he is or what he may be or what he ought to be," but is pretty sure to think himself the most ill-treated of mortals, and far from occupying the position which his or her exalted gifts entitle him or her to occupy. Such persons "consent to serve, and they blush to obey: they like the advantages of service, but not the master." You meet them everywhere, as clerks in stores, as street-car conductors, steam-boat, railway, and hotel officials, government officials, policemen, mechanics, and common laborers. You are never sure, in transacting a piece of business with a public servant who is a stranger to you, that you will not have your feelings shocked by some display of spleen or insolence. In refreshing contrast to this class are the few who are not above their business, who are at the height of their ambition, feel themselves in their chosen and proper sphere, and are consequently good-natured and contented. Persons of this class are mostly individuals of foreign birth, who were of adult age before they left their own country. But not a few are native Americans. One feels that he is peculiarly in luck when chance brings him into relation with one of these cheery, hearty fellows. It is an amazing relief to feel certain that you are not any moment in danger of treading upon the tender toes of an ambitious fellow-citizen. You respect your man more, too; acquire a real affection for him often, and on both sides everything is calm, settled, and agreeable. There is one other extremely small class of public servants who are both cultivated and courteous, who blend dignity with attentiveness, firm self-respect and pride with respect for others. We feel for these the deepest regard. They have aspiration, culture, and pride, and yet know how to serve others with graciousness. We have known persons to fill what would ordinarily be considered a subordinate position with such immovable dignity and sweetness of temper that the relation between them and the public seemed reversed: the servant became the master, and seemed to you as one who was voluntarily conferring favors upon his fellows, benignly scattering around him rich largesses of smiles, good-will, and help. Such persons may actually make the humblest and to the falsely sensitive most galling of offices seem a rare and fortunate prize, something to be envied and striven for. Such is the agreeable illusory charm that choice and distinguished manners throw around any office. In every community there are a few such rare individuals. They are popular favorites; all delight to do them honor; they gain entrance to any circle which their circumstances or education make it pleasant for them to enter. The writer has in mind a Scotch policeman whom he formerly knew of, and who for the extreme dignity and sweetness and royal courtesy of his manners had been for years detailed by the city government to serve the public in one of the great railway depots of Connecticut. He was a universal favorite. It had become a pleasant little custom for the mayor to present him every Thanksgiving day with the finest turkey to be found in the city. And he received other attentions and honors. He was a tall man of magnificent physique, handsome as a god, and in perfect health. You felt flattered almost if he spoke to you. He looked and acted the king.

It is such persons as these who should serve as exemplars to all who are called upon at any time to act as public servants. The truth is that every honest man in a democracy is a public servant: if he is not, he is no better than a criminal, and is actually treated as such by the law. If it were a possible thing for a man to entirely isolate himself from his fellows, exert no influence upon them for good, pay no taxes, and hoard up his wealth (like a miser) from all beneficial investment, and still avail himself of all the inestimable privileges of organized society, men would justly look upon him as a public enemy and a thief. No: we are all public servants in one sense, from the street-cleaner up to the President. But, as things go, there are distinctions. Some kinds of service are wrongly held to lower one,—as if any kind of beneficent labor could be degrading! Only fools and snobs think so. But it must be confessed that fools and snobs are alarmingly numerous. The only remedy for the discontented employé or public servant is self-respect and a firm insistence upon the intrinsic dignity and value of his work or calling.

After all that can be said or done, discontent will always be present in some degree in a democracy where we have la carrière ouverte aux talens, and where tailors and tanners and shoemakers may boldly grasp the highest offices. Tocqueville says that, on travelling through this country, what most surprised him was the innumerable number of persons striving to emerge from their original condition. That it is possible to do this is the cause of discontent in the minds of the lazy and incompetent, but of cheerful and energetic toil in the case of the plucky and competent. When you see a clerk sulking and ill-natured, because he imagines himself in an inferior position, ten to one but he is an arrant blockhead, or at any rate is not underplaced, but overplaced: he was not fit to be promoted to the honorable position of a public servant; i.e., a public benefactor. For in an ideal state of society, where perfect honesty and mutual understanding existed, all altruistic acts, even the selling of a shoe to a man, would be considered as affording more pleasure to the doer than to the recipient, and hence would be striven for as occasions for the experiencing of pleasure. This is so in a measure now, as Herbert Spencer shows in his Data of Ethics, and as every man's experience will verify. And the consummation of such a state of things is to be approximated to as fast as possible. But this is wandering from the line of thought a little. What has thus far been said may be summed up as follows: The office of a public servant is an honorable and responsible one. The best defence of the employed is self-respect and dignity. One serves not because he is necessarily inferior to the man or men he serves, but because he covenants, for a certain compensation, to do a portion of the honorable work of society. Those with whom he makes his contract may be, and often are, his equals or inferiors in every sense.

Hitherto, we have regarded but one side of the question. The public is just as much to blame, has just as many shortcomings and just as many duties as the public official. The official might, it is true, if he could be perfect master of himself at all times, come off unscathed from interviews with the most obstreperous ass, Philistine, oil-nabob, or fool of any kind. But he is but human, alas! Therefore, he may justly ask that the public do its part in the attempt to reach a pleasant mutual understanding. The attitude toward a public servant which should be maintained by a true gentleman is one of easy courtesy and dignity. The finer qualities of mind and heart a man has, the more sedulously will he take care to be urbane and courteous to one occupying the position of a server of others,—especially in the present false state of opinion, when there are so many sore feelings and chagrins on the part of the employed. Unfortunately, the mass of men do not possess these choice manners. American manners are probably the worst in the whole world, unless it be those of Germans. It is our national and distinguishing vice, our weak spot. Many a tribe of savages, or such people as the Hindoos, Chinese, Japanese, can laugh to scorn our unpolished and often disgustingly "natural" manners. When one considers the innumerable host of American bores, bores, and blockheads, one is inclined to wonder not that our officials are so petulant and sulky, but that they do not all die off at once. Our public clerks when dying should order an auger to be carved upon their tombstones. It is these ill-mannered persons who spoil the temper of the public official. And then when an absent-minded, innocent individual comes along, one who has the instincts of a gentleman, but who has not been so situated as to have brought forcibly to his notice the necessity for especial care in dealing with thin-skinned officials,—when such a person meets one of the said sore-headed officials, he is thunderstruck at the treatment he receives; more, he is hurt, and perhaps his happiness is spoiled for the day. So, for the lack of good manners upon the side of the public, and the lack of the right spirit and theory of life upon the part of the servant, mutual misunderstandings and unnecessary collisions and solecisms are continually occurring. The remedy is reform on both sides. And reform can only be attained gradually, by patient, repeated, and long-continued effort.

For the Free Religious Index. UTILITY, ITS NATURE AND LAWS.

As it is useless to discuss the theory of morals without some basis upon which to work, the following brief summary of the nature and laws of utility is presented:—

1. Nature of utility.—Jevons says utility is extrinsic, that it is "no inherent quality," and thinks it better described as a "circumstance of things arising out of their relation to man's requirements." It appears to me still better to say that utility is force; that force is the action or reaction of one thing upon another. That action and reaction or force are extrinsic only signifies that there must be that which acts and that which is acted upon. Hence, utility consists of such actions and reactions of things as conduce to man's welfare, and is consequently extrinsic. The same remarks will apply to disutility, except it relates to man's non-welfare. Utility and disutility, like force, are either actual or potential. They may also be classified as direct and indirect. The different degrees of utility or disutility do not concern us here.

2. The laws of utility.—It is strange that even those who recognize and make use of the science of utility as the corner-stone of economics have not only not pointed out the identity in the nature of force, utility, and disutility, as briefly indicated above, but have not shown how even the latter two are related. Jevons says, "We must be almost as often concerned with the one as with the other." Indeed, we are always concerned with the one when concerned with the other. Utility is impossible without disutility. Since utility is action or reaction of things upon other things, the latter, in so far as thus acted or reacted upon, must be the opposite of utility,—that is, disutility. Then, as action and reaction are equal, we must have (I.) $U=D$, in which equation U represents utility, and D disutility. I have made use of the terms positive and negative as more appropriate and comprehensive than the terms utility and disutility in any sense in which they appear as yet to be used. The science of utility, like the science of electricity, has its negatives and positives, although these terms may not be applied; and, like electricity, its negatives and positives are equal and capable of their own proper modes of measurement and comparison. Equation (I.) expresses a fundamental law of utility,—how it is always related to, and measured by, disutility. It remains to consider the relation of both to force.

All forces in the universe, including those within man, in so far as they relate directly or indirectly to man, must affect him favorably or unfavorably. That is, they are either negative or positive utilities. Now, every concrete substance possesses various forces,—that is, various sorts of actions and reactions on other different bodies, and may be said to act and react in all directions. If certain of these actions or reactions are useful to man, others may be the opposite of usefulness. It can be shown that each portion of matter is possessed of both negative and positive utilities, however indefinitely small either or both may be. Allowing f to represent the actual and potential forces of any body or thing relative to man, u and d utility and disutility respectively, we have equation $f=u+d$. These same letters differently subindexed may represent the equation of as many other different things, all of which may be advantageously written as follows:—

$$\begin{array}{l} f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \\ f=u+d \end{array}$$

(II.) $F=U+D$

Equation (II.) expresses the relation of all forces in man and all those without man, in so far as they may be said mediately or immediately to affect him, to utility and disutility. Every concrete substance according to the above minor equations possesses both utility and disutility. If the former exceeds the latter, we have a commodity: If the latter exceeds the former, a discommodity. If they are equal, we may have an incommodity or neuter-commodity, or whatever we choose to call it. Commodity, discommodity, utility and disutility are terms borrowed from Jevons' work above referred to. He uses inutility as an abstract term, like utility and disutility. But the latter two with him are taken to signify rather excess of utility and disutility. Still, inutility is impossible as an abstract principle, since, if a thing exists at all, it must exert a force, and that force must both favor and disfavor, must possess both negatives and positives, however indefinitely small either or both may be.

Now, man, as well as all other things, is an agent in his own economy. He is not only that subserved, but is one of the subservient elements or agents. It is in the latter sphere of being only that he becomes a moral or immoral agent, and in that only so far as his conduct directly or indirectly relates to his fellow-man. Any of the above minor equations, then, may be used to represent simply man in reference to his conduct and influence upon mankind, and thus become a moral equation. If utility u in this moral equation of any person A exceeds disutility d , A is a moral agent. Should disutility d exceed utility u , then A is an immoral agent. An immoral person is, in respect to his fellow-man, a kind of discommodity; and by appropriate means, as those of fines, imprisonments, etc., is to be guarded against like other dis-commodities. Moral negatives give rise to positives, or usefulness to the different sorts of punishments, which punishments may sometimes be of the nature of a reformation process,—the cancelling of the negative to a moral product, upon the same principle as the milling of wheat cancels a negative condition and leaves the more useful product flour.

Having thus briefly pointed out in what morality consists, a few remarks may well be added concerning actual and potential moral forces. A moral man may commit an immoral act through negligence, ignorance, unskillfulness, or the like, without evil intent, in which case the act is properly condemned, but not the man. Or an immoral man may commit (as is often the case from some necessity) a moral act, and of course the man would be morally condemned, though the act be approved. But how are we to distinguish a moral or immoral man? This can only be done by noting the measure of utility in his acts. If disutility to his fellow-man predominates in his acts, without obvious reasons to believe to the contrary, or to believe him insane, we infer intent or design to commit the evil act, and hence pronounce him an immoral man. But intent, purpose, and design to commit an evil (dis-useful) act are but so many different expressions for one potential disutility, to be guarded against on the same general principle, as we would guard against the potential destructive effects of fire on our buildings and other things. To determine moral acts, not only the immediate but remote consequences are to be considered as to their measure of utility. Our experiences, observations, and teachings have taught us to know or to believe what acts are wrong and what are right,—i.e., those acts in which utility or disutility are known or supposed to predominate. Then, the commission of known or supposed injurious acts upon man, as most probably or certainly due to the potential negative variously termed "malice aforethought," purpose, design, etc., is the only ground upon which a correct judgment as to the immoral character of a person can be formed. Without utility or disutility there is no such thing as a moral or immoral action, nor hence a moral or immoral character. Design or purpose is an element in determining the moral character or quality of a person,—is, in fact, the thing itself. But the measure of excess of utility or disutility is that alone which determines the moral character of an act of a person. The moral character of a person is restricted to his inclination to do good or evil acts from intent or design; and it is only by means of known or supposed useful or dis-useful acts, in conjunction with the general deportment of the person, that it is ascertained he possesses a moral or immoral character. It is a general rule that evil or good acts are the result of like characters or qualities in the actors. By their fruits ye shall know them.

KEOTA, IOWA.

TIFFANY J. BROCKWAY.

For the Free Religious Index.

A RADICAL AVOWAL.

A Letter to Orthodox Friends.

You have remarked upon evidences that I was changing in my religious belief; and I have avoided speaking about it, because I shrank from giving you pain. But I feel it is best, once for all, to tell you frankly where I stand, so that there need be no misunderstanding between us.

You know that ever since I began to travel extensively, and visit foreign lands all around the world, I have employed nearly all my spare time in Biblical and theological studies, being led to this by observation of the varied interpretation of Scripture. In time, I adopted the Plymouth Brethren's system of literal interpretation, believing that, if God gave a revelation to man, it must be one that each man could understand for himself, without the intervention of any ecclesiastical or other human authority. I believed, therefore, that "God's word" meant what it said, and was not to be ingeniously twisted, its surface meanings ignored, and promises to the Jews "spiritualized" into prophecies of the Christian Church. I found that Christ promised his disciples that the Spirit should lead them "into all truth"; and it followed, from Protestant interpretation, that the prayerful student of the Bible, in whom, according to our theory, the Holy Spirit dwells, must learn the Bible's true teaching. Intercourse with numerous Christians, many of whom I was convinced prayed earnestly for the guidance of the Spirit, showed me that the Holy Spirit led each man to different and often opposing views: though one devout and highly educated Christian assured me that no one ever studied the Bible prayerfully without believing as he did, but I found that his present adherents numbered only two. The theory that these different views were like the varied aspects of a mountain from numerous points did not satisfy me, for a mountain never looks like a valley; and I began to doubt if it was possible that an omniscient God would give a revelation to man that would set all the world "by the ears" in their efforts to interpret it. The only solution to my mind was that each man's belief is determined by his own organization and surroundings. All religions are of human origin, Christianity not excepted.

Acquaintance with many lands, and conversation with "many men of many minds," showed me that, in all civilized or semi-civilized countries, there is a prevalent recognition of the great truths of morality, while ideas of religion vary. I saw less wickedness on the heathen shores of China, India, Java, and Sumatra than on the Christian wharves of New York and Boston or around the docks of London and Liverpool. Morality, therefore, is independent of religion, being the result of universal experience of the best methods of living.

But my early training and surrounding influences led me to suppress these convictions; and, for several years, I fought against my reason, restricted myself entirely to evangelical reading, and resolved not to doubt. At intervals, scepticism would revive, but by trampling on my intellect, plunging into religious work, and trying to accept the dogma that, as the finite cannot comprehend the infinite, the unintelligibility of a doctrine was a proof of its divinity, in this way I managed to preserve my faith. A visit to England and Germany rather unsettled me, until I buried myself again in "the faith of my fathers," and refused to acknowledge my own independence and right to think for myself, because the fathers and many living great men held and hold this faith. Finally, three years of travel, talk, and reading entirely emancipated my mind from the sway of the current Christian theology.

I believe that all things are subject to law, from the raindrop to the loftiest conception of the human brain. There is no supernatural interference. All can be, or will be, accounted for as knowledge increases, and the reason why everything exists or acts will be shown. Therefore, as there are no miracles, there need be no prayer.

The study of the Bible, and comparing it with the sacred writings of other nations, convinces me that the Bible is a human compilation of the traditions, poetry, history, and religious ideas of the Jews in earlier and darker ages than the present. It is "God's word" only in the sense that what is good in all written, spoken, or secret thought may be called God's word. Its atrocities, indecencies, and incomprehensible dogmas are of the earth. I reject the orthodox doctrine of inspiration entirely.

The doctrines of evolution, in their main outlines, are now received by nearly all learned men, whether Christians or sceptics. The Bible says the world was made in six days by magic, man was perfect but sinned, Christ died to save a few, and soon God will destroy the world and punish the vast majority of men forever in hell. Evolution says the world is the product of a gradual development of matter, progressing through millions of years; man has arisen from lower animals, and they from inferior orders of animal and vegetable life down to the simplest atom. Analogy teaches that man will continue to rise, and through the operation of the same laws attain to a far higher, if not perfect development, for there must always be progress upward. So I have changed from a pessimist to an optimist; and, instead of ignoring this sin-cursed world doomed to destruction, I accept it as "the best world going," and one capable of improvement, it being my great aim so to advance my own nature and that of others that the world may be better for my life. Not the salvation of men's souls from hell, but the elevation of their hearts and minds, and the bettering of their social condition is now my desire.

As to immortality, nothing is revealed to me, though many analogies encourage hope in a future existence. If there is no other life, we shall never know our loss in our dreamless sleep; and, if there is a future state, if we have lived well for this life, we shall be best fitted for another. One world at a time is enough; and, when another comes, it will then be time to take an interest in it.

I see no proof of a personal God, who sits up aloft and makes butterflies and counts hairs and conjures up squalls to upset the boats of Sabbath-breakers; but I see an ever-active, unerring force in nature, working in the main for good, though painfully and mysteriously to "the creatures of a day."

The result to myself is that I am rid of the awful depression and gloom of the doctrine of hell, the nagging of conscience to pry into men's minds and know if they are "saved," the perplexing defence of the Hebrew Deity who ordered slaughter and rapine, the contempt of this life, and the Pharisaic conceit of the "elect." I now want to live, to enjoy what nature, art, and civilization supply, but all to the end of advancing humanity to a higher plane of virtue, knowledge, and happiness. I have lost nothing in motives to be good and do good, but have gained in freedom, hope, and gladness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM AN OLD FRIEND TO INTRODUCE A NEW ONE.

CELLE, GERMANY, Oct. 9, 1881.

DEAR INDEX:—

A few weeks ago there came into my possession two small pamphlets. One of them was an historical account of the various professions which the Jews had engaged in from the year 1800 B.C. to the present time. It was written in reply to the charge of some anti-Jewish writers that the Jews had an inborn dread of labor. This pamphlet appeared last year, and two hundred copies were ordered by a single Berlin professor for distribution.

The other pamphlet was on "Tolerance and Humanity," an address delivered some months ago before the Mendelssohn-Verein at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Lessing.

The author of these pamphlets is Mr. Ludvig Rost of Alzey (Rheinhessen), whom I wish to introduce to the readers of the Free Religious Index.

For the last eight years, Mr. Rost has been a preacher, but at present, on account of his liberal views, is without a pulpit, and is supporting himself and family by teaching and writing. I have lately had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Rost; and, as there is some possibility that he may go to America to enter the Free Religious work, I will state briefly the main facts of his life. After going through the Gymnasium of Celle, his native place, he spent three years in the University of Göttingen. After leaving the university, he was occupied for seven years as a teacher, two years in Russia and five years in the high schools of Germany. He then applied to the Hannoversches Landes-Consistorium, the highest ecclesiastical body in the province of Hanover, for admission to the Ministerium. This body, upon examination, found his faith defective on some point relating to future punishment; and he was consequently not received. He then applied to a more liberal Lutheran body at Weimar, and was received. He was at once settled in the Lutheran church at Weimar, where he preached for five years. At the end of that time, he found himself out of harmony with the views of the church, and resigned his position. He now joined the "Free Protestants," a small religious body organized at Worms in 1876, which holds a religious position very similar to that which the Unitarians have held in America. Mr. Rost was immediately settled over a Free Protestant Society at Alzey, where he has been preaching for the last three years.

A few months ago, however, he resigned this position, partly because of certain illiberal tendencies which he found in his church, and partly because of the disfavor which he created on account of his warm friendship with the Jews and public utterances in their behalf. Mr. Rost lately came from Alzey to Celle purposely to make inquiries concerning the Free Religious movement in America. In the work of constructive liberalism, he seems to be deeply interested, and thinks the time has come for the reorganization of religion on a broader and deeper basis than that upon which the Christianity of the day rests. With the Free Religious attitude in regard to Christianity, Mr. Rost expresses entire agreement; and he is also in full sympathy with the principles and aims of the Free Religious Association as presented in the Constitution and in the prospectus of the Free Religious Index. Philosophically, Mr. Rost is a theist. A young-looking man, of wide learning and ability, he seems capable of many years of fruitful work in the cause of pure and rational religion.

NOTES FROM NEW YORK.

Reformed Judaism.

The influence of the Society for Ethical Culture is everywhere felt, but nowhere so much as in Reformed Judaism. The leading preachers of this faith are exasperated at the constant exposures of their illogical position between restraint and reason. The attitude of Judaism is one of restraint. It does not respond to the revelation of to-day, but turns to that of a former day. The deep needs of present relations it does not feel, because it thinks of the days gone by. Reformed Judaism is Reduced Judaism, Judaism gone to seed. The reformers, both in Judaism and in Christianity, claim that they are progressive; but the progress is negative, not positive. Theirs is not the progress! They come unwillingly down the stream of time, the public leading and directing the way. The degree in which an individual or a society is private in its aim and purpose,—itself the object of its own existence, having thus no outlook, but only an inlook,—to that extent will it be deaf to the needs of humanity. Again, seek culture, not as a means to character and conduct, but as an end in itself. Judaism, meanwhile, feeling slightly the unrest, offers to these spiritual needs tradition, Jehovah, and charity. Christianity offers "other-worldliness,"—stones!

Political Demoralization.

The ignoble methods of some of our New York politicians, even of high social position, are just now being illustrated anew; and to them words once used by Mr. O. B. Frothingham are strikingly appropriate: "Ambition, coming from a Latin word which means to go about, signifies—as applied to politicians, for it was applied to them at first—a person who goes about soliciting votes for himself. In ancient cities, it was customary, with candidates for office, to go through the public streets showing their wounds in the public service and putting forth their claims to the suffrages of their fellow-citizens. The scene is admirably described in Shakspeare's play of 'Coriolanus.' The politician of to-day does the same thing. He goes about from street to street, from ward to ward, sometimes personally and sometimes by deputy; to registration and newspaper offices; goes about by the help of circulars and hand-bills; goes about in the person of adherents, who make speeches with the design of proving that he deserves all the suffrages that can be given him. It is not a noble thing to contemplate: in fact, it is a very ignoble thing, men electioneering for themselves; going forth to blow their own horns, cajoling, flattering, smiling, wheedling, if so be, by any of these unworthy arts, they can induce a fellow-creature to say that he thinks him worthier of office than anybody else."

A Practical Church.

The Church of Humanity, of Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. Henry Kimball, pastor, propose—

1. To give every tramp a good bath by way of baptism into the church.
2. To dress him in a new and clean suit.
3. Give him a square meal.
4. Put him to work, and, if he declines the offer and is able to work, send him along.
5. If he drinks too much, colonize him in the country, twenty-five miles from a grog-shop.
6. Provide a lecture-room, reading-room, library, and all the blessings of society.

This church has no salaried officer. No one ever gets a dollar for working for humanity. It puts every member at work, helping each other. It is a mutual help church. Several thousand dollars were spent last year, and more will be needed this year.

TSCHERNISCHEWSKY, the imprisoned Russian novelist, a petition for whose release was proposed by a delegate to the International Literary Congress, is said to have given in a novel, printed about 1861-62, the first impulse to what has since been known as the Nihilist movement. He is in the great mining district of the Crown in Eastern Siberia, and for twelve years was literally chained to his wheelbarrow by day and fettered to the wall of his cell by night. This treatment has been lately somewhat lightened, but its effects are revealed in his appearance. He looks, although only fifty years old, like a man of great age.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE MAN JESUS. A Course of Lectures. By John White Chadwick, author of The Faith of Reason, The Bible of To-day, A Book of Poems, etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881. Price $1.00.

Those of us who are habituated to the method and the conclusions of modern rational thought respecting the Bible and the origin of Christianity can with difficulty understand how this book of Mr. Chadwick's must strike an orthodox believer who should here chance to read such views for the first time. It is not unlikely that such a reader might cast the book from him as wild blasphemy before finishing the first chapter. For the first chapter, which deals with the "Sources of Information" (chiefly the first three Gospels, the fourth being left aside as utterly unhistorical), swings the broad axe of criticism at the New Testament record with a sturdy confidence that appears never to have heard of such a doctrine as an infallible Bible. But, if said orthodox believer will only have the fairness and patience to read on, he will find that, however much his own most cherished beliefs may be antagonized and his most familiar religious sentiments shocked, Mr. Chadwick is yet not wanting in a deep reverence and even tender affection for the character he has attempted to delineate. Jesus is to him as real a figure as he can be to the most devout Christ-worshipper. He has not, of course, depicted him as a God; for in his Godhead he does not believe. No more has he depicted him as a supernaturally gifted man: in such a being, he believes quite as little. But he has by a few strong strokes drawn the character of one of the manliest of men.

No writer, indeed, on the character and career of Jesus has ever kept more consistently within the lines of simple, natural manhood. Mr. Chadwick has made no fanciful interpretation of miracles, in order to save the authenticity of the record,—the too common method of rationalistic biographers of Jesus. On the contrary, he plainly says that a miracle, in any proper sense of the word, is impossible; and all the foundation in fact that he allows for the stories of miracles wrought by Jesus is the possession of a power for healing or temporarily alleviating certain nervous diseases. Nor, though Mr. Chadwick's book occasionally reminds one of Renan's Life of Jesus, especially in the picturesqueness of its descriptions of the material and human surroundings amidst which Jesus lived, does he fall, like the brilliant Frenchman, into sentimental though empty concessions to the popular Christology, any more than he does into Renan's curious moral disparagement, that Jesus sometimes lent himself to the intrigue of a miracle-show. In truth, Mr. Chadwick's work in these lectures impresses us throughout with the quality of perfect sincerity. He keeps nothing concealed that his method of treatment required to be said, and shrinks from no conclusion that legitimately follows from the modern system of New Testament criticism which he accepts.

It is to be remembered, however, that these are lectures, and lectures given in the place of sermons to a Sunday congregation. This will explain the fact of their presenting such important and to many people startling results in so condensed and positive a form, without much reference to the researches and authorities on which the results rest. The book, too, is brief, only two hundred and fifty pages,—seven lectures in all, and three of these taken up with the sources of information, the resurrection belief, and the after deification. It is necessarily, therefore, a sketch of the life of Jesus, yet as a sketch is wonderfully complete, and, though following so many similar attempts, has a freshness and individuality peculiarly its own.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON: His Life, Writings, and Philosophy. By George Willis Cooke. James Osgood & Co., publishers.

This book will be a welcome addition to the library of all lovers of Emerson; and, to those who are not yet acquainted with the life and character of the Concord poet and philosopher, it will prove an excellent introduction. Mr. Cooke, though he writes con amore, has yet made a careful study of his subject; and those, even, who think they understand Emerson thoroughly, will find in this work some new light thrown upon his character and genius. Although Mr. Emerson has been found always in sympathy with every genuine reform, Mr. Cooke shows that his sympathy with reforms has ever been more philosophic than iconoclastic, but he has always been ready, with helpful, cheering, inspiring words, for every progressive movement. The upright purity, simple sincerity, unaffected modesty, and true, manliness of Emerson's character are brought out in strong relief by Mr. Cooke's record. Of Emerson as an author, Mr. Cooke remarks as follows: "In Goethe, the sense of beauty was supreme; in Carlyle, the love of strength has been predominant; but, in Emerson, all powers and faculties have been held in reverence only as aids to character. His writings have been conceived and executed only as helps to human life and aids to moral excellence." As a thinker, he rates him thus: "Emerson belongs in the succession of the idealists. That company he loves wherever its members are found, whether among Buddhists or Christian mystics, whether Transcendentalist or Sufi, whether Saadi, Boehme, Fichte, or Carlyle. These are the writers he studies, these the men he quotes, these the thinkers who come nearest his own thought. He is in the succession of minds who have followed in the wake of Plato, who is regarded by him as the world's greatest thinker. More directly still, Emerson is in that succession of thinkers represented by Plotinus, Eckhart, and Schelling, who have interpreted idealism in the form of mysticism. . . . Emerson belongs to that class of literary geniuses, such as Rousseau, Herder, Lessing, and Coleridge, who are the intellectual awakeners and stimulators of their age, not the thinkers of a generation, but its inspirers. They are moved by feeling, imagination, and intuition; but they open the way to new possibilities of life, action, and thought." We glean from Mr. Cooke's book that Emerson has been exceptionally favored in the friendships and environments of his life; and one wonders how, in such comparatively sheltered harbors as this strong yet gentle soul seems ever to have found, he ever came to understand, with such keen sympathy, the needs and losses of the many who have been less fortunate. By all those who have ever taken any interest in the history of the Transcendental movement, or whose lives have received a directing impulse to higher aims from any one of that noble band of high thinkers who surrounded Emerson at the incipency of the movement, Mr. Cooke's work will be read with deep interest and pleasure.

THE PAGEANT, AND OTHER POEMS. By Christina G. Rossetti. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

Remembering the enjoyment that we had in a volume of Miss Rossetti's poems printed some fifteen years ago, we approached the present volume with the pleasantest anticipations. They have not been fully realized. In fact, our disappointment has been considerable. Yet we have little reason to complain; for in the first poem, after the beautiful dedicatory sonnet to her mother, she frankly strikes "The Key-Note" of the volume, calling the poem by this name. It runs:—

"Where are the songs I used to know,
Where are the notes I used to sing?
I have forgotten everything
I used to know so long ago.
Summer has followed after spring.
Now autumn is so shrunk and sere,
I scarcely think a sadder thing
Can be the winter of my year."

If Miss Rossetti has not forgotten everything she knew, she has well-nigh forgotten how to write a simple, natural, human poem. She was an excellent mistress of this art, when her first volume was published. In the present volume, the healthy, joyous side of life gets little recognition. Miss Rossetti's muse, like Angela in the new comic opera, "is limp, and she clings." Her poems are for the most part poems of love and languishing. They are poems of morbid love and morbid piety. But not a few of them, especially the sonnets, are written powerfully. In a series of sonnets called "Mouna Inuominata," she endeavors to indicate what Mrs. Browning's "Portuguese Sonnets" would have been, if she had been unhappy in her love. The second of these sonnets would, however, answer for the happiest girl in the world. Others (notably the eleventh) are remarkably good; while of curious felicity of expression there is nowhere any lack, even in those poems which are too "soufully intense" to please a healthy mind.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MARK RUTHERFORD, DISSENTING MINISTER. Edited by his friend, Reuben Shapcott. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This is an exceedingly interesting and pathetic book. The names are undoubtedly fictitious, and many of the details of the narrative are very possibly so. But the idea is irresistible that, in the main outlines and general spirit of the book, we are dealing with the actual experience of a much-suffering man. He does not represent himself as a robust person; rather, many will say, as a poor creature too easily excited to hysterics. It may be doubted whether a man virile enough to write these pages could have been so invirile as Mark Rutherford. We have, first, an account of child-life in the family of a dissenting minister, then the preparation for the ministry in a theological school, then the ministerial work, first in an orthodox and then in a Unitarian pulpit. An atheist mechanic and his daughter furnish the material for a very interesting chapter. There is much suggestive writing on those topics of religion which are being most earnestly debated at the present time. Aside from these and from its general purpose, the book is worth reading for its exquisite touches of natural beauty. The writer's sense of this is of the keenest. The book arrives at no particular destination. The unheroic hero loses his old faith entirely, but he finds nothing positive to replace it. But the story is, no doubt, a faithful illustration of a tragedy that has many representatives in modern clerical life. It is infinitely pitiful.

"This sentence have I left behind:
An aching body and a mind
Not wholly clear, nor wholly blind,
Too keen to rest, too weak to find,
That travails sore and brings forth wind,
Are God's worst portion to mankind."

ENGLAND WITHOUT AND WITHIN. By Richard Grant White. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881.

Of the five-and-twenty chapters in this book, the greater number have appeared in the Atlantic Monthly. But Mr. White informs us that the book was contemplated from the start. To this fact, it is perhaps indebted for a unity and completeness that it would not otherwise have had. Mr. White is never less than entertaining. He is a master of expression, and he has always something to express. The character of his present work is very largely objective. With the deeper aspects of English life, he does not concern himself. His themes are its railroads, its climate, the London streets, manners and habits, rural England, the men and the women, how they look and dress, parks and palaces, drinking and racing, and so on. The comparative method is pursued throughout; and many of the comparisons are calculated to rouse the indignation of our English cousins, especially the ladies. But the balance of admiration and approval is apparently upon the English side. If the American reader hugs himself upon the liberal praise of things American, let us hope that he will ask himself what he can do to improve our manners and habits in those respects in which they are obviously inferior.

SONGS OF SEVEN. By Jean Ingelow. Illustrated. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

This cluster of poems, which has already won a place in the affections of thousands of people, is here printed in the most sumptuous manner and with illustrations very happily conceived. Those in the text, by Edmund H. Garrett, are of the daintiest, with the exception of some of the head and tail pieces, which are conventional and weak. The landscape part of the full-page illustrations is by J. Francis Murphy, and so is good of course. The figures in these are not equal to the landscape. In "Seven Times One," we are bound to say that the merry lass is scarcely four years old. But, take it all in all, the book is charming enough to contest for Christmas honors, with the likelihood of getting one of the highest prizes.

THE WHITTIER BIRTHDAY BOOK, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., is on somewhat the same plan as its two predecessors, the "Longfellow" and "Emerson" birthday books. It is compiled with much good taste and literary judgment by Elizabeth S. Owen, who seems to have made a faithful and loving study of Whittier's works, both in prose and verse. The selections from his prose works will give to many, who know him only as a poet, some idea of an unappreciated phase of his authorship, and will send some of these in search of his prose writings. The prettily embossed covers, and many gems of illustrations its pages contain, make it a very appropriate birthday gift for any one.

GENESIS I.-XI. Second edition, revised, with additions, by A. R. Grote. New York: A. K. Butts.

This work is by a scholar and a man of science, and it presents the results of a careful study of Genesis in the light of the most advanced thought of the day. It treats the so-called Mosaic account with perfect fairness, and in the spirit of one who wishes to present the truth and not simply to sustain a theory; and, if the Biblical account is discredited, it is because the facts of science and the fancies of the past are in irreconcilable conflict.

THE November Wide-Awake, D. Lothrop & Co. publishers, spreads a Thanksgiving feast of good things before its young readers. The anniversaries of the month are duly celebrated,—"All-Hallowe'en" in a charming story-poem by Mary E. Wilkins, and Thanksgiving by another story-poem by Margaret J. Preston, a prose story by Mrs. H. R. Eliot, and the words and music of a new Thanksgiving-day song by Louis C. Elson. The number is enriched with many beautiful illustrations from the best artists as well as stories and articles of interest by standard writers.

"BABY-LAND," from the same publishers, for November, contains about the usual number of beautiful pictures and pretty rhymes and stories well calculated to instruct and amuse the nursery pets.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE Atlantic Monthly for November contains an article from John Fiske, on "The Theory of a Common Origin for all Languages," in which he comes to the conclusion, which may be taken to represent the orthodox view of the matter, that in speech, as in other branches of human activity and development, the progress of mankind is "from fragmentariness to solidarity." At the beginning, among savage tribes, hundreds of half-formed dialects, each intelligible to a few score of people, all constantly changing; "at the end, an organized system of mighty nations, pacific in disposition, with unlimited reciprocity of intercourse, with very few languages, rich and precise in structure and vocabulary, and understood by all men."

The editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, referring to the late Methodist Council at London, says: "A conference of a great church assembled not daring to discuss its doctrinal basis is an exhibition of cowardice which, above all others, the sons of John Wesley were forbidden to make. Anything that will not bear examination is not worth the keeping. . . . And then there is the question of inspiration, its nature, its limitations and evidences, which must be reconsidered, whether we will or no, that might have been committed to some careful and capable hand, to the profit of our common cause. The recognition of something outside of Methodism, something pertaining to our common faith, something affecting our universal Christendom, was due the world from this body of Christian ministers and laymen."

MR. BUFFUM, of Lynn, in introducing Fred. Douglass recently to the Middlesex Club of this city, said that he regarded it as a remarkable fact that within the memory of gentlemen yet comparatively young a slave had, by overcoming what at one time seemed to be insurmountable obstacles, arisen to be one of the executors of the laws of the people that had enslaved him. Mr. Douglass said that he had made a good many speeches during the past forty years, but that experience proved of little service to him on this occasion. He alluded to the pleasure it gave him to mingle on terms of social equality with gentlemen of such high standing in mercantile and civic life, and said that occasions like this reminded him of days when he was the lowest and most abject of slaves. He drew a vivid contrast between his present condition, sitting at the table with gentlemen, as their guest, and the time when he was compelled to fight with his master's dogs for the crumbs that fell from the table. He referred gratefully to the political honors of which he had been the recipient, and dwelt at some length upon the degrading influence of slavery. He apologized for entering into a discussion of slavery, and said the only justification for referring to such a theme was that the time would soon come when there would be no one left to speak of personal experiences of that kind. He spoke with much feeling of the part Massachusetts had taken in the abolition cause, and of the kindnesses he had received at the hands of his friend, Mr. Buffum. He eulogized John Quincy Adams, the reading of whose speeches, he said, had first brought vividly to his attention the enormity of the evil of slavery.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

GOLDWIN SMITH pronounces Parnell's arrest "a sad necessity."

JESSE BENTON FREMONT is writing a play for John McCullough.

MARK TWAIN and Mary Clemmer are among the guests at the Vendôme.

OUIDA is about to contribute a novel, called Cigarette, to the columns of the Paris Gaulois.

THE Pall Mall Gazette denies on authority the rumors of Premier Gladstone's resignation.

REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, wife, and daughter, of New York, have engaged apartments at the Vendôme for the coming winter.

REV. DR. VINCENT, who did so much to make the Chautauqua Assembly the success it was, gave a lecture in this city last week.

HENRY WARD BEECHER delivered a lecture one evening last week, in Music Hall, this city, on teaching as "The New Profession."

MR. THEODORE STANTON, son of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, was the only delegate present at the recent Peace Congress in Geneva.

THE parents of Bayard Taylor are both living at an advanced age, in excellent health. They have lived a harmonious wedded life of sixty-seven years.

THE father of Charles Sumner was called in his day "the best-mannered man in Boston." He was a lawyer and a poet of considerable local celebrity.

MRS. ABBA GOOLD WOOLSON is giving a course of twelve morning lectures in the Hawthorne Rooms in this city, on English History and Literature.

"Give us a Rest" is the title of Judge Tourgee's new lecture. Now that the judge's thought is pretty well exhausted, suppose he practises what he preaches.

It is proposed to commemorate in Cincinnati, on the 19th inst., the fiftieth anniversary of President Garfield's birth. General Cox is suggested as the orator for the occasion.

WILLIAM ARTHUR, father of the President, taught a private school in Burlington, Vt., before he took orders as a clergyman, and is spoken of by the older citizens in very high terms.

LADY FLORENCE DIXIE, who accompanied her husband, Sir Beaumont Dixie, in a lengthened tour through South Africa, is to publish a book of her travels on her return to England.

A GRAND-NIECE of Washington Irving, who bears a striking resemblance to her distinguished relative, was recently married, in New York City, to a Mr. John Wilson, a wealthy gentleman of Montreal.

PROFESSOR GUNNING, the lecturer on science and author of The Life History of our Planet, has been offered the chair either of anatomy or chemistry in the Georgia Medical College, lately removed from Macon to Atlanta.

MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL has issued from the press of Roberts Brothers My First Holiday, an account of a trip through Colorado, Utah, and California. The book is a collection of letters written to her friends during her journey.

ARCHBISHOP PURCELL is, it is said, entirely helpless and nearly speechless from paralysis, and, though he may live some time, is liable to die at any hour. He has for two years been an inmate of the Convent of the Ursulines, in Brown County, Ohio.

SAMUEL J. TILDEN is said to own one of the finest private collections of books in the country. Without being in the commonly accepted sense of the word a bibliomaniac, he yet takes great pains to have his library as complete and choice as possible.

WHITELAW REID and wife are expected home soon from their five months' bridal tour in Europe. On their arrival, "the young editor of the tall tower" will be given a rousing reception and dinner by the Lotus Club of New York, of which he is president.

FATHER BREHENY, the Roman Catholic pastor at Manayunk, Pa., declared in a sermon that he had never worn a stitch of English cloth since he arrived in America, and that, rather than send his relatives a dollar that might go into a landlord's pocket, he would let them die.

THE Springfield Republican pertinently inquires: "How does it happen that Justin McCarthy is out of jail? He was a land-leaguer at last accounts,—high up, too. Has he prudently stayed in London? Or does Gladstone, who is a literary fellow himself, shrink from turning the key on so sprightly a novelist and historian?"

M. D. CONWAY writes from London that "Mr. Bradlaugh has suffered a relapse, and, although now somewhat better, has had to cancel his lecture engagements. He thus has to pay a good deal for his unorthodox ideas. He may have to pay more; for the Tories are preparing to wage a regular jihad—a holy war—against his admission into Parliament in February. This has been announced by one of them, Sir Herbert Maxwell."

COLONEL BUNDY's return to Chicago, after an absence of several months, rendered necessary by his failing health, seems to have infused new life into the Religio-Philosophical Journal. The latest number contains a large amount of excellent reading. Those among Spiritualists who are interested in sustaining trickery and fraud, known to be such, do not like the Journal; but the better class whose philosophy it represents, and many who do not accept that philosophy, read it, because it fearlessly exposes rascality, whether practised under the name of "mediumism" or some other name.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON:

HIS LIFE, WRITINGS, AND PHILOSOPHY.

By Rev. GEO. WILLIS COOKE.

1 volume, crown octavo.....$2.00.
With fine Steel-Engraved Portrait.

An interesting and valuable critical and analytic survey of the literary life of Mr. Emerson, with copious quotations and extracts from his writings, including many choice and characteristic passages not comprised in his printed works.

"Mr. Cooke has given to this book long and faithful study, and some high authorities who have examined the MSS. promise it a permanent place in literature."—Unity, Chicago.

"It is equally clear that Mr. Cooke's volume will have a value quite independent of his own biographical work in it, though this also has been carefully done, and will add much to the common stock of knowledge concerning our chief American author; for such Emerson is, and will soon be recognized, if he is not already."—Frank B. Sanborn, in the Springfield Republican.

"He has given us an interesting biography of Mr. Emerson, touched upon his personal traits and peculiarities, told us incidents connected with the writing of some of his more famous essays and poems, and has brought together a large amount of matter written by Mr. Emerson, which has never found place in his published works. This feature makes the work of especial value, as certain of the essays and sermons included have been sought for in vain for many years."—Boston Transcript.

"Mr. Emerson's relations with the great minds of the century are clearly brought out by abundant quotation and selections from personal reminiscences. For the rest, the volume is rich in indited writings and speeches."—Boston Traveller.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE memory of Savonarola, the Italian reformer who was tortured and burned in 1498 by the agents of Pope Alexander VI. was recently honored by a demonstration organized by the Democratic party in Florence. A large procession with flags and music repaired to the place where stands his monument, and upon it placed a beautiful crown of flowers. This was to offset the Italian pilgrimage to Rome.

MISS KATE E. MORRIS applied to Harvard College to be admitted as a candidate for the degree of Doctor of Laws. She was informed that "the Corporation are not prepared to admit women as candidates for a degree." Colonel Higginson remarks that the phrase "not prepared" evidently comes from the recitation room, and hopes the Corporation will soon be "prepared" to do so simple an act of justice as that asked by Miss Morris.

THE German conservative papers in their excessive zeal for the Government, before the election, applied offensive epithets to radical opponents, to men even like Virchow and Mommsen, whose character, talents, and attainments honor not only their nation, but their race; and the conservative committee at Berlin sent tickets to the people, inviting them to free entertainments at theatres, concerts, and beer-shops. The conservative party richly deserved the defeat which it experienced.

GOVERNOR LONG is a rather versatile man. Everybody knows he can make neat little speeches on any occasion. This month, he attracts attention by issuing a proclamation for a day of "public thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God," in which, after mentioning the day, he quotes Scripture, gives a hymn from Whittier, and closes with a benediction. He had just been re-elected Governor, and his joy blossomed into song and praise. There is nothing like political success to promote political piety.

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON, the well-known philanthropist, has won by her efforts for humanity in general a well-deserved and very appropriate token of recognition from her native State, New Hampshire, in having recently had renamed for her one of the range of White Mountains near Franconia, N.H. The other peaks in the immediate neighborhood of the newly christened Mount Elizabeth Thompson are Mount Lincoln, Mount Lafayette, and Mount Garfield. So she will have the satisfaction of remaining forever, in name at least, in the "best society."

GENERAL MARCUS WRIGHT, who has long been the custodian of the Confederate archives, says the belief that there is a deposit in England as the basis of recent speculations in Confederate bonds is without any substantial foundation. Referring to the belief that the Confederacy left treasures hidden somewhere in England, the Nation says: "It is like the belief in Captain Kidd's treasures and in the unclaimed English estates belonging to American men. Such beliefs, indeed, are survivals of the olden time, when there were no banks and people buried their savings, and are among the most ancient and poetic weaknesses of the race."

THIS soi-disant civilized world is not yet free from remnants of the old barbarism of earlier times. For two years past, a prefect of one of the chief cities of Italy, an owner of extensive vineyards, has compelled his laborers to wear iron muzzles during working hours in the vineyards, to prevent them from eating any of the grapes. We wonder if the Italian version of the Scriptures contains the just Jewish law, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." At any rate, the civic authorities should insist upon some such law in the case of these human beings, and for the sake of decency should take from such a prefect his rank as public officer.

MR. WILLIAM W. HENDERSON, an educated colored man from Mississippi, in a lecture in this city last week, announced himself as a representative of a rapidly increasing class in the South; namely, reconstructed negroes who are especially interested in the education of the blacks. He thought that more school-houses and fewer ballot-boxes are needed South; that the colored men are desirous of obtaining education, which is demonstrated by the large attendance at the day and evening schools, after the long day's work upon the plantation. With rudimentary education merely, the colored laborers can protect themselves against the thieving sharks who despoil them of their gains.

GUITEAU is reported in the newspapers as saying, "The divine pressure upon me was so enormous that it destroyed my free agency, and therefore I am not legally responsible for my act." If Abraham's determination to slay his son, or that of Jephtha to sacrifice his daughter in accordance with a vow made when "the Spirit of the Lord was upon Jephtha," was justifiable, Guiteau's plea cannot be consistently disregarded. The same is true of Freeman of Pocasset, who killed his beloved daughter, convinced that God demanded the sacrifice, and that the child would be restored to life, to the surprise and consternation of an unbelieving world. But, fortunately, this theory of a "divine pressure," or "Spirit of the Lord," has no weight with an honest court and a sensible jury in this scrutinizing, scientific age.

It is pretty evident that there has been a miscarriage of justice in the cases of the Government against "the Star-route swindlers," which were begun by information because the statute of limitations barred an indictment. A conspiracy to defraud, Judge Cox decides, is "an infamous crime," and the Constitution requires that such an offence shall be prosecuted by "presentment or indictment of a grand jury." This judicial ruling is probably correct; but when proofs of the criminality of the accused are, by the officers of the Government, said to be overwhelming, what shall be said of their judgment or their honesty in commencing the prosecution by a process that was generally foreseen to be and has now been proven unwarrantable and illegal? To say the least, some one has blundered. There have been needless delays, designed, some think, with a view to allowing the statute of limitations to operate against some of the cases.

THE Cotton Exposition now open at Atlanta, Ga., gives promise of new purpose and earnestness in the Southern people to make better use in the future of the industrial resources of the South in supplying its needs by its own manufactures, and perhaps of vying with the North in the control of cotton manufacturing. A friendly rivalry of this kind would work wonders in cementing the newly felt brotherhood between the two sections of the Union. The exposition of cottons is said to be the most complete that has ever been seen anywhere. A correspondent of the Boston Herald says, "Every variety has a place, from the famous 'Sea Island' to the miserable little specimens from the most unfavored sections of the world." Many Northern manufacturers are in attendance, gaining useful hints for future use. They report that they are welcomed with genuine Southern hospitality. This Exposition, it is to be hoped, will become the bond of a closer union of the no longer divergent interests of the North and South. Hon. Edward Atkinson of this city gave the address on manufacturers' day; and his speech was heartily applauded, particularly when he stated that one of his sons, who is now a Harvard student, was a practical blacksmith and carpenter.

PROGRESS OF FREE RELIGION.

The Free Religious Association is sometimes reproached with the small progress its cause has made. A few critics, indeed, appear to think that the Association is going backwards. A few others complain that it has already advanced too far; that it has left the goal it originally set for itself, and is now trying to accomplish something further. Neither of these small classes of critics, it is probable, ever quite comprehended the real significance of the Free Religious movement, or, comprehending it, entirely sympathized with it. While their liberty of judgment is to be respected, their opinions, in this matter, may be left to cancel each other. But the main charge heard against the Association is that stated above,—that its cause makes little advance, that the movement it represents has scarcely any more volume or power than it had fourteen years ago when the society was organized.

And this criticism is heard both outside and inside the Association. It is made by those who have never believed in the Association's principles and aims, and who are only too glad to believe that the movement is not advancing. But it is made quite as much, perhaps, by those who do believe very fully and earnestly in the Free Religious movement, and who, because of their earnest belief in it, are impatient at what seems to them the slowness of its progress and the apathy of many of their fellow-believers toward organizing progress. These critics on both sides rely, it is probable, on the same kind of evidence. They see that the Association has never adopted a very vigorous propagandist policy; that, though it has been in existence fourteen years, it has no auxiliary associations, and apparently has attempted to form none; that, though itself, by its constitution, officers, and memberships a national association, there are yet even many Liberals in the country who are not aware of its existence except as a Boston institution; that only a very few local societies have taken its name, and that these are in feeble condition and are bound together by no common tie of organization; that it presents no common work under whose standard Liberals throughout the country can rally, and makes no array of increasing membership nor of a plethoric treasury.

And such facts as these must be admitted, though possibly not the inference that is drawn from them. In its methods, thus far, the Association has mainly confined itself to the holding of conventions, the issue of publications, and the maintenance of occasional courses of lectures. Nor will it be accused of having pushed these instrumentalities with undue zeal. In latter years, its conventions have been limited to its annual meetings in Boston, while formerly it held two or three a year in different parts of the country. Its Boston courses of lectures, which were once famous, have been abandoned, and it is doubtful if the plan of lectures in different New England towns adopted last winter was sufficiently encouraging to be continued. In the matter of publication alone can it be claimed that the Association has strengthened its original instrumentalities. The Index is now published under its auspices, and of course is more than an equivalent for the occasional reports and tracts it was wont to issue. Yet, on the other hand, it must be said that the Index has always been an organ of Free Religion, and that the assumption of it by the Association has not therefore necessarily increased the agencies of the Free Religious cause.

By the standards of measurement known to statisticians, therefore, it would not appear that the Free Religious Association has much to show for the progress of its cause. When the Secretary of the Association was recently requested by the United States Census Bureau to furnish certain figures, similar to those furnished by the various religious denominations, in order "to secure for the Free Religionists accurate representation in the tables of the tenth census," he was compelled to answer that there were no effects for the reckoning of the census-taker. Yet he confesses that he felt no regret at this compulsion, but rather was glad that there was one religious movement in the country strong enough to have attracted the attention of the census officials and yet with nothing that they could tabulate in their accounts of the standing and growth of the various religious sects. By this token, it was shown that the Free Religious Association had been at least true to one of its principles,—namely, that it would not increase the number of sectarian organizations.

But by no means does it follow that the cause of Free Religion has made no progress. No one who is at all conversant with the condition of the Christian churches, or with the smaller body of Hebrew synagogues in this country, can doubt that liberty of opinion has greatly advanced in them during the last fourteen years. The spirit of sectarianism and the sway of dogmatism are still, it is true, prevalent enough, and are not yet to be considered as having given up their power. But that they have very much less power than they had even half a generation ago, and that they have much softened their asperities, is evident to every one who is in a condition to know what is going on in the religious denominations. And not only are old creeds becoming dissolved in the alembic of freethought, and the spirit of fellowship in consequence increasing among those who have hitherto been divided by sectarian walls, but also, as a consequence, soundness of character is getting more emphasized as an essential element of religion, and works of humanity are brought into greater prominence as one of the functions of church life. Now, all these are objects which the Free Religious Association has set in the foreground of its own organization. And, though the large, complete liberty which it proclaims has not yet been won by any of the sects, it can but recognize with pleasure any progress which they may make toward its goal. Of course, this progress is the result of many agencies belonging to this era of general growing enlightenment; but, among these agencies, it may not immodestly claim to have had some little share by the very fact of its holding up the standard of an active fellowship in moral aims and good works on the basis of perfect freedom of thought. It has also especially helped to make more familiar the fact that the essential elements of ethical and spiritual truth are common to all the great religions.

But the progress of Free Religious ideas is more particularly evident in Unitarianism. Though the Free Religious Association from its inception has had a much larger aim than to be the wing of any sect, and has in fact had a membership of various denominational antecedents, nevertheless it had its origin in a protest against the narrow action of the Unitarians in the formation of their National Conference; and hence upon Unitarianism has the effect been most apparent. The number of actual seceders was small. But the number of Unitarians who felt that the seceders' protest was legitimately in the line of Unitarian inheritance was large, and has been increasing ever since. And, more than this, the fundamental ideas of the Free Religious movement have been largely spreading in the Unitarian ranks. It is said that Western Unitarianism is thoroughly honey-combed with these ideas. Many of its younger and more active preachers are either members of, or more or less in sympathy with, the Free Religious Association, and with each year the control of the Western Unitarian organizations passes more and more into their hands. The platforms of some of the State Conferences, organized in the last half-dozen years, have been framed in accord with the Constitution of the Free Religious Association and are not in accord with the National Unitarian Conference or with the American Unitarian Association. The statement made on good authority in our issue of November 3, with regard to the State of Michigan, is significant. Five new liberal societies have been organized in that State the past year, all of them on a very broad basis; and all of the settled Unitarian ministers in the State, nine in number, we believe, are said to be, with one possible exception, "pronounced advocates of Free Religion." All this may be held to be the pretty direct result of the Free Religious movement.

So much with regard to the progress of Free Religious ideas within the lines of the old denominational or semi-denominational organizations. Of the progress and prospects outside of those lines, something may be said in a subsequent number.

W. J. POTTER.

AN UNORTHODOX ANSWER TO AN ORTHODOX QUESTION.

"A Christian" writes, "Since you do not acknowledge the authority of Christ or the truth of his gospel, yet profess to be interested in the redemption of man from selfishness and wretchedness, will you please explain why no regard was shown for the poor and the unfortunate, until the example and teachings of Christ touched men's hearts and moved them to deeds of charity and love?"

The history of Egypt, India, China, Judea, Greece, Rome, and of other nations, ancient and modern, demonstrates that human sympathy and benevolence, and "deeds of charity and love" which spring therefrom, have been confined to no one country or age, are due to the example of no one man, to the influence of no one book, and depend upon no theological dogmas. In all ages of human history, men have felt for one another in distress, and have made efforts to mitigate the hardships and to improve the condition of the unfortunate. If, in later times, the methods adopted have accomplished these ends more successfully than those of the past, if even men's sympathies to-day are wider and more active than they were thousands of years ago, no one person, no one system, is entitled to the exclusive credit of having wrought these changes; although every man who has labored for others, every system that has emphasized the duty of benevolence, and every agency that has helped to break down the barrier between men of unequal conditions and of different nations and races, and to promote between them a community of feeling and interest, have contributed to this broadened humanitarian education of the race.

The notion that sympathy, generosity, and charity were unknown before the Christian era is very absurd, and is positively contradicted by what we know of Pagan antiquity. Provisions for the relief of poverty were quite abundant, although not always wise; and in some cases, as in the gratuitous distribution of corn in Rome, leading to indolence and improvidence,—the same results that followed the encouragement of indiscriminate almsgiving by the Christian Church in later periods. The history of all the ancient nations abounds in examples of generosity, charity, and disinterested devotion to humanity. They all had institutions for the unfortunate, however inferior to those of this age. They were not due to the influence of Jesus. And when Lyons was nearly destroyed by fire, and Rome supplied the wants of the people in grateful return for assistance received from Lyons, when a little earlier a similar calamity had befallen Rome; when Antioch was half-destroyed by an earthquake, and the other Asiatic Greeks "sent from all sides provisions, by land and sea, to the unfortunates who clung to their ruined homes,"—as one who was living there wrote, it was not because of the example or the influence of the Nazarene reformer, but because the heart of the Pagan was touched then as the heart of the Christian is now by spectacles of distress, and because natural sympathy and benevolence prompted then as they do to-day to efforts for the alleviation of human suffering.

The practice of disparaging and defaming the old Pagan nations, exaggerating their vices and utterly ignoring and even denying their virtues,—contrasting them thus misrepresented with the most enlightened nations of modern times, and then ascribing not only the real but the imaginary difference between ancient and modern civilization to the influence of Christianity, was once almost universal among theologians, and is not yet entirely abandoned. "A Christian," evidently like Judge Black, is among those who still think it a just and legitimate method of defending their faith. A larger view of the subject would probably show him that all civilizations have their peculiar excellences and defects, the result of temporary influences or local environments; that civilizations, when compared at all, should be compared as wholes; that modern civilization is the complex product of all past thoughts and acts, that it has been evolved from pre-existent conditions with as little break as the man is developed from the child, and that the differences between the age of Pericles or Augustus, or Constantine or Queen Elizabeth, and the nineteenth century, are due, not simply to one person or theological system, but to a multitude of causes, the respective influences of which in the production of the grand result can be properly estimated only by the man who has profoundly studied the nature and the history of our race.

The practical harm that comes from the narrow view which ascribes all that is noble in thought and conduct to a particular theological belief consists chiefly in limiting the mental energies and the moral enthusiasm of the believer to the propagation of speculative opinions, which to him assume the form and authority of axiomatic truths, thereby diverting his attention and interest from the intellectual achievements and practical reforms of the age. Such persons are ever ready to support churches and to sustain missionary efforts for the conversion of the heathen, but they are among the last to give their adherence to any new thought or new reform. They are the most inflexible opponents of progress, the most stubborn defenders of hoary-headed errors.

Fortunately, in these times, the faith of the great mass of Christians, in this country at least, is so modified by scepticism, and in this progressive age the necessity imposed upon the most zealous devotees of yielding to a great extent to the practical influences which everywhere prevail is so imperative, that the narrow and utterly untenable view indicated by the question of "A Christian" is very much reduced in importance as an influence in personal conduct and as a factor in modifying social conditions. The world moves; and even they who deny this and try to prevent it, in spite of their denial and protests, are forced to move with the world. In social development, individuals cannot remain entirely stationary. They are necessarily affected by their surroundings, and become unconsciously imbued with the influences of their age.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

WHAT THE CHURCHES HAVE DONE FOR MENTAL AND MORAL GROWTH.

There are several strong reasons for considering religious habits morally advantageous. In the first place, it follows, from the fact that piety is usually considered a duty, that pious people have, to a great extent, been highly conscientious ones; so that, in joining their company, the young man or woman has come under the best social influences within reach. This was the case to a much greater extent a century ago than at present; but there is still some danger of irreligious habits leading young people into bad company. Then, second, the Church is still one of the most active of moral teachers, and in old times she monopolized this office. And, besides teaching virtue, she has punished vice, and, in some cases, with great severity. This office, like that just mentioned, was more important in the past than at present; but there is one service which the Church is now rendering to morality more consistently than ever before. In setting up the ideals of a loving Father, who wishes that his children should be like him, and of a heaven which can be reached only through leading on this earth a life that is heavenly, the Church stimulates love of goodness both purely and powerfully.

These influences were, on the whole, more active a century ago than at present. Then, the Church had not only a legal authority which has almost entirely vanished, but a social one which has much diminished. We need go back but a hundred years to find almost every man of any respectability a church-goer, especially in New England. In all Protestant communities the pulpit was the great means of moulding public opinion, and the clergy were a power in the land.

Shall we conclude from this that moral growth is likely to be weaker now than it was a hundred years ago, because the Church is feeble? This is a question which needs to be discussed thoroughly.

First, let us look back through history. A century ago, the Church had a legal and social power, now in great part lost. Two hundred years ago, that power was still greater, and was the ruling spirit in politics and literature. Our New England writers in the seventeenth century, for instance, were, almost without exception, theologians, and so were many of the leading British and Continental authors. The great literary interest was in controversy. Go back still a century more, and we find the creeds battling, not merely with book and sermon, but with blade and ball. The hundred years between 1550 and 1650 might well be called the bloody century. It was an age of ferocious civil wars, and they were all religious ones. Thus mighty was religion, even when men differed about her. Mightier still was she when they agreed. Seven hundred years ago, she needed but to call aloud, and her words became cathedrals and crusades. During the last five centuries especially, the Church has grown steadily weaker, but the morals of Christendom have certainly not grown steadily worse. Coming forward from that by-gone age of faith to the present day, we find drunkenness and licentiousness growing less and less gross and frequent, the insane, the sick, the blind, deaf and dumb, and even the criminals cared for ever more and more tenderly, the laws more and more constantly obeyed, human rights better and better respected, and the duty of training and developing the intellect practised more and more faithfully in every succeeding generation, and with greater zeal to-day than ever before.

But so important a question deserves more definite treatment. Let us take a special case in regard to which it is peculiarly easy to get particulars; namely, the state of England and Wales between 1841 and 1876. During these thirty-five years, the power, not only of the Church of England, but of all religious institutions, has undergone a change whose nature is shown by the following facts:—

In the first place there has been much legislation opposed to the supremacy either of the Established Church in particular or of the Protestant sects in general. Of the former class are the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland, the abandonment of compulsory church-rates, for not paying which men were imprisoned in 1840, and the abolition of the tests which had prevented Dissenters from taking degrees at Cambridge or even entering Oxford; while among many of the latter class are the Dissenters' Chapel Bill, by which congregations who had given up the old creeds were permitted to hold their property, the grant to Maynooth College, a well-known Catholic institution, of sums so large that there was fierce opposition both from church-people and from Dissenters, the founding in Ireland of what were called the "godless colleges," on account of their unsectarian character, the establishment of a system of national education under the control of all the tax-payers without distinction according to creed or sect, the opening of courts for granting divorce on other grounds than the solitary one permitted in the Gospels, and, finally, the removal of those disabilities which had prevented Jews from holding municipal offices and sitting in Parliament, so that no Briton now finds his civil rights impaired in consequence of his belief. Then, second, the census of 1851 states the number of sittings in the Episcopal churches in England and Wales as five million three hundred and seventeen thousand nine hundred and seventeen, and the number of other Protestant places of worship as about nineteen thousand six hundred and forty; but the number of Protestant churches and chapels, not Episcopalian, licensed in 1877, was only nineteen thousand four hundred and eighty-six, and that of the church-sittings only five million seven hundred and one thousand seven hundred. Now, during these twenty-six years, the population of England gained twenty-six per cent., so that neither the Church of England, whose sittings increased but seven per cent., nor the Dissenters, whose places of worship actually decreased, kept up with the population. In the early part of the century, the Dissenting chapels increased rapidly; those of the Wesleyans, for instance, from eight hundred and twenty-five in 1801 to eleven thousand and seven in 1851. As early as 1845 there were public complaints made in this and other sects of a decline of interest, and the subsequent statistics show that the danger was real and unavoidable. The Roman Catholic places of worship, indeed, nearly doubled between 1851 and 1874, rising from five hundred and seventy to a thousand and thirty-five; but the gain in power by this Church is small, compared to the sum total of loss by the others. And that all the churches taken together have lost power in that country may, in the third place, be inferred from a large class of facts, which cannot be stated definitely, but which are of immense importance, such as the rise and spread of Chartist, Positivist, Socialist, Secularist, and other organizations hostile to the ruling creeds, the growing influence of scientific teachings, especially those most disliked by devotees, namely, the Darwinian theory, and that of the antiquity of man; the wide circulation of such books as the Essays and Reviews, and the works of Colenso, Strauss, Renan, Parker, and Emerson; and, finally, the great freedom in criticising religious people and institutions characterizing all our most recent literature, with but few exceptions.

One has only to compare the earliest volumes of Punch with the latest ones, to see that the respect once paid to the Bible and the Sabbath by the upper and middle classes in England has decreased incalculably.

So plainly did the influence of religious institutions over England and Wales decline between 1841 and 1876 that the statistics of crime for this period have a peculiar interest. The Encyclopædia Britannica (Vol. VIII., p. 250) states that "the total commitments decreased from twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and sixty in 1841 to sixteen thousand and seventy-eight in 1876, and the convictions from twenty thousand eight hundred in 1841 to twelve thousand one hundred and ninety-five in 1876." It will at once be seen that neither committals nor convictions were more than two-thirds as numerous at the end of thirty-five years of religious decline as at the beginning. And this decrease of crime is all the more remarkable, because the estimated population increased during that period from fifteen million nine hundred and twenty-nine thousand four hundred and ninety-two to twenty-four million two hundred and forty-four thousand and ten (Enc. Brit., Vol. VIII., p. 221). Thus, in 1841, seventeen in ten thousand were accused, and thirteen in ten thousand convicted of crime; but in 1876 six in ten thousand were committed and five convicted. In other words, that was but little more than one-third as much crime in England and Wales in 1876 as in 1841, in spite of the great decline in the power of the Church during those thirty-five years. Perhaps this improvement may be due to the great extension of public schools. At all events, the moral condition of these countries does not seem to have been affected for the worse by the growing weakness of the Church.

Thus, whether we look back for a few years or for several centuries, we see that the Church decays, but morality improves. Indeed, we could expect nothing else, when we remember that church influence diminishes because we are learning to love morality for its own sake, to judge for ourselves what is right, to control our feelings by our reason, to live for present duties and privileges rather than on dreams about the future, and to expect to be happy or miserable according to our conduct, not our forms or creeds. Learning this is so precious morally, that what we unlearn is of little importance. The moral value of religious institutions must therefore be considered at best as doubtful.

As for the mental influence of the Church, it is plain that her power was at its maximum in the Dark Ages, and that progress since has been mainly due to men whom she fought against and put to death as long as she could. There is no burning of heretics now, but yet there are several ways in which the churches still check mental growth. In the first place, the churches insist on belief in their particular doctrinal views. Whatever intellectual opposition is offered to the creeds comes from the thoughtful rather than the thoughtless. Acceptance of any creed has a strong tendency to check farther investigation of the questions there decided upon. It is almost a truism to say that the Church has loved faith more than inquiry, and that inquiry favors mental progress. People do not join churches in order to learn to think for themselves. In the second place, the more intellectual power a man has, the more highly he will usually value it, and the less he will care for the systems which raise certain phases of emotion above vigor of thought, and which give little place to mental culture in their sacred books. Pulpit-teaching has improved in this respect since the last century. Still, it must be acknowledged that the general result of church-going is to excite feeling rather than thought. I do not say that the feelings excited in church are not those that best deserve to be called forth. I only say that the devotion of the best strength of the Church to exciting high feeling necessitates failure in calling forth clear thought. Third, one of the great agencies in mental progress, especially of late, has been science; and her relations to the Church have certainly not been so friendly that loving either of these two great powers has not had a strong tendency to hinder a man from loving the other. And, fourth, the Church has labored zealously to make people prize the next world more highly than this one; and such labor cannot but hinder mental growth. This depends so closely on faithful use of our senses and on accurate attention to the circumstances of this present life, that underrating this world must be prejudicial to intellectual culture. The Church is not of this world, but culture is; hence, loving one is likely to lead to neglecting the other.

It seems to me unquestionable that the Church has given too great prominence to the future life, that she has not been friendly to science, that she has cared more for the emotions than the intellect, and that her main object in training the latter has been faith. Need I say whether she has helped or hindered mental progress? These are facts which need to be kept in mind, and have special importance so long as the Church claims exemption from taxation. Nor should they escape the notice of people who have any doubt whether they should be church-goers or non-conformists.

F. M. HOLLAND.

OUR IDEALS.

In these days, when our commonest thought is often subjected to a sort of specious self-analysis in the light of our nineteenth-century philosophy, in speaking or thinking of our ideals, we are apt to give the term the broadest and highest significance of which we are cognizant, and to forget that persons of very little ideality have still their own ideals. From the first dawn of conscious thought in the mind of man there has ever been a standard of excellence present in that mind, which standard, however low, has always been a degree in advance of attained excellence.

Our ideals are and ever have been the measures of our best and highest thought, and so vary according to our culture and aspirations. Although the projection of our own minds, they are still the models from which we pattern, which we seek to imitate as nearly as possible; and the degree to which we succeed in doing this is the test of our physical, intellectual, and moral progress. Without ideals, or some type of character higher and nobler than anything yet attained by us, progress, physical, intellectual, or moral, is at a standstill. Our ideals are the gauges of our altitudes: always beyond us, they yet mark the boundaries of the presently possible.

The savage's ideal is a man stronger, braver in battle, larger in frame, or perhaps more cunning and skilful in barter than himself. The higher we rise in the scale of civilization, the higher, the nobler, the purer must be our ideals; and the ideals of the intellectual manhood and womanhood of to-day should be more perfect than anything that has yet been achieved by erring humanity, the embodiment in one being of all our isolated impulses toward the highest thought, of all our fortunate stumbles in the right direction in search of truth, of all our rare successes in our gropings toward the best and truest.

We think sometimes, sinking into despondency over our often futile efforts at attaining our ideals, that it is useless for us to try; that all our endeavors toward that attainment are but a useless waste of force and will, that might be better spent in self-service and in the grasping of lower but more lucrative aims. We feel ready to join in the dismal song of doubt, as voiced by Dr. Holland in Bitter-sweet:—

"There is no good, there is no God,
And faith is a heartless cheat,
Who bears the back for the devil's rod,
And scatters thorns for the feet."

We cry out bitterly, like spoiled children, that our ideals are impossible of realization, that they are given us but to tantalize, and to make more hard our already dreary lot, our imperfect life. But such despondency can only spring from a narrow and mistaken view. Our ideals are possible, have been attained to and realized.

In the steadfast, if slow, progress of mankind, many ideals have been overtaken, and assimilated into realization; but as soon as one ideal became possible, possessed, and a reality, at once a new and more glorified ideal took its place, just far enough in advance of the realized to draw forward in the never-ending upreaching of humanity to a still higher moral and intellectual plane. Accepting this view of the subject, remembering ever this fact, we begin better to understand Mrs. Browning when she says that these things, though at present

"Called the ideal, are better called the real,
And certain to be called so pre-ently,
When things shall have their names."

But it must be ever borne in mind that as high ideals tend to elevate, broaden, and strengthen our characters in approximation to such ideals, it is possible to adopt ideals so low that they tend to weaken and degrade the best in us, and we should be ever on guard against such adoption.

This age, so rich in intellectual culture, marked by such varied and far-reaching moral and æsthetic growth, full of possibilities and incentives toward more complete ideals, is also full of allurements toward lower ones, the ideals of money-making and fame-securing by fraud, by trickery, by dishonest scheming, by unfairness of all sorts. These allurements, in the form of apparent temporary success in the lives of those who have lowered their standards of truth and right, are everywhere present, everywhere beckoning the unwary in the wrong direction; but he who accepts these lower ideals in place of the higher ones not only does himself most grievous wrong, but his race as well, by depriving it of his example and his efforts for the right, and by his joining the great army of non-progressionists, the army that must be conquered and disbanded before there can be much prospect of attaining to the likeness of our best ideals.

Throughout what we call Christendom, where the Christian faith is held, where the Christian religion is dominant, and the Christian Church has unblushingly taken to itself the credit of all acknowledged principles of morality, and successful reformatory movements of the world at large, it will be thought and said of the world's doubters—the thoughtful unbelievers in what is unproven or improbable—that they are not of those who would be expected to follow, or even to entertain in thought, ideals of any noble type. Yet these, the thinkers and workers for the world's weal, are just the ones who most of all do need and who ought to hold the very highest, truest, purest ideals. If, as they are sometimes forced to think, this world is man's only heritage, since their children whom they love, and their children's children are to "inherit the earth" after they themselves have passed away, it becomes them to do their best for the coming generations, by following their own highest ideals, so bringing the best nearer to realization for future inhabitants of the earth, making themselves and the men and women present with them in the world to-day wiser, better, and happier for their efforts, and the world itself a more endurable place of residence.

ECCLESIASTICISM, OR THE NEW MEMORIAL CHURCH.

An opulent business gentleman of Lynn, recently deceased, it is well known, invested a moiety of his vast wealth, acquired in hotel-keeping and manufactures, in a costly ecclesiastical edifice, which was recently consecrated. It is called the St. Stephen's Memorial Church. The fact that we have hosts of people in this country at the present time, who are able to spend a quarter of a million of dollars or even a million, to perpetuate their affection for their loved and lost, is a startling one, so that the memorial church under consideration must be regarded not only as a gorgeous and enduring memorial of paternal love, but also as a splendid monumental evidence of the glaring social inequalities which already characterize our popular civilization at the end of the first century of our national existence. The industrial system here in New England has in fact led to the same social result which it has accomplished in Old England; namely, to a division of our democratic community into two classes of needlessly wealthy capitalists on the one hand, and of hand-to-mouth operatives on the other. The so-called Episcopal Church is not only an un-American institution, it is also an un-Christian institution; for it is the Church of royalty, nobility, wealth, social distinctions, æstheticism, and good society, or, in one word, of respectability. Of course, such a church has not a single root in primitive Christianity, the religion of poverty, communism, and other-worldliness.

The St. Stephen's Memorial Church at Lynn is an Episcopal church. Its builder was a this-worldly person, who devoted his life to heaping up riches. Such a person could bear no "testimony to the supernatural," whatever that may mean. The St. Stephen's Memorial Church at Lynn, like a gorgeous private residence, simply "bears testimony" to the immense wealth and sumptuous taste of its builder, and to the farther fact that he had been able by his wealth and business shrewdness to appropriate the lion's share of the profits of numerous manufacturing establishments, which were either owned by him or under his supervision and management. Let not wealth lay the flattering unction to its soul that by any ostentatious expenditure in ecclesiastical architecture it can secure for its possessor éclat in any higher spiritual existence which may possibly await us. Of all the forms of snobbery now current, ecclesiastical snobbery is the most of an affectation, is the most contemptible. This is not the age of church architecture, albeit silly ecclesiastical reactionists indulge in it. Church architecture is simply an attempt to revive the Dark Ages, the ages of faith, of a brutal aristocracy on the one hand, and an ignorant, poverty-stricken, superstitious multitude or proletariat on the other. In this age and country of popular education and popular freedom, ecclesiastical architecture and ritualism are the most laughable part of the æsthetic craze, which is so much ridiculed in England. Mr. Mudge was doubtless a respectable, energetic, business man; but, from the stand-point of intellect and knowledge, he was of no particular account. Had he been acquainted with ecclesiastical history, he would have known that ecclesiastical Christianity is and always has been a sham and impudent perversion of a long-extinct religious enthusiasm of the simplest and most popular sort to purposes of aristocracy and statecraft. All the Established Churches in existence are simply police institutions in the interest of wealth and rank, and to keep the people quiet and contented with ignorance and poverty, while kings and priests lord it over them in the name of an imaginary personality in the heavens. The upholders of these churches talk about their "God" forsooth; but the real and only heads of such institutions are czars, queens, popes, and sultans. The head of the Protestant Episcopal Church is the Queen of England; for it is an exotic here, with as little root in our political and social system as it has in primitive Christianity. All the Established Churches of the Old World, as I have already indicated, are State machines, and are trespassers and intruders on our soil. They are un-American, and have no business here. Their upholders cannot be good citizens of a republic, of a popular sovereignty, and practically they are not, as is becoming more and more evident. The adherents of such churches are really the subjects of potentates beyond the Atlantic.

The very ritual and service of such churches are lessons in royalty and aristocracy, and insidiously infuse into their devotees a contempt for popular institutions. Our newly enriched people rush into ecclesiasticism with a perfect abandon, as something which is most powerful to cleanse them from vulgarity. Our wealthy people seem to be anxious to be rotten before they are ripe. Meantime, there is one consolation; namely, in the fact that Established Churches are slowly but surely falling into ruin in the countries where they originated and where they belong. The English Church was, in its origin, a mere State machine, adapted to the environment in which it arose. The Roman Catholic Church talks Latin and belongs in Latin Europe; namely, in Italy, France, and Spain. Elsewhere, it is a trespasser and intruder. Especially is it entirely at variance with the genius of the Northern or Teutonic nations. The Greek Church is a Russian, Levantine institution. Elsewhere, it is an absurdity.

I care not how many adherents a so-called Established Church may number on our American soil; it never can take root here except at the expense of and by the overturn of our free political and social system. It will always be a thing alien here, and utterly out of place. More than that, these foreign Churches, which have been imported here, are not unlikely, in a not remote future, to lead, like slavery, to civil war on this soil. Already, foreign priests are exercising here an insolent supervision and despotism over the private affairs of their followers or subjects. Let them trespass thus on the free activity of Americans, and there will be war to the knife.

B. W. BALL.

OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM.

Our friend, O. B. Frothingham, has passed through the hands of an "interviewer." The result was published originally in the New York Evening Post, and has been widely copied; and, since it represents Mr. Frothingham to have avowed a considerable change of opinion on religious matters to a more conservative attitude (though the change does not appear so great as some of the journals are inferring), the publication is sure to create no little discussion. We much doubt, however, whether this is an authoritative statement of Mr. Frothingham's position. There are certainly some things in it which Mr. Frothingham could never have said. Whatever fear, for instance, may have recently come over him with regard to the "materialistic" philosophy, he is too well-informed a man to class Mr. Chadwick and Mr. Adler among "materialists," as the interviewer makes him do. The statement throughout lacks those personal and philosophical discriminations in respect to the advocates of freethought which Mr. Frothingham's accuracy as a scholar and writer would have been sure to make. It is a lack that betrays the interviewer's ignorance of the subject he was trying to handle. The writer, indeed, confesses at the outset that he does not know what Mr. Frothingham used to teach as a preacher or what were his methods. We doubt, therefore, the interviewer's ability accurately to present Mr. Frothingham's present views, unless he reported him verbatim, which is not claimed; and we shall continue to doubt whether the statement presented is wholly Mr. Frothingham's, until we hear that he saw and authorized it before it was published or accepts it now as his own.

W. J. P.

PRESIDENT PORTER, of Yale College, speaking of the lamented President Garfield, says that "there is no more interesting feature of his character than his loyal allegiance to the body of Christians in which he was trained and the fervent sympathy which he shared in their Christian communion." There is nothing especially meritorious in a man's adherence to what he has been "trained" to believe. The great religious reformers of the world, like Buddha, Jesus, and Luther, have been men whose clear vision, sublime courage, and conscientious devotion to truth raised them above mere allegiance to the sect in which they were reared. "President Garfield," says the same eulogist, "adhered to the Church of his mother, the Church in which he was trained," etc. For this, no one is disposed to reproach General Garfield; but, when it is brought forward as something exceedingly praiseworthy, we may remark that, if the men who have been the world's greatest benefactors had been content to believe as they were taught by parents and teachers, mankind had been deprived of their intellectual contributions, the example of their moral heroism, and the results of their self-sacrificing labors. The fame of President Garfield was not achieved in the domain of religious thought; and it is fortunate for his memory that the popular esteem and affection cherished for him have something stronger upon which to rest than the fact that he did not leave the Campbellite Church to which his mother belonged, and which he joined when he was a young man.

THE Christian Register, in a very favorable notice of Mr. Cooke's Emerson, which was reviewed in the Index last week, observes: "Something more of emphasis we should have liked on the agreement between Mr. Emerson's idealism and the results of modern science. Lange has written that 'genuine Idealism, in the whole sphere of the explanation of nature, goes at least as entirely in hand with natural science as materialism by any possibility ever can.' The writings of Emerson furnish abundant proof of this. He was Darwinian before Darwin, an evolutionist before Spencer. With dogmatic materialism he has no alliance, but with scientific materialism his own idealism is in perfect harmony."

MR. SETH LOW, Republican candidate for mayor of Brooklyn, said in a recent speech, "There is no man, no set of men, no class of men, no kind of men that can do so much for me that I should feel under obligation to any one of them in the mayor's chair, except to treat each and every one of them as my fellow-citizens." This is an admirable statement of the doctrine and spirit that should govern every candidate for office, and which are so rarely exhibited in the field of party politics that they are worthy of notice in the Index.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

BRENTANO, Union Square, New York, will take subscriptions for the Index, and keep copies for sale.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will start West about December 1, to meet lecture engagements. Societies or individuals in the West that wish his services should address him at once, as this will be his only lecture trip this season.

AN intelligent workingman gives very good reasons for having fairs opened on Sundays. "I am," he writes, "a man who goes to his labor at 7 A.M. I return home at 6.45 P.M. By the time I get my supper and would get ready to go to the fair, and arrive there, it would be 8.15, leaving me only about one and a half hours to see a show that would require all day. I can count hundreds in the same condition."

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates? We shall also be pleased to receive names and addresses of persons likely to be interested in the Index, to whom we can send sample copies.

VERITAS, replying in the Boston Transcript to a correspondent who had declared there is no evidence that Washington was a Freemason, says that on the records of the Fredericksburg (Va.) Lodge is the following: "Nov. 4, 1752 (A.D. 1752), received of George Washington for his entrance fee £2 3s. March 3, 1753, George Washington passed the degree of Fellow Craft. August 4, 1753, George Washington raised a Master Mason." Veritas says that the Alexandria Lodge has this record of date 1799: "Lodge of Emergency, Funeral Lodge, called for the burial of General G. Washington, first master of this Lodge, No. 22."

A BOSTON daily alludes to the views of Rev. M. J. Savage as "remarkable theology." It thinks there are "many even in this city who will be slow in following his teachings, when he says he 'does not believe in the wrath of God, from which men must be saved. If God be angry with us, he is to blame, for he made us.' This is very pronounced Unitarianism." Whether this is "very pronounced Unitarianism" we are unable to say, as the word "Unitarianism" to-day represents a great variety of thought and belief; but we are sure it is very poor theology, although very good common-sense, such as has found expression in the writings of Freethinkers the past few hundred years.

THE Seymour (Ind.) Times is a unique journal. In its opposition to supernaturalism in every form, it is direct and unqualified. It does not simply combat the idea of a God; it will not even print the word with a capital letter. It is smart, but its tone is not judicial; nor are its statements, in our opinion, always just to the system it so mercilessly assails. But, on the important practical questions which have confronted the Liberals of this country the past three years, the Times has been in substantial accord with the Index. Dr. Monroe, the genial editor, is a surgeon and physician who was in the United States service during the Rebellion, is something of a wit and poet, and a kind-hearted, philanthropic man.

"THE TWO WORLDS," a journal published in New York by Eugene Crowell, and edited by A. E. Newton, Mrs. S. J. Newton, and H. H. Brown, comes to us this week increased in size from four pages to eight, and much improved in appearance. It hardly need be said that this paper is devoted to modern Spiritualism, of which it is certainly one of the ablest and handsomest organs published. One world is all that we can attend to, or of which we have been able to learn anything; but if there are individuals who are able to give us information in regard not only to this state of being, but to another hidden from mankind in general, we congratulate them on their exceptional capacity and endowments, and shall welcome any light that may come through them from a supramundane source.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE New Religion, published at Norway, Me., and one of the broadest of religious journals, speaks of Professor Adler's lecture on the "Personality of God," printed in the Index of September 22, as follows:—

Mr. Felix Adler, having passed one cycle in his spiritual evolution, arrives very nearly at the faith of his Jewish fathers. Israel found no name for God, but said, "It is," or "I am." So Mr. Adler is conscious of something. He does not name it God or the Supreme Intelligence or the Unknown, but the something which is and which we cannot understand. Perhaps this is as much as the most devout believer can do. Who is there, indeed, that has any conception whatever of God, though so frequently named in Christian worship and in religious literature? We talk pitifully, if not contemptuously of the atheist and the agnostic; but who of us can tell anything more of God than Spinoza or Spencer?

THE New York Tablet, in a leader on the late State election, gave a pleasant piece of political information about the increasing division of the Catholic vote between the two parties, and also some sound advice addressed especially to Catholics, but which it will do no harm for other folks to read. It says:—

Within a few years, our fellow Irish citizens have become more independent and intelligent in recording their ballots; and, as a consequence, we find the Republican journals that formerly abused us now our warmest advocates and the most outspoken champions of the Irish cause, while such Democratic organs as the World slavishly pander to England, and sneer at the delusion of Irish freedom. We would ask our readers, Is not this a great gain? And we would add that, in order to be respected by both parties, we must make them feel that we are worthy of the honor conferred upon us as free American citizens, and that we shall never prostitute our suffrage or manhood by voting for political intriguers or corrupt party hacks. We should not suffer ourselves to be dragged in the tail of any machine, but should proudly sustain our rights as citizens and the purity of our manhood by supporting none but capable and honorable candidates for office, no matter whether we find them on a Republican, Democratic, or Greenback ticket.

The Tablet announced its own preference for General Carr, the head of the Republican ticket, for Secretary of State, over Mr. Purcell, his Democratic competitor, because the latter has "no public record except that of a politician, and a 'ring' one at that." Both Carr and Purcell are members of the Catholic Church.

WE have long thought that the special need of Spiritualists is a teacher of logic, and we are impressed anew with this want by an article in a recent issue of the Banner of Light, headed "President Garfield with the Invisibles." The article begins thus:—

Without intending it, all modern utterance breaks out into testimony for the existence and presence of spirits to aid us, to guide us, and sympathize with and inspire us. The proofs are to be gathered in all quarters, secular and religious.

The writer then proceeds to quote an anecdote, which somebody has related of the late President, as one of these unconscious "proofs" of the immediate presence of spirits about us. General Garfield, it seems, was describing to the teller of the anecdote the manner of the Union soldiers in one of the battles in which he had been engaged, when, warming with his subject and getting up and walking across the room, he exclaimed with enthusiasm: "Why, they were men who went into battle inspired by all the heroism of antiquity. They marched into the fight with Miltiades and Themistocles and all the heroes of history in the air above them," stretching up his arms. And this the Banner offers as evidence that Miltiades, Themistocles, and all the other heroes, were really there, helping on the Union army.

THE Christian Statesman very justly characterizes the persecution of the Jews in Europe:—

One of the guiltiest and most painful outbursts of malignant and vindictive feeling in modern times has manifested itself in European affairs during the last year against the Jews. Germany has been deeply stirred with an anti-Jewish agitation. Enormous petitions have been presented to the Reichstag, asking for the abridgment of their privileges, and even for gross infringements upon their rights. The nineteenth century seems to have lapsed suddenly back to the Dark Ages, when the Jews were the victims of pitiless oppressions and persecutions throughout almost all Christendom. In Russia, at the present time, this wicked crusade is more violent than in Germany.

And yet the one purpose of the Christian Statesman's existence is to secure an amendment to the United States Constitution, so as to make that instrument distinctly and expressly Christian,—an amendment that would discriminate most unjustly against the Jewish faith, and operate to the practical exclusion of conscientious Jews from participation in the government. Such an amendment might not lead to violent forms of persecution; but is it not inspired by the same spirit of prescription that has caused the outrages in Europe which the Statesman calls "wicked," "malignant," and "gross infringements upon rights"?

THE Catholic Review still continues to discuss the imminent probability of the Pope's leaving the Vatican. It says:—

If the worst comes to the worst and the Pope is compelled to leave Rome, which indeed offers small attraction to him now, he carries with him the Holy See wherever he goes, as we have frequently pointed out. At the same time, no Pope could leave Rome with a light heart. Looked at from whatever point of view, the contemplation of such a step is a problem beset with difficulties. It is no more easy for the Pope to leave what has so long come to be regarded as the geographical centre of Catholic unity than for the sovereign of a people to leave his capital and his kingdom, and carry his offices and its responsibilities into a strange land. As the London Times, in discussing the possibility of the Pope's departure, says: "No State desires to have him in its midst. He is too strong for a subject, and perhaps for a guest."

DAYLIGHT.

Shuts out the depths of cosmic space the day,
Our puny earth to prominence restoring.
Refreshed and reassured by morning's ray,
Through wonted channels life again is roaring.
No wonder men the sun were once adoring:
In his glad light, we somewhat seem again.
Cities and hamlets largely loom once more,
The air throbs with their turmoil and uproar,
From morn till evening human interests reign.

Earth into shadow then again retires,
Abashed and hushed beneath the starry fires,
Cyclads of limitless space. The Milky Way
In mystic stillness gleams o'erhead, where, blent,
The beams of myriad suns kindle the firmament.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 17, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION IN FRANCE.

BY DYER D. LUM.

Religion is the inspiration of life, society the registration of its highest ideals. No creed has ever received the hearty support of succeeding generations without having answered to social requirements. Let us consider the rôle played by the Church in the social crucible of the Middle Ages, and its influence in that development of which modern society is the result.

Rome had rendered the ancient world subject, and opened its highways for Christian missionaries. Not only had the opportunity come, but the need for a new inspiration was manifest. Rome had grown old. The routine of habit had impressed itself upon society, and become a second nature. Paganism had ceased to be a living force, moulding society to great deeds and noble thoughts. Ingrained habit prevented any thorough work of conversion. Destruction was to precede renovation.

Christianity helped to destroy, it could not regenerate Roman society. "Christianity could do nothing for the material sufferings of society, which were as feebly remedied by the Christian emperors as by their predecessors" (Michelet). It needed a new race, untainted with theories of Roman materialism, free from the inherited corruption that had become inseparable from social life, and which had given it a course that nothing but a violent reaction could remedy.

In the presence of a society steeped in the grossest corruption, the new faith could but act as a dissolvent. For constructive work, it needed a virgin soil. This it found in the barbarians. Christianity never conquered the Roman Empire. True, it converted emperors, and a premium was given to conversions; but this could not lead to amalgamation. When the Germanic hordes overran the empire, the Church found the material essential to its success and its preservation.

Martyrdom and devotion had been powerless to supplant paganism, because paganism was not so much a religion as an element of Græco-Roman civilization. The principles of Christianity could not triumph only in the establishment of a new civilization. The founders of Christianity had not sought to found a new State; their object was not a political one. They supplied a principle for man's guidance through life, and modified society in seeking the regeneration of men. In the civilization which formed its cradle are to be found the laws that governed its development.

The truth or falsehood of Christianity does not lie in its forms. The labored attempts to trace its usages and doctrines to its pagan predecessors have only served to prove its historical filiation with the past, and that a social institution is progressively developed with society; but, to use a Gallicism, this goes without saying. There can be no distinction drawn between paganism and ancient civilization: they were inseparable. Paganism saw in the rise and fall of empires only fatalism, proceeding from "causes" that emperors sought to control. Christianity introduced providence in history, a force not under the guidance of men, but shaping human progress, directing all things for a wise purpose. This controlling Power, whether called God or Humanity, is a conception arising from wider generalizations and deeper spiritual insight than paganism could bring forth. The Church developing this thought, whether by Augustine or Calvin, has often tried to build up a system of Christian fatalism: that it has not succeeded is largely due to the presence of conflicting elements, which I shall point out, as coordinate factors in civilization. That the conception of the unity of God in the theology of Mohammed led to different results than its assertion by Christian theology is due to other elements, lacking in Arabian civilization, which were present in the world Christianity encountered.

From the fifth to the tenth century, Christianity found its true mission crowned with success. In Rome, "paganism, though apparently destroyed, in reality still lived in manners" (Laurent). Pagan Rome prepared the ground for Christian Rome: it was to give way to a successor, which was to build a spiritual empire upon the temporal one it supplanted.

Rome had contained within itself a germ of death, for it lacked all conception of liberty. The barbarians, called from the German forests to fill the ranks of the army of the decaying empire, brought liberty, or individuality. Rome had esteemed no man as such: it recognized in him no value save as citizen. The sturdy, dominant spirit of self-assertion was wanting. It absorbed man in the State: the individual was the means, the State the end. The invasion of the barbarian hordes brought an influx of life, of individuality, into social growth. The rôle of antiquity was accomplished: new, life-giving elements were needed to revivify social action; and the Church found its mission in converting the barbarians, and infusing the spirit of charity into the races that henceforth were to dominate civilization. The half-savage German found the real obstacle in his path in the person of the Christian bishop. "Notwithstanding their warlike energy, they would have been absorbed in the ruins they had made, if they had not found a moral force to blunt, direct, and transform their material force. The Church thus served as the bond between the New and the Old World" (Lavallée).

The spirit of independence that characterized the barbarians was sufficient for their half-savage existence in their native forests; but when they stepped on the scene of the world's theatre to form cities, constitute States and govern them, there was necessary a genius which was lacking in them, and this Christianity alone could supply.

The empire they conquered, or which fell into their hands like overripe fruit, had one saving feature,—the idea of law and of unity; and this, consequently, survived the invasion. The Germanic races had so little of the faculty of organization that all their attempts to found great States failed: they ended in concentrating themselves into small local associations, the feudal system of government. The legacy of law left by Rome was reclaimed by the communes or cities, and the first break made in that excessive yet logical development of personal liberty that found expression in feudal institutions. But to the Church is due the preservation of the arm which not only fortified the rights of mediæval cities and broke seigniorial power and privilege, but in turn was directed against herself.

Christianity brought to the ancient world a belief at a time when philosophy had divested the old religions of all vitality; and the empire, in establishing unity, had shown that solidarity without liberty was social inanition. But, in making this belief wholly spiritual, Christianity accepted existing social relations, such as slavery and the domestic organization. Its influence on society was, therefore, an educational one. What was needed in civil life was liberty, individuality, to raise men from the dead level Roman equality, solidarity, had achieved. Christianity supplied moral agencies only. But the development the Church received in its four centuries of vain efforts to break and reform ancient civilization by its methods gave it the strength which was necessary to curb the lawless spirit of the invaders. "There was needed a human sword for the spiritual empire: the Church would bless that of the Franks" (Lavallée).

Christian liberty in history is the liberty of the Church, its freedom to realize its dream of unity in the individual: it is emancipation from bondage to sin, subjective in its nature, the consecration of the inner man to higher life, fitting him for a kingdom not of this world and to which the affairs of this world were of little moment. Its fundamental dogma of the unity of the Godhead, the Sovereign Ruler, zealously maintained in a state of social decadence, and its creed, based on a revealed religion, logically led it to continue the ideal of unity Rome had established, and gave to the dream of universal monarchy a new and higher significance; but its chief aim was to subject all social life to spiritual life.

Let us clearly understand the theory that the Church professed to act upon, before we consider how far that theory was realized in fact, for unrealized ideals are not without their influence in shaping human actions, even if afterward abandoned; but first let us look at the various principles the mingling of which was to produce civilization. If the dogma of the unity of God led to the establishment of the Catholic hierarchy—for revelation and Catholicity were logically connected—upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, inheriting its ideals, and clothing itself with the forms the empire had created, so the dogma of the unity of the race led to the assertion of fraternity, the brotherhood of man in the Church.

In a word, Christianity and feudalism were diametrically opposed: in the one, we had fraternity without liberty; in the other, liberty without fraternity. Their principles, logically carried out, would have led the one to universal subjection and mental stagnation; while the other had no common aim, and could have brought but anarchy. But, in the conflict arising from their joint presence struggling for mastery, individual liberty and civil solidarity became incorporated in civilization.

Rome, the Church, and feudalism have alike contributed to the formation of modern society, and though each, in pursuing its course, may separately be considered as impotent to the task, yet to each we owe just recognition: to Rome for the ideal of unity and civil equality; to the Church for the spirit of fraternity and charity; to the feudal system for the adoption of the Germanic element, individual liberty, transformed by the blending of the three from liberty of self to liberty of others.

We have seen the Church for centuries struggling against Roman civilization and becoming an organized hierarchy. This development alone rendered the Church a power capable of fulfilling its mission among the invading barbarians. Primitive Christianity, so highly eulogized by those who imagine that it was sufficient for any and all times, and adapted to all forms of society, would have been powerless. The papacy had brought unity, a spiritual power not limited to a locality, but extending over the whole of Europe; and the influence of local Christian communities was changed to that of a Church, sitting on the throne of the Cæsars and speaking with the authority of God. Remembering the spirit of feudalism, let us listen to some of the words thundered into the ears of men intent only on personal gain, trampling down fellow-beings in the wild play of their passions, and proud of their power and their rank.

St. Gregory said: "What is the source of nobility? Creation? By this title, we are all equally noble. I say nothing of the nobility that has its origin in the diploma of princes. Must I respect the monkey, when he is called a lion? There is but one true nobility, that of virtue." A monk of the tenth century says: "The Church disdains the nobility that has its source in the vanity of the flesh: it takes the poor from the dust, and places him beside princes in the celestial city."

Pope Clement IV., in 1265, wrote to an Hungarian king, who had refused to recognize a man of humble birth as bishop, that men had the same origin and the same wants, and that nobility of birth was but an accident, a human institution. "In the eyes of God there are neither nobles nor serfs," he said. Gregory VII. said that the Church had become great, because it had ever refused to recognize nobility in birth and Honorius III. rebuked the nobles for aspiring to possession of rich benefices: "It is not birth, it is virtue that makes the servant agreeable to God." In the Crusades, "the popes declared that no Christian, in whatever condition he might be born, could be prevented from taking up the cross and departing for the Holy Land. This was to sever at one blow the ties which bound the serfs to the glebe on the land of their lord" (Bonnechose).

Though individual examples to a contrary spirit in the Church are not lacking, the fact remains that this was its constant theory. They went further, and attacked the very source of pride, individual property. It was not in the possession of wealth that the Church saw a crime, but in its appropriation to private uses alone. In this it was consistent with the communism of the founders of their faith. St. Ambrose declared the earth to be the common property of all, that all had an equal right to its gifts: "Nature has willed community, the usurpation of man has created individual property." St. Augustine said that rich and poor had an equal title to the earth and its fruits. St. Jerome denounced private wealth as having its source in iniquity. St. Chrysostom and many others could be cited, equally explicit; and, from their day to Lacordaire, the same voice is heard.

It will be seen that to the Germanic element of individuality, and the Roman principle of civil equality, the Church added the law of duty; and, in humanizing the barbarous peoples who overran the empire, it softened manners, and insensibly reacted upon civil as well as social relations. Slavery, inseparable from ancient civilization, became serfage; and woman began to be more than a piece of furniture. To properly judge of the services of Catholicity, we must compare it with its age,—not to the standards of to-day,—when the Church alone breathed into society any idea of duty. In this view, and regarding it as a factor in civilization, independent of its divine claim, it is impossible to enumerate our indebtedness to the Church. Whatever its shortcomings, in working out its high ideal in hostile environments, and its invasion by the proud aristocracy, usurping its high places, it preserved civilization from possible extinction for the time being. It was a moral principle, speaking to the consciences of rude men, often from ignorant lips; and less extreme doctrines and high claims would have failed to modify social growth. "Individual man," says Michel, "is a materialist, and spontaneously attaches himself to local and private interests. Human society is a spiritualist: it tends unceasingly to free itself from the miseries of local existence, in order to attain the lofty and abstract unity of a country."

The student of history and civilization has no quarrel with dogmas: he studies them as factors in shaping opinion and society as far as he can from the standpoint of their age. He sees in Catholicity a powerful tendency to harmonize barbarous natures with social ideals; an effort to ameliorate the evils engendered by constant war; checking the germs of disorganization inherent in selfish individualism from developing too rapidly; giving to serfage both hope and opportunity that slavery had crushed, and inculcating obligations upon the strong toward the weak; keeping alive the flickering lamp of knowledge of both science and literature; weakening the power of feudal barons through ecclesiastical courts, and preparing the path for justice and unity; developing the study of Roman law, and weakening greed and avarice in the communes by associating with law the idea of equity and charity.

It gave to an egoistic age a faith higher than force, a faith uniting men in bonds of fellowship, and hurling them in solid column against the Saracen; it abolished private wars, the essence of feudalism, by establishing truces, thus giving rise to peaceful modes of activity; it created the institution of chivalry, wherein honor, devotion to principle and to duty, supplanted the reign of brutal passions, and shed a halo of glory over the knightly armor; it kept distinct in France Church and State, the spiritual and temporal power, permitting the development of civilization which made France its centre of radiation; it kept alive the dream of unity, and associated with it the conception of humanity, thereby preparing the world for an age wherein unity of power and faith, of will and of sentiment, will yet become dominant.

To say that the Church did not mean this is irrelevant: it is but asserting that it was not omniscient. L'homme s'agite, mais Dieu le mène. The Church did not create society; but it did bring into social evolution the action of principles, without which the world would never have escaped from the vicious circle of the ancient civilizations.

I have endeavored to give due merit to each of the three elements to which modern civilization is indebted down to the close of the Middle Ages, making of France the moral magistracy of Europe. In time, corruption found its way into the cloister, generally by an invasion of the privileged classes avaricious of ecclesiastical benefices; but thanks to the spirit of life Catholicity retained, and under the influence of the sentiments I have quoted, a reaction ever set in. Before the fifteenth century, an age of doubt meant retrogradation and death. The Church was becoming feudal, the materializing influence of land was manifesting itself; and when it began to accumulate titles, and pride itself in worldly wealth, it began to share in the general degradation of morals. But the Dominican and Franciscan monks started the work of regeneration by the inculcation of poverty upon its members, and the spirit of fraternity was retained as a social factor.

I will not pass what is called the "Dark Ages." Compared with the standards of the nineteenth century, we see striking abuses in both its theory and practice; but, compared with the reign of brutal force and passions with which it was environed, we cannot but admit the world's great indebtedness to its achievements. It was but one factor in the evolution of civilization. Christianity supplied the heaven of charity and fraternity which knit together the rival tendencies of the Germanic and Roman elements, blended liberty and equality by giving a moral inspiration to feudal individuality and a consecration to civil solidarity.

That the men of the Church were too often ignorant of the mission intrusted to them is but to say that they were human. Men, whatever may be their elevation, generally sacrifice the future to the present; and, when they show a conception of future requirements to the realization of which they bend all their energies by overcoming present obstacles and ambitions, we term them statesmen and men of genius. It was the glory of mediæval Christianity to present an ideal that powerfully moved men's minds, when the jewel it had in its keeping was one of priceless worth to mankind. The formation of society was a task beyond its power. To have undertaken it would have been suicidal. It directed the consciences of men; and, while ever proclaiming passive obedience to Christian princes, it became the soul of the social body. Collectively, the Church possessed the genius of true statesmanship; individually, we see its work carried out by men shackled by the limitations of their age.

As in the dust and smoke of the battle the unity of operations is concealed from the spectator, so in the turmoil of the conflict in the Middle Ages between feudal barons, the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and the royal power, the part each played was obscured by passion, and the directing hand concealed from view; but, as the ages have rolled by and the clouds have risen, we see that the prowess of each contributed to the final result, and to the custodian of moral principle may be ascribed the victor's laurel. To Rome, Christ, and the barbarian are to be accorded the three elements which were alike needed to make civilization. Each bore its own standard, and deemed itself the chief corner-stone; but time has woven the conflicting elements into its woof by broadening the conception of liberty to associate with it the rights of others, converted egoism into altruism, and made the highest independence consistent with civil equality; a struggle which modern France has summed up in that sublime aspiration,—LIBERTY, EQUALITY, FRATERNITY.

BEAUTY FOR ASHES.

I hear all about me sighs over the lost youth of the world. I see lugubrious faces, the corners of the mouth drawn down. Thinkers' hearts are unbuoyant; songs die upon the lips; literature is at a stand-still; art is chilled; the van of humanity is only "marking time." Of American literati who have accepted the results of the scientific renaissance of the day, only two (Burroughs and Whitman) give forth, to my ear, a perfectly healthy and cheery tone. Society has been awakened too suddenly from its long religious somnambulism, and gropes about blindly by excess of light.

In frivolous social circles, the religiously illuminated tip one another the wink; outward-sainted priests are deprecatory and abject. Your only fashionable Church game is blind-man's-buff, and your only tolerated philosophy that of the ostrich. Truth hides abashed in corners, and can only be found after diligent search. If the head is sick, so is the body. Falsehood, greed, commercial materialism, are spreading amain: their tough roots are striking deep down into the soil of human nature. Now, as always heretofore, the approach of moral decay is insidiously prepared by wide-spread hypocrisy and social artificiality.

IN URBAN SOCIETIES, THE MORAL INTERREGNUM HAS ALREADY BEGUN.

Something must be done, and speedily. Woe be to him who knows and speaks not, who has but a crumb of religious comfort and gives it not. The conflict is inevitable. Let the issues then be joined. Let the sharp, short struggle take place, that shall end the painful repression, the humiliating subterfuges, and the stupefying and paralyzing inactivity to which thousands of the noblest young men of the land are now driven. Anything is better than wide-spread dissimulation and irresolution. The very majesty and glory of the nation are at stake. The facts of the universe must be fronted; and the first minds of the nation must base themselves openly upon grand religious faith, or all heroism and all high ideal art will, little by little, inevitably perish. It is true that, as respects a knowledge of the Infinite, the highest virtue is Entsagung, submission, renunciation. But that is not the point. The point is to get the silent and waiting thousands to unite upon the basis of Entsagung, organize the new cult, and take their stand fairly and squarely upon the principles which they see to be everlastingly true.

It is plain enough that it is not solely social and domestic ties that hinder the majority of the best intellects of the country from organizing for the purpose of protection, sympathy, and ethical and religious culture. In the region about Boston, at least, to be scientific in religion requires very little martyrdom. But the fundamental reason why we have not a grand religious cult organized, commensurate with the splendor and beauty and mystery of the new universe, is that the outlook has seemed so cold, unbeautiful, and joyless.

People say to themselves: "The inducement is not sufficient. Rather than avow my melancholy creed, I will purchase peace and happiness so long as I may by silence." Short-sighted and ruinous in its influences as this policy is, it is difficult to blame people for it. The inducements hitherto have been meagre, and the outlook joyless. It is time that the cheerful side of the vaster religion of the future were dwelt on. It is time that each accurate thinker should formulate and publish the few simple cardinal principles that he has thought out for his own guidance and comfort. Let him that is able to receive them receive them.

Strange and terrifying at first is the step that must be taken by him who would now attain religious peace, and there will be comparatively few indeed who will be resolute enough to take it. Yet, when once you are habituated to the new attitude, you find that its yield of quiet and enduring happiness is every day more abundant and satisfying. The step required is that of self-abnegation; to be in love with death; to meet it like the soldier, with a smile on the lips; to embrace the earth as our natural good, to cease to be terrified at it; to expand our insect minds to the scale of Nature; to have a wholesome awe and trust respecting her laws, and a vast and enduring hope of such an immortality as she shall see fit to give. Suppose we do pass at death into another form of existence, why should we fret at that? For my part, I am proud to live on any conditions in such a magnificent universe as this. Let it be what it will in essence, it is a thing of unutterable splendor and mystery and power. Let me see to it that I conduct myself in a manner worthy of it. Let me not fret and fume because I cannot pluck the heart out of its mystery. Let its dumb and unconscious ministers torture me for a hundred weary years, then part me from my friends by death, take my body to pieces and use every atom of it for some finer work, by what right do I complain? Shall I challenge its vast purposes, its means? Shall I not do what it will with its own?

Has it not given me ten thousand beautiful gifts already, and may it not have in store for me a grander one than all in the metamorphosis of death? Oh, there is immense comfort in this trustful stoicism, this cheerful acquiescence in the necessary limitations of our knowledge. It is not sorrow, it is joy; it is not despair, it is hope: it is not weakness, it is strength; it is not loneliness, it is coöperation with the everywhere-present spirit of nature, that august Being that fills the universe with its presence; that mysterious Phenomenon about us, which is not what it seems, whose dwelling is beneath and in the rock, the wave, the rich and fluctuant fires of space, and the lowly and trustful heart; whose names are Truth and Power and Love and Law, and the scope of whose power reaches unto the end of eternity, down to that deep shore the pebbles of which are stars, and up to that roof whose lamps are myriad suns, and around to the bounds of the universe.

Preserving toward the Infinite some such attitude as this, one should not dwell long or morbidly upon thoughts of death or the other life; but he should turn with exuberant joy to healthful activity, to the enjoyment and exploitation of this beautiful garden into which he has come. The aim of men should be to make themselves by out-door life so utterly healthy and robust, and so entirely master of nature, that life would be in the case of all, as it is now in the case of a few, one long scene of happiness, and death would be always the result of old age, as painless as the dropping of a ripe pear from the bough. Then would there indeed be in the world beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness, and we should give a new meaning to these words of the old prophet: "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest and not comforted, behold I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates and thy gates of carbuncles and all thy borders of pleasant stones."

If man should commence by studying himself, he would see how impossible it is to go further.—Pascal.

In the soul's coercion of the lower nature, its energies can alone be exerted and its valor displayed.—Frances Power Cobbe.

DISCONTENT with the worse may always be, though often it is not, a prelude to improvement or change for the better.—Edith Simcox.

LET not your peace rest in the utterances of men, for whether they put a good or bad construction on your conduct does not make you other than you are.—Thomas à Kempis.

WHAT the light of your mind, which is the direct inspiration of the Almighty, pronounces incredible, that in God's name leave uncredited; at your peril do not try believing that!—Thomas Carlyle.

THIS truth within thy mind rehearse:

That in a boundless universe

Is boundless better, boundless worse.

—Tennyson.

THE more readily we admit the possibility of our own cherished convictions being mixed with error, the more vital and helpful whatever is right in them will become; and no error is so conclusively fatal as the idea that God will not allow us to err, though he has allowed all other men to do so.—John Ruskin.

THE man of science does not treat the affirmations of the priesthood with less respect than the affirmations of his own scientific brethren: he applies, with perfect impartiality, the same criticism to all affirmations, from whatever source they emanate. The intellect does not recognize the authority of any one.—Hamerton.

SO WILL I ever face

In thought beforehand, to its utmost reach,

The consequences of my conscious deeds;

So face them after, bring them to my bed,

And never drug my soul to sleep with lies.

If they are cruel, they shall be arraigned

By that true name; they shall be justified

By my high purpose, by the clear-seen good

That grew into my vision as I grew.

—George Eliot.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EVOLUTION AND CHRISTIAN THEISM.

I believe the most difficult thing in all controversies is for opposing parties to understand each other, and to answer each other instead of each answering a figment of his own imagination. In the Index for November 10, M. J. Savage makes a misapprehensive, and thence scornful, reference to a previous little satire of mine. He thinks it infinitely ridiculous that its author should speak on the basis of his own conception of Christianity (see his first paragraph). Pray tell me on whose conception but his own should he speak? Shall we all go to M. J. S. to start with?

Now, I spoke as a Christian; and, according to my view of Christian Theism, I say that that Theism is incompatible with every form and degree of the evolution of one being into another. If any one proves the contrary of this, I shall be refuted, but not till then; and the scorn of the uncomprehending does not in the mean while disturb me. But, of course, before that refutation can be acknowledged, we must agree on what is evolution. What that is, I indicated in my article. And I challenge any one to show that that is compatible with what is universally agreed on among the orthodox to be Christian Theism. Till then, I have nothing more to say on this subject, only to add that I see much to commend in the rest of the gentleman's article. A METHODIST MINISTER.

LIFE EVERYWHERE AND ETERNAL.

WASHINGTON, D.C., Nov. 1, 1881.

Editors of the Free Religious Index:—

I read with interest the many thoughts on what science teaches and proves, and especially the thought that science does not disprove immortality, in the October 6th number. With the writer, I think it a very superficial materialism which claims to have demonstrated the impossibility of conscious life after the dissolution of the body (I will not say death of the body). I believe death to be an impossibility anywhere: that all is life and all eternal; that the atoms that compose our bodies, when they have served our purpose and ceased to be attracted by us, simply become divorced, and seek other attractions, under the eternal law of their natures.

To my mind, creation is a self-evident impossibility: that anything can begin or end is inconceivable. What! the superficialist will say, did my body not begin? Not in the proper sense: the body is not an entity, it is composed of entities or atoms brought together by their attractions to form a habitation for the higher entity during this phase of its existence.

That these minor entities or atoms have pleasure in this cohesive marriage is not to my mind impossible or improbable. Like Bruno, I believe that life and sensation are everywhere, through all atomic as well as organic existences; that marriage and divorce is a universal law which is always operative with all entities or existences.

I believe that the atoms of this small centre called earth were drawn together, aggregated and segregated by and under eternal law; that all entities or spirits, from the lowest atom up to man, the epitome of all, are of eternal existence; and that each and all came on earth and took on what we call their earthly bodies when the conditions of the earth became such as to attract them, and that each and all are doing so still, and will continue to do so as long as the earth attracts them; that all entities above the atomic take on and throw off atomic bodies by nature's law, that these entities or spirits or souls (or by whatever name called) are the grandest forces in nature. One would have to stultify himself to deny this, and say that he was only a body or machine, and that the machine moved without a force behind it.

A great deal of time and thought are wasted, it seems to me, in trying to find or explain the ultimate origin of things. We might as well try to explain the origin of time or space. There can be no ultimate origin of anything. There is not one atom—flower, tree, shrub, insect, animal, or man—more in existence now than there ever was: all are from eternity to eternity, all have passed through endless phases of existence, and will pass through endless phases in the future. Neither evolution nor any other theory can tell the exact method by which the forms of life have come to be what they are, or by which they pass from one phase to another. We know in part, and we believe in part. We know in part how the blade of grass is formed, or takes on its form; but who can tell the precise way each atom takes its place, or why they form stock and blade, unless, as I have before suggested, they respond to the desire of the spirit or higher entity, and lovingly take their proper or appointed places, and under the law of their natures to serve for a time in that phase, when divorce will take place, and they will enter some other phase, and so on and on forever? And as with the atom, so with all entities up to man.

I send you this brief statement of my understanding of existences, believing it is in accordance with facts and sound philosophy. I will not enlarge upon or elaborate these thoughts, but close, hoping you will receive and criticise freely. H.

ANGELS.

DEAR EDITORS:—As a Liberal, I feel pained to read in the Index that there is a falling off in the devotion paid to angels. You may have only quoted a Catholic paragraph, but caution should be exercised in reprinting questionable matter. In Montreal, we know a little about angels and have possibly nearly a full line of most kinds; but do not, I exhort you, adopt the idea that we are wanting in devotion to them. Canadian angels are good, and the American kind are perfectly unsurpassable. I saw an angel or two at York Harbor, Maine, last August; and the neighborhood of Gloucester, or Cape Ann, was conspicuously full of them. Brother Brown was not forgetful to entertain strangers, and received quite a number of angels unawares.

Ignoring the supernatural, I am convinced there are far more angels in this than in any other world. There is no use in trying to improve on the terrestrial brand.

Canadian angels may possibly be subject to a little discount through ill-conceived American regulations, but do not, I repeat, run away with the idea that we, on our part, fail in devotion to them. Nol

Yours,

W. H.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY IN MICHIGAN.

To the Editor of the Free Religious Index:—

The subject of the taxation of church property in Michigan is formally presented to the people of the State through the tax commission now engaged in preparing a revision of the tax laws.

A provisional committee having the matter in charge have prepared blank forms for petition to the Legislature, asking that church property be taxed, and also a short address on the merits of the question.

Any person wishing to undertake the work of securing signers to the petition will have copies of the blank forms sent to him or her on application to me.

S. B. McCracken, Provisional Sec'y,

DETROIT, Nov. 5, 1881.

MISS EMILY J. LEONARD writes: "Lately, in re-reading Chadwick's Bible of To-day (which, by the way, I thank him for publishing), I observed in a foot-note on page 94 that he said, 'The horns in Michel Angelo's statue of Moses are an attribute of Zeus.' I wonder that he should say this, not only because Zeus is not represented with horns (unless Jupiter Ammon is to be regarded as Zeus), but because Michel Angelo only followed the Latin Vulgate in representing Moses as horned when he descended from the Mount, as any one may see by consulting Exodus xxxiv., 29, 30, 35, in any Catholic Bible. I am informed by a Hebrew scholar that this translation, i.e., 'horned,' occurring where our common version represents that his face shone, is due to the fact that the same Hebrew verb was employed to express the emission of rays of light and the putting forth (or growing) of horns. An error similar to what is supposed to be the Catholic one occurs in the use of the same word in Habakkuk lii., 4, in the current English version, as our marginal renderings in polyglot Bibles show.

THE wife of Alexander Campbell, founder of the Christian Church of which President Garfield was a member, although eighty years old, has hair as black and eyes as bright as in her youth, often reads and writes till past midnight, and is preparing the reminiscences of her husband.

MAN.

Study 21.—The Animal Kingdom. (Except man.)
Radiates.

Text-books: Wood's New Illustrated Natural History, Article on Radiata; also Chambers's Cyclopædia, article on same subject.

Specimens: Star Fish, Sea Urchins, and any other forms of Radiate life obtainable.

What is the next higher order of animal life to the Protozoa?

What is a Radiate?

What is the difference between the Protozoan class and the Radiate class?

What members of the Radiate class have you seen, if any?

What is one of the highest forms among the Radiates?

[Show specimen, Star Fish.]

How does this animal move?

Are its movements graceful?

Does it easily accommodate itself to the surface over which it is passing?

What does it do to Mollusks?

Where is its Mouth?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

Can a Star Fish detect prey at a distance?

How?

If a Star Fish is broken into two or more pieces and these thrown back into the water, what happens?

What is a Sea Urchin?

[Show specimen, if possible.]

How do Sea Urchins grow?

What is sometimes done with them?

What kind of Urchins are sometimes found in the fossil state?

How many kinds of Sea Urchins can you mention?

What is a Sea Nettle?

Why is it so called?

What other name is sometimes applied to it?

Why?

How is nutrition carried on in these animals?

How many kinds of Sea Nettles can you mention?

What are some of their characteristics?

What is a Zoöphyte?

Why is it so called?

What divisions in this class can you mention?

What have all the animals treated of in this study in common?

Hence they are called what?

Do any of them show how beautiful and wonderful they are, until we have studied about them?

In this respect, are they like or unlike everything else in the world of Nature?

SELECTIONS.

Let us be content with what is within our reach, and doubt not that in these little creatures are mysteries more than we can fathom.—Kingsley.

Ripe knowledge bringeth to us, day by day,
A greater bliss than wonder was before.
—Lowell.

There are stars in the sky, so also are there stars in the sea.

The living jellies floating by the shore,
Figured by hand divine,—there's not a gem Wrought by man's art can be compared to them.
—Crabbe.

Soft, brilliant, through the wave, the beauteous nettles glow,
And make the moonbeams brighter wheresoe'er they flow.—Crabbe.

After all, these wonderful creatures of the sea only teach us anew the lesson of how much of beauty lies all about us, waiting for us to grasp it and make it our own.

Suggestions to Leader.—Any oysterman will procure you Star Fish alive for little or nothing, and the illustrations in the Natural History will help very much in giving a correct idea of the animals in question.

Articulates.

Text-books: Wood's New Illustrated Natural History, Articles on Insects, Spiders, Crustaceans, and Earth Worm; also Chambers's Cyclopæ-dia, article on Crustaceans.

Specimens: Some Insect, a Spider, a Lobster or Crab, or both, and an Earth Worm.

What is an Articulate?

Can you think of any animals which are Articulates?

What is this?

[Show specimen Insect.]

Into how many parts is its body separated?

How many legs has it?

Are the legs straight?

How many horns or feelers has it?

Are these characteristics common to all Insects?

What, then, is an Insect?

How do Insects breathe?

What kinds of eyes have they?

What varieties of Insects can you mention?

Where do all Insects live?

What is this?

[Show specimen Spider.]

What kind of a body has this animal?

Are the bodies of all spiders divided alike?

How many legs do spiders have?

What are spider-webs?

What are they for?

What makes spiders dangerous?

Where do they live?

What is this?

[Show specimen Lobster or Crab.]

In what respects is this like Insects and Spiders?

In what respects is it unlike Insects and Spiders?

What is the shell of this animal?

Does it always keep the same shell?

How does it sometimes lose a limb?

Can it get a new one in such cases?

How?

What is this?

[Show specimen Earth Worm.]

What kind of a body has this animal?

In what ways, if any, is it like Lobsters and Crabs?

In what ways unlike them?

Is it like Insects and Spiders in any respect?

What is the difference between a Caterpillar and a Worm?

Does it seem as if Flies, Spiders, Lobsters, and Worms were much alike?

How does it happen, then, that they are classed together?

What does this show about everything in nature?

SELECTIONS.

How well clad are the insects; with what suits of mail are the beetle, the bee, and the ant furnished!—
Parker.

So work the honey-bees,—creatures that, by a rule in nature, teach the art of order to a peopled kingdom.—Shakespeare.

Seeing only what is fair,
Sipping only what is sweet,
They do mock at fate and care,
Leave the chaff, and take the wheat.
—Emerson.

It seems strange that a butterfly's wing should be woven up so thin and gauzy in the monstrous loom of nature, and be so delicately tipped with fire from such a gross hand, and rainbowed all over in such a storm of thundrous elements. The marvel is that such great forces do such nice work.—Parker.

Crush not that helpless worm. Turn the hasty foot aside. Do not lightly take the life thou canst not give.
—Gisborne.

There is not an insect that darts through the air;
there is not a spider that crawls along the ground;
there is not a lobster or a crab that navigates the sea;
there is not even a worm trodden under the foot of man; but furnishes a new chapter in the never-ending history of Wonderland.

Suggestions to Leader.—Make the distinction between the Larva and Pupa of the Insect and the Worm clearly understood. A cut like that in the illustrated dictionaries showing the Caterpillar, Chrysalis, and Butterfly will be a great help to this end. The specimens for this study are such as can be easily obtained in many places. Notice also the illustrations in the Natural History.

BOOK NOTICES.

ARNE. By Björnsterne Björnson. Synnöve Solbak-ken. By the same author. Translated from the Norse. By Rasmus B. Anderson, author of Norse Mythology, etc. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.
1881.

Three of Björnson's stories have been for some time available to the American public,—Arne, The Fisher Maiden, and The Happy Boy. But they were published timidly, and have not attained to any general circulation. We are now to have a uniform edition, printed on beautiful paper and in beautiful type; and the general make-up of the books is to be worthy of their inherent loveliness. The edition is published by arrangement with the author. The reputation of Professor Anderson as a Norwegian scholar is sufficient warrant for the accuracy of the translations, and they are very pleasant reading. The songs with which they are sprinkled are translated by Auber Forestier.
Something has been sacrificed here to literalness and conformity to the original metres. The translation of the wonderful song, "Over the Mountains High," in the old edition was probably much less literal, but as a song it was incomparably superior.

We do not feel that it would be possible for us to praise these books more highly than they deserve.
They are the first-fruits of a remarkable genius, and it has borne none that are sounder or sweeter. Syn-növe Solbakken was published in 1857, when the author was twenty-five years old. Arne, a more powerful but less pleasing story, was published in the following year. They are idyls of the purest water. They are not so long but they can be read each in a single evening, and so give an unbroken impression. Their conciseness leaves much to the imagination. They have a wonderful suggestiveness. The method of Björnson is to do nothing for the reader which he can make him do for himself. The nearest analogues of these stories are the shorter stories of Auerbach; but not even his Little Barefoot can compare with Arne and Synnöve and The Happy Boy. There are also suggestions here of Hans Christian Andersen, but on the Dane's own ground Björnson is his superior.

Here are books that readers of the Index ought to read and circulate. Björnson, like Auerbach, is "one of our folks." He is a Liberal of the Liberals; a reformer in art, in politics, and in religion. He is the first novelist, lyric poet, publicist, and orator in Norway, at the present time. As a dramatic poet, only Ibsen is his equal. The impression we have ourselves received of the power and pathos of his stories makes us impatient to raise up for him an army of readers. Every new reader is sure to be a propagandist of his fame.

THE ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY. By Ludwig Feuerbach. Translated from the Second German Edition, by Marian Evans. Second Edition. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881.

This work, the first edition of which was published in 1854, has been given a place in the "English and Foreign Philosophical Library," to which it is certainly entitled by its great merits. It is the work of a close analytical thinker, and of a bold, vigorous, and brilliant writer.

The work is an historico-philosophical analysis of Christianity. The author thinks the true explanation of this system of faith is found in the thought and feeling of man; that anthropology furnishes the key to theology; that man is the substance of which God is the shadow; that man studied himself in the worship of God before he made himself a direct object of study; that God is the mirror in which man sees his own intellectual and moral face; that all the dogmas of the Christian religion, such as the Trinity, Incarnation, and Atonement, are but formulations of conceptions of the human mind. Feuerbach's philosophy has for its principle "not the Substance of Spinoza, not the Ego of Kant and Fichte, not the Absolute Mind of Hegel, but a real being, the true Ens realissimum,"—Man."

THE English Medical Press gives the following warning: "We are concerned, in the interests of impressionable females and weak-minded young men, to notice the arrival in England of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, of explosive revival fame. Former experience of the pernicious influences of the hystero-religious mania with which these clever men were identified leads to hope that most people will guard against an undue preponderance of the emotional passion."

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRESIDENT GREY is described as a stout, thick-set, and almost corpulent person. When he goes shooting, —this being his favorite amusement,—he wears a dark corduroy suit and long leathern gaiters, and is accompanied by a pointer given to him by the Prince of Wales.

THE Christian Instructor (United Presbyterian) asks, "Is there anything amiss at Princeton?" The writer, after listening to six of the sermons, remarks that "from all the six efforts no one could have learned that man is a sinner or Christ the Saviour. Had there been any stray sheep present, nothing was said that would either drive or entice them back to the fold."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Boston Herald, in an appreciative notice of Mrs. Annie Fields' forthcoming volume of "Memoirs" of her husband, the late James T. Fields, remarks: "Mr. Fields was not strong at authorship: this was not his gift, but he had other gifts more than those connected with writing,—the gifts of estimating the value of a work in manuscript as a literary production, and of guessing correctly whether the public would like it. His literary sagacity amounted to an instinct. He divined the tastes of people from their physiognomy, and surprised his fellow clerks by being able, on seeing a person enter the bookshop, to predict what book was wanted before the wish was expressed."

AN exchange tells us that when a free church clergyman discovered Herbert Spencer's name among the list of visitors at an out-of-the-way English resort this summer, he instantly convened a prayer-meeting in a billiard-room, as a "fumigatory measure." An intelligent Chicago minister, recently, after identifying the gospel of Jesus with the high morality of the Sermon on the Mount and the parables, declared, as reported, that he was "willing to look Herbert Spencer and Tyndall square in the face, and declare that he was not ashamed of this gospel of Christ." We cannot understand why the clerical brethren should be so much afraid of this man, Herbert Spencer. He who has rebuked so effectually the dishonesties of the day in his essay on the "Morals of Trade," who has pleaded so tenderly for help to the deprived and fallen in his "Prison Ethics," and who has heroically given his life to the work of planting the "Data of Ethics" firmly in the soil of universal experience and eternal law, is certainly a fellow-laborer with all those who, in the spirit of Jesus, would work for the coming of the kingdom of truth and righteousness, the kingdom of heaven. Why should you be afraid of your friends, brethren?—Unity

THE New York Sun has found, in all the reports of the Garfield memorial services in various cities it has examined, only one prayer for Guiteau, and that was uttered by a colored minister in Louisville. "A Christian" writes that paper thus: "That lady whom you mentioned as praying and singing for the wretch Guiteau should be safely lodged in an insane asylum. I say, Down, down to hell with him. Heat it a thousand, yea, ten thousand times hotter for him, is my prayer." Commenting on this, the Springfield Republican says: "The influence of an unquestioning faith in hell, well lived up to, to make men fiends, could not be better illustrated, except by Guiteau himself, who in one of his pamphlets says: 'We answer, God must sustain his government. Heaven is for the righteous, hell for the wicked. Heaven would be a hell, if the wicked could get into it. Hell is for the devil's seed, heaven for Christ's seed.'" The New York Evangelist says: "Do not talk about pity in such a case as this," and declares that Christ forgave his murderers because they knew not what they did, but that this fact has no bearing on the case of Guiteau. Has the editor of the Evangelist ever read these words: "But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven," "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us"? Guiteau is a murderer, and should be tried and punished according to law; and, while his crime is of a nature to arouse indignation, it is not pleasant to see one who professes to be a moral and religious teacher exhibiting a barbarous thirst for blood, and trying to make the words of the Nazarene reformer justify a spirit of revenge.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JOHN BRIGHT will be seventy years old on the 16th inst.

MR. JAMES GORDON BENNETT is to send a relief expedition to search for the "Jeannette."

GLADSTONE, though past seventy years of age, has just put on spectacles for the first time.

THE sixtieth birthday of Professor Virchow is to be publicly celebrated at Berlin on the 19th.

EUGENE LAVASSOR, a captain who served under Napoleon Bonaparte until his exile, died recently on his estate near Covington, Ky., aged ninety.

FIVE of the essays of Schopenhauer, on Misery, Love, Genius, Poetry, and Education, have been translated by Messrs. G. Droppers and C. A. P. Dachsel, of Milwaukee.

MR. W. R. SALTER's discourse at Parker Memorial, last Sunday morning, on "An Ethical View of Religion," was full of thought, and its style and spirit were admirable. It elicited general praise.

A NEW edition of the Chinese classics will soon be issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., and also a reprint of The Arabian Days' Entertainments, translated from the German by Herbert Pelham Curtis.

H. HOLT & Co., publishers, are preparing a series of biographies of distinguished Americans to be written by such humorists as Burdette of the Hawkeye, Charles Dudley Warner, and John Habberton.

PROFESSOR GULLIVER (ill-omened name), of Andover Theological Seminary, declares that the theology of New England is as sound now as it was in the time of Jonathan Edwards. This must be part the fourth of Gulliver's Travels, each part as true and reliable as the others.

QUEEN VICTORIA completed, on October 25, a reign of forty four years and one hundred and twenty-eight days, which is just the length of time that Queen Elizabeth sat on the throne. Victoria has now reigned longer than any other English sovereign, except George III., Henry III., and Edward III.

PATTI is reported saying that, if her manager charges ten dollars for tickets to her concerts, she can't help it. All she wants is to "see dear old America again." But the manager, according to an interviewer, says he simply obeys her orders. Entire unselfishness is no more to be expected in the theatrical than in other professions.

PRINCE BISMARCK's son William has been defeated in Mulhausen, by five thousand votes, by a liberal. The opposition may prove strong enough to necessitate a dissolution of Parliament. But the London Times Berlin correspondent says, "The relative party strength in the new Reichstag will not differ much from that in the old."

GENERAL BANKS, in his oration on Garfield in this city, showed that Edward Garfield, an English gentleman of German ancestry, came to Watertown, Mass., in 1630, and was a selectman, representative, and captain of militia. He was the ancestor of Abram Garfield, who was at the Concord fight, and of the line of our lamented President.

LUCY HAMILTON HOOPER writes from Paris of Queen Marguerite of Italy: "I am told that there are few ladies in Europe so well versed in American literature as she, Longfellow ranking among her favorite poets and Hawthorne among her best-beloved romance-writers. I have also heard that she cherishes the idea of one day sending the young Prince of Naples to America to study our institutions and our people."

A REV. B. S. TAYLOR, known as a cranky member of the Troy Methodist Conference, substituted the following speech for the usual sermon to his congregation at Sand Lake. "Not until God in His infinite mercy can create some one who can manufacture his own buckskin breeches and live on wind pudding can a person exist as pastor of this church, and until such a person is found I declare this pulpit vacant. The congregation will arise and receive the benediction."

ONE Egbert F. Cleave writes to the Boston Post as follows: "I stand ready to do oral combat before a tribunal whose qualification shall be simply the standard of common morality, against any infidel who may be considered sane; and I will show that infidel craft alone is the beastly vampire impeding and destroying true progress and development of humanity, the poisoner of all that is noble, good, and tender in mankind, the foul assassin of every hope and aspiration of true being." Who is this theological Don Quixote?

MISS HELEN TAYLOR, the step-daughter of John Stuart Mill, in an address to the Ladies' Land League of Dublin, writes: "I feel almost ashamed to be an Englishwoman. I feel that to you born in Ireland the very name of England must be detestable, and that just ground exists for all the hatred and all the contempt you feel for us. But yet I can assure you there are thousands, and there soon will be millions, in England who will make their voice heard loud and strong in protest against the iniquities that are being perpetrated in Ireland. Your day of vengeance will come."

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE, still called Reverend because he once believed in and preached theology, and deserving now of the title because of his venerable years and philanthropic works, talks the rankest kind of pessimism, while acting daily the part of the Good Samaritan. He has just given $40 to the "Home for Little Wanderers" in this city, $20 to the North End Mission, $20 to the Home for Colored Women, and has sent a chromo of Toussaint L'Ouverture and other pictures, amounting to $50, to the Holley School at Lottsburgh, Va. His main thought and work seem to be to relieve distress and to assist educational and charitable enterprises.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON:

HIS LIFE, WRITINGS, AND PHILOSOPHY.

By Rev. GEO. WILLIS COOKE.

1 volume, crown octavo.....$2.00.
With fine Steel-Engraved Portrait.

An interesting and valuable critical and analytic survey of the literary life of Mr. Emerson, with copious quotations and extracts from his writings, including many choice and characteristic passages not comprised in his printed works.

"Mr. Cooke has given to this book long and faithful study, and some high authorities who have examined the MSS. promise it a permanent place in literature."—Unity, Chicago.

"It is equally clear that Mr. Cooke's volume will have a value quite independent of his own biographical work in it, though this also has been carefully done, and will add much to the common stock of knowledge concerning our chief American author; for such Emerson is, and will soon be recognized, if he is not already."—Frank B. Sanborn, in the Springfield Republican.

"He has given us an interesting biography of Mr. Emerson, touched upon his personal traits and peculiarities, told us incidents connected with the writing of some of his more famous essays and poems, and has brought together a large amount of matter written by Mr. Emerson, which has never found place in his published works. This feature makes the work of especial value, as certain of the essays and sermons included have been sought for in vain for many years."—Boston Transcript.

"Mr. Emerson's relations with the great minds of the century are clearly brought out by abundant quotation and selections from personal reminiscences. For the rest, the volume is rich in indited writings and speeches."—Boston Traveller.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE New York Tablet is very indignant that in Germany the priesthood is not exempt from military conscription, and, citing one or two recent cases, says, "This sort of thing is simply monstrous."

THE venerable and venerated Peter Cooper, philanthropist and nonagenarian, made the trip from New York to Boston November 9, for the express purpose of visiting the two great Fairs, with which he expressed himself delighted.

"STATISTICS show," says the Church Union, "that fewer people attend church in Liverpool now than twenty years ago. The ability of the people to appreciate good preaching has probably increased without a corresponding improvement in the sermons."

PROFESSOR SWIFT has discovered a comet in the constellation Cassiopeia, about half-way between the pole-star and the cluster in the Sword of Perseus. This is the second comet he has discovered, and gives him a total of $400, so far this year, out of the Warner prizes.

THE Porte has sent instructions to Turkish representatives at St. Petersburg, Berlin, and Bucharest that Jews will be allowed to settle in all parts of the Empire, except in Palestine, but that they will be subject to the Turkish laws, and required to adopt Turkish nationality.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Sun says that the census shows in the Eastern States a great excess of women and in the Western States a great excess of men; and he wants "several thousand of the educated and refined girls and women of the Eastern States to make their homes in Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska."

THE Springfield Republican says of Gambetta: "He is a Republican from conviction. He is radical, but not blindly and destructively radical. For a Frenchman of the South, he has a surprising dash of American practicality and horse sense in his composition. He has the French freethinker dislike for priests, and he believes in secular education,—in what is known in some quarters as the "Godless public school." "

THAT there is really something in a name, even if "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet," seems to be indicated by the fact that John P. Howard, of Burlington, Vt., emulative of his philanthropic namesake, has given the opera house which bears his name, and which cost him $125,000, as a home for destitute children. Mr. Howard's gifts for charitable purposes within the year, inclusive of this, are said to aggregate nearly $225,000.

ALTHOUGH Guiteau claimed that he was only an instrument in the hands of the Lord for the removal of President Garfield, in order that Arthur might take his place, he maintains that but for the mismanagement of the physicians his victim would not have died. We refer to this inconsistency only to remark that a real lunatic would, under the circumstances, be likely to glory not only in the part he performed, but in the death of the President, instead of attempting to evade responsibility by ascribing the result to the unskillfulness of the doctors.

A WITNESS has been disqualified at Toronto on the ground that he is an agnostic. Mr. Justice Osler suggested, with much good sense, that an honest admission of ignorance regarding a supermundane existence should not render a witness incompetent respecting what he knows about this life, when his testimony is important as to what he has seen bearing on the rights of a plaintiff or a defendant. The laws of Canada on this point, like those of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and some other States of the Union, evidently admit of considerable improvement.

MR. FROTHINGHAM, in his recent letter to the New York Evening Post, says: "In conclusion, permit me to say that I have seen no reason for changing my opinions. It has, however, occurred to me that they do not contain the whole truth. Certainly, I have not gone back to any position which I had abandoned." It occurs to all thinkers, before reaching the age of Mr. Frothingham, that their opinions "do not contain the whole truth," and what occurs to them as a possibility when they first begin to realize the meagreness of their attainments and the limited range of their thoughts deepens, with years and added wisdom, into a profound and abiding conviction.

AURELIO SAFTI, who was a triumvir of the short-lived Roman Republic of 1849, in a letter to the International League of Peace and Liberty which recently held sessions at Geneva, wrote as follows: "I have faith in the Republic, that is to say, in Liberty, Justice, the Future. . . . The Republic is the soul of civilization; that is, of all the live forces which Reason, Science, and Work develop in modern society. The Republic will not die. It is, on the contrary, destined to become more firmly fixed in Europe. The proof of this is that in France, where it is a living fact, its complete triumph is growing more certain every day. The last elections are a striking evidence of this. And everywhere, indeed, the tendency of thought and the social action of peoples who are rising from the condition of resigned slaves is decidedly republican. The dynastic principle is no longer rooted in the faith of the multitude. Constitutional monarchy is nothing more than a transitory form, which conceals the longing for self-government among people already ripe for liberty."

At the National Labor Congress, held at Pittsburgh on the 17th, to encourage the formation of national and international trade and labor unions for the purpose of securing legislation in the interests of the industrial classes, a platform was adopted, declaring in favor of the right of labor to organize in its own defence against the aggressions of concentrated capital, the abolition of contract labor in penal institutions, the prohibition of Chinese immigration, and of the incorporation of trades unions like other bodies having property and desiring to accomplish a just and legal object. Among the other demands of the Congress are the enforcement of the national eight-hour law, the compulsory education of all children under fourteen years of age, the proper ventilation of mines and workshops, fire-escapes for factories and workshops, and sanitary inspection of all buildings and localities in which men and women are employed. The demand for the prohibition of Chinese immigration is of questionable justice and wisdom; but the other measures advocated, or most of them at least, will commend themselves to the favorable consideration of all fair-minded people.

THE sessions of the new Reichstag were opened on the 17th; and Bismarck, after conveying the excuse of the Emperor for his absence, read the speech from the throne. The speech lays stress on the necessity of provision by the State for invalid workmen, and declares that social evils are not to be remedied by repression alone, but by the "concurrent promotion of the welfare of the working classes." The Emperor says that he will look back on all his successes with greater satisfaction if he can bequeath to the Fatherland new and lasting guarantees for continuous peace at home, and to the necessitous a more secure and generous measure of that assistance to which they have a claim. The aged and infirm, he says, are entitled to a greater degree of State provision than they now enjoy. At a moment when matters connected with internal institutions present far-reaching and difficult problems, the solution of which is not to be mastered in a single session, but which the Emperor has felt it to be his duty before God and man to put forward, he rejoices the more to be able to express his entire satisfaction with the state of foreign politics. The speech concluded thus: "Our relations with all the other powers are most friendly. Belief in Germany's loyal and sincere desire for peace has gained a hold with every nation. We regard it as a duty to God and the Fatherland to strengthen and justify that faith."

UNCHURCHED FREETHOUGHT.

In the last issue of The Index, something was said in this column on the progress of free religious thought in churches, and in other denominational and semi-denominational organizations. To one content with gains effected by the steady process of evolution and not ambitious to figure out, if not to figure in, a revolution, the account of such progress could be made sufficiently satisfactory. But the progress of freethought concerning religion outside of all ecclesiastical lines is even more marked. To glance at some of the evidence:—

The number of thoughtful and moral persons whose thought has led them away from any stated connection with existing churches is increasing. The class of scholarly, scientific and professional people who are outside of the Churches is increasing. Public opinion does not require, as once it did, an attendance on Sunday services nor an acceptance of any scheme of theology. Scepticism and even the boldest denials in religious matters get a hearing in quarters to which they once had no access. The Positivist philosophy, especially in the form presented by Herbert Spencer, has won a large discipleship in the younger generation of reading and earnestly practical men. Still another large class of people, somewhat less thoughtful and less practically earnest perhaps, but more aggressively defiant in denial, are attracted to the teachings of Colonel Ingersoll,—an attraction not to be explained wholly by his eloquence or his rhetorical sharpness, exceptional though they are, and certainly not by his learning, which is scant. Spiritualism has made another large cleavage from the Churches. And there are still other people, who have felt that philanthropy and pure ethical culture are the main parts of religion, and who, seeing how relatively little, compared with the stress put on theology, the Churches have hitherto done for these objects, have withdrawn, and sought to do their work in other ways. Thus, reckoning up the different phases and types of that free thinking which has broken away from all ecclesiastical organizations, there exists a large heterogeneous mass of Liberalism, which, so far as any unity of purpose or of consciousness is concerned, is yet in a very chaotic condition, but which is evidently becoming stronger, more outspoken and demonstrative, and which is not likely ever to be gathered back into the Churches from which, by the impulsion of the common spirit of liberty, it has escaped.

Nor, regarding this mass of Liberalism as a whole, does it at first sight appear much more likely that it will evolve from itself any common organization for constructive social or moral work. The different classes of people and types of mind that compose it are one in the spirit of liberty, but in almost all things else they are as divided as are the ecclesiastical sects. The principle of individualism is dominant among them, and no vital principle of combination seems hitherto to have been shaping the mass of individuals into a consistent organic whole. Considering, too, the progress of Free Religion, it might be said that in this direction the prospects of freedom look much better than those of religion; that, in the Liberalism which is outside of churches, the element of freedom dominates everything, and that the element of religiousness is defective; and that sometimes even the moral sentiment appears at least no stronger than in the Churches, though it is a standing liberal complaint that in the Churches morality is sacrificed to theology. Looking at some aspects of Liberalism, the question is certainly in order whether morality is not sacrificed to freedom.

Yet after giving full weight to this disorganized, heterogeneous, and atomic condition of Liberalism, let it not be too easily decided that it is void of all capacity for organization and progress in constructive work. Much of it will doubtless remain purely negative and individualistic,—remain to make its protest and denial against the irrational dogmas and superstitious fears and false authorities which have been imposed upon mankind in the name of religion. There is a body of Liberals who will continue to spend their energies in that way so long as the Churches keep any entrenchments on freethought to fight against. And, until that end is reached, this class will not be without their uses. But meantime there are many other Liberals who are not content with merely this attitude of protest and denial, who see that freethought is now so well under way and has so many helpful allies that its triumph at no distant day is assured, and who are beginning to ask, Having won our liberty, what are we going to do with it? There are not a few Liberals who are beginning to see what a mighty power the Churches might be for social advancement, for moral education, for philanthropic purposes, for the strengthening of personal and public integrity, if, emancipated from the service of upholding and propagating certain creeds, they could only devote their entire energies to these things. And this class of Liberals are not far from asking or are already asking the question, Why shall not we set about doing in some united way for ourselves and our children and the community around us these things which we believe the Churches might and ought to do? There are signs that a good many Liberals have come to the point where they are not satisfied with merely a freethought lecture or debate, and feel that the work of protest and denial alone, however important a work it may be, is barren of personal or social nutriment. Here, for instance, in Indiana, is a gentleman who has built up a large manufacturing community, and who is a thorough Liberal by conviction. He is desirous now to organize some effective institution for the moral and social improvement of the people whom his business has drawn around him,—something that shall stand to them as a liberal church for the elevation of their social condition and the refinement and ennobling of their characters. He has a glimpse of a plan, and money ready to bestow upon it. What he waits for is some man with wise directive ability as an organizer to take charge of the work. Farther out, in a town of Missouri, as a circular recently received informs, a society of Liberals has been organized on the basis of ethical culture, and is having unexpected success. In many other places in the West, it is said, by those in a position to know, are the conditions ripe for effective liberal organization outside of even the most liberal churches, if only men of the right stamp were ready to go to them as leaders.

Possibly, some allowance may have to be made for the enthusiastic hopes of those who furnish this kind of evidence. And yet, in the nature of the case, there seems no good reason why what has been done in a few places might not be done in many more, if the leaders could only be multiplied. New York is not so exceptional but that the kind of society and work which Felix Adler has organized there might not be organized in several other large cities of America, if there were several other Felix Adlers to do it. The conditions would be nearly or quite as favorable, probably, in Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and San Francisco. And so among smaller cities. The kind of Liberalism that has organized itself into a Free Religious Society in Providence exists, probably, in a dozen other cities of similar or smaller size: only, in Providence, the movement found a worker to devote himself to it. It should be added, however, that the Providence liberal movement started before the leader came. It started in the convictions and enterprise of a few persons who believed in the need, and the possibility of supplying it. But neither is this a condition that should be wanting elsewhere. Wherever and whenever Liberalism comes to consciousness of its needs and responsibilities, it will develop a capacity for organizing agencies adequate to the discharge of its social and public duties.

W. J. POTTER.

UNORGANIZED LIBERALISM.

With many who have strong convictions and an earnest spirit, the impression prevails that without special organizations the advancement and triumph of liberal principles are impossible. Individual effort counts for but little, they think, in modifying public sentiment and preparing the way for rational thought and its incorporation into the character and conduct of the people.

This view in our opinion is erroneous. Fully aware of the advantage and power of organized effort sustained and wisely directed, we yet cannot be unmindful of the enormous influence exerted in a thousand ways through a multitude of instrumentalities, independently of any special organization. Indeed, individual effort is often more decisive and powerful in influencing public sentiment and leading to the accomplishment of great results than the work of the largest associations formed for some special object. History abounds in examples illustrative of this fact, that must occur to all readers. The influence of thinkers, men like Darwin and Huxley, Mill and Spencer, Carlyle and Emerson, upon this age is incalculable. Theology to-day is being modified, and rational views are gaining in strength and importance not largely through the organized efforts of Liberals, but through the influence that comes from enlarged knowledge on every subject, and the independence and courage which are born of this knowledge. The disclosures of science and the results of historical research, the diffusion of knowledge, the consequent decay of superstition and the growing habits of independent thinking among all classes, have contributed among a multitude of influences to infuse liberal sentiments into the popular mind. The result is seen in the tone of the press, in the teachings of the pulpit, in improved legislation, in the character of our general literature, and in the growing charity and spirit of tolerance among all classes.

We do not wish to be understood as undervaluing liberal organizations, which indeed may be made powerful aids to progress. We claim only that the strength and influence of rational thought are not to be measured by its special organizations; and it does not depend upon them for its triumph, or even its progress, which, however, they may accelerate or retard.

The absence of numerous liberal organizations in this country is by no means an indication that Liberalism is accomplishing nothing. Progress now as in the past is along the line of existing beliefs and institutions; and its results are seen in the continual modification of the old rather than in the creation of something entirely new. It is more probable that the Churches will become in time so divested of theological influence and so thoroughly in harmony with the best thought and spirit of the age that they will satisfy the social wants of all without offending the reason and common-sense of any, than that there will spring up outside of them organizations which will sap their strength and have the general support of the people. The Churches have in them elements of excellence without which they would not have the support they now receive. And whatever in these organizations is adapted to the requirements of this life, to the intellectual, moral, and social wants of our nature, is largely due to the rational thought and spirit which prevail, notwithstanding theology by many is still credited with the whole. So, if those who are interested in the progress of liberal views can point to no great general organization which is devoted exclusively to extending those views, they can see everywhere, inside the Churches as well as outside, the influence of the principles which they cherish, and labor to advance.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

MR. SAVAGE ON THEISM.

It is refreshing, now and then, to find some one who, like Mr. Savage, not only professes to believe in "God," but is bold to advocate and ready to defend that belief against every assailant. He does not care to sue for peace, saying, "I believe in God, but I can't tell why"; "I believe in God, but I can't tell what"; "I believe in God, but I can't tell how"; or, "I believe with the heart, and cannot reason it out"; or, "To define God is to destroy him"; or, "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned: we pity you for your blindness, but it is of no use to argue with you." Not this is the attitude of Mr. Savage; but, in a true knightly fashion, he comes into the arena, unsheathes his sword, and, in the name of the scientific spirit and method, throws out his challenge. One must respect such a champion, though he cannot always train under his banner, and may even find himself at theological cross-swords with him now and then.

It is in such a position that I find myself, upon reading his "Some Reasons for Theism," published in Index of November 10. To drop the simile (for it is not as foes fighting for victory, but as friends helping each other in the search of truth, that we meet), it is not clear that Mr. Savage is successful in his attempt to rest his Theism upon a scientific basis. At least, it seems to me that he fails; and I think I detect the fallacy of his reasoning. If I have not done so, I shall at least have exposed the fallacy of my own; and that is worth while, if he will kindly show me my error.

Mr. Savage starts out with this proposition: (1) "We know that a power exists which is not man. To this power, we can set no limits. We cannot even conceive any limits. It existed before man, and would exist just the same were humanity swept off the face of the earth. By this power, we were brought into being, have been made what we are, and on it every moment depend." The italics are ours. What, you ask, can there be objectionable in this language? To me, it bristles with half-hidden assumptions, utterly unwarranted by anything yet established by the "scientific method." In the first place, it seems to me that Mr. Savage assumes the whole question at issue in his use of the word "power." It is true he does not, as Professor Huxley would say, make a "grenadier" of it by heading it with a capital P; but he does make it do all the duty of a little god throughout his sentence. For instance, he makes that power bring us into being, and develop and support us here. Now, if he uses the word "power" as a word standing for an idea not included under the words "matter" and "force," will he tell us by what scientific method he arrived at a knowledge of that tertium quid?

If, on the other hand, he uses the word "power" as identical with "force," meaning by it the sum of all the physical correlated forces, known and unknown, then by what right does he ignore the function of "matter," as we distinguish it from "force," in the bringing of man into being, and the developing and sustaining him here? Would it not be just as true to substitute the word "matter" for the word "power" in his proposition? If so, haven't we, at least, two Gods in the universe, according to his reasoning? But, although he does not formally endow this chameleon-hued word, "power," with intelligence and consciousness until he reaches his second and third propositions, does he not practically do so in the language which we have underscored? "Brought into being"? Yes, in the sense of evolved, but not created, which the expression seems to imply. "Have been made what we are"? Have we, then, had no share in making ourselves? "On it every moment depend"? If we are a part of the great whole, does it not "depend" upon us as well as we upon it? It seems to me that the mutual relation of the Ego and the Non-Ego is expressed not so truly by the word "dependent" as by the word "inter-dependent."

But, if I object to the manner in which he assumes the existence of God, the chief point at issue, at the very start, still more do I find myself protesting against the reasoning by which he attempts to establish the intelligence of that being. Assuming this power, and that it manifests itself in an intelligible order, he asks, "Have we now a right to speak of the power thus manifested as intelligent? . . . What do we mean by intelligence? What do we mean when we say a man or animal is intelligent? We mean that his actions, words, movements, the manifestations of his life, correspond to what we call the rational order of our thought. That is all we do mean or can mean. Tried by this test, the universe outside of man is unspeakably a grander manifestation of intelligence than all that the history of humanity itself makes us acquainted with."

Now, it seems to me that, when we say that a man or animal is "intelligent," we mean a great deal more than that the "manifestations of his life correspond to what we call the rational order of our thought." The "action" of a glacier, the "movements" of a meteor, the "manifestations of the life" of a tree,—do they not "correspond to what we call the rational order of our thought"? Yet does that make them intelligent? The definition does not define. It covers, indeed, "intellect," and then spreads out all over creation. This is very convenient for his theory, but it is unfortunate for the word. We submit that, if Mr. Savage would know what is meant by "intelligence," he should not invent a brand-new definition,—for there is no need of it,—but take the one already established and universally accepted when applied in such cases; and this he will find in any lexicon. Here is one, for instance, from Webster. "Intelligent,"—"Endowed with the faculty of understanding or reason; as, man is an intelligent being." We understand by "faculty" a possession, by a creature, of organs of thought and feeling,—a nervous system and, above all, a brain. When we say that a man or animal is "intelligent," we mean that it has a brain that manifests intelligence, and not merely that "the manifestations of its life correspond to the rational order of our thought." Tried by this test, it is evident that we find intelligence, or mind, in the universe outside of man, only when we find a brain.

But Mr. Savage says that mind does exist in man; and, if man is a part of nature, and came out of nature, then mind must have come out of nature. To quote his language, "If man is only a bit of nature, and shows, like a specimen brick, the material of the whole, then mind also is in nature." No, not necessarily, even if his comparison is true; for the "brick" was not in the mud-bank. It required weeks of skilled labor and the application of heat to change that homogeneous material into the brick. The brick is mud plus a good many other factors. So may it not be with mind? What if mind is not an entity, but a process? What if it be but the flowering out through a material organism of all the lower physical forces? If so, would it be proper to say that mind was one of these forces? Not if we observe the distinction in words that there is in ideas; and this we must do, or cease to make intellectual progress.

If this evolution theory of mind be the correct one, then it were as proper a use of language to say that you saw in a corn-field oceans of whiskey, or in a cotton-field thousands of shirts waving in the breezes, as to say there is "mind" in nature outside of the animal kingdom, because it has been developed from inanimate things some way. It is a misuse of language. It is a confounding of words, and this both expresses and fosters confusion of ideas. Therefore, in the interest of clear, radical thought, we deprecate such improper use of language. It is only allowable in poetry, never as a substitute for truth.

Since Mr. Savage does not, as we think, succeed in demonstrating the existence of an "intelligent power" in the universe, outside of man, it would be a superfluous task to discuss the subsequent problem whether that hypothetical being is conscious or unconscious, good, bad, or indifferent in character.

OBSTACLES TO LAND REFORM IN ENGLAND.

As I have previously insinuated, the English landlords are endeavoring to stave off discussion of the land question by diverting the attention of the people from that to other topics. They are trying to show that the commercial and industrial depression of England arises from other causes than that of the antiquated land system. This is the real origin of the so-called "fair trade" movement, which is in reality protection under a new guise. It must not for one moment be supposed that the reason of England is being converted to protection: that is an event which it is safe to say will never take place in the country of Adam Smith, Cairnes, Cobden, and John Stuart Mill.

Never was the intelligent conviction of England more decidedly in favor of free trade than at the present moment. It is true that the "fair traders," as the neo-protectionists call themselves, have recently made some stir, parading their doings in the newspapers, and especially calling attention to the fact(?) that they are acting entirely independent of any political party. Of course they must say this to save appearances; but every one knows perfectly well that their organization is simply a piece of the new machinery of Toryism. The Tory party have been, since the elections of last year, sitting in the desolating shadow of affliction. Their old watchwords are worn out, and their party cries have failed to charm.

The prestige of England, the glory of the empire, was the cheval de bataille with which they formerly did battle; but that serves their turn no longer. Under these circumstances, their usual course is to shout, "The Church in danger!" or "The throne in danger!" or "Property in danger!" But now, owing doubtless to the wicked arts practised on innocent people by designing Radicals, the working classes do not appear as though they were deeply moved by the danger threatening the Church, the throne, or even property. Under these sad circumstances, the Tory party are bound to provide some new watchword which will catch the ear of the people by appealing to their selfish instincts. Consequently, "our ruined agriculture" and "our blighted commerce" afford convenient texts from which Tory wire-pullers can preach the gospel of "fair trade."

The landlords know perfectly well that in the natural course of things they can never hope for the high rents and the position of power and influence they formerly enjoyed. The facts of nature, the events of history, the development of democracy,—all these things portend the collapse of the old order. This being so, the only way to save landlordism is to delude the people into believing that something else, and not it, is the cause of the existing distress. This something else is discovered to be American produce, and French and Belgian manufactures: these inundate the country, and lead to the ruin of native industry. Now, as the Tory party desires to preserve the old system of things, it is only natural that that party should secretly encourage and even openly coquet with those who would do their best to revive protection.

This is the plain and simple story of the so-called "fair trade" movement: it is a new attempt on the part of Toryism to ally the aristocracy with the "residuum" (as John Bright calls the "baser sort" of the populace) by working on the selfishness and ignorance of the latter, in order to avert the pending fall of the former. Supposing that, as the fair traders suggest, a small duty were put on American corn, the price of corn in England would at once rise, to the joy, for a short time, of the farmers. The almost immediate consequence would be that the landlords would raise their rents. They are not going to tax American produce for nothing. They must themselves reap a substantial benefit. This, of course, is their real object: the promotion of the prosperity of the country is simply a device to "split the ears of the groundlings."

Now, such a policy cannot be carried out in England; for not only is the reason of the country opposed to it, but, happily, the force of the country will never permit it. Whatever may be the peculiar circumstances and needs of other countries, England must be a free-trade nation; for she depends for her industrial greatness on cheap food and cheap raw produce. The people understand this perfectly well; and, although a few may be seduced into supporting a protective policy in favor of some particular industry with which they are specially concerned, the overwhelming majority will never consent to tax their own food for the benefit of their landlord.

The most unfortunate fact in the political and social condition of England is the ignorance and lack of public spirit displayed by the farmers. They are the greatest sufferers from landlordism, and yet they are now in many cases crying for protection instead of joining the people in their assault on the land-laws. They might as well cry for the moon. Their present position and immediate prospects are undeniably gloomy in the extreme; but this is to a certain extent their own fault. Had they combined against landlord tyranny as the Trades-Unionists combined against the power of capital, they might by this time have strengthened their own position and weakened the landlord system. But three-fourths of them are Tory to the backbone, full of absurd, insular prejudices, unmoved by the thoughts of the modern world, caring for little beyond their own farms and markets. They have submitted patiently to a despotism which self-respecting men ought never to tolerate, and they have almost uniformly supported the Tory party. They represent the dull and heavy and material side of the English nature, with no capacity for ideas and no love for anything new. If the English farmers would even now join heartily in the liberal movement, they would be warmly welcome and they would accomplish important results. But the recent elections which have taken place show clearly that they can be made the dupes of the landlords and Tory electioneering agents.

In writing thus, of course it must be clearly understood that I speak simply of the majority of the farmers. There is a wise minority, but in most parts of rural England it is powerless for great good. The shop-keeping class have profited so largely by free trade that it is safe to predict that the "fair traders" will not make a great many converts from their ranks, so that the case may be said to stand thus: On the one side are the landlords, the majority of the farmers, and the representatives of certain industries which have been more or less affected by foreign competition. To these add the clergy of the Established Church, who, themselves monopolists, generally rank themselves instinctively with all other monopolists, and who never yet interpreted the generous aims and great aspirations of the people.

On the other side are the leaders of thought, the champions of progress, all the energetic reformers, the bulk of the manufacturers, the majority of the shop-keepers, and the great body of the artisans. The loyalty to free trade of the latter great body had been doubted up till recently, and all sorts of means had been adopted to gain their adhesion to the "fair trade" cause; but the action of the Trades Union Congress, which met in London during September, put an end to all doubt, and proved that the spirit and influence of Cobden still animates England's toiling masses.

Now, to any one who knows the history of England during the past, there can be no doubt which side will be victorious in this dispute. The fair trade movement may give some trouble; but it will be, sooner or later, stamped out, for the forces of the country are against it. This movement cannot, therefore, really divert the attention of the people from the land question; for the people have already weighed it in the balance, and found it wanting. The movement, however, is of great importance, as indicating the desperate anxiety of the landlord class to prevent the discussion and settlement of the land question.

This does not promise well for a speedy and peaceful solution of that question. Neither do the general character and tone and temper of the peerage as a whole. The House of Lords is simply an assembly of land-owners, who make it their chief business to thwart the popular will and keep back the current of progress. All attempts to liberalize that body have failed and must fail, because the body itself is necessarily hostile to liberalism. Mr. Gladstone has been unwise enough to continue the process of placing his own supporters in that House, partly to reward their past efforts, partly in the hope that they may impart a new and better tone to the chamber, so bringing it more into harmony with modern ideas.

Such hopes are vain and idle. The new peers, instead of improving the chamber, are themselves deteriorated by it, so that in a few years (often in a few months) they become more Tory than the genuine Tories themselves. Nothing can save the hereditary chamber. It is doomed to pass away. But meanwhile, by insisting on the claims of landlordism, it will only precipitate social convulsion and strife. Under its present Tory leader, the Marquis of Salisbury, it is likely to do this, or at any rate to make a show of it for a time. For it must be remembered that an aristocracy, still powerful, can hardly be expected to surrender its ancient privileges without a struggle.

But there is no heart nor spirit nor strength in the party of defence. It is destitute of ideas, without leadership, without genius, without any clear guiding principle of action. It will not, therefore, maintain its position; and the only question is, How soon will it conclude that it is worse than useless to combat the inevitable? Thus, we are again brought round to the same conclusion, that the method by which the land question will be settled, whether peacefully or by revolution, largely depends, nay, entirely depends, on the character and course of action of the landlord class. That class is beginning to learn that side issues and pretences and attempts to shirk the question are of no avail; and I, who naturally prefer reason to violence, cannot help thinking that England may be spared the undoubted evils of a revolution of force and of an agrarian agitation such as has convulsed Ireland.

The old Latin proverb, however, tells us that the gods madden those they are about to destroy; and it is possible that the aristocracy of England may, in a state of panic, irrevocably commit themselves to some huge folly which will cost them dear. In my next paper, I will attempt briefly to outline the two general theories of land reform which are being advocated in England. WILLIAM CLARKE.

OUR HOLIDAYS.

"I suppose," said an orthodox friend to me on the eve of a past Thanksgiving Day, "that, if ever you rationalists and freethinkers come to have your way, there will be no days like Thanksgiving, Christmas, or Fast Day observed. We shall all be tied fast to the treadmill of dreary utilitarianism: no tender, loving associations will be permitted to make any one day in the year more sacred, more holy, than all the rest? So, if reason, as you pretend it does in your case, forced me ever so much to disbelieve the teachings of religion, all my proclivities would still keep me within the fold of the Church. I am not quite ready to give up all the sunlight of life, of which our holidays, once holy days, make so large a part." I pondered over these remarks of my orthodox friend. I, too, have a liking for the tender associations linked with our national holidays. Was it necessary to give them up in the cause of consistent rationalism? Because they were holy days, should they cease to be holidays? Thanksgiving, for instance,—there I paused in my thought. "Thanksgiving—to whom, for what?" I had not thought of the anniversary in this wise before. I doubt whether many of our orthodox friends do think of it as a "holy," "sacred" day. It was to me only a day sacred to family reunions, to tender reminiscences, to general good feeling and fellowship; and yet it was a day dedicated to thanksgiving, and I could not ignore the implication that the thanks were to be rendered to a supreme, supernatural, vaguely defined Being, to whom thanks were supposed to be due for what little of good and happiness brightens and sweetens our otherwise dreary life, and for the evils and unhappiness of which it seems to me any such Supreme Being must be also responsible.

Out of my ponderings, several thoughts resolved themselves into definite form, one of which was that holidays, days of rest, of amusement, of change from life's ordinary humdrum, are necessary to man's equipoise; that the history of past ages, of all peoples, of all stages of man's development, show the ever-recognized need and usefulness of these days of recreation. Theology, always eagerly covetous of the credit for every known good, and with the good sense to recognize how useless would be her ban upon these necessities of man's nature, has been shrewd enough to turn these festal days to excellent account, as days of devotion to her mandates and precepts. So even in America, youngest and fairest of all Liberty's fair daughters, at least one-half of the sorely begrudged yet more than ever necessary holidays are devoted in name to religious purposes; and those who have begun to doubt the ever-important claims of orthodox religion begin to wonder regretfully whether in their iconoclasm it will be necessary to do away with the observance of these holidays, as too prominent landmarks of forsaken boundaries of a past faith.

But, in the mean time, we do not feel in the least like bidding an eternal farewell to Thanksgiving with its roast turkey and cranberry sauce, its family reunions, and general good feeling. We are not yet quite prepared to bid good-by to all fully understood but romantic and dear delusions of the Christmas time. Our childish regard for Santa Claus is not yet wholly obliterated. We still share in the children's delight and surprise over their Christmas gifts. Realizing humanity's great need of recreation, rationalism will doubtless come to the conclusion that we need more rather than fewer holidays, but that those days should above all others be free from theological domination and compulsion; otherwise their mission of recuperative rest and growth will fail of its purpose. In spite of our loss of faith in old traditions or religious superstitions, our holidays may still remain in deed and in truth "holy" days,—days sacred to all that is dearest and best in humanity. Our fast days (which even among professing Christians have degenerated into extra feast days) may be days dedicated to thoughtful consideration of the laws of health. Instead of praying for light to enable us to do that which is best for our own good and that of others, we will go in search of that light by careful study of the recorded experience of others. Our Christmas may still remain what it has come to be, —a day of rejoicing over the best developments of humanity, over the birth of a high type of manhood and womanhood, of all that we have hitherto idealized as Christ-like attributes; for these are really only humanity's best attributes. Our Christ-masses shall be devoted to earnest thought how to make these rarer virtues common to all mankind, so that in that sense we may all become Christ-like and Christians. So the old gift-bestowing, happiness-giving, and feud-forgetting characteristics of the day may still be preserved, but only given a broader, grander significance. And our Thanksgiving days can consistently be observed as days devoted to grateful recognition of the increase of charity, love, and tenderness in mankind generally. These days will thus more than ever become days of love-renewing, of social joy, and out-flowing charity and kindness toward all. Let us hope then to live to see more frequent holidays, days sacred to rest of body, heart, and brain, not as hitherto sacred to the "glory of God," the enslavement of man's reason, and the profit of the priesthood.

EVOLUTION AND THEISM.

Permit me just one word more to my friend, "A Methodist Minister." If he will consider my point a little more carefully, I am confident he will see that my reference to him was justified. It is a perfect illustration of what I had in mind. And his later note does not show that I misapprehend him.

The question he asks, as the title of his article (Index for October 20), is as to whether evolution is compatible with "Theism." He then goes on to discuss something that may be quite a different thing; —namely, "Christian Theism." In his first paragraph, he says that "evolution . . . is now almost universally admitted among Theists," and he says he doubts "the propriety or consistency of this admission." All the rest of the article is devoted to showing its inconsistency with "Christian Theism."

The point of my criticism was the lack of a definition and of a consistent sticking to it. The impression his article leaves is twofold: 1. That "Theism," "Christian Theism," and "God"—he uses all three terms—mean substantially the same thing, —he uses the terms as though they were interchangeable, and draws no distinction between them; and, 2. That evolution is not consistent with "Theism," "Christian Theism," or "God."

If he meant only "Christian Theism" all through, then, for the sake of clearness, that phrase should have been in the title; and he should have kept to it all through. Or, if he introduced some other term, he should have shown a reason for it, and told his readers what he meant by it.

It is, as he says, so "difficult . . . to understand each other" that we should be consistent in our use of terms.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

The Presbyterian brings testimony, even from its rigid communion, of the loosening of the old doctrinal foundations:—

The charge that the sceptical spirit of the age has entered the Church, to any large extent, is not strictly true, and yet not entirely without foundation. The faith of Christians has not been shaken, but many nominal Christians would seem to have lost their anchorage, and to be drifting out upon the sea of unbelief. And those whose faith has not been shaken, whose anchor holds firm so that they are unaffected by the drift and current, are painfully aware that their faith is weak. . . . There is a very painful evidence that faith is weak in the growing indifference to the truth. The tendency to modify the truths which faith receives, especially those which relate to the unseen world, its agencies and conditions, so that they meet the demands of the age, i.e.,—largely the demands of the natural understanding and modern speculation,—is marked. We are called upon to revise our creeds, to lay aside worn-out forms, so that, with a faith new formulated, we may be ready for a new departure.

From a paragraph in the Christian Statesman, we learn that at a recent convention of Orthodox Congregationalists in Brooklyn, N.Y., there was some pretty plain talk on hymns:—

Rev. William Lloyd, of Madison Avenue, New York, formerly a Methodist preacher, took strong grounds, and denounced Moody and Sankey's hymns as "utter trash." Henry Ward Beecher was not prepared to go quite that length, and thought "the best net was that which caught the most fish," which was an evasion. Rev. George F. Pentecost went in for Moody and Sankey without exception, basing his argument on the number of books sold. "It seems to us," says a correspondent of the Cincinnati Christian Advocate, "that Mr. Lloyd is the nearest right. We are getting more and more into the way of sensational and emotional devotion, out of which we shall have to come some day or other. And there has been nothing so fruitful in producing such a result as the displacing of our old hymns to make room for mere ditties that not only lack in poetry and music, but inevitably degrade the popular taste."

Any one who has had much experience with hymn-books can sympathize with a good deal of strong talk about them. For our own part, we have never seen a hymn-book in which, on account of bad theology on the one side and bad poetry on the other, the possibilities of selection were not reduced to very narrow limits.

THE American Missionary for November reports the receipts of the American Missionary Association of which it is the organ, for the month of September as $30,417.94, and for the financial year closing with that month as $244,578.96. We are glad to see that a large part of this large sum is spent in sustaining teachers and schools among the colored people in the South. The society "originated in a sympathy with the almost friendless slaves"; and, since emancipation, it has naturally turned its attention to helping the freed race. It aids or entirely supports fifty-one schools in different parts of the Southern States. Of course, it tries to evangelize as well as to maintain schools for secular education. By its constitution, it is very severely "evangelical." The article on membership is unique, and runs thus: "Any person of Evangelical sentiments, who professes faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, who is not a slave-holder or in the practice of other immoralities, and who contributes to the funds, may become a member of the society." A foot-note defines "evangelical sentiments" as follows:—

By evangelical sentiments, we understand, among others, a belief in the guilty and lost condition of all men without a Saviour; the Supreme Deity, Incarnation, and Atoning Sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the only Saviour of the world; the necessity of regeneration by the Holy Spirit; repentance, faith, and holy obedience in order to salvation; the immortality of the soul; and the retributions of the judgment in the eternal punishment of the wicked and salvation of the righteous.

In practice, however, we believe the society is not so dogmatic as this creed would imply. We should be more glad if the money for Southern education were raised and spent in unsectarian methods by liberal hands. But, since it is not, we are glad that even an evangelical missionary society is doing so much for schools among the colored people.

From the American Missionary's African notes, we extract this morceau: "A missionary asked an old African woman what the earthquake was. 'Me tink,' said she, 'God Almighty pass by, and de world make him a curt'sy.'"

THE recent Episcopal Church Congress, held in Providence, appears to have fully maintained its reputation for lively and free debate. Bishop Clark has an article on the Congress in the Independent, from which we extract passages illustrating the discussions of two evenings:—

On the third evening, the subject of "Liturgical Growth" was presented. . . . The dramatic element now had full play; and, if I had not determined to mention no man's name in this sketch of the disputants, I would be glad to allude to certain prominent and most conservative speakers, who would have been "read out of meeting," if they had ventured to say what they said on this occasion twenty years ago. Until quite recently, the prevailing cry in the Church was, "Whatever else you do, don't touch the Prayer-Book"; but these men did something more than touch the Prayer-Book. What they said will appear in full when the verbatim report of the Congress is published; for every word, good or bad, prudent or imprudent, that is uttered there, must appear in print. The "Education of Divinity Students," strange to say, elicited the sharpest debate that was heard during the session of the Congress. . . . The prominent defects in our popular theological training were handled not only without gloves, but with a very hard grip. The defenders of existing modes and practices were equally positive and strong. Many lively illustrations were given of the blunders which clergymen make for want of proper training and, it might have been added, for want of a little common-sense, as, for instance, that of a minister, who addressed a company of rough miners, on the only occasion that he had to preach the gospel to them, in regard to "the evils of the pew-system in our churches."

Or the community of "Harmonists" founded by Father Rapp at Economy, Penn., there remain about one hundred old men and women. The business of the community, contrary to the general experience of such socialistic societies, has always been managed with such prudence, tact, and talent that its accumulated wealth is reported to amount to several million dollars.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WHEN the Free Religious Association assumed the responsibility of providing for the continuance of the publication of The Index, the name was changed by the addition of Free Religious to indicate the transference. The addition has always made an awkward handle, and now, by general consent of those interested, it is dropped and the old name restored. Our exchanges will please take notice.

W. J. P.

THE letter of Mr. O. B. Frothingham, reprinted in another column from the New York Evening Post, shows that The Index was right last week in doubting whether the statement of Mr. Frothingham's views in the Post through an "interviewer" was correct. Whatever substance of truth there may have been in the report, it is now so uncertain where the boundary lies between Mr. Frothingham and his "interviewer" that it seems fairer to them and to the public to defer discussion of the matter. If Mr. Frothingham shall see fit, as it were to be wished he might, to express his present views of the religious outlook in his own way, he will be entitled, whatever the views may be, to a most respectful hearing, and would certainly receive it from all his old friends and co-workers.

W. J. P.

OUR friends in New York will find The Index on sale at Brentano's, 5 Union Square.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates? We shall also be pleased to receive names and addresses of persons likely to be interested in the Index, to whom we can send sample copies.

THE Independent, referring to the trial of Dr. Thomas, says, "The spectacle of the member of a recent court leading the way from the room in which the verdict was rendered, triumphantly announcing, 'The dog is dead!' does not speak highly for the judicial calmness of that tribunal."

A SPIRITUALIST advertised in Portland, Me., recently, for a Sunday afternoon, "An admirable discourse from our late worthy President, addressed to his family and the nation, describing the scenes of the last hours here and during the passage to his heavenly home." Yet this charlatan or lunatic is in good standing in Spiritual circles.

REFERRING to the recently published volume of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass, the Boston Journal says, "With the exception of the beautiful poem, 'My Captain,' there are not in our judgment a hundred lines of genuine poetry, which will be known and quoted thirty years from now, in all these three hundred and eighty-two pages."

MOSES THOMPSON, an Arkansas negro, who has been a preacher half a century, was a hundred years old a few days ago. Regarded by his people as an inspired prophet, he has exercised the authority of a religious autocrat. He declared that he was exempt from death, and that on his hundredth birthday he would, like the prophet Elijah, ascend in glory and resplendence to heaven. A crowd assembled to view the spectacle. Thompson appeared arrayed in a white robe, singing and praying, and exhorting sinners to flee from "the wrath to come." But he didn't ascend, and the prosaic, practical reason he gave for the failure—a rain-storm that prevailed—was so unsatisfactory to the spectators that they jeered him and chased him away.

THERE are no papers that come to our office which contain a more objectionable class of advertisements than papers published in the interests of Orthodox Christianity. Some of these journals, while complaining of "infidelity" on the ground that it leads to immorality, give prominence and support to every species of quackery and fraud. In their editorial columns, they prate of "purity," "holiness," and "righteousness," while in their advertising columns they encourage and aid the meanest swindlers, men who thrive on the ignorance, credulity, and weakness of the people. Some of these advertisements, a disgrace to decent journalism, are of a kind rejected by The Index every week, notwithstanding the pecuniary inducements offered for their insertion.

THE Christian Union having stated that there are whole conferences of Methodist ministers in which not even a respectable minority teach the doctrine of eternal punishment, the Christian Advocate replies, "We declare that, in every conference, nine-tenths, if not nineteen-twentieths, of the ministers teach the irreversible doom of those rejected at the last day, expressly or impliedly, and that scarcely a minister can be found among us whose ministry has been attended by any considerable number of conversions who does not expressly preach it." That those ministers who are the most successful revivalists preach Hades (unrevised), and that trials like that of Dr. Thomas make Methodist ministers cautious in criticising old dogmas which have been associated with Methodism, are very true; but that nine-tenths of the preachers in every Methodist conference believe in "the doctrine of eternal punishment" is incredible; and we can add, on very good authority, that no such proportion preach it.

THE Belleville Ontario says in regard to the seizure by the Toronto Collector of works by Paine and Voltaire:—

This is the first time that we have heard of the writings of Paine or Voltaire being placed in the category of immoral literature and confiscated by the customs authorities. That certain passages in these works may be made to answer the charge of immorality brought against them we believe, but no passage can honestly be separated from the purpose of the whole. The authors were infidels, and used such arguments as they deemed best to bring the Christian religion into ridicule. We still think that Mr. Patton was over-zealous in a good cause, and that, should the matter be brought before the courts, the legal decision will be against him.

The Ottawa Free Press remarks:—

We were under the impression that freedom of opinion in religious matters was the right of every Canadian, but it appears that such is not the case. At the same time, we think that an attempt to enforce the law and its penalties would not be regarded with favor by any section of our people.

PROFESSOR E. N. SWORMTERDT, of Cincinnati, son of a poet and a writer of Methodist hymns, by the use of figures, demonstrated, to his own satisfaction at least, that the "end of the world" would occur November 12. "I think," he said, "the Bible clearly shows that this golden age of the world is to be introduced by physical power. Christ will bring in the millennium, and not the present visible Church; and he will do it by physical power. Principally, first, he appears in the air, and winds up the gospel age. The holy dead and the holy living are then caught up in the clouds to meet him, and are made immortal. These will be the reigning class, when he sets his kingdom in the millennial earth. If any more would join this reigning class, they must act quickly. Eighteen hundred and eighty-one will, in all probability, end this age; and then no man can join this body. Forty years of great judgments will then follow, during which the nations will be broken to shivers. Satan, the great enemy of God and man, will turn the world into a wilderness during this time. Antichrist will make his appearance during this eventful period, and will conquer the whole earth, and reign three and a half years. The true Christ then descends to the earth, and casts the false Christ into the lake of fire."

ALLUDING to the recent Congress of the Episcopal Church at Providence, the Boston Herald says: "The Church which is not afraid to wash itself, whether in public or private, is the Church which is most likely to be kept clean, the Church which must be gradually brought into the closest sympathy with present life; and this is one of the many services which the Providence Congress has rendered to the body which it represents." Very true. Harmony purchased by a cowardly suppression of differences on important subjects, or by any sort of double-dealing, is dishonorable and disgraceful. It is intellectual peace purchased at the price of intellectual degradation. And those Liberals who cannot agree to differ, and to discuss their differences as to views and methods, and who fail to take up live issues,—questions of present practical interest,—do not represent the thought and spirit of the real Liberalism of this age. "The cause" needs no suppression of facts, no concealment of honest differences, no misrepresentations, no ignoring of earnest criticism, whether it comes from friends or foes, and no resort to sensational methods to obtain recognition, or of unfair means to prevent the discussion of measures or policies adopted. A "Liberalism" that cannot keep in advance of every form of Christianity, both intellectually and morally, will and should fail to command the respect or to receive the support of those who keep abreast of the age, and feel the enthusiasm of humanity. "The survival of the fittest" is a law of intellectual and moral growth not less than of the structural development of species.

A NOVEMBER PICTURE.

Above the corn-fields spreads the sky;
The light is gray, the winds a-whisk.
The great doors swung against the barn
Reveal the hay-mow's upright walls,
And pumpkins in a yellow heap.
Seeded and tough, the weeds bristle,
Where, in their tender growth, the brood,
Sty-born, champed them with piggish joy.
The citron in the garden lies,
Survivor of the cucumber,
That rots and leaves a tawny shell.
From orchard-tree, the apples drop
Singly, to join their mellowing mates.
The plundered grape-vine spreads, half-bare,
Along the wall or road-side fence.
The cricket's tranquil note bespeaks
The calm of home establishment.
The swallow's melancholy changes
Denote the foreigner's unrest.
The flies, in silent clusters, hug
The space around a nail or hook
Of ceiling, stupid from the cold.
The wasp, wind-frowzy, flutters low
In search of food from apple bruise,
Or pumice at the cider-u ill.
The grasshoppers, demure and old,
With effort strain their shrunken thighs
To flee the intrusive brush or step.
Dull is the flow from road-side spout
Into the drinking trough. Sere leaves
Lie on the surface, muffling sound.
The brook seems lapsed. Through fallen sedge,
It creeps in tuneless pilgrimage.
The season oozes to its end.

The Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 24, 1881.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

KAMI NO MICHİ,

OR

"THE WAY OF THE GODS."

BY MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL.

A very well-digested article in a recent review has shown your readers what a wonderful positive step has lately been taken toward the solution of the great problem of the distribution of races. What Bunsen coolly asserted to have been deposited in China as early as fifteen thousand years before Christ, with no basis beyond his own prophetic consciousness, left its own traces there, on the first "bamboo books," never until now made legible to moderns. This discovery, added to the recent publication of the appendix to Miss Bird's late work, which concerns the state religion of Japan,—the "Shinto," as it is called by the Chinese,—offers much matter for speculation in regard to the primitive worship of these two countries.

In considering some matters relating to the joss-houses of San Francisco, it seems worth while to give a short abstract of all that relates to the Shinto, first because this is now fairly accessible to the English reader for the first time, and also because there are remarkable parallels between the Shinto and the old State religion of China, which Confucius strove at once to understand and "transmit." The Japs call their primitive faith "The Way of the Gods," Kami no Michi; and the word "Shinto" is a Chinese synonyme for that phrase. In considering it, we will avoid, as far as possible, the use of names which from the infrequency of their appearance in literature it is almost impossible to remember.

The "Shinto" is a system of "Sun-worship," which seems to have lost track of the planets, and never to have been degraded into a system of magic. To us, it seems like a fragment of primeval Akkad worship, a part of the civilized life which gave birth to the Chinese and Japanese alike, in some prehistoric time.

The Japs open their own history with the name of the "Sun Goddess," Amaterasu. She found the country in great confusion, and sent a lower divinity to appease its dissensions. When Ninigi no Mikoto had succeeded in this, the Mikados descended from him, and "ruled all visible things."

In the Tao worship of the "Great Way," it is one of the Chang family, Yü Hwang, who attends to all earthly affairs.

The Mikado's crest is the Chrysanthemum, or "Sun Flower." The term "Celestials" applied to the Chinese, and their constant use of the figure and rays of the sun on all state occasions, would seem to have the same origin; but we do not find the "Sun Goddess" in Chinese literature. The "sun-worship," indicated by the solstitial sacrifices of the Emperor, and the "moon festival" of the lower classes, probably preceded ancestral worship, and, if princes and deities were considered "children of the sun," must have assisted to formulate it.

In 600 B.C., Jimma Tenno, one of the "sun-descended," although we do not know from what quarter he came, conquered the islands afresh, and reigned over them in divine right. The "Sun Goddess" gave him "a mirror, a sword, and a stone." A mythological story sheds light on the meaning of the mirror. In the cold, short days of winter, the "Sun Goddess" hid in a cavern. Toward summer, she was lured from her retreat by her own image in a mirror, where she thought she saw a lovelier rival. Perhaps that first mirror was only a still lake on which her own returning glory fell.

The heavenly origin of Jimma and the succeeding Mikados constituted the stability of the old Japanese government. It was not till six hundred years had passed, however, that a shrine was built for the three gifts of the sun, at Isè; and there they remained for two thousand years, until 1871.

The religion of the first Mikados consisted in "compelling obedience and worshipping the gods."

These "gods" were the forces of nature, or "sun-descended" creatures, whose lives on earth had been, not always so good, but either so good or so powerful that they could not be accounted for, except as inspired by the "Source of Light." It was almost a thousand years after the erection of the shrine at Isè that "Kôbô Daishi," the first Buddhist who reached Japan, began to corrupt the simplicity of the old faith. In the pure "Kami" there was no creed, no code, no idols, no priest, "and," adds Miss Bird, "no idea of a future life." In this last statement there is certainly an error. The deification of heroes involves the idea of immortality. If a departed human soul can enter a temple, and sanctify a shrine, it must have a life independent of its body. Where and what that life was, neither the ancient Chinese nor the Japs seem to have guessed, any more than Confucius. There are thirty-seven hundred inferior shrines in Japan. Each hamlet has its deity, each child its patron saint; and the same is true of the Chinese, not only in China, but in California.

The Japanese, however, have for some sweet reason kept the simplicity of their faith, as the Chinese could not. The temples are of unpainted wood, with tent-like roofs thickly thatched, and are without paraphernalia. They contain only a steel mirror, the gohei, which are slender rods, fringed with white paper, which the sun loves to light on, small offerings of food on wooden trays, and decorative sprays of the Cleyera japonica.

Until the shrines began to feel the influence of Buddhism, none of these were ever shown. Behind the closed doors of the "Holy of holies" was a small ark in which the "Seed of God"—that is, the emblems which attracted and held the sun-rays—were hidden. The descriptive phrase indicates a reverence for generative force which degenerated into "cone-worship" on the banks of the Oxus and the Euphrates, but does not seem to have done so among the Japs.

One of the old religious emblems in Japan is the torei, or "perch." It is a sort of arch (which is not an arch) across the road by which the worshipper approaches a shrine. This consists of two tree-trunks crossed by a beam, and precisely resembles the entrance gate to the ancient temples at Sankhi, except that in India the thing is more elaborate.

In Japan, the "perch" receives its name from the fact that the poultry offered, but not sacrificed, on the shrine of the Sun Goddess, fearlessly roost upon it.

In the year 850, Kôbô Daishi told the Japs that the great Shinto "gods" were only incarnations of Buddha.

"He builded better than he knew"; for, in a spiritual sense, this was entirely true, and then this view of it chanced to please the reigning Mikado, and in consequence the early simple prayer at the shrine was soon hidden behind images or lost to sight in clouds of incense and ascending masses.

After the rebellion in 1868, the Mikado attempted to restore the simple forms of worship; but these were wholly antagonistic to the new influences at work in Japan.

The authority of the "Way of the Gods" once stood above that of the Council of State. It is now subordinated to it. The shrine-keepers are officers of the government, and constitute a "Board of Religious Instruction." In 1877, this became a sub-department of the Ministry of the Interior. Modern Shintoism is said to "assume" the immortality of the soul; but it is evident that the dogma has always been held. It inculcates imitation of the departed and reverence for their worth; and, although there is no priesthood, the keepers of shrines occasionally assemble and chant together.

In China, music and dancing seem to have waited on the solstitial sacrifices at the very earliest date. In Japan there are festival days, with music, dancing, and processions through the streets. Does not the fact that worship in Japan was not confined to the sovereign partly account for the continued purity of the faith? A sacred drama is sometimes enacted in a Shinto temple, but there is no hint of a "chamber of horrors." In the temples of both China and Japan, the worshipper kneels alone, and claps his hands to attract the attention of his deity. Motonori, the great modern advocate of the Shinto faith, says:—

"Hades is a land beneath the earth, whither all men go when they die, whether they be mean or noble, virtuous or wicked."

This also might Ulysses have said, and perhaps Confucius never went so far, for he refused to speak of that he "did not know." In many Chinese houses in California there will be found, as in Japan, a place holding a miniature temple and a tablet bearing the name of the household gods. It is called the "god shelf." Flowers and food are offered upon it, and at night a taper burns before the little temple. The Japs do not think that they need moral restraint. As regards the work of Confucius, they say, "The Chinese were an immoral race, therefore they invented morals."

What a subtle saying it is, and how true of most human creatures! The Chinese pray by a wish merely, or turn to the sun when it rises, rub their hands and bow.

In Japan, the devotee turns toward the province of Yamato, where the great shrines are, although this is not always to the east of the worshipper. It is obvious that topographical peculiarities sometimes interfere with the perception of the true Oriental point. De Lacouperie finds the Chinese names of the four points of the compass to have had an Akkad origin, but suggests that they have shifted position.

The burden of the Japanese prayer is always the same: that the gods will correct, not forgive, unintentional wrong-doing; and the Christian pietist might well take this lesson from them.

In California, and let us suppose therefore in China, the power of the god is invoked to assist men in evil deeds.

So far Miss Bird, Satov, Bosquet, and the reviews, helped out by talks with Basil Hall Chamberlain and Chinese dignitaries. We have seen how Terrien de Lacouperie leads the way to Bunsen's assumption that the Chinese and the Egyptian are offshoots from one Akkad stock, which believed in one God; having broken off from it at different eras, and each nation carrying with it the distinctive characteristics of the period of its own departure. The most remarkable and touching thing about the Chinese religion is the fact assumed by Dr. Legge, that this people has preserved an untainted faith in one God for more than five thousand years.

This monotheism encountered two dangers from the very beginning: first, the idolatries, which naturally attached to what would seem to have been a primitive sun-worship,—a worship which has left its traces in the earliest written characters, or ideographs; and, second, a system of magic or divination, which shows itself also in their primitives.

If it were not for the evidence inherent in these facts, it would seem as if the "Hundred Families" had broken off from the Akkad stock before the worship of one God had been tampered with.

It is most extraordinary that the Chinese have been able to keep monotheism the prominent element of the State religion from the beginning until now.

*"UNBEATEN TRACKS IN JAPAN." By Miss Bird. London: John Murray. 1880.

"THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA." By James Legge. 1 vol. 12mo. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1881.

Dr. Legge shows this conclusively in this last work, from the constitution of the "primitives," or earliest hieroglyphs, without knowing apparently that Lacouperie was drawing still more important conclusions from the same premises.

It was once necessary to inquire somewhat closely into the personal use of the word "heaven" in Dr. Legge's translations of the Kings. His present explanations fully vindicate his practice.

The Chinese are themselves ignorant of many of their own customs, and of the meaning of much of their own literature. Dr. Legge cannot explain why the Emperor must sacrifice to the "six honored ones," at the solstitial services, after offering his tribute to the "one God"; but Lacouperie finds these six inferior powers at Susa, next after the chief deity.

It was not only the Emperor Shan, but the magnates of Babylonia, who recognized provincial princes by the title of "pastors."

Legge emphasizes the fact that only the Emperor of the Chinese, in all the nation, worshipped the Supreme Being. He believes that much evil resulted from the fact that the common people were not permitted to worship; but it does not seem to have occurred to him that the leader of the "Hundred Families," or first emigrants into China, might possibly have been a priest, who had been accustomed to consider the semi-annual sacrifices one of the functions of his caste, or that the prohibition might have been a matter of prudence in the beginning, lest unmeaning or magian corruptions should creep in.

In the Yh King, Lacouperie finds a sort of hieroglyphic dictionary, accompanied by lists of provinces and manufactures and a vast amount of archaeological information. We are as certain now to penetrate the secrets which Confucius could not fathom as we were to unravel the mysteries of the Egyptian stele, the moment we had translated the Rosetta stone.

The death of Goodwin, the great Egyptologist who went to China, was a great disappointment. He was well prepared to understand what he found and a great deal that is meaningless to the people themselves. The evident relation of the old diagrams and mathematical formulas to similar things in Egypt would have given him the key to what was common in the origin of the two nations, a key which would reveal also the intellectual position of the people from which both sprang.

The numeric formalism is the same in both countries; and the cuneiform characters may have found their origin in "tongues of flame," or in that "cone" which stands upon the altar of Pthah, or the "wedge" of phallic ceremonial, all of which stand for generative power, but not, as Lacouperie would suggest, for the generation of fire. It is evident that the first writings were the work of the priesthood, and held sacred, as if they were written, as was said, by the "finger of God." Only by admitting this can we understand the traditionary superstitious reverence for fragments of written paper to be seen throughout the East, and especially in China to-day. As the number of symbols used in worship increased, as the purity of the worship fell away, nothing was more natural than the obscuring of the sacred writings by the use of arbitrary signs, where they had once used simple lines.

In this way, the Scriptures became more truly a Caballa.

Yao divided his country into twelve provinces, and of their limits, productions, and manufactures the Yh is some day to give a full account! His system was only the duodenary feudal system in vogue at Susa. The "Chief of the Four Mountains" in China seems to reproduce the "King of the Four Regions," one of the titles of the Chaldean sovereigns; and the signs for the four points of the compass are the same in the two countries.

Professor Sayce's "oblique-eyed population of Babylon" are soon to be proved close kindred of the Chinese.

The Japanese are also an "oblique-eyed population," and whatever tends to such a certainty will still better explain to us the rise of this artistic and intellectual people. Is it not strange that the popular religion of both countries should be called the "Way," that the monarchs of both peoples are "heaven" or "sun" descended, that the Emperor of China officiates chiefly at solstitial sacrifices, while the sacred mirror in the shrine at Ise is only the emblem of the Sun God's return in the spring? What has kept the Japanese from bloody sacrifices? The secondary deities of both nations are found in the forces of nature, and both styles of worship have been corrupted at about the same period by Buddhist influences.

LETTER FROM A BROTHER TO A YOUNGER SISTER ON HER RELIGIOUS DOUBTS.

December 30, 1879.

MY DEAR SISTER:—

You have no idea how much good your last letter has done me. A mountain-load of anxiety is thrown off my heart now. You had never before revealed your heart to me in respect to these highest themes; and I, on my part, was determined never to be the cause of your doubting on religious matters. But I see that you are the true sister I thought you: you have nobly thought and nobly doubted. I have longed to tell you the truth for years, and now I will. But what do I know? What have I learned by ten years of incessant and, I was going to say, agonized thinking upon the problem of life? I am obliged to confess with you that the outcome of it all is that "I know nothing"; or, rather, I can say that I do know one thing, and that is that some everlasting and far-reaching and beneficent Being is (for ends totally unknown to us) developing what we call the "sensible" or "material" universe to a more and more perfect conformity to its august will.

I do not know what evil is; but it seems to be but the blind and mistaken ways in which the living substance, matter, has developed itself. As far as I can make out (after years of intense thought and study), the material universe is a sort of splendid automatic machine poem, acted on by the universal Power or Good Being we call God, which Being penetrates every particle of the fabric of the universe. My studies in science have convinced me that evolution is true. All vegetable and animal life started up simultaneously millions of years ago in geological times, started up in the simplest and most minute jelly-like forms. That was God (or the Spirit of Intelligence, before which we veil our faces) first appearing on the planet in separate forms of life. From these first forms thus growing up out of the other world that lies beneath this (I mean that which we call "Heaven"), from these jelly-like forms came all trees, plants, flowers, animals, and man: all were evolved, by divine force continually operating from within, into the splendid phantasmagoria we call "nature," with its beautiful colors, sounds, shapes of vegetation, animals, Buddhas, Socrateses, Shaksperes, and the world of art or idealism which whispers of its deep origin in that magnificent real world that underlies this,—the world of ideal excellence, the region in which God lives, who is the source of all love, holiness, mirth, humor, laughing, bird-singing, and even seems to be the source of all the tiger-crunchings, flesh-tearings, murders, and everything else. And here I come to the greatest mystery of all; but perhaps we have made it a mystery by starting with false assumptions. We were taught that God is perfectly powerful as well as perfectly good. Well, it seems as though we were making assumptions here. We are in dense ignorance; but it seems to me that God is only the source of evil in some such way as this. Suppose the unending and fathomless ocean of immensity full to all eternity of the living matter of which our universe is composed. Now, if all these living mountain-tree-plant-flower-flesh-and-brain atoms had, from all eternity, either been such or had such laws impressed on them by the Eternal One that they must keep continually moving and combining and growing of their own accord, you can very readily see that they would often grow up into monstrous forms, if God had not the power to watch all the rascals at once, or could only get control of them slowly and keep them straight; and so, growing up in this way in countless numbers, they had to go to eating one another for want of anything else to eat.* Hence arose the horrible animals of geological times, and the savage beasts and men of our own age. But steadily, steadily, we and all other things have been fighting to realize the perfect ideal of God. I mean that God in us and in other things has been working to make the blind atoms, of which bodies are composed, develop in the line of truth, beauty, and goodness.

*This eating, by the way, and killing, was not and is not one-tenth part so painful to the lower animals, with their tough bones, obtuse sensibilities, and half-awakened consciousness, as it is to us with the morbidly sensitive nerves which we have in this transition period of embryonic civilization. When we were children, we remember that bruises and bumps did not hurt us very much: we did not know we had nerves.

This, as nearly as I can make it out, is the state of the case. But, after all, M—, we have to confess our ignorance on these stupendous subjects. My own belief, however, is firm that all the love and tenderness of human society, of the little birds, and of all gentle parts of nature, are visible manifestations or outgrowths of a rich and glorious heaven which surrounds us on every side, and even clings close to our very bodies, and into which we shall gently sink, when the hearts, "deep-seated in our mystic frame," shall cease to beat. We cannot now see through into this far-spreading, living realm, because it is of a totally different nature from this world; and we, being wholly made up of the material of this world, cannot get out of ourselves for a second,—i.e., we have not the right kind of material in our eyes to enable us to see through into this other world. And yet, as I said, do we not feel its presence daily? Are we not almost always happy in the thought of the near presence of a good and very powerful Father-being? When we bask in the warm sunshine or watch the gambols of kitty or listen to the singing of robin red-breast, are not our hearts full of faith? Do we not feel in all our best moments that "He who hath made us will lift us, though stained and deformed and degraded,— Lift us and love us, though drowned in the surges of darkness and death?"

"Ah! what are all the discords of all time

But stumbling steps of one persistent life

That struggles up through mists to heights sublime,

Forefelt through all creation's lingering strife?—

The deathless motion of one undertone,

Whose deep vibrations thrill from God to God alone."

—C. P. Cranch.

Yes, dear M—, we are afloat in a wonderful universe. We are only beginning to understand it. But we must be brave, we must take refuge in active work; for this is our mission here. We feel that there is a great end to be accomplished, though we do not know what it is; but we see that it lies in the direction of truth, beauty, and goodness, don't we? That is the reason we cannot do wilful wrong without feeling remorse. Your affectionate brother,

CORRESPONDENCE.

POLITICAL REFORM IN WISCONSIN.

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 10, 1881.

The event of an election turns thought naturally, almost necessarily, toward political affairs. Some remarkable or, to say the least, unusual features were developed in the late campaign. The one development which possesses more than a passing interest to the readers of the Index was the introduction of the question of equal taxation, or taxation of church property, as an issue at the polls. Nominations for the office of the Assembly were made with an eye to this issue. The fight over this question took a decided shape in three wards of the city. In two wards, the candidates who favored equal taxation were defeated on that ground, the church element being strong in those wards. In one ward, where the freethinking German element is large, the Republican candidate for the Assembly obtained a handsome victory on account of his well-known stand in favor of equal taxation. It will be remembered that the subject of church taxation has been before the Wisconsin Legislature for the past three years. It has been ably presented and voted upon. Each year, it has found a trifle more favor and enlisted more of public attention, until it has grown into its present proportions. The Catholic Church people are especially aroused to the coming fight; and some ambitious candidates for the office of Assembly worked the Catholic field vigorously, to bring out a strong force of opposition to equal taxation. The interest manifested in this issue has great significance, and shows that the vital subject of secularization is gaining in strength and importance. There will be some lively work in the Legislature this winter in behalf of this question. Defeat is perhaps inevitable this winter, and possibly again and again. Meanwhile, the attention of the public is arrested; and the secularists should get in some good work this season, to supplement the decisive step taken one year ago at the Secular Conference held in Chicago. Such conferences call attention to the subjects for which they are convened. Although meeting with opposition and causing a feeling of discouragement to those engaged in the work on account of the apparent apathy of the liberal people who should work zealously for the movement, these public meetings are the surest way to arouse the public sentiment.

Wisconsin can be justly looked upon with pride by its progressive people as a pioneer in some of the most important social movements.

A committee of the citizens of Milwaukee last winter adopted a series of propositions that contain the spirit of social progress, which, before the late election, were sent to each candidate for the office of assembly, with a request that they should be answered upon blanks prepared and sent with the propositions for that purpose.

The aim of these propositions is notably to promote the well-being of humanity, and deserve a place in these columns, which ever stand for social reform, and are as follows:—

1. "The veto power of the governor to be abolished. In lieu thereof, all laws passed by the Legislature must be submitted to the vote of the people, whenever a number of citizens (such number or proportion to be determined by the Constitution) demand such popular vote.

2. "The passage of special laws as well as coercive, infringing personal liberty, to be prohibited. All laws to be of a general character, and framed in language plain and intelligible to all people.

3. "The codes and processes of law to be simplified. The criminal laws and prison regulations to be reformed, so as to conform to the humane spirit of the age. It ought not to be the purpose of the State to take revenge by punishment, but rather to reform criminals and to attempt to make useful citizens of them.

4. "All elections and popular votes to take place on Sundays, so that all citizens, especially those obliged to use the other days of the week to gain a livelihood, may have ample opportunity to do their citizens' duty without subjecting themselves to a pecuniary sacrifice.

5. "All property, income, and heritage to be taxed uniformly, according to a progressive (graduated) scale of rates.

6. "The passage of humane factory laws, stipulating the length of a 'normal day's work'; prohibiting the use for industrial purposes of labor of children under fourteen years of age; securing sanitary protection to the laboring men and women, according to their respective sex, condition, and age; instituting a controlling supervision of factories, dwellings, and provisions; compelling the employer to pay damages in every case when an employé is hurt or killed in his employ, without the employé's own fault.

7. "Public statistical bureaus for labor and production to be established, to whose duties shall belong the giving of gratuitous information.

8. "Instruction to be gratuitous in all schools established by the State.

9. "The separation of Church and State, proclaimed by the fathers of the Revolution and guaranteed by the supreme law of the land, to be completed and consistently carried out, so that all relics of the political domination of ecclesiasticism may be wiped out."

The recently formed Milwaukee Civil-Service Reform Association contains in its constitution by-laws which indicate good reformatory work also. The object of this association is to establish a system of appointment, promotion, and removal in the civil service, founded upon the principle that public office is a public trust, admission to which should depend upon approved fitness. To this end, the association will demand that appointments to subordinate executive offices, with such exceptions as may be expedient, not inconsistent with principles already mentioned, shall be made from persons whose fitness has been ascertained, by competitive examinations open to all applicants properly qualified, and that removals shall be made for legitimate cause only, such as dishonesty, negligence, or inefficiency, but not for political opinion or refusal to render party service. And the association will advocate all other appropriate measures for securing integrity, intelligence, efficiency, good order, and due discipline in the civil service.

This association will hold meetings, raise funds, publish and circulate appropriate information, correspond and coöperate with associations organized elsewhere for the objects set forth in this constitution, and support all executive and legislative action which will promote its purposes. The conditions of membership shall be wholly independent of party preference. Questions will not be discussed in debates or publications upon party grounds. Neither will the name nor influence of the association be used on behalf of any party or for procuring office or promotion for any purpose. But nothing shall be construed to prevent the association from opposing any candidate, when, in its opinion, such course is demanded by the objects of the association.

This association is officered by the most influential and prominent public men of Milwaukee, who represent purity in politics and stand outside of rings that are corrupting our political parties.

The temperance failure of last winter, the anti-treating bill, which passed through the Legislature and then failed to stand any legal test, did not discourage the cold-water clan. The Prohibitionists nominated an entire ticket this fall, which had the effect of demoralizing the Republican party through some mistakes of the Republican management, or some misapprehension on the part of the people concerning their movements, and resulted in large Democratic majorities in districts which had in recent campaigns given Republican majorities. The chief result of this ticket was to carry confusion into the ranks of the regular parties. The supporters of the prohibition ticket are of the class which, although in earnest in this special work of reform, bases its efforts upon antiquated ideas, and is limited by notions inconsistent with the more progressive principle which "favors no special or coercive laws infringing personal liberty."

The Greenback party run their ticket also, making four distinct tickets in the campaign. With such an assortment of parties to select from and the novel issues that arose out of them, it is little wonder that there was a somewhat unusual excitement in this election, although a much lighter vote than usual was polled in the State generally, owing to the impassable condition of the roads from the recent heavy rains, to the distractions of parties, and the deplored indifference of persons who have lost faith in parties and keep aloof from politics.

The question of biennial sessions of the Legislature was submitted to the people, and voted upon in this election. It was undoubtedly decided that hereafter there would be biennial instead of annual sessions, much to the gratification of the tax-payers and the dissatisfaction of hotel proprietors at the capitol.

The suffragists will probably take advantage of the close voting on the woman suffrage question last winter, and get in some hearty work at the coming session of the Legislature. Arguing from the felicitous example of our State in developing new parties, it might not be out of place to predict the advent of a suffrage ticket in some coming campaign. But, in all seriousness, I would say that any woman who has the opportunity of noting the conduct of election affairs cannot but be sensible of the importance of the introduction of some hitherto unemployed influence to lessen the existing evils. Whether it be the future mission of woman to accomplish this is by no means certain. She, however, nourishes such a hope, and is willing and eager to attempt the work of reformation. I would like, at least, that women might try their hand upon the polling-places on election days, and, if they cannot coax nor compel the captain of the polls to repair to their parlors, see if they cannot eliminate some of the crudities of the street corner saloons, and elevate them to something of the æsthetic expression of their home life.

NOTES FROM NEW YORK.

In Memory of Lucretia Mott.

November 18, 1881.

Many members of the Society of Friends were at the Church of the Messiah, Sunday evening, November 13, to attend the memorial services for Lucretia Mott. Rev. Robert Collyer spoke of her devotion to the abolition of slavery. "She dedicated her life," he added, "to many other noble purposes as well. She preached the beautiful gospel of the Friends. She had abundant faith in the final triumph of the peace principle, and believed that wonders could be wrought by it." Mr. Alfred H. Love, of Philadelphia, related in detail the circumstance of her visit to General Grant when he was President, and her appeal for the lives of the Modocs who were under sentence of death. Her son-in-law, Mr. Davis, the speaker said, sought to dis-suaue her from going, telling her that she was not invited, and that there were certain forms of etiquette to be observed before she might be permitted to see the President. She replied that the spirit prompted her to go, and that she felt that it was right; and then she quietly but firmly requested him to have the horse harnessed to take her to the station. She succeeded, and many a life was saved. Rev. Phoebe Hanaford, Miss Irene Ackerman, Mr. Ed. Ryder, recited poems. Mr. Collyer said he was pleased to see the Friends blossoming out in poetry. The Universal Peace Association promises to carry on a vigorous war against all contention and quarrels of individuals, States, and nations. The Evening Telegram said, "The memory of so rare and gentle and loving and steadfast a character is a more potent influence for human brotherhood and peace than are the contentions of a century of peace societies."

The Test of a Religion.

Prof. Felix Adler said, in a recent Sunday's discourse, that the test of a religion is the degree to which it succeeds in inducing its followers to practise its principles. A religion of humanity can only gain the respect of mankind, if its adherents carry out what in principle they applaud. The amount which men devote to charity is the first test of their religiosity. It is not the final test, but it is the first step on the ladder of genuine humanity, which those must ascend who would reach the higher grades. Very few give in proportion to their means. All that part of our income we ought to expend upon ourselves which we need in order to live a truly human life. In this is included whatever is needed for the maintenance of health, the cultivation of faculty, the refinement of taste, and efficient recreation. A part of our income should be used for the present support and future providence of our family. Whatever is above this does not belong to us, and we hold it only as a sacred trust for the benefit of others. By this rule, nothing that makes life grand and valuable would be cut off from our use, but the mere vanities and luxuries would be cut off. If others are too poor to achieve decency and joy and knowledge themselves, we must use all we can spare to do it for them. If, indeed, the idea of brotherhood is to be more to us than an empty name, let us arouse men's consciences, quicken their imaginations, so that they may realize the distress that is on all sides of them, the great work of salvation which clamors to be done,—salvation from sickness, death, and ignorance. They will then recognize what needs of their own are fictitious and what are real, and they will give the benefit of the doubt to charity rather than to self-indulgence. In our larger charities must appear the first-fruits of our moral culture.

Who is Responsible for Guiteau?

The Rev. Robert Collyer looked in the Bible for Guiteau's inspiration last Sunday morning. He said: Had Guiteau been a Jew, the people would have said to the Jews, "There is something wrong about your faith; and, if this thing goes on, we shall hold you in some degree answerable for the consequences." The stories of Abraham, who would have slain his child, and of Jephthah, who murdered his daughter, are stories locked up in a system of faith. The Churches still hold to the idea that the whole Bible is a divinely inspired book. There are preachers who recite its myths and legends in a dramatic and impressive manner to susceptible audiences, as if they were events of yesterday and occurred only a little way up the Hudson. It is not an uncommon thing to hear of men who have gone mad under the influence of such teaching. This bigotry in respect to the Bible, this bondage to the letter, makes men commit murder. It was asked of Colonel Ingersoll after the assassination, "What can you say to comfort us now?" "Not one word?" Although this is true, it is also true that there is nothing in Mr. Ingersoll's belief that would have prompted Guiteau to the commission of his crime.

BIOLOGICAL.

A discovery I made when analyzing plants last spring seems to me to have biological significance, and may interest some of the readers of The Index.

In examining pollen from a freshly opened calla, under a magnifying power of one hundred and sixty diameters, I perceived (except where the grains were too crowded for observation) that each grain was joined by two links or bands on either side (thus, o=—o=—) to its next neighbors. These links were translucent, like the grains, and apparently either filled with, or composed of, the same protoplasmic fluid. They seemed to grow more dense on exposure to the air, and to become fibres or threads. The thought immediately occurred to me that these links were arrested currents of protoplasm. I recalled the protoplasmic currents or trains of granules which Huxley describes as coursing swiftly in opposite directions, within a twenty-thousandth of an inch of one another, in a single microscopic hair of the nettle; and it seemed to me not improbable that in these tiny vesicles of pollen, filled as they were with protoplasm, there might be a like circulation extending from one grain to another through all, from the same author, at least.

In all later experiments with pollen from the same flower, I failed to discover any connecting links. Whence I infer that the connection between the grains and the system of circulation, if such there be, ceases soon after the anthers burst and discharge their pollen. This view was confirmed by a subsequent examination of the Hepatica triloba, of which I obtained one specimen where the grains were connected; and also by that of a species of Salix, of which I had a specimen where the grains appeared attached at intervals to the sides of long, silky, shining threads. In the Acer rubrum, the pale yellowish-green pollen grains were connected by threads of bright amber color.

Most of the pollen, however, which came under my microscope in the course of the season, had grains wholly disconnected.

If, on farther examination under higher magnifying powers, it should be proven that protoplasmic currents do in fact course through the pollen before its discharge from the anther cells, it would follow that, when these cells open, the connecting currents would become stiffened on exposure to the air, as similarly fine threads of the white of an egg would harden under like exposure.

It is to be hoped that some one who has the facilities for the experiment will pursue the investigation further, test the theory, and also disclose some of the hidden movements of the fovilæ,—those tiny atoms in active motion in the little microscopic vesicle of a grain of pollen.

CHRISTIAN BIGOTRY.

PARIS, Nov. 1, 1881.

To the Editor of The Index:—

Here is a fine example of Christian (!) charity on the part of a clergyman, contained in the following address to the electors of the second district of Berlin at the recent election of members of the German Reichstag:—

The moment is solemn. The Christo-Teutonic spirit is awakened as during the days of the wars of independence, when we threw off the foreign yoke,—an insatiable abuse, an insupportable oppression. We wish to remain Germans,—to have a German God, a German heart, a German faith, a German liberty, as was formerly sung by Moritz-Arndt, the faithful Christian, the faithful German! Our liberal legislators are only the creatures of the large capitalists, the selfish, the Jews and their companions. Suffer no longer Jews to be our judges and the teachers of our children. Let all vote, therefore, for the candidate of the anti-progressists, for the Rev. Mr. Stöcker.

It is agreeable to know that this narrow-minded and bigoted priest was defeated, and that the liberal candidate, the celebrated Professor Virchow, was elected by six thousand majority.

Very truly yours, THEODORE STANTON.

VOX ET PRE.

DEAR EDITORS,—Discussing lately with a clergyman the anthropomorphism of the Bible, I cited the text in which God is described as walking in the Garden of Eden at the cool of the day as a striking instance. "Ah, no, my dear fellow," replied my reverend friend, "it was only the voice of the Lord: you should read the passage correctly."

You see, dear Editors, what a theological training can do. I was vanquished. It was only the Lord's voice that was walking; he himself was not there. Perceive?

MONTREAL, November 10.

W. H.

HON. R. G. HORR, of East Saginaw, Mich., writes us: "In your paper of November 3, I read the address of Mr. Hinckley on President Garfield, and am sure that his explanation of the cause of the crime is not warranted by the facts; nor do I believe any good will come from the effort of so many to charge this murder to the spoils system or any other system. I enclose you my own address made on that occasion, which contains my theory of the cause of the assassination." We give a brief extract from Mr. Horr's able address:—

That such a man, so early in life and so soon after assuming the duties of the high office to which he had been called by the suffrages of his admiring fellow-citizens could be shot down by the hand of a silly fool is humiliating in the extreme. Care, however, should be taken not to give the act the least political significance in the world. I do not believe the assassin ever in his whole life performed a single act which could be dignified as work for any definite, reputable result. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the sole moving cause of the villainous deed was some fancied slight that he imagined he had received at the hands of the President, who had no doubt treated his importunities with the indifference they deserved. His whole past career shows that he was incapable of any more lofty motives. So far as can be ascertained, his past life had been a simple repetition of low villainies. In religion, he was a hypocrite; in the family relations, he was untrue and unfaithful; in all his business transactions, he was a fraud. He seemed to possess in any considerable degree only two qualities,—self-conceit and a capacity for meanness; and the galling, humiliating fact is that such a being could by any possibility destroy so valuable a life. The form of our government had nothing to do with it. Political differences, party animosities, did not in the least incite him to perpetrate the deed. No other person in our broad land was in the slightest degree responsible for the act. Nor does it in any manner reflect discredit upon our form of government or upon our national institutions. It was one of those low, cowardly, wicked, disreputable deeds, that can always be perpetrated in any country, under any form of government, when a being vile enough for such work happens to be born into the world. Let it be said, to the credit of our common humanity, that such creatures appear only at long intervals.

A CORRECTION BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

To the Editors of the New York Evening Post:—

The report of an interview with me which was printed in the Evening Post of yesterday gives me a little disquietude. With the general substance of it I have no complaint to make, though it is somewhat more penitential than I like. The account is cleverly written, and in the main is just. But two or three points might be differently stated. I cannot remember expressing or feeling any dissatisfaction with the issue of my professional work in New York. As far as it went or professed to go, it achieved its whole object and met every reasonable expectation. How my reporter came to associate materialism, in any of its phases, with my friends John W. Chadwick and Felix Adler,—two men with whom materialism cannot be in any way connected,—I cannot imagine. Dr. Dix and Dr. Taylor—gentlemen who have never honored me with their acquaintance—will be surprised as well as disconcerted on hearing that I claim them as my friends. Perhaps I mentioned other names which my interviewer forgot. In conclusion, permit me to say that I have seen no reason for changing my opinions. It has, however, occurred to me that they do not contain the whole truth. Certainly, I have not gone back to any position which I had abandoned.

Faithfully yours, O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY.—By far the most interesting article in the number just published, but dated April, 1881, is Miss Marion Talbot's lucid and vigorous translation of Professor Preyer's essay on Psychogenesis, or the development of the soul, as studied by observation of the new-born child. Professor Harris shows great liberality in thus giving more than a fourth of his space to a series of illustrations of the fact that "the sense-perceptions are the only material from which every human being builds up its world." The general tone of the journal is particularly marked in the opening editorial, designed to give "the self-refutation of scepticism or agnosticism." The strongest point is that made at the conclusion and to the effect that making an assertion about any subject takes it for granted that this subject can be known; and so, when the agnostic denies that he knows anything about the infinite, he thereby admits that he has some knowledge of it. Thus, according to Professor Harris, agnosticism is self-contradictory, because it says, "Objective possibility is sufficiently known by the human mind to affirm of it its difference from any human knowledge of it." The Professor's argument is that "in all cases the criticism of the faculty of cognition is performed by that faculty itself. It is a self-measurement. In measuring there must be a scale or measuring-rod to which the object to be measured must be applied; and the scale must extend beyond that which is measured by it, or else the limits of the object will not be ascertained." This is true when the object is shorter than the measuring-rod, but only then. Thus, a yard-stick will measure a yard of cloth without extending beyond it, and a plank of several feet in length may be measured by a foot-rule. To have the object extend beyond the scale is very common; and this is exactly the case in question, that of the measurement of the universe by the human intellect. Fully to measure an object requires us to apply our scale as far as it extends; but there is no need of carrying the scale any further. It is also perfectly possible to measure only a part of the object, and not apply our scale to the rest. All we need to know is what we measure. We do not necessarily know anything about what lies beyond. Thus, our reason furnishes the means of measuring a certain portion of the universe. This we know something about. Outside of the limits to which our measuring-rod reaches, we know nothing. Professor Harris indeed says that our knowledge is self-determined, and limited only by the nature of mind itself. "Any criticism that attempts to fix the limits of human cognition will meet this difficulty. It will presuppose that it has before it as its object both itself as limited and the object which limits it." In other words, to say that knowledge is limited by anything but itself is to take it for granted that we know the object limiting it. But is this so? Do we know what is the reason that our senses are so limited that we can hear nothing when vibrations take place at a rate greater than seventy-three thousand a second, and see nothing when they take place at a rate less than four hundred and fifty-eight trillion? To both sight and hearing, the intermediate vibrations are a blank; and this results simply because our knowledge is limited by the nature of the external world. So, again, we are unable to tell whether there really are any atoms or whether matter is infinitely divisible. Still less are those who admit the existence of ultimate elements able to tell what they are. And there are countless directions in which our knowledge is thus limited by the nature of the world in which we live. External facts set up limits outside of which we know nothing, and beyond which we can extend no measuring-rods. Here, knowledge stops; and we do not know what stops it or what lies beyond these limits. For agnostics to say that they know nothing about God or immortality or any other infinite and absolute ideas is no more a self-contradiction than it is for us to say that we do not know the properties of those vibrations which lie between those that produce color and those that produce sound; or, again, than it is for us to deny that we can tell what the atoms or ultimate elements really are. Asserting that these atoms are beyond our knowledge does not take any power of knowing them for granted. No more does a similar assertion about the Infinite. When a man tries to tell what the atoms are, as Lucretius did in a great poem, of which a good account is given by Mr. Emery in this very number of the journal, then his argument comes within the range of our knowledge, at least so far as that we can tell if it is consistent with itself and with known facts. And so we are able to pass judgment on the views which philosophers and preachers present of the Infinite. We can easily see that these views are so contradictory, one of another, that all cannot possibly be true; and we can also see that none of them are really supported by facts. Agnostics will certainly not admit that the Infinite can be known until they find that such knowledge is proving its existence by bringing forth fruit which nothing else can yield.

THE Catholic World for December gives its readers "The German Problem," by Rev. I. T. Hecker; "How Cornwallis consolidated the British Empire," by Margaret F. Sullivan; "The Story of a Portionless Girl," by Mary H. A. Allies; "Monastic Dublin," by William Denneky; "Monte Vergine," by M. P. Thompson; "Cardinal Wolsey and his Times," by S. Hubert Burke; "Christian Jerusalem," by Rev. A. F. Hewitt; "A Jesuit in Disguise," by John R. J. Hassard; "Impressions of Quebec," by Anna T. Sadler; and other articles.

THE Unitarian Review for November contains solid reading. The topics are "Reflex Action and Theism," by Prof. William James; "The Reform Church of France," by D. Charruand; "Criticism and the Scriptures," by Prof. George L. Cary; "The Theistic Argument as affected by Recent Theories," by Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D.; "Things at Home and Abroad," by Mrs. Martha P. Lowe; "Notes from England," by Rev. John Page Hopps; "Editors' Note-Book"; and "Review of Current Literature."

THE North American Review for December is a good number. Hon. John A. Kasson discusses "The Monroe Doctrine." Rev. Dr. Cheever, Judge Samuel Hand, and Wendell Phillips discuss "The Death Penalty." H. O. Arnold Foster defends the policy of Gladstone. Dr. Hammond, and three other eminent physicians, review the history of President Garfield's case. David A. Wells treats of "Reform in Federal Taxation."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

IN consequence of the election of four "antichristians" as School Commissioners at Nevada, Iowa, the Bible has been excluded from the public schools.

SENATOR ANTHONY has been a United States senator continuously for twenty-two years. No other man in Congress has continuously served so long in either house.

THE first Lyceum in America was started at Millbury, Mass., in 1826, by Josiah Holbrook. The lectures were devoted exclusively to scientific and hygienic subjects.

ERNEST RENAN, on his arrival at Rome, about a month ago, was saluted by all the papers—to the exclusion of the clericals, of course—with words of respect and cordiality.

THE picture of Columbus just found in the Spanish Colonial Office represents him as about forty, without a wrinkle on his broad forehead, with dark, thick hair, a brilliant eye, and beaked nose.

It is told of Gambetta that the only occasions on which he has been seen at church since he became famous were the funeral of President Thiers and the recent marriage of the daughter of President Grévy.

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER says Irving was very sensitive, and that the play of his mind depended on the sunshine of approval. And this shows that he lacked what many pleasant writers lack, intellectual virility.

OLD MEN AS SCIENTISTS.—Recently, Professor Huxley said that ninety-nine men out of every hundred became simply obstructive after sixty years old, and were not flexible enough to yield to the advance of new ideas.

BRET HARTE's hair is turning white. Doesn't he know anything about "ways that are dark"? Bret is young, but he has a hard time. He has to live in London while his consulate is in Glasgow, and this is wearing on him.

AUGUSTA J. EVANS' Beulah, St. Elmo, Vashti, and Macaria, though as extravagant and absurd as they can well be in plot, style, and character, have been very remunerative to her, having brought her more than $10,000 each.

"JUNO" writes to the New York Tablet concerning Felix Adler, "When he was a boy of fourteen, he was noted for the intellectual beauty of his face, but more than all for his talent for drawing, which was pronounced wonderful."

COL. H. S. OLCOTT, formerly journalist, now president of the Theosophical Society,—whatever that may be,—turns up at Ceylon in a new rôle, as the author of a text-book for Buddhist schools, written in English,—the Buddhist Catechism.

THE Princess Maud, the twelve-year-old daughter of the Prince of Wales, is said to be quite a musical genius, and is so devoted to music that her parents and teachers are obliged to exert their authority in order to restrain her ardor in its study.

THE pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church in New York City recently preached a sermon, severely denouncing theatres and theatre-goers; but we see no announcement since in the New York papers of any theatre failing or closing in consequence.

REV. J. VILA BLAKE spoke with stirring eloquence at Parker Memorial last Sunday. The members of the society assembled in goodly numbers to hear him, and to recall tender associations of his former ministry among them. He speaks there again next Sunday.

M. DE COUTOULAY, the new French minister to Mexico, was formerly a journalist, which is encouraging to the ambition of that multitudinous craft; but then it is added that he was also an accomplished linguist, having at his command several tongues besides his mother tongue.

AT the approaching coronation of the Czar and Czarina, the ivory throne of Constantine, the last Emperor of Constantinople, is to be used. The Czarina is to occupy a throne adorned with 876 diamonds and rubies, and 1,223 sapphires, turquoise, and pearls of the first water.

ROWLAND CONNOR, minister of the Unitarian Society of East Saginaw, Mich., is to deliver a course of twelve lectures at the Academy of Music in that place, to explain and illustrate what is popularly known as "Darwinism," including a statement of some of the main affirmations of modern science.

CHIEF "IRON EYE," Mrs. Bright Eyes Tibbles' Indian papa, is described by a recent visitor to the Omaha Reservation as "of medium height, neatly dressed after the civilized fashion, with a clear-cut, intelligent face." Though he has a wooden leg and so limps in his walk, he is extremely expert in the saddle.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, though of English parentage, was born in Florence in 1820, and is therefore sixty-one years of age, and is described as having an English complexion, large brown eyes, and a well-nourished body, which would weigh one hundred and sixty-five pounds, so that she is not now the slight, fragile person which the engraved portraits, taken just after the Crimean war, represented her to be.

PROF. ROBERTSON SMITH finds his hands full these days. He furnishes the articles on the Books of Joel and Judges for the new volume of Encyclopædia Britannica; and he is about to begin the delivery, at Inverness, of a course of four lectures of a non-controversial character, two of them on "Hebrew Poetry." Meanwhile, Professor Watts, of Belfast, is engaged upon a reply to his "Lectures on the Old Testament."

THE poet Whittier, having been voted an honorary member of the "National Carriage Builders' Association" recently convened at Cincinnati, returns thanks for the honor in the following quaint fashion: "I am not a builder, in the sense of Milton's phrase of one who could 'build lofty rhyme.' My vehicles have been of an humbler sort, merely the farm wagon and buckboards of verse, and are not likely to run as long as Dr. Holmes' 'One Hoss Shay,' the construction of which entitles him to the first place in your Association. I should not dare to warrant any of my work for a long drive."

A WASHINGTON correspondent writes that a lady guest from Providence "said merrily that it was always a treat to meet General Burnside at a party; that he would come up in his superb, soldierly way, and offer a cordial hand to her, saying: 'How do you do? How do you do, my dear madam? How do you do?' and without another word go on to the next acquaintance similarly, leaving her with an impression of having had a very nice talk with him. 'I know there is nothing weighty behind that grand manner,' she added. 'I know he adds just nothing at all to the intellectual wealth of the Senate, but what a treasure he is, after all! Rhode Island likes him, and always will.'"

CHRISTMAS SERVICE.

A Christmas Service for the Church and Sunday-school together, or for either alone, is now ready, published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, 40 Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois. Eight pages, containing Responsive Reading, with Anthem and Chant, and six Carols, Price $2.50 per hundred. Specimens will be sent on receipt of a three-cent postage-stamp.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON:

HIS LIFE, WRITINGS, AND PHILOSOPHY.

By Rev. GEO. WILLIS COOKE.

1 volume, crown octavo.....$2.00.
With fine Steel-Engraved Portrait.

An interesting and valuable critical and analytic survey of the literary life of Mr. Emerson, with copious quotations and extracts from his writings, including many choice and characteristic passages not comprised in his printed works.

"Mr. Cooke has given to this book long and faithful study, and some high authorities who have examined the MSS. promise it a permanent place in literature."—Unity, Chicago.

"It is equally clear that Mr. Cooke's volume will have a value quite independent of his own biographical work in it, though this also has been carefully done, and will add much to the common stock of knowledge concerning our chief American author; for such Emerson is, and will soon be recognized, if he is not already."—Frank B. Sanborn, in the Springfield Republican.

"He has given us an interesting biography of Mr. Emerson, touched upon his personal traits and peculiarities, told us incidents connected with the writing of some of his more famous essays and poems, and has brought together a large amount of matter written by Mr. Emerson, which has never found place in his published works. This feature makes the work of especial value, as certain of the essays and sermons included have been sought for in vain for many years."—Boston Transcript.

"Mr. Emerson's relations with the great minds of the century are clearly brought out by abundant quotation and selections from personal reminiscences. For the rest, the volume is rich in inedited writings and speeches."—Boston Traveller.

A Weekly Journal

PUBLISHED AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.,

By a Board of Seven Trustees, who are nominated by the Free Religious Association and incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. GUITEAU's trial is likely, at least, to have one good effect. It is producing a wholesome discussion of the question of insanity in connection with vice and crime, and people are beginning to see that a man may be technically called insane or bordering upon it, and yet not at all be absolved from moral or legal responsibility.

In the debate upon the budget in the Reichstag last Thursday, Herr Richter criticised severely the imperial message, ridiculed Bismarck's economic policy, and declared substantially that the German people, while not insensible to Prince Bismarck's merits and services, now "claim to be of age, and must have a voice in the settlement of their destinies."

GUITEAU's religion, like his sanity, seems somewhat "mixed." When asked if he was afraid on the occasion of the latest attempt upon his life, he replied, "No," he "trusted in the Deity and the Metropolitan police," and consequently felt safe. But he omitted to state, although he sufficiently indicated by his conduct, upon which he chiefly depended for safety.

SENOR MARTINEZ, the Spanish Minister of Justice, declared on the 24th that the Government was negotiating with the Vatican in regard to the civil marriage question; and, although he hoped for a favorable result, in the contrary event the Government would maintain the principle of the bill it had presented, and uphold the prerogative of the State. The declaration made in the Senate Committee was warmly applauded.

ACCORDING to statistics gathered by the Census Bureau, the chief of the wheat-growing States are now Illinois, which yields 51,110,502 bushels; Indiana, 47,284,853 bushels; Ohio, 46,014,869 bushels; Michigan, 35,532,543 bushels; Iowa, 31,154,205 bushels; California, 29,017,707 bushels; Missouri, 24,966,627 bushels; Wisconsin, 24,884,689 bushels; Minnesota, 24,601,030 bushels; Pennsylvania, 19,462,405 bushels; and Kansas, 17,324,141 bushels. New York, once the richest granary of the United States, produced last year only 11,587,766 bushels of wheat; while Nebraska, of recent settlement, produced 13,847,007 bushels.

In the statement which he read in court last week, Guiteau said: "Any fact in my career bearing on the question who fired that shot, the Deity or myself, is of vital importance in this case; and I propose that it go to the jury. I never would have shot him of my own volition, notwithstanding those newspapers, if I had not been commissioned by the Deity to do the deed; but this fact does not relieve the newspapers from the supposed disgrace of the President's removal. If he had been properly treated, he would have been alive to-day. It has been published that I am in fear of death. It is false. I have always been a religious man and an active worker for God."

"THE American people," says the Boston Sunday Herald, "of Irish birth and lineage are almost unanimously enthusiastic for any measure of relief for Ireland; and Americans generally wish well to Ireland, and oppose arbitrary measures. But we should say that the weight of opinion in America is that the present programme of the Land League leaders is illogical and hopeless. If the Irish people should make a definite demand for local self-government, they would have the undivided sympathies of the American people; but Americans generally do not see the justice of refusing to fulfil definite contracts or a chance to hope that the Irish people can gain anything by such a policy. And in this view they are sustained by many true friends of Ireland at home."

THE observance of Thanksgiving day in this city was general; but it was the festival and not the religious feature of the observance that was general. The churches were not well attended, while all the theatres and places of amusement were crowded to overflowing afternoon and evening. To thousands, it was, as usual, not only a day of heavy dinners, but of delightful family gatherings and reunions of friends, in which the affections of home and the amenities of society prevailed over the bustle and business of ordinary daily life. Festival days like this should be encouraged, for they are needed by the people; although it is time that the proclamations appointing them be divested of their usual theological phraseology, which is meaningless and mere remnants of ages, the actual belief and spirit of which belong to the past.

THE Toronto Globe, commenting on the law in regard to the taking of evidence in Canadian courts, under which Justice Osler found himself compelled to refuse to receive the testimony of a professed agnostic, says: "Little argument is needed, we fancy, to convince any one that the ends of justice will be promoted, and no sanction of religion weakened, by conforming the laws of Canada in this respect to those of England, where provision is made for receiving the affirmations of persons to whom the ordinary form of adjuration is devoid of solemnity and power. . . . Whatever mode of affirmation may be adopted, the main reliance must be upon stringent provision for severe penalties for every form of false testimony. The paradoxical absurdity of the present custom was illustrated by the placing of Mr. Belford under oath, in order to prove that his oath could not be accepted. That is to say, the testimony of a witness is relied on to prove that it cannot be relied on."

MANY citizens, including Jewish rabbis, Unitarian ministers, Orthodox ministers, and freethinkers, have petitioned the Board of Education of the city of Chicago to "enact rules and regulations to the effect that instruction in unsectarian ethics be given in all the grades of the public schools of Chicago." The petitioners declare that "the proper authorities have not only the right, they have more than this,—they have the duty to provide for the moral training of the rising generations." The address contains valuable suggestions, among which are the following: "The classes shall be opened every morning with appropriate songs. To the singing, ten minutes shall be devoted. The next thirty minutes in the first morning hour shall be devoted to instruction in unsectarian ethics, and in the highest grade to instruction in empirical psychology." The petitioners present briefly the kind of moral lessons they think adapted to the different grades, and declare to the gentlemen of the Board that, in carrying out these proposals, they would open the gates to one of the most urgent and most important reforms in our national system of education.

THE religious press is making a good deal of capital out of the recently published report of an interview with Mr. Frothingham. And some of the secular journals show a readiness to join the religious papers in conveying an impression that is plainly contradicted by Mr. Frothingham's recent letter, in which he says: "I have seen no reason for changing my opinions. Certainly, I have not gone back to any opinion I had abandoned." A few days ago, he wrote, in response to an inquiry regarding his supposed change of views, as follows: "Were I to reply to all the foolish things in the papers, and to explain all the riddles they proposed, my hands would be full of most unprofitable work. The piece from the Commercial contains a measure of truth,—a small measure,—but so garbled and distorted as to defy analysis. . . . The note which was published in the Post of Monday evening last contains all that I am disposed to say to the public on this matter." Notwithstanding Mr. Frothingham declares he has seen no reason for changing his opinions, since he admits that the report of an interview published in the New York Evening Post is partly true, a clear and definite statement from him at this time, while his position is a subject of general doubt and discussion, would be very gratifying to his friends, and would seem to be due the Liberals of this country and the public generally. P.S.—Since the above was in type Mr. Potter's editorial article has come in which the office-editor commends to the attention of Index readers and the public generally.

MR. FROTHINGHAM AND HIS ALLEGED CHANGE OF VIEWS.

The brief paragraph in last week's issue of The Index concerning Mr. Frothingham and his interviewer, it was supposed at the time might be the end of the matter, so far as this journal is concerned, unless Mr. Frothingham himself should choose to speak. Mr. Frothingham's own letter to the Evening Post, as well as a private note from him, had made it so certain that the interviewer's statement was very incorrect, and yet had left it so uncertain how far the incorrectness extended, that the premises seemed too loose to sustain a discussion. What Mr. Frothingham's views may be on the matters at issue is a question of real importance to a good many people. What his interviewer's views may be nobody cares. Since, however, the journals in general and especially the religious press, are discussing the interviewer's statement as if in ignorance of Mr. Frothingham's correction of it, or as if, though having seen his letter, deeming it of little consequence, something further appears to be demanded in our columns.

We had hoped that Mr. Frothingham himself would be inclined to address his old friends through The Index, as he was invited to do. But this, we are sorry to say, his health will not permit. By leading a very quiet life, avoiding exciting scenes and discussions, he is confident of being able to go on with the literary work in which he is now engaged,—the Life of Mr. Ripley,—and a good deal more after that is done. But, as condition for doing it, he must keep free from all excitements, especially those involved in public speaking and controversial writing. For this reason, he contented himself with the briefest possible reply to the Evening Post's statement. He was most concerned to correct certain gross personal misrepresentations for which the statement made him responsible, and to relieve the faithful friends of his New York society of the impression that he regarded their joint work together as a failure. The other misimpressions given by the statement were caused mainly by the shading and coloring and shaping that came from the reporter's own mind,—by the use of words apart from their proper connection, and of phrases and inferences that were his own, etc.; and to have corrected all this would have required a long communication,—a re-writing, in fact, of the whole conversation. He, therefore, simply made the corrections which justice to other persons required, and, for the rest, deemed it sufficient to say that he had seen no reason for changing his opinions nor gone back to any position once abandoned.

And these last assertions, made so unqualifiedly and emphatically by Mr. Frothingham himself, should have barred out much of the newspaper discussion based on the interviewer's statement. Some of the journals that refer to his letter even speak of it as not essentially modifying the statement, and then go on to discuss the statement as showing the great change in his opinions. Yet here are his exact words: "I have seen no reason for changing my opinions." "I have not gone back to any position which I had abandoned." Because he also said in the letter, "The account is cleverly written, and in the main just," this is regarded as proof that the letter does not essentially alter the matter as left by the statement. But, surely, the positive, unqualified assertions in the sentences first quoted should, by any fair rules of interpretation, explain and control the qualified assertion of the last sentence quoted. Doubtless, in the strange and unexpected array in which his informal conversation appeared, Mr. Frothingham could yet distinguish the general outline of his unprepared talk; and hence, in that respect, could say that it was in the main justly reported. Yet he doubtless saw, too, that it was so phrased and shaped as almost certainly to lead to the inference that he had changed his religious position, had "recanted," as some of the newspapers have headed the statement. And, to close the door against that inference, he made the clear, positive denial of any such change of opinion or position.

If Mr. Frothingham had only added to his letter certain facts, which on the best authority have now come to our knowledge, he would have still further deprived the Post's statement of its weight, and relieved the minds of many friends. These facts are: (1) that though he knew the gentleman who called upon him was from the Evening Post's establishment, and expected, as the result of their conversation, that some general article might appear concerning his connection with his New York society, he had no thought of any attempt to report in detail his own language until he saw the statement several days afterwards in print; (2) that the "interviewer" produced not a scrap of paper or pencil, and made not a single note in his presence; (3) that what he did, therefore, was to write out afterwards, as well as he could remember, Mr. Frothingham's part of the informal conversation which they had held together as two gentlemen, and to put it, with sublime audacity, into the first person, and even into quotation-marks, so as to give it every external appearance of having been authorized by Mr. Frothingham himself. And this statement, so made, on a theme of such supreme importance, where so many weighty and delicate interests are involved, the staid and scholarly Evening Post puts into print without any attempt to verify its truth. In our view, the transaction verges close upon a fraud.

But still it will be asked, doubtless, Is there not some change, at least, in Mr. Frothingham's mental attitude on religious problems? Otherwise, how could there have been even a kernel of truth from which such a statement as that printed could have been produced? In answering this question, let the impersonal editorial dignity be dropped entirely, and let me speak as an old friend and co-worker with Mr. Frothingham, and speak especially to the old circle of his friends and admirers in the liberal ranks as well as to the general public.

Within the last week, I have had the pleasure of three hours' conversation with our friend, and mainly on the themes covered by the published statement. I am sure — and I may say it without undue confidence — that with my knowledge of his mental temperament and past opinions, and my intimacy with his habits of thought and speech, I could write a much more accurate account, from that conversation, of O. B. Frothingham's present religious views than the New York interviewer composed. My account might not be so readable as his, nor so salable. It would certainly be very different in tenor. But I am not going to attempt any such account. I have no authority to quote what Mr. Frothingham said, and I did not visit him for that purpose.

But this much I feel that I have a right to say and ought to say,—that it is due to him no less than to the public to say it: I came away from our wholly cordial, friendly, and earnest talk with the entire and grateful conviction that he and I stand as near together to-day in our views, sympathies, hopes, as we did during the twelve years when we worked together as President and Secretary of the Free Religious Association. I detected no sign whatever of anything that could be called defection from the liberal ranks; no turning back upon the path, no lessening of conviction in the necessity of religious progress. The Evangelical Protestants and Romanists who are offering him the refuge of their special sanctuaries of belief may spare themselves the trouble. He is not looking in their direction. The only change of mental attitude observable to me was shown on two or three points, and it is evidently, even on these points, more a change of emphasis to his own consciousness than a change of views; for I think all his present views will be found stated somewhere in his published writings. He is, for instance, more dissatisfied than he was formerly, as are a good many liberal thinkers, with the results of materialistic philosophy; and he has less confidence than he once had in science as the solver of religious problems. At the same time, he gives somewhat more credit than he was wont to do to the old churches, with their creeds and symbols, for preserving the religious sentiment and nourishing the practical consecrations of life. And in these particulars, too, he would find not a few liberal thinkers, who are supposed to be in the advanced ranks, in sympathy with him.

But he does not look back to the churches, nor to their creeds nor symbols, nor to any alleged revelation in the past, for the solution of to-day's great questions. He looks to the future for it, and so he still faces forward. He has faith that it will come in time, and believes that it will come in some grander disclosure of truth, in some larger synthesis of all truths than has yet been discerned. But, because he does not see clearly yet just what it is to be nor how it is to come, he chooses for himself to stop on the line of hope and expectancy, and wait for more light. There are others of us with him, too, on that line. But few have earned the right to stop by so many years of fruitful labor as he. After thirty-three years of the preacher's toil, with little rest, he might fairly ask to be relieved from the field of active labor without other reason. It is enough if he but stands there to prophesy the coming light. That is encouragement and cheer. But some of us think we do see a little beyond that line of expectancy and hope,—see a little of the way by which the coming light is to break. At least, we see far enough for the doing of to-day's work, even though it be but to grope, feeling the way, for the removal of obstructions and the opening of windows for the freer access of the new day's light when it shall dawn. Others among us venture to think that the new day is already here, and the skies bright with promise; that the word for the hour has already been spoken, and that the greatest need is a larger and more earnest apostleship to spread it. All these phases and types of mind make up the ranks of religious progress. And all are looking to the future for the realization of their hopes. As to leadership, the Free Religious movement never had a leader nor a claimant for the office. Many individuals, by their abilities and position, have done it distinguished service, among whom Mr. Frothingham will always be held in honored remembrance as occupying a most eminent place. But the movement is led by ideas, not men.

WM. J. POTTER.

THE CRIMINALITY OF UNBELIEF.

The text of Scripture found in Mark xvi., 16, has proved one of the most baneful in its far-reaching effects upon humanity of any to be found in the pages of the Bible. It reads, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." These words purport to be among the sayings of the newly risen Christ. According to the context there are now very few if any persons living who will not be damned; for it goes on to describe the "signs" which "shall follow them that believe," among others "they shall speak with new tongues," "they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them,"—tests of belief which all must confess are at least rare nowadays, but which ought to be considered just as sacred and binding as the curse upon unbelief. These tests were never so heartily adopted as matters of faith by the Christian world as the more congenial curse on unbelief preceding them. It has been found a great deal easier to accept as true the anathema pronounced on others than the crucial tests of faith. And now, though the revisers of the New Testament have seen fit to decide that these portions of Mark's Gospel with their contexts are apocryphal additions, and so have thrown them out of the "revised edition," there has not yet been found a way to "revise" the spirit which these condemnatory words have fostered in the minds of Christian men and women.

This unrevised text, "He that believeth not shall be damned," with others like unto it, in the early days of Christianity, during its first fierce struggles for supremacy among the religions of the world, formed the pretext for divine authority in their merciless proselyting by flame and sword; and now though the days of such cruel conversions are, we trust, over, and men, seeing more clearly, kindly, and sympathetically in the light of reason, no longer believe in the efficacy of force to control the intellect and will, it is yet through the baleful effects of this—one of the few curses attributed to fall from the divine lips of Jesus—that Christian men and women feel that any one who does not believe as they believe, and who frankly owns his doubt, is, in some vague, undefined way, a criminal, and a wilful criminal at that. There runs this thread of feeling all through the Christian community even to-day, and it is this that makes the ignorant but zealous Christian man or woman shrink from the society of the man—however good and pure his life may be, however self-sacrificing and honorable, however cultured, talented, or genial he may be—who is brave enough to avow and true enough to his conscience to refuse to conceal any change of belief which may have occurred in his intellectual convictions as to the truth of the Christian theology. And even those broader-minded, educated, and larger-hearted Christians, whose good sense and larger views incline them to have faith in the honesty of their freethinking neighbor's disbelief, cannot avoid the half-felt, hardly repressed feeling that any man who disbelieves, and expresses unequivocally that disbelief, in the dogmas of the Church or the supernatural origin of Christianity, is in some way to blame,—a dimly defined feeling that he might, if he only chose, believe as they do, and as if he were only avowing his loss of faith in a spirit of contrariness, braggardism, and bravado, forgetful of the social sacrifices that must necessarily be made by all who make this avowal. And, even in our most liberal Christian papers, this feeling of the criminality of unbelief, born of man's own vengeful nature and nurtured by the accredited curse of Christ, crops out in even their most liberal utterances, in the half-pitying, half-condemnatory tone used toward the thinkers who are a few steps in advance of them.

One's belief is not a matter of choice or of volition. No one can say truly, "I will believe so and so, or I will not believe the other thing." A belief is according to the evidence received or the authority acknowledged. A belief in anything can be professed, provided there are deceit and falsehood in the soul of the one who so professes, or if the inducements of wealth, fame, social distinctions, or other incentives prove too strong for a feeble mind and will to withstand; but the belief is still unchanged, without new and convincing evidence showing the baselessness of that belief. The pleasantness, safety, or beauty of a belief, though it may make it more desirable, does not make it one whit more believable, if the evidence seems to us untrustworthy. Fairy tales are often very enchanting, and we could earnestly desire that they might be true; but experience and reason teach us that they have no foundation whatever in fact. So, however desirable they may be, we know they are not true; and no amount of contempt for our lack of faith from some child who does devoutly believe in them, and who pities us for our unbelief could change our views in regard to them.

A belief may, however, be greatly a matter of temperament, inheritance, or circumstances,—not that any of these can fully determine what a man shall or shall not believe, but these things are almost sure to give a bias to his belief; and even those who in the prime of life, in the face of evidence which to them is overpowering, change their belief in regard to religion or any other matters, at the near approach of death or in the slow death of old age and consequent weakened faculties, when their courage and clearest thought is gone, when early impressions and inherited tendencies assert themselves most strongly, and with them comes often the renewal of that inborn feeling of the criminality of a change of faith,—then these even are apt to waver and falter, to look longingly back to their inherited faith, and, yielding to the oppression of the almost universally expressed condemnation, at last give up the convictions of their ripest reason, and save themselves from the revived feeling of wrong-doing by disowning their belief, disowning it even to their own stifled conscience.

And saddest of all it is that this inherited condemnatory spirit of the law that "he that believeth not shall be damned" survives oftentimes in the doubter himself, who, having as he thinks been brought to see more clearly than his Christian, or perhaps only more orthodox, neighbor, finding himself unable to bring that neighbor to see as he does, feels like, at least, condemning that neighbor for doubting his own new views.

THE FASCINATION OF IDEAS.

Not even money exercises such a glamour over the average man as ideas exercise over persons of uncommon intellectual power. Such persons will forego wealth and political and social distinction for the sake of leading a life of reflective thought. Indeed, it is almost impossible to exaggerate the fascination of ideas over their devotees. The passion of the lover for his mistress, of the miser for his gold, is as water to wine when matched with the passion for truth which the earnest student and thinker feels. The ideal life is the proper life of an intellectual being, although of course as yet only comparatively the few are either disposed or able to lead such a life. Later along, the pure pleasure of high thinking, of knowledge for its own sake, without ulterior selfish ends, will undoubtedly be participated in by the multitude at large. Long ago there was a learned mob in Germany, that is, a vast multitude of persons of superior culture and intellectual capability; and such a multitude is now a feature of France, Great Britain, and the United States. Every day discloses the fact that there are numbers of persons all about us who, though obscure, are the intellectual peers of the most distinguished public men.

Ideas now are broadcast and sown, as it were, upon the wind. The means of popularizing and disseminating them are becoming more and more effective, so that unfurnished brains are becoming rarer and rarer. Indeed, hardly a human head in the midst of such a continual snow-fall, as it were, of ideas can avoid becoming the nidus of one or more of the winged spiritual seeds of thought with which the moral atmosphere is filled. Reflective persons are getting to be numerous indeed.

All the current ideas, which are now so rapidly disintegrating the old social, political, and ecclesiastical order of things and transfiguring society in the light of truth, only three or four generations ago were latent in a few big heads which could be counted on the fingers of one hand. Thus the sources of all the great rivers, which fructify and beautify the lowlands for hundreds and thousands of miles along their currents before they enter the great oceanic reservoir of all inland waters, are to be sought in cloudy uplands, remote forest-girdled lakes, and hidden springs. So it is with ideas. They have their origin in a few Jupiterian or Olympian brains or lofty souls that dwell aloof and apart in a seclusion of intense meditation. Such souls are seldom fully known or appreciated by their immediate contemporaries.

But the great revolutionary truths and ideas to which they give birth gradually descend like mountain rivulets and streams from their original elevation and seclusion to the plane of ordinary life, to the level of the average man. A single great revolutionary thinker—like Kant, for instance—requires a host of popularizers and interpreters of his thought to follow in his wake, and retail his ideas, as it were, to the multitude. The business of the ablest writers and lecturers of to-day is the interpreting to the masses the thoughts of a few great original thinkers, who have kindled in their disciples and followers an irrepressible, intellectual fire and enthusiasm, the contagion of truth. A century ago or more, Kant demonstrated that the pure reason of every sane, enlightened person is the native seat and highest tribunal of truth and right, and as such superior to all instituted authority, however venerable. Here was an affirmation of the dignity, inviolability, and sanctity, even, of human nature in every individual man and woman, of its superiority to all institutions of whatever standing or sacredness, which has transformed and is transforming under our own eyes society over the whole area of civilization.

Here was fire from heaven indeed, and evidence that the race of prophets and inspired men can never become extinct as long as we are linked to eternal power and truth by our higher nature, the faculty of fundamental and universal truth. The companion idealist of the great Teutonic thinker is, of course, Darwin. To these Dioscuri or twin-stars of the first intellectual magnitude is traceable pretty much all the intellectual, moral, and social ferment which is going on about us. Before Kant's ideas, spiritual and political despotisms and legitimacies, however hoar or long-seated, are crumbling to dust. The Darwinian hypothesis rids the world of the absurd conception of a thaumaturgist and sleight-of-hand deity, in whose behalf Paleys and Butlers had to be continually writing apologetic and explanatory treatises of natural theology, so called.

Thus mighty are ideas; and he who makes them the pursuit of his life may not acquire wealth or political distinction, or distinction of any sort, but he is certainly fitting himself for the high destiny which is generally believed to await us as spiritual beings. Carlyle, in his latter days, was a little peevish over the fact of the multitudinousness of writers and thinkers in these times, and, in one of his reported conversations, contemptuously styled them "literary canaille," as if they were inconveniently numerous, and so diminished the conspicuousness of such exceptional geniuses as himself. Such a jealousy was unworthy of the great iconoclast, and was the offspring of the fretfulness of age. The sphere of ideas is no royalty or imperialism, but a democratic domain :—

" Aloft, in secret veins of air,
Blows the sweet breath of song :
Oh, few to scale those uplands dare,
Though they to all belong."

Yes, all men may and will ultimately know the pure pleasure of the intellectual life: all men will sooner or later be lifted from the plane of animalism and of servitude to animal propensities to those "uplands" of poetry and high reflective thought, whence is visible the domain of eternal truth and reality.

EDUCATION AND MORALITY.

The National Bureau of Education has just issued a circular on the relation of education and crime, which should be carefully studied by every one interested in the morality of our own communities. It is astonishing how carelessly people attack the whole school system on the ground of a single instance: a man educated at high school or college commits a crime which is widely known from the fact of his high position, and immediately the conclusion is drawn by some wiseacre that education does not conduce to morality. As well might we say that because people living in well-ventilated and well-drained houses are sometimes ill that good ventilation and drainage are not conducive to health.

At a meeting of the National Educational Association in 1879, at Philadelphia, the assertion was made that sixty per cent. of the convicts then confined in the prisons of Philadelphia were high school graduates. This being denied, a committee was appointed to investigate the subject; and their report is made through Mr. J. P. Wickersham, LL.D., for fifteen years State superintendent of public instruction in Pennsylvania. Without giving the details of statistics on which they are founded, the following conclusions will show the result of their inquiry :—

1. That about one-sixth of all the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly illiterate.
2. That about one-third of it is committed by persons practically illiterate.
3. That the proportion of criminals among the illiterate is about ten times as great as among those who have been instructed in the elements of a common-school education.

Similar statements are quoted from other high authorities; and the condition of things in Europe is equally significant. Dr. Wines states that in Belgium one-half of the prison population is wholly illiterate on commitment, and in Holland one-third. The statistics of certain State and reformatory schools also show a very small percentage of crime, even among children of bad antecedents, when carefully educated.

But we cannot expect perfect results from a school education which covers only a small portion of a child's life. It is only one of the many influences to which he is subjected, but it is one of the most important of them; and it is the only one which in the majority of cases the State can bring to bear upon human beings at the age when they are most susceptible to lasting moral impressions. Another circular, on the "Discipline of the School," shows how effective even its intellectual work may be made for the promotion of good habits of life.

The Report of the Department of Superintendence of the National Association covers so many topics that we cannot review them at present, but only say that it is full of suggestion in regard to "weak places in our systems of public instruction," "our schools and our forests," "museums illustrative of education," "education and the State," and other important topics. The Bureau is doing good work, and the public should recognize and support it.

NATIONAL RECOGNITION OF THEOLOGY.

Rev. C. A. Bartol preached in this city, last Thursday, to a congregation "numbering," says the Herald, "an even half hundred," in favor of the national recognition of a Supreme Being. We give the following extract from a report of his sermon as published in the Journal :—

But what right has the Magistrate, presidential or gubernatorial, to call us together in our churches or suspend our ordinary avocations at all? Who gave him authority to ascribe the harvest to a living power rather than to dead matter? What business has he to recognize religion, the Christian or any other, when he is but elected under the Constitution for the execution of the laws? Has not the Jew or atheist as much right to have his convictions or denials respected by men in office, partly through his vote, as Protestant or Romanist? Did not whoever prescribed for the United States coin the motto, "In God we trust,"—did he not presume beyond his sphere, and violate the fundamental principle of our institutions,—equal privilege for all opinions? Such questions are asked, and the organ of all similar inquiries in Boston sneers at Governor Long for the piety in which it says his success at being rechosen blossoms out. There is, then, a handful of malcontents, a minute minority scarce visible, should the whole population rise to be counted and stand up together, who object to having the Supreme Being recognized in any document of State. Has their point any force? I have to say it is too late and out of order among us, inasmuch as the most important political paper ever drawn on these shores, by Thomas Jefferson, the great radical of his day,—the Declaration of Independence,—expresses our appeal as a nation struggling for life, yearning to be born, impatient to exist, for the rectitude of our intentions.

Mr. Bartol asks questions which he utterly fails to answer. Certainly, the "Jew or atheist" has "as much right to have his convictions or denials respected by men in office, partly through his vote, as Protestant or Romanist." And the motto "In God we trust," on the United States coin, is a violation of the spirit of the Federal Constitution and of the principles of secular government, which cannot consistently recognize as true or false any theological system or dogma. Although the word "God" occurs in the paper in which our fathers declared the colonies free and independent States, it does not imply the recognition of such a Being by the national Government. Jefferson, who drafted this "important political paper," positively refused to appoint a day of fasting and prayer, and declared that the appointment of such a day was not within the province of the Chief Magistrate of this nation. In the national Constitution, as is well known, the word "God" does not occur.

Mr. Bartol speaks of those opposed to the appointment, by the President and Governors, of days of thanksgiving and prayer as "a handful of malcontents." His statement is founded only upon his wishes, certainly not upon facts. Very likely Mr. Bartol's congregation and the circle in which he moves are in sympathy with his utterances; but if he would make a trip through the country and mingle with the people, especially in the great and populous West, he would find a very large and constantly increasing public sentiment in favor of the removal of every vestige of the union of Church and State. A large proportion of the ministers and members of the very denomination to which Mr. Bartol belongs are, in the West, heartily in sympathy with the movement for State secularization. Their faces are toward the sunrise, and they represent whatever is advanced and progressive in Unitarianism. Mr. Bartol is gazing at the setting sun, and is so dazzled by "the evening's river of gold" that he sees not "the morning's silvery dew." He can appreciate the progress from the theology of Jonathan Edwards to that of the right wing of Boston Unitarianism, which is hardly in advance of the left wing of Boston Orthodoxy; but, of the progress from this sort of Unitarianism to the more advanced thought of this generation, he seems to have very little appreciation. The "organ" to which he alludes will pursue the even tenor of its way, and continue to propound "inquiries" that will puzzle and perplex men who, owing to the bias of a theological education, are unwilling to admit, because unable to see, the justice of completely separating the Church and the State, and leaving religious doctrines and observances to those who believe in them, without the official interference or even recognition of the Magistrate.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

THE City Council of Des Moines, Iowa, recently passed an ordinance to prohibit concerts and theatrical and operatic performances and exhibitions on Sunday. This ordinance was vigorously opposed by some members of the council, and its passage has provoked much indignation and determined opposition. A large meeting held at the Academy was addressed by Rev. S. S. Hunting, the well known Unitarian minister. He said: "If benevolent persons would unite and sustain a fine concert every Sunday afternoon or evening in the Opera House or Academy of Music, for ten cents admission, it could do more good for the morals of the city than any church in the same time. Let the music, both vocal and instrumental, be classical and popular combined, and it would meet a want very much neglected in a growing city like this. I can hardly credit the sincerity of professed temperance men who put a fine upon the music of the city, when they may know that for every concert hall they shut up they open a saloon and drive persons into it. As for one, I despise such legislation. There is not a law of the State to sustain it. Let the concerts increase Sunday afternoons or evenings. Let our musicians be encouraged. . . . I denounce the ordinance concerning concerts as an insult to all liberal people who would turn the Sunday to its highest uses. I denounce it as a barefaced attempt to legislate the religious views of one portion of the community into law, and thus imposing an unlawful religious test for acts above the suspicion of immorality. At the conclusion of the address, the following resolution was read :—

* Resolved, That the principles stated by President Grant in his Des Moines speech at the Opera House, namely "Let us all labor to add all needful guarantee for the more perfect security of free thought, free speech, and free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespective of nationality, color or religion. . . . Keep the Church and State forever separate"—is the sense of this meeting.

Ex-Governor Gue moved the adoption of this resolution by a rising vote; and, says the Des Moines State Register, the audience "arose in a body simultaneously and unanimously in assent."

SENATOR SHERMAN is reported to have said recently :—

Mormonism is established. These Mormons claim—I have talked with some of them—that they are Christians; that they are God-fearing men; that they have the highest sanction for their practices. They quote the Bible, the old Mosaic law, that, if a man die, his brother shall marry the widow; and, they argue, if the brother, why not the friend? They say Christ did not annul that law. If you say the spirit of the New Testament is against it, they say that is a matter of opinion. Opinions are stubborn things, you know: they die hard. Civil law cannot touch them. They marry one woman. She is the lawful wife. The others are sold to the Mormon. He believes that his religion requires him, in some cases allows him, to enter into this relation. If he were brought before a civil magistrate for bigamy, no one would testify against him, because nobody has witnessed any marriage ceremony.. There was none, except in the case of the first wife. The United States might perhaps disfranchise the Mormon, but it would be a question above policy. The institution is already distasteful to the young people; and only a small portion of the community, about one man in seven of the members of the Mormon Church, actually practise polygamy. Measures of reform must be moderate and gradual. It would die out, were it not for accessions from Europe. Meantime, the Mormons have redeemed the country they occupy from barrenness. A tract of land, two hundred miles long by fifty miles wide, has become highly cultivated and productive. They are industrious and orderly. Salt Lake City is better policed to-day than Cincinnati. If they are forcibly coerced, they will only abandon their industries and set up their institution in some other part of the country.

M. PAUL BERT, who is known both as a man of science and an uncompromising advocate of the entire separation of State and Church, has been appointed by M. Gambetta Minister of Instruction, much to the chagrin of the clergy and their supporters. The design of the French Premier evidently is to relieve the schools from the control of the priests. M. Waldeck Rousseau, Minister of the Interior, declared in the House of Deputies, on the 24th, that the government could not remain indifferent to the attitude of the clergy, that the ministry was of the opinion the clergy should remain within the limits of the Concordat, and that it would use all legal means to compel the clergy to respect the Constitution and laws of the Republic. The Concordat specifies the respective duties of the State and the Church. Heretofore, the language of the Concordat has been construed by the representatives of the Church, not only to further its ecclesiastical interests, but to increase also its political power. At the same time that the clergy have received from the State pay beyond what is allowed them by the Concordat, they have not scrupled to use their position to assail the republic and to secure the election of its enemies. It is very evident by his appointment of M. Bert that M. Gambetta is determined to confine the bishop and priest of the Roman Catholic Church to the exercise of their legal rights.

A BERLIN correspondent of the Nation, referring to the late elections for the Reichstag, writes: "The reactionary period had reached its climax, and progressive tendencies will again prevail. All earnest men who do not consider politics a mere business job or speculation begin to take more hopeful views of the future, and appreciate the important change just brought about by the elections. It is impossible that the anti-Semitic and other reactionary elements should longer be held together. Terror-stricken, they try to make up by braggadocio for what they have lost in confidence and success. The so-called Social Christians—a mean set of demagogues, under the leadership of a court preacher, a certain Stoecker, also a defeated candidate—have already lost the support of their former wealthy Conservative friends, who appreciate the cruel fact that this kind of political business does not pay. The same official and officious press organs which did their utmost in backbiting and stirring up the worst passions now desert their own camp, and confess that their attacks have only advanced the Liberal cause." This is very encouraging, although it should be added that the demagogue, Stoecker, has been finally returned from Minden.

THE colored citizens of the South are rapidly adapting themselves to their new and improved condition, and adopting the best plans of their white brethren for the improvement of their lands and fortunes. At Raleigh, N.C., was recently held the third annual exhibition of the "North Carolina Industrial Association," an association whose members are all colored people. It was formally opened by a speech from the Governor of the State and other white public dignitaries. The exhibition was very creditable in all departments. Of the people at the fair, a correspondent of the New York Herald remarks that they "were orderly, jolly, and sober. They are losing a great deal of the humorous, or rather clownish, traits that formerly marked them. . . . Responsibility is making them serious. . . . They are improving morally. Their manners show this step in advance. Their social customs are becoming, under the influences of the churches and social organizations, more quiet. They are exhibiting more conservatism, a better capacity for public affairs, and a less feverish desire to engage in them."

THE Springfield Republican says: "The interesting fact about M. Paul Bert, Gambetta's minister of public instruction, is that he not only doesn't believe in God, but isn't willing that any one else, not even the little boys and girls and their mothers, shall believe in him. He is a physiologist of deserved distinction, and an authority on the phenomena of life under varying barometric pressure; but there are other phenomena of life about which he knows nothing, is content to know nothing, and is angry that other persons should pretend to know more than he does." The Republican, whose religion is a mixture of Unitarianism and Transcendentalism, and whose reputation among its contemporaries is not that of an orthodox journal, can yet be as unjust and as savage in its allusions to scientific materialists and in its strictures on their views as any of the orthodox journals. The fact that M. Bert does not believe in supernaturalism is no just reason he should be misrepresented.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE New York Independent, in an editorial article on the Frothingham "interview," summarizing the matter at the close, says that it would call attention to two facts. One of the "two facts" is that "the tendency of free religion is downward. Its drift is toward an abhorrent, dead materialism, which uplifts no life, its own leader being witness." Now, Mr. Frothingham has given witness to no such thing. The Independent bears false testimony. There is no such sentence as this in the interviewer's statement, from which the Independent professes to draw its facts. There is one good deal like it, on which it is evidently framed. But there is a change in a most important word,—the key-word of the statement. Where the Independent says "free religion," the interviewer's statement says "free-thought." This latter is his phrase all through. He never once uses the term "free religion." On this point, he very likely reported Mr. Frothingham with tolerable correctness. His statement as a whole is bad enough; and we are now convinced, by the best of evidence, is entirely untrustworthy. But for the Independent to gloss it in this way is to go from worse to worst. The "free-thought" movement is by no means identical with the "free religious" movement. Mr. Frothingham has been a conspicuous leader of the latter. That is, he has preached religion no less than freedom. And he has nowhere said, as the Independent affirms he has, that freedom and religion, when brought together, tend downward to an abhorrent materialism.

THE American Bible Society managers are charged with some mismanagement of the society's funds. It is not yet clear what the trouble is; but it is a suspicious circumstance that the managers have refused, and in a very evasive and dilatory way, to allow a committee of the Connecticut Auxiliary Society, appointed for the purpose, to make a thorough investigation of the treasury affairs. The Christian Union advises Boycotting the Board to terms, thus:—

The Christian Union recommends to its readers to refuse to give any farther funds to the Bible Society till these charges are cleared up; to all pastors of churches to postpone the Bible Society collections; and to all auxiliaries to hold their funds in their own treasury till the condition of the treasury of the American Bible Society has been thoroughly investigated. Every man is to be presumed innocent till he has been proved guilty; but no man in charge of trust funds should be left in charge of them, if, under serious charges, he opposes, declines, evades, or even discourages a full, free, and thorough investigation of his accounts.

THE following clear and correct definition of "Freethinker" is from the Secular Review, London:

Freethinker is not necessarily an unbeliever in all theology, or an antagonist to every phase of religion. Freethought has no antagonism to religious belief any further than such belief arrogates to itself infallibility, and attempts to suppress all views not in harmony with itself. The Freethinker is one who admits the right of every opinion, that is not a manifest violation of decency and morality, to be adopted and published by those who think it wise to do so, leaving the public to decide how far such opinion or publication is deserving of appreciation and encouragement. Freethought, when properly understood, does not consist in a form of belief, nor in a code of unbelief, but in the right to think, and to give expression to such thoughts, without persecution following as the result.

"THIS WORLD" is to be the title of Mr. George Chainey's Lectures at Paine Memorial Hall in their pamphlet publication for 1882, instead of the present title, "The Infidel Pulpit." The change is good as substituting a positive idea for a negative one. We have watched Mr. Chainey's work in Boston with interest, and have been hoping to see it take, after he fairly got started, a more constructive form. But thus far it does not appear to have done so, but rather, judging from reports of his discourses which we have read from time to time, to have become more negative in spirit and declamatory in manner. The applause which greets the hard hits at old theological absurdities is dangerous to a speaker of Mr. Chainey's temperament. It does not give a fair chance for that capacity for presenting constructive truth which we believe he possesses; for this is a work that requires a calmer and more thoughtful method, and allows consequently less room for the "telling points" so admired by the Paine Hall audience. Perhaps the change of name indicates a change of purpose. The new name stands for one special idea of the materialistic philosophy (though not its exclusive possession),—namely, to spend all our energies on bettering man's condition in this world. If Mr. Chainey and the large following he has drawn around him will only set on foot something in this direction which will be recognized as a positive moral and social benefit to the community, they will do more for the cause of Liberalism in Boston than all the first volume of his lectures has done. The churches are beginning to take much more care of this world than they used to, and Liberalism should not fall behind them in the practice of its own idea. It was members of Trinity Church who gave the Boston newsboys the Thanksgiving dinner last week. Last summer, we believe, some measures were under discussion for organizing the Paine Memorial Society more effectively for social and philanthropic work. We trust they have not been abandoned. But we have heard nothing of them of late. This World is also to contain some other matter besides Mr. Chainey's lectures.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Our friends in New York will find The Index on sale at Brentano's, 5 Union Square.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates? We shall also be pleased to receive names and addresses of persons likely to be interested in The Index, to whom we can send sample copies.

We have the pleasure to announce to our readers that next week The Index will contain a lecture on Emanuel Kant, by Prof. Felix Adler. In the same number will appear a reply to Mr. W. H. Spencer's late article, by Mr. M. J. Savage.

A LADY correspondent writes: "Mr. Schumm, a graduate of Cornell College, an honest, trusty, and able young man, has lately come out with a new paper, the Radical Review. I am convinced of his earnestness and ability." This paper is published at Madison, Wis.

THE letter recently published in The Index, signed "R. C. A.," giving the reasons of the writer for renouncing Christianity, was written, we have permission to say, by Capt. R. C. Adams, son of the late Rev. Nehemiah Adams, D.D., of this city. There have been many inquiries in regard to this letter, and we may republish it in a future number of The Index.

MR. EDWARD ATKINSON, in a very fine address delivered November 22 before the Massachusetts Mechanics' Association of this city, seems to accept and acknowledge the universal laws of evolution and heredity, even in the manufacturing arts, in the following words:—

The finest work ever done, or that can now be done, in the world in the fabrication of cotton cloth, is still performed by the hand in India, in the making of the Dacca muslins which have been named "Woven Wind." It is an hereditary art, and is still conducted as it may have been before iron had been smelted and before any tool of modern kind had become known among men. The cotton plucked with the finger is cleaned and separated from the seed by the snapping of a bow made of bamboo and strung with the gut of an animal; it is carded with a fish-bone; twisted by the use of a stone distaff and the human finger; the ends of the warp are fastened in a simple loom made of reeds, while the weaver, seated upon the margin of a hole dug in the ground, works only during the damp hours of the morning and of the evening. That is the true picture of a real textile manufacturer. All our modern textile machinery is but an evolution from or modification of these prehistoric types. On not one of our seemingly perfect modern machines can the work be equalled of those who have inherited this art, and whose lissome fingers bear evidence of many centuries of training.

We have received from Colonel Ingersoll a printed circular, stating that he has been charged with giving a lecture on Temperance, in which he "used the language of another and pretended it was original." In denial of this charge, he states that a temperance lecturer appropriated what he had said in "the Munn trial," and an extract from some other writer or lecturer, and published them as one piece; that somebody recognized the first part as his, and declared that he had stolen the whole; that he has repeatedly disclaimed all authorship of the part that is not his own, and that he will give a thousand dollars reward to any one who will show that the part he claims is not original, or that he ever pretended he wrote or uttered the spurious part. This charge against Colonel Ingersoll is entirely false and malicious. We distinctly remember that the portion of the "Temperance Speech" which he claims as original was published some years ago without the extract that has been subsequently added, and which is not in Ingersoll's style. It was hardly necessary that this brilliant orator and rhetorician should notice a charge like this, when all who have heard him, or have read his writings, know that his great strength and power are largely in his command of language.

MR. S. J. STEWART, of Bangor, Me., is one of the most virile as well as most radical of the Unitarian preachers. The Index recently printed a considerable portion of a discourse of his on the foundations of morality. The following extract on Amusements is from the same discourse:—

In the sphere of morals, all restraint, except of crime, is founded in a meddlesome, tyrannous spirit, that causes more immorality than the natural desires men attempt to control. Unnecessary prohibitions always create hypocrisy and excesses. Unnatural prescriptions tend to call attention to one vice, and overlook habits which make men more unhappy. The fanatic would like to regulate the food and drink and pleasures of other people, and overlooks his own immorality.

"Compound for sins he is inclined to By damning those he has no mind to."

Human nature will always assert itself, and nothing so tends to immorality as the attempt to force upon men conventional restraints that do not lie in reason. Shut up the child from a natural, healthful amusement at home, and he is likely to steal out of some back-door to gamble with dangerous companions. Allow the girl no freedom of choice, and she becomes deceitful, and is more likely to fall into secret temptations. The Church has long condemned the theatre, indiscriminately. All the time many of her ministers have visited it in secret when away from home. Now, the real immorality is in the secrecy, and not necessarily in the theatre. The real harm has come from not drawing rational distinctions between the pure and the impure. To live without amusement in our intense life is impossible: to try to do so is dangerous. The boy who is forbidden to see a Barrett or a Jefferson sneaks in at some low show that is really dangerous to his morals. Everybody loves the drama, and a certain amount of excitement. In lieu of that which is legitimate, the church people find the dramatic in a church quarrel, and let off the nervous extra force in some gossip at a neighbor's. Men and women will not live in straight jackets. A true moralist, therefore, does not attempt to damn up the fountain of life, lest there should be some dangerous overflow, but only seeks to use the intellect in finding out the proper channel and guiding the passions and impulses through it.

We have made the following additional clippings from Canada papers with regard to the confiscation of the works of Voltaire and Paine at the Toronto Custom House. The Montreal Spectator says:—

The question naturally arises, Why were these books singled out of all that are equally objectionable for this action on the part of an individual? and the answer as naturally is, that they are antichristian in their tendencies. If this answer is correct, and it is to be feared it is, then these quasi defenders of Christianity, in invoking the strong arm of the law, abandon, so far at least as they are concerned, the unsailable position in which Christianity had hitherto been intrenched in the minds and consciences of her adherents.

The Huron Expositor observes:—

We do not know anything about the Pocket Theology, but we do not think the law is calculated to interfere with works such as The Age of Reason. This work is certainly not immoral in the ordinary acceptance of the term. . . . In excluding works of this kind, it seems to us that the government are attempting to exercise a censorship over the judgments of the press which they have no right to do, and which the law does not justify.

The following is from the Paisley (Ontario) Advocate:—

It is a fact patent to careful observers that there is a growing tendency among the young people to acquire possession of and read immoral literature, such as the works of Tom Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll, and other freethinkers. The recent action of the custom-house officer at Toronto in seizing a number of this class of books will certainly do not a little toward still further engendering this unhappy inclination. People who never heard of these books before have their attention called to them by hearing that an embargo has been put upon them.

The Monetary Times says:—

It appears that the collector of the port of Toronto has taken upon himself to confiscate certain books, on the ground that they are indecent or blasphemous; and that the new Index contains a work of Voltaire and another of Tom Paine. Even at Rome, no such abuse of power would be allowed. There a book can be condemned only after a thorough investigation by several independent authorities, and after a formal defence has been put in by counsel officially provided by the Church. If collectors of customs, who have for the most part no literary aptitude, are allowed to become inquisitors, public liberty would be held by a very slender thread. The government is entirely incompetent to say that a particular opinion on a religious subject should not be tolerated. . . . The Toronto collector is said to have exceeded his instructions; and we can well conceive that no government in this country would condemn a work of Voltaire, which is in every considerable library, to the flames.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

THERE is no eloquence like the eloquence of example. A man does well when he talks with words; but he is irresistibly convincing when he talks with the deeds of an honest life.—Unknown.

Good taste rejects excessive nicety: it treats little things as little things, and is not hurt by them.—Fénelon.

Most people are too exclusively individual for conversing. It costs too great expenditure of magnetism to dissolve them. Who cannot leave himself out of his discourse, but embarrasses all who take part in it. Egotists cannot converse, they talk to themselves only.—A. B. Alcott.

THE moral sentiment is alone important. There is no labor or sacrifice to which it will not bring a man, and which it will not make easy. Under the action of this sentiment of the right, his heart and mind expand above himself and above nature.—Emerson.

THERE is no counting with certainty on the justice of men who are capable of fashioning and worshipping an unjust Divinity, nor on their humanity so long as they incorporate inhuman motives in their most sacred dogma, nor on their reasonableness while they rigorously decline to accept reason as a test of truth.—John Morley.

UNRECOGNIZED.

BY HELEN T. CLARK.

Dusk, tangled roots that rear
Crests of white lilies, do your fibres rear,
And thrill, when mortal lips that pureness praise
Which ye from slime upraise?

Is there a beating heart,
Tumultuous, hidden in that writhed part,
Singing for joy, " 'Tis ours, this birth of bloom!
We filtered its perfume.

"We swept its leaves with light.
We shot swift currents upward, through the night,
From chemic batteries; wrought dull ooze and death
To life of richest breath!

"And though ye heed us not,
Who bend above our lily's whiteness (caught
By its consummate fairness to forego
Its dark root-meanings), yet we know,—we know!"

So sweetness, light, and power
From fate's alembic leap, in some crowned hour,
Whose veiled beginnings, in their low, poor places,
No human vision traces.

The Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 1, 1881.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

KAMI NO MICHU,

OR

"THE WAY OF THE GODS."

BY MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL.

(Concluded from last week.)

Any one entering a joss-house in San Francisco, with a preconceived notion of the simplicity of that faith which Confucius transmitted, would find himself a good deal puzzled. There is no one to explain to him, not only the corruptions of that "ancient faith," but the far more perplexing fact that, in its zeal for organization, the head of that worship, the Emperor of the "Celestials," has actually given a State position to the impish Tao-ists! When we find close beside the primitive symbol of Ti, the one absolute God, two others, pronounced shi and shan, referring to "spirits in general," we see how early polytheistic superstition must have made its way into the popular mind.

In spite of Professor Tiele's positive assertion, Dr. Legge refuses to recognize pure animism, or a preponderating fetishism in the State religion. He finds in it a true piety, for which it is evident he is liberal enough to feel a sincere respect. At 2200 B.C., he finds the Emperor Shun worshipping every fifth year in the "Four Quarters of the Country," in a fashion which again reminds us of Chaldea. This Dr. Legge asserts to have been a pure worship of the one God, officially proclaimed throughout the land, and attended by a sacrificial recognition of inferior powers erroneously supposed to be the instruments of the divine government. All the people were expected to recognize this one God; but only the Ruler of the State gave it a voice. All the people as well as the Emperor believed in and practised ancestral worship, the head of each family officiating.

In houses and temples, those familiar with Chinese customs will recall certain white tablets about the shape of an ordinary tombstone, but of various sizes. Upon these is written the character "san-chu," which means the "seat of the soul," and perhaps the name and age of the departed. This is set up before the worshipper in the "ancestral" service, and fixes his attention as the abode of the spirit. The first prayer invokes the presence of the departed soul, the last "escorts it on its departure." When the worship is over, this bit of wood is no more sacred than any other. Such tablets were carried to the field of battle in ancient times, as the ark of the Israelites was "brought into camp." During the reign of Chan, a living descendant of the same name as the departed soul took the place of the tablet, and professed to be the vehicle of the departed spirit. This change probably originated in a truly spiritual sense of the thing desired; but it came as a fashion does, and passed away in the same manner.

Those of us who have had the great privilege of praying with Theodore Parker, and remember how he bowed before the "Great Father and Mother of us all," not knowing in what other way to express his sense of the divine tenderness, cannot fail to be interested in the fact that this same transcendental ruler of the Chan dynasty called God the Father and Mother of all creatures, as the Emperor was the father and mother of his people!

The Emperor, worshipping for his race, made his sacrifices at the period of both summer and winter solstice. These were neither propitiatory nor vicarious, but simple tributes of love and duty, and also, as it seems to the present writer, periodic expressions of gratitude for the creation of the world, addressed to the Being who had redeemed it from "confusion" or chaos. This we deduce from the prayers of the ritual. They were attended by music and dancing. The bull was a prominent object of interest at such seasons, as he was in Central Asia.

Seven hundred years before Christ, a court poet wrote:—

"In autumn comes the autumnal rite,
With bulls whose horns in summer bright
Were cropped with care: one of them white.
And see, they place the goblet full,
In figure fashioned as a bull."

From the first, the Chinese held to the goodness of human nature; and Dr. Legge admits that Mencius anticipated the great statements of Butler's Analogy. Two hundred years before Moses was born, T'ang ascended the throne, and proclaimed the essential goodness of human nature. That the Chinese believed in immortality, he of course claims; and the claim ought to abash those who insist that the Hebrews did not. Confucius, however, did not encourage precise views on a subject he did not himself understand.

"Of that day and that hour knoweth no one, not even the Son of Man."

Dr. Legge asserts very emphatically that the Emperor cannot be called a "high priest," since there were no priests in China. It does not seem to have occurred to him that the first Ruler, if himself a priest, might have wished to abolish the priesthood as a caste, and yet, by the exercise of his own priestly functions, have furnished an historic precedent for the Emperor.

Certainly, this is what Moses attempted; and perhaps, if Moses had forbidden worship to the people, he might have succeeded, but he said instead, "Every one of you shall be a priest unto the Lord," and the next moment found them worshipping the "golden calf," a relic probably of Akkad solstitial ceremonies.

With all its openness to deterioration, the popular ancestral worship could never be responsible for all that is to be found in California. It could not explain the heroic deities, the propitiation of the Evil One, the "Mother of Mercy," or the sale and use of amulets and paper charms. Neither would Buddhism, pure and simple.

It is necessary, therefore, to look to Taoism for some exposition of worship in the concrete. Taoism is, as we know, the name of a very transcendental system of philosophy, to which the vagarious meditations of Laotze gave birth. It is as mystic as Kant or Concord could desire. Of this, we need say very little; for the sources of information are open enough. But it is also the name of a very low order of worship, a polytheistic religion, of which this same very much misunderstood philosopher is the chief God under the name of Prince Lao. This is sustained by a system of magic and incantation, in which the worship of evil forces and a belief in transmigration combines with the terrorism of purgatory and hell.

This last is painted on the walls of an apartment attached to the temples, well known to foreigners, and called by them the "Chamber of Horrors."

How this should exist is hard enough to comprehend; and it is made still harder by the fact that it wears a part of the external livery of Buddhism, and has been recognized as a State religion as well as that transmitted by Confucius.

The authority of this form of worship is vested in the family of Chang. It is not strange that the families of Chang and Kung should sound very much alike to the common reader. Dr. Legge does not seem himself to understand how this system of magic could have arisen from a superspiritual philosophy; but it seems to me a very simple thing. Such a philosophy proclaimed to wholly ignorant people, to whom it is by nature unintelligible, naturally degenerates into pure mysticism of the sensuous sort. What can a Chinese coolie make of a philosopher who wants him "To taste without knowing the flavor"?

What can he think of a leader who says:—

"The common people are full of discrimination, I alone have none"? or who tells him that he does not know the name of the mother of all things, but will call her the "Way"?

It is a common saying that, "whatever disorder afflicts the State, the Changs and the Kungs have no occasion to be disturbed."

The Kungs are the descendants of Confucius. The Changs are not descendants of Prince Leo, but the popish heads of the degraded faith erected upon his philosophical system.

The Chang pope has held large tracts of land near Lung-hu, which were granted as a permanent endowment ever since the year 1015. A great deal of superstition was mingled with the teachings of Liehtsze, a prominent disciple of Laotze three hundred years before our era; but they assumed no organized shape for two or three centuries after it.

On entering the Pine Street joss-house in San Francisco, the traveller finds three seated images on as many thrones, which instantly remind him of Buddha. The attendant will tell him that the central and principal figure is "all same as his Jesus."

These three figures are the "Three Holy Ones" of the Taoists.

The central figure, already alluded to, is that of Prince Lao himself; and here it is perhaps worth while to say that Laotze means simply the "old," the "venerable," and that no one seems to know the family name of the "Prince."

The next is Hu Hwang, a magician of the Chang family, who takes charge of all earthly affairs. And the third is Chaos, or Confusion. Is it at all strange that he should be worshipped in this category? For ourselves, we think it was to guard against precisely such an abuse of allegiance to himself that first Moses and then Jesus was content to die in solitude, and hide the place of his sepulchre from the eyes of his followers.

Confucius saw the whole thing coming, and said, like Saint Paul,— "Respect the spirits, and keep aloof from them."

He could not foresee how the increasing power of the Buddhists would give shape to a loose bundle of ignorant delusions.

Although there may be no priests in China, the Chang family dominate over the Taoists, and, wearing some sort of a wooden fixture in their back hair, are called by Dr. Legge "Yellow Tops."

Every one of this family is a magician; and it was one of them who came to the assistance of the Emperor, and filled the stage with masks and half-invisible creatures in the play which I saw at the "Gold Cinnamon Garden." The presence of their deputies can alone account for the sale of amulets and charms in San Francisco. The dread of spirits is both the Chinaman's nightmare and his waking horror. By pandering to this fear, the "Yellow Tops" maintain their sway. They teach a belief in three "souls," as if the fear of one were not enough! One of these clings to the corpse, another resides in the tablet, and another passes into "purgatory" or "hell."

Sins of all kinds shorten life, in periods from a hundred days to twelve years. The sinner buys back his life by virtuous actions. If he is content to be an "Immortal on Earth," three hundred will suffice; but if he will become an "Immortal of Heaven," it must be thirteen hundred. Unexpiated, the consequence of crime devolves upon posterity. An account of the "Purgatory" may be found in Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio, published in London this year by Herbert A. Giles. The purgatory involves transmi-gration; and in it bones are beaten, bodies scorched, eyes are stung, and flesh scalded, or tongues pulled out. The whole list of horrors has an ancient Persian semblance. If by repentance and five virtuous acts a soul earns a reward, it may choose its own vehicle of transmigration. If it be a woman, she may even be born as a man! Is there not some innocent crime one might commit to escape that?

The mystical words of Laotze, as Dr. Legge suggests, conducted this forlorn people to the brink of a great prospect, but they looked down upon a sea of mist.

We think Julien was quite right when he wrote of the philosophic Tao, Il est un être confus. It was never of infinite promise, like the Hebrew or Christian Incarnation, but sadly limited by the weakness and dim-sightedness of its prophet. For, after all, we must judge of the real power of an idea after it has crystallized into the concrete.

The deity commonly found in the California joss-houses is called by the attendants Kar Qvon or Kwan; but none of the educated Chinese know about him. Kwang Kuang, the God of War, is evidently quite another person. Offerings of food on wooden trays are made at funerals and occasionally in the temples. What the Japs call gohai, or slender rods fringed with white paper, intended to attract the rays of the Sun God, are also there, but it is impossible to ascertain for what reason.

The god is supposed to be in the temple, as the spirit is in the tablet; but the worshipper claps his hands to attract his attention! The worshipper comes alone, and there is no attendant visible. He buys there long, red paper tubes, filled with the sweet dust of the sandal-wood, which he burns before the images. The dog Fo is everywhere;—made of straw if the devotee has been praying for rain. At the funerals, the living and the dead are supposed to eat together, although the visible remnants are afterward sold for the use of spirits in the flesh. The tablets in the joss-houses are probably fetiches, as a lamp is kept burning before each, as long as the worshipper will pay for it.

Gilded papers are scattered from the windows of the funeral coaches to buy back the soul from the devil.

In Japan, the number of household gods is almost infinite, and in every house there is a "god-shelf,"—we should probably say "altar," if we had classical associations with the worship. Something like this is to be found in the Chinese homes of the West coast, especially where there are no joss-houses. On the "shelf" are a small temple, a tablet, and the household gods, with oblations of food or flowers, and at night a burning lamp.

The Chinese in California show a great dread of death. They do not like to be in a house where death occurs. If they foresee it, they will leave the best master. They expect it to be averted by charms and prayers, and will entreat their employers to have recourse to these when the physician fails.

It is not likely that at any time in the world's history the most civilized races have shown a popular interest in the common arts and customs of Greece and Rome, which will compare with the modern interest in Oriental bric-à-brac. Very little of this is intelligent, but it is almost universal; and it would seem desirable that we should know as much of the gods and temples of the Eastern people as we do of their lacquer and their porcelain. To that end have these pages been written.

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

The Church Universal of a Divine Humanity.

The foundation thought of the religion of the future is that all life originated in Deity, or the eternal, verifying, energizing spirit which pervades all nature, which transcends all nature, and in which "we live and move and have our being"; that this life has slowly differentiated itself from a homogeneous state, in which all things consist, into a constantly increasing heterogeneous state.

But, while differentiating itself into greater heterogeneity, it is also constantly tending to an increasing homogeneity; for segregation and aggregation are the obverse and reverse properties of life as it evolves into greater complexity and perfectness.

While the tendency of things is toward an ever-developing variety, that variety also contains the unfolding principle of unity.

Creative energy, or the soul of things, in which all force inheres, acts on matter, both from within and from without, continually advancing it from state to state, from condition to condition. It acts by the creative power which is in matter, coming into correspondence with the creative power which is external to matter in its visible form.

Just as the physical forces are correlated, "just as everything that we can ever know or hope to know in the whole inward as well as outward world, everything existing, from a star to a thought or from a flower to an affection, is connected with molecular changes"; just as mind and body are related, every thought, feeling, act of will, having their definite correspondence in the physical organism,—so is it with the mind, or soul, of the universe. A correlation of forces exists between the visible and invisible. Every thought and feeling of the soul of the universe vibrates through the mechanism of that universe, stimulating, developing, and sustaining all the parts thereof.

All progressive development being the result of the transformation of energy consequent upon the interaction of divinely creative and divinely created forces, they are so related, so conjoined,—the spiritual and material, the infinite and the finite,—that, although different terms are employed to give expression to the thought, they are in their nature and essence one.

For the finite partakes of all the qualities of the infinite, and, through endless modifications and transformations incidental to development, is on its way to the stability, permanence, and equipoise of perfectness. Man is derived from Deity as truly and literally as the child is derived from its parents. The creative life, which differentiated itself through endless forms of existence, was derived from God, and through innumerable years, innumerable variations, has worked its way up to where it is to-day, self-conscious individualities.

Every human being, however low and degraded, being literally sons and daughters of God, bearing within themselves the latent forces of Divinity, and slowly evolving into all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. This is what it is to be "sons of God," "heirs to all the glories of the universe": it is to carry within yourselves the forces of Divinity which eternity cannot destroy, but only develop.

Man is divine because he originated in Deity, and has ascended or evolved through all the intermediate forms of life, until his ripening faculties are bringing him into unity with the All, with the Source and Centre of his being. Just as the quickened human germ passes with rapidity from condition to condition through all the characteristic types of the lower orders of life until the distinctively human stage is attained, so the primeval germ, quickened with divine energy, has through endless cycles of time passed through all the intermediate forms of life, until the human was attained.

While, in one sense of the word, man is a finite being, in another and larger sense, he is truly infinite; searching from eternity to eternity, with all the possibilities and glory that belong to infinite powers and forces.

Being from the infinite One, he is a partaker of the nature and attributes of the Source from whence he sprung. Hence when the terms energy, force, or power of God are used, that energy, power, or force is of the same kind as that which characterizes the nature of man.

But, as man is still undisclosed and undeveloped, the potential energies of his being are also undisclosed and undeveloped; and as we can only predicate qualities of the Author of our being, as those qualities reveal themselves through our awakening perceptions, so God, or the Supreme Energy of all things, is, to a great extent, unknown and all unknowable.

Yet this divine nature is pledged to reveal itself; and in every age, in every land, in every condition of life, the divine manifestations have been commensurate with the advancing intellect of man.

Working up from and through all grades and parts of life, the life principle, which originated in Deity, discloses as it differentiates itself. In circling worlds and fiery planets, in growing grass and budding trees, in the shining lizard and the crawling serpent, in birds and insects, in all forms of mammalian life, upward this life principle makes its way, until it expands into the higher-life of a conscious intelligence.

Still onward and upward through the slow growth of the human, until the last great differentiation or divergence of kind takes place, and the human gives birth to Divinity.

The evolutionary process of life completes itself; and the hidden energy of the primal atom develops, through the slow cycles of almost endless years, into Divinity. From God to God is the grand orbital revolution of nature.

The great although partial truth of Pantheism, God in All, which the immortal thinker Spinoza gave to the world, is yet to expand and grow into a vast system of thought, around which other systems will revolve; the truth of the immanence of Deity in every form and particle of life, although the form still half-conceals as well as reveals the Divinity within; God in every form of thought, in every system, in every religion, that has ever existed or ever will exist upon the earth.

For even as life originated in Deity, or spiritual energy, so all life carries within itself the potential energy and power of its divine Creator, tending irresistibly, by the law of growth, to finally come into conscious correspondence with the unseen Author of its existence. The question that naturally presents itself is, If Nature has the potential powers and possibilities of Divinity within her, can those powers ultimate themselves into action, apart from the direct and constant interaction of creative energy? The answer is obvious and conclusive. She cannot, because cause and effect are so indissolubly connected that the existence and action of the one presupposes the existence and action of the other also; so closely connected that they are incapable of separation, and in their very innermost nature are one, the cause precipitating itself into its effects, and the effects ever tending to ultimate themselves into their cause.

God is the Supreme Cause of all that is, nature the outflowing effect; the effect containing the potential energies of Deity, and by those energies irresistibly attracting the inflowing power of creative life.

God and nature, the spiritual and the material, the invisible and the visible, earth and heaven, always must, always will, act conjointly.

Not by any arbitrary impulsion, not by any foreign force projected in or upon nature, but because the invisible spiritual cause, God and the visible material universe are always conjoined. From their action and interaction, life in all its multitudinous forms proceeds.

The result of all the evolutionary work of life is to bring man into conscious correspondence and unity of nature with Deity; to show that man is created in the image and likeness of God, although that likeness is still obscured by the long and tortuous route by which he has ascended into being. Yet that mode of ascension was necessary, in order to relate the very highest form of life—namely, divinity—with the lowest and most primitive. For the attainment of the divine life of God in man, universally, is the end of the great evolutionary work of existence; to bring the soul of man into unity with the Soul of Being, not to become absorbed and lose the identity of a conscious individuality, but to be one in essence, one in wisdom, one in love, with infinite love and wisdom, while the conscious individuality of each and every one grows and expands with augmenting being; homogeneous in nature, heterogeneous in forms of expression.

"Great are the symbols of being, but that which is symbolized is greater;
Vast the create and beheld, but vaster the inward creator.
Back of the sound broods the silence, back of the gift stands the giving, Back of the hand that receives thrills the sensitive nerves of receiving."

IMOGENE C. FALES.

REV. STOPFORD BROOKE, one of England's most talented liberal preachers, and author of an excellent biography of Rev. F. W. Robertson, is described by a correspondent of the Springfield Republican, who heard him preach recently in London, as "a well-built, robust-looking man, with a face of the Irish type; sandy hair, broad, high, retreating forehead, and fair complexion. It is a face betokening more imagination than reflection, more love of activity than of contemplation,—a rather disappointing face to those who have known him only by his writings."

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANOTHER WORD ABOUT CHURCH-KEEPING.

It is really a little bit funny to notice in what bondage of fear certain liberal people, who imagine they have outgrown all forms of slavery, are held by certain dreadful words,—how each liberal hair doth stand on end, if one chances to utter in the presence of the "emancipated" the words "church," "minister," or "religion."

If, as Spiritualists tell us, the noble red man delights to return from the happy hunting-grounds to take control of his pale-faced destroyer, how effectually some unregenerate brave might indulge his torturing propensity by taking possession of some individual and making it his mission in life to haunt liberals and afflict their souls with these words of dire import!

Just let some luckless person who is pressed for time make use of the word "church," when he ought to state that he only means an edifice-erected-for-the-purpose-of-promulgating-those-broad-and-progressive-ideas-which-will-emancipate-the-minds-of-men-from-the-slavish-superstitions-and-effete-religions-of-the-past,—and what was I about to say? Ah, yes: just let one forget and say "church," instead of all that, and straightway he is suspected of being still in the bonds of darkness, and somebody feels called upon to state that radicalism has no use for churches.

I imagine that most liberals believe that the understanding and practical application of their principles would benefit society, and tend largely to improve many of the hard conditions of life. Believing thus, they would doubtless be glad to bring about a larger acceptance of their views. And organization simply means the employment of that system and method which have been found beneficial and necessary in all educational, social, or business enterprises.

Religion has always been that which has claimed to answer the large questions of life, and to teach and direct men how to live. What other than this does rationalism mean? What else is rationalism than a religion evolved from all preceding religions? To be sure, it does not, like its progenitors, pretend to give complete and final answers; but it answers toward the immensities, and certainly does not hesitate to direct humanity concerning those things of which it knows. And, until the world becomes so wise and so well-governed that there is no sin nor sickness in it, there will be need of that kind of instruction and direction which rationalism has to offer.

Just here, some one will be sure to point out that mankind is being educated and directed by the schools and libraries, the museums and art galleries, and that the day of usefulness for churches and ministers is gone by. It is true that experience has demonstrated the wisdom of a division of labor and of study; but it has also shown the necessity for a wise supervision, and a recognition and preservation of harmonious relations between the various special activities and interests. So I believe there is abundant room and need for a science of the whole. There is need of a general superintendency of all the specialties, all the sub-divisions and the sub-interests of the great educational work of the world. And this is the mission of the rational church and minister,—to oversee, to report progress, to point out the beautiful relation of all the parts to each other and to each individual life, to interpret the meaning of passing events, to assist the men and women who are busy with another part of life's work to an understanding of the duty and need of the hour, to hold up ideals that shall quicken men's souls and stir noble impulses, and strengthen and sweeten their lives,—thus making itself a science of all sciences in the recognition of the unity of the universe.

Holding this conception of the office of rationalism, I utterly repudiate the notion that it is individualizing, disintegrating, and unsocial in tendency; and I deny that radical thought in theology is incompatible with a cohesive, organic life. I know that this theory is confronted by the fact of a decline in the church-going habit of liberals. I know that the path of rationalism is marked by the desolating, paralyzing habit of isolation, that men have become indifferent to church interests largely in proportion as they have outgrown their theological beliefs. But that this is the legitimate and inevitable result of radical freethought, I deny. It has come about because the rationalism which was presented ran along in certain lines, and ignored or failed to provide for certain other conditions requisite to life and growth.

Fourteen years ago, a few clear-thoughted men came out from Unitarianism, and pronounced the latest word of rationalism. They gave the word of command to go on in the search for the truths of existence. They said the adequate religion must be like life,—free to grow in all directions. And this great truth they said and said and sung,—excuse me, no: they did not sing it. Just there their rationalism halted; just there it got out of joint. The new religion necessitated a new order of things: it demanded and inaugurated an educational movement, yet made no provision for its continuance as such.

Rational Religion inherited no externals suitable for its use. It had no hymn-books, and no one was set to work to make them. Was it a comprehensive rationalism that failed to provide for the music side of its life? There were few competent teachers, accredited expounders of cultured freethought: yet no provision was made for schools of its own. Was it a far-sighted rationalism that failed in this direction? There was need, in short, of any and all the conveniences, all the helps that any other great educational or reformatory movement would need, and none of those things were attended to; but the new religion was expected to live and thrive without any dependence upon the common things of earth. And, because it did not, the philosophy of rationalism is reproached and taunted with being disintegrating and demoralizing, and cold and selfish; and it isn't true the least little bit. The present reproach was brought upon it by the laziness of its friends. If, ten years ago, the Free Religious Association had been a little more worldly-wise, and taken some thought for the morrow, in the way of propagating their views, in mapping out courses of study for the men and women whose busy lives give them no time to plan, only a little time to follow where others lead, and in otherwise looking after the physical basis of rationalism, who can doubt but that Free Religion, as an organized power, might be standing to-day, where by birthright it belongs, at the head of the intellectual, moral, and social life of America? As it is, Chautauqua, with its glorious educational methods, its scientific course, and its work to encourage "study at home," has passed on to the front. While Free Religion has been complacently hugging its scientific method, Chautauqua has put it into practice; and all this is quoted as proof of the destructive tendency of freethought, and the constructive power of the old theology. But such judgment is superficial. The whole difference lies in the fact that orthodoxy had the machinery and the tools to work with, and rationalism had not. Orthodoxy has not been reinforced to any large extent for the last ten years by fear of future punishment or an angry God. On the contrary, it has prospered and taken on new life and interest because of its absorption of rationalism, by keeping its old dogmas out of sight, and by carefully looking after its business affairs. Should orthodoxy attempt to depend upon its doctrines for which it claims such wholesome social power, it would soon discover its downward tendency.

Just here let me put in a denial of the statement that "there is a company of liberals in Kansas too poor to buy a song-book of their own, and so sing 'Rescue the Perishing,' from the Moody and Sankey book." It is not that liberals are too poor to buy song-books, but liberalism is too poor to publish such books and offer them for sale. The Index's merriment over the "trashiness of the Moody and Sankey literature" might abate somewhat, could it be brought to a realizing sense of the wholesome effect a little more of the "Rescue the Perishing" spirit would have upon Free Religion. A little more "Hold the Fort" determination, clothed in rational words and set to ringing, soul-stirring music, would go far toward arousing the world to a knowledge of its mistake with regard to the inherent coldness of Free Religion.

Supposing I should tell that there is a company of liberals in Florence, Mass., who meet for purposes of mutual improvement, and sing the "Gloria in Excelsis," would The Index advise that society to make the acquaintance of some truly liberal works? My own astonished radical ears heard the Cosmian Hall choir sing "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost" as heartily as ever those Kansas people sang "Rescue the Perishing." Now supposing that these societies wished to act on The Index's advice, and were to send to No. 3 Tremont Place for a truly liberal song-book, I imagine The Index would lift its serenely intellectual eyebrows, and wonder what those Cosmian people meant by insinuating that they dealt in such commonplace things as song-books.

When Messrs. Gannett, Blake, and Hosmer issued their Unity Hymns and Chorals, I noticed in The Index some good words for it, along with some very just criticism of its excessive Theism. But I've been looking ever since for a "truly liberal hymn-book," published by the Free Religious Association,—a book that would give us words and music thrilling us and filling us with a yearning tenderness and a desire to rescue the ignorant, helpless, diseased, and perishing ones; a book that would give us something as grand as the "Gloria in Excelsis"; a book without over-much bold mention of the great name, yet all full of loving reverence and aspiration toward the Great Soul of the Universe.

When will your book be out?

Yours very truly,

ANNIE L. DIGGS.

[We are not aware that The Index made merry over the hard condition of the Kansas Liberal Society that, for some reason or other, had to sing the Moody and Sankey hymns, but rather that it rebuked one of its Orthodox exchanges for unseemly glorification over the fact. We entirely sympathize with our sprightly correspondent's desire for a better liberal hymn book than any now in existence. But we want it so good when it does come that we are content not to have it come too hastily. Poets and hymns are not made to order.—Ed.]

FREETHOUGHT IN CANADA.

TORONTO, NOV. 18, 1881.

Well knowing the interest you feel in the advance of intellectual liberty in all parts of this wide world, I wish to furnish a few jottings from this stronghold of ecclesiastical power, Toronto. The book seizure by our collector of customs is so well known all over this continent that the matter scarcely demands a notice, further than the fact that our over-zealous official has not been backed up by a general government order to seize the same works at other ports of entry. Consequently, Canada is being flooded by the works of Paine and Voltaire. People are reading them who never would have thought of doing so, had not our sapient collector so well advertised them. Our Secular Society is so much improved in size, quality, and influence that Mr. Underwood would hardly recognize it as the same institution to which his presence in Toronto gave the start some six or seven years since. An excellent staff of lecturers, readers, etc., has been provided by our efficient president, Mr. Alfred Piddington and the committee of management; and this, resting upon funds that are found ample and well guaranteed, gives promise of a success its warmest friends could hardly have hoped for. In an important law case in one of our courts, the evidence tendered by Mr. R. J. Belford, of this city, was refused (with expressions of regret by the judge) on the ground of inadmissibility. Mr. Belford was sworn to give evidence of his religious belief for the purpose of discrediting his testimony. Here, at all events, we can truly say the old slimy snake of intolerance and persecution is not killed, although it is being badly scotched. We have here an association of parsons, priests, and curates (the "Ministerial Association"), who are trying to stop Sunday trains, close barber-shops, and stop other business on Sunday. Their meddling interference with social liberty is effecting its own cure, as people kept at home must do something. They are shortly to be supplied with a Sunday newspaper.

Nov. 24, 1881.

There has been another seizure of the works of Paine and Voltaire; while those of Ingersoll, contained in the same parcel, have been released. Mr. P. C. Allen, a Toronto publisher, had the Age of Reason, Pocket Theology, Crises, and Volney's Ruins, together with several copies of Ingersoll's lectures, seized. It is stated that all were retained but the lectures.

We had a very large audience at the secular meeting in Albert Hall last Sunday night. There were eighty ladies present. This augurs well for freethought in Toronto, considering that women exert an immense influence in favor of the churches. The presence of so many women at this meeting seems to indicate increasing liberal thought among the fair sex.

Mr. W. B. Cooke is still fighting the battle of the first book seizure, but does not appear to have been very successful so far. This second seizure may give a new impulse to the battle; and our Collector may find he has embarked in a campaign that will engage all the forces at his command and end in defeat. The Government is alienating many friends by persisting in this censorship.

Many here would like to see an opinion expressed by yourself as to the position of Mr. Frothingham. One of our Toronto papers comes out with an article congratulating the Orthodox on the fact of Mr. Frothingham's "new anti-materialism." I am sure an article by you on this matter would be greatly welcomed in Toronto at the present time.

Truly yours,

J. ICK EVANS.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE REPUBLIC OF GOD. An Institute of Theology. By Elisha Mulford, LL.D. Fourth edition. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Mr. Mulford's Nation was a book that appealed powerfully to a limited class of men for whom speculative politics have great attraction. It established his right to be heard on any subject that he might choose to handle. And the fact that his new book has already reached a fourth edition is proof sufficient that this right has been accorded to him freely.

The Republic of God is a remarkable book. It is written with an enthusiasm that will carry many along with it, and will make others tenderly respectful, even while dissenting from the argument and still more from the conclusion to which it finally comes. This is the Nicene Creed as revised at Constantinople in the year 381. Mr. Mulford's principle thesis is that Christianity is not a religion, but a revelation. The New Testament is the record of this revelation, not itself a revelation. In the course of his argument, he traverses many of the lines of orthodox belief. Sentences abound that would be heartily approved by the most thorough-going rationalists of the time. But the book is characterized throughout by a certain remoteness from all practical considerations. No attempt is made to square it with the conclusions of critical scholarship. When all is done, one has a feeling very much like that which little Wilhelmine had about the battle of Blenheim. The book leaves no distinct impression. "It is impossible," the Spanish proverb says, "to take soft cheese on a hook."

But the book is not without significance. It is one more proof of the break of modern intelligence with the hard literalism of the supernatural theory of Christianity, as commonly held. Such books emancipate from the ancient formulas, but men do not rest on them for any length of time. "Fine days for theology!" wrote Strauss of the time when Orthodoxy was translated by Hegel into the terms of his philosophy. Everybody knows how miserable was the collapse. Let those who imagine that Mr. Mulford has made out a philosophical justification of the Nicene Creed be warned by that experience. He has only furnished another brilliant example of "that delirious joy by which a certain class of minds, with a marked tendency to introspective and self-centred thought, find themselves overtaken when they have suddenly and accidentally come upon what they suppose to be the solution of a much-mooted question."

JESUS OF NAZARETH. By T. B. Forbush, Minister First Unitarian Church, Detroit. Sent postpaid by the author for 50 cents.

This pamphlet of eighty-four pages contains the substance of eight lectures delivered in Detroit, Michigan, last winter. They are strong, earnest, manly, thoroughly radical, and yet reverent and rationally conservative. They are less scholarly than Mr. Chadwick's lectures on the same subject, but they deal much more in developing the moral and spiritual elements which entered into the life and teachings of Jesus. The line of thought followed, and the general method of its development, is much the same that Mr. Chadwick has pursued. The following are the chapter headings: The Real Jesus and the Ideal Christ; What we know about Jesus; The Story of Jesus; The Legend of the Resurrection; The Hebrew Messiah; Wonderful Works; The Manliness of Jesus. In the first lecture there is given an idea of the several standpoints from which Jesus is viewed in the New Testament. It is shown that these are simply ideal conceptions, and it is claimed that any attempt to sketch the life of Jesus must result in an ideal portrait. Mr.

Forbush says: "We can only retouch and make vivid the blurred and indistinct outline of the ancient time. But our ideal need not, therefore, be less true than that of the fathers. We have all the materials which they have preserved. We have clearer historic judgment to sift those materials. We have a loftier idea of God, a larger view of the universe and of the relation of this world thereto, a truer appreciation of humanity, and a better knowledge of the real method of Providence in the education of mankind. We have the experience of eighteen centuries to show us what were the vital truths of Jesus' teaching, and what were the grand qualities which raised his humanity so high that it caught the glow of divinity. We can form a more correct idea of Jesus' life to-day, one more in harmony with the infinite method of human development and inspiration, than was possible to his contemporaries, with their minds preoccupied with Messianic dreams and visions of a redeemed Jerusalem with all nations flocking thereto." While Mr. Forbush attempts to give a historic picture of Jesus and his times,—and he has performed his task in a very successful manner,—yet he maintains that the ideal Jesus which appears as an addition to whatever of historic fact we can find is the only true one. He says that "to-day the ideal Christ is the true Christ. It is the ideal which the world looks to and loves. In him, humanity incarnates its own highest aspirations. It ascribes to him the divinity which it feels struggling within. And, of all the ideals, the simplest, the grandest, the most human, is the truest. The vision of the son of man now possible, vision springing from our larger thought of God, our wider experience of life, our deeper faith in humanity, is the best insight the world has ever had into the soul of him who for so many centuries has been its spiritual leader." These extracts from the first lecture show the stand-point of this pamphlet. The succeeding lectures give a very good account of the sources of information, the life and teachings, and discuss from a very radical outlook the Messiahship and the reputed miracles. Always reverent, never flippant, there is a strong, honest dealing with the main problems of the subject. In the last lecture, the manly character of Jesus is discussed in an excellent spirit, and with a tone of true sincerity and justice. It is a fine presentation of those manly qualities of a moral and spiritual life which have given Jesus his enduring hold on the ages.

The Art Amateur for November is especially interesting; and some of its designs are pleasing, and may be very useful to those engaged in ornamental work. The first article, "A Suggestive Exhibition of Designs," gives a full description of the designs for wall-paper brought out by the liberal offer of prizes by Messrs. Warren, Fuller & Co. Paper hangings constitute a very important manufacture, and there is nothing in which good design is more necessary; for our walls are not covered for a day, but for years. The results of the art education of the last ten years are plainly seen in the best paper hangings of to-day. It is very pleasant that Mrs. T. M. Wheeler, who has opened a new and most appropriate sphere of work for women by her establishment for household decoration in New York, won the first prize of $1,000, and her daughter, Miss Dora Wheeler, the fourth, of $200. Good workmanship united to good design will give success in all departments of household decoration.

The Popular Science Monthly for December offers to its readers a rich, varied, and interesting table of contents. Among its attractions, we note "The Rise and Progress of Palæontology," by T. H. Huxley; part second of "A Half Century of Science," by Lubbock; "North America in the Ice Period," from the pen of Professor Hitchcock; "Catholicism, Protestantism, and Suicide," an extract from the advance sheets of Dr. Henry Morselli's new work on suicide; an article by Dr. William B. Carpenter on "Disease-Germs"; and an article likely to provoke discussion on "Equality and Inequality in Sex," by G. Delauney. The other articles are readable and of interest.

In the December number of the Atlantic Monthly, "Dr. Breen's Practice" by Howells, and Henry James' "Portrait of a Lady," are finished,—a little abruptly, story-readers in general will be apt to fancy. An article by James W. Clarke on "British State Assassins and the Defence of Insanity" will be read with much interest, in view of the Guiteau trial. Kate Gannett Wells has an article on "Caste in American Society." Harriet W. Preston contributes a charming bit of travel, entitled "At Canterbury." The other articles are all readable, and the book reviews are exceptionally good.

SENATOR EDMUNDS is preparing a magazine paper on the political aspect of Mormonism.

JULIAN HAWTHORNE, the novelist, will, it is said, soon take up his residence in this country.

It is stated that new data have been discovered for the history of the life of Shelley, the poet.

ROSCOE CONKLING has taken a law office at the corner of Nassau and Cedar Streets, New York.

BANCROFT, the historian, who lives at Newport, R.I., celebrated his eighty-first birthday recently.

MR. CHOATE was once described by an old farmer as looking like a mixture of jaundice and jurisprudence.

BEECHER has come out in favor of taxing church-property, and against deadheading well-paid ministers.

The Wandering Genoese is the title applied to Gambetta by the Paris Figaro, on account of his frequent journeyings.

CHARLES READE will republish his novels with illustrations early next year, at which time the copyrights revert to him.

STATE ENGINEER HORATIO SKYMOUR, JR., has been offered and has accepted charge of some extensive landed interest in Michigan.

NO GRAVE at Highgate, it is stated, is more frequently asked for and more visited from all parts of the world than that of George Eliot.

A BRILLIANT fête was recently given at Berlin, in honor of Professor Virchow. A thousand persons of the élite of the medical and scientific world were present.

A WRITER in the Nation says that Kant, who died a bachelor, "was twice on the point of proposing, but both times failed to come to a decision until it was too late."

FRED. DOUGLASS is reported to be worth $100,000, with an official salary of $7,000 per year,—a romantic and pleasant sequel to the life of a once oppressed and indigent slave.

AN effort is being made among the friends and admirers of Theodore Parker to raise funds sufficient, with the bequest of the late Nathaniel C. Nash, to erect a statue to the great reformer.

THE discourse delivered by J. Vila Blake, at the Parker Memorial, last Sunday, on the subject, "It's a Queer World," was a brilliant effort, and it was listened to with profound interest by a most appreciative audience.

THE Sunday Herald, alluding to Mr. Frothingham, says, "We beg the excellent ministers who hope to make capital out of him to leave him alone just a little while, at least until he expresses some desire to be converted to their religious opinions."

It is said that Hon. A. H. Stephens, notwithstanding long-continued bodily frailty, has, during the summer and autumn, given fourteen hours a day to literary work; and he has now returned to Washington to resume his seat in the House of Representatives.

HON. EDWARD ATKINSON, referring to "self-made men," says, "I never use that term without recalling the funny outburst of my late friend, Dr. Francis Lieber, when I used it in his presence. Self-made, men, indeed!" said he: 'why don't you tell me of a self-laid egg!'"

HUDSON TUTTLE, referring to the discussion between Mr. Garfield and Mr. Denton which occurred twenty-three or twenty-four years ago, says, "Mr. Denton said that Mr. Garfield was the most honorable disputant he had ever met, and when he lectured a few years since in Washington Mr. Garfield attended."

REFERRING to Guiteau, the New York Tribune says: "The life of this wretched outcast may not be worth the baying of the meanest cur in the streets of the capital; but American reputation for justice, fair play, and judicial decency would be sullied if he were to be foully dealt with in advance of the verdict."

GUTEAU says: "I don't swear. I abhor profanity and vulgarity. I have only association with high-toned people,—Christians and politicians of high moral principles. Whenever you see an oath coupled with any expression purporting to come from me, you can put the expression down as a manufactured falsehood."

GARIBALDI wrote to the recent Peace Congress held in Geneva: "Evil is more powerful than good, and it is only devoted men like you who do not lose courage. Despotism and falsehood are stronger than ever, united by fear and voracity. And the people? They stand ready to applaud with enthusiasm! Forgive me this moment of pessimism. With my soul, I shall be ever with you, and your devoted."

MRS. CLARA NEYMANN informs us that she has lectures on "The Spirit of Republicanism" and on "Thoughts in regard to Government," which she would be pleased to deliver in New York, Boston, and vicinity. Mrs. Neymann is an independent, courageous thinker, and we would be pleased to see her have all the work she can do in the lecture field. Her address is 94 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE Boston Evening Transcript wisely says that, "whatever may be the verdict of the jury, nothing but national shame of a deeper tinge than that inflicted by the assassination itself could come from any exhibition at the trial of anything like Russian absolutism or Spanish cruelty deliberately practised by the officers of the law even toward this meanest and most hated and most detestable of culprits."

A CORRESPONDENT, commenting on the eulogy of Oakes Ames by a clergyman who at North Easton spoke of him as "the last of the Puritans," says, "It is hard to compare a man who sacrificed position and comfort for liberty and conscience' sake with one who strove to corrupt the national legislature, and died full of riches; but usually we state the difference by calling one of them a hero and the other—something else."

CAPTAIN PAUL BOXTON, the rubber-suit merman and hero of so many wonderful aquatic exploits, recently finished a water trip of about twenty-five hundred miles down the Yellowstone and Missouri Rivers as far as Omaha. It took him forty-seven days to accomplish the journey; and he reports it as one of the most difficult he has ever undertaken, from the wildness of the regions through which he passed. He intends to paddle his own peculiar "canoe" from Omaha to the mouth of the Missouri.

MISCELLANEOUS.

RELIGIOUS PROCLAMATIONS. — Religious proclamations, by the governors of the States, for thanksgiving at the close of the harvest season, have been issued from the colonial period, and during the last twenty years national proclamations have also been issued. The observance of some kind of harvest festival seems to satisfy an instinct of the religious nature, which is nearly as universal as religion or paganism. The ancient pagan festival of Ceres, held among the Greeks and Romans during nine days of September and October, converted the harvest worship into an institution so elaborate and important that the simpler mode of its celebration among Christians amounts at the best much more nearly to a breach than an observance. So far as the observance of the form results in pleasing family reunions and other social benefits of the holiday, we would be reluctant to discourage it. These are secular blessings, and their enjoyment in no way connects the State with religious questions. The sectarian character of the present mode of proclamation is shown by the fact, that, should the President happen at some time to recommend a return to the ancient rites of Ceres, or should he adapt his proclamation to the Jewish faith by recommending religious persons to meet in public prayer for the coming of a Messiah, or to the Spiritualist faith by recommending that all men meet in circles and await the manifestations of their spirit guides, or to the agnostic faith by calling upon all men to meet and publicly avow their ignorance as to whether there is a God or not, or to the Darwinian faith by recommending that men meet and celebrate the fact that during the past year all their wants have been met by an evolution of the latent potency of matter in a degree to adapt the organism to its environment, —in either of these cases, the inappropriateness of imparting a religious bias to the national proclamation of a secular government would be evident. Such inappropriateness will always be less evident to those to whose mode of faith the proclamation conforms than to those whose religious scruples it solemnly insults. But the accident of bias in no way affects the official impertinence of the act.—Address of the Provisional Secular Association.

BISHOP FITZGERALD, of Ross, in acknowledging an invitation to the Parnell Banquet in Cork, pays the following tribute to the Land Bill: "I would respectfully put before the committee the usefulness of giving the Land Act a full and fair trial. A measure that contains so many large and welcome principles, even though so many other provisions that we could have looked for are absent, is deserving of being tested in the spirit of thorough frankness, before that it be discredited or condemned. If, after such full and fair trial, it should, however, prove to be disappointing and inadequate, the popular power that achieved so much in 1881 would find it easy to add to its list of victories at another and a future date." That seems common-sense. It is clear that the people can obtain what they want by lawful agitation, more surely even, if slowly, than by secret plot or disastrous revolt.

A CHURCH is never reformed from within. Savonarola tried after a reform, and was put to death. Luther tried, and had to dissent. Our Presbyterian forefathers tried, and were forced into dissent. The Wesleys tried, and were forced into dissent. An established church never can reform itself. The reform must come first by the more enlightened persons quitting, and then by their action on men's minds from without.—Samuel Sharpe.

CHRISTMAS SERVICE.

A Christmas Service for the Church and Sunday-school together, or for either alone, is now ready, published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, 40 Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois. Eight pages, containing Responsive Reading, with Anthem and Chant, and six Carols. Price $2.50 per hundred. Specimens will be sent on receipt of a three-cent postage-stamp.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON:

HIS LIFE, WRITINGS, AND PHILOSOPHY.

By Rev. GEO. WILLIS COOKE.

1 volume, crown octavo.....$2.00.
With fine Steel-Engraved Portrait.

An interesting and valuable critical and analytic survey of the literary life of Mr. Emerson, with copious quotations and extracts from his writings, including many choice and characteristic passages not comprised in his printed works.

"Mr. Cooke has given to this book long and faithful study, and some high authorities who have examined the MSS. promise it a permanent place in literature."—Unity, Chicago.

"It is equally clear that Mr. Cooke's volume will have a value quite independent of his own biographical work in it, though this also has been carefully done, and will add much to the common stock of knowledge concerning our chief American author; for such Emerson is, and will soon be recognized, if he is not already."—Frank B. Sanborn, in the Springfield Republican.

"He has given us an interesting biography of Mr. Emerson, touched upon his personal traits and peculiarities, told us incidents connected with the writing of some of his more famous essays and poems, and has brought together a large amount of matter written by Mr. Emerson, which has never found place in his published works. This feature makes the work of especial value, as certain of the essays and sermons included have been sought for in vain for many years."—Boston Transcript.

"Mr. Emerson's relations with the great minds of the century are clearly brought out by abundant quotation and selections from personal reminiscences. For the rest, the volume is rich in inedited writings and speeches."—Boston Traveller.

MASSACHUSETTS IN THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

By Mrs. HARRIET H. ROBINSON. Price $1.25.

"Mrs. Robinson is the widow of a man who has achieved a wide reputation for his brilliant letters to the Springfield Republican and other papers over the nom de plume of 'Warrington.' Like her husband, Mrs. Robinson is devoted to the cause of woman suffrage; and she has been one of the most prominent and zealous of the workers in behalf of what she considers her down-trodden sex. She is well qualified by ability and experience to write the history of the woman suffrage movement in Massachusetts, and she has done so. The time covered by her history is from 1774 to 1881, and she presents the general, political, legal, and legislative history of the movement. Mrs. Robinson is a bright woman, and makes her work extremely interesting. Of course, she is prejudiced in favor of the suffragists; and her history bears pretty hard on those who have opposed the movement. But it is a woman's privilege to scold; and if she scolds well, it is entertaining, and the scolded ought to be able to bear it with equanimity, even enjoy it."—Boston Post.

THE MAN JESUS.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK. Second Edition. Price $1.00.

"Rev. John W. Chadwick tells us in the preface to 'The Man Jesus' that his object is to 'contribute something to a rational understanding of the human greatness of Jesus in the minds of those who have not the time or opportunity to read those voluminous writings in which the modern study of the life of Jesus has embodied its conjectures and results.' The author ignores entirely the supernatural element: he accepts the most advanced views with regard to the authorship and authenticity of the Gospels, and he makes use of the most radical interpretations of the New Testament narrative. With points of doctrine, we, of course, have nothing to do here. We can only say that Mr. Chadwick's work throughout is marked by the most reverent regard for the example and teachings of Jesus, that he brings home to the reader, as few others have done, the tender, affectionate nature of his great subject, and that he has revealed, under the robe of tradition, the throbbing of a human heart. Even the bitterest opponents of the views which Mr. Chadwick adopts must acknowledge that in the field of literature it is a masterful performance, luminous with the teachings of the gospel of humanity and a wonderful knowledge of the place and time of which he treats."—Says the Boston Traveller.

MY FIRST HOLIDAY;

Or, Letters Home from Colorado, Utah, and California.

By MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL. 12mo. Price $1.50.

"It is refreshing to get hold of a book of travel that is written in a spirit of honesty and common-sense. The author of these letters went West in search of health; and, while she was travelling in the Far Western States, she kept her eyes open, and carefully noted what she saw. The result is she has given us a very accurate and trustworthy account of the experiences of a traveller in those parts, and has also shown up the existing state of things in many respects. 'The glorious climate of California' is one of the greatest of frauds. The delightful climate of Colorado does furnish relief to consumptives by hastening their deaths, and so putting them out of pain. These facts the author observed, and does not seek to disguise. The Indian and the Mormon questions are also vigorously discussed in these letters. Nevertheless, the author does not seek to abuse or cry down the West. There is a heap to be seen and enjoyed there, and she saw and enjoyed it. And her descriptions are extremely well written and interesting. Anybody contemplating a visit to the West, either for health or pleasure, had better read this book; for they will get a great deal of valuable information as well as much pleasure from the perusal."—Says the Boston Post.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

CURRENT TOPICS.

ALLUDING to the Irish Catholic bishop's expressions of satisfaction with the Land Act, the London Secular Review says, "We think these prelates have acted wisely in thus demonstrating their gratitude to the Government for what is undoubtedly a magnificent act of justice."

THE Emperor of Japan announces that in 1890 he will give the country over which he reigns a parliament and a Constitutional government. This pagan ruler sets an example, in the declaration he has made, which might wisely be followed by some of the sovereigns of Christendom.

It is gratifying, says the Radical Review, published at Madison, Wisconsin, "to note that there has arisen spontaneously from the student body of the University of Wisconsin a Free Religious Association. Its objects are similar to those of the National Free Religious Association, expressed in the first two articles of the constitution."

ACCORDING to the New York Herald, Dr. McCosh observes with deep regret that, of the young men who go out from the colleges of this country, fewer every year accept the clerical office. The paper named thinks that "piety is not fostered by the clergymen as a class," and that they fail to answer the "eloquent and specious philosophy" of men like Ingersoll.

GUITEAU says he "found the people were very ready to pay fifty cents to hear there was no hell, but wouldn't pay a cent to hear that there was a hell." For the very good reason that people who talk in favor of hell or believe much in that institution are regarded as cranky, of which fact the conduct of the miserable wretch who murdered our President is a sad and sorrowful illustration.

THE Church of England Funeral Reform Company opposes the use of "crape, plumes, scarves, mourning coaches, etc., as involving unprofitable expenditure, and inflicting severe hardship on persons of limited means." The object of this organization is commendable. In these times, when the expenses of a funeral are so great, a poor man cannot afford to die, even though he is unable to live.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL JAMES is in favor of applying the principles of Civil Service Reform to his department by "appointments determined solely by proper qualifications, ascertained by impartial tests, open to all applicants upon equal terms." His "prolonged official experience," of which, he says, this conviction is the result, gives weight to the views and suggestions of Mr. James on this subject.

REFERRING to the condition of Pope Leo, the Catholic Review says: "Unable to leave his prison without imperilling in the gravest way most important interests of the Church, he is nevertheless compelled to submit to the grossest outrages. In the words of Dante, Christ is again imprisoned, scourged, and crucified in the person of his vicar. Surely, his condition is one for active Catholic sympathy, and something more practical than good wishes."

A CLERGYMAN in Canada recently brought some of his parishioners before a magistrate for snoring in church, and thereby interrupting the service. The magistrate dismissed the case. The journal from which we glean this item of intelligence thinks the case was rightly disposed of on the ground that, if a precedent against sleeping in church were once established, "half the congregations in the country would lose many of their soundest supporters."

SAYS the Boston Herald: "Capt. Adams (as he is referred to by the Congregationalist), a son of the late Dr. Nehemiah Adams of Boston, one of the ablest and most stalwart of the defenders of the orthodox creed, has not only abandoned the entire religious faith of his father, but makes open warfare against it, in the aggressive and sweeping manner of another Ingersoll. The reader can imagine the consternation of the Congregationalist, and its solicitude for this 'child of many prayers.'"

THE Independent concludes, from the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the State against the claims of Miss Lelia J. Robinson to practise law in the courts of Massachusetts, that the wording of the law which decided her case is defective. The judge who rendered the decision decides that the word "citizen" in the Massachusetts law, strictly defined, means male citizens only, whereupon the Independent suggests the amendment of the law by adding after the word "citizen" the words "without distinction of sex."

THERE has been considerable discussion lately on the pernicious influence exerted on youthful minds by a class of books admitted to public libraries, which cannot be kept out of such libraries without something approaching the appearance of a censorship of the press. An Englishman, a member of Parliament, suggests, as the proper mode to deal with this question, the establishment of children's libraries where only pure and solid literature shall be admitted. As an earnest of his interest in this subject, he offers to give $2,500 from his own private purse toward such a library.

THE Bishop of Manchester, an accomplished and progressive English prelate, does not regard with favor the large meetings brought together by, and acting under, the influence of Moody and Sankey. But a small proportion, he thinks, of those who sing "Glory Hallelujah," and leave the meetings in religious ecstasy, become permanent, useful members of the Church. He seems to think that the development of character must result not from emotions inspired by exhortation and music, but from growth, education, and discipline. It is in admissions like these that we see evidence of the prevalence and strength of liberal thought.

THE London Times, discussing the tariff convention held in New York, says: "The tariff may be revised, but it is not likely that sweeping changes will be introduced while the present extraordinary prosperity in America is maintained. It is unwise for those English manufacturers who have been hoping to see markets long closed to them reopened to deceive themselves with the expectation of any speedy movement toward free trade in America. Some day, the Americans will recognize the futility of battling against economic laws, and will perceive a waste of national energy which protection involves; but at present the free traders are lukewarm, while the protectionists are active, eager, and united."

TALMAGE, the religious mountebank, says prayer has less effect upon the weather than upon anything else; and his scheme for getting rain is to bombard the heavens with cannon. This idea is by no means original, indeed there is nothing original in Talmage except it be "original sin"; but it is suggested that, if rain can be obtained by causing the clouds to gather and break in the manner proposed, there is no way to limit the supply. Whereas, if there be any efficacy in prayer, why not inform the Being who "rides upon the storm" as to the amount of water that is needed, and thus not only obviate the use of cannon and powder, but avert the danger of floods, with all their destructive results?

A LAW was passed in Brazil, in 1871, by which children born of slave mothers, after the passage of that law, were declared free, but were to serve an apprenticeship of twenty-one years to their masters. The masters are taking advantage of this emancipation law, violating alike its letter and its spirit, by selling from the auction block the "services" in name, but the bodies in fact, of nominally free-born children, including mere infants two or three months old, whose "services" can be of no possible value. On the 10th of November, one of these sales occurred at Valença; and the number of children and babes put on the block sufficiently indicate that the planters are speculating in their future services, when the law referred to presumes they will remain with their parents and masters till the age of twenty-one, not as slaves, but as apprentices, and then be entitled to their own earnings. Dom Pedro has been much eulogized; but it is not creditable to him that sales like those mentioned are advertised in the papers of the capital, and that mere babes are still sold in the slave markets of the empire.

COLLEGE-TRAINED LIBERALISM.

In another column, a correspondent criticises the recent action of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association in inaugurating a "Fellowship" for the special training of teachers of free and rational religion, on the ground that the advantages of the "Fellowship" are to be limited to college graduates. In our correspondent's view, colleges are by nature conservative; they were originally established chiefly to supply theological training, and are still largely under the influence and permeated by the spirit and methods of theological advocacy; that therefore they are no place for the training of young men who want to devote themselves to the promotion of liberal ideas in religion. The presentation of this objection gives a fit occasion for some remarks on the need of a more learned Liberalism.

Even if our correspondent's view of the principal aim and work of colleges to-day were correct, it would not necessarily be a valid objection to the condition attached to the "Fellowship" in question. The applicant for its aid is to show himself thoroughly in earnest to become a teacher of free and rational views of religion, and to prove that he has a fitness for special study to that end by writing an appropriate essay. The very conditions of the application, therefore, will bring out the fact that, however strong may be the general theological bias and aim of the colleges, they have not been strong enough in this particular case to warp the mind to conservatism, but may rather, by furnishing this practical knowledge of the theological spirit and method, have better equipped it for the work of religious reform. To come out of the fortresses of an enemy, hostile to him still, and possessed of all the secrets of his mode of warfare, is to go into the contest against him armed with a great advantage.

But our correspondent writes, evidently, out of little practical acquaintance with the colleges. It can hardly be said to-day that any of the large American colleges, even though they may have so-called Doctors of Divinity as presidents, are devoting themselves chiefly to theological instruction or to preparing defences of the Christian Church; while, in some of the foremost and best equipped,—as Harvard, Johns Hopkins, Michigan University, Cornell,—the teaching of any kind of theology, even by indirect methods, is by doses of the most homœopathic description. It is true that many of the colleges—the older ones especially—were originally organized as allies of the Church. Harvard was established particularly for the training of ministers. It should be said, however, that this did not mean merely a theological training. It meant laying the basis, with all the learning that was then available, for a special training in theological study that was to follow. With the enormous progress of knowledge in the two hundred and forty years that have since elapsed, this general basis has become so broadened that the special structure that was to be built upon it is almost nowhere. It is now one of the standing complaints of the Churches that Harvard turns out so few candidates for the pulpit. It is filling the ranks of the lawyers, the physicians, the engineers, the journalists, the teachers' and professors' chairs, the great posts of business, but it sends out comparatively few who become preachers. Sectarian aims still adhere, it must be admitted, to too many of the colleges; and in some of them the theological animus is so dominant that young men of liberal religious ideas would probably avoid them. Yet there is no college of respectable reputation to-day as a seat of learning which does not have departments of instruction in which the theological bias has little or no sway. A college that strives to keep abreast with the times—and in the competition for students they all have more or less of this ambition—must needs become less dominated by theology and adopt a more universal curriculum. We have seen a statement recently that the President of old-fashioned Princeton is lamenting that even that stronghold of Orthodoxy is not sending out so many graduates who become clergymen as it was wont to do.

What the best colleges do in these days is to lay a broad foundation of general knowledge, which may be equally useful in any profession or occupation that may be afterwards followed. In other words, they give mental training and discipline and an inculcation of the elementary principles of all learning, which are needful for whatever special vocation may be chosen. And there is no vocation that more needs this kind of mental discipline and this broad foundation of elementary knowledge than that of the teacher of free and rational views of religion. Sometimes the lack of it in early life may be made up by diligent reading and study afterwards, but oftener the defect is likely to remain to vitiate and narrow the teaching. It is one of the curses of modern Liberalism that so many of its popular advocates are deficient in just this breadth of learning; that there are so many charlatans in the field as its spokesmen; that so many crude books and addresses and theories are put forth in its name; that a little smattering of natural science, a few commonplace apothegms about the ethical and mythical resemblances of the religions, and a voluble knowledge of the superficial absurdities of the Bible, are so apt to be regarded as a sufficient equipment for a radical religious reformer. Persons of natural ability, with only such qualifications as these for teaching on religious matters, may be sharp critics, but they can hardly be builders. They may have propagandist zeal; but it is a zeal that will run into dogmatism of denial merely, and not become constructive and creative.

Such representatives of Liberalism will not always have the influence they do now. The demand already begins to be heard for a Liberalism that shall make itself felt as a positive social and educational force in the community. To meet this demand, trained thinkers and workers will be required. Of course there must be natural ability to begin with, and also enthusiasm of humanity to give motive, and the gift of practical wisdom to steady the motive to effective results; but these will avail little without the knowledge and mental training that comes from wide study. These gifts of mind and heart, equipped with appropriate learning, will make the teachers that Liberalism needs. The teachers of the coming religion must match the learning of the Churches with a learning larger and more profound. If they shall have little or nothing to say of speculative theology, they must yet be amply versed in the history of religions, in the knowledge of ethics, in the principles of sociology in its various departments, and in the great science—inclusive of all sciences—of man's relation, individually and collectively, to the universe of which he is a part. And for this special training, other things being equal, the preparatory college training must give an advantage in mental balance and breadth. The teacher so trained will be likely to have a better perspective of truth. He will see more aspects, more phases of it, and will be less apt to ride hobbies and become a narrow partisan and dogmatist.

There are two classes of men who are specially advancing the cause of free and rational religion to-day. These are the genuine scientists, the men who love truth before any preconceived theory of truth,—like Darwin, for example,—and the men who, with more or less strictness, are applying scientific methods of study to the history of the religions and their literatures, like Max Müller and Robertson Smith and Ernest Renan and many others. And these, almost without exception, are college-trained men, or men who had a training corresponding to that of a college or university at the outset of their careers. Let not earnest young Liberals conceive the idea that learning is a hindrance to progress. Let them read and ponder Wendell Phillips's magnificent Phi Beta Kappa oration on the dangers of learning, and then—go to college, as he did.

WM. J. POTTER.

"MR. SAVAGE ON THEISM": A REPLY.

The first thing for me to do is simply and heartily to thank Mr. Spencer for his criticism. It is fair and manly. It gives us an opportunity to stand on a basis of mutual respect, and try to see the truth in each other's statements. And, if we cannot agree, I trust that mutual respect at least will remain. And this alone shows a stage of civilization on the part of The Index that most religious papers are far from attaining. The usual method of discussion is that of which Shimei (II. Samuel xvi., 13) was an ancient and shining example. If two cannot agree, they generally end by calling each other fools, and a relegation to an uncomfortable climate in a not distant future.

Now for the point of the critique. In my reference to the "power which is not man, which existed before man, which would exist were humanity swept off the earth," I am not a little astonished to find what unconscious guile I displayed. To Mr. Spencer, these innocent-looking phrases are an ambush, "bristling with half-hidden assumptions," bearing arms not warranted by the law of any known scientific method. My intention, however, was quite as innocent as the appearance. I meant, and mean still, only the common fact that everybody admits. I wish to assume nothing by my use of the word "power." I neither endow it with a capital letter nor with personality at the outset. I only state a fact. There is a power not man; by it we came into being; by it we exist; it will abide when we—in the ordinary sense of that word—cease to exist. Mr. Spencer objects to my saying, "On it, we every moment depend." I am quite willing to admit his supplement, and speak of interdependence. It will not take away the fact I care to keep. Man and wife interdepend; but that does not change the fact that there are two of them. Though the brick comes out of the mud-bank, still there are the mud-bank and the brick; and the brick would not have been, had there not been a mud-bank first.

Further, of this power he says, "If he uses it as a word standing for an idea not included under the words 'matter' and 'force,' will he tell us by what scientific method he arrived at a knowledge of that tertium quid?" I most certainly do not ask for any power, except that which manifests itself through "matter" and "force." Mr. Spencer speaks as though he knew what matter and force are. But I take it that neither he nor anybody else does know. They are only phenomena. But a belief in the existence of a somewhat, back of all phenomena, Herbert Spencer tells us, "has a higher warrant than any other whatever." It is no tertium quid then, but only the basis of reality that underlies all existence.

I do not, then, "ignore the function of matter," or the function of anything else that exists, or that plays any part in the development of man. Neither do I "assume the existence of God," or of anything else. I only recognize a fact that I never heard of any one's doubting,—a fact that Mr. Spencer does not doubt. And this fact—to state it plainly once more—is simply this: a power, not man, existed before man; man exists by means of this power; this power continues when man departs; we must believe it would continue though the earth became cold and dead, and were scattered in fragments through space. Mr. Spencer is at liberty to define this power as he pleases, so he does not omit any essential facts; and he is at liberty to call it any names he pleases, so he includes under his terms the reality. All I ask is the fact.

Now for the matter of intelligence. When Mr. Spencer goes on to say of me, "Assuming this power, and that it manifests itself in an intelligible order," I must think him (unconsciously) guilty of something logically worse than anything he charges on me. For, with a verbal stroke of legerdemain, he appears to whip out of sight the entire basis of my argument. But, as this basis is the universe, it does not disappear so easily. "Assume the existence of God?" I did nothing of the kind. I assumed nothing. I only recognized the existence and order of the universe. And, since these are the basis of all science, it did not occur to me that "any known scientific method" could cry me, "Check!" I said nothing of God. This is only one of the supposed inhabitants of my supposed ambush. I said only "power and order." I cannot think Mr. Spencer will deny them. But perhaps it is to my saying "a power" that he objects. If so, I claim for that only the belief that the power manifested in the universe is one; or, in other words, that it is a universe that we are talking about.

As I stop now, and look back over the pages I have written, I am more than ever impressed with the fact of how many words it does take to make what at first seems a very plain statement. And yet they talk about wanting us to preach short sermons!

Yes, I did raise the question, and now raise it again,—"Have we a right to speak of the power thus manifested as intelligent?" And, though Mr. Spencer hurl at me a whole library of dictionaries, I still insist that my definition of "intelligent" is not only accurate, but that it is the only one that is definitely and scientifically accurate. Are not dictionary-makers men? It is their business to set forth common usage. But writers on scientific and philosophic themes are expected to go deeper than common usage, and get at the essential and universal. Of a fool, of a drunken man, or of one who is insane, we say his action is not intelligent. And we mean by so saying that his "actions, words, movements, do not correspond with what we call the rational order of our thought." Men recognized intelligence before they knew anything about brain. And because we now associate brain and intelligence does not touch the matter of the essential definition, that goes deeper than the organ of manifestation. Indeed, the lowest forms of life manifest a degree of what no one can say is not intelligence, which is sufficient for all their needs, while as yet there are not even the apparent rudiments of a nervous system. But I do not care to hinge any argument on that. I only care to say that, however or through whatever organ manifested, any movement or act or word that "corresponds to the rational order of our thought" we are compelled to think of as "intelligent."

He objects to this that "the action of a glacier, the movements of a meteor, the manifestations of the life of a tree," since they "correspond to the rational order of our thought," would, by my definition, be made "intelligent." Instead, however, of my being crushed by this supposed reductio ad absurdum, I accept it. Since these do correspond to "the rational order of our thought," it is for Mr. Spencer to prove that they are not the manifestation of intelligence. I believe they are, and that to argue from this fact that they are, is logical and scientific. Of course I keep in mind that all our language is anthropomorphic, and that all our knowledge is relative. To say that the power manifested in the universe is intelligent may not mean just what one can find in the dictionary; but it seems to me only rational to assert that it cannot mean anything less than that.

The reference then to glacier, meteor, or tree, does not trouble me, for the simple reason that these, to us, isolated movements are only a part of the universal order, and we do not expect to locate the intelligence in each infinitesimal fragment of an infinite universe. To illustrate: suppose that the Lilliputians, when they came on the sleeping Gulliver, had pulled off or cut through one of his boots; and when the bound giant, awake and attempting to rise, moved one of his toes, they had proceeded to examine that toe to see whether its movements were or were not intelligent. With the Lilliputian Webster in hand, and finding that intelligent meant "endowed with the faculty of understanding or reason," and knowing that each Lilliputian had a brain, of course they would examine this wonderful moving thing. Suppose they cut it off and dissect it, they would find no "organ of intelligence." But the movement no less would have been the manifestation of intelligence. Make your Gulliver practically infinite, and your Lilliputians the size of men, so that the mightiest telescope could not span the distance from button to button on his coat, and you have a good illustration of the fallacy of this kind of reasoning. Of course I do not think of the universe as a great man. I use the illustration only for the one point it illustrates.

Mr. Spencer assumes that the action of a glacier, etc., is not a manifestation of intelligence; while this is the whole question up for debate. To this kind of assertion, I regard the reply of Martineau to Reymond as perfectly in order. When Du Bois Reymond said, "If an infinite mind, then, too, an infinite brain," Mr. Martineau responded, "If the structure and movement of atoms do but repeat in little those of the heavens, what hinders us from inverting the analogy, and saying that the ordered heavens repeat the rhythm of the cerebral particles?" We know perfectly well that the molecules of the brain, relatively to the size of the brain, are farther apart from each other than are the heavenly molecules that we call planets, stars, and suns. Do not misunderstand me. I only mean by this reference that, to a negative argument like this of Mr. Spencer or Reymond, this suggestion of Mr. Martineau is a perfectly competent answer.

Though I have taken so much space already, it is only now that I reach the last and, in some respects, the most important point of all. I have reserved it thus, so that it might stand out by itself. Mr. Spencer objects to my saying, "If man is only a bit of nature, and shows, like a specimen brick, the material of the whole, then mind also is in nature," since it is admitted that mind is in man. My "brick" illustration was faulty, but only in a way that is absolutely fatal to Mr. Spencer's conclusions from it. It does not cover the whole truth, because a brick contains only such materials as may be found in the mud-bank, and it can be competently explained as composed of the mud-bank. But, unless there is mind in nature, man contains something—the most important of all—which does not exist in his mud-bank; and he cannot be explained by the mud-bank at all. "What if mind is not an entity, but a process?" asks Mr. Spencer. All very well, when it can be shown to be a process. Not one single step has been made toward such a showing as yet. Curiously enough, he charges me with a "misuse of language" in the very next line after this huge assumption,—"because it [mind] has been developed from inanimate things some way." Has it? Since when was it so demonstrated?

How stands the matter? Is it not just here? Mind is the only thing man directly knows by an immediate act of consciousness. All the attempts thus far made to explain mind on a materialistic basis have completely broken down. This is the assertion of Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Fiske, and all competent authorities. Huxley goes so far as to say that, though a "mechanical equivalent" were discovered for every separate thought or emotion, still no molecular movement of matter would explain them. The circle of material motion is complete with mind left out. The law of the "persistence of force" finds its action in man complete, without taking account of mind. The gulf between mind and the atomic movements of matter is not only not bridged, but Tyndall declares, "The problem is as insoluble in its modern form as it was in the prescientific ages."

If intelligence could be explained as a product of brain, then it would be logical to say, No intelligence without brain. But, in the present condition of knowledge, one might as well say, No music without a piano. If the brick, when constructed and lying on the mud-bank, contained something not yet found in the mud-bank, if this something was the most essential part of it, then one of two things would necessarily follow: 1. Either the brick was not wholly a product of the mud-bank; or, 2. The mud-bank really does contain the element not yet discovered.

M. J. SAVAGE.

TWO THEORIES OF LAND REFORM IN ENGLAND.

The land system of England having arrived at this pass at which every one admits, either openly or tacitly, that "something must be done," there are two general theories as to the methods by which that system should be brought into harmony with modern civilization. One of these is the method which found its foremost advocate in Cobden, and which now finds favor with the majority of English Liberals. This is simply to abrogate the old semi-feudal laws, which hamper the free distribution of land and lock it up from generation to generation in the hands of a small number of families. "Free trade in land," said Cobden, "would be of still greater value than free trade in corn." The estates of the country are in the hands of persons who find themselves fettered in every imaginable way by ancient laws and customs, and who cannot sell their land if they felt inclined to do so. A great nobleman may be, as several noblemen actually are at the present time, bankrupt, or all but bankrupt. This may be caused partly by their own extravagance, partly by the generally ruinous condition of agriculture and lowering of rents. But, whatever the cause, the result to the public is the same. The farms are not taken up, the land goes out of cultivation, the owner retires to some foreign city where he can live in an inexpensive way, and the estate is rendered valueless. If this were the case in the United States, the remedy would be simple. The estate would be sold to some one who could make proper use of it, who had both energy and capital; but in England this cannot be. The dead hand grasps the land, and prevents the living from making any use of it. The aristocratic structure of society also, which tends to the preservation of an old family and the continuity of a long line of descendants, of course assists in maintaining the land of the country in this anomalous condition. Now, said Cobden,—and his followers to-day (including Bright, Chamberlain, Fawcett, and Thorold Rogers) echo his sayings,—if once this dead hand is removed, if once primogeniture and strict entails are abolished, if the feudal privileges of landlords are got rid of, the land of the country will, like every other commodity, follow the natural economical laws, and become gradually but surely distributed among those who can make the most use of it, and raise the greatest produce from it. Let us not, therefore, hamper and fetter owners of land by any State regulations at all, excepting such as are necessary. Let us make the transfer of land from one to another cheap and easy, and let us abolish feudalism; and then the land will gravitate to those who would hold it with the best results to trade, agriculture, and the interests of society. Now, this is substantially the condition of things in reference to land tenure in the United States. In America there are no semi-feudal land laws, and land can be transferred cheaply and effectively to those who desire to purchase.

The efforts, therefore, of Cobden and his liberal followers were to Americanize the English land system. This is the theory which finds most favor with the orthodox school of English economists,—the school of which Ricardo may be said to have been the founder, and of which Professor Fawcett and Mr. Rogers are two of the principal representatives at the present time. Chevalier and Bastiat, the French economists, are also of this school; and I suppose that most American economists would take this general view of the land-problem. It is a view which is universally English and individualistic, leaving the citizen to push his own way among his fellows, regardless of the help or hindrance of the State.

The other theory of reform may be perhaps distinguished as the Continental or collectivist view. It has a learned and powerful exponent in M. Emile de Laveleye, and finds favor with that group of French Republicans whose oracles are Louis Blanc and Clémenceau; while Mr. Henry George, in his remarkable work entitled Poverty and Progress, has given expression for the benefit of English readers to the same principles, and Mr. Herbert Spencer has also stated in a powerful way the case for the theory. This theory differs radically from that of Cobden in this respect: that, while Cobden and his followers regarded land as like any other kind of property, and wished to assimilate completely legislation on land with legislation respecting houses or shipping or cattle, the other school considers land to be a peculiar kind of property, unlike anything else, and which law can never possibly assimilate to personal property. Land, they say, is essentially a monopoly; and only the State, representing the interests of all, can be intrusted with such a delicate and vital matter as the possession of this monopoly. You can build multitudes of ships, you can breed countless herds of cattle, but you cannot make a single acre of land. The land is the gift of nature to the human race; and, being necessary for every kind of production, agricultural or industrial, should never be permitted to be monopolized by any one man. Power lies with the possessors of land: wealth and influence are theirs. To be deprived of any share in land is to be deprived of political power, of wealth, and of influence. If the State permits absolute ownership, it gives an unfair advantage to those who enjoy the monopoly, and depresses the majority who are landless. Besides, says M. de Laveleye, the principle of political equality, proclaimed loudly in the modern State, demands that the practice of equality shall be embodied in modern democratic institutions. This involves the protection of the weak against the rapacity of the strong, the guarding of the former's interests against the latter's constant tendency to undue encroachment. Laveleye, therefore, looks forward to a gloomy future for the United States, which has permitted the practice of individual ownership to take root in the Republic, and so has created a great landless class, who will fill the mighty cities of the future, and will be centres of disaffection and of turmoil.

It may perhaps be broadly said of these two general theories that the former is the view of the practical man of affairs, the latter of the theoretical thinker. The latter ignores important aspects of the question, which at once appeal to the former; while the former has no disposition to philosophize about monopolies and the theory of the State, like the latter. One makes little of practical considerations, and the other equally little of broad, general principles. Let me point out in a word or two how the theorist's plan presents difficulties which he not only does not attempt to solve, but which he does not even recognize. The theorist's plan demands the abolition (gradual or immediate) of private property in land. But there are tens of thousands of persons who possess such property, and who do not feel disposed to have their right contested. Would any one rob these people of the land they own? Probably not. Even the Land League claims to do nothing more than reduce rents and buy out bad landlords. Now, if landlords are to be bought out by the State, if they are to be compensated for their loss, the people must provide the funds for such a transaction.

Now, it would take, on a rather low estimate, £400,000,000 to buy out the landlords of England; and the question is, Where should such a sum come from, even provided the transaction were otherwise feasible? People talk of "the State" doing this, as though "the State" were a living entity. But "the State" is simply a name for all the people in their collective capacity, and consequently this huge sum could only come from the people. So far as I know, this is the only way of securing what is known as the "nationalization of the land," except revolutionary methods and physical violence are resorted to. It is true that a great part of the land of England is, owing to the terrible condition of agriculture, depreciating in value every year; but no time can be looked forward to when the landlords would be so utterly impoverished and reduced, and when the aristocratic feeling would be so diminished, that land-owners would be willing to part with their estates to the government on any terms. But until such a day does actually come there can be no doubt that an enormous sum in compensation must be paid by the English people, if the land is to become their own property. Another consideration ignored by the theorists is that there are large numbers of persons who have no desire for land and no use for it.

The theory referred to is that the landless person is deprived of wealth and influence, because all production ultimately depends on land. But, in intellectual and in many industrial occupations, the possession of land is of no value, and is not desired. It is sufficient for the intellectual or industrial producer that the land should be in the hands of those who can produce from it the greatest quantity of those things which the community needs. Yet, again, the theorist ignores the fact that new improvements in agriculture invariably proceed from those who own large estates by a secure tenure, and are helped by a liberal supply of private capital. The constant and, as it seems to me, valid objection to all socialistic schemes hitherto advocated is that such schemes, if put in practice, would leave no room for the energy and enterprise of the individual. If all are equally cared for, if extra exertion brings no more advantages than indolence, the motive which leads men to invent and improve is gone. General schemes of universal benevolence, which ignore the fact that this is a world of conflict and that the conflict is absolutely essential in order to lead mankind onward to a higher stage, will all fail. That higher stage is always reached by individual initiation, and not by collective exertion: this latter may aid and stimulate, but it cannot act as a substitute for the former.

Now, the advocates of "nationalization of land" propose to place all in a comfortable position,—a position, by the way, which three-fourths of them would probably forfeit within the first twelve months; but they give no chances to those original minds by whose working the general improvement is made. If we all had our land at a moderate rental from "the State," or if we held it by a system of tenure analogous to that existing in Russia, it is probable that the influence exerted would tend to depress the daring initiative of individual mind, and so thwart material progress. Whatever may be the state of things some centuries hence, the course of events would seem to indicate that, in the rough-and-tumble work of building up the outer framework of the new democracy, much must be sacrificed to individual energy and originality, even although many may thereby enjoy less material prosperity than they would otherwise have done. On this seems to me to depend the development of man's powers in the immediate future, and the importance of this is not duly estimated by the theorist.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

ANSWER TO MR. SAVAGE'S QUESTION.

I have delayed replying to Mr. Savage's question in The Index of November 3, till I could send the manuscript of my Kant lecture for publication. Read in the light of that lecture, published in the present number, the following statement may serve to indicate the position of Utilitarians and my own. Utilitarians direct men to labor for universal happiness. Practically, I should recommend the same thing. But the essential difference is this: they seek to work out universal laws for the purpose of achieving happiness, I should seek to achieve happiness for the purpose of illustrating a universal law. With them, the law universal is the means, and happiness is the end: with me, happiness is the means, and the gradual approximation toward a law universal, which is at once the ideal of science and the task of ethics, is the end.

FELIX ADLER.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

The Christian at Work closes an article suggested by the Frothingham interview with this moral:—

The world's work to-day is being done by Christianity. It is the one soul-satisfying system, religious or intellectual. Outside it there is neither hope nor happiness, nor the assurance born of Faith. Rationalism and Materialism have neither father nor mother to show their source, nor a guide-post to point to their destiny.

This is akin to the claims which it is customary for Evangelical theologians to make,—that modern civilization is the direct product of Christianity. Sometimes, it is even said that the steam-engine and the railroads and telegraphs girdling the globe have come out of the Bible. If the claim that Christianity originated modern civilization is to be carried to this extent, then it is but fair to hold Christianity responsible for the evil of modern civilization as well as its good, for that practical materialism, worse than any philosophical materialism, which so largely mingles with "the world's work to-day," and degrades life to sordid ends and ambitions. But the truth is, modern civilization was born of that revival of rational thought which appeared in Europe as the precursor of the Protestant Reformation. And the "Rationalism" that then began and has been doing a larger part of the world's work since is now rapidly making over Christianity.

THE Christian Union does not show the most commendable candor in the following correspondence:—

Have Calvinists ever taught the doctrine that there are infants in hell? and, if so, where can such teaching be found? Please answer, and oblige, ALLEGHENY CITY. INQUIRER.

This teaching is like the chills and fever. You can never find a place where they have the chills and fever: they always have it in the next town. So you never can find any Calvinist who will own to having taught the doctrine of infant damnation, though you can find plenty who will swear that their neighbor has taught it.

This answer, perhaps, sufficiently covers present facts; but Inquirer asked concerning the past.

THE religious press continues to discuss Mr. Frothingham's supposed abjuration of rationalistic beliefs. Some of the journals, perhaps, will never learn the blunder they have been drawn into, but will be wondering why their new convert does not enter some of the hospitably open doors they are showing him. The wide-spread discussion indicates at least at what a high estimate Mr. Frothingham has been held by people of all denominations as a power in the religious world. A writer in the Catholic Review recalls a rumor of his Catholic proclivities, which was current, he says, in Jersey City when Mr. Frothingham was preaching there, but which we think will be news to his friends. But this writer departs from the usual path of the religious newspaper comments to relate the following pleasant incident:—

While in Jersey City, I remember well, it was said that Mr. Frothingham had exhibited decided Catholic tendencies. However that may be, I shall never forget a very important work of charity which he participated in. I think it was in 1857, during the season of distress which followed the failure of the Bergen Tunnel Company, when some fifteen hundred poor Irish Catholic laborers were thrown out of employment. I was at that time connected with the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, of St. Peter's Church; and we were struggling with the tremendous burden of relieving the destitution of those poor workmen and their families, who were crowded into the tenement-houses of the city, sometimes two or three families in a single room. To our agreeable surprise, one of Mr. Frothingham's leading members called upon us, and proposed to take a portion of our burden upon their shoulders. They had raised considerable sums of money, he said; and, as they had no poor of their own and we seemed to be overburdened, they should be glad to take a portion of our poor and look after them during the winter. And they did their work nobly and generously.

This clipping from the Catholic Review gives a fact over which Liberals may ponder to advantage. It shows not only the strength of the Catholic conviction in favor of parochial instead of public schools, but the generosity that is ready to make the conviction practical:—

A few Sundays ago, the pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, New York, asked his people for a collection for their schools. They paid on the plate, on one Sunday, six thousand dollars!

THE AFFIRMATIVE SIDE.

Liberals are often told that they are constantly telling what they don't believe, but are utterly unable to state what they do believe. Their position, it is said, is wholly one of negation, criticism, and destruction.

As the term "Liberal" is applied to a very large class, in which are persons representing every school and phase of unorthodox thought, considerable variety and even contrariety of belief must necessarily be found in the writings of this class. But, although men and women who have outgrown the dogmas of theology are not accustomed to present their views on disputed points as unquestionable and final, they have positive convictions, which they can affirm with as much reason, at least, as orthodox Christians can repeat the creed that they were taught to believe in advance of all intellectual discrimination. Thousands there are who, when confronted with the charge that they indulge only in denial and negation, might present some of their views affirmatively, in a statement something like the following:—

Enlightened human reason is man's best guide. The well-being of man (not the glory of God) is the highest object of human effort. Knowledge comes, not by special revelation, but by observation, experience, and reflection. The untrammelled exercise of reason is not only a right, but a duty. Doubt is the beginning of wisdom. Beliefs are neither moral nor immoral in themselves; but correct beliefs tend to right conduct, erroneous beliefs to wrong conduct. A good motto is: "In things that can be demonstrated, unity; in things that admit of doubt, free diversity; in all things, charity." Reasonable faith is conviction based upon evidence. Morality is founded upon and is the science of man's relation to his fellow-man and to the entire natural world. The principle of sacrifice, admired by Christians in Christ, should be glorified in humanity. Reliance on ourselves and the utilization of the forces of Nature are more effective for human welfare than prayer for aid. This world is worthy of all our efforts. One world at a time is all we can attend to: the only "preparation" needed for death is the faithful performance of the duties of life. At birth, we all have good and evil tendencies or aptitudes, inherited from ancestors. To strengthen the good and to neutralize the evil is the primary work of education. Our knowledge of right and wrong (actions or thoughts that promote and that militate against human happiness) has been acquired in the school of experience. The function of "conscience" is to condemn what we believe wrong, to approve what we believe right. Working for earthly improvement is better than striving to get to heaven. Charles Sumner, whose last words were, "Take care of my Civil Rights Bill," was nobler than the "Christian saint" whose thoughts are given chiefly to his "immortal soul." A knowledge of what we call the penalties of violated law is more effective as a restraint to vice and crime than belief in a hell that can be escaped by faith and death-bed repentance. Practice of the precepts of morality is more important than belief in a salvation scheme by which many hope to avoid the consequences of immoral lives. Study of the order of nature is more fruitful of good results than speculation about "God." Belief in the eternity of what is presented to us as matter, force, law, and causation, is more rational than the belief that it came by a creative fiat from nothing. Worlds, life, species, language, religion, morality, and civilization have been evolved to their present condition under law, through unimaginable periods of time. The on-goings of nature are invariably in accordance with law, disturbed by no interposition of supernaturalism. All phenomena are due to absolute, self-existent power, which we know only as it is related to us in consciousness. The word "God" is simply the letter x, representing the unknown quantity in an equation, for the solution of which the finite mind can furnish no formula. The Bible is a mixture of truth and error, reality and romance, fact and fiction. It is an outgrowth of the human mind, like all other so-called sacred books. Man is a progressive being. The golden age of humanity is in the future, not in the past.

This statement, however unsystematic and incomplete, would be a sufficient reply to the objection we have mentioned, at least in the form in which it is usually urged by the representatives of theology.

THE Nation, referring to the appointment of M. Paul Bert, Minister of Public Worship, whose office has but recently been attached to the Ministry of Public Instruction, says: "It cannot but be mortifying for the ministers of all denominations to have to transact business with an officer who considers them either gross impostors or harmless dupes, and pays them their stipends as a deplorable concession to a degrading popular superstition. It does not do credit to science, either, that one of its ministers should be willing to occupy a position in which he will constantly have to feign respect for various things which he really despises." In France, the relations between Church and State being determined by what is called a Concordat, and the public worship being subject to such police rules as the Government may deem necessary, why should not the Premier of France appoint, to carry out these rules, a man of incorruptible integrity, of admitted ability and scientific reputation, like M. Paul Bert? M. Bert says distinctly that he has nothing to do with doctrine, but that his business is to enforce the rules of the Concordat. Since the clergy are supported by the State, Gambetta is evidently determined that they shall cease conspiring against and plotting to overthrow the State. Why need the Nation find fault with him for this? Not long since, two naval officers in France were dismissed the service for the terrible crime of attending the civil burial of a child. These officers have been reinstated. This act alone is sufficient to indicate the spirit of the old régime and the need of a ministry like that of M. Gambetta and an officer like M. Bert. The new French Minister of Worship said recently that he would abstain from violence or party molestation, and that the people would see that he was not "a revolutionist or a blunderer, but a man brought up in the study of science and law."

THE Boston Sunday Herald thinks that the next national issue to divide politics in this country will be protection versus free trade. "On this issue," it says, "sure to come sooner or later, and liable to come soon, time is on the side of the free traders, as it was on the side of the Republicans in the slavery episode. Every year sees more and more of the work of protection accomplished, and more of the necessity of free trade demonstrated. Two great interests, commerce and agriculture, need free trade. So far, manufacturers have had their own way at the expense of the other two; but the time comes, and has already come, when manufacturers must seek a market in competition with other countries. At this point, the issue must begin to be the leading one in our politics."

SINCE Guiteau never swore or scoffed at religion, but has always been pious, the revision of Sunday-school literature is in order.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

OUR friends in New York will find The Index on sale at Brentano's, 5 Union Square.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates? We shall also be pleased to receive names and addresses of persons likely to be interested in The Index, to whom we can send sample copies.

WE give our readers an intellectual treat this week in the able discourse on Kant, by Prof. Felix Adler.

"SOME of the best men go into the Christian ministry," says the Christian Union; "but the average, whether measured by the popular standards of college classes or by the standards of recitation, is not high."

NEXT week, The Index will contain an essay by Mr. F. M. Holland on the subject, "What kind of Morality did Jesus and the Apostles teach?" and a letter from Mr. Allen Pringle, an able Canadian writer, on "The Progress and Condition of Free-thought in Canada."

"FREE Religious," says the Investigator, "is of doubtful meaning, but the 'Index' is definite,—that which points out. Let us hope that the Boston Index will point out nothing but the truth." The aim of The Index will be in the future, as it has been in the past, to point out the truth, and to point out falsehood also, under whatever name either one or the other appears. "Let us hope" that the Investigator will do the same.

"OUR DUMB ANIMALS," the organ of the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," protests against the barbed wire fences, as being a source of injury to animals, and gives from a Pennsylvania paper a long list of injuries inflicted on animals by this means. The same paper also reports the recent order given at police headquarters for the punishment by fine of a policeman who failed to arrest a man when requested to do so, who had maltreated his horse.

AT a recent communion service in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle in London, sixteen new communicants were received into the Church, and Mr. Spurgeon stated that "only two of them were converted through his agency, the other fourteen by that of his members." In this transaction, the Lord seems to be counted out; and we are irresistibly reminded of a reply Wesley made to a drunken man whom he met, who clinging to a lamp-post recognized the preacher, and cried out: "How do you do, Mr. Wesley?" and then, as Wesley paused, wonderingly inquired: "Don't you remember me? Why, I am one of your converts!" Whereupon, Wesley, looking upon him sadly, made reply, "If you are converted, my friend, as you profess, it must be that you are one of my converts; for sure am I that the Lord had nothing to do with your conversion."

A bust of Voltaire in plaster, by C. E. Dallin, is on exhibition at the office of The Index. It is a faithful and spirited copy, enlarged from a small Parisian bronze, esteemed in France as the most accurate presentation of the great philosopher art has furnished. Certainly, the head by Mr. Dallin is a remarkable study. The modelling is clean, strong, and crisp. "Voltaire's smile" is there, but one feels on beholding it that justice of the more recent criticism, which ascribes this characteristic of the wonderful man to that side of his nature which was "good enough to kindle, justify, and sustain the enthusiasm of that young philanthropist, Edouard de Pompery." Mr. Dallin is a young man of liberal views, prosecuting his art studies, but in our opinion this specimen of his work would honor a sculptor of far riper years. We are authorized to receive orders in his behalf. The price is $12, delivered within the city limits, or boxed to express elsewhere.

M. ERNEST RENAN, in a letter to the Lega della Democrazia of Rome, says: "There are no longer believing multitudes: there are individuals who believe. Whether it be a cause of regret or rejoicing, the people of the great cities no longer go to church or to the temples: neither can they be again led thither. The secondary cities and the country obey the same tendency." He declares his belief in the complete secularization of the State: "The State comprehends individuals belonging to different forms of worship, Catholics, Protestants, Israelites. And it comprehends, besides, a class of persons which, for my part, I think the most interesting, and which Sainte-Beuve called 'the great diocese,'—I mean those who, respecting truth, do not mean to enclose it in a determined form, and are contented to do good modestly, without daring to think that they alone possess the truth. In so much variation, the State can have one rule only,—abstention,—and declare itself incompetent to occupy itself any more with the religious opinions of its components than it does with their opinions in art or literature, and, above all, to grant no privileges to any."

SINCE the publication in The Index of a letter from Capt. R. C. Adams, giving some of his reasons for renouncing Christianity, many Orthodox Christians, including scores of ministers, have called at this office to inquire as to the genuineness of the letter and to obtain copies of the paper containing it. Among the callers this week was Rev. Dorus Clarke, D.D., one of the best known and most rigidly orthodox Congregationalist ministers of this city. He volunteered to assure us that Massachusetts owes her present intellectual and moral enlightenment and material prosperity to the theology of the New England Puritans. We took the liberty to dissent from this opinion, and to say that we would like to see the man, if such could be found, who would undertake to defend such a proposition in a public controversy. The reverend gentleman declared that he was willing and ready to engage in such a discussion. We informed him that the columns of The Index were open to him; and, with a promise that we would soon hear from him, he bade us good-morning and left the office. Further than this, deponent saith not.

JOHN W. GITEAU, in reply to the question, "What do you mean by saying that your brother was possessed of a demon or a devil?" said:—

The religious theory is that there are two forces in the universe,—one under Satan or the devil, and one under God or Jesus Christ. My father held to the view that there were living in the world those who were seized of the devil or Satan, and of Christ or God. He believed that those two forces were at war, one with the other, and that at present and since the fall of man Satan had, to a very great extent, dominion on the earth to possess himself of all those he could; and that he did possess himself of all those who were not absolute believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, and who had not been saved from the power of sin by a complete union with the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; that all evil, all disease, all deformity, all infirmity, was the result of sin, or the admission of those who had a free will; that they were under the dominion of Satan or the evil spirit, or of evil nature. That was my father's theological view; it was my brother's; it is mine. And so I believe that at some time in my brother's life, as he had a free will to choose good or evil, he must have allowed Satan to gain such a control over him that he was under the power of Satan. That idea is the one on which I based my opinion that my brother was morally responsible to God, but perhaps not responsible according to human or legal responsibility, being in one sense insane.

The theological views above expressed are substantially those maintained by Rev. Dr. Phelps, of Andover. What shall be said of them, judged by their fruits?

REV. I. M. ATWOOD, in the Christian Leader, says: "On looking over the report of any Unitarian convocation in the West, it becomes very apparent why the union of Universalists with Unitarians, often represented as so needful in that section, is impracticable. Universalists believe in the Gospel, in the Church, in organization, and think the way to serve the world in their capacity as representatives of religion is to teach the truth they have been intrusted with and build up the institution they are responsible for. Unitarians in the West, at least, appear to believe in criticism, the 'intergration of individualism,' great latitude of discussion, and in the saving merits of unlimited talk. They are a miscellaneous multitude of free-thinking, free-speaking folk, interesting enough to listen to, but not people you would select for co-partners in any serious religious work." The fact is, Simon pure Universalism is to-day among the most fossilized forms of Christianity. Once, Universalism was courageous and aggressive; and it has undoubtedly contributed to soften the spirit and modify the creeds of the Orthodox Churches. But the necessity for its existence as a separate sect has diminished in proportion as its distinctive doctrine has become accepted by the Christians of other denominations; and of late years many of its members, having discarded the whole theological system, have withdrawn from the Universalist churches, or remained mere nominal and uninterested members, while the more advanced and vigorous thinkers generally, when they have not been content to remain outside of all church organizations, have sought fellowship among the Unitarians, or other societies which trouble themselves little, if any, about the theological beliefs of their members. The result is that Universalism, which did such noble work years ago, is now timid, time-serving, and unprogressive. It joins Orthodoxy in sneering at science; it can use no epithets too vile in referring to "infidelity"; it cannot affiliate with Unitarianism; its sympathies in the main are with the Orthodox Churches, and its leading representative in New England, Rev. Dr. Miner, is in favor of Christianizing the Constitution of the United States. Evidently, this denomination has outlived its usefulness.

ALLOTMENT.

BY HELEN T. CLARK.

The fleeting breath of lilac-blows,
The tremblings of the shadowed grass
'Neath wooing winds that away and pass;
The fairy fabric of the rose,
The phalanx of the golden-rod,
The benison of the tasselled grain,
Hoarding the gifts of sun and rain
For hands that reap, and break the clod,
Mute signals raise of brotherhood!
The lowliest life, in humblest part,
Thrives with the Universal Heart,
And swell the ceaseless tide of good.
What are ye more than voiceless vine,
If, in your larger scope and place,
Ye fall to round, with worth and grace,
The day of toil to fruitage fine?
Not more, but less! The barren sheaves
Dishonored droop at sunset's hour:
The stem that lift one fragile flower
Its purpose in its bloom achieves.

The Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 8, 1881.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

IMMANUEL KANT.

A Discourse delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture, New York, Nov. 6, 1881.

By FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

Among all the human beings that have ever lived, considering the intellectual service which they have rendered to mankind, I believe Immanuel Kant to have been the greatest. He stands like a new Atlas bearing a world upon his shoulders. To give you any idea of his thoughts,—I do not see how I shall do it. For years and years, this man's philosophy has been uppermost in my mind, and I have longed to bear some testimony to the faith in him that was in me; yet I have ever shrunk from the immensity of the task. To-day, it is an outward occasion that rouses me. The year 1881 is the centennial year of the publication of Kant's great work, the Kritik of Pure Reason, which has become the corner-stone of modern philosophy. And, though I cannot hope to convey even approximately the fulness of the thought of Kant, I would not have the year pass away without paying some tribute, however insufficient, to such greatness. The philosophy of Kant can only be compared to the ocean. No more than we could hope in an hour's time to measure the vastness of the Atlantic, and fathom its abysses, no more can we attempt in an hour to measure the vastness and sound the depths of this philosophy. The greatest minds have labored for years to understand the meaning of Kant and penetrate into his subtle thought. Commentaries have been written, a whole literature has sprung up in explanation of his works. How then could I succeed in these few moments to unravel for you the tangled knot of his theory, or call up, freed from its obscurities, the splendid content of his teachings? And yet I am impelled at least to try; and, if no more is gained than to prepare the way for subsequent and clearer statements, this, too, would be sufficient.

IMMANUEL KANT was born on the 22d of April, 1724, in the city of Königsberg. Königsberg at that time, as at present, was the centre of an active commerce. Ships from Poland, England, Holland, and even distant America, entered its port. The cosmopolitan character of the place impressed itself upon the mind of the youthful Kant, and helped to build up that cosmopolitan interest by which he was distinguished in after years. The origin of Kant was of the humblest kind. His ancestors came from Scotland, and the family name was originally spelled with a C. His father was a saddler, his uncle a shoemaker. Both his parents were distinguished by simplicity of life and earnest and deep rectitude. Kant himself relates how, when he was still a child, a dispute broke out between one of the leading crafts of Königsberg and the craft of the saddlers, to which his father belonged. The dispute lasted for some time, and serious losses were inflicted upon the saddlers. But Kant recalls with pious respect the moderation with which his parents always spoke of their opponents, never, even in the privacy of their home, allowing one bitter or defamatory word to escape them concerning those who had so injured them. Kant, the man, dwells upon the influence which this example had upon him, and says that he will never forget it so long as he lives. This one instance suffices to indicate to us the pure, clean piety that pervaded the domestic life of the saddler's family. But it was to his mother especially that Kant was drawn. She had borne eleven children, but to this son she was particularly attached. She used to take him out with her in her walks, and called his attention to the beauties of nature, and sought to open his mind to the wonderful works of the creation. She was a woman of devout spirit, full of honest religious fervor, belonging to the sect of the Pietists, but not tainted by their exaggerations. She came to an untimely death; and the manner of her death itself testified to the nobleness of her nature. A lady, a friend of hers, was deserted by her fickle lover, to whom she had already plighted her troth. Taking this disappointment grievously to heart, she fell a prey to a dangerous malady, and was tenderly nursed by the mother of Kant. But the patient, at the height of her fever, refused to take the medicine which had been prescribed, and upon which the physician insisted as the means of saving her life. All entreaties were unavailing. At last, Kant's mother seized the spoonful of medicine which the patient had just rejected with aversion, and swallowed it herself to give her friend courage by her example. But no sooner had she done so than she was seized by a violent disgust, a severe chill followed, she fell into a raging fever, and soon after, in December, 1737, died, a victim to her devotion.

The lad Kant was thirteen years old when his mother died, and often and sadly must he have missed her fostering kindness. The circumstances of the family now became still poorer than they had been. And yet, with that laudable pride which we find in the artisan class of Königsberg at this time, every effort was made to secure the best possible education for the children. Immanuel was accordingly sent to the Latin school, and from there to the university. History and classics he studied with a special fondness, being able to recite whole passages from his favorite author, Lucretius. Later on, mathematics, physics, and philosophy chiefly engrossed his attention. It had been the darling wish of his mother that he should devote himself to the ministry, and accordingly he faithfully pursued the prescribed course in theology, and even attempted to preach a few sermons in country churches. Fortunately, his success in this direction was far from encouraging; and before long he definitely and finally abandoned the theological career. In the year 1746, his father died; and for nine years thereafter he was compelled to act as private tutor in various families. At first he resided with a clergyman in the neighborhood of Gumbinnen, then with Herr von Hülsen on an estate near Arensdorf, then in the family of Count Kaiserling. It was to his stay in this family that he owed many of the most pleasant recollections of his life. Here he had occasion to cultivate that polish of manner and that courtesy of bearing for which he was ever after so preeminently distinguished. The countess, a lady of unusual esprit and intelligence, recognized the genius of the tutor, and drew him into the best social circles of the city, in which he soon became a frequent and welcome guest. At last, in the year 1755, he was enabled to announce his first lecture as Docent, at the university; and fifteen years more had to elapse before he was finally advanced to the honors of a full professorship, he being then forty-six years of age and his fame already widely spread in Germany.

During the whole middle period of his life, nothing of outward importance occurred. It was a common shell, to all outward appearance, in which the pearl of priceless value was being formed. It was a quiet and colorless existence which the philosopher led; yet during all this time he was at work raising a new Pharos, that was destined to throw its light far out upon the sea of life, and help many a mariner to find the port of safety. He was rearing a gigantic monument in the intellectual world, which is destined to stand for generations on generations to come.

Let us then endeavor to take some approximate measure of the greatness of this monument, to get some understanding of what it stands for. The vulgar view of the philosopher is that of a dreamer, an idle speculator, a sort of human spider who spins his theories out of his inner consciousness. And many persons there have been who have aped the language of philosophy, and who, by their windy pretence, have brought philosophy into discredit in the public eye. But if you wish to contradict this popular impression, and show how little it applies to true philosophers, there is no other example to which you can point with so much force as to that of Kant. Do you suppose that he, too, was a mere theorist, weaving his cobweb of dreams? Why, he was a mathematician and physicist of eminent rank before he began to teach philosophy at all. The first treatise he ever published was a treatise on the "Force of Bodies in Motion." Then came another on the question whether the rotation of the earth around its axis is changing; another, on the cause of earthquakes; another, on the true theory of the wind. And it was he who, independently of Hadley, called attention to the difference in the velocity of rotation and in the temperature of different latitudes, as explaining the origin and the course of the westerly winds, thus giving "the fundamental statement by which many of the meteorological phenomena find their explanation." And it was Kant above all who, when he was thirty-one years of age, propounded the nebular theory of the heavens, independently of Laplace. It was he who uttered the tremendous thought that originally the entire universe was one vast, nebulous mass, extending over dimensions inconceivable; that the thickening of different masses caused the first sidelong motion, and that hence arose the revolving spheres and the present order of the solar system and the constellations.

The nebular theory bears the names of the two men to whom it owes its origin: it is called the Kant-Laplace theory. And Kant's name is thus handed down to posterity with honor, as in part the author of one of the grandest of scientific hypotheses. This was no dreamer of dreams, no man given to blowing soap-bubbles of theory into the air. He was a man of science, a student of science, a teacher of science; one who enriched science with positive knowledge, and who retained his interest in science until his latest breath. It is perhaps necessary to forewarn the hearer of this at the outset, so that, when he shall hear statements which may seem to him wild and impossible, he may remember the source from which they come, and be cautious in uttering hasty condemnation.

Now, this man Kant not only undertook to measure the heavens, as it were; he undertook also to measure the human reason and fathom its depths.

We here come to the Kritik of Pure Reason, a work whose centennial anniversary occurs in this year and in which lies the central difficulty of Kant's thought: The purpose of that work may be briefly stated to be an examination of the reasoning faculty, with a view to ascertaining just what sort of and how much knowledge it can give us. Kant himself had at one time been under the glamour of the old philosophy. He had attempted to prove the existence of God on grounds of reason. He saw the philosophers everywhere trying to climb the glass mountain of metaphysics, and always slipping back before they had at all approached their goal. It occurred to him to ask whether the goal they aim at is at all approachable; and, if that goal cannot be reached, what other goals the human reason can reach? In brief, to answer the inquiry, What is it within the power of our minds really to know? The result of the book is that we can know only that which it is possible to verify by the help of the senses; that beyond sensation or possible sensation we have only ideas; that these ideas are not worthless, but that they do not give us knowledge.

But this is a mere preliminary view and first rough statement of the results of the Kritik of Pure Reason, and we must enter somewhat more deeply into the subject, if we would understand the true meaning of the Kantian thought. Let me begin by giving you a technical statement of the main content of the Kritik, a sort of logical skeleton which we shall try to clothe with flesh and blood later on. That there are difficulties in understanding it, I know; that objections will arise, I am aware,—swarms of objections, like swarms of stinging gnats that obscure the object around which they gather, will arise around every point of the Kantian philosophy as it is successively put forth. They arose in my mind, these swarming objections: they arose, doubtless, in the minds of many of the scientists who to-day in effect accept the Kantian theory. But what I claim is that, if we only take time enough to think out the matter, the essential ones of these objections can be driven off, and the Kantian theory will be substantially found to stand.

Let us then set forth our logical skeleton, nor let us be dismayed if much that may here be stated cannot be wholly clear. We shall attempt to give the concrete counterpart of the abstract thought presently. Kant starts out by calling attention to the difference between analytical and synthetical judgments. An analytical judgment is one in which the predicate is already involved in the subject. Thus, if I say, Charles is a man, that is an analytical judgment, because the predicate, man, is already involved in the idea of Charles. A synthetical judgment is one in which the predicate adds to our knowledge of the subject. Thus, if I say, Charles is a hunchback, that is a synthetical judgment, because it is not involved in the idea of Charles that he should be a hunchback. The next step is to define the meaning of the word a priori; and this is done in the definition that all such knowledge is to be considered a priori which is both necessary and universal. Now, that analytical judgment should convey to us a priori knowledge is easy to understand and really obvious; for, since the predicate is involved in the subject, it cannot be helped that, wherever the subject is given, the predicate also should be implied of necessity and universally. But the question whether synthetic judgments can also convey to us necessary and universal knowledge is of a different sort. In the synthetic judgment, the predicate is added to the subject as something new, which increases our knowledge of the subject. How, then, can we be sure that our new knowledge is universally and necessarily true? This is, technically considered, the bottom question of the Kritik.

The question, "Are synthetic judgments a priori possible?" is written by Kant at the head of his great work. The whole book is intended to demonstrate that synthetic judgments a priori are possible. The principle of synthetic judgments, a priori, is the constructive principle by which the whole philosophy of Kant is built, the root out of which it all grows. In order to briefly indicate what is understood by synthetic judgments a priori, let me say that Kant discovers such judgments to be the basis of mathematics, as well of arithmetic as of geometry.

Let me again remind you that by a priori knowledge we mean necessary and universal knowledge. Now, Kant calls attention to the fact that, when we say seven plus five are twelve, we have a conviction that seven plus five are always twelve. No matter whether we mean seven balls and five balls or seven apples and five apples or seven stones and five stones, or seven anything and five anything, we have a conviction that seven and five always and of necessity are twelve. Whence comes this certainty that the result is necessary and universal? Is it from induction? We do not need any long-continued induction to assure ourselves of the result. A child, as soon as it is able to understand what we mean by seven and five, agrees in the conclusion that the sum must be twelve. Nor would all the inductions that we are able to make justify us in saying more than this: that in so and so many cases we had found that the sum of seven and five is twelve. But it would never give us the right to say, as we do say, that the sum of seven and five must always and of necessity be twelve. And so, in geometry, the proposition that two parallel lines, even though they be prolonged ad infinitum, can never intersect, is a synthetical judgment a priori. Whence do we derive our certainty that this is so? Who has ever prolonged two parallel lines to infinity? And who can tell whether two lines, now parallel, might not somewhere on the road to infinity cease to be parallel and intersect? The answer is given that, in the mind, however far we may think of them as prolonged, we can only think of them as still parallel. It is then from the notion of space we have in our mind, and not from space as we know it in experience, that we obtain our certainty. And so in regard to the proposition that every point on the circumference of a circle is as distant from the centre as every other point of the circumference. How do we know that this is so? Have we ever seen a perfect circle in nature? Is it possible, with the greatest skill, to draw a circumference in which, when minutely examined, every point shall be found really as distant from the centre as every other? Is it not again the notion of space which we have in our own minds that gives us the idea of the circle, that leads us to accept the always imperfect circles of nature as tokens of what we mean, as sufficient representatives of the thought of the perfect circle which we have within ourselves and which we bring to the contemplation, not which we get out of nature, not which we copy from nature, but which we lend her from the storehouse of our own minds? And so Kant is led to show that we have original notions of space which we do not obtain from experience, but which we need to have in order to make experience at all possible; or, rather, that there is that in our mental constitution which generates the idea of space, when the impressions of the senses on their part call it out. For Kant is the opponent of innate ideas. His a priori has nothing to do with the old scholastic intuitionism. He does not believe in ready-made geometrical axioms lying boxed up in the mind, ready to be taken out when wanted. He does not believe in an idea of space or an idea of time or an idea of God, ready to walk out of the mind when its presence is desired. He simply says that there is a principle of coördination in the mind itself, to which the impressions derived from the senses are subjected, and which is not itself derived from the senses. And, because the axioms of mathematics rest upon this principle, therefore we know them to be universally and necessarily true,—true, because they depend on that which is part and parcel of our own mind.

And so he declared that there is a principle within us out of which grows the idea of space. The idea of space is in us. What it may be outside of us we do not know. We see the starry heavens, we see from the mountain-top the broad lying lands and the woods and the lakes and the sea. These are pictures of the mind. They stand for a reality, they are wholly real to us; but what they may be to other beings, whose minds are different from ours, we do not know. And so he maintains that there is in us a principle of arrangement, out of which grows the idea of time. Time also is an idea in us, and what it may be outside of us we do not know; and the dependence of time upon our consciousness is even more easily seen than the dependence of space upon our consciousness. We measure time by the succession of our conscious states. When we are not conscious, there is no time for us. In sleep, time is obliterated for us. When our affairs are many, when we have many different states of consciousness succeeding each other within a brief interval, time is long. Sometimes we seem to have lived through a year in an hour; and sometimes an uneventful year, when we come to look back upon it, seems no more than an hour. When we dream, there is no time for us. When we are dead, there will be no time for us. If the whole human race were obliterated from the face of the earth, there would be no time at all. Time is based upon human consciousness. What it may be outside of human consciousness, nobody can tell.

And so Kant went on to say that the law of cause and effect, too, is based on a principle of arrangement inherent in our mental organization. For many are accustomed to say that we gather the law, that every effect must have its cause, from nature; that we watch causes, and see that like causes have in innumerable cases always been followed by like effects, and that we generalize, and say that like causes must always have like effects. But Kant has wholly inverted this faulty process of reasoning, and has shown that, in order to watch the first cause for its effect, and another cause for its effect, we must already have in mind the scheme of cause and effect; nay, that, as in the case of mathematical axioms, the certainty with which we predict the necessary and universal connection between cause and effect can only be due to the fact that that connection has its basis in the very constitution of our own minds.

Now, if we remember that the laws of nature are but special cases under the law of cause and effect, we shall perceive the revolutionizing consequences to which this view of Kant must lead. All the great laws of nature—the law that governs the interchange of night and day, the law that governs the procession of the seasons, the law that makes the wind blow and the rivers run, the law that causes the earth to cohere, the law that causes gunpowder to explode—are but particular ways of stating a primary law which has its origin in our own minds. Hence, the tremendous assertion which Kant was led to put forth,—that we prescribe to nature its laws. The light by which we read nature is in ourselves, the power which construes the material universe is mind power. The stream of influences that works outside of us is indeed a stream, a part of which we catch in the forms of our mind; and so much as we receive into these forms we know, and other beings that have narrower forms than ours will have a narrower world than ours, and other beings that have more capacious forms of thought, or forms of thought of a different kind, than ours, will have a larger world and a world different from ours. This, then, roughly outlined, is the thought of Kant. It is an immense thought. It seems to us, when we first begin to take in all the consequences that follow from it, like a mirage, that overturns the stable notions of existence.

And yet science, concrete, practical, cautious science, substantiates this boldest theory that philosophy ever put forth; science kindles its torch at the light of the Kantian thought. For let us pause a moment, and consider what the new science of the physiology of the senses has proved. In former times, men believed that the outside world enters bodily, as it were, into their minds through the gateway of the senses, or that pictures of things outside of us are, as it were, photographed on the brain. The recent results of natural science show that nothing of the kind is the case. We have five senses,—the senses of sight, hearing, taste, smell, and touch. Now, it has been shown that the nerves which communicate these five kinds of sensation are to be considered, figuratively speaking, like telegraph wires, each of which is connected with its own instrument in the brain, and gives its own peculiar report. When the optic nerve is affected, it reports light; when the nerve of hearing is affected, it reports sound; when the nerve of taste is affected, it reports sweet or bitter or sour. Now, the point to be remembered is that, in whatever way these nerves are affected, they give the same report. Let us take the optic nerve as an illustration. When the eye is open and the optic nerve is affected by the waves of ether that undulate in every direction through space from the sun, the optic nerve reports light in the brain. But when the eye is closed, and when you succeed in irritating the optic nerve by some other means, lo! it gives the same report,—light. When, for instance, you press against the eyeball, and thus irritate the nerve, or when in a dark room you irritate the nerve by electricity, or when the blood rushes to the eye, or when in sickness the blood is disordered and thus irritates the optic nerve,—in all these cases, light is reported in the brain. The irritation of the optic nerve by the waves of ether is only the most frequent kind of irritation. But there are other kinds of irritation that produce the same result,—a report of light. Hence, we see that light is in the brain, not outside of us. There is no such thing as light outside of us. Outside of us are waves of ether. You say you are sure that there is light outside of us. I say no. If there were no optic nerve, there would be no light, there would be only waves of ether, and these waves might be reported as something totally different,—not light at all in a being with different nerves from ours. Another remarkable point is that, even in ourselves, these self-same waves of ether are differently reported. These very waves of ether, when they are too long to be taken in by the eye, and when therefore it is dark around us, affect our sense of touch and are reported as heat. The very same wave-motions are reported to us in the one case as light, in the other case as heat. Is it not, then, plain that these wave-motions are neither light nor heat; that light and heat are sensations within us; that it is true that there is something which corresponds to light and warmth outside of us; but it is not true that light and warmth themselves are outside of us? And the same line of reasoning could be extended very much further. You look forth upon nature: you say you are sure that the sky is blue, that the grass is green, that the leaves are yellow in these autumn days, that the rose is red, and that lilies are white. All this brilliant pageant of color delights you, and you say you are certain of its existence. But ask yourselves. What is color? By color, we denote the power which objects have of reflecting certain waves of ether to our eye; and it is our eye which sees the color in them. And, if there were no eyes like ours there would be no redness in the rose and no whiteness in the lily and no greenness in the grass and no beautiful blue in the sky. The proof of this is color-blindness.

Nor is it to the eye alone, but to all the senses, that the same argument applies. What is it that seems the most concrete, real quality to the ordinary man, which he will be sure that it is, whatever else is not? It is hardness. Men speak of hard facts, hard realities. Now take a stone or a brick, and consider what we mean when we say that it is hard. Simply that, when we press against it, we have the sensation of resistance. But whether it is hard or not, outside of our sensation, is a question that has not even a meaning. Take up this brick, and ask yourselves what qualities it has that are independent of us who look at it. Its hardness, as we have just seen, is only another name for a peculiar mode of our sensation of touch. Its red color is a name we give to a peculiar mode of our sensation of sight. Its square form is perceived by us in accordance with a principle of coordination we have within us, that we call space. What then is it, outside of its relation to us human beings? We cannot tell. We have not the faintest conception of what it may be, except as human eyes regard it. We have not the faintest idea of what things are in themselves: we know of things only as they appear to us. We stamp the idiosyncrasies of our mental organization upon the data of the senses, and that gives us all our knowledge of the world in which we live and move. Even the wave motions of ether of which I have spoken as going on outside of us do not really exist outside of us in any other sense than light or heat does. The idea of motion results from a combination of the two ideas of space and time. But what motion may be independently of our human notions of space and time we cannot begin to guess.

And yet let no one therefore say that the world is a dream or an illusion. The world is real to us. Any other reality we do not need, and cannot by any possibility attain. What though the rose is red only to us? That does not make its damask beauty less beautiful. What though the moonlight is light only to our eyes? That does not make its fairy sheen less splendid. What though the solid earth be solid to us only? That does not make it for us less solid. We walk safely among these realities. We are on friendly intimacy with the unknown Powers. The laws of our mind give us only one interpretation, it is true, of the world; and other interpretations are possible. But the point of safety, the point that Kant has emphasized, and that has so often been misunderstood, is that our interpretation, so far as it goes, and for us, is correct. You need not fear to step on the flag-stones, when you leave this hall; though they are hard for you only, they will always retain for you their hardness. The things of the world we know only by their properties in relation to us. But these properties in relation to us do not change, so far as they have been correctly determined by the laws of science. The laws of science—that is, the laws of the human mind—are the sole guarantee we have of the reality of anything that is. So far as we arrange and classify the data of sensation with the help of our notions of space and time, of substance, of cause and effect, and whatever other categories our mental apparatus may include, in so far they are real. And there is no other test of reality than the test of reason.

This was the striking, startling, fruitful thought that was born out of Kant's mind into the ages. It takes years and years to appreciate it in all its bearings and wholly make it one's own. Kant compared his own work, in the introduction to the Kritik, to the work of Copernicus. As Copernicus had reversed the supposed relation between the earth and the sun, so he reversed the relation between man and the outer world. Let this be his name, the Copernicus of Philosophy. And when he broke through the bonds of illusion, and showed us that this world is only our world, he rendered the greatest service to morality as he had previously rendered the greatest services to science. He cleared the ground whereon adamant systems of ethics may be built hereafter. His service to science has been extolled, his service to morality has not begun to be recognized as it ought. Kant showed that the whole intricate web of our experience depends for its certitude upon the laws of our mind. They alone give reality to what is real. But there is in our mind the idea of a supreme law, of a law universal, a highest generalization, a complete world formula, the ideal of science! Nowhere in nature do we find this ideal law: it is none other than the moral law. The moral law is the supreme generalization of human reason. The ideal of science is the task of ethics. And now, if all the lesser laws of mind have reality, if they are in truth the guarantee of every thing that is real, then it is to be presumed that the supreme law of reason must also have reality,—nay, a greater reality than all other laws. The moral law is the profoundest reality of the world. This is that foundation of ethics on reason, which has been so often indicated. It is the work of Kant.

Kant's work was an event in universal history, and a wave of enthusiasm among his contemporaries rose to meet it. Men travelled for miles and miles to see the sage of Königsberg, and hear explanations of his ideas from his own lips. Professors were sent by the King of Prussia and other princes of Germany to Königsberg, for the same purpose. Baggesen exclaims of Kant, "After Christ, this one is to me the most interesting man among all that have lived." Of Count S. it was said, after returning from a visit to Kant, he came back like Moses from Mt. Sinai, the halo of revelation still about him. The more sober praise of the greatest among his contemporaries is even more to his honor than these exaggerations of the enthusiastic. Schiller says, "The philosophy of Kant has only one opponent that will stand in its way: only prejudice will stand in its way." And his devotion to Kant's ideas he illustrated in his work on the æsthetic education, a work which is thoroughly permeated with the Kantian principles. Goethe says, "Kant is without doubt the most eminent of modern philosophers: his teaching bears continuous fruit, and has penetrated most deeply into German culture." Jean Paul says, "In Kant, not a single luminary, but a whole solar system, has risen upon the world." William von Humboldt, after a remarkable outburst of praise, in which he says that Kant undertook and accomplished the greatest work that perhaps philosophy has ever owed to a single man,—after extolling the union in him of depth and acuteness, of unexcelled dialectic and truthfulness, of deep feeling as well as deep thought,—sums up with the words, Concerning Kant, three things remain unmistakably certain: some things which he has destroyed will never again be built up; some things which he has founded will never again be destroyed; and, what is most important, he goes on to say, Kant has taught men not only philosophy, but how to philosophize.

Thus, indeed, it may be said of Kant "that he has satisfied the best men of his time, and so has lived for all time." Twelve years he labored in preparing the Kritik of Pure Reason. He was an exceedingly laborious student. His personal habits were of the utmost regularity. Every morning, summer or winter, he lectured at seven; and his lecture-room was usually crowded. The students sometimes collected as early as six, in order to secure their seats. Kant himself rose punctually at five. He lectured till nine or ten, and then returned to his study and continued his labors until one. At one o'clock, he took his dinner. He was accustomed to take only one meal daily; but he was fond of the society of friends at his meals, and guests, one or two, sometimes even four or five, were never wanting at his table. It pleased him to sit for hours after the cloth was removed, and this was his time for recreation. Then, humor, anecdote, brilliant satire, flowed from his lips. The philosopher was forgotten. A man of acute political insight, of fine literary taste, and withal the most courteous of hosts, displayed himself. These after-dinner sittings sometimes lasted till four or five o'clock, and his friends valued not a little the privilege of sharing them.

Kant was never married. He lived plainly in three rooms. In front, a reception-room, then the study, and, in the rear, a little bedroom with one window. So great a mind did not need splendid surroundings. He was a man of small stature, barely five feet high, feebly built, with scant muscular development and bent chest; but with a high, broad forehead, cheeks from which a healthy, ruddy glow did not depart even in advanced old age, and a radiant blue eye. Children loved him. He was of a most benevolent disposition. In later years, he spent nearly the whole of his salary in works of charity. He was the friend and counsellor of those in distress. Especially after the publication of his work on virtue, many persons, who found themselves in moral perplexity, turned to him for advice, praying that he might be their guide. And he ever strove to respond to these appeals with strict conscientiousness and regard for the responsibility they implied. But old age was now coming on with quickening pace; and he began to feel more and more the burden of his years.

In the year 1797, on the 14th of June, the students of the university appeared before him in a body, to give him their last salutation before his retirement from his professorship. For forty-two years, he had been the light of the University of Königsberg, and had devoted himself with unswerving fidelity to its interests. But he could continue his much-loved labors no longer. It is sad to watch the decline of day, it is sad to see the decline of the year; but, oh, what sadness can compare with that with which we watch the decline of human genius! For Kant, that period of sad decline had come. In 1802, his memory began to fail him. When a friend came to visit him, he was unable to find the right phrase in reply to a question that was put to him. The friend sought to help him; but Kant begged him to wait, and then himself repeated all the phrases he could think of until at last he hit upon the right one.

He was now compelled to note down on little slips of paper everything that he wished to remember. Some of these slips have been preserved. In five different places, we find the words, "My barber's name is Rogale." What pathos is in these words! One could weep in reading them. The great Kant reduced to this!

In 1803, he could no longer walk. Frequently, he fell; but he made light of it, saying, with a sweet smile to his anxious friends: "Do not be alarmed. You see I cannot fall heavily, I have so little weight." At night, he was troubled with wild dreams, so that, notwithstanding his weakness, he would seek to rise from bed, and his servant would often find him prone on the floor in the morning. He loses the power of human speech. From now on, he must be propped up with pillows in an arm-chair. He sits for hours silent. Only when some question of natural science is touched upon in conversation by the friends that surround him, he will sometimes break forth with some brilliant remark, showing that the power that once sent its lightning into the world was not yet wholly gone. On the 5th of February, Dr. Elsner, his attending physician, rector of the university, paid him his usual daily visit. Kant rose with great exertion from his chair as the doctor entered, and succeeded with much difficulty in uttering the words, "Busy—Rector—visit." More he could not say. A friend who stood near divined his meaning, and said, "No doubt the Professor means that, because you are Rector and so busy, he feels doubly grateful for your daily visit." Kant's face lit up with pleasure as he saw that he was understood; and in clear, unhesitating words he now said, "You are right: the sense of humanity is not yet dead within me." It was his last painful effort. On the night of Saturday to Sunday, the 11th of February, 1804, he was troubled with an agonizing thirst. To the friends who offered him drink, he merely shook his head, and said, "It is well." At eleven in the forenoon, he breathed his last.

It had been his wish to be buried early in the morning, in perfect stillness. But his many friends, the authorities of the university, and great numbers of the community in which he lived, urged their desire to do him honor. Accordingly, on the 28th of February the body was carried from the house of mourning, followed by an immense throng, composed of representatives of every class of the population, while all the bells of the city were tolling, and was received by the curator of the university and the academic senate. The funeral obsequies consisted of a cantata composed by Himmel, and two orations delivered by students of the university. It was a significant fact that students were selected to deliver the last words over the great master. For them he had labored, for the future he had toiled; and it was fitting that they, the representatives of the future, should receive him as he passed from among the living, and in the name of all the generations yet to come assume the guardianship of his name and fame.

The philosophy of Kant is the gateway that leads from the past into the fulness of the present: it marks the dividing line between the old and new. In the ancient monarchies of the East, it was customary to begin a new epoch of time from the date of the succession to the throne of the reigning king. With greater justice than this was ever done before, the modern world will date a new epoch of human development and human freedom from the time when there succeeded to the throne of reason the royal thought of Immanuel Kant.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IS A COLLEGE TRAINING DESIRABLE FOR FREE RELIGIOUS TEACHERS?

To the Editors of The Index :—

SIRs,—In the issue of The Index for October 13, last, was an editorial entitled "A New Step." This article stated that the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association at their last meeting had "voted to appropriate $500 as the beginning of a 'fellowship,' for aid in training teachers for societies that wish to organize on a Free Religious basis. This sum is for the use, for one year, of some young man who is a college graduate, and who desires specially to prepare himself for this kind of work. Besides being a college graduate of fair standing, the qualifications for receiving the benefit of the 'fellowship' are," etc.

It is concerning the requirement that the person receiving the benefit of the fellowship must be a college graduate that I wish to speak. I want to ask why it is considered necessary that the student selected should be a college graduate? Is it impossible to obtain the requisite culture for a teacher of Free Religion, or in other words rationalism, freethought, humanitarianism, outside of a college?

Is Free Religion indebted to the colleges for aid rendered in any appreciable degree? I think not. Nearly all colleges in this country, at least, were established for the benefit of some particular religious sect, to educate young men for the ministry, for the purpose of upholding degrading superstitions and lying traditions. They are essentially conservative, and whatever of liberal ideas they have adopted have been forced upon them by the progress of science and the pressure of public opinion. Now, what qualities are essential to a teacher of Free Religion?

It seems to me that before all else it is absolutely necessary that such a teacher must have as far as possible a sound, incorrupt judgment. It is evident that the opinion of a person whose mind is biased on any subject is practically worthless regarding it. When the government selects a jury, it aims to choose men whose opinions are not settled concerning the case to be tried, well knowing that a prejudiced man's judgment, no matter what his learning, is of no value.

In searching for truth, learning, experience, and intellect avail nothing, if we allow prejudice to retain possession of our minds. As I have said before, colleges are naturally conservative. The main tendency of their training is to inculcate in their pupils reverence for musty tradition, pious fanaticism, and tyrannical ecclesiasticism. Radical thinkers who were college graduates have become what they are in spite of their collegiate training. There is scarcely a college in the land that has not a D.D. for president. What does D.D. mean? It signifies that the person bearing the title is learned in theology, or the knowledge of an infinite God. What can a finite being know of an infinite God? Nothing. The science of theology is nothing but a systematized aggregation of the absurd fancies, dreams, and wishes of a multitude of diseased, fanatical "cranks." What are their opinions worth on any question with which religion has the remotest connection? Nothing! Absolutely nothing! Let us remember that the colleges are controlled by just such men and their followers. The colleges originally taught nothing but theology, the classics, and the higher mathematics. Any study that was thought likely to promote investigation, and draw men's minds out of the deep ruts of slavish superstition by causing them to think and reason, was suppressed. To-day, the sciences and liberal arts are also taught to a greater or less extent; yet every science and art with few exceptions had to fight its way into the curriculum by the aid of an irresistible public demand, in spite of the opposition of the D.Ds.

We often hear the claim made by the clergy that they have always been friendly to science; and they always have been to their ideas of science, which were almost invariably false. True science has never had their support.

For every radical thinker that graduates from a college there are twenty hide-bound bigots. I am willing to give the colleges credit for all the good they have done and are still doing. The advance of civilization has compelled them to teach something useful, in spite of the efforts of priestcraft to suppress everything of the kind.

As yet, however, it is the next thing to a miracle for a young man to go through one of these colleges and not be surrounded by such a dense atmosphere of theological presumption, mystical philosophy, and ostentatious pedantry as to be practically incapable of learning anything new or different from his preconceived notions. Not until we have a university wholly emancipated from theological and scholastic influence will it be possible to obtain an education worthy of the name inside college walls.

Concerning the necessary qualifications for a teacher or student of Free Religion, I believe, if a young man has a good knowledge of the common-school studies, has sufficient knowledge of theology to confute its absurdities, a logical mind, abounding zeal and energy, and above all, as far as possible, a sound, unbiassed judgment, free from the mystifications and entanglements of theology and so-called Christian philosophy, that such a one is fitted for either position, whether he is a college graduate or not. If the Free Religious movement is intended to elevate humanity in general and not for the benefit of a privileged class or sect, it must not select its leaders from those whose minds have been systematically warped and corrupted by theological and scholastic influences, but must choose men for what they are worth, considering a sound judgment by far the most needed qualification, and that great erudition is by no means indispensable.

W. H. LOVELL.

MILLBURY, MASS.

P.S.—To fully realize how much a collegiate and theological training succeeds in corrupting one's judgment and reasoning faculty, we have only to listen to or read a few of the sermons which are inflicted upon the people every few days by such men as Talmage, Newman, Tyng, and many others.

FROM ARKANSAS.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., Nov. 29, 1881.

I send papers marked that may be of some interest to you. Liberalism is growing here, but in a quiet way, since your lectures in this city. No League is now in existence; but the genuine Liberals, many of whom you met, are working for the cause in their own way. Liberals here are of so many different views that I have not much hope for the present of an organized society. I have determined to limit my labors to distributing liberal literature. Mr. R. L. Goodrich reads the next essay before our Eclectic Society on "The Origin of Religion." All the educated freethinkers of the city, among whom the essayist above named is included, as well as the clergy, belong to this society.

Yours truly,

CARL JONITZ.

BOOK NOTICES.

MY FIRST HOLIDAY : or, Letters Home from Colorado, Utah, and California. By Caroline H. Dall. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881.

There is an exceedingly pathetic implication in the title of Mrs. Dall's book, seeing that she is already "looking toward sunset." And, seeing that it was her first holiday, it is a pity that her enjoyment of it was not more complete. "Desolation and dreariness" are the words with which she sums up her impressions of California in her dedication. The contrast between her book and Miss Isabella Bird's three books of travel is remarkable, and is just what we should not expect from the nationality of the two authors. The Englishman is a proverbial fault-finder on his travels. The American is proverbially good-natured. But Miss Bird is good-natured under the most trying circumstances, and Mrs. Dall is always drawing on a private fund of virtuous indignation. Can it be that American women have the disposition of English men and female Britishers the disposition of male Americans? As yet, we have not facts enough for a complete induction.

It is no drawback to the interest of Mrs. Dall's book that she is not so optimistic or so easily pleased as the run of travellers. Her disillusion gives a spice to her chapters, that is by no means disagreeable. And while, here and there, the reader is permitted to indulge a faint suspicion that a different subject would have been affected differently by some of the objects mentioned, it is hardly to be doubted that much of her fault-finding is in perfect keeping with the facts of Western life. What she says of California climate and of California fruits will find an echo in many a sad experience of her fellow-creatures. The touches upon Leadville and Salt Lake City make the book still more valuable and interesting than it would otherwise be. In conclusion, Mrs. Dall heeds well the Emersonian injunction, "Hitch your wagon to a star"; for she tells with overflowing tenderness how the news of Garfield's death came to her across the early morning air, while she was standing in the dewy grass that grows upon the grave of "Abram Garfield," the Massachusetts ancestor of the murdered President.

MASSACHUSETTS IN THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT. By Harriet H. Robinson. Boston: Roberts Brothers, publishers. 1881.

Those who remember with what interested sympathy and in what respectful tone "Warrington" always wrote of woman and her cause in his admirable letters to the Springfield Republican will understand the source which inspired that sympathy in reading this book from the pen of his widow. Mrs. Robinson is an earnest woman suffragist. Every page bears impress of her strong feeling on the subject. She possesses in a high degree the courage of her convictions, and does not hesitate to express her opinions in regard to men and things wherever it comes in her way as an historian to do so. Her style, while not remarkably eloquent or ornate, is clear, vigorous, and graphic. Mrs. Robinson has done good service to her sex in writing this volume, as she has gathered together a goodly array of facts not hitherto easily accessible, whose meaning is worthy of careful study by all men, and in regard to which no woman, and particularly no Massachusetts woman, can afford to remain in ignorance. She complains in the preface of "being hampered for want of authentic data"; but, in spite of this, she has managed to mass in orderly sequence many interesting facts, including much that has not been generally known in relation to the movement during the last half-century, nor does she fail to strengthen her statements by opinions gathered from the best thinkers on this subject. The history is brought up to the latest date—to May, 1881.

Mrs. Robinson confesses herself gratified at the progress made in the advancement of woman in all planes of life and the many opening avenues of employment and education for her, and is full of hope for her full enfranchisement in the near future. She has great faith in the benefit of constant, unwearied importunity, and urges her sex everywhere to persist unceasingly in the demand for the ballot and equal rights. On the whole, this book is well adapted to stir anew flagging enthusiasm and to infuse new life and courage into all women who are discontent with, or disheartened over the present status of the sex.

Mrs. Robinson appropriately dedicates her book in these words: "To the young women of Massachusetts who enjoy the fruits of the labors of those whose names are recorded in these pages, I dedicate this book, with the hope that, since they find the path so well opened to them for better educational, social, and political advantages, they may bear in mind how much the Woman's Rights Movement has done to clear the way."

LANDOR. By Sidney Colvin, M.A. New York: Harper Brothers.

This volume is the last published of an admirable series, "English Men of Letters,"—last, but not least. On the contrary, it is one of the best of the series, fit to rank with the Scott of Hutton and the Wordsworth of Myers in the quality of its workmanship, though treating of a theme remoter from the sympathies of the majority than the work of either Scott or Wordsworth. Mr. Colvin has no difficulty in discerning the causes of his scanty popularity. One with his age in his passion for liberty and his spirit of humanity, and with its culture in his Hellenic admirations, he often chose the subjects of his art from fields remote from popular information; and he took no pains to make his readers at home. It is even possible that he enjoyed their baffled curiosity. But he was a great artist in prose and verse, and a critic of the highest rank. Mr. Colvin has such admiration for his writings as consists with frankest recognition of their faults. The estimate of Landor's personal character as made by Mr. Colvin is much more favorable than that which has become traditional. "At worst," he says, "he is like a kind of gigantic and Olympian school-boy,—a nature passionate, unteachable, but withal noble, courageous, loving-hearted, wholesome, bountiful, and sterling to the heart's core." Our own Emerson's admiration of Landor should have done more to raise up readers for him than it has yet accomplished.

A YEAR OF MIRACLE. A Poem in Four Sermons. By W. C. Gannett. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis, publisher.

This little book will make an appropriate and tasteful holiday gift for the friends who are possessed of poetic or devout tendencies. It is a prose poem on the seasons, made up of four sermons: on winter, "Treasures of the Snow"; spring, "Resurrection"; summer, "Flowers"; autumn, "The Harvest-Secret." Considerable scientific information is intermingled with the moral and religious lessons drawn from the different seasons by Mr. Gannett. While the book is religious in spirit, it is liberal in tone, and is so entirely unsectarian that it will be read with pleasure by all devout persons of whatever form of Christian faith. It is nicely printed, and presented in a neat and tasteful binding.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE.—The number for October opens with Count d'Alviella's narrative of his visit to Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, and Niagara Falls. To show how powerful the Church of Rome is in Canada, the traveller tells the whole of a story which has hitherto been but partly known, and has called forth great interest. In 1844, a literary society, called L'Institut Canadien, was founded at Montreal by some young Roman Catholics, who numbered seven hundred in 1858, when the bishop commanded that heretical books and journals should be excluded, and, when this was refused, announced that the sacraments should be refused to all who belonged to the Association. Half of the members withdrew at once, but the rest were still under the ban, when one of the most highly honored, named J. Guibord, died, November, 1869. He had been, in all other respects, a faithful Catholic; but his widow was refused permission to have his funeral celebrated in her church, or his remains buried in the family lot in the consecrated cemetery. She went to law, and, dying before the suit was decided, left all her property to the Institute to carry it on. A favorable decision was reached in 1874, but the first attempt to lay Guibord's body beside his wife's was defeated by a mob who threw stones at the hearse; and it was necessary for the mayor to call out all the police, who formed, with volunteers, a procession of over one thousand men, before the burial could be accomplished. The Institute triumphed for the time; but when our friend visited it in September, 1880, he found the building closed, and learned that the members had either withdrawn or turned Protestants, that the collection of ten thousand volumes had been offered to the city government for a public library, but that this plan also was opposed by the Church. It has not yet been carried out. The other contents are a translation of Mme. de Dinckelage's story of The Dominie, and several educational, political, æsthetic, and literary essays.

THE editor of the North American Review states that he has found it impossible to conduct that publication "in the spirit of the motto adopted by its founders, making it a forum of independent thought, and extending, at his discretion, the hospitality of its pages to thinkers and scholars of all creeds and forms of belief, and at the same time to maintain relations with a publishing house having extensive school-book and other interests of its own to promote," and announces that the Review will hereafter appear under its own imprint. Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. issue a circular stating that "the connection between us and the North American Review was terminated by our action, and not by that of its editor. We decline to continue to act as publishers of the Review distinctly, because we consider certain articles that have appeared in its pages blasphemous in character, and hence an offence to good morals, and not because we supposed our interests in other departments would be affected thereby." Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. have published several as thoroughly atheistic books as were ever written; but they are of a kind not read by the masses, and hence their publication did not excite the ire of the clergy and the religious and semi-religious press. If Col. Ingersoll had devoted the space allotted him to a discussion of the "Absolute," or

"The Objective and the Subjective," however atheistic his conclusion, his articles would have given no great offence. But he wrote in a style to interest common readers; and the views he expressed, although presented in several works published without scruples by the Appletons, suddenly became "blasphemous in character, and hence an offence to good morals." "Consistency, thou art a jewel!"

PERSONAL ITEMS.

ANNA DICKINSON will begin her dramatic tour January 2, at Providence.

R. A. PROCTOR is to edit a new scientific journal in London, with the title of Knowledge.

CIRCUMSTANCES growing out of illness and death in his family compel B. F. Underwood to postpone all lecture engagements outside of New England till January.

WILLIAM CLARKE, of London, whose able articles on the English Land Question, published in this paper, are attracting attention, will speak at Leicester next Friday evening.

It is stated that Dennis Kearney and I. S. Kalloch have fallen out. We have wondered how even the "orator of the sand lots" could keep such company as that of Kalloch so long.

In his address before the Spanish Chamber of Deputies, Señor Castelar pleaded boldly and eloquently for the appointment of freethinkers to professorial chairs, requiring intellectual and moral worth only as a test of fitness.

JUDGE COX, who is presiding at the Guiteau trial,—which must also be a trial of his own patience,—is said to be in his private life a man of the purest and most exalted character and in his public duties calm, judicious, and thoroughly conscientious.

JAMES K. APPLEBEE delivered at Parker Memorial last Sunday an able and eloquent discourse in defence and illustration of evolution in religion. It was highly appreciated by the audience. Mr. Applebee will soon speak again from the same desk.

GEO. H. ELLIS, of this city, will soon issue Gems of the Orient, a volume of sayings, aphorisms, and choice extracts from Persian, Hindu, and other Eastern writings, collected by Charles D. B. Mills, of Syracuse.

ANDOVER's professors are getting flighty. First, we have Professor Phelps declaring in favor of a revival of demonology; and now comes Professor Gulliver, who says, "The language of the Bible is often so ambiguous on a point of physical science as to suggest the strong probability that it is purposely so,—by the divine intention and superintendence."

THE pastor of the Congregational Church at Stratford, Conn., used the revised New Testament. The officers sent him a written order to return to the King James version. "The ignorance thus shown by a people to whose enlightenment I have devoted myself," says the minister, "so disgusts me that I will no longer read any Scripture for their benefit. I have resigned."

PHILOSOPHER ALCOTT celebrated his eighty-second birthday on the 29th ult., and is enjoying a hale and hearty old age. The papers which record this fact also ungallantly record that his daughter Louisa turned forty-nine on the same day. If they record truly, she will soon have to be accounted, in the words of the title of one of her charming stories, "an old-fashioned girl."

HANNIBAL HAMLIN, when passing through France on his way to his mission in Spain, paid visits to President Grévy and Minister Gambetta, both of whom received him with great cordiality. They assured him of the sympathy of France with the United States, and expressed their hope that the relations between the two great republics would be of the friendliest character.

CHRISTMAS SERVICE.

A Christmas Service for the Church and Sunday-school together, or for either alone, is now ready, published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, 40 Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois. Eight pages, containing Responsive Readings with Anthem and Chant, and six Carols, Price $2.50 per hundred. Specimens will be sent on receipt of a three-cent postage-stamp.

MASSACHUSETTS IN THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

By Mrs. HARRIET H. ROBINSON. Price $1.25.

"Mrs. Robinson is the widow of a man who has achieved a wide reputation for his brilliant letters to the Springfield Republican and other papers over the nom de plume of 'Warrington.' Like her husband, Mrs. Robinson is devoted to the cause of woman suffrage; and she has been one of the most prominent and zealous of the workers in behalf of what she considers her down-trodden sex. She is well qualified by ability and experience to write the history of the woman suffrage movement in Massachusetts, and she has done so. The time covered by her history is from 1774 to 1881, and she presents the general, political, legal, and legislative history of the movement. Mrs. Robinson is a bright woman, and makes her work extremely interesting. Of course, she is prejudiced in favor of the suffragists; and her history bears pretty hard on those who have opposed the movement. But it is a woman's privilege to scold; and, if she scolds well, it is entertaining, and the scolded ought to be able to bear it with equanimity, even enjoy it."—Boston Post.

THE MAN JESUS.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK. Second Edition. Price $1.00.

"Rev. John W. Chadwick tells us in the preface to 'The Man Jesus' that his object is to 'contribute something to a rational understanding of the human greatness of Jesus in the minds of those who have not the time or opportunity to read those voluminous writings in which the modern study of the life of Jesus has embodied its conjectures and results.' The author ignores entirely the supernatural element: he accepts the most advanced views with regard to the authorship and authenticity of the Gospels, and he makes use of the most radical interpretations of the New Testament narrative. With points of doctrine, we, of course, have nothing to do here. We can only say that Mr. Chadwick's work throughout is marked by the most reverent regard for the example and teachings of Jesus, that he brings home to the reader, as few others have done, the tender, affectionate nature of his great subject, and that he has revealed, under the robe of tradition, the throbbing of a human heart. Even the bitterest opponents of the views which Mr. Chadwick adopts must acknowledge that in the field of literature it is a masterful performance, luminous with the teachings of the gospel of humanity and a wonderful knowledge of the place and time of which he treats."—Says the Boston Traveller.

MY FIRST HOLIDAY;

Or, Letters Home from Colorado, Utah, and California.

By Mrs. CAROLINE H. DALL. 12mo. Price $1.50.

"It is refreshing to get hold of a book of travel that is written in a spirit of honesty and common-sense. The author of these letters went West in search of health; and, while she was travelling in the Far Western States, she kept her eyes open, and carefully noted what she saw. The result is she has given us a very accurate and trustworthy account of the experiences of a traveller in those parts, and has also shown up the existing state of things in many respects. 'The glorious climate of California' is one of the greatest of frauds. The delightful climate of Colorado does furnish relief to consumptives by hastening their deaths, and so putting them out of pain. These facts the author observed, and does not seek to disguise. The Indian and the Mormon questions are also vigorously discussed in these letters. Nevertheless, the author does not seek to abuse or cry down the West. There is a heap to be seen and enjoyed there, and she saw and enjoyed it. And her descriptions are extremely well written and interesting. Anybody contemplating a visit to the West, either for health or pleasure, had better read this book; for they will get a great deal of valuable information as well as much pleasure from the perusal."—Says the Boston Post.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

The Springfield Republican.

The Leading New England Newspaper.

Enterprising — Honest — Independent.

Established: The WEEKLY in 1824; The DAILY in 1844; The SUNDAY in 1878, by Samuel Bowles.

THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN has long been recognized as the leading and representative newspaper of New England, and is more widely known and quoted than any other. Its growth and present position are unique. There is no other daily newspaper in the world, published in so small a city, that has so large a constituency and so potent an influence on the thought of the time. During the past year, the circulation of the daily edition alone has advanced from 11,000 to 12,000. THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN, besides its large circulation in New England, has a considerable and growing audience at the West and South, and even abroad.

In politics, THE REPUBLICAN is thoroughly independent and honest. Its motto is, "Print the news and tell the truth about it." This it aims to do carefully, fairly, and conscientiously. It has its own opinions on all public questions, and is not slow to express them in vigorous, intelligible English; but it recognizes the rights of opponents, and is not afraid to print criticisms of itself and its views. THE REPUBLICAN at present labors especially for a thorough reform in the civil service, a sharp, intelligent, and impartial revision of the tariff, and a sound financial system. It belongs to no party except that of reform, but it applauds the good and condemns the evil in all of them.

THE REPUBLICAN is not simply a political newspaper. It touches in its news reports and editorial discussions every interest of life, and undertakes to inform its readers of the progress of events and of thought in all directions. As a New England journal, it is intended to make it a complete mirror of New England life, an indispensable guide to every one who would know this section and its people. It devotes large attention to literature; it deals intelligently and liberally with all questions of philanthropy, social economy, ethics, religion, science, and industry. THE REPUBLICAN supports a large staff of trained writers, editors, and reporters; and, though published in a provincial city, it maintains the machinery, displays the enterprise, and enjoys the facilities of a metropolitan journal.

THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN

Will be found a valuable paper anywhere. It is a compact, comprehensive, and well-edited review of American life from week to week, and of the affairs of the world generally. Its summaries of news are prepared with great care, special attention being given to the presentation of New England news. Its editorial articles discuss broadly and with independence a wide range of topics. Its correspondence is of an unusually high character. Frequent stories and choice bits of poetry lend variety to the paper and increase its attractiveness. Each number contains a column of religious intelligence. Agricultural matters are fully treated, particularly those that are local to New England, this department having a long list of well-known contributors, among them Dr. George B. Loring, United States commissioner of agriculture, Dr. Paul A. Chadbourne, Dr. E. Lewis Sturtevant, and Major Henry E. Alvord. Market reports are published with special reference to the information of farmers. The Weekly, in a word, contains the cream of the Daily and Sunday editions closely edited, and its own special agricultural matter besides.

Subscription Rates.

THE DAILY REPUBLICAN is 3 cents a copy, 75 cents a month, $9 a year.

THE SUNDAY REPUBLICAN is 5 cents a copy, 50 cents for three months, $2 a year.

THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN is 4 cents a copy, 75 cents for six months, $1.50 a year. A liberal cash commission is allowed to postmasters and others acting as local agents.

All subscriptions payable in advance. Specimen copies free.

PROFESSOR MOMMSEN writes to his constituents that "the principal duty of the Liberals is to persevere doggedly in the path they have marked out for themselves, until a second spring dawns on Germany. The German people are not only more powerful, but also tougher than Prince Bismarck."

Two thousand delegates, representing forty thousand farmers, were present recently at a demonstration held at Aberdeen, in connection with the land agitation. Resolutions were adopted demanding reduction of rent, compensation for improvements, and other legislation in the interest of the tenant farmers of Scotland.

THE German national guests' appreciation of the courtesy shown them by our leading Cabinet officer has been delicately and felicitously expressed since his return to Europe by Baron von Steuben, who telegraphed to the Secretary of State that the son, born to him two days after his return, had been named "Blaine Steuben."

It is said that General Sherman's visit to the Cotton Exposition at Atlanta, where he faced former foes in the spirit of true amity, and his frank words of reconciliatory friendship for the reconstructed South, have done much to bridge over what little opening is still left of the "bloody chasm." It is quite time that the ghastly chasm was filled up and put out of sight by brotherly deeds and wishes from all sections of this great Union.

AMENDMENTS have been proposed in the Spanish Chamber of Deputies for abolishing oaths and modifying other rules in regard to political oaths of allegiance, in order that deputies who are not Catholics or Christians may take the oath according to their faith, or dispensing with it altogether may substitute for it a simple promise to obey and maintain the laws of the country. The party in power is pledged to favor this reform, and the amendments have been offered with the consent of the Ministry.

WHILE there are thousands of Union soldiers who could easily have obtained pensions from the Government, but who, able to maintain themselves, have declined to ask for aid, there are others on the list of pensioners whose claims are fraudulent. It has been suggested that the names and addresses of all government pensioners should be published. This would help to expose imposture and fraud, and would be but an act of justice to the people and to the deserving veterans whose names are on the pension rolls.

THE general opinion of President Arthur's message is that it is a calm, dignified, and comprehensive document. It discusses reform questions with a candor and directness of expression which were not generally expected. The frankness of the President in dealing with the civil service question, and his views in regard to suppressing polygamy among the Mormons, meet with general approval. Even those who expected only a vague and colorless official statements are compelled to admit that the message is an unusually well-written, able, and statesmanlike paper.

SOME Russian fashions are worthy of adoption by more advanced nations. A lecture is given twice a week in the streets of St. Petersburg, describing the contents and extolling the merits and advantages of the great public library which contains more than a million volumes. One such lecture is given every Sunday, when the streets are quiet and the people presumably at leisure to listen: another is given on a week day. Rigid religionists as the Russians are, they yet understand how to utilize Sunday for the people's good, in one respect at least.

THE conduct of Guiteau under trial, and the testimony offered the past week, have strengthened the general conviction that the assassin, although a "crank," belongs to a class that are morally responsible for their acts, and upon whose minds the fear of punishment has the same effect that it has upon the minds of other men. The object of punishment by the State is the prevention of crime. Doubtless, all men who in this age and country resort to murder to accomplish their ends are persons of unbalanced minds, but their unsound mental condition does not render them indifferent to punishment, and should not exempt them from the penalties of the law.

THE fact that the President devotes about one-eighth of his message to the consideration of the Civil Service problem is some indication of the prominence of this subject in the public mind. Although President Arthur has been regarded as among those who are opposed to any change in our methods of making appointments to office, and in his message shows misgivings as to the results of rigid competitive examinations in this country, he says, "If Congress should deem it advisable at the present session to establish competitive tests for admission to the service, no doubts such as have been suggested shall deter me from giving the measure my earnest support."

THE Methodist Judicial Conference at Terre Haute has voted fifteen to four against entertaining the appeal of Rev. H. W. Thomas from the action of the Rock River Conference. His expulsion from the Conference, therefore, is a settled fact, and he is no longer a minister of the Methodist Church. This fact under the circumstances "is greatly to his credit." He will now occupy an independent position; and, as ecclesiastical organizations are modified mainly by forces from without, the expelled heretic, while speaking to an independent congregation, will help form that general public sentiment which is constantly modifying the creeds and liberalizing the spirit of all the Churches.

THE British Government has fostered the opium traffic to such an extent that the present annual revenue on this article delivered at Chinese ports is, it is stated, nearly thirty-five million dollars. The statesmen of China, seeing the ruinous effects of this drug, have done what they could to discourage its use. The Chinese Government has suppressed opium dens, and issued proclamations appealing to the people to have nothing to do with the vile stuff. The importation of opium would be prohibited at once, if this were possible without a war with England, whose statesmen, although they are fully aware of the disastrous effects of the traffic on the Chinese, are unwilling to deprive the British Government of the enormous revenue derived from it.

AN exchange says that in the town of Jackson, Ohio, a Catholic community, "the only school in the place, although supported from the general State fund, is managed in the interests of the Church; and the Catholic Bible is used as a textbook and the Catholic catechism is taught. The community is very ignorant; and, as the management of school money is plainly in violation of the law, there is a prospect that some missionary work will be done upon it by the State authorities." There is as much justice and propriety in the use of the Catholic as of the Protestant Bible. The proper work of "the State authorities" is to exclude all theology from the Jackson school and all other public schools in the State, and make them entirely secular.

CASTELAR made a speech in the Spanish Cortes recently, which is pronounced one of his greatest efforts. He said he had sacrificed much by revolution, and would sacrifice more, if necessary; but he thought important reforms could now be accomplished by agitation on the platform, through the press, and in Parliament. Science and learning, he said, must be free from State and Church tyranny. The professional man in the pursuit of truth must be beyond the reach of fanaticism and despotism. He desired progress and liberty combined with benevolence and humanity. Alluding to the form of government existing in the United States and to President Garfield, he asked, "How can we forget that noble chief of a free people who fell at the post of honor, a martyr to duty, after an honorable and brave career, an example of Republican fortitude, and torn by the hand of a cowardly assassin from his devoted wife, his loving children, his true colleagues, and a great nation?"

MR. O. B. FROTHINGHAM'S THEOLOGICAL POSITION, PAST AND PRESENT.

If the wide-spread discussion of Mr. Frothingham's religious views, which the Evening Post reporter started, were to lead to a more general reading of Mr. Frothingham's books, it will have accomplished at least one good object. His "Religion of Humanity," his "Cradle of the Christ," his "Transcendentalism in New England," his "Life of Theodore Parker," his volumes of collected discourses, are rich mines of liberal thought. In the department of critical essays on religious problems, his literary work will stand among the first. The grace and easy elegance of his style, the wealth of illustration, the breadth of reading and culture, the critical acumen mingled with the large toleration, the entire freedom from the dogmatic spirit, the lofty moral tone, the perfect intellectual serenity, the fascinating boldness, yet always reverent, with which he invites you to look over the edge of the profoundest abysses of speculation,—these are elements which carry the reader of his books irresistibly along, whether friendly to his thought or not. For full and incisive statement of the problems which confront the religious world to-day, for large comprehensiveness of outlook, for fair and candid consideration of all the facts, both those that natural science brings and those that are furnished by the history of religions, these books are almost without a parallel.

But if the reader goes to them seeking a definite, logically wrought out, and thoroughly compact and finished system of religious philosophy, he probably will not find it. The separate sentences are compact and definite enough; but they do not always round, in the essay or discourse, into a systematic whole. Mr. Frothingham's work, as shown in these books, was largely critical, and yet by no means wholly so. It was also in good part constructive. But it was tentatively constructive. He indicated the direction, drew some of the outlines of the coming religious philosophy, but he did not profess to give a complete logical statement of it. He started questions which he frankly admitted his inability to answer. None the less he trustingly claimed the right of the human mind to start them, and as trustingly believed in the capacity of the human mind to find in time all needed solution of its inquiries.

It is evident that Mr. Frothingham, at least in all his later thinking, out of which most of his books have come, inclined very strongly to, if he did not plant himself firmly upon, the basis of science. It has been said that he could never quite become a Transcendentalist, even when Transcendentalism was the magnet that was drawing all the progressive young minds of New England Unitarianism into its upper skies; though he claims for himself, and probably more truly, that he did once take that flight. Yet he was all ready for the acceptance of those scientific doctrines which have in our generation set all the religious problems in a new light, and for the application of the scientific method to the study of religion as to all other investigations. The theory of evolution not only explained for him outward creation, but the history of religion and of morals as well. He was led by it theologically into considerable sympathy with agnostic views. In morals, he said, as plainly as Herbert Spencer: "The experience of humanity begets the conscience of humanity. . . . Moral truth has not been so much communicated to the world as extracted from the world." And yet, while these modern scientific theories of religion and conscience had this strong hold upon him, he has not hesitated at any time to make excursions into the domain of Transcendentalism and the intuitive philosophy, and to appropriate their language, if not their ideas, when science seemed to fail to cover all the facts. In this respect, he has been in his position and work the counterpart of that brilliant co-worker in the rational religious movement, John Weiss. They equally kept abreast with the discoveries of science, and made themselves familiar with the physiological explorations of the realm of human consciousness. They were equally fond of using science both for fact and illustration. But, while Frothingham took science as his base, and journeyed as occasion required into the transcendental realm, Weiss was an intuitionist, and valiantly remained so to the last, and yet as valiantly made incursions into the domain of science, and welcomed and even claimed all her proved facts, even though aware that he would have hard work to make his intuitionist theories cover them.

Mr. Frothingham, however, has never been so eager a propagandist of any theory of religion as was Mr. Weiss. His work has not been that of the impassioned advocate of a system of thought, but rather that of a critic and sifter of systems already formed or forming. He has been a shaper of thought and of thought-conditions toward a system of religious philosophy yet to come; and in this work he has rendered an inestimable service.

Now, the broad sympathies, the eclectic spirit, and the hospitable attitude of mind which belong to a position like this make it easy to pass from one mental mood to another without any real change of opinions. As said in these columns two weeks ago, Mr. Frothingham appears now disposed to bring to the front and place more emphasis upon certain views which he has always held and which may be found in his books again and again, though more in the background. If, for instance, he now seems to have less confidence than he once manifested in science as the solver of religious problems, see the same doubt expressed in this extract from his History of Transcendentalism: "Transcendentalism carried its appeal to metaphysics. At present, physics have the floor. Our recent studies have been in the natural history of the soul. Its spiritual history is discredited. But the human mind ebbs and flows. The Bains and Spencers and Taines may presently give place to other prophets. Psychology may come to the front again, and with it will reappear the sages and seers. In that event, the religion of Transcendentalism will revive, and have a long and fair day. For it can hardly be supposed that the present movement in the line of observation is the final one; that henceforth we are to continue straight on till by the path of physiology we arrive at absolute truth; that idealism is dead and gone forever, and materialism of a refined type holds the future in its hand. The triumphs of the scientific method in the natural world are wonderful. The law of evolution has its lap full of promise. But one who has studied at all the history of human thought; who has seen philosophies crowned and discrowned, sceptred and outcast; who has followed the changing fortunes of opposing schools, and witnessed the alternate victories and defeats that threatened, each in its turn, to decide the fate of philosophy, will be slow to believe that the final conflict has been fought, or is to be, for hundreds of years to come."

These sentences are followed by a discussion of the question of human consciousness, with references to leading philosophical and scientific writers; and in the course of it, while the leaning to the side of the scientists as against the intuitionist school as hitherto known is plainly manifest, yet Mr. Frothingham intimates that the final solution will include the essential truths of both sides. It may here be appropriately added that the sympathetic and hospitable quality of Mr. Frothingham's mind is shown by the fact that, though not a Transcendentalist, he was yet able to write the history of the New England Transcendental movement with such thorough and warm appreciation.

Again, in a discourse on "Instituted and Ideal Religion," we find the same appreciation which he now expresses of the value of religious institutions for preserving the religious sentiment and nourishing goodness. Having spoken of the danger that this externalism of religion will become mere formality and hypocrisy, he says: "And yet it is not all hollowness and hypocrisy, even in the most stubborn cases; for this peril thus incident to all institutions is in some degree compensated by a certain steadfast and solemn grandeur, an impressiveness as of divine things, fixed, immutable, and everlasting, which fills the mind and gives solid reality to a spiritual world; which keeps passion habitually quiet. As I have in foreign churches, Catholic or Protestant, seen the still crowds of worshippers; as I have beheld their devout postures, and listened to the words that were spoken with evident feeling, though without intelligence, I have felt that the mere presence of instituted and time-honored thoughts, uncomprehended and unappreciated as they were, might be better, much better, than utter vacancy and blank indifference, better than positive coldness and callousness,—infinitely better than the haughty contempt which thoughtless and sometimes excessively critical people pour upon ideal splendors that have filled intellectual worlds with their glories."

In a discourse on "The Soul of Truth in Error," there is a return to the same sentiment and an enlargement upon it, with manifold illustration. The creeds of the past, however irrational and abhorrent now, are shown to have covered some important truth, and to have done a service in their time and place. And in this same discourse the author speaks of the soul of truth in errors on the other side, as in materialism and atheism; and, in referring to the errors of materialism, uses the same language that he would use, perhaps with somewhat more of emphasis, to-day.

And this discourse contains a passage which so aptly illustrates Mr. Frothingham's present theological attitude, as he stands looking still to the future for the complete solving light, that with it our survey may fitly close: "To believe that the mind of man is ever pushing toward light, though it may never reach its source; to be sure that while 'our little systems have their day,' they cease to be only because their 'broken lights' must give way to clearer senses,—such a belief makes all systems positive, all creeds respectable, all confessions honorable. It abolishes enmity between schools; it suggests a brotherhood of believers; it brings East and West and North and South together in bonds of peace, makes voices formerly discordant and quarrelsome ring in unison, and proclaims aloud the symphonies of faith. The symphonies of faith, I say, not the indifference of creeds,—the identity of the thinking principle, not the equal value of its results. It is the soul of truth that is venerable, not the thing erroneous; the questioning mind, not the incoherent answer. The beliefs are arrested thoughts. Let them go. The thought that cannot be arrested,—let that pass on."

WM. J. POTTER.

CHARACTERISTICS OF FREETHOUGHT.

In The Index of December (1881) there is an admirable description of the Freethinker, quoted from an exchange. It affirms that a freethinker may be religious; that he never antagonizes religious faith, unless it assumes infallibility or the right of suppressing opposing views; and that it consists essentially in the right to think and express itself without restriction within the bounds of moral decency. This is the social and political aspect of freethought; and with that I fully concur. But this description suggests another aspect of the subject coincident with this,—the psychological aspect, on which I wish to say a few words. Supposing society imposes no restrictions to freethought, there are certain psychological conditions which must be fulfilled before any man can be actually a freethinker.

One of these is personal independence relative to other minds. There are men who take the hues of every surrounding object. They have no definite intellectual individuality; and some of this class are too pliable to receive from any source any permanent impression. There are others who are equally incompetent in the opposite direction. Much of their intellectual action is the product of personal or social or party antipathy. They may be hard as flint in their mental composition, and as definite and expressive as sculptured marble; but mentally they are always "in opposition," and the rigid attitude will change with "a change in the situation." To such minds, freethought is impossible, and to them the term is void of any just meaning. They have no mental rectitude and self-balance. They never veraciously weigh and consider, and make equal efforts to understand and appreciate opposing claims, theories, and arguments. The whole intellectual work of both these classes is confined to the exhibition of the thought of others, one of which does it by coincidence, the other by opposition.

The freethinker, on the other hand, moves among intellectual forces, himself a force; and he, faithfully, to the best of his ability, compares himself with them, and them with each other, and thence draws his conclusions free from all bias except that which intelligence itself enjoins, which is not a bias in the common meaning of the word. No one, indeed, can be purely and absolutely an intellectual force in perfect poise, and so this is the ideal freethinker only; but every man will deserve credit as a freethinker, in proportion as he approximates this ideal. From this class, we must exclude mere iconoclasts of all kinds,—intellectual levelers, Nihilists, mere battlers against whatsoever is old, established, venerable, sacred, and religious. From this class, also, we must exclude all who have adopted the liberal plume because they have received some real or fancied wrong from the conservative or orthodox party in Church or State or other quarter; and the name of these is legion.

Another psychological condition of freethinking is exemption from the oppressions of dogma-born fears of all kinds. I do not mean that anticipative concern which intelligence begets, but the dread which is the product of irrational impressions. Such impressions, for instance, are often made in early years by representations of the moral vindictiveness of Deity, and, in spite of superior intelligence, they long persist in some minds, and in yet others they never entirely fade away. In vain may such minds say that these impressions are the effects of error, that they are calumnious, blasphemous. They cannot be always perfectly free in their thinking. Their thought is liable to occasional impress from the old tyranny. I have known many men to be intellectually halt and lame from such causes all their life, conservatives with a gilded leaden bonnet on their brains.

The bondage of fear may have a moral cause. To bad men, Justice takes on the visage of a Fury, which they fear; and so they may be led to seek relief in moral scepticism. These can never be the subject of freethought, except in spots; and in them it has never any principle or guarantee. One radical bias precludes all preassurance of intellectual rectitude anywhere. Personal, selfish considerations of all kinds will, in a degree, operate to the same effect.

It would hence appear that genuine freethought is somewhat rare and precious, and that we have far too little of it in the world. Freethought is unbiassed thought, thought for truth's sake, irrespective of all consequences to self or others. It is only the good man of exceptionally fortunate gifts and training who in any great degree can be a freethinker. Freethought exists only in shreds and patches, in various degrees of purity and power. We may boast of it much when we know little about it, and are the slaves of some blind force of nature or circumstance. Its prime characteristic and guarantee are intelligence and virtue.

We hence learn that freethought is not determined by the holding of any class of opinions whatsoever, whether theism or atheism, naturalism or supernaturalism, heterodoxy or orthodoxy. It consists in the character of the man and his habit and spirit and principle of intellectual action. I think this has been too often overlooked, and that freethought has been not infrequently confounded with antitheism. But theistic and orthodox thought may be as free as any of its various opposites. A man may thus freely study the evidences; and, being convinced by them, he may with equal freedom accept the authority of Revelation and submit to its teachings. But, though a freethinker, he may not be so liberal in his opinions as some other freethinkers. He may not, does not, deem all thought equally good, though he will allow that, if honest, it is innocent. He will affirm moral distinctions, moral responsibilities, and an immortal existence of moral fruitage, while others may deny all this; and to them he will seem comparatively illiberal. This is inevitable where freethinkers differ. Equally free, they cannot be always equally liberal. Let us then be liberal so far as we can; but let us above all things cultivate freethought, which may possibly include the widest mental differences, Orthodoxy and its extremist antagonists.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Independent meets our criticism of two weeks ago in this wise:—

The editor of The Index declares that we have borne false witness in that we say that Mr. Frothingham declares that "the tendency of free religion is downward." It is free thought, we are reminded, not free religion, that Mr. Frothingham was speaking of. The distinction is to us less clear than to The Index. That paper, which has just deliberately dropped the prefix Free Religious from its title, ought to be supposed to understand just what free religion is, and perhaps conceives itself to be a little freer than when its freedom was limited by this word religious. But all the freedom of thought concerned in what Mr. Frothingham was talking of was in religious thought, and we do not see that there is any great distinction. Certainly, the free religious organization, of which Mr. Frothingham was president, took a turn of freethought with a vengeance, so that all decent people connected with it were disgusted.

If the Independent sees little or no distinction between free thought and Free Religion, we do; and it may be presumed Mr. Frothingham does. At any rate, it would have been more just to keep to the text which the Independent was professing to follow. But let that pass, as also the curious reasoning in the sentence referring to the fact that The Index has recently returned to its old name, thereby coming again alongside of the Independent, without the word Religious in its title. But there is a weightier matter now for the Independent to look after. In the effort to defend itself from our accusation of bearing false testimony, it has fallen into the greater sin of making a grossly calumnious charge. We call upon the Independent either to verify the statement made in the last sentence of the extract above quoted or withdraw it. When did "the Free Religious organization, of which Mr. Frothingham was president," make that turn to free thought which disgusted all decent people connected with it? And how have these people manifested their disgust? The successor of Mr. Frothingham as president of the Free Religious Association (and he was never president of any other "Free Religious organization") is Prof. Felix Adler. He has held that position three years. Among the vice-presidents of the same organization are Ralph Waldo Emerson, George W. Curtis, Prof. Edward L. Youmans, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Hon. Nathaniel Holmes, of St. Louis, and Judge Hoadly, of Cincinnati. In its list of other officers are Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, William C. Gannett, John C. Haynes, Richard P. Hallowell, Minot J. Savage, C. D. B. Mills, and others. All the above named, in both lists, have held their positions for several years, and some of them from the beginning of the organization. Now the Independent must have evidence that these persons, and many others of equally good repute, who might be named in the roll of membership, are or have been disgusted with the Association, or else it puts them in the pillory as indecent people. We ask for the evidence.

THE New York Tablet begins an article on Mr. Frothingham in this sweet and catholic (!) fashion:—

A Recanting Infidel.

The Rev. Mr. Frothingham seems to be emerging from his self-inflicted obscurity. Like Ingersoll, he strutted before the public for a brief period as a materialist, a freethinker, and an infidel. In all and each of these characters, he attracted considerable attention; for, like Ingersoll, Max Adler, and others of that school, the man possessed considerable ability both as a speaker and writer.

In these ten lines, including the heading, there are at least seven distinct misstatements, not to mention a general atmosphere of ignorance pervading the whole. The same spirit runs through the entire article, and does not seem calculated to convince Mr. Frothingham that "he will find the spiritual peace and repose within the bosom of the holy Roman Catholic Church" which the writer at the close offers him, and thinks "his soul evidently craves."

THE Christian Register of December 1 contained a full report of a sermon by Dr. Bartol on "The Reported Words of the late President of the Free Religious Association." Dr. Bartol gives rather more authority than we do to the interviewer's statement; but he comes to the same conclusion with us, that Mr. Frothingham is not going backward. The sermon says, "He is not going back to any Orthodox, Episcopal, or Romish Church, more than to an exploded, blown-up, and abandoned fort." Dr. Bartol, hospitable from the first to the Free Religious Association, has yet been its censor as well as friend; and into this discourse he injects quite a severe criticism of it, and makes some statements concerning it which will receive notice next week.

THE Presbyterian evidently thinks that Mr. Frothingham's anonymous interviewer's theological statement can be made to do best service by using it piecemeal, apart from the modifying connections in which the pieces originally stood. Here is a specimen of its method:—

Mr. O. B. Frothingham, the forward apostle of Free Religion in New York, admits that "revealed religion is stronger, both in Europe and America, than it was twenty years ago."

This phrase "revealed religion," which occurs several times in the interviewer's concocted speech, is especially pleasing to the fancy of the Evangelical journals; and it has staggered not a few liberal thinkers. Let us make it, therefore, a text for a little discourse. The present writer knows, from Mr. Frothingham's own lips, that, if he used this phrase at all, he used it to designate the general group of Evangelical sects and Churches in their capacity as religious organizations, and did not use it to designate the popular doctrine of the supernatural origin of religion. And this is the interpretation that would most naturally occur to any one acquainted with Mr. Frothingham's views. In this sense, too, the statement is doubtless correct, and is what liberal thinkers have repeatedly said before. Ecclesiastically, the Evangelical Churches in this country, at least, are as strong as, if not stronger than, they were twenty years ago. But this is by no means to say that the doctrine of supernaturally revealed religion is as strong as it was then. And this Mr. Frothingham did not say. This doctrine, as others once firmly held by the Evangelical Churches, has as certainly weakened greatly in the last twenty years, under the influence of free inquiry and historical criticism. If the interviewer's sensational story had been subjected, especially after Mr. Frothingham's own letter, to a little more discriminating study (if it was thought worth while to give it regard at all), pages of aimless discussion, on both the conservative and the liberal side, would have been avoided. There are four statements which, in our view, made the substance of that now famous conversation: (1) that science, in its purely material researches, does not explain everything; (2) that some of the most demonstrative forms of the practically applied materialistic philosophy, both in this country and in Europe, are not wholly satisfactory; (3) that the Churches persist as organizations to satisfy some natural demands, while changing to more enlightened and liberal forms of doctrine; (4) that free-thought makes as yet little or no headway in organization outside of churches. And every one of these statements might be made by a liberal thinker, if he observes as well as thinks, of the most advanced standing.

A DAMAGING COINCIDENCE.

It is certainly a damaging coincidence that negro slavery is only found lingering, in this hemisphere, in communities in which Romanism is the prevailing faith. We also find gross popular ignorance, a belief in shrine-cures, and all sorts of exploded superstitions, survivals of the childhood of the world, still nestling under the wings of the Mother Church, wherever she is the established religion. It is not wonderful, then, that slavery of the body should be found correlated with mental and moral or spiritual slavery. In two Roman Catholic countries of this hemisphere,—namely, Brazil and Cuba,—slavery, albeit the general ear has been abused with a pretense that it is undergoing a gradual process of abolition, in effect "still lives," and men, women, and children are still put up at auction to the highest bidder. There was once a phrase in vogue, which originated with a famous politician long since deceased, who made a distinction between "a man and his act." Brazilian and Cuban slave-holders are equally subtle casuists. It is not men, women, and children whom they are selling, but their "services" for a term of years, or until such time as their days of bondage expire by statutory limitation. Practically, Brazilian or Cuban slaves or slave-born persons never experience the benefit of any abolition act, which may have been passed to secure their ultimate emancipation. There is nobody to interfere in their behalf against their powerful masters, who are loath to part with laborers who cost nothing in the shape of wages.

The Emperor of Brazil, if we mistake not, poses as a liberal, enlightened ruler, a devotee of science and art, and a thoroughly modern man in all his ideas. Nevertheless, his slave-born subjects who are cheated of their statutory rights find no vindication at his hands. Meantime, Dom Pedro is a devout Roman Catholic, as have been all his ancestors of the Lusitanian royal blood. Portugal was indeed for ages, down to the time of the famous minister Pombal, who was the terror and scourge of the Jesuits, and to the close of the eighteenth century, the era of revolution, little better than a vast monastic establishment. Her princes and nobility were abject devotees rather than able administrators and men of the world. Dom Pedro is not exactly that; but he and his Church, which is the keeper of his conscience, can hardly afford to continue indifferent to the rights of his slave-born subjects in these days of freedom and universal publicity. The Roman Catholic Church is an old institution, but not so old as slavery, which is utterly out of date.

An impression prevails that the Church in question is ready to coöperate with any species of despotism which will yield it protection. Furthermore, it is charged that only by migration into modern, liberal, and enlightened countries, where toleration and freethought are the rule, can the people of Roman Catholic countries get a taste of the good things of current civilization, such as popular education, worldly prosperity, and the franchises of free and independent citizenship. But priests now follow their migratory subjects and children, in order to see that they are not seduced from their spiritual allegiance and to warn them against the "godless" school systems, which free governments deem it indispensably necessary to provide at the public expense, in order to render the masses intelligent, free moral agents, capable of exercising their reasoning faculties and forming their own opinions and judgments. The priestly assault on common schools is ill-advised, to say the least of it; but the upholders of lost causes always provoke their final ruin, and have themselves to blame for it. The Roman Church is by the very logic of its absurd pretensions to infallibility and immutability bound to be everywhere a dead weight and drag on human progress. Bismarck at last has come to have a proper appreciation of Romanism, and is making it his ally in his insane attempt to repress the free spirit of the age. Only a few short years ago, the great Teutonic minister of brute force, the man of blood and iron, was the bogey of Romanism, and regarded by priests and laity alike as their arch-foe.

But the shrewd Prussian has changed all that, and transformed the papacy into his tool. He finds himself, in his mad career of repression, in the same boat with the successor of St. Peter; and a community of peril has made him wondrous kind toward the Holy See. He has not been obliged to go to Canossa, or to humiliate himself in the least to secure its friendship. He has only to remove the heavy hand of power, which he had laid upon its priesthood in Germany. Priests of all religions now are at a discount, and the Pope is no longer formidable. Indeed there is not a government in existence, with the possible exception of that of Spain, which would lift a little finger in his behalf. He is simply a high priest, who is likely ere long to become an itinerant, a bird of passage, without a fixed abode. Under such circumstances, he is not to blame for coöperating with Bismarck; but, in doing so, he is in bad company. Bismarck, without the prestige of Sedan and Sadowa, could not defy the popular sentiment of Germany, as he is doing to-day; and, even with that prestige, he cannot do it much longer. In the words of another, "Prince Bismarck seats himself by the shore of modern politics, and orders back in earnest the current of his time. The waves of the democracy he has dared to trifle with sweep away even now the sandy basis of his power, for in Germany there are all the elements of a political deluge ready at hand. Of all the nations of civilized Europe, Germany is that in which revolution seems nearest at hand, and will when it comes be most dangerous." So writes a sagacious observer of current events and phenomena abroad. The longer the volcano is pent up, the more fearful will be the final explosion.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

In The Index this week, our valued contributor, F. M. Holland, presents his views in a thoughtful and scholarly essay on the morality of the New Testament. Rev. William I. Gill, A.M., author of "Evolution and Progress," for writing which he was in 1875 summoned before the Newark Methodist Conference, but who, more (or less) fortunate than Rev. Dr. Thomas, still remains a Methodist minister, and now preaches to the students of Drew Theological Seminary, favors our readers with an article on the "Characteristics of Freethought." Allen Pringle, in an interesting letter, which will be concluded next week, writes about "Freethought in Canada." Communications from other pens add to the variety and value of the paper. The office editor invites special attention to Mr. Potter's article on "Mr. O. B. Frothingham's Theological Position, Past and Present."

We are receiving many commendatory letters from our subscribers in regard to the changes, which they think improvements, recently made in The Index. Of course, such approval gives us pleasure; and we hope to be able, as soon as our arrangements can be completed, to merit still further the satisfaction expressed by adding to our already fine corps of contributors the names of some of the best-known liberal thinkers and cultured writers of England and America. We are happy to state that next week we will be able to lay before our readers an extremely interesting article from the always pleasing pen of Moncure D. Conway, who will be a regular contributor to The Index the coming year. George Jacob Holyoake also promises us monthly contributions; and Col. R. G. Ingersoll is expected to furnish us one of his racy and eloquent articles, as soon as he "finds time to write." Other attractions will be added during the year. We hope to make The Index, as far as possible, a nucleus of the most advanced and matured thought of the day, and a journal worthy of the support of all intelligent Liberals.

Miss EMILY J. LEONARD, of Meriden, Conn., who is collecting statistics for that State with regard to the enforcement of its Sunday laws, would be glad to receive information from any persons who are acquainted with any facts of arrest, prosecution, or punishment under these laws. She refers particularly to the laws forbidding travelling or doing any secular work or letting carriages for travelling except for necessity or mercy, or engaging in any recreation, attending any concert of music, etc., on Sunday under penalty of a fine. The information should give the details of any attempts to enforce these laws with as much accuracy as possible, and state the result. Miss Leonard may be addressed 57 Pleasant Street, Meriden, Conn.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar.

CO-OPERATION seems to be a success in Philadelphia. A coöperative society there has six stores in prosperous operation. The society is eight years old, and began on a scale of small, but sure profits. The grocery and provision stores have proved the most profitable of the society's ventures. Dry goods and shoe-stores have barely paid their way.

WE are now sending out bills to the subscribers of The Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a favor if our friends will remit at once, and if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew. A number have sent us new subscribers, and we ask all who can to assist us in this way. Let us emulate our orthodox friends in their zeal, and do this much, if not on account of our personal interest in the paper, at least for the cause it represents. Remember also that the most effectual way of improving The Index is to give it the means which will enable those in charge of it to make the improvements desired, and which none desire more than themselves.

REFERRING to the statement of the editor of the North American Review that it is impossible to keep that publication open to the impartial treatment of great questions and keep on the right side of publishers who have large school-book interests at stake, the Boston Herald says: "The only way to obtain an absolutely impartial discussion in this country is not to be under obligations to anybody. The North American is quite able to stand alone, and is rivalled in circulation and influence by only one of the great reviews of the day, the Revue des Deux Mondes of Paris."

THE Investigator Society, an old liberal organization of this city, has been revived; and arrangements have been made for a course of lectures under its auspices. Able and eminent speakers, we are informed, have been engaged.

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE having been represented by a correspondent of the Seymour Times as an Orthodox clergyman, Mr. William E. Coleman wrote Dr. Clarke in regard to the matter, and received the following reply, which we find in the paper above named:—

I do not think that Mr. Graves can possibly be right in calling me "an Orthodox clergyman." I suppose that Orthodoxy means to believe in the trinity, the deity of Christ, his atoning sacrifice, verbal and plenary inspiration of the Bible, total depravity of man, irresistible conversion, and the everlasting punishment of the wicked. I do not believe, never have believed, and am never likely to believe any of these doctrines. I have been opposing them all my life.

THE Springfield Republican, in an editorial commenting upon the moral turpitude found to exist among the young people of many suburban communities in New England,—a turpitude which has of late years resulted in an amazing amount of tragic crimes,—ascribes this state of things to "a decay of social life, the old restraints of the Church, and the old traditions of New England lapsing and nothing new to take their place," and suggests that, "when the social missionary is raised up to do his work in these country neighborhoods, he will have to start from the old Puritan centre, the Church,—not in the Puritan fashion of irrational dogma and gloomy severity, but in the fashion of the man Jesus, whom the Puritans so poorly understood, with light, cheer, friendliness, earnestness, vigor, the true enthusiasm of humanity, all springing from the union of the heart with an Almighty Father."

THE President recommends for putting an end to polygamy legislation "by which any person solemnizing a marriage in any of the Territories shall be required to file a certificate of such marriage in the Supreme Court of the Territory."

THE Moody and Sankey meetings in Scotland are reported to be rather unsuccessful. It is stated that a majority of the Glasgow ministers refused to sign a call for Mr. Moody's services, on the ground that his ministrations hitherto have been of no permanent service to the cause of religion or morality.

PROFESSOR FERRIER, of London, having been summoned to Bow Street by the Anti-vivisection Society, the British Medical Journal proposes a testimonial to him on the ground that "it would have been hardly possible to select a man for persecution whose researches had done more to throw light on the most important functions of the human race,—those of the brain and the diseases incidental to it."

THE missionary column of one of our religious weeklies contains the following: "The devil is not going to give up Japan without a fight. A missionary states that one of Tom Paine's infidel works has been translated into the language, and other infidel, materialistic, and atheistic works are finding their way into the land through books, papers, and travellers returning from America and Europe. Our warfare has got to be with heathenism and infidelity combined."

THE Herald of Health is inclined to think that some of the so-called "holy" wells, to whose waters devotees ascribe miraculous virtues, should be called instead unholy wells, since many of them are found, after scientific analysis, to be impure and badly tainted. The well in Mecca, whose waters are sent to faithful Mohammedans wherever the Moslem religion prevails, has recently been subjected to such examination, and declared by competent authorities to be "more filthy than seven times concentrated London sewerage." "Is it any wonder," the Herald continues, "that cholera and typhoid fever are spread all over Europe?"

ONE Frank Hall, a notorious desperado, was hanged at Little Rock, Ark., on the 9th inst. "He said he felt happy, and was glad to leave this world of woe. He expected to go to heaven, and believed his sins were washed out by the blood of the cross." This murderer evidently belonged to the class of orthodox believers who found their hopes of future happiness not upon character, but upon creed, not upon moral worth, but upon a scheme of redemption by which they believe the sins of a lifetime may be blotted out in a moment, and the murderer may ascend from the gallows to heaven to receive his crown of glory.

MR. GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, in a letter to the office editor of The Index, writes: "I am afraid Mr. Potter will think I have relinquished my intention of writing every month to you. The truth is I am engaged in writing some Memoirs for the Nineteenth Century, but I intend writing for The Index also, and intended doing it when you were in charge of it during the summer."

SOME ill-natured fellow has returned to this office a copy of The Index containing Capt. R. C. Adams' letter, with the letter marked, and, written across it in large letters, the following words: "If you are trying to make a name for yourself, do as Guiteau did, but do not think you can do so by this means. The Lord he is God!! The Lord he is God!!! You will know this to your cost by and by, in the city of Boston and not elsewhere!!" The envelope in which the paper was returned bore a Canadian stamp, indicating that all the cranks are not in Washington.

THE Catholic Review has an aversion, like the majority of us, to long sermons, and tells of an excellent fashion prevailing in a Catholic church in France, at Pau, where the sexton has orders, which he strictly obeys, to ring a bell as a signal for the close of the priest's oration, if the sermon exceeds twenty minutes in length.

THE English correspondent of the United States Newsdealer declares that the American magazines are becoming powerful rivals of the English monthlies, and are growing more and more popular with the English-reading public every year. Of the Christmas number of Harper's Monthly alone, forty thousand have already been ordered for the English market.

A DUBLIN correspondent of the Catholic World writes: "The Land Act grows rapidly in popular acceptance and favor, as I have predicted throughout. The Land Commission opened on the 20th of October; and now, at the close of about three weeks' operation, there are nearly thirty thousand cases before the court, demanding the fixing of a fair rent, apart from a large number of cases of arrears of rent, leases, other classes of applications under the Act. The Commissioners," he adds, "have so far given decisions that startle the landlords and cheer the tenants. At an average, they have reduced the late rents from 25 to 50 per cent., and with few exceptions have brought them below the Poor Law or Tenement, popularly known as Griffith's valuation, and in almost all cases have decreed the tenants' costs against the landlords. . . . Under the healing influence of the act, better relations between landlord and tenants are returning; large numbers are paying their rents; agrarian outrages are fast disappearing; confidence and credit are improving; and trade and commerce, latterly so depressed, are slowly but steadily reviving." But according to the latest reports disturbances in Ireland are by no means at an end. Opposition to paying rent continues, outrages upon those who have paid are perpetrated nightly, the Land Court is paralyzed by the amount of business forced upon it, and the general feeling is by no means one of confidence and security.

"THE Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," laudable as its purpose is, seems to have done an ill-advised act, and to have overstepped the boundaries of its peculiar province in the arrest of the guardians of the child actress, "Corinne." No cruelty to the child seems to have been proven at the trial; and though her vocation, with its necessary surroundings, may not afford the most healthful moral atmosphere, or one which parents generally would like their children to grow up amidst, yet it appears from all we can learn that "Corinne" has a phenomenal tendency toward stage life, acting seeming to be part of her nature, and it may be questioned whether the "cruelty" is not on the part of those who would take her from her guardians, to whom she is affectionately attached, and compel her to a life to which she is all unaccustomed and unfitted. It is a pity, too, that a society whose very name wins approval for its aims from humanitarians everywhere, should have allowed their counsel to make inquisitorial inquiries into the theological teaching given the little actress by those who claim her, instead of confining their inquiries to the physical, intellectual, and moral training bestowed upon the child. There are children in the city of New York, ragged, dirty, uncared-for, unpraised, abused, for whom this society can do much, and to whom one day of little Corinne's life of petting and praise, even with its burden of hard artistic labor, would seem like a glimpse of heaven.

The Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 15, 1881.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

For The Index.

THE CONFLICT.

There are a thousand voices
That plead within the soul,
And many offer rapture,
And many breathe of dole.

There are wild doubts in legions
Out on the storm's distress,—
Our leaves of hope, that nestle
At last in death's caress.

There are a myriad tempters
That creep within the heart,
And some bring doubt and sorrow,
And in thy fear depart.

Oh! play of Gods and Satans,
Whichever one hath won,— Wrong veils me as the night-gloom,
Right frees me as the sun!

The moves of babbling armies,—
The blow, the hush, the lairs,
The wait, the prayer, the manhood
That fears the fate it dares!

Sweet child of man, we wander
With phantom guides; we feel
For the strong touch that lifts us,
And wise souls that reveal.

Stern are the deathless powers
That vex thy sea: oh, vow
All pity for the lost ones
That were not brave as thou!

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

EVERYWHERE we are confronted by the work of our ancestors,—in the material world, which they wrought out of the morass and jungle; in the spiritual world, which they wrought out of the chaos of sensation. We cannot take a step but in the footsteps of the millions who went before us. We cannot think a thought but the minds of millions have made it possible for us. The axe of the colonist clears the way. What we know of nature is this twofold product of ancestral toil of hand and eye, guided by the mind which hand and eye have educated.—G. H. Lewes.

For The Index.

What Kind of Morality did Jesus and the Apostles Teach?

BY F. M. HOLLAND.

In other words, what virtues have been most honored during the last eighteen centuries? What are the principal defects in Christian teaching? Is the Bible inspired? Should church property be taxed? May we call ourselves Christians? Ought we to be church-goers or non-conformists? Let me give what help I can toward answering these questions. And let me simplify the problem by taking the accuracy and authenticity of the books of the New Testament for granted, merely begging the reader to remember that they are written in Greek, and mostly, if not wholly, in Rome, Athens, and other cities outside of Palestine, though by converts from Judaism, so that the authors may be supposed to have known something of Grecian and Roman as well as Hebrew modes of thought. Nor need I take any note of alterations recently made in those sanctified words which have ruled English and American life for centuries.

I. The grandeur of the New Testament exhortations to purity and love needs no eulogy; but it is well to remember that, though such passages as "Blessed are the pure in heart" and "Abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the soul" show a position above that of the Old Testament as well as of Greek and Roman literature before the days of the apostles, precepts of equal elevation were given by Seneca and Epictetus. Nor should it be forgotten that Plato prayed, "May I, being of sound mind, do to others as I would that they should do to me"; that he makes Socrates forbid rendering evil for evil; that Epicurus said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive"; that, forty years before the birth of Jesus, Cicero declared that "We are created for the sake of mankind," and that "All men are plainly bound together, so that they who say that we should love our fellow-citizens, but not foreigners, destroy the universal brotherhood of mankind with which benevolence and justice would perish"; or that Exodus, Leviticus, and Proverbs command us to do good to our enemies and to love our neighbors as ourselves. (See Plato's Laws, beginning of book xi., and also the close of the Crito; Plutarch's Morals, vol. ii., pp. 180, 374, Goodwin's edition; De Officiis, I., vii., 5, and xvi., 5; III., vi., 6; Ex. xxiii., 4; Lev. xix., 18; and Prov. xxv., 21, 22.) But the new commandment, the Sermon on the Mount, and the parables of the sheep and goats, the good Samaritan, and the cruel servant, must always have unrivalled power and popularity, not only from their eloquence, but from having been spoken by one who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, who went about doing good, and who gave his life to save those who were lost. And when we think of the labors and persecutions, even from fellow-Christians, which Paul endured so cheerfully and for so many years in his desire to teach aliens and foreigners, we are doubly grateful for his vigorous rebukes of various forms of unkindness to others, and his impressive description of the charity that envieth not, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, beareth all things, hopeth all things, and never faileth.

II. But we shall be all the more faithful to the spirit of this teaching, for keeping our eyes open to some defects in the letter. Paul's view of marriage is very sensual, and the peculiar guilt of unchaste actions above that of impure thoughts is disregarded in the Sermon on the Mount. True philanthropy forbids indiscriminate almsgiving; but this is much favored throughout the Bible, and especially in the three first Gospels, which, like some of the Epistles, were written after this error had been pointed out by Seneca, who forbids that charity should be squandered, and says, "Giving to a base man is neither noble nor generous." "Prodigality is never noble, and especially not in charity." "The wise man will give not only to those that are good, but to those whom he can make so, consider to whom he gives rather than what he gives, and help his friends through their strength rather than his own." (De Beneficiis, i., ii., 1; iv., ix., 3; De Vita Beata, vii., xxiii., 5; Epistles, 19, 12, and 109, 6, with other passages quoted in The Reign of the Stoics, pp. 163, 164.) This philosopher's condemnation of the gladiatorial games (Epistle 7, sec. 2) apparently found no echo from the apostles, whose indifference to the wholesale slaughter of wild beasts in the arena is all the more remarkable, because there is not a word in the New Testament in favor of humanity to animals; though this duty had been much insisted on by the Pythagoreans as well as by the authors of Proverbs and Deuteronomy. From the latter, Paul quotes the precept about oxen, but only to say that it does not apply to them. He asks, "Does God care for oxen?" The apostles and evangelists evidently did not. Still worse is their ignoring the guilt of infanticide, a common sin denounced at this time by Rufus, the teacher of Epictetus. Books which do not condemn abandoning little children, nor cruelty to animals, nor suicide, then frequent and much-lauded, were certainly not written under any special inspiration.

And this conclusion is strengthened by the utter neglect of a duty necessary to the discharge of any of the rest, and much insisted on by pagan moralists and legislators, that of health. Paul is even represented as telling Timothy that "Bodily exercise profiteth little," and the unhealthy custom of fasting under excitement is too much favored by both the apostle and his master. (Matt. iv., 2; vi., 16-18; xvii., 21; Acts xiv., 23; I. Cor. vii., 5; II. Cor. vi., 5.) Neither of these great lives gives much sanction to another fundamental virtue, very important to the most recent moralists, as well as to the earliest in all nations. The celibacy of Paul and Jesus, the apostles considering unmarried people morally superior to the married (I. Cor. vii., 32-35), a position incompatible with the language about young widows attributed to him in I. Tim. v., 9-15, and the master's encouraging his disciples to leave brothers, sisters, father, mother, children, wife, and even hate them for his sake, and forbidding men, ready to follow him, to stop and bury their fathers or bid farewell to their family, are not calculated to promote respect for household ties; though these are strengthened by some strong precepts in the Epistles, as well as by the gospel prohibition of divorce. Very significant is the absence of precepts in favor of mental culture, especially as Jesus treats the scholars of his nation with the utmost severity, and Paul shows great scorn of what he calls worldly wisdom. The denunciation of "science, falsely so-called," is of uncertain authorship and application; but the New Testament position toward knowledge is plainly inferior to that of the Greek and Roman philosophers, of the authors of Proverbs and Ecclesiastics, and of modern writers and statesmen almost universally. And our list of duties disregarded in the New Testament should not be closed without due notice of the fact that, though patriotism holds a high place with both classic and modern moralists, and though terrible oppression and suffering was inflicted by foreign tyranny on the mother country of Jesus and the apostles, none of them show any sympathy with the struggle for independence and existence which the nation was then carrying on, but the payment of tribute to Tiberius is justified in three of the Gospels on the ground that his face was stamped on the current coin, an argument which would condemn the American, French, and English Revolutions. Paul advocates obedience to Nero: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers; for there is no power but of God, the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." (Romans xiii., 1, 2.) And Peter says: "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors, . . . for so is the will of God."

III. This teaching by Peter and Paul that absolute monarchy is a divine institution has peculiar significance in connection with other passages in the New Testament, and also with the state of the times. The great political question of the first and second centuries was whether the senate should have any control of the emperor. Tiberius and his successors were constantly murdering obnoxious speakers and authors and suppressing their books,—outrages which had long been unknown. Literary activity almost ceased at the deaths of Livy and Ovid. Free thought and mental life could not flourish except by the protection of the senate, appeal to which enabled Thrasea to save a satirist named Antistius from Nero's vengeance but two or three years after the Epistles just quoted were written. Thrasea kept up such opposition until he was put to death, as was another Stoic, named Helvidius, for asserting the privileges of the senate against Vespasian. Earnest attempts to have this last check on tyranny kept up were made still later by Trajan, Marcus Aurelius, and finally Probus. Whether unlimited power to repress free speech should be given legally and by unanimous consent to the emperor was still undecided when Peter and Paul forbade any farther resistance to Nero as contrary to the will of God, a doctrine all the more inexcusable because rebellion is highly sanctioned in the Old Testament as well as in the Apocrypha. Particularly important is the story that the Lord made Deborah, the prophetess, leader of the revolt which freed Israel from King Jabin. This account, like that of Abigail's receiving a blessing for openly disobeying her husband, of King Josiah's having to learn the divine judgment on his race and nation from Huldah, and of Esther's becoming the providential saviour of the chosen people from the doom pronounced by her royal consort, and like the omission of obedience from the qualities of a good wife, described in the last chapter of Proverbs, shows that the Old Testament, on the whole, favored the great movement under the twelve Cæsars to emancipate woman. Plato, too, made both sexes follow the same studies and hold an equal sway in his ideal state. Sappho, Corinna, Aspasia, Arete, Hipparchia, and Leontium justified this theory in literature; while the place in history taken by Portia, by Cleopatra, by Livia, wife of Augustus and mother of Tiberius, by Antonia, who saved the latter from being dethroned by Sejanus, and, in the apostolic age, from that terrible Agrippina who made Nero emperor and who wrote memoirs which were used by Tacitus, proves that women could no longer be kept out of politics. Among the judges who heard Paul plead, and decided that he should be sent to Rome, was Queen Berenice. Already had the wives of governors and generals taken the lead, not only in the hall of justice, but in the camp, so conspicuously that a decree forbidding women to follow their husbands into the provinces was proposed, during the reign of Tiberius, to the senate, who rejected it by a large majority. Seneca earnestly encourages his mother to pursue the studies she had begun in youth, and blames his father for having hindered her (Ad Helviam Matrem, xi., 5; xviii., 3, 4). Epictetus, who came to Rome soon after, found the ladies reading Plato. The close of this century shows us Plutarch advising a bride to study the sayings of wise and learned men; while Juvenal tells us how Mævia slew wild boars in the arena, Lauronia confuted the counterfeit Stoic who blamed her sex, Manilla drew up indictments as skilfully as any lawyer, and other women trained themselves to fight as gladiators, or kept themselves aware of whatever went on anywhere in the empire. Meantime, the old forms of marriage, by which the man had absolute power over the wife, had given place to a simple contract, which made both parties equals before the law, and suffered women to manage their property as they chose and leave their husbands whenever they wished. Great as were the moral dangers of such easy divorces, they gave complete protection against tyranny. Lecky says that the Roman women "arrived during the empire at a point of freedom and dignity which they subsequently lost, and have never wholly regained." Maine thinks that "No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by the middle Roman law" (Ancient Law, p. 152, Am. ed.). At all events, their legal, social, and intellectual independence was far more complete than ever before, when Paul said: "Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak; and, if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home, for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord." "As the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything; and the wife see that she reverence her husband" (I. Cor. xiv., 34, 35; Eph. v., 22, 24, 33). The last passage appears to have been written from Rome, and the other belongs to one of the most authentic Epistles, which also contains the statement that the man was not created for the woman; but the woman for the man; and here, too, we find that Paul had not found out, as John Stuart Mill did, that, "Among the barbarisms which law and morals have not yet ceased to sanction, the most disgusting, surely, is that any human being should be permitted to consider himself as having a right to the person of another." The most advanced of the apostles approves of what the freethinker justly calls "a degrading slavery to a brute instinct in one of the persons concerned, and most commonly in the other helpless submission to a revolting abuse of power" (Political Economy, Book II., ch. xi. and xiii., vol. i., pp. 425, 451. Boston, 1848). Another significant fact is that precisely the same words are used in the Greek text of the Epistles, as well as in our English versions, to command the obedience and subjection of wives to husbands, of citizens to sovereigns and magistrates, of slaves to masters, and of all men to God. Thus, the first Epistle of Peter, after sanctioning bondage to tyrants and slave-holders, says, "Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands . . . even as Sarah obeyed Abraham," which, however, she did not do, according to the story of the expulsion of Hagar. As already shown, the apostles were much less friendly than the Old Testament writers to female independence, which met with no opposition of importance outside of the Church. Here the Gospels are silent, except in utterly forbidding divorce to women, though permitting it to men in case of adultery. (See Mark x., 12; Matt. v., 32; xix., 9; Luke xvi., 18.)

But let us pass on to a still more marked difference between the early Christians and the philosophers. The latter had come, as Cicero says, to "believe unanimously that God never is angry with anybody, nor does any harm." Seneca, whom Paul may have talked with, declares again and again: "No one has known God. Many think ill of him, and he harms them not." "No sane man fears the gods." "All their power is to do good, and mildly do they bear with the errors of wandering souls." Great freedom of speculation had been attained when Augustus began to revive the almost obsolete fears of the divine wrath against all who did not worship acceptably. Under his successors, the reaction became complete, as was largely due to the fact that the early Christians, while insisting on rites and creeds differing widely from those of the pagans, were equally zealous teachers of the doctrine that theological and ceremonial errors are sinful and hateful unto God. Paul says that He was so provoked at the form of worship practised by Socrates, Cornelia, Cato, Portia, Epictetus, and their compatriots, as to give them up to the reign of the vilest of passions; and even, according to the authorized version, to "send them strong delusions that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned." . . . (Romans i., 18-32; and II. Thess. ii., 11, 12.) The apostle to the Gentiles also told them that "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction" (II. Thess. i., 7, 8), and that idolaters "shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal. v., 20, 21). So we read in the Revelation of John that the heathen, after suffering the worst of earthly calamities, shall be shut out from the New Jerusalem and "tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb, and the smoke of their torment ascendeth for ever and ever" (Rev. ix., 20; xiv., 9, 10; xxii., 15). More toleration is shown toward differences among Christians; yet even here it is said: "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." "An heretic after the first and second admonition reject." "If any come unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God-speed." "There shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." "Wandering stars to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." (Gal. i., 9; Tit. iii., 10; II. John 10; II. Peter ii., 1; Jude 13.) The last phrase applies particularly to those who speak evil of dignitaries of the Church, and such heretics "shall utterly perish in their own corruption" (II. Peter ii., 12),—words in harmony with, "Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God, whose faith follow" (Heb. xiii., 7); and, "If he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen" (Matt. xviii., 17). All the Gospels represent failure to agree with Jesus and his apostles as sinful, and unquestioning acquiescence as highly meritorious. Even the unutterable guilt of Sodom is said to be less than that of refusing to listen to the disciples; while charging their master with insanity is denounced as the unpardonable sin, not to be forgiven either on earth or in heaven. Jesus is represented as saying that the Jews "sin because they believe not in me." And, again, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child shall in no wise enter therein." "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." (Luke x., 12; xviii., 17; Mark iii., 29, 30; xvi., 16; John xvi., 9; xx., 29.) These words, with those attributed to John the Baptist,—"He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him,"—show, as does the whole apostolic teaching of justification of faith, that acceptance of the authority of Jesus is enjoined as necessary to salvation throughout the New Testament. Morality, of course, is insisted upon also, and very strictly; but I see no evidence that either the apostles or their master expected that any one but Jews and Christians would be saved. These opinions about theology, with those about the rights of women and the duty of passive obedience, and with the neglect to favor mental culture, will not permit those who regard intellectual culture as one of the highest of duties, and now best entitled to support, to consider what is said against it by the apostles and evangelists fully atoned for either by the excellence of their teaching of more familiar duties or by the assistance found in their doctrine of salvation through faith rather than ceremony by the assailants of papal tyranny. Thus each reader must decide whether the apostles or the Stoics best knew their duty to Nero, whether Paul or Mill was the true friend to women, and whether there was more inspiration in the claim to Messianic authority than in the dying request of Socrates to his disciples not to let love for him tempt them to overvalue the intrinsic truth of his words.

IV. To do our subject full justice, we must at least glance at two other points. Advanced thinkers are now aware that what may be called the business virtues, such as industry, economy, prudence, foresight, and enterprise, are very important for social welfare and progress, as well as highly conducive to moral development, that love of money, though dangerous in excess, like other strong passions, for instance, religious zeal,—is on the whole the root of more good than evil, and that it is the people who are above poverty and have good business habits that are the most free from vice and crime. These facts are not yet generally understood, and in ancient times they were very imperfectly known. The Book of Proverbs gives as correct a view as can be found in antiquity, especially in the closing picture of the diligent and far-sighted wife, who makes her family wealthy and honored. The best teaching up to the age of the apostles is so inconsistent, that we need not wonder to find it said in the same Epistle that he who does not provide for his own family is worse than an infidel, and that "The love of money is the root of all evil." The popular error was so great as sadly to favor the financial weakness which was one of the causes of the fall of the Roman Empire. Hence, it was peculiarly unfortunate that the Gospels taught such an extreme view as to say: "Take no thought for the morrow." "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor." It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." If Jesus really said this, it is not strange that the disciples asked, "Who then can be saved?" Then, again, there is the preference of Mary over Martha, the parable in which Lazarus appears to go to heaven simply because he was poor, and Dives, who is certainly not without brotherly love, to be sent to hell merely because he has been rich, and the beatitudes in Luke: "Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God. But woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation." To suppose all this written only for the first disciples is to admit that it is not written for us. The whole attitude of the Gospels toward riches and business is shown by these passages, and is exactly the opposite of that which is embodied in modern civilization.

And to this cause, as well as to the great importance given to Benevolence, may we attribute the fact that Jesus scarcely mentions Justice, which is often commanded by the apostles as well as in the Old Testament: though no Jew went so far as the Greek philosophers, who made this duty include all our obligations toward our fellow-men. This high place is given to Love in the parable where men are divided off for punishment or reward, simply according to their charities, as well as in the repeated assurances that we shall be forgiven according as we forgive others,—a standard more favorable to Julius Cæsar and

Charles II. than to Cato and Washington. It must be confessed that this doctrine, as well as the praise of the employer who pays all his laborers alike, even those who are hired at the eleventh hour, does not show very great regard for justice; neither does the refusal of Jesus to listen to a man who wished him to urge his brother to divide their inheritance. (Luke xii., 13.) The general condemnation of the Pharisees for immorality is not easily to be reconciled with Paul's declaration to Agrippa,—"After the most straitest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee,"—nor with such phrases in the Epistle to the Philippians as "touching the law a Pharisee, . . . touching the righteousness in the law blameless." And what can we say of such stories as that Jesus authorized the destruction of two thousand swine, on which the owners, who apparently received no compensation, begged him to leave the country; that he caused a fig-tree, a valuable piece of private property in Palestine, to wither away, because he found only leaves on it, "for the time of figs was not yet"; that he drove out of the temple the sellers of the birds and animals needed for sacrifice, and the money-changers who enabled the Jews to pay such coins as were required by the priests, and that he even had the money taken from the men it belonged to and poured out upon the ground? Whatever may be the accuracy of these narratives, they play a great part in setting forth the example which has had such mighty influence these eighteen centuries. So much more has been done by the Gospels than by all the rest of the Bible to form our moral ideas that it is simply unfortunate that the evangelists do so much less than the other writers to teach justice. The same must be said of truthfulness, which is really a part of the great duty of respecting others' rights, and which must necessarily be hindered by all opposition to freedom of speech.

V. Our survey of the moral teaching in the New Testament shows that, to weigh its value fairly, we must put almost all the precepts about purity and love into one scale, and much of what is said about family fidelity, physical and intellectual culture, patriotism, mental independence, the business virtues, justice, and truthfulness into the other. Which scale should preponderate each reader must judge for himself. We are bound to keep all these facts duly in mind, and be sure to have full justice done to them, whatever may have to fall.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FREETHOUGHT IN CANADA.

Editors of The Index:—

During the last decade, liberal thought in Canada has made marvellous progress, especially in the Province of Ontario. Ten years ago, no freethought lecture had been given in the Dominion, but few liberal papers were in circulation, and the very few scattering and isolated Liberals were wholly without organization, personal acquaintance, or communication, or that active spirit of propagandism with which Canadian Liberals are now so strongly imbued. At this juncture of nascent Canadian Liberalism, Mr. B. F. Underwood was invited by us, in the fall of 1874, to come over to Ontario, and give a course of lectures in the city of Napanee. Mr. Underwood came; but it was not until after a determined struggle with bigotry that he could exclaim, "Veni, vidi, vici!" I will not here enter into the struggle we had with the authorities over the Napanee Town Hall, which we had leased from them, and paid for, for the lectures, but which they, in flagrant violation of their written contract, forcibly prevented us from using. Nor can I enter into the long course of litigation which followed, constituting the now celebrated "Napanee Town Hall case," and culminating in an unjust verdict against us. But we had our lectures in another hall in spite of all opposition, and grandly successful they were. Mr. Underwood, by his courteous bearing, sound reasoning, and logical argumentation, sadly disappointed the hundreds of Christians who attended the lectures, curious to see to which branch of the vertebrates an "infidel" lecturer belongs. Having duly satisfied themselves that the lecturer was, after all, really of the genus homo, and likewise that he was "a gentleman and a scholar," they decided neither to lynch him nor jail him.

Well, this opposition on the part of our Christian friends had, as usual, just the opposite effect to what they expected. The ball of Canadian freethought was thus set on a lively roll. We discussed and wrote for the newspapers, and circulated our documents, and in a few months again invited Mr. Underwood to Napanee, where he has given in all three or four courses of lectures, and held a four nights' debate with the late Rev. John Marples. Mr. Underwood has also since lectured in various other places in Canada,—Toronto, Hamilton, Aylmer, St. Thomas, Meaford, Lindsay, Belleville, and Montreal,—and held, in all, three or four debates, adding each time to his reputation as a formidable controversialist and able exponent of modern Liberalism. These lectures and debates with the clergy gave a great impetus to Canadian freethought. Colonel Ingersoll has also been here within a year or two, lecturing in four or five leading places. The Colonel—more eloquent, but less profound than Mr. Underwood—seemed to capture every soul, Christian and heathen, who listened to him, and the clergy were all set agog.

Among the influences, however, which have materially contributed to the advancement of freethought in Canada must be reckoned the able and popular liberal writings of William McDonnell, Esq., of Lindsay, Ont. His Exeter Hall and Heathens of the Heath have had a wide reading in Canada; and their influence has been as salutary as extended, and has contributed to liberal progress. There must also be taken into account the freethought conventions which have been held in Toronto, the meetings of the Toronto Freethought Association, the late Freethought Journal, the liberalizing influence of our literary periodicals, the Canadian Monthly and The Bystander, and the increasing circulation in Canada of various American freethought papers. The London National Reformer and Secular Review have also a considerable circulation here, some of our best men being Englishmen who were thoroughly indoctrinated in secularistic freethought before coming to this country. All these influences of lectures, debates, books, pamphlets, papers, etc., with the individual local efforts of many sterling workers in the ranks throughout the whole country, have been most effective in destroying superstition, exposing error, and propagating and building up the truth.

I may be pardoned for referring somewhat to my own humble efforts in the cause. After Mr. Ingersoll lectured here a year or two ago, a shower of replies and attacks fairly rained from the pulpit and the press.

Requested by our friends to reply to some of the more important and prominent of Ingersoll's assailants, I did so in pamphlet form, replying to Wendling, Archbishop Lynch, "Bystander" (Goldwin Smith), and others. My pamphlet—of which two editions have been issued, aggregating six thousand copies—has been extensively circulated throughout Canada, especially this province. From the numerous letters received, both from friends and opponents all over the country, I am led to hope that this and another similar pamphlet by me have done some little good in advancing the cause of truth; while Professor Goldwin Smith does me the honor to say in his Bystander that "Ingersoll in Canada" (the pamphlet of replies) "is one of the latest proofs that the great questions of religious philosophy are beginning to engage a good many Canadian minds." Rev. Principal Grant, of Queen's University, Kingston, had said, in a recent paper in Scribner's Monthly, that in Canada, with "astonishing religious zeal and clattering activity," there was little "theological scholarship and less speculation." Professor Smith did not agree with him in this, that Canadians never rise to the consideration of great questions, religious or political, but are entirely taken up with mere party politics and mere sectarian religion, and says "that description would have been more applicable to our people twenty or even ten years ago than it is now."

As to the numerical strength of Canadian Liberals, it would be, of course, impossible to speak definitely; but it can be safely said that we are quite numerous, and our numbers are rapidly increasing. Every city and town in Canada, at least of Ontario, is, to quote a Toronto paper, "honey-combed with infidelity," with perhaps the single exception of New London. In Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Belleville, Picton, Port Hope, Oshawa, Lindsay, Meaford, Owen Sound, Seaford, Brantford, St. Thomas, Aylmer, Collingwood, Ingersoll, Guelph, Orillia, Orwell, Vienna, Walkerton, Stouffville, Glen Allen, Galt, Gananoque, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, etc., with all of which places I am in communication, there are active, intelligent workers in our cause. In Toronto there is a strong society holding weekly meetings, at which papers are read, taking a wide range of liberal thought, embracing not only critical essays on theological subjects, but constructive essays on ethical and sociological questions. These meetings are numerous attended by thoughtful and intelligent men and women seeking more light. In Ottawa, the "Progressive Society" holds its weekly meetings, where the most advanced thought in science, sociology, and morals, is discussed. In Montreal also is a freethought organization; while the Spectator of that city is very liberal in tone, the Star also to some extent. An esteemed and reliable correspondent writes me from that city that, although freethought "has not yet attained such proportions here as to be considered quite respectable, yet every other man you meet, if you catechized him privately, will admit he believes little or nothing of the old religious dogmas." Though these are the only places, I believe, where regular organizations of freethinkers exist in Canada, in many of the other places informal meetings are held; and, in every locality, missionary and propagandist work of some description is going on, often quietly, but surely and steadily. In the Eastern Provinces, though freethought has not perhaps spread as rapidly as here in the West, yet it is steadily gaining ground. The Halifax Mayflower—though not quite to our mind in some respects—must be doing great execution in that Province in overturning dogma and uprooting superstition. Our venerable old friend, Lieutenant-Colonel Griffiths, formerly of this Province (Dufferin College, London, Ont.), but now of Halifax,—a gentleman whose influence cannot be but good wherever he is,—is also still busy with his facile and cultured pen down among the Nova Scotians. In New Brunswick, from what I have heard from Messrs. Baxter and Moffat of that Province, progress is being made. As to the "Great Northwest," a Manitoba friend informs me that, though there is not much visible on the surface (they are too busy there now for speculative questions), yet "every other man you meet," like the Montrealer, is decidedly shaky in his Orthodoxy. This, then, is our present condition in Canada as to numbers and work.

NOTES FROM NEW YORK.

Editors of The Index:—

Mr. O. B. Frothingham's Religion.

The misreported interview with Mr. O. B. Frothingham, recently published by the Evening Post, gave the impression that he had lost his faith in religious progress and his hope for new satisfactions. This caused general surprise. There is yet much public comment on his supposed defection. It was to be expected that the religious press and the secular press would seize, without careful verification, upon any statement showing an apparent weakening in a progressionist's position: the one, to strengthen thereby their now crumbling edifice; the other, for its sensational attraction.

I myself have listened to Mr. Frothingham; and to him I owe my salvation from self-satisfaction,—which was my "Christian lot,"—and I was born again to find satisfaction in and for service. Redemption and reform must have this as the basis of the coming philosophy.

A New Movement: The Conversion of "Sceptics."

[The People's Church, Rev. Dr. G. W. Samson, pastor and president, desires to reconcile Christianity with modern thought and with universal religion upon the basis that Christianity is the complement and fulfilment of all thought and sentiment. He is making an energetic effort to reach those who are dissatisfied with current teaching, by inviting them to discussion and by amiably conceding their logical difficulty and sympathizing with their position. The following is a short epitome of one of his lectures, given to us by himself:—

"The design of the familiar conference at four o'clock, Sunday afternoon, in the Fifty-third Street People's Church, is to reach two classes whose religious faith is shaken: first, those who are convinced that religious truth and duty, which do rule in and among the peoples gathered in our land and city, ought to be so investigated that some common ground of concerted thought and action may be attained; second, those who profess the Christian faith, but are in doubt as to the grounds of their own profession. The series of themes proposed for the first six months—addressed to those who in the old Greek sense are 'sceptics' or independent investigators—relate, first, to the nature of faith in itself; second, to religious faith and its field; and, third, to the demonstrative or 'positive' testimonies which reason has given in reply to the three questions, 'Whence came we? What are we? Whither go we?'

"As to faith in itself there are four themes for conference. The first, 'Faith the Ground of all Knowledge,' led to the statement that 'faith' is the farthest remove from mere unfounded belief. The word itself in all languages has, as its derivative, 'faithful,' implying that faith is a conviction both intelligent and practical which leads to duty. The Latin fides, whence our word 'fidelity,' Cicero says the Stoics derived from fiat, 'it must be done.' Aristotle, presenting the intellectual character of faith, says that fancy leads to unreliable conviction, opinion to conviction that may be reliable or unreliable, while faith is the foundation of all reliable conviction. The knowledge derived through the senses even,—as when we see the heavens as a concave, yet know there is no concave,—the knowledge, most assured, attained by the senses, has its ground in our faith in the united testimony of observed phenomena and of intuitive judgment as to those phenomena. The same rule as Hume acknowledged must determine the knowledge supposed to be attained through the intuitive convictions of reason and conscience as the ground of truth and duty." A. L. L.

CAN THERE BE RELIGION WITHOUT THEOLOGY?

Editors of The Index :—

It has been truly said that clear and accurate thinking is needed fully as much at the present time as freethinking. But, singularly enough, those who make this just claim are, many of them, in precisely the same predicament, in one respect at least, as those whom they frequently criticise as being mentally inaccurate and beclouded. The inconsistency of these critics, it seems to me, consists of their hearty approval of religion, while they are just as hearty in their disapproval of theology. Webster defines religion as being systematized faith and worship; also, as pious practice. Theodore Parker defines theology (and the Christian world agrees with him on this point) as treating of God, man, and the relations between them. History records the conflict between science and religion, but nowhere, that I am able to discover, any conflict between religion and theology. Such representative theists as Thomas Paine and Theodore Parker believed in the existence of true and false religion, and also of true and false theology. They never divorced theology from religion. Even such advanced Christian sects as the Universalists and Unitarians have their systems of theology as well as of religion. I know of no religion, with the exception of the Positivists' "Religion of Humanity," and perhaps I might add what has been called the "Religion of Spiritualism," that has not its corresponding theology. Some of our best thinkers are persuaded that the Positivists misuse the term religion. Can "Free Religionists" cling to religion, and consistently reject theology? Will the free, clear, and accurate thought of the future divorce theology from religion, or will it either accept or reject both together?

Yours very respectfully,

W. C. BOWEN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1881.

[Between actual religion and actual theology, history records a good deal of conflict. Many believers in religion are led to oppose so earnestly the existing and dominant theologies that they may appear to oppose all theology without really doing so. Whether religion can exist without any theology depends upon whether it necessarily involves theistic belief. A theist must have some kind of theology. But religion certainly has existed without theistic belief,—as, witness the great religion of Buddhism in its purer days, which, even if it was not atheistic, was certainly agnostic. If by "Free Religionists" it is meant to designate those who adhere to the principles of the Free Religious Association, our correspondent's question cannot be answered by either a yes or a no; for some of them are theists, some pantheists, some agnostics, and some, probably, would call themselves atheists. The first two classes cannot reject all theological beliefs, and the last two cannot consistently accept theological beliefs. As to the future, each of us is apt to think that his own particular theory of things will come uppermost.

HERBERT SPENCER.

Editors of The Index :—

I see by The Index lately, but without any astonishment, that Herbert Spencer is claimed by Mr. Savage as an idealist and by Miss Hardaker as a materialist. Mr. Savage probably bases his claim on the Chapter on the Relativity of Feelings in the Psychology, Vol. I., page 193, where the following quotations occur: "Thus we are brought to the conclusion that what we are conscious of as properties of matter, even down to its weight and resistance, are but subjective affections produced by objective agencies that are unknown and unknowable." And again, "We are thus forced to the conclusion that the relations of co-existence, of sequence, and of difference, as we know them, do not obtain beyond consciousness."

Miss Hardaker, on the other hand, most likely bases her conclusion on the nineteen chapters in the second volume of the same work, wherein Mr. Spencer vigorously attacks the arguments of the Idealists, even going the length of describing them as "Insanities." It is much to be wished that Mr. Savage or Mr. Fiske or Mr. Youmans, who are all on such intimate terms with Mr. Spencer, would get his interpretation of these contradictory statements. How an evolutionist can be an idealist, or talk like one, is to me a mystery. Evolution teaches that all animals, including man with his large brain and nervous system, have been slowly moulded into their present condition by contact with the outer world and its changing conditions; that consciousness itself, which the idealist asserts is the only thing that has a real existence, has been created by this contact; that the earth existed and was covered with plants and animals long before there was a human eye or a human consciousness to take note of them. Mr. Spencer says rightly, "Should the idealist be right, the doctrine of evolution is a dream." Mr. Huxley says, "In addition to the truth of the doctrine of evolution, one of its greatest merits in my eyes is the fact that it occupies a position of complete and irreconcilable antagonism to that vigorous and consistent enemy of the highest intellectual, moral, and social life of mankind,—the Catholic Church." It has also the merit—and it is no small one—of giving the final refutation of the vain and futile reasonings of idealism. Mr. Spencer is too great and too true a man to be charged with pottering with words and ideas in order to make his views acceptable to a wider class of readers. We can only fall back on the conclusion that his views on mind have not yet assumed that definite and coherent shape which, according to his own varied and beautiful illustrations, marks the higher stage of evolution.

A SWEDENBORG CALENDAR.

Editors of The Index :—

We should be grateful for all that was done during the past to advance freethought. Especially may we thank Swedenborg for what he did nearly a century and a half ago to free people from bondage to the letter that killeth, and teach them to care more for morality than for belief. The readers of The Index will therefore be interested in a calendar for 1882 just published by Rand, Avery & Co., and containing many grand passages like these:—

It is a law of the Divine Providence that a man should not be forced by external means to think and will, and so to believe and love, the things which are of religion; but that a man should lead, and sometimes force himself to it.

In heaven, by loving the Lord is not understood to love him as to his person, but to love the good which proceeds from him; and to love good is to will and do good from love.

After death, faith does not remain in man, if not grounded in heavenly love.

Simple persons, who have loved good and truth for their own sake and have implanted them in their lives, thereby acquire the faculty of receiving heaven, with all its ineffable perfections. On coming among the angels, they enter fully into their angelic wisdom and the felicities of heaven.

God has no need of being praised and glorified. His will is that his subjects should perform uses, and thus do the good works which are called the goods of charity.

It may be affirmed of the angels of each heavenly society that the more every individual has a distinct identity of character, in which he freely acts, and thus loves his associates from himself or from his own affection, the more perfect is the form of the society.

The worship of the Lord from charity can never differ, however externals may be changed.

CONCORD, Dec. 7.

F. M. HOLLAND.

A VALUED contributor to The Index, in a private letter, writes: "To-day's Index I have enjoyed all through. For Professor Adler's discourse on Kant I am thankful. Mr. Potter's words on college-trained Liberalism are timely. William Clarke's article on "Two Theories of Land Reform in England" especially interested me. He writes like a 'level-headed' man. The time for 'the affirmative side' of Liberalism has, I think, come, at least in your vicinity. Here, however, a great work is yet to be done, ploughing the hard soil of old traditions before the seed of truth will take root. I am with the Boston Sunday Herald on the free-trade question. The advantages of free trade seem to me beyond dispute. 'Current Topics' and 'Editorial Notes' both interested me. I think, however, Our Dumb Animals can do better than to oppose barbed wire fences, on the ground that some animals have been injured by them. In the early days of railroads, cow-catchers often caught stray cattle; but now we seldom hear of this happening. Cattle have learned to keep out of their way. Does the present generation of these animals avoid them by 'inherited instinct'? Barbed fences, at any rate, are a great blessing—I know about it—in keeping off the troublesome cows of neighbors and thereby preserving the fences. My pity for the people quite overcomes that for the dumb animals, particularly as they are not forced to suffer."

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE revised version of the New Testament is used in the devotional exercises in the Yale Theological School.

THE Chicago Daily Times of November 19 says that the Religio-Philosophical Journal "exceeds in circulation any Eastern organ of the class," and adds: "It speaks well for the Spiritualists as a class or sect that a fearless, independent, non-sectarian paper—as the Journal has proven itself to be—meets with wide-spread and universal favor among them, and in its successful warfare waged against mountebanks and tricky mediums, in its demand for test conditions and scientific methods of investigation, as well as in its fair and just treatment of honest mediums, it has the earnest sympathy of all contemporary publications pretending to be in the service of truth. The Journal has made its influence profoundly felt in the spiritual movements of the age, and, like all Chicago enterprises which meet the demand of a wide-awake, progressive public, is steadily widening its circle of influence, and is more frequently to be found in the minister's study and on the desk of the professional and literary man than any other modern journal devoted to the philosophy and the phenomena of Spiritualism."

BLASPHEMY.—The definition of blasphemy sometimes obtains an alarming extension. There are writers in Quebec who think it blasphemy to criticise the Syllabus: they call it blaspheming against the Syllabus. Of prohibited books, the world has had a sad and bloody experience; and wherever prohibition has been attempted, whether at Rome, Madrid, Paris, in New Spain or Old Spain, an Index or list of prohibited books has always been necessary. We, too, if we are to enter into a crusade against heresy, must transform the Minister of Customs into Inquisitor-General, and every collector into an inquisitor. And even then we cannot trust to the wisdom of these functionaries to pronounce off-hand on the heresy of a book not in the Index. Already, the Minister of Justice has received intimations from Toronto pulpits that he can have any number of inquisitors for the asking. And this in the year of grace 1881. The collector, poor man, seems to have acted on a sense of duty, under what he conceived to be the requirements of the law, and need not much be blamed for over-zeal. In diplomatic language, the government disavows this act as being in excess of his instructions; but he, perhaps, thought he needed no special instructions with the law before him.—Toronto Varsity.

THE Sanitary Engineer, published at 140 William Street, New York, comes to us changed from a semi-monthly to a weekly. This journal is doing needed work in educating the public regarding the causes and the means of preventing sickness and premature death. It justly says: "An educated public opinion is demanding more exact knowledge of the causes of disease, and the demand is creating the supply. Under the auspices of Boards of Health, which are being formed everywhere, investigations are going on; registration of death, and, to some extent, of disease, is being established and made more complete; the effects of bad drainage, overcrowding, polluted water, and contagion, are becoming better known; and an epidemic is no longer considered to be an unavoidable dispensation of Providence, any more than a great fire or a railway collision. And, so fast as the causes of disease are understood, the ingenuity and technical skill of the nineteenth century are applied to providing the means of avoiding or destroying these causes. The announcement by Pasteur or Koch or Burdin-Sanderson of the discovery of a new fact in the life history of some minute and apparently insignificant organism at once becomes a basis for means of disinfection provided by the chemist or engineer, or for legislation in preventing the spread of disease."

A LECTURE, recently delivered by a German scholar in Munich, upon the pessimistic views of the philosopher Schopenhauer, gives some interesting information concerning the philosopher's relations with his mother, Johanna Schopenhauer, a popular novel-writer in her time. She had not the slightest interest or appreciation for her son's labors. When, in the winter of 1813, he showed her his first essay, she looked at the title, and inquired whether it was a treatise for apothecaries. He replied angrily, "It will be read when it will be impossible to find a copy of anything you have written in any rubbish closet." To which she coolly replied, "Of all that you ever write, the whole edition will then be on hand unbroken." The son's prediction has been verified of the mother. Few, outside of those still surviving who once were personally acquainted with her, know aught, except that Schopenhauer was her son. But the mother's prediction, at least in the sense that her son's writings would have few readers, has not been entirely unfounded either. Though by a small number recognized as a profound thinker, it took forty-four years to sell two editions of his chief philosophical work; and these comprised only seven hundred and fifty copies. Three small editions were sold in fifty-nine years. Yet Goethe pronounced Schopenhauer "the philosopher of the nineteenth century."

In his oration at Yorktown, Hon. Robert C. Winthrop eloquently said: "The general government of the Union must exercise its paramount authority over everything of domestic or foreign interest which comes within the sphere of its constitutional control. Civil service must be reformed. Elections and appointments, as Burke said, must be made 'as to a sacred function and not as to a pitiful job.' The elective franchise must be everywhere protected. Public credit must be maintained in city, State, and nation, at every sacrifice. Neither a gold nor a silver currency, nor both conjoined, neither mono-metallisms nor bi-metallisms, can form any substitute for the honesty and good faith which are the basis of an enduring public credit. Our independent judicial system, with all the rights and duties of the jury-box, must be respected and upheld. The army and the navy must be adequately maintained for the defence of our coasts and commerce and boundaries, and the militia not neglected for domestic exigencies; but peace, at home and abroad, must still and ever be the aim and end of all our preparations for war. Above all, the Union, the Union 'in any event,' as Washington said, must be preserved." In closing, the orator referred to our united country: "Fellow-citizens of the United States, citizens of the old Thirteen of the Revolution and citizens of the new Twenty-five, whose stars are now glittering with no inferior lustre in our glorious galaxy,—yes, and citizens of the still other States which I dare not attempt to number, but which are destined at no distant period to be evolved from our imperial Texas and territories,—I hail you all as brothers to-day, and call upon you all, as you advance in successive generations, to stand fast in the faith of the fathers, and to uphold and maintain unimpaired the matchless institutions which are now ours. You are the advance guard of the human race. Let us lift ourselves to a full sense of such a responsibility for the progress of freedom, in other lands as well as in our own. We are bound—bound together afresh—by the electric chords of sympathy and sorrow, vibrating and thrilling, day by day of the livelong summer, through every one of our hearts, for our basely wounded and bravely suffering President, bringing us all down on our knees together in common supplications for his life, and involving us all at last in a common flood of grief at his death. Oh, let not its influences be lost upon us for the century to come, but let us be one, henceforth and always, in mutual regard, conciliation, and affection! 'Go on, hand in hand, O States, never to be disunited! Be the praise and the heroic song of all posterity! Join your invincible might to do worthy and godlike deeds! And then'—but I will not add, as John Milton added in closing his inimitable appeal on reformation in England, two centuries and a half ago, 'a cleaving curse be his inheritance to all generations who seeks to break your union!' No anathemas shall escape my lips on this auspicious day. Let me rather invoke, as I devoutly and fervently do, the choicest and richest blessings of Heaven on those who shall do most in all time to come to preserve our beloved country in unity, peace, and concord."

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

THE loftiest form of greatness is never popular in its time. Guinea negroes would think a juggler a greater man than Franklin.—Theodore Parker.

ONLY on a canvas of darkness could the many colored picture of our life paint itself and shine.—Carlyle.

"For the truth itself

That's neither man's nor woman's, but just God's."—Mrs. Browning.

THERE are epochs in the history of the human race when the decayed branches fall from the tree of humanity, and when institutions grown old and exhausted sink and leave space for fresh institutions full of sap, which renew the youth and recast the ideas of a people.—Lamartine.

THE popular man or writer is always one who is but little in advance of the mass, and consequently understandable by them.—Herbert Spencer.

THE love of power and the love of liberty are in eternal antagonism.—J. S. Mill.

SHOW me from hence a discoverer who has not suffered for his discovery, whether it be of a world or of a truth, whether a Columbus or a Galileo.—W. S. Lardor.

THE Christianity which Voltaire assailed was as little touched as Voltairism itself with that spirit of holiness which poured itself round the lives and words of the two founders, the great master and the great apostle.—John Morley.

If one thing is clear, it is that faith is large in proportion as it dares to put things to the proof. Fear and laziness can accept beliefs. Only trust and courage will question them. To reject consecrated opinions demands a consecrated mind. The moving impulse to such rejection is faith,—faith in reason, faith in the mind's ability to obtain truth. The great sceptic must be a great believer. None have so magnificently affirmed as they who have audaciously denied.—O. B. Frothingham.

SCIENCE is, I believe, nothing but trained and organized common-sense, differing from the latter only as a veteran may differ from a raw recruit; and its methods differ from those of common-sense only so far as the guardsman's cut and thrust differ from the manner in which a savage wields his club.—T. H. Huxley.

SOMETHING which befalls you may seem a great misfortune: you meditate over its effects on you personally, and begin to think that it is a chastisement or a warning or a this or that or the other of profound significance, and that all the angels in heaven have left their business for a little while, that they may watch its effects on your mind. But give up this egotistic indulgence of your fancy, examine a little what misfortunes greater a thousand-fold are happening every second to twenty times worthier persons, and your self-consciousness will change into pity and humility, and you will know yourself, so far as to understand that "there hath nothing taken thee but what is common to man."—John Ruskin.

No LONGER talk at all about the kind of a man that a good man ought to be, but be such.—Marcus Aurelius.

JESTINGS.

"Is THIS my train?" asked a traveller at the Grand Central Depot of a lounging. "I don't know," was the reply. "I see it's got the name of some railroad company on the side, and expect it belongs to them. Have you lost a train anywhere?"

"GENTLEMEN of the jury," said an Irish lawyer, "it will be for you to say whether the defendant shall be allowed to come into court with unblushing footsteps, with a cloak of hypocrisy in his mouth, and draw three bullocks out of my client's pocket with impunity."

A RURALIST seated himself in a restaurant, the other day, and began on the bill of fare. After employing three waiters nearly half an hour in bringing dishes to him, he heaved a sigh, and whispered, as he put his finger on the bill of fare: "Mister, I've et to thar," and moving his finger to the bottom of the bill, "ef it isn't agin the rule, I'd like to skip from thar to thar."

A MAKER of doggerel having laid a wager that he would make a rhyme on anything, "Sennacherib" and "Jehoshaphat" were suggested as a theme. He immediately said:—

There was a King Sennacherib
Who said that he could whack a rib
Of any but Jehoshaphat:
He wouldn't his, he was so fat.

BOOK NOTICES.

LEAVES OF GRASS. By Walt Whitman. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co.

Heretofore Mr. Whitman has been his own publisher. Now, he is to go forth with the imprimatur of one of the most respectable publishing-houses in America upon his title-page. We cannot help regretting that in connection with this new departure he did not see fit to make some erasures. There is so much in his verses that is high and sweet and good that it is a pity that a few indecent passages should spoil them for the frankest circulation and enjoyment. Mr. Whitman has been much admired by the fleshly school of poets on the other side of the Atlantic, but there could be no greater mistake than to confound those elements in him which are most repellent to persons of refined and delicate character with the evil side of Swinburne and Rossetti. These are like the Frenchwoman who said of her ice-cream, "If it only had a little sin in it." We never find this note in Whitman. What we do find in him is such abounding faith in human nature that even the extravagances of human passion lose their hatefulness for him, in his conviction of the essential good of that which they exaggerate. Those who go to Mr. Whitman to excite their pruriency will hardly go in vain, though they may be disappointed that the grosser element in him is so inconsiderable in comparison with the rest. Those who go to him for help and cheer will find these in abundance. They will find faith in God and man, and in the order of the world. They will find innumerable touches of beauty. They will find "Drum-taps" that set their pulses flying, if they be not wholly inaccessible to generous emotion.

ENGLISH CLASSICS. Edited by William J. Rolfe. Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

These are the last two published of Mr. Rolfe's admirable series of Shakespeare's plays. Twenty-four have been published previously. The standard of excellence established in the first volume of the series has been maintained throughout, and never more conspicuously than in the volumes now under consideration. Each play is introduced by a history of the play, and selections from the criticisms of the most competent Shakespearean scholars. The text is judiciously expurgated to such an extent as to make it convenient for the use of families and schools. At the end of each volume, we have a series of notes conceived in the most admirable spirit, not purely technical, but with ample reference to the poetic beauty and the spiritual force of the play. Too much cannot be said in praise of the general make-up of this edition of Shakespeare's plays. The type is good; the quarto shape is pleasant; the illustrations are all that they pretend to be,—that is to say, purely ornamental. For use in the school and home, whatever may be in the future, this edition is the best that is as yet available.

YESTERDAYS WITH AUTHORS. By James T. Fields. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881.

This edition of Mr. Fields' delightful book differs from the original edition in being printed upon finer paper, with much wider margins, in having steel engravings of the authors spoken of in the text, and, best of all, in the inclusion of a batch of reminiscences of Barry Cornwall, equal in interest to any other chapter in the book, which, as it stands, is the pleasantest memorial that we are likely to have of Mr. Fields. The book, as it now stands, contains chapters on Pope, Thackeray, Hawthorne, Dickens, Miss Mitford, and Barry Cornwall. There is little here that is of the nature of criticism. Mr. Fields as dearly loved an author as Tommy Moore a lord. The author's personality was to him exceedingly engrossing. It was his fortune to have intimate relations with some of the most distinguished authors of his time, and he has reproduced the delight he had in these relations in a literary form that is full of pleasantness and charm.

POLLY COLOGNE. By Mrs. A. M. Diaz. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

Happy the child into whose stocking Santa Claus thinks best to put Polly Cologne as a Christmas gift! The tiny, quiet, yet adventurous dolly who owned this queer name is made by Mrs. Diaz the centre of a charming social circle of people whose acquaintance the little ones, and even some grown people who yet retain their youthful hearts, will be delighted to make. This book is in Mrs. Diaz's best vein, and how charming that can be all those who have read any of her previous writings know full well.

THE Radical Review, published at Madison, Wis., "is," says the editor, "to be an independent paper, devoted to the discussion of all general questions that agitate the minds of men. In dealing with problems, it will bow before no external authority, but follow reason wherever it may lead. It stands outside of Christianity, as well as all other revealed religions. It will discuss all questions from the stand-point of evolution. In politics, it is independent of all existing parties. It will espouse the cause of woman's rights, and favor her political enfranchisement. It favors the complete secularization of the State. It will give as much attention to the discussion of social questions as their importance demands. The threatening attitude which monopolies are assuming toward the State will be considered, and also the questions of free trade and protection, the Review favoring a free-trade policy." The numbers of this journal which we have received contain interesting articles; and we hope that Mr. Schum, the proprietor and editor, will be successful in this new venture in journalism. The subscription price is $2 a year.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

SEE Moncure D. Conway's unique article, entitled "Our Fellow-Worms," in the next issue of The Index.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will speak at Paine Memorial Hall, next Sunday forenoon, on "Theism and Atheism."

ROSA BONHEUR is in failing health, and is said to be gradually losing her magic hold on the limner's art.

THE Czar is a regular church-goer, and very fond of sacred music. He maintains two fine choirs at Peterhof.

QUEEN VICTORIA lately called upon the parents of a man who had been in her service, and on his grave placed a bouquet of flowers.

MR. W. M. SALTER's lecture at the Parker Memorial last Sunday, on the ideal element in religion, was an able and earnest effort, broad in spirit and elevating in tone.

GENERAL BOULANGER of the French army, in his report of the Yorktown Centennial, speaks in high praise of Hon. Robert C. Winthrop's oration on that occasion.

COL. JOHN W. FORNEY died at Philadelphia on the 9th. He was in some respects a remarkable man. He was active and versatile, and his acquaintance with public men and political measures was such as few men possess.

MR. PARNELL will be likely to awaken the jealousy of the average revivalist; for since his imprisonment he has been overwhelmed with gifts of slippers and embroidered handkerchiefs from the enthusiastic and patriotic women of Ireland.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN has recently had a lucid interval. He announced that he had made his last speech and written his last letter. Let us hope that he will not have a relapse into an insanity which will make him forget this promise.

MR. GEORGE TOWLE says of Victor Hugo, "Poet, artist, romancer, orator, statesman, letter-writer, essayist, editor, advocate, and song-maker, he has attempted many forms of brain labor, and on each his genius has stamped its impress."

A STORY is told that a lady once asked Thomas Carlyle if he would recommend some plain, interesting history of England suitable for her little girls. "Oh," said the crabbed philosopher, "they had better read Macaulay's England. It is the most childish I know."

THE Waugh Methodist Church in Washington is "enjoying" a revival. Johnny Noogle, a converted sailor, like reformed drunkards at temperance meetings, delights the attendants with stories giving details of his extreme wickedness. His converts, it is said, are counted by scores.

A WAX-WORK figure of Franklin on exhibition in France is labelled: "Franklin, inventor of electricity. . . This savant, after having made seven voyages around the world, died on the Sandwich Islands, and was devoured by savages, of whom not a single fragment was ever discovered." Such is fame.

JOHN HAY suggests that "Tortured for the Commonwealth" is a more impressive rendering of the Latin motto written by the President—Strangulatus pro Republica—than "Slaughtered for the Republic," as it has been translated by Colonel Rockwell, in whose presence it was written, and by the editor of the Century Magazine, and says that there is authority for his word in Ovid, Seneca, and Juvenal.

JOHN MORLEY, in his recent excellent biography of Richard Cobden, says that, early in his career, Cobden had leanings toward the stage; but his first play, entitled "The Phrenologist," was incontinently rejected by the manager of Covent Garden Theatre. "Luckily for me," afterward philosophically wrote Cobden; "for, if he had accepted it, I should probably have been a vagabond all the rest of my life." Morley ascribes to Cobden's early travels, and especially to his visit to America in 1835, his enlarged and broad views on many subjects.

WE quote from a recent article on Prof. Felix Adler, which appeared in the Boston Transcript, the following: "Adler's religion is precisely identical with his morality. The word 'morality' falls from his lips with an affectionate utterance not quickly forgotten. He seems to love the very word, and to recur to it with a frequency almost fatalistic. Blue-eyed, sensitive, and intense, with his slight, indefinable impediment of speech, which smooths off the jagged angles of certain consonants, he has a pleading expectancy of manner which seems to demand the best of every listener. Like all men of powerful convictions, he is too intent upon his aims to fall into any idling by the way. He seems always so hard at work that his very attitude is a reproof to any one who would lag behind him."

MR. JOHN BRIGHT's constituents lately presented to him, on his seventieth birthday, an address, in which they said: "Never, in the whole course of our connection, has there passed between us the faintest shadow of misgiving or distrust. At the outset, we gave you our confidence without reserve: it has remained unabated and unbroken. To political confidence, we have long since added the rare and precious gift of personal affection; for, in your fidelity to us, you have been unswerving, your service has been devoted, and your intercourse with us has been marked with a grace and a tenderness which have won our hearts. We promise you that so long as your life endures these relations shall continue. Between you and us there exists a bond that never can be broken."

CHRISTMAS SERVICE.

A Christmas Service for the Church and Sunday-school together, or for either alone, is now ready, published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, 40 Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois. Eight pages, containing Responsive Readings with Anthem and Chant, and six Carols, Price $2.50 per hundred. Specimens will be sent on receipt of a three-cent postage-stamp.

MASSACHUSETTS IN THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

By Mrs. HARRIET H. ROBINSON. Price $1.25.

"Mrs. Robinson is the widow of a man who has achieved a wide reputation for his brilliant letters to the Springfield Republican and other papers over the nom de plume of 'Warrington.' Like her husband, Mrs. Robinson is devoted to the cause of woman suffrage; and she has been one of the most prominent and zealous of the workers in behalf of what she considers her down-trodden sex. She is well qualified by ability and experience to write the history of the woman suffrage movement in Massachusetts, and she has done so. The time covered by her history is from 1774 to 1881, and she presents the general, political, legal, and legislative history of the movement. Mrs. Robinson is a bright woman, and makes her work extremely interesting. Of course, she is prejudiced in favor of the suffragists; and her history bears pretty hard on those who have opposed the movement. But it is a woman's privilege to scold; and, if she scolds well, it is entertaining, and the scolded ought to be able to bear it with equanimity, even enjoy it."—Boston Post.

THE MAN JESUS.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK. Second Edition. Price $1.00.

"Rev. John W. Chadwick tells us in the preface to 'The Man Jesus' that his object is to 'contribute something to a rational understanding of the human greatness of Jesus in the minds of those who have not the time or opportunity to read those voluminous writings in which the modern study of the life of Jesus has embodied its conjectures and results.' The author ignores entirely the supernatural element: he accepts the most advanced views with regard to the authorship and authenticity of the Gospels, and he makes use of the most radical interpretations of the New Testament narrative. With points of doctrine, we, of course, have nothing to do here. We can only say that Mr. Chadwick's work throughout is marked by the most reverent regard for the example and teachings of Jesus, that he brings home to the reader, as few others have done, the tender, affectionate nature of his great subject, and that he has revealed, under the robe of tradition, the throbbing of a human heart. Even the bitterest opponents of the views which Mr. Chadwick adopts must acknowledge that in the field of literature it is a masterful performance, luminous with the teachings of the gospel of humanity and a wonderful knowledge of the place and time of which he treats."—Says the Boston Traveller.

MY FIRST HOLIDAY;

Or, Letters Home from Colorado, Utah, and California.

By MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL. 12mo. Price $1.50.

"It is refreshing to get hold of a book of travel that is written in a spirit of honesty and common-sense. The author of these letters went West in search of health; and, while she was travelling in the Far Western States, she kept her eyes open, and carefully noted what she saw. The result is she has given us a very accurate and trustworthy account of the experiences of a traveller in those parts, and has also shown up the existing state of things in many respects. 'The glorious climate of California' is one of the greatest of frauds. The delightful climate of Colorado does furnish relief to consumptives by hastening their deaths, and so putting them out of pain. These facts the author observed, and does not seek to disguise. The Indian and the Mormon questions are also vigorously discussed in these letters. Nevertheless, the author does not seek to abuse or cry down the West. There is a heap to be seen and enjoyed there, and she saw and enjoyed it. And her descriptions are extremely well written and interesting. Anybody contemplating a visit to the West, either for health or pleasure, had better read this book; for they will get a great deal of valuable information as well as much pleasure from the perusal."—Says the Boston Post.

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Journal

PUBLISHED AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.,

By a Board of Seven Trustees, who are nominated by the Free Religious Association and incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

In the recent municipal elections in Massachusetts, 96,000 votes were cast on the question of license or no license, of which 54,000 were for license and 42,000 for prohibition. In Boston, 22,429 voted for license, and 12,396 for prohibition.

Jewish exiles from Russia are seeking homes in this country. Over a hundred families have arrived in Chicago the last six weeks. The United Hebrew Relief Association intends to establish several Jewish agricultural colonies in the West early next spring.

A LONDON paper, referring to the Salvation Army's street parades and performances, says, "The nuisance has now become so intolerable that the tradesmen are about to take action in the matter, with the view of testing the right of the army to parade the streets and cause disturbance."

In Edinburgh, since 1867, $2,500,000 have been spent in improvements relating to the sanitary condition of the city, and a steady decrease in the death-rate has been the result. Facts like these are a sufficient answer to the cheap talk of average preachers who declare that "science can never reach the masses."

THE Independent says that the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children deserves thanks for the efforts in the case of the child actress Corinne; but Judge Donohue very wisely refused to take her away from her guardians, and his decision is approved by the secular press, and commends itself to the good sense of people generally.

THE Vienna disaster has had the salutary effect amid all the evil it wrought to awaken the authorities in many of our American cities to the need of better facilities for egress in case of fire in our theatres; and the theatres of New York and Boston have been within the last week thoroughly examined in this respect, and improvements ordered.

"TOADYISM" is what the Boston Globe calls the amicable feeling between two great and friendly nations, which prompted the salute of the British flag by American troops at Yorktown. And what does the Globe call that reciprocation of the same feeling by the English nation, which prompted the playing of the "Star-spangled Banner" by the bands of British troops in London on Lord Mayor's Day?

THE Collector of Customs at Toronto is evidently an ignoramus. Not satisfied with seizing the Age of Reason and Volney's Ruins, he has, so Canadian papers state, detained Paine's Rights of Man and Common-Sense, while the works of Ingersoll are allowed to pass. There must be urgent need of Civil Service Reform over the line, when such a man holds an office, one of the qualifications for which should be at least ordinary intelligence and common-sense.

THE religious unsettledness of the age seems to have been equally appreciated and feared by two such opposite men as Dean Stanley and Sir William Heathcote. It is said that the Dean, in spite of his optimistic spirit, often looked forward fearfully to the possibility of Westminster Abbey's falling into the hands of the Church of Rome; and Sir William Heathcote "disinherits in advance any tenant for life or tenant entail of his estates, who may become a Jesuit or join any other Romish order."

FROM the Russian Nihilists, Guiteau gets no sympathy. In one of their organs published in St. Petersburg, recently appeared an editorial surrounded by a deep black line, lamenting the assassination of President Garfield. Referring to this editorial, a St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Telegraph says: "It is satisfactory to notice that this dastardly crime is condemned in the strongest language; and the opinion is expressed that in a free country, where the voice of the people can always make itself heard, nothing can excuse a resort to force. The particular crime of Guiteau is declared to be an act of despotism,—the despotism of a party, which is as detestable as that of an individual, and is as contrary as the latter to the principles of the revolutionary committee."

THE Christian Union says very justly: "The sincere and statesmanlike efforts of Mr. Gladstone are met with turbulence and contempt; and, as a consequence, even English Liberals, many of whom hoped that the time had come when justice might be done to Ireland, have lost heart and are becoming incensed at the blindness and folly of the people whom they are trying to benefit. The victims of this lawlessness are not the English, but the Irish themselves. When peaceful Irish farmers, disposed to look at the situation calmly, and to secure what they can from the new Act, are shot down in their cabins at night by their own countrymen, the enemies of self-government for Ireland are supplied with the most cogent arguments possible. The vices of barbarism and the privileges of constitutional liberty cannot go hand in hand."

MR. GEORGE SCOVILLE, in his recent lecture at Washington, as reported, said that the pulpit condemned Guiteau on the assumption that he was a sane man, and yet not a single minister of the gospel had called on the prisoner in his cell, and not a single letter had been sent by them to him, as a sane man, calling on him to repent and turn to God; that nineteen-twentieths of the letters received by Guiteau were simply threats against his life, and not more than two or three breathed a Christian spirit. If this wretched criminal is really sane, and if, without a "change of heart" before he dies, his state will be one of eternal torment, the clergy who profess thus to believe and who claim to represent him who came to call "not the righteous, but sinners to repentance," do not by their attitude toward Guiteau show either consistency or confidence in the gospel which they preach.

THE Springfield Republican says: "The lofty resentful way in which Dr. Spitzka, of the Guiteau trial, drew himself up the other day, when he was asked whether he believed in the existence of a God, is a reminder that we are living in an age of agnosticism, so called, and that to a portion of the community these old law questions about belief in God and in a future state of rewards and punishments are mere superstitious lumber, as obsolete as the trial by combat or the judicial killing of witches. If the agnostics carry the day, the Spitzkas of the future will not have their scientific susceptibilities ruffled by such interrogatories. It is not yet quite certain, however, that the agnostics are going to carry the day." Whether we live in "an age of agnosticism, so called," or "the agnostics are going to carry the day" or not, it is pretty evident that witnesses will not be much longer badgered and insulted in courts of justice in this country on account of their opinions or doubts concerning matters which are clearly beyond the range of human knowledge.

PROFESSOR A. S. BRUCE of Glasgow University, a member of the Free Church of Scotland, a friend of Professor Robertson Smith, is likely, so report says, to be subjected to treatment similar to that met by Professor Smith, because of a recently published work, entitled The Chief End of Revelation. In a recent letter to the Independent, Professor Bruce says: "Within the last few days, hopeful, cheering words have been spoken in behalf of freedom and growth in theology by theological professors, at the opening of the halls for the training of our future ministers. Dr. Laidlaw, recently appointed to the chair of dogmatics in the New College, Edinburgh, in his inaugural lecture, repudiated the idea of being bound over to a blind, mechanical adherence to traditional dogmas; and Professor Flint, in his opening lecture to the divinity students in the University of Edinburgh, scouted the idea that all truth had been found out in theology, and asserted not only the right, but the duty of free inquiry, as the only means by which the Church could effectually defend the faith and maintain the respect of the world for the Christian ministry."

"OUR FELLOW-WORMS."

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY.

There used to be an orthodox old lady in Cambridge (Mass.), who would never permit the caterpillars in her trees to be destroyed. "They are our fellow-worms," she used to say, and devastation radiated from her garden. The caterpillars, in a sense, were rather her lords and masters than her fellow-worms: human interests were sacrificed to them. The poet Cowper wrote:—

"I would not enter on my list of friends,
Though graced with polished manners and fine sense,
The man who needlessly sets foot upon a worm."

But with equal justice he might have set foot on every worm which destroyed leaf or fruit necessary for the health and welfare of man.

But, where ignorance says falsely, "They are our fellow-worms," knowledge may say the same truly, at any rate of the earthworms, now that Darwin has told us the history and romance of these lowly contemporaries. In simple prose, the great man tells the facts about the worm, quite unconscious of the picture that for others illuminates his book,—the greatest scientist of his century bowing his gray head for years in study of the humblest form of life. Because the worm is a nocturnal animal he must sometimes watch beside it through the night. While the world slumbers, the astronomer bends his telescope on starry galaxies, but he finds there no grander vistas than he whose scientific vigil is beside a pot of earthworms. What is an inanimate star to this dawn of organization, this genesis of order and first footprint on a planet of the brain that distinguishes and selects? The earthworm brings but one little functional power superior to all that preceded it,—sensitiveness. Like inorganic nature, it is blind and deaf; but it can feel the light it sees not; it has sensitive touch, it can suffer. Suffering means a knowledge of good and evil,—so early was that fruit eaten! To seek pleasure and escape pain is henceforth the aspiration of animate nature: it will be the law alike of the self-tortured ascetic and the epicurean. All civilization will be but a system of contrivances to avoid pain and secure happiness.

The dignity of the worm has never been without some recognition by man. It was of old a symbol of destruction. It passed from the gloom of Job, who said to the worm, "Thou art my mother," to Jesus, who pictured Gehenna, whose worm dieth not. In Egypt the little lord of the grave expanded into Apophis, the all-devouring serpent, and it gave Dante and Milton their name "Worm" for Satan. The Rabbins brought together the Worm and Solomon (least and greatest) in their legend that, though that king, leaning on his staff after he was dead, deceived the genii, he could not deceive the worm. The enslaved genii went on building the temple, thinking their erect master was still alive; but the worm gnawed the end of his staff, and down tumbled Solomon. Christians represented Herod as having turned to worms. Many myths of this kind preceded Victor Hugo's "Epic of the Worm," which Bayard Taylor translated:—

"God having made me worm, I make you smoke.
Though safe your nameless essence from my stroke,
Yet do I gnaw no less
Love in the heart, stars in the livid space,
God jealous, making vacant thus your place,
And steal your witnesses.

"Since the star flames, man would be wrong to teach
That the grave's worm cannot such glory reach;
Nought real is save me;
Within the blue as 'neath the marble slab I lie,
I bite at once the star within the sky,
The apple on the tree."

Such has been the epic of the worm in the past, —the passing away of the glory of the world under the remorseless gnawing of time. But in our century poetry became pantheistic; its eye caught the glimpse of a cosmic unity which included the worm and the universe in one vast circle of love. The first lines of a new worm-epic were written by Shelley:—

"The spirit of the worm within the sod
In love and worship blends itself with God."

The brave theme floated in the air till it caught the ear of Robert Browning, and there gained a variation:—

"For the loving worm within its sod
Were diviner than a loveless God
Amid his worlds, I will dare to say."

But before that Emerson had measured the justice of the universe with this lowly form:—

"Fear not then, thou child infirm, There's no god dare wrong a worm."

Thus there have been fine preludes to the new epic, whose materials Darwin has gathered and sifted; and this new song will reveal the worm as reverse of a destroyer. It harms not the living. It burrows in graves to bring back into activities of life the useful substances which man, or rather his superstition, buries there. The worm is the resurrection and the life for such spirits in prison. Things hard and useless for the life of nature,—stones, ruins,—it buries, but converts organic remains into mould, and brings them to earth's surface, where they may bloom again and breathe in fragrance and happy carols.

The worm is apparently the first form in nature that ever earned its living by work, and, like every faithful worker, serves all in serving itself. It is weak and timid; without eyes, ears, feet, tooth, or weapon of defence; it can only lay hold of a thing by suction. And this slow, small thing, without shield or shell, set to work on a granite world, has surrounded it with a rich soil, enabled it to put forth its variegated carpet, and to evolve forms beneath which the violent are buried. The service done by the worm for man has naturally attracted the attention of theology. A generation has not elapsed since theology was hurling anathemas upon the man to whom it now repairs to beg a little help. An ingenious writer in the Spectator argues that the work of the worms must have been providentially designed, in anticipation of man, because the worm does not do the best for itself while doing the best for man. Such is the fact. The worm swallows vast quantities of sand, chalk, etc., to get the small nutriment in them, when it might get the food it prefers by devoting itself to the vegetal world. It has gone on for ages eating dust, though the vegetal supplies have increased. It must, says the theologian, have been bound to such self-denying work by a higher power. But the theologian forgets that what is originally adopted from necessity often survives as instinct. There are human tribes that obstinately go naked, even in the cold, after clothes are offered them; others that keep the Sabbath rigidly after it has become an impediment. We can understand the force of habit among our fellow-worms; but it cannot be shown that man might not have been better off if the earthworm could have varied its instincts under changed conditions.

Man is prone to personify in nature the mental order derived from nature, and to imagine an invisible man at work there. And, if he did not regard this invisible man superstitiously, it would be true enough to say that an intelligence like his own is at work in nature. In the prudence of one animal, the affection of another, the maternal instinct of another, it has worked. Human taste is prefigured in the distinguishing touch of the worm; and human society in the earthworms rolling themselves together in a ball to keep alive through the winter. That, too, is providence. But when the human mind would go beyond recognition of its own tendencies distributed through nature to find these concentrated in an Omnipotent Person, the providence that seemed so beautiful in the earthworm ceases to be so. We should expect the culture of the soil to be achieved by Omnipotence without such myriads of agonies. The needless agony of one worm justifies Emerson's verdict, "There's no god dare wrong a worm,"—the penalty being that a power which achieves by pain what it might achieve without, it must cease to be worshipped when it ceases to be feared. Tennyson trusts

"That not a worm is cloven in vain,
That not a moth with vain desire
Is shrivelled in a fruitless fire,
Or but subserves another's gain."

That is a divine voice, filled with a pity that nature largely lacks, and though it may sink into agnostic silence it can never be lifted in loving praise of a power less compassionate than itself. Therefore it is that every religion is a pilgrimage from a cowering worship of omnipotence to the apotheosis of its victims,—from Brahma to Vishnu, from Zeus to Prometheus, from Jehovah to Jesus. And all these do but dramatize love. It may be that in the great future of human development some vision may be attained of a divine life in nature as little dreamed of now even by a Darwin as the worm writhing in his hand dreams of his true heart. The reverent mind can afford to wait without dogmatic negations, but it cannot say it sees the things it sees not, nor sing hymns which belie its humanity. Its religion is the love of Love, an uncomplaining calm resistance to all that is opposed to love, and a joy in all those adaptations in nature which illustrate the steady transmutation of inorganic nature (including the disorganizing ferocities and passions in which it survives) into the image of that divine principle which links the toiling worms with the suffering saviours of the world.

Darwin shows how earthworms have preserved ancient ruins, old monuments, the records of man's earliest history and the materials of science. I was lately walking with some scientific men in a beautiful region of Wiltshire. Near us workmen were excavating an ancient barrow, bringing from it the ashes and arrows of prehistoric warriors. Near us a greensward, spread by earthworms over a British village, awaited its turn to withdraw for the inspection of science. Among the company was Sir John Lubbock who has so long vainly tried to persuade legislators in Parliament to give ancient monuments a protection now chiefly accorded by the worms. These relics are in the region of the famous "Cranbourne Chase." The hunting seat of King John is there, and many ancient hunting lodges. There were once twenty thousand deer in this Chase, and for centuries the first gentlemen of England, always an incurious race, did nothing but hunt there. Not a tumulus was uncovered, not a monument exhumed: over historic spots, Roman camps, British villages, they hunted and they hunted. All the "providential" care of the worms was wasted on them from remote antiquity up to last year when all that land became the inheritance of the President of the Anthropological Society. Then the work of the worm was realized. The monuments they have preserved are now coming forth, and the little creature is at last linked with the advanced thought of the world.

Solomon sent man to school to the ant that he might learn enterprise. He might equally have made man learn from the worm that gnawed his staff the greatness of the least when its work is organic. In its sod it works, an earthworm, unambitious to be a heaven-worm. Perfect steadfastness to what it is organized to do enables this weakest of its citizens to change the face of the earth. If men and women only spake and did what is equally organic, out of their very structure! What then would become of all this that people call their "religion"? What are these dogmas, rites, ceremonies, in Europe and America? Do they come out of the heart and brain of the living man? Are they expressions of the sentiment, common-sense, and reason of our age? Assuredly they are the relics of dead brains, Egyptian, Syrian, and other. Earthworms have long ago converted the cerebral organs that so thought, the lips and hands that so spake or wrote, into mould, and so passed them on to new organization for new work. But they cannot claim to be even fellow-worms of those faithful organisms who, finding their dead dogmas and rites transmute them not at all, but parade those spiritual scalps as ornaments and charms, even amid the electric lights of their physical civilization.

There is, indeed, one aspect in which the earthworm is but a too faithful type of the superstitions which arrest the organic work of the human brain and heart. And here again we may remember pregnant words of the thinker who, least of all in his generation, suffered such arrest:—

"A subtle chain of countless rings
The next unto the farthest brings.
And, striving to be man, the worm
Mounts through all the spires of form."

These lines of Emerson, anticipating Darwin's great generalization, suggest the sad side of evolution. The worm mounting through the spires of form may continue through them instincts which, however useful in a worm, are deplorable in a man. (Alas, that fact was known to Pilpay and Æsop, who detected the slyness of one animal and vanity of another beneath the mask of man!) The worm is a fair type of that adherence to old conditions by sheer force of custom, which is the chief obstruction to human development. Though the conditions of nature have changed again and again, the worm goes on burrowing and eating the dust all its days. So did its ancestors. And what other reason have half mankind for what they say and do? Why are antiquated prayers and creeds repeated? Why are foolish oaths found crawling about court-room and legislature? Not because they are really believed: were they really believed, toleration of their denial would be impossible; every freethinker would be executed as a destroyer of more than life and property. It is the worm-instinct, burrowing in graves, though a new heaven and earth offer it their banquet.

It must be admitted that this persistence of usages based on discredited beliefs serves a like utility with that of the worms, which preserve monuments. The science of mythology and folklore values the myths and fables transmitted by the credulity of one generation to the parrot tongue of the next. But it is too costly a price to pay for the fables that their transmission makes man a mere leaden pipe. At any rate, we need such antiquated mythoducts no more. Art and science can secure all the survivals they require without their being deposited in the place of brains. It is time for that dogma to die which makes man a child of the worm, and his religion a prolonged meditation in the grave. It is time for man to enter on his progression also, and mount through all the spires of thought, building his spirit's mansion not beneath the earth, but upon it.

THE JOY OF GIVING.

The practical yet untheological spirit of the age is nowhere more clearly shown than in the utilitarian use made of our national holidays. Our fast days are becoming simply days on which we refrain from tyrannous toil; our Fourth of Julys are devoted to a letting-off of the repressed steam of our exuberant national vitality; Thanksgiving days have become only days devoted to the household Lares and Penates; and Christmas, from a day of reverent but rather frigid commemoration of the birth of the Saviour of men, has come to signify, to every progressive and loving soul, the advent and ultimate triumph of a grand and glorious principle rather than the deification of a man. To-day, Christmas embodies an ethical idea, emanating, it is true, from the altruistic conception involved in the martyrdom of the Christ, an idea which the so-called "materialistic spirit of the age" would call simply "the joy of giving."

The truism, which with many other undeniable truisms finds prominent place in the Scriptures, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive," we find to be as true to-day as when the thought first took form in utterance. Nowadays, the church dogmas growing out of the self-sacrifice of Christ are, in a great measure, submerged in a general outpouring of the spirit of altruism,—the joy of giving. The majority of the poverty-stricken people, wandering amid the glittering maze of Christmas displays in all our stores, do not, as a rule, stop to regret that, in all probability, they may be forgotten in the general gift distribution of the sweet Christmas morning, but instead feel a pang of disappointment and sorrow as they count the contents of their scanty purses, because the meagre sum they possess will go so short a way in the coveted joy of giving. This phase of latter-day altruism is certainly not a result of the vaunted Puritanism of New England, for Christmas in the days of the Puritan fathers was a festival mainly observed by the Catholic Church, and New England Orthodoxy had such a horror at that time of the "Scarlet Woman" and all her belongings that any day observed as a holy-day by Catholics was not countenanced in the least by Protestant observance. Secular culture, and not Christianity, is to be given credit to and thanked for that broader spirit of self-forgetfulness which permeates, more or less, all Christendom to-day, and which makes orthodox and unorthodox alike eager to make Christmas day a holy day in deed and in truth by its altruistic temptations to indulge in the ever new and always satisfactory joy of giving.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

GUITEAU's flippant talk about being "inspired" to kill President Garfield,—claiming that, though generally sane enough, he believed himself on that 2d of July to be under an irresistible pressure from Deity to do as he did, and that "that is all there is about it,"—may lead to some fruitful and reformatory reflections among Orthodox believers on the subject of inspiration. Perhaps a healthful degree of agnosticism will be one of the lessons taught; and people, for a time at least, will be less inclined to talk familiarly of their knowledge of God's plans and purposes, as if they had just "interviewed" him in the next room. The Christian at Work appears to have had its thoughts aroused in this direction. It says:—

There has been a great deal of irreligious talk about religious things, and much of the pious prattle of people who mean well enough is little better than profanation. A great deal of the religious apathy of our day is the natural recoil of the heart from language about Deity and sacred things, which shocks the sensibilities and makes piety seem akin to blasphemy. It is impossible not to feel sometimes, after hearing people, who presume that they are religious, talk of God and the deepest experiences of the soul, that the divinest words in human language need to be washed and perfumed before they can again be used.

AMONG the theories put forth to account for Mr. Frothingham's alleged change of religious views, the following explanation from The Two Worlds, a Spiritualist paper, has at least the interest of being unlike any other:—

It was an unwise thing for Mr. Frothingham, in his intellectual and physical weariness, to have put himself under the magnetic and psychologic influences of Catholic countries. . . . It is not O. B. Frothingham that is talking, but O. B. Frothingham psychologized by associations with Roman Catholic influences. These being the opposite of himself, under their influence he speaks and sees the opposite of what the normal man sees and says. Having seen some of our speakers and mediums, under Orthodox influence, recant their Spiritualism, and preach Orthodoxy, and then, when again surrounded with the right conditions, regain self-control, or, as the Bible says, are again "in their right mind," we can but feel that they explain Mr. Frothingham's present condition. He is sensitive, and while in Europe has become to a greater or less degree the instrument for the inspiration of the great magnetic power that flows from the Catholic Church, and upon that stream there may and probably do come individualized Catholic spirits as his inspirers.

THE Inquirer, a Unitarian journal published in London, in a report of a speech of Rev. Mr. Marshall at a Unitarian convention, has this notice of Tennyson's poem, "Despair," in the November number of the Nineteenth Century:—

It is a polemic, in one sense, against agnosticism, the dreary negation of all faith which can lead amid the pressure of life's trials to nothing but despair; but it is still more a polemic against the stern Calvinism, the intensely narrow dogmatic Orthodoxy, which is mainly responsible for the existence of unbelief. He (the speaker) was afraid that many readers will miss this lesson, and in their opposition to unbelief will fail to observe the magnificent universalism, the large-souled Liberalism, which are characteristic of this latest production of Tennyson's genius, as of his greatest poem, the "In Memoriam."

Agnosticism may not here be rightly described; but none too much credit is given to Tennyson for his work in behalf of liberal religious ideas.

CHRISTIANITY, it is professed by its adherents, was founded by Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus of Nazareth, according to the New Testament, gave a very simple model for prayer, and especially directed that prayer be in secret. In view of these facts, the following extract from the Catholic Review presents food for reflection:—

The ceremonial of the Church is a prayer. Too often, it is performed in a way to shock the intelligent Catholic, and to induce the opinion that those taking part in it are either profoundly ignorant or are lacking in faith in the sublime mysteries in which they participate. The explanation is, so far as we have observed, that the subordinate ministers are not always properly trained. . . . Even serving Mass is too often painful to the celebrant and to the people. In such cases, it can hardly be a consolation to the acolytes. The fruitful source of this unseemly discord will be largely removed by Father McCallen's little book, The Sanctuary Boy's Manual, which will facilitate the labors of the clergy in training the sanctuary boys. It is almost impossible that any of the inferior ministers, who master the instructions of this manual, can fail to know their duty in any of the ordinary ceremonies of parochial or even cathedral churches. A diagram of every ceremony shows the relative position of all the assistants. Of course, no book will make up for the want of a faithful, skilful, intelligent, tasteful, and sympathetic Master of Ceremonies; but to such a one Father McCallen's book will be a treasure, full of practical hints, the fruit of many years' study of the best interpreters of the rubrics, and of almost daily practice in the cathedral of Baltimore.

A "Master of Ceremonies" and a "diagram" of positions for the conduct of prayer, among the disciples of one who recommended that prayer should be in one's own closet, with the door shut!

A WORLD'S FAIR AT ROME.

The glorious old liberator, Garibaldi, wants a World's Fair at Rome. He wants such an industrial gathering in the interest of art, agriculture, science, and progress, to disinfect the Eternal City, as it is called, of the miasma of priestism and war, and thus give to it a new and modern departure. We don't particularly need a World's Fair here in Boston, because our New England civilization has always been peaceful, industrial, commercial, popularly intelligent and free. Per contra, Rome was from the start a brutal militarism, and continued to be such until it became something worse; namely, the great centre, for the nations of the West, of superstition, priestcraft, and bigotry. Ecumenical councils should give place there to world's fairs and congresses of savans. Against the background of prehistoric time or of the historic time of the countries of the Eastern Mediterranean, Rome is not a particularly old city. Herodotus, the father of authentic history, knew nothing about it. It was of no account in his day, or not of sufficient account to attract his cosmopolitan eye, which took in everything worthy of notice in the terra cognita of his day. Rome has a future, which may atone for her past with its hideous memories of brutal conquest and bloody superstition. A great industrial exhibition in the City of the Seven Hills would make a splendid new point of departure for her on the pathway of a pacific, enlightened, tolerant civilization. The Coliseum, the scene of the sanguinary gladiatorial shows of old, when men of the Northern races were butchered to make a Roman holiday, might be transformed for such an occasion into an exhibition building. The ghosts of the ferocious old emperors would thus be effectually laid and exorcised. If there should be a World's Fair at Rome, the main structure devoted to it should be surmounted by a colossal statue of Giordano Bruno, one of the last and most illustrious martyrs of the Inquisition. If Garibaldi could have his way, he would doubtless treat the innumerable and costly churches in Rome as quarries from which building materials without limit could be taken for the erection of useful edifices devoted to human and not merely priestly purposes. In the reconstruction of Cairo in Egypt, old Arabian edifices have been thus utilized, to the great grief of sundry architectural dilettanti, who have a passion for stones shaped by chisels a thousand or two thousand years ago, and who devote their lives to the protection of dilapidation and its preservation. As if the one thing needed in the countries of the Levant and Southern Europe was not to have their soil swept clean of rubbish by way of preparation for a new departure! Western Asia, in the days of the philosopher Thales, was studded with commercial cities. Its soil was immensely productive, and it had gold mines among its sources of wealth. Under the Turk, it has become a desolation; but it is susceptible of renovation and restoration to its primitive fertility. As military Rome, the Rome of the Consuls and Cæsars, was long ago a mere hideous memory, so papal Rome, the Rome of Popes and Jesuits, is destined ere long to become a tradition of the past. To make it such as soon as possible, let Garibaldi's project of a World's Fair there be put into execution. B. W. BALL.

A FRIENDLY FOE OR A HOSTILE FRIEND.

The relations of Dr. Bartol to the Free Religious movement have been from the beginning unique. Intimately connected with the Free Religious Association in its origin as the hospitable and sympathetic host at whose house the conferences were held which ultimately led to public organization, he yet did not directly counsel organization nor join in it when it came. He gave his blessing most heartily to those who did believe in it, but for himself did not go with them. Yet he could not restrain his heart from following after them. By a natural magnetism, he was drawn to their meetings. He has never been reluctant to sit on their platform, as he did at the last May meeting, nor to respond to impromptu calls for speeches. He has as readily responded to repeated special invitations for essays and addresses. And all this speech, whether on the spur of the moment or previously written, though containing occasional criticism, has, in general spirit and aim, been in entire harmony with the platform on which he stood and with the principles and movement represented by the Free Religious Association. Whatever subject Dr. Bartol might be discussing or wherever speaking, he could hardly help disclosing his sympathies with all earnest efforts for mental and religious liberty. Yet, to some extent during all this time, but more particularly in later years, he has been the censor of the Free Religious movement. From the spirit and acts of fraternization at the Association's meetings, he has gone to his own pulpit, to throw back upon the platform which he had just left with a gracious blessing his vials of censure. No preacher in Boston has said severer things in condemnation of the Free Religious Association than he. He is not, however, to be charged with anything like treachery in thus readily passing from the Free Religious camp as a friend to the trenches of the enemy. It is simply that he lives under the influence of two controlling principles, both honestly held, but not harmonious and not yet reconciled in his consciousness.

Our friend, in his function of censor, appears to have reached pretty nearly a culminating point in a recent discourse entitled "The Reported Words of the late President of the Free Religious Association," and printed, apparently in full, in the Christian Register. In the at best confused and, as now known, inauthentic statement made by Mr. Frothingham's New York interviewer, Dr. Bartol seems to read the death-knell, if not the requiem, of so-called Free Religion. The moral that he draws is that not only freethought, as Mr. Frothingham is reported to have said, is tending to materialism, but that the movement which has tried to link freethought with religion is going rapidly the same dread way, and has, it would appear, already sunk into that hopeless gulf beyond recovery. We print in another column the essential portions of the discourse which cover this part of his theme; and we advise our readers to read them before proceeding further in this article, both because we are going to make some comment upon them, and because criticism coming from one who has shown so much friendly sympathy for the movement he now so severely criticises, is to be listened to with respect.

And, first, there are two or three matters of fact, of more or less importance, where Dr. Bartol's statements need correction. On certain particulars connected with the history of the Free Religious Association, his memory evidently fails him. The most serious of these is his speaking of "the Free Religious Association, with its Liberal Leagues,"—as if the Liberal Leagues were organized by and affiliated with the Association! It is very strange that Dr. Bartol should not have known, and quite as strange that he should have known and forgotten, that the Free Religious Association never as an organization had anything to do with forming the Liberal Leagues, or gave them any recognition when formed. Comparatively few individuals who were officially prominent in the Association showed much interest in the Leagues. And it was because Mr. Abbot, who was the organizer of the League system, saw that the Association was thus apathetic toward certain kinds and methods of liberal work which were near to his heart that he went outside to form a separate organization for the special accomplishment of these objects. And it is his complaint to-day that the National Liberal League, to which he had given his chivalrous devotion, went to wreck, just because so small a part of the membership of the Free Religious Association came to its support. Very few of the same persons were prominent in both organizations, and the two organizations never had any connection with or responsibility for each other.

With respect, too, to the origin of the Free Religious Association, Dr. Bartol falls into some confusion of reminiscence. It is not a matter of very great moment, but when one attempts to give "a bit of history or biography" it is as well to be accurate. Three memories are better than one; and there are at least three men who will remember the facts a little differently here from what Dr. Bartol states them. That meeting at his house "which seventy men attended" was two years after "the New York Convention was called to consummate," as he says, an "enterprise for a new religion of ritual and the letter." So that, if, as he affirms, it was his "wrath" at what the Unitarians were to attempt at that Convention which led him to call that meeting of seventy, he certainly restrained his "wrath" in a remarkable degree before he allowed it to become operative.

Dr. Bartol has evidently mixed things somewhat in the history of those events of which he is talking, and mixed the biography a little, too, concerning the call for that "meeting of seventy,"—a memorable meeting, with consequences every whit as important as he indicates. It was the action of the Syracuse Unitarian Conference (a year and a half after the New York Convention) which brought about those private conferences in Dr. Bartol's house, which grew into the Free Religious Association. Certain of the younger ministers in the Unitarian ranks, who had struggled at the Syracuse Conference for the overthrow of the preamble-creed which the New York Convention had adopted, and been defeated in the struggle, found, on returning to New England, Dr. Bartol full of sympathy with them in their defeat, and nursing a veritably divine wrath against the victorious denominational powers. He was full of the spirit of protest and revolt, was ready even for "a new denomination," and opened his house as hospitably as his heart for such conferences as these younger men wished to hold. For the first small informal meetings, he sent out invitations to such persons as they suggested to him or he wished to have present. But, when it came to the more important meeting of seventy, while he, as the generous host, was of course free to invite personally whom he should desire, all the preparatory arrangements, including the sending out of most of the invitations, fell to the lot of the three men who, after the smaller conferences had shown only a divided sentiment, had begun to look more steadily than the rest toward some form of organized expression of a larger religious liberty. It should not be deemed invidious to name these three. They were Francis E. Abbot, Edward C. Towne, and the present writer. Octavius Frothingham readily cooperated with them, and was in full sympathy with their aims; and Dr. Bartol, though his "wrathful" zeal had so far subsided that he did not favor organization, yet favored a free opportunity for those who did believe in it, and welcomed the meeting with all his heart. The meeting, however, was really called and arranged by these three men, Dr. Bartol standing behind them as host. Since the Free Religious Association, the offspring of that meeting, has turned out a good deal of a prodigal, in Dr. Bartol's view, it is but right that his conscience should be relieved, by this reference to historical facts, of any reproach that he may feel for having been the father of the Association. He was only its god-father; and, as such, he has done his best by his watchful care and counsels, both in praise and rebuke, to hold it in right paths.

We are sorry to see our friend repeating his old accusation that his freedom of speech has been interfered with on the platform of the Free Religious Association. He refers, doubtless, to an incident that happened at one of the conventions, where a member too zealously protested against his having brought and treated a certain subject there in the manner he had. But another member defended his right with equal warmth, and the Association in no way made itself responsible for the individual attempt to infringe on his liberty. Dr. Bartol had already said all that he had to say, without interruption to the end, and has always had the same uninterrupted liberty whenever, before or since, he has spoken on the Association's platform. For him to claim that his pulpit is freer than that platform, when two years ago he sharply criticised the Unitarian Ministers' Institute for inviting an anti-Christian and a Jew to address it, basing his criticism mainly on the fact that they were invited to speak in a church that had been dedicated to Christ, indicates, to say the least, a not very clear idea of freedom. If he was sincere, as is not to be questioned, in his criticism of the Institute, then of course he would not admit as speakers into his pulpit, which has been "dedicated to Christ," an anti-Christian or a Jew. But the Free Religious Association invites such speakers to its platform, and grants them equal freedom with others.

But the gist of Dr. Bartol's complaint against the Association is that it has left the Transcendental philosophy, set itself against the doctrine of intuition, and gone over and down to an arid and lifeless materialism. It were well if this charge, that the Association has become materialistic, which is heard in different quarters, should be drawn out with some attempt at preciseness of statement and presenting of arguments for sustaining the charge. Then, it would be easier to meet it. Dr. Bartol's statement is so rhetorical that its only proper answer is an equal felicity of rhetoric. In one sentence, he comes to more definiteness, as when he says: "As represented in its own arguments, through its platform or press, the movement of revolt has been continually sinking to a lower plane, as terrace after terrace was left among the highlands by the subsiding sea." But when we read through the succeeding sentences, which appear to have been intended to present the specific facts for sustaining this assertion, we are only left with an aroused but baffled curiosity as to just whom he meant by the "speculative explorers" who have gone up in "a balloon of metaphysics," or down in "diving-bells," or off "hunting for the North Pole." It looks as if our friend must have mixed the "Concord School of Philosophy" with some enterprising scientific adventurers, neither of which worthy class of persons come so often to the Free Religious platform as we might wish.

But, more seriously, where and what are the facts on which this assertion that the Free Religious Association is becoming materialistic is based? The present president of the Association, though possibly more agnostic theologically than its first president, is an avowed opponent of materialism, as his lectures published in The Index within the present year clearly prove. In moral problems, he is also an avowed intuitionist. Among the twelve vice-presidents of the Association, there are not more than one or two who could be called materialists; and even these might, it is probable, be more accurately classed as agnostics. Of the thirteen directors and other officers, there is possibly—possibly, not certainly—one who would take the name of materialist. The secretary, who is also editor of this paper, which is now published under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, is, if he knows his own mind, as far from materialism as Dr. Bartol. He may not accept Dr. Bartol's theory of the universe, and he certainly cannot treat with disparagement this world of matter, which is at once the organ and garment of idea, and whose secrets science is so wondrously revealing; but he does not believe that matter in itself alone is adequate to explain the world. His editorial colleague is an agnostic, and accepts substantially the philosophy of Herbert Spencer. Among the nine invited speakers at the last annual meeting of the Association there was one, and probably but one, who could be called a materialist. The Association has always taken the ground, in accordance with the broad principles of its constitution, that honest materialism has a right to be heard on its platform and in its publications, like any other honest attempt at explaining the world of matter and man. But there appears to be no solid reason for believing that materialism, as a system of thought, is stronger in the Association to-day than it was ten or twelve years ago.

To one thing, it should be said in conclusion, the Free Religious Association is committed by its constitution,—to "the scientific study of man's religious nature and history." But this is by no means to limit the study of "the atoms or the orbs." Science has a much larger range to-day than in physical nature. Nor is the study limited to the thought in man's "forehead." It embraces the sentiments of his heart as well. His hopes and aspirations are as much a part of the facts of the world to be considered as are the circulation of the blood in his veins or the inflation of his lungs. "The rock of inner spiritual conviction" is as much a part of the field of study as the rock which geology explains and classifies in the earth. Why this fear that science, if it touches these inward facts of mind and heart, is going to explain them away, so that nothing will be left of them? If real, will they not stand the study? Science does not explain away the outward rocks nor the orbs nor the atoms. Science only discloses truth, does not destroy it. It will leave standing in the world of man as in the world of matter everything that is genuinely true. What, more than this, can we want? It was specially to further this fearless and unbounded search for truth in religious problems and for right applications of truth to life that the Free Religious Association came into existence. For this, it still stands. When it ceases to stand for this, let it cease to be.

THE Presbyterian says, "Mr. Frothingham has half-recanted his creed." But Mr. Frothingham writes, "I have seen no reasons for changing my opinions. Certainly, I have not gone back to any opinions I had abandoned."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

SO MUCH has been said regarding Mr. Frothingham's alleged change of views that the discourse in relation to this subject by Mr. Savage, delivered in this city last Sunday, and published in The Index this week, will be read by Liberals generally, we think, with interest and satisfaction.

The Index next week will contain an essay by Mr. Charles Ellis, on "Matter and Spirit," which was read last Sunday before the "Parker Memorial Class." We shall give to our readers, among other contributions, one from Mrs. E. D. Cheney on "The Kantian Centennial," one from the pen of Miss M. A. Hardaker on "Science as a Factor in Social Progress," and another of the series of articles by Mr. William Clarke on English Land Reform.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar.

WE are now sending out bills to the subscribers of The Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a favor if our friends will remit at once, and if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew.

A WRITER in the Christian Statesman, in an article on "Guiteau's Defence," says: "I do not justify the Constitution nor the deed committed by the assassin; but, if the doctrine of the Constitution be correct, his act cannot be condemned. Guiteau richly deserves to die; but the Constitution, which educated him to believe that he might murder the President under the delusion that it was an act of religion which could not be punished, needs to be amended." If Guiteau acted in accordance with the Constitution, and if the Constitution of his country educated him to commit the deed for which he is now on trial, how can a sentence of death by the Government be justified? Such a Government as the writer above quoted desires would be a religious despotism; and, if established, tame submission to it on the part of those who believe in religious liberty would be cowardly and mean. The man who would not join in a rebellion for its overthrow is unworthy the name of free-man.

MUCH that is represented in these times as the teachings of materialism is unscientific and crude; and it is not uncommon to confound this crude thought with the philosophy of all thinkers who reject as unproven the hypothesis of an intelligent Deity and the doctrine of personal immortality. Without expressing here any opinion as to the merits of different philosophical systems, we may remark that many of the foremost scientific men and philosophic thinkers of the age, among whom may be mentioned Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, Lewes, and Fiske, while they rebuke assumption and dogmatism, whether they are indulged in under the name of theology or materialism, find no convincing evidence either in themselves or in the world about them of an intelligent Being who governs the universe, or of the continuance of human consciousness after the dissolution of the physical structure. This agnostic philosophy, as it is now often termed, is, like every other school of thought, open to discussion, and not by any means to be regarded as a finality; but on the one hand it should not be confounded with antiquated theories, nor on the other should fragmentary quotations from its eminent exponents be unfairly made, as they frequently are, in support of theological or theistic views with which these thinkers are known to have no sympathy whatever.

The Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 22, 1881.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

CREEDS AND DEEDS.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

I asked my neighbor what he thought
Of God. He looked me o'er and o'er,
Then answered, God I must esteem
Unknowable for evermore.

I saw my neighbor in the dusk
Steal forth and stand with upturned face,
The glinting stars showed me a soul
That worshipped, though but empty space.

I asked my neighbor what he thought
Of Christ. He said, Christ was a man
Like to the rest of us, no God I see Forth shadowed in his life's brief span.

I saw my neighbor in the haunts
With vice and shame and misery fraught,
With spotless hands and holy zeal
Doing the things which Christ had taught.

I asked my neighbor what he thought
Of heaven. He said, Heaven is a dream,
As though mere foolishness of man
Thoughts of another world I deem.

I saw my neighbor planning out
Large charities, from whose success
The coming years had most to gain,
When he was dead the world to bless.

Then said I, "Neighbor, what you think
With your cool head I know in part,
But care not; for I now have found
What you think of them with your heart.

"And you may foster as you will
Your unbelief in all the creeds,
So that you keep your faith still strong
In the great Gospel of Good Deeds.

"And out of this, perchance, at length
A higher hope and joy may spring,
Of your life's work the glorious end,
Its crowning growth and blossoming."

A PERSON who should labor for the happiness of mankind lest he should be tormented eternally in hell would, with reference to that motive, possess as little claim to the epithet of "virtuous" as he who should torture, imprison, and burn them alive,—a more usual and natural consequence of such principles,—for the sake of the enjoyment of heaven.—Shelley.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM

AND HIS SUPPOSED CHANGE OF BASE.*

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

"And the city was filled with the confusion: and they rushed with one accord into the theatre. . . . Some therefore cried one thing, and some another: for the assembly was in confusion; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together."—ACTS xix., 29, 32.

This nineteenth chapter of the Acts gives us an admirable picture of a popular excitement. Paul, the leading radical thinker and preacher of the first century, was a restless and perpetual menace to the old Judaism, and to the orthodox Christianity of Jerusalem. But, not contented with this, he was invading Paganism in all accessible lands. Ephesus at this time was the centre of one of the most famous worship of antiquity. Here was the image of the great goddess Artemis, or Diana, that was said to have fallen down from heaven. In proclaiming a new God and a new religion, Paul was endangering the prestige and prosperity of the city. Particularly did he excite the wrath of the craftsmen who lived and prospered by the manufacture and sale of "silver shrines," or miniature copies of the famous temple. If the new opinions of Paul prevailed, there would be no longer any need of their services. It naturally followed then that, when the alarm was given, the city was filled with confusion. With one accord, they rushed into the theatre; and for the space of about two hours they cried out, "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!" And, as commonly in the case of a crowd, it was not at all necessary that they should take pains to know what it was all about; and so the writer significantly adds, "The more part knew not wherefore they were come together." It was a general opportunity for a frantic outcry, and they all took advantage of it to the utmost.

There is a striking similarity between some features of this old commotion and the present condition of the public mind concerning our friend, Mr. O. B. Frothingham. Only, whereas, in ancient Ephesus, there was only one party whose interests were involved, now, in modern America, there are two,—one to be converted to, and one to be converted from. It follows that there are more people to scream, and the resulting possibility of a greater confusion. For twenty years, in the metropolis of the country, Mr. Frothingham stood the most conspicuous representative of radical religious freethought. Worn out at last by long-continued and unrelieved labor, he goes abroad in search of new stores of vigor for renewed activity. When he returns, we are all interested as to what he will do. But he is waylaid by a danger to which, however many things he may have suffered from, Paul was never exposed. Paul, indeed, gives us a heart-rending picture of what he had been through. Besides stripes and stonings and shipwreck, besides labor and watching, and hunger and thirst and fasting, and cold and nakedness, he itemizes all these: "In perils of rivers, in perils of robbers, in perils from my countrymen, in perils from the Gentiles, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren." All this is bad enough. But there is one thing Paul escaped: he never was "in peril" of an "interviewer." But this Mr. Frothingham does not escape. He is thus put before the country in a false light. His old friends and followers think they are about to lose him, and the shrine-makers think he is going back to the gods whose prestige he has threatened; and the natural result follows. Not "the city" only, now, but the country, is "filled with confusion." Both sides "rush with one accord into the theatre," the public theatre of debate and outcry; and pulpit and platform and newspaper resound with shrill and conflicting voices. And as it was in Ephesus, so it is now: "the more part know not wherefore they are come together." The mob does not wait for so commonplace a thing as knowledge on the subject. There's an opportunity to scream, and they improve it. The extreme radical says: "I told you so. There always was something peculiar about Frothingham.

* Mr. Savage having been kind enough to read me his sermon, I take pleasure in saying that it tells correctly the story of the New York Evening Post interview; and also is substantially correct in every particular as concerns my present attitude of thought. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.
December 16, 1881.

My pet crotchet that was warranted to make a perfect world in six easy lessons, he never would have anything to do with. He's a fastidious aristocrat, and never had any real sympathy with the people." While, on the other hand, the old ecclesiasticisms echo the cry: "I told you so. We always knew he was a noble man, a bold thinker, and altogether too wise to continue walking with his eyes open, and without the guidance of our antique leading-strings. We knew he'd get tired, and lie down to sleep swathed in our traditional millinery at last."

Meantime, while he keeps silent, new changes on these sage conclusions are rung in our ears. Every Sunday, the pulpits echo all over the land. All the old religious newspapers are chanting pæans over Frothingham's "recantation," "the failure of freethought," "the death of Liberalism." Many of the so-called "freethought" papers ring with taunts, and are besprinkled with epithets. Even the daily press helps on the "confusion worse confounded." If Mr. Frothingham cares to know what an exalted saint, what a base traitor, what a self-seeking hypocrite, what a penitent prodigal, what a broken-down imbecile, and what a religious devotee he really is, he has now an opportunity that will probably never be offered him again.

All this while I have kept silent. Some of you, I know, have wondered why I did not speak. I am now ready to tell you. It seemed to me that there was confusion enough already. I did not care to scream for the sake only of adding to the noise. When at liberty to do so,—unfortunately, a minister does not always have that liberty,—I have always had a prejudice in favor of waiting until I had something to say, and thought at least that I knew what I was going to talk about. If all people did this, there would often be what Sydney Smith called "brilliant flashes of silence." But the world would be none the less wise. I proposed then to keep still until I had something to say. I felt that it was quite possible for a man of even Mr. Frothingham's brain and culture to change his mind. I knew it was far from uncommon for men to become more conservative as they grew older. This is seen in all phases of thought. But I also felt sure of another thing. I felt sure that, if Mr. Frothingham was of sound mind, he could never put forth any such manifesto as that which appeared in the New York Evening Post. Whatever else he may have been during the last twenty years, he has at least been a clear-cut, logical, vigorous thinker and writer. But this reported "interview" was confused, contradictory, inconclusive, and full of ignorant misstatements concerning matters of even common scholarship. It betrayed the voice of a man who did not know what he was talking about. And I said to myself and to my friends, When Mr. Frothingham does change his opinions, he will at least be able to state that fact clearly; and he will set forth some intellectually respectable reasons for that change. And, as neither the one nor the other of these conditions had been met, I felt sure that, to whomsoever the hands might belong, the voice was not the voice of Frothingham. This is why I have been silent.

Why, then, do I now speak? For the very good reason that at last I have something to say. I have had several talks with Mr. Frothingham. He knows my personal interest in him, and also my interest in the truths that are involved in all this confused controversy. While therefore there are reasons why he does not wish to enter the debate with his own pen, he has given his consent that I should speak for him. This word therefore goes before the country with his sanction, and backed by his authority.

But, before attempting to set forth his present religious attitude, let us take a brief preliminary glance over his career. He was born Nov. 26, 1822. He has therefore passed fifty-nine, and is travelling on toward his sixtieth year. His father was Dr. N. L. Frothingham, for thirty-five years the able, scholarly, and refined minister of the old First Church of Boston, now in charge of Dr. Rufus Ellis. Boston's "blue blood" is therefore in his veins, Boston's best traditions are behind him, and his cradle was rocked by Boston's finest culture. He trod the highway that New England pride and devotion have built for the favored feet of those that are destined to stand on her lofty outlooks of learning. Through the Boston Latin School, Harvard College, the Divinity School he goes, till, at the age of twenty-four, he stands on the threshold of his active life. His first settlement is over the old North Church in Salem. Traditions, training, taste, all combine to make of him here the refined, quiet, scholarly, conservative clergyman. And such he was until, like all men with a mission, he meets his fate. But new life and new light were in the air; and souls capable of inspiration could not escape the influence. This was the morning time of New England's new age,—the time of Emerson, of George Ripley, of Margaret Fuller, of the Dial, of Brook Farm. But the voice that spoke to him out of the overhanging cloud, and became to him the heaven-sent utterance as to the way in which he must thereafter walk, was that of Theodore Parker.

Parker was at this time, especially throughout rural New England, a name to frighten children with. I well recall the uncanny echoes of his supposed horrible doctrines that reached my childhood, in the central part of Maine. In Boston itself, to be an attendant at Music Hall was not only enough to shut one out of heaven, but—what to many was even a worse calamity—to shut one out of "good society."

I must stop here long enough to indicate one or two changes in public opinion concerning Parker, that bear on a question now under discussion, as to whether rational thought or religion has made and is making progress. May 19, 1841, about a month before I was born, Parker preached his famous sermon on "The Transient and the Permanent in Christianity." So dreadful was this regarded then that the Unitarians themselves cast him out. To-day, it is commonplace in all liberal pulpits; and, even in many an Orthodox pulpit, it might now be preached, while all the deacons should nod an acquiescing Amen. They prayed then that God would put a hook in the nose of this soul-destroying leviathan. And now, concerning young Frothingham's meeting with this same supposed new incarnation of evil, a churchman prints in a Boston paper, "God had a hand in it." While, just before his death, Dean Stanley writes that Theodore Parker has rendered a greater service to theological science than any other American for a hundred years.

But, in spite of the reputation that Parker then had, young Frothingham's mind was a blade of such temper as to strike fire on this flint, and be all the sharper for the contact. But Salem still had left some of the Pharisaism that cast out the witches, and was therefore no comfortable home for the disturbing spirit of modern thought, which, the staid citizens took for granted, must be from below. September, 1855, then finds Mr. Frothingham in Jersey City. Here at least he found himself free. But the pharos-tower was not conspicuous enough for the light; and 1859 sees him in New York, in the eyes of all the land. For twenty years, he was one of the religious "features" of the metropolis. From his study, he sent out book after book, too often putting what ought to have been vacation into some literary or theological work, for which his ordinary duties left him no adequate time. He was a frequent contributor to all the leading periodicals of the day. And I well remember how, while I was still in an Orthodox pulpit, there came through the secular press, on a Monday morning's telegraph, echoes of what he had said the day before.

Let us now get him clearly in mind, if we can, as he stood at home some Sunday morning, in the presence of his own people in Masonic Temple; and then we will briefly estimate the place he held and that which he stood for in the religious life of his time.

As I saw him in those days, he stood, a little taller than most of his fellows, a fine figure of dignity and grace. His head was nobly moulded; his hair dark, short, curly, and a little sprinkled with gray; his eyes gray and piercing; his face mobile and expressive. He spoke without notes, as had been his custom for years; but he did not speak without thought. And you felt all the while that he grasped a clear line of purpose, and was following it to a definite end. His style was elevated, terse, and clear. Not given to rhetoric or ornament, and never playing with either for its own sake, he yet was graceful and finished, and often rose naturally to heights of poetic beauty and imaginative eloquence. But thought was always first. If emotion showed itself, it was no "display of feeling," but only earnestness fused to white heat in its rapid motion toward a practical end.

What now did he stand for? Perhaps the title of what I should call his best book, The Religion of Humanity, may be taken as a general answer. As a public teacher, he stood alone in New York as truly as did ever any old prophet in Jerusalem. But he bore his "burden" patiently, and bravely uttered his message. Surrounded on all hands by churches of every name and creed, he had with them no recognized religious fellowship. Ecclesiastical authority, book revelation, miracles, supernaturalism in all its forms, these he rejected. He stood for utter free-thought and the supremacy of human reason. He rejected nothing of the past that could come into court, bringing what reason could accept as adequate credentials. He was not frightened from his purpose by being called a "negationist"; for he had intelligence enough to know, what is too often overlooked, that to deny is only another way to affirm. And, in reality, his teaching was one grand affirmation. He affirmed man, freedom, reason, morality, religion, as against the myths, the traditions, the ignorance, the misconceptions, the partialisms, and the dogmatic tyrannies of the past; and he affirmed these equally against the vested interests, the hereditary prejudices, the time-serving, the pusillanimities, and the cowardly hypocrisies of the present.

There is one feature of this brave stand that is of enough importance to call for special mention. One radical publication has been mean enough to intimate that the motive of his recent supposed change is somehow connected with a desire for the soft and comfortable repose of the established Church. Let us look and see. Here is a man with all refined and cultivated tastes; a born aristocrat, if you please; a lover of art, of music, of literature; to whom all social circles are naturally open. And all this is supplemented by an independent fortune. How many men, in such a case, would have simply "taken their ease, eaten, drunk, and been merry"? Does such a man need to go into any church for the sake of a soft sleeping-place? And yet, with all these tempting opportunities for a self-indulgent life, no man who had his bread to earn by drudgery has been a more laborious worker for thirty years than he. He has fairly worn himself out, self-impelled, for the love he bore to truth and man. He stood up in the face of a storm of obloquy in days when much of our present easy-going radicalism might not have had the courage. Whatever, then, he may now choose to do, it is not for those whose work he has helped make easy to air their questionable bravery by calling him a coward.

In 1879, he feels he can go no further. For a time at least, he must lay down his burden and rest. In his farewell sermon, before his departure for Europe, he takes occasion to express his dissatisfaction with unorganized effort, and in some respects to criticize his own past methods. The old churches of course are happy that he is going. And, in a spirit like that they have recently shown, they catch at his expressions of modest and frank self-criticism, and cry out that he has pronounced his work a failure. Their wish is so much "the father to the thought" that they are not over-scrupulous in their efforts to set him in the light in which they would like to see him. If it be a failure not to leave behind him a sect of Frothinghamites,—he who all his life has fought against sectarianism,—then indeed did he fail. But, if the "heaven" is not lost which is "hid in three measures of meal," then the end of his work is not yet.

It is easy to say that he ought to have organized his New York Society so as to leave it at work and with a successor on his platform. And indeed this is now his own feeling, and perhaps his one regret. On the other hand, it is only just to say that some men are like Melchizedek: they stand alone, and have no successors. Be that as it may, his society found no one to take his place, and crumbled into individual fragments when the central attraction was gone.

He was abroad two years, seeking health, and not finding it. Last fall, he returned, and, with what strength he had, picked up here in Boston a labor of love, of friendship, and of old-time memories,—the Life of George Ripley, who had been one of his New York disciples.

And now comes the "beginning of sorrows." Very naturally, his old friends in New York are anxious to know what he purposes to do. Very naturally, people all over the country would like to know his plans; if he is to preach again; if so, where and what. And also, very naturally, the newspaper man is anxious for a piece of piquant and salable sensation. As there is much misunderstanding, and has been some contradiction concerning the matter, I will here relate the true story of the famous interview.

Mr. Frothingham had no intention of issuing to the country a manifesto. Neither did he take any steps toward such an end. He is here in his retirement among his friends, when he receives a letter from a man on the editorial corps of the New York Evening Post. Mr. Frothingham replies, saying he expects soon to be in New York on business, and will step in and see him. His correspondent writes again, telling him not to take that trouble, but only to send his address when he is there, and he will call upon him. This, then, is done. After being overtaken some days with business, and perhaps the too great kindness of well-intentioned friends, the interviewer calls upon him. He has no paper, no pencil, and takes no notes. Mr. Frothingham indulges in a general free conversation. "I have been interviewed often enough," said he to me, "to know what it means. Had he had pencil and paper in hand, I should have known what to expect. He had written me, asking two questions only: why I did not go on with my New York work; and what I was going to do. He asked nothing, in his original letter, as to my religious opinions; and I did not suppose he was to mention that subject." He had, therefore, no idea that any more was to be made of it than some ordinary item as to his present condition and his future work. As the interviewer rises to go, he takes care to caution him against possible misrepresentation; for some of us, who know what a reporter of vivid imagination can make us say when he has his pencil, may well stand in awe of one who trusts wholly to memory. And indeed, in my opinion, it is not common honesty to put into quotation-marks a mass of stuff that is only written out from recollection after a prolonged conversation. It is sure to misrepresent: it may be well-nigh slanderous. Two or three days pass, and nothing appears in the Post. But Saturday night shows a marvellous success at misrepresentation. And it is afterward discovered that, as New York correspondent, the reporter had sent letters to several of the principal papers in the larger cities East and West.

Mr. Frothingham says—and I think we will all agree with him—that "a piece of work like this ought to lose a newspaper man his position." He now goes in personal protest to the proprietor. He even shows the proprietor the brief reply he had felt himself obliged to make. He asks him if he thinks what he has said sufficient; and, at his suggestion, adds the last sentence, in which he plainly declares, "Certainly, I have not gone back to any position which I had abandoned." The proprietor then tells him he thinks he has said enough to make the matter plain. From this time on, Mr. Frothingham does not even look at the original reported interview. But, meantime, the mischief is done. The cry is begun,—and one side is saying, "Traitor!" and the other is getting ready to welcome a convert. He is disgusted at both sides: that his former friends are so ready to believe him as idiotic as the report would make him out; and that the Evangelicals are so happy over so ignorant and inconsequent a manifesto. Of course, the Post is open to him to print whatever he will. But, in his present state of health and state of mind, he does not want to be dragged into a compulsory unbosoming of himself before the country. To speak at all to his own satisfaction, he must speak at greater length and more exhaustively than he has at present either strength or time to do. His pen is now a burden to him. He tells me that, when he is ready, he hopes to publish something that may deserve to stand, both as an estimate of what he has tried to do and also as expressing his present outlook over the religious situation. He only glanced over the interviewer's work once, in New York, and sent a brief note of general denial, covering two points: first, to correct the misstatements concerning personal friends; and, secondly, to say, "I have seen no reason for changing my opinions," and "I have not gone back to any position which I had abandoned." Whether rightly or not, he thinks his saying any more may only add to the confusion. He will let people cry themselves hoarse about it, trusting they will stop when they get tired or find themselves mistaken.

Two things remain to be done: to state the principal things the interviewer makes him say; and then to state the facts as to his present religious attitude.

But first, a word as to the general appearance of the report. The writer gives the impression that he is stating verbatim what Mr. Frothingham said; for he has the assurance—to give it no harsher name—to put almost a whole long column of fine print (as it appeared in the Boston Journal) in quotation-marks, and to represent Mr. Frothingham as speaking in the first person. When you remember, as I have already told you, that he did not take a single note during the conversation, the dishonesty of such a proceeding becomes tolerably plain.

Now for the contents of the misreport. The tone and tints and atmosphere of this piece of work—to use an artist's figure—can be properly appreciated only when you remember all the while that he who lays on the colors is an Evangelical in his sympathies and sees all things through Evangelical eyes. Indeed, he begins by saying, "Exactly what Mr. Frothingham taught"—before he went away—"I do not know"; though he thinks he taught nothing "to alarm the most radical of atheists." A total ignorance of our side must be an admirable preparation for an impartial setting forth of the contrasts!

For the sake of being very clear and specific, I shall number those points that are most important to be noticed:—

1. He makes Mr. Frothingham heap purely gratuitous insults on his old friends and followers. But, whatever else he may be, nobody ever suspected him of not being a courteous gentleman.

2. He makes him speak of Messrs. Chadwick and Adler as materialists. Only an ignorant man could have thought Mr. Frothingham ignorant enough so to misstate the facts.

3. He makes him misrepresent the position and work of Mr. Conway in London. Mr. Frothingham tells me that he knows perfectly well the precise contrary of what he is reported to have said.

4. He makes him express the opinion that "Evangelical religion" is "stronger" than it was "twenty years ago," and that the "opponents" of "revealed religion" during the "last twenty years" "have made no headway whatever." In the ordinary ecclesiastical meaning of those terms, Mr. Frothingham believes nothing of the kind.

5. He makes him say that "unbridled freethought leads only to a dreary negation called Materialism." No man living knows better than does Mr. Frothingham that the highest science and philosophy of the age have dealt materialism its death-blow. And no man living is less inclined than he to set any limit to the completest freedom of thought.

6. He represents him as being wondrously impressed by the Catholic priests in Rome. On this, many wiseacres have shaken their heads, and have lifted up their voices in prophecy to the effect that "Frothingham would bring up in Rome at last." Indeed, he has already received overtures in that direction. On referring to this, he laughs outright, and says: "To think of my being taken with painted windows at this time of day! If ever I was less inclined toward Catholicism than at any time before, it was when I was in Rome!" And I could not help thinking of his sermon on "The Cardinal's Beretta," preached on the occasion of Archbishop's McCloskey's receiving the cardinal's hat, in which he says that "a man may stop thinking without joining the Catholic Church."

I have already told you the substance of his little note in reply to this, and why he did not go into a more special explanation. In common with many others, I have wished he had said more. But the state of his health and a certain contempt for the whole matter have sealed his lips in a retired and dignified silence. Indeed, after having looked over the reported interview once, he dropped the matter. He does not read the newspaper discussions. And the zealous Churchmen, so forward with their fulsome welcome, may spare themselves the trouble of writing; for all letters on this subject, except from personal friends, find speedy oblivion in the waste-basket.

The treatment of this matter at the hands of the Orthodox press is nothing less than disgraceful. In spite of his explicit declaration that he has recanted nothing, not gone back one step, abandoned no position once held, they still persist in holding him up as a convert, as an example, and prophesy of the failure of freethought. The pulpits proclaim it; and individual ministers on the street look wise and smile as they fling this "interview" in the teeth of those who still hold that brains were intended for use. Time was when the Church was so strong that it took back a penitent heretic, if at all, only on his knees. Does it look like a sense of growing strength when they are so anxious to rush out in a body, and with shouts of welcome bring back on their shoulders the arch-heretic of the day, because they only suspect or hope that he is not quite so severe an enemy as he used to be? They must be reduced to sad straits when they thus rejoice over the hoped-for accession of an ally so incoherent and idiotic as he would be, if guilty of the Post "interview." Indeed, Mr. Frothingham has been so disgusted with the use that the "Evangelicals" have made of the matter that, as he says, he is compelled to feel "less sympathy with them than ever before."

Now then let me outline as briefly as I can Mr. Frothingham's present religious attitude. Has there been any real change in his view of things? Yes, there has; and this is the little flame at the heart of all this heaven-filling cloud of smoke. That change I will speak of in its place. And here again, for clearness and for the sake of avoiding further misunderstanding, if possible, I will number my points.

1. Mr. Frothingham does not regard any science that deserves the name as tending toward materialism.

2. He would not limit freethought on any subject or in any direction.

3. He is not in the least inclined to go back to any past church, statement, or creed. "Why, Mr. Savage, I know too much for that," said he the other day.

4. While he is in no sympathy with destruction for its own sake, he thinks "the work of destruction, for the sake of higher and better building, has not yet gone half far enough."

5. I asked him if he would now blot out anything he has already written and published. "Not one single word," was his answer. "I would only supplement here and there with additional statements." I asked especially about The Cradle of the Christ, which would perhaps be called his most destructive piece of criticism. He said: "I would make no change in it. It is now impossible to get at the historical Jesus. We have no materials. Jesus and the Christ I regard as two distinct and separate things."

6. Now, then, for his change. To put it into my own phrase, I should say he has come to be a more pronounced theist. The point toward which his thoughts converge is the mode of communication between the divine mind and the human. To quote his own words in conversation, he said: "For many years, I have been inclined to try to prove that everything comes out of the earth from below; that religion is purely earthly in its origin, something made by man,—his 'effort to perfect himself,' to use Mr. Abbot's phrase. And I have not, as I now think, taken enough account of the working in the world of a divine mind, a power above man, working on and through him to lift and lead." And, in his own use of that term, he looks for larger "revelations" of God and truth in the future. "I hope," said he, "that new light will break out—not of God's word, in the sense of a book, but—of God's universe. The new light, he thinks, will come, not by studying old creeds or standards or Bibles, but by looking forward for new manifestations, through natural methods, in the human soul."

Whenever, in the past, I have felt compelled to criticize or differ from Mr. Frothingham, it has been almost always concerning these very points wherein his reported change has taken place. So far as I can see, the present attitude of Mr. Frothingham is not very far from my own. Not by any means that I would presume to put him in the position of fathering all my ideas, but only that his position and outlook are substantially the same as mine.

Meantime, after a life of exceptional toil, he has certainly earned the right to rest and wait. If he is not entirely satisfied with his life-work, what man of any lofty ideals is satisfied? If he questions some of his past methods, and feels that he overlooked and did not sufficiently emphasize some of the many sides of the infinite truth, let that man who has grasped the whole universe be the one to find fault with him. Ceasing to speak when they have delivered their message; and waiting for "more light," instead of plunging recklessly forward when the way is not clear; hoping in the future, and trusting that the power that has unrolled the panorama of the past has more and grander still to reveal,—is not this the attitude of all reverent, noble, believing souls? Let us leave Mr. Frothingham then on the furthest verge of his advance, not taking one step backward, but only facing the east, waiting for a new and brighter rising of the ever old and ever new "Sun of Righteousness" and of life; feeling sure that, like the fabled statue of Memnon at Thebes, when the first rays smite upon his forehead, the music of his old-time utterance will respond to the appeal.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHAT IS WESTERN UNITARIANISM?

Editors of the Index:—

The Index is wont to speak approvingly of the broad platform of Western Unitarianism. "It is broader than the National Conference," and "substantially in accord with the Free Religious Association." Precisely what Western Unitarianism is, what its philosophy, theology, etc., are, it is difficult to determine. So far as Unitarianism comes within the scope of the writer, geographical position makes little or no change. It is allotropic in the East, it is allotropic in the West. In the East, you have a Savage and an Ellis in one city, a Chadwick and a Putnam in another. In the West, you have a slushy Orthodoxy in a Chicago pulpit and a scientific radical at Denver. In the late Rev. R. L. Herbert, of Denver, Mr. Jones, Secretary of the Western Unitarian Association, discovered "the promise of the effective liberal minister that we are waiting for." It is quite possible therefore that Mr. Jones would indorse both Mr. Herbert's spirit and belief. Suppose he did, you have only two men represented, neither of whom would dream of representing Western Unitarianism found in that small section of country extending from Buffalo, N.Y., to the Golden Gate, and including "Kentucky and the South," and which, in 1876, consisted of seventy-three societies and forty-three ministers.

Supposing Mr. Herbert and his eulogists were in sweet accord, what would they as individuals calling themselves Unitarian ministers represent? What views do they hold on subjects which agitate and define religious factions? In two private letters, dated respectively Feb. 23 and June 20, 1881, Mr. Herbert succinctly states his position. The following extracts are to me significant. Of Unitarianism, Mr. Herbert says: "Unitarianism is sick, because it sticks to so much of the old nonsense. . . . Unitarianism gives me freedom; but many Unitarians are as narrow bigots as the Orthodox. They have not come to the solid rock of science yet." In Word and Work for November, issued by the American Unitarian Association, a writer said: "We may confidently name it [the Fatherhood of God] as the vertical point of the rising star." Listen to Mr. Herbert: "What do I care about a personal God? We don't know anything about any personal conscious God. All we say about such is mere guessing. The stern miseries of life and the awful things that happen make me unable to think for a moment that God has a Father's care for us. Yet I am no pessimist, for I think that there is very much joy and pleasantness in life. There is no living man that knows one thing about what God is. Nature is sometimes very lovely and sometimes very cruel, if we may so personify nature."

Of the Bible, Mr. Herbert says: "I respect the old Bible as pamphlets of different ages, showing some goodness and much ignorance in the writers. I am free forever from the nonsense of any Bible infallibility." Of the religion which was the joy of Mr. Herbert's life, he says: "I get sick when I think of the curse that costs so much, and which is named so unreasonably 'religion.' We need so much more money and energy to teach people how to be healthy, serene, delivered from poverty and oppression, from foolish vices and self-injuries. . . . All I know about religion is that there is some power in nature beyond my knowledge, and that the experience of the ages teaches that it is well to be truthful, honest, generous, patient, and kind. I most firmly believe in being true, upright, honest, and generous. That is enough solid religion for me. . . . I believe in the order of nature, and all supernaturalism is to me mere fancy. . . . My business is to try to get people to practise what we are sure will bring health of body and mind, and help them to make the best of this world."

Speaking of the Church, Mr. Herbert says: "We are fools yet in Church and politics. . . . I wonder at the foolishness that is prated in so many churches every week. . . . In my church here, we have formed a club of studious men and women to study Herbert Spencer's philosophy. We meet once a week, and have a good time. . . . Oh, how the gas would go out of the common preachers, if they would only study Spencer earnestly!"

The thought of progress constantly recurs, and from it he derived inspiration: "Well, friend, the human world is moving constantly toward a better social and more sensible religious state. The day will come when science and common-sense will scatter the old tradition totally away. It will take time to educate the masses to a thorough rational religion. It is slow growth, and I am willing to work and wait for it. . . . Be a seeker of peace through constant progress."

Death was only eight weeks distant. There were premonitions of its approach. The "usual strength and vitality were gone." He hoped to be better after vacation, yet greatly mistrusted his recuperative energies. The vision of the life that now is was all powerful. He may have cherished a hope for that which is to come. He wrote, June 20: "Oh, for the wisdom to make the best of this life, physically, socially, and morally! I don't have the least trouble about any other life and world. I never saw any person that knows the least thing about such another life."

All religious bodies consider the subjects on which Mr. Herbert is so explicit, fundamental. Certainly, Mr. Herbert's views are not Christian in any recognized sense. They flavor more of agnosticism and secularism. How far do Mr. Herbert's views represent Western Unitarianism? Are these views acceptable to the Unitarian congregations? The Denver people seem to have been enamoured of them. "The Unitarian church here [Denver] was almost ready for burial when I came here; but now it is very flourishing. Many people went home from our church last Sunday, church being so crowded. I succeeded in getting all the debt [$4,000] of the church paid. My people are jubilant."

Mr. Herbert had a very appreciative though small audience at Geneva, Ill. And, so far as can be learned, he was highly appreciated wherever he went. So far, Mr. Herbert's views may be looked upon as in some degree representative of Western Unitarianism. How many of the forty-three, more or less, ministers would indorse Mr. Herbert, I do not know. Since Mr. Jones, the Secretary of the Association, sees in Mr. Herbert "the promise of the effective liberal minister that we are waiting for," it is presumable that he himself indorses the positions taken. And, since Mr. Jones is a Secretary of an Association composed of independent churches, it is presumable also that the Association would be in accord with its Secretary and with Mr. Herbert. The question, What is Western Unitarianism? remains unanswered.

FENTON, N.Y., Dec. 6, 1881. L. A. CARTER.

[When The Index spoke of Western Unitarian platforms, it named the printed constitutions of certain conferences, and did not have in mind "Western Unitarianism" in general, which our correspondent is right in describing as indefinite, and inclusive of a great difference of views. The only difference between Western Unitarianism and Eastern Unitarianism is that in the Western variety liberal views are more in the ascendant.—Ed.]

FREETHOUGHT IN CANADA.

(Concluded from last week.)

Editors of The Index :—

And, now, for proofs of the "progress, condition, and prospects" of Canadian freethought, let us look into the press, the pulpit, the pew, and the colleges of Canada. Whoever has read the papers here during the past eight or ten years must be struck with the great change in the direction of freedom of discussion. What was blasphemy in religion and treason in politics ten years ago passes now as perfectly legitimate discussion. "Canadian Independence," "Commercial union" with the United States, and even "annexation," are no longer treason, any more than the discussion of the inspiration of the Scriptures or the existence of a God is blasphemy. No question, economical or theological, is now too sacred to be ventilated in the public press. Of course, our papers have not all arrived at this stage of development; but some have, and others are following suit. At the present time, the writer is holding a discussion with a Western editor in his own paper (Thornbury Union Standard), involving the fundamental doctrines of theology; and this courageous editor publishes every line I send him, and replies to it as best he can. The Toronto Globe, the leading paper in the Dominion, condemned the recent book seizure by the customs authorities, on the broad principles of liberty; declaring that "it is clearly not true that this nation is Christian in the sense that it is the business of the Dominion or Provincial Government to uphold the Christian religion," and that nothing could be "more irrational, more suicidal, in reference to such men" (freethinkers), "than the mistaken attempts to proscribe and persecute them by refusing their testimony in courts of justice, and forbidding the circulation of their literature." Indeed, every secular paper in Toronto except the Mail condemned the confiscation; and, were this thing to do over again, the Mail, with its present light, would not repeat its mediæval bigotry and folly. The press generally throughout the country, that mentioned the matter at all, condemned the seizure. As evidence of the general agitation of freethought in Canada, I need only refer to the Mail's weekly disquisitions on freethought subjects. Ostensibly the champion of a semi-orthodoxy, it conceives itself as having a special mission every Saturday to don the sacerdotal vestments in defence of a decaying theology. By tacitly admitting, however, that the downfall of the system it is endeavoring to bolster up is certain, the Mail fairly gives itself away. Though it admits that the Christian faith is "rapidly vanishing," yet it comes to the front again the next week in its priestly robes, with as much show of courage as though nothing was happening.

Our monthly magazines are also exceedingly liberal in tone. The Canadian Monthly publishes from time to time radical papers, from our stand-point, dealing with the most fundamental questions in ethics and theology; while Prof. Goldwin Smith's Bystander (now suspended because of its editor's absence in Europe, but to be resumed in the spring) is thoroughly independent and liberal on all questions. Indeed, to Goldwin Smith is justly due much of the progress in free discussion the Canadian press has made during the past ten years. He has been the constant defender of free speech and free discussion. At the banquet given him in Toronto last June, by the Canada Press Association on the eve of his departure for England, in his speech, Goldwin Smith said: "I hope I may truly say that, in any dealings which I have had with the press of Canada, my object has always been to increase its independence and make it entirely free to serve the people. . . . Liberty of thought is the palladium of our profession. . . . How would the world advance, if new opinion was to be killed in the bud? What journalist has not seen the treasonable paradox of one day become the open question of the next and the accepted truth of the day after? . . . The presence of members of the press, of all parties and shades of opinion, around this table, is a pledge of their resolution to be true to the great principles of the profession, and, however they may be divided on other points, to unite in guarding liberty of thought." These words, addressed as they were to the press of Canada, were as timely as they were noble, and must have the most salutary effects. The question of Canada's future relations, which Mr. Smith has never hesitated to discuss, is now discussed freely by the newspapers. In showing the condition of the press, I must not overlook Canada's Punch,—little Grip at Toronto, which is decidedly liberal and progressive; and, as it is often easier to laugh the errors and follies out of mankind than to argue them out, Grip is doing an excellent work. Of course, he condemned the seizure of our books, and very justly turned the customs "Pope" at Ottawa into a laughing-stock. He also condemned the exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh from the English Commons on account of his atheism, and turned John Bull into another laughing-stock in his inimitable cartoons. Notwithstanding the recent book seizure, the whole range of liberal and scientific literature may be had in Canada. In Toronto, our friends Mr. A. Piddington and Mr. W. B. Cooke sell all liberal works; and, in less than a fortnight after the appearance of Colonel Ingersoll's last reply to Judge Black in the North American Review, it was in our bookstores here in Napanee, in pamphlet form, for sale, having been immediately reprinted in Toronto.

As to the pulpit signs of progress here, we need only listen to or read a few of the sermons, especially in the cities, to note the change. No more hell-fire for sinners; no more infant damnation or reprobation; no devils with cloven feet and horns,—none of these! They are things of the past. No one preaches them except "local preachers" in the backwoods. And we also have our Thomases and Swings in Canada. Roy, McDonnell, Burns, Pedley, and a host of others, are loosening their hold on Orthodoxy. Goldwin Smith is admonishing them in his Bystander that their religion is "carrying a weight it cannot bear," and that unless they "separate the credible from the incredible, the reasonable from that which shocks reason, there will be a total eclipse of faith." He tells them that their Mosaic Cosmogony will no longer "bear the scrutiny of modern science," and also that "the moral code of Moses is tribal and primeval and alien to us, who live under the ethical conditions of high civilization and the religion of humanity." He tells them that the Old Testament is no longer fit to be read in the churches, and that it would be better to cast off the whole of it and also the miraculous portions of the New Testament, and simply hold on to "natural religion, and Christianity in its natural aspect."

That the leaven of unrest also permeates the pews is evident on every hand. Rev. H. Pedley, in the Canadian Monthly, acknowledges that one of the principal difficulties of the clergy in these days is the prevalence of freethought among the people. He says, "We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that ideas about Christianity of a destructive nature are being diffused with amazing and increasing rapidity among all classes of people," and that "these novel ideas are finding their way to every corner of society," and warns his clerical brethren that if they do not study sceptical works they will soon find themselves preaching to people who know more than they about matters "which it is their special business to understand."

Nor have the colleges escaped the wholesome contagion. Neither professors nor students are exempt from the prevailing spirit of inquiry and doubt. From a theological professor in a Methodist university near by, I have a letter, in which he says: "I have no doubt but the truth will ultimately win, no matter which side it is on,—yours or your opponents. I have neither sympathy with, nor respect for, any pretended science or dogma, religious or otherwise, that will not allow its claims to be investigated at the bar of reason." In this college, I find among the text-books Kant, Gibbon, Hallam, Mill, Bain, and Strauss. From the theological professor in the college of the other Methodist denomination, I have the following: "I am quite familiar with the principles which it [the pamphlet] defends, and have no objection to discuss them with my students; and, should your pamphlet be placed in their hands, I shall avail myself of the occasion to do so." The Methodist bodies of Canada are, it is true, by the establishment of their theological colleges, fast sweeping away the just stigma of an uneducated ministry; but their theology will, I fear, be swept away at the same time. The Rev. Dr. —, President of Toronto University, in disclaiming having interfered with or in any way prevented the delivery of pamphlets to students, writes, "I have no fear that truth is endangered by discussion." From one of the most learned and able theologians in the Province, officially connected with Knox College, Toronto, I have a long letter, in which, at the conclusion of an able argument—and as courteous as it is able—in support of his religion, he adds: "Let us both labor honestly and faithfully, according to our light. There is no reason why we should bite and devour each other. For I believe that God has a design for good in all the present strife, and you believe that these are the necessary conditions of evolution in the survival of the fittest. We both may say, Let the fittest survive. It will."

To such a Christianity as is defined in these two letters, accompanied by such a spirit, the freethinker practically would have little objection. For myself, I have none at all.

We are at present circulating petitions to the Dominion and Provincial Parliaments of Canada, asking that our law may be altered in regard to oaths and evidence, and conformed to that of England, or even extended beyond that; and we have excellent prospects of success.

THE CORINNE CASE.

Editors of The Index :—

Please allow me space, both as your well-wisher and as a friend to children, to express my hearty sympathy with your remarks concerning the "Corinne case" in New York, in your last issue.

As the former agent of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, I fully examined into this matter, and found no cause whatever for attempting to do what the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children have now tried, and so signally failed in accomplishing. Not long ago, a man and several boys were prevented from longer performing dangerous gymnastic feats, wherein one boy was injured, at the Howard Theatre here.

The man produced a paper, apparently genuine, from the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, giving him permission to act. As consistency is a virtue, even in charitable corporations, we submit the facts for consideration.

Very truly,
JOHN DIXWELL, M.D.

A CRITICISM.

Editors of the Index:—

I have just finished reading Mr. William Clarke's "Two Theories of Land Reform in England." What he calls "socialistic ideas, if put in practice, that would leave no room for the energy and enterprise of the individual," are, I believe, more popular in England to-day than Mr. Cobden's free trade in land was thirty years ago. Experience only proves that, if land were made free for all to sell who would be willing to do so, it would not benefit the tenant, but would make his rent higher.

If land is private property rightfully, what have governments to do with fixing what rent the landholder shall receive for fifteen years, as they are now doing in Ireland, and enacting laws preventing owners from selling it, as does the law of entail in England and other countries? But, if private property in land is wrong, to talk about the people of England paying the land-owners £400,000,000 is like a man who has had his coat stolen proposing to pay the thief to let him have it back again. And if, as Henry George claims, increased rent and increased land value indicate the difference between what labor and capital get and what they ought to receive,—the cause of poverty and the pressure that brings wages down to starvation point,—I fail to see how the nationalization of the land would "depress the daring initiative of individual mind and thwart human progress." On the contrary, I think Mr. George demonstrates conclusively that it would unloose springs of human action that are now fettered, and raise men with families to maintain to a position above that of working for seventy-five cents a day, as I am assured many are doing who live within sight of where I now sit.

Yours very respectfully,

HENRY ROBERTSHAW.

ADAM AND EVE CIVILIZED.

Editors of The Index:—

Hon. J. F. Wilson, of Fairfield, Iowa, who is a prominent candidate for the United States Senate, delivered a lecture in Keokuk very recently, on "Civilization," in which he labored to prove that civilization appeared when the first progenitors of the human race were created. This was a strange position for a man of intelligence to take in this late day. Some of us were surprised that a man of Mr. Wilson's large intercourse with men, a man who has been accustomed to sift evidence, who is an able lawyer and statesman, and who boasts that his town has a public library of seven thousand volumes, could stand up before an intelligent audience and gravely maintain that Adam and Eve were civilized when God made them. Not one particle of evidence from Nature did he produce. Not a single fact could he unearth from the distant past to establish his position. His main argument, if argument it can be called, was this: God is infinite in wisdom and goodness, therefore God could not create a savage.

We should have been glad of the chance to ask Mr. Wilson how it came (taking the Genesis account of creation) that God did make human beings so grossly ignorant that they knew not they were naked, that they could be deceived by a talking serpent, that they did not know the difference between good and evil, and supposed that they could hide from God among the trees, and that God had to make them coats of skins. Pretty civilization this!

We should like to have asked Mr. Wilson, too, how it came, if his argument is sound, that the civilized beings God made turned out to be such miserable failures, involving in their fall, according to Mr. Wilson's theology, the degradation and ruin of myriads of human beings. Better have made them savages, and let the human race have taken its chances of progress, than to have created them thus civilized, allowed them to fall, and then followed up their fall with such patch-work and botch-work for their redemption as Mr. Wilson believes in.

Rev. Mr. Elder, of the Unitarian church, delivered a capital discourse last Sunday, December 11, in reply to Mr. Wilson, dwelling chiefly upon the overwhelming evidence of geology for the antiquity of man, and the utter absence of any proof which that evidence furnishes of man's primal civilization, and bringing out in telling language and tone the glorious tribute to human nature which was borne by the achievements of civilization. We wish our candidate for the Senate could have heard this discourse. We do not believe, if we may judge from his lecture, that he hears much or reads much beyond his old, worn-out Presbyterian creed. We will not question his ability to make a good statesman. But, when Mr. Wilson undertakes to oppose evolution and defend untenable hypotheses, we can say certainly that he is either uninformed or is acting the part of the politician and is insincere. We prefer to think that Mr. Wilson is uninformed and not dishonest.

FROM DENVER, COLORADO.

Editors of The Index:—

The radical element has met with a very severe loss in the death of Rev. R. L. Herbert. Mr. Gordon, of Milwaukee, will succeed him, commencing here about the first of January. We have here two rather aggressive Presbyterian ministers, Dr. Hays and Rev. Mr. Field. The former reviewed Ingersoll lately, and last week he overhauled Darwinism, but his representations were a miserable caricature of the theory. Mr. Field has reviewed O. B. Frothingham's "new departure," and indeed placed him back among the believers in revelation! We have seen nothing authoritative from Mr. Frothingham, and nothing definite from anybody authorized to speak for him, warranting all this talk about his change of views. Our Herbert Spencer class, organized since Mr. Underwood last lectured here, is doing well. It has gone through about three-fourths of First Principles. There are some questions in regard to Spencer's philosophy that have aroused discussion that I must ask you concerning, when I have time.

JOHN G. JENKINS.

DENVER, COL., Dec. 19, 1881.

DR. BARTOL ON FREE RELIGION.

Let me give you a bit of history or biography here. It is sixteen years since some captains of the Unitarian host conferred, as elsewhere, so in my own house, though without my sympathy, about a verbal scheme of common worship and faith for that order. But the proposition, on reflection, went so counter more and more to my instincts and wrought in me such wrath that, when the New York Convention was called to consummate this enterprise for a new religion of ritual and of the letter, I called a meeting, too, in the same house where I still live, which seventy men attended; and if, as I suppose, our strenuous opposition did aught to prevent the success of an ambitious and audacious plan against the independence alike of our churches and of our own several lay and clerical views, it was not in vain, and confessedly to-day not of little worth. The articles to be instituted, not by reason, but by a majority vote, would have been disputed from the start, and the liturgy manufactured would not have lasted save by excluding the life of the denomination for a year.

Out of that assembly in my rooms, as from a seed or through a conduit, sprang two radical clubs now deceased, their mission—which was a divine one—being fulfilled. And also, later, the Free Religious Association arose, with its Liberal Leagues, whose platform, as was made very plain and pungent to me, furnished no more genuine freedom of speech than any other, and much less than I have enjoyed always in the pulpit of my own church. Nevertheless, from the vice of hypocrisy or glaring and foolish inconsistency, with which ancient establishments are so infested and honey-combed, the new radical order was refreshingly free. But, as a social power, to build up a fellowship, to edify mankind, establish in any large style God's kingdom, to plant a church, it had small gift. . . .

Meanwhile, these seceders from the ecclesiastical settlements made a great and precious, lasting and world-wide contribution to common honesty, if but a trifle of addition to the stock of religious truth. There were no tides because there was no sea. An ocean or flood there had been of reality in that preceding spiritual or so-called transcendental idea which dawned in New England fifty years ago, and took shape in a literature of prose and poetry which no writing among us since has matched. But the movement of the radical convoy or fleet left that broad, heaving main of God, and took to the logical understanding, as some vessel goes from the Atlantic for refuge into a little, shallow, muddy creek; and for transcendentalism, the recognition of an immediate relation to God, we had sensible observation of the world without,—Utilitarianism, Benthamism, the Positivism of Auguste Comte, the evolutionism of Darwin and Spencer and Bain, experientialism, and outspoken materialism of Vogt, Maleschott, Haeckel. We had these, not as illustrative, secondary, and complementary, but expelling the transcendental idea, and claiming to cover the whole field; in short, a substitute of earth for heaven, of time for eternity, and of the senses for the soul.

It is this false notion and apology of phenomenalism for a philosophy, this attempt to get the whole man out of his forehead as you draw out the joints of a spyglass from its larger wooden case, this reduction of conscience to a calculation, love to the ghost of a bodily sensation, thought to a function of matter like digestion and assimilation, and the soul to a blossom of dust, as Miss Harriet Martineau and her elected teacher laid it down and laid it out as a corpse in a shroud; it was this apotheosis, deifying of the elements, and presenting of spirit as but a local, short-lived accompaniment of matter, that was playing the universal, everlasting tune, all our affections, aspirations, and hopes but like what a droning hand-organ grinds out for a minute on the street, this making of death the substance, and life a fleeting show,—it was this, I suppose, which stirred our Boston and New York friend (and no wonder) to his revolt, which is the earthquake to our conventional piety just here and now. As represented in its own arguments, through its platform or press, the movement of revolt has been continually sinking to a lower plane, as terrace after terrace was left among the highlands by the subsiding sea. Some speculative explorers had gone up in a balloon of metaphysics beyond our reach, till in the rarified air they could hardly breathe themselves, or the aeronauts tumbled fatally from their seat. Others, in that zeal for physical science which is the mark and almost mania of our time, had taken to microscopes, dredges, and diving-bells, to telescopes, to Alpine glaciers, and hunting for the North Pole, hoping to detect God and heaven, if they existed at all, in the atoms or the orbs. But a man without sentiment, imagination, having no rock of inner spiritual conviction, no felt immediate relation to his Author on which to stand, and so searching for a religion in the crevices and appearances of this external phantom universe, as the impostor did with Edie Ochiltree in Scott's novel, in the cave for hidden gold, will come and fetch all who train with him to grief. He will be like a cold-fingered man trying to warm himself at a painted fire. To leave the heart and seek our inspiration in the head is like leaving the Australian mines for the hole where Captain Kidd buried what he had robbed.—Christian Register.

THE Presbyterian says, "Mr. Clark Braden is unwilling to the public the life and character of Robert G. Ingersoll, and the exposure is anything but creditable to the infidel lecturer." Has the Presbyterian taken the pains to inquire as to the truth of Braden's accusations? Does it know anything in regard to the character of the man who makes the accusations? Of this man Braden, the Apostolic Times, a paper of his own denomination (the Campbellites), said, in 1876, "He deserves to be not only censured, but excommunicated by the congregation to which he belongs and repudiated by the entire brotherhood, unless he give evidence of sincere repentance." The Christian Review, another Campbellite paper, said, "In another column, the reader will see that, in addition to the slanderous documents hurled like a firebrand before the public, Clark Braden's conduct has been such for some time past that the Church has discredited him and disavowed any fellowship with him." In August, 1876, the elders of the Church of Christ at Perry, Ill., published a letter "To the Christian Brotherhood, wherever scattered, greeting," in which they declared that Braden had made "false and slanderous statements," referred to "wrongs and misdemeanors committed since coming among us, which we deem amply sufficient to warrant us in withdrawing our fellowship, if it existed, unless he repent of his wrongs," and concluded by saying that until Clark Braden disavows the sentiments of the aforesaid pamphlet, acknowledges his wrong for thus slandering the Church and the preachers, and sets himself right before the congregation for his conduct here, we must hold him as an enemy of the Church and to the cause which we plead, and as wholly unworthy of a place among us, either as a member of the body or a preacher of the blessed gospel." Will the Presbyterian and Christian Statesman persist in repeating disparaging statements regarding Colonel Ingersoll, on the authority of a man who is thus regarded by his own brethren?

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. MARY A. LIVERMORE's sixtieth birthday occurred on Monday, December 19.

MR. JAMES K. APPLEBEE has been engaged for two months to occupy the desk of the Parker Memorial.

MR. CHARLES ELLIS last Sunday read an able paper before the Parker Memorial Class on "Matter and Spirit."

DR. ISAAC I. HAYES, the well-known Arctic explorer, died of heart disease in New York City on the 17th inst., after a few days' illness.

JOHN RUSKIN deplores the decline of literary artists, and says of his own work that he has sometimes spent a whole morning in constructing a single phrase.

REV. WM. R. ALGER, the accomplished scholar and preacher, delivered an elaborate and beautiful discourse on "Man, God, and Immortality" at Parker Memorial last Sunday.

MISS M. A. HARDAKER of the Transcript, and an esteemed contributor to The Index, delivered an address before the "New England Women's Club" of this city, Monday evening, giving her peculiar views on the sex question.

HERE is how the Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., father of the first American Episcopalian prelate, wrote on winning a lottery prize: "The ticket 5,866, in the Lighthouse and Public Lottery of New York, appointed by law of 1763, drew in my favor £500, for which I now record to posterity my thanks, and praise to Almighty God, the giver of all good gifts."

"SUNSET" Cox, who was given an impromptu and hearty greeting and serenade in New York City on his return from his European trip, incidentally referred to political matters in his enforced speech as follows: "You know my simple philosophy of politics. I challenge every bill I cannot understand. That's a pretty big assertion, but it's true. I oppose every attempt of the chartered few to enrich themselves from a too plethoric treasury, to the disadvantage of the majority."

THE French correspondent of the Sunday Herald speaks thus of the new Premier of France: "M. Gambetta is the best speaker in the Chamber to report. He is a natural orator, the best, perhaps, in France; and his words are not only well chosen, but are clearly spoken. Even when he is quite excited, he is easily understood. He may then talk more rapidly, but not less plainly. Besides, he leaves the reporters carte blanche, and that is a good deal to a writer who is in a hurry."

BOOK NOTICES.

THE North American Review for January, 1882, gives an exhaustive discussion on "The Moral Responsibility of the Insane," by five distinguished American authorities; namely, Dr. J. J. Elwell of Cleveland, Dr. George M. Beard and Dr. E. C. Seguin of New York, Dr. Jewell of Chicago, and Dr. C. F. Folsom of Boston. Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi asks the question, "Shall Women practise Medicine?" and answers it from personal knowledge and experience intelligently and affirmatively. The other articles are "The New Political Machine," by W. M. Dickson, "The Geneva Award and the Insurance Companies," by George B. Coale, and an interesting "Chapter of Confederate History," by F. G. Ruffin. The publisher makes the announcement that the February number will contain Part III. of the "Christian Religion" series of articles, of which it affirms that it will be "a very able defence of the Christian faith," though the writer's name is not given.

WIDE-AWAKE and Baby-Land for December reach us a little late from the publishers, D. Lothrop and Co.,

Franklin Street, Boston. A glance through their rich pages makes all elderly persons who have not forgotten the poor print and coarse woodcuts of the "unvarnished tales" of their childhood wish more than ever "to be a child again," in order to enjoy a child's fresh delight in the feast of good things furnished by these careful literary caterers to the needs and desires of the developing mind of to-day. To mention any one of the numerous and interesting articles in these magazines, where all are so exceptionally good, would seem invidious; but one cannot help hinting that whoever fails to read the weird ballad-story, "Wee Willie Winkle," and the arch little poem, "A Truly Church," in Wide Awake, misses a treat.

THE Atlantic Monthly for January, 1882, begins the year in a promising manner, with a goodly array of noteworthy contributors. There are articles from the editor, W. D. Howells, from Rev. Edward Everett Hale, "H. H.," J. T. Trowbridge, the new, charming, and original writer of short stories but multitudinous initials, "S. A. L. E. M.," with others who have made themselves a name in literature. The book reviews are as usual timely and finely treated.

THE Catholic World for January is a live number, and contains articles from various writers, replete with interest to readers of all denominations and faiths. Among these, we have space to mention only the following: "A Christmas Play in the Pyrenees," "The Late War between Chili and Peru," "The End of the World," and "The Decay of the Celtic Language."

THE Unitarian Review for December has articles on "Communism," by Rev. Dr. Newton, "Private Wealth and Public Welfare," by Edward Atkinson, "Dr. James on the Feeling of Power," by William Salter, "Things at Home and Abroad," by Mrs. M. P. Lowe, "Notes from England," by Rev. J. P. Hopps, and editorial notes, and reviews.

THE Sunday Review is a quarterly, published in London, Eng., by Trübner & Co., Ludgate Hill, and simultaneously in half a dozen other cities, devoted to the secularization of the Christian Sabbath, for which it gives excellent reasons, backed by the expressed opinion of the best living authorities.

RADICALISM: A Criticism on Certain Opinions recently expressed by O. B. Frothingham. Published by S. W. Green's Sons, 74 and 76 Beekman Street, New York; and a Sermon by M. J. Savage, entitled "Is Death the End?" published by Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, Boston, received.

THE Art Amateur for December is quite up to its usual standard, and must be very useful to those who trust to their own taste and skill to prepare their Christmas gifts. The tendency to decorative art is too strong to be resisted: it must be educated and elevated.

THE Sanitarian for December, A. N. Bell, editor, a monthly magazine "Devoted to the Preservation of Health, Mental and Physical Culture," is received. Its articles are full of interest to the scientific hygienist.

JAMES VICK, of Rochester, N.Y., has outdone himself in his Floral Guide for 1882. For ten cents, all flower-lovers can procure a book which they would not part with for ten times its cost.

THE Roll Calendar, received from C. A. Hack & Son, Taunton, is one of the most elegant and artistic developments of the recent rage for decorated Christmas cards and New Years' Calendars. The charmingly-colored illustrations are from original designs furnished by John A. Mitchell, of New York, and the decorations by F. H. Smith, of Boston. It is of large size, and fringed with silk, after the fashion of some of the Christmas cards. One of these calendars would make a handsome Christmas or New Year's present. Price, $1 and $1.50.

CHRISTMAS SERVICE.

A Christmas Service for the Church and Sunday-school together, or for either alone, is now ready, published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, 40 Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois. Eight pages, containing Responsive Readings with Anthem and Chant, and six Carols, Price $2.50 per hundred. Specimens will be sent on receipt of a three-cent postage-stamp.

MASSACHUSETTS IN THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

By Mrs. HARRIET H. ROBINSON. Price $1.25.

"Mrs. Robinson is the widow of a man who has achieved a wide reputation for his brilliant letters to the Springfield Republican and other papers over the nom de plume of 'Warrington.' Like her husband, Mrs. Robinson is devoted to the cause of woman suffrage; and she has been one of the most prominent and zealous of the workers in behalf of what she considers her down-trodden sex. She is well qualified by ability and experience to write the history of the woman suffrage movement in Massachusetts, and she has done so. The time covered by her history is from 1774 to 1881, and she presents the general, political, legal, and legislative history of the movement. Mrs. Robinson is a bright woman, and makes her work extremely interesting. Of course, she is prejudiced in favor of the suffragists; and her history bears pretty hard on those who have opposed the movement. But it is a woman's privilege to scold; and if she scolds well, it is entertaining, and the scolded ought to be able to bear it with equanimity, even enjoy it."—Boston Post.

THE MAN JESUS.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK. Second Edition. Price $1.00.

"Rev. John W. Chadwick tells us in the preface to 'The Man Jesus' that his object is to 'contribute something to a rational understanding of the human greatness of Jesus in the minds of those who have not the time or opportunity to read those voluminous writings in which the modern study of the life of Jesus has embodied its conjectures and results.' The author ignores entirely the supernatural element: he accepts the most advanced views with regard to the authorship and authenticity of the Gospels, and he makes use of the most radical interpretations of the New Testament narrative. With points of doctrine, we, of course, have nothing to do here. We can only say that Mr. Chadwick's work throughout is marked by the most reverent regard for the example and teachings of Jesus, that he brings home to the reader, as few others have done, the tender, affectionate nature of his great subject, and that he has revealed, under the robe of tradition, the throbbing of a human heart. Even the bitterest opponents of the views which Mr. Chadwick adopts must acknowledge that in the field of literature it is a masterful performance, luminous with the teachings of the gospel of humanity and a wonderful knowledge of the place and time of which he treats."—Says the Boston Traveller.

MY FIRST HOLIDAY;

Or, Letters Home from Colorado, Utah, and California.

By MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL. 12mo. Price $1.50.

"It is refreshing to get hold of a book of travel that is written in a spirit of honesty and common-sense. The author of these letters went West in search of health; and, while she was travelling in the Far Western States, she kept her eyes open, and carefully noted what she saw. The result is she has given us a very accurate and trustworthy account of the experiences of a traveller in those parts, and has also shown up the existing state of things in many respects. 'The glorious climate of California' is one of the greatest of frauds. The delightful climate of Colorado does furnish relief to consumptives by hastening their deaths, and so putting them out of pain. These facts the author observed, and does not seek to disguise. The Indian and the Mormon questions are also vigorously discussed in these letters. Nevertheless, the author does not seek to abuse or cry down the West. There is a heap to be seen and enjoyed there, and she saw and enjoyed it. And her descriptions are extremely well written and interesting. Anybody contemplating a visit to the West, either for health or pleasure, had better read this book; for they will get a great deal of valuable information as well as much pleasure from the perusal."—Says the Boston Post.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE legislators of Kansas say that no person in that State must marry within six months after procuring a divorce.

AFTER encountering fierce opposition, a law last week passed the French Senate, by which restrictions regarding cemeteries that have heretofore existed are abolished, and the ground is now open to all alike, regardless of religious creeds.

THE humble Campbellite Church in Washington, which President Garfield attended during his short term of office, and which by reason of his attendance was crowded every Sunday by pious man-worshippers, is said to be now almost deserted. "The king is dead. Long live the king."

THE "Dunkers," a peculiar religious sect, have protested in Indiana against having their children taught grammar in the public schools on the ground that teaching it "offends their religious principles"; and the State Superintendent of Education has directed the teachers to yield to their request, and to teach the "Dunkers" children without grammars "all that is practical on the subject without offence to their parents." It is fortunate for the sect that they do not object to Bible-reading in the schools, since in that case their request to have that prohibited might not meet such ready acquiescence.

AT this stage of the world's progress, it seems rather strange, and gives one a sense of being set back a half-century or so, to read in one of our daily papers of a veritable "slave chase"; yet the chase of a slave-ship did actually occur in this the closing month of the year 1881. The paper states that "on the 3d of December Captain Brownrigg, of the English man-of-war "London," with ten men, pursued in a steam pinnace an Arabian dhow flying the French colors and loaded with slaves. The Arab crew resisted so fiercely that three of the Englishmen, including the captain, were killed, and the dhow escaped."

DR. TALCOTT testified that, in his opinion, Guiteau was not insane or inspired. The assassin remarked: "That settles you. I guess you are one of the fellows who don't believe in the existence of God." To Dr. Hamilton's testimony, Guiteau replied: "Exceedingly eccentric when I am abused, I've had to take more abuse since this trial began than during my whole life before. I don't take much stock in this head business [striking the table and flashing his eyes upon the witness]. You study up on spirituology instead of craniology, and you will learn something. It is the spirit that gets into the brain and behind it that actuates a man."

THE "one touch of nature" which "makes the whole world kin" thrilled every heart in all those parts of the civilized world where last week was received the welcome news of the discovery of the fate of the missing arctic exploring steamer, "Jeanette," and the finding alive of part of her crew. The promptness of action on the part of the Russian authorities in sending immediate aid to the suffering survivors warms every heart toward those officials. Intense anxiety will be felt to learn further from the unfortunate explorers, whose story when told will, no doubt, add one more to the many terrible tales already narrated of the extreme suffering and courageous facing of death by explorers in the frozen seas of the polar regions.

RECENTLY, in Stonington, Conn., a boy was whipped by the teacher of a public school because he refused to bow his head while the teacher conducted religious exercises; and the boy, persisting in his refusal, was severely punished by a member of the school committee, to whom the teacher had appealed for advice and assistance. The parents, who are Catholics, took their boy from the school, and are about to bring a suit for damages against the teacher and committee-man, determined to test the legality of Protestant religious exercises in the public schools. They have secured the legal services of Thomas Waller, of New London, State Attorney, one of the smartest lawyers in Connecticut. The proportion of Catholics in Stonington is quite large; and the contest is one in which the prosecution will have abundant sympathy and aid.

A NEW "Daniel has come to judgment" in the person of Judge Allison, of Philadelphia, whose wise and sympathetic counsel resulted in reuniting a married pair who had separated for insufficient reason, and, quarrelling still further over the custody of their only child, had brought their case to be tried, before this just judge. Discerning through the entanglements of the case the real regard these young people still held for each other, the judge stopped the course of "justice," gave them both a paternal talking to, advised the dropping of the case before the courts, and urged them to begin over again their married life on the new basis of mutual concession and forbearance. This advice was accepted in the spirit in which it was given, and the couple are now living together harmoniously as a reunited family. If all "legal advisers" were of the stamp of Judge Allison, the law courts would have less cruel work to do, while the sum total of human happiness would be considerably augmented.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE writes in the London Daily News: "The Irish seeking justice and liberty are our brethren: seeking separation, they are our enemies, not we theirs. We admire their bright qualities and their bravery. Our country is as much theirs as our own. They are ever welcome among us. In every struggle for equal freedom and new opportunities of progress, they can as ever command the co-operation of all Liberals. But, if they want to break up the Empire, Liberals cannot help them in that. They would be the first to feel contempt for us if we did, and they ought to know that we understand this."

THE New York Times, describing the "fast sets of London and New York," says: "Those who have returned thence [to England] after ten years' absence are utterly amazed at the change since the death of the Prince Consort and the Queen's retirement. Anything may be done now with impunity, and almost anything may be talked about. For a section of fashionable society in New York, this has an ineffable charm; and the more such fellow-feeling takes such people off to London and keeps them there, the better for this city. It has sometimes happened that a society has been very vicious and yet very brilliant; but the modern fast and fashionable set in London, as in New York, is as brainless as it is debauched. George IV. half-redeemed his vices by seeking the society of Sheridan and Fox in his pleasures; but, unfortunately, in the case of the present Prince of Wales, wits and orators are not the persons most in request at Marlborough House and Sandringham, and dull or merely 'smart' beauties usually fill the places of Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, and Mrs. Crewe."

ALTHOUGH M. Gambetta and M. Paul Bert have been fiercely assailed and charged with many evil designs against religions, not only by the Catholic, but by many of the Protestant journals of this country, their wise, moderate, and statesmanlike course begins to command the respect even of journals like our Bourbon contemporary, the Presbyterian, which says: "Gambetta, reputed to be an atheist, is Premier of France: Paul Bert, known to be an atheist, is at the head of the Department of Worship and Public Instruction; and to these two men the interests of the French Republic are for a time committed. . . . On this side of the water, very few will condemn these men, if their policy should be directed to a separation of Church and State. . . . The true Church of France, or, we might better say, the true Churches of France, would not be permanently affected by the dissolution of this partnership. The best work done in that land to-day is work which rests upon voluntary gifts; and some of the Protestants are standing up nobly for free churches, untrammelled and unsupported by the State. If the men who have come to power mean disestablishment, or if they mean that all churches shall stand alike before the law, or if they mean to restrain priestly interference with the operation of the law, or priestly opposition to the movements of the government,—if they mean these things, and nothing more, they may be successful and retain power."

THE QUALITY OF LEADERSHIP.

Many of the popular features of Christmas have an ancestry that antedates the birth of Jesus. Nevertheless, in Christendom the Christmas celebration recalls the advent upon the earth of this gracious person; and more and more, as the years advance, does the celebration connect him with purely natural and human interests. In the historical Christian Church, Jesus as man has remained essentially buried. It has been Jesus as Messiah, Jesus as supernatural Saviour, Jesus as God; but Jesus as man seems never really to have come into the Church which bears his name. Should he have come in just the character and manner he had in Judea, there is hardly a Christian sect that would have received him as a member, much less as its head. Yet the man Jesus has not perished. Humanity recognizes its own; and in this latter century especially, when the human mind has awakened to its rights and the human heart to know its kindred, the genuine royal manhood of Jesus has been discovered beneath the decayed vestments of the official robes in which the Church had thought to enthrone, but did bury, him. He comes forth not so much the head of a Church or the founder of a religion as one of a company of elect souls whose office it has been to teach religion.

But the query is often made, How explain, by natural process, the rare purity of soul, the wealth of disinterested, self-sacrificing love, the single-eyed clearness of moral vision, possessed by such leaders as Jesus and Buddha, of whom one resisted the idea of temporal sovereignty which a fond discipleship would fain have thrust upon him, and the other actually resigned a temporal throne which was his by inheritance, that he might become more purely a moral leader and king? Is it, however, so strange that nature, and the providential purpose that is at work in and through nature, should now and then appear to hit near its aim? Is it so strange that, amid the manifold conditions under which human character and destiny are shaped, just those conditions should now and then appear together which favor at least an approach to our highest ideal of manhood? Is it so wonderful that, among all the roses in all the gardens of the world, nature should here and there produce one which seems to hint at what might be a perfect rose? The gardens of such great faiths as Brahmanism, out of which Buddha came, and Judaism, out of which Jesus came, had become rich through long centuries of culture, in moral forces, and it was the most natural thing in the world that they should at some time bring forth types of character in which little of the earthiness of common mortals appeared to mingle. And yet, from the fact that man's face is set towards a goal that is absolute perfection, no character that has ever lived fully satisfies the highest human ideal. There can be no such thing as absolute human perfection already achieved. The goal is still ahead. The perfect manhood is still before us, soliciting our aspirations and our efforts. The fine approaches towards it that give a glory and a hope to man's past history are a stimulus to more heroic endeavor, and a pledge of possible achievement, but they do not close the way.

Nor is it inconsistent with the modern doctrine of historical evolution that these great moral and religious leaders should occasionally appear,—those who seem to see the moral law through no effort of reason or struggle of experience, but to gaze upon it as it were face to face, and whose characters by nature are the incarnation of moral fact and force, which they have simply to live out in natural way. The doctrine of evolution says, for instance, that the moral sense has been born of struggle,—struggle, however, not always in the individual, but in the race. The same doctrine admits that what may have at first, long ages ago, been learned only by the stern discipline of experience may now have become intuition. And we have in this country to-day an eminent living example of a type of mind and character superlatively intuitional, and yet traceable, with exceptional clearness, by the law of heredity back to ancestral forces and conditions. Ralph Waldo Emerson is a moral seer. He gazes upon the world's facts of truth and right and beauty at first hand, and then reports what he sees. He has never had any other method than this. "So I see, so I believe," he has always said, "and so I must speak; but if you ask me to give reasons for what I thus speak, I cannot do it." And yet, it is not because the reasons are not there. The reasons are back of him in the ancestral thought and logic and exceptional moral experience of the generations from which he has sprung. Emerson's seership is the grand moral conclusion of a double ancestral line of noble aspiring and pure living, that can be traced back for eight or ten generations. The very elements of godhead, not to speak with any irreverence, but even more literally than figuratively,—that is, the simple, unadulterated elements of truth, righteousness, love, purity,—come into him more directly, more as the essence of his very being, than into most of us; and hence he speaks out of his own consciousness of them, and not merely from his reasoning about them.

And this touches the very kernel of all genuine leadership. A man always speaks with authority when he speaks as if he were a fresh seer of truth; when he speaks as if he were uttering his own truth, and not another's; when he speaks not as if by hearsay, but as if by his own sight and knowledge; and when the spirit of utter sincerity and profound conviction goes along with his words. It is not so much the doctrine that he utters, as a quality of personality behind the doctrine, that makes him a leader: it is character; it is moral earnestness; it is that natural magnetism of soul which comes from thorough and enthusiastic consecration to any idea or cause that has won personal love and fealty. In these days of general enlightenment, it is not possible, at least in civilized countries, for any individual men to attain to such power over great masses of people as was once the case. Some of the great leaders of the past, if they were to return to earth to-day bringing only the knowledge they possessed at the time of their living, would be dwarfed by the average height of the intelligence around them. No class of civilized people to-day depend for guidance upon others as once they did. And yet, though the conditions of leadership involve a certain measure of harmony between the leader and his time in matters of intellectual acquisition, they do not necessarily involve vast stores of knowledge, nor depend on the possession of extraordinary mental ability. They depend more on the possession of that quality of inspiring wisdom which is moral rather than mental,—that wisdom which never becomes obsolete, is never out of date, which allies man with eternal principles, and makes him a part of the creative, sustaining forces of the universe itself.

WM. J. POTTER.

THE KANTIAN CENTENNIAL.

THE Journal of Speculative Philosophy, vol. xv., No. 3, although dated July, has just come to us, this number requiring unusual care in preparation.

It is a very interesting and important pamphlet, worthy of thorough and careful reading, not only by those who are interested in metaphysics, but by that larger body of liberal thinkers and observers who are watchful of the drift of thought in our own day, and of the bearing of speculative discussion on practical interests. It is entirely devoted (with the exception of book notices, etc.) to a report of the two centennial celebrations in honor of the publication of the great works of Immanuel Kant, the one held at Saratoga and the other at Concord.

It does not of course furnish a full presentation of the Kantian philosophy, nor a detailed criticism of it; but it does fully perform its task of introducing the reader into the world of Kantian thought and discussion, and exciting in him a desire to pursue it further, according as his own mental powers and opportunities will permit.

To the general reader, the most interesting thing is to observe the different stand-points of the various speakers and writers. The answers to the invitations to attend the centennial show the wide and varied interest felt in this great thinker. We do not find among them the name of Felix Adler; but, in his eloquent essay published in The Index of December 8, he, the pure Humanitarian and Free Religionist, says: "Among all the human beings that have ever lived, considering the intellectual service which they have rendered to mankind, I believe Immanuel Kant to have been the greatest." And he looks upon him as the herald of that progress in truth and freedom which he most desires.

The Professor of Harvard doubts if a dozen scholars in the United States really know and understand Kant in the original, and fears that the public are not numerous enough to make a celebration successful. Yet he, too, bears witness to the immense influence of Kant.

Professor Thompson well says: "The truth he did see most clearly; the truth of human freedom, and responsibility based on freedom, is just the truth our age needs, and Ezekiel taught before Kant." While a few of the notes have a touch of theological acidity in speaking of the modern tendencies of thought, in general the tone of breadth and liberality is most cheering, and shows that the movement for renewed study of philosophy is genuine, and not in the interest of any narrow opposition to science or freedom of thought.

Four essays are here printed. The first, by John W. Mears, gives a general account of the purpose of the centennial, with an estimate of the value of the study of Kant rather than an exposition of his views.

Mr. Harris' paper is a very able statement of the position of the Kantian thought in regard to his Greek predecessors, Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, and his German successors, or in his own words, "a statement of Kant's significance in the struggle between ancient and modern thought, and of Hegel's position as the one who harmonizes Greek and German thought."

In this paper occurs this striking sentence, "Christianity, alone among world religions, makes the individual man worthy of immortal life in a continued human existence of growth, intellect, will, and love." That this was the thought of that "great religious genius," Jesus of Nazareth, is very probable; but that it is the doctrine of the Christian Church does not seem so clear, or that it is by any means exclusively Christian, but rather a culminating thought evolved from the progress of religious life. Mr. Harris seems often to use the word Christianity in this wide sense, while fully recognizing that what he so names is largely indebted to all other systems of thought. In the admirable plea for technical terms, which he himself made in one of the conversations reported, he points out the very danger which we think lies in this use of a term having such different meaning to most people. Mr. Morris explains "Kant's Transcendental Deduction of Categories," and criticises some of his positions with severity and satire.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's article fully justifies her selection as one of the speakers, for she added the truly feminine element to the celebration. Her view of Kant's philosophy reminds one of Goethe's saying, "All philosophy must be loved and lived." In her hands, his thought becomes poetry and religion and life; and she, like Mr. Adler, sees in Kant the forerunner of freedom and humane religion. "From the east to the west of this vast continent," she says, "from its northern to its southern limit, wherever liberal Christianity or free religion is preached, the work of this great master is multiplied and perpetuated." Mr. Alcott and Mr. Sanborn, Mr. Cohn and Dr. Jones, took part in the conversation at Concord; and all made important statements in regard to the relation of Kant's thought to poetry, to progress, and to practical philanthropy.

We have given large space to the notice of this interesting number of a remarkable periodical, because we think it a very grave error in Radicals and Free Religionists to neglect the study of metaphysics and the history of the development of human thought. The true radical is not he who pulls up by the roots, but he who digs down to them, who is not satisfied to call a dogma or a creed a superstition or an error, until he has traced the sources out of which it sprung, and shown its relations to the whole course of human thought. It is the province of the iconoclast (and sometimes his work is the pressing need of the times) to break down and destroy with little discrimination; but, in our community, the important duty seems to us much more that of the liberal thinker who neither despises the thought of the past nor distrusts that of the future. SCIENCE AS A FACTOR IN SOCIAL PROGRESS.

That for which the word "science" stands is often divorced from human life in the common imagination. Science is associated with laboratories, with herbaria, with museums, libraries, and apparatus. To rid ourselves of this limited application, we must begin by remembering the etymology of the word: it means simply knowledge,—no more nor less. But it happens that our knowledge has attained great completeness in certain directions. Matter, which can be handled, tested, weighed, and referred to the simple senses, has had the earliest attention of exact students. Hence, we have a list of natural sciences, an armory of observations, experiments, and conclusions (better known under the name of laws), making an increasing literature, and proudly quoted as the "great body of modern scientific knowledge." It is easy to see why science should have begun low down among simple phenomena; and, if we look sharply at the historic data, we shall see that the knowledge of natural phenomena and the knowledge of human nature were both made top-heavy by an excess of philosophy. Even yet men have not learned that infinite patience of observation which heaps up facts and multiplies conditions of test before daring to announce conclusions. The error of method which vitiates all bygone philosophies of human nature is precisely the same in kind as that which led to the Ptolemaic philosophy of the universe, with its seven heavens of cycles and epicycles,—a habit of careless induction from hasty observation.

Now, the first reactionary influence of science upon human nature must necessarily have been a moral one. The intellectual gain is obvious. But the indirect moral stimulus of studies in natural science needs a moment's thought in order to bring it into focus. In the first place, the hunger for truth, the impulse to acquire new knowledge, is in itself the most transparent and clean-cut of all moral tendencies. A mind possessed by this eager appetite for knowledge will have little energy left to transmute into wrong-doing. In fact, the refined scientific intellect is almost invariably united with exceptional simplicity, straightforwardness, and honorable purpose. The petty vanities and jealousies of artists, musicians, and literary men, are hardly ever repeated among men of science. There is some quality in the atmosphere which they breathe that acts as a moral disinfectant. They are not working for individual fame, but for universal truth. What one discovers at London or Madrid is quickly telegraphed to Washington and St. Petersburg. The spirit of absolute moral unity prevails nowhere as in the republic of science. Prelates quarrel, curse, and excommunicate each other. Monarchs and prime ministers watch each other suspiciously, and haggle over a few international pence. Whoever heard of a scientific man who planned to make money or personal advantage out of his discovery? When such men were few, their social influence must have been slight. But the multiplication of institutions and instructors, pupils and literature, has augmented this spirit to no inconsiderable social force. The scientific habit makes men tolerant. It is the natural enemy of dogmatism. What chance, indeed, to dogmatize about universally acknowledged facts capable of verification at any moment? It is true that occasional controversy has arisen between men of science, as in the well-known argument upon Evolution between Haeckel and Virchow. But it will be remembered that in this the pivotal point was Haeckel's accusation that Virchow had spoken out of ignorance of truths known to other students. It is, after all, a healthful, moral discipline which holds men so rigidly to the search for facts. Nor can we imagine a better moral preparation for the study of psychology—a science which is just beginning to stir in feeble embryonic life—than this conscientious discipline which the study of physical science compels.

But science has touched human life in a still more appreciable way, through our magnificent list of inventions and industrial appliances. But the history of this influence is essentially different. To step down from the position of the genuine lover of science to the struggling crowd of mechanical inventors is exchanging the fine air of the mountain for the smoke and soil of the city. Here is the noisy clamor of financial competition. Here are lawsuits for priority of discovery. Here is the pictured literature of the patent office. Nevertheless, the great fact remains that our civilization is in the deepest debt to the inventor. Science in its loftier position is the agent of great moral and intellectual gain. But applied science in the hands of the inventor has become the minister of physical comfort, of convenience, of beauty, and of economy. Some drawbacks have attended this immense material advance. Obedient and nimble machines have induced overproduction. Improvident workmen have failed to forecast evil days, and suffering has been the consequence. But these mistakes are faults of adjustment, and capable of easy correction. Another adverse influence is ascribed to this inundation of machinery. It is said to have lowered the average intelligence of workmen. Many machines are automatic. A boy can superintend a dozen such. The brain is now in the machine. The boy who tends it does not need to understand the reasons of its motion. All that he need know is certain mechanical adjustments. He need not even know the relation of these adjustments to each other. The intelligence of the inventor makes the boy a part of the machine. He is like an independent lever or pulley availed of for occasional use. Before the era of machines, the intelligence resided in the workman. A consequence of machinery is the liberation of the instructed workman for more complex pursuits. He becomes a foreman, an agent, a supervisor, a partner. In prosperous times, observation shows that the skilled mechanic has not been crowded out of employment by the machine and its ignorant attendant. He has simply been promoted to some place where experience and skill are needed. It would have been a waste of power to keep him in attendance upon a self-adjusting machine.

Another result of applied science is the immense stimulus which it has given to commerce. When manufactured goods were slowly evolved by human hands and by the aid of imperfect tools, there could be comparatively few exchanges and few middlemen. By machinery, production has been accelerated and intensified the world over. National taste, diversity, and resources have created variations in products. Every nation has eagerly exchanged with every other. Thus, the desire for novelty and variety has found gratification; and thus, too, hostile nations have been brought into peaceful commercial relations. Commercial treaties have arisen between jealous nations,—treaties forced upon them by the pressure of financial interests. The merchants and manufacturers of England and France, speaking to each other across the channel, found their interests best served by fair and open chances for exchange.

Applied science, too, in the form of improved communication and transportation, has brought the nations face to face. How impossible would have been the good understanding and generous sympathy which swept over the civilized world like a great wave, in the weeks when President Garfield lay dying in the White House, if the electric current had not been trained to an obedient messenger! How much more exalted is such a service than that of flashing madly across the sky before the puzzled gaze of superstition! Could any number of homilies, of moral dissertations, or of international alliances have effected such a result as the simple cable messages of the Secretary of State? Suppose European newspapers had depended on the steamships for intelligence, or suppose, as before the era of steamships, they had depended on the sailing vessels! Our President might have fought his long fight with death without the knowledge of a single inhabitant of Europe, and the sympathy which came would have been tardy and ineffectual. As it was, it seemed to us that all England was watching with us at Garfield's bedside. This is an instance of indebtedness to science which we can all appreciate. In former times, nations glared at each other almost like wild beasts, each retreating to the darkest corner of its den. Now, science has made them acquainted. They are shaking hands and comparing notes. The first necessity was that they should know each other. To know each other, communication must be increased. This could only happen by travel and international trade. For this problem, science has found the key, and invention has turned it in the lock. The doors have been thrown wide open; and lo! the prayers for peace and good-will on earth, which have been going up for centuries in the churches, are suddenly answered.

Still another recognizable indebtedness of society to science is in the impulse to sanitary studies. If, as we are beginning to see, the great aim of human life is the security of human happiness, and if the goal is to be the quality of civilization rather than its quantity, the observance of physiological laws is a primary interest. It was of no avail that our mothers chld us for naughtiness, while the diet, dress, and habits of heredity which their inexperience had entailed upon us induced new manifestations of inharmonious temperament. Science is teaching us, too, that mental and moral traits come in the straight line of inheritance. Lastly, scientific method is penetrating our organizations for charity and reform. We are learning to make philanthropy preventive as well as remedial, and are discovering that the remedial department is the transient instead of the important feature. The scientific method of dealing with crime and helpless incompetence is also extending to governments. Industrial instruction is displacing public almsgiving. Education and moral training is seen to be cheaper than reform schools, police, and prisons. All these substitutions rest mainly on the scientific principle of the economy of power. Unconsciously, many social arrangements are governed by it. It is perceived to be inexpedient that the rich (as in the Christian economies) should constantly supply the poor from their superfluity. Experience shows that in the end such inconsiderate almsgiving does not serve the highest welfare of either rich or poor. How quickly the Christian precept bends and snaps before the induction of experience! That which our carefully studied observation shows to be best we unhesitatingly do, no matter how many ancient theories of duty are thereby overthrown. This constant habit of induction from experience proves how deeply the scientific method of dealing with human affairs has penetrated modern society.

THE VULGAR ERA.

It goes without saying that the development of mankind up to within a century was theological; that is, fitful, irrational, and whimsical. Mankind were divided into great theological camps. Each theological division of the race insisted that its prophet or savior was the central figure of human history, that all historic events up to the time of his birth had reference to him, and that all subsequent events were devolutions from him, he being the cardinal man, or the hinge, on which history turned. It is thus that Bossuet and Neander regard Christ, and Mohammedan theologians thus regard the Arabian prophet. Prophets and enthusiasts were thus deemed up to within a century the great historic factors and centres of historic interest and gravitation. Such having been the case, it is not remarkable that we have Christian eras and hegiras as survivals still in vogue of the times of crass ignorance of nature and scientific destitution, when myth and theology were arrogantly dominant. For the old Romans, the great cardinal event of history was the year of the foundation of their so-called eternal city. For the democratic, competitive Greeks, who were more fond of the laurel of fame than they were even of gold, the year of the first great Pan-Hellenic gathering at Olympia, for the celebration of their heroic games, was the chronological point of departure in time, the era or fixed time-point from which to date and reckon. Throughout Christendom, it is needless to say that the year, which is purely and wholly a natural division or unit of time, has been called Anno Domini, forsooth, the year of our Lord, in Christian parlance. But whose year was it a million centuries ago when man and the so-called Son of Man were only the remotest, unevolved possibilities, and there was no human being or prophet to appropriate the order to theological and ecclesiastical purposes?

Man, when full of his old theological conceit of human centrality in nature, reminds one of Æsop's fly perched on the horn of an ox. The fly imagined that he was a burden to the majestic ruminant. Upon inquiry, he found that the ox was not only not disturbed by his presence, but that he was entirely ignorant of his existence. The eternal forces, which compose and vivify cosmos, had been measuring off time into natural units of years by the revolution of planets round their solar centres for incomputable, unimaginable periods of duration, before there were any so-called prophets and saviors. The year was a device of the Nature of Things, like the three weeks' incubation of the hen. The Mécanique Céleste is a regular, natural clockwork. Nature accomplishes her operations in definite periods of time. She can furnish eras based upon cosmical events, time-points, about which there is no haze or uncertainty as there is in the case of the birth-years of so-called saviors and prophets, who were all born in ages of ignorance, superstition, and darkness, when there was hardly a scintilla of positive, scientific knowledge, when the unregulated senses, misled by the mythic imagination, were the sole interpreters of natural phenomena.

An eclipse of the sun is a natural era, if we choose to utilize it as such. Thousands of years ago, the old Ionian philosopher, Thales, foretold a certain solar eclipse, which occurred at the time he predicted. That Thalesian eclipse was a godsend to chronologists. Astronomers by the aid of it quickly straightened out the chronology of the events of the primitive historic period. The cosmical movements and revolutions proceed with a chronometric precision which knows no variation. The exact date of an event, say a battle, which occurred during the Thalesian eclipse, can be fixed by astronomers to a second. In the progress of positive knowledge and a rational civilization, arbitrary, theological eras are sure to be discarded sooner or later, because they are badges and relics of superstition and ignorance, which the enlightened future will not endure. Actuated by the theological spirit,—that is, the spirit of whim, unreason, and ignorance,—the early Spanish voyagers and conquistadors in this hemisphere sprinkled the two American continents with the names of all the saints recorded in the Acta Sanctorum. Curiously enough, precisely in those countries and communities where there is the greatest number of saintly local names, there the people are at the foot of the social ladder in point of intelligence and morality. The more saints, the more assassins, thieves, loafers, and social scum of all sorts.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Christian Leader (Universalist), replying to the questions put by the Christian at Work, "Who can point to one single impress which Theodore Parker has left behind? What single pulpit is under the dominance of his thought?" well says:—

The Unitarian pulpit of to-day is not indeed altogether, but very essentially, leavened with the thought and the animus of Theodore Parker. We well remember how the Unitarian Association used to snub him, dodge him, circumvent him,—thirty years ago he was very distasteful to that body. At this date, nearly all is changed. . . . Recent church history does not show another triumph so radical and so near complete as that of Theodore Parker.

To this may be added the more remarkable testimony given by Dean Stanley shortly before his death and referred to by Mr. Savage in his sermon in The Index last week, "that Theodore Parker has rendered a greater service to theological science than any other American for a hundred years."

WHEN we see such theological teaching as is contained in this extract which we clip from the Pres- byterian, and which has been the prevalent teaching of the Protestant Christian Church, we do not wonder that many people should fear that Christendom is threatened with a "moral interregnum":—

In spite of the plain teaching of the New Testament in regard to the impossibility of becoming reconciled to God through a self-made righteousness, how many people still cry out, "I am not good enough for God to accept me"! What a clear distinction on this point is made by Luther, when he says that we do not become righteous by doing what is righteous, but having become righteous we do what is righteous. And the becoming righteous is God's work through Christ, not man's work for himself.

We can see a good sense in Luther's "distinction," which is only another form of saying that, when the inner affections and impulses are true and pure, the conduct will take care of itself. But, if the closing sentence added by the Presbyterian is right, man is absolved from all responsibility for his inner affections and impulses, and hence for his conduct. That this doctrine has not done more moral harm than it has in the world is owing to the fact that people's hearts are often better than their beliefs. Yet having once heard a prominent Orthodox preacher and doctor of divinity say in his pulpit, where he preached for thirty years, that "the morally upright and benevolent men who made no profession of religious conviction, having only a self-made righteousness of good works, did more harm in the world than the openly wicked and criminal classes," it did not much surprise us when a considerable number of his prominent church members, who had sat for years under this kind of teaching, were publicly convicted as defaulters and swindlers.

THE Sunday School Times gives a lesson on the morals of "advertising," which the religious press especially would do well to take to heart. The heedlessness of religious journals in this matter is deplorable. The Times truly says:—

The advertising columns of a paper are the best measure of its purity and of its integrity. Yet the most cautious managers are sometimes deceived; and, when they are, they ought to bear the loss. Those who receive money for publishing false statements, rather than those who are misled by them, are the parties to make good the amount lost by the transaction.

The Times follows up this lesson by an act as rare in journalism as it is honorable. Having unwittingly inserted an advertisement which it discovered to be fraudulent, it offers to refund to any of its subscribers, who may have been induced to purchase the article by its advertising of it, whatever they may have paid.

THE New York Independent frankly confesses its mistake in the calumnious remark which it made against the Free Religious Association, and concerning which we asked for proof or withdrawal two weeks ago. It says, "We made the momentary lapse, which we regret, of confounding in memory the National Liberal League with the Free Religious Association." So far very well. But the Independent goes on, in a long article, to complain of the Association for keeping silent when Joseph Cook, in one of his lectures in Boston, made a similar blunder, and charged the Free Religious Association with acts of which the Liberal League had been guilty. These acts were votes and resolves on the part of the League in favor of the repeal of the United States postal laws forbidding the use of the mails for carrying indecent literature. "Then was the time," the Independent thinks, "for the Free Religious Association to speak its indignation at the charge and its reprobation of the attempt to make the United States mail the servant of obscenity." It says:—

Why did not Mr. Potter, who now indignantly rebukes us, through his Index, as soon as Mr. Cook had held the Association up to scorn, present a resolution before that body at its next meeting, protesting its reprobation of any proposition to remove the penalties for distributing indecent matter? We fear such a resolution could not have been carried. Not, be it clearly understood, that we imagine the officers were not just as sincere as any man for purity and morality; but they were not willing to take associate action against the infamous proposition, so long as Mr. Frothingham and James Parton and Judge Dittenhoefer and Elizur Wright and the Cornell professors, all lights of freethought, were earnestly urging that every law be repealed that forbids the sending of filth through the mails.

To this, the simple reply is that (1) Joseph Cook was not a man of such accuracy of statement or weight of judgment in his public lectures as to make it important for the Free Religious Association to enter a formal defence against his attacks. The falsity of his charges was sufficiently shown in The Index and other journals at the time. (2) It has never been the method of the Association to pass votes on questions discussed upon its platform, except on matters pertaining to its business; and the subject-matter of Mr. Cook's charges had never been, in any way, shape, or fashion, before the Association, even for discussion. Even, therefore, if a public speaker of weightier character than Mr. Cook had made the blunder of confounding the Association with another body, there would have been no reason why the Association, on compulsion of such a blundering speaker, should hasten to change its methods of procedure in order to set itself right on a matter on which it had never by any possibility put itself in the wrong. The fear expressed by the Independent, that a resolution of reprobation of the attempt to repeal the postal laws in question could not have been carried, is a purely gratuitous conjecture. How slender the basis on which it rests is shown by the Independent's enumeration of names of persons likely to oppose such a resolution. Only one of the persons named was ever prominent in the counsels of the Association, and several of them were never members. Mr. Frothingham, of course, was prominent. But of him we are sure it cannot be truly said that he ever "earnestly urged" the repeal of those laws. There was a time, as the Independent relates, when, impelled by his chivalrous impulses to defend imperilled liberty, he questioned the constitutionality of the laws, and manifested his sympathy for the editor of the Truth-Seeker, whom he believed to be unjustly arraigned under them. But this was before the corruption of Bennett's character was so thoroughly exposed as it has been since. Mr. Frothingham's eyes were sure to open, as the Independent itself suggests, so that he soon saw that he was wasting his generous chivalry on a worthless cause. When the split came in the Liberal League on the repeal or reform of those postal laws, and the League fell into the hands of the repeal party, Mr. Frothingham withdrew his name as a vice-president of the League; and almost without exception, we recall not one prominent exception, all those members of the Free Religious Association who were also members of the League withdrew from the League at the same time and for the same reason. We may say, in conclusion, that the Independent does not cut a very handsome figure in picking up Joseph Cook's addled eggs to throw at the Free Religious Association. Such weapons do not improve with age.

MANKIND are to-day carrying a heavy and useless load of superstition to keep their "morality" in place, and resent as a sacrilege and irreverence the suggestion that more morality and less superstition would be a wiser arrangement.—F. E. Abbot.

THE POSITION OF MR. FROTHINGHAM.

We have received several letters requesting us to give our views respecting the present position of Mr. O. B. Frothingham. We know nothing in regard to his position beyond what has been already published.

It is now certain that the statement which appeared originally in the New York Evening Post was a distortion of Mr. Frothingham's words, and largely a misrepresentation of his views. He said to Mr. M. J. Savage recently that "a piece of work like this ought to lose a newspaper man his position." In a note to the paper above named, Mr. Frothingham wrote: "I have seen no reasons for changing my opinions. Certainly, I have not gone back to any opinions I had abandoned." But with strange inconsistency he referred to the report of the interviewer as "in the main just," and thus furnished the reporter the means of self-vindication, and the Orthodox clergy and press the means of justifying the claim that Mr. Frothingham's position was fairly stated in the report. The senior editor of this paper, during a long interview with Mr. Frothingham, with whom he has been well acquainted several years, and between whom and himself exists a warm personal friendship, could discover no indication of any essential change in his views, although he thought he gave more emphasis to the intuitionist philosophy than formerly. Mr. Savage, in his discourse published in The Index last week, which Mr. Frothingham states is "substantially correct" in regard to his "present attitude of thought," says: "In spite of his explicit declaration that he has recanted nothing, not gone back one step, abandoned no position once held, they [the Orthodox press] still persist in holding him up as a convert, as an example and prophecy of the failure of freethought."

Mr. Savage declares that Mr. Frothingham does not regard science as "tending to materialism," "would not limit freethought on any subject or in any direction," "is not in the least inclined to go back to any past church, statement, or creed," thinks destruction "has not yet gone half far enough," "would not blot out anything he has already written and published,"—"not, to use his own language, 'one single word.'" Mr. Savage rebukes the Orthodox papers for their very evident misrepresentations made in utter disregard of Mr. Frothingham's "explicit declaration," and affirms that Mr. Frothingham "is so disgusted with the use that the 'Evangelicals' have made of the matter that, as he says, he is compelled to feel 'less sympathy with them than ever before.'"

Yet Mr. Savage thinks there has been a "real change in his view of things." "To put it in my own phrase," he says, "I should say he has come to be a more pronounced theist." "Whenever in the past," he adds, "I have felt compelled to criticise or differ from Mr. Frothingham, it has been almost always concerning these very points wherein his reported change has taken place. So far as I can see, the present attitude of Mr. Frothingham is not very far from my own." Knowing that Mr. Savage is one of the most pronounced of theists, that he has been in controversy of late vigorously and zealously combating materialism, atheism, and agnosticism, it occurs to us, remembering Mr. Frothingham's declaration, "I have seen no reasons for changing my opinions," that even "the change" which Mr. Savage puts into his "own phrase" may unconsciously to himself derive much of its definiteness and emphasis from the positiveness of his own nature and the well-defined character of his own views.

Mr. Frothingham, never a materialist nor an atheist, has generally been regarded as a theist, but his position is nowhere clearly defined in his works; and it is doubtful whether his views in regard to the existence and nature of God have been or are now sufficiently definite in his own mind to warrant a positive statement concerning his belief. From his writings, it does not appear whether he is a theist, pantheist, or agnostic, or whether he is inclined more to the intuitionist or experiential school of philosophy. We have however thought that his sympathies and feelings were with theism and intuitionism. He is now evidently suffering from ill-health, and it is not strange that men of positive convictions who interview him find that the drift of his thought is on subjects in which they feel the profoundest interest toward their own position. But Mr. Frothingham's own declaration, "I have seen no reason for changing my opinions," is, for the present, of paramount authority, although we may be in doubt as to the opinions he holds on certain subjects. We do not care to read or hear anything more about Mr. Frothingham's position until restored health shall enable him to write such a statement as he may think necessary to make his present "attitude of thought" understood by his many friends and admirers, and by the public generally. The Liberals of America cannot be indifferent to the views or the attitude of one of their most learned, brilliant, and noble representatives, nor would any truly liberal mind, even if there were reason to believe Mr. Frothingham's views had undergone a radical change, question his right to abandon former opinions, or withhold from him credit for the excellent work he has done. But Mr. Frothingham's views, according to his own statement and that of his most intimate friends, are substantially the same now that they have been for years; and whatever change has occurred in his feelings, or to whatever cause it is ascribable, his exalted character, his years of service, and his present ill-health entitle him to the most patient forbearance, until he shall see fit to speak in his own time and in his own way. Meantime let us bear in mind that the progress and triumph of liberal thought depend not upon the approval, nor can they be permanently arrested by the defection, of any man. B. F. U.

EDWARD KING writes to the New York Evening Post in words of glowing praise of Ernest Renan's new book on Marcus Aurelius, the seventh and last volume of his History of the Origins of Christianity. He says of it, "If you have ever walked through some charming room in a rich museum decorated with hundreds of antique medals, and felt that thrill of satisfaction provoked by constant presentation to the eye of delicious portraits, you can appreciate the feeling with which you turn the pages of this exquisite book." Mr. King further says:—

M. Renan consecrates to the adopted father of Marcus Aurelius a few charming lines: "Antoninus was a philosopher without claiming the grade, almost without knowing it. Marcus Aurelius was one with natural grace and admirable sincerity, but with reflection. In some respects, Antoninus was the greatest. His kindness did not lead him into faults: he was not tormented by that internal sorrow which forever preyed upon the heart of his adopted son. That strange malady, that inquiet study of himself, that demon of scruples, that feverish aspiration to perfection, are signs of a nature less strong than noble. The finest thoughts are those that one does not record; but we must add that we should not have known Antoninus, if the son had not sent down to us that exquisite portrait of his father, in which he seems to have applied himself, by very humility, to painting the image of a better man than himself. Antoninus is like a Christ who would have had no evangel. Marcus Aurelius is like a Christ who should have written his own."

The Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 29, 1881.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

BEFORE our next issue, we shall have entered upon the duties and possibilities of a new year. The year now so near its close has been in many respects a prosperous one to the country, in spite of the black stain stamped by a murderous hand across its otherwise fair record,—a stain by reason of which 1881 has been made forever a marked year in the history of a great Republic. The business prospects of the nation never looked brighter. We are at peace with all other nations, there are no questions before the public of such vital interest as to threaten any domestic discord; and we have every reason to look forward to the coming year as of one of industrial, commercial, and financial prosperity. The cheerful faces which we meet in the rush of holiday trade in our stores and on our streets seem to bear no impress of regret for the passing year; and while many no doubt will experience a momentary sadness as they listen to the midnight bells which shall note the close of 1881 and the advent of 1882, yet the prevailing feeling will, we fancy, be an echo of Tennyson's words:—

"Ring, happy bells, across the snow:
The year is going, let him go."

A SERIES of articles written for this paper by Mr. D. A. Wasson, who, as is well known, ranks among the ablest thinkers and best writers of this country, will be a part of the feast of good things which we shall lay before the readers of The Index the first month of the new year. "Theism and Spencerism" is the title of the contribution from Mr. Wasson's pen that will appear next week. We shall give in the same number an article by Mr. J. W. Chadwick on "The Origin of Christianity."

THE North-Western Christian Advocate, says the Independent, "publishes verbatim all the argument of Dr. Thomas' appeal, and omits every word said by his counsel in his defence." And, in doing this, it adheres to the usual policy of orthodox journals in dealing with heretics. Did they present with fulness and impartiality the position and principles of heretics and freethinkers, how long would they have the support which they now receive?

AN appropriate New Year's gift to a friend would be a year's subscription to The Index.

HENRY WARD BEECHER declares that protection is "organized immorality," and the Independent says that "free trade is a silly speculation."

THE London Times thinks that President Arthur's appointments to office will be a far more certain indication of his views on Civil Service Reform than anything presented in his message. This is an unsentimental, practical, and reasonable view of the subject.

THE war on mutilated coins, it is stated, has had the effect of increasing the Sunday collections in the Evangelical churches. This will hardly be claimed as an indication of growing piety or interest in the "cause of Christ," although the evidence it affords of the "deep religious convictions" of the people is quite as satisfactory as much that is adduced every week, to prove this by the religious press.

MRS. E. C. STANTON is naturally indignant over the fact that, while President Arthur has paid no attention whatever to the repeated requests of the Woman's Suffrage Association that he should recommend the appointment of a standing committee to look after the political rights of women, and Senator Edmunds has not thought it worth while even to acknowledge the gift of a handsomely bound copy of A History of the Woman's Suffrage Movement, yet they could both join in sending a very graceful letter of acknowledgment to a Vermont woman for the highly appreciated gift of some butternut candy.

SAYS the Toronto Daily Globe, the most influential journal in Canada: "We do not deny the existence of a certain class in the community who believe it practicable to have public school-teachers give religious instruction to their pupils indiscriminately; but we have never been able to understand how they could so regard it. As a matter both of principle and of expediency, we hold that the State should not undertake the work of religious instruction in any form. Equal toleration for all forms of belief and for agnosticism also is the proper attitude of the secular power. The work of imparting religious instruction devolves on the parent and the Church."

As The Index was the first journal to expose the dishonesty of the New York Evening Post's reporter's statement of Mr. Frothingham's religious views,—that dishonesty consisting in putting the statement into the first person and into quotation-marks, and thus leading the public to believe that it was written down directly from Mr. Frothingham's utterances, while it was actually written entirely from memory,—the Post does not feel kindly toward The Index; but, instead of frankly confessing that its reporter imposed upon it as well as the public, it has assumed editorial responsibility for its work, and only answered The Index by abuse of its senior editor, who wrote over his own signature the article which has so severely tried its nerves. As another journal says of it, "The Post has evidently lost its temper, if not its common-sense."

JUDGE DAVIS, in charging the jury in the city of New York, in the case of Mrs. Coleman, indicted for murder, said:—

No imaginary inspiration to do a personal or private wrong, under a delusion, a belief that some great public benefit will flow from it, where the nature of the act done and its probable consequences, and that it is in itself wrong, are known to the actor, can amount to that insanity which, in law, disarms the act of criminality. Under such notions of legal insanity, life, property, and rights, both public and private, would be altogether insecure, and every man who, by brooding over his wrongs, real or imaginary, shall work himself up to an irresistible impulse to avenge himself or his friend or his party, can with impunity become a self-elected judge, jury, and executioner, in his own case, for the redress of his own injuries or the imaginary wrongs of his friends, his party, or his country. But, happily, that is not the law; and whenever such ideas of insanity are applied to a given case as the law (as too often they have been), crime escapes punishment, not through the legal insanity of the accused, but through the emotional insanity of courts and juries.

IN the passage from the theological or supernatural view of the world to the rational, scientific view, there will be for a long time to come more or less reversion, even among the children of light, under the demoralizing influence of age and illness, to the twilight beliefs of the past or of their fathers and mothers and remoter ancestors. Such reversions and relapses are and will continue to be inevitable. Human nature does not take on an entirely new mood at once. It does not break with the past at once and forever, but gradually. Theology is still in the bones, blood, and marrow of us all, whatever may be our intellectual status. The new thought has not yet been so assimilated and taken into general circulation as to have become a habit and second nature. Besides, moral as well as physical cowardice is still a predominant trait of a large fraction of human nature, which is anxious for bread and butter rather than truth. A pretty extensive finishing stroke of mental and moral evolution will have to be undergone even by enlightened humanity before it can assume the Phrygian cap of perfect moral and intellectual freedom.

ONE is inclined to imagine, from the news received from Europe in regard to the persecution of the Jews, that the majority of Christians there are of the type of a certain rough sailor we have read of, who was rather ignorant in regard to religious matters, but having been "converted" at a prayer-meeting one evening, under the ministrations of a zealous revivalist, happened the following morning to meet on the street an inoffensive Jew, and incontinently knocked him down. "What did you do that for?" gasped the astonished victim. "Because," answered the convert, "you are a Jew; and didn't the Jews crucify Jesus?" "But that was hundreds of years ago," explained the poor fellow. "I can't help that," was the reply. "I never heard of it till last night." Only a few days since, the news came of an unprovoked attack by a Russian mob upon Sara Bernhardt, because of her Jewish birth. And this week the cable tells us that many innocent Jews were unmercifully treated in Warsaw by another mob, because a pick-pocket who was a Jew raised the alarm of fire in a Warsaw church, creating a panic which resulted in the death of over thirty persons.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar.

WE are now sending out bills to the subscribers of The Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a favor if our friends will remit at once, and if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew. A number have sent us new subscribers, and we ask all who can to assist us in this way. Let us emulate our orthodox friends in their zeal, and do this much, if not on account of our personal interest in the paper, at least for the cause it represents. Remember also that the most effectual way of improving The Index is to give it the means which will enable those in charge of it to make the improvements desired, and which none desire more than themselves.

MATTER AND SPIRIT.

An Essay read before the "Parker Memorial Class," Dec. 18, 1881.

BY CHARLES ELLIS.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—My object in attempting to discuss this subject is to give you a glimpse of, and to get your opinions upon, what I think must become the scientific basis of Liberalism before the latter can emerge from its present incoherent, negative, and chaotic condition.

Almost as long as there has been a human race, there has existed a diversity of opinions in regard to spirit and matter. All through the early history of the race, the existence of either was not doubted, but the one was believed to be in deadly hostility to the other: matter was the evil power of the world; spirit, the good. We must figure the primitive mind arriving at its conclusions from observation and experience plus wonder and fear, two very powerful factors. Observation and experience convinced the beholder of the existence of matter, or realities external to himself; but there was the strange difference between living and dead bodies to be accounted for. Men and animals lived to-day, and to-morrow, or soon or late, they were changed, they lived no more. What, said the beholder to himself, makes that awful change? The natural conclusion at which the ignorant mind would arrive must have been that there was something in the body when alive that was not in it when dead; i.e., that there was something in a living being that could go out of the body and leave it in a state of death. Strengthen this conclusion with the dream of the primitive man, in which he beholds the dead alive again, and we have the savage's conviction that there must be more than the body. The existence of the body was not doubted: the existence of the soul was an inference. The fact that it was uncertain, dim, and shadowy only favored the belief in it, on the same ground that people even yet find the strongest proof of spirits in the marvellousness with which their "manifestations" are surrounded. The shadowy vision of the dead in dreams was thus the basis of the primitive conception of soul or spirit. From the existence of a soul of man, or a spirit man, the conception spread until the world was peopled with imaginary spirits, at first dwelling in material objects on the earth, but gradually transplanted to the skies, where the conception grew to the magnitude of gods, that in time melted into one another, until at last we had but one supreme spirit, the author of all, and the owner of all as well. With the development of intellect there came to be doubters. Then God became a huge personal being projected into the skies, with a heavenly city above the stars. That materialistic conception has never disappeared from the human mind. Why?

A spiritual being or spirit is something of which we can have no conception, unless we conceive it as being like something that we know, as a material existence; and hence we can secure belief in spirit only by and through matter. Consequently, it is much more satisfactory to the common-sense of the world to believe in a material than in a spirit God. Just as fast as the prevailing conception of God loses its materialistic character, the existence of God, as therein defined, will become doubtful in the public mind. This, to me, is the secret of the rapid increase of what is called "atheism." The most transcendental conception of a spiritual deity is only an intellectually refined figment of the materialistic conception of God; and, if the transcendental conception ever arrives at a state in which no shade of the anthropomorphic God can any longer be detected, then God will have ceased to exist, and the world will be dominated by atheism.

In time, the question of the existence of matter and spirit became a metaphysical battle, which has never wholly died away. The smoke and din of the conflict obscure the mental vision of most people yet, when they chance to look in that direction. The case stands now somewhat in the condition of a "draw-game" of chess. Neither party has won; but in the coming years I predict that one will absorb the other, and that the material, not the spiritual universe will be recognized as the basis of all philosophy and belief. To-day, people believe in spirit, not because spirit has been proved, but because spirit is associated with religious training; and the denial of it shocks the quiet mind, as if an attempt were being made to rob it of some heirloom on which great store is set. By way of gratifying this prejudice and fortifying the people against such loss, it has become common for bright men, who are a trifle afraid of public opinion, and who think they can be a little false to truth and not be found out by a world that doesn't know quite as much as they do, to support the hypothesis of spirit by virtually denying the existence of matter. They reason that, if all our knowledge is confined to states of consciousness, we cannot know anything outside of our own minds, and therefore we can never know anything about matter. It is at this point that I touch the core of the subject. But first let us drop all bias from our minds, and be willing to follow the truth anywhere. Lewes says, "If there is one lesson emphatically taught by philosophy, it is the unwisdom of founding our conclusions on our desires rather than on the objective facts,"—a very important truth in itself.

How shall we start our investigation? We must, it seems to me, commence with ourselves. Of each individual present, it must be said, "You feel," and of each object in the room it must equally be said, "It is, or may be, felt." The feeling in the individual is the subjective, and the object felt is the objective aspect of the phenomena present. You hear my voice. That is a subjective state in you. The atmosphere of the room is thrown into motion by my organs of speech, and that motion is conveyed by wave motion to the tympanum of the ear. That is the objective state. If this room could be made a perfect vacuum into which two persons could be put and kept alive, the one might talk and the other listen all day and hear nothing. There must be matter or objective existence present, upon which my voice can act, or there is no motion conveyed to the ear, and consequently no sound. Objective and subjective, therefore, go together, must of necessity go together. On this point, Lewes, to whom I shall repeatedly refer as to the highest authority, says: "It is only by analytical artifice that the objective can be divorced from the subjective. Matter is for us the felt: its qualities are differences of feeling. . . . The denial of all reality apart from our minds is a twofold mistake: it confounds the conception of general relations with particular relations, declaring that, because the external in its relation to the sentient organism can only be what it is felt to be, therefore it can have no other relations to other individual reals. This is the first mistake. The second is the disregard of the constant presence of the objective real in every fact of feeling: the not-self is emphatically present in every consciousness of the self. . . . You may, conceivably, regard the whole universe as nothing but a series of changes in your consciousness; but you cannot hope to convince me that I myself am simply a change in yourself, or that my body is only a fleeting image in your mind. . . . That I have a body, or am a body, is not to be speculatively argued away. . . . The primary fact testified by consciousness is that experience expresses both physical and mental aspects, and that a not-self is everywhere indissolubly interwoven with self, an objective factor with a subjective factor." That is, we can have no mental states without material existences and motions or resistance to motions which excite them. Given a body possessed of a nervous system and capable of resistance, and a material universe, the prime condition of which is motion, then, at every point where that body comes in contact with the universe or any part of it, the nervous system proclaims that contact by its action and reaction. If we could conceive a nervous system existing alone without material surroundings, as God is said to have existed before he created the universe, in the absence of all objective factors, no states of consciousness could ever have existed in such a being. He would have been virtually non-existent. Idealist and spiritualist are wrong. We are compelled to postulate matter before we can take a single step toward a solution of the mystery in which we find our lives involved.

Tyndall says: "There are two things which form, so to say, the substance of all scientific thought. The entire play of the scientific intellect is confined to the combination and resolution of matter and force." He says that the fundamental thought that pervades all study of the universe is that out of nothing nothing can ever come, and he adds: "It ought to be known and avowed that the physical philosopher, as such, must be a pure materialist. His inquiries deal with matter and force, and with them alone."

Huxley says: "I take it to be demonstrable that it is utterly impossible to prove that anything whatever may not be the effect of a material and necessary cause, and that human logic is equally incompetent to prove that any act is really spontaneous. A really spontaneous act is one which, by the assumption, has no cause; and the attempt to prove such a negative as this is, on the face of the matter, absurd. And, while it is thus a philosophical impossibility to "demonstrate that any given phenomenon is not the effect of a material cause, any one who is familiar with the history of science will admit that its progress has in all ages meant, and now more than ever means, the extension of the province of what we call matter and causation, and the concomitant gradual banishment from all regions of human thought of what we call spirit and spontaneity."

I would not be understood as quoting either of these men as holding the opinion that spirit must be dogmatically ruled out of court. They recognize throughout the universe that mystery which Mr. Tyndall calls "inscrutable." Mr. Huxley says it makes little difference whether we express the phenomena of matter in terms of spirit, or the phenomena of spirit in terms of matter, "but with a view to the progress of science the materialistic terminology is in every way to be preferred." He says the "spiritualistic terminology is utterly barren, and leads to nothing but obscurity and confusion of ideas." Comment is unnecessary.

I go back again to Lewes. He says, "All that we know of force is motion." Is that true? I think it is. I think Mr. Roper will indorse that proposition without delay. Let me try to illustrate it. Here is a quantity of water. Let us say that we have here ten cubic inches of water. If we confine this water in a suitable vessel, a boiler, and heat the boiler, what takes place in the water? Motion is not created or even begun, for it is already there to an extent not cognizable by our senses, but is simply increased between the molecules of which the water is composed; and, if the heat applied is sufficient, this motion becomes so great that the molecules, if they had room enough to swing to their limit of repulsion, would fill a space equal to seventeen thousand two hundred and eighty cubic inches. By confining them and directing their resistance, we make these molecules drive a piece of machinery that we call a steam-engine. Have we anywhere created a force in this operation? By no means. We have simply combined and transformed motion. We may leave the word "force" out of our calculation entirely, and our understanding of the phenomenon will not be impaired. By heating the water, we increase the motion, or swing, of its particles. That motion we direct by the use of boiler, valves and pipes, steam-chest, piston-head and crank, and transform it into mass motion in our engine. All that we really know in this phenomenon is motion, and without that motion we should not have our phenomenon and no state of consciousness regarding it. If we choose to make use of the term "force," there is no objection to saying that our water represents potential energy, or potential force, if you please. But the force must remain a prisoner, as it were, until the motion of the particles of water is sufficiently increased to liberate it in the sublimated activity of steam. We can know it only as motion. The term "force" is therefore only a thought symbol of an objective reality, which appears to our senses as matter in motion. Hence, Mr. Lewes' proposition is true, but is not, it seems to me, the whole truth. Why is it not a nearer approach to the ultimate fact to say that all we know is but subjective aspects of matter in motion, and that therefore matter and motion are the only objective realities in the universe? If this reasoning is correct, it follows with the rigor of logic that, if there is such an existence as spirit, it is not only unknown to-day, but, in the very nature of the case, it must forever remain unknown. For every state of consciousness there must be an objective as well as a subjective side. Place the finest mind in the world in this room, and ask of it a knowledge of spirit, and it will be dumb, or at best will say, "I know nothing about it!" Out of nothing, nothing comes. Fill yonder hall with ghosts or Holy Ghost, if that be possible, and then lie, bask, bathe, sleep in it, you will get no state of consciousness regarding spirit. Flood mind with nothing for a month, and the result will be—nothing.

On the other hand, what can be said of matter? Do we know anything of it? I will repeat Mr. Lewes' definition: "Matter is for us the felt; its qualities are differences of feeling. . . . It is because we do know what matter is that we know it is not mind: they are symbols of two different modes of feeling. If we separate the conception of citizenship from the conception of fatherhood, although the same man is both citizen and father, how much more decisively must we separate the conception of matter, which represents one group of feelings, from the conception of mind, which represents another! One element in the former is common to the whole group; namely, the reference to a not-self, induced by the sensation of resistance, which always ideally or sensibly accompanies the material class. The axiom, I feel, ergo I exist, has its correlative, I act, ergo there are other existents on which I act; and these are not wholly me, for they resist, oppose, exclude me; yet they are also one with me, since they are felt by me. In my feeling, that which is not me is matter, the objective aspect of the felt, as mind is the subjective aspect. . . . Matter is primarily the visible and resistant, and secondarily whatever can be imagined as such; so that ether, molecules, and atoms, although neither visible nor tangible, are ranged under the head of matter."

If we take any material object, this piece of coal, for instance, and attempt to analyze it, we soon discover that it has evaded our senses, so to speak. We know, through the investigation of the chemist, that it is composed mainly of a material substance which we call carbon. When we apply heat to it, the atoms of carbon become disturbed, somewhat as a colony of ants is when you pound upon their hillock. With the increase of temperature, the swing of the atoms increases, until at length they overcome their cohesiveness in the lump of coal, and, rushing into the embrace of the atoms of oxygen, the dashing Don Juans of the air, they elope in a honeymoon of carbonic acid gas.

Neither as atoms nor as molecules can we obtain any sensible conception of matter. We cannot see them, we cannot touch them. How, then, can we be assured that they have any material existence? By capturing the carbonic acid gas, we can partially tear asunder the embrace of its molecules, which, as you are aware, are composed of one atom of carbon and two atoms of oxygen, and can drive away from each molecule one atom of oxygen, leaving carbonic oxide. But the sunbeam, surpassing the human chemist, uses the green leaves of the vegetable world as a decomposing battery, and, divorcing the atoms of oxygen entirely from those of carbon, deposits the carbon in the fibre of plant and tree, and drives the oxygen back again to its homeless wandering in the atmosphere. Thus, while we cannot see atoms and molecules, we are compelled by the intellect to admit their existence by their effects, of which we can and do obtain sensible cognition. So clearly do the effects prove them that, in absence of a conviction of their existence, the philosopher would be obliged to supply them theoretically,—just as the astronomer, noting and measuring and calculating the perturbations of a known planet, declared that at such a point in the heavens there ought to be found a hitherto unknown planet, which was accordingly discovered as predicted.

An objector might say, "Why are not atoms spirit?" Because they are known to act as if they had material properties, and produce effects that could not be produced without material properties. Here, again, I quote Lewes. He says: "The matter which is sensible as masses may be resolved into molecules which lie beyond the discrimination of sense, and these again into atoms which are purely ideal conceptions; but, because molecules are proved, and atoms are supposed, to have material properties, and to conform to sensible canons of the objective world, we never hesitate to class them under the head of matter; nor do we imagine that, in passing beyond the discrimination of sense, they lose their objective significance. They are still physical not mental facts."

In closing, I beg to say that I feel warranted in maintaining—against the argument that we only know states of consciousness, and therefore cannot know matter—that we can and do know matter, either sensibly or extra-sensibly, as an objective existence external to ourselves, and that, in point of fact, we really know nothing but matter and motion. But, whenever we attempt to speak of spirit, we are obliged to speak of it in terms of matter, and can obtain no conception of it whatever, save only so far as we succeed in presenting it to our sensibility in terms of matter. We are obliged to materialize it before we can obtain any conception of it. Thus, we are compelled to destroy spirit in order to know it; for, in materializing it, we have robbed it of its character of spirit. When it arrives at our consciousness, it has ceased to be spirit. Therefore, I maintain, we are only deluding ourselves when we wrest language from its usage for the purpose of supporting theories of spirit.

As a final word, then, what is it that has so long deluded humanity as spirit? I offer the following as an easy and natural solution of the secret: Spirit is the personification of sleep-consciousness. It is a subjective creation of mind itself, and has no existence outside of the mind. A mental concept is clothed with individuality, and by a confusion of thought is believed to have an objective reality, while in fact it is nothing more than the unsubstantial stuff that dreams are made of. Thus, for instance, when in my dreams I see the form of one whom I knew and loved in life, I have only to personify my state of sub-consciousness, or sleep-consciousness, and I have before me what to my own mind is a reality; but it is real nowhere else, and is only so to me because I have created it myself. I can never exhibit such a creation to you, for the very good reason that I have nothing to exhibit. That is why the believer in spirits never can show them to you. The spirits thus created, as I have indicated, have no objectivity. They are not a factor in any state of consciousness in which your minds on the one hand, and the external world or universe on the other, are involved. There is nothing to them to waken in us any consciousness of them as objective realities.

If I am correct, it at once becomes plain how the belief in spirits grew and spread so widely in the early history of mankind. If the mind can personify a state of consciousness in one case, it may in ten thousand cases. We see trees and rivers, mountains and oceans, birds and beasts, as well as men, in our dreams. It would be just as philosophical to personify our sleep-consciousness of any or all of these as of our dead friends. Hence, for ages long, people believed in spirits of trees, mountains, rivers, lakes, stones, birds, and beasts, as well as men. The belief in spirit-gods was only the primitive conception of spirit-men, plus the undeveloped intellect of the people. That is to say,—if I can say it without casting any reflection on any one who may now believe in a spirit God,—that is to say, the less men knew about nature, the more they believed about God; the smaller their intellectual development, the larger their idea of God. When I dream of Mr. Roper's gyroscope, I have only to personify my sleep-consciousness and clothe it with my own ignorance of the wonderful phenomena presented by the little machine to produce in myself a positive belief that it is the abode of a spirit gyroscope which controls and directs its motions. Indeed, cheaper affairs than that have been believed in as gods. But, if I were seriously to propose such an explanation of the phenomena of the gyroscope, the class would in all probability, and very justly too, call me a crank. Yet I maintain that such an explanation would be no more wild or unphilosophical than is any and every attempt to explain what we do not know by the assumption—which it always is and must be—of the existence of spirits, either of gods or men or devils. We have neither intellectual nor moral right to put forward an assumption as a fact. It is deceitful and dishonest, and is an act that all intellectually honest men should scorn. No man is fit to be a leader of public thought who, through fear of public opinion, panders to the long-existing belief in spirits by putting forward the assumption of their existence as the fact of their existence. Among evil things, I see none more dangerous than the man who preaches assumptions for facts; who teaches his people to believe a lie, because, forsooth, the truth might offend them and curtail his income. Let us have the truth, no matter what cherished belief is dissipated by it. Regarding this subject, the truth compels me to accept the conclusion that all belief in spirit is self-delusion. Until we can have spirit produced in court, in form palpable beyond the possibility of collusion between impostors, we have no proof of its existence, and are logically debarred from believing in it. But the moment it is so produced it ceases to be spirit, and we have matter before us. So we cannot believe in it at all. But, if we cannot believe in spirit, what have we left that is worthy of our sincerest belief, trust, and reverence? That question I shall try to answer next Sunday.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FREE RELIGION.

Editors of The Index:—

The change in the title of the paper is an improvement; and it has been, I believe, made very silently, without assigning any reason for it. A good move carries its own reason with it generally. A retiring judge advised his successor to give no reasons for his decisions, because the assigned reasons would probably be more open to criticism than the decisions. Others, however, who do not know, will tell the world what those who do know have not divulged. Thus, the Independent tells us this change is from a desire to be free from religion. I have not been instructed nor consulted on the subject, but what I have to say may suggest a better reason,—that it is perhaps seen that "free" and "religious" are not the most congruous of epithets, an absolutely free religion being no religion at all, a thought in the opposite direction to that suggested by the Independent. That paper sees little or no difference between free religion and freethought, unless it be that the latter is perhaps a little the worse of the two. I propose to show the opposite; and, in the mean while, I cannot help expressing some surprise that what calls itself the Independent, with an insinuation of special significance, should ever decry freethought. What other thought would they have,—enslaved thought? which is certainly the characteristic of much that appears in the conventional organs.

The very word "religion" precludes entire and absolute freedom. It implies something binding, the solemnity of a contract or the sacred obligations of a vow; and it would be just as rational to talk of free duties, optional obligations, and unobligatory debts, as to talk of free religion, except as the term "free" is used in a special and modified sense, because religion is nothing, if not binding.

We should reach religion by freethought, and by freethought should we cherish religion; and so different are these two that the freedom is transmuted into obligation as soon as religion is reached. It is true that Jesus and others often describe religion as freedom; but they also describe it as a yoke, voluntarily worn, and in that sense free. It is also properly described in the light of freedom, so far as it helps to victory over bad passions, oppressive fear, despondency, or any moral evil. And, so far as we become in feeling and disposition and habit conformed to the acknowledged moral obligations which may be involved in our religion, we become free and happy in the practice; and our spiritual freedom from the dominion of baser and opposing forces is thus secured.

Whatever be our religion, it should be alternately effect and cause of freethought.

Of course, some may confound freedom with lawlessness, relative to both thought and religion. What of that? A great truth is not nullified because of its occasional misapprehension or perversion. The wise and the good and those who are struggling so to be cannot be deprived of their grand inheritance, because a portion of their goods have been stolen and directed to base uses. The Promethean gift of fire was a great benison to mankind, notwithstanding the evil it has sometimes wrought with or without the malevolent direction of man.

A religion born of freethought will foster freethought, and will therefore accord to others the supreme right which it claims and exercises for itself. It will therefore sacredly abstain from every degree and form of coercion relative to religion. It will not introduce any form of religion into the public schools against the protest of a respectable minority of the people. If it introduces the Bible or any other book, it must be as literature, not as religion. In that light, the Bible is on the same footing with all other books, and there it should stand. Neither will such a religion tax others, and force them to support religious institutions in which they have no faith, and which, perhaps, they deem not only erroneous, but injurious. Christians of this mental and moral fibre would say as one man, Let church property be regularly and duly taxed according to its market value, just like other property. The plea that it is a donation for the public good, and surely promotes that good, is illogical. Every religionist of every type, down to the fetich worshipper, will claim that for his peculiar institution. Besides, a purely moral movement can be promoted only by a moral spirit and agency acting and manifest; and that would be incomparably more conspicuous and effective if, by greater self-denial, we paid the taxes ourselves instead of extorting them in part from unbelievers. And even if, as a consequence, we had less property, we should have vastly more of that which is said to be "the end of the commandment,—charity out of a pure heart"; and our moral influence would be of corresponding proportions.

I think I ought to add that such a religion as this will not refuse to recognize any true and noble sentiments well expressed, because they have been formulated by others. Songs which have been sung in other camps are not thereby tainted and disqualified for use in the church of true Liberals, provided the songs are true and liberal. And what can be more so than some of the hymns in common use in the Christian Church? Take, as an example, the noble verse of Watts:—

"My God! the spring of all my joys,
The life of my delight,
The glory of my brightest days,
And comfort of my nights."

God, whatever else he be, should be all this to the believer,—must be this, if he is really and thoroughly believed in, whether we conceive him as personal or impersonal, intramundane or extramundane. All such songs are the property of Liberalism, which covers Christianity as well as all other forms of earnest thought and sentiment. WM. I. GILL.

LIFE IN AN ENGLISH VILLAGE.

Editors of The Index :—

About two-thirds of our population are Wesleyans; comprising a large majority of the agricultural laborers and their families, some of the artisans and shopkeepers, and one small farmer, who, however, owns his land, and therefore has no direct interest in propitiating his territorial superiors. But, like many of his co-religionists, he is a very mild, not to say spiritless, person. As has been remarked, in England you can tell a dissenter by his manners, which suggests a latent consciousness of social stigma, scarcely beginning, even now, to be removed. He knows that his non-conformity exposes him to the suspicion of inferiority of caste. The Orthodox worshipper or merely acquiescent is "more respectable." Moreover, the national Church has all the advantages of power, positions, and title, and never concedes the least of these to her rivals until compelled. There was something ludicrous in the eagerness with which the Wesleyans jumped at the poor privilege of using the prefix "Reverend" upon a tombstone, when, after due litigation, a few years ago, it was decided that the Anglican clergy had no right to the monopoly of the word.

So our chapel folks do not rank highly in the social scale, though some of them are well-to-do in the world. I think the small farmer above mentioned and an aspiring young master-butcher might claim to be their head men. The first has a non-resident elder brother who used to preach: the second has tried at it, but without success, and now confines his efforts to prayer-meetings, Bible-classes, and occasional exhortations. These are pretty frequent in our village, the lighted windows of the chapel often intimating that something is going on within on working-day evenings besides the regular Sunday performances.

It is a smallish building, like a toy Noah's ark, approached by a gate (kept locked on ordinary occasions) and a straight gravel-path, between flower-beds, sloping upwards to closing walls. The lowering of one of these, by the way, abutting on a vegetable garden, owned by one of our small gentry, provoked him into compelling its re-erection, under threat of a law-suit, which ungenerous proceeding was generally attributed less to his jealous concern for his own privacy than ill-will to his non-conformist neighbors. The facts that he waited until the wall had been finished and neatly capped with stone before raising any objection, and notoriously disliked the singing of the chapel folks (which could be heard as distinctly in the manor house as if it proceeded from his lawn), seemed to justify this opinion. Mr. — came of clerical lineage, and, like most of his class, always stood by the Church, though he had repeated quarrels with our late Vicar's wife on the question of social precedence, in which his irritability and persistence sometimes gave him the victory.

Without sharing his Orthodox prejudices, I must say that I do not admire the Wesleyan psalmody. It is characterized by that "fondness for minor keys and wailing cadences" which Dr. Holmes has remarked as "common to the monotonous chants of cannibals and savages generally, to such war-songs as the wild, implacable 'Marseillaise,' and to the favorite tunes of low-spirited Christian pessimists." To an imaginative temperament, it conveys a sense of misery and latent fanaticism, which is at once deplorable and hateful. I could fancy some such tones lamenting a lost soul, or attempting in vain to propitiate the wrath of an omnipotent Moloch. One voice, shrill, dissonant, and feminine, is especially prominent: it soars above all the others, like the cry of some bird of evil omen among a flock of less inharmonious fowl, seemingly dragging the rest after it. For upwards of forty years, the walls of that chapel have vibrated to that voice. It proceeds from a woman who has not the best of reputations in our village for the so-called Christian virtues, and who, indeed, is said to have grudged bread to her poor old father during his decadence and dependence on her.

But I must not wholly disparage the Methodists' singing. They have recently adopted some of Moody and Sankey's melodies, which, though they appeal to no higher feelings than the emotional and dramatic, are never dismal, and generally a great improvement on the old style of hymn. These are trolled forth with much fervor, especially by the younger part of the congregation, and latterly to the accompaniment of a harmonium, played by a self-taught laborer. Listening to them, at a judicious distance, I sometimes think that these poor folks let off a great deal through this medium, which would be perilous stuff to retain. Their lives are so hard that, lacking this poor relief, they might despair. It is at once an indulgence and an inspiration. The mischief is that it diverts effort to a quarter in which we can accomplish nothing, and keeps up the old lie that this world is a predestined vale of tears and the ante-chamber to one incomparably worse, from which we can only escape by the ridiculous doctrine of "imputed merit."

Of course, this belief is the burden of the prayers and sermons delivered in the chapel, all of which are extemporaneous, as among Wesleyans in America. Inevitably, these performances vary in style and merit (or want of it) with the individual officiating. Sometimes the discourses are dogmatic and sectarian, sometimes evangelical or practical, often commonplace and uninteresting. On one occasion, I heard as kindly and human a sermon from an ex-mayor of Banbury as could be desired,—delivered, too, with an absence of all pretension, beyond that of a man speaking to men, which was simply admirable; but I am sorry to say this was altogether exceptional. Too frequently, the preaching is of the poorest character. The only palliative trait that can be conceded to it is that it may be well-intentioned; and oftentimes the obvious conceit or vanity of the holder-forth forbids even this faint praise. Indeed, the average is every way so inferior to that which obtains in the United States that any comparison is out of the question.

Some of the sermons have very much the air of mechanical performances, as if they had been learned by rote, or were, as is equally probable, the result of involuntary imitation. Some are mere declamation, —Methodistical monologues, any portion of which might be transposed without much damage to the context. Others are Little Bethel, crude and rampant; theology served up raw, without garnish of brains; unclarified divinity; words, words, words; cheap settings-forth of the old, stale supernaturalism, promulgated with all the complacency of ignorance, as if it were instead of undermined and honey-combed throughout by science and intelligent scepticism, of which the pulpiteer evidently knows no more than a mediæval monk; a stringing together of glib phrases, so hackneyed that they have entirely lost their "bite" on the mind, and which one endures rather than listens to; dilution of Scripture, ladled out with a fatal facility, suggestive of hopeless mediocrity of intellect; otherworldliness; religion presented as so much self-seeking,—the paramount doctrine of self-preservation; sound and seeming, signifying nothing; a barren obtrusion of the letter of Christianity, and an ostentatious proclamation of some of its tenets, but an ignorance of its better spirit,—the only thing that makes it endurable; denunciations of this poor, old, kindly, beautiful world, and impossible nonsense about the next; a general assumption that we can only be conured into an utterly stupid and insufferable heaven by belief and "blood," the merits of which dispense with all others, nay, render them impious,—in short, the old style of thing, anachronistically administered.

Not a few of the preachers enliven their discourses with anecdotes, though of rather a trite character. More have a good deal to say about hell and the devil, which grisly superstitions are by no means exploded among average religionists in England. The clergy of the national Church, indeed, rarely allude to them, and then only in vague and general terms, as if the personality of the latter were a sort of official formula, like the late John Doe and Richard Roe among the lawyers, and the introduction of the former in bad taste. We are to suppose that they believe in both, as integral, essential parts of Christianity, but do not care to exploit such horrors. Your non-conformist, however, is much more plain-spoken, and thinks, with the late Bishop Wilberforce, that fear is the most potent agent in conversion. Hence, he trots out "Old Splitfoot," as Lowell calls him, pretty frequently, and describes his proper habitation after the atrocious Calvinistic style which culminated in Jonathan Edwards. It is crudely done, of course, but too commonly has its deplorable effect upon weak-minded and ignorant persons, especially women. Spurgeon's early diabolisms are known to have crazed a wretched creature, who went about London streets raving that she was damned; and two similar instances have occurred in this village. In one, the daughter of a small tailor (an occasional preacher) insisted on wallowing in ashes and covering herself with a sack, in token of her despair and abasement. In another (quite a recent case), the wife of a worthy laborer has become a confirmed invalid and hopeless hypochondriac, solely from such teaching.

I think, nevertheless, that most of our chapel folks are the better for their religion, inasmuch as it generally deters them from the grosser vices to which the poor are supposed to be peculiarly liable. You shall find scarcely any drunkards among them, while wife-beating and adultery are all but unknown. Incontinence is common enough in early life, and there are families in which bastardy is hereditary; but, on the whole, we have a decent population. I know simple, kindly Methodists who make the very best of their narrow creed and hard lives, and are in all respects unexceptionable, almost realizing Carlyle's affecting picture of a peasant saint in Sartor Resartus. But such persons are, inevitably, very rare; and their average fellow-worshippers certainly merit no such high encomium. They have, in fact, characteristics in which they exhibit no sort of moral superiority to the worldly-minded, and which it is difficult to avoid attributing to a religion which makes so much of faith and so little of good works, inculcating the latter merely as a corollary and supplement.

Thus, speciousness, eye-service, small dishonesty, overreaching, conceit, quarrelsomeness, backbiting, and an intolerable desire to pry into the affairs of others and to interfere therein, are, I regret to say, but too common. The standard of conduct is not high, the practice altogether incommensurate with the profession. Without asserting that our chapel folks are meaner persons than others in the ordinary affairs of life, I must yet insist that they exhibit a notable regard for their own interests,—suggestive, indeed, of Leigh Hunt's remark that they want a snug kennel in this world as well as the next. It took me over half a dozen years of persistent antagonism to get the tickets of the young master-butcher, before mentioned, into harmony with the true weight of the meat sent to the house. And we once had a servant-girl, a great chapel-goer and regular attendant at class-meetings, who was an incorrigible sluggard and liar; while her equally devout sister shammed sickness in order to avoid work, and lost her situation in consequence of repeated thefts.

I have devoted so much space to the Wesleyans that I shall have to finish my account of our village in another letter. And then, if you please, I will speak of some other aspects of life in rural England.

THE REVOLT AGAINST COMPULSORY VACCINATION IN ENGLAND.

Editors of The Index:—

The recent conference of the London Society for the Abolition of Compulsory Vaccination has given a further impulse to the now irrepressible agitation for the repeal of all compulsory vaccination legislation. The chair was taken by Mr. J. Passmore Edwards, member of Parliament for Salisbury, and proprietor of the Echo and other well-known journals, who denounced the tyranny of the laws which subjected parents to repeated fines and imprisonment for their non-compliance to what they believed to be a mischievous medical infliction. There was a large attendance of medical men, sanitarians, members of Boards of Guardians, and others interested in questions relating to the public health, among whom were Dr. Clark, Dr. C. T. Pearce, Dr. Edward Haughton, Dr. D. Jones, Dr. C. R. Drysdale, F.R.C.S.; Mr. W. J. Collins, M.B., M.R.C.S.; Dr. Thomas Nichols, Dr. Renner, Mr. Alderman Rees (Chairman of the Dover Board of Guardians); Mr. Zadok M. Spear, of Philadelphia, U.S.A.; Mr. Alex. Wheeler, of Darlington; Mr. T. Martin, of Lewes; Mr. Robert Blackie, of Liverpool; Dr. Alice Vickery, and other lady doctors; Mr. Mozley barrister at law; Mr. W. Tebb, Mr. William White, Mr. Cornelius Pearson, and many others. Dr. Drysdale read an interesting paper on the origin of Vaccinia, and the progress of animal vaccination, which was followed by an animated discussion. Mr. William Tebb furnished some important details relating to the progress of the movement against compulsory vaccination, both in England and on the Continent; upwards of a quarter of a million tracts and publications had been published and circulated by the London Society alone during the past twelve months, new Anti-Vaccination Leagues and Societies had been formed and old ones revived. An able article in the Journal of Science for November, entitled "The Vaccination Question reconsidered," showed that recent Parliamentary and other official documents demonstrate the inutility of vaccination as a preventive, and its deleterious effects on the public health, which facts could not be much longer concealed by the leaders of the pro-vaccinating party. The International Anti-Vaccination Congress, held in Paris last year, had been the means of intensifying the opposition, and awakening public attention to the subject to a large degree. Deputations of the delegates had been granted audiences with M. Tirard, the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, also with M. Constans, the Minister of the Interior; and the main facts against vaccination laid before them had led to the rejection of M. Liouville's bill for making vaccination and revaccination compulsory in France. The International Congress recently held at Cologne, at which eight nationalities were presented by forty delegates, would, he (Mr. Tebb) ventured to hope, precipitate the repeal of the Vaccination Acts in Germany, the opposition to which was gaining ground every day. After the termination of the conference proceedings, Mr. Alexander Wheeler proposed the following resolution:—

That in view of the confusion of opinion which prevails among medical authorities, when the subject of vaccination is discussed, it is unwise, impolitic, and unjust to enforce it; that such enforcement retards all improvement in the treatment, and all discoveries for the prevention, of small-pox; and that all compulsory legislation with regard to vaccination ought to be repealed.

This was seconded by Dr. Haughton, and carried amid applause, with only two or three dissentients in an overflowing assembly.

Yours faithfully,
WILLIAM YOUNG.

OBJECTIONS TO THE KANTIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Editors of The Index:—

I have been considerably interested in Professor Adler's discourse on Kant. I had known something of Kant's, Hegel's, and of other German philosophers' theories in a general way; but I was surprised to learn that any one of them was accepted as a whole by the leading scientific men of our day. If Kant's thoughts are generally accepted by scientific men, it is a strong argument in their favor; but I have always thought that they were chiefly speculative, and that they made man but little less than a nonentity. Nor can I now, after carefully reading Professor Adler's seemingly very plain definition of the Kantian philosophy, make it appear but that I am just what my senses tell me I am, and that the world outside is just what it appears to be. I suppose, as Spiritualists say, it is because I am not "progressed" enough.

There is no doubt that what we do know is but a very small fraction of the whole; but does not that little, notwithstanding its smallness, that small spark of consciousness, prove, if it proves anything, that we are realities. And what we see and hear and feel and reason out by certain fixed rules, does it not prove this rather than the contrary?

It does seem that it would be useless to attempt anything for the human race, in a philanthropic, scientific, or any other manner, unless self were first accepted as a fundamental fact. Without this hypothesis, the wildest of speculative notions would be as sound and worth as much in fact as the mathematical axioms that prove the existence of a universe. We have sometimes considered it difficult to draw the dividing line between a seeming fact drawn by deduction and a hypothesis; but this Kantian theory settles it, or else the subject is beyond my comprehension. Will somebody give us more light on this subject? I am sure that there are other readers of The Index as ignorant as myself.

A CORRECTION.

Editors of The Index:—

In my correspondence of date September 29, I wrote that "a combined effort of the entire ministerial body, including the Unitarian, early in the season endeavored to prevent the running of Sunday excursion trains on the different roads centring here."

This statement was based upon a mistake which I wish now to correct.

The movement regarding Sunday excursion trains was, I have recently learned, promoted only by a few persons. A ministers' meeting was held about the same time, for the purpose of taking steps to "secure the better observance of Sunday." A statement of opinions held in common was adopted and signed by fifty representatives of religious bodies in the city, including all the ministers.

I am pleased to learn that at this meeting the movement to prevent the running of Sunday excursion trains was voted down, and that the Unitarian and two or three other ministers advocated "Sunday excursions and all other wholesome things that might make Sunday more recreative and joyous," and that one Orthodox brother advocated music in public parks, etc., on Sundays.

In the light of these facts, communicated to me during the present week, I sincerely regret that I had not the opportunity to learn the sense of the ministers' meeting; and I cheerfully make this correction.

BOOK NOTICES.

HISTORY OF POLITICAL ECONOMY IN EUROPE. By Jerome Adolphe Blanqui. Professor of Political Economy in the Collège de France, etc. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Jerome Adolphe Blanqui was a worthy successor to J. B. Say. The reader of his History of Political Economy in Europe, which is the most valuable of his many important contributions to economic literature, will hardly fail to be impressed by the discrimination with which, from the vast amount of materials at his command, he has selected the facts indicating the economic forces at work in Europe from the early days of Greece and Rome down to the time when he wrote, and the distinctness with which he sets forth their results. His sense of the industrial, commercial, social, and intellectual needs of modern society, derived from actual contact with men and affairs and travels and observations in connection with commissions to investigate the economic conditions of various European countries, gave him a peculiar fitness for this task. Added to these qualifications, he was a lover of humanity.

Some facts which he records are, so far as we can ascertain, given in no other work in the English language. Besides, his is the only general history of political economy which has been written, though the number of special treatises is almost countless.

The investigator of labor problems will perceive as he follows the course of history, from the time when in the so-called Republic (!) of Athens the masses were slaves and went "to drink with the horses," down to the strikes of the present day, that there has been a constantly renewed struggle for a more equitable distribution of the profits of labor; and he may also learn how the claims of labor have come by degrees to be respected. The protectionist and the free trader will alike read with profit the chapters on Sumptuary Laws and on the Italian Republics, Venice especially, as well as the pages indexed under Commerce and Free Trade. The greenbacker and the hard-money man will alike find something to learn from the chapter on the various monetary systems that have prevailed in Europe, and may even find some new suggestions in the chapter on John Law and his system. To the religious student, the chapters on Christianity and Protestantism will be of interest; and he can hardly fail to be touched by the pathos with which Blanqui laments the decadence of a religion which, he says, "no longer has ministers which rise to the height of its needs and ours." He calls the priests "a caste who persist in living outside of humanity," and who, instead of seizing the opportunity presented of taking the lead in reforms, do not so much as follow. He says, "There are questions of political economy which will remain unsolved until religion shall put her hand to them." Among these, he enumerates prisons, schools, workshops, the relations of nations and of individuals, agriculture, employers, and employed; and, in fact, he considers almost everything within the province of a priest who would bring himself into harmony with the present age. We can see from this how broad a connotation the word "religion" had to him.

The student of social science, besides the interest he will feel in all these questions which concern humanity, will perhaps turn with peculiar pleasure to the account of Quesnay and his school, and the pages which record the social experiments of Fourier, Owen, and Saint-Simon, as well as to the closing pages of the work. Blanqui was an ardent defender of commercial liberty, and also an earnest worker for industrial education.

A copious index has been added by the translator to the American edition of this work, as well as appendix notes. The translation is by Miss Emily J. Leonard who has done her work with marked ability and fidelity.

HECTOR. A Story. By Flora L. Shaw, author of Castle Blair. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881.

The author's Castle Blair had the advantage of being heralded by John Ruskin, his trumpet giving no uncertain sound. But Hector has a better recommendation in the success of Castle Blair, which more than justified the promise of Ruskin. Hector has one advantage over its predecessor: it is a much more cheerful book. More gracefully written it is not, and could hardly be. It is the story of a boy and girl who take it upon themselves to save a young woman from a repulsive marriage, and unite her to her own true love. In the course of their endeavor, they encounter various haps and mishaps; but all things come at length to a happy conclusion.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE.—The November number opens with an interesting account of the free cities in the Middle Ages. Few of our readers are probably aware how fully tolerated the Jews were in Cologne, Frankfurt, Augsburg, Vienna, and Prague during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, or how much resistance was then offered, not only in these cities, but in those of Flanders, to the attempts of the Church to enrich herself and escape paying taxes, or how complete was the equality of priest, noble, and mechanic, under the burghers' laws. Those who would study the history of liberty will learn much from the books recommended in this article: Stubbs' Constitutional History of England, Vanderkinder's Le Siècle des Artevelde, Lévassieur's Histoire des Classes Ouvrières en France, Otto Gierke's Rechtsgeschichte der deutschen Genossenschaft, and Von Maurer's Geschichte der Städteverfassung. We have also another article of the series on education, and the first number of "Les Frasnques de Majesté," a story of the adventures of a timid, imaginative orphan boy, whose father had been a painter, and whose aunt, a matter-of-fact woman who has set her heart on making a success of her lazy husband's soap-works, is trying to turn him into a man of business. There is also a minute account of the trial and execution at Louvain, in 1543, of several Protestants, two of whom bore the euphonious name of Sclerckx, and a spirited description of the British fox-hunters, whose number is estimated at more than twenty thousand.

POETRY.

For The Index.

FAREWELL TO THE YEAR.

Good-by, Old Year, good-by!
Others may hasten to unbar the door
And let the infant that succeeds come in.
I'll not oppose his entrance, and will give Him kindly greeting; but I cannot haste
To turn my back upon old friends, and bid
Them to depart, in welcoming of new.
And one, at least, will make you kind adieu
(For go you must), and one will close your eyes
With tender love and hearty sorrow. She shall kiss
Your poor dead brow, and see you laid
With quiet ceremony 'neath the snows,—
The well-befitting place for your repose,
Who art as pure, in all intent, as they.

Good-by, Old Year, good-by!
Thou'st been a true and faithful friend to me.
But little joy thy predecessors brought,— Thy later predecessors,—though the years of old
Were very bright to me; nor could I deem How much of anguish they might crowd within Their circling round, if so they were instruct (For ye are but the servants of the gods,
And do their high behest). But now I know it well;
For they have proved their terrible strength to me.

D'ye mind when first ye came,
As comes this infant, in an hour's time,
And takes his elder's place as ye did then?
You read me well, old friend. You never smiled
When others did, who, viewing, thought they gazed
Into a paradise. You saw much lack of joy;
And so you never smiled when others did,
Nor even when I did myself. I almost think I've seen a tear drop from your tender eye
When that I tried to hide my heartache dire
With outside seeming. And so for all this love
I thank thee well, Old Year, and ne'er forget.

Good-by, Old Year, good-by!
Eleven by stroke of clock, and but one hour
Remains thy lease of life. Yet go not forth Until I thank thee more than all beside
For thy great boon, maternity, bestowed
Upon my lonely life. O year of all the years,
Thou shalt not go unhonored to thy grave
Without one real mourner; for thou brought me this,
A priceless gift, and one I treasure well,—
My prattling baby, with his clear blue eye,
His pleasant smile, and merry little ways,
That bid me throw despairings to the winds,
And live for love of him, and care of him,
And hope for future care returned to me.
So by thee I have gained me heart to hope,
And wisdom by thy teachings,—how made glad!
I reverently bid thee sad farewell,—
Breathe out thy latest breath upon my breast.
I lay my child aside to succor thee
In this thy last extremity. So, tenderly,—
"I lay me down to sleep,"—

The Year is dead!

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JUSTICE GRAY will take his seat on the United States Supreme Bench the second Monday in January.

MR. W. F. JAMIESON writes us that he is lecturing in Michigan, and that his present address is Albion, Mich.

B. F. UNDERWOOD's deferred lecture before the Chicago Philosophical Society will be given on the evening of January 14.

GRANT's chaplain, Rev. Dr. Newman, has deserted the Methodists, and taken the pastorate of the Congregational church which Hepworth left.

A SON of Smith O'Brien, the Agitator of '48, was fired at, but without result, while returning from valuing farms at Glandore, County Cork.

PRINCE LEOPOLD will get some distinguished relatives, if he marries the Princess Helena of Waldeck. Her sister is Queen of the Netherlands and her aunt the Queen of Sweden.

JOHN MORLEY says that classical training is more aptly calculated to destroy the qualities of good writing and fine speaking than any other system that could have been conceived.

REV. LEONARD BACON, D.D., LL.D., died suddenly at his residence in New Haven, Conn., last Saturday, in his eightieth year. On his table was found an unfinished article on the "Utah Problem."

REV. C. W. HAMILTON, in a sermon at Salem, N.B., explained that the assassination of Garfield was ordered by God as a punishment of the nation, because of the popular and semi-official reception of Parnell in this country.

THE Nation says in regard to Mr. Blaine, "He has succeeded in making the country see good reason for congratulation that the work his ambitious brilliancy has accumulated for his successor will be disposed of by men of less dash and more good sense."

MR. C. D. B. MILLS delivered a thoughtful and scholarly discourse at the Parker Memorial last Sunday morning. Mr. Mills lectured at Concord last Tuesday evening. He will speak at Longwood, Pa., next Sunday, and at Rochester, N.Y., January 13.

MRS. JULIAN HAWTHORNE is described as "a brunette, with a fine carriage, a grave, noble face that had in it a look of power and resolution which was unusual. . . . Her articles on art and London literary topics in Harper's Bazar have made her very generally known in America."

LADY DUFFUS HARDY, who has been recently "doing" the United States, expresses her pleased surprise at the uniform deference and attention paid to women by the average male American, and especially his chivalrous care for any woman travelling alone, no matter how old, homely, or humble in appearance she may be.

THE late George Borrow, the historian of the gypsy tribes, was often subject to fits of nervous depression, resulting from his too close application to study. "What do you think I do," he said to a friend, "when I get bewildered after this fashion? I go out to the sty, and listen to the grunting of the pigs till I get back to myself."

MRS. ROSE HAWTHORNE LATHROP, daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne and authoress of some little fame, has been recently in Boston. Nora Perry says, "She is a blonde, with light, red-tinted auburn hair and eyebrows, a warm red and white complexion, and the most delightful look of unconsciousness when she smiles and speaks."

REV. J. L. BENEDICT advertises that he is "an evangelist, successful in revival meetings and gospel tent work," and is "open for engagements on terms within the reach of any church anxious for the salvation of souls." Think of it! How many souls may be lost, if you neglect to send for this Benedict, "who moves the arm that moves the world!"

DICKENS was a painstaking and industrious writer. One who was admitted to his private friendship says of him: "He wrote, it seemed to me, almost in anguish. I looked in his face, and watched the anxiety and care, I saw the blotting and rewriting of the work, and was astonished to find how much he owed to his indomitable perseverance."

NORA PERRY describes Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt, whom she met recently at the Parker House in this city, as "the embodiment of her poems. She has a refined, sensitive face, capable of expressing every variation of feeling; in figure, slight, of medium height, and conveying in her whole personality the woman by an element which is so largely maternal in her poems."

THE law office of Judah P. Benjamin in London is a shabby back room, furnished with two chairs, a table, a few musty law books, and an army of ink-bottles. His clerk's room adjoining, though plain, is furnished with princely splendor in comparison with the den of the great barrister, queen's counsel, and one of the wealthiest practitioners in England. He gives away great sums in charity, while his personal expenses are almost nothing.

MISS ALICE ILGENFRITZ, in an address on journalism to the Fourth Iowa Press Association, published in the Burlington Hawkeye, says that the neglect of literary finish is the great fault of American newspapers. The following amazing passage occurs in the address. "I am thankful for the iconoclastic spades which are rooting up old saws that have become stripped of all significance, like Cleopatra's Needle, by being removed from their natural surroundings."

MARIE COLOMBIER, an actress who accompanied Sarah Bernhardt during her American tour, and who might be expected to echo the sentiments of her more famous companion, has written a book since her return to France, describing that tour in a manner not very favorable to America, Americans in general, or American theatrical artists in particular. A rather ungrateful return for the favor the company and chief actress met with here, and the attentions bestowed upon them.

ACCORDING to a London paper, this year, as last year, and through many that went before, Mr. Gladstone prefaced his arrival at Hawarden Castle by the despatch of a large box containing books he had picked up during the session at book-stalls and in second-hand book-shops. There is an unpretending-looking shop in the narrow thoroughfare in the Strand which the tenants like to call Booksellers' Row, where he is a constant customer. He bought here, among other things, a second-hand copy of Lothair.

SOME interviewer has had the honor to be introduced to the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and glowingly describes her after this fashion, "A tall, graceful lady, dressed in a soft twilled silk, with delicately shaded flowers sprinkled over its white ground. . . . Over her brown hair, in which no gray was visible, was a tiny bonnet of white lace and lilac ribbon. . . . Her manner is easy, unpretentious, and unassuming as a child's. . . . She has a refined face, with a slightly visionary expression, combined with a look of aristocratic breeding and culture."

PUBLISHED AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.,

By a Board of Seven Trustees, who are nominated by the Free Religious Association and incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. THE Boston Herald says: "Canada spends seven dollars for liquor to one for religion, but her people console themselves with the thought that they drink only about one-fourth as much per capita as their ancestors."

THE Mormons object to the use of the word polygamy in reference to their system of plural wives. "Celestial marriage" they assure the gentile public is the proper phrase. But it is the thing rather than the name that is offensive to the people of this country.

LAST summer, the city of Venice granted to a French company the right of running small steamers from one point to another within the limits of the city; and, in spite of the protests of Venetian noblemen living in palaces on the Grand Canal and the strike of the gondoliers, the gondolas, so long associated with poetry and song, must give place to the swift-moving steamers which science has invented, which the interests of civilization demand, and to which the romance of the future must accommodate itself.

THE Japanese are getting ahead of Christians in worldly—no, heavenly—wisdom. Alarmed at the spread of Christianity in their country, they are forming societies to loan money to all persons desirous of going into business, one of the conditions of such loans being that the borrowers must be of the Buddhist faith. This plan not only keeps needy souls in the way they were taught to go, but acts as a sort of premium to invite others back. It is a more effectual method of conversion than Sunday-school chromos.

"WILD roves the Indian girl" will soon become a mere figure of speech. Here is "Bright Eyes" married to the white philanthropist, Tibbles, and Sarah Winnemucca, an educated Piute princess, married to L. H. Hopkins, a white sub-agent on her father's reservation. And it is remarkable how easily these whilom savages take to civilized ways; for "Bright Eyes" has already given several lectures and contributed to our leading magazines, while Princess Sarah Winnemucca Hopkins, so the daily papers report, is "coming East to lecture." The lecturing mania is likely to have a revival, if we are to be refreshed in one season by the "talk" of a native American squaw and the prate of Oscar, Britannia's polished aesthete.

THAT the "Civil Rights Bill" in some of its provisions is not yet accepted in all the States, we are admonished by various little happenings here and there. Among the most recent of these is the action of some white people at St. Louis, Mo., who insisted upon the removal of Mr. Rutor,—a light-colored mulatto, a highly respected gentleman, and principal of one of the city schools,—with his wife, from the parquet seats he had paid for in a fashionable theatre, on the ground that the rules of the theatre only admit negroes to seats in the family circle. Mr. Rutor maintained his right to his seat, and refused to leave, upon which he and his wife were rudely hustled into the street. He now proposes to do as any other wronged citizen would,—appeal to the law for redress; and every lover of justice will hope to see him win the case.

IN a reply to the statement of a writer in the New York Evening Post, that the articles published in the Popular Science Monthly are pronounced in their atheistical tendencies, the editor of this magazine observes: "We were once accosted by an inquisitive Irishman thus: 'D'ye b'lieve in the mother o' God?' 'No.' 'Be gorry y'er an atheist: I wouldn't be in yer boots for twenty pound.' Was that a satisfactory basis of classification? Prof. Huxley had a cook who got on a drunken spree, and made such a row in the house that the police were called. As she was hustled through the yard, she sent back a blast, of which all that could be heard was an emphatic 'damn atheist.' Is Prof. Huxley therefore to be ranked as a 'pronounced atheist'? But, if a drunken cook is not an authority on this point, is a sober bigot any better?"

DR. THOMAS, referring to the theatres of Chicago, says that "all save one are open every Sunday evening"; and Prof. Swing declares in the Alliance, that, at the representation of one of the plays in that city, "four-fifths of those present were members of church congregations," and that "the play was written by a Presbyterian, put on the stage by a Presbyterian, and quite a number of Presbyterians came from Monmouth, Ill., to see the play written by one of their own psalm-singers." "This," says the Presbyterian, "was surely enough to give the play a decided Presbyterian flavor, but did this make the Chicago theatre a good thing?" Certainly not. A theatre with "a decided Presbyterian flavor" cannot be "a good thing." However, a play may be written, put on the stage, and attended by "Presbyterians," in the city of Chicago, and yet have no "Presbyterian flavor," and therefore may be a very "good thing."

JUDGE HILTON, the chosen friend and executor of the will of A. T. Stewart, does not seem to win golden opinions for his actions since he accepted that trust. His vain attempt to exclude the Jews from Saratoga hotels, and so ostracize them from society, only served to alienate the Jewish trade from Stewart's stores, and to give him an unenviable fame among all classes of honorable people. His blundering rendering of Stewart's expressed design in the much heralded women's hotel, which by his action was made a complete failure for the purpose for which it was intended by Stewart, and lastly his hard course in regard to clerks and employes of the branch store of A. T. Stewart, recently established in Chicago, which resulted last week in a general desertion of the establishment by about eighty of those employed there, with an expressed determination not to work longer for him, have given Judge Hilton a notoriety which will do him no good service in future ventures.

THE Boston Herald notes the fact that it took a hundred and seventy wagons daily of Adams' Express Company to deliver in New York the goods intrusted to its care during the week before Christmas, and remarks that this "looks like a magnificent practical application of Christianity to life, and ought to offset Prof. Adler's idea that Christianity concerns itself so much with the life beyond the grave as to hinder a thorough interest in the life that now is." The wealth and prosperity of the country and the interest in worldly matters indicated by the heavy demands on Adams' Express Company are not very good illustrations of that religion which condemns wealth, enjoins poverty as a virtue, and directs the chief attention of its adherents not to this life, but to another. The reference of the Herald shows not the strength, but the weakness, of the Christianity which "concerns itself so much with the life beyond the grave," which is the Christianity of the New Testament and that which Prof. Adler criticised.

THE Evening Star of this city sent a reporter recently to investigate the new régime at the Westboro' Reform School, and the report he gives is very favorable to the methods of the new Superintendent, Mr. Allen. Since he took charge of the school in October last, he has inaugurated a number of changes for the improvement of those under his care. He has introduced a new system of employment for the best boys, in getting them places in families outside of the institution, where they can be treated as members of the family, so long as they prove well-behaved and trustworthy. Mr. Allen has found it to his advantage in his work to show his charges that he has a certain amount of confidence in their honor, and that he has a genuine interest in each boy's welfare. The subdivision of the school into family groups is seriously contemplated, as it is believed such a method will be better adapted to the true reform of the pupils than the present practice of huddling them all under one roof. It is conceded by all that Mr. Allen is "the right man in the right place."

THEISM AND SPENCERISM.

Were the question asked, Is mind manifested in the order of the universe? I should, for my own part, answer it in the affirmative without hesitation. But to answer it thus, though a preliminary step toward theism, does by no means suffice to constitute one a theist. Mind is manifested in the tricks of knaves, in the arts of poisoners, the composition of infernal machines, and in much else that does not seem to be altogether of a divine nature. It must further be asked, Is that mind God? Do we see in it the fulness of divine attributes, omnipotence guided by omniscience and inspired by infinite goodness? Is it such that one should look up to it with adoring love, and repose in it a boundless trust? Does it comprehend the universe in a design which makes every part and fact of the world-process, however fearful or woful in its immediate aspect, a means toward the realization of divine and perfect ends? He is a theist who to these questions can answer with clear affirmation. Happy man, whatever be his lot in life!

But to answer thus is to assert, if not the old doctrine of final causes, at least a teleological constitution of the universe: it is to say that every movement in the whole world-process has its final explanation, not merely in the existence of a certain force, but, over and above this, in a beneficent and all-comprehending intent, immanent in the order of the world, focussing it always upon perfect ends, and leading it surely to their attainment. If there be no such arrangement, theism is but a futile opinion: if it be on all hands acknowledged that there is none such, a profession of theism is absurd. For who will say that the world, considered only in its bare, immediate actuality, is the perfect realization of a divinely perfect thought or the perfect manifestation of a mind all-powerful, all-wise, and all-good? The world has indeed its grandeurs and splendors, but what savageries, what horrors, are these to put in the balance against them? It has a phenomenal order, which one must regard with wonder and admiration; but this order takes its course over birth-beds and death-beds, over festivals and battle-fields, over all that there may be of human weal, and all that, alas! there must be of human woe, indifferent alike to both. Out of it come growing States and mounting cultures, and out of it the wreck of republics and the ruin of civilizations. Under the sway of this order, a Spanish Inquisition pointed the way to heaven, and a pious Alva could boast, on leaving the Netherlands, that during his administration he had gloriously served God by putting thirty thousand heretics to a cruel death. A beautiful and admirable order; but do you see in it perfect love, infinite tenderness, wielding omnipotent power? Perhaps you do, or believe that you do. This is not the end, you say. What we behold is but one moment of a process by which results are wrought out worthy of a God and worth their cost. The process is, in part, fearful, but only as a means to work out a more exceeding weight of glory. He who can say this with an assured heart is a theist, whether or not conscious of believing in God. But to say this is to assert a teleological order of the universe, which its phenomenal order subserves. All progress, designed or implied essentially in a certain constitution of things, is teleological. It looks toward an end which is the true raison d'être of the system. If, in the constitution of the world, there be no such design; if, in the immense process of evolution, no, beneficent intent fulfils itself through incomputable periods of time, we can still see in the universe a manifestation of mind, but most surely not the manifestation of a divine mind. In short, theism and teleology stand or fall together.

Can one, now, consistently profess himself a theist, while holding to the philosophy of Herbert Spencer? One who believes in a supernatural revelation may perhaps do so; but the case is different with those who do not admit the fact of such a revelation, but derive their belief from natural sources of knowledge only. Spencer rejects teleology with a degree of disdain, and boasts that his "law of evolution" is free from every teleological—that is, from every theistic—taint. Accordingly, he is careful to explain early that evolution is not progress, but another matter quite. Progress, he says, is teleological, as indeed it is. Evolution is only a movement of a certain definable sort. Progress looks toward ends that answer to the hope and aspiration of humanity, and implies a beneficent design in the constitution of forces: evolution has results; but its result, according to Mr. Spencer, is only an ever-increasing heterogeneity, accompanied with specific integrations or diminutions of heterogeneity. Now, heterogeneity is not a word especially dear to the human heart; nor is there any reason why it should be dear. A heap of miscellaneous rubbish is heterogeneous: a hubbub of discordant noises is heterogeneous. Heterogeneity has no moral value, nor necessarily a value of any sort. It is not an object of desire: no man ever died rejoicing in the hope of immortal heterogeneity, and none ever lived and labored to procure heterogeneity for himself or others. But Mr. Spencer values his law the more for the very reason that to the heart and hope of man it has no value. Because it is indifferent to human welfare and neutral with respect to good and evil, he regards it with the greater complacency, and prides himself the more upon having made a truly and purely scientific discovery.

But, leaving this matter aside, let us attend to Mr. Spencer's theory of knowledge, its sources and limits. Here, however, the reader should receive a caution. I was never so familiar with Mr. Spencer's writings as with those of his metaphysical congener, J. S. Mill; and being now unable to consult his books, or any books, with my own eyes, I can speak only from recollection of a somewhat distant reading, confined for the most part to his First Principles. But, having made this acknowledgment, I shall in what follows state the fact as it stands in my mind, not encumbering the statement at every step with if and perhaps. Spencer, then, holds that we know at bottom only our own sensations. These sensations arise between our own sentient organization, on the one hand, and an unknown outward reality, on the other. But, by a sort of magic, the secret of which lies in our organization as sentient creatures, those sensations are thrown outward, and take to our eyes the seeming of a real world. It is only a phenomenal world, only an appearance, necessarily subsisting to our eyes and apprehension, but having in the last analysis sensation only for its substance. As to this purely phenomenal character of all visible existence, Spencer agrees with Kant, but here the agreement ends. Kant held that there could be no experience, did not the mind itself supply certain forms of apprehension and thought, sensation alone being qualified to furnish no more than the incoherent and shapeless elements or matter of experience. Spencer maintains that those forms or moulds of thought are themselves but transformed sensation, though the transformation does not take place in the life of the individual, but of the race. It follows that not only all the facts which science considers, but equally all the forces or laws it discovers, are resolvable at last into sensations. It follows no less that all human ideas, beliefs, and sentiments are but phenomenal effects, in like manner resolvable into sensations. Further, sensation is itself a phenomenal effect. But this phenomenal effect is the bottom fact of all human knowledge: we can therefore never say what reality underlies either it or its outcome. Reason can indeed go so far as to assure us that what we see and know is phenomenal only, and that some reality is behind it; but this is its utmost stretch. That reality is to us, and must remain, a mere somewhat, indefinable, inconceivable, unimaginable: we can have no knowledge of its character and no ground for any definite belief concerning it.

With such a theory of knowledge, only a pure agnosticism consists. We can conclude neither to theism nor to atheism without transgressing the limits of rational thought. For, if any man knows that the original and ultimate reality is not only mind, but mind infinite and perfect in power, wisdom, righteousness, and goodness, and that it comprehends all phenomenal necessity in another and higher, a divine necessity,—this man knows very much about it, and is in his own person a refutation of Spencer's theory. But one may say that, though he does not know all this, yet he has probable reason to believe it; therefore, that he may consistently be at once a Spencerian and a theist? But can there be a probable reason to believe where there is no knowledge? Have we a ground of rational belief concerning a somewhat which is utterly inaccessible to our faculties? Not unless the name of rational belief may be given to baseless conjecture.

Now, without acceding to this theory of knowledge, which seems to me questionable at more than one point, I am of opinion that Spencer's limits of the knowable are not far from being indeed those of scientific knowledge, strictly so called; and if these are also, as according to the same doctrine they must be, the limits of philosophical thought or of intelligent belief derived from natural sources, let us at once confess that agnosticism, with its conscientious reserves, is the only resort of those who cannot believe in a supernatural revelation. In another paper, I will seek to show how little we may expect from science or the "scientific method" a verification of religious belief.

D. A. WASSON.

PROBABLE NATURE OF LAND-LAW REFORM IN ENGLAND.

It is scarcely necessary to refer to the weak points of the individualistic theory of land ownership. It is sufficient to say that here the supreme claims of the State are somewhat ignored, and the peculiar nature of land as distinguished from every other kind of property is scarcely realized. The question is which method should be adopted by the English people in the reconstruction of their landed system. My reply to this is that the claims of the two theories must be reconciled, as they have substantially been in the recent Irish legislation on this subject. Clearly, the State is paramount over all individuals; and no individual has any right to hold a portion of the earth which he did not create, as against the general welfare of society. And, as an actual matter of fact, society will always assert its right as against individual power of acquisition. There is nothing in law which prevents half a dozen people from acquiring possession of all the land in England; but the people would never permit them to do so. The State has always, in England, as elsewhere, asserted its right to dispose of the land in the last instance. The statute of mortmain and the legislation of Henry VIII. against the monasteries indicate the power of the State. With examples such as these before our eyes, we can scarcely say that land should be sold like a ship. The State would never assert its right to deal with personal property, such as a ship, in the same way that it would deal and has dealt with real estate. And it would not do so, because we can create as many ships as we please, while we cannot create as much land as we please. The true view, therefore, would seem to be that the State must be regarded as a partner with every landholder in the community.

Now, a partner has an equitable claim to a share in the proceeds of a business; and, if this view be a true one, the State must be considered as having a claim on every fragment of real estate in the country. This is not a mere theory, but is historically true. The English State has, as a matter of fact, been the supreme landlord, all others only holding their lands as its tenants. The English sovereign is assumed in law as the owner of all the land in the country; and every landlord is supposed to hold from that sovereign, representing the nation. This claim of the State is now in abeyance, and the most important element in land-law reform will consist in its resumption. Under the feudal arrangements of England in early times, those who held land from the sovereign were bound to render military service to him in exchange for the lands they held. There was thus no absolute ownership, but there was a mutual obligation on the part of the supreme landlord representing the State and his tenants, the feudal barons. Early in the reign of Charles II., however, this state of things came to an end. A Parliament of landlords abolished all the feudal dues and obligations, thus relieving themselves of all military burdens, which they threw on the broad shoulders of the Atlas of the State, the common people, who have continued to bear them ever since. Thus, land-owning in England was exempted from all those rightful obligations which it ought, in justice to the community, to bear. In 1692 a land-tax of four shillings on the pound was established, and in 1789 this was made permanent, but on the valuation of 1692. Now, of course it is precisely during this period that the enormous wealth of England has been developed; and yet, although landlords have been enriched (to quote Dr. Johnson) "beyond the dreams of avarice," they are only paying the paltry rate of the valuation of 1692. Now, in my opinion, the proper readjustment of the land-tax will be the most important reform to be secured. I do not propose that the State should in any way confiscate private property in land, but simply that it should resume its own ancient and undoubted rights in its own interest and for the welfare of the community.

It should do this, because rent is, in reality, created by the public, by the growth of trade, wealth, population, industry, means of locomotion, rather than by the energy of the landlord. To take an instance. The Duke of Bedford owns a very large portion of central London. The territories adjoining the British Museum, Covent Garden Theatre, etc., are all his property. His rents must be enormous; but he is paying no more proportionately to the State (except by income tax) than did his ancestor two hundred years ago. He has not created the wealth and business of this region: indeed, he has rather retarded than helped its development. But nevertheless he receives every year immense sums of money coined by those who reside in and pass through this particular region. Rational reformers do not propose to forcibly deprive him of these great estates; but they think, and think rightly, that one who derives such great wealth from the enterprise of the community should render some corresponding services to the public.

Again, a tax or rent is more easy to ascertain and collect, and more difficult to evade, than any other kind. Trade and industry, too, are the creators of rent and wages; and therefore, if the former increase, it is only right that the latter should increase likewise. This kind of taxation, too, is in harmony with England's free-trade policy, and is only an important continuation of that direct taxation which England began to adopt forty years ago. But the most urgent reason for the adoption of this method is that which bears more directly on the land question. It is admitted by all who understand the matter that the land of England does not yield the produce which it might and ought to yield. Now, the best means of compelling land-owners to make their estate productive of material good to the people is to tax them soundly, so that they may be driven to cultivate their land, in order that it shall bring forth food for the people, instead of being simply an instrument for the idle sport of the landed aristocracy. If landlords find that they cannot do this, they will (supposing primogeniture abolished and entails largely got rid of) dispose of their estates to those who, by energy and capital and public spirit, can make these estates productive, of benefit both to themselves and to the general public. By this means, the old estates are likely, in many cases, to be broken up, and the fragments to pass into the hands of those who will make use of them in accordance with the spirit and methods of modern civilization.

I confess that I look upon this readjustment of the land-tax as, in a large measure, the key to the aristocratic citadel; and it was so regarded by Mr. J. S. Mill, both in his Political Economy and in his latest utterances on this great subject. This would be a reform of a peaceful and gradual nature, interfering in no way with the existing "rights of property" (so called); and yet it would be the entering wedge which would split from top to bottom the most solid fabric of class privilege which the civilized world contains at the present moment. It would proclaim the rights of the community over all individuals, and yet no single individual could say that he was wronged or that his liberties were invaded. It would be at the same time radical and conservative, effecting a mighty change, and yet going back to the old usage and custom of the English State. Of the other reforms which must accompany this, I will say something in my next paper, which will be the concluding one on the land question. I shall then turn to the other chief prop of the old order in England,—the Established Church.

CAN FREETHOUGHT IN ITSELF BE EVIL?

I do not quite like the encouragement given to using the term "freethought" in a bad sense, in the controversy with Mr. Frothingham's critic in The Index, December 15. We ought not to give up good words to a partisan or technical use. If we do not want freethought, how do we want it fettered? Freedom is obedience to natural and true law instead of arbitrary and unjust law. The earth swings freely about the sun, in obedience to the combined forces of attraction and repulsion, but according to definite law. Thought is free, when it acts according to the laws of the human mind, not fettered by the dictates of a school or church or individual. It is not free, when any arbitrary authority sets limits to its action.

That freethought, free speech, free action, may result in evil is as clear as that a child free to walk may fall and harm itself before it has learned the laws of locomotion; but it will only learn those laws by its free efforts. So the freethinking of modern times results in much of crudity, conceit, and error; but are we to put thought in leading-strings for that? Has it been free from these mistakes, under the most arbitrary authority? We must trust freedom, and be patient with these phases of freethought. And yet so painful and unlovely are they that we cannot wonder that a mind of any æsthetic delicacy is often tempted to reject this rough and dusty highway, and seek some sheltered cathedral close blooming with verdure and beauty.

Freethought does not necessarily lead to materialism more than to Spiritualism. We have both sides represented to excess in our free community; but it does give opportunity for both sides to work out their problems, and it gives a chance, and the only chance, for that radical solution of these problems which shall show the common ground in human nature from which both these tendencies spring. Then we may have both freethought and free religion. Wordsworth gives the idea of both in the little verse:—

"Why does the meadow flower its bloom expand?
Because the lovely little flower is free
Down to its roots, and in that freedom hold.
And so the grandeur of the forest tree
Comes not from casing in a formal mould,
But from its own divine vitality."

E. D. CHENEY.

[In the preceding article, our esteemed contributor takes exception to a recent brief paragraph in one of the editorial columns of The Index, as encouraging the popular use of the term "freethought" in a bad sense. There must certainly have been some defect in the paragraph, if such an interpretation of it was admissible, or else Mrs. Cheney could not have read it with her usual clearness of perception. In either case, it is well to have attention called to the point, and to have her supplementary words, which the writer of the paragraph in question accepts entirely.—W. J. P.]

PHILOSOPHICAL LESSONS FROM THE DISASTER AT VIENNA.

The frightful story of death and suffering which has flashed across the ocean cables is one of three equally startling events which have fallen within the past twenty-two years. The other two were the falling and after destruction by fire of the Pemberton Mill, and the death by suffocation and burning of several hundreds of people in a Christian church in a South American city. After the consternation caused by the destruction of the Pemberton Mill was somewhat past, there followed a general endeavor to reason out an agreement of this catastrophe with current philosophical doctrines. The historic evolution of popular philosophies shows that men have always been in haste to reach generalizations, and that, when a new fact has arisen, the first tendency has been to group it with other facts under an established theory. The elasticity of theories has been strained to the utmost in receiving stubborn facts.

But a new fact leads a scientific reasoner to question his theory, and to inquire diligently whether the new fact does not compel a modification or reconstruction. This habit has its popular correlative in what we name "candor" or "openness to conviction." The scientific spirit, which severely interrogates theories upon the appearance of contradictory facts, has been steadily increasing for the past quarter of a century. It is perhaps for this reason that the American pulpit has not attempted (as in the case of the Pemberton Mill) to reconcile the Vienna catastrophe with the accepted theories of divine supervision and benevolence. The common-sense of the community would hardly bear the strain of such an argument, and the probable result would be a weakening of the philosophy which its representatives would intend to support.

The Vienna disaster robbed several hundred people of the prize of life. Their removal was sudden, frightful, and far-reaching in its entail of suffering on others. Many children were orphaned, many parents left childless. Important civil and military servants were snatched from the State. Artists, singers, physicians, literary men, and probably students of science, were whelmed in destruction. The accumulated endeavor of years became as naught in those terrible flames. One inference is inevitable. The march of civilization has received a local check. The wheels have been temporarily blocked. Several thousands of human beings will have to meet added privation, discouragement, and obstacle. Many will pass their lives under a cloud of painful disappointment. They will not accomplish what happier fortune would have enabled them to do. Some will sink to a lower rank in life from lack of help.

Besides these local and personal disadvantages, certain optimistic inferences may be drawn. New boards of construction will be appointed. Where such already exist, they will be held to more rigid supervision. New theatres will be better built, and old ones will be modified to insure greater safety. Each new disaster of wide influence induces greater carefulness, whenever large risks of life are made.

So far as human reason can analyze cause and effect, the Vienna disaster is traceable to human ignorance. Certainly, it is not traceable to human malevolence. Neither the builders of the theatre nor its proprietors meditated the destruction of life. They either failed to see certain contingencies, or, foreseeing them, set them aside as improbable. Is there any evidence of divine malevolence in the disaster? Did the Deity intend to punish these hopeless people, or to punish others through them, or to teach humanity a lesson at such costly outlay? Could not divine wisdom have discovered a less hideous discipline? Had such a lesson been left to human intelligence, would not that have devised a less horrible method of instruction? If there was no malevolence, do the facts show evidence of divine benevolence? Are they reconcilable with the theory of paternal care which notes the sparrow's fall and numbers the hairs of our heads? Do the facts, fairly considered, show any evidence whatever of divine interference, benevolence, or supervision? Do not the factors of careless construction, human panic, and the operation of inevitable natural laws, multiplied together, give the whole sum of the disaster, so far as the human mind can cognize its causes? And must not the Deity, therefore, be completely exonerated from any participation in this horrible occurrence? Certainly, all right reasoning and good feeling would force us to such a conclusion as surely as to the wish to prove that he was not the accomplice of Guiteau in causing the death of Garfield.

THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY.

An opportunity has recently been afforded the Brooklyn public to hear an argument for the supernatural origin of Christianity as able and as eloquent as any argument for this opinion that has been heard of late in Europe or America. It was embodied in a course of lectures by Dr. R. S. Storrs. The subject of the course, which was substantially the same as that delivered in the Lowell Institute a year ago, was "The Divine Origin of Christianity as indicated by its Historical Effects." By "divine" I need hardly say that he meant supernatural. The eight lectures which make up the body of the course were an elaborate exposition of the changes which have been wrought by eighteen centuries of time in contrast with the state of things existing at the beginning of the Christian Era; and the impression left upon the average hearer's mind was that for these changes Christianity was, if not exclusively responsible, so nearly this that any other force that has been operative is not worth mentioning.

Whatever else the lectures were, they were a chant of progress, loud and magnificent. In spite of all demurrers and of all mental reservations, it is not to be denied that the lecturer was easily able to show a splendid intellectual and moral gain. "Shall we," he asked, "attribute all this gain to the sensitive mind and the impassioned heart of a young man of Galilee who died a miserable death upon the cross, under the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate?" But surely this is not the only alternative of supernaturalism. This is not the claim of any anti-supernaturalist whom I have ever known in person or in books. Do we attribute all the waters of the lower Mississippi to the modest stream that rises on the Canadian border in the fastnesses of the Hauteurs de Terre? No, we do not. We recognize the fact that going on its way that modest stream receives into itself innumerable tributary waters, great rivers,—the Ohio, the Missouri, the Arkansas,—each of them fed by countless smaller streams, and all of them together draining an area of twelve hundred thousand miles. No wonder that the lower Mississippi pours along such a resistless tide, spreading itself out in shallow seas over the surface of the land! No wonder that the lower tide of Christendom is so strong and full! It has not all come from the brain and heart of Jesus. This, too, has had its Ohios and Missouris with their tributary floods. This, too, has drained the areas of continents and centuries of time of what they have to give of turbid strength or crystalline clearness. "One voice in Galilee? Twenty centuries of Europe answering, Yea, verily! Was it something or nothing that answered, Yea?" It was nothing, said the lecturer. Humanity, since the time of Jesus, has been a passive bulk acted upon by his exclusive energy; or, if not a passive bulk, something with ability to oppose, but never to coöperate with, the supernatural force of Christianity.

Now, let us for the moment grant that Christianity has done all that the lecturer claimed. Let us forget all that it has not done or done amiss. Let us forget the Empire of the East, the Papacy in the West. Let us forget Alexander VI. and Leo X., God's atheist vicegerents. Let us forget monasticism,—invirile, prurient, insulting marriage and the home, parent of all foul imaginations. Let us forget the Inquisition, Alva and Torquemada, Innocent III. and Philip II., wading in human blood. And let us also forget for the moment all the Ohios and Missouris, all of the tributary streams that have contributed to swell the aggregate of intellectual and moral energy that spreads wide and deep over the modern world. Let us forget "the mechanical inventions, the habits of industrialism, the discoveries of physical science, the improvements of government, the expansion of literature, the traditions of antiquity," the bequest of Roman jurisprudence, the inspiration to science from Mohammedan Spain. Last, but not least, let us forget, if we can, the development of the rationalistic spirit during the last three centuries, and its attendant secularization of ethics and politics, literature and science and art. Let us imagine that there has been no loss and no defect, and that all the gain has been the gain of Christianity, attributable to this, whether conceived as the personal force of Jesus, or as a literature contained in the New Testament, or as an organized religion, or as all of these together. Let us imagine that but for Christianity, so considered, there would have been no progress for these eighteen hundred years, but rather an ever deeper plunge into the abyss of ignorance and crime. So imagining and so forgetting, what would our verdict be on the main question, Is Christianity a supernatural religion? It would still be unfavorable. And it would still be unfavorable if the advance had been a hundred times as great as it has been, if all war had ceased, if all poverty had been done away, if all lawless passion had been curbed, if "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" had become the universal formula of social life.

And why would this be so?

Because, until we have stretched our line and plummet upon human nature and upon the natural order of the world, we are totally disqualified for predicating anything exceeding either the one or the other. We must know the utmost capability of human nature, we must know the utmost capability of God working within the natural order of the world, before we can affirm of any product: here is something that human nature could not produce without supernatural assistance. Here is something that the natural order of the world could not produce, and hence a miracle. The supernaturalist's assumption, on which the validity of his argument wholly depends, is that he knows the utmost of which human nature is capable, the utmost of which God is capable through his eternal immanence in men and things. But, when it comes to this, who of us is there that can go with him? that does not feel compelled to say, "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me. It is high. I cannot attain to it."

No man can attain to it. The capability of human nature can be measured by no past achievement, by no present victory. All it has done so far goes to its credit. All it can ever do will gradually be added to the score. In truth, the lecturer's conception of humanity betrayed at every step the Calvinism of his personal creed. He rejected this in terms declaring for the dignity of human nature. But what dignity is there in human nature if it has no reactionary power; if, when it has gone far forth upon an evil way, it cannot turn about and face the light, and seek it with courageous heart. What dignity is there in human nature if, when the Almighty had broken through the orderly succession of the world to save it from itself, it still proved so refractory that the almighty agency was more than half in ruin. If the lecturer's belief in the dignity of human nature had been actual, and not merely formal, he would never have doubted for one moment its ability to accomplish all that it has accomplished in virtue of its inherent power and worth. If humanity can descend so much lower than Washington or Channing as to include a pagan Nero or a Christian Alexander VI., I do not see why it may not extend upon the upper side as far above their moral excellence. I do not see what limit can be fixed to human possibility.

The lecturer's conception of God involved in his supernaturalism did not seem to me a whit more exalted than his conception of man.

"I tread with bare, hushed feet the ground
He has with boldness trod;
I dare not fix with mete and bound
The love and power of God."

I dare not say, Here is the extremest limit of his natural operation; excess of this must be miraculous. For, when I consider that without a miracle the stars swing in their circles, that without a miracle seed-time and harvest keep their punctual round, that without a miracle the immanent life climbed from the fiery mist of worlds unmade to all their myriad shapeliness and interacting harmony, to mineral and vegetable and animal life, and from the wallowing saurian to the man or woman whom you love,—when I consider all these things, I must confess it seems to me little less than blasphemous to suggest that the Power which is equal to them all is not equal to the development of humanity from any possible depth, to any possible height, by methods as serene as those which keep the stars from wandering or convert the substance of the planet into human smiles and tears. To affirm the supernatural origin of Christianity is to affirm the incompetency of man, not less the incompetency of God. For those who believe that nature and humanity are full of God, there is no need or possibility of any infinitesimal increase of his perpetual immanence. There has been nothing in the past which does not seem to them as natural as a rose upon its stem; there can be nothing in the future, be it ever so wonderful, ever so exalted, that will surprise the soul which knows that we cannot expect too much of the omnipotent and everlasting God.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

THE SYNTHESIS OF FREE THOUGHT AND RELIGION.

The problem of problems that confronts the philosophical religious thinker to-day is to find some formula of reconciliation between the freest thought and the essential idea of religion. By "freest thought" is meant that absolutely untrammelled method of thought which science is accustomed to use in its investigations; and by "the essential idea of religion" is meant not any of the dogmas or theories of religion, but the germinal sentiment or thought of religion itself. The questions of reconciling the Hebrew story of creation, or Garden of Eden legends, or sacrificial blood-atonements, or Scriptural infallibility with the demands of scientific criticism, are no longer in the court of rational judgment. These questions have been passed upon, and the decision rendered that such stories and legends and dogmas must go, their reconciliation with rational thought being impossible. Certain classes of theologians may continue to discuss them as if they thought a reconciliation still possible, but they only thereby show how far they are behind the times. The question which now presents itself is whether religion itself in any shape, under any conception, is compatible with a free and rational or, if it be preferred, a scientific view of the universe.

There is a class of liberal thinkers who regard this question as already decided in the negative. In their view, after rational criticism has removed the legends, dogmas, superstitions, with which religion has been associated, there will be nothing left which can be called religion. They accordingly oppose any and every form of religion as a superstition. They stand at the extreme on one side of this question, corresponding to the extreme occupied on the other side by those dogmatic theologians who take the ground that religion rests on authority peculiarly its own, and is not to be brought into the court of reason at all. The latter dogmatize in affirmations; the former dogmatize in negations. And neither of these classes, without a great change of mental attitude, is in a condition to accept any method of reconciliation between religion and free thought. The one is combative against free thought: the other is equally combative against religion. There is an incompatibility of temper at the outset, which forbids marriage.

But between these two extremes there is a large and increasing body of people who do not identify religion with any of the dogmas or superstitions or ceremonies with which it has been historically connected; who are ready to let all these go, even the beliefs in a personal Deity and in personal immortality, if rational thought really demands it; but who yet believe that religion, which has held such a momentous place in the history of mankind and has passed through so many transformations, may yield again to the transforming power of the freest thought, and survive in some more rational form for better service. And this class of people is, by no means, wholly outside of the churches. A very large section of it is inside of the churches, and even in churches of the Evangelical order. Not all individuals of the class within the churches may have a definite consciousness of the goal toward which they are going, but they have committed themselves with confidence to the highway of rational investigation, and are ready to trust its conclusions. Others of this same general class, outside of the churches, are more absorbed, it may be, in scientific pursuits, in historical inquiries, or in problems of philanthropy, and may manifest little practical interest in religious matters. But they by no means consider the question as closed against religion. For religion as commonly presented in the churches, they may have little sympathy, but at the same time they may believe that religion in itself admits of the strictest rational justification. Now, for this very large class of people, who are both inside and outside of churches and among whom there may now be great variety of opinion and belief, a synthesis of free thought and religion is possible; and, so far and fast as this becomes an actual junction, it furnishes the basis of the coming Liberal Church. Let us indicate the chief points of this synthesis.

1. The whole religious history of mankind, from the very beginning of any history to the present day, including all the special religions, and all creeds, beliefs, ceremonies, sentiments, hopes that have been a part of any religion, presents the field to which free thought, in the scientific spirit of discovering truth, is to apply its researches. Here are the phenomena, to use the phrase of positive science, that are to be investigated. There is a popular misapprehension that to apply the scientific method to the problems of religion is merely to subject religion to certain material and physiological tests. But the true scientific scholar has no such narrow view. There are certain religious beliefs that will doubtless be affected by the material discoveries of science. But these beliefs are only a part of the phenomena to be studied. To affirm that the whole field of religion is to be investigated by learning a few facts of physical science is as unscientific as to assert that the science of language is exhausted when one has learned the physiology of the organs of speech. The history of religion is like that of language, of literature, of morals, of government: the scientific method may be applied to the study of all these departments of human development precisely as to the material history of the earth. But this is not to subject these phenomena of human history to the tests of material science alone.

2. Taking a broad survey of the field of religious phenomena and making a generalization from the root-ideas and sentiments of all religions, we come to this result: Of religion as thought, the central idea is that of man's relation to the universe and to its vital forces; of religion as feeling, the central sentiment is that of obligation imposed on man by this tie of vital relation; of religion as practice, the centre of action is man's effort to meet this obligation, and thus to put and keep himself in right relations with the universe and its vital powers. All the various beliefs of the various religions concerning spirits and genii controlling the operations of nature, and concerning deities or Deity creating and giving law to the universe and shaping its destiny, all ceremonies of worship and so-called works of religion for winning the supposed favor of the divine powers, will fall under one or another part of this formula. At the same time, the formula is only a statement of facts pertaining to man which the strictest scientific thought must recognize. In whatever way the universe came into being and is sustained, man is in actual relation to it and its vital forces. Of all finite beings within the range of our knowledge, he is the culmination of its vital processes. It is also a fact that he feels himself under obligation to give service for what he has thus received, and that only that kind of conduct which shall put him in right and normal relations with the universe of persons and things of which he is a part can satisfy this inward sense of obligation. These facts are not more scientific than they are religious.

3. Below all attempts at defining and naming the being or beings that, in the various religions, have been declared to be the ruling power or powers of the universe, there has been a deeper feeling of a power undefinable, incomprehensible, inscrutable, whose judgments were "unsearchable" and whose ways were "past finding out"; a cause behind or within all causes that must baffle man's powers to understand, and which, when most reverent, he left without name. And to-day there is not only a tendency from the side of science, but a tendency from the side of religion to the same position. Agnosticism is of various shades and degrees; but, when it presents itself in the form of admitting the existence of some power behind phenomena and the laws (or sequences) of phenomena, while denying man's capacity to know what this power is, or in the form of acknowledging, as physical and psychical science does acknowledge to-day, that at the bottom of all material and all mental phenomena there is an unexplained secret, then agnosticism furnishes one of the links of the synthesis by which the freest thought may be wedded to religion.

4. Religion has claimed that the moral law received its sanction, because given by external command from heaven, or because it was man's intuitive sense of a divine order of conduct. A modern scientific view of man's history, which may not yet, however, be regarded as complete, changes the theory of the origin of the moral law without changing its nature or its authority. This view declares the moral law to have been inwrought into the mental constitution and temperament of man by the social and vital forces amid which he has had his existence, until what was first learned in the struggles of experience has become intuition. For anything that science thus declares, nay, taking her hint,—religion may enter the claim of an eternal equity and a persistent moral purpose in the universe itself, since these have been revealed in man, the outcome of the universe.

5. The doctrine of personal immortality, one of the staple beliefs of historical religion in general, cannot be said either to have been proved or disproved by science. The doctrine is scientifically involved in the problem of the relation between matter and intelligence,—a problem which is the present focus of keen and multiform research, but on which little that is certain has yet been discovered. Thought is free, therefore, to survey the whole field of scientific and philosophical probabilities, and to come to such conclusion as it may on the premises given. There are people, indeed, who strenuously deny the doctrine of a future life, on what seems to them strong grounds of rationality. There are many others who dogmatically affirm it on the old ground of miraculous evidence. But there are many others who think it wiser and more becoming either to take an agnostic position in regard to this belief, or to affirm it only as a well-grounded probability and hope. Meantime, however, there is one basis on which people of various shades of opinion concerning the doctrine can stand together. Whether man is to have a continuance of existence in some other sphere or is to have his only immortality in the future of the human race on earth, it is a now quite generally admitted truth that the best preparation he can have for either destiny is to make the utmost possible of his present life, in virtue and useful service; that his duty is not so much for any other world or time as here and now; and that to do well his part at the posts to which he may be allotted on earth is the only way for earning either an honorable promotion or an honorable discharge. On this ground, people may stand side by side in all good works for the benefit of this world, however strong or weak may be their faith in a world hereafter: to which it may be added that physical science itself, by its marvellous discoveries, gives a hint that nature's processes, however regular, are full of wondrous surprises, and that it is always wise for man to be in readiness for the best which thought can conceive or hope can entertain.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THE editors of The Index very sincerely wish all its readers a "Happy New Year!"

SINCE our last issue, we have entered upon a new year. We refrain for the sake of our readers from repeating at length the worn-out platitudes of the season, and from recapitulating the gains and losses from our own stand-point during the year that is past. Our sincere hope is that those thoughtful ones who have paused in reflective mood on the threshold of this new year with a "realizing sense" of its obligations, hopes, and possibilities, and who have formed resolves to make 1882 a year memorable in their lives by breaking off from all bad habits and practices, by living nearer than ever before to their highest ideal, and making this and coming years of more benefit to themselves and their fellow-creatures than any past years in their lives have been,—will be able to carry out to their best fulfilment these designs, unhindered by weakness of will or force of circumstances. And to such we hope to make The Index an important factor in strengthening these good resolutions of the new year, by holding up to their view, through the published thought of our able corps of contributors, the highest incentives to noble living.

WE have been thinking some time of making an improvement in The Index by giving every week a column or two of reading matter especially adapted to interest, amuse, and instruct the young. This feature, which will soon be added, will, we are confident, increase the usefulness of The Index, and be valued not only by parents and teachers, but by all who are interested in the education of youth.

THIS number of The Index will be sent to several hundred persons who are not among our subscribers, but whose names have been kindly furnished us, with the belief that the character and object of this journal will commend it to their favorable attention and induce them to become subscribers.

IN his trip with the "innocents abroad," it seems that Mark Twain showed himself one of the most decided "innocents" by being imposed upon to the extent of shedding elaborate tears, duly chronicled, over the tomb of his dear father Adam. To such an extent did he carry his grief over his failure to meet his dear progenitor that a good Methodist minister to whom his book was loaned expressed himself "disgusted with a man silly enough to weep over the grave of Adam." Poor, misinformed Mark! Mr. Abbott Kinney, who has made three trips around this world, and recently settled in San Gabriel, near Los Angeles, Cal., says in the Sierra Madre Vista: "As for the doubting Thomas, let him go to the old octagon house in the Pueblo of Los Angeles, and he will see the graves of Adam and Eve, the very place where they were buried. The evidence is conclusive."

THE editor of the Popular Science Monthly says: "Mr. Spencer is not a denier or antagonist of religion. He holds it to be a reality, a great truth, in short nothing less than an essential and indestructible element of human nature." This is true; but for some readers it is necessary to add that this "indestructible element" is not, in Mr. Spencer's philosophy, any system of worship or belief in an "Infinite and Eternal Spirit," but the sentiment awakened by the contemplation of mystery behind phenomena. To use his own language, "So that, beginning with the germinal idea of mystery which the savage gets from a display of power in another transcending his own, and the germinal sentiment of awe accompanying it, the progress is toward an ultimate recognition of a mystery behind every act and appearance, and a transfer of the awe from something special and occasional to something universal and unceasing." The existence and permanence of this sentiment as a part of man's nature only a superficial mind will deny.

A PUBLISHER who advertises in The Index writes in a business note, "The most of the orders I am receiving seem to come from parties who have seen the notice in The Index."

FIFTEEN hundred Mormons, converted in England since August, will soon join their brethren in Utah.

THE Pope says: "God's church is being attacked, despite its power of bridling human passions and restraining masses in revolt. The benefits conferred by the Holy See upon the populations are denied with no less madness than audacity."

SAYS the Christian Union: "Mr. Savage has been preaching a sermon, in which he claims to express Mr. O. B. Frothingham's religious views as by authority. The public has hitherto had an impression, apparently well founded, that Mr. Frothingham is abundantly able to express his own views, whenever he wants to give them expression; and the interview with him published by the Evening Post, with his consent, coupled with Mr. Frothingham's own note correcting some minor and unimportant errors, will be generally accepted by the public as better authority than Mr. Savage's sermon." Yet Mr. Savage's sermon above referred to was accompanied by the following statement over Mr. Frothingham's own name: "Mr. Savage having been kind enough to read me his sermon, I take pleasure in saying that it tells correctly the story of the New York Evening Post interview, and also is substantially correct in every particular as concerns my present attitude of thought." Mr. Savage in this sermon shows the falsity and dishonesty of the report published by the Evening Post, and declares that "Mr. Frothingham says, and I think we will always agree with him, that 'a piece of work like this ought to lose a newspaper man his position.'" And yet this report will be "generally accepted by the public as better authority than Mr. Savage's sermon"; and the injustice receives not condemnation, but encouragement, in the columns of the Christian Union.

PROF. DAVID SWING says, "There is unbelief enough now in all compass points of our land; but, had not the pulpit begun some years ago to preach a more reasonable gospel, the mass of our community would now be scoffing infidels." In other words, "unbelief" has so modified the teachings of the pulpit and the views of the people that doctrines once scoffed at are now obsolete, while the less unreasonable portions of theology to which the people still assent are by those in advance of the churches, criticised in the broad and generous spirit of science, representing, as it is now recognized they do, necessary but transitional stages in the evolution of thought. Professor Swing further says: "Thirty or forty years ago, when the rights of married women to property were discussed in an adjoining State, it was shown from Scripture that woman was wholly negated by the idea of man, and that marriage made her as poor as a slave; but within recent days the same Christianity has made the wives of that State almost equal partners in the property accumulated in the married life." It is not "the same Christianity" that has produced this change, however often the statement is repeated by men who have largely outgrown Christianity in fact, but from various considerations still use the same to cover all the virtues of life. The Old Testament and the New alike clearly teach that woman is man's inferior, and that she should be subject to him; and the laws that raise woman "almost" to the social and legal position of man are the result of what is stigmatized as "infidelity,"—rejection of the authority of the Bible and acceptance of the teachings of observation, reason, and experience.

THE editor of the Popular Science Monthly, after giving Webster's definition of atheism, "The denial of the existence of a God," and Webster's definition of God, "The Supreme Being, the Eternal Spirit," says: "Herbert Spencer is not an atheist and never has been. . . . On the contrary, he has labored with all the power of his genius to prove that atheism, as a theory of the universe (which it professes to be), is baseless and indefensible. He has sought to show that the Infinite and Eternal Spirit, of which all phenomena of the universe are but the manifestations, is the most absolute of all realities." This statement is liable to mislead those who are unfamiliar with Spencer's philosophy. It is true that Spencer rejects what is commonly regarded as atheism, the theory that denies an absolute behind phenomena, and affirms the self-existence and independence of the phenomenal universe; but it is equally true that he rejects what is understood by the word "theism," the theory that the operations of nature depend upon a being possessing intellectual and moral qualities. He recognizes power, of which all phenomena are manifestations; but, holding that it cannot be legitimately formulated, either in terms of matter or in terms of mind, he calls it the Unknowable. He declares that "the proposition that an 'originating mind' is the cause of evolution is a proposition that can be entertained so long only as no attempt is made to unite in thought its two terms in the alleged relation. That it should be accepted as a matter of faith may be a defensible position, provided good cause is shown why it should be so accepted; but that it should be accepted as a matter of the understanding, as a statement making the order of the universe comprehensible, is a quite indefensible position." Since Herbert Spencer does not acknowledge an intelligent being as the author or ruler of the universe, and since spirit is understood to be, as defined in the dictionary, "an intelligent being or substance, imperceptible by our present senses," it cannot fairly be said that the great English philosopher believes in an "Infinite and Eternal Spirit." As Mr. Spencer's philosophical views are a subject of much interest and controversy, it is important that they be correctly stated and thoroughly understood.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 5, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

Peace on Earth, Good-will to Men.

A Discourse delivered before the First Congregational Society, New Bedford, Dec. 25, 1880.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

No religion has ever had a sweeter song sung over its cradle than Christianity. The song is none the less sweet though we must believe, in the light of reason to-day, that it was not voiced by any miraculous choir in the skies, but sung itself out of the gladdened and hopeful heart of humanity. Indeed, the Religion of Humanity, of which we hear not a little in our time,—the religion which seeks not so much to fit men for a future residence in the heavens as to make them virtuous and happy citizens on earth,—could have no truer motto of its hope and aim than this song, which is repeated all round the world every Christmas morning as the birth-hymn of Jesus, "Peace on Earth, Good-will toward Men." It was a renovated, health-restored, sin-cured, suffering-alleviated, joy-covered earth that those early Christians, the first generation of Jesus' disciples, were looking for. And to them, to whom the world was not so big nor perhaps so bad a world as it is to us to-day, this did not seem so hard a task. In their youthful, buoyant, dreamful hope, it seemed as if it should not take so very long to change the world from a sinful and suffering one to a world of universal good-will and happiness. As this was what people most needed and most longed for, so, most surely, would they grasp it when thus clearly offered them. Those primitive disciples were in the fresh childhood of their faith. They had not learned the painful fact that people will not all rise at once to receive even that which is their deepest need and which inwardly they most long for, though it be offered just above their heads, but that many will continue to play with some bubble of glittering, tempting pleasure closer to their hands. They had not learned the painful fact that evil is a habit not to be changed in a day,—a habit so inwrought into the very texture and elemental conditions of human life that people often have to wear it, or the shameful and torturing remnants of it, even after they are filled with disgust for it and a holy desire to cast it off forever. They had not learned that the reformation of the world is the task of the ages, and that even Divine Providence has to be patient and works but slowly at the mighty problem. They were still in the stage of child-faith, when nothing seemed more probable than that their dearest hopes should be fulfilled, nothing easier than to accept the offered boon of a redeemed and blissful human society on earth. And so they lived expecting to see with their own eyes the dawn of the millennial day,—the ushering in upon the renovated earth of the era of perfect goodness and perfect bliss. And in the freshness of this hope, in the overflowing, childlike enthusiasm of this expectation, before the new religion had become worldly-wise, before it had become a creed or a formula, and long before it had thought to grasp at the worldly power of imperial Rome, while the spiritual imagination was still innocent of any rational philosophy, and the hearts of these primitive believers were only filled with the joy and beauty and perfect assurance of the hope,—then it was that the hope itself welled up to the lips in a song, and the loyal imagination carried the song back to the manger cradle of Jesus, "Glory to God in the highest: on earth peace, good-will toward men."

And how we love to repeat these words! How we love to believe in their promise for mankind! As the Christmas days come round, though the hope that first inspired them has been so long deferred, our hearts take them up and sing them anew. Catholic and Protestant, orthodox and heterodox, rationalists and supernaturalists, democrats and monarchists, sinner and saint, rich and poor, high and low, in pain and in joy, alike we catch the refrain, "Peace on earth, good-will to men." That is our hope, our wish, our aspiration to-day, as much as it was the hope and wish and aspiration of those who first repeated the words in Judea. Though we have not their simple, earnest faith that the prophecy of the words is to be speedily fulfilled, the words none the less express the genuine prayer of our hearts. They express the prayer and the prophecy of all genuine religion. All the great religions of the earth have something corresponding to this hope; and most of the great religions seem to have begun in some fresh revival and inspiration of this hope, in some newly awakened expectation and endeavor that the hope might be speedily realized. Man's deathless hope in a better day,—the hope that, though he may be in misery to-day, he may be happy to-morrow; that, though he may be sinful to-day, he may be virtuous to-morrow; that, though he may be cast down and despised to-day, he may spring up in triumph to-morrow; that, though he may be of the earth and earthy to-day, the slave of animal instincts and passions, there is yet coming for him a day when he will put on a new and holier manhood,—this persistent, unconquered, deathless hope, which has attended man from the beginning of his existence on the earth, is the spur of moral effort, and one of the most vital and perpetually healthful sentiments of religion. And hence, though the hope be long deferred so that sometimes the heart is made sick and almost sinks to despair, we must not give up the hope which the old song renews for us every year, and which our hearts sing from very habit as the Christmases come round. The "peace" and the "good-will" may yet seem very far away, but we will not give up the faith in their coming. Even to repeat all round the world the sentiment of that song for one day should make mankind, at least for the time, a little more peaceful, a little more disposed to good-will.

And yet, as we look over the world of Christendom to-day, while these old words are being repeated in manifold languages and among various peoples,—in the pomp of great cathedrals, with all the glory of the musician's art, or by the heart only at the silent Quaker meeting, among the missionaries in Africa, or in the Methodist chapel on our own Western frontier, or while they are passing from our own lips or from hand to hand on pictured cards,—at this very time that the words are being said or sung by so many millions of lips with such apparent faith and fervor, what a sad commentary upon them is the actual condition of this same Christian world! I said at the outset that no religion ever had a sweeter song sung over its cradle than Christianity. And yet it must be said with equal truth that no religion ever grew to manhood to live in such open defiance of the sentiment of that song as this same Christianity,—unless it be its younger brother, Mohammedanism. No religion, except Mohammedanism, has been so ready to propagate itself by the sword. No religion has shown more zeal in persecuting heretics to its standards of faith, or been more ingenious in inventing cruel tortures to force them back. No religion has ever had more wars of creed against creed in deadly battle even in its own household of a common faith. No religion has ever manifested more bitterness of sectarian dispute, more angry, unfraternal contention and quarrelling of denominational rivalry. No religion has ever been more grasping of power, more aggressive in taking possession of the earth regardless of the rights of previous inhabitants, or has less followed its own precept of meekness, or has imbued its hands more deeply in the blood of fratricidal strife. Buddhism, a religion more populous than any other on the globe, has always been a peaceable religion. It has never persecuted. It has grown and spread on the principle of good-will to men, keeping consistently to its own maxim, "Honor your own faith, while you respect the faith of others." The devotees of Brahmanism, when roused, can fight, and the Sepoys showed themselves in their rebellion to be desperate and ferocious soldiers; but they were quite matched in atrocity by their Christian conquerors. In the conflicts and wars of the East to-day, Christian and Mohammedan populations vie with each other in inventions of barbarous cruelty. For eighteen centuries those words, "Peace on earth, good will to men," have been echoed down the years, and yet the history of those centuries could have been written more appropriately in blood than in ink. Read the chronicles of England's Christian kings, if you would see what kind of will toward their fellows animated the hearts of Christian rulers, and what savage practices prevailed among the highest defenders of the faith. Read the story of the Inquisition in Spain, if you would see how the most zealous adherents of the Christian faith interpreted that old song of peace and good-will. Read the story of the Crusades, and see how hordes of rough warriors carried the song across Europe at the point of their battle-spears. See Christianity through all these centuries, standing before the world with the song of peace and good-will and the Sermon on the Mount on one hand, and an unsheathed sword, just a little concealed by her ecclesiastical draperies, in the other, while she cries, "I offer you this gospel of peace: take it peacefully, if you will, without money and without price; but take it you must, though I have to back my word with my sword."

This is a picture from history as a commentary on the gospel of peace and good-will. But how is it in the present? We have made some advance—yes, a good deal of advance—since the days of the Crusades and the Inquisition, or when the Christian kings of England murdered their rivals or were themselves murdered in their beds or in dungeons. And Christianity is to be credited with a vast deal of benefit to the world. But still its song of peace and good-will is a prophecy, not a reality. Still it is sung as fervently, as beautifully, as artistically, as ever. It is reverberated from choir to ceiling; it is echoed from pulpit to pew, and back again from pew to pulpit; it is painted on glowing windows and on church walls. People linger upon it lovingly as it passes their lips; and it is still a wish and a hope deep down in their hearts, and is altogether the most beautiful sentiment throughout the whole domain of the Christian creed or the Christian world. Yet, as practice, how far away still it is! How dim the vision of it in perfect fulfillment! How mountainous the obstacles between us and the attained reality! "Peace on earth, good-will to men," is a sentiment which the whole civilized world will most cordially accept. All the Christian sects, though uniting in nothing else, will unite in praising it. Infidel and believer are in accord here. Yet in all the social reforms of our day none attracts to its standard so few people or makes so little headway as the cause of peace in and between nations. No nations are so belligerent as Christian nations. All the great wars of our own time have been carried on by Christians against each other, or, if they have been carried on between Christian nations and a people of some other faith, almost without exception it is the Christian nation that has been the aggressor and really begun the war. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," sing the Christian nations of Germany and France to-day. Yet a half million of men, and more, in time of peace stand armed on each side of the frontier, and ready, at a moment's warning, to rush at each other, to shoot and bayonet each other down, over some quarrel for national advantage that may at any day arise. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," sings Protestant Christian England. Yet her armies have hardly yet returned from two wars, in Asia and Africa, in both of which she was the aggressor. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," sings Catholic Italy. Yet Italy is straining every nerve to build a strong navy and equip an army that shall put her as an equal among the great powers that settle the politics of Europe. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," sings the Republic of the United States. Yet the United States are hunting Indians from their homes, and have but recently emerged from a civil war in which six hundred thousand men were killed by battle or by army disease, and in which one-half of the States fought for the power to hold four millions of their fellow-Christians in slavery. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," sing the South American Republics, out of a state of chronic war and revolution. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," sings, in his chapel to-day, the Czar of Russia, the official head of the Christian Church and viceroy of Christ himself throughout all the vast Russian dominions. To-morrow, he signs an order for transporting a score or a hundred of his rebellious subjects, writhing under the heel of his despotic government, to an imprisonment in Siberia more rigorous in cruelty than any death. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," rings out from hundreds of thousands of Christian churches. In the shadow of those churches lurk crime and vice, hideous passions warring with one another for their ignoble existence, mean lusts that corrupt and enslave and eat out the life of men, strifes of class with class, low-lived men subsisting and enriching themselves on the weaknesses and temptations of their fellows, labor struggling against capital and capital against labor, jealousies and envies and hates and personal rivalries of all sorts battling with each other for place, and jostling against each other even as they come down the aisles of churches where they have just been rapturously listening to or singing together the old song of good-will and peace.

Do I make the picture too dark, draw it too heavily shaded, for this bright Christmas morning? Should we, at least for to-day, think of only sunshine and goodness and joy? Yet you know, you who sit here in this warm enclosure, with all your bodily wants apparently satisfied, you who have walked under the broad sunshine that fills our streets to-day, and felt the invigorating joy of it thrilling you in every nerve, you who have come from your homes of comfort or of luxury, where the merry wish has gone round and the gifts perhaps have been exchanged, you who have had and have all this seeming fulness of enjoyment,—yet know that there are hearts in this city to-day that feel not one ray of the brightness of this Christmas morning's sunshine, hearts that are under the pressure of want and poverty and sorrow, hearts that have been chilled and frozen by the icy blasts of their drear existence, until they reflect off every ray of warmth and brightness from without. You know that, even in this city of comfort and wealth, there are people who live day by day face to face with hunger and cold, who know not to-day where to-morrow's food or fuel are to come from, even if they have a supply for this Christmas day; people to whom gifts must be charities for the necessities of life, and sometimes grudgingly bestowed at that, instead of symbols of regard and affection or of an equal and mutual friendship. You know that there are places—hardly could you call them dwellings, so poor and wretched are they—where people must stay when not in the street or at labor, which yet are not homes. And worse than this: you know that there are places called homes, and that some of them have all the outward appearance of comfortable homes, which are under a heavier cloud of sadness than poverty or loneliness or hunger or cold can bring: homes where strife reigns instead of love, where affection has changed into neglect and cruelty, where the demon of intemperance has come in, and is rapidly driving out all the old domestic joys and hopes from under the roof. You know, too, that even in your own homes the brightest outward sunshine does not always bring brightness within, nor all the comforts and luxuries which you can accumulate around you always bring peace of heart. You know that your peace and good-will are beset by scores of little enemies; that sometimes your good wishes on Christmas morning are narrowed and maimed by ill-will; that, along with the gifts, sometimes go little envies and jealousies that despoil their pleasure; and that even the very surfeiting of good things may bring, as to children so to older people, irritation and selfishness, with their discord, where there should be concord. That is, you know that, though we recite and sing the glorious words, "Peace on earth, good-will to men," and, though we love the words and have faith in them as representing the aim, the hope of human life, yet there is no community where the aim is not still separated by a wide chasm from its accomplishment, and the hope an unfulfilled dream.

But it is time that I turned back again to the brighter side of our Christmas picture. I have only dwelt on this darker side for the purpose of showing how the brightness is to be put in. It is not for those of us who have only the brightness, who sit amid the comforts and the joys of life, to forget that there is the darkness and the deprivation. Let us keep and repeat the old song with all our faith and all our might: But let us not keep and repeat it in any optimistic way, as if the keeping and singing of it were enough; as if the prophecy were somehow going to fulfil itself just by our repeating it. If this world is ever to be made bright for all, it will be because those for whom it is already bright shall strenuously and lovingly set to work to remove the shadows from the paths of others. Dark as has been the record of Christian history, it is yet brighter than it would have been, if there had not always been a line of elect and faithful souls who have tried zealously to live "peace and good-will," as well as to sing it. Christianity is, doubtless, better than it would have been if it had not had this benign sentiment at its heart. And had Christianity gone East, to the nations of less aggressive temperament and milder manners in Asia, instead of coming West into Europe, the sentiment might have had much more sway in the historical development of the religion. But coming West and being adopted by the most aggressive, independent, mentally robust yet savagely selfish and warlike race on the face of the earth, the Anglo-Saxon, Christianity has had a hard task to keep its gracious sentiment of peace and good-will in the forefront of its standards. Nevertheless, it must have credit for having done much to soften the asperities and ferocities of this pushing race, than which there was never a people more unchristian by temperament and nature. To temper such a people to charity and gentleness was no easy mission. And the credit for what has thus been done is due to the sensitive and faithful souls, the philanthropists and saints,—the Carlo Borromeos, the Princess Elizabeths, the Fénelons, the John Howards, the Florence Nightingales, the Channings and Garrisons and Burritts, and many like to them, both in conspicuous and in humble life,—who have felt the painful contrast between the Christian hope and the Christian realization, and have set themselves to the task of removing it; who have not only loved the old song of peace and good-will, but have believed in it as enjoining a duty, and have made it the practical guide of their lives.

And it is more living by this sentiment that the world needs to-day. After eighteen centuries we have learned, by the experiences of history and the revelations of reason, that the actual kingdom of peace and good-will among men is not to descend upon the earth, as the early Christians thought, by a supernatural drama enacted in the skies, but that it is to be wrought out by the valorous good deeds of human beings themselves. It is to come not through any supernatural savior or redeemer, but through the efforts of men and women having only just such common faculties of mind and heart and body as you and I may have. The people of any and every community must establish it among themselves. It will not come to us of this city from Boston, or Washington, or London, much less from Jerusalem. Imported thither from any other town or planet, it would be of no use to us, unless we had already trained our faculties to live up to its level. Upon the human race has been put the task of bringing its own millennium. And this means that we who are living at this moment in this city are charged with the duty of bringing it just here in this spot where we live. The darkened homes in this community must be made brighter by us. The burdened hearts in this community must be relieved by us. The warring, selfish interests and passions in this city must be purged and adjusted by us. The morally dangerous places in this city must be cleansed and made safe by us. The social problems that involve the physical and moral health and the public and private virtue of this city must be considered and solved by us. And the "us" here—the "us" with which we are specially concerned—does not mean merely the people who are on some other street or who may have assembled to-day in some other edifice. It means us who are here in this church. And we who are accustomed to come here are in a special manner charged with the responsibility of improving the moral condition of the community of which we are a part. From the many homes among us that are surfeited with culture, refinement, and luxury, there should go out a power for elevating and brightening all the homes in our city. What might not the wealth and social advantages that are here represented accomplish for the good of this community, were they thoroughly consecrated to the service of public and private benefaction! The era of peace and good-will among men will come just as fast and just as soon as individual men and women get the sentiment of peace and good-will in their hearts, and go out into the world to live by it. If each and all who now sit lamenting and discouraged over the appalling evils that heavily shadow human existence would at once take up some practical errand of alleviation, the dawn of the better day would not be so far off as it is. The whole mass of human ills is not, indeed, to be lifted at once. But by patient labor in the spirit of love and justice,—helping the poor to rise out of their poverty, removing temptations from weak men and women, succoring the lonely and suffering, lifting and holding up the fallen until they can stand alone, taming the passions of selfish aggressiveness, ameliorating the conditions out of which spring vice and crime, educating the young so that virtue shall be a first as well as second nature to them,—thus the mountainous mass of social wrong and woe will be slowly but surely worn away. And if it be so sweet just to hear the old hymn of "Peace on earth, good-will to men," how much more pleasurable should be the sensation of thus putting it into deed!

CORRESPONDENCE.

A LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30, 1881.

Editors of The Index:—

What are "current affairs" here, of which all the people at the North and West ask us to write now and then? I suppose two-thirds of your population would answer at once, The affairs of fashion and politics, without thinking for a moment that here is a large resident population whose fortunes "hang by a hair," and who never think of either except when once in each four years they suffer from the spasms of the season. I made a call last evening, when the conversation turned on dictionaries, and a bright young girl from the Eastern shore asked me if I had ever seen Johnson's Dictionary in the first edition. "Certainly," I answered. "I have never seen it," said she, demurely; "but I am told that its definitions are completely obsolete. Only think,—'politics' is defined as 'the occupation of the vilest of mankind.'" The bright eyes twinkled, and I was half-way home before I had done wondering whether that remark was intended to be satirical.

The first thing that struck me after I came to live in Washington was its likeness to a great factory centre. When the departments are closed at four o'clock, and the streams of people crowd every avenue and cram every coach, the same pathetic interest attaches to the dispersion with which I have often watched the "girls from the mill." Here, a worn and tired face betrays the widow, left with a family to provide for,—a work faithfully followed out for many a year. There, a fresh young face, shrouded with fresher crape, goes hurrying by with a step which says: "I have never left baby to nurse before. Shall I ever get used to it, even if I have no other way to put bread into its mouth?" Sadder still to look at is the group of flaunting hats, worn with such ungracious defiance, which tell the world that our industrial population is not free from any of the disgraces or dishonors that afflict more obscure crowds. Men in Washington one soon learns not to regard too closely, if one would keep one's faith in human nature; yet nowhere in the world can nobler men be found.

Besides its industrial, Washington has now a literary and scientific life. Of the literary, represented chiefly by clubs, we may say that its coteries show for the most part a worthy ambition, which has so far achieved little. The finest club, to which women are admitted, is that of the literary society of which Garfield was president. It held very lately a memorial meeting at the house of Professor Gallaudet, the presiding officer of the Deaf Mute College, where Mr. Spofford, of the Congressional Library, read an admirable essay on Garfield's literary taste and pursuits, and Mrs. Burnett's musical voice brought tears to every eye as she recited her own dirge-like verses. President Gallaudet's parlors were draped for the occasion with the funeral moss which hangs on the live-oaks of the cotton islands, and it was sent to him by Carolina women, who knew for what purpose it was to be used.

As to scientific life, Washington is now the headquarters of such life in America; and the existence of the Smithsonian, and all the marvellous scientific bureaus of the government, including the Ethnological Bureau, over which Major Powell presides, is my warrant for saying that, whatever subject is under discussion, an expert can always be found here to treat it. And some exquisite literary work has been done in those bureaus. Is there anywhere in English literature a finer story than the Major has told of the Cañon of the Colorado?

The new year opens for us under a cloud. President Arthur has the aristocratic ways of a society man in New York. He has already shown that he can keep his own counsel, and that he means the White House to put on the air of a gentleman's residence. I have seen tears start to more than one eye at the suggestion of festivities at the White House this winter. It is thought that the reception for the people on New Year's day cannot be given up; but let us hope that this will be the last. The President's long visits to New York are a little "out of form," and only to be excused because of the unceremonious manner in which he was hustled into office, and the long delay in taking possession of his proper abode.

It seems likely that the disgraceful disturbance over the medical treatment of Garfield will get before Congress, and then—Heaven help us to decency! If Dr. Boynton ever loved his cousin, one would think he would be able to restrain his insane vanity. If Dr. Baxter ever was the family physician, let him show himself worthy of the dead man's esteem by a silence that shall give evidence that he loved where he served.

As for Mrs. Garfield, those who reverence her womanly loyalty pray that she may in no manner take part in the debate. If General Garfield did not have the physician he wanted, the blame must rest with those nearest him; and, as nothing deterred her from acting when he prayed to be left alone at Elberon, we will not believe that the fear of etiquette or cabinet had any weight before. It will be a happy day for mankind when the gibbet does its work on Guiteau, and his demoralizing presence is swept beyond our cognizance. The use of the hangman's rope is a confession of ignorance; but, so long as it is used in any civilized land, a criminal like this must not escape it. Those of us who understand and appreciate the great dignity and sound reason of Judge Coxe do not know how to be silent under the attacks lately made upon him. The conduct of the trial will be vindicated by the result, and that is all we have need to say.

Congress will have a good deal of work to do. When we consider how difficult it is to find any safe investment for money, and how many widows and orphans of soldiers are supported on a scanty income derived from government bonds, it seems to the unfinancial mind rather cruel that a government so rich as ours should go on refunding, and so bring such incomes to the starvation point, unless it will also lift the taxes from the burdened nation.

Our foreign policy, if we take the cue from Mr. Blaine, is to be somewhat aggressive. A great navy is to be built, and the affairs of Utah are to come up at once, Governor Murray having been already summoned to give his opinion. Why does it not occur to the government that far more would be gained by taking counsel with the most intelligent of the Mormons themselves? When, a few months ago, I gave in print the prophecy born of my own observations, I asked no counsel. I am therefore the more gratified to find it already in process of fulfilment.

Recent newspapers have a paragraph to this effect: "A number of Mormons who claim that Brigham Young introduced the doctrines of polygamy and blood-atonement, contrary to the original Mormon faith, have organized a movement in Salt Lake City. They renounce polygamy, and refuse to pay any more tithes."

I shall not err, I think, if I say that these are Scandinavian converts or their children. When I see how greed and hate and politics enter into this problem, as they have already entered into the Indian Department, I feel as if Dr. Samuel Johnson had been gifted with second sight!

There is one question that will not come before Congress that ought to do so. It is the consideration of the government's duty to the negroes brought round by Sherman after the war and resident in this district still. These negroes have no work, no homes, properly speaking; and their children, having neither clothes nor food, have of course no education. I have heard this class estimated as high as twenty thousand. They live by robbing gardens, hen-roosts, and exposed refrigerators and closets. I do not wonder that they do this with a clear conscience; for any one of them that can think knows that the white race owe him not merely a living, but a rescue for body and soul. I am too ignorant myself to see in what way this people should be helped. There will be a dozen legal reasons to the support of anybody who objects.

What I should like to see done is this. I would like Congress to take up these vagrants who have no proper hold here, and take them, say fifty to a hundred families in a group, to some good government reservations. There, under practical farmers from either the North or South, these people should be trained to get their living from the soil, their women should be taught to sew and cook, and their children should be sent to school. If there are real reasons why this cannot be done by government, government should be petitioned for the land.

If a "Freedman's Bureau" cannot be formed, then the philanthropy of the North must form an organization, and supply teachers and funds. No part of the South beside is overcrowded with laborers. These people constitute the criminal population of this district and Virginia and Maryland. In hot days, they come out of their burrows to quarrel, rob, assault, and outrage, and every little while one of them is hung by Judge Lynch. The better class of negroes are compelled to live in the shadow of their lives.

Not since the war has there been such an excitement as on the day when the news of the safety of the "Jeannette" arrived. We are apt to forget that the army and the navy form a wheel within the wheel of government here. All night long, the State Department was open and the corridors crowded with uniforms. Old McDaunenhover stood for hours, with the tears running down his cheeks, unwilling to go home till he could carry the good news which did not come till twenty-four hours after.

In diplomatic circles, we have many changes to regret. Sir Edward Thornton has gone, with his pleasant, sensible family, and, in his train, Maurice Bunsen, the grandson of the Egyptologist. There are great changes in the Spanish and Portuguese legations, and a complete overthrow in the Chinese and Japanese. Poor Japan! It must already rue its hasty intrusion into Western waters. They have already "gone over its soul."

It has been very pleasant to observe that a picture of Garfield enters into every household with the Christmas and New Year's cards. C. H. DALL.

MATERIALISM, IDEALISM, AND MR. SPENCER.

Editors of The Index:—

Mr. J. G. Whyte calls for an explanation of a contradiction which he professes to find in Mr. Spencer's utterances on the subjects of idealism and materialism. It strikes me that, if Mr. Whyte had read with care those nineteen chapters to which he refers in the second volume of Mr. Spencer's Psychology, he would have found the contradiction vanishing. The whole difficulty arises from the assumption your correspondent makes, that between idealism and materialism there can be no middle term. How any one familiar with Mr. Spencer's writings can make such an assumption, and take no notice of the elaborate line of argument by which Mr. Spencer seeks to overthrow it, I confess I cannot understand. However, this is what Mr. Whyte does; and I can only conclude that, so far as those "nineteen chapters" were concerned, he was well content to know that Mr. Spencer was attacking idealism, and did not care to inquire too curiously on what grounds.

Mr. Spencer's objection to idealism is not that it reduces the properties of matter to subjective affections,—so far, he accepts the idealistic line of argument, as Mr. Whyte himself has shown,—but that it tries to dispense with an external cause of those subjective affections. It is here, and here only, that he finds it "insane." But his believing in an external cause does not commit him to materialism,—a system of thought which places outside of the mind the very things which he has declared to be affections of the mind. The materialist is glad to hear Mr. Spencer talking of an external cause; for he at once jumps to the conclusion that Mr. Spencer can mean nothing but matter. But the philosopher expressly and most emphatically states that he means nothing of the kind, and that his external cause is something utterly unrecognizable by human faculties. Mr. Spencer's philosophy may thus be roughly defined as idealism plus a belief in an unknowable cause of our subjective affections. As between the two positions, the idealistic and the materialistic,—supposing one were shut up to a choice between them,—Mr. Spencer has declared his preference for the idealistic.

Now, it is quite open to the idealist to criticise Mr. Spencer's postulate of an external cause; and it is equally open to the materialist to criticise his conception of that cause, but it is not open to any one who has read Mr. Spencer with attention to say that he has left his argument at loose ends. That can only be done upon the strength and under the influence of the unproved assumption that he who believes in an external cause at all must believe that cause to be matter.

Here I was on the point of closing; but a glance at Mr. Whyte's letter obliges me to notice briefly another point. The doctrine of evolution, he says, has the great merit of "giving the final refutation of the vain and futile reasonings of idealism." This is a most extraordinary statement, considering that Mr. Whyte finds the writings of the greatest living exponent of the evolution philosophy tainted, as he regards it, with idealism. Everything that is objectionable in idealism, from Mr. Whyte's point of view, Mr. Spencer adopts; and the rider that he adds to it, in the shape of an external but wholly unknowable cause, Mr. Whyte, as I have reason to believe, thinks of little or no value. Yet, with all this staring us full in the face, we are told that evolution gives "the final refutation to the vain and futile reasonings of idealism." On whose authority is this said? Why, the very names Mr. Whyte quotes should have made him a little more cautious. He mentions Professor Huxley—surely, the less that is said about his opposition to idealism, the better—and Mr. Savage and Mr. Fiske. What are they? One thing we may confidently say: they are not materialists. The fact is that, the more the doctrine of evolution gains ground, the more do the higher minds of our generation incline to that view of the properties of matter as "subjective affections," which Mr. Spencer accepts, and which the late Professor Clifford pronounced to have been established by the clearest and most indubitable teachings of physical science. Mr. Whyte's words may contain a prophecy, but they do not accord with actual facts or even with any observable tendency.

CLASSIFICATION OF LIBERALS.

Editors of The Index:—

In the issue of The Index for December 3 was an excellent article upon Liberalism by B. F. Underwood, which I have hoped to find indorsed and further elaborated by some of our good Liberals; but so far, I think, little notice has been taken of it. He refers to the different degrees of the old Christian thought which are yet remaining among those who gladly class themselves as Liberals, though each following perhaps a different line of thought from the rest of Liberals. Though there is much in the article that ought to call forth further remark, I must now refer to the culmination of the retrospect or introspect, in a suggestion of "a theoretical or nominal classification of Liberals, . . . terms employed that will enable all to understand the positions and principles of the various classes of Liberals." I like this idea, and feel strongly the necessities of the case, in order to obviate the necessity of explaining one's "positions and principles" in every communication made. He truly says, "The great majority of Liberals have an aversion to the word 'infidel,' convinced that it does not define their position," etc. I object decidedly to this term, which is so vague that it is made to cover every shade of thought that varies from Evangelical Christianity (even Universalists have been termed infidels), and which defines nothing.

In The Index of October 27, Miss Hardaker has an interesting article, as is usual whenever she writes, entitled "Does Materialism destroy our Moral Ideals?" but it loses its point by our not knowing whether she is talking of all liberalistic ideas or of Materialism proper. She questions the destruction of our moral ideals by our relinquishment of the old incentives of "divine interference and supervision," which have been so long looked to "as a basis of morals." Perhaps I am foolishly jarred by the term "Materialist"; but it seems she covers ground that belongs equally to the scientific thinker, to the agnostic, and even to many who do not doubt the continuance of individual existence after the body ceases to exist, and these, none of them, should be named Materialist, though they have, with him, given up the "supernatural conscience" and the "divine interference" and all belief in a divine personality; and to so pertinaciously confine the consideration of her subject to the cold realms of "Materialism," whose dogmatic teachings, as I understand them, recognize matter as the only entity in existence, and mind as a simple product of the same, asserting its negation of the possible continuation of life, independent of that of the body, seems to me a little unneighborly at least, and as showing a tendency to be exclusive in appropriation of the good things,—which, perhaps, however, she did not intend.

It is quite likely this may all be a misapprehension on my part, growing out of non-explanation of terms. Therefore, let us have the definition, if possible, of the different classes of Liberals; and I for one will select my colors, and sail under them when I have anything to say. Make us a list as long or longer, if needed, as Francis E. Abbot's "Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism," and as definitely accurate. Give them a little corner of the paper as often as you choose, that people may have their lexicon at hand.

MR. CHARLES BRIGHT IN AMERICA.

Editors of The Index:—

Mr. Charles Bright, the well-known freethought lecturer of Australia and New Zealand, has recently arrived in San Francisco, Cal. For a number of years past, Mr. Bright has been actively engaged in freethought propaganda; and his efforts have probably done more than those of any other one person to bring about the present marked progress in the liberalizing of public sentiment in Australia. For three years past, he has been speaking in Sydney, N.S.W., to audiences averaging a thousand, his farewell address being listened to by some fifteen hundred auditors. Ill-health necessitated the cancelling of his future engagements; and, by the voyage and a twelve-month visit to America, he hopes to recuperate his failing strength and health. After an interval of rest and repose, Mr. Bright may favor the San Franciscans with a few of his able and eloquent presentations of the liberal gospel. In the spring, he purposes journeying eastward; and I bespeak for him a cordial welcome at the hands of the untrammelled thinkers of our country. Mr. Bright is a gentleman of scholarship and culture, a clear, level-headed thinker and reasoner, and a gifted and eloquent orator, "on whom there is no discount," as Prof. Wm. Denton writes me.

PRESIDIO OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

FROM A YOUNG SUBSCRIBER.

Editors of The Index:—

As everybody who takes your paper must sympathize to some extent with its object and work, it may not be uninteresting to you to learn that I think a great deal of my paper and get much good from its columns. I am enthusiastic over each number of it. I think it probable that I am one of your youngest subscribers, being sixteen years of age when I first subscribed, one year ago, which I did with money of my own earnings. I like The Index better since the change, though I thought it as good as it could be before. I am glad to see more articles by Mr. Savage, of whose sermons and writings I am very fond. I also like very much your lady contributors, Mrs. Underwood and Mrs. Cheney. The "Editorial Notes," "Current Topics," and "Personals," I read over about six times each week. I was delighted to see recently that Col. Ingersoll was to write us an article, and hope it will not be long forthcoming. Heartily wishing The Index an extended circulation and great prosperity,

I am yours respectfully,

H. W. F.

A SUGGESTION.

Editors of The Index:—

The revision of the New Testament has been well received. The Old will bear similar pruning. The national assassin now on trial declares that he removed the President by the command of God for the benefit of the nation. Where does he find parallel cases in the old record? Jephtha's rash vow and Abraham's sacrifice. This egotistical, unbalanced religious lunatic finds his warrant in these and similar cases. For the benefit of the present and coming generations, I suggest to intelligent D.D.'s that these stories be omitted in the coming revision of the Old Testament, or repudiated as examples. They should not be considered canonical, or even merely apocryphal.

BOSTON, Dec. 29, 1881.

ANOTHER SUGGESTION.

Editors of The Index:—

Since I again became subscriber to your paper, I have been exceedingly pleased with the numbers I have received, and think the paper well keeps up the excellent character it had under the former editor, Mr. Abbot, who had the care of it when I was in your country. But will you bear gently with one suggestion for improvement?

Please leave out the name of the man who murdered your President. Mayhap we are more intolerant in England than you are: we have not yet learned the charity that endureth all things, and one thing we can't endure is the thought of that man and his crime. Surely, when once we have had to face the fact that the crime was committed and was successful to the end, and when we have groaned in spirit at the weakness and wickedness still remaining in humanity, and have sworn to ourselves to do what we can to make the world a little better, hoping that soon such crimes shall be almost inconceivable, we ought not, in a paper that we read for the sake of encouragement and light, to be tormented week by week by the memory of this hated crime. Spare us. Attack fanaticism in other ways. Illustrate your theories in some other fashion. That man is already damned: let us forget that he is not dead. Yours truly,

AN ENGLISHMAN.

ST. LEONARDS ON SEA, Dec. 10, 1881.

FROM A NEW SUBSCRIBER.

Editors of The Index:—

A friend has just loaned me a few copies of The Index, with which I am so well pleased I hasten to subscribe. I would like to begin with December 8, the number containing the "Kant" article, of which number I want three copies. I want these extra copies as much for the article headed "The Affirmative Side" as for the lecture on Kant. Both are good. I have been a "freethinker" thirty years, and have never seen the affirmative side better stated than in the article alluded to. One of the most pleasing features of The Index is its freedom from personalities. I am interested in Mr. Clarke's articles on Land Reform in England. I think it much needed, and no doubt legislation can do something toward it; but I am certain England can never be prosperous and happy until the people eat their grain as bread and meat instead of drinking it as beer and whiskey. As long as the people of Great Britain consume liquors to the amount of $20 a head, for every man, woman, and child, per annum, no legislation, nor conceivable land reform, can do them much good. I would like to see Mr. Clarke's ideas on this point. With me, the problem is how to enlighten men's spiritual vision so they can see clearly the causes of their degradation. They will not be likely to try to get out, until they realize they are in. A large class of thinkers say, "Give them good material conditions, and the spiritual will take care of itself." I cannot think it: witness the result of "Romney Leigh's" efforts in that direction. But how shall we make them see? that is the problem. "Where there is no vision, the people perish." I would like to ask Mr. Adler a question or two. He says, "I should seek to achieve happiness for the purpose of illustrating a universal law." Would that be a higher motive than to seek it for its own sake? He says, "Happiness is the means, and the gradual approximation toward a law universal, which is at once the ideal of science and the task of ethics, is the end." I have no doubt there is a deal of meaning in that sentence, but to me it is misty. I do wish he would "rise and explain," and tell us what he really means by it.

Yours fraternally,

S. CARTER.

FROM AN AGED LIBERAL.

Editors of The Index:—

I wish I could help The Index. It is read here with great interest, and I wish its circulation could be increased. After a life of almost eighty years, I regret that I dreamed away the younger part of my life. I was a promoter of the first Sunday-school in South-western New York about 1820, joined the Methodist Church in 1834 and remained in it till 1839. When in Mississippi on business, I saw thirty slaves sold at auction, and went to church and heard a sermon justifying slavery. Then I began to think and investigate; and, for the past twenty years, I have been called an infidel, because of my rejection of what I once passively believed. But I feel free, and am as happy as my environment will permit. It is my conviction that dogmatic theology has retarded civilization. I shall die soon, and with the regret only that I cannot devote an ordinary lifetime to the liberal cause which is so well begun.

During my extensive travels and dealings the past twenty years in Canada, and in the West and South as well as the East, I have found a large majority of the best business men I have met holding views on religion essentially the same as those I maintain.

M. MCGOWAN.

ALBANY, N.Y., December, 1881.

MR. WILLIAM BIRNEY, of Washington, D.C., in a business letter writes, "I am glad The Index has sloughed off the greater part of its old title, and I congratulate its readers on the recent marked improvement in the character of the paper." A friend writes from Albany: "I look upon The Index as the best paper in the world. Judge Hurlburt is also delighted with it, and, the last time I saw him, spoke highly of it. I hope yet to see it well circulated among the people."

BOOK NOTICES.

THE LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN. By John Morley. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

One rises from the perusal of this record of Cobden's life with a sense of satisfaction that one so eminently calculated to do justice to England's great political economist as Morley was chosen to do the work. That he has done it well must be the verdict of every careful reader, and no reader of the biography can fail to be impressed with admiration for the biographer as well as for his subject. Apart from its interest as the story of an earnest, active, successful life, this book is an excellent lesson in political economy, which is pretty thoroughly discussed, though in an apparently incidental way, in its pages.

It is a very fine, strong, thoroughly manly character which Mr. Morley hints for us. Coming up through his own exertions, his only capital his far-seeing business tact, his clear-sightedness in the larger affairs of the nation, and his thorough honesty of purpose in whatever he undertook, from comparative poverty to be the leader of a large political faction in a great nation, this record of his success by an appreciative thinker contains a lesson of hope and encouragement to the sometimes impatient workers in the same field to-day. Without reading this Life, no one can understand how thoroughly Cobden was imbued with the sense of the paramount necessity of economic reform in governmental affairs, nor of the arduous work he performed as a writer, thinker, and speaker, to bring his ideas into practical form. In conjunction with his ever-faithful friend and coadjutor, John Bright, he did much toward the repeal of the Corn Law in 1846. He worked all his life in the interests of free trade,—his special hobby,—though all reformatory measures found in him an earnest supporter, whether in or out of Parliament.

In his extensive travels through Europe and America, when his reputation as a successful statesman gave him access to the society of crowned heads and the most renowned men in all the nations he visited, his one theme and subject of investigation was always the different methods of economic legislation; and every new hint thus gained was soon formulated in his clear-thinking brain into a help in the up-building of his own particular theory. Honest, upright, philanthropic, and unselfish as he proved himself in public life, he is found none the less admirable in his private relations,—a faithful, consistent friend, a loving brother, a tender father, and devoted husband. The numerous extracts from Cobden's letters which are given in this volume much enhance its value, as giving an insight into Cobden's clear, forcible, and graphic style of writing. His comments on the distinguished men and women he met have a freshness and vigor all their own. They are excellent word-pictures, executed with a few strong, telling strokes, which bring before us at once all the most salient points of the character portrayed. The volume is full of temptations to quote; but our space forbids the indulgence of that temptation, and we can only say in conclusion that Mr. Morley has given us one of the few imperishable books of the year.

EXPERIENCES OF PIONEER LIFE IN THE EARLY SETTLEMENTS AND CITIES OF THE WEST. By James B. Walker. Chicago: Sumner & Co., publishers.

This is one of those unique autobiographies with which our biographical literature is occasionally enriched, and which are generally the result of the efforts of original and self-made men to tell their own stories in their own way. Among the more notable of these have been the autobiographies of Peter Cartwright and Lorenzo Dow; and this book, though differing of course in the manner of recital, inasmuch as Professor Walker differs from these brother preachers in views and methods, has the same racy flavor of ingenuous sincerity and honest confession as to the ins and outs of the real life of the narrator, which give the autobiographies referred to an exceptional interest and value, and make them delightful reading. Professor Walker is the author of a number of books, among others of a polemical work entitled The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation, which has been translated into several languages, and is used as a text-book in theological schools in this country and in Europe. Professor Walker began life on the lowest rounds of the social ladder, was successively a worker in a nail-factory, a clerk in a frontier store, a printer, law student, agent of the Bible Society, editor, publisher, preacher, author, State senator, and lastly a college professor. Each step upward was gained by hard work and indomitable perseverance; and the story of his progress is told in this book in an inimitably quaint and interesting manner. His life as an earnest and active worker in many reforms, anti-slavery, temperance, etc., brought him into contact with many prominent men and women; among others, the Beechers, father and son, Rev. C. G. Finney, John Brown of Harper's Ferry fame, Theodore D. Weld, and others. One of the most unique experiences related by Professor Walker is his account of his youthful and transient passion for Eliza Snow, the Mormon poetess, before her conversion to Mormonism, and when he knew her only as an interesting young girl who wrote poetry under the nom de plume of "Angerona" for a local paper on which young Walker was employed.

THE Popular Science Monthly for January, 1882, is one of the best numbers ever published of a magazine which, it is justly said, "reflects the breadth, the independence, and the catholicity of thought that distinguish the scientific men of our time." We can only give the contents, which, however, suggest the breadth and variety of the thought presented in its pages: "Earth-worms and their Wonderful Works," by W. H. Larrabee (illustrated); "Astronomy in High Schools," by Miss Eliza A. Bowen; "Time-keeping in Paris," by Edmund A. Engler (illustrated); "Jurassic Birds and their Allies," by Prof. O. C. Marsh; "What is Transcendental Physics?" by Paul R. Shipman; "New Guinea and its People," by Rev. W. G. Lawes (illustrated); "Sanitary Relations of the Soil," by Dr. Max von Pettenkofer; "Progress of Copyright Law," by Benjamin V. Abbott; "Volcanic Products" (illustrated); "The Chemistry of Coffee and Tea," by Albert B. Prescott; "The Anatomy of an Old Anecdote," by William B. Bellson; "The Bunsen Lamp," by H. P. Armsby (illustrated); "The Colorado Desert," by Joseph F. James; sketch of Prof. John W. Powell; "Entertaining Varieties," "Correspondence," "Editor's Table," "Literary Notices," "Popular Miscellany," "Notes." This number alone is worth the price of the entire volume.

"PERHAPS now," says the Springfield Republican, referring to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, "this remarkable society will be able to find time to do something for the half-starved and half-frozen little girls, many of them younger than Corinne, who swarm in the down-town streets and squares of New York. Its agents can find scores of them any evening, without going out of sight of the city hall clock."

POETRY.

POSSESSION. For The Index.

A Parable.

I said, one morn, "I will review my wealth,
My lands of rare estate!"
And, lo! swift weeds and high had choked by stealth
What else were fairest growth! Early and late

A spell was in the air. Mine eyes waxed blind.
Nothing seemed fine or good.

No voice could charm, no friend to me be kind,
All was distortion to my thankless mood.

My heritage was vain. My soul was sealed
To influence sweet. Mine ear
Could catch no rhythmic pulse of lives afield, Fleet wings of bird or bee. No flower-haunts near Wove mystic, viewless nets my feet to snare.

"Joyless the world!" I cried.

And straightway one, who in his right hand bare
A magic lens, appeared my path beside.

To my filmed, fretful sight, the glass he raised,
And wondrously outspread

My vista of possession! Centuries blazed
Like jewels, each one glory-heralded,

Each heralding the new. Strange meanings flashed Revealed to my swift sense.

All hate with love, all grief with joy, was dashed,
All toil with hope,—e'en where I traced, intense,

Those misty footprints vanishing o'er the verge,

Where old blind Homer hurled
(As breaks on sea-set crag the baffled surge)

Great shocks of song against a blinder world!

Down the long line of dreamers, toilers, all
Their final heights achieved.

No spirit truly grand but broke its thrall;
No prophet-word but was at last believed.

All martyrdoms bred peace. All truths gleamed gold.
All drosses fell to earth,

And, slow-transmuted, blessed earth's young and old
With healing. Life from death and doom had birth.

Then vibrant thrilled his voice who walked beside:

"To him that hath, new gifts
Drop daily, hourly. So shall naught abide
With him who undiscerning gaze uplifts!"

OLD AGE.

For The Index.

(FROM GOETHE.)

Old age at first with gentle
Rap knocketh at your gate,
Nor shows he sign of anger,
When told outside to wait.
But nevermore he leaveth,—
Steps boldly in some day,— Heeds not your frigid welcome:
"Who asked you here, sir, say?"

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

We are the heirs of Time. Unhappily, it is in the nature of heirs to be heedless of the origin of their wealth, ungrateful to those who created it. We accept what comes to us, heedless of the signs it bears of hard-handed toil, struggle, and suffering.—G. H. Lewes.

Yes, here in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable Actual, wherein thou even now standest,—here or nowhere is thy ideal. Work it out therefrom, and working believe, live, be free.—Carlyle.

Young men talk of trusting to the spur of the occasion. That trust is vain. Occasions cannot make spurs. If you expect to wear spurs, you must win them. If you wish to use them, you must buckle them to your heels before you go into the fight.—James A. Garfield.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JAMES K. APPLEBEE spoke from the desk of the Parker Memorial last Sunday, and his discourse was well received.

HERBERT SPENCER has just published the last part of his work Descriptive Sociology, which treats of "French Civilization."

It is said that the two most valued and valuable members of the New York State Board of Charities are two women, Mrs. Lowell and Miss Carpenter.

TENNYSON is by no means "a society man." He has a few choice, stanch, congenial, and well-beloved friends, but for the most part he prefers solitude and his pipe.

JAMES GORDON BENNETT, of the New York Herald, has gone to St. Petersburg to confer with the Russian government as to the feasibility of starting a new polar expedition.

CHARLES SUMNER much admired the scintillations of wit characteristic of Wendell Phillips' conversation, and remarked of them: "They sometimes crop out in his speeches too, but they never do in mine. You might as well look for a joke in the Book of Revelations."

THE orthodox press, and some of the secular journals of orthodox proclivities, show downright dishonesty in their reference to O. B. Frothingham. Ignoring the authorized statements which have been published, that he has seen no reasons for changing his opinions, they persist in representing that he has abandoned his liberal views, and that he shows decided leanings toward Orthodoxy. They seem to think that "a lie well stuck to is as good as the truth."

CAPT. PAUL BOYTON claims to have made a curious discovery as to certain social customs during his recent trip down the Missouri River. He found that many white men are in the habit of buying Indian girls for wives; and these women, with their half-breed children, are in a large measure slaves of the husband and father, being bought and sold or exchanged whenever the owner grows tired of them or can drive a good bargain by means of their labor. Capt. Boyton thinks justly that this abuse is a matter for governmental interference.

A REV. JAMES E. SMITH (Universalist), of Abington, Mass., has "embraced" Orthodoxy. He had become unpopular in his society, and a correspondent of the Boston Herald says, "The reverend gentleman's days of usefulness in this town were at an end long before his religious change was announced." We have long observed the facility with which some theologians can charge from heterodox to orthodox and vice versa, when the change is favored by personal and financial interests. This is perhaps one of the indications of our transitional stage of religious thought.

MRS. AMELIA HATHAWAY, who delivered a highly praised address on the philosophy of the German pessimist Schopenhauer before the Concord School of Philosophy last summer, died rather suddenly at her home in Little Prairie Ronde, Mich., on the 26th ult., leaving an infant daughter a few days old, and her husband, Mr. Hathaway, who is the author of a recent work, The Legends of the Iroquois, which has won favorable criticism in literary circles. Mrs. Hathaway is described as being "simple and unpretending in manner as a child, gentle in address, and as amiable in character as she was intellectual in apprehension."

THE members of the Massachusetts Bar experienced a decidedly new sensation one day last week, through the appearance before it of a lady lawyer, Mrs. Belya Lockwood, of Washington, D.C., to plead a woman's case. The reporters, presumably of the masculine gender, seemed to be more impressed by her toilet than her speech, at least they gave the particulars of the former at greater length than the latter. We learn that Mrs. Lockwood is "a lady of medium size, about fifty years of age, with a face and bearing that would command respect and attention wherever she might be. Her gray hair is combed back and wound in a heavy coil high up on the back of her head. Her features are delicate and finely chiselled, and, aside from its kindliness, the most striking impression received from her countenance is that of ability and efficiency." An elaborate account of her dress makes the reader amazed at the perceptive faculties of the reporters.

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

THE Boston Transcript advocates the opening of the city library to the public on the winter holidays, "in the interest of morality, intelligence, and good order."

THE Government of Russia evidently thinks that it needs the influence of the Church to maintain its authority. It has ordered that the national theatres be closed on Saturday nights, on the ground that the Sabbath begins at that time, and also on all fête days and during the season of Lent.

THE management of the working department of the Kentucky Penitentiary seems to need investigation and remodelling, since, within one year, eight convicts employed in its hemp-hackling business have each deliberately cut off one of his hands in order to escape the torture of the employment.

IN Germany there are 3,250 co-operative associations. Of these, 1,895 are loan or credit societies, peoples' banks, etc., 674 industrial societies, 645 stores for the sale of goods, and 36 building societies. The stores are the most profitable, and the banks next, while the industrial organizations are the least prosperous.

THERE is a strong and growing feeling against the Mormons in England; and two of their missionaries, who tried to hold a meeting in the suburbs of London on a recent Sunday, were rudely attacked by a mob, roughly handled, and their meeting broken up. But they are not likely to be put down by such means.

THE Mormons of Utah have quickly caught the "boycotting" idea, and have lately begun to practise it on the "Gentiles." They now give their patronage only to postmasters of their own faith, even when to do so puts them to much personal inconvenience. The United States authorities, in trying to remedy this state of affairs, have found it necessary to remove Mormons from this office, filling their places with Gentile postmasters, and the Mormons are thus "hoist with their own petard."

THE Irish landlords, finding their rents reduced by the land commission, ask for compensation from the government; but Mr. Chamberlain, the radical member of Parliament, declares that, if compensation is due any class, it is due the tenants on account of the too high rents they have heretofore paid. The Land Act, in spite of the opposition of selfish landlords and of short-sighted tenants, is accomplishing the purpose designed, and is destined to take rank among the great reforms of the last quarter of the nineteenth century.

THE new war minister of Russia has advised the academical teachers of medicine to dismiss their female assistants and employ men in their places, and has ordered the military hospitals to exclude women students. For some time in Russia, women of recognized ability and successful practice have been chosen by professors as assistant teachers. The number of female students has increased until it is now four hundred. But the Russian government seems to think that the education of women to teach or practise medicine is dangerous and should be discouraged, if not forbidden; and the action of the war minister is in keeping with the general policy of repression and subjugation to which the reactionary party in Russia is committed.

TO THOSE who remember what an uncompromising hater of shams and all sentimental nonsense Horace Greeley was, it seems odd, to say the least, to learn that one of the first aphorisms with which Oscar Wilde favored the American public was addressed to Greeley's youngest daughter, Gabrielle, who sat in the same box with him, witnessing the play of "Patience," a burlesque of the æsthetic craze. "This," said the "super-poetical, very æsthetical" Oscar to Miss Greeley, "is the tribute the mediocre pays to that which is not mediocre." Involuntarily, one wonders what would have been the reply of the father of the young lady, had Oscar addressed his remark to him. Something, probably, which would have set the young man to thinking. It is a pity the young æsthete could not have met the philosopher of the Tribune instead of his daughter. He might have caught some new ideas in dress from the well-known and honored white coat and hat.

THE English Governor-General of Hong Kong reports that, although the number of Christian workers employed and the amount of money spent for Christian missions in China have been greatly augmented, the work of conversion is on the decline, and there are now fewer native Christians in that country than there were a century ago. It is asserted that, since the missionaries conduct their work under treaty stipulations, appealing to their consuls whenever aggrieved, they appear to the Chinese to have at their backs the armies and navies of foreign powers; and these ministers of Christ, with the religion they teach, share in the general odium which attaches to everything that is disliked in the treaty regulations and the treaty-making powers. If the missionaries could carry on their work without availing themselves of the protection of their respective governments, they would probably be more successful; but without that protection missionary life in China would be less safe than it now is, and fewer ministers would be attracted thither.

JOHN BRIGHT recently made a speech in North Wales, in which, after mentioning aggressive wars, laws favoring the accumulation of land in the hands of a few, and neglect to encourage or even to make possible popular education, among the causes of the ignorance, pauperism, and depravity in England, he declared that a happier era is dawning upon England, that more has been done the last ten years toward lifting the cloud of ignorance than in all the preceding centuries of English history. In 1869, a year before the education bill was passed, according to Mr. Bright, the number of inspected schools was 10,337, and with an attendance of 1,332,000. In 1880, there were 20,670 schools, the attendance numbered 3,155,000, and the grants to school-boards amounted to £10,739,000. These facts and figures he thought very encouraging. "With regard to our foreign affairs," said Mr. Bright, "may we not hope, looking back to the past, to the page of glory,—false glory, of glory based upon misery and bloodshed,—that page shall be a new page, and that the historian of the future shall record that we have come to a time of a higher civilization and of a higher and purer national morality?"

WILLIAM, the King of Prussia, has, by Prince Bismarck, issued a rescript directed nominally to the Prussian ministry, but evidently designed to apply throughout the German Empire, in which he declares in substance that the relations of the king to the people cannot be transferred to the ministers because they appertain to the person of the sovereign; that the measures of the ministry are those of the king; that it is his constitutional right to direct the policy of the government; that this policy must be supported by all officials, "even at the elections"; and that they must "hold aloof, even at the elections, from all agitation against my government." This is without doubt the work of the German Chancellor, and the object is to enable him to carry through the Reichstag measures which must inevitably be defeated without resort to absolutism to overcome parliamentary opposition. Whether this repressive policy will be carried out remains to be seen. It means, if successful, nothing less than the destruction of constitutional government in Germany. But, judging from the tone of the liberal leaders and the influential journals, it is not improbable that even the iron will of Bismarck will be forced to bend before the opposition which this imperial manifesto will arouse. The National Zeitung says that "the Liberals would deplore such conflict, without, however, being deterred from pursuing the objects which they have in view, as the present state of things is not their fault." The article concludes: "The fidelity of the Prussian people to the constitution will again outlive the conflict, and the rest of Germany will not fail to follow the example." The Volks Zeitung considers the rescript the forerunner of a shortly impending crisis.

THE DESTRUCTION OF EVIL BY THE CULTURE OF GOOD.

It was a saying of Newton (Sir Isaac or Rev. John) that "the principal method for defeating error is by establishing the truth. One purposes to fill a bushel with tares; but, if I can fill it first with wheat, I may defy his attempts." This was said more particularly of intellectual error; but it is quite as true of moral error, or the practical evil that comes upon human beings through vicious or ill-regulated propensities. And it is to this moral side of the principle thus stated that this article is designed to call attention.

Let it be understood, however, at the outset that to urge the importance of this method of dealing with evil is not to declare it the only method. Sometimes, indeed, the growth of moral evil has become so excessive and rank that there is no chance for cultivating any good qualities until the evil has been directly attacked and eradicated. This may be the case both in respect to individual evil habits and the evil into which entire communities sometimes fall. Moral wrong may grow to such power as to absorb and neutralize the good qualities of character, drain off to sustain its own vitality the best blood of a nation, and thus use up the very elements from which virtue is to be produced. And, wherever this has happened, the evil is to be directly assailed and mastered as a necessary preliminary condition for the culture of goodness in its place. All this is to be borne in mind, while the closely related truth is pointed out that one of the most effective methods—perhaps, in general, the most effective method—of overcoming moral evil is by cultivating and developing the antagonistic good.

In the first place, even if the evil is of so gross and rampant a character that it must be positively attacked and eradicated, care must be at once taken to nourish and strengthen the better propensities and tastes, or the work of eradication will have been of little avail. A field may be so overgrown with brambles that nothing useful can be produced in it until these have been thoroughly destroyed. But, if good seed be not at once sown in their place, and the growth of it carefully tended, the brambles will soon be there again as vigorous as ever. The human heart is a soil that must produce some kind of a crop. It is a soil all alive with the seeds of active impulses,—with desires, propensities, tastes, passions; and, if the evil among these have once got the mastery, they will be pretty sure to get it again, unless the good by diligent effort are put and kept in mastery over them. This is the reason why many persons, who appear to have been reformed from great vices, fall back again to their old bad courses when the pressure that has temporarily aroused their better impulses is withdrawn. These better impulses, however genuinely felt for the time, have not been cultivated so as to hold the character permanently to high objects; and, no counter attractions to good having been put in the place of the old and strong temptations, the victim, left to himself, falls easily into the worn grooves of his past evil habits. Reformation from vice is not even half-accomplished when an evil appetite is resisted and denied. There is really no safe beginning of reform until a good appetite has been planted in place of the evil.

These are moral truisms; but they are truisms that have not yet to any great extent been applied to public methods of philanthropy in dealing with the vicious and criminal classes of society. Boston philanthropy has just aroused itself to the work of establishing an attractive coffee-house for the purpose of drawing off some of the frequenters of liquor-saloons, and satisfying appetite without subjecting it to the temptations of those degrading places. This enterprise is excellent, so far as it goes. But what is one coffee-house for the people, in the midst of Boston's multitude of grog-shops? In Liverpool and London and Philadelphia, even private enterprise has shown that the coffee-house experiment of supplying the people with something better than the grog-shops furnish may be made a financial success. But such an attack on intemperance and its kindred evils should not be left to the uncertain competitions and necessities of private enterprise. That it can be made to pay for itself even pecuniarily, is only a louder call upon the philanthropy and piety of our great cities to take up this mode of dealing with this enormous public vice as one of their regular instrumentalities, with the advantage of being able to make one more point against the grog-shops by adding the possible pecuniary profits of the enterprise to the attractions of the coffee-rooms and the benefit of their frequenters. Suppose that the churches of Boston were to divide the territory of the city among them in sections proportioned to the membership and wealth of the churches, and each church take a section under its special responsibility for doing this work. Let each church then proceed to plant throughout its section, along the streets where poverty and vice and crime herd together, coffee-houses, holly-tree inns, reading and amusement rooms, industrial schools, places of popular but well supervised musical and dramatic entertainment,—dotting the streets with as many of these open and attractive moral saloons as there are grog-shops in them. Who can estimate the amount of evil that might thus be neutralized or destroyed? This would be a raid on the liquor-dealers more effective than any police raid. And this kind of work rests on the truth that, to reform and eliminate evil, you must put a vital principle of good in the place of it. To abate the consequences of a vicious appetite, a healthy and elevating appetite must be trained by its side, and its demands kept satisfied, in order to draw off vital force from the vicious desire.

The same principle is illustrated again by that most discouraging fact, made patent to all who have had anything to do with attempts to aid branded criminals or those who have once been in prison, or to reform the unfortunate class of women who have fallen victims to licentiousness,—the fact that it is one of the hardest things in the world to put these classes of persons under the influence of helpful surroundings. Few people are ready to take a degraded woman or a man from the State's prison into their houses or their places of employment. Even those who genuinely desire to aid such unfortunate ones back to honest and pure ways of living rightfully question whether they should risk vitiating the innocent by their companionship. Hence, it is almost inevitable that those upon whom the brand of such guilt has once been publicly placed will be pushed into such courses and companionships as will only continue to elicit their evil propensities, though their very salvation from utter moral ruin depends on the cultivation of what is good in them. Hence, the need of special institutions, supported by public taxation or private charity, where the reformation of these classes can be cared for, with employments and recreations appealing to their better nature, until they can again find safe and honorable recognition in society.

But there are other kinds of moral evil,—propensities, tastes, tendencies, which have got a wrong bent or an excessive vigor, but have not yet crystallized into evil habits and much less into criminal character. With this kind of evil, hardly any other treatment is requisite or is more effective, especially with young persons, than the assiduous cultivation of good propensities and pure aspirations, which shall so grow and overshadow the evil that the latter will die out from sheer want of nutriment. There are more or less of such seeds of evil in the vast majority of human beings. They come by natural inheritance, or by accidental lodgement from without, or by some temporary excess given to a disposition in itself good and true. They are vital, and, if suffered to do so, may spring up and bear a plentiful crop of trouble and misery. But if a wise care and culture come in, awakening the better instincts and faculties to activity,—setting reason on its throne, vitalizing conscience, arousing the love of truth and right, and putting into active leadership all the highest aspirations of mind and heart,—the result is almost sure to be good. When human minds have been trained to love truth and right and goodness for their own sakes, the battle with personal evil has for them ended.

And this is the high end of all genuine moral culture,—to infuse the mind with a vital energy which shall instinctively shrink away from and repel every form of untruth and unrighteousness, and as instinctively turn toward and work for the good and the true. The man that shuns vice, not only because it is vice, but because it is distasteful and unattractive, is morally safe. To be held to virtue by the force of reason or conscience is very much; but reason and conscience may both be overthrown in an unguarded moment by the seductive power of a pleasurable vice. But to be held to virtue not only by sense of duty, but by disgust for vice, is to stand above the reach of temptation itself. Whoever thus follows righteousness is held to it as planet to its sun.

W. J. P.

THEISM AND THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD.

Science proceeds upon sensible observation. To what does it proceed? What direction do its inquiries take? After making its observations or in pursuing them, what does it farther attempt to do? This is a question worthy the serious attention of those who see in the scientific method the true iter ad astra, or rather the true way beyond the star. Science attempts one of three things: 1. Having observed particular phenomenal effects, it returns from them, and endeavors to ascertain from what definable force or forces, no less phenomenal, those effects proceed. Thus, in gravitation, a measurable and so far definite force was discovered, which governs the motion of the planets. This is the highest work of science. Often it must be content with less. 2. In many cases, science can do no more than discover a rule according to which a certain class of effects uniformly take place, and may be expected always to take place. In the law of definite proportions, for example, a rule was found which is uniformly observed in chemical combinations, but without the discovery of any specific force which should necessitate the rule, though speculative attempts to account for it, more or less plausible, have been made. In Grimm's law of phonetic changes, a discovery was made of the same sort, but more limited. A rule was found according to which certain changes once did take place, but without giving us any reason to think that the rule obtained in any other than a specific instance, or will obtain in any future one. 3. Descending still, science may seek only to classify a multitude of observed facts in a natural order of arrangement, without considering those facts as effects, or at least without attempting any scientific account of them when so considered. Such, until recently, was the case with the sciences of natural history. Darwin, however, took up the facts of species as effects, and sought to do in one province of science what Newton had done in another, by ascertaining the natural forces from which those effects arise.

It is quite possible that these specifications do not perfectly cover the whole field of science; but they so far determine its direction and objects as to sustain the conclusion from them which here follows. Science discovers, and from the nature of its objects can discover, no facts higher in kind than those from which its inquiries set out, but only facts which belong to the same order and are of the same degree. For example, the law of gravitation is not higher in kind than the existence and motion of the planets; the law of definite proportions is not of a nature superior to the existence and relation of chemical elements; the struggle for life, natural selection, environment, heredity, and the like, do not belong to an order above that of the effects ascribed to them. Indeed, these forces seem very distinctly inferior to effects imputed to them by some. For example, when the sovereign authority of morals, the sacred sense of obligation, is got out of environment, heredity, etc., I cannot help feeling that it is something like getting a Plato born from an alligator. But let us not dwell upon this matter. If spurious science falls below the facts it observes, true science can never transcend them. We have heard of reasoning "from nature up to nature's God,"—a fine feat, surely, but no feat for science to attempt. God is not a phenomenal force, nor a rule according to which certain effects take place, nor a natural order in which particular facts are arranged. Nor has science a vocation to reason up. It reasons from the particular to the general; but the particular from which, and the general to which, it reasons, belong to the same order and stand upon the same level. It has its place within the limits of phenomenal nature, and, in the attempt to transcend these, turns away from its popular objects, loses its character, and becomes an impertinence.
