THE funeral of Jesse James, the noted robber and murderer, was an imposing affair. It occurred in a Baptist church, "where he was converted in 1866." Two Baptist ministers performed the service, which was opened with the hymn, "What a friend we have in Jesus!" A very pathetic discourse was given on the necessity of faith and Christ's forgiveness of sins. Two sheriffs were among the pallbearers, and a large concourse of friends followed the body to the grave. Commenting on the death and burial of this human monster, the Nation says: "The comfort the Italian and Greek brigands find in the external observances of their creed, while committing the most atrocious crimes, is now an old story. A sceptical or agnostic robber is in fact unknown in Eastern or Southern Europe. The devout brigands all belong to the Catholic or Greek Church, which has always greatly exalted the value of external worship and pious credulity, and thus furnishes only too much temptation to those who are ready to believe without limitation for the purpose of postponing any change in their habits. The Protestant Church has been much more exacting in the manner of conduct, and in fact has afforded in its teachings but few of the refuges for easy-going sinners which its great rival provides so plentifully. But the fight between faith and right-living nevertheless rages within its borders unceasingly, and not always to the advantage of the latter. It is not only in the James district in Missouri that one comes on the strange compromises by which a certain external devoutness is made to atone to the conscience not only for spiritual coldness, but for long and persistent violations of the fundamental rules of morality. Startling as are these revelations about the state of society in that part of the country, they are hardly more startling, everything considered, than the frequency with which our defaulters and embezzlers in this part of the world prove to have been vestrymen, deacons, Sunday-school superintendents, and prominent church members during long years of delinquency and perfidy. There is nothing new about it at all."

WANTED.—A REVIVAL OF RELIGION.

A few years ago, in an elaborate public address, in which he surveyed the present most prominent wants and interests of the American people, Hon. Charles Francis Adams made the statement that the greatest need of this country is a genuine revival of religion. Coming from a man so little given to excitements, so cool, sober, and clear-headed, the remark had the effect of a humorous surprise, and some persons were ready to believe that the speaker meant to be jocose or was at least satirical. But the context showed that he was entirely in earnest, and that the remark was based on a thoughtful philosophy. Of course, the revival of religion which Mr. Adams had in mind was something quite different from that which runs like a prairie-fire through a negro camp-meeting and sometimes appears even in Caucasian congregations; but nevertheless, while consistent with liberal religious views and with sedate, practical common-sense, it was something that would partake of emotion and would spread and prosper by a sort of spiritual contagion, and hence could properly be called a religious revival. And its great utility, as Mr. Adams thought, would be that it would lift people of all classes out of petty bickerings and partisan strifes and sordid pursuits to a sensibility to loftier motives and to a capacity for worthier deeds. That a religious revival, if it could be confined to such ends, would be a benefit to the country, hardly admits of a question. But, in the present state of religious thought and feeling, are there any conditions favorable to such a revival? And is there any probability or possibility of its coming?

That there will still occur those spasmodic excitements commonly called "seasons of revival" in special churches and sects is probable enough. These "seasons," however, even where the doctrines admit of them, do not appear to come with the intensity and power which formerly characterized them. Increasing general enlightenment and increasing liberality of religious belief are certainly not propitious to the old-fashioned, demonstrative revivalism. In a group of churches holding substantially the same evangelical doctrines, their sensitiveness to the "revival" spirit will be found to be pretty exactly in inverse proportion to their general knowledge and culture. And the doctrines themselves, under which revivals were once fostered, have lost, with increase of culture, their sharp-cut distinctness and with it their ability to impress the imagination. In the theology of the "old-school" Orthodoxy of Christendom there were materials for two very vivid dramatic pictures, calculated powerfully to stir the emotions,—the unquenchable fire-torments of hell as the merited doom of every human being, and the merciful Christ suffering on the bloody cross to ransom man from that doom. But now that, even in the limits of Orthodoxy, the doctrine of eternal punishment is becoming involved in so much doubt, or, if retained still in the creeds, is kept so much in the background, and the mission of Jesus, though regarded as one of mercy still, is interpreted in so much freer and more natural way than was the case in the old commercial scheme of theology, the materials for those effective dramatic portraiture are very much damaged. The colors have faded out of them, and they have largely lost their power in any section of tolerably enlightened Christendom. You cannot move a revival meeting with an if. For that, you must have a certainty. And the more palpable, material, concrete, and immediate the certainty can be made to appear, the better for the purpose. The revival spirit demands a doctrine and preaching intensely realistic. And just in proportion as the old Evangelical theology is rationalized away and translated out of prosaic, logical realism into figures of speech, does it lose its power as a conductor of emotion. It does not seem probable, then, that the conditions of religious revival of the kind here considered will be renewed on an extensive scale, unless knowledge shall set backward toward ignorance and liberality yield again to bigotry.

But are there no possible conditions of a genuine revival of religion? Is religion itself to fade away, as an effective, dominant force in human affairs? There are people who think that this is to happen,—people to whom religion is synonymous with superstition. But the superstitions that have been so thickly associated with religion and that knowledge dispels, no more disprove the existence of religion itself as a genuine and permanent human experience than do the errors and wrongs that have been connected with the marriage institution disprove and set aside the fundamental natural fact of sex-distinction on which marriage rests. The fundamental elements of religion are so inherent in the very constitution of human nature itself, so necessary a part of the laws of human intelligence, that it is difficult to conceive of man as accomplishing his normal destiny without it. That is, man cannot be man without his finite thought being drawn in reverent search after the sovereign power manifest in the universe and without his moral sense recognizing an obligation to a sovereign law of right. Here is a mental gravitation, from which humanity can no more escape than the earth can fly from the sun; here, a vital relation to a law or force of life, from which man can no more sever his individual life than he can get outside of his own nature. And here in these inward and necessary gravitations, mental and moral, are the essential elements of religion.

And, if religion remains, it is altogether likely that there will come some fresh awakening of its power,—something like a new revelation of its transcendent position and potency in human life. But the kind of religious revival that will meet the changed conditions of modern thought will be of vastly greater moment than what are ordinarily called revivals in special Christian churches or denominations; for these play upon the emotions through the force of old beliefs, and hence have little bearing beyond the church or sect that cherish them; and the beliefs themselves, as we have seen, are becoming obsolete. A more exact parallel will be found in those epochs of history when new religions have been born, or when old religions have been very essentially transformed, or when important new sects have arisen to embody some larger view of truth. One of the primary conditions of every such era has been the inspiring power of some new thought. No religion nor sect nor church was ever born of emotion alone, nor ever lived long on emotion alone. In the origin of Christianity there was the very distinct proclamation of new ideas, the natural product of the extraordinary mental movement of the time, the actual mingling of three of the previous great religions of mankind; and these new ideas, presented in a way to impress the imagination and stir the heart, were the inspiration of the new religion. In the rise of Buddhism or of Mohammedanism, the same fact is evident. Some fresh belief was behind them as their motive power. Protestantism came as a revolution in the Christian Church, breaking it asunder, because of that most revolutionary of all thoughts, the human mind's assertion of its right to think for itself instead of committing its thinking to the Church to do for it. And the Protestant sects, Puritans, Quakers, Baptists, Unitarians, Universalists, etc., each marking in turn some genuine revival of religious activity, have been the deposit from successive tidal waves of thought rolling in from the broad deep sea of Protestant free inquiry. In considering the probability of a genuine revival of religion on a large scale with effective power, the question would seem to be, therefore, whether any new ideas or convictions are likely to arise capable of concentrating and embodying religious emotion and directing religious activity.

And since religion is a constituent part of human nature, and is surely emancipating itself from the superstitions which have enthralled and deformed it, we may be certain that in due time it will associate itself with a new system of thought, consonant with the free intellectual spirit of the age, and capable of revivifying power over human life. Already we may see at what point this thought will have its centre and in what direction will run its main lines. The old theologies of Christendom have clustered about the one idea of supernaturalism. The universe was conceived as divided into two segments,—one under the dominion of natural law and open to the investigation of human reason, though liable to unexplainable incursions from the upper realm; the other, wholly under the immediate control of Almighty will, super-rational, incapable of being understood by any human faculties. The new religious beliefs will cluster about the idea of a rational and natural universe, pervaded by the power of one law and one life throughout. Their starting-point, philosophically considered, will be the scientific fact that man finds himself in actual relation to the universe and to its vital forces and powers, whatever they are, and that in himself he recognizes a sense of obligation to learn the completest terms of this relation and to live in accordance with them. And the objective point of all activity will be morality and philanthropy,—the endeavor to put the highest ideal of a universe, in which the individual parts and members shall all help on the development of nobler life, into practical deed. Here are ideas which are not only capable of being wrought into a system of logical thought satisfying to the understanding, but which are able also to impress the imagination, and, what is of greater importance, to excite the enthusiasm of the heart and create motives of conduct. And when the ideas growing out of this new conception of the universe and of man's relation to it shall have taken full possession of the minds of large numbers of people, a genuine revival of religion, a new religion, in fact, will be close at hand. A movement will have begun in which thought, sentiment, action, will be concentrated upon the aim to make this part of the universe which is intrusted to human responsibility so strong in rectitude and so fair in virtue and beauty that it shall be fit to survive in the galaxy of worlds forever.

SCIENCE AND MORAL PROGRESS.

Knowledge increases in usefulness as it becomes methodized, in which form it is called science. Viewed separately, in ignorance of their relations to one another and to the well-being of man, facts are of but comparatively little value to anybody. Only when they are classified and their relations are grouped, and the processes called laws which they indicate are understood, is man able to use them to the greatest advantage. Without these generalizations there can be no comprehensive-ness of thought, no far-reaching plans or projects, no great intellectual or moral achievements.

Man's "pre-eminence over the beast" consists not merely in a special faculty, but in his greater knowledge, and in his greater capacity to acquire knowledge of his manifold relations to his environment. Whatever progress may make the coming man, compared with the man of to-day, an intellectual and moral giant, larger knowledge of himself and the ongoings of nature will be his distinguishing characteristic.

It is often remarked that mere knowledge is no evidence of moral character, and we are sometimes referred, in illustration of this statement, to

"A sinful soul possessed of many gifts;
A spacious garden full of flowering weeds;
A glorious devil, large in heart and brain,
That did love beauty only."

But such a character can be the product only of ages of evolution; and the results of ages of ignorance and savagery being ingrained in the mental as well as the physical constitution are more powerful determinants of conduct than the mere intellectual attainments of the individual, added to the inherited tendencies derived from a few hundred years of civilized life. Violence of passion, inborn selfishness, or lack of sensibility even, may blind a man of great knowledge to the rights, or render him indifferent to the sufferings of his fellow-men. Further, a large knowledge of many subjects is often found in minds that are lamentably ignorant of others which have a more direct relation to conduct. Many, too, have theoretical knowledge of matters of which they are so destitute of practical knowledge that they are unable to realize their real significance. We must consider that man has been learning through many centuries, in which the horizon of his thought, although gradually expanding, has been, compared with his outlook to-day, very circumscribed. Since it is impossible for him to disconnect himself from the past, he cannot divest his mind at once of ancient beliefs, much less of the results of ancient beliefs; nor can he in a day make new channels of thought, or think or act in a manner wholly consistent with newly discovered truth or newly acquired knowledge, when it conflicts with beliefs that have profoundly influenced the thought and life of his ancestors from whom the characteristics he possesses have come down to him as a legacy. We should therefore expect on a priori grounds the disparity between intellectual attainments and moral character, conspicuous illustrations of which can be found in almost any community.

It is, however, none the less true that the only natural basis for hope in man's moral progress is in his undeniable capacity for knowledge,—to which, in the region of the knowable, no limit can be set,—and his ability to methodize his knowledge, and make it minister in countless ways to his wants and his welfare. The whole tendency of modern civilized life is to repress the savage instincts and traits of man's nature and to develop and intensify those qualities of mind and heart which appear in a late period of his development, and which are even now too often reduced to the weakness of their nascent condition temporarily by the brutality of the savage, who attests his presence and reasserts his control in the civilized man of the nineteenth century. Fortunately, the influence of constantly increasing knowledge is eradicating the results of ages of ignorance in human character; and, when men shall become yet more emancipated from their bad inherited tendencies, they will be able not only to discover truth more easily, but to conform to the moral relations it reveals more readily. Inconsistency between conviction and conduct must become less general, and creed and character more in harmony with each other.

If a man believes that a certain course of conduct is for his best interests, judged by his highest moral standard, he will follow that course in proportion as he is unhampered by traits, beliefs, and tendencies that dominated in those ages of savagery in which men, not understanding their relations to one another, were short-sighted, acted from impulse, and were strangers to the higher sentiments and nobler motives which determine the conduct of the best men to-day.

That men are coming to understand more fully than they did in the past that virtue is wisdom and vice is folly can be clearly shown. That they now understand better than they did formerly what constitutes a virtuous character and a vicious character is sufficiently evident from a comparison of the ethical views of the best teachers of this age with the best among the ancients. That men live more morally now than in the past is evident from a comparison of this age with that of Pericles or Augustus, of Elizabeth or George III. That knowledge is increasing needs no proof. It is reasonable therefore to expect moral progress in the future.

The belief even now is very general, and likely to remain a long time with a certain class, that the only true basis and support of morality are afforded by theology. This belief has plausibility for the masses, because a portion of man's toilsomely acquired knowledge has been embodied in or connected with theological dogmas. What man has discovered in himself he has contemplated in God. The elementary facts of anthropology, long before they were systematized into a real science, were made the basis of the pseudo-science of theology, the assumptions of which stand out prominently in the history of the race; while the unrecorded thoughts, hopes, fears, and aspirations of the people out of which these dogmas grew are little thought of or entirely disregarded.

Conduct, influenced far less by theological beliefs than is commonly supposed, is determined by character,—the product of factors furnished by the experiences of countless millions who have lived and died,—and by surroundings which are continually modifying character. Every observation, discovery, and invention, and every act in the life of man that has helped to make him understand his relations, to enlarge his powers, to improve his physical condition, have contributed to the moral progress of the race.

With multiplied relations and increased complexity of social life, man is placed in a greater variety of positions and subject to far greater moral strain. The existence, therefore, in civilized society, of a multitude of evils, unknown to barbarians, is an unavoidable incident in the evolution of institutions and the growth of industrial pursuits that distinguish civilized from savage life. According to statistics, Protestant districts in Germany exhibit more fraud than Catholic districts; and the reason of this, evidently, is that more business is done in the former than in the latter. In Catholic districts, the excess is in acts of violence, because in those districts are more ignorance and poverty.

The more complex becomes man's relations, the greater the necessity and the greater the power of resisting temptation and yielding to the discipline of personal sacrifice for the general good. The moral sense, too, is strengthened, and its power in restraining the selfish propensities and in making conduct conform to conceptions of duty is augmented. The more man knows of science, the more clearly must he see and the more fully must he realize that morality is supreme over everything else, because upon its embodiment in character and conduct depends, more than upon everything else, the well-being of the race.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

A SERMON AND A LAY-SERMON.

A few weeks ago, a stranger was passing a Sunday in a thrifty village of Ohio. He attended church and heard a sermon from the text, "Having food and raiment, be content." Scripture and sermon were in accord: "In whatsoever state you are, be content." "Take no thought for to-morrow. . . . Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and are not you of more value than many sparrows? . . . He feeds the young ravens when they cry." The birds are content: God gives them food and feathers. Be you content: God gives you food and raiment."

Sunday-school followed, and a member of the lecture committee approached the stranger and said, "Your presence has been noticed, and members of my Bible-class join me in urging you to remain and talk to them." Yielding to the importunate request, the stranger met in an ante-room an eager audience, and spoke essentially the following lay sermon:—

Three weeks ago, I passed through a portion of West Virginia. I looked out from the car window on villages as full of filth and disorder as a Hottentot Kraal. Society was in that state of homogeneity in which the door-yard is not differentiated from the pig-yard. Men, women, and children were living in good fellowship with pigs and goats and geese. While listening to the Cleveland preacher awhile ago, the thought occurred to me that for two hundred years these Virginians had been hearing just such sermons as that. "Having pork and 'pone' and homespun, be content, be content."

The preacher took Paul at his lowest. Let me take him at his highest. Paul said, "Not as though I had already attained." A greater preacher than Paul—I mean Theodore Parker—said, "Two birds flutter forever about the family of man. The one is I Have, the other, O Had I. The one is the bird in the hand, the other is the bird in the bush. The function of the bird I Have is to lay the egg whence comes the goodlier bird O Had I."

The water weed is an aggregation of cells. If we probe the cell-wall, there flows out a translucent, spontaneously moving jelly. We call it protoplasm. It lives, and is the only thing that lives. In the cell-wall of the plant, it is content, that is, "contained." In the rhizopod, it is not quite content. It pushes itself out in little threads of plasma to seize whatever nutrient atomies are floating by. This same protoplasmic life ensnares the muscles and nerves and brain of man. Content in the cell of a water weed, thrusting out pseudo-podia in the rhizopod, in the brain it is one face of a profound fact. The other is the Psyche. In the rhizopod, its molecular movement is translated into movement of the mass. In the brain, its molecular movements are either translated into thoughts, or they are in correlation with thoughts. The out-reaching now is not of the protoplasm, but of the Psyche. Our pseudo-podia reach forth through abysses of time and abysses of space. Worlds are the nutrient atomies they would grasp. The past of nature, the past of man, thoughts of thinkers, songs of poets, creations of Phidias and Angelo and Raphael, all readings of the real, and all dreamings of the ideal, minister to the far-reaching Psyche. If all birds were in the Psyche's hand, her Bird of Paradise would still be in the bush. And still she would follow on from bush to bush, seeking the bird which perches from higher to higher. No song piped from the throat and no hues flashed from the burnished plumage of any bird in the hand can stay the Psyche from her quest in the bush.

Has this winged Psyche been content with her encasement? The ape has a longer arm; but man, in sublime discontent with his limitations, has laced the globe with nerves of wire, and made his arm as long as the longest wire. Whatever a man can do at the end of his arm, it is possible for him to do at the end of a wire. You may sit in your easy-chair in Chicago and guide a torpedo boat into the harbor of San Francisco, then ring a bell in the Observatory of Cambridge, then play a symphony on an organ in London, then write a letter on a desk in Constantinople, and then explode a mine in Japan.

Has man been content with his environment? He took the globe when tenanted only by wild weeds and wild beasts, himself a wild man. Thorns and thistles, claws and fangs, war of mouth with mouth and wind with wave,—that was the world in times primeval. Man was the level antagonist of pard and panther. He tamed the beast, lifted the weed into a plant, the shrub into fruit, and himself from a troglodyte into a man. When "raw from the prime," and skulking in caves, he was clad in skins and fed on roots and nuts and flesh of the victims of his club. When religion dawned on this troglodyte and he began to worship a phallic symbol or snake, his medicine man said to him, "Having these roots and nuts for food and that bear-skin for raiment, be content." The darkest fact in the annals of the race is that he was content, content so long that rigidity overtook him and entailed a state of savagery on vast numbers of his posterity.

When he who was not rigid advanced a little and began to work in metal, his medicine man, now a priest, said to him, "Having spears and arrow-heads of flint, be content." And, when stone gave way to steel, the priest in Egypt and Palestine said: "This innovation shall not touch the altar. In the rites of religion, we will cut with knives of stone." When science came and showed that the seeming vault of heaven is not a firmament, and the seemingly revolving sun and fixed earth are not what they seem, the priest said, "Having the belief of your fathers canonized as holy writ, be content." And when science had read from the tablets of the globe a record of vast æons, the religious teacher, still true to the old instinct, said, "Having the chronology of your fathers, a few thousand years, be content."

Is the religious sentiment to feed forever on archaisms? The poet and the scientist are priests of a better religion:—

"Build thee more noble mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll.
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven by a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

Content, folding her arms, is a pillar on the road to death. Content with a worm made the mole. Striving for the sky gave wings to the bat. Content merely with being has dwarfed the muscles of the ear into shreds. The law holds the Psyche as well as its organs. Swedenborg said that he found in Hades a group of Egyptians embalming little crocodiles. By the Nile of Egypt, five thousand years ago, they were embalming crocodiles; and here by the Nile of Hell, for five thousand years, they have done nothing and thought nothing but to embalm crocodiles. Whether Swedenborg saw a ghost or not, he saw a truth. As muscles, falling into disuse, abort and fade out, so these souls were fading out. We possess ourselves, as our muscles, on the tenure of use. If you would live, you must strive. The floral world has put on its robes of beauty because there were eyes of butterflies and birds. Woman became beautiful because there were eyes of men. Man became brave because woman was tender and trustful. All animate things rise, if they rise at all, for a something not themselves or toward a something which may become themselves.

W. D. GUNNING.

A WILD PREACHER.

Certainly, the New Year will be a pleasant time for me to renew my papers for The Index. It is a natural period of new resolutions. As for that, every period is good for that, provided the resolution be a right one. There may be persons so fortunate in the control of events as to be persistent, as never to have to renew a resolve they have made. The saying of the French, "It is good for a man to take his bearings from time to time," is a useful maxim. The currents of life do not always run in the same direction, and the vessel in which we sail is often diverted from our chosen course. It is well therefore to look around now and then, just to see where one is. Besides, the strongest purpose often pales in men's thoughts. New duties arise and obscure the old impression. Even a meditative walk by the river's bank on the brightest day has to be given up, if a child falls into the water. We should think ill of the philosopher who continued his train of thought, and left a little one to drown, lest he should lose the thread of his speculation. The child must be saved, though the new idea be lost. The smallest human life, around which somebody's affection clings, is worth more than an unborn thought, which, after all, may not be worth bringing into the world. Thus, countless incidents more or less urgent compel us to postpone our purposes, to renew them another day.

The preceding passages I find among my papers, the commencement of an article which was intended to reach you in time for the first January Index. I include them in this communication, in order to show that what you did "promise and vow" in my name as to periodical contributions was founded upon an assurance given by me to that end. Long before this reaches you, one instalment toward the fulfilment of my promise will be in your hands.

Not long ago, I read in your pages a notice of the late Joseph Barker by the Rev. Dr. Collyer, who seems to me always to speak with vigor and originality upon any subject on which he treats. Some of your readers may be willing to read an English estimate of Joseph Barker.

The best qualified adversary who occupied early socialistic attention for a long period was this same Rev. Joseph Barker. He was a restless Wesleyan local preacher, who had not been used well by his own party; and he avenged himself by never treating any other party well. He published pamphlets against social principles, always readable by wild persons for their offensive invective, but not instructive, as the objections he brought were entirely theological. The social advocates, who always had an appetite for an adversary, found Mr. Barker much occupation, and were not very tender in the terms of speech they applied to him. Mr. Barker excelled most men in his character as a Christian who destroyed respect for Christianity in numerous persons, who otherwise would have disented from it in part, without disliking it as a whole. The overwhelming majority of social reformers were believers in the precepts of Christ, and desirous of being associated with what would now be admitted as practical Christianity. Mr. Barker was a man of strong feelings, with wonderful command of Saxon-English, and an almost poetic imagination; so that whatever side he adopted, and he adopted every side in turns, he presented it with a force of speech which commanded attention. He was not a man who originated thought; but, in discerning all that could be made of thought which he found originated, he was unrivalled as a popular expounder. The imputations he made upon those who differed from whatever views he happened to hold at the time would have amounted to a crime, had they been an intellectual act of his mind; but, as his imputations were applied to every party by turns to which he had ceased to belong, they were merely the expression of a powerful nature concentrating itself upon the new opinions which possessed him, and which made everybody and everything seem hateful that stood outside the convictions which at that hour possessed him. He left to the adherents of every opinion that he espoused a legacy of exposition and denunciation which no other man contributed in his time.

Your journals at the time of Dr. Collyer's oration on Barker described him as an atheist. Barker was an atheist for a limited time. He denied it in his latter days. But he denied most things by turns in which he had been concerned. Another time, I will relate the curious incidents of his atheistic career in London.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

ESSEX STREET, TEMPLE BAR, LONDON.

FAILING POWERS OF THE ENGLISH STATE CHURCH.

Not only are the working-classes of England largely alienated from the Established Church, but the same is true of the highly-educated and cultured members of society. The progress of a strongly negative philosophy—negative, i.e., on its religious side—has greatly modified the character of English society, while the enormous development of wealth has exerted an influence upon the same classes entirely unfavorable to religious belief or life. In short, English society is strongly materialistic. The absence from church of the upper classes may not be so striking a phenomenon as the almost complete absence of the working-classes, because, within certain limits, it is respectable and even fashionable to go to church. But those who assemble there on Sunday are found, in the course of intimate conversation, to be largely tinctured with scepticism, many ladies, for instance, who like to have their children baptized and confirmed for social reasons, admitting privately that they consider three-fourths of what they hear from the pulpit on Sunday to be more or less superstitious nonsense. In brief, it may be affirmed with truth that the upper and lower sections of the English public have been all but stripped of their religious belief. Churches and chapels in England are really kept up by the middle class,—Matthew Arnold's "Philistines." The hundreds and thousands of suburban churches which you meet with in the environs of London, Manchester, Liverpool, and other large centres of population, are simply middle-class institutions, dominated by essentially middle-class ideas. But at least half of the English middle classes are ecclesiastically dissenters and politically liberals. Therefore, excluding that section of the aristocracy which is strongly Anglican, the Established Church of England can scarcely reckon for vigorous and earnest defence upon more than a mere section of the middle classes. Numbers and intelligence are ranged against the Church, which will need a much stronger support than is to be found in a mere minority of the middle classes. Another significant fact is the unwillingness of the abler young men of the English universities to enter the ranks of the Anglican priesthood. Time was when all the foremost men at Oxford and Cambridge were numbered among the clergy. Now, the Church is recruited from the less able and often (one is compelled to say) the less honest of university graduates. I have been astounded to know and see the sort of men who pour forth from Cambridge every year into the portals of the Church. Those who have utterly failed in their examinations through idleness or stupidity, the narrow, the prejudiced, the ignorant,—these, so far as my experience goes, constitute the majority of Anglican curates. There are persons of a different calibre, it is true, some of whom are engaged in the weary and thankless task of trying to liberalize the Church; but these are only a minority, and a small one. The men of talent, the brilliant men, will have nothing to do with the venerable national agent of superstition and reaction. They prefer to go into medicine or law, or to swell the increasing ranks of the teachers of science and literature. The Church, therefore, as an instrument of national culture, is receding further and further into the background, and is becoming every day less and less significant as a factor in the nation's life.

Now, who are they who retain the Church as a political institution? Mainly those who consider its existence, as such, necessary in order to secure certain political ends. The great majority of the aristocracy have no religious beliefs, nor do they care for the Church as a religious body. They simply care for it as a political body, and as the surest bulwark of their own order and of the monarchy. The majority of Anglican clergy are Tory electioneering agents, and the Church has invariably taught the most servile political doctrines. There has never been a bishop wanting to bless an unjust war, or to consecrate an act of oppression. The very words of the prayer for the Queen used in Anglican churches are that "she may vanquish and overcome all her enemies," whether such enemies happen to be in the right or in the wrong; and, after she has successfully carried out this barbarous work, the hope is expressed that "she may obtain everlasting joy and felicity." And this anti-social, inhuman sentiment well characterizes the Anglican Church as a body. It is a national political institution, an outwork of privilege, of aristocracy. That is what it is primarily. It happens also to be an association of persons more or less Christian in belief and sentiment; but that is accidental, nor do politicians care for it in that relation. The Church, therefore, is mainly defended as a political institution. Lord Salisbury indeed has gone so far as to declare that he only is a good churchman who is a good Tory; and, from the political point of view, this blunt declaration is quite correct. The liberalizing influences of modern democracy are entirely incompatible with the existence of such an institution as the Established Church; and, as a consequence, the Church can only be supported by those who are hostile to these modern democratic ideas. That is to say, the only support which can be logically and consistently given is of this kind. But it is singular that quite a large number of able, intelligent, cultured, and liberal persons do from time to time put forth arguments in favor of the maintenance of the State Church. The arguments of these persons do not probably affect many minds; but, coming as they do from men of recognized ability and position, they are worthy of some consideration, and in my next paper I shall briefly criticise them. They will all be found, by those acquainted with the book, to be more or less mere modifications of the principles laid down by Coleridge in his important work on Church and State. Indeed, Coleridge is the spiritual father of all those in England who are engaged in the task of patching old cloth with the new garment of reform, the main author of "phantasms" and "moonshine."

WILLIAM CLARKE.

NOTES OF THE FIELD.

Returning home from a somewhat protracted tour in the West, I am glad to greet again The Index, whose face I have seen but seldom during my sojourn away.

Every year's visit in the West brings me renewed proof of the powerful and deep-reaching change that is now going forward in the public mind. It extends everywhere, is to be found with those of religious and church connections, the professors of Orthodoxy as well as others. Indeed, I am sometimes led to believe that it is more marked and pervasive in the churches than outside of them. However unrecognized and unacknowledged there, it cannot fail to work powerful effect in the open attitude of multitudes of men and women in these connections in the not distant future. As a general thing, the pews are more advanced, more liberated, than the pulpits.

The West has its full share of timidity, moral cowardice, conformity, and make-believe. Few people have thoroughly the courage of their opinions, a resolute, manly independence in all the relations. The vast majority everywhere are swayed and held subject by traditional and social influences. This, found in many who have outthought and outgrown their leading, makes the pathway of the upstanding, faithful reformer ever hard and thorny. Yet I do deem that in the West is comparatively more freedom and frankness, willingness in people to stand and be known for what they really are.

Of all those I have seen, Kansas seems to me the banner State for freedom. There our friends are awake, and intent upon doing something in the way of practical, effective work. Perhaps it will issue in nothing more at present than in the formation of little clubs in the several towns for study, and getting some apprehension of what is to be done. But these will be a nucleus, and more and more will open as the field receives attention. I have strong faith that, with the moral earnestness and enterprise of some I saw, such as Mrs. A. L. Diggs (already known to the readers of The Index), Miss S. A. Brown, and others, valuable results will be accomplished.

There is great need that the living, spoken word be carried into these sections of our country, and I believe that the Free Religious Association cannot do better than give the matter its earnest consideration. In Hastings, Neb., a little town only a few years old, and perhaps twenty-five hundred inhabitants, the Liberals have a commodious and pleasant hall, all paid for, have a large constituency in the community, and are glad to welcome the best, most advanced thought of the time. Seldom as yet do they have that opportunity. There should be a ministry of the gospel of broad and universal religion for this and other like towns that may be found. The best lecturers and public teachers that our country affords should be heard there. And the work ought all to look, so fast as the communities should seem ripe for such a result, to the formation of societies on a simple ethical and religious basis. There should be some arrangement for furnishing the supply. Doubtless there will be many embarrassments and discouragements, no solid work is wrought without them, but the demand will grow and declare itself. The need we already know is profound and universal.

I may say that I know of one instance at least in the West, in which from an orthodox pulpit are preached with the utmost freedom the ideas of universal religion. The people gather in large numbers to hear, and the word is spoken to hungry and delighted ears. The minister is thoroughly intrepid, free, deeply, devoutly earnest,—a most sweet and saintly soul. I acquit him of any semblance of falseness or infidelity to truth in his holding the position he does, for he has been entirely frank and manly in his relation to his society and denomination. What will come of it, I do not know; but I am fully confident there will be no shrinking from accepting whatever trial or cross fidelity to duty may involve. Would there were more such ministers of religion!

I return home with renewed sense of the weight and pressing call of the work that lies to be done. How much remains in order to bring these truths, transcendent truths of the spirit, to the plane of the common apprehension! How present, make them so attractive, winsome, striking, that they shall draw, impress, and delight the mind of childhood, feeding it with the images, with that objective form of presentation in which the child's thought must have its life? What may be done for those in adult life, and their name is legion everywhere, who are largely on the plane of the sensuous, and can hardly realize or apprehend anything except in the concrete, must be spoken to on the side of the realistic? How clothe the ineffable in the forms of light, use the symbolism, and at every cost avoid that Charybdis whereon all barks hitherto have gone to wreck,—namely, worship of the outer, the seen, and the historic?

The poetry, the mythologies of the world have doubtless mission here. Who shall act the interpreter, and reveal the fine and hidden beauties that will yet refresh us all? Who may be so deft, furnished, skilled, that he may use this most indispensable means of symbol, holding it as means, in the end, as medium and vehicle only, and guarding infallibly against possibilities of entanglement in finite and seen?

There is room in the world to-day for such an artist, yea, imperative call as never before for that prophet, sayor, and seer, too, who can translate the realities of the celestial into the language of the terrestrial. He that can articulate here will be one of the most vital and beneficent aids in inaugurating the Church that is to be.

HISTORY OF RELIGIONS IN SCHOOLS.

Such instruction is now given at Oxford, under direction of Max Müller, and in Holland, France, Switzerland, and Germany, as is fully described in the Revue de Belgique for February, by Count Goblet d'Alviella, whose article has been sumptuously reprinted in pamphlet form by Mucquardt, 45 Rue de la Régence, Brussels. Here, we find a powerful argument to prove the fact that no one can understand the historic basis of our civilization who does not know the many creeds and rites which have ruled the nations, and that such knowledge cannot be fully acquired except as a special study. Our own history, for instance, is not to be understood without a full idea of the religious peculiarities which made the Puritans flee from England, and which led them to persecute Roger Williams, the Quakers, and the Baptists. Two of our most recent political issues require some knowledge of Mormonism, Buddhism, and Confucianism before they can be judged intelligently. The question how the Church should be treated by the State is best answered by remembering how Rome has used her mighty power. Even the school-boys have to take up questions in religious history. The more intelligently they can do so, the better. And with wider knowledge must come greater tolerance. Miscreant could never have come into use as a synonym for unbeliever, except at an age when all Christians were taught that Moslems were idolaters and that heretics met only for debauchery. The Free Religious Association was designed to promote the scientific study of religion. Its friends and members may well consider whether they cannot do something to give this study a higher place in our universities.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

When I saw in your paper the announcement of the death of Samuel Johnson, I said to myself, "Oh, why is life so short!" Johnson was one of those men with whom I wished to have some day a hearty hand-shaking, not in the body, but the spirit. He sent me his books, he wrote me a kind letter; and I read both and then put them away, hoping for a quiet day or for a quiet week to find rest to write to him and tell him where I agreed and where I differed from him,—telling him, at all events, how strongly I felt that he was doing a great and good work. But, alas! the quiet day or the quiet week never came; and he must have thought me a cold, unsympathizing fellow for never having written to him, for never having thanked him, for never having assured him of my sincere admiration and sympathy. It is not the first time this has happened to me. There was another man, very different from Samuel Johnson, but I admired him, too, and I thought he had never had his due; and that was J. F. McLennan, the author of Studies in Ancient History. I had made plenty of notes on his writings, and some day, I thought, we should have it all out. And then some day I opened the Times, and I saw he was gone. I have still a number of such unknown friends in the world, to whom I have much to say, and who are probably very angry with me; but what are we to do? "Seid umschlungen Millionen" is easy to say, but to do it by letter is very hard.

Well may you mourn for Samuel Johnson. Though he has done brave work, he might have done, he would have done, more. Perhaps I am hardly just to him; for the man who breaks stones on the road, as I have been doing nearly all my life, has not always a very kindly feeling toward those who drive by in a carriage over the road that he has made or mended. I mean Samuel Johnson's knowledge of Oriental religions was at second-hand, and the little accidents that must happen to an historian or a philosopher who writes on Oriental religions at second-hand are just those that most exasperate Oriental scholars. Still, Samuel Johnson was honest, and to be honest means to be accurate; and there are few things in his volume on the Religion of India for which, at all events, he could not give chapter and verse, though chapter and verse may not always come from the right book.

What I admire most in Samuel Johnson was his not being disheartened by the rubbish with which the religions of the East are overwhelmed, but his quietly looking for the nuggets. And has he not found them? And has he not found what is better than ever so many nuggets,—that great, golden dawn of truth, that there is a religion behind all religions, and that happy is the man who knows it in these days of materialism and atheism?

F. MAX MUELLER.

Oxford, March 24, 1882.

THE perfection of the intellectual spirit is the entire forgetfulness of persons in the application of the whole power of the mind to things and phenomena and ideas, not to mind whether the speaker is of noble or humble birth, rich or poor. This indeed is much, but we ought to attain to a like indifference to the authority of the most splendid reputations.—Philip G. Hamerton.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Andover professors (six in number, making all the active professors) have united in a lengthy and elaborate reply to the argument of the Congregationalist that Dr. Smyth should not be made the successor of Professor Park. As we stated two weeks ago, the Congregationalist objects to the appointment, because Dr. Smyth, if he adheres to views contained in recently published books, is not in unison with and cannot consistently sign the creed to which, by direction of the founders of the Seminary, the professors are required to subscribe. The professors join issue with the proposition that loyalty to this seminary creed demands a literal interpretation of it. They maintain that no such literal and absolute servitude to the letter of the creed as the Congregationalist contends for has been heretofore exacted; that to apply such a rule would be impracticable, would be suicide, and would nullify "the true intentions" of the founders. They defend Dr. Smyth against the charge of heresy, claiming that he is in "substantial agreement" with the Andover creed as progressively interpreted, and at the close make a remarkable statement concerning the progress and present position of New England Orthodox theology, which we here quote at length:—

What has most excited criticism in Dr. Smyth's position is a natural development of principles which the New England theology has especially cultivated, and which for more than a generation have been taught with particular emphasis from the chair of Christian Theology at Andover,—the universality of the atonement and the necessity of personal choice in order to the existence of either guilt or virtue.

These principles have gained their rights only by hard conflicts. At every stage, the cry of heresy has filled the air. But they have won the day. They have banished the dogmas of guilt for Adam's sin, of infant damnation, of passive regeneration, of the universal perdition of the heathen. They have been attended all along by concessions,—concession of the dogmas that all men sinned in Adam, that Adam was their federal head, that the death of Christ was only for the elect; concession that "elect infants" who die in infancy include all such, that we cannot fix the time when moral agency begins, that none who die before this point is reached are excluded from salvation, and so on through ever-advancing modifications. The path of New England theology is thus strewn with concessions,—concessions to an advancing knowledge of God's Word, concessions to truth. At the same time, every concession has been attended with gain and with new construction. We understand Dr. Smyth's position to be clearly and definitely within the legitimate lines of this movement. We understand him to be endeavoring to apply to the doctrine of the future life principles which the New England theology has already triumphantly applied to men's responsibility in the present life; in a word, he is aiming to do for eschatology what already has been done for anthropology. . . . Christianity educates men to ever higher, broader, more truthful conceptions of God. The questionings of to-day in Christian hearts respecting the doctrine of eternal punishment are a consequence of the elevating and spiritualizing power of the gospel. The Church should seek out positions that can be held. It should be in advance of its enemies. True conservatism points this way alone.

Nevertheless, the Congregationalist replies, and, we think, with great force, that, after declaring the creed to which the professors were to subscribe (from which we quoted a fortnight ago), the founders clinched it thus:—

It is strictly and solemnly enjoined, and left in sacred charge, that every article of the above-said creed shall forever remain entirely and identically the same, without the least alteration, addition, or diminution.

This, certainly, does not look as if the founders had it in their "intentions" to provide for a progressive development of theology, however desirable it might be so to interpret them. And the creed they enjoined most unmistakably teaches the dogmas which the professors above declare the principles of New England theology to have banished.

THE True Religion is the new name under which the New Religion comes to us from the town of Norway, Me. It has changed its form as well as name, now being folded into sixteen pages. It is a bright, wide-awake paper. Its editor says, "The name we now take serves our purpose as well, and affords the opportunity for more positive statements in liberal thought."

LONGFELLOW, it is well known, was liberal in his religious views. Yet we have not noted that a single religious newspaper has made any abatement on this account from its praise of the beneficence to humanity of his life and writings. The Evangelist voices the common eulogy of him, when it says:—

He touched the great chords of human sympathy, the best elements of human hearts, as no other writer of our time has done. And his poems are full of noble thoughts and sentiments, of comfort and sympathy and hope, of kindness and trust and aspiration. They are more quoted in the pulpit than any other. For fifty years, Mr. Longfellow was one of the literary and moral forces of the country. This is his praise. And, if writers in another generation excel him in power or grandeur or sweetness or any of the qualities which command success or give influence, they will have to thank him for pioneering the way.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

SUBSCRIBERS are requested to look at the address tags on The Index, and if in arrears to send us at once the amounts due.

NEXT week, The Index will contain interesting contributions from the pens of D. A. Wasson, George Jacob Holyoake, William Clarke, W. H. Spencer, and other able writers.

ALTHOUGH we do not discover in Dr. Samson's article, printed in The Index this week, any new contribution to religious thought, we cheerfully give him an opportunity to present to our readers his views of "The Truth as it is in Jesus."

A CONVENTION of the National Free Religious Association is to be held in Chicago on the 10th and 11th of May, of which more particular notice will be given next week. The usual annual meeting of the Association will occur in Boston on the 1st and 2d of June.

THE Toronto Telegram, referring to the Pope's complaint that the Catholic press is not well sustained, says: "Every indication of independent utterance on the part of Catholic newspapers in regard to Catholic affairs is suppressed by the authorities of the Catholic Church; and, so long as Catholic newspapers are kept in a state of servitude and vassalage, they must necessarily be inefficient and without power, except in a very narrow sphere. No public journal can have influence with the people, unless it is free to speak its mind unreservedly upon all questions as they come up."

THE Boston Traveller, in reply to somebody who was anxious to learn how the poet Longfellow stood theologically, says: "Mr. Longfellow was not a church-goer. His family have sittings in the College Chapel at Cambridge, and have been attendants there. It is understood that in his religious belief he was in sympathy with his brother, Rev. Samuel Longfellow, a liberal Unitarian." This statement is doubtless correct, and, for those who know what Rev. Samuel Longfellow's views are, sufficient. But, to others, it conveys no precise information, since one "liberal Unitarian" differs in "religious belief" from another as "one star differeth from another star in glory."

PROF. E. L. YOUNG writes in the Popular Science Monthly: "Under the old ideal of culture, a man may still be grossly ignorant of the things most interesting and now most important to know; but an ideal of cultivation begins to be demanded which does not comport with ignorance. Modern knowledge is the highest and most perfected form of knowledge, and it is no longer possible to maintain that it is not also the best knowledge for that cultivation of mind and character which is the proper object of education. This truth is making its way steadily; and although the traditional ideal of culture is strongly fortified in existing institutions, and maintained by old habits and associations, it is undermined on every side, and is certain to give place to more comprehensive and rational views of what constitutes a properly cultivated man."

IN regard to the trouble concerning the Andover professorship of theology, the Transcript observes: "The root of the whole difficulty in this case seems to be that three donors of small sums of money (which have since been largely increased by gifts not so severely restricted), at a time of keen and angry controversy, solemnly covenanted that all who should teach in the seminary on their foundations should forever hold certain opinions and beliefs, whatever might be the developments of wisdom and truth. It may be that future legislation will prohibit this attempt to perpetuate antiquated opinions and beliefs by the dead hand. What should we say now, if there was an endowed fund held to-day in this State, as given in 1692, by most sincere believers in witchcraft, solemnly pledged to teachers and lecturers who should uphold that belief?"

AT a meeting of the Toronto Secular Society a recent Sunday evening, Mr. A. Piddington, the president, read a paper by Mr. Allen Pringle, of Napanee, on the subject of "The Mail's Theology." The writer quoted from the Mail's Saturday sermons, in which the ground was taken that a religious belief is the only safeguard of morality; and he charged the Mail with encouraging immorality and weakening the public sense of right by telling all those who had shaken off the religious beliefs of their forefathers that there was no reason or consistency in their living virtuous lives. He pointed out that the Mail writer himself admitted that religion was decaying and faith dying out, and he thought that, instead of contending that morals must of necessity disappear, it was the part of every well-wisher of humanity to put morality on a firm scientific basis. The paper was well received.

GEORGE BRANDES, a Danish writer of reputation, in a collection of essays giving some personal recollections of John Stuart Mill, says: "He recommended me to read Herbert Spencer, but not his later works, in which he departed from the good method. He directed my attention especially to Principles of Psychology, Bain's Senses and the Intellect and Emotions and the Will. He presented me with a copy of Analysis of the Human Mind by his much-admired father, and praised it as the greatest work of the English school in this century. He spoke highly of Taine, and of a small book entitled Essays by a Barrister." Brandes concludes by remarking on the nobleness and the truthfulness of Mill's character, and says, "We must recall the noblest philosophers of antiquity—Marcus Aurelius and his like, if his like existed—to find a parallel to Mill. He was equally earnest, equally great, whether he were sending the rich maturity of his thoughts in a world-famous book to a worldwide circle of readers or conversing in his home with a stranger, never for a moment obtruding his superiority."

CHARLES E. ENDICOTT, in an article in the Boston Transcript, writes that, during a residence of two decades among the Chinese, he is convinced that they are entirely misunderstood by the Western World. "The vices," he says, "prevalent among them are no worse than exist in Christian countries, nor even so great in proportion. Their respect for intelligence, as far as they are in a position to appreciate it, is quite equal to our own. Their commercial honor is practically better than that existing in Europe and America. Their industry and frugality are of the highest types. The only obstacle that retards their progress is the deathlike conservatism that surrounds them; but when the time arrives that is approaching, that they are prepared to accept the teachings of a more advanced thought, a field for enterprise will be opened in China that, for stupendous results, will far eclipse the most sanguine imagination of the ancients concerning the wealth existing in 'Far Cathay.'"

POETRY.

THE LAMENT OF CERES.*

[TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHILLER.]

BY B. W. BALL.

Once more is genial spring-time glowing?
Has earth re-youthed herself again?
Green in the sun the hills are growing;
And ice-free leaps the brook again,
While flashes on its mirror blue
The cloudless heaven's reflected sheen;
And west wind's softest whispers woo
The buds to burst in leafage green.
With lays of love the groves are yearning:
Greets me the Oread in the wild,
"Thy flowers, behold, to light returning, Returneth not thy vanished child."

How long I've wandered wide earth o'er,
A weary quest in vain pursuing,
Sending thy beams to help explore
Her track, O Sun, whose loss I'm rueing!
Not one has tidings brought to me
Where now my hapless darling pines:
The sun himself, that all can see,
Vainly to find my lost one shines.
Am I through thee, O Zeus, forlorn?
Has Pluto, smitten by her charms,
The maid to hell's dark rivers borne,
A ravished captive in his arms?

The herald of my anguish who
Will be unto that gloomy shore?
Forever piles the grim canoe,
But only shadows ferries o'er,
Barred—that no happy eye may know
Its gloom—the underworld remains.
And long as Stygian stream may flow,
No living form there entrance gains.
While thousand pathways lead below,
None back unto the daylight tend,—
No witness of the Maiden's woe
May to the Mother's sight ascend.

Mothers from Pyrrha's stock who came
Are at the grave not all forlorn.

*The legend of Demeter and Kore or of The Mother and The Maiden, as Ceres and Proserpine were called, is the most touching and significant of all the Greek myths. The Mater Dolorosa of Christianity is a plagiarism from it. Ceres was of course a personification of the Earth, and her daughter, Persephone, of the Earth's annually reappearing vegetable life. This annual resurrection of blade and blossom the old Greeks regarded as a symbol and assurance of the triumph of the human spirit over death. This was the fundamental idea of the Eleusinian mysteries and of the solemn earth-worship celebrated at Eleusis. Schiller has concentrated in the above poem the very essence of the Greek myth of the Mother and Child. It is, perhaps, the finest of his minor poems. It is full of the sadness of the yearning of the human spirit for immortality, full of the sadness of the laceration and mystery of death, and also of the joy and hope of a resurrection or triumph over death.

†Pyrrha was the Eve of Greek Mythology, or rather the mother of mankind after the flood.

They follow through the funeral flame
Their loved,—themselves, too, mortal-born,— Dwellers in Jove's high homestead may Descend not to the nether strand.
Thither inclined, their passage stay
The Parcae with a pitiless hand.
Oh would I were an outcast there,
From golden halls of heaven exiled!
The stricken mother would forswear
Her deathless birthright for her child.

Where with her gloomy consort she
High-throned in joyless state may sit,
Would I a bodiless shade might be,
With shadows, that before her flit!
Alas, her eyes, blinded with tears,
Seek vainly for the golden light,
And for the distant, starry spheres
They knew of old in earthly night.
Her yearning gaze her mother's face,
Till joy returns, may not behold,
Till, locked once more in close embrace,
Parent and child each other fold,
Till down the cheeks of Orcus stern
The shades of Erebus discern,
Amazed, strange tears of pity rolled.

6.

This may not be: my grief is vain.
Calm in its even course above
Rolls on the Day-god's golden wain,
Forever stands the will of Jove.
Far from the realm of night, he turns
In bright disdain his glance away.
Once snatched to nether gloom returns
No more my lost one to the day,
Until the streams of Orcus glow
With cheerful tints of roseate dawn,
And over midmost hell her bow
Of beauty Iris shall have drawn.

Remaineth naught of her to me?
Is there no sweetest pledge assuring Tha', though by space we sundered be,
Our wonted love is still enduring?
Is there no heart-knot knit, that ties
The mother to the daughter fled;
No mystic emblem, that allies
The living to the cherished dead?
Wholly apart, we are not riven:
She has not flown beyond my reach;
To us the Powers on high have given,
That we may still commune, a speech.

When children of the spring are dying,
And blade and bloom are turning sere,
And mournfully the bare bough sighing
Waves leafless in the north wind drear,
The very germ of life I take
Out of the year's exuberant horn,
An offering to the Styx to make,
Seed of my own fair, golden corn.
Sadly in earth I bury it low,
Close to my child's heart lay the grain,
That it may tell her of my woe,
A mother's love, a mother's pain.

The roseate hours in frolic dance
Usher the gracious spring again,
And in the sun's life-kindling glance
The blade new-born shoots forth again.
The germs, which to the eye had perished,
Into the realm of colors bloom,
And by the sunbeams wooed and cherished
They struggle forth from dark earth's gloom.
While heavenward the stalk aspireth,
Shyly the root gropes toward the night:
Gloom of the underworld requireth
The growing blade and ether's light.

Thus, touching realms of life and death,
The wheaten stalk for me upspringeth:
My herald from the shades beneath,
A message sweet of joy it bringeth.
Out of the spring's young blossoms fair,
Listening, I hear a soft voice say,
That far from daylight's golden air,
Where only mournful shadows stray,
Bosoms the throbs of love still know,
And hearts with fond effusion glow.

O children of the fresh, young year,
With joy unfeigned thus hail I you,
Steeped in the sun, your stalks you rear,
In rainbow tints your flowers appear,
Your cups o'erflow with purest dew.
In springtime's warmth and splendor brief,
Each tender breast my joy will know,
And in the autumn's withered leaf
Behold an emblem of my woe.

The Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 20, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

Is Spencer's Philosophy Atheistic?

A PLEA FOR ITS STUDY BY STUDENTS.

BY EDWARD KIBLER.

Already, the synthetic philosophy of Herbert Spencer is a partially recognized factor in the education of American youths. Several of the ablest American instructors are resolutely endeavoring to secure its adoption, in a modified form, as a part of the college curriculum. Its treatises on psychology, sociology, biology, and ethics, as exemplifying evolution, are known to those who study them as furnishing accurate information and yielding large returns in mental drill. Since the novelty of method in bold generalizations and unbiassed research, and the freedom from futile speculativeness, have begun to compel the other systems of philosophy to be studied merely as historic thought, we are prepared to expect that the innovation will be met with many a repulse. The natural conservatism of mind renders a sudden and radical renunciation of old habits of thinking and long-cherished beliefs a mental impossibility. That which seems to contradict parental teaching and to overthrow the many strongholds in morals and reflection founded thereon can be ultimately accepted as truth only after severe mental sacrifice and on deep-rooted conviction. A reasonable amount of mental conservatism must be recognized as at all times having a very salutary influence in restraining one from being carried away on a wave-crest of radically new thought; while, on the other hand, an excess of conservatism renders impossible that intellectual habit of revising and re-revising conclusions, without which material progress in knowledge is impossible. To assume or believe the absolute truth of any tenet, and invite into the mind whatever happens to fall into coincidence and reject whatever in the minutest particular fails to tally therewith, is to pursue a course which is sure to entail mental stagnation.

Some of the ultimate conclusions of Spencer's philosophy are out of harmony with the settled habits of popular thinking and with the beliefs of those moral teachers who are largely instrumental in directing popular thought. In dealing with subjects toward which most people have directed some random thoughts, this system of philosophy employs a reasonable scientific spirit, ever eager to get at the truth, and a philosophic courage prepared to recognize or infer whatever conclusions logically result; and these are facts which of necessity would forbid its sudden prevalence, for in many particulars it militates against popular prepossessions and creeds. For instance, what random thinker would ever conceive of a rational system of ethics finding its basis in other than Biblical law, believed to be divine? So the comparative few who occupy the pulpits and are in a position to mould the character of the graver thoughts of the many, from motives of policy and self-consideration, often desert their post of duty by teaching not their own convictions nor the conclusions resulting from careful individual research, but teach rather what they find in greatest demand. To them, the people usually relegate for solution the problems growing out of graver things, and for the most part they regard their careless judgments and ready decisions as beyond appeal. In this region of thinking, a new idea is promptly discouraged; and truly marvellous is the consummate skill displayed in preventing a habit of independent thinking from taking thrifty root. It is generally true that what the pulpit frowns on the people distrust, what it smiles upon they eagerly adopt, and what it scorns they fear. It is a régime of limited despotism, which exacts assent from the people without granting them license to question the justice of the frown or the scorn. Hence, the natural conservatism of mind is not the only motive manifest in the efforts to prevent the general study of Spencer's philosophy among students, but there are considerations far more positive and urgent. Grave fears are entertained lest, if the students of this generation imbibe and indorse the principles therein contained, the traditions and creeds now held sacred beyond question may themselves be profaned by scientific scrutiny, be weakened in their efficacy by contact with criticism, and be eventually discarded. Unable to question its logical consistency or its expedience in teaching truth and disciplining the intellect, the opposition, with an impressiveness almost irresistible, declares that Spencer is an atheist and his philosophy fell atheism, making it seem to the average student a rash risk to dally with his thoughts, since eternal damnation will surely result.

A reference to the political tactics of to-day will reveal this method usually employed to paralyze a righteous opposition. If a party champion a measure and preach it to the people to influence suffrage in its behalf, the opposition, failing to present a more expedient measure, sets about to bring it into popular disfavor. If all available tests in proving the logical inconsistency of the measure fail, if its expediency and timeliness cannot be disproved to public satisfaction, the opposition embraces the last desperate resort of misrepresenting it to the popular judgment, and hiding its righteousness under the garb of some repulsive name. They try honorable means first; and, if these fail, they care not what means are employed, so the end is gained. "My son, make money," the old man said. "Make it honestly, if you can: if not—make money." It is not the aim of this paper to discourage controversy, but simply to show that the method now being employed to bring this system of philosophy into disrepute relies on misrepresentations of the most serious moment and on false charges, maliciously or ignorantly urged. Did such accusations solely emanate from those mentally unqualified to pass an equitable and intelligent judgment, we might dismiss the fact as significant; but, in many instances, those who are thought to be fully equipped for fair estimates, and who, in dealing with some subjects, have evinced the virtue of rivalling their opponent in a fair statement of his position, nevertheless seem so carelessly to apply epithets to Spencer and his philosophy as to frighten away the young student, who will scarcely dare to peep within the volume, lest a calamity befall him instantly. A few quotations from writers of this class will suffice. President Porter, in a paper entitled "The Newest Atheism,"* speaks of the "vacillating atheism of Spencer." President Gregory, in "John Stuart Mill and the Destruction of Theism,"† speaks of Spencer's "anti-religious thought" as having for its aim "the construction of an imposing and comprehensive system of anti-theism, or atheism." Rev. Dr. Patton, in "The Final Philosophy,"‡ referring to the reconciliation of religion and science proposed by Spencer, says: "He proposes that science shall give religion a share in the kingdom of this world on the express condition that religion shall abandon all hope of a world to come. What shall be said to these proposals? The answer is not difficult. Can an atheist worship? Can he pray? Need he have any sense of responsibility?" etc.

These charges, then, deserve to be answered as openly as they are made. Is Spencer an atheist, and is his philosophy atheistic? If the distinction be dichotomously drawn that all who strictly adhere to the Biblical conception of Deity are to be classed as theists and all who in any particular deviate as atheists, then Socrates, Spinoza, Comte, Spencer, in fact, all philosophers, strictly speaking, are atheists and their teachings atheistic. But no such claim will be made. It is not customary to charge Cicero and the Romans with atheism, Homer and the Greeks. We do not think of the "heathen" as atheists, even though they worship "stocks and stones," nor of the Deists, who deny a verbal revelation. No close student of Spinoza, who has caught anything of the spirit of his philosophy or of the sublime reverence of the philosopher, would ever impute atheism to him. Yet he denied that personality, will, or understanding could be predicated of the Deity. He worked out an elaborate system of practical ethics, without regarding the conception of a personal deity as a sine qua non. Schwegler, in History of Philosophy, says of him: "His chief work, the Ethica, appeared the year of his death. His design was probably to have published it during his life; but the odious report that he was an atheist restrained him." There is not the ghost of a shadow of an attenuation of truth in saying that Spencer is an atheist because he does not indorse the Christian conception of Deity. It is a criminal strangling of the truth to represent that when Spencer implies no personal deity he means no deity, no cause, nothing.

It is a well-known rule of evidence in legal practice that, when a written instrument is the subject of litigation, the best evidence only is admissible concerning its character and contents; and hence the writing itself, if available, must be submitted for judicial scrutiny. The impressions which the reading of it have made on another man's mind, the report of its contents or gossip concerning its character, will be promptly ruled out as incompetent: the instrument must be produced to disclose its own secret and speak for itself. To arrive at the truth concerning the particular charge against this philosophy, let us abide by the legal rule, and quote from Spencer's First Principles of his synthetic philosophy:—

§ 11. Thus, the atheistic theory (respecting the origin of the universe) is not only absolutely unthinkable, but, even if it were thinkable, would not be a solution. The assertion that the universe is self-existent does not really carry us a step beyond the recognition of its present existence, and so leaves us with a mere restatement of the mystery.

§ 12. We cannot think at all about the impressions which the external world produces on us without thinking of them as caused; and we cannot carry out an inquiry concerning their causation without inevitably committing ourselves to the hypothesis of a First Cause.

§ 14. Here, then, is an ultimate religious truth of the highest possible certainty, . . . that the Power which the universe manifests to us is utterly inscrutable.

§ 27. Though the absolute cannot in any manner or degree be known, in the strict sense of knowing, yet we find that its positive existence is a necessary datum of consciousness; that, so long as consciousness continues, we cannot for an instant rid it of this datum, and that thus the belief which this datum constitutes has a higher warrant than any other whatever.

§ 31. By continually seeking to know, and being continually thrown back with a deepened conviction of the impossibility of knowing, we may keep alive the consciousness that it is alike our highest wisdom and our highest duty to regard that, through which all things exist, as The Unknowable.

This, which to most will seem an essentially irreligious position, is an essentially religious one,—nay, is the religious one to which, as already shown, all others are but approximations. In the estimate it implies of the ultimate cause, it does not fall short of the alternative position, but exceeds it. Those who espouse this alternative position make the erroneous assumption that the choice is between personality and something lower than personality: whereas, the choice is rather between personality and something higher. Is it not just possible that there is a mode of being as much transcending intelligence and will as these transcend mechanical motion? It is true that we are totally unable to conceive any such higher mode of being. But this is not a reason for questioning its existence: it is rather the reverse. Have we not seen how utterly incompetent our minds are to form even an approach to a conception of that which underlies all phenomena? Is it not proved that this incompetency is the incompetency of the conditioned to grasp the unconditioned? Does it not follow that the ultimate cause cannot, in any respect, be conceived by us, because it is in every respect greater than can be conceived? And may we not, therefore, rightly refrain from assigning to it any attributes whatever, on the ground that such attributes, derived as they must be from our own natures, are not elevations, but degradations? Indeed, it seems somewhat strange that men should suppose the highest worship to lie in assimilating the object of their worship to themselves. . . . May we not without hesitation affirm that a sincere recognition of the truth that our own and all other existence is a mystery, absolutely and forever beyond our comprehension, contains more of true religion than all the dogmatic theology ever written?

The above quotations will give a fair conception of Spencer's position on this subject, and at the same time show how utterly groundless and absurd is the charge of atheism, hurled so desperately at him and his philosophy. It is also to be recollected that to the thinking of the younger student the epithet "atheist" is apt to convey not simply the idea of one who denies the existence of Deity, but other attributes have been so intimately associated with the word in earlier thought that in his imagination he inevitably pictures the "atheist" as a moral monster, utterly devoid of all sense of right; and thus the very word itself, especially to younger minds, is very likely to produce an additional misrepresentation of the grossest type.

Realizing that it is always better and more profitable to form an individual opinion from the requisite data, instead of studying other men's opinions, if the young student would resolve personally to investigate these mooted questions, he would come to know that Spencer's philosophy embodies the greatest advance in research that science has made,—at least in modern times,—and would come to believe that his attitude at all times is the very supremacy of reverent piety. Then, he will begin to understand that the bitterness of the opposition springs from a rash zeal to rescue its imperilled beliefs, to question which is claimed to be profanity, and to doubt is believed to be damnation. Let the young student but remember that truth can never contradict itself, and that a vigorous conflict between counter-claims can permanently injure only error. For what fails to survive the tests of truth deserves to fall, even though it lacerate our heart-strings to surrender it up.

But, even if Spencer were an avowed atheist, by far the greatest portion of synthetic philosophy, dealing with subjects purely scientific, might profitably be studied without provoking the antagonism of even the most bitter sectarian; but by hanging such a pall as "atheism" over it, which to most young minds inevitably has a sort of traditional repulsiveness, the opposition would render Spencer's volumes as unfrequented as a public building condemned to be unsafe. But the wise student will be fearless to enter; and, if his purpose be resolute to acquire the best knowledge at hand, if his morals be so firmly grounded that he is led to do right because it is the best thing to do, and if his intellect be so matured that he can correctly appreciate the spirit and grasp the principles so clearly set forth, then he will realize that to study Spencer's philosophy is to reap golden grain.

"THE TRUTH AS IT IS IN JESUS,"

The Goal of Free Religion.

BY G. W. SAMSON, D.D.,

PASTOR AND PRESIDENT OF PEOPLE'S CHURCH AND BIBLE WORKERS' COLLEGE, 53D ST. AND 7TH AVE., NEW YORK CITY.

The repeated wish of an esteemed and able contributor to The Index prompts the suggestions clustered under the above caption. The fresh review of the long familiar reasoning of eminent thinkers, like Abbot and Frothingham, and of varied recastings of materialistic and idealistic theories, found in the columns of The Index, furnish the data for induction. History, which records the succession of profound thought on religious truth in all ages, seems to justify the conclusion. The sources of reliable knowledge, forming the basis of science as applied to religion, must lead all discussion; and the leading questions of religious research,—God, Revelation, Atonement, and Future Life,—as Comte and Frothingham, in common with men of every school, have agreed, are the essential central issues to be considered.

The American Bible Society have issued a little pamphlet with the Lord's Prayer in one hundred and sixty-four different languages, among which are found the most cultured tongues of Asia and Europe and the simplest and rudest of native African and American savages. John Eliot, contrary to the prior convictions of New England Bible Christians, was able to put the New Testament into the language of Indian tribes who were the remotest and most degenerate of the Asiatic settlers from the east of Asia on the coast of the American continent. If such a fact had occurred with the Vedas of the Brahmins or the Dialogues of Plato, every impartial mind would admit that it was the starting-point for an induction. The words, the teachings of Jesus, recorded and developed in the New Testament, what Paul, addressing the many-minded Asiatic Greeks at Ephesus, calls "the truth as it is in Jesus," has a claim to be taken as a central "goal," toward which, in the race for the meed of success in the search for truth, champions for the prize may with propriety be invited to direct their course.

Here, however, the book must be kept distinct from its commentaries. In the summer of 1848, in the old cathedral of Geneva, the eloquent rationalistic preacher, speaking in French, took for his text: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Reviewing the history of that cathedral, under its three eras of Romanism, Calvinism, and Rationalism, his three heads of discourse were, "Riches shall pass away, but not the Word; creeds shall pass away, but not the Word; interpretations shall pass away, but not the Word." Just as in ancient Greece, and now in the columns of The Index, the interpretations of the book of nature are numberless, so is it with Revelation, but, as nature does not pass away, so the Word does not. In his youth, Rousseau bitterly opposed Christianity, because he confounded it with the Church of his day and land. In his exile among the Swiss, he wrote his Emile, in which, comparing the words and acts of Socrates in the second book of Plato's Republic with the words and acts of Jesus, he wrote, "The life and death of Socrates were those of a sage: the life and death of Jesus were those of a God." In his old age, an exile in England, where he was Hume's intimate, he wrote to his friend Moulton to this effect: "Experience has shown that the pure truth is found in the words of Jesus, and that the day will come when society will be redeemed by its influence." Jefferson, when commending to Virginia the school-system of Massachusetts, uttered a like sentiment.

Coming, then, to the essential truths of religion, the vital fact to regard is this: that as interpretations of both nature and revelation may and do differ, so individual views as to God, Revelation, Atonement, and Future Life, may and must differ. As individual conceptions of a passing train or of a sudden broil differ according to each observer's position, no two occupying the same point of view, and yet, as in essential facts, all agree in giving testimony, so is it with differing views of religious truth. All men believe in God's existence, though his nature is incomprehensible; and hence all extremes, from the African fetish to Plato's Infinite Spirit, from Darwin's creator of the first few types of flora and fauna to Haeckel's automatic order,—all extremes show that it is not the fact, but the manner of the fact, as to which men differ. So, too, views of the nature of the future life vary, from that of the Indian's happy hunting-ground to the symposium of Socrates and Cicero; but, while the manner of the fact is differently conceived, the fact is demonstrated in human thought.

That the fact as to each truth of religion is demonstrative, Socrates showed, when, as now by Comte and Mills, it was claimed that only mathematical reasoning is demonstrative. When the first axiom of geometry was quoted, "Two things equal to a third are equal to each other," and it was urged that eyesight attests this truth, the Grecian sage, holding up his two fore-fingers, compelled his opposers to admit that no two things are ever seen to be equal, but that "equality" is a mental conception, which eyesight applies to material objects. So, when eyesight attests that the starry expanse is a concave, when Jasper contends against Galileo that the sun moves, the entire chain of applied mathematics by which the truth opposed to eyesight is reached depends, as Aristotle showed, on the combining of the two testimonies of consciousness and on the harmonizing of the two partial philosophies, materialistic and idealistic, which, instead of living in quarrelsome union, should live in happy wedlock.

The Old and the New Testament view of God, from Moses to John, is this: God, as a pure spirit, cannot be known, and on this assured principle of science, because he cannot be "seen." But all the traditional convictions of mankind, only culminating in the religion of Buddha, accord with the fact that God was manifest in the human form that walked in Eden and pledged redemption to fallen man,—a fact recognized by the Roman officer who saw Jesus' death, and who, like Rousseau, exclaimed, "Truly, this was the Son of God." As to revelation, the demand was successively recognized by Zoroaster, in his Brahminic reform; by Confucius, as he saw the failure of his moral precepts; by Socrates, as before the Athenian senate he dwelt upon their rejection of the truth urged by Athenagoras and repeated by himself; and, above all, by Cicero, who, having shown in his "Divination" the human art of all auguries, argues that the false, as with coin, proved the existence somewhere of the true revelation. If objection, then, arise to the supernatural testimony to a natural revelation, these replies may be given: First, as Zoroaster intimated, the common mind of man demands, and justly too, this testimonial; for nothing but a visible exertion of supernatural power can prove to man the presence of a divine spiritual teacher. Second, if, as Darwin admits, the Divine Being has directly interposed in the creation of insignificant plants and animals, he may certainly be expected to interpose to accomplish the great need of his highest work,—the moral redemption of man. Third, as a fact, the best minds of Greece were convinced by the miracles of Jesus. [Mohammed is witness to their reality, and Renan's views were modified by tradition in Palestine.]

As to the atonement, all agree that, as an effect, it is moral "reconciliation" of man to God, whose unreconciliation and lack of faith are certainly most palpable. As a cause, the idea of needed "expiation," secured by sacrifices of animal or human life, has everywhere ruled human conviction. Xenophon, at the opening of his Memorabilia, quoting this practical faith of Socrates, and Confucius reasoning as to the import of sacrifices, still maintained, as General Grant's visit illustrated, in the heart of Asiatic civilization. Nothing but the historic fact as to Jesus has ever satisfied man's conviction as to his personal need. As to the future life, Aristotle, in his "Psyche," pointed out the distinction between the animal intelligence, mixed with and sympathizing with the material (ψυχή) in man, and the "mind" proper (νοῦς), unmixed with and unaffected by the material organism; and of the latter he says, "τοῦτο μόνον αἰώνιον καὶ ἀσάλευτον,"—this alone is eternal and indestructible. Plato argued the same from the fact that animal intelligence has no office but the care of the body, and hence may be supposed to perish with it; while the yearning for higher life must, as all human yearning, have its realization in fact. This perfection of Grecian analysis permitted a century later the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, and three centuries yet later the writings of the New Testament with their distinctive terms. In his account of creations, declared by Haeckel to be scientific in statement, Moses represents the Divine Being as a pure spirit, saying to surrounding angels, "Let us make man in our image," thus declaring the origin of his spiritual nature; while, afterward, "the Lord God," or the humanly manifested God, "formed man out of the dust of the earth, and breathed into him the breath of life, and man became a living soul," thus partaking the lower intelligence ascribed to the animals with whom in his earthly existence he was to be associated. Every page of the Old Testament and of the New Testament is conformed to these distinctive teachings as to each of the essential doctrines of religion, spiritual redemption intensifying faith in the future life.

That the Christian system was meant to triumph as the exponent of "free thought" is witnessed in every discourse of its great apostle as recorded by Luke, and is embodied in the closing statement of his history at Rome, the world's capital: "And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came unto him; preaching the kingdom of God and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ with all confidence, no man forbidding him." If like truth has been otherwise received in later times, the fault has been either in the preacher's interpretation or in the lack of Roman virtue in the powers that have ruled. Whether "the truth as it is in Jesus" is to meet Rousseau's conviction as "the goal of Free Religion," the spirit of its advocates and investigators must combine to attest. Certainly, it has no other human means which its advocates can legitimately employ than the three graces,—Faith, Hope, and Charity.

THE ORIGIN OF REASON.*

If I were to tell a man who had never seen ice, and was wondering what had happened to a lake in winter, "The water is frozen," this would be explanation. But why is it one? Here is a difficult question, which has already been brought up by Locke, and which cannot be answered without looking into the nature and origin of reason. The peculiar value of my words is that they contain an idea by which the appearance is placed under a general law. Ideas are generalizations, and it is general ideas that form the substance of human knowledge. We say of a thing, "It is frozen." It is only man who can say, "I am freezing." He can say this even in summer, and think it even when he feels no chill. Why? Because he possesses general ideas. And how has he come to possess them? This is the hardest of questions; and it brings us down to the origin of reason, for reason is man.

Should I say, "Man thinks because he speaks," nine-tenths of my readers would shake their heads and answer, "No, man speaks because he thinks." All great truths are first known as paradoxes. How long it was before men would distrust their eyes, and believe that the earth moves rather than the sun. Words are the fixed points which show the limits of the ideas they have brought into existence. Without words there would be only fleeting, shadowy, and disorderly impressions. An idea has never existed in man without its material counterpart, the word. And yet I do not say that with every word there must be an idea. Parrots imitate our words, and produce only sounds. The sound is not alive until it becomes a word, and the life of the word is in the idea. The great question is how ideas are united with sounds, and thus made alive. Thinkers have built up system after system, and perhaps there is nothing about which there has been such a variety of opinions as on the way that speech began. Here is the point to which we must set the lever, to roll away the rock that has kept a great secret from leaping forth in a fountain of truth.

Philosophy has no right to give an opinion on the origin of reason until she has taken note of the results of comparative philology; for speech is the body of thought, and both were born together. Nor has science any right to refuse attention to what philosophy can say about the origin of speech. The philologist who declares, as Frederic Müller does, that the only difference between the language of men and that of the lower animals is in quantity, deserves more approbation from parrots than from scholars; for the English miner who uses but three hundred words is more than twice as well able to speak as was Brehm's parrot who knew a hundred and fifty. That book which Immanuel Kant sent out, badly printed on gray paper, a hundred years ago, has had greater results than giving Berlin the nickname of the City of Pure Reason. This Critique has much to teach us still; for instance, that the whole business of human reason is with representations, which are not mere empty sensations, but which stand in such close relations to objects that our thought has an objective character throughout. Hence it is that we cannot wander from this plain road through experience to knowledge without falling a prey to hallucinations and self-deceptions. These representations of objects are given by the senses, but brought into shape by the reason. So the secret which has been promised is that in human speech each word has originally a relation to some object which was signified by that word, and that thus our words first took their meaning by means of the representations in our minds. When we say, "The water is frozen," or, "I am freezing," we utter a word which was first used as a representation of a state of external objects, and then gradually came to express a condition of internal feeling also. This is a fact which is proved by Kant as well as by the philologists who have been too tardy in recognizing their obligations to the great philosopher.

THE authority which extends its claims over every action and even every thought, which insists upon an answer to every interrogation, however indiscreet or oppressive to the feelings, will, in young or old, produce falsehood.—Mrs. Barbauld.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MEETING OF THE FLORENCE FREE CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

Editors of The Index.—

The annual meeting of the Free Congregational Society of Florence was held on the evening of the 3d inst. The attendance was large; and, in the absence of the moderator and clerk, General Otis was chosen moderator pro tem. and Miss E. C. Elder clerk pro tem. Nine new members were added to the society, and all the old officers were re-elected. The treasurer reported the society as out of debt, and that all the expenses of the year were provided for by voluntary contributions. The largest contribution, say $446.14, having been made by the Ladies' Industrial Union, the executive committee say that, in view of such repeated evidence as we have had of the thrift and good business management of the women, the society may well give its Bond* in town-meeting that the women will faithfully discharge any town affairs that may be committed to their charge.

The committee say that Mr. Spencer has filled the office of resident speaker with great ability and earnestness, and has greatly favored the society by bringing with him, in the person of his gifted wife, one that is virtually a colleague pastor, being fitted thereto by experience as well as rare mental gifts, she having been the resident speaker of the Free Religious Society of Providence.

The attendance at the Sunday-school has largely increased during the last year, and the school is in a healthy and hopeful condition.

The committee refer in appropriate terms to the deaths of three prominent members, Henry H. Bond, Elisha L. Hammond, and Mrs. Maria B. Learned.

After giving in detail the doings of the society for the last year, the committee say: "And now at this late day, in spite of all the positive work which the Cosmians have done, we are told by the upholders of church and creed limitations of thought and speech that we are mere seekers and doubters, and that we cannot build a religious society upon denials. Now, we believe that there is one thing, if there is no other, that Cosmians have found out, settled, and affirmed (and that one thing is a sufficient foundation for a religious society),—namely, toleration,—the principle that character, not creed, shall be the ground of fellowship. Who can doubt that the horrible outrages now being inflicted on the Jews in Russia have their main root in religious hate and intolerance? The people of that so-called Christian nation are letting their light shine; but it is a light that gleams from their murderous daggers and incendiary torches, casting its lurid glare on the affrighted victims of their brutality and lust." H.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In the Contemporary Review, Herbert Spencer has a short article on Goldwin Smith's recent criticism of his Data of Ethics. Spencer says: "In the preface to the Data of Ethics there occurs the following sentence: 'With a view to clearness, I have treated separately some correlative aspects of conduct, drawing conclusions either of which becomes untrue if divorced from the other, and have thus given abundant opportunity for misrepresentation.' When I wrote this sentence, I little dreamed that Prof. Goldwin Smith would be the man to verify my expectation more fully than I expected it to be verified by the bitterest bigot among those classed as orthodox." Goldwin Smith had said: "An authoritative conscience, duty, virtue, obligation, principle, and rectitude of motive, no more enter into his definitions or form parts of his system than does the religious sanction." In refutation of this statement, Mr. Spencer quotes several passages from Data of Ethics, from which we give the following sentences: "There is a truth also in the doctrine that virtue must be the aim, for this is another form of the doctrine that the aim must be to fulfil the conditions to achievement of the highest life. That the intuitions of a moral faculty should guide our conduct is a proposition in which a truth is contained, for these intuitions are the slowly organized results of experiences received by the race while living in presence of these conditions. . . .

*The town, in two annual town-meetings, on motions of D. W. Bond, Esq., a member of the society, has voted in favor of woman's suffrage.

So understanding their relative positions, those ethical systems which make virtue, right, obligation the cardinal aims, are seen to be complementary to those ethical systems which make welfare, pleasure, happiness the cardinal aims. . . . Hence, recognizing in due degrees all the various ethical theories, conduct in its highest form will take as guides innate perceptions of right, duly enlightened and made precise by an analytical intelligence, while conscious that these guides are proximately supreme solely because they lead to the ultimately supreme end,—happiness, special and general.' Experience does not lead me to suppose that Prof. Goldwin Smith will admit his description of my views to be unjustified. Contrariwise, many instances have proved to me that, when the statements first made are not distinguished by great scrupulousness, no great scrupulousness is shown in the defence of them. . . . So far from being exceptional, the instance I have given is typical of his entire criticism. I have noted eight other statements of his concerning views of mine, which are quite at variance with the facts, most of them as widely at variance as the one I have instanced."

THE nation in good faith asked for the President's life. It is idle to say that we wanted it, if God saw that it was best. That goes without saying. If God saw that it was best, he would order it himself. No one supposes that God will ever do less than best. The directions are simple. The contract is easily understood. St. James does not hedge. The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up. We prayed the prayer of faith, and it did not save the sick. The Lord did not raise him up. Must it be said that it was not the prayer of faith? It was all the faith there was. Everything of religion in the land was in that long-drawn summer of pain and prayer, and the only prayer answered and the only plan matured were Guiteau's. He said he was divinely inspired to remove the President—and he did remove him—by the most cowardly of murders. He said he would harmonize the Republican party, and over that couch of suffering all parties and all factions were hushed for two silent months. A liar from the beginning, a monster of intelligence and iniquity, sprung from the dregs of an ancestral blood whose revolutionary force and religious terror had left this horrible sediment of malignity and murder, his hand slaughtered a lofty life and reversed a national movement. Religion may well shudder to behold the man, but he is hers. He is not an infidel. He is a Christian. It is a ghastly and loathsome skeleton; but it is the skeleton of a pure ancestral Huguenot faith, perfect in all its parts. Heavenly influence, divine protection and providence, communion with God, companionship with Christ,—there is not a sacred truth, a solemn trust, which Guiteau has not beslimed with the acrid poison of his tongue. Naming every name which the Church holds holy, he stands before the Church and the world, totally depraved, proving, by the horror with which we regard him, how little the Church has ever believed in the doctrine of total depravity. Let us be frank. The Church stood ready, watching, eager to leap up and claim for prayer the credit of Garfield's recovery. She could not wait the issue. When the cloud lifted a little and let a momentary gleam of hope shine through, the Church sang softly, tentatively, timidly, as needs she must, her delight in the answer to prayer. But, if Garfield's recovery was answer to prayer and justification of the Church's theory, then his death was the non-answer to prayer and the destruction of her theory.—Gail Hamilton, in North American Review for May.

A BERLIN correspondent of the Nation writes: "In June, 1859, there was formed at Gotha a Bund freireligiöser Gemeinden Deutschlands, and at the close of the year 1880 the number of free religious societies and clubs belonging to this Bund was one hundred and thirty-six, and there were besides several newly formed societies and clubs which had not yet joined the national organization. There are at present about twenty active free religious speakers, some of whom do service for several societies. The facts here given are to be found in the Freireligiöser Kalender for 1882, published at Gotha. There is one of these freireligiöse Gemeinden in Berlin, having a membership of over eight hundred names. This society has a settled speaker, Herr Schäfer, who addresses it every Sunday morning in 'a hall.' The speaker offers no prayer and reads from no book. Congregational singing, before and after the discourse, is the only exercise. Connected with the society is a Religionschule, which is attended by a hundred and forty-eight children. To the religious instruction of these children, the speaker of the society devotes four hours a week. The children are instructed in the mythology and history and principles of the great historical religions; and Christianity is made no exception, but is treated in exactly the same way as the other religions. Belief in a personal God who can hear and answer prayer, in a divine Saviour, and in miracles, is classed among the superstitions. The children are furthermore taught they have a religion of their own, different from Christianity and the other great religions,—a religion based upon ethical and rational principle, and one which has to do with the present life. This school and society are a fair type of others in other cities, and represent a movement which is gradually assuming considerable proportions. It thus appears that Germany must be added to those nations in which an attempt is being made to build up a religious organization which is both non-theological and non-Christian."

BOOK NOTICES.

EVENINGS WITH THE SCEPTICS; or, Free Discussion on Free Thinkers. By John Owen, rector of East Anstey, Devon. London: Longmans, Green & Co.; New York: J. W. Bouton. 2 vols. $9.00.

This is the most scholarly book in English on the subject, and is further remarkable for the warm sympathy and brilliant style in which "some of the noblest among the truth-seekers of antiquity," like Socrates and Sakya Muni, and then some of the pioneers in what the author calls "Christian Scepticism," receive full justice in twelve essays, accompanied by lively comments from a party of friends, most of whom are nominally Episcopalian, but all of whom are really Free Religionists. Especially valuable is the account of Ockam, an early English Liberal, who has been sadly neglected even by his own countrymen. We must not be surprised at finding a few names like his made much more prominent than those of many others nearly their equals, nor at being now and then carried deep into metaphysics, nor at finding some leaders in the Church treated too tenderly, though the prevailing tone is shown in such passages as these: "I can understand the fascination which arbitrary belief has for intellects of a certain kind,—'ivy-minds,' I have heard them called." "Augustine, the academic sceptic, was nearer to genuine Christianity than the aged Bishop of Hippo," "Calvinism, the natural outgrowth of Augustinianism, has, in my judgment, done more mischief in the world than all the systems of free thought put together." And now that Agnostics are so falsely and frequently charged with being universal sceptics, with no firm knowledge about anything, we owe some gratitude to the clergyman who has intelligence and honesty enough to be able to see that the distinction between them and Positivists is "merely verbal; for the Agnostics limit their profession of ignorance to real or final causes, and the Positivists limit their certainty to ascertained facts and processes, so that there is in reality a perfect agreement between them. Both claim knowledge, where sensible phenomena and its manifest relations are concerned: both disclaim it, when ulterior causes are in question."

THE Atlantic Monthly for May contains the last poem written by Longfellow, the "revise" of which, corrected by his own hand, was received by the publishers only a few days previous to his death. The poem, entitled "Mad River," is a very charming one, and shows no sign of mental decay in the writer. Prof. John Fiske has an interesting article on "The Arrival of Man in Europe." Eugene W. Hilgard concludes his paper, "Progress in Agriculture by Education and Government Aid." "Studies in the South" continues to be as suggestive and instructive as in former chapters. Miss Elizabeth Robins gives us this month, as the result of her mythologic research, "The Evolution of Magic." Renan's "Marcus Aurelius" is reviewed at length. The stories, poems, etc., are of their usual interesting quality.

THE North American Review for May contains an article on "Party Schisms and Future Problems" from the pen of Carl Schurz, whose observations cannot fail to interest all American citizens who think more of justice and right than of obsolete party cries. Samuel Ward gives reminiscences of our lamented poet, under the title of "Days with Longfellow." Elizabeth Stuart Phelps gives her views as to "What does Revelation Reveal?" Lieutenant-Commander Gorringer writes with abundant knowledge and great frankness of "The Navy." W. H. Mallock contributes an article on "Conversations with a Solitary." The most breezy paper in the Review is "The Spent Bullet," by Gail Hamilton, from which an extract is given in this number of The Index.

THE Catholic World for May well sustains the reputation of this magazine for conservatism. Rev. M. A. Carrigan, D.D., in an article on "Recent Attacks on the Catholic Code of Morals," defends the Church from the strictures of M. Paul Bert. Arthur Featherstone Marshall writes on the "Decay of Faith among Catholic Peoples," which he says is apparent only, not real. "Bishop Lynch," by Hugh P. McElrhone; "The Roman Primacy in the Third Century,—Tertullian," by Rev. A. F. Hewit; and "One Session of the Irish Parliament," by William Francis Dennehy,—are among the other contributions.

THE Popular Science Monthly for May is a very readable number. Among the articles it contains are "Method and Profit of Tree-Planting," by N. H. Egleston; "Prof. Goldwin Smith as a Critic," by Herbert Spencer; "Monkeys," by A. R. Wallace; "A Reply to Miss Hardaker on the Woman Question," by Nina Morais; "Stallo's Concepts of Modern Physics," by W. D. Le Sueur; "The Tree that bears Quinine," by O. R. Bacheleer, M.D.; and a "Sketch of Sir John Lubbock" (with portrait).

We have received from the publisher, C. A. Wenborne, Buffalo, N.Y., the March and April numbers of Literature, a monthly magazine devoted to literary culture, which formerly appeared under the name of the Wyoming Literary Monthly. Critical essays on the life and writings of Bryant, Dickens, Lamb, Dean Stanley, Whittier, Wordsworth, Scott, Gladstone, and other well-known writers and thinkers, make up a good part of the reading matter of these numbers.

THE Unitarian Review for April contains contributions on "Transmutational Ethics," by Rev. J. T. Bixby; "Office, Mission, and Influence of the Hebrew Scriptures," by Rev. R. P. Stebbins, D.D.; "The Art of Rembrandt," by Rev. J. W. Chadwick; "Things at Home and Abroad," by Mrs. Martha P. Lowe; and "Notes from England," by Rev. John Page Hopps. These, with editorial notes and reviews, make an interesting number.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A LONDON despatch last week announced the death of the poet-artist, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, at the age of fifty-four.

TRINITY PARISH has given Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D., a year's vacation, which will be passed in travel.

REV. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, who will sail for Europe May 13, will return late in August. His last trip across the ocean was made twenty-eight years ago.

REV. BROOKE HERFORD of the Church of the Messiah, Chicago, Ill., has accepted a call from the Arlington Street Church of this city, and will soon remove here.

THE Tichborne claimant is sawing wood and unloading timber in the dockyard at Portsmouth, England. He thrives on a prison ration a quarter larger than that allotted to the other prisoners.

TOM HUGHES, it is said, will soon be appointed governor of the Isle of Man. The governorship has a good house and a salary of $7,500 attached to it. The duties are very light, and the cost of living about thirty per cent. less than in England.

ON April 6, at Paris, Stark Co., Ohio, Mr. Rudolph Martin died, in his eighty-third year. He was a firm liberal man, of intelligence, of great generosity and kindness. His funeral was largely attended. Brief addresses were made by Messrs. McGregor and Schaeffer, and Dr. Cock, of Canton, Ohio.

YOUNG Robert Barrett Browning is as persistent a worker as his father. Although he has attained a good position among the English artists, and has seen his pictures hung on the line at the Royal Academy for several years, he does not consider himself released from study. He is now going through a course of anatomy in Paris.

STANLEY, the African explorer, was born near Denbigh, Wales, in 1840, and is therefore but forty-two years old. During his childhood, he was for ten years an inmate of a poor-house, and by his own unaided exertions has since worked his way up to his present position as the most enterprising and intrepid of living explorers, in addition to his fame as a lively and interesting writer. His story is an admirable incentive to youthful ambition under untoward circumstances.

ERNEST W. LONGFELLOW, the son of the dead poet, in a note addressed to the editor of the Evening Transcript deprecates the numerous hasty biographies of his father now being compiled, and advertised all over the country, and adds "in due time a memoir will be published, to which the family will lend all their assistance; that for this they reserve all the material in their hands; and that they will be thankful to those of Mr. Longfellow's friends who will intrust to them for this use whatever correspondence and other helpful data may be in their possession."

SARA BERNHARDT's powers as an actress must surely be on the wane, or she would not find it necessary to keep her name before the people in so many sensational ways as she does. Within six months, we have heard of her as attacked by a Russian mob on account of her religion, then of her real fainting in the death-scene in Camille from exhaustion, next we hear she is very low with hemorrhage of the lungs, and now we are told that on the 4th of this month she was married in London to M. Damala, a wealthy Greek gentleman, proceeding on the evening of her wedding-day to Barcelona to fulfil a theatrical engagement.

ELKANAH P. STEDMAN, late of Walnut Hills, Ohio, left a will in which he gave one-half of his property to his son, adding, "misfortunes have followed us both, but his door has always been open to me." To one of his daughters, he gives all his household effects and one-half the residue of his property. . . . He desires his remains "to be dressed in a cotton shirt, and a shroud of Canton flannel, as was the fashion when my father died, fifty years ago, and my grandfather, seventy years ago, both Revolutionary soldiers who perilled their lives for their country. . . . The only inscription I desire is, 'Through life a friend of the oppressed.'"

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Rev. Clara M. Bisbee, having established in Dorchester, Mass., the 'Free Society' for religious growth, gave on Easter Sunday a specimen of her ideal 'christening.' After a short address, explanatory of her position, she called to the platform, which was beautifully ornamented with flowers, fifteen children of her flock, and received from their friends assent to the following formula: 'Will you do your best to instruct this child in the truth, the goodness, and the beauty which pertain to God?' and 'Will you do your best to strengthen his will toward the realization of these divine attributes in his life?' Lyceum hall was crowded, and the occasion will prove a memorable one to all present."

MRS. IDA GREELEY SMITH, eldest daughter of Horace Greeley, and wife of Col. Nicholas Smith, died at her home in Chappaqua, N.Y., on Tuesday, April 11, very unexpectedly, of diphtheria. She leaves three little ones: Horace, aged five; Gabrielle, two years old; and a month old infant daughter. She was about thirty years of age. Her younger sister Gabrielle, who has made her home with Ida, is now the last surviving member of the family of the lamented founder of the New York Tribune. Mrs. Smith was a lady of exemplary character, and the author of a series of letters from Nassau, N.P., published in the Tribune, several sketches which appeared in Appleton's Journal, and the translator of a serial story for the New York Graphic.

THE death of Lady Lytton, wife of Bulwer Lytton, the novelist, and the mother of Lord Lytton, late viceroy of India, recalls a case of painful domestic infelicity. She was the remarkably beautiful daughter of Francis Massy Wheeler, an Irish gentleman of fortune, and while quite young married Lytton. Her disposition was not the sweetest, and his temper was not the most conciliatory. Finally, they agreed to separate, he paying her $2,000 a year. She began to publish novels. Running into debt, she called upon Lytton for money; and, as he refused, she wrote him up in one of her books. He then had her put in a lunatic asylum. The outrage came to public notice, and Lady Lytton was released. After this episode, she lived on the continent most of the time.

Frothingham's Sermons.

The sermons are neatly printed in pamphlet form, and our friends who wish to do missionary work for the Liberal cause will find them admirably adapted to that purpose. To such as order them in lots of 25 or more, the price will be reduced to 3 cents. Single copies 5 cents.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A TRIAL is now in progress in Cincinnati involving large interests and novel questions, the suit being to determine the ownership of the property held in the name of Archbishop Purcell. The creditors who have brought the suit claim that the property, which includes churches, school-houses, and cemeteries, was purchased with their money, and really belongs to the trust. The church claims that the property was paid for by the different congregations, and legally held by the archbishop in accordance with custom.

ON the 21st, in the House of Commons, Mr. Forster stated that the total number of arrests under the Coercion Act up to the 18th was nine hundred and eighteen. The return for the first quarter of the year 1882 shows that, exclusive of persons reinstated as care-takers or tenants, seven hundred and thirty-four families, consisting of three thousand eight hundred and ninety-two persons, were evicted in Ireland. Nearly four thousand evictions mean an amount of suffering and wretchedness which it is appalling to contemplate.

SAYS Unity: "In the recent death of Miss Elizabeth Hamilton, daughter of Sir William Hamilton, the great Scotch metaphysician, the women have lost an advocate of their rights to legal and educational equality, who demonstrated the arguments she urged. She was selected by the editors of the new Encyclopædia Britannica as one equal to the difficult task of preparing an account of her father's philosophy for this work, and at the time of her death she was engaged upon an analysis of the subtle philosophy of Hermann Lotze. Is it not wasting time to discuss problems in the abstract, that have already been solved in the concrete? The question as to whether woman is equal to the higher problems of thought is closed when a woman is found equal to the task."

DURING a riotous demonstration at Balta, the Jews were assailed in the most merciless manner. The plundering lasted two days. Forty persons were seriously injured, some of whom have since died, a thousand houses were wrecked, and nearly two thousand Jewish families were rendered homeless. One report says that, until the arrival of Podolia, the troops aided in plundering instead of protecting the Jews from the fury and fanaticism of the rioters, who were mainly peasants from the neighborhood of the town. These horrible outrages, while they excite in us pity for their victims and indignation against their perpetrators, serve to remind us how far portions of the "civilized" world are from that ideal state, the hope for the realization of which inspires and sustains the efforts of patriots and philanthropists.

It is stated, apparently on good authority, that Jesse James was strong in his theological convictions, which were orthodox, and that "Am I a Soldier of the Cross?" was one of his favorite hymns. It is even asserted that he once shot a man, with whom he was disputing on religion, for persisting in saying he did not believe in hell. It was soon after he left Quantrel's band that he became "converted," and began to take an active part in religious services. His brother Frank is at times exceedingly devotional, and prays with great fervor. This religious tendency seems to have been inherited from the parents, for the father of the James boys was a Baptist minister; and the mother, Mrs. Samuels, is declared to be "a marvellous success as a leader in prayer-meetings. Her commanding presence and vivid descriptions of hell make the heart of the sinner quake."

An intelligent London correspondent of the Nation writes: "Coercion is, as every one now sees, a temporary makeshift, not a permanent policy. To rule by means of coercion acts is like governing by means of a state of siege. The device is effective for the moment, but every month which it lasts increases the difficulty of returning to the orderly reign of regular law. I do full justice to the good intentions with which the policy of coercion was begun. I dare not even assert with confidence that the policy was, with all its fatal defects, one which could be avoided. All that I do assert, and this without hesitation, is that the policy of governing by means of arbitrary arrest cannot last. The problem before the government is how to enforce law and to protect life in Ireland by just, by regular, and by legal means. I do not believe the problem to be without a solution, but one may say with certainty that no leading statesman has pointed out a satisfactory solution for the adoption of the nation."

SEVERAL hours were given one day last week, in the Massachusetts Legislature to the discussion of a bill offered by John F. Andrew, son of Governor Andrew, providing that disbelief in a God shall not affect the credibility of a witness in court. Messrs. Andrew and Cronin of Boston, Muzzey of Cambridge, and Hayden of Woburn defended the bill as a step forward, demanded by justice, in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, and due under the claim of equal rights to the class known as atheists,—a class, it was declared, as worthy of credence as professed believers. But the bill was opposed with the usual arguments (?) and defeated by a vote of one hundred and ten to thirty-five. We remember well when the law under which atheists can now testify in the courts of this State was passed, after bitter opposition and repeated failures; and we hope to see at no distant day this vestige of intolerance, against which Mr. Andrew, who is certainly "a chip of the old block," made so courageous a fight last week, forever abolished.

THE new cable connecting Emden with the Anglo-American cable system at Valentia, by which messages can be transmitted directly between Germany and America, was completed on the 22d; and communication was opened with the following message from the German Emperor to the President of the United States, "I am happy to express to you, Mr. President, by the first direct telegraphic traffic between Germany and America, my satisfaction on the completion of the work by which the friendly relations between both nations will be furthermore enlarged." To this, the President replied: "I have received with much satisfaction, as the first despatch over the new line of telegraph between Germany and the United States, your Majesty's kind message. In common with all the people of the United States, so many of whom still speak the German tongue in their homes, I share in the pleasure which your Majesty expresses at the opening of this new line of communication, and in the faith that it will serve to promote the friendly relations which we desire, and which it will be my aim to preserve and increase."

MR. WILLIAM CLARKE, well known to our readers by his able contributions to this paper, has given his impressions of America since his return to England, in a lecture before the Reform Club of Cambridge, of which city he is a resident. A report of his lecture given in an English paper concludes as follows: "Mr. Clarke proceeded to show the difference there was between the demeanor of the government officials in the United States, where they realized the fact that they were the servants and not the masters of the public, and the government officials in England. Recently, one of the most illustrious men of our day [Herbert Spencer] was engaged in the founding of a new association, and required to see and take counsel with various members of the House of Commons, but was unable to obtain admission to the lobbies of the House of Commons until some member of the House came and introduced him; while the Westminster School boys, in cap and gown, could march through, and even enter at their will and take the seats in the speaker's gallery. In the United States, all the galleries of both Houses, with the exception of one for Senators and diplomatists, were thrown open to the public without any distinction. Mr. Clarke concluded a most interesting lecture by quoting the eloquent words of Mr. John Bright during the period of the civil war, when he exhibited great foresight in predicting for the United States the great and glorious career upon which it had now entered, and which justly made it an example for the whole world, and resumed his seat amid loud cheers."

THE AMERICAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The pastoral letter issued by the Provincial Council of Catholic bishops held at Cincinnati a few weeks ago is a notable document and has attracted wide attention. On some points, particularly on social questions, its attitude has been very generally commended by the Protestant press, both secular and religious, as wise and conservative. But, on political and religious matters, it seems to have been pretty generally regarded, and in some journals severely criticised, as a challenge and menace to American principles and institutions. From the style of some of these criticisms, it would appear as if not a few American editors had just waked to a consciousness of the creed and character of the Catholic Church. In fact, however, there is nothing novel, from a Catholic point of view, in the declarations of this pastoral epistle. The positions taken in it and the ideas advanced are such as logically follow from the Catholic principle of the absolute supremacy and authority of the Church over individual reason and conduct; and they have been again and again stated in one form or another, according to the circumstances that have called for a formal declaration. If they startle by a seeming novelty and strangeness, it is because every fresh statement of them only discloses a wider gap between them and the political and religious ideas that are most in the ascendant in this last quarter of the nineteenth century.

To American citizens, for instance, who have been brought up to believe that the Declaration of Independence has about equal authority with the Bible, and who would as soon think of disputing the Commandments as disputing the propositions that "all men are created equal," that they have an "inalienable right to liberty," that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," who are the people,—to those brought up on these political principles, it seems like a revolutionary pronunciamento of some despotic conspiracy against their liberties to hear such sentiments gravely put forth, under the sanction of religion, as the bishops' epistle contains. The letter traverses and boldly denies every one of these declarations which are commonly regarded as the palladium of our popular form of government; and it does this in language which suggests that the writers had the Declaration of Independence in mind, and meant to declare its fundamental principles to be dangerous errors. They say that men are not created equal; that not only are men unequal in faculty and condition, which is of course true, but that they are not in reality equal as to rights before the law. "It is ordained by God that some shall rule and some shall be ruled. Those who are appointed to rule have certain rights that subjects have not. . . . Kings and magistrates and bishops and priests are appointed to rule: if to rule, then are they above those whom they rule. Before God, their sins may make them less than those they rule; but, as rulers, they are above those whom they rule." So also in respect to freedom. "God alone," says this pastoral letter, "is free. . . . All men are born subject to law: if subject, then not free, except so far as the law makes them free." And the doctrine that all power in government is from the people the letter declares to be an error. "All power," it says, "comes from God, by whom princes rule and the mighty decree justice." It is true the bishops quote Pope Leo, and declare their opinion as in agreement with his,—that in some cases the people have rightfully a voice in electing the administrators of government; yet they hasten to add that the people, in thus indicating the instrument, do not confer the right or the power to govern, which always come from God. And since it is the Catholic doctrine that the Church is God's vicegerent on the earth and the present medium of the revelation of his will, this statement is but a thin disguise of the old claim of Catholicism that the Church, being the depository of all governmental powers, should control the State.

Now, all these are certainly very un-American doctrines. But, as they have been the doctrines of the Catholic Church for hundreds of years, they should excite no surprise. The American Republic was founded on principles of civil and religious liberty that are the exact antipodes of these principles of Roman Catholicism. And hence, when we see the two sets of principles formulated side by side, we are at once struck with their antagonism. We have seen the Catholic Church for the last generation increasing in numbers and power among us at an enormous rate; and yet it has not seemed the dangerous thing which it now looks, when its doctrines are thus clearly enunciated. Here and there, friction has been experienced between Catholic convictions and our Republican institutions, particularly with regard to the public schools. And an occasional alarm has been sounded as to future peril. But, on the whole, Catholics have demeaned themselves as loyal citizens. They have fought for the nation's integrity in its armies. As to politics, they have generally allied themselves with the party claiming to be most democratic and most hostile to monarchical traditions and centralization of power. But, suddenly, on reading this manifesto of Catholic principles, many good Americans appear to have become aware that the nation, by its very guarantee of religious liberty, has been nursing a power whose central purpose and life mean the overthrow of those liberties to which the nation is dedicated.

And yet, while the subtle influence of Catholic doctrines as an abrading force hostile to free institutions is to be vigilantly guarded against, there is another side to the picture, that is calculated to allay alarm as to any very great or immediate danger from Catholic ascendancy. There is no doubt that Catholics who have emigrated to this country from the monarchies of Europe learn speedily to like the larger freedom they find here, and that the civil and social liberty granted them tends to beget in them a kindred spirit of religious liberty. A friend informs the writer that she has two servants that represent two very different types of Catholicism,—a cook somewhat advanced in years, who came from Ireland and can only read her prayer-book, and who is most devoted to all the doctrines and ceremonies of the Church and makes the advice of the priest her conscience; and a waitress, born in this country of devoted Irish Catholic parents, but who has been through our public schools, is fond of reading newspapers and books from the public library, who usually goes to the Catholic church once on Sunday, but does not deem it a great sin if she stays at home, and who shows in other ways that she is much emancipated both from the superstitious dogmas of the Church and from the authority of the priest. And this is an illustration of a modification of Catholicism which has been going on in this country; and going on to an extent, doubtless, more visible to the authorities within the Church than to any outside observers.

It is not difficult, indeed, to read between the lines of this Pastoral Letter, which has alarmed some zealous Protestant patriots concerning their country's liberties, the notes of a precisely opposite alarm agitating the minds of the bishops who wrote the document,—an alarm lest the free spirit and institutions of this country are undermining the authority of the Catholic Church with its membership. The letter, it should be remembered, is written specially for Catholics. It is to be read in their congregations. And it is a warning throughout against the perils which beset Catholics, especially in this country. There are direct assertions in it of a growing disposition among Catholics to question the authority of the priest and to assert that he derives his power from the people, and also that editors of some Catholic newspapers have caught the very un-Catholic habit of criticising bishops and priests, and thus discrediting them with their readers. The letter contains various other intimations, disclosing the fact that Catholics in this country are much more disposed to act on their own individual judgment than they are accustomed to do in European countries. The truth is there is growing up an American Catholic Church, which in time, if present tendencies continue, may become quite distinct from the Roman Catholic Church. The authorities in the Church see the danger; and one of the most efficient methods by which they are seeking to ward it off is the withdrawal of all Catholic children from the public schools, and placing them in parochial schools under Catholic instruction. This plan, so far as carried out, would check the tendency of American institutions to Protestantize Catholicism. But, should it result in checking the tendency to such an extent as to protect the interests of the Catholic Church at the expense of the nation, the nation in self-defence would have to find a remedy for this ecclesiastical assault upon its vital principles.

DARWIN.

Charles Darwin, who died last week in his seventy-third year at his home in Kent, with friends and his books and plants and laboratory about him, has left to the world a name that will be honored, and scientific treasures that will be valued as long as the race endures. His death takes from us a man who has exerted an influence on the study of natural history more profound and far-reaching than has been exerted by any other man who has lived since the days of Aristotle. Although the views with which his name has become identified were, when first presented less than a quarter of a century ago, treated with almost universal derision, he lived to see them accepted by the great body of scientific men and by thinkers generally capable of judging them; and he enjoyed the satisfaction before he died of seeing that his discoveries and his untiring labors had created an important epoch in human thought. "Proud as England may be," says Haeckel, "to be called the fatherland of Newton, who, with his law of gravitation, brought inorganic nature under the dominion of natural laws of cause and effect, yet may she with even greater pride reckon Charles Darwin among her sons,—he who solved the yet harder problem of organic nature under the sway of the same natural laws."

The great work by which he is best known, on The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, given to the world in 1859, has been translated into all the languages of civilization, has provoked earnest and often angry controversy far and wide, and "has been," say the cyclopedias, "the subject of more reviews, pamphlets, and separate books than any other volume of the age." The result of all this discussion is a profound conviction among men who have given careful attention to the subject that the main positions of Mr. Darwin in regard to the origin of species are reasonable and sound, are supported by a multitude of undeniable facts, and by reasonings based thereupon which no future advances in knowledge are likely to invalidate. "Missing links" have been discovered almost every year since Darwin put forth his celebrated work. The series of transitional forms between birds and reptiles has been pretty well completed by the discovery of birds with teeth in this country by Prof. Marsh. The development of flowering plants from flowerless plants, asserted by Mr. Darwin, has been demonstrated. The dividing line once alleged to exist between animals and plants has been shown to have no existence in the "border land" of organic life. A study of the remains of the tertiary mammalia has shown "that, if the doctrine of evolution had not existed, palæontology must have invented it." Men like Lyell and Huxley, Gray and Marsh, have found the facts in their provinces of investigation so overwhelmingly strong in support of evolution that they have been compelled to accept it. Darwin did not of course first enunciate the theory of evolution; but he presented a comprehensive and systematic combination of phenomena which before had stood isolated, and an intelligible and rational method, by which evolutionary changes in the organic world have occurred. While others before him had had mere glimpses of the principle of "natural selection," and while Wallace, without doubt, discovered it by his own observations, yet Darwin's discovery was made independently of others, and as far back even as 1844; and he alone possessed the knowledge of natural history, and had the full understanding of the import and implications of the theory necessary to present it in a manner that would command the attention of scientific men. Enough that the reality and value of the discovery are now recognized, and that it is now everywhere perceptibly affecting the beliefs of intelligent men.

For it is not, as John Fiske says, "simply that the great body of naturalists have accepted the Darwinian theory: it has become part and parcel of their daily thoughts, an element in every investigation, which cannot be got rid of. With a tacit consent that is almost unanimous, the classificatory relations among plants and animals have come to be recognized as representing degrees of genetic kinship. One needs but to read constantly such scientific journals as Nature or to peer into the proceedings of scientific societies to see how thoroughly all contemporary inquiry is permeated by the conception of natural selection. The record of research, whether in embryology, in palæontology, or in the study of the classification and distribution of organized beings, has come to be the registration of testimony in support of Mr. Darwin's hypothesis. So deeply indeed has this mighty thinker impressed his thoughts on the mind of the age that, in order fully to unfold the connotations of the word 'Darwinism,' one could hardly stop short of making an index to the entire recent literature of the organic sciences. The sway of natural selection in biology is hardly less complete than that of gravitation in astronomy; and thus it is probably true that no other scientific discoverer has within his own lifetime obtained so magnificent a triumph as Mr. Darwin."

Mr. Darwin was born in Shrewsbury, England, Feb. 12, 1809. His father, Dr. Robert Darwin, F.R.S., and his grandfather, Dr. Erasmus Darwin, F.R.S., author of Zoönomea, Botanic Garden, and Temple of Nature, were men of scientific tastes and acquirements. The great naturalist was educated at Shrewsbury grammar school, and afterward at the University of Edinburgh. He was then four years at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1831. His hereditary taste for the study of natural science showed itself in his joining the Beagle Exploring Expedition to South America, Australia, and the Pacific Islands, which sailed in 1831, the voyage lasting five years. On his return to England, he published a volume in regard to the geology and natural history of the countries he visited; and subsequently he wrote the Zoölogy of the Voyage of the Beagle, and several volumes on geology and palæontology. In 1853, he received the royal medal, and in 1859 the Wollaston medal, from the Geological Society. In 1859 appeared his Origin of Species. Among the other works by Mr. Darwin are The Structure and Distribution of Coral Reef (1842), Geological Observations on South America (1846), Monograph of the Family Cirripedia (1851-53), Fertilization of Orchids (1862), Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication (1868), The Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex (1871), On the Expression of the Emotions in Men and Animals (1872), and The Formation of Vegetable Mould through the Action of Worms (1881).

Mr. Darwin's work extends over a wide field of thought, including zoölogy, botany, and geology, to each of which he made original contributions of an important and valuable character. The minuteness of his observation was not more remarkable than the comprehensiveness of his thought. He was, fortunately, in easy circumstances, and was able to devote all the time his health would permit to scientific pursuits. He was elected Fellow of the Royal Society in 1834, and was the third of his family in direct descent who enjoyed that distinction. He was successively elected a member of nearly all the European scientific bodies, and was regarded as one of the most original thinkers and the most remarkable naturalist of the age. Personally, he was one of the noblest of men, and he was deservedly esteemed by his friends and neighbors.

The influence which the writings of Darwin have had and will continue to exert in modifying theological thought is incalculable. No other man of the age probably has contributed so largely to the general disbelief which prevails in regard to the Scripture account of creation and the miraculous origin of man.

His magnanimity, his judicial spirit, his absolute fairness, his inflexible love of truth, and uncompromising adherence to his conviction through evil and through good report, none can help admiring. His moderation in the statement of his views, the singular honesty with which he stated in their full strength objections to his theory, the readiness and candor with which he acknowledged an error when discovered by himself or pointed out by another, his desire to give to all persons credit for their discoveries and labors, the undisturbed serenity with which he pursued his studies in spite of misrepresentation, opprobrium, and ridicule, the precision and comprehensiveness with which he observed the phenomena of nature, the extent and variety of his knowledge, the fertility and originality of his intellect, and the vastness and value of his contribution to the thought of the world entitle him to rank among the greatest and noblest of mankind. B. F. UNDERWOOD.

POLITICAL SCIENCE IN NEW YORK.

Professor John W. Burgess contributes an interesting statement to the April International Review relative to "The Study of the Political Sciences in Columbia College." He remarks that "the conviction is now already deep and general that, unless a sounder political wisdom and a better political practice be attained, the republican system may become but a form and republican institutions but a deception. It is, then, hardly a question any more as to whether we need a higher political education." He then proceeds to indicate the system of study which has been conceived and developed—to a considerable extent, we imagine, by himself—to meet this need. First, there is instruction in history and elementary political economy in the first three years of the undergraduate department. Second, there is the School of Political Science proper, the first year of which may take the place to the undergraduate of the college Senior year, and is devoted to the study, in connection with lectures, of the history of the development of the political institutions of continental Europe, the special constitutional history of England and the United States, the history of the philosophic theories of the State, and the history of economic systems and theories. The second year is occupied with the comparative constitutional law of the principal States of Europe and the United States, and of the commonwealths of the United States, and with the Roman law and codes derived therefrom. In the third year, the comparative administrative law of the principal States of Europe and the United States and of our commonwealths, the history of diplomacy, international law (public and private), and economic, statistical, and social science are considered. History is considered to furnish the foundations of political science, and the historical method of study is emphasized and illustrated in the manner of instruction. Theory and speculation in politics, it is said, must be regulated by historic fact, and even generalized most largely from historic fact. Perhaps Professor Burgess does not realize that this already involves in a preliminary way a certain "theory or speculation" respecting politics, and does not preclude the question, for which we seek not merely a de facto, but a rational answer,—namely, Why should our principles of political action be based on facts rather than on an idea which may surpass the facts and furnish the motive for the creation of new ones? The historical method is, however, the only method for the study of the politics of the past and present; and it is to the study of history and of present actual tendencies rather than to the inculcation of any theory of what ought to be in the future that the school devotes itself. And by no means is it a merely empirical, but a truly philosophical method of historical study that is sought to be inculcated; and the influence of this must be directly against the merely empirical political practice which is so common in our time, and has made "politics" almost a synonyme for the absence of statesmanship. At the end of the third year, a degree of Doctor of Philosophy may be won by a triple examination, which reminds us in its thoroughness of the practice of the best German universities. The third and fourth features of the scheme are respectively an academy of political sciences, which graduates of the school may enter on condition of promising at least one original contribution a year on some special topic connected with political science, and the library of the political sciences, which is to be a collection not merely of hand-books, text-books, treatises, etc., but of original material, such as texts of constitutions, statute-books, and ordinances of governments, debates of legislative assemblies, decisions of judicial bodies, etc., on the basis of which the students may do original work.

The above scheme cannot be too highly praised; and it is interesting to note that Harvard University has, since the inception of the plan at Columbia, gathered into a group its various courses on constitutional history and political economy, and so announced them, and that Michigan University has actually established a similar school. Young men, not intending to enter public life, but with an ambition to make religion mean something for the world about them, and no longer to be merely a way of getting to another or perhaps a gentle inspiration toward living in a traditional manner in this, could hardly do better than attend such a school for a time. Indeed, were Professor Adler able to give some instruction in ethics and philosophy, we could hardly imagine a place better fitted to their needs than New York city. The liberal divinity schools differ from other divinity schools not so much in any inclination to take up the problems of the future as in a more genial and liberal attitude toward the old problems. They are doubtless filling their place, but it is not the place to which we are sure an increasing number of young men will feel themselves attracted in the not distant coming time. There is no political radicalism any more than religious radicalism in the school of political science in New York; but there are rich sources of political instruction, and we suspect that the young men whom we have in mind will have sufficient radical impulses of both kinds in themselves. If not, they are hardly among the "called."

W. M. SALTER.

BOOKS AND THE WRITERS OF BOOKS.

Forty or fifty years ago, the authorship of a dozen meritorious short poems even would give to the writer of them immediate reputation as a versifier, which, if properly cultivated, might ultimately become the fame of a poet. The authorship of two or three readable volumes of travels or romance made their writer at once a literary man of note. In fact, the publication of a readable book at that time was more or less of a literary event. A good book was generally read and talked about, and widely noticed. Its author had no occasion to complain of neglect from the public. On the contrary, the recognition of even ordinary literary merit was prompt and ungrudging. Indeed, the so-called criticism of that day, in this country at least, was too apt to be mere fulsome laudation of anybody and everybody who indulged in prose or rhyme. Fifty years ago, the candidates for literary distinction were so few that they were not in each other's way. Several of them still survive, crowned with the laurel of a well-earned fame. One of them has just disappeared in a sunset-like effulgence of glory, honored and mourned in both hemispheres, even beyond the limits of the English-speaking world. To-day, the conditions of literary distinction are entirely changed, the terms on which it is had being much harder than they were of yore. Now, the publication of a confessedly good book, which all the journalistic and periodical critics are willing to praise and which they can conscientiously praise, is such a constantly and multitudinously recurring literary event that it excites only a languid and temporary interest that quickly dies out, leaving the author of the good book aforesaid in pretty much his original obscurity. Literary merit is so common now that it scarcely confers distinction. The mob of gentlemen who write with ease and ability is rapidly becoming in the leading countries of the civilized world a large and formidable moiety of the entire population of each of those countries. An English writer on this subject says that newspaper criticism favorable to a young author produces at the present time little or no result, because there is too much of it, and the competition is too fierce for any one name to emerge from the crush, except by miracle. "A good book, you say: the critics praised it. Ah, indeed! Why, look at 'the opinions of the press' at the end of everybody's volume, and see if the critics have not praised all. They were every one good, no doubt; but how on earth can anybody read the ten thousand books per annum that are published and that the critics have praised?" Such is the pertinent inquiry of Mr. Grant Allen in an article on "The Decay of Criticism" in the March number of the Fortnightly Review. And just here is the rub for the young author, even the young author of undoubted genius. The road to distinction through the writing of books is a hard road to travel. It is so thronged, and there are so many meritorious competitors, that no single individual is very conspicuous or can be. We should infer that almost every Englishman and Englishwoman of education and ability writes one or more novels as a matter of course. Writing ability was never in greater demand than it is in now, because everybody reads; but writing ability cannot now expect much in the shape of fame; but must content itself with a pecuniary compensation, such as producers of ordinary kinds of wares and commodities are content to receive. Even an omnivorous reader like Magliabecchi, with nothing else to do but to devour books, would stand aghast at the torrent of really good books of all kinds and in all departments of thought and literature which are now constantly pouring from the presses of Great Britain, Germany, France, and the United States. The critical department of every weekly journal has whole columns of notices of new books. In a world like the present, so preoccupied with politics, the daily news, business, and pleasure, readers confine themselves more and more to newspapers and periodicals and books published in pamphlet and periodical form. Meantime, as the world gets more and more on a rational basis, the literatures and histories of the past will become of less and less interest. Their significance will be condensed in a few pages, and that will suffice; for a rational, scientific, popular civilization will have little or nothing to learn from the past, and thus the Gibbons, Mommsens, and Grotes will no longer be read in extenso except by the curious archæologist. Society will soon have taken a departure de novo, social and individual life being lived according to the dictates of reason and common-sense, and not according to precedent and authority.

PERTURBATIONS OF ENGLISH UNITARIANISM.

This year, I have hope of visiting the United States once more. You are good enough to inform me that in that case I may probably have an opportunity of speaking in the Memorial Hall, erected to the honor of Theodore Parker. This will be a great pleasure. Indeed, I should also be glad to see Florence and Providence again. Influenced by what took place in America, I was invited to speak in an English church by a congregation attended by Mr. Thomasson, M.P., whose father gave £1,000 to Professor Huxley, as a testimony of his regard. Upon this invitation, our Unitarians took alarm. The Inquirer is our chief Unitarian journal, edited by the Rev. Mr. Marshall, who, though a liberal, courteous gentleman, expressed great perturbation at this incident. You will gather his point from what I said to him in a letter which he fairly inserted in the Inquirer. As I expressed therein my sense of the singular liberality of American churches, it may interest some readers of The Index, if I recite its terms. The following was my argument to the Rev. Mr. Marshall:—

What an odd idea you have that the invitation by the free Christian church in Bolton to "a professed Secularist to give discourses as a part of the ordinary Sunday services seemed to indicate that the minister and congregation attach no importance to the public expression of belief in God, and the consequent acts of prayer and worship"! This idea never occurred to me. I do not believe it ever occurred to the church. I received similar invitations to speak in several Christian churches in America, and accepted them. Nobody there seemed to imagine what you imagine. The Twenty-eighth Congregational Church in Boston, over which Theodore Parker was formerly minister, has as much good religion in it as any English church I know, and three times I was invited by the authorities there to speak in the church, and "to conduct the services in my own way." In Florence and in Providence, I accepted similar invitations. The Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York, is as likely as any minister in England to "attach public importance to the public expression" of the beliefs and acts which you mention. Dr. Collyer made the offer to me with his usual heartiness; and all who know Dr. Collyer know that his is not a foolish or sentimental heartiness, he being distinguished among ministers for a manly and an intelligent frankness. The Rev. Brooke Herford invited me to speak in his church in Chicago, and himself told the congregation that he had pleasure in doing it, because years ago I had done the same by him. So your idea that "I should not invite a 'professed Christian' to conduct a religious service in a secular hall" is wrong. This has often been done, not only in London, but elsewhere. The Secular Society in Leicester has oft done it. It has been done in the Baskerville Hall in Birmingham, built by my friend Daniel Baker, who, though a "professed secularist," was one of the principal subscribers, a short time ago, to a fund for extinguishing a debt upon a Unitarian church in that town. I always advocate a generous toleration, without caring whether others show it to us or not. In America, Unitarians of eminence did, however, show it to me. And I have wished an opportunity of making some acknowledgment of their friendliness in your representative pages. In America, I was always asked to conduct the services in my own way, no condition being imposed or suggested as to what I should say. You have not been correctly informed as to what I said in the Bolton church. Such a phrase, for instance, as "We should not waste our time in sentimental piety" never escaped me. I should deem it bad taste and a breach of good courtesy to introduce debatable questions, unless desired. In controversy, Christians whom I have met have constantly contended that Christianity includes secular morality. If this be true, there is common ground between Christianity and Secularism. On this ground, I spoke. Is it not well that men should sometimes dwell upon their agreements rather than magnify forever their differences? Secularism maintains what Lord Beaconsfield would call the "territorial independence" of morality. Christianity contends for its exclusive dependence upon theology. The Rev. Herbert Mills, the minister of the Bolton church, and the congregation who invited me to speak on two Sundays, no more thought they were betraying their "attachment" to Unitarianism by listening to me than I thought I was betraying my "attachment" to Secularism by speaking to them. Feeble and foolish people, who have no clear hold of their own minds, thought that the Bolton church had become secularist and that I had become Unitarian. But foolish people do not count in these days for so much as they once did. There are many Christian persons for whom I have not only respect, but affection; and there are in Christianity many secular precepts which I accept and honor for their own sake. But I have no wish to be thought a Christian. Nevertheless, no fear of being called one shall ever prevent me listening to noble Christian preachers or speaking in their churches, if invitation thereunto be given me. One obvious want in these days of diversity of opinion is a morality which persons of all faiths can understand,—a morality founded on common-sense, common experience, and the teachings of science, and which a man may believe in without being called upon to believe in something else. It is this which we call "Secularism"; and, if Christians really care for morality for its own sake, it can do them no harm to hear of this form of it.

This account may give your readers a better insight of the perturbations to which the English Unitarian mind is subject than any formal narrative.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

ESSEX STREET, TEMPLE BAR, LONDON.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE New York Tablet, speaking of the Pastoral Letter issued by the recent Catholic Synod at Cincinnati, seeks to allay the fears excited in some quarters by those parts of the letter which assert that political power comes primarily from God and not from the people, and which deny some of the fundamental principles of the American Declaration of Independence. The Tablet says of the former assertion:—

It is an old doctrine of the Catholic Church, and there is nothing in it to alarm any one about good Catholics not being good citizens of this Republic. The pastoral even quotes the words of the present pope, who says that "they who are to be set over the Republic may be chosen by the will and decision of the people, without any opposition or repugnance to Catholic dogma."

The Tablet also declares that the Catholic Church thrives best on the voluntary system of support, and that what it asks for is not power as a State religion, but only an equal chance with other churches for self-development.

THE Irish World—which, by the way, is specially mentioned in the Pastoral Letter of the Catholic bishops as "a bad paper, breeding insolence and defiance of authority," and not to be encouraged—announces that the contributions which have been made through its agency for the Irish Land League, and forwarded to the treasurer of the League, amount to $300,444.71,—"the largest fund ever raised by any newspaper for any cause." Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of the World's methods, its success is certainly an illustration of the power that attends earnest conviction and persistent energy. Well may the paper congratulate itself on Gladstone having thus advertised its ability in the House of Commons: "But for the work the Irish World is doing, and the money it is sending across the ocean, there would be no agitation in Ireland."

THE Presbyterian has an article showing "why Presbyterians recognize, but do not celebrate, Easter." After mentioning but not laying stress upon the fact that Easter day, being movable, rarely coincides with the real anniversary of the event alleged to be celebrated, it says that "there is no Scripture command" for the celebration; that "Lent, Good Friday, Passion Week, Easter, have not a word of sanction in Holy Scripture"; that the religious observance of the first day of every week is the proper commemoration of the Christian belief in Christ's resurrection; and that, "if the matter be adjourned to one great outburst of commemorative enthusiasm each year, is there not danger that it be limited thereto," and "is not that the precise effect which has followed?" Further, it questions the religiousness of the current celebrations of Easter, and on this point quotes and indorses the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph as follows:—

What part real religion plays in all this is would be difficult to determine; but, as a mere festival, Easter grows in consequence yearly. The makers and dealers in fancy goods have ingeniously contrived to make the season one of their great "coigns of vantage."

More than that, it is their last great opportunity of the early part of the year, so they fiercely intrench themselves in lines which they make ever stronger. Business enterprise is a good thing; and yet it does seem that there are features of this Easter traffic which, on the score of good taste at least, would bear considerable modification. The variations on the Cross, "He is Risen," and the like, come dangerously near frivolity; and the flooding of all sorts of places with such ultra familiar treatment of things held by the truly devout in awe and reverence can hardly do good to religion. That it is all done palpably to make money renders the business specially unpleasant: that, indeed, is the great objection to it. If it were the outcome of sincere feeling, the vulgarity of it could be overlooked; but it is simple moneyed speculation, and as such is little short of an abomination in the eyes of many people. Doubtless, however, it is one of the things that is not amenable to criticism: it must run its course, and then possibly may be succeeded by some more seemly freak of fashion. The "art renaissance" has had much to do with the inflection. The card artists, and "decorators" of all kinds, have been so encouraged by the prevailing craze that it is small wonder if, in yielding to the rage, and in their omnivorous search for "subjects," they should overstep the mark. For the bulk of people, no doubt, Lent and Easter are only words, conveying no distinct meaning.

THE Christian Union, in an article entitled "A Missouri Saint," indulges in its usual plain speaking over the disgustingly ostentatious funeral ceremonies that were held in honor of the notorious bandit and murderer, Jesse James. After a sketch of his career, it says:—

Death seems to settle all accounts, and no sooner was this murderous villain dead than the whole community set to work with extraordinary unanimity to canonize him. His funeral was an ovation. The attendant throng crowded the Baptist church, "where he was converted in 1866,"—heavens! what sort of a man would he have been, if he had not been converted. . . . Out upon such a religion as this! If a Dr. Thomas intimates that there may be perhaps a probation in another world for those who seem to have had no true probation in this, he is turned out of the fellowship of the church as a heretic. If a Mr. Jones and a Mr. Martin send a freebooter and a lifelong robber and murderer straight to heaven in a chariot of fire, without as much as a baptismal bath by the way, will any church call them to account for their falseness to the law of God and the sacredness of morality? We shall see.

THE Kansas Liberal, heretofore published at Valley Falls, Kansas, has become the organ of the Kansas Liberal Union, been removed to Lawrence in that State, enlarged, and made more widely representative of the different phases of Liberalism. Its old editor, Mr. Harman, remains at its head; but its editorial contributors have been increased. In the number before us (April 13), Mrs. Annie L. Diggs has several articles. The Liberal Union is a State organization that evidently means work. Liberal thought is strong in Kansas; and, in the main, it seems to be of a healthful type. It has missionary zeal, and is preparing to prove that it has the courage of its convictions.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

AN article from Mr. D. A. Wasson, which we intended to present to our readers in this number, is unavoidably deferred till next week.

NOT caring to emulate the Christian Register in its lack of neighborly courtesy, we do not hesitate to congratulate it upon its increased size and new and improved form.

THE new and uniform edition of Colonel Higginson's writings announced by Lee & Shepard will contain a revised edition of his Epictetus, which has been out of print for ten years, and is a very rare and valuable book.

ON Wednesday, April 19th, commenced the fifty-second volume and fifty-second year of the Boston Investigator, which was started by Abner Kneeland, and whose present publisher and editor, Mr. Mendum and Mr. Seaver, went on the paper half a century ago, when they were young men.

MR. DARWIN was a subscriber of The Index from the first year of its publication to the time of his death. He manifested his interest in this journal by generous donations from time to time; and when he last renewed his subscription, not many months ago, he enclosed a twenty-five pound note to be used in the support and circulation of the paper.

THE Christian Advocate warns its readers against the Popular Science Monthly, one of the broadest and best periodicals published in the interests of science. The Advocate evidently holds with one of the Fathers of the Church, Tertullian, who says, "Desire of knowledge is no longer necessary since Jesus Christ, nor is investigation necessary since the gospel."

"A CHARACTERISTIC incident," says Unity, "is told of Dr. Bellows by a correspondent of the Inquirer, London. When the doctor was editor in chief of the Christian Examiner, his associate submitted an article to him, asking whether it should be printed, because its radical character might cost the Review some subscribers. Mr. Bellows replied, 'It shall be published, though it cost us every subscriber we have.' No journalist can preserve the virility of his paper, who keeps up an anxious line communication with the pocket-books of his constituency. The pocket-books themselves will soon discover the temerity of such editorial work, and will hasten to punish its want of confidence."

THE Pall Mall Gazette recently had an article of a good-natured, almost funny character, which was intended to allay the fears of all such Britishers as are still afraid of our example, and are therefore alarmed at the friendly feeling which is exhibiting itself in Great Britain for America and things American. The Pall Mall Gazette makes light of the various stock charges brought against us and our institutions, such as their tendency to reduce men and things to a low level of commonplaceness, to quench or discourage intellect, genius, and the literary spirit, and to produce a general atrophy of the higher emotions in favor of a contentment with the merest material success and sensual gratification.

SAYS the Boston Herald: "The proposed gift of $1,000,000 by the great iron manufacturer of Norwich, Ct., Mr. John F. Slater, for the purpose of conferring upon the colored people of the South 'the blessings of a Christian education,' is too noble and notable an act of philanthropy to be the subject of adverse criticism. But it may be doubted whether the class in question does not need, for its own good and that of the nation, the blessings of a common school education more than it does the sort proposed. Even in the old days of slavery, religious teaching and exercises of a certain sort were not denied to the negroes. Large masses of them have 'got religion,' but it doesn't make them honest or moral, or improve them much as citizens. What they lack and need is intelligence and a capacity for being educated that comes from knowing how to read and write."

SAYS the Boston Star: "The wages of the workingmen in this country should be commensurate with the demands of our civilization upon them. These require that they shall receive sufficient to enable them to feed, clothe, and educate their children, and provide a comfortable home for themselves and their families. The character of our form of government makes it absolutely necessary that wages shall be high enough to enable the workmen of the country to meet these imperative requirements. When capitalists grind wages below this civilization standard, they are speculating upon the stability of the government, and imperilling the permanency of Republican institutions. . . . The policy of screwing down wages to a starvation standard for the purpose of squeezing out dividends to stockholders, and at the same time continuing to pay extravagant salaries to ornamental managers, treasurers, and other officials, is radically wrong, and will ultimately redound with terrific force upon the parties who do it. The unwritten law of the nation is, 'Improve the masses, strengthen the family ties, educate the children.' Whoever strikes at these is pulling at the underpinning of the Republic."

THE Christian Union has little or no confidence in the success of the present policy of the government in dealing with the Mormons: "Any attempt to put this population under the political control of a Gentile ministry is certain to fail. Any attempt to extirpate their polygamy by legal prosecutions is certain only to intensify their fanatical fidelity to their wives, in the name and for the sake of their religion. The problem is full of difficulty; but there are certain remedial steps that are plain and simple. 1. We may clearly refuse to allow a people, who do not conform with our ideas, to share with us in our political government. The United States has a right to choose her own partners. 2. We may give to the women the protection of law, and enable any of them that desire to break away from polygamy to do so, and to take her share of support from her so-called husband without continuing to live in his harem. 3. We may establish public schools out of the National Treasury for the education of the children, and we may endow them so munificently that Mormon schools cannot compete with them. Schools cost less than armies, and they are more efficient. The worst foe to an unscrupulous priesthood is a free school."

THE Catholic World, commenting on the message of the English Queen asking for a "nuptial grant from the government to Prince Leopold, in view of his approaching marriage to Princess Helena," uses the following plain and vigorous language: "A 'nuptial grant!' In ordinary people, it would be considered a disgrace to beg, especially in the case of individuals about to be married. Well, this pair are not exactly begging themselves either. His mother is doing it for him, and many a sturdy loafer has had his mother begging for him before now. There are those, however, who may think that begging, after all, is not poetic in princes. But was there ever a true prince who did not beg and plunder as well? Is not begging and plundering a trade among princes? Of course, the British and Irish work-slaves must pay the 'nuptial grant,' whatever sum it may be. The wretched hind, slaving from sunrise till sunset for a pittance to support his ragged little ones, must pay a fraction of that pittance, that Leopold and his wife may labor not. But England is a great country, after all; and, if plundering landlords and begging queens and princes can make the British people happy, they ought to be a very happy people indeed."

ONE of the most cheering signs of the times is the fact that the two chief communities of the English-speaking world—namely, Great Britain and the United States—are settling down to international accord, and forgetting mutual rivalries and jealousies, and correcting their mutual misunderstandings and misapprehensions of each other. This great Western Republic has at last got a recognized position at the council-board of nations. The last great ordeal to which it was subjected made it evident that it was useless for its enemies to speculate longer on the probabilities of its collapse. It weathered triumphantly such a tempest of civil war as was without historic parallel. Furthermore, its example of popular rule is felt, even by the privileged classes of the European nations, to be the order of the day, to be the kind of rule which is impending over their own heads in the near future. The interests of the two countries are becoming more and more identical. Great Britain is our largest and most profitable customer. Every possible consideration works for international good feeling between us and our mother land. People and political parties in this country, who deem it to be for their interest still to decry Great Britain, after the old fashion of other years and of a different state of things, find to-day that they not only meet with no general sympathy, but that the inhabitants of our vast Western agricultural area especially have the most substantial reasons for cultivating friendly relations with the English people.

HON. JOHN WENTWORTH recently gave a lecture in Chicago to fully thirty-five hundred people on "Personal Recollections of the Period when I was in Congress with Adams, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, and Webster." "Calhoun," he said, "spoke like a college professor demonstrating to his class. His position was stationary, and he used no gesticulation. His pale and livid countenance indicated the cloister. His voice was silvery and attractive and very earnest. His eyes indicated quick perception. Starting with the most plausible premises, he would carry you irresistibly along with more plausible reasoning, until you would be puzzled to know how much back-track it was indispensably necessary for you to take to avoid conclusions which would make it difficult to tell the difference between your views and those of a South Carolina secessionist. After having heard all the Senators speak, if a stranger should select the one, irrespective of doctrine, who came nearest a saint, he would select Mr. Calhoun; and such he was held to be throughout most of the South to this day. College professors in the South were his great admirers, and taught his doctrines to their students. Educated clergymen and all fashionable society there lost no opportunities of manifesting their admiration of him. 'Have you seen Mr. Calhoun?' 'Do you think of leaving without seeing Mr. Calhoun?' were questions invariably asked by Southern Congressmen of their constituents visiting Washington. And Mr. Calhoun's prestige was so worked up that Southern visitors, both gentlemen and ladies, were as much expected to call upon him as upon the President. At the time of his death, he was gaining a strong foothold among the scholars of the North, who seemed incapable of resisting the seductive reasoning of his perceptive, comprehensive, and analytic mind. Reference was made to the case of President Lord, of Dartmouth College, who had been overcome by his influence, and had eventually to give up his position. When Calhoun came into the Senate to make his last speech, he was supported by two friends. His days were numbered. Senator Mason read his speech for him in a haughty and defiant tone. The lecturer saw Mason afterward, when he was not so defiant. It was upon one cold day in November, when he, with John Slidell, was exercising himself in the open air at Fort Warren, in Massachusetts, reaping, at seventy-five years of age, the fruits of Mr. Calhoun's doctrines."

The Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD,

No WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

For The Index.

TRANSITION.

There are pulsings of life in the darkness
By the shell of circumstance bound,
There are faintly felt strivings to pierce it,
That freedom and light may be found;
And the pulsings and strivings together
With vict'ry some day shall be crowned.

There are throbbings deep down in the bosom
Of earth, ere the winter is past,
There are myriad atoms that wrestle
In vain to escape from her grasp;
But her brown arms firmly enfold them
'Till her nurse-maiden lifts them at last.

There are seed-corns that linger in dying,
And turn as a being in pain,
Yet 'e'en then the new leaflets are listing
The lover-like call of the rain;
And the seed is a step that they tread on,
The joy of his presence to gain.

There's the dreariest hour of all watching,
The hour ere the coming of day,
When the stillness of death seemeth lying
Over bird and blossoming spray;
Yet the hush and the darkness together
But herald an incoming day.

So every good gift that comes to us
Must pass through the portals of strife:
The birth pang never fails in preceding
The gift of the newly born life.
Bravely bear then the pain of the present,
Believing with joy it is ripe.

A SONNET.

As a fond mother, when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
And leaves his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,
Nor wholly reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which, though more splendid, may not please him more:
So Nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings one by one, and by the hand
Leads us to rest so gently that we go,
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know.

AGNOSTICISM AND RELIGION.

Lecture delivered in Cosmian Hall, Florence, Mass., April 2, 1882.

BY W. H. SPENCER,

RESIDENT SPEAKER OF THE FREE CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

"The world stands on ideas, not on iron or cotton; and the iron of iron, the fire of fire, the ether and source of all elements is moral force. As cloud on cloud, as snow on snow, as the bird rests on air and the planet rests on space in its flight, so do men and their institutions rest on thoughts."—Emerson.

Agnosticism might be called know-nothingism in theology. It means, literally, without knowledge. An agnostic is one who claims to know nothing about those truths, or rather teachings, of Christianity which are said to be "spiritually discerned," especially about the existence of "God." The agnostic says there may be a God, or there may not be one: he does not know. He does not deny the existence of such a being as the atheist is popularly supposed to do, nor does he affirm it. He admits that there may be one God or a great many gods, for aught he knows: he cannot find out. Nature and her laws he sees and knows, man and the duties of man to man he sees and knows; but, as to the existence of a being commonly called "God," he knows nothing, and he finds no rational grounds for belief, and thinks it idle to speculate about it. This is the theological attitude of the agnostic. Now, before I discuss the question whether agnosticism is consistent with some ideal form of religion, let us consider the relation of this belief, or rather non-belief, to the Christian, theistic, and pantheistic conceptions of Deity. These different views of God are more or less blended and confused in the popular mind, but still they exist; and, for convenience and clearness, I will draw the line of demarcation sharply between them.

All Roman Christianity, and the larger part of Protestant Christianity, conceive of "God" as a supernatural Being; i.e., a being as super or above nature. The conception is essentially primitive. It arose during the ages when men imagined that this little earth was the centre of the universe, flat, and separated from the upper regions by a solid concave, a blue vault, or "firmament" which divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament. This firmament was the floor of the home of the Deity. Up there was his awful throne, upon which he sat and looked down upon earth and ruled the destinies of men, like a mighty king. "And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded."

The objection to this view of Deity is that it rests essentially upon a childish misconception of the physical universe. Astronomy has taught us that the "firmament" is not a solid dome, and nothing like it; but an airy nothing, through which the telescopic eye can pierce for countless millions of miles. Every inch of the celestial vault has been gauged by the patient, star-eyed science. Had there been somewhere up yonder a "golden throne," the telescope would probably have run across it long ago. Such a conception of God is material and childish. To talk about a God above nature is to belittle nature. One cannot possibly conceive of an "above" in nature. Nature seems infinite in all directions. There are no vacant rooms in her attic marked "to let," in which the supernatural can hide. All is natural. Every room is "let." Law, infinite and eternal, occupies them all. One can see no place, think of no place, where that man-like, localized Deity of supernaturalism could secrete himself. Besides, if there were such a being outside or above nature, how shall man ever know it? I have never seen him, you have never seen him, nobody that we know has ever seen him. No, but we are assured that he was seen long, long ago. Moses saw him once. Some of the Old Testament prophets caught occasional glimpses of him. Most Christians, however, confess that no one ever saw God clearly until Jesus came. He came from God, went back to God, was indeed "very God of very God." But how can we be assured of it, if it were so? They tell us that we must have "faith." But how can we have faith in what we have no evidence of? It would require more than two or three witnesses to convince us that some men saw a "God" in the heavens or on the earth to-day. Why, then, should we believe that some credulous Jewish fishermen and peasants, eighteen hundred years ago, saw what nobody else in all the wide world has seen? It is a monstrous assumption.

The idea, then, of a "God" above nature, descending into it, at times suspending law, injecting miracles, flashing out in "revelations," incarnating himself in redeemers, is a conception of Deity which to the agnostic, as likewise to rationalists in general, is puerile and receives no assent in the mind. It prevails chiefly in the lower intellectual stratum of Christianity and other peoples of unscientific habits of thought.

The second view of God which I shall call your attention to is that found in theism. The theist does not believe, as the true Christian does, in a God super or above nature, but in a God in nature. To use Theodore Parker's phrase, he believes in an "immanent" God. To the theist, at least to the theist of the intuitional or transcendental school, nature as we look upon it is the visible garment of Deity. God is the invisible soul or mind or heart of the universe. But the agnostic objects that, when you come to analyze the words you use, it is just as absurd to talk about a God in nature, as the theist does, as about a God above nature, as the Christian does. For, imagine if you can, an "in" or inside of nature. If God is "in" nature, point him out, one spot where he is. Turn nature inside out once, and let us see the God "in" it. He further objects, if God is the invisible soul or mind of the material universe, how shall we see him? How can we possibly see what is invisible?

In its attempt to answer this puzzling question, theism divides into two schools, the intuitional or as they are also called the transcendental theists and those who call themselves scientific theists. Let us consider them briefly in the order named. The transcendentalist tells us that the invisible God is seen not with the outward eye, as Moses of old is said to have seen him, nor with the Christian eye of "faith" in the authority of Church or Scripture that the invisible was perfectly revealed in Christ Jesus, but that God is perceived by a transcendent sense or faculty in man, which is sometimes called intuition or intuitive reason. Theodore Parker, who was, if not the subtlest thinker of this school (which embraced such writers as George Ripley, Margaret Fuller, John Weiss, Samuel Johnson, and includes such living representatives as Bronson Alcott, David A. Wasson, Cyrus A. Bartol),—Theodore Parker, who was the most powerful pulpit exponent of transcendental theism in this country, used to say that man as man has an immediate consciousness of God, an intuitive knowledge of him as a being infinite and absolute in wisdom, power, and goodness. But the agnostic denies that he himself has any such intuitive knowledge or immediate consciousness of God, and he cannot think that any one else has any private means of information respecting supersensual things which he does not possess. He finds no warrant for accepting the Christian doctrine of an external, general revelation of God in history, and as little for the so-called internal, private revelation of God in the soul of the individual. That Parker and Weiss and Johnson did have exalted emotions connected with their thoughts of God no one will deny. It is enough to create exaltation of feelings amounting to ecstasy in any heart that imagines it is in direct communion with God; but to assume that these emotions in man correspond to revelations from God, and therefore demonstrate his existence, would prove that every idea and feeling about the gods which every man in the world ever had was inspired and infallibly true. No: it seems to the agnostic that the transcendentalist, in order to make it clear to himself and to the world that he really saw the invisible, first misnamed his belief about God a knowledge of God, and then invented the name "intuition" to explain the assumed process by which he derived his assumed knowledge. All this is quite too much assumption for the agnostic. But he regards the transcendental movement in this country as a step in advance, and a long one; for it led men to break away from the authority of tradition and to trust to their own mental powers in the search for truth in religion as everywhere else. This was well, although they overrated the reach of mind in certain directions. It was a movement of mind in the right direction, but it was not apparently the goal of modern thought. No holier spirit than that which baptized as with fire the early intuitional theists has ever descended upon America; but a far mightier one has come, and is sweeping over the whole civilized world. The habit of proving all things, which science engenders, questions the unverified assumptions of transcendentalism as well as of Christianity. The result has been to compel modern theists to abandon their basis on intuition, and seek to establish their faith on scientific grounds. No one, perhaps, is making more vigorous efforts to effect this change of base than Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston. Those of you who have read his discourses may judge for yourselves with what success. A favorite name with this class of writers for the Deity is "the Power back of phenomena," or the "Power manifesting itself through phenomena," language borrowed in defence of theism from the agnostic philosopher, Herbert Spencer. Now, it is my opinion that theism sees something new and wonderful in this philosophy, simply because it throws metaphysical dust into its own eyes. For what does all this talk about a "Power back of and beyond phenomena" mean? Nothing, absolutely nothing but what every common-sense man, every clod-hopper, understands by the world we see. That is all. Granting, as Mr. Spencer makes clear by his reasoning, that all our knowledge is relative and phenomenal; granting that we only know of the external world as states of consciousness in ourselves,—do we doubt, can we doubt, that there is an external world which produces these states of consciousness? We are compelled by the laws of thought to believe that an external world exists. To use language as the court accepts it, we may say we know it exists. We know it, if we know anything. Now, this external world, this outside reality, is simply what every man who has two eyes means by nature. That is all. But the great philosopher comes along, and calls it the "Power back of phenomena," and spells his "power" with a capital P. There would be no harm in this, if men would always keep in mind just what he means. But, lo! the theist comes along,—he who has been driven from his Christian or intuitional shelter, and is without refuge and hunting for a new "God,"—and he sees, or thinks he sees, something to make a God out of in the expression, "Power back of phenomena"; and he eagerly seizes the capitalized word, which seems to be a mysterious somewhat hiding behind "phenomena," as the Jewish Jehovah is supposed to have hid himself in the ark of the covenant or behind the cherubim. And, straightway, he goes up and down the world, shouting, "Great is the new God, the great God,—Power back of phenomena!" What I would like of such people is to come back to the common-sense view of the world. When I ask you if you see that tree yonder, don't go on to discourse about states of consciousness and your faith in a Power back of the phenomena of tree. Call a tree a tree and a stone wall a stone wall; and, if you can find a "God" "back" of or "under" or "above" or "around" them, then point him or her or it out to us. This is what the man who talks about finding God by the scientific method is bound to do. In my opinion, what is called "scientific theism" is as unscientific in its methods of reasoning as transcendental theism ever was, and to the question, "Canst thou by searching find out God?" must answer, "No!"

Now let us turn to pantheism.

The pantheist identifies God and nature. Nature is God, and God is nature. They are one. He looks upon the forces of nature, like gravitation, electricity, heat, light, etc., not as the manifestations of a hidden God, but as God, a part of the universal whole. The pantheist thus conceives of God as the sum of the seen and the unseen; and, as man is a part of the great All, man is, of course, a part of God.

The merit of pantheism is that it is simple and comprehensible. When a man tells us that nature—i.e., the whole external universe—is his God, we clearly apprehend his meaning. To be a pantheist, we do not need to have the Christian's "faith" in a supernatural external revelation, nor the theist's assurance of an internal, transcendent intuition of God; but with one eye, and that a very ordinary eye, we can see God, for we can see nature,—the two are one.

But the objection to this view is the inconsistency of calling one thing by two such different names. Why confuse ideas by confounding words? Why not call nature "nature," and done with it? What do we gain by calling it at one time "nature" and at another time "God"? Besides, if nature, by which I mean external nature, is your God, is it or he or she anything really higher and better than yourself? The primitive man is a nature-worshipper; i.e., he worships some tree or river or rock or mountain, or sun or moon and stars. What is the pantheist, so far as he is a worshipper, but a nature-worshipper? What is his Nature-God but the sum total of all trees, all rivers, rocks, hills, oceans, suns, stars? And, if there is nothing in one star that is worthy of adoration, why should there be in all stars? The sunset glory and the flower's hue are beautiful. Many things in nature are indeed beautiful, but you do not worship them. The roll of Niagara, a storm at sea, the splendor of the open heavens at night when the silent stars from their awful depths look down upon you,—these things are grand, are sublime; but you do not worship the waters, the storm, or the stars.

If nature is God, as the pantheist says, what is the good of it? If I have a God, I want one that is better than myself. With all the beauty and loveliness and grandeur in Nature, it is difficult to prove that she possesses one single moral quality. The stars, that sparkle so splendidly, look down with eyes as cold as ice, and would see nations starve without shedding a tear. You are awed by them; but what care they for you, little man? You love the flower, but does the flower love you? The lily that stands by the coffin of the babe is every whit as happy as when it stood by its cradle. Where is the pity, the charity, the love, the righteousness in nature, outside of human nature and sentient life? Where, then, does the pantheist find any God better than himself to worship? Suppose then that we cannot rest in the conception of the Christian, of a God above nature, for we cannot conceive of an "above" in a nature which is infinite; nor the theist's conception of a God in nature, because we cannot conceive of an inside any more than an outside of a nature which is infinite; nor of the pantheistic conception that nature and God are one, because no one part of nature gives us, nor all of the parts combined give us, anything worthy of our supreme reverence,—suppose this is so, then where can you find "God"? Do you tell me that "you do not know"? Then, dreadful as it may seem to you, you are very near agnosticism. An agnostic, let me repeat, is one who says respecting God, "I don't know." He does not deny, neither does he affirm. He simply says, "I don't know." Perhaps he would like to believe, but cannot, as he sees, or thinks he sees, no reason for it. Suppose you try to convince him. You ask him if it is conceivable that all this wonderful world should exist without a God, who created it. He replies that it is indeed a very wonderful world, but it does not clear up, but rather deepens the mystery, to suppose a "God" created it; for you have then two mysteries, the origin of the world and the origin of God, too, to account for. To him, it appears the simpler assumption that the world, the substance of it, is self-existent and eternal.

If you turn to the argument from design and urge the marvellous adaptation of part to part,—how the eye, for instance, is adjusted to the light,—he admits that the adjustment is wonderful; but he replies that, were it not that the eye could adapt itself to the light, there would have been no eye. "The earth is suited to its inhabitants, because it has produced them; and only such as suit it live." Besides, the fact of rudimentary and useless organs militates directly against the theory of design. If you point out to him the loveliness in nature as an evidence of the supreme love, he points you to the ugly things in nature as evidence, equally valid, of supreme hate. You point him to the rosy cheek, he points you to the rosy cancer eating at the heart of your beloved. If you admit the evil, but argue that there is "a soul of good in things evil, would men willingly distil it out," he replies that it may be so sometimes and the reverse sometimes; but that, as a rule, good begets good and evil begets evil in this world; and that, "if harmony and fitness are to be cited as proofs of beneficent design, then discord and unfitness must equally be kept in view as evidence of less admirable contrivance." If you remind him that it is by the struggle of the human race to get rid of pain and evil that civilization has been developed, he admits it, but reminds you of the individuals and races who have gone under in that struggle. The agnostic refuses to see any more reason for thanking a good God in the heavens for the welcome, fruitful sunshine than for cursing an ugly devil in the skies for the withering drouth or the destroying tornado. To the agnostic, the good and evil in the world are strangely mixed; and he sees no evidence that God, if there is a God, is infinitely wise and good, in the sense we use the terms of human relations, and any other use of these terms he thinks an abuse of them. If you ask him if it would not be a pleasant and consoling belief that somewhere above us is a "Heavenly Father," who is filled with "loving kindness and tender mercy," who watches over us as a mother over her sleeping babe, he probably replies that it would be indeed a pleasant belief, but the question is not what is pleasant, but what is true; and his experience has taught him that, if there be a God watching over us, man will stumble and fall and go to the bad, unless he looks out for himself. What does it avail if a God watches the falling sparrow? It falls all the same; and no all-seeing eye saves it, if the cat sees it. Thus, the agnostic looks squarely at the facts of human life, however grim they may be. He throws no metaphysical dust into his eyes, in order not to see what is unpleasant to see. He keeps eyes wide open, that he may see the bottom facts and no mistake. There must be some steel in his nerve and a streak of the Stoic in his mental make-up. Nor does he juggle with language. He calls sin "sin" and evil "evil," not "undeveloped good" nor the "shady side of good,"—but evil, ugly and hateful. He indulges in no optimistic nonsense, such as "whatever is right." Yes, he adds, except what is wrong. He doesn't waste time in speculating about the "origin of evil" or in "apologizing for God"; but, recognizing the existence of evil as a sad, stern fact, he goes to work manfully to get rid of it and to make the world better and happier.

Now, I know, my friends, that to many of the conclusions of agnosticism you will say, "Amen!" But I doubt not some of you are saying to yourselves, "If agnosticism is to become the creed of the world, will it not utterly ruin religion? Will it not knock the bottom out of her, and she go down like a scuttled ship?" Ah, but what if the blows which the genius of this age is apparently aiming at religion are not scuttling her, but merely knocking off the miserable barnacles of superstition, which have gathered about the old hull as she has come sailing down the ages! For one, I do not fear,—not at all. I cannot tell, no one can tell, in the process of ages, what words may be dropped from our language as obsolete, and what will be expanded and modified to fit the new wine of thought to put into them. The word "religion" may be dropped, or it may grow; but, whichever happens, this I feel sure of,—that everything which is true and good in the thing will be gathered up, and pass on to comfort and heal and bless. I should not be true to the great principle of evolution, if I did not believe that the religion of the past would develop, without break or jar, into the religion of the future, though it may be called by a different name. And this is saying that I believe there is what we may call an essence of truth in all higher forms of faith. The form of the faith will change, will pass away; but the spirit of truth and love within will never die. It rises as on invisible wing above the accidents of form, to live immortal in the thoughts and affections and deeds of the ages to come. It is the business of agnosticism to point out how it is entirely consistent with the sweetest, purest, divinest spirit in the faith it destroys. Oh, how hard it is to surrender the old, cherished convictions! The tendrils of feeling are so closely woven with the lattice-work of the old religious conceptions that we do not want to let go, we will not let go. We cling to them passionately, long, long after reason has pronounced them false and quietly rejected them. Even when the wife, feeling, has joined hands with the husband, reason, and reluctantly yielded, saying, "Yes, we must leave the old home,—leave the old symbols and thought-forms so dear, for the newer and truer," yet at times, years after, she will yearn with an inexpressible longing for the early home-thoughts and the simple faith of her childhood days; and now and then, swept into the current of some strong emotion, awakened by music or eloquence, she will find herself borne away back to the dear old home of her early faith. But, alas! it is not the same to her. The well is there, but the moss-covered bucket no longer hangs in it. The hearth-stone is there, but the fire is gone out; and nothing but ashes cold remain. The loved ones that made the place once home are all gone. The music ceases. The eloquence dies away on the air. Feeling rises, brushes a tear from her eye, and goes back to her new home to live with reason. That is right. By and by, when fresh, green tendrils have woven themselves about the new lattice-work, then the new home will be to her as sweet and dear as ever the old one was, and ampler and better.

Now, I am addressing those before me who, if they may be, hardly know what they believe, or where they are in the pathway of religious progress. Their reason has led them beyond the Christian conception of God, past the theistic and pantheistic conceptions perhaps, on to the borderland of agnosticism or into the very heart of it, and they look in vain for religion there. I wish to say to such people that religion, the truth of it, is there, and the highest type of religion, too, if you can but see her. She stands by your side, in robes as white as the angels, radiant as the morning, with the dew on her hair, and love in her eyes, and truth, and nothing but truth, on her lips. She will not desert you; and, when once you have seen her, you can love none other. Her name,—would you know it? Before I tell you, let us look to see if we cannot find her under disguise in all the higher forms of faith. I might point her out to you in Confucianism, still more clearly in Buddhism, but let us look for her in Christianity. The very heart and soul of Christianity, as I conceive it, is the worship of "the Christ" as Lord and Saviour of the world. It was unquestionably a deep-felt need that made the early Christians deify Jesus. They wanted a God with human attributes, who could be looked upon as a moral exemplar and leader of the people in "the way, truth, and life." In Jesus of Nazareth, they found an excellent subject to deify. His morals were pure, his record was clean. It is true that his public life was short, and that he was comparatively unknown. For this very reason, imagination had freer play to weave about him her legends and idealize and glorify him. The Romans, as you know, had apotheosized several Roman emperors; but their lives were too conspicuous, their faults too prominent. But here was Jesus, an obscure preacher from far-away Nazareth, of whom little was known, except that he was an enthusiastic moral teacher and religious reformer, with the current notions about the speedy end of the world. Here was a fit person for the vacant throne in the heavens, caused by the death of Jupiter and the insufficiency of Jehovah. The earnest want of a God helped to create the supply, as the wish is so often the father of the thought. Very early, the disciples began to idealize Jesus. He started simply as the "Son of man." The process of idealization went on until the "Son of man" became "Son of God," and still further until the Son of God became God himself. So, in less than two centuries, at least before the close of the second century, the Roman Christians had exalted the son of a carpenter to a seat among the gods. But stop! Do I mean to say that they had really exalted Jesus? Is the Christian world to-day really worshipping Jesus? Should he return to earth and walk among men in his plain home-spun, think you the Christian world would receive him as a "God"? Far from it. The truth is the Christian world to-day is not worshipping the historic Jesus, but a somewhat as unlike the real Jesus of Nazareth as a simple peasant is unlike a purple-robed pope. If you will think of it for a moment, you will see that it is impossible that the countless Christians of the world are worshipping Jesus. It cannot be so, unless there are a million Jesuses; for does not every Christian, almost, have his own peculiar Jesus?

To the Catholic, Jesus is a Catholic and will save only true Catholics. To the average Protestant, he is a Protestant, and will hardly save agnostics. To the Universalist, he is a Universalist, and is bound on honor to save every man, woman, and child. The Jesus of the little four-year-old and the Jesus of the adult, the Jesus of the benighted and the Jesus of the enlightened Christian, are widely different persons.

Now, when the millions bow to Jesus in prayer, to what are they praying? It cannot be that four hundred million different Jesuses are present to listen to the four hundred million different petitioners. To what, then, are they praying? I will tell you. They are bowing before not Jesus, but their idea of Jesus,—a mental image of what to them is a perfect man. Nothing seems to me more self-evident than this: that the Jesus, or rather the "Christ," which Christians are now adoring, is not a divine person just outside the brain of the worshipper, but simply a divine-like image inside the brain of the worshipper. Long, long before Shakspeare wrote, "Imagination bodies forth the forms of things unknown, and gives to airy nothing a local habitation and a name," the religious imagination had been bodying forth, upon mountain, sea, and sky, the forms of the perfect in the mind and tricking men into worshipping them as gods. Thus arose the Christ-god.

Now there can be no question that the character of Jesus, as found in the Gospels, enters very largely into the Christian's concept; but the virtues which Jesus illustrated are not the only ones that enter into even the Christian's conception of the perfect character. The Christian's ideal, every one's ideal, is made up of elements derived from ten thousand different sources. We are debtors to every noble character we meet. As we walk along the pathway of our threescore and ten, we pick up a golden thread of virtue here, a silken one there, and a silver one yonder, and out of these beautiful abstract thoughts the mind weaves for itself the seamless robe of the Perfect. Imagination—wondrous power!—paints, as with invisible fingers, a picture of the Best, and hangs it aloft in the upper galleries of thought.

This marvellous faculty by which the mind builds up ideals within is the divinest inheritance of man. How is it that, out of broken pieces of virtue we chance to see, the mind is able to patch them together into an image of beauty and of good exceeding anything our eyes have ever beheld? It is to me as wonderful as it is a blessed power. It is right here that agnosticism finds the key to the temple of its religion. I said the mind builds these ideals. In a sense, this is true; but it is also true that we do not make our ideals so much as they are made through us by laws of moral evolution.

Whenever we are loyal to our highest thought, we are rewarded by visions of a higher beyond. Loyalty to the ideal is voluntary; but the lifting of the curtains to disclose the next higher, that is not voluntary. It is done through us, but not by us. It is due to the force of impulsion within,—a law of what we may call "soul-growth,"—which pushes up higher whoever aims higher. It is the reward of virtue which comes with obedience to moral law. It is heaven, or a part of it, which comes down to him who climbs up toward it. Here lies the seed of truth that hides in that Christian phrase, "salvation through Christ." Thousands of people will testify that they have been made better men and women through obedience to "Christ." So they have by obedience; but what is their "Christ" but another name given to the image of the perfect in their mind? They are indeed saved, every one is saved, just in proportion as he is loyal to that upper thought.

Whenever the clamorous passions of the lower nature in man have been raging at will and dragging him down and creating war in the soul, whenever these are silenced and brought into subjection to the higher nature, then there is peace where there was discord, there is joy where there was shame and sorrow, there is a consciousness of salvation—salvation of character—where before there was damnation. This is the atonement I believe in. Not a "vicarious" atonement, not another suffering for me, but my higher nature suffering, in tears, sorrow-stricken,—yea, crucified,—because of the sins and shame of my lower nature. And the atonement is a natural atonement of the lower and higher nature, whenever the immoral demands of the lower are subjected to the moral commands of the higher. Then comes the reconciliation between the real life and the ideal life. Now is not loyalty to this ideal in man, which the agnostic surely believes in, just what the Christian means by obedience to Christ? Religion! What is it, when stripped of all illusion and superstition, except this,—devotion to the ideal in man as to its God? This is just what it is, I believe, even in the most primitive forms of ancestral worship. We may accept Herbert Spencer's theory of the "Genesis of the Deities" as the true explanation of the birth and evolution of the god-idea in the human race. We may smile at the savage bowing before the thought of an ancestral ghost as his god, but it suggests to me something deeper than a smile. I tell you that sheeted ghost is not altogether an empty or a useless vision. It is the shell of a seed-thought that is growing to be the divinest reality in human form. Nay, it is that now, despite the superstition which envelops it. That ghost which the savage adores is not the memory of some coward, some sneak, some idiot of his tribe, but the ghost of the grandest man he ever saw or that his fathers ever saw or heard of,—some great, strong, brave chief who did mighty deeds for his children. That is the kind of a ghost the very meanest of savages reveres as his god. But it is not the ghost of the man as he was, but as he stands idealized and glorified by the imagination, and by it enthroned in the clouds. But where are these clouds? The savage points, perhaps, up toward the sun; but the agnostic sees that those clouds are in the heavens of the savage's own mind. He sees that the ghost-god of the savage is simply his ideal bodied forth by the imagination in objective form. Thus, he believed it is with the deities of all the religions of the globe, including not only Christianity, but theism and pantheism. Now, the agnostic does not allow his imagination to play any such tricks with his reason. He recognizes the reality of these ideal thoughts within the mind: they are a matter of immediate consciousness. He recognizes their supreme beauty, and feels the sense of obligation to love and be loyal to this upper thought within as much as does the devotee of any religion; but he does not read his moral ideal into the universe without, and then worship his own creation as his creator. Has not such a man, nevertheless, a religion? He certainly cherishes the whole moral element in religion. If religion is, as Prof. J. H. Allen defines it, an "ethical passion," the agnostic may have it. If religion is, as Matthew Arnold defines it, "morality touched by emotion," the agnostic may have it. If the Christian, who thinks that the God-idea in his mind is a supernatural, an historic revelation or an immediate reflection of an objective entity, is religious, then is not the agnostic, whose God-idea is nothing more nor less than his idea of the good, his moral ideal, and who regards it not as a supernatural revelation from without, but a natural evolution from within, and who is seeking through love and devotion to his ideal to realize it in his life,—is he not religious? If not, it is because he is more than that.

"Chisel in hand stood a sculptor boy,
With his marble block before him.
And his face lit up with a smile of joy,
As an angel-dream passed o'er him.
He carved it then on the yielding stone,
With many a sharp incision.
With heaven's own light, the sculpture shone:
He had caught the angel vision.

"Sculptors of life are we, as we stand
With our souls uncarved before us,
Waiting the hour when, at God's command,
Our life-dream shall pass o'er us.
If we carve it then on the yielding stone
With many a sharp incision,
Its heavenly beauty shall be our own;
Our lives, that angel vision."

Yes, we are sculptors of our own lives,—"architects of our own fortunes."

That "angel vision" is the ideal vision, a vision of what we may be and may do in this world. Every pure thought we cherish, every true word we speak, every noble deed we perform, is a silent chisel-stroke carving out our real into the semblance of our ideal. Man is the sculptor, his "life-dream" is his model: the infinite possibilities that lie slumbering in the quarries of the unseen future are his materials. Death unveils the statue: what shall it be? Only so far as the religions of the globe have been moral have they helped on the human race toward civilization, and is it not clear that they have been moral only so far as their idea of good has entered into their conceptions of God? I care not one straw for a belief in God, unless that belief makes one a better man. A God to whom you simply doff your hat or bend your knee as you enter church, and who frightens you a little on your death-bed, but exerts no restraining power on your vices, no ennobling influence on your character and life,—what is such a God good for? He is nothing more than a horse-shoe over your front door; nothing but the new moon over your right shoulder; nothing but a hollow, gilded figure-head on your boat, as you go sailing down the stream of time. I want no such a God. I believe in no such a God. I will teach the existence of no such a God. I trust to no religion that patronizes such a God. But I believe in moral ideals as supreme. I believe in them as the divinest thoughts in all the great universe of mind. I believe in their mighty power to hold one up, when he stumbles against temptations. Nay, I believe they will put their everlasting arms beneath you and lift you up, as on wings, above temptations. I believe that whoever looks up, and is loyal to his highest ideals, will find them a sufficient Lord and Saviour from sin in this world or in any other in which he may hereafter find himself. They will do more than this for us. They not only point out what we should be, but what we should do. In the words of Thoreau, they command, "Be not simply good: be good for something." They give us visions of a world as it ought to be,—of an ideal home, an ideal society, an ideal State and Republic,—and then they say, "Work, work, O man, with all thy might to realize these splendid ideals." Look on that picture, then on this,—on the world as it is, and then on the world as it ought to be. See humanity, otherwise so fair and lovely, staggering with intemperance, blotched and bleared with licentiousness, sick with its leprous vices, imprisoned with its inexorable habits, red-handed with awful crime. See how these curses mingle in the blood, and go rushing down the generations in a torrent of crimson. What shall we do to stop it? Shall we get down on our knees and pray to God, or get up and go to work for man with all our might? Shall we keep on sighing and dreaming with folded hands of a heaven off somewhere beyond the clouds, or go to digging and planting, pruning and weaving, building up homes and building up character, now and here, and try to make heavenly places on earth?

The religion that teaches the pursuit of the ideal good as the highest duty of man is preëminently a working, practical faith.

It makes over the robes of the priest into garments to clothe the poor. The tinsel and gewgaws of the altar it tosses into the nursery where they belong, and may do some little good. It hoists the chapel windows, that the sweet breezes may enter in and expel the foul air and the incense of the worship of fearful incomprehensibles, and man may the clearer see and the freer breathe. The baptismal waters it puts to higher service by sprinkling some thirsty garden of beauty or turning some busy mill-wheel of the practical in this world. In short, it seeks to divert the minds of men from barren theological speculations into the fruitful fields of attainable knowledge, and directs the religious emotions, which have been largely running to waste for centuries, into wholly moral and useful channels. This is the gospel of agnosticism on its positive side. Whatever it does, it does for man. If there is anywhere to be found the "ethical passion," surely it is here. The loftiest devotion of soul, the purest flaming of love, the mightiest energy of will, the most unselfish and heroic consecration of life to the good of our brother man,—all this is consistent with agnostic belief. If this is not "religion," then woe to religion. If this is not religion, then the Future will write of her on the judgment hall, "Thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting!" If this is religion, the essence of it, then the agnostic may be the most profoundly religious of men. Devotion to the moral ideal, this is the heart of his religion. This beautiful vision of the ideal good may be, should be, must be, the Lord of his life, lifting him up and leading him on.

"Wait there,—wait and invite me while I climb;
For see, I come!—but slow, but slow!
Yet ever as your chimneys,
Soft and sublime,
Lifts at my feet, they move, they go,
Up the great stair of time."

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these, if at all, with great freedom. Reptiles.

Text-book, Wood's New Illustrated Natural History, Division on Reptiles.

Specimens: It is of course impossible to obtain actual specimens of the various kinds of Reptiles. A Turtle and Tadpoles in different stages of development can be had, but the work of illustrating this study must be done largely with pictures.

The subject of our last study was what?

And these occupy what place among Vertebrate Animals?

What is the next higher order of Vertebrates?

What kinds of Reptiles can you mention?

Why do we call them Reptiles?

Where do they live?

How do they differ from Fishes?

What is a Tortoise?

Where is its Skeleton?

Is this common among the Vertebrates?

Is it common among the Invertebrates?

For what is the shell of the Tortoise used?

For what its flesh?

Upon what do these animals live?

What are Crocodiles and Alligators?

Where are the largest Crocodiles found?

How large are some of them?

How are they captured?

How are they warned of danger?

How does the Alligator differ from the Crocodile?

What is a Snake?

What peculiarity has its vertebral column?

Are all snakes dangerous?

How many kinds of snakes can you tell about?

How do they vary in size and color?

What is a Tadpole?

How does it develop?

What is a Toad?

What are Toads good for?

How are we in the habit of regarding most reptiles?

May it not be that we do them injustice?

Can you mention any good things they do in the world?

Ought we to look for good in these as in all other creatures?

SELECTIONS.

"Save for the Eternal Thought,
Bright shape, thou hadst not been:
He from dull matter wrought
Thy yellow and thy green,
And made thee take,
E'en for my sake,
Thy beauty and thy sheen!

"All feel that crawl, or walk, or swim,
Or poise the busy wing;
Then seek not pleasure in the pain
Of any living thing."

What a wonderful thing is the tortoise with its bones outside its body, containing as in a curious box nearly all the organs of life! The pretty lines upon its back seem like the letters of some strange language, in which it speaks to us, could we but read the story.

No form of life deserves contempt or cruelty.

Suggestions to Leader.—Tell the children the story of Theodore Parker and the tortoise. You will find it in Weiss' Life and Letters. Also show them that, after all, the snake is no more the enemy of man than many other animals, and is, like them, always wonderful and often beautiful in structure. Cruelty to animals is a very good subject to consider in this study. Is not self-protection the limit of our right to interfere even with reptiles?

Birds.

Text-book, Wood's New Illustrated Natural History, Division on Birds.

Specimens: One or more of each of the seven classes spoken of may be found in collections of stuffed birds. If access to such collections is impossible, colored plates or the illustrations in the text-book will have to answer.

We have now studied about what two classes of Vertebrates?

What is the next higher order?

In what respects do birds differ from fishes and reptiles?

In what respects are they like fishes and reptiles?

What kind of a bird is an Eagle?

Why so called?

What kind of a bird is a Hen?

Why so called?

What kind of a bird is a Robin?

Why so called?

What kind of a bird is a Parrot?

Why so called?

What kind of a bird is an Ostrich?

Why so called?

What kind of a bird is a Stork?

Why so called?

What kind of a bird is a Duck?

Why so called?

Birds may then be divided into what seven classes?

What birds of prey can you mention besides the Eagle?

What scratchers besides the Hen?

What perchers besides the Robin?

What climbers besides the Parrot?

What runners besides the Ostrich?

What waders besides the Stork?

What swimmers besides the Duck?

What is the largest bird you know?

What is the smallest?

How old do birds live to be sometimes?

What are the shortest-lived birds?

When do birds get their food?

Do all birds move in the same way?

Do all birds sing?

What can you tell about birds'-nests?

Can you think of anything the birds teach us?

SELECTIONS.

"The study of the forms, history, and habits of birds, abundantly illustrated as all these subjects have been by the genius of the poet and the painter, cannot fail to be both interesting and instructive to every lover of nature."

"Who taught the birds to know the changing seasons? What instinct guides, what power gives strength of wing to sustain them in their homeward flight?"

Birds—birds! ye are beautiful things,
With your earth-treading feet and your cloud-cleaving wings;

Where shall man wander, and where shall he dwell,
Beautiful birds, that ye come not as well?
—Eliza Cook.

"It wins my admiration

To view the structure of that little work,—
A bird's nest. Mark it well within, without;
No tool had he that wrought; no knife to cut;
No glue to join; his little beak was all;
And yet how neatly finished! What nice hand,
With every implement and means of art,
And twenty years' apprenticeship to boot,
Could make me such another?"

Suggestions to Leader.—Prang's Natural History Series, Birds, large and small plates, will be found an invaluable help in this study, well worth two or three times their cost.

CORRESPONDENCE.

F. MAX MUELLER AND SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Editors of The Index:—

It may seem ungracious to find fault with Professor Müller's remarks on Samuel Johnson. But to one who knew how Mr. Johnson was neglected by those who should have been foremost in cordial recognition of his work, however little they might know of his grand character and life, it can scarcely be other than painful to read Professor Müller's confession of delinquency in this respect. More than once, Mr. Johnson was grieved to find that some Oriental scholar could privately commend his books, and in public either be silent about them or speak with disparagement. What encouragement and comfort, in his lonely work, a hearty word from a fellow-laborer would have brought to him! It may not have been unpardonable remissness in a busy man, like Professor Müller, not to acknowledge Mr. Johnson's gift of his books, and not to thank him for his "kind letter,"—what friend of Mr. Johnson ever felt that he could be thankful enough for one of those kind letters of his?—but I cannot help speaking of the contrast between such omitted courtesies and Mr. Johnson's own practice in similar cases. How prompt he was to answer even the least noteworthy communication, from whatever obscure source, which sought his friendly sympathy or notice, and carried an implied confidence in his generosity! Who ever knew him to neglect the smallest of such opportunities to do, not necessarily a direct duty, but a kindly act toward a fellow-man? No press of work, no private difficulties, no want of health and strength, could make him forget or postpone a thing like that. This was one of the most marked and beautiful traits of his character. I doubt if the death of any man ever left in Mr. Johnson's mind the regret of some undischarged duty, nevertheless capable of performance!

However it may have been with his Oriental scholarship, in his ethical life, at least, there was nothing "at second-hand." His conduct was of a piece with the original justice and love. And, as to his "second-hand" work in Oriental Religions, there seems to be some fitness in the remark of "D. A. W." in the Boston Transcript, to the effect that those who esteem themselves exclusively entitled to the chief credit for their first-hand labors may really deserve it when they shall have done something equal to what he has done in this field. But does not the stone-breaker's "exasperation" at the driver over his road seem unnecessary, when we reach the next figure, that of "looking for the nuggets," and, finding them, find somewhat unspeakably better than nuggets? Surely, that does not appear like "second-hand" work. The philosopher, who presents to the world the best results of the detailed studies of a hundred men of science, can hardly suffer much because they point out the fact that he has made his great synthesis without needlessly going through all the analysis whereby they have furnished him materials for his grander task. J. H. C.

NORTH ANDOVER, MASS., April 28, 1882.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A. BRONSON ALCOTT, in an address at Concord in the summer of 1880, said: "We cannot think annihilation. When I think of myself as nothing, I prove that I am something. If I say I am, I am really is-ing. This is the power by which we thing things. I who am, or is-ing I, think this that other somewhat. The thing must be what I think or thing it. In other words, I think my thing, and that things things."

REPLYING to charges made against the Jews by the "friends of Czardom and inheritors of Christian prejudice," the Springfield Republican observes: "In Russia, the Jew is not permitted to own land, or to carry on any manufacture, or to deal with other countries in any sort of goods, or, so far as ukases go, to trade at all, although he does trade, by sufferance. In fact, the only thing left perfectly open to him is the traffic in money, the business of pawnbroker and money-lender. Under this state of things, the Jews have no doubt been excessive and exacting in their dealings with the improvident Russians; and it is said that in many places nearly all the Russian population are literally in the hands of the Jews, who thrive on their wastefulness. It is but the natural result. The Jew is venal, because the Jew cannot legally be anything else in Russia. And, as for lacking love of country, what a mockery is that charge! Yet something may hereafter be said concerning the patriot Jews even of Russia."

A CORRESPONDENT writing from East Saginaw, Mich., gives the following item concerning the Rev. Rowland Connor:—

When President Garfield was buried, the citizens here united in a memorial service; and, as the weather was threatening, it was decided to hold it in the Congregational church, that being the most capacious building suitable for such services. After it was published far and wide that there was no sectarian significance about the place chosen and after the money for decorating, etc., was raised, all the local clergy were invited to a seat on the platform, including the Catholic clergy, but excluding the Rev. Rowland Connor, Unitarian. That little incident showed what our orthodox preachers think of a man who believes in the right of private judgment in matters of religion. Since then, Mr. Connor has given two courses of Sunday evening lectures, one on "Ethnic Religions" and one course on "Darwinism"; and while the other clergymen, with their trained choirs and big organs and cushioned seats have had an audience of about one hundred and fifty, the little agnostic has had from five to eight hundred every evening. And that shows what the people think.

THE peroration of James G. Blaine, in his eulogy on President Garfield, is especially fine, and will bear rereading: "As the end drew near, his early craving for the sea returned. The stately mansion of power had been to him the wearisome hospital of pain, and he begged to be taken from its prison walls, from its oppressive, stifling air, from its homelessness and its hopelessness. Gently, silently, the love of a great people bore the pale sufferer to the longed-for healing of the sea, to live or to die as God should will, within sight of its heaving billows, within sound of its manifold voices. With wan, fevered face tenderly lifted to the cooling breeze, he looked out wistfully upon the ocean's changing wonders; on its far sails, whitening in the morning light; on its restless waves, rolling shoreward to break and die beneath the noonday sun; on the red clouds of evening, arching low to the horizon; on the serene and shining pathway of the stars. Let us think that his dying eyes read a mystic meaning which only the rapt and parting soul may know. Let us believe that in the silence of the receding world he heard the great waves breaking on a further shore, and felt already upon his wasted brow the breath of the eternal morning."

RABBI MAX LILIENTHAL, who has lately died in Cincinnati, will be remembered by some of our readers in Boston and vicinity as having once lectured in the Horticultural Course conducted by the Free Religious Association. His lecture showed that he was in thorough sympathy with the principles and aims of the Free Religious movement, and it left an excellent impression of the mental breadth and humanity of the man. The Jewish Watchman says of him:—

It is difficult to measure the extent of this loss. The congregation whose Rabbi he has been for twenty-seven years; the cause of modern Judaism, whose interests were so dear to his heart; the Queen City, where he had lived and wrought so long; the works of education and charity to which he gave such large consideration and effort,—will all suffer the loss of a gifted leader and a truly great and good man. He was for many years a member of the Cincinnati School Board and the Board of Regents of the McVicken University. He introduced the system of teaching by object lessons in the public schools, and prepared a manual for that purpose. He was one of the organizers of the Union Hebrew College, and taught in it to his dying day: it was to him a labor of love. . . . He was always young and fresh. He sympathized with the young in all their perplexities, and remembered them and their families with an accuracy which could only have been the result of very active interest. . . . Many instances of the powerful effects of his preaching upon the audiences who thronged to hear him, and, hushed into silence, hung breathless upon his words, might be named. There was a peculiar power in his eloquence, especially when he spoke of the greatness, the freedom, and generosity of the American people, the separation of Church and State, the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

J. H. McVICKER recently addressed an open letter to Rev. Herrick Johnson, in reply to his published charges against the theatres of Chicago. The vigor and directness of Manager McVicker's reply may be inferred from the following extracts: "I request that you select from the recognized theatres of Chicago—those regularly advertising in our daily papers—one, naming it and its manager, and then charging it with the crimes you have laid at the door of all in such a way that the case may be taken into our courts, and I will guarantee to convict you of slander, or pay $1,000 to any charitable institution you may name. I make this request, because I desire a test case. You say 'constant theatre-goers by the score' have admitted your charges to be true. I want to put them on the stand. I desire to see the people who will admit they go constantly to theatres to witness 'murderous assaults upon all that the family circle holds most holy and sacred.' So let us have a test case. You and I may 'bandy words,' as many have done before us, and arrive at no conclusion; for each will claim to have proved his side, and there is no umpire to decide which is right, for in such matters the public is a myth. So, my dear sir, select your theatre, and in a proper form present your unquashed indictment. . . . In your unchristian-like dealings with your fellow-man, are you so blinded with ancient theological dust that you cannot see the position you will soon occupy, if you do not occupy it now? During my day in Chicago, several ministers of the gospel, with paralyzed ideas such as yours, have come to the surface and for a time barked at the moon, so to speak; but not one of these, who adhered to his charges, claiming that he had proved them, can boast to-day that he has the respect and confidence of the community to whom he promulgated such slanders. . . . You say there is not a 'dramatic house that has boarded the test of time without allowing filth on its boards,—there is not one on earth,—not one'; and, after this sentence, you sign yourself, 'Respectfully, Herrick Johnson.' You should have signed yourself, 'Slandrously, Herrick Johnson,' or 'Maliciously, Herrick Johnson.' If you will apply that assertion to McVicker's Theatre in such a way as to get it before the courts, I will agree to convict you of libel or pay $1,000 to any charity you may name. That 'dramatic house' has stood the test of time, under the same management; and, if report can be believed, it has never allowed upon its boards a tithe of the filth that emanated from your pulpit in your 'plain talk about theatres.'"

BOOK NOTICES.

NATURAL LAW; OR, THE SCIENCE OF JUSTICE. A treatise on natural law, natural justice, natural right, natural liberty, and natural society, showing that all legislation whatsoever is an absurdity, a usurpation and a crime. Part first. By Lysander Spooner. Boston: A. Williams & Co. 1882.

The author of this pamphlet, after stating some of the general principles of justice, attempts to answer the question, "Why is it that it [justice] does not universally, or well-nigh universally, prevail?" He finds the reason in government and legislation. "All the great governments of the world, those now existing as well as those that have passed away, . . . have been mere bands of robbers who have associated for purposes of plunder, conquest, and the enslavement of their fellow-men. And their laws, as they have called them, have been only such agreements as they have found it necessary to enter into, in order to maintain their organizations and act together in plundering and enslaving others and in securing to each his share of the spoils." The author is evidently earnest and honest, but his reasoning does not seem to us conclusive.

AN excellent portrait of the dead poet Longfellow, together with a tender little poem about him, entitled "The Poet and the Children," by John G. Whittier, adorns the first pages of Wide-Awake for May. The series of articles entitled "Short Stories from the Dictionary," of which the fifth instalment is given in this number, is an interesting course of study in word-building. There is a strong aroma of spring-time in this number, which in these chilly April days is rather hope-inspiring; for, besides the usual complement of good reading and handsome illustrations, it contains a blue-bird poem, a dandelion poem, and an apple-blossom poem, besides the flower pictures in the wild-flower series of papers.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

EMERSON is reported dangerously ill at his Concord home with pneumonia.

JOHN OWEN, the life-long friend of Longfellow, died April 22, aged seventy-six.

GEO. H. ELLIS will shortly publish Gems of the Orient, by Mr. Charles D. B. Mills, of Syracuse.

THE junior editor of this paper will lecture at Plainville, Mass., Tuesday and Wednesday evening, May 2 and 3.

COL. INGERSOLL is announced to lecture in the Boston Theatre on "Talmagian Theology" next Sunday evening.

CARLYLE's posthumous work, Reminiscences of my Irish Journey, will be begun in the May Century, and completed in June and July.

THERE is talk in the National Free Religious Society at Chicago of establishing an "Ethical Society," and putting ex-Rev. George C. Miln at the head of it.

THE one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Friedrich Froebel, founder of the kindergarten system of teaching, was celebrated in various localities on Friday of last week.

MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD last Sunday read an essay before the Parker Memorial Class, in reply to Miss Hardaker's paper in the Popular Science Monthly, on "Science and the Woman Question."

KING OSCAR of Sweden has sent Miss Marie A. Brown, of Chicago, an autograph letter, authorizing her to translate his works into English. She already has translated some of the writings of eminent Swedish authors very successfully.

CHARLES READE the novelist, whose conversion occurred some few years ago, soon after the death of a dear female friend, and who thereupon foreswore fiction writing, seems to have recently "fallen from grace"; for he is reported to have engaged to write a series of stories for London Life, to begin next month.

ON the question of admission of women to the Harvard Medical School, the twelve Overseers who voted for it, against thirteen opposed, were President Eliot, Phillips Brooks, James Freeman Clarke, Edward Everett Hale, John T. Sargent, Henry P. Kidder, Alexander McKenzie, John T. Morse, Jr., Francis G. Peabody, Edwin P. Seaver, Moorfield Storey, and Morrill Wyman.

GARIBALDI's visit to Palermo, and especially the journey thence from Messina, was triumphal. In the darkest hour of the morning on which he was to arrive, people began to gather in the streets, awaiting him; and, when he reached the villa he was to occupy, fully twenty thousand persons had gathered in the street before it on the neighboring seashore. Processions with flags and bands paraded the streets, and bonfires gleamed on the surrounding heights.

MISS HELEN TAYLOR, step-daughter of John Stuart Mill and greatly beloved by him, although English born and bred, is taking a very active part in the Irish Land League Movement. Henry George writes to the Irish World that, in spite of many other pressing duties, among which are her superintendence of schools and other ordinary duties as member of the school board, she addresses "night after night, for week after week, meetings of English working-men in denunciation of Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy."

REV. L. HAMILTON of the Independent Church of Oakland, Cal., fell dead in his pulpit, April 9. He was speaking on the theories of life and its duties. His last words were, "We know not what matter is"—and with this utterance he fell gasping, and died in a few moments. He was known and honored all over the State, and respected by all who knew him. He had a massive and well-cultivated mind. For several years, he was a Presbyterian minister; but he outgrew the orthodox theology, and for some time had been speaking to an independent congregation in Oakland. He had a number of years been a reader and supporter of this paper, in which he was deeply interested.

PROF. E. S. MORSE, whose brilliant lectures on Japan before the Lowell Institute last winter gave so much pleasure, proposes to start for Japan on Monday next on a seven months' tour of observation and study. The trustees of the Peabody Academy of Science have granted him a leave of absence, and during his travels he will collect ethnological material for the museum at Salem. He will return by way of China, India, and Europe. His ties of interest in Japan are strengthened by the circumstance that it was during his stay there that he made some valuable discoveries in regard to progressive changes in the ancient molluscan fauna, which attracted the attention of European evolutionists and the warm personal esteem and indorsement of Charles Darwin himself.

THE death-bed of Lanza, the Italian statesman, has become as great a scandal as that of Littré, the great French critic and lexicographer. Lanza cared no more about the Church than he did for the chemical composition of faith; but, when he came to die, an officious nephew introduced a priest to his bedside. "You repent of your last sins?" said the agent of the Church. "Yes," replied the dying man, feebly. "You repent and retract all you have done against religion and the holy Church?" Lanza looked up to the priest with the utmost scorn and contempt, and did not deign to reply to what he considered an insult. The priest, however, gave him absolution, and proclaimed that Lanza had repented. The truth is, Lanza had nothing to repent of, and died, as he had lived, an enemy of Catholicism.

THE IMMORTAL LIFE.

By John Weiss.

12mo. 255 pp., with Helotype Portrait of the Author.

PRICE $1.50.

Mr. Weiss' great argument for a future existence is the nature of human personality. The argument probably will not convince persons with a strong natural tendency to disbelieve immortality; but it ably maintains that science has not yet, as many persons apprehend and some claim, given a negative decision on the old question of immortal life. The old faith still stands; and people may hold it with Mr. Weiss, and yet accept all the attested facts of recent science.

In this age of scepticism, when almost everybody doubts and insists upon proof, this work cannot fail to be a great help to those whose visions are clouded by fears that the grave ends all, and that there is no spiritual existence beyond the dark valley.—Boston Herald.

THE law under which, in Virginia, the whipping-post has been the past four years an instrument for the punishment of petty larceny, expired April 30; and, the day following, the whipping-posts throughout the State were torn down and thrown into the fire.

REPORTS from China represent that a system of railways is being inaugurated there, wheat culture extended, flour-mills introduced, textile factories established, mining developed under competent engineers, ship-building expanded, and other industries encouraged tending to progress in that conservative empire.

JOHN CHARLES FREDERICK ZOELLNER, the German astronomer and physicist, is dead. To many who are unacquainted with his scientific work and treatises, he is known by the published accounts of his experiments with Slade the medium, and his attempt to explain some of the phenomena which he witnessed by him by the old hypothesis of "a fourth dimension of space."

A DESPATCH to the London News from Berlin says: "Influential Jews here have received from Russia letters in which their co-religionists declare they will quit the country en masse, if the persecutions continue; but a conference of Jews, recently held in St. Petersburg, disapproved of a general emigration." Two hundred Russian Jews left Liverpool for the United States April 28.

SAYS the Boston Post: "Nelson Hutchins, of Brockton, read in his Sunday morning newspaper a prediction of a rainstorm before night. Part of his roof had been removed for repairs, and he immediately set about replacing it. An attempt was made to punish him under a blue law against Sabbath breaking; but the judge decided that his work was of necessity, and discharged him. However, it gave the prosecutors a chance to advertise themselves as complete and competent jackasses."

THE funeral and interment of Charles Darwin took place on Wednesday, last week, in Westminster Abbey. The pall-bearers were James Russell Lowell, the Duke of Argyle, Prof. Huxley, Sir Joseph Hooker, Sir John Lubbock, Alfred Russell Wallace, Lord Derby, and William Spotiswoode. A large number of distinguished men, including Herbert Spencer, Prof. Tyndall, John Morley, and Sir Charles Dilke, were in attendance. The anthem sung was composed especially for the occasion.

OF Emerson, the New York Herald says: "At the early age of twenty-nine years, just half a century ago, he unfrocked himself and stepped down from a sectarian pulpit to become a lay preacher of what Mr. Lowell, in his Fable for Critics, concisely styles the doctrines of 'primitive paganism.' He has lived to receive acknowledgment of the purity as well as the force of his lay sermons from a community which they at first inspired with dismay; and he dies crowned with honors by the timid university which at first shrank from regarding him as anything but an abnormal growth upon its stem, and by the neighboring city, where he was long conceived by the conservatives to be close akin to Apollyon. Boston, however, he always loved, in spite of its conservatism."

REV. A. D. MAYO, now travelling through the South on an educational mission, writes to the Springfield Republican that he finds the people of that region, both blacks and whites, alive to the need of educational facilities. "The Roman Catholic clergy," he says, "fight the movement for an extra school tax. Some of the Protestant clergy are on the same side, and with them are narrow-minded academical people, and some sections of local wealth." "The crying want here," Mr. Mayo goes on to say, "is good teaching for all classes of children to the age of twelve or fourteen years. For want of it, thousands of children are growing up either ignorant or very poorly instructed, the academies are compelled to deal with young people only fit for low-grade work, and the colleges can be little better than academies."

LAST Sunday evening, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll delivered his new lecture, "Talmagian Theology," in the Boston Theatre, to an audience that crowded the building, floor and galleries, so that many present could barely obtain standing room. The lecture abounded in wit, sarcasm, and pathos, and in passages of rare beauty and thrilling eloquence. It is hardly necessary to say that his exposure of the fallacies and follies of Talmage, in which nobody present probably believed, was complete. The large audience that Col. Ingersoll attracted (with an admission fee of a dollar), the unflagging interest with which he was heard during a lecture that occupied fully two hours, and the successive bursts of applause which his most radical utterances called forth, are pretty strong indications of the great popularity of the "eloquent pagan" as a platform speaker, and serve to remind us of the progress that has been made in this city, in liberality of sentiment and tolerance of spirit, since the days of the Puritans.

"WHEN," says the Advertiser, "one of the great councils of the Catholic Church in America announces officially that 'it is not a Catholic idea that all power comes from the people,' it arrays the Church against the republic, not upon a religious, but upon a political line of attack. When it says that 'all men are not equal, and that men ordained to rule as kings, magistrates, bishops, and priests have rights which their subjects do not possess,' it distinctly champions the monarchical idea. And this not merely by the use of the words 'king' and 'ordained to rule' and 'subjects,' but by the essence of the whole sentence. For under our institutions there are no such things as rulers or 'men ordained to rule.' Our public officers are the servants, not the masters, of the people. They are elected to 'serve,' not to rule. The line of duties intrusted to them is defined by the Constitution as laid down by their masters, the sovereign people. The greatest of our presidents, the mightiest of our soldiers, have been proud to call themselves the servants of the people. It is not, therefore, the mere use of such words as 'king' and 'subject' and 'ruler' that is objectionable in this pastoral letter, but the fact that the whole theory of our political institutions is distinctly repudiated by the highest Catholic authority, and the monarchical idea distinctly put forward as 'Catholic doctrine.'"

THE Russian Revolutionists have, through their Executive Committee, issued a proclamation, in which are stated the terms on which the Emperor "can boldly send away his body-guard to their barracks and burn the gibbets which demoralize the nation." When the terms are complied with, "the Executive Committee will stop its work, and the forces organized about it will disperse, in order to devote themselves to the education of the people." They demand: "1. General amnesty for all political offenders of the past, inasmuch as they were not guilty of any crime, but only fulfilled the duty of citizens. 2. The convocation of representatives of the whole Russian people for the revision of existing forms of government and social life, and their reconstruction in accordance with the desires of the people." The Committee declare that the elections must be made under the following stipulations: "1. Deputations should be summoned from all classes of the people without distinction, and in proportion to the number of inhabitants. 2. No limitations should be made as regards the rights of electors or of deputies. 3. Elections, and the contest for them, must be carried on entirely unhampered; and, therefore, the Government should grant as a temporary measure, and until a decision of the National Assembly can be obtained, the following: Complete liberty of the press, complete liberty of speech, complete liberty of public meeting, complete liberty of electoral programmes." The Committee affirm that these are the only conditions on which peace and prosperity are possible, and add that "we solemnly declare, in the face of our country and the whole world, that our party will, so far as it is concerned, unconditionally conform to the decision of the National Assembly, elected with the observance of the above conditions, and will have no recourse in the future to any violent proceedings against the government sanctioned by the National Assembly."

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

Within little more than a single month, three of the most eminent names of the civilized world have been enrolled among the dead,—Longfellow, Darwin, Emerson,—the world's most beloved and popular poet, its foremost man of science, and now its first essayist on themes of religious and social philosophy. If it is more difficult to classify Emerson than the other two of this great trio of immortals, it is not because his mental gifts were less distinguished than theirs or his life less peculiarly serviceable, but because his mental powers were less concentrated upon one line of activity. Though a prince in the realm of letters, it is impossible to designate his literary position and work by a single phrase. His intellect was variously gifted and his service wide. His genius was not only high, but broad. "A poet-philosopher," says one. And a poet he was as well as philosopher. He was a poet more profound than Longfellow, because he thought more deeply, though less skilled in rhythmical utterance. His prose has some of the first essentials of poetry. He also had an eye for observing facts—facts in nature and in human life—almost as keen as Darwin's. And he took, perhaps, even more than Darwin's delight in facts. However high or however humble, they all brought material which his intellectual genius wrought into his philosophy of existence.

But Ralph Waldo Emerson was more than poet and philosopher together. He was a religious teacher, a philanthropist, a social reformer, a life-long advocate of liberty in Church and State, a preacher of morals to the American people and the world, a seer and sayer of truths that will take their place in the small circle of books which last for ages to feed the moral and spiritual hunger of mankind.

When such a man dies, the race is exceptionally bereaved. It is therefore with a peculiar sadness that we contemplate his departure from life. It is true that Mr. Emerson had done his life-work. In one month more, he would have been seventy-nine years old; and his mental faculties, more especially his memory, had become much enfeebled. Since die he must, we may even rejoice with him that he could go without farther impairment of that royal intellect. Nevertheless, it is with exceptional sadness that we follow such a man to the grave. Men of his mould come into the world but rarely,—one or two in a century, perhaps, and then whole centuries pass, it may be, without one. There has been but one other in this nineteenth century to classify with him,—his personal and intellectual friend, Carlyle. But Emerson was greater than Carlyle. He had all of Carlyle's mental robustness and insight, with more than Carlyle's sincerity, and was greater, because he had more faith in man and was himself more human and humane than his fellow-seer in England. But to these two there is no successor. Other great men die,—statesmen, poets, philanthropists, scientists; and, though their loss seems irreparable, their places are soon filled. Though Darwin was the first scientific genius of the age, his work was so thoroughly done that a host of Darwinian investigators now take it up and carry its development successfully forward. The silencing of Longfellow's muse has for a time made a void in the heart of mankind. Yet greater poets are singing than Longfellow, if not so popular; and every generation brings its poets of the people. But, when such a life as Emerson's ceases, not only the individual, but the species dies. The mould is lost after which it was fashioned; and it is not reproduced until again, in some rare fruitage of the centuries, the conditions meet of which the finest mental and moral genius may be born. It is not probable that any persons now living, even the youngest, will ever see Emerson's place filled.

And the special characteristic of the great service he has rendered, the secret of his influence, is that he has been a teacher of the teachers; and this service, through his books, he will continue to render. It cannot be said that he is read among the people at large; but he is read widely, and more widely to-day than ever before, among thinkers and the leaders of thought. His wisdom has gone into pulpits where he never would have been admitted. It has percolated through newspapers and magazines. It has inspired scholars and poets, it has awakened noble ambitions in practical men, and given impulse to patriotism and philanthropy. He is the inspirer and creator of thought in others. His books are granaries for the seed-grain of thought, to which persons whose office it is to furnish thought in their service for mankind will repair for mental supplies. In generations to come, men and women who shall make themselves conversant with the history of intellect will be found turning to him as one of the most eminent and fruitful in the not crowded line of thought-producers.

Mr. Emerson was a philosopher, but he constructed no system of philosophy; and, because he did not, some persons are asking whether the influence of his literary work is likely long to survive. As well might it be asked, which are likely to last the longer, the Bibles of the world or the creeds constructed upon them? Philosophical systems, like creeds of theology, have their day and vanish. The history of intellectual development through the ages is strown with these discarded systems. There is not one of them, built up with whatever elaboration of logical effort, that is now accredited in the full court of rational thought. That Emerson produced no philosophical system by a process of logical demonstration does not touch the question of the survival of his fame and power. That he was a thought-producer insures this survival much more than if his work had been mainly to systematize thought. His name is always associated, indeed, with the transcendental philosophy; and he may truly be called the leading if not the originating mind of the important movement known as New England Transcendentalism forty and fifty years ago. A transcendentalist, an idealist, an intuitionist, by personal temperament and in the philosophical sense of the words, he doubtless was. But he was no dogmatic nor rigorous "intuitionist." He did not posit a special faculty for apprehending God and spiritual truths; and in respect to affirming any theological dogmas on the ground of human consciousness he was very reticent. He gave, too, as already intimated, hospitable welcome to all facts that science might discover, and was ready for any doctrines its discoveries might establish. He felt no antagonism between science and his philosophy of existence. His philosophy, indeed, was so broad, so natural, so grounded upon nature—nature in its largest sense, including all there is of matter or law or life—that scientific truths fell at once into their places in it without a jar. As idealist, he did not stop in the bare material fact which the scientist brought him, but the fact for him, became at once informed with purpose and soul, and was taken into his view of the great world-life as something throbbing with the very pulsations of the wonderful creative energy which he called sometimes God and sometimes Nature. His belief as an intuitionist would appear to be met by the statement that the entire being of man, body as well as mind, is in immediate vital contact with the forces and powers and laws that together may be called Divine, the Over-soul and In-soul of all phenomenal existence; and this not by any supernatural process, but by channels of natural relationship through which flow the very nourishments of physical, mental, and moral life.

No sketch of Emerson, however incomplete, should be permitted to close without referring to the rare moral nobility of his character. Never did philosopher better illustrate in his own life the adequacy and beauty of his doctrine than did he. Heroic and saintly qualities mingled felicitously in his nature. There is no virtue that was not at home with him. In public and in private, his unstained life was devoted from beginning to end to human amelioration. He was alike gentle and strong,—believing in the urgent necessity of personal interest and work for the achievement of good objects, yet serene with hope and faith against all disappointments. Fond as he was of his books, he did not shut himself among them, but recognized his mission as a man among men in caring for the daily interests of society. He left his library and his essay-writing and appeared with needed vote and speech whenever any cause of imperilled human rights demanded his advocacy. He took the side of the despised and persecuted abolitionists—was one with them—at a time when to take that stand required not only moral but physical courage. His door was always hospitably open, and for years his house has been a goal of pilgrimage for all classes and kinds of persons who felt the attraction of his thought. He not only loved books, but humanity and nature; and, to what fine purpose he studied both humanity and nature, his own books testify. His neighbors—men, women, and children—not only revered but loved him. They may not all have understood his writings, but they understood the man. They knew his strong, sincere, pure, kindly, helpful life of nearly fifty years as citizen of their town. He was simple and equal neighbor to them all, yet they knew they had for neighbor one whom neither hereditary blood nor title could outrank in fine nobility.

It was said above that Emerson leaves no successor, and that probably no one now living will ever see his place filled. But it should be added that there is a small band of select souls who after death continue to live in an exceptional way in their recorded thoughts and in the mental and moral impulse they leave behind them. They are as vitally creative characters in the world, though they may have been dead for centuries, as are any persons who are still breathing in the flesh. When such men die, they continue to fill their own places. Emerson will stand within the circle of this immortal company.

MR. EMERSON'S RELIGIOUS POSITION.

Emerson's service as a religious and theological reformer can hardly be overestimated. To treat, however, this part of his life as it deserves would require an essay rather than a paragraph. But this journal, even if all others do, cannot overlook the fact that he has been connected with the Free Religious Association from its beginning. He, more than any other, may be called the father of the Free Religious movement in this country. And, when the Association was organized to represent this progressive movement, he was present at its first public meeting, made one of the addresses, and was among the first at the close of the meeting to present himself at the Secretary's table, with the fee for membership in his hand, to ask to have his name enrolled as a member. And when, a few years afterwards, the list of Vice-Presidents was enlarged and modified so as to make it more widely representative, and he was asked to accept a place in the number, he signified his ready and cordial assent. And there, re-elected every year since, his name still stands at the head of the list. As it has not been his habit to connect himself as a member and officer with public organizations, even though approving their objects, this exception to his usual course was made the more significant. Nor was his connection with the Association merely an honorary and passive one. He took an active interest in its aims and work, spoke several times in its conventions and lecture-courses, contributed to its funds, and was a regular attendant at its annual meetings so long as his health allowed him to go to such gatherings. REPLY TO "A CRITICISM."

In another column will be found a communication from Mrs. Celia P. Woolley, in which a sentence, quoted from an editorial paragraph that appeared in The Index a few weeks ago, is made the basis of a criticism of the position of The Index, which calls for a reply.

That its thought and spirit may be fairly understood, the paragraph containing the sentence which is particularly offensive to our esteemed correspondent is here given entire:—

A subscriber writes requesting us "to name a juvenile paper suitable for the children of a free thinker." As this is a question frequently asked us in one form or another, we would here state that, so far as we know, there is no juvenile paper distinctly antichristian or distinctively free thought in its teachings. But we find that all juvenile literature nowadays, except that published for Sunday-school use or in the avowedly religious organs of the various sects, partakes largely of the scientific spirit which permeates the literature designed for maturer minds,—a spirit that is sure to awaken thought and inquiry, and especially in the naturally inquisitive brain of youth, and so is sure to give a strong impulse in the right direction, the search after truth. In such papers as the Youth's Companion, published in this city, and Harper's Young People, New York, and in such magazines as Wide-Awake and St. Nicholas, there is no danger of any strong orthodox bias being given to any youthful mind. The best and highest talent in the land is secured by the publishers of these and other juvenile periodicals for the purpose of instructing, as well as amusing the children of this generation; and the result is that they are healthful in tone, scientific in spirit, and moral in purpose, and no parent need to hesitate to put such literature into his children's hands, nor any free thinker from fear of warping his child's mind in a wrong direction.

The words "antichristian" and "free thought" (or free thinker) have long been "interchangeable terms"; and our use of them in the above paragraph is warranted not only by common usage, but by the authority of the standard dictionaries. The following definitions by Worcester are to the point: "Antichristian, opposed to Christianity, an enemy to or opposer of Christianity." "Free thinker. A term assumed by disbelievers in a Divine revelation." One who is opposed to Christianity, considered as a revelation from God, given through inspiration and attested by miracles, is, in the common acceptance of these words, an antichristian and a free thinker, and in this sense the terms are in common use, not only in papers, periodicals, and books published in opposition to Christianity, but in those devoted to its defence. And we may add that Christianity, as expounded in the past by its most eminent representatives and as illustrated through centuries by the legitimate effects of some of its doctrines in repressing freedom of thought and expression, has afforded very good ground for the use of these words in the manner in which they are now employed.

This is none the less true because some persons are, by force of circumstances, constrained to call themselves Christians when they no longer believe in Christianity, when they are antichristian in the sense that they are disbelievers in the inspiration and authority of the Bible and in the superhuman character of Jesus, or because many of the most unreasonable and pernicious doctrines of the Christian system have fallen into disrepute with the growth of liberal thought, or because in this period of transition the word "Christian," revered by multitudes who have largely outgrown beliefs which it connotes, is employed to describe not only the ethical element of religious and philosophical systems in general, but all the splendid achievements of science and civilization against which Christianity has at times directed, but in vain, all its enormous power. For centuries, the term free thinker was one of reproach; but with the progress of liberty, corresponding with the decay of theology, the word has become recognized among intelligent people as expressive of the inalienable rights of the human mind, and of course this improved intellectual condition fairly admits of a wider application of the word than was possible, when it was originally assumed in defiance of the authority of the Church.

But as it is impossible arbitrarily to divest a word of a meaning that has become attached to it in the history of intellectual development or to replace it immediately with another word that will be generally understood, we must be permitted for the present to use the terms free thinker and free thought as they are commonly used in The Index.

The statement that "the theory of The Index seems to be that because the word 'Christian' no longer satisfies the needs, as a term defining their own growing and widening faith of a large class of thinking people, it therefore has no legitimate place in the dictionary or the history of human speech and affection," is open to this objection, that it is not warranted by anything that has appeared in the columns of the journal. Christianity,—a system of religion that has had a natural origin and development, that has grown out of man's nature and surroundings as naturally as have grown from the same source governments and constitutions, that forms an important part of human history, portions of it reaching back into the remote past ages anterior to the time of Christ, and that, modified in adaptation to race, climate, and circumstances, is still the religion of millions of devout worshippers,—cannot be ignored by any thinker, nor can its influence be disregarded in any fair and full consideration of the causes that have advanced and the obstacles that have hindered civilization, whatever may be thought of its claims to a supernatural origin. There is nothing that has been evolved from the mind and its relations, in the form of religion, government, art, or industry, however incomplete or however unsuited to a higher intellectual condition, that has not at some period served a purpose and been a "factor" in the advancement of the race; but it is equally true that systems, conceptions, and methods have often outlasted their usefulness, and in their fixed and fossilized condition and with their authoritative pretensions have exercised an influence for evil on ages which, having advanced beyond the conditions that give them birth, demanded higher thought and better systems.

Many there are who neither ignore nor disparage Christianity, and yet who hold that, as preached by orthodox theologians and even as taught in the Gospels, it is far behind the best thought of the age, and that, except so far as it is modified or supplemented with the results of modern science, it is delaying the removal of acknowledge evils, obstructing reform and retarding intellectual and moral progress. They neither "undervalue" nor "decry" it, but aim to treat it with judicial fairness, actuated by no personal "hostility" or "spirit of hatred" and uninfluenced by traditionary prejudice or sentimental attachments. They do not regard Christianity as a "term expressive only of the excessive cruelties which have been practised in its name," nor do they shut their eyes to the actual evils that are justly ascribable to its theological teachings. They freely admit that Christianity not only may, but does "possess some merit," without which it would never have triumphed over the paganism of antiquity and gained the adherence of millions, including many of the best and noblest of earth; but they do not, in their fair and generous recognition of this merit, lose sight of the fact that the valuable part of Christianity is chiefly the universal element of all systems of thought, with which theology has no necessary connection, and which will continue, with vast additions made to it from age to age, when Christianity as a supernatural system shall have taken its place among the outgrown superstitions of the race. To the class whose position is thus briefly defined, we claim to belong.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

LAST WORDS ABOUT METHOD.

"If the day ever comes when the intellectual, moral, and religious facts of human nature are seen to demand—as an adequate explanation—an intelligent moral and religious cause, external to man, then theism will take its place as scientific demonstration. I believe that the day is already here." So Mr. Savage wrote in concluding his interesting essay on "The Scientific Method in Religion," published in The Index of March 16. Such words raise in me a mood at the farthest possible remove from that of belligerent controversy. With their general purport, my feeling, at least, goes strongly; and it may be added that this essay, as a whole, gave me pleasure from the entire directness with which the writer applied, not merely his pen, but his mind, to a question of cardinal importance. It was quite evident that he was not concerned to answer another person, but to answer the question raised, and that his words stood for mental combinations formed in his own mind. I shall address myself once more to the same question, and could wish only to do so in the same spirit.

Is there but one intellectual method, or are there more than one? The question may be answered either way: there is but one or there are many, according to the point of view assumed. All vertebrate animals are of the same sort as being vertebrate animals, while yet there are numerous and widely different descriptions of such animals; and so all rational methods are identical as being rational, but vary nevertheless from one pursuit to another. The methods of the geometer, the chemist, and the historian may be equally rational, and, in this sense, not different; but it is obvious that they do differ, and that each has its distinct character. All right practical methods, again, have been rationally devised, and so far there is the same method of building a railroad bridge, shoeing a horse, keeping accounts, and cooking a dinner; but it is not necessary to say that the several methods of the cook, the accountant, the farrier, and the civil engineer are indeed several, and to a degree unlike. Speaking, therefore, in the most general manner possible, we should say that there is but one intellectual method; while, speaking in a more definite and specific manner, we should say that there are several.

Now, every particular method is good for certain results, and not for others, and, however excellent for its purpose, will be worthless or worse in the wrong place. Suppose all historians, for example, to adopt the methods of physics. They are to look only for uniform laws and processes, causing the same results in Russia, England, China, and Patagonia. They are to regard human action as the same in character with physical motion, and to seek out the constant uniformities of such motion, if such there are, looking upon all else as without significance or interest. As the result, history, properly so called, would disappear, to be replaced by a small number of general propositions, illustrated with examples picked out here and there. And it would be a wonder if most of these propositions should not prove, upon a strict scrutiny, to be fallacious; for the inquirer, assured from the start that there must be a uniformity of all human and historical motion, would put the color of his belief into the facts before him, and see the required uniformity in all sorts of casual, shadowy, and insignificant resemblances. Even so learned, large-minded, and discreet an historical inquirer as Guizot has furnished a partial example of just this. Having persuaded himself that the ancient Germans were quite the same in character, institutions, and manners with the existing savages of America, Africa, and Polynesia,—or, more generally, that the childhood of the most capable and improvable races corresponds in character to the adult age of degraded races,—he sought to support his persuasion by a style of argumentation which astonishes one as coming from him. Ransacking books of travel and the like, he picked out, now on one continent and now upon another, any trait of savage manners he chanced to alight upon, to which somewhat a little similar might be discovered in the manners of the primitive Germans; and, having thus made out a small list of real or fancied resemblances, he remained content. Such a kind of argument is obviously worthless; yet such a man, following upon the trail of a foregone conclusion, could palm it off upon himself as genuine.

Here, we suppose only that one special method invades and usurps the province of another. The like might occur upon a wider scale. A method of much more extensive application than that of strict physics, but not covering the whole ground of human reason, might, through the richness of its results, grow in favor continually, until at length it should be set up as alone rational. Two effects would follow. On the one hand there would be an arbitrary limitation or constriction of the human mind. Whatever was unattainable by this particular method would be regarded as forever beyond the reach of thought; and any thought that should actually go further would be set down at once as groundless and fantastic. On the other hand, such interpretation of known facts as this method could afford would be taken as incontestably true, while in some cases, at least, they would be false interpretations. For example, man has a sense of freedom. Without such a sense, no one could feel himself morally responsible. To any man totally destitute of it, the word ought would be meaningless. But freedom is physically impossible. Therefore, if one apply the methods of physics to the interpretation of this sense, he will be compelled to pronounce it a mere subjective illusion; that is, he will arrive at a destructive interpretation. Now there is a method, set up as alone legitimate, which actually gives this result; and there are moral teachers who, from their faith in the method, accept the result as beyond question true. But, before myself coming to such a conclusion, I must be assured that the method which conducts to it is indeed the only rational one. It is obvious that, in the sentence quoted at the outset, Mr. Savage has taken the word "scientific" to be the equivalent of rational. Now, I certainly neither contend that rational conclusions can be reached otherwise than by rational methods, nor deny that reason is the test of all belief. The test, I say, not the source; for it is my fixed persuasion that religious and ethical beliefs have not been brought into existence by a course of ratiocination, and in order to satisfy man's understanding, but have arisen from a native want and spontaneous prompting of the human soul. To this conclusion, I am led not only by observation of historical facts, but by my own immediate feeling. For, suppose I represent to myself a cold and blind universe, without consciousness, without feeling, a mere outcome and embodiment of physical necessity. This universe throws out upon the surfaces of its worlds conscious souls with thoughts and hopes that wander through eternity, but it knows not of them. Blindly it has produced them, and blindly it will soon sweep them down into everlasting darkness. Generation after generation, they arise to look out upon earth and sky, to behold the wonder of the starry heavens and feel the majesty of the moral law, and to think of immortal life, unsullied beauty, imperishable good; and, generation after generation, they are coldly swept down by a universe that knows nothing of good or beauty or life, nothing of them with their luminous thoughts and warm hearts, nothing even of itself. And at last the end of all will come: mankind will be extinguished, as all its generations have been; and the universe, a blind, deaf, feelingless Saturn, will devour the offspring of whom it was not worthy. Now, in representing to myself such a universe, I shiver to the marrow. Nevertheless, if it be indeed such, I will open my eyes to the fact. Long since, my soul said, with Sartor, "Truth, though it slay me"; and I am not aware that it has ever been unfaithful to the vow then made. Not one illusion will I permit myself, however sweet, however needful to my happiness. But such a universe is to me dreadful, hateful, monstrous, horrible; and no painting it with "progress of the species" or the like rouge can make it seem less monstrous and horrible. On this head also, I will have no illusions. Therefore, my own heart tells me why men have believed in gods: it was not from a curiosity about the "cause" of things, but from the strong cry of their hearts after a fellowship with the universe that had begotten them. But religious belief, if at all true, must be susceptible of rational verification: the reason that was not its source must be its test.

But there is an intellectual method by which, according to philosophical schools differing so widely as that of Kant on the one hand and those of Comte and Spencer on the other, such belief can never be verified. I have called it the "scientific" method, partly because, my mind being very feeble, I am careful not to put gratuitous difficulties in its way. To avoid doing so, I seek to have a distinct term for every distinct order of facts, and in the sphere of intellectual labor as elsewhere. But that a word may not stand between those who may otherwise come, perhaps, to an understanding with each other, this method will here be briefly described without receiving a name.

Its data are given by states of consciousness which are conditioned immediately upon, if they do not arise merely from, impressions made upon one or more of the five senses. These states of consciousness represent to us the existence, attributes, and motives of external objects. Concerning such objects, the question arises, What order of relation subsists between or within them? This is a definitely limited inquiry, leaving important provinces of our being unengaged. For, in the first place, the said objects stand simply before the eye and the understanding as quite independent of our wishes, hopes, sentiments, and purposes,—in short, of the entire practical and productive or teleological part of our nature. Now, that movement of the human mind which looks to ends is its great characteristic and governing movement. Dr. William James has given a philosophical interpretation of this fact in an essay published in the Unitarian Review for November last, an essay with which I first became acquainted a few days since, and which is penetrating, stimulating, suggestive, and, in the best sense, original to an extraordinary degree. I cannot dwell upon the matter here, but may remark that Bacon looked always upon science as subsidiary to use, as a means to "subdue" nature, and subject it to the teleological human principle. In the second place, that inquiry about an order of relation leaves quite aside that æsthetic impression of natural objects and aspects which has played so great a part in human development. What does it learn of the sky, for example. That this is some gases and vapors and an optical illusion. But in all ages the sky has touched the hearts of men with a sense of majesty, benignity, peace, serene and infinite comprehension. Nature speaks to the imagination and pregnant sensibility of man: he pictures in vocal expression the æsthetic impression thus received; and here, as I believe, is the germinal principle of language. But the method in question, putting aside all this, and putting aside no less all that which gives man the impulse and power of a maker,—converting him for the nonce into a mere eye and understanding,—looks only for a certain order of phenomenal relation,—an order, it has been said, of "coexistence and succession," to be expressed "in terms of matter, motion, and force." Now, this is plainly a limited kind of mental motion. One sees at a glance, and cannot refuse to see, that it is not coextensive with the entire movement of human intelligence.

The objects observed and the order ascertained are phenomenal. The metaphysical meaning of "phenomenal" will be fully appreciated only by those who have made certain studies, which many intelligent readers of The Index may have had no occasion to undertake; but the distinction it implies coincides nearly with one which is ancient and familiar. "The things that are seen," said Paul, "are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." These temporal things which are seen have been spoken of in religious circles, and not badly designated, as "the things of time and sense." Religion, if not of a very low degree, has always imported that somewhat unseen is real in a deeper sense than this scene of things upon which our eyes look out. Now, the "things of time and sense" are phenomenal, and the method in question serves to ascertain the fixed order of phenomenal relation. Of course, one will never get beyond phenomenal relation by the act of ascertaining what it is. And it is inconceivable to me that the same method, the same mental motion, should serve for a farther purpose,—inconceivable, in other words, that one should arrive at other and higher results by reasoning from the same data in the same way. And my impression that here is a boundary of some sort is strengthened by the circumstance that a great and growing school, the school of agnosticism, finds just here the ultimate limit of all human knowledge, all definite thought, all rational belief. I fully agree with the agnostics thus far: what they call the limits of all thought and knowledge I freely admit as the limits of a method. By my persuasion, they are in the right from their point of view. When they add that the motions of the human will are necessitated like those of running water or falling stones, I acknowledge that their conclusion is not arbitrary, but follows from their method, and that again they are right from their point of view. And, this acknowledgment being fully made, the ground is cleared for farther inquiries, not, however, to be entered upon at this time.

Mr. Savage thinks that the existence of an intelligent moral cause superior to man might be "scientifically demonstrated," as the existence of the planet Neptune was discovered. I willingly accept this as a test case, and would ask no better. Leverrier observed certain planetary perturbations, which, excluding any supernatural intervention, could be accounted for only by supposing another planet outside those hitherto discovered. By a course of exquisitely fine and exact mathematical calculations, he ascertained the precise point in the heavens where this planet should be, and turning his telescope to that point saw it there. It was but another phenomenal object, on the same level with the other planets and contained in the same order. Now imagine him or another looking on the order of the solar system, finding it perfect, and saying, to account for the existence of this order, One must suppose a mind above it. He sets out to obtain some rational verification of this hypothesis. Can one conceive of him as attempting to do so by the same or a similar method? There would be no use for his telescope, no place for his mathematics; and the data upon which Leverrier proceeded, or any similar data, would be insignificant. Moreover, if by any such method one actually did discover somewhat superior to the solar system and the source of its order, this thing so discovered would be but another phenomenal object, to be itself accounted for. Meantime, I have personally little interest in such a God as should serve chiefly to satisfy the understanding by appearing as the "cause" of any facts. Assured of somewhat in the fundamental character of the universe which answers to the moral nature, the heart and hope of man, I could be well content to leave the mystery of existence a mystery still. D. A. WASSON.

HUME, KANT, AND SPENCER.

To the admirer of Herbert Spencer, it seems strange that Professor Caird, in his address on David Hume, delivered last November, should have contrasted the sensational or experiential school with the philosophy of Kant only, without even mentioning the more advanced and more perfect system so ably advocated and interpreted by Herbert Spencer. It is true that Immanuel Kant died in 1804,—about half a century before the evolution philosophy had reached its first great stage of development by the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species,—so that Kant had not these later discoveries of science to guide his thought.

But, aside from "evolution," Spencer has satisfactorily explained and reconciled the old metaphysical schools. The idealism of Berkeley, the innate ideas opposed by John Locke, the "sensational experience" of David Hume, and the intuitions or "a priori forms of thought" of Kant, are all explained and harmonized by Spencer in his First Principles and Psychology. He has shown that there is some truth as well as much error in all of those progressive forms which philosophy has taken in its gradual development up to its present scientific basis. The idealism of Berkeley embraced only the subjective side, and could not see any objective reality outside of mind. The ego was all that Berkeley felt sure of, and metaphysical absurdity reached its climax in his form of reasoning. David Hume takes the opposite course, and shows that the senses are the only avenues to knowledge, that mind is wholly dependent upon the experience furnished by the senses. He overlooked the intuitions of the mind.

Immanuel Kant, on the contrary, demonstrates the fact that there are intuitions, or innate tendencies of thought and feeling, but does not attempt to explain how such tendencies have originated.

The difference between Berkeley, Hume, Kant, and Spencer, may be illustrated to those who are not fond of abstract reasonings in the following manner. Suppose these four philosophers are about starting on a trip to the "regions of the unknown." There is a train about starting on each side of our philosophers, who have just taken their seats. "See," says Hume, "we are off," looking out of the window. "Are you sure?" says Kant, looking out on his side of the car. "Perhaps your senses deceive you." But Kant perceives motion on his side, and says: "You are right. We are off, sure enough." "You are both mistaken," says Berkeley. "What you see moving are only the trains, one on each side of us, which have just started. Your senses have deceived you both. Look at the depot. We are still opposite, and our train has not moved. You see how our senses deceive us,—can't be relied on. The mind, the ego, is the only reliable guide."

"But how do you know we have not moved?" replies Kant. "You have to depend upon your perception of the depot being in the same relative position to our train. Hume is correct, in depending upon sensational experience; but why didn't we depend upon our first sight of motion on one side of our train? Why do we have a suspicion or doubt of the correctness of our first observation? Is it not because we have an innate caution not to judge always by appearances? This innate tendency, or a priori form of thought, is overlooked by our friend Hume; and, instead of referring all knowledge to experience, he should have referred also to this important element of mind, without which we should be in constant danger of being deceived by appearances."

Herbert Spencer at once acknowledges this innate tendency of thought and feeling, but, turning to Kant, asks him: "Whence comes this innate tendency? Is it not the result of the experience of our ancestors? Is it not a physiological and psychological fact that any habit of thought or feeling,—the feeling of caution, for instance,—if so long continued as to become habitual, produces organic changes in the brain, and those changes are transmitted to posterity? That these mental qualities are transmitted to offspring, when surrounding conditions do not prevent it, is a fact fully admitted. Hume is right so far as the fact that the senses furnish us with individual experience, Berkeley is right so far as the fact of our senses often deceive us, Kant is correct so far as the mind having innate tendencies of thought and feeling; but all these views are harmonized and explained, if we add ancestral to individual experiences, and the fact that organic changes of brain are transmitted to offspring."

The great superiority of Herbert Spencer as a philosopher is his wonderful power of analysis, his fine discrimination of nice shades of difference, his concentration of thought and mental grasp. These qualities are very conspicuous in his reply to James Martineau of London and to his other critics, as well as in his First Principles and Psychology. Perhaps no modern philosopher has been more misrepresented or misunderstood than Herbert Spencer. And it is not surprising, since he has shown the errors of transcendentalists, of materialists, idealists, and metaphysicians generally. He has sided with no school of philosophy, but has built up a new one on the basis of scientific facts. Although not a special scientist, he has collected the facts of many sciences, and shown that they all demonstrate the truth, the certainty of the evolution philosophy.

A volume would be required to show how Spencer analyzes the "contents of our consciousness," explains what constitutes reality, and how the ultimate scientific ideas of space, time, matter, motion, and force have been generated; but my object will be gained, if this will provoke inquiry and induce the would-be critics of Herbert Spencer to read again more thoroughly his complete works, especially his Psychology and First Principles.

EMERSON'S DEATH AND BURIAL.

Ralph Waldo Emerson's fatal sickness was acute pneumonia. He was ill but six days, his vital powers gradually losing strength from the beginning. During the last hours, he was unconscious. He died on the evening of April 27, a little before nine o'clock, dropping peacefully into the final sleep. At noon of that day, he recognized, with his accustomed smile of welcome, an intimate friend who had come from Boston, and spoke a few words of cordial greeting. And this characteristic incident of his habitual manner seems to have been about the last evidence of consciousness. The burial was at Concord, in the cemetery of "Sleepy Hollow," on last Sunday afternoon as the sun was near its setting, a vast concourse of people—neighbors, townsmen, and friends from abroad—being present. At the private funeral, services at the house only, Rev. Dr. Furness of Philadelphia, a life-long friend of Mr. Emerson, officiated. At the church, Rev. James Freeman Clarke and Judge E. R. Hoar made addresses, and there were other services. But nothing could have been more touching than these words with which Judge Hoar closed his brief address, as he turned and looked upon the dead face of his noble friend:

That lofty brow, the home of all-wise thoughts and noble aspirations; those lips of eloquent music; that great soul, which trusted in God, and never let go its hope of immortality; that great heart, to which everything was welcome that belonged to man; that hospitable nature, loving and tender and generous, having no repulsion or scorn for anything but meanness and baseness,—oh! friend, brother, father, lover, teacher, inspirer, guide, is there no more that we can do now than to give thee our hail and farewell?

It seemed, however, to be a general feeling among the hundreds who returned to Boston by the special train after the funeral that, while the dignity of the popular oration could hardly have been surpassed, the spoken words were singularly unequal to the occasion. Judge Hoar's introductory remarks had a certain rugged dignity of deep feeling, Dr. Clarke's remarks were simple and conversational, and Mr. Alcott's so-called sonnet was pleasing, though trite; but Dr. Furness' selection of the conversion of Saul, as his main Scriptural citation, was little less than an insult to the departed, who, certainly, never had persecuted anybody, and whose light from heaven shone all the time. And Rev. Mr. Brown's prayer was a prolonged strain of commonplace. It was an occasion for eloquence in its highest sense, and there was none there. Ten sentences from Phillips, or some natural orator who had known Emerson, would have been worth all that was said.

TUESDAY, May 30, has been set apart by order of the Grand Army Posts as Memorial or Decoration day, and will be very generally observed throughout the country.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on the 1st and 2d of June, 1882, with sessions as follows:—

THURSDAY EVENING, June 1, at 7.45 P.M. Business meeting for election of officers, hearing of reports, and action upon the Resolutions referred from the Conference of March 28. The following amendment to the Constitution, prepared by a Committee appointed for the purpose by the Executive Committee, is to be proposed for adoption in lieu of present Article III.:—

The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and twelve Directors. They shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the Association; and the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors be chosen. The Directors shall be chosen for four years, and, at the expiration of that term, shall not be eligible for re-election until after two years. One fourth of their number shall be chosen annually; but, at the annual meeting of 1882, the full number of twelve shall be chosen in sections of three respectively for one, two, three, and four years. The President, Secretaries, Treasurer, and Directors shall together constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. They shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number, or in the list of Vice-Presidents, between any two annual meetings. Six members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

FRIDAY, June 2. A Convention for essays and addresses at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. Farther particulars as to speakers and topics will be given hereafter.

FRIDAY EVENING, a Social Festival will close the proceedings, with the usual features of interest. WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

WE shall give next week an admirable discourse on Emerson by John W. Chadwick and an article from Moncure D. Conway.

THE Indianapolis Age proposes that revival congregations be utilized by organizing them into "Relief Committees, to hunt out and succor suffering humanity." Not a bad idea.

WE send this week to all subscribers of The Index who are in arrears bills showing the amounts they owe for the paper, and to those whose time has expired or is about to expire postal cards soliciting a renewal of their subscriptions. Prompt remittances will be appreciated.

"THERE are," says the Catholic Review, "Orthodox Unitarians, and Unitarian Orthodox. There are all grades of opinion in both parties; but it must be admitted that the general tendency, even in orthodox congregations, is in the direction of 'free thought' and 'liberal Christianity.'"

SAYS the Presbyterian: "The question, often mooted, 'What was the religion of Thomas Carlyle?' seems to be settled by Mr. Froude in his biography. He was not a believer in revelation. He rejected distinctly the miracles of the sacred history. He called the universe a 'miracle,' and therefore disbelieved in special miracles. So all history was to him 'a Bible.'"

OUR "esteemed contemporary," the Banner of Light, informs us that, "unknown to Mr. Darwin, Alfred R. Wallace had at the same time, by his own reasoning, or rather by being in an equally receptive condition to the inspirations of spiritual intelligencies, reached the same conclusions; but Mr. Darwin, incidentally learning of this, stole a march on him, and expedited his own presentation of his views to the world."

"A GENUINE philanthropist," says the Investigator, "is one who wishes well to his fellow-men, especially the poor, the laboring people, and the unfortunate. Robert Owen, a Liberal and a Socialist Reformer, was a philanthropist of this class. He spent fifty years and a princely fortune in helping English working men and women. In all the annals of humanity there is probably no mention made of a purer-minded, a more unselfish, and a more generous-hearted man than Robert Owen."

SAYS Prof. Tyndall: "The reader of my small contributions to the literature which deals with the overlapping margins of science and theology will have noticed how frequently I quote Mr. Emerson. I do so mainly because in him we have a poet and a profoundly religious man, who is really and entirely undaunted by the discoveries of science, past, present, or prospective. In his case, Poetry, with the joy of a bacchanal, takes her graver brother, Science, by the hand, and cheers him with immortal laughter. By Emerson, scientific conceptions are continually transmuted into the finer forms and warmer lines of an ideal world."

THE Christian Union says the conclusion that man descended from a lower animal "is certainly inconsistent with the ecclesiastical traditions of creation and the fall, founded upon the acceptance of the Mosaic narrative as an infallibly accurate historical and scientific record. But, since Biblical critics are now universally agreed that the first chapter of Genesis is not history, there is nothing fatal to Christian faith in conceding the traditional and poetic character of the immediately succeeding narrative. The Darwinian hypothesis, that man has descended from a lower animal, is not necessarily more degrading to man or dishonoring to God than the ancient opinion that he has descended from a statue of clay into which a life was breathed by direct creative act."

THAT advanced and progressive sheet, the Christian Statesman, presents the following from the profound and sagacious "Rev. David Gregg": "The reason why the majority of men reject Christ today is not the badness of their intellects, but it is the badness of their hearts. Their intellects see enough to establish the truth of Christ's claims, but their hearts control their intellects. The clamor for more light and evidence in order to establish the Christian religion is an inspiration of the devil, and is intended to keep men from using and appreciating the light and evidence which they have. We find this characteristic of unbelievers, of which we speak, exemplified in Dives, when he lifts up his eyes in torments. Some people teach that we have in him the evidence of reform in bad men after death. They tell us 'he cared little for his brethren when on earth, but now such has been his improvement that he yearns for their salvation, and asks that Abraham will send some one to warn them.' There is no mark of improvement here. On the contrary, the old plea of the want of sufficient evidence asserts itself."

THE debate over the nomination of Dr. Newman Smyth as professor at Andover still continues in the Orthodox papers, and waxes warmer. Personalities begin to mingle with the discussion of points of theological soundness. The acting professors are accused of usurping an office that does not belong to them, in taking it upon themselves to appoint and so zealously defend Dr. Smyth. And Professor Park is accused of being the power behind the throne of the Congregation- alist, secretly working against the confirmation of Dr. Smyth as his successor. The Independent charges the Congregationalist with deliberate suppression of the truth in one of its articles. And the Congregationalist, noticing sarcastically the "fine honesty" of another of its antagonistic contemporaries, takes advantage of an apparent misprint in its critic's article, in which the phrase "the mule of history" occurred, to say that "that would be a happy name for such a critic to assume as his own." Altogether, the spectacle is not one naturally suggestive of the exclamation, "How these Christians love one another!"

SAYS the Boston Herald: "No one would think of maintaining that Darwin's Descent of Man and the Mosaic record of the creation can be reconciled on any basis which would leave much literalness to the latter. However, one of the canons of Westminster Abbey, and no less a person than Canon Liddon of St. Paul's Cathedral, feels assured that this adaptation will be made; of course, by surrenders of what have heretofore been looked upon as vital portions of the sacred text. One does not need to be much of a theologian to see how seriously these admissions interfere with the logical continuity of the old systems of belief. If evolution is to take the place of the Mosaic account of creation, then there can have been no fall of man; for he has been constantly progressing. If Adam did not fall, then mankind cannot have been brought under the condemnation of sin, and no vicarious atonement was called for. It is hardly necessary to follow these successive propositions on to their ultimate conclusions: suffice to say that it is not in accordance with orthodox notions. Mr. Darwin's death has shown the transitional state of our religious belief. He has had no hand in its positive destruction; but he has pointed out, in an unmistakable manner, that in the future it must rest on very different foundations from those that served for it in the past; and, what is more, religious teachers are now coming to realize the necessity of making this change."

THE following in regard to Emerson is from the Boston Advertiser: "A child of Boston which he loved so well, and of Unitarian parents whom he venerated with filial piety, he drank well from the spirit of his surroundings, from Harvard, and from literature. For a while, he occupied a pulpit, but found it too narrow, not because any man is too great for the pulpit, but because he desired more freedom than he thought it right to expect from a salaried office and social traditions. Then, he retired to Concord and his ever-diligent labors in literature, half yielding to Coleridge, hailing Carlyle, and embracing transcendentalism, not, however, because these were the best things to be had, but because Mr. Emerson knew that his sources of strength ought not to be limited by conventionality, by the aspirations of the great and good, or even by his own prophetic soul. He would not join a school, an intellectual aristocracy, a philosophical set, or any group, however much of honor and comfort it offered. Hence, he is not the property of any class, but our common possession and our national glory, whose words read like the great ledger entries of our merchants, whose acts betray the shrewdness and prudence of the typical New Englander, and whose words are the outcome of our national development, our joy, our honor, and withal a part of every fine American, so that his axioms and surprises of 1840 have become our proverbs of 1882. If one wish to have the summary and quintessence of this new continent and its people, their thought and the very spirit of modern New England, it is all in Emerson, of whom only the mortal frame can be destroyed by the angel death."

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 4, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association: namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

GOOD-BYE, PROUD WORLD!

Good-bye, proud world! I'm going home;
Thou art not my friend; I am not thine;
Too long through weary crowds I roam,—
A river ark on the ocean brine;
Too long I am tossed like the driven foam;
But now, proud world, I'm going home!

Good-bye to Flattery's fawning face;
To Grandeur with his wise grimace;
To upstart Wealth's averted eye;
To supple office, low and high;
To crowded halls, to court and street,
To frozen hearts and hasting feet;
To those who go and those who come,
Good-bye, proud world, I'm going home!

I go to seek my own hearthstone,
Bosomed in yon green hills alone;
A secret lodge in a pleasant land,
Whose groves the frolic fairies planned,
Where arches green the livelong day
Echo the blackbird's roundelay,
And evil men have never trod
A spot that is sacred to thought and God.

Oh, when I am safe in my sylvan home,
I mock at the pride of Greece and Rome;
And when I am stretched beneath the pines,
Where the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and pride of man,
At the sophist schools and the learned clan;
For what are they all in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?

—Emerson.

April 27, 1882.

"Take me home!" would our great man say,
As this earth was growing dim;
And lost in his own room he lay,
Where was no more home for him.
He was nearing his home 'mid the band
He has taught us to know so well,
Wand'ring on to the Silent Land
Where the heroes and sages dwell.

Alas for the vacant place,
Which no one else can fill!
Alas for his kindly face!

He's at home: 'tis we that wander still.

If there be one thing upon this earth that mankind love and admire better than another, it is a brave man: it is a man who dares to look the devil in the face, and tell him he is a devil.—James A. Garfield.

IMMORTALITY.

SOCRATES, BLAISE PASOAL, SHELLEY.

BY B. W. BALL.

It is a venerable aphorism of philosophy that "in the world there is nothing great but man, in man there is nothing great but mind." As a thing of consciousness, a complex sensation, the world really exists in the mind, and so is called the sensible world. What the world is as a pure non-ego outside of human sensibilities and consciousness and a mere "thing in itself," "no fellow," we are told, can find out. According to Wilkinson, the body is the mere perishable, phenomenal man, a passing cloud or show, while the real man is mind or spirit. "Our first conception of the human body," he says, "is that of a living subject. Life is the dim personality which animates it, as well as the atmosphere in which it moves and breathes. Upon this lowest floor of our existence there rises an edifice of many stories. Upon simple life, which is the vegetable in the animal, there is founded a life of life, which is mind. The mind is many-chambered and many-storied. Life dwells in the body; but the mind, or superior life, inhabits the head, or, according to anatomy, the brain. The brain, then, is presumably the body of the mind; and whatever is wisdom or faculty in the mind is furniture or machinery answering to faculty in the brain. And, as the mind is the man, the brain is his representative, or the man in another degree." This is the Swedenborgian statement of the relation of body and spirit as exhibited by man. The eye is the organ and symbol of intelligence, will, and feeling,—now flashing with indignation or flamed by reverie, now glistening with unspeakable affection or lit up by the fire of enthusiasm and supra-mortal determination, now radiant with smiles and mirth, and anon streaming with tears welling up from the deepest fountains of the sorrow-stricken heart. The blood, breath, and features of a living human being are all alive, not only with bodily life, but they are glowing and saturated with thought, will, and emotion. How eloquent is the blood in regard to the state of the feelings or emotions, flushing the cheek with crimson at the instance of anger or shame, and leaving it pallor-stricken under the influence of fright or panic! The bowels literally yearn with pity, the lungs heave with emotion, and the suspended breath is full of intensest thought: the morbid liver is the seat of melancholy, despair, world-weariness, and gloom. With our pulses regular, our respiration free and unimpeded, and all our vital organs in healthy operation, life is joy and happiness, and easily kindled into rapture. Such is the intimate interaction of spirit and organs, if we regard our nature as dualistic. But, even if mind differs toto caelo from matter as widely as consciousness differs from extension, it appears to sympathize with and partake of the body's fortunes, of its infantile weakness as well as of the vigor of its maturity, and at last of its decline and senility. The earliest recorded attempt to demonstrate the immortality of the thinking, sentient, conscious principle in man is that of Socrates in the famous Platonic dialogue, entitled the Phædo. It is needless to say that the talk on this subject of the old Athenian wise man is readable to this hour. But it is, of course, less conclusive than an attempted demonstration would be at this time of day, with all the physiological, psychological, and biological data which we possess. But, even for us, the doctrine of immortality is still undemonstrable. It is still with us a matter of faith, speculation, and hope, as it was with Socrates, rather than of scientific or positive demonstration. Socrates was pretty certain that his inner man, or self, would elude the undertaker, as he jocosely intimated by his reply to his friend Crito's inquiry as to his burial. He bade his friend not to be afflicted when he saw his body buried or cremated, as if he, the real Socrates, was undergoing that operation. Socrates maintains the doctrine of the soul's preëxistence before its present entanglement and alliance with corporeity. Before its birth into this life, he says, it led an ideal existence; so that ideas and principles, such as make us rational, intelligent, and reflective beings in our present life, are merely recollections and more or less dim reminiscences of our antenatal existence, which are revived in us here by the copies of ideas with which the world is filled.

All this, of course, is pure speculation, imagination, and Oriental tradition, which Plato probably picked up in Egypt or Mesopotamia or farther East, and put into the mouth of Socrates, the stay-at-home Athenian, whom he uses in part as a ventilator of his own thoughts and theories. But the coolness and tranquil assurance with which Socrates drank the fatal potion indicated at least that he was fully satisfied that, whatever destiny or lot awaited him in the hereafter, it would be all right. He went into the gulf of night, not only untroubled, but sublimely acquiescent in whatever fate awaited him, after the hemlock should have done its work upon his organization. His sublimely tranquil mood in the presence of death, with all his splendid intellectual faculties in full and even joyous activity, showed human nature at its best and noblest. Death had no sting for him, and was winning no victory over him. In the consciousness of an upright life, actuated and directed by the loftiest and most unselfish motives, he looked not only the here, but the hereafter in the face without quailing or blenching, but joyously, festively, with a humorous sally on his lips aimed at one of his friends, whom he bade to bury him in such manner as he pleased, if he could catch him. Socrates, being the most rational of men and thoroughly matter-of-fact, with all his sublime thoughts and theories, was of course not at all under the influence of a fanatical other-worldliness. For he enjoyed this present life and its good things with the most jovial of his contemporaries, such as Alcibiades, for instance. He could sit up all night, arguing and drinking wine, until pretty nearly all his boon companions and antagonists in discussion were sound asleep under the table. In the boundlessness of his rational and psychological or anthropological curiosity, Socrates probably welcomed death as an opportunity for exploring the great secret, the undiscovered country beyond this mortal stage of being, into which he had endeavored to send his thoughts all his life long. Socrates entertained contemptuous and ascetic notions in regard to the body, which a saner and riper physiological and biological knowledge finds so admirable as the organ of spirit. He regarded it as something altogether vile, the seat of animal appetites, appetencies and concupiscences, a lazarus-house quarantine, and obstruction to the spirit or soul, which was in itself a harmony not the result of the bodily organization, as its music is of the lyre, but a harmony which was hindered and jangled by its attempt to express itself through such a vile instrument as the body.

"Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it."

These lines of Shakspeare are a Socratic statement in regard to body and soul. Thinking so contemptuously of the body, Socrates hailed death as an emancipation from thralldom to it, and a restoration of the soul to the pure ideal life once more, from which it had been exiled into this world. Thus, the asceticism and spiritualism of Christianity are older than Christianity, old as Greek philosophy, and thousands of years older than the earliest Greek philosopher. The death of Socrates was more inspiring than his argument. It was so altogether admirable and memorable that it remains to this day the model death. He died like a thoroughly self-possessed, noble, brave, high-souled man, and philosopher, if you please. Rousseau's flourish about his dying like a philosopher while Jesus Christ died like a God is simply ridiculous, and without meaning or point; while it was intended to be remarkable for both. If he failed to show that his expectations of a continuance of his conscious existence after death were more than merely speculative, traditional, and conjectural, he showed by his death a sublime acquiescence in the order of nature, and a confidence that all would be well with the man who had led a life in accord with the dictates of his higher reason. For what difference do our creeds, opinions, beliefs, and theories make in the event which follows death, or in the fate which awaits us in that undiscovered country, from which there are no returning tracks (vestigia retrorsum) visible? Our lot is foredetermined, whatever it may be, whether it is a lapse into unconsciousness and insentience, or a continuance of our conscious existence in a new environment. Socrates died equal to either fate, but hopeful that he had a career before him in the hereafter, indeed more than hopeful, for he affirmed that "the soul is immortal." On this subject of immortality, Emerson thinks all sound minds rest on a certain preliminary conviction; namely, that, if it be best that conscious personal life shall continue, it will continue: if not, then it will not. Had Socrates been a younger man, it would have been his duty to have availed himself of the facilities of escape from prison which his friends had arranged for him rather than submit to the infamous sentence of the Athenian authorities, which was prompted by malignity, bigotry, and superstition, in equal parts. Socrates, of course, was fully imbued with the old Greek idea of the sanctity of the city or State, to which every citizen was bound to be obedient and loyal to the sufferance of outrage and injustice even at its hands, and the sacrifice of his life, when the State demanded it.

In coming down from Socrates to Blaise Pascal, from several centuries before the Christian era to the seventeenth century of that era, we pass from a consideration of the wisest and most spiritually keensighted of the men of the pagan foreworld to the most brilliant, piercing, apprehensive, and comprehensive of modern intellects, who was moralist, metaphysician, mathematician, inventor, and scientist, all in one. The first chapter of the Thoughts of Pascal, like the Phædo of Plato, is devoted to a consideration of the immortality of the soul, not in a rational spirit, but in the spirit of a narrow, atrabiliar, gloomy, cowardly, religious bigotry and dogmatism, altogether unworthy of the author of the Provincial Letters. Were Blaise Pascal living to-day, he would be in the front ranks of the foremost champions, fighting in the war of liberation of humanity. He would be the world's leader in the domain of science and rationalism. But, alas! he lived in an age of blind faith, bigotry, priestism, torture-wheels, monkery, and unquestioning submission to kings and hierarchies. With his disordered nerves and intense susceptibilities, his mind was fatally infected and darkened by the gloomy and narrow theological spirit of his time. Now and then, in his Thoughts, his genius breaks forth with startling and meritorious fulgence; but, for the most part, they are the utterances of a fanatical, blind, and hypochondriacal faith in the creed of Latin Christianity. He writes on the subject of a future existence, as if we had our fate in our hands, and could be guilty of "negligence in an affair wherein the question is concerning ourselves, our eternity, and our all," as if we were not foregone conclusions, bound to appear here at a certain place and time in accordance with the course of things and events, as every grain of sand occupies a certain position on the seashore, because all the forces of the universe conspired to place it exactly there and nowhere else! In like manner, we each of us are what and when and where we are in character, space, and time, by the whole pressure and tendency of our antecedents. "It is not necessary to have a very elevated soul," says Pascal, in some observations "against the indifference of the atheists," "in order to comprehend that there is here no true and solid enjoyment, that all our pleasures are but vanity, that our ills are infinite; and, in fine, that death, which threatens us every instant, must in a few years infallibly reduce us to the horrible necessity of eternal annihilation or misery." This is an ebullition of hypochondria and religious melancholy, of diseased nerves and a diseased liver, which cannot be mistaken. Death is a law of nature, for which we are not responsible at all. Had Pascal been healthy or of a vigorous, nervous organization, or had he lived in a later and untheological age, he would have found solid enjoyment here in the exercise of his unparalleled inventive and scientific and reflective genius, and would not have been the wretched other-worldling which he was.

Shelley, the most spiritual, unworldly, and noblest of poets, was inexpressibly sad all through his brief life, because he found the alleged continuance of conscious existence after death not only undemonstrable, but, in such intellectual light as he enjoyed, improbable. Shelley had in him the raw material, so to speak, of an almost unequalled metaphysician and psychologist. In his case, in the partnership of soul and body, the body was of little account. He came as near to living that ideal life which Socrates claimed to have been our antenatal manner of existence as any human being ever did. He was in fact a free-thoughted, pantheistic mystic. His organization was too sensitive and susceptible to make it possible for him to exhibit the philosophic tranquillity of Socrates in the prospect of death; and the very sensitiveness and susceptibility of his nerves to all the impulses and vibrations "of this so lovely world," as he calls it, made existence an unspeakably thrilling and delicious draught to him, which he deemed it almost an exhibition of malice on the part of creative power to withdraw from his lips. In his essay "On a Future State," Shelley says, "The natural philosopher, in addition to the sensations common to all men inspired by the event of death, believes that he sees with more certainty that it is attended with the annihilation of sentiment and thought. He observes the mental powers increase and fade with those of the body, and even accommodate themselves to the most transitory changes of our physical nature. Sleep suspends many of the faculties of the vital and intellectual principle, drunkenness and disease will either temporarily or permanently derange them. Madness or idiocy may utterly extinguish the most excellent and delicate of these powers. In old age, the mind gradually withers; and, as it grew and was strengthened with the body, so does it together with the body sink into decrepitude. - Assuredly, these are convincing evidences that, so soon as the organs of the body are subjected to the laws of inanimate matter, sensation and perception and apprehension are at an end." In concluding his essay, Shelley says, "This desire to be forever as we are, the reluctance to a violent and an unexperienced change, which is common to all the animated and inanimate combinations of the universe, is indeed the secret persuasion which has given birth to the opinions of a future state." But our dream experiences were ground for primitive mankind deeming that there is somewhat in us which is self-subsisting and independent of the body, and capable of ranging at large, when the body sleeps, and of therefore living an incorporeal ideal life. But Shelley yielded with reluctance to the verdict of his senses and reason in the matter of death. He did not acquiesce in annihilation like Professor Clifford and Miss Martineau. In his "Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude," he exclaims

"Oh that God, Profuse of poison, would concede the chalice" of immortality; and, further along in the same poem, he again exclaims,—

"Oh that the dream
Of dark magician in his visioned cave,
Raking the cinders of a crucible
For life and power, even when his feeble hand
Shakes in its last decay, were the true law
Of this so lovely world!"

The closing lines of this poem of "Alastor" are full of the melancholy of his conviction that death is the extinction of intelligence and sensation. He says,—

"It is a woe too deep for tears, when all
Is reft at once, when some surpassing spirit,
Whose light adorned the world around it, leaves
Those who remain behind, nor sob nor groans,
The passionate tumult of a clinging hope;
But pale despair and cold tranquillity,
Nature's vast frame,—the web of human things, Birth and the grave, that are not as they were."

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CRITICISM.

CHICAGO, April 13, 1882.

Editors of The Index :—

I value The Index so highly, and the principles for which it stands, that it seems the greater pity whenever I detect anything in its columns which is at variance with those principles. I confess that it is with mingled feelings of amusement and regret, in which the latter predominate, that I have just read, in your issue of April 9, the reply you make to an inquiring subscriber asking you to name some periodical adapted to the needs of the children of a liberal household. You say in that reply, "There is no juvenile paper distinctly antichristian or distinctively free thought in its teachings." It is the assumption, not the conclusion, expressed in the above, against which I desire to enter my little protest.

Since when have the words "antichristian" and "free thought" become interchangeable terms? What warrant have we either in logic or history for making one of these terms synonymous with the other? How free is any boasted free thinker who still cherishes a hostile attitude toward any one of the great historic religions of the world, whether it be Buddhistic, Mohammedan, or Christian?

Now, I do not care to enter into the old quarrel concerning the especial value and merit of that body of faith and doctrine known as "Christian," still less do I desire to take part in any wordy combat over the use and desirability of retaining the old name and terms of the Christian nomenclature. But, lest I should be misunderstood, I may say in connection with this latter point that, for myself, I desire neither to cover my sins, emblazon my virtues, nor veil my heresies with the word "Christian." For reasons sufficient for the present at least, to my own understanding, I prefer to define myself, if define I must, with some simpler term, less liable to misconception, and less capable of being put to ambiguous uses. But the theory of The Index seems to be that because the word "Christian" no longer satisfies the needs, as a term defining their own growing and widening faith, of a large class of thinking people, it therefore has no legitimate place in the dictionary or the history of human speech and affection.

And Christianity itself, that vast system of religious creed, dogma, and protest, whose history, bloody and full of dark deeds as it often is, is yet the record of a constant struggle and striving for the better way,—Christianity, which must ever be reckoned as one of the prime factors of our civilization,—surely The Index does not number itself among those superficial critics whose hopeless and unbecoming task it is to undervalue and decry that great movement which had Jesus for its founder, and men like Savonarola, Luther, Wesley, Priestley, Channing, Parker, and Abbot even, to mark the steps of its progress.

Understand me, friend Index. Far be it from me to claim that every good and great thing of the past, present, and future, has been or is to be accomplished through the influence of Christianity. I have as little sympathy with those fond and slavish adorers of the word, who would make it synonymous with illimitable wisdom and progress, as I have with those who regard it as a term expressive only of the excessive cruelties and superstitions which have been practised in its name. I desire only to ask whether—after granting all the worth and noble meaning which the comparative study of religion has discovered in far-off systems like those of the Indian saint and the Persian fire-worshippers—our own may not possess some merit also, may not indeed have some special claim on our love and esteem? It is not considered a weakness, but rather the sign of natural feeling, that one should love one's own grandmother a little more than one's neighbor's. She may have plenty of faults, and be on the whole a very cranky and whimsical old lady; but it is for her we reserve the warm place by the fireside, and teach the children to pay due honor and respect. She is the dearest old lady in the world, not because her smile is the sweetest, her eye the brightest, her cap and kerchief the neatest of all the rest of the grandmothers of the neighborhood,—often a close and disinterested observation convinces us that this is not strictly the case,—she is the dearest grandmother in the world just because she is ours. And this love and pride in our very own is one of the most helpful and beautiful sentiments of the human heart. And the same feeling which leads us to love our own parents and children, brothers and sisters, more than anybody's else, prompts us to regard our own Bible and the religion of our fathers with a shade more of respect and veneration than those of the dusky tribes of Asia. So just as I love my own country a little better than any other, notwithstanding the labors of certain political philosophers to convince us that England is much better governed than we are, as I love the house and home wherein I played in childhood better than any other, so it must ever be with feelings of peculiar interest and affection that I read the legends of the Hebrew Scriptures, the stories of Saul and David and the wicked wise man,—very different from the cool and critical spirit with which I come to the reading of the Vedas or the Koran, both of which, to be quite honest, I find a little—dull.

With this feeling of loyalty and good-will toward the past,—loyalty of the kind that has learned to discriminate and judge, such as the son, himself a mature man, pays his aged mother,—it is impossible not to be sensible of a feeling of pain and aversion toward that spirit of reactive hatred and mischief-making implied in the little prefix anti. Some things there are in the world well worth hating. Slavery was one. And the term "an anti-slavery man" changed from one of reproach to honor. But, dear Index, it is for you to teach us better than to cultivate this spirit of hatred, of narrow, hostile criticism in the discussion of themes which require as much calmness as breadth of judgment to decide fairly. Teach us better than to aspire toward any such dishonorable title as "anti-christian."

LAND AND LABOR REFORM.

Editors of The Index:—

For upwards of five years, I have been a regular subscriber to The Index, and during the first two I was an occasional contributor of articles upon the Labor Question and other topics, being at that period resident in America. I have thus some acquaintance with America and the Americans; and I know that the public affairs of England are not without interest for them, the more liberal-minded of both countries having long since, in the words of the immortal Colonel Sellers, shaken hands across the bloody chasm. Questions affecting Ireland, again, have of course a peculiar and direct interest for the American public.

Encouraged by these considerations, I am sending you a pamphlet of mine upon the land question of England and of Ireland, concerning which, as you know, there has been, and is likely to be, so much stir.

Your entertaining correspondent, William Clarke, appears to have a good knowledge of English opinion and of the English rural districts, but on one point I suspect that I must have failed to catch his meaning. He seems to represent that there is a party favoring the nationalization of the land, meaning thereby the equal subdivision of it among the people either in lots or by some such easy process. Surely, this must be an error. Otherwise, I shall be obliged to relinquish the conceit, which I have cherished hitherto, of belonging to a nation of practical men; for never, I will answer for it, did disciple of Saint-Simon or Proudhon, as hero of the Parisian barricades of '30 or of '48, conceive project more wildly or fantastically impracticable than would be such a one. Such a scheme would be unfit for any country, either actual or imaginable; but, in the England of to-day, the land of the cotton industry and of the black country, the Liverpool docks and Lombard Street, it would attain a climax of extravagance. Any one who may favor me so far as to peruse my pamphlet will see that the nationalization of the land, as it assumes shape in sober minds, is, to say the least of it, a project less evidently chimerical.

However, this is a question rather for new countries than for old ones, because in the latter the great difficulty of it cannot be denied; and, besides, the difficulty might prove just as great now as at a future period. Whereas, where the public lands are still extensive, measures could be taken now with comparative facility which in fifty years' time would probably be difficult or impossible of execution. If any change is to be made in the systems of the settlements and sales of land in your Western States and Territories or in the concessions of enormous grants of land upon easy terms to the railroad companies, no time is to be lost. And, certainly, it seems to me that economists of what we in England call the orthodox school—that is to say, the disciples of Ricardo and Say—ought to be among the first to protest against an inconsiderable and lavish creation of property, since, clearly, nothing can so much tend to interfere with that inviolability of it, on the importance of which they so justly insist. It will be an ill day for America if the land through injudicious laws should become too much monopolized, and that then that tremendous and fearful proletariat, conducted by able leaders, should raise the cry of land and liberty. Such has been the usual cause of popular upheavals both in modern and in ancient history.

In regard to Ireland, I will but say that I have been a little happy, since, while writing the articles of which my pamphlet consists at pretty long intervals during the Parnellite agitation, and again after the bill of last year became law, I have never wanted to take back my words, but am now able to indorse them all. That all the worst evils from which Ireland suffers—her famines periodically recurring, her defective husbandry, and the improvidence and disaffection of her people—directly and necessarily result from the maintenance in her of a territorial aristocracy of alien blood, and that the removal, root and branch, of that unnatural and barbarous institution is the one sole panacea for all her woes,—such has been for long past and such remains my deliberate conviction. Mr. Gladstone's bill, if it works, will eventually effectuate this, and no other. I desire to see it have a chance, notwithstanding that the measure admits of no defence upon strict grounds of equity. It was in fact a compromise involving a clean sacrifice of principle, and the opposition to it of all extreme and of all logical politicians was a foregone conclusion.

The anti-English movement in Ireland is and always was, before and above all things, a nationalist movement; and to this Lord Derby himself, Tory and economist, bears testimony. Now, is it safe, or even very possible, to ignore these motives? Lord Derby, a cool judge, thinks not; and I certainly indorse him. The present troubles in the Austrian empire and General Skobelev's appeal to the Slavs furnish a still fresh illustration of the futility of trying to ignore the natural attachment of race and the principle of nationalities, and dealing with human beings like chessmen.

During the Parnellite agitation, the Times said that race had nothing to do with the anti-rent movement. During the American Civil War, the same journal said that slavery had nothing to do with the American Civil War. I love to pay compliments, and I will say that nothing could be more appropriate than that those two judgments should have come from the same arbiter.

WISCONSIN CHARITABLE WORK.

MILWAUKEE, April 10, 1882.

Editors of The Index:—

With readiness, I accepted the invitation of the President and Secretary of the Wisconsin State Board of Charities and Reforms to attend the second annual meeting of the conference of charities, held at Madison, Feb. 7-9, 1882.

The programme included reports, papers, addresses, and discussions upon the following topics: "pauperism, State school for dependent children, industrial schools, private charitable institutions, duties of superintendents of the poor, duties of overseers of poor-houses and their wives, hospitals and hospital cases in poor-houses, prisons, and reformatories, jail management, prison labor, indeterminate sentences, vagrancy, insanity, outdoor relief, and charitable work for women."

So wide a range of subjects gave opportunity to advance many and varied opinions; but in the treatment of each topic there was a noticeable indication of new departures toward real reformatory work, based upon broad and humane ideas.

The problems of pauperism and vagrancy and the care of dependent children and the insane received a large share of the attention of the conference.

The number of women represented in the conference, as engaged in charitable and reformatory work, was also noticeable; and their varied experiences and thoughtful suggestions added value to the discussions. Mrs. Wm. P. Lynde, who has been foremost in active charitable and reformatory work in Wisconsin, argued eloquently for some wise reforms, imperative in industrial schools; and Mrs. Mary Rockwell, superintendent of the Milwaukee Industrial School for girls, read an effective paper on women's prisons and girls' reformatories, concluding with an eloquent and a sensible appeal for the establishment of training schools for teachers to engage in these institutions. Mrs. E. B. Fairbanks, a member of the State Board of Charities and Reforms, reported the numerous activities of the women of Wisconsin in charitable work.

More noticeable still to me than these, because unexpected, was the presence of the wives of the overseers of the poor, who with extremely modest demeanor set forth the value of woman's effort in the reforms of many abuses long existing in the management of poor-houses. These women demonstrated throughout the discussion the beneficial influence of manual exercise, especially upon the insane paupers. They evinced a knowledge of domestic sanitation, and urged the importance of attention to the provision of wholesome food, pure air, and cleanly habits, as primary helps to a healthier moral condition. When I afterwards read in the annual report of the State Board of Charities that the Walworth County poor-house was "the best institution for the chronic insane in the State, in the two essentials of occupation and restraint," I was inclined to give the greater share of the credit to Mrs. Dunlap, who, though all unused to public speaking and modestly hesitating to say a word of self-praise, convinced her listeners that at her home, among the poor unfortunates under her charge, she was eloquent in efficient work and unhesitating in the administration of wholesome laws.

The care of little children committed to poor-houses was very touchingly treated by one of the humane overseers, who brought the tears to many eyes by his simple, unaffected story of his methods of management in this department of his work. The humanitarian spirit manifested in these reports and discussions tells powerfully of the true progressive spirit of this age, and marks Wisconsin as one of the leading States in reformatory work.

In the line of this work, the Associated Charities of Milwaukee holds a prominent place. The objects of this association are to secure the coöperation of the different charities, in practical measures, for the prevention of pauperism, the promotion of thrift, and the more certain relief of the worthy poor, to prevent indiscriminate almsgiving, and to detect imposture by making work the basis of all relief to the able-bodied. The association has adopted the motto, "Not Alms, but a Friend." The constitution and plan of work outlined are embodied in a pamphlet which has been generally circulated in the city. The officers and membership represent the philanthropic and intelligent element of Milwaukee, and from the association we may reasonably expect efficient effort in this best of schemes yet devised for the detection of imposture and the relief of real distress.

Preparations for the ninth annual session of the National Conference of Charities and Correction, that is to be held at Madison, beginning Aug. 7, 1882, are now complete. The conference will continue in session five days, and invitations have been extended to prominent humanitarians throughout the country. The published programme covers the discussion of all important points in charitable work, together with reports of work from the New England and Middle States.

A visit to the Industrial School at Waukesha by a special train and one evening session in Milwaukee are included in the programme. The objects of this conference will interest the readers of The Index, as they are so intimately associated with sociological science. It invites the attendance of all interested, and Madison also invites at a season when the summer beauty of the capital city—a gem in its setting of four of Wisconsin's finest lakes—can scarcely be surpassed.

In connection with the subject of charities and reforms, mention should not be omitted of two notable bills introduced into the legislature the past winter: the bill for the establishment of a State school for dependent children; and the bill to provide for the education of deaf mute children by school boards, with limited State aid, proposing to make this education a part of the public school system of the State.

Both bills, unfortunately, were lost; but each was ably defended by well-known philanthropists and educators. Rev. G. E. Gordon persistently pressed the importance of the first of these bills before the joint committee on claims, and one of his able arguments has been published. "The safety of civilization," he says, "lies in the care of the neglected youth; and a great crime is committed when children are, for no offence at all, placed in reform schools. Yet scores of tender girls, who never thought of doing wrong, have been thrust into the association of the viciously inclined. In the reform schools of this State, at the present time, there are about two hundred and fifty children who have never committed any crime. It is to the nurture of destitute and neglected children that all the best genius in legislation and philanthropy, state-craft and statesmanship, should be directed. The problems of crime, pauperism, and insanity are upon us all. They baffle us. We take hold of these problems at the large end,—that is the trouble."

These forcible arguments and the persistent efforts of this gentleman, who stands at the front of all our philanthropic reforms, availed nothing however, through the short-sighted economical notions of our legislators.

The second bill was equally well supported by Robert C. Spencer, who is known to Index readers, and James McAllister, Superintendent of the Public Schools of Milwaukee. Its claims to support are well founded on considerations of efficiency, economy, and humanity; but the same short-sightedness and unwillingness to promote any innovations and get out of the grooves of charitable work obtained in the legislature. These, with many other eminently progressive reforms, are doomed to wait. They can only be carried when our legislature shall be educated in the science of sociology and are taught the true meaning of economy.

"WHAT ARE BRAINS FOR?"

Editors of The Index:—

While looking over the Herald the other morning, my attention was arrested by the words, "What are Brains for?" and, following the report, I found it was a synopsis of Mr. M. J. Savage's discourse of the previous Sunday. Being somewhat interested in psychophysiological matters, I was curious to see what answer Mr. Savage would give to the important question he had propounded.

He deigned the comprehensive and indisputable answer, "Brains are for use," from which of course there is no appeal. He asks: "What is the object of thought and study, and why are we born with brains? . . . Why do we have the power of thought? What is it all for?"

These inquiries would seem to indicate that Mr. Savage suspects some connection, mysterious, no doubt, between brain and thought. He tells us, "All thinking, all study of every kind, and in every department of human life,—all is for the sake of forming opinions: we have opinions for the sake of action," and, "ultimately, a man is what he thinks." And this is as near as Mr. Savage dares, or deigns, to answer his own inquiry, "What are brains for?"

But, suppose he had called in a physiologist, what would the answer have been? What do Bain and Huxley and Carpenter and Draper say? Bain tells us that "the most careful and studied observations of physiologists have shown beyond question that the brain as a whole is indispensable to thought, feeling, and volition." Dr. Ferrier says: "The brain is the organ of mind, and that mental operations are possible only in and through it. This fact," says he, "is so well established that we may start from it as we should from any ultimate fact."

And Professor Virchow, of Berlin, says: "Every one must admit that without a brain, nay, more, without a good and well-developed brain, the human mind has no existence. Man has a mind and rational will only in as much and in so far as he possesses a brain." Huxley says: "What we call the operations of the mind are functions of the brain, and the materials of consciousness are products of cerebral activity. Sensations are products of the inherent properties of the thinking organ." Tyndall says: "We believe that every thought and every feeling has its definite mechanical correlative in the nervous system; that it is accompanied by a certain separation and remanifestation of the atoms of the brain." Dr. Maudsley says: "I do not go beyond what facts warrant, when I say that, when a thought occurs in the mind, there necessarily occurs a correlative change in the gray matter of the brain. Without it, the thought could not arise, with it, it cannot fail to arise."

I could easily continue these quotations from men of equal standing to those already quoted,—Carpenter, Draper, Dalton, and Flint, Bernard Du Bois-Reymond, and Haeckel, with all the hosts of physiologists throughout Europe and America,—and not an exception would be found. And, while we are on this subject of testimony, I cannot help wondering who are the men whom Mr. Savage designates as "the best modern thinkers," who believe that "the only real things in existence are mind and God."

Dr. McCosh stands high among his fellows as a great thinker, I believe. He tells us that "the supernatural system is higher than the natural, but is in accordance with it. The higher joins on to the lower beautifully and quite as fittingly as vegetable life superinduces itself on inanimate nature, and as animal life follows vegetable and the soul fits into the body. The supernatural is not inconsistent with the natural: it is the complement of it. The higher world overarches the lower world, as the sky does the earth. The world to come consummates what is begun in the present world, provides a place for the immortal soul, and for the body raised to join it."

Now, no one would be able to deny that this sort of writing shows power to think. But what does it amount to? There is not a vestige of reality nor a provable statement in it. It is pure and simple fancy, "stellar politics." And this all arises because the prefix "super" happens to be applicable to certain words, giving them additional weight. Super means "above, beyond, or in excess of." But to talk of anything being to us superior to nature is the height of absurdity. Our highest and only source of knowledge is nature and her laws. And super, when affixed to Truth, is just as absurd. Truth is that which is true, right, honest. Can anything be more or in excess of such truth? This, however, passes with some people as great thinking.

Dr. Bowen, of Harvard, is another most wonderful thinker. But, when he tells you that men can carry on all their intellectual operations as well asleep as when awake, you cannot help doubting the correctness of what he says. And yet he is a great thinker.

It is not mere thinking that is of value. It is the quality, the kind of thought, which makes it valuable or valueless. Valuable thinking is such as is based on facts of observation. Two and two make four every time; and any pretended fact clashing with this we may set down as doubtful, if not untrue. Uncertain as some of our knowledge is, we yet know something, which we must never let go as long as the world is what it is. We have boats and ships which can conveniently sail round our harbor; but, so long as the law of gravity remains what it is, our post-office is not likely to do so.

Matter exists, notwithstanding the intricacies of metaphysical word-juggling. Mind and God are but a small portion of what the universe contains. We know iron, for instance, has qualities of weight and strength and hardness; that coal has qualities peculiar to itself; that water behaves, under certain conditions, in a manner peculiar to itself,—it freezes at a certain temperature and goes into steam at another. We have also peculiarities of composition and construction in our own bodily organism. We have what we call "organic organs,"—stomach and heart, liver and lungs, each with special qualities and functions. And our organs of special sense,—the eye, the ear, the touch, and taste, and smell,—all have their peculiarities of arrangement and purpose. And last of all, and above all, comes the nervous system with its infinite variety of construction and its incomprehensible composition,—fibres by the million, with mysterious and interminable ramifications; cells by the million, in various shades and shapes and sizes, hidden in the strongest rampart of the body,—the skull. And probably on this account it has longer eluded the examination of the investigator and the dissector.

Its turn, however, has come at last; and probings and searchings and experiments have been applied, and some of its mysterious qualities and functions have been ascertained. Facts have been disclosed proving that, while the brain is a bodily organ, it is also the organ for functioning, or producing, mind. We have just as much certainty that the brain evolves thought as we have that the larynx produces voice or that the stomach digests the food.

As Mr. Savage has, for some reason, omitted to answer his own plain question, I have volunteered, unsolicited, to do it for him. And the names I have quoted in support of the statement will doubtless be a sufficient guarantee for the correctness of the assertion that "brains are to think with," and that without brains "mind and God" are not.

THE SUNDAY FREETHOUGHT PLATFORM IN AUSTRALIA.

By the last mail from Australia, I have received a clipping from the Sydney Daily Telegraph, of February 16, giving particulars from the Melbourne Age of recent developments of the struggle between the Liberals and the government relative to the Sunday free-thought platform. I enclose the extract, in hopes that you will find space for its insertion. All who are true-hearted in the cause of freedom in the colony will have the opportunity at this juncture of upholding the hands of those who are fighting against oppression.

SALT LAKE CITY.

[The article alluded to above states that "the lessees of the Opera House, Melbourne, received a notification from the chief secretary of Victoria, intimating that, if the theatre was opened on Sunday for the purpose of lectures where charges for admission were made, the license would be immediately cancelled. Mr. Walker, who uses the theatre for the purpose of giving what are known as free-thought lectures on Sunday evenings, was at once informed that he could no longer be allowed to have it, and a notice was posted on the doors intimating that Mr. Walker would deliver his usual lecture at the Horticultural Hall. Long before the hour appointed, the hall was densely crowded, about four thousand persons being present, in addition to a large number outside. Mr. Walker, after explaining the reasons for the non-delivery of his lecture at the Opera House, said that he had been informed by the under-secretary that Sir Bryan O'Loughlin had instigated his ejection from the theatre. It was well known that Sir Bryan O'Loughlin was the catspaw of the Roman Catholic Church. . . . He had found that on the 14th of March last, at the opening of Saint Patrick's Cathedral new organ, an advertisement had appeared to the effect that 5s., 3s., and 2s., would be charged for admission to the various parts of the church. He had never charged for admission. He had collections to pay the expenses, and the church did the same thing. . . . The action the government had taken would probably be a good thing, because it would bring them more into prominence. They would in future act on the offensive. . . . A resolution was then proposed, expressing indignation at the action of the government, and that a meeting should be held at the Town Hall during the week for the purpose of more freely discussing the matter."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE truth is that before the publication of the Origin of Species there was no opinion whatever current respecting the subject that deserved to be called a scientific hypothesis. That the higher forms of life must have come by some process of development from simpler forms was in itself a sensible—perhaps the only sensible—view to take of the subject; but there is nothing properly scientific in a vague general opinion of this sort. A scientific hypothesis must allege a true cause whereby to account for a group of phenomena. Before 1859, no one had suggested a true cause for the origination of new species, but the problem was one over which every naturalist had puzzled since the beginning of the century. Hence the completeness and swiftness of Mr. Darwin's success. But Mr. Darwin's originality was as complete as his success, and it embraced the entire scientific conception of the development theory. He did even more than allege a vera causa in natural selection. He was the first to marshal the arguments from classification, embryology, morphology, and distribution, and thus fairly to establish the fact that there has been a derivation of higher forms from lower; and he was also the first to point out the modus operandi of the change. The first of these achievements by itself would have entitled him to associate his name with the development theory, but by the second the triumph of the theory was practically assured. . . . There can be little doubt that Mr. Darwin's name will go down in history as that of the greatest scientific inquirer and the most pregnant scientific thinker that has lived since Newton. Since the beginnings of modern learning, probably no single idea has wrought upon the minds of men with such rich and manifold results as the idea of "natural selection." And it is evident that what we have already seen is but an earnest of vastly more that is to come.—The Nation.

At a celebration of the centenary of Irish independence in Baltimore, April 19, Judge Jeremiah S. Black gave an address in which, referring to the condition of Ireland, he said: "The present trouble is directly caused by the unnatural relations existing between the millions who cultivate the soil and the landlords, small in number, who snatch away the fruits of it as soon as gathered. This domination of the few over the many was established and had its origin in robbery. The Irish were the owners in full of the land which they now cultivate only for the benefit of their oppressors. The first conquerors unceremoniously appropriated the property. A forcible entry was held to be a good title; and the original owner was supposed to have lost his right, because he was not strong enough to keep it. But the whole island was confiscated again and again before it got into hands rapacious and loyal enough to suit England. Then, the landlord system went into full operation. The mass of the people were tenants; and every tenant was a slave,—if it be true, as it certainly is, that the essence of slavery consists in making one man labor while another takes his earnings. A lease was a mortgage of the tenant's life. It compelled him to work incessantly, with every limb stretched and every muscle swelled, for 'the bit and the drop,'—the smallest quantity of food that he and his children could live on,—with a thatched roof above them and a little turf on the hearthstone. Often, they did not get that. A month's sickness reduced them to hopeless want; and, if a crop failed, starvation carried them off by the thousand. Such has been the operation of the system, such it is at the present moment, and the English government is doing all it can to perpetuate it. Concede that these landlords have a title which cannot now be questioned, assume that an owner of property may rent it on the hardest terms, still the existence of that gigantic monopoly, clothed with the privilege of desolating a country and starving the industry of a people, is the saddest fact in the history of the human race."

BOOK NOTICES.

BELIEFS ABOUT MAN. By M. J. Savage. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1882.

This book contains strong meat. It is not adapted to babes in religious thought. People in whose religion sentiment is the main thing will not like it. Nor will it be liked by people who are very old-fashioned in their theology,—those, for instance, who adhere to the Andover creed. But, to all persons who admit the idea of progress in theology and who like to find thought in sermons the book will be good diet. It is intended as a companion volume to Belief in God, by the same author, published a year ago. The two give a very complete idea of Mr. Savage's theological position. Beliefs about Man is made up of nine discourses, which treat the various religious questions concerning man according to the gospel—not of the New Testament, but of evolution. They are all thoughtful, as is everything that Mr. Savage writes; and they demand thought in the reader. They do not make the usual appeals expected in sermons to the emotions or the imagination. They close as they begin with addressing the logical understanding. Yet they are not void of fitting illustration, nor do they fail to give occasional glimpses of that vein of poetry which runs through Mr. Savage's mental temperament.

The discourses do not impress us as equal in strength. Two or three of them seem fragmentary: the last one, on the question of immortality, perhaps had to be; and here and there the logic appears to falter, which is the more noticeable, since in general the course of argument is severely logical. "The Law of Progress" and "The Earthly Outlook" are the two that have attracted us most by the sweep and suggestiveness of their thought. And the two to which the writer of this notice would most demur are those which discuss "Motive Forces" and the question "Is man Free?" Mr. Savage denies "free will" to man. He does not, however, accept the old theological doctrine of predestination. He calls his view "the scientific doctrine of necessity." The gist of it is that man's will is not an independent, self-acting faculty, but is determined by motives. But suppose we adopt the distinction which Mr. Savage himself makes, that it is not the will as an independent faculty that decides, but the whole man that decides. The mental nature of man entertains, considers, weighs a great number of motives, and finally chooses among them those upon which it will act. It may resolve to attend to one set of motives rather than another, making this resolve from the general motive that such a course will be according to the highest right or will result in the greatest benefit. And in this choice between motives consists man's moral freedom, and not in any whimsical power of will to act from no motive at all. Now, Mr. Savage appears to believe that man has this choice. Else what does he mean by inculcating "a wise and powerful self-control," or by such a sentence as this: "There needs only that I develop an ability to hold myself in check, to look out over the world and to choose this or that; to know what is best, and fix upon that"? Indeed, if we understand Mr. Savage's unfoldment of his view, taking these two discourses together, what he calls "the scientific doctrine of necessity" we should call "the scientific doctrine of moral freedom." We demur again to making even a "wise selfishness" the root or a root of morality. We do not believe that morality begins until man rises high enough in intelligence to see beyond all his own self-interests, bad or good, and to recognize that under the same conditions his neighbor has the same rights which he himself has, and that it is due to that neighbor that he should yield to him those rights simply because they are his, and not because he expects a selfish return for yielding them.

But whether we agree with or reject Mr. Savage's views, we always find him robustly healthful and provocative of thought.

THE PETTIBONE NAME. By Margaret Sidney. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co., 32 Franklin Street.

This is a pleasant story of the self-sacrifice of a charming old maid for the sake of the family name. It never grows wearisome, though it has rather too much of the regulation Sunday-school literature tone about it to suit the taste of to-day.

BABY-LAND for May comes a little late from its publishers, D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, but is none the less bright and interesting on that account. On looking over such magazines as this, the longing to "be a child again," so as to enjoy these periodicals, becomes very strong indeed.

OUR LITTLE ONES for May, from the Russell Publishing Company, 149 A Tremont Street, Boston, is at hand; and its array of reading matter and illustrations for whom it is named is, if anything, more than usually appropriate and satisfactory.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. DARWIN had announced his intention of paying a prolonged visit to this country during the approaching autumn.

JAMES RICE, the author of a number of popular novels, several of them written in conjunction with Walter Besant, died recently in England.

JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY, poet and editor of the Boston Pilot, is to deliver a poem at the reunion of the Army of the Potomac in Detroit next June.

SUNDAY morning, May 7, Mr. J. K. Applebee will speak at Parker Memorial on "Emerson, the Poet," and the Sunday following on "Emerson, the Thinker."

ALL the evils of Guiteau's pistol-shot are not yet exhausted. We are threatened with lectures about him from Mr. and Mrs. Scoville, his brother-in-law and sister.

PROF. E. RAY LANCASTER, F.R.S., has been appointed to the Chair of Natural History in the University of Edinburgh, in succession to the late Sir C. Wyville Thomson.

GEORGE R. GRAHAM, founder and editor of Graham's Magazine, of Philadelphia, is now, in his old age, an inmate of a Newark, N.J., hospital. His health is very poor, and he is in indigent circumstances.

THE King of Siam, though less than thirty years old, is said to be one of the most enlightened and progressive monarchs now living, and, though a pronounced Buddhist, is extremely liberal toward all other faiths.

DR. WHITFIELD WINSEY, a colored physician, who was a few days ago blackballed by a medical society in Baltimore, has just been elected a member of a medical and surgical faculty there, a distinguished and more exclusive body.

COL. FRED BURNABY, whose Ride to Khiva and other books of daring adventure have made him so well and so favorably known, tried a new venture the other day. He crossed the English Channel by balloon, alone, leaving Dover, Eng., at 10.35 A.M., and arriving at a point eighteen miles beyond Dieppe late in the afternoon.

A MEMORIAL statue of Robert G. Shaw, the gallant young Colonel of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts (colored) Regiment, is to be erected on the State House grounds in this city as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made by the committee in charge of the project. He was killed at the head of his regiment in the assault on Fort Wagner in 1863, and as the Southerners tauntingly said was there "buried with his niggers."

MRS. ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, of Florence, Mass., gave a lecture before the Moral Education Association in Wesleyan Hall, Tuesday afternoon of last week, on "The Abandoned Class," in which she treated a tabooed subject in a very refined, earnest, scientific, and practical manner. She is herself so dainty and charming in appearance and manner that she is always sure to win the attention and interest of her audience, whatever her subject; but her subjects are always interesting and practical, and her treatment of them shows breadth of thought and acquaintance with the latest results of science.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Association shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

THE stolen Senate Bible has been restored by the repentant thief, and now the Senators will be able to swear again.

THE San Franciscoans, in their eager haste to rid themselves of one class of their foreign-born population, do not disdain to borrow the methods taught by another and more influential class of the foreign element among them, and purpose to adopt the Irish system of boycotting the Chinese in California.

THE love of the Lord manifests itself queerly sometimes. Because a prominent member of a Western church for some good reason was publicly expelled therefrom, his wife and daughter waylaid the pastor of the church and beat him unmercifully. Whether the husband and father of these zealous Christians was by this means restored to the church as in good and regular standing is not told.

IN spite of the civilizing tendencies of the age, slavery, in a modified form, still exists in the kingdom of Siam, where young girls are bought and sold openly for the harems of the wealthy class. The influence of the British residents, with whose opinion on this subject the young king is in full sympathy, is, however, gradually creating a strong public feeling against it; and, before many years, such slavery will doubtless be abolished.

A NOVEL but characteristic method of tax-collecting is followed in some of the Russian provinces. On a recent trial of some peasants of the Province of Vyatka for beating soundly the Chief of Police, it was shown that within two years seven hundred and ninety-seven peasants of that province had been publicly flogged for non-payment of taxes, by order of the police authorities, although it was known that poverty alone prevented payment.

IT is stated in a German newspaper published in St. Petersburg that the Russian Minister of the Interior has issued an order reviving a forgotten and obsolete law, forbidding Jews to carry on the business of druggists,—a business of which, by generations of experience and their consequent superior qualifications therefor, they had obtained the almost entire monopoly. But they were waxing rich in the trade, so the government enviously shuts them off from it, at whatever cost to the welfare of the people at large.

THE faint gleam of hope that De Long and party would be rescued alive from arctic ice-fields has been destroyed by the sad intelligence that these unfortunate explorers have been found dead near the mouth of the Lena. Their fate affords a new illustration of the frightful cost of attempting to wrest from nature the secrets of the frozen seas. The books and papers of the expedition, which were also found, doubtless give details of the wanderings and struggles of the intrepid men whose lives have been sacrificed in the interests of science.

A FEW days ago, in an address at New Orleans, Jefferson Davis said: "As for me,—I speak only for myself,—our cause was so just, so sacred, that, had I known all that has come to pass, had I known what was to be inflicted upon me, all that my country was to suffer, all that our posterity was to endure, I would do it over and over again. [Great applause.] It is to me most desirable that the conduct of our men in defence of that cause should be so presented to the world as to leave no stain upon it. They went through trials which might have corrupted weaker men; and yet throughout the war I never went into an army without finding every camp engaged in prayer, and, after the war was over, see how many of these men who bore muskets in the ranks became ministers of the gospel. It is your good fortune to have one presiding over your diocese now, and who is the successor of one who drew his last breath on the field of battle,—the glorious Polk."

THE Ohio temperance folks have always been more enterprising and original in their advocacy of and methods of enforcing temperance principles than the people of any other State. But it occurs to us that the plan of blowing up whiskey saloons with dynamite is carrying the war into the enemy's camp in too "utterly utter" a style. A few days ago, Cornelius Sweeny's liquor-saloon was blown up by a charge of dynamite at one o'clock in the morning; and he and his two little children were thrown out of their beds, but fortunately not seriously injured, though one end of the building and all the windows were demolished. The same day, a drug store, whose proprietor claimed the right to sell liquor as medicine, shared the fate of the saloon. These explosions are ascribed to the temperance party in Cleveland, which has been worked up to a strong pitch of excitement recently. Such intemperate temperance is sure in the end to "be hoist with its own petard." No worse enemies to a good cause could be found than such aiders and abettors as these.

THE passage by the French Senate of the Education Act, by which religious exercises and religious teachings will hereafter be excluded from the public schools, has very naturally aroused the indignation of the clerical party. Heretofore, all the schools of France, public and private, have been by law subject to the surveillance and under the management of the clergy, and they have been as thoroughly Roman Catholic as they could be made; but under the new code, which makes ample provision for moral training, as well as secular education in general, the priests are deprived of their authority. A manifesto urging Roman Catholics to resist the enforcement of the act, and signed by prominent clericals, including some of the senators and deputies who voted against the act, has been put in circulation. It is but just to say, however, that some of the more discreet and sagacious representatives of the clerical party have published a protest against the folly of this manifesto, but recommending the establishment of private schools, and watching for an infraction of the law by some attack on the Church in the schools, that the odium of first violating it may rest upon the originators and friends of the law.

MR. GLADSTONE has taken a step forward, and shown great sagacity, elasticity of mind, and readiness to adjust his policy to the demands of the hour by abandoning the Coercion Act, which it is well known was forced upon the ministry by the attitude of the Tories, and which was a temporary measure, expiring by limitation in a few months. Until recently, the Tories were clamoring for a Cromwellian policy of repression and force; but now they are ready, in their extreme anxiety to return to power, to make any concession to Ireland,—that is, so far as promises can go, for it is impossible for them to execute a just project of legislation for the good of the Irish peasants. But the attitude of the Tories renders it possible now for the ministry to put itself at the head of the liberal public opinion of England, and to adopt a mode of procedure which Mr. Sexton said, in the House of Commons last week, "was the first step of a policy that would crown its administration with glory, and would produce ties of mutual interest between Ireland and England." Mr. Gladstone has admitted the grave defect of the Land Act in not dealing with the arrears of rent that existed when the act was passed, and that this burden of arrears, which, as Mr. O'Donnell says, hangs over the Irish farmer, "chilling his honest resolves and stimulating his desperate impulses," will probably have to be paid in some way by the government. Mr. Gladstone's speech, the unconditional release of the imprisoned Irish leaders, and the programme indicated by the steps taken the past week lead us to hope for some settlement of the Irish troubles that will give relief to the Irish people. But such tragedies as the assassination of the new chief secretary and under-secretary of Ireland, in Phoenix Park, Dublin, on the 6th, are not likely to promote peace or prosperity in that unhappy country, although the prompt repudiation and denunciation of the cowardly crime by the Land League, and by Irishmen generally, will do much to appease the hostility it has excited in England. That the situation is an extremely critical one is evident to everybody.

THE PROPOSED NEW DEPARTURE FOR THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

In The Index for April 13 was published the report of the special Committee appointed at the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association on the question of a more effective organization of the Association, together with the resolutions containing the specific plan of action recommended by the Committee and adopted by the Conference of March 28, to which the report was presented. A note appended to the published report stated the votes by which the several resolutions passed the Conference. And the plan, as thus indorsed by the Conference, is to come, according to the original vote creating the Committee, before the approaching annual meeting for more decisive consideration. It is safe to say that no more important question concerning its own aims and methods has ever come before the Association.

The main and essential point of the proposed plan is the turning of the energies of the Association toward the organization of local Free Religious Societies, to the degree of extending assistance in their formation through accredited agents of the Association, and even, under certain conditions, pecuniary aid. To this end, all the several parts of the plan converge. There are portions of it that might, it is true, be adopted, if the Association were simply to pursue the methods it has thus far used of a general agitation of public opinion in the interest of religious reform. But, in the mind of the Committee, it is evident that these portions are subordinate to the one aim of fostering and effecting local organization. And it is on this point of directing the efforts of the Association specifically to organizing local societies that the membership of the Association, as was shown by the discussion and voting in the recent Conference, is divided.

Now, the need of such societies may be urgent, and it might be an excellent thing, were they to be formed; though in the opinion of the present writer, judging from the general condition of Liberalism, the time is hardly yet ripe for any large number of them. But, even conceding that the conditions are ripe for the effective and healthful local organization of Liberalism, it is a question whether the Free Religious Association, in accordance with its present Constitution and with the general understanding of its aims and methods hitherto held and acted upon by its members, can assume direction of this work. It seems almost inevitable that the plan proposed, if successfully carried out, would result in the formation of a new sect,—a very liberal sect, but still a sect. This might not be a bad thing. Sects that come to represent new ideas in religion are favorable to progress. And it may be that before religion in general can be emancipated from thralldom to creeds and ecclesiastical authority there will be occasion for another liberal sect. But whether or not such a new sect be desirable or probable need not here be discussed. The previous question is whether the Free Religious Association was designed and adapted to inaugurate even a very liberal sectarian movement. And, on this question, both the Constitution and the widely representative list of officers of the Association appear plainly to give a negative answer.

In the second article of the Constitution there is a clause, the force of which is perhaps not so apparent to those who have come into the Association in recent years as it is to those who assisted in framing and adopting the Constitution. It is the following: "Membership in this Association . . .

shall affect in no degree his [a member's] relation to other associations." This meant that, whatever else the Free Religious Association might do, it would not make a new sect; that, while it planted itself unequivocally on liberty of thought, it would not require as a condition of membership a withdrawal from other religious bodies, if any members could still conscientiously work with them. And this clause was put into the Constitution, not from any spirit of compromise with sectarian organizations, but rather in the interest of a more complete individual liberty and a larger fellowship. As a matter of fact, there were present and among the speakers at the meeting when the Association was organized, not only those who already stood outside of all churches and aloof from all denominations, but representatives of the liberal wings of Unitarianism, Universalism, Quakerism, and Spiritualism. And all these different phases of thought were represented from the beginning in the list of officers, with the addition afterwards of the Progressive Jew and a representative of the German Freie-Gemeinde. And the same breadth has existed in the general membership. Now, this wide variety would hardly have been secured, if the Association had proposed to enter on the work of organizing local societies. It is not probable, for instance, that Lucretia Mott, who took a deep interest in the Association and for several years was a Vice-President of it, would have become a member, if it had made its chief object to organize local societies to take the place of the local religious meetings of other bodies. She had conquered a free place for herself in the Society of Friends, to which she still adhered; and her idea of the best form of a local religious society would be one somewhat after the manner of Friends. Robert Dale Owen was one of the first Vice-Presidents of the Association. His idea of a local society would naturally have been one in which Spiritualism should not only be recognized as having a right to membership, but as having a prominent place in the teaching. In the present list of officers there are two or three who also act with the Unitarians, and one who is a rabbi of a Jewish reformed synagogue. These might indeed all recognize the need, under certain conditions, of local societies of a somewhat different type from their own, and willingly give aid to such societies. Yet it is easy to see that they might also be brought into embarrassing situations from belonging to two associations, both engaged in organizing local societies, and that they might then plead that they had been deceived by that provision of the Free Religious Association which says that membership in it shall not affect one's relations to other Associations.

But how is it that these people of widely different opinions and of various denominational antecedents and connections have ever come together at all in one organization? The reason is vastly more than that the Free Religious Association offers a free platform for the equal expression of all religious opinions. This is a very inadequate interpretation of the meaning of the Free Religious Association, though it is one sometimes given. With such an interpretation, the Association as such would have taken no religious position at all. It would be utterly colorless in respect to religious problems. It would be like the London Philosophical Club, where Catholic, Evangelical-Protestant, Unitarian, Theist, and Agnostic meet together and read papers from their various points of view, and yet the Club says nothing: it has no point of view. But the Free Religious Association has said something as an organized body. It has spoken in its Constitution, and in that established a very definite point of view of its own. It has declared, to begin with, for unrestricted mental liberty on all religious problems. It asserts both the right and the duty to look at all problems from the stand-point of the free reason. And then, on this basis of individual liberty of thought, it declares its practical objects to be to promote righteousness, fellowship, and the rational study of religion. It is because the membership of the Association, though of various religious antecedents and differing in present theological beliefs, assent to the supremacy of these declarations that they have been drawn together into one body. They have been able to stand together on this foundation and unite in these objects, even though in many cases still retaining affiliation to other religious bodies. Hitherto, the methods for promoting these objects have been such as were calculated to affect general public opinion. And the result might appear in two ways: first, in increased liberality and enlightenment within the Churches; and, second, in the greater power and better character of Liberalism outside of Churches. And if from this latter result should spring up anywhere local societies to meet local needs and conditions, meeting their wants in their own way and responsible to no body but themselves, such spontaneous growths would be entirely in keeping with the principles and aims of the Association.

It may be, however, that the time has come when these old plans and methods, even were they to be extended, have lost their effectiveness: when the "new occasions teach new duties"; when the Free Religious movement is coming to a more definite consciousness of its own heart, and is ready for a more specific and definitely prescribed task. The fact that the more recent comers into the Association do not appear to comprehend or to be satisfied with the old aims and methods would seem to indicate that the time for such a change may be approaching. There can certainly be no disposition in any part of the membership to conserve the established, merely because it is the established. Better, a thousand times better, that the old Association should disappear utterly than that it should stay to cumber the ground and to prevent the uprising of some new method better adapted to the real needs of the present hour. Only, if such a change is to come, it should be made with a clear understanding of its purport and with such radical changes in the Constitution of the Association as shall put it into harmony with the new departure, and make plain to all members the meaning of it. And the best outcome of the matter at the approaching annual meeting would be, perhaps, the adoption provisionally of the committee's plan (or some equivalent of it), as far as there was unanimity upon it at the conference, with a view especially of gaining a better acquaintance with the present state of Liberalism in the country; and, in addition to this, the appointment of a larger committee to consider the question whether any reorganization of the Association, including changes in its Constitution, is necessary, desirable, and feasible, in order to meet any changed conditions in the liberal cause that have come in the last fifteen years. There are principles, surely, underlying the Free Religious movement which will continue to command the devotion of earnest minds, and which cannot fail to find in some way effective expression in human society.

This article, it need hardly be said, represents the opinion of one member of the Association only, and is not to be regarded as the voice of The Index. The columns of this journal are just as free to give voice to any other member's opinion.

THE LAWS OF NATURE.

Theology is especially anxious now, since so many phenomena are being explained in accordance with law that in former times were ascribed to supernatural intervention, to make it appear that the laws of Nature must have been made or instituted at least, by a supernatural Being. But, if matter and force are eternal, or if, as Spencer shows, they are symbols of an eternal, absolute reality, these laws are also eternal; for they are but the modes in which matter acts, in which force manifests itself, in which the eternal existence reveals itself in consciousness. We observe certain modes of action or sequences of motion, certain processes. For instance, a body heavier than the atmosphere, unsupported, falls to the ground. Here we see matter acting in a certain manner, which, by observation, we have learned is uniform; and we call this uniform mode of action the law of gravitation. It could not have been "impressed on matter," it could not have been "made" or "instituted"; for it is the necessary consequence of the existence of what presents itself to us as matter and force, and, as Moleschott says, "a stringent expression of necessity."

In strictness of speech, the laws of Nature govern nothing. They stand for the uniform processes which are themselves determined by the eternal, self-existent substance upon which all phenomena depend. Between them and human enactments there is no analogy.

If it be affirmed the laws of Nature are eternal, but nevertheless dependent on God, since they are the expression of his will, it may be said in reply that they are not, then, due to intelligence; for if they had no beginning, if they are the eternal expressions of an Eternal Will, they cannot have been caused, cannot have had an origin, and do not therefore suppose a law-giver.

The theological position is thus stated by Joseph Cook: "Charles Darwin and your Archbishop Butler say that the only clear meaning of the word 'natural' is 'stated, fixed, regular,' and that it just as much requires and presupposes an intelligent agent to effect anything statedly, fixedly, regularly, that is, naturally, as it does to effect it for once, that is, supernaturally. According to Darwin and Butler, therefore, a natural law is simply the usual, fixed, regular method of the Divine Action."

The laws and principles of the Divine Existence, assuming its reality, must be "stated, fixed, regular." If God exists, he must exist according to laws. If he thinks or perceives, if he plans and purposes, he must do so in accordance with laws. If he is self-existent and eternal, if he is powerful, if he is just and good, whatever he is, he must be so in accordance with laws and principles which constitute the essential conditions of his being. These laws and principles must be "stated, fixed, regular." They can have had no origin, they can be due to no intelligence, because they are the laws and principles by which a Being, who had no origin and is due to no intelligence, exists.

Are not the laws and principles of the Divine Existence, which make it possible for God to be what he is,—a God and not a man,—and to act as he does,—like a God and not like a man,—quite as wonderful as the laws of nature, those sequences of phenomena which Mr. Cook is pleased to call the "usual, fixed, regular methods of Divine Action"? To say no is to say that the cause is not as wonderful as the effect, that the mind is not as wonderful as its products, that the Divine Being is not as wonderful as the works ascribed to him, that the action of the divine mind is not as wonderful as the operation of things which have been created by the divine mind. Mr. Cook must say yes; and, in saying yes, he must admit that he believes there are laws and principles which had no origin and are due to no intelligence, that are as wonderful as, and even more wonderful than, the "laws of Nature," to which he appeals as proof of a supernatural Being.

Let us see Mr. Cook's reasoning in the form of a syllogism:—

Whatever is "stated, fixed, regular," presupposes an intelligent agent to cause it.

The laws of Nature are "stated, fixed, regular."

Therefore, the laws of Nature must have had an intelligent agent to cause them.

But we may say:—

Whatever is stated, fixed, regular, presupposes an intelligent agent to cause it.

The laws and principles of the Divine Being are stated, fixed, regular.

Therefore, the laws and principles of the Divine Being must have had an intelligent agent to cause them.

The latter syllogism, of course, implies that the Divine Being has been caused by a being who preceded and is superior to him, which is an absurdity. The fallaciousness of Mr. Cook's reasoning is apparent.

If it be said that the terms "stated, fixed, regular," cannot be applied properly to the laws and principles of the Divine Being, since they presuppose a being who stated, fixed, and regulated them, the rejoinder is that they are equally improper when applied to the laws of Nature, of which there is no proof that they were ever stated, fixed, or regulated. These terms are anthropomorphic. Man projects, so to speak, his own intelligence out upon the field of phenomena; and, because he is conscious of feeling and thinking in a certain way, he imagines that the cause of all phenomena must do the same; and, because he "states," "fixes," and "regulates" things, he believes and speaks as though the laws and principles of Nature must, in a similar manner, be "stated," "fixed," and "regulated." These words are misleading in their connotations, when applied to the laws of Nature; for, as Lewes says, law "is the process of phenomena, not an agent apart from them, not an agency determining them, but simply the ideal summation of their positions. . . . Phenomena, in as far as they are ruled,—regulated, determined in the direction taken,—are determined by no external agent corresponding to law, but by their co-operant factors, internal and external: alter one of these factors, and the product will be differently determined."

EMERSON'S POETRY.

It always troubled the critics to classify Emerson's poetry. It is eccentric in its scansion and otherwise, a new kind of poetry with a flavor and laws of its own. The writer is unfortunately old enough to remember the advent of Emerson's first volume of Poems, for that was the unpretentious title of it. It is needless to say that it was in the words of Pindar only Phonanta sunetis, or only vocal and musical to the initiated. But there were those even then with whom the new volume of verse immediately became a favorite, whose melodies were quickly transformed into treasures of memory, never more to be forgotten. A few of the poems immediately passed into general circulation. I allude to the pieces entitled "Good-Bye," "The Snow-Storm," "The Rhodora," "The Problem," "The Humble-Bee." These appealed to all, and were appreciable by all. They were freighted with no abstruse philosophy or mysticism. Each of them had a sweetness of its own, a sweetness altogether novel and unprecedented. The "Humble-Bee" is instinct with the balmy spirit of our New England May, a month which Emerson has celebrated at length elsewhere in immortal verse. The writer of this is probably not singular in regarding "Wood-Notes" and "Monadnoc" as unique in the poetical literature of all time. They impart to the mind a divine aroma. They have a honeyed rhythm of their own. They are full of a mystical wisdom. In them, we have the spirit of Emerson entire. It is no wonder that such scientists as Tyndall are fond of quoting from them. In fact, they are science steeped down, sublimated, and epitomized. They are cosmic verses, and their rhythm pulses with the life and movement of the universe. In "Monadnoc," Emerson gives to mountains a tongue. In "Wood-Notes," the pine-tree recites its million-centuried memories:—

"Soundeth the prophetic wind,
The shadows shake on the rock behind,
And the countless leaves of the pine are strings Tuned to the lay the wood-god sings."

These unparalleled poems are instinct with the spirit of our New World nature. They are oracular utterances, adequate interpretations of the immanent spirit of the universe. They are reed-notes wild of Pan, such as were fabled in the elder times to unfit those who happened to hear them for ordinary life, and to make them evermore in love with solitude and lonely nature. They are full of "The primal chimes of sun and shade,

Of sound and echo, man and maid."

In "Monadnoc," the poet speaks of our little earth as

"The round, sky-cleaving boat,
Which never strains its rocky beams;
Whose timbers as they silent float
Alps and Caucasus uprear,
And the long Alleghanies here,
And all town-peopled lands that be,
Sailing through stars with all their history."

Inspired by Goethe's West-Easterly Divan, Emerson surpassed his master in his Oriental pieces, such as "Saadi," and in his two translations from Hafiz, the Persian poet. Emerson was in fact an American Sufee. Who can forget his "Exile," translated from the Persian of Kernani?—

"I know that thou, O morning wind,
O'er Kerwan's meadow blowest,
That thou, heart-warming nightingale,
My father's orchard knowest."

Who can forget

"The hyacinthine boy, for whom Morn well might break and April bloom," who is celebrated in the "Threnody"? I have likened Emerson's verses to the fabled reed-notes of Pan. May-Day is resonant throughout with such notes:—

"Soft on the south wind sleeps the haze.
So on thy broad, mystic van
Lie the opal-colored days,
And waft the miracle to man."

But May not only recalls to the mystical poet his vanished youth, but awakens a thought of the vanished friends and mates of his youth also:—

"Not long ago, at even-tide,
It seemed, so listening, at my side
A window rose; and, to say sooth,
I looked forth on the fields of youth."

"I saw fair boys bestriding steeds,
I knew their forms in fancy weeds,
Long, long concealed by sundering fates,
Mates of my youth, yet not my mates."

"Stronger and bolder far than I,
With grace, with genius, well attired,
And then, as now, from far admired,
Followed with love
They knew not of,
With passion cold and shy.
O joy, for what recoveries rare!
Renewed, I breathe Elysian air,
See youth's glad mates in earliest bloom.
Break not my dream, obtrusive tomb,
Or teach them, Spring, the grand recoil
Of life, resurgent from the soil,
Wherein was dropt the mortal spoil."

Curiously enough, Emerson passed away just as his favorite month of May was about to make its appearance, and was buried just as May-day was about to dawn. The weather of our uncertain New England spring proved fatal at last to its poet, but the genius of the season will not fail

"Infusing subtle heats
To turn the soda to violets" over his grave. B. W. BALL.

THE LIMITATIONS OF THE "SCIENTIFIC METHOD."

Mr. Salter to Mr. Savage.

Allow me, in answer to your very considerate "Reply" in The Index of 6th of April, to do no more than simply endeavor to bring out my meaning a little more clearly. In the way of proof, if indeed I essayed so strict and ambitious a thing, I have little or nothing to add.

1. I did not mean to say that "science" is not capable of dealing with psychical phenomena, but with psychical phenomena presumably existing in any other person than the scientific investigator himself. Of psychical phenomena in himself, he has immediate experience; but, in another, physical phenomena are all that he can "scientifically" deal with (i.e., words, glances, motions, etc.). The psychical phenomena in this case are a matter of inference. A "science" of individual psychology is then possible to each of us who has the patience and wit to classify and turn into system the maze and flow of his own thoughts and feelings; and a "science" of general psychology is possible after we have made the inference that a connection obtains between psychical and physical phenomena in others similar to that which obtains between our own. Of course, with the terms "science" and "scientific," I connect the notion of verification, on the necessity of which you laid such emphasis in your article of 16th March. And my object was by no means to discredit the inference which we are all of us making as to one another's thoughts, but simply to show that the "scientific method," which has so greatly rewarded those who have pursued it in many a department of research, is, in reference to the matter in hand, inapplicable, because too strict in its requirements.

2. I see that I was misunderstood in using as an illustration the law of gravitation. I did not mean by this law anything behind or in addition to the facts, but simply the facts themselves, summed up in a general statement. With reference to our globe, all bodies show a tendency to move to its centre. We call this the fact of gravity, and the general rule or formula we call the law of gravitation. A force or thing or cause that may be behind these facts, and may prescribe their law, is something of which the physical investigator as such knows nothing, and for the simple reason that any theory in regard to the same is beyond his power of verification; and he is pursuing physics, not metaphysics. The law of gravitation, in the sense of the physicist, is one that may be verified at any time, even as a law of chemistry or physiology. That "law" is ambiguous, I know; but I had supposed that it had a pretty well-defined use in "scientific" circles, not as anywise a supersensible thing or cause, but simply as a statement of certain constant sensible relations. No more by "mind" did I mean anything behind or separate from the thoughts and feelings of which you seem to regard it as the cause. Mind is to me no more than that which thinks and feels. But I distinctly wished to avoid ambiguity in this regard; and, remarking that the term is "suggestive to some of a substance," I expressly excluded it from the discussion. Thought or thoughts, i.e., psychical phenomena, are all that I was concerned with. And excuse me for saying that a part of your reply loses its pertinence, since you do not bear in mind this simpler and humbler task to which I addressed myself. I might agree with all that you say respecting "mind" (in the sense in which you use it), and yet be nowise uncertain of my own position respecting the thoughts of another person.

3. It is confusing to me to have you compare the thought of another person and a bar of iron. The really comparable things are the other person's physical organism and the bar of iron. The sensible qualities of the bar of iron you can have a tolerably complete experience of. You can note its color, its peculiar resonance when struck, its roughness, hardness, etc. Equally well and directly can you observe and know all the qualities of my body. What the iron or my body is in itself, i.e., apart from these sensible qualities, which are really their effects upon you, you do not know, and I no better than you. Here, we pass into the realm of what Kant called the Ding an sich, and Spencer the "Unknowable." But iron and any physical organism are not, as we ordinarily use language, names for the things in themselves, but for these groups of sensible effects upon us. And, in this sense, we know or may know (and directly know) the iron and any physical organism completely. But the whole question is whether you have any such knowledge of psychical phenomena, i.e., in any other person than yourself. My thought directly produces no effect upon you. According to my way of thinking, it is only certain physical phenomena that pass from me into your consciousness; and these you interpret or judge to be connected with certain psychical phenomena,—i.e., my thoughts and feelings. You might conceivably inspect my brain, and with certain helps note very minute motions in it; but, even if you could detect the molecules and their vibrations, would you thereby detect my thoughts? I suspect that, if you were bound to believe in their existence only if you could have sensible experience of them, you would either regard them as identical with the molecules and their vibrations or would ignore them altogether, and regard my physical organism as an automaton. I do not mean to deny that we might conceivably be able to know directly one another's thoughts, without the help of sensible media; but this would involve new powers, while the suppositions I have just made would require only the extension and refinement of those we now possess. And with these new powers of direct intuition, even as we are now able to verify hypotheses respecting sensible phenomena, so we should of the existence and nature of psychical phenomena in others than ourselves. And, had we these powers, I believe that we should find our present suppositions respecting such phenomena verified. But, at present, this is only a belief; and the suppositions themselves are only beliefs.

4. Is then your inference respecting the existence of my thought an wholly unwarranted leap? I certainly failed in clear expression, if I left an impression of this kind. On the other hand, I assert that you do proceed on a basis of experience, namely, of a known connection, whether strictly causal or other, between thoughts and words or other expressions in your own person. That connection holds good in you. If you are ever inclined to doubt this, you can remove your doubt and verify your faith by examining yourself. Hence, you naturally infer, when witnessing similar physical phenomena in another, that they proceed from a similar source, or have a similar connection,—namely, with another's thoughts. There is no difficulty and no departure from the "scientific method" in this: the difficulty is in the next step, which the "scientific method" equally demands,—namely, that you verify your inference. For, to do this, you must have the subject-matter in hand to which inference relates, and then compare the one with the other. If they agree, your inference is no longer an opinion or notion or belief, but attains the rank of "science." The question is then, Can my thought become such subject-matter to you? Have you an intuition, not only of physical phenomena in my case, from which you make an inference, but also of psychical phenomena, which you can verify the same? I confess, without trifling, that, if any one has such an immediate knowledge of my thought as he doubtless can have of the phenomena connected with my body, he is to me a singularly, if not awfully, interesting human being. I do not deny, then, but assert that you have reason or ground or occasion for your belief respecting my thought. I only say that, in the present state of human faculties, it must remain unverified. The belief suffices for practical purposes, but it can hardly be called "scientific."

5. If your own thought is an inference to you, in the same sense that my thought is (though I am not certain whether this is your position, since you use the ambiguous word "mind" in speaking of the subject), instead of helping matters, you seem to me to cut the ground from under your own feet. For, then, what basis in experience have you for inferring my thought? To my mind, your own thought is not an inference which you make from the physical phenomena manifested in your body; for you may often be well aware of your thought before giving any kind of perceptible expression to it. It is the very fact that you know thought in yourself that gives you an occasion or reason, not to say a right, to infer it in me. If all thought, your own included, is inference, then it is only physical phenomena, of which we have immediate experience; and materialism becomes the only strictly "scientific" philosophy. And this, though the question might still remain, What is it that makes us infer, and what could possibly impel to it?

LIBERAL DEFENDERS OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.

After one has endeavored to estimate clearly the character and position of the so-called Church of England and the mighty forces that are arrayed against her, it may seem strange to find that Church supported by several prominent Englishmen on the progressive side. Nevertheless, such is the case; and I propose, briefly, to set forth and to consider their arguments. We may perhaps take four prominent individuals as representing the liberal defenders of the establishment, premising, however, that nearly all which is valuable in their arguments has been stated before by Dr. Arnold, by Coleridge, and, indeed, in many points by Hooker in his Ecclesiastical Polity. The four individuals whom we may regard as types are Lord Granville, W. E. Forster, Matthew Arnold, and Canon Farrar. What they have urged in behalf of the Church of England really covers the whole ground of the defence; for we may fairly ignore the utterances of mere bigots and reactionists, as comparatively worthless. Lord Granville is a bland and genial peer, the leader of the liberal aristocracy, fairly able, exceedingly good-natured, and undoubtedly popular. He is as much in sympathy with modern progress as an English aristocrat can be, for of course such a person is necessarily biased by the social position he occupies. Some time ago, Lord Granville came to the defence of the Established Church when attacked by its enemies; and what did his arguments amount to? Simply to this: that the establishment was in existence, and therefore ought to be maintained. He admitted that, if he were founding a new State, he would not include an Established Church in its constitution, his political sagacity telling him that such a thing would be the absurdest of anomalies. But, said his lordship, you have the Church already, an institution which has descended to you from the distant past, and you will therefore do well to maintain it. This was really the main substance of the argument; and a singular argument it is, as coming from one who would call himself a friend of progress. According to this view of things, we are not to inquire whether an institution is good in itself, and adapted to the requirements of the people and the age: we are simply passively to acquiesce in its existence, because we already possess it. For Lord Granville cannot contend that we are actively to support and cherish the Church: he is too sensible of its utterly anomalous character to urge that. He is not interested in the Church, and he cannot expect modern Liberals to be interested in it; representing, as it does, a social, religious, and political conception utterly foreign to the opinions of our time. We are therefore asked simply to tolerate, and not to attack, an institution which many of us conceive to be the greatest enemy of the people's emancipation, on the ground that it exists and has existed for a long time. Precisely the same argument might have been used, and was used, for the maintenance of human slavery, penal laws against Irishmen, religious tests, rotten boroughs, and all the other rubbish which we have been for many years engaged in clearing away. And yet this is the only argument which this so-called liberal leader can urge in behalf of the Church of England as by law established. Mr. W. E. Forster is a colleague of Lord Granville's in the present cabinet. By his reactionary education policy, he materially assisted in wrecking Mr. Gladstone's first administration, and his unfortunate Irish policy bids fair to cause the wreck of Mr. Gladstone's second administration. He first entered public life more than twenty years ago as an advanced radical; and he has been engaged in accommodating himself to English institutions ever since, so that he came to be known some time ago as Mr. "Facing-both-ways." He is trying the difficult and thankless task of putting the new wine of democracy into the old bottles of mediævalism, and as such he feels bound to defend the "time-honored institution" of the Anglican Church. He delivered his soul on the matter some few years ago in a long and important speech to his Bradford constituents, who are generally by no means ardent admirers of Anglicanism. Mr. Forster thinks that it is well to have in every parish some good clergyman who shall comfort the poor laborer bowed down by toil and sorrow, and point him to a better life beyond the grave. Therefore, says Mr. Forster, we need a State Church. To my unsophisticated mind, this appears a non sequitur. I cannot see why a State Church is needed for the performance of this simple task. Do not English non-conformist ministers comfort and help the suffering and toiling? Do not the Catholic priests in Ireland, who receive no State pay, devote themselves to the people's wants and sorrows with infinitely greater assiduity than ever the Anglican clergy did? Do the pastors of the unofficial churches of the United States neglect the flocks to which they minister? Then, again, the English laborer wants to know if the village rector of Mr. Forster's imagination has anything to say about justice here on this solid earth. He has heard enough sentimental cant about the joys of heaven, where he and the rector and the squire, their earthly distinctions having vanished, are to stand round a throne, waving palm-branches, and striking harps. These celestial possibilities somehow do not appeal very strongly to his dull imagination. But he is conscious of stern and disagreeable facts related to his actual daily life. He knows that he and his fathers have been for generations uncared for, neglected, and permitted to grow up with scarcely higher aspirations than the beasts about him, and often not so well housed as they. He has an idea in his dim mind that a religion which has nothing to say about iniquitous land and game laws is no religion for him. He finds that the rector has no word of rebuke for earthly injustice, but is, in nine cases out of ten, the friend and ally of some neighboring game-preserving landlord. But the son of toil needs and demands justice and progress here.

"Not in Utopia,—subterraneous fields,—
Or some secreted island, Heaven knows where!
But in the very world, which is the world
Of all of us,—the place where in the end
We find our happiness, or not at all."

For these things, he looks in vain from Mr. Forster's time-serving priest with his unreal pictures of celestial bliss.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE religious press generally are speaking kindly of Darwin, and they would themselves be most unkind if they did not. Never was there a more amiable spirit engaged in the work of uprooting old opinions and disseminating new. Though the evangelical churches have been wont to consider him their great enemy, and have tried to bury his books under ridicule, in their inability to answer them, he can hardly be said to have been the antagonist of anybody. He was bent with single eye on the discovery of truth; and his devotion to truth was so complete, he had so little of selfish interest or pride in maintaining his opinions, was so utterly without the spirit of dogmatism or partisanship, that he never thought of stopping or turning aside for any personal controversy. He simply searched for and announced facts of nature, and modestly stated the theories of the methods of nature which the facts seemed to him to prove or to indicate. His facts and theories did run directly counter to the prevailing creeds of theology, and to the previously generally accepted scientific beliefs. Yet he resorted to none of the usual propagandist practices in doing his work. He was content to declare the facts he saw, and the inferences which he believed might be drawn from them, and then to leave the matter to the court of the scientific judgment of the future. The objections to his inferences he stated as fully and fairly as could any opponent. His strength lay in his perfect trust in the truth. Such modesty, serenity, and fairness in his methods, mingled with such singleness of devotion to the discovery of truth, and a rare purity of private life, have not failed to win the respect even of those who have feared the results of his work as dangerous. And it is noteworthy that many of the orthodox papers, not only those of the more liberal wing, but such as are highly conservative, are now taking the ground that the doctrine of evolution is not hostile to religion or even to "Christian revelation." In short, the Churches are evidently preparing to adapt themselves theologically to the exigencies of the new science.

THE Christian at Work does not seem to us to show a very "Christian" spirit at work in its own heart in its strongly avowed opposition to the bill for Indian education now before Congress. It urges that—

The efforts of our government and philanthropy should be directed to the education and improvement of the races already incorporated into the national household, instead of seeking to civilize a race of savages. The policy of the government should look to the cultivation of those whose ignorance and vices would imperil society, and let the savage go. And Christian philanthropy should learn a lesson of the Great Master, who said the children's food should not be given to dogs.

To which the Independent, with more humanity, replies:—

"Let the savage go," indeed! We do not need to say how abominably unchristian all that argument is. It would break up every asylum for the unfortunate deaf or blind or feeble-minded or insane. It would crush out all but the strongest race in existence. It would forbid all mission work to the ignorant and uncivilized. It speaks Anglo-Saxon haughtiness and conceit. We thought it was the glory of Christianity that it elevated the weak, that it honored women and children, and gave the gospel to every creature. Is this the style of religion offered us by the stalwart Orthodoxy which has been so righteously horrified at the Andover nomination?

MR. ALLEN PUTNAM, in the Banner of Light, says that he has frequently wondered why the spirits that visit the séances are so desirous to have an abundance of flowers in the room, "since at their own homes they may ever revel in far more delicious ones"; and he has asked, "Have they other uses for them than as contributions to their pleasures of sight and smell?" Recently, his question was answered by a controlling spirit, who said that the aroma of the flowers furnishes material out of which the spirits extemporize an extra wrap (no pun intended) when they come into our bleaker air. The spirit explained it thus:—

On any raw and chilly day, though clothed sufficiently for comfort while in your warmed houses, an extra garment will be very helpful in preserving your comfort if you go out of doors. We, when coming from our genial clime into your chilling atmosphere, seek to use all possible protection from its harshness; and out of the aroma given off by your living flowers we make and put on a wrapper which in a measure protects us from the exhausting and uncomfortable action of your harsh atmosphere, and enables us to put forth what we would give you with more readiness and power than we otherwise could, and to act in your presence for a longer time and with less draft upon our powers and our comfort.

This information is both interesting and pleasant—if true.

THE Catholic Review, referring to the fact that under President Grant's administration fifty thousand Indians, who had been converted to the Catholic faith and were progressing in civilization under the Catholic missionaries, were deprived of their priests and were put against their will under Protestant missionaries of different persuasions, thinks there is little hope now of this wrong being righted by President Arthur, since Mr. Teller, "an Indian hater," has been made Secretary of the Interior at the solicitation of General Grant. The Review makes a strong case against the government. It says:—

Those poor Indians, smarting under a sense of injustice and cruel wrong, are still clamoring for their rights, but in vain. Government will not listen to them. Those new agents and preachers of liberty of conscience, in some cases, will not allow the Catholic priest to come to the agencies to baptize their children, to hear their confessions, or even to administer the last rites of the Church in case of death. They have been forcibly expelled, and government has sustained the agents. The injustice of this thing has been set forth in the public prints and in reports to the Department at Washington, by Protestants as well as Catholics; but nothing is done about it. Why? They are Catholics; and the great Protestant public looks on with indifference or tacit approval, while the "Independent" press of the country, which reflects public sentiment, prudently withholds the expression of its detestation of the injustice, for fear of offending its enlightened readers!

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on the 1st and 2d of June, 1882, with sessions as follows:—

THURSDAY EVENING, June 1, at 7.45 P.M. Business meeting for election of officers, hearing of reports, and action upon the Resolutions referred from the Conference of March 28. The following amendment to the Constitution, prepared by a Committee appointed for the purpose by the Executive Committee, is to be proposed for adoption in lieu of present Article III:—

The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and twelve Directors. They shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the Association; and the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors be chosen. The Directors shall be chosen for four years, and, at the expiration of that term, shall not be eligible for re-election until after two years. One fourth of their number shall be chosen annually; but, at the annual meeting of 1882, the full number of twelve shall be chosen in sections of three respectively for one, two, three, and four years. The President, Secretaries, Treasurer, and Directors shall together constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. They shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number, or in the list of Vice-Presidents, between any two annual meetings. Six members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

FRIDAY, June 2. A Convention for essays and addresses at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. Farther particulars as to speakers and topics will be given hereafter.

FRIDAY EVENING, a Social Festival will close the proceedings, with the usual features of interest. WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

THE Chinese bill was signed by the President last Monday, and has become a law. It is no credit to the country.

MR. SAVAGE will reply to Mr. Salter next week. An article from Moncure D. Conway is unavoidably deferred till our next number.

NEXT Sunday forenoon, a meeting will be held at Paine Hall, in observance of the one hundred and eleventh anniversary of the birthday of Robert Owen, the philanthropist.

THERON BAKER, of Enosburg, Vt., made a poor use of his little fortune of $15,000 by willing it after the death of his wife to convert the heathen. A city paper thinks the Vermonters might themselves legitimately claim the inheritance.

"THE Cincinnati Enquirer," says the editor of the Commercial, "is a bully, a defamer, a vilifier, and a common liar." Such language, with the construction that some might put upon it, is open to the objection that it is liable to be regarded by an over-sensitive opponent as slightly personal.

THE following we find in the Jewish Watchman: "A Yale College paper of recent date says: 'The valedictorian last year was a Hebrew; the salutatorian, a German; the prize declaimer, a Chinaman; but the captain of the Base Ball Nine, an American.' America is bound to give her sons a liberal education in at least one branch."

"THE Court of Appeals of Kentucky," says a Western paper, "has decided that an atheist's testimony is as good as that of any other man. He cannot be deprived of the right to testify, and as to credibility stands on the same footing with other witnesses. The case in which this decision was made was that of John Bush v. the Commonwealth."

REV. JOSEPH COOK, in his travels through India, China, Japan, and Australia, with his dangerous facility for acquiring unpronounceable words, is sure to return with plentiful supply of this sort of ammunition to hurl at and make quail his cultured Boston audiences in the fall. He gives us a few samples of the new store he has accumulated, in a recent letter to the Independent written "In the Himalayas."

SAYS the Boston Post: "Talmage's text last Sunday was, 'I know how to be abashed and how to abound.' If he can now add, to the stock of his own and other people's knowledge, how to be abated, he will gain immensely in popularity." A very sensible remark, that will apply not only to Talmage, but to many other sensational speakers and writers who attempt to make up for a deficiency of knowledge by an exuberance of zeal, and who substitute for vigorous thought dogmatic assertion, loud declamation, and fierce invective.

AMONG the belongings of a tramp arrested in Cambridge the other day, and sent to the House of Correction, was found a diary, which showed that he is vice-president of a "Tramp Association." The other duly elected officers of this precious organization are a president, secretary, and treasurer. What the peculiar duties of a treasurer of tramps may be would be interesting to know; also what would become of the Association from lack of a "head centre," if the president should die or get killed while stealing a ride on a freight-train, before the vice-president has served his term in the House of Correction?

THE Nation thinks "the Chinese must be a good deal puzzled about the source of the hostility to them. On one day, they hear that they must 'go' because they are so barbarous and uncivilized; on the next, because they are so skilful and intelligent. The treaty permits the United States Government to exclude Chinese 'laborers.' The term 'laborers' was undoubtedly used in the sense in which it is ordinarily used here, to designate unskilled laborers. It has, however, in the bill been made to cover artisans and mechanics; and there can be little doubt that the Chinese will consider this a quibble, and will wonder if Christian morality sanctions such things."

THE assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, in Phoenix Park, Dublin, last Saturday night, was unprovoked, cowardly, and brutal, and with the indignation it has aroused in England comes a demand for the sternest measures in reference to Ireland. But, as this atrocious deed has excited nothing but feelings of horror and detestation among Irishmen of all parties, who have been swift to denounce the crime in no uncertain language, it is to be hoped that, whatever repressive measures may be necessary to protect life, no excited public feeling in England will prevent Mr. Gladstone from carrying through the conciliatory policy he has but lately initiated.

THE flexibility of modern Christianity, and the facility with which the Church where its temporal interests are involved can feel a pious interest in purely worldly matters, are well illustrated by the fact that on a recent Sunday evening Gen. Abe Buford, the old turfman, occupied the pulpit of "the Christian Church" at Louisville, and gave an address on "The Church and the Turf," in which he encouraged visiting the races. He said: "The race horse is too important a factor in the commercial prosperity of Kentucky, a State which is world-famous for its blooded stock, to be ignored by the religious element because of the mismanagement of some of the race tracks, and because some people bet on the races. The Church must not drive men away because they believe in horse-racing as necessary for the improvement of the breed, but should rather strive to have the evils now connected with the sport remedied. The General said that there were some evils which existed on Eastern courses which do not exist in Kentucky, and in his remarks he paid a compliment to the Louisville Jockey Club for its benevolence in donating a large sum of money to the yellow fever sufferers."

THERE is to be more fun at Concord this season. A. Bronson Alcott, "the mystic," and Dr. Jones, the Western Platonist, will be among the principal lecturers of the Concord School of Philosophy. There will be several speculative thinkers there, and among them Prof. Harris, who will give a number of lectures on his favorite themes. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, John Albee, President Seelye, F. B. Sanborn, and Elizabeth P. Peabody will also be among the lecturers. These names are sufficient to insure discussions of a wide range, and some of the persons mentioned can scarcely fail to speak on subjects of practical interest. But among the lecturers announced is not one representative of the modern school of scientific and philosophic thought. Last year, Dr. Jones attempted to refute Darwinism, but was not able even to state it correctly; and Mr. Alcott disposed of evolution by declaring that animals have descended from men, and established the doctrine of immortality by affirming that a man need not die at all, if he will but live right. Would not a lecture or two before the Concord School by Prof. Youmans, John Fiske, or Francis E. Abbot have a tonic effect on the mystical and metaphysical speakers and listeners?

NUMEROUS responses of approval have come to us concerning the paragraph in the last Index on the peculiar inappropriateness of most of the public ceremonies at Mr. Emerson's funeral. It is evident in particular that Dr. Furness' selection of the account of the conversion of Paul as his longest Scripture reading impressed many, as it did the writer of that paragraph, as an unfortunate choice, to say the least, considering Emerson's well-known view of Jesus, since it obviously suggested a parallel between Paul and Emerson. But, from our knowledge of Dr. Furness' great liberality of spirit and his life-long admiration and friendship for Mr. Emerson, it has occurred to us that he must have intended the selection as a lesson for the denominational Unitarians, who had been fighting against another Jesus, as it were, in Emerson during most of his life, but had now been converted to his side. Or perhaps Dr. Furness recalled the time when both Emerson and himself had to face the hissings and yells of mobocratic audiences. Both of them then met, and met unflinchingly, the spirit and acts of genuine persecution; and it was persecution nourished and led largely by the very classes of respectability that are now most forward to proclaim Emerson's praises and share his renown. We ourselves remember to have seen Emerson hissed and hooted down at a public meeting in Cambridge, when Harvard students were prominent in the rabble that broke up the meeting, and prominent Harvard professors were known to have afterwards expressed sympathy with these students' acts. To Dr. Furness, recalling such scenes and witnessing the general public mourning and the popular ovation at Emerson's funeral, the change must have seemed like a miracle. Certainly, a great light has broken upon somebody's path, and the evidence is that it was not needed on Emerson's.

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

EMERSON.

For The Index.

O poet, teacher, sage, philosopher!
Thou who did'st seek so long to bring us aid,
Whose studies have for all mankind been made
In loving hope we might be happier,—
We miss thy grave yet kindly face. Where'er
We turn, the vista seems at once to fade.
We cry in vain. In what far-distant glade,
Through what mysterious region, earth or air
Or dark or bright, do thy quick footsteps go?
Can'st thou not call to us from out the high,
And tell us of the wonders which are by
And all around us? If we may not know,
But through life's conflict and death's bitter woe,
Be this our prayer: like thee to live and die!

WALTER L. SAWYER.

TOLERANCE.

For The Index.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL KNORTZ.]

Encount'rst thou a trusting heart
To pious faith attuned,
That trust and peace wrest not apart,
See not its hope impugned.

List, patient, while it speaks its thought
Of Him who sits on high,
Who all this world's fair glory wrought
To cheer the human eye.

List while it speaks of Paradise
That holds its gates ajar,
Wherein life's weary sacrifice
Can joy no longer mar.

Speak not of priestly subterfuge:
It's had enough of woe.
Crush not this saddened heart's refuge,
No blissful dream o'erthrow.

Say not humanity's a dream,
Man but a clump of dust,
This life the boundary extreme
Of all his joy and trust.

Unfit him not thus for the strife:
Give him bread, and not a stone;
Leave him the remnant brief of life
With hope and peace alone.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

A Discourse preached in Brooklyn, N.Y., Sunday Morning,
April 30, 1882.

BY JOHN W. CHADWICK.

We have heard that Emerson is dead, but we do not believe it. There has of late been no man living in Europe or America or anywhere upon the habitable globe for whom death was so impossible as it was for him. That the man has ceased from certain bodily functions, this we may not deny. It is not sad that it is so. In another month, he would have entered on his eightieth year. "We could not wish to detain him, when his tools were all broken, memory and speech." So writes to me Dr. Furness, his life-long friend; and we can all of us agree to this. But Emerson is not dead. Emerson is in this semi-score of books on which his genius is impressed. Because these live, he lives also. And these, I think, are not less sure of immortality than anything that has been written since, at the age of fifty-two, Shakespeare let fall the magic wand which has entranced three hundred years of time. Ay, more: if every word that Emerson has written could be blotted out, to say that Emerson is dead would still be an absurdity. For to destroy his words would not eradicate him from the minds and hearts of the innumerable company who have built themselves up out of his thought into a nobler manhood. So memorable are his words, so many minds there are that cherish them, that, if his books could all be banished from existence, it would be no difficult matter to make up a large anthology of his sentences from the memories of different men. I think I could myself agree to furnish a few score of pages. But his life in us is deeper than could be inferred from any amount of verbal recollection. Emerson lives in his America and in all the English-speaking world as an influence, a spirit. He lives in our mental largeness, in our liberality, in our breadth of view, in our impatience with dogmatic formulas. Shall we go on, and predicate of him persistent individuality? He was himself one of the most cautious here, one of the least dogmatic. He was a better believer, he said, than he could give grounds for. We have an argument that he had not, an argument from which he was debarred by his inherent modesty. We cannot think the extinction of so great and good a man. For such passion of truth as fired his breast, we demand some further exercise.

"Rapt from the fickle and the frail,
With gathered power yet the same,
Pierces the keen seraphic flame
From orb to orb, from veil to veil."

We will still believe that this is so until our belief is confirmed by our experience, or too deep a sleep is ours for us to even dream that we have expected better things from God than he was able to perform.

Let us pause a moment to consider the pathos of his short tarrying with us after his friend Longfellow had, in his own phrase, "taken his lamp and gone to bed," and Emerson remained awhile "to cover up the embers that still burned." You have all read of his going, with characteristic resolution, to Mount Auburn in the bleak March weather to see the earth close over his beloved friend. All who were there, and did their best to shield him from the wind and rain, felt that no shielding could avail him long, so frail the tenure was by which he held the remnant of his days.

"Never, believe me,
Appear the immortals,
Never, alone."

With Longfellow and Emerson and Darwin all going over to the majority in a single month, we question whether "disappear" would not be truer than "appear." It is as if the great ones gone drew after them the great ones left by strong, invisible cords.

Not long ago, I was looking over certain autograph letters; and among them was one written about ninety years ago by the Rev. William Emerson, of Harvard, Mass. It seems he had been preaching for the minister in Wilton, N.H., who had rallied him upon his celibate condition, advising him of the superior excellency of the wedded state. Mr. Emerson replied that, if he could find for him a lady so rarely gifted as his wife appeared to be with every grace and virtue, he would willingly become 'as one of them knowing good and evil.' How strange it seems that the Emerson whom we have known should be contingent on that languid disposition, he seems to us so inevitable, a man that must have been! Whether the Wilton friend assisted I am not informed; but certain it is that the senior Emerson married Ruth Haskins in 1796, and of this marriage came five sons, of whom the second, Ralph, was born in Boston, May 25, 1803. The boy had in his veins eight generations of such culture as the Christian ministry afforded in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. His clerical ancestors were each and all reformers in their day and generation. Far back in 1215, one of his ancestors—who was not a preacher, but a doer—put his name to Magna Charta, when that famous document was forced from the reluctant clutches of King John. William Emerson, his immediate ancestor, was not only a consistent anti-Calvinist, but maintained "a studied reserve on the subject of the nature and offices of Jesus." Channing and Buckminster were not more progressive; but he died in 1811, before the Unitarian controversy had definitely begun. Emerson's mother bequeathed to him some of his finest traits,—his brave sincerity, its hatred of all sentimentalism, a temper placid as the surface of his beloved Walden on the stillest day. An aunt, residing in the family, was one of his most valuable instructors. Not Greece or Rome had done more for him, he said, than his Aunt Mary. The names of Descartes and Leibnitz and Spinoza were frequently upon her tongue, and Ralph's first lessons in philosophy were of her giving. He made good progress at the Latin School, but to "some idle books under the bench" he credited a better part than that which he received from the more regular studies. The Boston of his boyhood was not the Boston of to-day. Witness the fact that his mother, like the dear ladies in Cranford, had "set up a cow"; and, while driving her to pasture, Ralph perhaps began that meditative habit which was so conspicuously his in after-life. He entered Harvard College in his fourteenth year. Furness and Gannett were in the class above him, George Ripley was in the next below. His judgment on his Harvard studies was severe. They taught him principally this, he said: that they were not of much account. His voluntary reading profited him, he thought, much more than the curriculum. He so far forgot himself as to carry Pascal's Thoughts to church with him, and read it while the various services went on. But when Edward Everett or Dr. Channing was the preacher, then he was all attention. For five years after his graduation he engaged in teaching and in theological studies, and then began to preach. His love of nature and his poetic gift were already clear enough. One of his finest lyrics antedates his earliest preaching. It is that which sings "Good-by, proud world, I'm going home."

Beginning so, and ending,

"Oh, when I am stretched beneath the pines,
Where the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and the pride of man,
At the sophist schools and the learned clan.
For what are they all in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?"

In the spring of 1829, he was ordained as minister of the Second Church in Boston. Very soon, we find him preaching on "The Universality of the Moral Sentiment," a theme of which he never wearied. If any theme was central to his entire activity, was it not this,—"the sovereignty and self-existent excellence of the moral law"? What stuff there was in him for practical emergencies, two homely facts sufficiently illustrate. In 1831 Samuel J. May gave an anti-slavery lecture in his church one Sunday evening, and in 1832 Arnold Buffum, one of the founders of the Massachusetts Anti-slavery Society, delivered there a plea for the immediate and unconditional emancipation of the slave.

These stumbling-blocks, over which the majority of Boston congregations would have fallen flat enough, were somehow got round or got over, but another lay athwart the path. Mr. Emerson wished to make the Lord's Supper a service of commemoration only, and give up the bread and wine. Others might use "the elements," but he would not. His appeal was not from Jesus, but to him. Jesus, to him, stood for a spiritual religion, for emancipation from all formal acts of worship. He had endeared himself very greatly to his congregation, and they were not inclined to let him go. Would he not go through the motions, putting on them his own interpretation and allowing others to top them? How little did they know the man! This scheme was very gently but firmly put aside, and his farewells were spoken.

But Emerson's break with his original profession was not by any means as sudden as is commonly supposed. The friendliest relations continued to subsist between him and his former people. He wrote for his successor the beautiful ordination hymn:—

"We love the venerable house
Our fathers built to God.
In heaven are kept their grateful vows,
Their dust endears the sod."

He went abroad; and after his return he preached in various pulpits, longest in Dr. Dewey's, at New Bedford, while Dr. Dewey was in Europe. Later, in 1834, when Dr. Dewey came to New York, Emerson was urgently invited to assume the charge of the New Bedford parish. The attraction was immense; but Emerson was beginning to suspect that literature and not the ministry was the profession that would give him the largest breathing-place and the highest vantage-ground for spiritual vision and coöperation with the most vital forces of the time. So he declined the call, but went on preaching here and there; and as late as 1838, when he gave the memorable address to the graduating class of the Cambridge Divinity School, he still spoke as a Unitarian minister. Apparently, his ultimate complete cessation from the preacher's work was the inevitable result of the increasing demand made on him by his lecturing and his general literary work. After the death of Theodore Parker, in 1840, he found that his society could offer him a pulpit not too cramped for his enlarged conception of religion; and Sunday morning found him often there, charged with some glorious message which I was very careful not to miss when, for three years, I was a student in the neighboring town.

His gradual withdrawal from the ministry, from 1832 to 1840, did not betoken any withdrawal of his mind from ethical and religious studies. There was no schism in his life. By infinite leaps of differentiation, the sermon passed into the lecture and the essay. There was no longer any text, and there was increasing breadth of illustration; but the spirit and the purpose were unchanged. Few indeed were the pulpits whose ethical and religious dulness was not shamed by Emerson's "ethical passion," his religious inspiration.

All of you know or ought to know his poem, "To Ellen at the South." She was the beautiful girl who became his wife in 1829, and died in 1832. Soon after came the surrender of his parish; and then he went to Europe there doing many useful things, but nothing else so notable as his pilgrimage to Craigenputtock where Carlyle and his Jeanie were living together in such stillness that they could hear the nibbling of the sheep a quarter of a mile away. That loneliness was never brightened by a more radiant presence. And thus began a friendship which went on for nearly fifty years, the outward signs of which—a correspondence of marvellous richness—will soon, no doubt, be shining in our eyes. When Carlyle's negro-phobia was at its point of utmost violence, he wrote to Emerson a letter full of contempt for all our works and ways. "I have let silence answer him so far," said Emerson to me, in speaking of the matter. I think it was Carlyle who broke the silence with some word of passionate regret. At any rate, the correspondence was resumed.

In 1834, Emerson married Lydia Jackson, the most notable of whose ancestors was John Cotton, the famous vicar of St. Botolph's, who was the first minister that signified of the First Church in Boston. They went immediately to Concord and set up their home, facing the road down which the British marched one April morning and full soon returned at double-quick. There, they have since remained. The original house was burned a few years since, and Emerson went abroad, to find on his return the village children waiting to conduct him under an arch of welcome to a new one as much like the old as possible. In 1837, Horace Mann summed up the teachings of Emerson in two pregnant phrases—"Sit aloof" and "Keep a diary." But to sit aloof was never Emerson's desire or act, so far as Concord was concerned. He identified himself heartily from the first with its traditions, with its social interests, with the common life of all the people of the town. It had no citizen less feared than he, more honored or beloved. On the 19th of April, 1836, the little monument of the Concord fight was finished; and for the occasion Emerson wrote the hymn, one line of which will, I doubt not, outlast the marble.

"By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world."

From that time to this, the town has celebrated no historical event without reckoning largely upon his coöperation. And, when great national events have been upon us, to no spot have our eyes turned so spontaneously as to Concord, for no voice have we listened so eagerly as for Emerson's, speaking the calmest, simplest, bravest wisdom of the hour.

In the interval between his return from Europe and his final settlement in Concord, Emerson had spent several months in the "Old Manse," so variously famed, and while there had written a little book which was published in 1836, called Nature. The text of Emerson is here complete: all that he wrote afterward was commentary and illustration. This was the introductory motto:—

"A subtle chain of countless rings
The next unto the farthest brings;
The eye reads omens where it goes,
And speaks all languages the rose;
And, striving to be man, the worm
Mounts through all the spires of form."

Does some one say: "Surely, you are mistaken. That is Darwinism pure and simple; and you must have quoted by mistake from Darwin's Origin of Species or Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy?" Here is indeed evolutionism before Spencer and Darwinism before Darwin; but I am not mistaken. The words are not Spencer's or Darwin's: they are Emerson's. If the motto suggests Darwin and Spencer, the book as it goes on suggests John Stuart Mill, from whom also we have an essay upon "Nature" of about equal length with Emerson's. But here the suggestion is by opposition. Mill is pessimistic in his view of nature. Emerson is optimistic. Nature, as conceived by Mill, is hostile to man. As conceived by Emerson, she is educative and beneficent. The result of Emerson impresses me as infinitely more rational than that of Mill. But, however this may be, the little book was full of a profound and serious beauty. There are sentences on every page worthy of everlasting remembrance. What a sturdy challenge rings at our feet in the opening paragraph of all! "Why should not we also enjoy an original relation to the universe? Why should we grope among the dry bones of the past? The sun shines to-day also. There is more wool and flax in the fields. There are new lands, new men, new thoughts. Let us demand our own works and laws and worship." This brave beginning promises much, but not more than we get. How Nature serves the body is set forth in telling phrase, then how she educates the mind. But how she makes us moral is the final word. "All things are moral," he insists, "and in their boundless changes have an unceasing reference to spiritual nature. Every animal function, from the sponge up to Hercules, shall hint or thunder to man the laws of right and wrong, and echo the ten commandments. This ethical character so penetrates the bone and marrow of nature as to secure the end for which it was made. Every natural process is a version of a moral sentence. The moral law lies at the centre of nature, and radiates to the circumference. It is the pith and marrow of every substance, every relation and every process. All things with which we deal preach to us." The heart of Emerson is in these sentences, the underlying granite of his nature which crops out through every soil that overlies the surface of his mind.

The published works of Emerson, so far as they have yet been collected, make but a small amount,—five volumes of essays and lectures, two volumes of poems, together with English Traits and Representative Men. A few more volumes might easily be made up from the pages of reviews and magazines. And still the catalogue would be brief in comparison with Carlyle's "gospel of silence," in thirty volumes octavo. It does not follow that Emerson has not been a diligent worker and writer. He has written a great many lectures that still lie in manuscript. There let us hope they will continue to lie, save in so far as he has expressly commanded their publication. It would be an act of gross impropriety to publish anything which does not bear his imprimatur. By all means let us be content with what we have rather than clutch at anything which did not satisfy his exigent ideals. Almost simultaneously with the printing of his first book began his career as a lecturer, and any account of his entire activity would be absurdly incomplete which did not include a most explicit mention of this special feature. Happy are they who are well acquainted with his books without ever having seen his face or heard his voice, but vastly happier are they who knew the presence of the man, his face, his voice, his wise, elusive smile. These can never read his pages without reproducing him to their imagination, without seeming to see him and to hear his emphasis and intonation. His delivery had a wonderful interpretative power: it made sentences that to the eye were dubious as clear as crystal in their meaning. But why should I detain you with my own hasty and imperfect words when Bronson Alcott has described him for all time? His description has never been surpassed; it is impossible that it ever can be. If Emerson could have objectivized himself, he could not have described himself more perfectly: "See our Ion standing there, his audience, his manuscript before him, himself an auditor, as he reads, of the genius sitting behind him, and to whom he defers, eagerly catching the words,—the words,—as if the accents were first reaching his ears too, and entrancing alike oracle and auditor. We admire the stately sense, the splendor of diction, and are surprised as we listen. Even his hesitancy between the delivery of his periods, his perilous passages from paragraph to paragraph of manuscript, we have almost learned to like, as if he were but sorting his keys meanwhile for opening his cabinets, the spring of locks following, himself seeming as eager as any of us to get sight of his specimens as they come forth from their proper drawers; and we wait till his gem is out, glittering; admire the setting scarcely less than the jewel itself. The magic minstrel and speaker, whose rhetoric, voiced as by organ-stops, delivers the sentiment from his breast in cadences peculiar to himself; now hurling it forth on the ear, echoing; then, as his mood and manner invite, letting it die away like

'Music of mild lutes
Or silver-coated flutes,
Or the concealing winds that can convey Never their tone to the rude ear of day.'"

I have known many sweet and pleasant things so far in my experience, few sweeter or pleasanter than to have heard Ralph Waldo Emerson. There are communities which had this happiness so frequently that we have a right to expect from them something of unusual nobleness. For forty seasons in succession, the Lyceum at Salem, Mass., welcomed his words of lofty inspiration.

The published works of Emerson are, for the most part, essays and lectures which were used upon the platform many times before they were printed. But each separate essay or lecture was always a becoming, a definition of truth by some German philosopher, until it fairly crystallized in print. The process of change and growth went on long after the manuscript had been given to the publisher. Print is the most critical test to which we can subject our thoughts, and Emerson's proof-reading was of the most remorseless and expensive character. The last result of so much patience and deliberation was all that these could lead the most judicious to expect. The thread on which the writer strung his beads might often be invisible, but each separate bead was perfect in its beauty. Nothing is more proverbial than his lack of logical coherency. But the lack, it seems to me, is superficial. It is not of interior connection. He has no firstlies and secondlies. He does not divide and subdivide his subject-matter. He does not lay out his thought like a city, in blocks and squares, but like a park, with winding roads that interlace each other, and have less regard to any ultimate destination than to the pleasure of the way. The unity of his discourse is not mechanical, as of a house, but vital, as of a tree. He seldom argues, almost never. He sees, and tells us what he sees; turns his subject this way and that, and lets it flash new meanings on himself and those who would be his disciples.

But those who find the most to blame in Emerson's essays and lectures, considered as so many wholes, will hasten to allow the perfect beauty of innumerable sentences and passages that they contain. Himself a famous quoter, delighting in sententious books and authors,—the quotable sort,—he is himself one of the most quotable. You know that I myself have found him so. I sometimes wonder if I have ever preached a sermon which did not contain one or more of his inimitable sayings. And for how many of my best quotations that are not from him am I indebted to his books! The service of Emerson has been immense in multiplying our store of excellent sayings from a wide range of authors. But for every one he has transmitted from others he has coined a dozen out of the substance of his own experience which have a universal currency. If some of these prevail by force of wit or humor or serene intelligence, others prevail by dint of an ineffable and immortal beauty. No music I have heard has ever thrilled me as some sentences of Emerson's have done. Some of you doubt if I could still say this, if I were as musical as you are. I do not doubt.

The unintelligibility of Emerson has been frequently asserted. It is related of him that, when he went to Egypt and confronted the Sphinx, the Sphinx, breaking the silence of forty centuries, said to him, "You're another." What shall we say to this? That what was expressible Emerson could express as distinctly as any son of man, but sometimes he would fain express the inexpressible. Then, too, sometimes there may have been defect in the intelligence of his readers. But, whatever is obscure in him, there is abundance that is clear as day. What aspect of our common life has he not touched with his illumination? He has a word for all. No humblest workman, no divinest artist, need ever go to him in vain.

We often speak of Emerson as a philosopher, but oftener as a poet; and the growing tendency to the almost exclusive use of the latter of these designations indicates an improving sense of his essential quality. But Emerson is not a poet merely within the limits of those writings to which he has given rhymed or rhythmic form. The poetic form does not make poetry, and the prosaic form cannot unmake it. Aside from fancy and imagination, the prose of Emerson has a movement, a rhythm, a happy collocation of the words, which make it a delight to read him, quite apart from what he says, and sometimes dim our eyes with happy tears. In his Fable for Critics, Lowell acknowledges this poetic quality of Emerson's prose. But how about his poetry?

"Here comes Emerson first, whose rich words every one
Are like gold nails in temples to hang trophies on; Whose prose is grand verse; but whose verse, the Lord knows,

Is some of it pr— No, 'tis not even prose.
I'm speaking of metres. Some poems have welled
From those rare depths of soul that have ne'er been excelled.

In the worst of his poems are mines of rich matter,
But thrown in a heap with a crash and a clatter."

Allow all this, and still the place of Emerson is secure enough among our major poets. Without Lowell's range of style and feeling, without Whittier's effusive tenderness, without Longfellow's grace of sentiment and perfect mastery of form, without Bryant's even excellence, he is, of all our poets, the most thoughtful, the most quotable. His poems, like his prose, are packed with thought. Their intellectual force is the first thing that impresses us. And, in the long run, that is the best poetry which has the most thought in it in a quotable form. If he had not written one poem perfect in its wholeness, he would still be invaluable as a mine wherein the rarest lines lie deep imbedded. One needs to read him slowly, and to hold the rich and juicy phrases, as it were, lingeringly between the tongue and palate of the mind before the final swallowing. Goethe declared that, if he could live his life over again, he would write poetry that would shock the devotees of rhyme and rhythm, and yet win honor and applause by its intrinsic merit. Emerson has done what Goethe would have done. But he has also written poetry in which "the lyrical cry" is as entrancing and appealing as in any poetry yet written in America:—

"How tenderly the haughty day
Fills his blue urn with fire!
One morn is in the mighty heaven,
And one in our desire."

If that isn't poetry that sings, where will you find poetry that does sing? And Emerson has written scores of stanzas just as lyrical as that; sometimes, indeed, whole poems that maintain this lofty pitch.

Emerson's brothers, Charles and Edward, died in early manhood. They were men of force and genius. The youthful mind of Charles was much more suggestive of Ralph's in its maturity than was Ralph's own. They were men of public spirit; and, when they died, Ralph felt that he must do his best to make up for their loss to the community. He did not "sit aloof." He entered heartily into various social schemes, but always with this understanding,—that, if he served at all, it must be on his own terms. He would be a passive cog in no reformatory wheel. He was an abolitionist from the beginning, but without feeling bound to accord an equal admiration to all abolitionists. As time went on, each changing aspect of the anti-slavery struggle found in him its best interpretation. When John Brown was legally murdered in Virginia and Abraham Lincoln was illegally murdered in Washington, no other told so well what these men signified for us and for all time. I never shall forget his words in Boston the Sunday after Lincoln's preliminary proclamation of emancipation. I never shall forget the impressiveness with which he said, "Do not let the dying die. Hold them back till you have charged their ear and heart with this message to other spiritual societies, announcing the amelioration of our planet." In verse as well as prose, he voiced the various need and passion of the time. Methinks that brave young men marched to their death with steadier pulses and completer resignation to the worst that might befall because of sentences like these revolving in their minds:—

"Stainless soldier on the walls,
Knowing this,—and knows no more,— Whoever fights, whoever falls,
Justice conquers evermore,—
Justice after as before.
And he who battles on her side,
God, though he were ten times slain,
Crowns him victor glorified,— Victor over death and pain
For ever."

One of the most interesting phases of the life of Emerson is his connection with the Dial, of which he was at first sub-editor,—his principal, Margaret Fuller,—and afterward sole editor. And it is a notable fact that under his editorship the Dial became less literary and more practical. Another capital stroke of work before his fortieth year was his introduction of Carlyle to his American audience. Thanks to Emerson, Sartor Resartus and the Essays of Carlyle were published here in book-form before they could get a publisher in England. The Brook Farm experiment interested him profoundly. A frequent visitor, he never could quite bring himself to such surrender of his individuality as seemed essential to a communistic life. "Spoons and skimmers," he said, "you lay indistinguishably together; but vases and statues require each a pedestal for itself." Do men and women require less?

I am impressed by nothing else in the total aspect of this man so much as by his wonderful inclusiveness, for all his dislike of Shelley and the French people and some other limitations. No delicate dilettante was he who must have delicate dilettantes alone for his associates. At home with scholars and artists, he was not less at home with farmers and mechanics and menders of the town's highway. There is evidence in his books that he got as much from these as from the artists and scholars. Genuineness, sincerity, was the only passport needed to his honor and regard. The ways of Lincoln and John Brown were as different from his ways as possible, and yet they found in him their liveliest appreciation. Another sign of his inclusiveness was his equal love of books and nature at first hand. There is the literary style, and there is the natural. Emerson's was preëminently the latter. You find in him no conventional similes and metaphors. The word fits the thing—is modelled on it. The streets of Concord and its outlying fields, the homely occupations of its men and women, these furnished him with fresh and lively illustrations of the most serious themes.

"There is nothing great or small,
To the soul that maketh all," he sang. It was not otherwise with him, or rather every smallest thing was great to him with the divinest implications. He seemed to walk with introverted eyes, and yet nothing escaped him and he forgot nothing. When the train-boy beguiled me into buying some of his absurd confections, Emerson said to me, "Does it taste as pleasant as the rose-cakes that you made when you were a boy?" Candor compelled me to reply that it did not. He was our first idealist, and yet there was not in the land a firmer realist than he. He did not believe that matter had any substantial existence, but ginger was not on this account any less hot in his mouth. We say he was a transcendentalist, and we are apt to think of him as far removed from later scientific tendencies. But you are desired to note that he is the favorite author of the men of science. Tyndall is always quoting him. He dragged the scientific Hectors at his chariot wheels. Nay, he invited them to ride with him, and they could not refuse his pressing invitation. As a book of Exodus, Emerson was well pleased with science. But, as a book of Genesis, he liked it less. It could celebrate the going forth, not the beginning. I have already spoken of the Darwinism in the motto to his earliest publication. But in his essay on "Nature" in the second volume of his Essays, antedating Darwin and Spencer nearly twenty years, I find this brilliant and astounding prophecy of their results, and Tyndall's Heat considered as a Mode of Motion: "Efficient nature," he says, "publishes itself in creatures, reaching from particles and spicula, through transformation on transformation, to the highest symmetries, arriving at consummate results without a shock or a leap. A little heat,—that is, a little motion—is all that differences the bald, dazzling white, and deadly cold poles of the earth from the prolific tropical climates. All changes pass without violence, by reason of the two cardinal conditions of boundless space and boundless time. Geology has initiated us into the secularity of nature, and taught us to disuse our dame-school measures and exchange our Mosaic and Ptolemaic schemes for her large style. We know nothing rightly for want of perspective. Now, we learn what patient periods must round themselves before the rock is formed, then before the rock is broken, and the first lichen has disintegrated the thinnest external plate into soil, and opened the door for the remote Flora, Fauna, Ceres, and Pomona to come in. How far off yet is the trilobite! how far the quadruped! how inconceivably remote is man! All duly arrive, and then race after race of men. It is a long way from the granite to the oyster; and farther yet to Plato and the preaching of the immortality of the soul. Yet all must come, as surely as the first atom has two sides." We question whether Darwinism evolutionism, ever can be made to harmonize with poetry and with religion, and behold our first idealist arrived at these results long before Spencer, long before Darwin, not by the path of science,* but by the sheer necessity of poetry and of religion! Here is good cheer for me; for I have often said that it was quite impossible for me to judge of evolution in the "dry light" of science, the poetic and religious aspects of this doctrine have for me such strong attractions. I find in Emerson a prophet of the ultimate synthesis of our most radical science with an idealist philosophy and a religion drenched with the consciousness of an omnipotent and omnipresent God.

The relations of Emerson to Christianity have been a subject of debate. Success is always orthodox. Let any man conquer the admiration of the world, and Orthodoxy will endeavor to capture the prestige of his illustrious name for the adornment of its triumph. That an attempt would, soon or late, be made to capture Emerson was simply inevitable; but what it proves is not his Orthodoxy, but the appalling laxity into which the defenders of the faith have fallen in these latter days. Emerson was a vice-president of the Free Religious Association for many years before his death. His reverence for Jesus was reverence for his human worth, the illustration which he furnished of the beauty and the sacredness of spiritual laws. If he said, in a jubilee of sublime emotion, "I and my Father are one," this was to Emerson no more than any man can say, who has arrived at true self-consciousness. The mechanical-toy theory of Christianity called supernaturalism was for Emerson, constituted as he was, simply impossible. Its lack of poetry, of beauty, was its sufficient condemnation; also its lack of vital and organic harmony with the general make of things.

I do not know that Emerson has ever been declared an atheist.† If he has not been, it is very strange; for almost every man who believes in God a great deal more than the most orthodox of his contemporaries is certain to be dubbed an atheist at one time or another. He has frequently been called a Pantheist, and might as well (I borrow from Carlyle) have been called a

*The ideas of Lamarck and Schelling and "that particularly unsatisfactory book," as Huxley calls it, Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, may have had some influence.

†Since writing this I find that he has been. See "The Emerson Maula" in Littell's Living Age.

pot-theist, for all the meaning that the word conveys to ordinary minds. The significant fact is this: that for Emerson the Universe was full of mind, of will, of law, of order, of beauty, of justice, of beneficence. "Religion includes the personality of God," he said in Nature. Whether he would have said this at the last I do not know—nor care. Saying it, he would never have meant that God was any great non-natural man. Denying it, he would never have meant that He was something less than Mind, Intelligence, and Love. The essence of religion is not confined by these distinctions of personality or impersonality in God, but plays back and forth through them, like the ocean through the meshes of a net that men have sunk into its streaming tides. Myself preferring to affirm the personality of God, I see that it is possible for men to have a different preference and yet have a sense of Deity in power and beauty infinitely transcending mine. There was no man of his generation who believed in God more perfectly than Emerson, and I for one do not believe that his belief was better than the fact.

His bravest word concerning Immortality is this: All is so well with us that we are certain that all will be well. But, in the splendors of the mind and in the exaltations of the righteous will (I wish that he had added the affections of the heart), he finds some powerful and gracious intimations of our personal continuance, when the mysterious bound of life is overpast. Here, Emerson, never denying, was on his ground of faintest affirmation. His ground of stoutest affirmation was the Moral Law. It is for this that he has stood, stands, and will stand, with grand preëminence. The Moral Sentiment, he said, is but another name for that causing force, that supreme reality, which lurks within all things that are. "As the granite comes to the surface and towers into the highest mountains, and, if we dig down, we find it below the superficial strata, so, in all the details of our domestic and civil life is hidden the elemental reality which ever and anon comes to the surface, and forms the grand men who are the leaders and examples rather than the companions of the race. The granite is concealed under a thousand formations and surfaces, under fertile soils and grasses and flowers, under well-manured, arable fields, and large towns and cities; but it makes the foundation of these, and is always indicating its presence. So it is with the Life of our life: so close does that also hide. I read it in glad and in weeping eyes. I read it in the pride and in the humility of people. It is recognized in every bargain and in every complaisance, in every criticism and in all praise. It is voted for at elections, it wins the cause with juries, it rides the stormy eloquence of the senate, sole victor. Histories are written of it, holidays decreed to it, statues, tombs, churches, built in its honor. Yet men seem to fear and shun it, when it comes barely to view in our immediate neighborhood." Then he goes on, and let us join our voices with his voice: "For that reality let us stand; that let us serve; that let us speak. Only so far as that shines through them are these times or any times worth consideration. Let it not be recorded in our memories that, in this moment of eternity, when we who were named by our names flitted across the light, we were afraid of any fact, or disgraced the fair day by a pusillanimous preference of our bread to our freedom. What is the scholar, what is the man for, but hospitality to every new thought of his time?"

It is the true, the real, the deepest Emerson that speaks these words. This is his grand, sweet song. He may wander far, and lead us through a thousand devious ways and fairest gardens, but he always brings us home to this at last: the Moral Law,—truth, justice, righteousness. These, he says, are the foundations. Without these there were no beauty, no intellect, no universe, no God. For these "preserve the stars from wrong,

And the most ancient heavens through these are fresh and strong."

If we are wise, we shall not go to Emerson expecting him to give us any definite creed or system of philosophy. Plenty of honest judgments he will give us upon men and things; and, if we could see deep enough, we should, I doubt not, see that all of these have an interior coherency. Plenty of beauty we shall find on every page; plenty of humor, too, everywhere as an atmosphere, and ever and anon condensed into a startling flash. But, over and above all this, it is the spirit of Emerson and the influence which proceeds from this which constitute his greatest value and significance for us. The love of truth, the love of beauty, the love of righteousness, are not here or there upon his pages: they are everywhere. And so simple and sincere are they, such joy the writer himself has in them, that, as we read, we cannot, if we would, resist his charm. If you do not want to fall in love with beauty, truth, and righteousness, then let Emerson alone. But, if you are willing to let these deliver on your heart the force of their divine persuasion, you cannot go to him too often; for you will find it nowhere else more potently embodied than in the music of his words.

It is exactly fifteen years since his May-Day made the May-time more beautiful for me and mine with his keen-eyed perceptions. The little volume also contained his "Terminus."

"It is time to be old, to take in sail," he sang; but there was no complaint. The note he struck was one of lofty cheer.

"As the bird trims her to the gale,

I trim myself to the storm of time:

I man the rudder, reef the sail,

Obeys the voice at eve obeyed at prime:

'Lowly faithful, banish fear,

Right onward drive unharmed:

The port well worth the cruise is near,

'And every wave is charmed.'"

And now the port is gained. To-day, his honored dust will be committed to the ground in Sleepy Hollow where Hawthorne, too, lies buried, and where Emerson (it was not a place of burial then) found him one day lying at Margaret Fuller's feet, and said to them, "The muses are in the woods to-day." England accords to Darwin—how quickly have the curses turned to praise!—a tomb in her Westminster Abbey. Shall we regret that we have no such place in which to house the ashes of our dead? No: it is better as it is. His is the vaster temple; his the grander harmonies. He would not sleep apart from humble men. He would not consent that any church should shut in even his ashes from the illimitable All.

"Sorrowing most of all that they should see his face no more." These Bible words have seldom such an accent of truth for us as they have when spoken of Emerson. His was such a pleasant face! The eyes were so kindly! The smile was such a gracious comment on the general folly of mankind. The last time I saw him, he was upon School Street in Boston, close by "the stone tavern," as he called it,—loving simple names,—meaning the Parker House. There seemed to be a sudden, swift illumination of the crowded street; and, seeking for the cause, there was his Yankee face, shrewd as the type, then a few words of that delightful voice, and he was gone. The last impression could not have been more beautiful. No wonder that his fellow-townsmen came to love that gracious presence. A life of peace on earth, good-will to men, had etched and moulded in his face the visible symbol of its interior spiritual significance.

How pathetic is the story told of him at Longfellow's funeral,—of his saying to a life-long friend, "The gentleman whose funeral we have been attending was a sweet and beautiful soul, but—I have forgotten his name"! O rarely noble friend, "a sweet and beautiful soul" wast thou as well; and we will not forget thy name, nor thy example, nor all the words of hope and cheer that thou hast spoken to our hearts!

"Every day brings a ship,

Every ship brings a word.

Well for those who have no fear,

Looking seaward, well assured

That the word the vessel brings

Is the word they wish to hear."

CORRESPONDENCE.

"WHAT ARE BRAINS FOR?"—A REPLY.

Editors of The Index:—

I do not happen to be acquainted with Mr. W. Mitchell, who appears as my critic in your issue of May 4. But, if this is a specimen of his method, he can hardly call it "scientific" enough to make it a fit standard by which to put other people to the test. In the first place, his "induction of facts" is sadly deficient. He says: "While looking over the Herald the other morning, . . . I found a synopsis of Mr. M. J. Savage's discourse of the previous Sunday." If he has found, in any daily paper, what can properly be called "a synopsis" of anybody's sermon, it is indeed a discovery worthy of record; but I have never seen such a report. He ought to know by this time that what pass for reports in the daily papers are always inadequate and frequently inaccurate in the extreme. If he wishes to criticise a man,—and I have no fault to find with him who criticises ever so severely anything I really say,—he should at least take pains to find out what he has said.

In the present case, he has wasted a good deal of paper and done me an injustice by attacking something that does not exist. My sermons are published in full each week; and, when he wishes to attack anything I have actually said, I will gladly send him a copy on application. There is nothing now for me to refute; for most of his positive statements I heartily assent to, and indeed have never thought of denying. In my sermon, I did not attempt at all what he seems to suppose I did. So that his somewhat officious willingness to answer my question better than I had done it puts him in the position of replying to a question that I had not raised.

Two-thirds of the way down his first column, he puts me in quotation-marks as saying "the best modern thinkers" believe that "the only real things in existence are mind and God." I really do not know where he found those words. I did not use them in the sermon he set out to criticise. And I haven't time now to read through all I have published to see if they occur anywhere else. I do not remember using them at all. And, if I ever did, I feel quite sure I did so in some connection that would give them a meaning other than the one he has put upon them.

If one is looking only for exercise, no doubt he can find it in fighting "wind-mills," like Don Quixote, as well as anywhere else. But the only blood spilt in such encounters is apt to be that of the erratic knight.

QUESTIONS.

Editors of The Index:—

It has been argued that force is simply motion. But is gravitation a state of motion. And what is meant by static electricity, if not force at rest? Science defines force as an immaterial substance that moves matter, which implies that motion is an effect. Science also has demonstrated that force can neither be created nor destroyed. Now, mind being a force, does it not logically follow that, as force, it never had beginning, and as power of thought by evolution it can have no ending?

An answer to the above questions would instructively interest the

MISCELLANEOUS.

"CHILDE ROLAND to the dark tower came" was Mr. Browning's ballad chosen for discussion at a literary society in England. Rev. W. Kirkman affirmed that the poet meant an allegory on death. Miss Drury affirmed he meant an allegory on truth. Mr. Furnivall stated, on the authority of the poet himself, that he meant nothing at all; but, far from abandoning their theories, they indignantly repudiated the interference of Mr. Furnivall, allegorized as Mercury, plainly telling him that, if he insisted on consulting Mr. Browning, allegorized as Jupiter, there was no necessity for a Browning Society at all.

MR. TENNYSON, through his son Hallam, has replied to the temperance society which recently forwarded him a resolution expressing regret at the "drink" passages in his new song. "My father begs to thank the committee," the son writes, "for their resolution. No one honors more highly the good work done by them than my father. I must, however, ask you to remember that the 'common cup' has in all ages been employed as a sacred symbol of unity, and that my father has only used the word 'drink' in reference to this symbol. I much regret that it should have been otherwise understood."

THE Princess Beatrice, Queen Victoria's youngest daughter, alone remains unmarried of all the English royal family. It is whispered that the Queen is so dependent upon this her favorite daughter's society for companionship that she is in no haste to pick out a partner for her, and would be quite content to have her remain single. At the time of the sad death of the young Prince Imperial of France, Eugénie's son, there was a romantic story afloat as to the Princess Beatrice and her love for him; and it is barely possible that that was the one romance of the young girl's life, for which the Queen may feel a womanly sympathy.

It does not follow that, because a long article is able and accurate, it ought to go into a newspaper. If our writers will not cut their articles short, let them remember that the reader will cut them altogether, and without compunction. In a contest for admission between a two or three-column article and several shorter communications, the issue is never doubtful. The reader will pardon the weakness of a production on the single score of its brevity; but for the mammoth article, which loads down a half-page, there is no hope of mercy, whatever may be its merit. If brethren must write these immense and endless things,—if no process of compression can reduce them,—then let them seek a place in some quarterly, or else they must sink into the oblivion of the waste-basket. For such articles, we have no room, and feel that it is our solemn duty to say so. It is only in the rarest and most exceptional cases that we can admit series of articles. The simple sign-mark "No. 1" at the head of a communication will stampede the bulk of readers.—Religious Herald.

NO MAN of the age was so feared and hated by the large body of Christian teachers—we will not say by all—as was Darwin. The reason was that the explanation he gave of the production of species was one that contradicted their notion of the interpretation of an obscure part of the Bible. Darwin taught the world, and it is now accepted from him by the great bulk of the students of animal and vegetable life, that the wonderful uniformities of structure discernible in different species, genera, and orders, is due not merely to a general plan in the mind of God, after which each species was instantaneously created, with all its special peculiarities, but to the fact that all had descended from a common parentage, and thus had inherited common characteristics. His theory was not the one common up to his time,—of special creations,—but of development or evolution. With great ingenuity and great wealth of research, he expounded this doctrine, first propounding a very gradual development from the mere predominant survival of such individuals as were but slightly better adapted than others to their environment. Afterward, other ideas, his own or suggested by his disciples, introducing other forces, and more sure and rapid in their action, have now greatly modified the original idea as propounded by Darwin and enunciated by Spencer. But this great idea of evolution has been accepted as a basis for research by the whole world of students, and has given rise to a marvellous range of discovery. Whether true or not, it has given a biological philosophy which is generally accepted, and is of the deepest interest, as it brings us so much nearer to the origin of existence. . . . It is not the fashion nowadays so much as it was for religious teachers to abuse what has become the prevalent scientific position. Too many Christian scientists believe in it, and those who cursed it in the name of the Lord are beginning to fear that their curses may come home to roost; and all but a few, of small discretion, now hold their peace. So Darwin has died, having revolutionized the thought of the scientific world and silenced his theological foes. Not now, perhaps, but by and by it may be seen that he has done much indirectly to put religious faith, as well as scientific knowledge, on a higher plane.—Independent.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

COUNT VON MOLTKE, Germany's veteran field marshal and chief of staff, has taken leave of absence for an indefinite period preparatory to final retirement from office.

OWING to shattered health and advancing years, Prince Gortschakoff, at his own request, has been relieved of the functions of minister of foreign affairs by the Czar of Russia.

ON the day that Emerson died, six Emerson trees, two oaks and four rock maples, were planted in Authors' Grove at Eden Park, Cincinnati,—a fitting memorial of the dead poet.

MRS. ESTHER A. COOLEY, of Bingham, Me., has received a commission from Governor Plaisted to solemnize marriages, administer oaths, and take acknowledgments of deeds.

THE widow of Junius Brutus Booth is still living, in a green old age, at Long Branch, where she is honored and respected. She was a Miss Mary Anne Holmes, and was a beautiful girl in her youth.

DR. MARY WALKER has been appointed to a clerkship in the pension office at Washington by Secretary Teller, in consequence, so it is stated, of the strong representations made to him as to her destitute circumstances.

THE many friends of Mr. Edwin D. Mead in and about Boston will be glad to know that he has been materially improved in health by a two or three months' vacation in Pennsylvania. He is now in Cleveland, Ohio.

ERNEST HAECKEL, the celebrated naturalist, and the first German who supported Darwin's theory, is at present travelling in India; and a series of letters from India from his pen are being published in the Deutsche Rundschau.

THE Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals had better extend its protective powers so as to include its President, Henry Bergh, who last week was brutally beaten by a ruffian named McKeever for attempting to arrest the driver of a lame horse.

MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON intends visiting Paris soon, partly to see her first grandchild (who is also her namesake) and partly to study European Communism, Socialism, and Nihilism. We hope the results of her study will be given us in a lecture upon her return.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT is prosecuting before the London courts a couple of men who extorted fifteen guineas from her for the return of her dog. She described herself as a journalist and publisher, and declined to take the customary oath, on the ground that she was an atheist.

"BOB INGERSOLL" seems to be a name which, like the fabled wand of Midas, turns every thing it touches to gold. From the "Bob Ingersoll" goldmine in Arizona, within two days recently was shipped three bars of bullion, valued at nearly thirteen thousand dollars.

PROF. FELIX ADLER closed his year's work in New York last Sunday, and gave a "Sixth Anniversary" address. In the course of it, he commented on the three problems to which an ethical movement must address itself; namely, a new ethics, a new religious philosophy, and the new consolations.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, in a recent speech, said that he had received an offer from American friends to give him the sum of $10,000 in advance to deliver a course of lectures in this country next autumn; but he had declined the offer, in order to fight out his battle with the British Parliament.

It is hinted that our great showman Barnum is really of noble descent, and is probably a scion of the Earl of Caledon's family, the coat-of-arms of which consists of a mermaid on one side and an elephant on the other. If a woolly horse and a gorilla had been thrown in, there could be no doubt whatever as to Barnum's blue blood.

LIEUTENANT DANENHOWER, survivor of the ill-fated arctic exploring steamship, "Jeannette," was shown great honor by the Czar and Empress of Russia on his arrival in St. Petersburg by being given a reception by them at an hour sacred to State purposes; or rather the Czar did himself honor in the pleasure of an interview with so brave a man as Lieutenant Danenbower.

THE Darwin medal, founded by the Midland Union of Natural History Societies, has been cut by Mr. Joseph Moore, of Birmingham. It bears a likeness of Mr. Darwin on the one side, and on the reverse an inscription relating briefly the history of its foundation, together with a branch of coral, indicative of one of Mr. Darwin's most important and successful researches.

In addition to the two poets so recently passed away, Emerson and Longfellow, many of the best-known and most highly honored men in this country have already outlived the allotted term of "three-score years and ten." Among these may be mentioned the historian Bancroft, John G. Whittier, Wendell Phillips, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Charles Francis Adams, David Dudley Field, Judge Jeremiah Black, Horatio Seymour, Alexander H. Stephens, and Charles O'Connor. A few more years only will be granted to these veterans, and we see among the rising men of the age few who can worthily fill their vacant places.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

THE American Free Trade League has been organized in New York. David A. Wells is President. It aims "to secure organized and united efforts in promoting commercial freedom between this and other countries, seeking to obtain to the greatest practicable extent the same freedom in trade between nations that exist between the States of the American Union."

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON and Susan B. Anthony recently addressed letters to each of the members of the Senate Select Woman's Suffrage Committee, urging them to recommend to Congress the proposed amendment to the Constitution providing for women's suffrage. The committee had a long discussion on the subject last Saturday, and have voted to make the recommendation.

THE French minister of foreign affairs has approved a scheme, which the President has appointed a commission of forty-eight to examine, to flood the desert of Sahara, and convert it into an inland sea by means of a canal two hundred miles long from the Mediterranean. A navigable sea in the place of this great desert, if it is possible, will open up the better parts of Africa, and lead to important results which no man can foresee.

THE statutes pending before the British Parliament for the repression of crime in Ireland are of a severe and summary character, and are the subject of much criticism, which is apparently not without reason, considering the unanimity with which Irishmen have denounced the Dublin crime; but it is gratifying to learn that remedial legislation of the widest scope for the relief of Irish tenants is to go hand in hand with the stern measures that are deemed necessary to give security to life in that distracted country.

A LEADING Boston clothing house shows its disinterested generosity by advertising "suits for clergymen" and their families at ten per cent. discount from regular prices. Of course, so thriving a firm as the one that thus advertises understands thoroughly the financial worth of such clearly marked religious tendencies; but, in view of the liberal salaries and comparatively easy work of the majority of the clergy of to-day, it would seem to the uninitiated to be an act of more real charity to make this discount to some harder-worked and more poorly paid class of laborers,—horse-car drivers, for instance.

THE Boston Herald has no high opinion of the Chinese bill which lately became a law. "It is better," it thinks, "than the original bill which the President vetoed, but it is still vicious, un-American, and impracticable. It creates a pariah class, with a machinery of espionage and discrimination not in harmony with our institutions. It is based on false social and economic ideas, and therefore we do not believe it can be permanent. It is, in effect, the adoption of a partial policy of seclusion against which we protested so earnestly and efficiently in the case of China. It is the construction of a Chinese wall against one race as much entitled to our respect and consideration as others which are freely admitted. It is a mean, narrow, contemptible law."

IN visiting the Peabody Museum at Cambridge with his party of Zuñis, Mr. Frank Cushing examined for the first time the splendid collection of Inca articles, which included certain things which have been the puzzle of archaeologists, and known as the "Peruvian mysteries." These he at once saw were the religious sacrificial paraphernalia of the Incas, and, in essential characteristics, substantially identical with those used by the Zuñis. They were also identified by the Zuñis as corresponding to their own. "It is hoped," says the writer in the Architect, "that this important subject will be worked up by Mr. Cushing jointly with Prof. Putnam, the latter treating it from the stand-point of Peruvian archaeology, while Mr. Cushing tells of the present observances of the Zuñis."

FROM the general tone of "Ouida's" works, we should scarcely expect to find her entering the lists as "a defender of the faith"; yet it seems she has recently had a "call" in that direction, judging from an extract from an article she contributed recently to the Gentleman's Magazine, a violent tirade against vivisection, in which she declares that "the vast and ever-increasing body of persons who are opposed to any form of religion has conceived that, in encouraging vivisection, it encourages free thought, because the most cruel vivisectioner in Europe was elevated for a few weeks into the position of a Minister of the French Republic." The knowledge of "Ouida's" well-known character as a good hater leads us to wonder whether it is religious ardor, horror of the pain necessary in vivisection, or personal dislike of M. Paul Bert, which most influences her pen.

GEN. ABE BUFORD, Kentucky's famous turfman who recently "got religion," continues to defend the race track: "Suppose," said he, "that we had been without a race course since Noah left his ark with his inferior Barb or Arabian horses. Our great generals, Forrest, Stuart, and Morgan, would have cut a pretty figure during the late war with their men mounted on such horses as these were! What sort of a race would I have made during the war, when chasing Sturgis back into Memphis, mounted on one of Noah's mustang ponies? Or what would have become of me when Wilson was chasing me across the bridge near Columbia, Ga., on which the Yankee picket seized the bridle of my horse and struck me over the head with his sabre, mounted on one of Noah's horses? I would have been a lost child. But, being mounted on an improved thoroughbred, after discharging my pistol at his head, I made a rapid and successful retreat."

THIRTY-TWO residents in the fashionable quarter of Murray Hill have petitioned the New York Board of Health to put a stop to the ringing of the bell of the church of St. John the Baptist at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street. The petitioners say that the noise of the bell, which is large and deep-toned, destroys rest and affects injuriously the nervous and the ill, and conclude thus: "This hideous noise is utterly unnecessary to the worship of God, and forms no part of it, and is simply a relic of the times when there were few, if any, watches or clocks in the community whereby people could learn the hour for repairing to the sanctuary. Its continuance is detrimental to health and ruinous to property, and we therefore pray that it may be abolished and forever hereafter prevented." The Board of Health says it will consider the matter, and has notified the trustees of the church of the complaint. The congregation is large and wealthy, and will resist.

THE results of the investigation into the causes of consumption and other tubercular diseases by Dr. Koch, an eminent German physician, as described by him at a recent meeting of the Physiological Society of Berlin, are a strong corroboration of the germ theory of diseases to which Prof. Tyndall has devoted considerable attention. After a long series of careful experiments, by microscopic examination and other methods, Dr. Koch says he found in all cases that the diseased organs were infected with a minute parasite. By transferring a speck of tuberculous matter from these diseased organs by inoculation to healthy animals, the disease was in every instance reproduced. To meet the objection that it was the virus contained in the diseased organ and not the parasite itself which was the real contagium, he cultivated his bacilli artificially through many successive generations. He prepared a composition to furnish nutriment for the parasite, and infected it with a speck of matter from a tuberculous lung. The parasite grew and multiplied, and from the new generation he took a speck and in the same way grew another crop. This was continued indefinitely with similar results in each case, and at the end of the processes he inoculated healthy animals with the purified bacilli. In every case, the inoculation was followed by reproduction and the generation of the original disease.

"NUMNY DUMNY": OR MODERN CABALISTIC THEOLOGY.

A gentleman residing in Redruth has sent me some examples of contemporary Cornish superstition. An old servant of his father's died last year of cancer in the stomach. He was convinced that he was the victim of a vampire; and the dissenting minister who visited him fully agreed in this view, and, having heard that my informant was trying to convince the sufferer otherwise, warned the latter against him as an "unbeliever." Not very long ago, a ghost was formally laid in the parish churchyard at Redruth by a clergyman, presumably educated at Oxford or Cambridge. But the story which most interests me is the following: My correspondent says that, a few months ago, he met a miner, who told him that the devil will always fly from you at the words Numny Dumny. These cabalistic words are the outcome of Nomine Domini. Whether the Redruth scholar explained this to the miner, I know not; but, if he did, the words have probably lost their charm for him forever. It is doubtful if any miner in England could be persuaded that any devil cares more than he for In the name of the Lord, in plain English. Long familiarity with that kind of thing has bred contempt.

Numny dumny may seem only a bit of foolish folk-lore; but so also may seem unimportant some tiny fossil picked up on the wayside,—such, for instance, as a shell (Cyrena), one-fourth of an inch in diameter, imbedded in a small stone I picked up on the Weald near Hastings, last Easter Monday, while rambling with some geologists. The sea was near by, the evidences of its wild work were all around us; but this little fresh water shell, hundreds of feet above the sea, was a small, still, infallible voice, witnessing that, before the sea had severed England from the continent, a great river had flowed from Germany to England, and left its monument in these countless fresh-water shells, revealed by marine denudation. Numny dumny, too, this bit of Latin fossilized in a Cornish miner's faith, testifies of the great ecclesiastical stream that ran from Rome to find its estuary in England, before the Reformation cut its channel between Protestantism and Catholicism. It witnesses also the nature of that old river of faith, a kind of dark, Stygian flood, haunted with terrors. Dig up one of its relics, you find a symbol of the universal fear. In remote districts of Germany, if a ghost is to be laid or a cow dispossessed, even Protestants employ the Catholic priest. In Cornwall, if the devil is to be put to flight, an old Romish rune is used, though nowhere is Romanism more dead. There is also in that Cornish spell a trace of a belief compared with which Christianity itself is modern, namely, in the real connection between names and things. "Talk of the devil, and his horns will appear." We have but lately found out the real name of the Hebrew deity (Yahve, or, as others think, Yahu), because the Jews avoided writing it. "Yahu will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." This superstition survives in the judicial oath. The old invocation of Zeus Orkion, the Guardian of Oaths, now represented by "So help me, God," means (though the evidence is too voluminous to be introduced here) that this deity is bound, literally, to respond, if summoned by name,—bound to become party to the compact with which his name is connected, and to inflict a special punishment upon the party that has invoked him "in vain,"—i.e., to "help" his falsehood.* Mr. Froude says that Carlyle did not like to pronounce the name "God," but would substitute euphemisms. It is very likely that this repugnance was at first a survival from the peasantry amid whom he was born, though afterward continued by his contempt for what the name commonly meant.

Words are the coin of fools, the counters of wise men. This old Cornish coin, with its nearly worn out image and superscription, does not need much wisdom to discern the debased fact of which it is the counter. "Numny dumny" is not further removed from "Nomine Domini" than the Lord of English sects to-day is from the Lord of England's olden faith. It would be a surprise to learn that any clergyman, unless he who laid the Redruth ghost be still alive, could be found attempting anything practical with the name of the Lord. The clergy may use the name of Jesus against an abstract devil; but, if they want to get tithes from a recalcitrant farmer, they invoke the constable. The people now seriously interested in Jesus are humanitarian heretics and historical sceptics. Christ lives on heresies. There is, indeed, a show of revived interest in Jesus among the ritualists; but, making an allowance for an exceptional mysticism which takes that form, this recent Jesu-ism is closely related to the craze for old china. It is "early English." The ritualistic churches are decorated by unbelievers like William Morris, who can stain windows with pre-Raphaelite saints, as the late Dante Rossetti, a radical unbeliever, could paint, in poems or pigments, Christian gods and goddesses as he painted those of paganism. Robert Browning's Florentine Jew getting rid of a Madonna painted near the Jewish cemetery for insult by buying it for his gallery of Venuses and nymphs is not without his Christian parallel in England. A sweet unconsciousness attends this transmutation of Christian symbols into virtù. It is mainly politicians who utilize the wide-spread interests of the Church and the fanaticism of vulgar sects that are characterized by hypocrisy. English Christianity means dilettantism in the cultured class, indifference in the thinking class, hypocrisy in the political class, vulgarity in the believing class.

This last class, the folk who really try to fight their devil with spells, to others merely politic or picturesque, is represented by the Salvation Army. These are the consistent believers in the tremendous dogmas of Christianity, and their movement is the most interesting phenomenon that has been known here since the rise of Wesleyanism. It is repeating, with wonderful fidelity, the phases of earlier enthusiasms, and explaining them; while, at the same time, it marks the fact that genuine Christianity has gone down and down the social scale, until it can only stir the mud. It is Christian oath." But no such oath exists. "On the true faith of a Christian" was expunged long ago for the sake of the Jews. The objectionable words in the oath now, "So help me, God," do not refer to any deity now believed in by any member of Parliament, and can be used as fairly by an atheist as by a theist. To make that oath theistic, in any ordinary sense of theism, it would be necessary for an authentic court of law to decide that the word "God" in it means what is now commonly understood by the word. That would disable an atheist from taking it, just as the Jew was disabled from taking the old Christian oath. Even then, the atheist would only be morally disabled. He could not be legally disabled except by a farther judicial decision that the phraseology of the oath is of the substance of the oath. There being no legal decisions adapting the antiquarian sense of "So help me, God," to English theism, or making the letter essential to the spirit (i.e., intent to fulfil a deliberate promise), an atheist violates no principle of his belief in taking the oath. If an affirmation be open to him, he might naturally prefer it, not because the oath is theistic, but because its form is a relic of barbarian superstition, and also because its preservation lowers the popular standard of veracity by diffusing the notion that even a benevolent untruth sworn to is worse than the most malignant lie unsworn.

sufficiently curious that just as Herbert Spencer has been setting forth his far-reaching generalizations on the military, as contrasted with the industrial type of society, this Salvation Army, organizing the elements of Christianity in earnest, should have shown how inevitably they take the form of a Church militant. The head of the Army is "General" Booth: his wife and three sons are officers, and his daughter is styled "Maréchale." There are colonels, majors, captains, lieutenants, and sergeants, as many of them females as males. They depend on keeping up in every neighborhood some enthusiast who is able to "draw" the roughs. Thus, in Hendesford holds forth the "Converted Drunkard"; in Accrington, the "Halleluiahs Fish-monger"; in Camborné, the "Converted Clown" and the "Blood-washed Miner"; in Leicester, the "Happy Baker"; in Blaina, the "Converted Welshman"; in Swindon, the "Halleluiahs Parson"; in Belfast, the "Devil Dodger"; in Glasgow, the "Devil Walloper," and so on. On their marches and in their gatherings, they have brass instruments, drums, triangles, and tambourines, which may make a joyful noise to the Lord, but one less happy to terrestrial ears. Trumpets and horns sound on the Sabbath air to awake somnolent souls. They publish a paper called the War Cry, which is filled with "testimonies." A brother, "who used tobacco for twenty-one years and could not pray without a chew, has, after a hard fight, made a surrender." Another said that, "when he told his wife that he had joined the Salvation Army, she called him names, and threw his shield through the window. He and his son got on their knees, and prayed that God would have mercy on her. While doing so, old boots were flying about; but they prayed on, and the next night she came and got herself saved." In Chester-le-street "there was a man so bad that he went by the name of Charlie Peace. He would come home sometimes so drunk that his wife had to hide his razors; but now a wonderful change has been wrought in him." (Charlie Peace was the name of a wholesale murderer recently hanged.) A brother says: "I used to go to public houses and stand on my head on the table, and play my concertina, and dance with my feet against the ceiling; but I am saved now." A wonderful case is that of "Captain" Beaty, a boot-finisher, who used to get dangerously drunk, and one day "seized a chair, struck his wife to the floor, and then kicked and dragged her about the room." Sometimes, he would smash furniture and use the pieces as missiles against all who interfered. It seemed "as though he were the devil in human form," for which reason he was called "Friday." Satan set himself to prevent "poor, sin-stained Friday from becoming a saint." His (Satan's) special disguise was that of a publican who set pewter-pots on his doorstep. But "General" Booth fought on the other side, and Friday is now a saint in the Army. "The pickets of the 99th 'Death and Glory' lads and lasses went to Downham the other day for a skirmish, and had real 'blood and fire' meetings in the railway carriage. The travellers were greatly affected."

These people, you will observe, have all the factors of a real, live apostolic church. They are fishers of men. Salvation to them means something: it means saving men from a devil whose throne happens to be the gin-shop. It must not be understood that this is a temperance movement. It does not demand abstinence from drink as a condition of membership. But it needs the people, and has been brought into necessary collision with this and other bad habits of the masses, such as unfit them to be active recruits. The public house and the Salvation Army compete for the same class of people, who cannot serve both. They sometimes set up in their assemblies revolving tree-like "altars," on which are hung bottles and pipes and bits of female finery, the "idols" offered up by certain brothers and sisters to Jesus. Every idol bears its offerer's name, and he or she is cheered with shoutings. Thus, following the Captain of their salvation in heaven means to these poor soldiers a real self-conquest on earth. But it also means a sharp conflict with the world. No week passes without their being mobbed. They are never the assailants, and are always the sufferers. At this moment, one of their female lieutenants lies in a critical condition from a blow; a colonel had an eye knocked out with a stone last week; and many have scars. These mobs are instigated and planned by publicans, infuriated at seeing their old customers now passing by their vainly glittering palaces. "Beer and Bible" had long been allies, and largely ruled in England. Together, they have absolutely swayed Sunday, the publican closing while the parson preached, and the parson barring up the museums, art-galleries, and theatres, so that the poor should have no other refuge from their deus than the public house. The Salvation Army has broken in on this comfortable arrangement. They, too, supply stimulants, and such as are not followed by such depressions. They have made the discovery that there is a holy Bacchic ecstasy happier than a Bacchanalian orgie. Therefore, the publicans, whose only faith is "Great is Alcohol of the English," send out their Apollyons wherever these pilgrims are marching, not seeing that they thus give as intensely real a character to the conflict of these humble Christians as Nero ever gave to that of the primitive martyrs. So powerful are these publicans who debauch this nation, so rich their Lord, the Licensed Victuallers' Association, which puts every great brewer in Parliament, that mayors and magistrates are afraid to control these rioters. It requires all the protest and vigilance of just men to see that the publicans shall not oppress the Salvation Army through the forms of law. Municipal authorities, trembling for their position, are prone to conciliate the publicans by prohibiting these Christians from marching. In London, a youth is imprisoned (the pretext, causing obstruction) for selling the War Cry, and three of the Salvation Army were imprisoned at Exeter for being attacked. In Oxford, where the university authorities rule over the city, the Salvation Army has free course; and it is stated, on unbiassed authority, that the chief brewer there has stopped two of his carts and had to discharge ten hands.

What do the rich and powerful, the polite and scholarly "Christians" know of such work and obstructions as these? Emerson said of Webster, He knew well the heroes of '76, but never the heroes of '56, when he met them on the street. Last Sunday, the finest master of pulpit rhetoric in England, Canon Liddon, preached a splendid sermon in St-Paul's on the text, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." Nothing could have been more graphic than his picture of the heroic sufferance, the victorious martyrdom, of the Christians opposing the magnificent and imperial "world" of seventeen hundred years ago; but there was no word heard in the cathedral recognizing the pathetic and heroic struggle all around it of poor sots and criminals to free themselves from actual devils, or of their martyrdom under the Alcohol Nero of to-day. Canon Liddon says the "world" now to be overcome is no longer an outward one, but an inward one, formed after the tradition of the other, a materialistic devotion of the heart to earthly objects and pleasures. Of course, for Christianity and the Canons now are the world; but what have they to "overcome"? Where is their faith winning victories over any "world"? Numny Dumny! The Salvation Army of Galilee is now the Church of England, "faith" that enjoys the world which martyrs overcome. And all the later Salvation Armies travel the same way,—e.g., successors of the Quakers, Puritans, Wesleyans. They were all mobbed when they were really overcoming evils and wrongs. But now, though a monument to Bunyan be built by descendants of those who imprisoned him, and his book is gilt-bound in every library, Bunyan's Pilgrims are scoffed and stoned as they move on the streets; and no worshipper of St. Bunyan helps Christian in his daily struggle with a visible and very brutal Apollyon. However, it is not to such Apollyons that such movements succumb. The monster that devours them is success. The Army has in three years laid up money enough to purchase four large halls in or near London, one being the skating-rink in fashionable Oxford Street. Their corps have risen from 48 to 286, their officers from 100 to 623; and the War Cry has a weekly circulation of 255,000. Several bishops are lately speaking well of them. Consequently, already we find the Salvation Army defining itself from some humbler army than itself which has raised a flag as the Army of Jesus. It is well enough, therefore, to study this movement before it goes the way of all enthusiasm. The shouting Salvationist will ere long be sitting in his fine chapel, drinking champagne, and chanting his "Numny Dumny" against a devil long dead.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

THE ARGUMENT OF DARWIN'S LIFE.

The revolutionary character of Darwin's scientific teachings as bearing on problems of theology deservedly attracts wide attention. But not least among the lessons which this foremost man of science has given to the religious world are those involved in his personal character and life. These have already been remarked upon in this journal, but they cannot be set forth too strongly.

Darwin has left an example of how truth may be sought and won and propagated, to which religious teachers may well give heed. He was no dogmatist, no narrow, egotistic partisan of a theory because he had himself propounded it, and was therefore bound to advocate it. Truth was his one guiding star, the one sacred thing to which he was devoted. To that he was loyal, let come what might to systems and theories with which his name was connected. He did not define truth, as is the habit of theologians, by some system of it already formulated nor by the facts of nature already discovered. To him, truth meant all the actual facts and forces of the universe, discovered and discoverable. He saw all around and through his theories, and knew and candidly stated the objections to them. It was he who, from his superlative knowledge of the fields of inquiry, gave to his opponents the very facts with which they argued against his theories. But this did not disturb him. He had no wish to go further than the facts would warrant, and contented himself with understatement rather than risk an exaggerated generalization. Fully aware of the radical and revolutionary import of his views, yet he was most modest and self-controlled in the assertion of them. Never could man have a more implicit or serenely trust in truth itself,—in "truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." He had no question of its acceptance, let only the evidence of it clearly and with unbiassed faithfulness be spread before intelligent minds, and no question of its safety for mankind, if once intelligently accepted. He was, therefore, the disciple of no theory, of no man, not even of himself, but Truth's disciple.

And how patient, untiring, far-searching he was in the pursuit of truth, how generous in his motives and magnanimous in his methods, how pure in all his private life, how free from all vulgar ambitions, from vain-glory and ostentatious display of his gifts and achievements, the world is now beginning to know. The churches, indeed, are beginning to see that in antagonizing and abusing this man they have been treating as an enemy one who in his personal character came remarkably near even to their own best pattern of what they have called "Christian" manhood. Being reviled, he reviled not again. He was simple and lowly of heart. "He did not cry out nor lift up his voice, nor cause it to be heard in the street. . . . A bruised reed he would not break. . . . As a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Yet he would "not fail nor be discouraged until he should bring forth judgment unto truth." In these personal characteristics, he is near to the Church's own model of its Redeemer. And hence, whatever the Church may do with Darwin's doctrines, it behooves it, unless its professions are solemn hypocrisies and its precepts false maxims, to take the example of Darwin's life to heart as among the best moral forces of our time. When theologians shall have learned his fairness and frankness, his calmness and courtesy, his sincere simplicity, his self-forgetful patience in the pursuit of knowledge, his pure, disinterested devotion to truth as the all-dominating object of life, then indeed will judgment be established in the earth near unto the line of truth.

And it is an interesting and a noteworthy fact that, in the personal qualities of character and life, there was a marked resemblance among the three distinguished men who have died recently so near together,—Longfellow, Darwin, and Emerson. High as they stood as intellectual powers, they were equally great in their moral example. They had the same serene self-poise and self-command, the same amiability, the same satisfaction in the home virtues, the same admirable and persistent fidelity to a noble life-purpose which in early manhood won their fealty, and for which they each won as the years advanced an ever more masterful triumph. Strong in their inner rectitude, they lived nearly to the same ripe age, shedding "sweetness and light" along their pathways, and leaving in the world a memorial of their moral worth not less enduring than that of their intellectual achievements. And in these times, when, in view of the frequent sight of self-seeking, corrupt, and incompetent men in public positions, and of the crime and vice brought to light in private life, we may be tempted to despair of the human race as becoming degenerate, it is encouraging to recall the characters of these three famous men, contemporaries of our own century, whose intellectual gifts would have added distinction to any age that has gone before us, and whose moral purity of life would grace any age that will come after us.

WM. J. POTTER.

A TRUE MAN.

Many who claim to be in sympathy with the enterprise and progress of this age yet tenaciously hold that the teachings of the New Testament are the very perfection of moral wisdom, many even who have abandoned all belief in the special inspiration of the Bible are accustomed to regard Jesus as a model man and the New Testament as a work which, although fabulous in its miraculous narratives, is faultless in the precepts and rules which it furnishes for man's guidance through life. This position we think untenable. Consider some of the prominent characteristics of a true man of the age. He is attached to this world, his thoughts are on himself and his fellow-men, the busy world with its multitudinous scenes and events. He is interested in all the great projects, in all the great material, intellectual, and moral enterprises of the times. The construction of railroads, the building of ships, the erection of magnificent edifices, far from impressing him with the thought that men are too much attached to the world, rather excite his admiration; and he is proud that he belongs to a race capable of such achievements, and to an age so distinguished for its activity and progress. He is himself ambitious to attain to excellence, to achieve success in some department of thought or labor. He sees that poverty is attended by many deprivations and great disadvantages, while wealth gives to its possessor leisure and comfort, distinction and influence. Adapting himself to the conditions which he finds in the world, he strives to add to his earthly possessions. During the day, his mind is on business, not on God or heaven or hell. From the cares and perplexities of the office or shop or the labor of the field, he seeks relief in the society of his wife and children, in the companionship of congenial friends, in the columns of the daily papers, among his books, or in some of the amusements of the day.

He feels pride and pleasure in his home. He makes it pleasant and attractive. If possible, he surrounds it with shade-trees, fountains, and flowers. The latest and freshest literature, the papers and magazines of the day, volumes of poetry and fiction, as well as the more substantial books of history, philosophy, and science, works of virtù and art, music,—all that can please the eye and ear, and minister to the love of the beautiful,—are made to adorn, enrich, and refine his home. To his wife and children, he is thoroughly devoted. He treats his wife not as a subordinate, but as an equal, a companion, a friend. The thought that he may love his family too much never enters his mind. The notion that his affection as a husband and father, by linking him too strongly to this world and diverting his mind from God or Jesus or heaven, is liable to result in the loss of his soul,—such a notion never for a moment disturbs him. When he looks upon his wife or sees the smiling, happy faces of his children, he is disturbed by no apprehension that in a few years some of them, perhaps all, will be writhing in hell.

The difficulties of life he encounters with a stout heart and determined will. He does not mourn or whine over the misfortunes of life. He has, quite likely, his hours of melancholy; but he does not sit down and cry, and deem it a virtue to do so. By exercise, by music, or other means adapted to his taste and condition, he endeavors to drive away sadness and gloom, and to recover his usual frame of mind. He does not imagine that the salvation of his soul will be promoted by feeling sad and sorrowful and weeping much of the time.

He maintains his own rights, while granting freely to others all they can justly claim. He sees that habitually conceding to others who demand more than they are entitled to encourages them in their extortion, and injures the cause of morality. He defends his person and his property. He allows no man to smite him on the cheek or to take his coat without permission. Yet he resorts to violence only when it is absolutely necessary, and deems it wrong to cherish revenge. If wronged, he seeks redress; but, except in extreme cases calling for instant action and personal violence, he endeavors to obtain justice by an appeal to the laws of his country.

He hates tyranny and oppression, and resists them by violence, if necessary. He admires the brave spirits of the past who have inspired their countrymen to rise in rebellion against oppressive governments, and led them through the fire and blood of revolutions to victory and freedom. He is in sympathy with every people that is struggling for liberty, and wishes to see every nation free. He loves liberty for himself, and desires it for his fellow-men in every clime.

He ascribes his misfortunes and those of his fellow-men to natural causes. He never thinks of attributing them to the agency of a devil or of demons. To remove these evils, he makes use of natural, secular means.

His confidence is in human effort wisely directed. He trusts not in prayers, but in the ingenuity, skill, and power of man in subjecting the forces of nature to his will and making them subservient to his ends. All through life, he looks to human effort and to natural methods. He never expects miraculous aid. For human improvement, he looks to those movements which tend to diminish poverty and give the people better homes, better clothing, and better food; which remove the temptations and inducements to criminal acts and vicious indulgences; which encourage temperance; diffuse knowledge, and enable men and women to better, every way, their earthly condition.

In estimating a man's worth, he considers his character, not his creed. If he has dealings with an individual, his standing in business circles is of more importance to him than his standing in the Church. He judges men by their conduct, and not by the frequency or form of their prayers, nor by the interest they manifest in theological doctrines.

Such are some of the prominent traits of a character which has the approval and commendation of the enlightened judgment of the present age. The individual who possesses these traits and whose life corresponds with the principles mentioned has the confidence and respect of all, without regard to party or sect. The virtues here alluded to, or many of them, are, by a perversion of language, called Christian virtues, and the character in which these excellencies are embodied is spoken of by the people as a Christian character, the word "Christian" being used as a synonyme for true, good, virtuous, etc.

In another article will be presented the characteristics of a true Christian,—one whose life conforms to the teachings of the New Testament,—a portrayal of whose character will, if we mistake not, show that, as Strauss says, "If we open our eyes and are honest enough to avow what they show, we must acknowledge that the entire activity and inspiration of the civilized nations of our time are based on views which run directly counter to those entertained by Christ."

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

EMERSON EXPLAINED.

Mr. Potter's recent article upon Mr. Emerson's religious position was so much to the purpose that one ought not perhaps even to regret its brevity. But light has broken from another quarter upon this question, which may make some reconsideration of it necessary on the part of those who regard Mr. Emerson as somewhat more than Christian in his religious views. In the Christian Register of May 11, the Rev. H. N. Brown, of Brookline,—the same whose profanation of Mr. Emerson's funeral, in a prayer which The Index fitly characterized as "a prolonged strain of commonplace," betrayed an assumption of the departed seer's return to a faith he had discarded,—makes the following important communication: "I say advisedly—and knowing whereof I speak—that he [Mr. Emerson] had no quarrel with Christianity; but the teachings of Christ were true in his regard, not because they were written down in a book called the Bible or attested by a seal of miracle, but because they answered to his own perceptions, and were based upon what he in his own heart knew to be the eternal verities of existence." In the absence of the Rev. Joseph Cook, we are fortunate to have this other authoritative interpreter of the opinions of the teacher whom so many minds have reverently sought to know, but who consented, it appears, to confess himself, beyond what his published words convey, to one. The world owes a debt of gratitude to this expounder for the important discovery which an acquaintance with Mr. Emerson in his years of mental decline has enabled him to make. He shows us that the method of Emerson is precisely the method of Jesus; that he saw "again something of what Jesus saw" (something!); in short, that he was just the sort of believer in him that Jesus wished for! Emerson, then, was a good Unitarian Christian, after the kind who to-day are endeavoring to rekindle the wasted fires of that denomination. Now let the other sects in turn claim him as their apostle.

If any answer is necessary to such artless violation of the name of Emerson, the best reply is an appeal to his books. That he had no quarrel with the spiritual sentiment of Jesus is no proof that he did not abandon Christianity. "Historical Christianity," he says, in the Divinity College address at Cambridge, "has fallen into the error that corrupts all attempts to communicate religion. . . . It is not the doctrine of the soul, but an exaggeration of the personal, the positive, the ritual. It has dwelt, it dwells, with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus. The soul knows no persons. . . . By this Eastern monarchy of a Christianity, which indolence and fear have built, the friend of man is made the injurer of man. The manner in which his name is surrounded with expressions which were once sallies of admiration and love, but are now petrified into official titles, kills all generous sympathy and liking. All who hear me feel that the language that describes Christ to Europe and America is not the style of friendship and enthusiasm to a good and noble heart, but is appropriated and formal, paints a demi-god as the Orientals or the Greeks would describe Osiris or Apollo. Accept the injurious impositions of our early catechetical instruction, and even honesty and self-denial were but splendid sins, if they did not wear the Christian name. One would rather be 'A pagan, suckled in a creed outworn,' than to be defrauded of his manly right in coming into nature, and finding not names and places, not land and professions, but even virtue and truth foreclosed and monopolized. You shall not be a man even. You shall not own the world; you shall not dare, and live after the infinite law that is in you, and in company with the infinite beauty which heaven and earth reflect to you in all lovely forms, but you must subordinate your nature to Christ's nature: you must accept our interpretations, and take his portrait as the vulgar draw it."

If this was not a protest against the "liberal" as well as other Christianity of that date (1838), then why did its professors and believers generally oppose and denounce the man who spoke it? Or does not "liberal" Christianity claim or allow itself to be "historical" Christianity? If Emerson, standing on his spiritual instincts, at last brought them round to him, what right have they now to claim him, who compelled them to virtually unsway their creed, as its believer and advocate? The same protest the man who spoke forty-five years ago would make to-day, whatever show of excuse his long senility may have furnished to unscrupulous sectarian zeal for asserting the contrary. It is not necessary to cite, in addition to the above, a hundred other passages from his books, to show that Emerson stood quite above and outside of all specific denominations and faiths, and cannot be appropriated, now or hereafter, even by the most indeterminate and self-deceiving of all, to which (and to sundry of its priests), in the name of him whose voice upon problems of the soul never gave uncertain sound, one might put the question,

"What have been thy answers, what but dark, Ambiguous, and with double sense deluding?"

J. H. CLIFFORD.

"THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD" ONCE MORE.

Reply to Mr. Salter.

For two reasons, I must try to be very brief. First, I do not want your readers to get tired either of this great subject or of me. Only one piece of music becomes wearisome, even if ever so well played. And, secondly, I am so driven with other matters that I have not the time for elaborate treatment.

Instead, then, of taking up, one by one, Mr. Salter's points and replying in detail, let me revert to the main question, and try to put my finger on just the point of our difference. If I understand him aright, he holds the position that only physical facts can be scientifically known; while I hold that anything that is a fact (any real thing that in any way touches or concerns us) can be scientifically known. I will not now dogmatize on the question as to whether there are any other than physical facts; for that would involve the raising of the whole inquiry as to the nature of mind and matter. But, if there are psychical facts, and if, differing from physical facts, they are nevertheless facts, I believe they can be investigated by the scientific method. In my use of language, I do not call anything known that has not been scientifically demonstrated. I cannot now go into the matter as to just what or how much I think is or can be thus known, though I should include some things that I presume Mr. Salter would leave out.

It seems to me that Mr. Salter imagines himself to know more than he does about the "bar of iron," and that herein lies the reason why he thinks he knows less than he does about a man. He says, "We know or may know (and directly know) the iron and any physical organism completely." And, to show that this position is deliberately taken, he later says, "If any one has such immediate knowledge of my thought as he doubtless can have of the phenomena connected with my body," etc. Now, I cannot for one moment agree with him that he has any "direct" or "immediate" knowledge of iron or flesh any more than he has of another man's thought.

There is a long and curious road between the bar of iron and his consciousness. And, when he has made the most searching investigation of the iron, all he knows is that some real thing outside of him—which is called iron—has been the occasion in him of certain sensations, some of which he calls weight, hardness, color, etc. Now, what does he know of a man? Only this: that some real thing outside of him—which is called a man—has been the occasion in him of certain sensations, some of which he calls form, color, intelligence, etc.

The kind of knowledge in the two cases seems to me precisely the same, and the method of getting at it seems to me also precisely the same. And, if I cannot get at the Ding an sich in the case of the man, neither can I any more in the case of the iron. The reality of a being who manifests intelligence as a phenomenon of his existence is scientifically demonstrable in the same sense precisely as is the reality of a thing that manifests hardness as a phenomenon of its existence.

That, in a word, is the point I have tried to make. I have not tried to show what mind is any more than I have tried to do the same concerning iron.

THE INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT IN SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

We suppose it is all right that the United States government should take the census of the religious denominations of the country; but we imagine that a good many clergymen who have been plied with the census agent's circulars of questions to be answered, some of which were not very easy to answer, have been disposed to query whether the government, even if keeping strictly in its province, was not inquiring after an altogether superfluous amount of minute details. The climax of superfluity must have been reached in a late circular concerning "Sabbath-schools," which contains, under twenty-four separate heads, seventy-two questions to be answered, with generous space left also for volunteer remarks! All this is on the face of the circular. On the back of it is a schedule for the names of all the teachers in each "Sabbath-school," with their full post-office address; and the request is added that, if they live in a city, the street and number shall also be given. On puzzling our brain to discover why the Census Bureau should be so desirous to have the names and specific post-office address of all the Sunday-school teachers in the country, a broad crevice of light became visible through the printed direction on the enclosed envelope in which the circular, after being filled out, is to be returned to the census agent. This direction reads: "HENRY RANDALL WAITE, Special Agent Tenth Census, Office of the 'Sunday School Times,' PHILADELPHIA, Pa. The envelope is a regular government envelope, with the printed 'Frank' of the Department of the Interior in one corner. The Sunday School Times is a weekly paper of very large circulation, devoted to the interests of Evangelical Sunday-schools. That the census returns from Sunday-schools should be stopped in its office might afford a clew to the singular request for the precise post-office address of all Sunday-school teachers. It is easy to see that such a list would be of use there, though only an encumbrance in the Census Department at Washington. But, then, the inquiry would be suggested, Has the Census Bureau entered into a partnership with the Sunday School Times for the increase of its circulation and the spread of Evangelical Sunday-school literature?"

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

We forgot to state last week that the war in the orthodox journals over the appointment of Dr. Newman Smyth as Professor of Theology at Andover is likely to cease, for a time at least, the Board of Visitors having vetoed the nomination of that gentleman. The Visitors are only three, and two voted No and one Yes. The rejection was not made, however, on the ground of theological unsoundness, but because, to state the substance of the reasons given, the majority consider Dr. Smyth a rhetorician rather than theologian. Immediately upon the rejection of Dr. Smyth as professor, the Trustees, with a finesse worthy of New York politics, appointed him Lecturer on Theology in the Seminary for one year, an appointment over which the Visitors have no power. Whether he will accept this or a call to an influential pastorate at New Haven is, at this writing, uncertain.

DR. EDDY, a Congregationalist minister of Detroit, having expressed his opinion that "the danger to the faith does not lie just now in Congregationalism nor in Andover Theological Seminary, but in the secret spread of a subtle liberalism in the Presbyterian churches of Scotland and America," the Presbyterian says:—

We are inclined to Dr. Eddy's opinion, though some of the facts upon which he bases his judgment may be interpreted in a more favorable way. There is a "subtle liberalism" working in the Churches named, as it is working in all the evangelical Churches, which may work out some day disastrous results to those who are smitten by it, and give great trouble to the Church. Watchful eyes are needed among the directors of our Theological Seminaries and in the Presbyteries to which young men come for licensure.

The more favorable facts to which the Presbyterian alludes are that, though a considerable number of heretical ministers have in recent years appeared in Presbyterian pulpits, the churches have generally had an "expulsive power" sufficient to separate them "from the fold." It names quite a list of clergymen, more or less distinguished, who have experienced this "expulsive power"; and it adds:

Somehow there is in the atmosphere of the Church a clearness and healthy crispness which makes it uncomfortable for nascent heretics; and they soon, in one way or another, escape from it. Exfoliation of this kind is not an unhealthful process, and the Church may possibly bear a little more of it.

"Exfoliation" is a new name for it.

THE Christian Union, in a finely appreciative article on Emerson, has this noteworthy paragraph, which contains, if we mistake not, some of the "subtle liberalism" to which Dr. Eddy refers:—

The finest outcome of Emerson's idealism was his reverence for humanity, his recognition of the divine element in human affairs, his faith in an ever-present God. For him, revelation had not closed, nor had the prophets ceased to speak. He revered the Bible, but he did not separate it from other books. He honored the prophets, but he refused to set them apart from humanity. He expected to hear the voice of God as clearly as Moses heard it, he looked to see the guidance of God as surely as the pious Jew watched for the march of the pillar of fire, he waited in serene assurance that prophets would continue to speak as long as poets and thinkers and philosophers continue among men. In this, most Christian thinkers will not agree with him; but there can be no question that, in a conventional and mechanical age, this attitude has done much to reopen the ancient fountains of truth and inspiration. It is a teaching which has reconciled noble minds to the hard conditions of life, stirred the pulses of youth with lofty resolutions, cheered and consoled the struggling and fainting in the weary march, and, like the bugle-call of a glorious leader, has rung along the front of a hard-pressed line of battle.

THE New York Examiner offers the following argument for the special truth of Christianity:—

Strong contrasts are oftentimes great teachers. One of them occurred in this city (New York) on Sunday evening last. On the one hand, the hours of the evening were occupied by Ingersoll in a series of his coarse and blasphemous denunciations of Christianity. On the other hand, the same hours were filled in the Brick Presbyterian Church by an earnest effort, on the part of men like Drs. R. S. Storrs and Roswell Hitchcock, to devise measures for the more effectual civilization and evangelization of Africa. Put these things together, and you have the spirit of infidelity in contrast to that of Christianity. The lesson is significant.

We have no objection to "infidelity" or any other form of Liberalism being held to the test of good and humane works. We believe in applying such a test to every form of belief or of non-belief. Liberals may not have much interest in the "evangelization" of Africa. But it has repeatedly happened that, while they were pleading the cause of justice to Africans in the United States or the improvement of the condition of woman, or a fairer and humaner treatment of laborers, reverend Doctors of Divinity have been spending the same hours in their pulpits in attempts at proving the dogmas of atonement and the Trinity and the true, apostolic succession of bishops. We commend this "contrast" to the Examiner as containing a lesson quite as "significant."

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on the 1st and 2d of June, 1882, with sessions as follows:—

THURSDAY EVENING, June 1, at 7.45 P.M. Business meeting for election of officers, hearing of reports, and action upon the Resolutions referred from the Conference of March 28. The following amendment to the Constitution, prepared by a Committee appointed for the purpose by the Executive Committee, is to be proposed for adoption in lieu of present Article III.:—

The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and twelve Directors. They shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the Association; and the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors be chosen. The Directors shall be chosen for four years, and, at the expiration of that term, shall not be eligible for re-election until after two years. One fourth of their number shall be chosen annually; but, at the annual meeting of 1882, the full number of twelve shall be chosen in sections of three respectively for one, two, three, and four years. The President, Secretaries, Treasurer, and Directors shall together constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. They shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number, or in the list of Vice-Presidents, between any two annual meetings. Six members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

FRIDAY, June 2.—A Convention for essays and addresses at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M., with the following programme of speakers and topics:—

Morning: T. W. HIGGINSON, "A Tribute to Emerson"; W. J. POTTER, "Liberty, but Religion also"; S. J. STEWART (Bangor), "Morality as the Aim and Crown of Liberty and Religion."

Afternoon: W. M. SALTER, "Why the Ethics of Jesus do not satisfy the Needs of our Time"; ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, "The Appeal of the Unchurched to Free Religion"; E. C. TOWNE, "The Permanence of the Christian Method in Religion"; B. F. UNDERWOOD, "Science as a Factor in Moral and Social Progress."

FRIDAY EVENING, a Social Festival will close the proceedings, with the usual features of interest.
WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

A BRILLIANT contribution on "Light and Life," from Mr. D. A. Wasson, will appear in The Index next week.

MR. CONWAY's sketch of the work and methods of the Salvation Army, in his article given in The Index this week, is extremely interesting.

FROM the New York Tablet, we learn that, "among the ancients, Descartes and other able writers held the Darwinian theory." That journal wants to know "how is it that since the days of Adam, a time of which we have true historical record, man has not degenerated into a monkey, or the monkey made no advances in development toward man?"

In an address published in the Christian Advocate, Rev. James Strong, LL.D., says: "Evolutionism is a barefaced and downright falsehood. It is an affront to genuine science and an insult to common-sense. . . . Evolution is essentially atheistic. It has no other raison d'être but to usurp the place of a personal God. . . . Christians should therefore shun it as a deadly foe to revealed religion." Dr.

Strong would probably be able to subscribe to the Andover Creed.

THE Chicago Tribune, not finding in any of the orthodox hymn-books anything suited to its peculiar taste in that line, has been looking over the hymns used by the Zuni chiefs at the incantations and religious ceremonies recently performed at Deer Island and elsewhere, and decides that they are more nearly expressive of the Tribune's inner consciousness than any other sacred songs; also, that they are only eclipsed in rhythm and harmony by Walt Whitman's "barbaric yawp."

"It is astonishing," observes the Independent, "that so wild and absurd a book as Wilford Hall's Problem of Human Life should have reached its twenty-fifth edition. A writer in a Macon, Ga., paper well says that its success brings vividly to view 'the poverty-stricken type of culture that obtains among a large class of teachers in pulpit and schoolhouse in our country,' who accept its pretentious and ridiculous replies to dogmatizing materialism as sound. This is the book that stoutly denies the wave theory of sound."

WE desire to call attention to the private family school of Mr. E. A. H. Allen, advertised on our last page. The school is to be opened next September in Northboro', Mass., which is one of the most delightful country towns in the State. It is to be limited to ten boys, and special attention is to be given to preparation for Technical Institutes. Mr. Allen is a graduate of the Polytechnic Institute of Troy, N.Y. He is a teacher of much experience, and belongs to a family of natural educators. Boys cannot be put under a more healthful, intellectual, and moral influence than will be found with him.

WE have received the first number of the Internationale Monatschrift (January, 1882), a German literary and political magazine, published at Chemnitz, by Ernst Schmeitzner. It is liberal and reformatory. Indeed, judging from this first number, it would almost seem to be the organ of Bruno Bauer, thirty-nine of its sixty-eight pages being written by him. His name alone would make the magazine worthy of attention. Whether his death, recently announced, is to affect its fortunes, remains to be seen. An article by E. Schläger on "Free Thought in the United States" follows too closely for historical accuracy the rose-colored reports made by the Liberal League delegates from the United States at the Freethinkers' Congresses in Brussels and London.

In a recent sermon, Rev. M. J. Savage said: "When in Chicago, I had for a neighbor a brilliant orthodox minister, who was afterward settled in Brooklyn, and has since died. He confessed to me that he did not believe in the infallibility of the Bible, he did not believe in everlasting punishment, he did not believe in the trinity. Yet he stood day by day on a creed that committed him to all these doctrines and in a pulpit where he was expected to believe and preach them all. Only a little while ago, a minister of a well-known city of New England came to my study, and I had several talks with him. He confessed that he was looking for a Unitarian church, but, as he did not find one to suit him, and did get a pleasant call from an orthodox church, he is preaching there to-day."

"No SINGLE instrumentality," says the Christian Statesman, "threatens greater injury to the cause of the Sabbath to-day than the publication of the great newspapers of the country seven days in the week. The weekly 'Sunday papers,' issued only on the Sabbath, have had a distinctive character, which limited, heretofore, their influence for harm. They were scurrilous, trashy, sensational, and viciously hostile to the Church and religion.

But the seven days' issue of the ordinary secular newspaper, replete on the Sabbath as on other days with important and interesting news, with some additional features of special interest, with an editorial on some moral or religious theme not in itself unsuited to the sacred character of the day, carried from the great cities to all the leading towns by the government mails on trains expedited with special reference to the newspaper service,—all this present an array of forces which are destined to work disastrous results to the purity, fidelity, and spirituality of the Church. Christian men ought to be specially resolute and watchful not to admit this insidious and powerful enemy of the Sabbath into their homes." A good Sunday newspaper seems to be regarded by the writer of the above paragraph as more dangerous than "scurrilous, trashy, sensational" Sunday papers, for the same reason that many look upon a free thinker whose life is pure as more dangerous than one whose life furnishes them with an illustration of what they think must be the legitimate results of "infidelity."

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

POETRY.

For The Index.

A NIHILIST PRINCESS.

A fairy tangle of light brown hair,
A face for a poet's bride,
A lithe, light form, divinely fair
By undulant lines of pride,—

Her life had known not fear or foil
Nor lack of love and song,
Her life had never gathered soil
From trust that suffered wrong.

A storm of angry discontent
Is raging in the land,
A storm of angry discontent
That mocks the king's command.

The fever of the poisoned air
Is in the Russian brain;
The fever of the stormy air
Makes mockery at pain.

And one that sought in vain her love
Hath turned in iron hate,
Hath turned from his unworthy love
To be her evil fate.

O coward-hearted, perjured spy,
Thy iron hates prevail;
But thou thyself shalt surely die,
Her vengeance shall not fail!

Aneath the Northland winter skies,
A train of exiles goes
To perish 'neath the curse that lies
Upon the polar snows.

And by the Northland Volga's tide,
Beside a prison wall,
Among the mourned ones that die,
A poet's name they call.

They take her brother and his wife
Across the deadly snow,
They quench her poet-lover's life,—
For what, she scarce doth know.

"They quench my poet's life to-day
In vengeance full of lies:
So take I vengeance as I may!"
To king and God she cries.

A dart of bright Damascus steel,
A woman's round white arm,—
A fair white arm and dart of steel Bear hate's reflected harm.

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 18, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, } Editors.

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

The National Conference of English Unitarians and its Significance.

April 22, 1882.—During the past week, the National Conference of Unitarian and other Churches has been held at Liverpool, and is now stated by the Unitarian journals to have been "the largest and most successful gathering of Unitarians ever held in the United Kingdom." It was announced long beforehand. Every effort was made to draw denominational attention to it. Seven hundred delegates were present. The preachers and essayists are supposed to be the ablest men in the body, and as many as twenty-five hundred people were present at some of the meetings. It has been, in fact, "a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together," on the part of the English Unitarians, and, as such, may be taken as testimony of the aims and needs of the denomination, and may serve as an occasion for a few critical remarks on the movement it represents.

The elaborate preparations and announcements gave good reason for hope that this Conference would be an advance upon all preceding ones, not in size only, but in kind. This hope, however, was promptly banished by the publication of the subjects which were to be discussed. These were four in number: the development of the religious life within our churches; how can we extend the religious influence of our churches? how to secure the better education of our ministers; ministers' stipends. One would almost be safe in saying that there has not been a gathering of Unitarians here during the century at which these questions have not been discussed; and it was disappointing to find that at this, its last and greatest effort, the denomination had nothing better with which to concern itself. For are not the subjects indicative of conscious inadequacy to the needs of the time? They tell a story of their own: there is little religious life within the churches, little religious influence is exerted by them, the ministry is an insufficiently educated and poorly-paid body of men. This is what these subjects tell us, and it will not be difficult to show that their story is a true one.

But, first, the Conference itself. In an editorial article in the paper from which we get our report of the speeches, we read: "It was a praiseworthy idea of the conveners of the Conference to strike the key note by the Lord's Supper service. This was a right beginning, and presented the sight of some eight hundred Unitarians obeying the command of our Lord, 'This do in remembrance of me,' which will never be forgotten." The editor is accurate in calling this the key-note of the meetings, and a very false note it is. Setting aside his dogmatic statement of what cannot be shown to be the case,—that Jesus "commanded" any such rite as this,—and his comfortable prophecy that it will never be forgotten, a cannot help regarding the circumstance as having I sad significance.

It is just fifty years since Emerson resigned the pulpit of the Second Church in Boston, because he would not administer the Communion. From a thoroughly Christian stand-point, he said: "The whole world was full of idols and ordinances. The Jewish was a religion of forms. The pagan was a religion of forms: it was all body, it had no life. And the Almighty God was pleased to qualify and send forth a man to teach men that they must serve him with the heart; that only that life was religious which was thoroughly good; that sacrifice was smoke, and forms were shadows. This man lived and died true to this purpose; and now, with his blessed word and life before us, Christians must contend that it is a matter of vital importance, really a duty, to commemorate him by a certain form, whether that form be agreeable to their understandings or not. Is not this to make vain the gift of God? Is not this to turn back the hand upon the dial?" In answer to this, an English Unitarian will tell you that he does not regard the sacrament as a duty, but merely as a means to an end. You can either take it or not, as best suits you. Exactly; but there are very few churches in the whole body which would receive as minister a man who would not administer it. For ages, we have been told the simple truth that the letter kills, that with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, that we need to be something, rather than to perform something. So it is sad to see these good Unitarians, at this late day, eating bits of bread and sipping wine with the belief that there is any possible connection between such a performance and the lessons of a noble life. And, if they reply that they believe in no such connection, but that their actions are commemorative or suggestive, the answer is either, What can be the state of mind to which such actions are commemorative of anything but the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation (which I have heard Dr. Hedge call the most horrible doctrine that ever arose at any time or among any people), or suggestive of anything but an age of formalism as far removed as possible from the spirit of Jesus? or else, What sort of a life can that have been, which needs so trivial a memorial to escape oblivion? The large number of the communicants was a great surprise, and people were actually to be heard congratulating one another in a whisper that "the wine wouldn't go round."

In the evening of the first day, the Rev. Charles Beard, of Manchester, preached a sermon, in which a manly and helpful spirit appeared struggling with a strange and senseless orthodoxy of language. The sermon is epitomized, and this deplorable tendency shown, in one of the closing sentences: "If only we are faithful witnesses to God, who hath neither beginning nor end,—for Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever,—if only now and then we can stay a fainting soul or refresh a weary will, and to the last quit ourselves like men in the ever-ringing battle of duty, what more do we need?"

On Wednesday, two papers were read on "The Development of the Religious Life within our Churches," one by Mr. Herbert New and the other by the Rev. C. C. Coe. The first of these was the familiar commonplace of the semi-liberal pulpit: the religious life does not clash with the ordinary social life; it is to be secured through prayer; affirmations are better than negations; no discoveries or advances can ever be made which will rob us of our birthright as children of God. Here is a specimen of the style and reasoning: "This common religious life is universal; for, as 'the true light lighteth every man coming into the world,' so every man is capable of receiving that light and of being perpetually illumined and led by it." The second was a paper of a more able character. Its tendency may be judged from this one of the two assumptions with which the speaker started. "The main object of the existence of our churches is to promote the religious experience of individual members through the religious life of the community; that, in short, no amount of social and philanthropic activity can be accepted as a substitute for the exercise of this distinctive function." In the discussion which followed, the Rev. W. H. Channing made the following doubly characteristic peroration,—characteristic of himself and of contemporary English Unitarianism:—

The time had come. They were being revived. It would go on to glory. There was no more backward. In the first place, their duty was to rally round this blessed Son, next to teach the scientific men, then to appeal to the people. The secularists were longing for a real reign of heaven on earth. They could show it to them,—

"One channel deep and broad from the fountain of the throne, Christ the Saviour, Son of God, blessings flow through him alone."

We have often heard the story of the reporter who wrote that the prayer which the Rev. — delivered on a certain occasion was "one of the finest that had ever been addressed to a Boston audience"; but we never really believed it. Here it is, however:—

Mr. Davis desired to lay special stress upon the necessity of a more devout spirit in Unitarian churches. Whatever the power of preaching might be, the power of religious utterances, the ability to pray so as to move the hearts of the people was more important still.

The following are the words in which the Rev. Charles Beard summed up the morning's discussion:

There was nothing whatever for them to do in this matter but just to go down into the depths of their own individual experience, to lay themselves open to all the sweet and helpful influences of which the world had never been empty, and of which it was as full now as ever it had been, and to ask themselves whether there could be any better, any stronger, any higher, any more beautiful or joyful thing for them than to profess themselves in very heart and in deed children of God, disciples of Jesus Christ, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven.

At the afternoon session, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Nottingham, read a paper on "How can we extend the Religious Influence of our Churches?" This was a simple and earnest statement that the two things required are vigilant, enduring work and the liberal giving of money. Mr. Armstrong spoke refreshingly to the point:—

It is wretched work for a dozen ministers to sit round the board of one of our missionary societies, with painful care voting £10 for the year here and £5 there, and refusing any action somewhere else, while men who are asking why on earth our churches do not extend are spending £100 on their summer trip, or entertaining a hundred guests at a dance at a cost of twenty shillings a head. . . . Let us face facts, and know that, if our churches do not extend, it is not by any mysterious inscrutable Providence, but because we think it more prudent not to sell all, and go and follow him.

It was, perhaps, the result of these untrimmed words that a Mr. Tate, of Liverpool, offered to start an augmentation fund with a thousand pounds.

The discussion was opened by the Rev. John Page Hopps, of Leicester, who has solved the problem for himself by drawing together every Sunday afternoon a thousand of the poorest people to a simple unsectarian service and a plain talk on some point of everyday morality. As he has a habit of forming his opinions for himself and of expressing them without much regard for what is expected of him, and as, moreover, he has no objection to do battle at any time from pulpit, platform, or in the newspapers for his opinions,—all being grist that comes to his controversial mill,—he is apt to prove an awkward member of a cut-and-dried discussion. So, in this case, he speedily put his finger upon the weak spot:—

The difficulty he felt in dealing with this subject was that he did not believe in any special scheme for extending the influence of their churches; and he thought they would be going astray, if they depended upon any particular kind of work. In his opinion, every man should endeavor to do that which he found ready to his hand. When they possessed the religious life within themselves, he did not think any necessity existed for pressing home the inquiry, what means should be adopted to extend the religious influence of their churches. When the fire was alight, the fire would spread. He believed the thing to be taken care of was themselves. If they could be impressed with a more earnest spirit, if they could be made to believe in their religion as though it were a reality, as business and politics, then the whole thing would shape itself.

A young minister once asked his bishop where he should put the stove in the church. "Put it in the pulpit," was the reply. This is evidently what Mr. Hopps thinks. He will not be a party to any patent hot-house arrangement. Your correspondent believes that Mr. Hopps proposes to visit America shortly. The Rev. W. Carey Walters spoke of his own success in adopting Mr. Hopps' plan of popular services, and added that the "mission of their churches was not, in his opinion, so much to set forth Unitarianism against Trinitarianism as to go out into the world and boldly to endeavor to regenerate humanity, to strive to raise men and women nearer to God, and to lift them to a higher level of truth and morality." These two speeches, exceptional in their tone, were among the few encouraging features of the Conference.

On Thursday morning, the proceedings were continued by a paper by Prof. Estlin Carpenter on "The Education of the Ministry." When you have heard one Unitarian address on this subject, you have heard all. This one contained nothing but what we have all heard a dozen times. Besides the somewhat dubious statement that the minister must take his stand on "the incommunicable experiences of his own soul," the essayist made the following familiar points: The needful learning comes not of hearing lectures, but of grace. It is a fatal mistake to suppose that the years of college labor form the student's complete equipment. He who would persuade others must first have attained definite convictions himself. Foremost among studies must, of course, be placed the Bible. The character of the minister depends upon the character of the congregation. Upon all of which the commentary is, "Of course." Really, one thinks that the cry of the Unitarian body to its ministers must be,—with apologies to Miss Rossetti for this unkind use of her beautiful words,—

"Oh, tell me once, and tell me twice,
And tell me thrice to make it plain."

The discussion was opened by the Rev. Henry Ierson, the worthy Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The closing passage of his speech is reported thus: "Broadly speaking, he was disposed to contend that whatever means the experience of a minister showed to be beneficial in the promotion of the work he had in hand should be adhered to and cultivated with a view of obtaining yet greater results. [Hear, hear.] For simplicity of style, originality of thought, and courage of utterance it would surely be difficult to surpass this broad contention. "Hear, hear," indeed! The rest of the discussion was equally striking. "The noblest study of mankind is man" (sic), etc.

Next came a very business-like and praiseworthy paper by Mr. Harry Rawson on "Ministers' Stipends." This had evidently been prepared with great care, and was very suggestive. Here is a summary of the results of Mr. Rawson's inquiries: among the Unitarian ministers of the United Kingdom there are 45 stipends under $500; 126 stipends under $1,000; 63 stipends under $2,000; 6 stipends under $2,500; 13 stipends of $2,500 and upwards.

The total income of the 253 ministers who replied to the circular—the total number being 288—is estimated at $232,715, an average income of about $920. "Lord, keep thou me humble and poor," prayed an enthusiastic candidate at his ordination: "Lord, keep thou him humble, and we will keep him poor," prayed the deacon who followed. This must have been in an English Unitarian Chapel. Of the two characteristics of a noble life,—plain living and high thinking,—one is certainly present here. No wonder that Mr. Rawson quoted with approval the words of an American writer, "The constituency of givers has to be developed and educated." Doubtless, the ministers ought to receive special instruction in this branch of pedagogy.

This paper and the discussion which it provoked resulted in the following resolution:—

That, in the opinion of this Conference, a Sustentation Fund be established, in addition to the funds that now exist for the augmentation of the stipends of ministers, and that this resolution be referred to the Conference Committee.

This was received with "loud and continued cheering," and with something much harder to produce; namely, one gift of £1,000, an offer to be one of a hundred to be responsible for £100, and an offer to be one of twenty to subscribe £25. The Rev. R. Laird Collier, with characteristic American enthusiasm, desired that this effort should be "the biggest thing yet achieved, and they should not rest satisfied unless they raised a fund of £100,000."

A vote of sympathy with the American Unitarian Church on the deaths of Longfellow, Dr. Dewey, and Dr. Bellows, was then passed, with graceful tributes to the memory of each of these men. The Rev. H. Clarke, "of the United States," replied.

At the large solr e held on Wednesday evening, the Rev. Pitt Dillingham, one of the American delegates, spoke briefly.

One other feature of interest was the long letter of Dr. Martineau to the members of the Conference. His position in England corresponds with that of James Freeman Clarke in America, except that he exerts more influence in the denomination by his position as head of the Manchester New College, the students of which reproduce his thought, and frequently his manner too, with great accuracy. The gist of his letter is given in the following paragraph, which in its fairness and moderation is a welcome advance upon some other of his recent writings:—

At a crisis when many heads are dizzied and many hearts alarmed by the rapid changes in thought and in society, it may not be out of place for a veteran, himself not unaffected by them, to avow his unabated confidence in the Christian Congregation as the most beneficent of human institutions,—the best guardian of the sanctities of life and the asylum of its sweetest affections. Among those who are alienated from it there are doubtless some who may sustain themselves in a higher atmosphere, and many who intellectually occupy a level above its average teaching. But, on a wide comparison of the population within the churches and that without, the former, I am persuaded, will be found to contain, in spite of its minority, by far the greater part of the conscience, the humanity, the purity, the nobleness, which are the cement of society and the backbone of national character.

The Conference will thus be seen to have tended toward a strengthening of the purely denominational bonds and an affirming of the doctrines of orthodox Christianity. I cannot even say of Unitarianism; for I do not see how the expressions used by several of the speakers can be brought within the simple doctrine of "God is our Father and all men are brothers," which is the favorite exoteric definition of Unitarianism. The editorial article which we have already quoted says, "Those who came, we hope, discovered that our churches are not going to give up Christ." This, with the communion service for a key-note, is an admirable summary of the results. And those of us who have been hoping that English Unitarianism would extend its boundaries and become the expression of English freethought will have to confess to a feeling of intense disappointment. On every hand, it is admitted that orthodox Christianity is fast losing, if it has not already lost, its hold over the minds of the leaders of thought, on the one hand, and the great mass of people to be led, on the other hand. This is no private opinion, it is no longer open to discussion: it is a perfectly well-known fact. And here we see the only organized body in England deliberately retracing its steps toward the very positions which every day of the past few years has shown to be more and more untenable and inadequate. I say the only organized body, for the secularists—with a few individual exceptions—are an ignorant and prejudiced body of men who give Sunday concerts and cheap lectures. Mr. Conway stands alone; and, admirable as some of his writings are, they represent himself only. The Broad Church stands on a rotten foundation of unconscious insincerity. Mr. Stopford Brooke, who has recently become aware of the fact and has left the body, is just about where many of the backward Unitarians stand. The so-called "Free Christian" churches are mostly struggling with the problem of how to get a thoroughly educated and liberal man to accept a mere pittance. So far from there being any organized body, we hardly know of a single satisfactory congregation representing reverent and cultivated free thought. Such a society as Dr. Adler's in New York is unknown here. There is, of course, no such organization as the Free Religious Association. So we repeat that it is intensely disappointing to find the only body which gave any promise of an attempt to acknowledge the thought and meet the needs of the day withdrawing its outposts and turning its face to the weak side of the past. The Unitarian denomination, though small in its numbers, is composed of wealthy and cultivated people, and has exercised a great influence. Now, we find many of its members gradually sliding into the Church of England. The reason given for this is that they cannot "satisfy their souls" in a Unitarian chapel. This is, I am convinced, a most false and delusive statement. The real reason is that having long been accustomed to hear their ministers dallying on the outskirts of Orthodoxy, appearing to be anxious for its doctrines without its beautiful forms, occasionally stealing some of the forms themselves, as the surplice, baptism, confirmation, and the like, they naturally prefer to "go the complete unicorn," as Mr. Bouncer would say. If the Church really is a divinely organized institution, they naturally wish to belong to the real Church, and not to this mushroom Unitarianism. If Christ really is the only means of approach to God, they naturally prefer a Church which stakes its existence on this fact, and not to listen constantly to people who say in one breath that he is and that he is not. Let the orthodox leaders make all they can of this. They stand in need of all the comfort and assistance they can secure. But deserters seldom make recruits worth having. The Unitarian body—this opinion must go for what it is worth, as the opinion of one man—strikes its own death-knell by such a step as it has recently taken. Two courses have for some time been open to it: one, to follow its own lead, and its own best impulses in the doctrine that "all men are brothers," and to seek, through many teachers, one end; the other, to shrink from the logical results of its original idea, and to fall back to a rarefied, transcendental Orthodoxy. In the former case, it would have ceased to exist as a Unitarian Church, but just as the chrysalis ceases to exist when the butterfly comes. In the latter case, the one adopted, it will cease to exist as the chrysalis ceases when it is eaten by the bird. "Our churches are not going to give up Christ." Who does not recall the bitter words in Lessing's glorious play?

"You do not know, you will not know the Christians. Christianity, not manhood, is their pride, E'en that which, from their Founder down, hath spiced Their superstition with humanity. 'Tis not for its humanity they love it. No, but because Christ taught, Christ practised it. Happy for them he was so good a man! Happy for them that they can trust his virtue! His virtue? Not his virtue, but his name, They say, shall spread abroad, and shall devour And put to shame the names of all good men. The name, the name, is all their pride."

"Call no man master," said Jesus himself. "Publish my ethics anonymously," wrote the blessed Spinoza for his executors: "truth should bear no man's name."

Everywhere, our fellow-men and women are sinning and suffering, are looking up with weary eyes for any savior, are holding up their hands for any help. To serve them in any way, we must first face those causes in our civilization which have produced this wretchedness. No charity-clubs, nor soup-kitchens, nor prohibitions, nor coffee-houses, can save us from the fight with the gigantic ideas: it is ideas that we have to destroy and replace. The figure of Jesus stands among the noblest figures of men, to guide, to inspire us. Why will these people hide him with their opaque cloak of antiquated superstition? We cannot spare a single member of our army of heroes. Men we are, those are men whom we wish to help. When shall we learn to use the reason which from some source or other we have, and which is our glory as men?

In conclusion, compare for a moment this Unitarian Conference at Liverpool with the first meeting of the "Anti-aggression League" recently held in London,—a handful of men, among them Herbert Spencer, John Morley, Frederic Harrison, coming together to form an alliance for the purpose of bringing a prompt influence to bear, in moments of political excitement, against aggressive measures of foreign policy, when there would be no time to organize meetings or to appeal to the country. How elaborate, how analytic, how self-assertive, and self-congratulatory, the one! How simple, how needful, how modest, the other. Yet, if we have not failed utterly to understand the need of the time, if we are not wrong altogether in our views of history, of philosophy, of criticism, unless man is something very different from what we think he is, this little meeting of men in the parlor of a London hotel is infinitely more in the direction of human salvation than these crowded Liverpool meetings, with their denominational and sectarian emphasis, their dreadful cant about "rallying round this blessed Son," and their sacramental key-note. Time will show. H. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. BRUNO BAUER.

Editors of The Index:—

In the suburbs of Berlin has just died one of the most independent and self-sacrificing thinkers of Germany. Dr. Bruno Bauer, the Biblical and political critic, breathed his last on the 13th inst., at the age of seventy-two. Forty years ago, the name of Bruno Bauer was upon the lips of every educated man in Germany; and, within the present week, the Berlin papers have spoken of him as "one of the most prominent philosophers of our time." Yet his remains lay three days just outside of the city before the news of his death was published. This is to be accounted for by the very humble and retired way in which the latter years of his life were spent. For some years past, he has led the life of a recluse. His mind, however, has been active; and his pen was not allowed to rest until within a few days of his death. A brief sketch of the life of this radical and acute thinker may be of interest to the readers of The Index.

Bruno Bauer was born at Eisenberg, Sept. 9, 1809. After studying theology and philosophy at the Berlin University, he became Privatdocent, or lecturer, in the theological faculty, at the age of twenty-five (1834). Hegel had died but three years before, and Bauer was one of the enthusiastic "Jung-Hegelianer" of that period. But his views soon developed out of the speculative orthodoxy of right-wing Hegelianism, where he at first stood; and he became so liberal that a proposition to make him a professor in the University in 1839 was opposed by the conservative Prussian king. He now went as Privatdocent to the University of Bonn, and published soon afterward a Critique of the Evangelical History and a Critique of the Evangelical Synoptics. On account of the radical views expressed in these two publications, he was informed in 1842, by Eichhorn, the Minister of Public Worship and Education, that he would no longer be allowed to lecture in the University. This act called forth a book from his brother Edgar, then but twenty-two years old, entitled Bruno Bauer und seine Gegner (Bruno Bauer and his Opponents), and also a book from Bruno Bauer himself, entitled Die gute Sache der Freiheit (The Good Cause of Freedom).

For several years from this time, the two brothers were associated in literary work at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, where a third and elder brother kept a bookstore and became their publisher. Edgar Bauer is now living at Hanover, and is recognized as a prominent writer. Already before 1860, Bruno Bauer had written and published several theological and historical works and pamphlets, besides numerous political pamphlets. In 1860, he was appointed chief editor of the Wagener Staats-und-Gesellschafts-Lexikon; and the next five or six years he was engaged in editing the twenty-two volumes of this celebrated work. Many of the articles he wrote himself. This was the most paying work of his life, and with the money which he received he bought the little piece of land in Rixdorf, upon which his elder brother has since lived as a gardener and he himself as a student and writer. During this time, he had edited the department of foreign politics for certain Berlin papers, and published Philo, Strauss, Renan, and Primitive Christianity (1874), Christ and the Cæsars (1878), The Bismarck Aera (1880), and Disraeli's Romantic and Bismarck's Socialistic Imperialism (1882).

Bauer's last literary work was for the Internationale Monatschrift, a new literary and political monthly edited and published by Ernst Schmeitzner, in Chemnitz, the publisher of his last two books. The first number of this periodical appeared in January; and the leading article of that and the succeeding numbers was furnished by Bauer, and also a continued article, beginning in the first number, on "Karl Philip Moritz," a German writer of a century ago. This article remains unfinished.

A series of articles on "Free Thought in the United States," by Dr. E. Schlaeger, is not yet ended, and will be noticed at another time.

Near the end of a long street just outside of the city, surrounded by green open fields and a few small houses, is a small, time-worn, uninviting-looking peasant's cottage. In this little cottage, the home of his brother, the funeral of Bruno Bauer took place on the 17th. It is in a still smaller and much more uninviting cottage near by, described as "a little mortar-covered building, which might originally have been a horse-stall or a potato cellar," that Bruno Bauer has been living for the last fifteen years in solitary intellectual work.

The walls of the little ground-floor room in which he had worked were lined on all sides with books and papers and manuscripts yellow with age. One could hardly believe that a writer who had won for himself a European reputation had lived and worked in such surroundings. He was never married, and all of the small earnings of his literary work went to help his elder brother. Nothing was spent upon himself. It is said that he still wore the same coat which he wore when he walked from Bonn to Berlin forty years ago.

At the hour for the funeral, about thirty men and a large number of peasant children had assembled between the two little cottages. In a small, low room, and in a plain oaken coffin, lay the peaceful and strongly cut face of the dead philosopher. The coffin was now brought into the open yard and placed upon a bier; and the small assembly stood with uncovered heads while Herr Schaefer, the speaker of a Free Religious Society in Berlin, said a few earnest and fitting words. There was no Bible-reading and no prayer. After the feeling tribute had been spoken, a few of the neighboring peasants took the bier upon their shoulders, and, followed by those who were present, carried the remains to their last resting-place. The coffin, decorated with a laurel wreath and a few flowers, was lowered slowly into the grave of the country cemetery. The silence was only broken by the sobs of the elder brother and the hollow, unpleasant sound of the handful of earth which each one present threw into the grave. The law would not allow Herr Schaefer to speak in the cemetery. Among those present at the funeral were Paul Lindau, the former editor of Der Gegenwart, Guido Weiss, Ernst Dohm, and other literary men. A biography of Bruno Bauer is to be written in English by Dr. E. Schlaeger, the most intimate friend of his last years.

A writer in Die Tribune says: "It would have been a gain to our public to become personally acquainted with that true Stoic, Bruno Bauer. We should have seen a Socrates before us, who knew how to be at the same time wise and amiable and cheerful, and whose criticism, although it spared nothing, yet destroyed nothing. What he taught was, to the high, modesty; to the low, self-confidence; to all, the love of truth and public spirit."

Die Post says: "He who had known Bruno Bauer in late years will gladly remember the worthy old man, who, in the midst of the warmest discussions, maintained the calmness and dignity of an ancient philosopher, and who treated the most difficult questions of philosophy and theology with a penetration of mind and an unimpassioned clearness worthy of admiration. His head showed great energy, and looked as if it might have been a bronze cast. His fiery eye added to the warmth of his conversation, which had no doctrinaire tinge. . . . He stood like a Diogenes against all those trifling things of life in which other men indulge. With this disregard for all worldly things, he united in his personal intercourse the amiability and the fine irony of a Socrates."

It should be added that this scholarly recluse, who belonged to no sect and to no party, was a warm friend of the movement for the more extensive rights of woman.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, April 26, 1882.

Since my last letter, the Smithsonian has entered upon a new work. Eight popular scientific lectures have been given without price in its new and beautiful lecture-room, to crowded audiences, and with results very gratifying to the Regents and the Curator.

When the Smithsonian Building was first erected, it possessed what has often been called the finest lecture-room in the world. It was constructed under the oversight of Professor Henry himself, on acoustic principles, and was a most delightful place to the audience it held. It was in the shape of an amphitheatre with steeply ascending sides. This lecture-room was destroyed by the fire. It was in the east wing. When that wing was rebuilt, it was fitted up as a residence for Professor Henry and his family, and another lecture-room was constructed in a different part of the building.

This was not so satisfactory to the public; and, for that and other reasons, the lectures which the secretary had instituted, as one means of distributing knowledge according to Smithsonian's will, were relinquished. A building which was not large enough to exhibit the contents of its own boxes could not well spare space enough for a good lecture-hall. When the new museum was put up, however, it was thought best to reserve one of its "ranges," and fit it up as a lecture-room. This was on the west side of the building. It was able to seat six hundred persons, and was first occupied on the 21st of February by the American Institute of Mining Engineers.

The first course of lectures opened on the 11th of March, with the following programme: March 11, Prof. Theo. Gill, "Scientific and Popular Views of Nature contrasted"; March 18, Major J. W. Powell, "Outlines of Sociology"; March 25, Prof. C. V. Riley, "Little-known Facts about Well-known Animals"; April 1, Prof. O. T. Mason, "What is Anthropology?"; April 8, Prof. J. W. Chickering, Jr., "Contrasts of the Appalachian Mountains"; April 15, Dr. Robert Fletcher, "Paul Broca and the French School of Anthropology"; April 22, Prof. W. H. Dall, "Deep-sea Exploration"; April 29, Dr. Siran M. Burnett, "How we see."

These lectures were offered gratuitously to the public, under the auspices of the Smithsonian, by the Biological and Anthropological Societies of Washington.

The Biological Society was organized in 1880, for the purpose of studying the organization and classification of animals and plants. It holds its meetings on alternate Friday evenings in the Archive-room of the National Museum. It has one hundred and forty members. Theodore Gill is its President; and Browne Goode, the curator of the Museum, is its Secretary.

The Anthropological Society was organized in 1879. Its principal work is to study the natural history of man in America, and Prof. J. W. Powell is its President. It has more than a hundred members, and has published one volume of Transactions.

The lectures were appointed for Saturday afternoons at half-past three. As the government offices all close earlier on that day, this hour permitted any clerks, who might have the desire, to attend. The hall was crowded the very first day, and after the third lecture the settees were removed to the north side of the building into a "range" which would seat nine hundred persons. Those who saw it crowded like the first could hardly believe the statement. These lectures are going to supply a great want in Washington. They were not only well delivered, and sound in themselves, but they were unexpectedly graceful. The newspaper reporters were not allowed to get hold of them. At the very beginning, Judd & Detweiler had asked permission to print them in compact little pamphlets at ten cents each; and every Saturday the full text of the lecture delivered on the previous week has been offered in the lecture hall, where it has been largely purchased. It has also been promptly laid on the counters of the Washington booksellers. You will readily imagine that I looked forward with great interest to the lecture of April 22d. It was, I believe, crowded like all the rest; but, when the day arrived, I was not only too ill to go to the lecture, but so ill that I did not even remember that a lecture was to take place. It was a pleasant accident that there was present Sir George Knaus, one of the "deep-sea dredgers" on board the "Challenger." Mr. Dall invited him to take his place on the platform, but to this the visitor would not consent. The lecture-hall is a pleasant room. The imperial banner of Siam floats over the platform, bearing on a scarlet field the well-known white elephant. One of the entrances is draped by a magnificent Persian carpet, long since presented to the United States Government; and, all round the room, glazed cases offer interesting objects to the sight, nothing among them being finer than the superb models of fish, constructed at the Smithsonian since the Fish Commission came into existence. Since the Museum has been thrown open to the public, it has had an average of twenty-five hundred visitors a week. The record is kept by an automatic register.

MEDLEY.

Editors of The Index:—

The medley which exists in the so-called religious world is now certainly equalled by the different forms of belief which many persons are now erecting as something stable and trustworthy. And these many different attempts at "philosophy" (?) grow out of what all men at times feel, and which the Nazarene prayed against,—"lead us not into temptation,"—namely, the limitations (doubts) to which we are subject; and herein the more we know, the greater is the ignorance which we feel in respect to phenomenal objects. Still, I hold it to be a truism that the mind of man was made to know, and in practical reason what he knows is a reality. If we assert that all truth is relative, we attack dim verity, and assume the absolute also when we affirm the relative. Herein, how often we find persons of a low type of agnostics (the uninitiated) falsifying their own position, when they assert with such positiveness concerning man's origin, especially his connection with all that is beneath him, while they deny with scorn his relationship to all that is above him. And, as they scout all a priori evidence of the infinite (the light in them having become darkness), I have a few words to say in respect to what is called a posteriori proof.

Now, I assert that we cannot think without thinking something, and that that something is God. Evidently, we cannot think of nothing, something being always present in such an attempt at thought. All order of thought assumes the Eternal. If I think of matter, knowing all that I can know of the properties of matter, I necessarily think of the Eternal, because matter is eternal. If I conceive the idea Life, the same process takes place in my mind, and I think of Life Eternal. And I also think of something distinct from matter. Now, the property of matter may be defined as gravitation (motion); but the property of life is counter to all this, as the plant is lifted up counter to gravitation. Herbert Spencer, an agnostic, defines life as "the continual adjustment of internal relations to external relations." Now, here something very transcendental is affirmed, and it cannot be other than the Eternal. Thus, in Him we live and move and have our being. And, as there is no life without antecedent life, there can be no life without subsequent life; and here is the "seed" that was queried after by M. D. Conway in a late Index, which is to live forever. Somewhere, somehow, our relation will be adjusted in the future as in the dim past. Somewhere we have been born into consciousness into this life, and somehow this consciousness will be adjusted as it is now adjusted in Life Eternal, also to other relations.

Again, if I think of mind, I cannot think but of eternal intelligence, and as an intelligence, moreover, which is one. Just as there can be but one infinite space, so there can be but one infinite intelligence; and the correspondence between human mind and the supreme mind is becoming more clear, the more we think concerning it. Every advance in science is affirming it. Every discovery affirming in life an infinite endowment in the infinite variety disclosed, and a teleology is revealed in which an intelligence like unto man's, either as an instrumental or as a principal cause, is evolved to us.

Take Charles Darwin's recent publication on the earthworm. Here is disclosed a creature which for "millions of years" has been at work preparing and adjusting the surface of the earth for man. The creature itself not advantaged! Query, Is Darwinism sure of Darwin, in view of his recent book, and of his confession "that it is absurd in the highest degree possible, the supposition that the eye with its inimitable contrivances could have been formed by natural selection"?

It is true that what is known of God is manifest in man, then it is not our limitations of which we should inquire concerning him, but rather to that which is highest and greatest and holiest in us. Thus, and thus alone, can his image be disclosed in us through dim possibilities.

"I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Now, as all religious fact is practical reason, such sayings as these must relate to self-evident truth. The "I" meaning simply the ego in us to be exalted in a proximate degree, thus man can become a partaker of the divine nature, one with the Eternal as regards intelligence, utility, and goodness. The water in the spring is of the same quality as that in the fountain, but in all other respects how different,—in measure, in power, in supply, how very different!

AGNOSTICISM AND RELIGION.

Editors of The Index :—

W. H. Spencer's elaborate article on this subject, published in your issue of 27th ult., while in some respects admirable, seems to be, in others, of questionable soundness. I ask permission to propound to the writer referred to one or two inquiries.

The Agnostic, we are informed in the article above mentioned, objects to the phrase, "God in nature, and challenges the Christian theist to point to a single spot where he is." If not in nature, where is God? I think Mr. Spencer will admit that there is no outside of nature. If not in nature, he is nowhere. And this the Agnostic by no means affirms.

The Agnostic also scouts at the "new God,"—the idea of Power behind phenomena. Not a very novel doctrine surely, although in our day much emphasized. But, says Mr. Spencer, "call a tree a tree; and, if you can find a God back of or under or above or around it, point him or her out to me."

But Mr. Spencer points out to me the great Cosmic Forces back of, under, above, and around us. In what part of Longfellow's brain dwelt his poetic genius? Where was the seat of Darwin's philosophic acumen?

And what if all forces material and mental be one force, and the cosmos their outcome? D.

A LETTER OF APPROVAL.

CAIRO, ILL., May 12, 1882.

Editors of The Index :—

I enclose $3.00 for the renewal of your valuable paper. I do so all the more gladly since reading W. H. Spencer's "Agnosticism and Religion," for it gives us not only solid mental food, but the strawberries and cream extra. Though entertaining agnostic sentiments myself, I feel my great inability to express them. Imagine my satisfaction, then, in recognizing in W. H. Spencer's field of thought some ideas of my own. Crude, unshapen, and undeveloped they were in my mind, but perfected and beautifully and fully blossomed out in his. So bright and clear are they now that I wonder how their beauty should have escaped me heretofore. They come as a sweet strain of music, which I recognize, appreciate, and love, but cannot produce.

Thanking the writer and The Index for this pleasure, I am truly,

MRS. JACOB MARTIN.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PROF. WILLIAM JAMES writes "On some Hegelisms" in the April Mind, in a way that will not please Hegelians. His moral feeling is revealed in a passage like the following: "In the universe of Hegel—the absolute Block whose parts have no loose play, the pure plethora of necessary being with the oxygen of possibility all suffocated out of its lungs—there can be neither good nor bad, but one dead level of mere fate." May not the same be said of any system, idealistic or materialistic, which has no place for "real contingency and ambiguity," or, what is the same, freedom? Professor James' long-expected "Defence of Faith" will appear under an altered title in the July number of the Princeton Review.

MR. THOMAS DAVIDSON, who contributed an article on Antonio Rosmini to the Fortnightly Review, November, 1881, now announces in the pages of the Mind a work of nearly four hundred pages on "The Philosophical System of Antonio Rosmini Serbati. London: Kegan Paul." From the announcement, we take the following: "Though Rosmini's philosophy was intended as a scaffolding for a theory of revealed religion, it is none the less true on that account, inasmuch as it does not set out with any theological assumptions, but bases itself on simple observation, which is shown to be a valid source of knowledge. In like manner, though owing very much to scholasticism, it is in no way influenced by authority. It may be said to be a summing up of what philosophy has done thus far, and a basis for future progress."

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE, the free-thinking chaplain (retired) of the United States Navy, and the well-known philanthropist, has, says the Advance, sent to Grinnell (Iowa) College "Trübner's Leipzig edition of Greek authors and the Corpus Inscriptorum Græcorum, one hundred and twenty-nine volumes in all, the very sight of which ought to be quickening to its Greek scholarship." Fisk P. Brewer, professor of Greek in the institution above referred to, has written Mr. Fiske a letter, from which we give the following extract: "Your benefaction has stimulated another. A friend of the Latin professor here saw a notice of your donation, and has promised to give our library the series of Roman authors published by Trübner." In another letter, Professor Brewer writes: "Since I wrote you last week, one of our graduates handed our instructor in Political Science $100 to purchase books in his department. This is, in my opinion, another happy consequence of your valued gift."

At the regular monthly meeting, April 30, of the Progressive Friends at Longwood, Penn., the speaker, Mr. John Albee, opened the exercises with some remarks appropriate to the day of Emerson's burial, of which we give the substance: "Mr. Emerson, who died on Thursday evening, is to be buried to-day; and it seems fitting to recall for one moment his memory, and in common with all those to whom, during so many years, he has been an inspiration and delight, to bring a tribute of affection to his obsequies. I hear that he had never spoken to this people. I was surprised, because it may be said generally that, where Garrison, Parker, Phillips, had been with their deep, breaking-up ploughs of political and moral principle, Mr. Emerson had followed not long after, and sown some of the furrows with his philosophic and poetic insights. In his way, he did much to reconstruct our social and intellectual life, after the shocks which slavery and the Church had given it. He aided also in breaking down our superstitions, and in substituting for them the most noble conceptions of humanity, the worth of the individual. He made plain the feebleness of the life that constantly leans upon outward, conventional, and traditional supports. He taught that 'When the half-gods go,

The gods arrive!'

Our debt to him is great and increasing; for, while enrolling himself on the side of every liberal movement, he brought also the subtle and sententious words which must forever be the text of free thought. Causes, parties, sects, may arise and pass away. Ideas endure: they destroy and create. And the style alone in which Emerson expressed himself will assist in perpetuating his thought. So his memory seems secure. His work will invigorate future times as it has our own. For that which has happened to the oldest of poets and seers, Homer, has disproved his own despairful line: 'Men always prize that song most which rings newest in their ears.' Many great men in their own chosen pursuits, many obscure men and women in every part of the world, have confessed that to the reading of Emerson was due all they were, all that made life important and interesting. For them, therefore, as well as for ourselves, the thanks which it is customary on this day to give to Heaven should be rendered for the gift of one more human life, lived for thought and in the harmonious pursuit of aims at once ideal and practical. He made the heavens seem nearer to the earth by his presence among us; and he taught us that, standing upright, our idols would lose one-half their height and all their terror. God himself must now be glad of the society of such a man. Farewell! and mayst thou continue to enjoy all that thy piercing spiritual vision had already, even in this world, experienced as the clearest reality."

DURING this week will be demolished a house with a peculiar history. Unless we err, it has had but one tenant. It was never gladdened with the birth of a child: it has never been shadowed by a death. The owner goes forth from it a grand, world-renowned, but somewhat solitary figure, having entered it forty years ago, a brilliant young man, with eloquence and leadership in his eyes. He has lived through extreme vicissitudes. At times, he has been the object of virulent hatred. His name has been reviled, himself mocked by the populace, and even followed to his door by hooting mobs. Again, he has been applauded by the same fickle people with an enthusiasm which knew no bounds. All in forty years. . . . There is not space for elaborate comparisons. We remember the massive eloquence and the resistless force of Webster, the perfect academic style and elegance of Everett, the energy and scholarship of the large-minded Sumner, the graceful periods of Hillard, and the magnificent Oriental profusion of Choate,—a born genius, if there ever was one; but after hearing them all, and the best of England's orators as well, we must think that no man in our time has appeared on a platform as an extemporaneous speaker with such a matchless presence, voice, and manner, and with such a command of the resources of argument, satire, humor, and historic allusion as Phillips possesses. Forty years ago! and yet that fame has kept growing. Year after year he illumined the meetings of abolitionists, and later he held audiences spell-bound in delivering his lectures. Never a legislator, he threw the light of truth into the domain of law, and pointed the way for law-makers to follow. Never a religionist, he assumed a loftier tone than the preachers, and compelled the churches to take the higher ground. Bound to no societies, he has been himself an institution for the relief of suffering. In this last character, few but intimate friends have seen him: his right hand has not known what his left has done; but his benefactions have been constant, and generations will rise up and call him blessed. The resident of this modest house, who aspired to no place, looked for no renown, and was careless of literary reputation, has seen in his time wonderful changes, but nothing more marvellous than the succession of eminent men and women attracted by his genius. In early times there came Hawthorne, rarest of prose poets; Hillard, whose scholarship and eloquence were so promising; Emerson, with the wisdom of Plato and the honey of Hybla upon his lips; and Margaret Fuller, free, exuberant, and aggressive. There came Everett, too, before his star had reached its zenith, and read aloud passages from his classic orations. Webster also was a friendly guest before parties were divided as by a sword. Theodore Parker was a neighbor (in Exeter Place), and a frequent visitor. Sumner, who was to be the political leader in the cause to which Phillips devoted his life, was wont to come for counsel. There came also Edmund Quincy, George Thompson, Samuel May, Francis Jackson, and other anti-slavery apostles whom the elders know and revere. Chief among them was Garrison, a man whose noble character, self-devotion, and heroic energy have given him undying fame. The poet Holmes, whose name of Wendell testifies to a distant kinship,—albeit he was not a born reformer,—was fascinated by our orator's fine conversational powers no less than by his vivid eloquence. Later came generals, authors, statesmen, philosophers, land-leaguers, including Butler, Parnell, Bradlaugh, and a host that no man can remember. The Prince of Wales took off his hat as he drove by the house, so did Dom Pedro and Kalakaua.—F. H. Underwood, in the Boston Gazette.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE BIBLE: Whence and What? By Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1882. pp. 232.

The writer of this work says that he "is a firm believer in the existence and moral government of God, in the continuance of human life beyond the grave, and in present and future rewards and punishments"; but in the Bible as an inspired volume, in Christianity as a revealed system, in Christ as a model teacher, he does not believe. "It is deemed only ingenuous," he observes in the preface, "to indicate by college degrees the writer's fields of study and habits of mind." The book is mainly a compilation of facts and arguments against the claims of orthodox theologians regarding the origin, history, and authority of the Bible; and the author has brought together in a convenient form considerable information respecting the Bible for those who have read but little on this subject. The author frankly says: "No originality is claimed. The reader is at liberty to credit particularly fine passages, if such be found, to some other writer."

LE CLERGE BELGE EN 1881. Par le Comte Goblet d'Alviella. Bruxelles: Weissenbruch. 1881.

This is a speech of one of the editors of the Revue de Belgique before the Belgian Legislature, giving a summary of evidence showing the arts practised by the priests to keep up their schools. One woman was frightened to death by clerical maledictions for preferring secular education, and another was advised by her pastor to bribe her husband to send their children to the church-school by letting him have all the money he wanted for drink. It is gratifying to find that this behavior of the priests has led the people of the Walloon or south-eastern provinces to stay away so generally from church that one witness says, "Formerly, we counted those who stayed away: now, we count those who go."

PHYSICAL EDUCATION, or the Health-Laws of Nature. By Felix Oswald, M.D. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

This is a work of two hundred and fifty-seven pages, written in a bold, vigorous, lively style, and containing for the common reader a large amount of information in regard to health and its laws and conditions. The chapters of this work appeared originally in the Popular Science Monthly, as a series of articles; and the publishers have thought them of sufficient value to entitle them to publication in book form. The volume relates to subjects of practical importance, and the subjects are treated in a manner that makes the book instructive and entertaining at the same time.

THE Art Amateur for May contains no less than fourteen large pages of designs for china painting, needlework, "etching" on linen, and general decoration. Much space is also devoted to the spring picture exhibitions. Clarence Cook criticises the paintings at the National Academy, many of which are illustrated; Edward Strahan writes of the Belgian "Salon" at Philadelphia; the work of the American Artists is editorially discussed; and there is a page of charming drawings from pictures in the French Water Color exhibition. The Metropolitan Museum Trustees are sharply arraigned for their failure to investigate the Feuardent charges with fairness; and there are excellent practical articles on photograph painting, modelling in clay, amateur photography, and needlework. Some "Classical Hints for Modern Costumes," with exquisite illustrations from the Greek, are especially interesting. No one of artistic taste can afford to be without this beautiful magazine, which completes its third year with the current number. Price $4 per year; single number, 35 cents. Montague Marks, Publisher, 23 Union Square, New York.

THE REVUE DE BELGIQUE for April contains articles on bi-metallism, on means of preventing the explosion of fire-damp, and on the elective franchise in Belgium. There is also a story about a freethinker named Morteroche, whose refusal to be reconciled with the Church of Rome, as he is at the point of death, is described with great power.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THEODORE TILTON has a new volume of poems in press.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON is said to have left an estate valued at $200,000.

THOMAS CARLYLE was once described by Emerson as "a trip-hammer with an Æolian attachment."

PHILLIPS BROOKS and Wendell Phillips are both descended from an uncle of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES ends this month his thirty-fifth year as professor in the Harvard Medical School.

A BIOGRAPHY of the late Charles Darwin will soon be published by Sir Joseph Hooker, the celebrated botanist.

THE London Spectator pronounces the American professor, Asa Gray, the most eminent of living systematic botanists.

REV. C. W. WENDTE, of Cincinnati, will commence his pastorate labors with the Channing Memorial Church at Newport next month.

PROF. SIMON NEWCOMB, the well-known astronomer, has been elected an honorary member of the Royal Irish Academy of Dublin.

THE £100 granted by the English government to Mr. G. J. Holyoake is to enable him to inquire into the question of the emigration of operatives to the United States and Canada.

JUST before Carlyle married, he read Kant's works in order to quiet his nerves. After he was married, he nearly talked his poor wife to death; and, to quiet her nerves, she used to scrub the floor.

KING CHARLES of Württemberg, a sovereign of a petty German State, has been converted from Protestantism to Catholicism. His wife is a member of the Greek Church, and most of his subjects are Protestants and Lutherans.

MR. LONGFELLOW left an unpublished poem on Decoration Day, which will appear in the next Atlantic. The same number will contain some verses on the dead poet by Dr. Holmes, and a critical article on the same subject by O. B. Frothingham.

HORACE SEAVEE, Judge Robinson (of Pawtucket, R.I.), and J. W. Ashton, who were personally acquainted with Robert Owen, made fitting remarks at the celebration of the one hundred and eleventh anniversary of his birthday at Paine Hall, last Sunday.

On the front of Mr. Tilden's new house, in Gramercy Park, there are five carved heads in bold relief. The two upper ones are inscribed "Shakspeare" and "Milton." Below, in the centre, is "Franklin," and below that are the two heads of "Goethe" and "Dante."

THE health of Mr. Herbert Spencer has again broken down. This is due partly to the anxiety which the organization of the Anti-aggression League has caused him, and partly to the worry entailed by his having to abandon his elaborate system of "Descriptive Sociology."

A NOTABLE Ruskin paper, prepared in London by Mrs. S. K. Bolton, will appear in the June Wide-awake. It is entitled "The Ruskin May-Day at Whitelands College," and is accompanied by fine pen-and-ink portraits of Mr. Ruskin and Miss Osborne, the May Queen.

Or Perry Belmont, Mary Clemmer writes: "In him, Mr. Blaine confronted the coming generation, the advance-guard of the mighty host of younger men who have already reached the front, before whom, with appalling swiftness, the men who have had their day must so soon go down."

THE library trustees have received from Miss Matilda Goddard a complete set of the writings of Theodore Parker, consisting of published volumes, articles in reviews and periodicals, occasional sermons, addresses, and reports, and newspaper cuttings. The collection is intended to be the complement of the Parker library.

DR. WILLIAM W. DRAPER, of New York, recently declared, at a meeting of people interested in the higher education of women, that so far not the slightest difference had been discovered in the nervous anatomy of man and woman, and it was absurd to hold to the doctrine that woman was by nature inferior in mental capacity.

THE Duchess of Edinburgh, sister of the present Czar of Russia and daughter-in-law of Queen Victoria, is described as a rather plain lady of about thirty-four, with a strongly marked face, but pleasant mouth and eyes and good forehead. She wears her hair à la Mrs. Hayes; that is, parted in the middle and "sliced" down over the temples. She dresses quietly in dark colors.

WHEN Darwin extended his walks into the country round about, it was observed that he was rarely seen in the village or met on the roads, preferring, as he did, to take his way, generally, southward, by the foot-paths through the woods and meadows. Little children, who have a quick instinct for a kind and gentle nature, would run to open a gate when they saw Mr. Darwin coming, encouraged thereto by a smile and a kind word.

"Of all men," says John Wentworth, "whom I ever heard, I never knew one who could endure so much interruption and discuss so many side issues, and yet finish his speech with the entire facts and the entire line of argument marked out in his mind from the beginning, as Mr. Clay. Could the enemies of Mr. Clay have formed a combination never to interrupt him nor be interrupted by him, they would have shorn him of much of his strength."

THE Bombay papers speak rather slightly of the labors of the Rev. Joseph Cook among the people of that region. It seems that the East Indians are either less susceptible or more critical than the cultured Bostonians, since he failed to make any deep impression on their minds. "Mr. Cook," says the Indian Spectator, "attempted the impossible, and failed. Though allowing him to be a very good speaker, Bombay is far from satisfied with his oratory."

THE widow of President Tyler, recently pensioned, is said to have been in very straitened circumstances, from which this action of Congress will relieve her. She is described as being a most "wonderfully preserved woman" for one of her age. She looks to be about forty-five, though of course much older. Her vigor and sprightliness are unimpaired. She is remarkably handsome, and her teeth are as white and faultless as thirty years ago. Her only living daughter is a lovely young girl, having been still in her babyhood when her father died in 1862.

SAYS the Commonwealth: "Attention is being widely drawn to the discourses of James Kay Applebee, at the Parker Memorial, on successive Sundays. Many who listen to him regard him as the ablest preacher since Mr. Parker's day. He is close in logic, eloquent in utterance, with suggestive and informing matter, and great readiness and adaptation to the special topic in hand. The old parishioners who have listened to him have become much interested in him, and the attendance is weekly increasing. His discourse last Sunday, on 'Emerson as Man and Poet,' was a fine tribute to the departed, and won many encomiums. To-morrow, he speaks on 'Emerson as a Thinker'; and we advise those fond of a high order of intellectual discourse, combined with reverence and spirituality, to listen to him. Mr. Applebee was formerly a Unitarian preacher in England."

Frothingham's Sermons.

The sermons are neatly printed in pamphlet form, and our friends who wish to do missionary work for the Liberal cause will find them admirably adapted to that purpose. To such as order them in lots of 25 or more, the price will be reduced to 3 cents. Single copies 5 cents.

GLADSTONE, it is now pretty well understood, will make the progress of the Arrears Act depend upon the support of the Repression Act. Any obstruction offered to the former will delay the latter. The Repression Act, however, is likely to receive some amendments before its passage.

THE believers in the prophecies of the Bible will begin to have their faith renewed, in view of the recent "looking toward Zion" shown by the persecuted Russian Jews. Seven thousand families, it is reported, have already applied to the immigration committee at Jaffa for assistance to get to the Holy Land.

WEDNESDAY, the 17th inst., was a noteworthy day in scientific circles, from the fact of the occurrence of a total eclipse of the sun, visible in Egypt, the west coast of Africa, and some other places. English astronomers had been for months preparing to take accurate observations of this eclipse, which the cloudless skies of Egypt greatly facilitate.

NO OTHER scientist ever had his discoveries acknowledged and his theories so generally accepted during his lifetime as did Darwin. And since his death, in Rome,—the stronghold of dogmatism and conservatism,—the students of the Roman University have requested Professor Moleschott to deliver a public lecture on the life and services of the dead scientist.

A NOTABLE feat of railway engineering is now very near completion in the erection of the Kinzua Viaduct, which, when finished, will be the highest railroad bridge in the world. It bridges the valley of the Kinzua, four miles from Alton, Pa., is two thousand and fifty-one feet in length, and its height is three hundred and one feet above the bed of the river. It is sixty feet higher than the suspension bridge at Niagara Falls.

INDIA is making rapid strides in intellectual and moral progress. Even in the enfranchisement and education of women, it is beginning to take its place among the most advanced nations, in proof of which we instance the fact that, "at the recent matriculation examination of the Calcutta University, eight women passed successfully, of whom six are natives of India; and at Bombay seven women were successful, including four from Poonah. At the First Arts examination at Calcutta, a female candidate obtained a scholarship of the first grade.

It seems that the boycotting system is, after all, not peculiar to Ireland; for a missionary relates that, in a certain village in Japan, some priests, in their efforts to prevent the spread of the Christian religion, have drawn up a document which is expected to be signed by all the inhabitants, one clause of which reads as follows: "Therefore, we agree that, if any native of this village becomes a Christian, we will cease to have any intercourse with him; and if any person dwelling here, not being a native, embraces the foreign creed, we will send him back to his birthplace."

THAT orthodox daily, the Cincinnati Gazette, in its zeal to have all work stopped on Sunday, argues against the claim that milkmen must make their rounds every day, because babies require it, by saying that "the rich can keep milk over Sunday and that the poor can go without it; and that, if the stoppage of Sunday milk shall diminish the rising generation, it will be only another of the means which nature fetches in to restrict the increasing pressure of population on the means of subsistence and to raise the quality of the race by the great process of the survival of the fittest."

THE popularity of General Ignatieff, the Russian minister of the interior and leader of the Pan-Slavic party, is on the wane. The minister of finance lays the responsibility for frequent outbreaks against the Jews to his short-sighted policy. The driving of Jewish inhabitants from the country and the destruction of their property are now seen to be an economical mistake; and the minister of finance, who is chiefly concerned in making the imperial income and expenditure balance, cannot help seeing that, by the destruction of thousands of buildings and the expulsion of thousands of industrious inhabitants, the country is made poorer, even though religious bigotry is thereby gratified.

AT a meeting of the Committee of the Sunday Society, London, on May 7 (the object of which society is to obtain the opening of museums, art galleries, libraries, and gardens on Sunday), Professor Corfield, M.A., M.D., in the chair, the death of Mr. Emerson was referred to, he having been an honorary member of the society. The following resolution was unanimously passed, on the proposal of Mr. Mark H. Judge, A.R.I.B.A., seconded by Mr. Robson I. Scott: "That, inasmuch as Ralph Waldo Emerson, lately deceased, was one of the truest exponents of the movement represented by the Sunday Society, and his connection with the society itself, as an honorary member, one of its proudest distinctions, this committee deplore the event which, while severing that connection, has deprived America of an illustrious citizen and the world at large of a benign influence, and express their profoundest sympathy with the surviving relatives of the eminent thinker in the loss they have sustained."

A PAMPHLET emanating from the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church is being circulated among lawyers. Enclosed in the circular is a neatly printed notice, which reads as follows: "As you are frequently called upon to draft wills for your clients, this pamphlet is sent to you to ask your attention to one of the most important eleemosynary institutions in our city. The corporate title is 'The General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States,' a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York." This notice is of course an invitation to lawyers to take advantage of their position, which involves confidential relations with their clients and knowledge denied to the world at large, to influence rich men, when drawing up their wills, to devise and bequeath their property to the institution above named. An exchange justly remarks that it would be almost as disgraceful "to comply with the spirit of the above invitation as it is for clergymen to surround the bed of a dying man, and endeavor to extort from him gifts to the Church which he would never have made in the time of health and strength and perspicacity of intellect. No honorable lawyer will comply with a request of this character."

"THE Summer School of Christian Philosophy," which will hold sessions two weeks at Greenwood Lake, N.Y., next July, is going to tackle some knotty questions, judging from the titles of the addresses to be delivered there. Among others, Professor Fisher of Yale is to present "The Arguments for the Being of a God"; Prof. Geo. T. Ladd will deal with "Nature and the Supernatural"; Dr. Bascom will discourse on "Mind and Matter, their Present Relation and Ultimate Reference"; Professor Patton of Princeton speaks on "The Genesis of the Idea of a God"; Prof. C. A. Young will tell what he knows about "Distances and Dimensions of the Heavenly Bodies"; Professor Davis of the University of Virginia will explain "The Duality of Mind and the Brain"; Rev. Washington Gladden will talk about "Christianity as a Social Science"; S. H. Wilder will give his reasons for believing "The Spencerian Philosophy a Misrepresentation of the Doctrine of Correlation of Forces"; "Literature and Popular Life" will be the theme of Professor Mabie, of the Christian Union; while Dr. Morris Butler will try to throw light on the "Curiosities of Insanity." It is well for the cause of progress that subjects like some of these, instead of the old-time points of doctrine, are to be discussed by Christian ministers; for, whatever views shall be presented, the discussion will be likely to awaken popular attention, encourage investigation, and lead to good results.

SECULARISM,—ITS MERIT AND ITS DEFECT.

One of the facts brought to light by the study of comparative theology is that several of the primitive races of mankind chose the sky—the bright, cloudless sky—as the name of their highest conception of Deity. Even while men were worshipping the inferior forces of nature, and believed in various deities and spirits in the powers of earth and air and in the heavenly bodies, they took for their symbol of supreme Deity the highest and grandest thing they saw,—that which seemed to be beyond and to include and cover everything else,—the brilliant vault of the heavens. Here is a hint that religion at its very origin, with all its errors and superstitions, had for its aim to bind man, not to his lowest, but to the highest and best that he knew,—a hint that man has felt, from the most primitive era, that his life was not held within the limits of earth-forces alone, nor bounded by its earthly horizon, but that earth itself with all its interests is joined in a common life with the heavens. Just as astronomers have shown that this globe which man inhabits is related to the sun and moon and planets, and is held in its place and impelled in its movements by the mutually related forces to which it is subject in its connection with these celestial bodies, and have shown again that the whole solar system has relation to other suns and systems around it in the infinite vastness of the celestial spaces, so has man, from that far antiquity of which any traditions have been preserved of his thoughts and customs, had an idea that all his concerns as a being, thinking, feeling, and doing on this earth, were vitally connected with whatsoever of being or of power could be conceived as existing in the farthest realms of space around and above him. And in the sense of this relationship of man's finite life and power to the life and power that he conceives to be supreme in the universe around him, however dimly or clearly the relation may be understood and in whatever form of words it may be expressed, consists the essence of the religious consciousness.

It is well to recall this fact of primitive religion and the significance of it in this modern era, when, owing to the damaged condition into which religion has been brought by irrational doctrines and observances, many people have come to entertain the idea that it is to be displaced and are looking about for some substitute for it. Secularism is the substitute that has been put forward, perhaps with the largest claims to efficacy. By secularism as here understood is meant a social, organized attempt to make the most and the best of this earthly life, as if it were the bound of all life for man. And this is a philosophy of life which has its merit. As opposed to that ecclesiastical type of piety, now happily becoming obsolete, which shut its eyes not only to human affections and joys on earth, but very largely also to human needs and to man's just share of responsibility for improving the earthly condition of the human race, there should be no hesitation in giving to secularism the preference. If secularism professes no belief nor interest in any other life, it at least tries to make the present life better worth the living. If it shuts man up to this world, it should have the credit of an earnest endeavor to make this world a more passable habitation for him. While saintly pietists stand gazing as if with clairvoyant vision up into heaven, sighing for its felicities, secularists put their shoulders to the task of removing the obstructions which prevent man from attaining felicity on earth. And such a philosophy has come as a natural reaction against those old theological beliefs which laid all the stress on getting ready for the life after death, and neglected the life before death; which blindly thought in some way to save the soul by maltreating and sacrificing the body. Secularism has in fact been teaching the possible beauty, felicity, worth, and dignity of man's life in this world. And in this capacity it has been doing a high religious service, for which it deserves the grateful regard of mankind. It has been teaching Religion her most primary duties; and there are healthful signs that Religion has, in a measure, caught the lesson.

But it may be questioned whether secularism can ever take the place of religion; whether its mission is not rather to balance and modify than to displace; whether it presents the broadest and completest philosophy of human existence that even science is giving us; and whether it can do its best work for even human amelioration on earth without being joined with a genuine religious philosophy. Secularism, developing as a system of life by itself, is in danger of becoming barren, prosaic, narrow, little, and belittling; missing the grand sweep of thought, the lifts of imagination and hope, the exhilarating breadth of mental atmospheres, which belong, not necessarily to church theology, but to the real domain of religion. It is to be admitted, certainly, that religion is not doing and will not do its proper work, until it takes hold of the present miseries and deformities of human society right here on earth,—the bitter, crying evils of intemperance, licentiousness, cruelty, hatred, dishonesty, selfish lust for power,—with earnest and steadfast determination to abate them. But, on the other hand, it may be doubted whether secularism, with all the benevolence of its aims, can accomplish a large and lasting amelioration of these evil social conditions, without the far-reaching vision and the consecrated persistency of purpose and the elevating sense of universal relation which religion supplies. As the earth itself cannot be scientifically understood, unless it is studied in its relations to the solar system, and hence indirectly to the whole universe of worlds, so man's life on this earth, even if there be no other for him, cannot be correctly measured and comprehended in all its mental and moral aspects without considering its relation, both as to origin and destiny, with the whole universe of life.

And, hence, secularism, professing to be the science and art of human society on earth and to rest on scientific facts alone, is brought by its own methods and aims to recognize religion as among the necessary factors for the accomplishment of its aims. As man's dwelling-place is but one of a countless number of globes revolving in the infinities of space, and is so organically related to them that its very perturbations are cancelled in their grander revolutions, so much more does man, the dweller, look out and up into the infinite dome of worlds with which he is surrounded, to feel that he bears a part in an august drama of existence, which takes him along in a vastly larger enfoldment of purpose than any which can be measured on the circumference of this little earth. This outlook which he has into the boundless heavens above gives him a different inlook into his own nature, with more adequate revelation of the source, purpose, and possibilities of his being. When our Aryan ancestors put their highest ideal of Supreme Being in the sky rather than in the rim of earth, they, to use Emerson's phrase, hitched their wagon to a star, which has drawn after it all the higher phases of human progress and civilization. "One world at a time" is an excellent motto to indicate the spot where the lever of duty is to be planted; but there is never a time when one world is enough to explain even itself to man's thought or to content man's ideal, so long as there are millions of worlds sweeping round his brain.

WM. J. POTTER.

A TRUE CHRISTIAN.

"Christianity, in common with Buddhism," as Strauss truly observes, "teaches a thorough cult of poverty and mendicancy. The mendicant monks of the Middle Ages, as well as the still flourishing mendicancy of Rome, are genuinely Christian institutions." A true Christian regards earthly possessions as the greatest stumbling-block in the way of salvation. "Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God"; but "Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation." The Master had not where to lay his head, and his immediate followers got rid of all their property,—"sold all their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men as every man had need." The Christian, in view of Christ's condemnation of wealth and the example of those favored ones who enjoyed the inspiration of his presence and his speech, deems it a duty to remain poor, believing his heavenly Father will take care of him as he takes care of the lilies of the field, or as, in olden time, he provided for his people by bread from heaven and water from a rock. Let worldly and wicked men, he says, engage in worldly pursuits; but my business is to lay up treasures in heaven, and save souls from hell.

The Christian thinks resistance on the part of slaves and efforts to destroy slavery wrong. In the Old Testament, he reads the commands to the Jews to buy bondmen and bondwomen. In the New Testament, slavery is nowhere condemned, although in the time of Christ and his apostles there were sixty millions of slaves in the Roman Empire. "Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their masters worthy of all honor," says the inspired apostle. It is sinful to own any property; but the unregenerate will have possessions, and it is the duty of the slave to submit and to be content with his condition. With this view, it is not strange that the slave system continued in the Roman Empire more than a thousand years after Christianity appeared, or that there were more slaves in Christian than in pagan Rome.

The Christian believes that resistance to "the powers that be" is resistance to God. He reads: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers, for there is no power but of God. The powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the powers resisteth the ordinances of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." Jesus enjoined non-resistance in the most unmistakable language; and, when subjected to oppression and ignominy, bitter as was the cup put to his lips, gladly as he would have pushed it aside, able as he was to summon legions of angels to his rescue and to overthrow the whole fabric of the Roman Empire, he offered no resistance, but meekly submitted to all his enemies chose to inflict upon him. How dare I, then, says the Christian, with the teachings and example of Christ before me, resist the wrongs heaped upon me, my friends, or my country?

Woman the Christian regards as man's inferior. She shines by light borrowed from man, while he shines by light received direct from God. The notion of woman's inferiority in the time of Jesus was common, but we have no evidence that he sought to correct it. He did not change the Jewish law of divorce, except to limit divorce to adultery on the part of the wife. The Christian turns to the writings of Paul, and reads: "For indeed a man ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man. For the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man."

"Christianity," says John Weiss, "neither emphasizes the equality of woman within her own sex, nor her right to all the opportunities she may decide to claim. It was not till Christianity found Greek refinement on its way to the west, and met there the superior reverence for woman among the Teutonic races, that Europe began to entertain a better opinion. The literalist has always been right in maintaining that human slavery and the subjection of woman can be clearly vindicated by the text and practice of the Bible."

The Christian regards marriage as undesirable and to be discouraged. Ordinary humanity compels him to deny himself a relation in which he might be the father of beings who would be doomed to everlasting torment. His Master never taught men should marry; and his duty is to work out his salvation with fear and trembling, and try to win souls to Christ, and not to add to the number that will be damned. "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," is his prayer. In heaven there is no marriage.

The Christian has but little confidence in the results of mere human effort. His reliance is on God's aid, to be obtained only by prayer. Is his brother sick? He calls no physician, but prays for his recovery, lays hands upon him, anoints him with oil. The study of medicine he regards as sinful, since it shows lack of faith in his Master's promise. "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do." He spends nearly all his time in prayer. He sees multitudes going down the road that leads to hell. He would not be human, if he did not mourn day and night. The words of Jesus come to him: "Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep." "Blessed be ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh."

The efforts of reformers who aim at the amelioration of man's earthly condition he deprecates; for they succeed only in making this life attractive, causing man to love the things of this life, diverting attention from the interests of the hereafter. He who finds this earth a place of hardship and weariness is more likely to "lay up treasures" in heaven than he who has earthly possessions and opportunities for enjoying the good things of this world. How cruel, then, is the man who tries to remove poverty!

The Christian is inflexibly opposed to whatever adds to the beauty and attractiveness of this world. Does his neighbor erect a palatial residence, surround it with pleasant walks, with trees and flowers, with sparkling fountains and beautiful statuary, and adorn its walls with pictures and paintings, and add to his home every attraction that art and taste can suggest. The Christian views all this with deep regret; for it is evidence that his neighbor loves the world and is neglecting to keep his thoughts on God and his immortal soul. The great industrial pursuits of the age and its secular enterprises are evidence to him only of worldliness and wickedness, and are a positive denial of the worthlessness of this life and the insignificance of human effort, unaccompanied by prayer. So the Christian implores God to touch the hearts of men and turn them from earth to heaven,—from railroads, steamships, telegraph-lines, banks and stocks, manufactures and mechanical inventions, government reform, agriculture, and other worldly objects and pursuits, to the world of spirits and the fate of their undying souls. Anxious to leave this wicked world,—to be "absent from the body and present with the Lord,"—he sings of the fleeting vanities of earth and the fadeless glories of heaven, the utter worthlessness of all worldly things, and the richness of Christ's undying love.

He believes in a great personal devil, and ascribes every misfortune and evil thought to him.

Has his mind dwelt on the pleasures and attractions of this life? the devil was at work trying to seduce his soul. He thinks Satan has filled the world with snares, and he is constantly on the lookout for his stratagems and devices to entrap his soul.

If he has been so imprudent as to have become a husband and father, he is distressed by fears that he loves too fondly his wife and his children. So strong are the ties of nature that he is liable by attachment to his family to become unworthy of his Saviour. But, if he is a Christian par excellence, he has no wife nor children to divert his mind from the supreme object of his affection.

Such are some of the main features of a distinctively Christian character,—a character that conforms to the requirements of the New Testament. That passages can be quoted which directly or by implication conflict with some of the characteristics mentioned above, is true. Were we to describe a Christian in full, we should be under the necessity of giving traits opposite to and quite incompatible with some that have been presented; for the New Testament, the work of different writers, contains teachings that are manifestly contradictory. Enough that we have ascribed to the Christian no qualities or practices that are not approved or enjoined in the Book which he accepts as an authoritative standard and an infallible rule of faith and duty. It is evident from what has been offered: 1. that Christianity in some of its main teachings is opposed to the worldly enterprise, activity, and progress of the age; 2. that, in practice, the civilized world is governed by precepts and principles diametrically opposite to many of the teachings of Christianity; 3. that some of the characteristic teachings of Christianity can be obeyed only by men and women living an ascetic life; 4. that the embodiment of Christianity in practice, in its entirety, is utterly impossible, and there is therefore no such character as a "Bible Christian on earth."

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

ROME NOW AND THEN.

Priestly power, which only a few years ago was supreme in the city of Rome, inspiring fear and outward deference, at least, in all dwellers with its omnipresent papal police, domiciliary visits, and arbitrary arrests, imprisonments, and expulsions from the city of all persons in the least obnoxious to it, seems to be now sadly at a discount there. We are told that a priest appearing in the streets of Rome in the evening in his clerical dress is in danger of insult and violence, inasmuch that ecclesiastics as a measure of prudence, when they are travelling or in the country or in the evening, adopt a plain black dress. Formerly, when the Pope's carriage came along, the people in the streets all knelt, in fact were obliged to kneel, as the papal police would be after any stiff-kneed Roman who remained erect while old Pio Nono was making his transit. It is no wonder to any one acquainted with the history of Rome under that pontiff that the priestly costume excites the wrath of the populace, for it used to be associated with the meanest and most arbitrary outrages on the personal rights of sojourners and citizens alike. In the good old days of papal rule, when Rome was a holy city pure and simple, householders and traders were constantly pestered by mendicant friars and innumerable priestly beggars for alms and contributions, which they were not at liberty to refuse, because anybody who did refuse was straightway subjected to all manner of annoyance by the papal police, even to arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. The priest was then supreme in Rome. The famous Spanish orator, littérateur, and professor, Castelar, gives a graphic account of the summary way in which he was hustled out of the Eternal City, where he was sojourning merely as a traveller, with no hostile intent toward the papacy. The landlord of the hotel where the illustrious Spaniard was stopping received a domiciliary visit from the papal police, and asked his guest in a terrified manner, "Why did you conceal your rank from me?" "My rank? I had none to conceal." "Your importance?" "I am not of any consequence." "You are a distinguished person." "I celebrated! Bah, are you mocking me?" Castelar demanded. "I have kept the police from coming to your chamber by saying that I would communicate to you their order." "What order?" "The order to leave Rome immediately." By way of explanation, Castelar was told that he had written books that were condemned by the Index Expurgatorius, that he was a friend of Garibaldi and of Mazzini, that he was a liberal and democrat and a revolutionist. In fact, he was told that, if he did not leave Rome by the first train, he would be imprisoned, possibly hanged. It was then half-past nine o'clock A.M. The next train for the south left at 10 o'clock. It is needless to say that Castelar left in it. Such was old-fashioned papal Rome in the days of Pio Nono. What wonder is it that its citizens say that they would prefer to see the city laid in ashes to a restoration of the supremacy of the priests? And yet we have American journalists, American by naturalization at least, who publish papers in this free republic, in which the Rome of to-day with its personal liberty and tolerance of free speech and action is denounced and the restoration of the city to priestly rule is persistently advocated. These journalists are a peculiar style of Americans, with peculiar notions of liberty. Of Anglo-Saxon liberty, at least, they have not the faintest conception. They are bigots, and wherever such as they are in power there is not the least freedom of speech or action. Thanks to Garibaldi, Mazzini, Cavour, and Victor Emanuel, the Rome and Italy of to-day are emulating Great Britain and the United States in the matter of liberty and tolerance. The priest is at a discount. And it is precisely as priestly power wanes that freedom, intelligence, and humanity become the order of the day.

B. W. BALL.

LIBERAL DEFENDERS OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.

II.

Our great poet and critic, Matthew Arnold, has of late years forsaken the pleasant paths of literature, and has begun to criticise our religious and political institutions, foremost among them the State Church. Mr. Arnold defends the Church of England from the attacks both of religious dissenters and of agnostics and of radical politicians, and he does so for two main reasons: first, he tells us that the Church is a great national institution for "the promotion of goodness"; and, secondly, it is a comprehensive spiritual organization, which no mere sect can be. Every one will admit that the "promotion of goodness" is a high aim, and one which might well be pursued by men both inside and outside the existing Churches. What is not so plain is that the Anglican Church as an Established Church is doing that work. A Church which is simply a bulwark of class government, which is disgraced by the scandalous traffic in livings, which is almost torn asunder by the violent conflicts of the contending factions within its limits, and which has never uttered a word in behalf of humanity,—such a body is not the most efficient organ for the "promotion of goodness." The Church has no coherent body of doctrine, no lofty aspirations, and calls forth no affectionate regard from the people. This being the case, how can it in any way promote goodness? If by the promotion of goodness is meant the quickening into renewed activity of the higher impulses of the soul, the kindling within men's breasts of the "enthusiasm of humanity," the formation of a better type of citizenship, then I say unhesitatingly that the humble and ignorant primitive Methodists have done far more during the last forty years for the "promotion of goodness" than has the great, wealthy, historic Church of England. In saying this, I by no means wish to appear insensible to the dignity of an historic Church or to record my hearty admiration of Methodism. A cultured man who believes in the existing Churches at all will naturally feel more en rapport with an historic national organization, with all its faults, than with a narrow and an ignorant sect. But, when all is said, such a one must admit that the sect has that divine element of human compassion and enthusiasm which the decorous and respectable national Church has not. I cannot see why State patronage and pay are essential to the "promotion of goodness," because I find that (1) goodness was most effectually promoted in the earliest days of the Christian Church, when that body was the object, not of patronage, but of persecution; and (2) because history also teaches me that, exactly in proportion as teachers of religion have become State officials, they have ceased to be purely spiritual forces in the community. This, I doubt not, every American regards as an axiom; and I cannot but think that every day a greater number of Englishmen are getting to regard it as an axiom likewise.

Then, again, Mr. Arnold would have us preserve the State Church, because it is a "comprehensive" body. In his essay entitled "Puritanism and the Church of England," Mr. Arnold says, "The good of comprehension in a national church is that, the larger and more various the body of members, the more elements of power and life the Church will contain, the more points there will be of contact, the more mutual support and stimulus, the more growth in perfection, both of thought and practice." Now, we must ask how it is that the Anglican Church has come to be a comprehensive church, for it is nominally bound together by certain creeds and articles of a by no means comprehensive character. The answer that must be given is that comprehension is purchased at the price of intellectual sincerity. Mr. Arnold has himself advised the clergyman who cannot accept creeds and articles in their plain and natural sense to put his own construction upon them. He may thus explain away, to himself and the initiated few, miracles, inspiration, atonement, future punishment, deity of Jesus, and even immortality and God, while reciting most decorously every Sunday words which can have to him no meaning, and leading simple people to suppose that he believes them. I can only say that it will be a bad day for England if ever this advice of Matthew Arnold's is generally adopted, for honesty and sincerity will have taken leave of our land. There is only one way of making the Church comprehensive, and that is by abolishing the creeds and articles and admitting every one (for if only a mere handful of secularists are omitted, the Church is not comprehensive in the sense of being coterminous with the nations). This cannot be done; for High Churchmen would regard such a body as no church at all, while all orthodox believers would justly protest against the admission of Jews, secularists, and atheists to an avowedly Christian Church. The notion of a comprehensive church, therefore, existing for the "promotion of goodness," is an entirely delusive one, spite of the glamour Mr. Arnold has cast over it by his fine genius.

Our last liberal defender of the Church as by law established is Canon Farrar, who dealt with this subject in some highly rhetorical discourses delivered last year in Westminster Abbey. It is a pity that this eminently good and noble-minded man is liable to be carried away by excited feelings and to indulge in reckless utterances. He was certainly never more reckless than on this occasion. He declared, among other things, that the demand for disestablishment emanated from the extremes of sacerdotalism and unbelief. It is doubtless true that both priests and philosophers are against the State Church; but it is also a notorious fact that the demand for the separation of Church and State originated with the orthodox dissenters who, forty years ago, founded the British Anti-State Church Association, now called the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control. Then, Canon Farrar, to treat of the French Revolution and its atheistic Reign of Terror, which is always brought forward in England by those who wish to frighten the people from making fundamental changes,—Canon Farrar tried to associate Robespierre in some mysterious way with the Liberation Society, unaware, apparently, of the fact that Robespierre was opposed throughout to the atheistic party, and that after he had rid France of that section he took part in a public celebration of the Supreme Being. The canon seemed also to have forgotten that throughout the whole Revolution a State Church existed in France, and that it exists there to-day, although the great mass of Frenchmen are well known to be indifferent or absolutely atheistic. It appears, however, that, so far as the pulpit is concerned, these are the strongest arguments that can be offered against disestablishment,—arguments which can only be summed up as an attempt at religious terrorism.

I have thus briefly sketched some of the leading arguments for the maintenance of the State Church urged by its liberal defenders; that is, by men who are more or less in sympathy with modern progress. It appears that they have little to say in behalf of an ancient feudal institution which is ludicrously out of harmony with this modern age in which it has managed to survive. That survival is mainly due to the rooted conservatism of the English people; but the time seems to be arriving when it will no longer be tolerated, and when England will borrow from the United States one of the most essential elements of the American Republic,—religious equality,—which will lead inevitably to political equality,—that is, the establishment of the republic in England.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

SCIENCE AND THEISM.

It will be obvious that, if the exposition of science we have given is true, science can furnish no original and direct help to the doctrine of theism. It is wholly confined to nature, and never transcends the phenomena of nature. It is a search for serial or lexical phenomena.

A blind demurrer will be raised to our exposition, in the interest of causality; and we must pause long enough to give it light, if not sight. It must be allowed that science treats of what it calls causes and effects. But terms should not blind or mislead us, for their proper mission is just the opposite. Now, by causes and effects, science always means lexical antecedents and subcedents, and nothing else in any case, so that the transition to the topic of causes and effects is only a nominal transition.

Now, if I attempted to sustain this exposition of cause and effect by quoting from scientists and philosophers of the materialistic order and tendency, I should, not without apparent reason, be charged with appealing to the prejudiced partisans of the doctrine. But, if I quote from theists themselves, and even from theistic metaphysicians, I shall be acquitted of partiality. I have therefore adduced Stewart on phenomenal lexicality, and I will now adduce Sir William Hamilton on the scientific doctrine of causes. In his lectures on metaphysics, he says, "Philosophical knowledge, in the widest acceptance of the term, and as synonymous with science, is thus the knowledge of effects as dependent on their causes." And he proceeds to explain these effects and causes as phenomenal antecedents and subcedents of lexical regularity. "For example," he says, "we are struck with the appearance in the heavens called the rainbow. Think we cannot that this phenomenon has no cause, though we may be wholly ignorant of what that cause is. Now, our knowledge of the phenomenon as a mere fact, as a mere isolated event, does not content us: we therefore set about an inquiry into the cause,—which the constitution of our minds compels us to suppose,—and at length discover that the rainbow is the effect of the refraction of the solar rays by the watery particles of a cloud. Now, this knowledge of the cause of a phenomenon . . . is called philosophical or scientific or rational knowledge." This discovery of phenomenal cause as the highest attainment of philosophy is identical with our definition of science, since these causes are lexical antecedents, and for this reason are called causes; and hence he here properly makes science and philosophy synonyms.

These causes, however, are all effects, whence, he says, "it follows that it is the scope—that is, the aim of philosophy—to trace up the series of effects and causes until we arrive at causes which are not also themselves effects. These first causes do not indeed lie within the reach of philosophy, nor even within the sphere of our comprehension; nor consequently on the actual reaching them does the existence of philosophy depend. But, as philosophy is the knowledge of effects in their causes, the tendency of philosophy is ever upward; and philosophy can in thought, in theory only, be viewed as accomplished,—which in reality it never can be,—when the ultimate causes, the causes on which all other causes depend, have been attained and understood." But, as each cause has a plurality of effects, "philosophy thus . . . necessarily tends, not toward a plurality of ultimate or first causes, but toward one alone. This first cause—the Creator—it can never reach as an object of immediate knowledge; but as the convergence toward unity in the ascending series is manifest, in so far as that series is within our view, and as it is even impossible for the mind to suppose the convergence not continuous and complete, it follows . . . that we must believe in that ultimate or primary unity which in our present existence we are not destined in itself to apprehend."

"Such is philosophical knowledge in its most extensive signification; and, in this signification, all the sciences, occupied in the research of causes, may be viewed as so many branches of philosophy."

This makes "philosophy in its widest signification" to be only of lexical phenomena; for the transcendent unity to which these are supposed to converge is ever beyond us, and on its attainment philosophy does not depend. This conception of philosophy is, therefore, so far only on a par with that of Comte, who with Hamilton makes all sciences "so many branches of philosophy."

Hamilton, however, has an affirmative addendum, to the effect that we must believe in an ultimate and primary unity, the Creator, as the focus toward which all phenomena converge. Where to put this addendum, or what to call it, he evidently does not know; and in his embarrassment he leaves it unplaced and undefined. He, however, excludes it from philosophy, since its attainment as a knowledge is not necessary to philosophy; and the belief of it, however necessary, is not philosophy, if a supposed psychological necessity is its sole and ultimate foundation; for it is then only an ultimate faith. (Besides, it is not such a necessity; for very many philosophers disbelieve the doctrine of a Creator.) Philosophy is thus left in its phenomenal nakedness and imbecility,—mere science or lexical phenomenalism.

Mr. Spencer's notion of philosophy is thoroughly Hamiltonian, except that he replaces Hamilton's "Creator" with the unknown "Cosmic Force," which, he says, is a necessary postulate of thought, a datum of consciousness, a necessary correlative of the relative, the immanent and immutable cause of phenomenal forms and changes and all experiences, and itself uncaused. But Spencer is more logical as well as more scientific than Hamilton, in that, as he finds this unity in nature, he ascribes it to nature, making the mighty force of nature's unity one with nature, which is all that is necessary or justifiable on the basis of the known facts.

The theologian and the moralist sometimes endeavor to construct an argument based on the phenomena of the religious and moral consciousness, inferring from these phenomena a personal cause. But, on our scientific basis, this inference is clearly unwarrantable. Scientifically, we shall only recede from these phenomena to lexically antecedent phenomena, which are their only scientifically recognized causes. Moral and religious phenomena come within the sphere of science as truly and completely as sensible phenomena, and science will investigate them after the same method; and, in so doing, its conclusions must be phenomenal,—natural, that is, not transcending the known or at least the knowable course of nature or the world.

On the subject of consciousness, Mr. Wasson reproduces an ancient and exploded error. Buckle says that, since men have imagined ghosts which have no existence except as modes of consciousness, consciousness is thus proved sometimes false or erroneous. Mr. Wasson replies that it is not consciousness that is here false, but perception, because there is a conscious fact, but not a fact of perception, consciousness being always confined to self, while it is the office of a true perception to transcend consciousness and self, terminating in an external object. This is false and belated psychology. Buckle was bad, but this is worse. Consciousness is co-extensive with sensation and perception, as well as with all thought and feeling, else we could not know that we are the subject and agent of them. I am conscious of the sensations which I call pen, paper, and writing, and therefore I am able to affirm these things. So far as perception ever differs from consciousness, it is not properly sense perception at all, but only an inference. When the genie of the Arabian story personated a woman's husband, and as such was admitted to her bed, she was the subject of a real sense-consciousness or sense-perception, and of a false inference. Her experience was real; but her inference that the cause of her experience, the apparent man in the likeness of her husband, was her husband, was erroneous. So, in Buckle's illustration of the ghost, he is wrong in saying consciousness is in error; and Mr. Wasson is wrong in saying that perception is in error. They are one, and both are correct. The alleged ghost is a sensible phenomenon, as well as a conscious phenomenon.

The error consists solely in the inference that the phenomenon is a ghost. The faculties of the soul should not be set a bickering at each other, like a set of opposing political partisans. There is no error or truth except for the understanding or reason, and neither internal nor external consciousness can make any mistakes; and all our faculties must be treated alike or by the same method. The phenomena of internal consciousness present no more mystery for science and are no less open to the inspection and judgment of science than are the phenomena of the outward senses; and the causes of one class as well as of the other are to be scientifically determined in the same way, by finding their antecedent lexical phenomena, which can never approach theism. "Science proceeds on sensible observation," it is true; but every possible form and sphere of observation are also its province. But, whatever its scope of observation, its inferences are only to other possible or conceivably possible observations as lexical antecedents or lexical subcedents. So far as the threefold object ascribed by Mr. Wasson to science is construed as meaning anything more than this, it is erroneous. The scientists often erroneously attempt more.

It is a fine and ingenious suggestion of Mr. Wasson that, "as we are through our sentient organism in constant and inter-relation with an external reality, which appears to us as material, so we, through the higher principles of our conscious being, are in contact and inter-relation with a superior and sovereign order of reality, which appears to us as spiritual." But this inference is super-scientific, both as to the material and spiritual reality, because both are confessedly trans-phenomenal. They are excluded from the chain of lexical phenomena. It is true that Spencer makes that inference concerning the world-force; but Spencer is avowedly something more than a man of science,—he is a philosopher who uses science for ulterior ends. But Spencer is much more true to the method of science and to the requirements of a strict and sober logic than Mr. Wasson. Mr. Spencer's unknown world-force is identical with the known world, and so with us; and therefore it is only partially unknown, while all that we do know are its actual modes of existence and action. It is all otherwise with the spiritual reality which theism infers, through Mr. Wasson. Further, our spiritual and sentient being are one, the modes of the same one conscious personality, and these modes have a known unity of lexical succession and development; and, if we were to allow ourselves to abandon the method of science and infer a cause beyond the order of nature, we ought to infer a unity of causation for the one personality, though a unity operating in various modes. And such a unity is found in Spencer's world-force, of whose existence and action we have a partial but real and extensive knowledge, since we form a part of it, and exemplify it in all our experience.

My theistic readers will now be mentally projecting against me the argument from design; but that also is super-scientific. Though we ourselves are conscious of design, it is never, and never can be, an object of observation beyond ourselves. Beyond ourselves, it is at the best only an inference, and as an inference it is non-scientific, since it can never be a phenomenon, never a lexical antecedent or subcedent of other phenomena, and so be either cause and effect relative to them. We infer design in other men, because in appearance and action they are like us; and we reject such inference relative to the world, because it is in appearance and action unlike us, and science can furnish no ground for the ulterior inference that the world itself is the product of design, because science can have no data for transcending the world at all or for assigning any limit to the extent and duration of the world-force.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian Register speaks of Dr. Adler's closing lecture for the season before the Ethical Society, New York, which he calls a "noble discourse," and makes it an occasion for explaining the drift of Dr. Adler's teaching in a way it is not generally understood by those who are not accustomed to hear him. As the correspondent truly says, the central idea with Dr. Adler is that "there is within us, regnant over all the domain of our manhood, a moral ideal, which is the grandest of ourselves and which is absolutely imperative." He then further interprets thus:—

In view of this immanent moral nature of man as affirmed by Kant, making itself felt, not because God is, but because man is, come the religious feeling and conception,—not as the source, but as the result of the moral sentiment. This is a very important point in Mr. Adler's philosophy; and, whether one agrees with it or not, its consideration is certainly helpful. Adler does not ignore religion and confine himself simply to ethics, meaning by ethics the right conduct between man and man. He says that morality inevitably flows to religion; that is, it seeks a philosophy of the infinite. The moral nature cannot confine itself simply to man: it will go forth to the whole surrounding universe, to the immensity of nature, to every distant star, and seek to know its destiny,—if all is well in those remote world-ships that, along with ours, are plunging through the measureless oceans of being. The moral man becomes at his highest religious, in that he feels his relation with the all; and he must, in aspiration at least, feel his oneness with the endless and infinite reality of things.

THE Catholic Church has a way of paying for endowments to its institutions which Protestants may envy. According to the Catholic Review, this is the way by which a Catholic college proposes to remember past donors and tempt new ones:—

Last week, we briefly pleaded for the endowment of Catholic colleges and schools. Now, we are glad to note that the colleges do not propose to forget their benefactors. One of them at least, that of Our Lady of Angels, Suspension Bridge, N.Y., proposes to found an annual Mass, to be celebrated on a fixed day early in May, for the living and dead benefactors of that institution. Says the Niagara Index: "We are requested by the Very Rev. President to state that a Solemn High Mass will be celebrated in the college chapel on the 1st of May, for the spiritual benefit of those who have in the past been the benefactors of the college and seminary of Our Lady of Angels. Those who made generous donations to our seminary in years gone by may remember that Very Rev. T. S. Smith, Visitor-General of the Congregation of the Mission, promised some time ago to have, in the future, masses of the living and dead said for them. The priestly faculty of our Alma Mater have never forgotten Niagara's benefactors at the altar of the Most High, and the new custom about to be initiated of having a Solemn High Mass celebrated on the first day of Mary's month of every year will rehearse the loving feelings of affection which bind Niagara to Niagara's friends. . . . Henceforth, the 1st of May of each succeeding year will be celebrated with as solemn and imposing ceremony as may be."

"It is reported in Berlin," says the Jewish Watchman, "that the representatives of the House of Rothschild in that city have refused to bring out a Russian loan of twenty million roubles for the construction of the Caucasus railway, chiefly in consequence of the continued persecution of the Jews in Russia. Negotiations having thereupon taken place with the Berliner Handelsgesellschaft, this body caused the Russian Minister of Finance to be informed that it would not enter into any arrangements with regard to the desired loan so long as there was no prospect of a cessation in the present cruel treatment of the Russian Jews."

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 25, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religious and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on the 1st and 2d of June, 1882, with sessions as follows:—

THURSDAY EVENING, June 1, at 7.45 P.M. Business meeting for election of officers, hearing of reports, and action upon the Resolutions referred from the Conference of March 28. The following amendment to the Constitution, prepared by a Committee appointed for the purpose by the Executive Committee, is to be proposed for adoption in lieu of present Article III.:—

The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and twelve Directors. They shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the Association; and the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors be chosen. The Directors shall be chosen for four years, and, at the expiration of that term, shall not be eligible for re-election until after two years. One fourth of their number shall be chosen annually; but, at the annual meeting of 1882, the full number of twelve shall be chosen in sections of three respectively for one, two, three, and four years. The President, Secretaries, Treasurer, and Directors shall together constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. They shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number, or in the list of Vice-Presidents, between any two annual meetings. Six members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

FRIDAY, June 2.—A Convention for essays and addresses at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M., with the following programme of speakers and topics:—

Morning: T. W. HIGGINSON, "A Tribute to Emerson"; W. J. POTTER, "Liberty, but Religion also"; S. J. STEWART (Bangor), "Morality as the Aim and Crown of Liberty and Religion."

Afternoon: W. M. SALTER, "Do the Ethics of Jesus satisfy the Needs of our Time"; ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, "The Appeal of the Unchurched to Free Religion"; E. C. TOWNE, "The Permanence of the Christian Method in Religion"; B. F. UNDERWOOD, "Science as a Factor in Moral and Social Progress."

An address will be made by FELIX ADLER at the morning session.

FRIDAY EVENING, a Social Festival will close the proceedings, with the usual features of interest. WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

MR. MILLS' new work, noticed in another column, can be had at this office.

SEVERAL articles, including one by Mr. Wasson, which we intended to give to our readers in this number, we are obliged to defer till next week.

WE hear a great deal about the helplessness and dependent position of women, yet a late census report shows that in New York city alone there are sixty-five thousand of these "helpless" creatures who earn a respectable livelihood for themselves and others.

SAYS the Rocky Mountain News: "Ralph Waldo Emerson is gone; but 'Billy' Emerson, the famous burnt-cork artist, is left. It is a sad commentary on the relative popularity of fun and philosophy that 'Billy' is more widely known and better liked in this country than Ralph Waldo."

OUR in Colorado, Oscar Wilde made a discovery which fills his æsthetic soul with delight. In the broad-brimmed slouch hat and easy-fitting clothes of the miners of that region, he has found the ideal masculine dress. Perhaps he will adopt it on his next appearance on the lecture platform.

SAYS the Independent: "The speech of Mr. Lynch, last week, before the House of Representatives, in advocacy of his right to the seat then occupied by General Chambers, when compared with the speech of the latter, shows that he is far the abler man of the two. He has a ringing voice, and, 'Nigger' though he is, a flowing and brilliant rhetoric."

A CONGREGATIONAL minister, we are reliably informed, lately admitted to membership in his church a well-educated young man, who disavowed all belief in supernaturalism, even to a denial of the resurrection of Christ, but who felt that in the Christian Church he found the best organized system of ethics and the most desirable association. He states that he frankly explained his views to the minister.

IN a notice of Mr. Spencer's discourse on "Agnosticism and Religion," recently published in The Index, the Boston Investigator says: "We have been reading this lecture somewhat; and we think it is one of the best that we ever met with, as regards ability, independence, a truly liberal spirit, and a strong common-sense. Mr. Spencer is evidently a progressive lecturer, and Florence is very lucky in having so able a teacher in its midst." Copies of this lecture in pamphlet form can be obtained at this office.

A CHOICE concert was given at the Meionaon on Saturday evening by the "Euterpe Quartette," assisted by Mr. Wulf Fries. The singing of this group of young ladies presents elements of rare beauty and excellence. They have been trained by Miss Lucy H. Garlin, a sister of Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer. It is interesting to note the varied channels into which a kindred vigor in members of the same family often betakes itself, and a happy result for society when the aims of such force are so pure and beneficent.

THE many friends of Samuel Johnson will be glad to learn that the words spoken and selections read at his funeral, together with various tributes called forth by his death in journals and pulpits and in private letters, have been printed in a memorial volume, making sixty-four well-filled pages. It is bound in brown cloth, with bevelled board covers. Though printed for private distribution only, the family, not knowing all of Mr. Johnson's friends who may wish a copy, have kindly left a few copies for sale at the office of The Index. The price is fifty cents.

GEN. ABE BUFORD, having been severely rebuked for his speeches on religion and the turf by the Apostolic Times, an organ of the sect which he recently joined (the Campbellites), defends himself in a letter replete with piety and horse language. "My earthly career," he writes, "is drawing rapidly to a close; and my great aim now is to win the race for eternal life. And, as you have before said, if I can pass through the pearly gates of heaven in a chariot drawn by 'Enquirer' and 'McWhirter,' I would shout with great joy, and would be far in advance of you, Mr. Editor, should your chariot be drawn by a pair of Noah's mustang ponies."

A CONGREGATIONAL minister, defending himself from the charge of insincerity, replied to a liberal correspondent: "I do without any concealment declare that I do not believe the whole Bible to be true; that there are human additions and interpolations; that, in fact, Robertson Smith is right in the view he takes. Must I say all I think to the weak and stupid public? for such it is. I never say anything I don't believe. I only act on Christ's own principle. 'I have many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now.' Yes, God is afraid of upsetting weak minds, if Christ echoed the divine view of things in that statement." We give the extract without by any means approving all that it implies.

FROM Mark H. Judge, London, we have received the following: "At the ordinary meeting of the Committee of the Sunday Society last night, Monday, April 24, reference was made to the death of Mr. Charles Darwin and Sir Henry Cole. The following resolutions were unanimously passed Proposed by Mr. James Heywood, F.R.S., and seconded by Prof. Corfield, M.D.: 'That this Committee unfeignedly lament the death of Mr. Charles R. Darwin, F.R.S., to whom, as one of its first Vice-Presidents, the Sunday Society owes a deep debt of gratitude, and desire to express their heartfelt sympathy with Mrs. Darwin and the family in the loss they have sustained by the decease of the distinguished naturalist who, while introducing his great discoveries, showed so much consideration for the feelings of others, and rendered such invaluable services to mankind that his name will be preëminently identified with the scientific achievements of the nineteenth century.'

IN a recent discourse on Emerson, Mr. M. J. Savage said: "The once famous 'Monday Lecture-ship' tried to patronize him, and use him as a weapon against Darwin. Mr. Cook even tried to claim him as a Christian. But an authoritative letter from his own son rebuked and silenced the impertinence. The Church has always tried, after their death, to claim the great names it could not win while their owners were alive. It has invented stories of death-bed penitence and recantation, as in the cases of Voltaire and Paine. Recently, concerning Littré, the great Frenchman, and Lanza, the Italian statesman, the same thing has been tried. It is curious to see what a typical man Longfellow is made out to have been by all the orthodox papers, though he was orthodox in no single point of his belief. And Darwin is hardly dead before we are gravely informed that his system, which the Church has been vilifying for twenty years, is perfectly consistent with the Evangelical faith. And now Emerson, rejecting a belief in a personal God,—in the ordinary sense of that word,—in prayer, in Christ, in sacraments, in ecclesiastical salvation of every kind,—who will dare say the heavens have not received him? His spirit, methods, doctrines, are in half the churches, and his books in all the best ministerial libraries of the land."

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

POETRY.

TWO SONGS.

For The Index.

I.

The Song of the Iconoclast.

Down with the idols from temple and shrine!
Down with the idols, both yours and mine!
Down with the idols men call divine!
Gilded and painted idols.

See how men worship the less than true!
Worship the old, because it's not new!
Worship the false, because others do!
Frail and crumbling idols.

They worship the myths of a bygone age;
Prophecies old that nothing presage;
Gloomy old records of folly and rage,—
Bewildering, frightful idols.

They worship the sound of a mighty name,
And bow themselves down to a record of fame;
Authority's charm the fiercest will tame,—
Demigods, human idols.

They worship the soldier's bloody sword;
Worship the birth of a so-called "lord";
Worship the hierarch's mystic word,—
Dazzling, blinding idols.

They worship success, whether right or wrong;
Worship the mountebank's brazen song;
Worship the slave-driver's cruel thong,—
Lying, tyrannical idols.

They worship idols of silver and gold;
And purse-proud wretches with crimes untold;
Human swine in filthiness rolled,— Gross, degrading idols.

Down with the idols from temple and shrine!
Down with the idols, both yours and mine!
Down with them, though they glisten and shine,—
Down with humanity's idols!
Down with the idols!
Down with the idols!

II.

The Song of the Conservative.

Break down the idols, but save the shrine;
Lop rotten branches, but spare the vine;
Destroy the false meaning, but not the sign:
There's always good with the evil.

All truth does not reside in the new;
The old has lessons for me and you;
In the tales of the past, some things were true:
There's always good with the evil.

There are reasons why men should worship a name;
It takes great deeds to earn great fame;
Remember men's virtues as well as their shame:
There's always good with the evil.

The soldier's sword oft saves the right;
Hereditary laws are full of might;
The priest's dim lantern contains a light:
There's always good with the evil.

Ability only can win success;
Men seldom get rich by chance or guess;
And charlatans often real goods possess:
There's always good with the evil.

Civilization acknowledges Slavery's aid,
And gold and silver are needed in trade;
Wealth is a blessing, when well outlaid:
There's always good with the evil.

Though ye break the idols, save temple and shrine;
If ye lop off branches, still spare the vine;
Destroy the false meaning, but not truth divine:
There's always good with the evil.

Save! save! save!
The good from the evil!
Save! save! save!
The good from the evil!

Miss Hardaker and the Woman Question.

An Essay read before the Parker Memorial Class,
April 23, 1882.

BY MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

In an article which appeared in the Popular Science Monthly for March, entitled "Science and the Woman Question," Miss M. A. Hardaker argues that woman's inferiority to man in social position and intellectual power, which she says is admitted by "the reform philosophy which asks for the elevation of women," is not, as that reform philosophy claims, due to temporary causes, but to permanent conditions in the physical structure of the race, which conditions cannot be altered or overcome except by the extinction of the race.

These conditions, simply stated, are as follows: that the average size of men is greater than that of women; that the male brain weighs more than the female brain; that men eat more; that "all human energy is derived from the food, and is an exact equivalent of the amount of food consumed and assimilated"; that, consequently, men think more; that the male brain is "of exactly the same quality as woman's, but larger"; that, in addition to these hindrances of less size, less brain-power, and less capacity to evolve that power on the woman's part, there is also the additional hindrance that "probably twenty per cent. of the energy of women, between twenty and forty years of age, is diverted for the maintenance of maternity and its attendant exactions"; that there is "a general law of transmission in the line of sex," which further tends to keep women from attaining intellectual equality with men, for "intellectual mothers will have fewer daughters than unintellectual ones, so that the chances of intellectual qualities in the female line will be lessened as culture increases among mothers"; also, "that the probabilities of marriage are lessened in the cases of intellectual women," which involves a still further loss; that "the reasoning power and the creative imagination are the highest and most complex forms of brain energy; . . . that, while man possesses both these powers in large amount and of superior quality, woman possesses them in smaller amount and of inferior quality"; that women possess the power of intuition in a higher degree than men," but "there is considerable evidence that it (intuition) is acquired by heredity, that it is closely akin to instinct, and that some modification of it is the common possession of women, children, and the lower animals."

To begin with, we shall at once concede several of Miss Hardaker's propositions: i. e., that woman is smaller in body than man; that her brain weighs less than his; that she eats less food; that food is a prime factor in the evolution of all human energy; that intellect is the highest manifestation of that energy; and that hitherto man has taken the lead in the most prominent departments of intellect, though we may not concede those departments to be always the highest; that the functions of maternity do entail the expenditure of a certain percentage of the energy which food supplies. So much conceded by way of agreement with Miss Hardaker, we now propose to show wherein we dissent from the conclusions drawn from some of these premises, and the fallacies contained in others.

To support her theory that man's superiority in size insures him also a corresponding superiority in intellect, she declares that "a large amount of matter represents more force than a small amount; and this law includes vital organisms as well as organic masses." This, she goes on to say, "settles the question of quantity of power permanently in favor of man," since man has the larger body and brain. Miss Morais, in the Popular Science Monthly for May, replies at length and with considerable force to this part of Miss Hardaker's argument. And, before Miss Morais' article appeared, another lady, Miss Emily J. Leonard, answered it as follows: "Does a large amount of matter always represent more force than a small amount," and this "in vital organisms as well as in inorganic masses?" This may be true, if every other condition is precisely the same; e. g., if the masses to be compared are equally electrized, etc. But in vital organisms we never can prove that all other conditions are equal. We can never have the proper conditions for test. There is a great difference between the potentiality of matter in the abstract and the amount of power actually evolved by any particular portion of matter. This difference Miss Hardaker seems to have disregarded. It does not seem to me true that the amount of power evolved by any organism is in direct ratio to its bulk. The complexity of the organism seems to have as much to do with the amount of power actually evolved as it has in any other piece of mechanism. Quite likely, the particles of matter in the larger organism might, under some different arrangement, evolve more power than as a matter of fact they do. To get energy from food, an organism is necessary, even were the organism as low as the jelly-like amoeba; and this takes us down to the protoplasm and the beginnings of things, and there we are lost. Whether the assimilation of food is a purely chemical process or not is, as far as I have learned, something not yet known.

"In applying her theory to the brain," says Miss Morais, "one fact which Miss Hardaker herself states is sufficient to tell very disastrously against her conclusion that larger brain-weight means larger thinking power. 'According to Gratiolet, the male brain cannot fall below thirty-seven ounces without involving idiocy, while the female brain may fall to thirty-two ounces without such result.' Here are two brains precisely of the same quality, one thirty-seven, the other thirty-two ounces, an absolute difference of six ounces. Yet these six ounces represent just nothing. Indeed, give the woman thirty-four ounces, and give the man thirty-seven, his three ounces more are simply a minus. Thirty-four is rational thought, thirty-seven irrational. In this instance, a small amount of matter represents more power than a large amount. It would seem that the true law must be sought elsewhere than in the grocer's scales."

If woman's brain is capable of thinking at a size at which in man idiocy is inevitable, it follows that there is something in the quality of woman's brain distinguishing it from man's which renders mere bulk of subordinate importance compared with other factors. Dr. L. Büchner, the well-known German physicist, after stating this objection to woman's intellectual advancement, goes on to say: "In the first place, the smaller stature and weaker muscular development of woman, as well as the smaller diameter of the nervous threads which converge in the central parts of the nervous system, quite naturally cause the total mass of the female brain to be comparatively smaller, without necessarily causing the development of energy of the parts of the brain devoted to the intellectual functions to suffer. In the second place, even if it could be demonstrated that these parts remain in their development behind those of man, this may just as well be ascribed to defective exercise and cultivation as to an original deficiency. For it is well known that every organ of the body, and therefore also the brain, requires for its full development, and consequently for the development of its complete capability of performance, exercise and persistent effort. That this is and has been the case for thousands of years in a far less degree in woman than in man, in consequence of her defective training and education, will be denied by no one. . . . Finally, in confuting this objection, a point must not be forgotten to which attention cannot be too often called; namely, that the estimation of the intellectual value of a brain depends not merely upon its size or material bulk, but equally, if not even more, upon its internal constitution and the finer development of its individual parts, and that it is perfectly conceivable that the female brain as regards this fineness, and in accordance with the greater fineness and delicacy of the female body generally, may exceed the male brain in the same proportion as the latter exceeds the female brain in its development in size. (Büchner's Man in the Past, Present, and Future, pp. 205-207.)

"Man eats more than woman, because his larger size requires him to do so. A larger proportion of nourishment is sent to his brain, hence men think more than women," didactically syllogizes Miss Hardaker. Might we not, after the same reductio ad absurdum, argue: "An elephant eats more than man, because its larger size requires it to do so. A larger amount of nourishment is sent to its brain, hence elephants think more than men." Perhaps it was through parallel reasoning that elephant worship began. If we are to accept such arguments, we had better begin with the worship of Jumbo at once. Even among the lower animals, the analogy from size does not hold good. The ant, the bee, and many other small-sized creatures, are far superior in intelligence to some of larger size, such as oxen, sheep, swine, etc. Among the members of the human family, it is by no means the largest in size who have accomplished the most, although Miss Hardaker seems to think so when she so positively declares: "Unless woman can devise some means for reducing the size of man, she must be content to revolve about him in the future as in the past. She may resist her fate, and create some temporary aberrations in her course; but she will be held to her orbit, nevertheless." We have no statistics as to the comparative weight and height of the men of nations differing essentially in size and differing also in intellectual vigor. Many very savage and semi-barbarous tribes are described as composed of large-framed men and women, while others in the same low intellectual grade are dwarfish. France is certainly not a race of physical giants, and yet is one of the most civilized and intellectual nations of the earth. Calculations have been made however by Count Daru, by which it appeared that "the height of men in France had been lowered an inch and a half or two inches by the wars of the First Napoleon; for the tallest men are perpetually chosen for war, and are carried off to be slaughtered before they have produced any progeny."

And yet we have not observed any consequent diminution of intellect in the French nation. The famous body-guard of Frederick the Great was composed of the tallest and finest-looking men he could pick out of the nation. These he compelled to marry the tallest women they could find, in order to insure a gigantic race from which to recruit that body-guard of grenadiers. But what descendant of that selected stock have we ever heard from since as a marvel of intellectual greatness? Napoleon the First, undersized in body, but a giant in brain-force, once, when reaching to get a book from the upper shelves of his library, was addressed by one of his tall generals with, "Allow me, Sir: I am higher than you." "You are taller, not higher," replied the Emperor, with a severe look. When we remember that many of the greatest men the world has known were beneath rather than above the usual stature, we are not very much impressed with the truth of Miss Hardaker's theory. We recall such names as Aristotle, Humboldt, Napoleon, Wellington, Nelson, Cromwell, Bacon, Pope, Burke, Talleyrand, Thiers, Grattan, Moore, and hundreds more or less famous, all undersized men, whose brains were as much the gift of heredity and circumstances as of superior bone, flesh, and muscle.

Another of Miss Hardaker's assumptions on the food question seems to be that those who can assimilate the greatest amount of food must needs be those who accomplish the greatest amount of intellectual work; yet many of our great men have also been semi-invalids with weak stomachs, and consequently small eaters. Among these, we instance Bentham, Pope, Comte, Cervantes, Descartes, Bacon, Heine, Spinoza, Dean Swift, Darwin, Herbert Spencer, Buckle, Goethe, Carlyle, and others. But these are enough to show the fallacy of considering food alone or the energy evolved from it the sole source of brain-power. It is well known that many idiots and imbeciles are ravenous eaters. The energy derived from food may even go toward the degradation and diminution of intellectual power. Heredity or circumstances may determine a man of good-sized brain to become a prize-fighter, a libertine, a burglar, a walkist, a glutton, or a drunkard. The energy stored up by food is as liable to be used for these and like expenditures of force as for thought.

Miss Hardaker says, "Women have done something of nearly everything that men have done, but they have come later and with smaller offerings." Is it not quite as true that men have done something of nearly everything women have done; while, in those matters which are peculiarly within women's province, they have not done it so well? Are men on the average as good housekeepers, as tender parents, as moral teachers, as conscientious as women? Where ages of custom have made one sex proficient in one department of life's necessary work, they have made the other more perfect in its own peculiar province.

We come now to the consideration of what Miss Hardaker evidently considers one of the strongest points against the possibility of the intellectual equality of the sexes. We give her statement of it: "The perpetuation of the human species is dependent on the function of maternity; and probably twenty per cent. of the energy of women between twenty and forty years of age is diverted for the maintenance of maternity and its attendant exactions. Upon the supposition that woman's mental endowments were exactly equal to man's, the amount diverted to maternity must be continually subtracted from it, so that any original equality of intellect would certainly be lost through maternity. This diversion of power would also occur in the years of highest physical vigor. This period in man is that of most active intellectual development, because the physical basis of intellectual energy is most abundant in these years. Consequently, his period of intellectual gain corresponds to her period of greatest loss."

That a certain amount of force is expended in performing the functions of maternity is undeniable; but the whole tendency of intellectual culture is, as Spencer argues and as observation shows, to reduce this demand on woman's energy and produce a "diminution of those mental differences between men and women which the early arrest produces"; and it is probable that the varied and complex experiences of motherhood will be an offset, if not more than an offset, to any loss incurred by a temporary diversion of a certain amount of force from self-development, upon which Miss Hardaker lays so much stress.

In his Study of Sociology (p. 371), Spencer brings out very clearly what some of those new intellectual experiences are which parenthood gives in exchange for the loss in other directions. "All lower types of beings show us," he says, "that the rearing of offspring affords the highest discipline for the faculties. The parental instinct is everywhere that which calls out the energies most persistently and in the greatest degree exercises the intelligence. The self-sacrifice and the sagacity which inferior creatures display in the care of their young is often commented on, and every one may see that parenthood produces a mental exaltation not otherwise producible. That it is so among mankind is daily proved. Continually, we remark that men who were random grow steady when they have children to provide for; and vain, giddy, thoughtless girls, becoming mothers, begin to show higher feelings and capacities that were not before drawn out. In both there is a daily discipline in unselfishness, in industry, in foresight. The parental relation strengthens from hour to hour the habit of postponing immediate ease and egoistic pleasure to the altruistic pleasure obtained by furthering the welfare of offspring. There is a frequent subordination of the claims of self to the claims of fellow-beings, and by no other agency can the practice of this subordination be so effectually secured."

That the loss of energy is not so great as Miss Hardaker would have us believe is, we think, also shown by the fact that, in spite of the increased facilities which celibacy, by giving leisure affords, a majority of our women of genius have been wives, and many of them mothers. Among those whose motherhood does not seem to have materially lessened their intellectual energy and brilliancy, we recall the names of Madame Roland, Madame de Sévigné, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Mary Wollstonecraft, Maria Theresa of Austria, George Sand, Madame de Staël, Mrs. Somerville, Mrs. Browning, Mrs. Hemans, Frances Wright, Lucretia Mott, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Livermore, Lucy Stone, Fanny Fern, besides others whose names can be recalled after a few moments' thought. Besides, Miss Hardaker herself admits that, as women become more intellectual, they have fewer children (and she could say the same with equal truth of men). The whole tendency of intellectual life is to diminish the demands of maternity; and, as the race becomes more advanced, this tendency will probably become even more marked than it is at present. Miss Hardaker declares that "the necessary outcome of an absolute intellectual equality of the sexes would be the extinction of the human race." Those of us who have seen Hogarth's picture of "the last man," with all its terrible details, will involuntarily recall it to mind on reading this direful prophecy; and, as there is scarcely any hope that our sex can be deterred from at least trying to gain all the knowledge possible, we wonder if the last man may not turn out to be a woman! Still, we feel very much like saying with Tennyson, "Better not be at all than not be noble."

With Miss Hardaker's intimated opinion that there is "a general law of transmission in the line of sex," the best authorities on heredity, like Ribot, Haeckel, etc., do not agree. Says Ribot: "When we study heredity empirically, when, that is, we observe facts and the generalizations which immediately result from it,—the formula which includes the largest number of facts and admits of the fewest exceptions is the following: heredity passes from one sex to the opposite." And Haeckel, in the History of Creation, page 200, says: "Every organic individual receives qualities from both parents, from the father as well as from the mother." This fact, that personal qualities of each of the two sexes are transmitted to both male and female, is very important. Goethe mentions it of himself in the beautiful lines,—

"From my father I have my stature and the serious tenor of my life,
From my mother a joyous nature and a turn for poetizing."

To Miss Hardaker's proposition that "the probabilities of marriage are lessened in cases of intellectual women," we reply that, though this may be in a measure true at a time when intellectual women, so called, are anomalous and isolated exceptions to the majority of their sex, yet it is reasonable to expect that it will be so no longer, when women generally shall reach a higher intellectual altitude. The probability is that in the future intellectual men will prefer for companions intellectual women, and that their offspring will inherit the qualities of both father and mother, as the children of to-day do.

We come now to the consideration of a very important part of "Science and the Woman Question," which Miss Hardaker disposes of in a few brief sentences. Hear her: "By the consent of competent judges the reasoning power and the creative imagination are the highest and most complex forms of brain-energy. We have the most abundant evidence that, while man possesses both these powers in large amount and of superior quality, woman possesses them in much smaller amount and of inferior quality. . . . We hear the power of intuition quoted as a higher one than reason. Women possess this power in a higher degree than men, and are sometimes rated above them in consequence of it. Very little study has been bestowed on this faculty, which has been the occasion of much self-congratulation to women. But there is considerable evidence that it is acquired by heredity, that it is closely allied to instinct, and that some modification of it is the common possession of women, children, and the lower animals."

Now, the fact is a vast "amount of study has been bestowed" upon intuition; and the fallacy of Miss Hardaker's conclusions is largely due to her ignoring the results of this study by the first thinkers of the age, and the omission of which in treating her subject is fatal to her conclusions.

To say that instinct is closely allied to intuition is just about as correct as to say that sensation is closely allied to reason. In both statements there is a certain amount of truth, and yet between the sensation of heat and the reasoning of a Newton there is an enormous difference; and the difference is not less great between the instinct of the infant to take nourishment and the intuition of George Eliot to discern character and perceive moral relations. That "some modification of it [intuition] is the common possession of women and children and the lower animals" is true enough; but it is just as true that some modification of reason is the common heritage of "women, children, and the lower animals." The whole theory of evolution, as held by Darwin, Haeckel, Huxley, Spencer, and its other representatives, teaches that instinct has resulted from habit, and that intuition is perfected reason. No one has given more attention to this subject than Spencer and Lewes. The latter says: "All our intuitions are organized experiences, groups of neural processes which originally were isolated. . . . Their mechanism is concealed, because their action is so easy and so rapid."—Lewes, vol. i., p. 343.

"Intuition must therefore be distinguished from induction, as vision is from inference. Intuition is the clear vision of relations."—Ibid., p. 346.

"The difference between the intuitive and discursive judgments [reasoning] lies in the different degrees of rapidity with which the constituent elements of the groups are apprehended."—Ibid., p. 348.

"Intuition is of much greater range than demonstration, because the greater fund of experience on which we rely is too complex and drawn too much from the forgotten past for us to be capable of showing all the successive steps which demonstration requires. All the great discoveries were seen intuitively long before it was possible to exhibit the correctness of their ground and to disentangle the involved data."—Ibid., p. 349.

Thus, intuition, according to the only scientific definition that has ever been given to it, is in its highest aspects the very fruitage of experience, the flower of intellection. The intuition in which woman is admitted to surpass man is as far above the mere instinct of the animal as the reason of a Bacon or a Spencer is above that of the brute. That the power of intuition is due to heredity in any sense in which the power of reasoning is not due to heredity has been already sufficiently indicated. If truth can be discovered by a mind in which the power of intuition is large, with less expenditure of force than by a mind that reaches its conclusions by the laborious process of reasoning, it follows that the former is in need of less food to supply it with energy; and, if woman therefore has more intuition than man, she can under favorable circumstances do the same amount of intellectual work with less food than he requires to do that work. But when Miss Hardaker admits that the question cannot be settled by physiology, and appeals to the work done by the two sexes to prove that man's brain is equal in quality to woman's, she begs the question; for it is evident that woman's unequal opportunities go largely to explain any lack of equality in her work to that of man in those departments of thought and activity from which causes that date back to savagery have excluded her, but the force of which happily is diminishing with the advancement of civilization. "We may fairly question," says John Stuart Mill, "whether experience has afforded sufficient grounds for induction. It is scarcely three generations since women, saving some very rare exceptions, have begun to try their capacity in philosophy, science, or art. It is only in the present generation that their attempts have been at all numerous, and they are even now extremely few everywhere but in England, France [and, we may add, America]. It is a relevant question whether a mind possessing the requisites of first-rate eminence in speculative or creative art could have been expected, on the mere calculation of chances, to turn up during that lapse of time. . . . In the department in which they have been longest engaged (both prose and poetry), women have done quite as much, have obtained fully as high prizes, and as many of them, as could be expected from the length of time and number of competitors."

"The authority of man over woman," says Mill, "arose simply from the fact that, from the very earliest twilight of human society, every woman (owing to the value attached to her by men, combined with her inferiority in muscular strength) was found in a state of bondage to some man. Laws and systems of polity always begin by recognizing the relations they already find existing between individuals. They convert what was a mere physical fact into a legal right, give it the sanction of society, and principally aim at the substitution of public and organized means of asserting and protecting these rights instead of the irregular and lawless conflict of physical strength. In early times, the great majority of the male sex were slaves as well as the whole of the female; and many ages elapsed, some of them ages of high cultivation, before any thinker was bold enough to question the rightfulness, the absolute social necessity either of one slavery or the other. By degrees, such thinkers did arise; and [the general progress of society assisting] the slavery of the male sex has, in all the countries of Christian Europe at least, been at length abolished, and that of the female sex has been gradually changed into a milder form of dependence. But this dependence as it exists at present is not an original institution, taking a fresh start from considerations of justice and social expediency: it is the primitive state of slavery, lasting on through successive mitigations and modifications, occasioned by the same causes which have softened the general manners and brought all human relations more under the control of justice and the influence of humanity. It has not lost the taint of its brutal origin. No presumption, then, in its favor can be drawn from the fact of its existence."

Further, an exhaustive consideration of this subject would necessarily involve a careful estimate of the real amounts of intellectual work done by men and by women. This question is not to be settled by a mere reference to the comparative number of books men have written, or the machines they have invented, or the battles they have fought, or the empires with which they have been conspicuously identified. The causes that most profoundly influence the race are not those which are the most prominently displayed, but those which by reason of their subtlety and complexity are hidden from the common gaze and are beyond the ordinary comprehension. The intellectual force that has been expended by woman in restraint and persuasion, in the manifold ways in which her position has compelled her to exercise her influence over man, in resignation and patient endurance, in the rearing of offspring and impressing her intellectual influence on rising generations, the ingenuity and devotion required in the performance of domestic duties, in resisting the aggressive and often unscrupulous efforts of men to degrade her, in rising above temptation and trouble, and pursuing courageously and serenely the path of duty,—is unknown and incalculable.

In addition to her superior intuition, woman's intellectual power is also shown in her higher morality; yet nowhere in her article does Miss Hardaker appear to have taken into consideration the fact, which most writers on the sex question very freely admit, that the morality of woman is greater than that of man. By thus ignoring this fact, she did not find it necessary to take into consideration the amount of intellectual force thus expended by the brain of woman. "Morally, the general superiority of women over men," observes Lecky in his History of European Morals, "is, I think, unquestionable. Self-sacrifice is the most conspicuous element of a virtuous and religious character; and it is certainly far less common among men than among women, whose lives are usually spent in yielding to the will and consulting the pleasure of another. There are two great departments of virtue, the impulsive, or that which springs spontaneously from the emotions, and the deliberative, or that which is performed in obedience from a sense of duty; and in both of these I imagine women are superior to men. Their sensibility is greater: they are more chaste both in thought and in act, more tender to the erring, more compassionate, more affectionate to all about them. On the other hand, those who have traced the course of the wives of the poor, and of many who, though in narrow circumstances, can hardly be called poor, will probably admit that in no other class do we so often find entire lives spent in daily, persistent self-denial, in the patient endurance of countless trials, in the ceaseless and deliberate sacrifice of their own enjoyment to the well-being or the prospects of others." Vol. ii., pp. 380, 381.

It may be said that morality is not a direct result of intellectual force, but is mainly due to heredity. To this, we answer that it is no more so than any other intellectual process. Edith Simcox, in her work on Natural Law, says: "Our moral conceptions are too complex to be referred to a single ultimate instinct or propensity, with a corresponding definite development of the organism. A number of feelings go to make up the state of consciousness which we call sense of duty; and many of these feelings are themselves compounds of physical temperament and moral experience, personal as well as inherited. We are born with a certain number of moral feelings, inherited through our immediate ancestors, from the long series of men and women who have lived under conditions favorable to their growth and transmission. Each one of these feelings has a history of its own; and the children of the present day are born with a rudimentary disposition to say, 'I ought,' in particular cases, as they are born with a disposition to draw or sing, as well as with a disposition to walk or eat. The disposition or aptitude is of the most rudimentary kind. . . . Just as some people are born with a musical ear, so others are insensible to the force of moral considerations. But the average man can tell one tune from another, and is more or less shocked by a discord; and in like manner the average man feels the pressure upon his own individual will of all the unknown natural sequences of motive in the past, which caused his ancestors to do on the whole more often the right thing than the wrong."

"If we advert to the moral acquisitions and habits in a well-regulated mind," says Bain, "we must admit the need of a large expenditure to build up the fabric. The carefully poised estimate of good and evil for self, the ever-present sense of the interests of others, and the ready obedience to all the special ordinances that make up the morality of the time, however truly expressed in terms of high and abstract spirituality, have their counterpart in the physical organism. They have used up a large and definite amount of nutriment; and, had they been less developed, there would have been a gain of power to some other department, mental or physical."

"A moral being," says Darwin, "is one who is capable of comparing his past and future actions and motives, of approving of some and disapproving of others; and the fact that man is the one being who with certainty can be thus designated makes the greatest of all distinctions between him and the lower animals."

"There are two things which, the more I contemplate them, the more they fill me with awe," declares Kant,—"the starry heavens above and the moral sense within." This moral sense, or conscience, it is now pretty conclusively shown by Spencer, is the product of experience; and experience means of course the expenditure of mental force. "I believe," he declares, "that the experiences of utility, organized and consolidated through all past generations of the human race, have been producing corresponding modifications, which, by continuous transmission and accumulation, have become in us certain faculties or moral intuitions, certain emotions which have an apparent basis in the individual experience of utility." This profound and important truth is expressed in George Eliot's Spanish Gypsy:—

"What! Shall the trick of nostril and of lips
Descend through generations, and the soul
That moves within our frame, like God in worlds, Imprint no record, leave no documents of her great history?
Shall men bequeath the fancies of their palates to their sons,
And shall the shudder of restraining awe,
The slow wept tears of contrite memory,
Faith's prayerful labor, and the food divine
Of fasts ecstatic,—shall these pass away
Like wind upon the waters, tracklessly?"

If it be true that women are more moral than men, it follows from the preceding reasoning that they possess, in this one respect at least, a higher intellectual nature than men. For, as morality is the science of human relations, and as the repression of selfish feelings and the adjustment of conduct to the complex requirements of social life demand a certain amount of intellectual force of the very finest quality, it follows from the moral superiority of women that the amount of force derived from food, and converted into or correlated with the finest and noblest manifestations of mind, is larger, in proportion to size and the amount of food consumed, in woman than in man.

In showing that intuition and morality have been hitherto, by reason of her physical structure and past environments, more strongly and prominently developed in woman's nature than in man's, and finding both these attributes to be true intellectual processes of the finest sort, we think we have thereby disproved another of Miss Hardaker's assertions. "Nor will the woman," she says, "ever be able to overtake the man in the race of thought; . . . for his brain is of exactly the same quality as her's, but larger." "That men and women are mentally alike," says Spencer, "is as untrue as that they are alike bodily." But, though woman's intellect may differ from man's in quality as well as in quantity, it does not necessarily follow that it is not equal to his. Equality does not always mean likeness. There may be equality in difference. A pound of feathers is equal to a pound of lead, but there is no likeness between them. Nor does it follow that the present intellectual difference between the sexes must always remain so strongly marked as now; for Spencer himself admits that "those unlikenesses of mind between men and women which, under the conditions, were to be expected, are the unlikenesses we actually find; that they are fixed in degree by no means follows. Indeed, the contrary follows. Determined as we see some of them are by adaptation of primitive women's natures to the natures of primitive men, it is inferable that, as civilization readjusts men's natures to higher social requirements, there goes on a corresponding readjustment between the natures of men and women, tending in sundry respects to diminish their differences." And Tennyson thus poetically repeats the same thought:—

"Not like to like, but like in difference.
Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man;
He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
Nor lose the wrestling thews that throw the world;
She mental breadth, nor fall in childward care,
Nor lose the childlike in the larger mind. . . .
And so these twain, upon the skirts of Time,
Sit side by side, full-summed in all their powers,
Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be,
Self-reverent each and reverencing each,
Distinct in individualities."

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN APPEAL TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Editors of The Index:—

I desire to make through The Index an appeal to the Free Religious Association to amend its constitution, with a view of giving to it a more definite aim and a broader scope; and, in accordance with this change in its organic law, to engraft on its present methods of propagandism a measure of a genuinely simple and popular character. In spite of my recent criticism of the Association's platform (the points of which do not seem to me to have been met by Mr. Potter's reply), to the Free Religious movement my soul turns in profoundest reverence, hope, and trust. Its leaders I regard as inspired in as true a sense as were the teachers that have made our Bibles for us in ages past. But there are phases of the movement I only accept provisionally, and some that I reject or condemn. I understand it to be denied that the Free Religious Association excludes from its membership any of the classes I specified. But it still appears evident to me that the Association assumes the existence of religion, the religious nature of man, and the supremacy of the scientific method as fundamentals of belief, requiring the positive assent of all its members. The "fellowship" and the "practice" must be moulded into this doctrinal form. The position of Free Religionists seems to be this: We know religion to be the greatest of truths, though not agreeing in our definitions as to its nature or method of unfoldment, as to its past history or future career. We are agreed, however, that free thought and religion are much estranged, and that the problem of problems confronting us to-day is their reconciliation. And a platform expressive of these sentiments is the broadest, simplest, plainest, most inclusive possible.

But, as a platform more in accordance with the real objects of the Association, I venture to propose the following amendment as a substitute for the first article to the constitution:—

"The object of this Association is to encourage the study of man in all of his relations, and to seek to realize the truth in life, and so to aid in those movements that tend most to the improvement of the individual and of society, and to the unity and freedom of mankind."

This appears to me full, clear, and simple, and to embrace the whole of what is meant by the words "religious," "humanitarian," and "scientific," which are often made to stand for one-sided and bigoted views, or for everything in general and nothing in particular. This amendment does not outline a theory or a philosophy; but its emphasis is upon those principles that express the one ideal sought for in the creeds of the churches, the teachings of the schools, and the maxims of common, every-day life.

And the missionary work I would recommend I will now state. The appointment of a committee in each of the States to report items of interest to the cause, and the sending forth of a few representatives into the lecture-field (see Conference report in The Index, April 13), are excellent suggestions. They express my heart's strongest desire. My faith has led me to an effort in this direction, and I am convinced such action is imperatively called for. But there is another method, distinct in its character, and fitted to give speed and effectiveness to the new enterprise.

Not only in every State, but in every city, town, hamlet, and school district, are people who will be found ready for this movement, if approached rightly. People exist in countless numbers throughout the land, in every grade of society, who have reached the border-line between the old and new faith, who are battling in their loneliness for what they know or believe to be the right, or who know not whether to retreat or advance, or whether it is best to disguise or avow their real sentiments, or whether even there be such a thing as truth or virtue. How are they to be reached and made confederates in one common cause? I say, by sending travelling missionaries, with a soul full of liberalism and a trunk full of tracts. And bid them say to these people: Stand fast; you are not alone. The spirit that stirs within you is beginning to move the world. But faithfulness is required of every one, as each is but a link in the chain of causes and effects that is to lift mankind again. Bid the missionary go into the highways and byways of life, to visit the minister, professor, millionaire, the farmer, mechanic, and laborer, the creed-bound and the creedless, and talk with them as brother with brother, challenging them in the name of our common humanity to a frank, friendly interview; to give and receive; in other words, reason with them. Tell them of the liberal movement, what it is doing and proposes to do. Say to them its standard is high and exacting; that it tolerates no shams, no compromises; that sincerity and candor are to be the germs of the new faith, the mighty awakening that is to come to man, making the thought and the life one.

Now, it is not one place in a dozen, or in twenty perhaps, where lectures could be given, and even then the lecture may not attract one person in a dozen or in twenty who might be benefited by it; and, furthermore, the audience, or a good share of it, may stand in need of hints that the lecture fails to supply. The missionary I speak of will make it his main business to seek out the right persons in a town or city, and to discover on which side they are accessible to his ideas. I met an editor who said Christ was God, and there was no hope for the infidel. Through his politics, I wrung from him an acknowledgment that Liberalism was the true method of reform. I met a minister: he exhorted me to come to Christ; but, from the unprofessional side of his nature, he made confessions that would have condemned him before the Synod. I met a man and his family: they regarded my cause with suspicion, their Church as something not to be criticised. Before parting, they owned to the perception of a broader distinction between right and dogma than before. I met a lawyer, a trader, and a man of the world: they jeered at my speech, and called it romance. By and by, they said, Well, yes, it is the world's only hope, we admit. I met the man with the literature of the ages within reach of his easy-chair and with the busts of the great looking down on him from their niches in the wall: he smiles, frowns, looks confused, affronted; but he becomes earnest, is in accord with me on all points save one,—"Not yet," he says. My last words to him were, "Yes, even now." I met the man in the field, in the workshop, and at the desk; and they said, That is my doctrine, only I never looked at it just in that way before. Come, I want to introduce you to a friend or two of mine. I met a city superintendent of schools, who thought it bold to pronounce in favor of Universalism. Further on, he said, in a half-whisper, I sometimes think Unitarianism is not far out of the way. I spoke to him of Free Religion. He stared, but said finally, I understand you,—would like to hear more about it.

This kind of work would by no means be negative in its results. It would open the way for the lecture and the organization; and even include these, but only as incidental or secondary. It would be the best way of making The Index known and increasing its circulation. It would awaken a sense of a community of motives and purposes among thousands, and create a spirit of moral earnestness that would pour itself into other men's minds in the most ordinary seasons, through the most casual intercourse. Conversation would assume a worthier cast, public discourse would have a new tongue, the home circle would experience a new elevation, neighborhoods would feel the throbbings of a new life. Free Religion must not only make pupils, but soldiers of its converts. Men must be taught to feel that these grand and simple truths are their own, and that they are not dependent on the bounty and condescension of others for their soul's daily sustenance; that it is in their power to give as well as to receive; that a noble life is their diploma. For morality is the only true democrat; but, mark, it is a democrat.

A certain kind of new tract is needed, a tract that would itself act as a missionary in any and every household. "The Index Tracts" are well in their place, but are written for superior minds, not for common minds. The list of works advertised in The Index, under the heading of Popular Books, is unsuited (with few exceptions) both as to price and form of treatment for the average reader. Tracts are wanted that will touch and interest the people, and put them in possession of the gist of the great controversy. And still these tracts can be made to contain the most important and valuable facts, truths, and principles, and to appeal with an almost equal force to all classes of minds. They might be written in the form of dialogue, epilogue, biographical or historical sketches, or anecdotes, of direct appeal to the reason and the conscience, of comparisons between the teachings of science and theology, between the pulpit and common-sense. They may give the resemblances between the different religions and the discord and schism within certain religions; the results of the latest Biblical criticism, and specimens of the new thought from liberal writings and addresses; an account of reforms or steps of progress that the Church took no part in, but to oppose; and an account of the manner in which creeds had their origin; the relations of Church and State, past and present; and statistics of the different combatants now in the field; reports of the work Liberals are now doing in various ways; and of the different philanthropic schemes now being attempted in the political and industrial no less than in the religious world, in behalf of man's physical no less than his moral and spiritual nature.

Now, the Free Religious Association has within itself the talent necessary for the execution of this plan throughout. The question then is this, Is it the thing that needs to be done? T. W. CURTIS.

AGNOSTICISM AND RELIGION: A REPLY.

Editors of The Index:—

One who subscribes himself "D." in the last issue of The Index invites me to answer two or three questions. So far as they are relevant to the subject, it seems to me his questions were quite fully answered in the essay referred to. Unless, however, querist will observe more care in reading my language than he does in quoting it, he is likely to overlook several other answers to questions in that paper. Speaking of my objection to the phrase, "God in nature," as equally objectionable as that of "God above nature," he asks: "If not in nature, where is God?" Such a question no agnostic assumes to answer. As to where God is, if there is a God, is the very problem that agnosticism disclaims all knowledge of. It is just because the agnostic cannot answer that question, and knows that he cannot, that he is agnostic. What he thinks he does know something about is not "God" as an objective entity in nature or above it, but the God-idea in the brain of man; and to explain the genesis and unfolding of this idea seems to him a worthy and fruitful field of inquiry. "D." continues: "If God is 'not in nature, he is nowhere.' And this the agnostic by no means affirms." The agnostic does not indeed affirm that, if God is not in nature, he is nowhere. He leaves such dogmatism to gnostics. But he does affirm that, if God is not in nature, he is nowhere, that the agnostic knows of. He does not deny that he may be in ten thousand places, where the agnostic cannot see and know him. But, if so, the agnostic simply says that he doesn't know that he is, and therefore cannot affirm it. To do so, it seems to him, he must see more; and to see more, he must be more. What he might see and know if he had a score more of senses, it is idle to speculate. My questioner further asks: "In what part of Longfellow's brain dwelt his poetic genius? Where was the seat of Darwin's philosophic acumen?" I must again plead ignorance. Perhaps some gnostic phrenologist might inform him. He certainly professes to know. I made no attempt in my essay to answer questions which seem to me to belong to the realm of physiological psychology. If I were looking for information on this point, I would consult Bain and Virchow, Huxley and Maudsley. Finally, my querist asks, "And what if all forces, material and mental, be one force, and the Cosmos their outcome?"

I should say, then, that the thing the Cosmos came "out" of would be left a shell of emptiness. The belief that all forces, "material and mental," are correlated, and, to use a theological term, are consubstantial with the Cosmos, I think is quite consistent with agnosticism. The agnostic, simply, does not fancy a grenadier cap on the top of one of these forces or on them all combined, and name it "God." He does not think that clearness of thought or nobility of character or rightness of life is furthered by what seems to him such a misuse of language.

Respectfully,

W. H. SPENCER.

BOOK NOTICES.

PEBBLES, PEARLS, AND GEMS OF THE ORIENT, Gathered and arranged by Charles D. B. Mills. Boston: George H. Ellis, Publisher. Price $1.50.

This beautiful volume in blue and gold reflects credit alike on author and publisher. It is a collection of the wisest, sweetest, and most trenchant aphorisms of the East. Than Mr. Mills there could be no more discriminating collector of the wisdom of the Oriental poets, prophets, and sages. He has the true literary honey-bee's critical taste. There is garnered up in this volume no moral poison or literary chaff. We have read this book with both pleasure and profit, and shall gladly reread its rich pages at our earliest leisure.

In the North American Review for June, Senator W. B. Allison discusses "The Currency of the Future," and indicates measures which Congress will have to adopt to insure a stable currency after the national debt has been paid. Walt Whitman, in "A Memorandum at a Venture," explains why he has trenched on topics usually regarded as amenable to literary treatment. "Andover and Creed Subscription," by Rev. Dr. Leonard Woolsey Bacon, is a review of the present state of theological belief in the churches. Hon. George F. Seward writes, in an article on "Mongolian Immigration," in opposition to anti-Chinese legislation. Dr. John W. Dowling has a paper on "Old School Medicine and Homeopathy," in which he defends the Hahnemannian School. O. B. Frothingham has a sympathetic article on "Swedenborg." Isaac L. Rice has an article entitled "Has Land a Value?" in which he criticises one of Henry George's main postulates. The last essay is by Charles E. Lydecker, on "An Unconstitutional Militia."

The Atlantic Monthly for June is a Longfellow Memorial number, containing, in addition to a fine steel portrait of the dead poet, a series of three sonnets to his memory by Oliver Wendell Holmes, which are vibrant with real feeling, entitled "Our Dead Singer"; a hitherto unpublished poem on "Decoration Day," by Longfellow, written a short time before his death; and a fine estimate of his character and genius by O. B. Frothingham. John Fiske, who knew Darwin personally, contributes an appreciative and interesting essay on his life and works. The other articles of note in this number are Edward Atkinson's paper on "The Rapid Progress of Communism"; "The New Eastern Question," by Herbert Tuttle; a careful criticism of the French novelist, "Alphonse Daudet," by Henry James, Jr.; and the fourth instalment of "Studies in the South." The three serials, by Thomas Hardy, Elizabeth S. Phelps, and W. H. Bishop, continue to gain in interest.

The Unitarian Review for May is a readable number, as may be inferred from the following "Table of Contents": "The Moral Dynamic," by Theodore C. Williams; "The Fourth Gospel," by J. H. Morison, D.D.; "The Puzzle of English History," by F. M. Holland; "God," by Rev. George Leonard Chaney; "Darwin," by the editor; "Editors' Note-book," "Things at Home and Abroad," by Mrs. Martha P. Lowe; "Review of Current Literature."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

NO WILL of the late Ralph Waldo Emerson has been filed, and it is believed that he died intestate.

CHARLES DARWIN was a believer in the rights of women, and was among the first in England to sign petitions demanding the elective franchise for the sex.

COL. INGERSOLL is to deliver the Decoration-Day Oration in New York city. Services will be held in the Academy of Music, and General Grant will preside.

A DESPATCH from Berlin says that a marriage has been arranged between Princess Beatrice, Queen Victoria's youngest daughter, and Prince Frederick William, eldest son of the Landgrave of Hesse.

THE will of the poet Longfellow, in spite of its legal informalities, is to be carried out in all its details according to the evident intent of the testator, the legal heirs having honorably determined on this course.

THERE has been found among Darwin's papers an autobiography of himself and a sketch of the life of his father. The publication of these will be looked for with much interest by the literary and scientific world.

THE new Chief Secretary for Ireland, George Otto Trevelyan, is the son of a favorite sister of Macaulay, the historian. He is the interesting biographer of his distinguished uncle and of Charles James Fox. He is literary in taste and liberal in sentiment.

THE Women's Club of this city gave Miss Elizabeth Peabody a reception at their rooms on Wednesday of last week on the occasion of her seventieth birthday, at which many interesting reminiscences, historical or otherwise, were recalled in the address given by the genial and gifted recipient.

THE Literary World says: "It is understood that the first publication from Emerson's papers will be the Carlyle correspondence, which is complete and in the hands of Miss Ellen Emerson. It covers nearly forty years, and may naturally be expected to be of great intellectual interest and value."

MRS. CLARA NEYMANN desires us to announce that she is open to engagements to lecture before liberal societies on "The Spirit of Republicanism," and other subjects of interest to radical thinkers. Her address is 343 West 58th Street, New York. Mrs. Neymann is an earnest worker in the field of reform, and deserves encouragement.

MRS. M. M. RICKER was recently admitted to the bar of the District of Columbia; and she passed, says a United States senator, "the best examination among seventeen applicants, all men but herself." She was found to be particularly well versed in the law of real property, a branch supposed to be beyond the reach of the female intellect.

THE New York correspondent of the Christian Leader, speaking of Mr. Chadwick, says: "We have not perhaps the high admiration for the genius of this preacher held by some, but we are more than glad to concede our admiration for the elegance of his style and the superb rhetoric of which he is the master. In these days, when so many of the clergy seem to despise the 'graces of composition' in their insane hunger for 'effect,' it is refreshing to read the sermons of men who are masters of 'English, pure and undilef.'"

SEVERAL YEARS ago, Mr. Moncure Conway collected from the columns of the Dial a number of Mr. Emerson's unpublished contributions, with a view to their issue in London. He even got the papers into print, when word came from Mr. Emerson that he preferred they should not see the light, at any rate while he lived. Report now says that Mr. Conway will take early steps to publish this collection. Few complete sets of the Dial have ever reached England. At any rate, few are now preserved there. One of the few is in the possession of Mr. Alexander Ireland, of Manchester, who was one of the first friends that Mr. Emerson made in England. He possesses a letter from Emerson, describing his interviews with Carlyle at Craigenputtock, and the one with Wordsworth at Rydal Mount.

THIS is the tribute which Prof. T. H. Huxley pays to the memory of Dr. Charles Darwin: "None have fought better and none have been more fortunate than Charles Darwin. He found a great truth trodden under foot, reviled by bigots and ridiculed by all the world. He lived long enough to see it, chiefly by his own efforts, irrefragably established in science, inseparably incorporated with the common thoughts of men, and only hated and feared by those who would revile, but dare not. What shall a man desire more than this? Once more, the image of Socrates rises unbidden, and the noble peroration of the Apology rings in our ears, as if it were Charles Darwin's farewell,—'The hour of departure has arrived, and we go our ways, I to die and you to live. Which is the better, God only knows.'"

EDITH SIMCOX belongs to a remarkably bright English family, and has always consorted with the advanced class of British thinkers. She is a companion in thought with Frances Power Cobbe, the late George Eliot, and late Mary Carpenter. Nothing in the shape of evolution or agnosticism is foreign to her. Her best-known work is Natural Law, an essay in atheistic ethics, which has been widely read, and very few have ever dreamed that so astute a writer, albeit a woman, could lay claim to anything in the realm of sentiment; but in a volume of Episodes in the Lives of Men, Women, and Lovers, published in London by Trübner & Co., of which James R. Osgood & Co. have imported an edition, she blossoms out as a woman of earnest and tender feeling, and has written stories which abound in fine passages.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

A friend desirous of completing his collection of Samuel Johnson's published works will give a fair price for certain of his sermons and essays in pamphlets or old newspapers (not THE RADICAL). Address Dr. B. F. C. INDEX Office, stating titles of discourses, newspapers, and terms.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE bill introduced into the House of Commons for the repression of crime in Ireland seems to have produced something of a revulsion of feeling in that country respecting the death of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, or in regard to assisting the government in the capture of the assassins.

THERE is a prospect that the legal restrictions which now compel English universities to choose clergymen for their presidents, and to elect men in "holy orders" to a large proportion of their fellowships, will soon be abolished. Some of the conservative London journals, like the Globe, lament this change as "a blow against Christianity and the Church of England."

THE London Times of May 28 says: "The situation in Egypt is tolerably clear. Turkey has been playing a double game. Arabi Bey is doubtless acting in collusion with Turkey. The latter has played the game with complete success." The article concludes by expressing hope that England's future policy will be marked by greater firmness and decision than has been hitherto displayed.

A DESPATCH from Springfield, Ill., says that in the business session of the General Assembly on the 27th, the report of a special committee on Sabbath observance was heard, and, with some modifications, was adopted. It disapproves of the publication of Sunday papers and running Sunday trains. Some of the speakers during the discussion suggested that some provision be made to prevent ministers and other Christians desecrating the day by blacking their boots and shaving their beards Sabbath mornings.

DURING the debate in the French Chamber of Deputies on the civil interment bill, the object of which is to place non-religious burials on the same footing with those accompanied with religious rites, M. Freppel ridiculed the idea that materialists could honor the mere "physico-chemical elements, which is all that remain after death"; whereupon, Clovis Hugues declared that materialists could honor the remains of the dead with as little inconsistency, at least, as do Catholics, who regard the corpse as the worn-out garb of a departed spirit. The discussion was brought to a close by the Minister of Worship, who said that a man at death leaves behind something worthy in the estimation of all of funeral honors, and that these last tributes of respect are evidently paid by materialists to a life consecrated to duty. The principle of the bill was accepted by a vote of three hundred and seventy-nine to eighty.

"A CURIOUS discovery," says the London Telegraph, "made by Signor Schiaparelli, Director of the Royal Observatory at Milan, seems to start again that old and unanswerable question, 'Are the planets inhabited?' This Italian astronomer is one of the most assiduous watchers of the planet Mars. It was he who, in 1877-78, first detected the many dusky bands which traverse and subdivide the ruddy portions of the martial orb. Again, in 1879-80, when the position of the planet was favorable, he reidentified these strange lines; but, during last January and February, he has been able to observe and map out in more than twenty instances duplications of the dark streaks 'covering the equatorial region of Mars with a mysterious network, to which there is nothing remotely analogous on the earth.' The Italian astronomer has styled them 'canals'; for they bear the appearance of long seaways dug through the martial continents, as if a mania for short cuts had seized the inhabitants of the planet, and everybody residing there had become an active M. de Lesseps."

A HEBREW named Rosenstrauch was tried at Newark, N.J., last week, for "blaspheming the name of Jesus Christ." One Deutschle, a Catholic, testified that the accused had reflected on the paternity of his Saviour, in consequence of which his own feelings were greatly outraged, and he thought it his duty to make complaint against the irreverent Jew. On cross-examination, Deutschle admitted that he was once convicted of murder in the old country, but unjustly, he claimed, and Mrs. Deutschle was obliged to admit that Rosenstrauch had refused to give her husband and herself credit for gentleman's furnishing goods, which was requested after the blasphemous language was used. The defendant declared that he had never uttered the words ascribed to him; that he had great regard for Jesus as a moral teacher; and that he thought his refusal of credit to Deutschle (because he had tried to defraud him out of a previous bill) was the real cause of this complaint. The jury, after being out a few minutes only, returned with a verdict of not guilty.

SAYS the New York Sun: "Uruguay's barbarous judicial customs have brought down on her the combined remonstrances of Italy, Spain, France, and Brazil, for maltreatment of their subjects. The two Italians recently arrested on a charge of murder, which it was afterward proved they did not commit, say that they were kicked, stabbed with knives, fed with salt herrings, and then put within sight, but not reach of water, their feet roasted, their mouths stuffed with sand, their arms and legs stretched by ropes tied to stakes, so that these ropes would shrink when wet with the dew and strain the joints of the poor victims. The Italian minister, whose demand of punishment for the official torturers and $80,000 remuneration for the victims was refused, has left the country in disgust. A combined movement of all the powers whose citizens have suffered might perhaps break up this barbarous custom. It is strange to what a pitch of refined devilry some governments have succeeded in bringing the torture of men and women, under the protection of the law."

P. CUDDY, a Catholic priest of Milford, Mass., wrote a letter last week to the Commander of the Grand Army Post there to state: "I entirely disapprove and differ from your mode of honoring our Catholic dead by putting a penny's worth of 'cotton bunting' on their graves. You get $100 a year from the town," he says; "why not, then, have solemn mass and service according to Catholic usage for the Catholic soldier who has 'fought his last fight,' and has passed from your jurisdiction to that of the Church that prays for his soul? You will, therefore, on receipt of this, take the proper action to mend your ways and rectify your mistake in time." Somebody, we trust, has informed this insolent priest that the veterans of the Grand Army visit and decorate the graves of their fallen comrades not on account of their religious beliefs, concerning which they ask no questions, but to honor them for their patriotism, their services, and their sacrifices for this Republic, and that the exercises of Memorial Day, with this purpose in view, have the approval and sympathy of all men and women capable of feeling gratitude, irrespective of their religious opinions.

THE impending strike throughout the iron region is the result of a condition of things well worthy the attention of our legislators. The past few years the iron manufacturers have done a prosperous and profitable business, which has been greatly stimulated by heavy duties. The prices of their production have been kept far above the figures of the European markets, thus maintained in part by the great railroad and other enterprises in this country. Now when the supply is greater than the demand, the workmen, urged by the increased cost of living, refuse to work unless their wages are raised. But the manufacturers have been doing a good business, have made money fast, and know that the most direct way to keep up the prices of production is to limit production, and this can easily be done by shutting down work. Meantime the workmen, whose wages have not been large, are confronted not only with the difficulty of increased cost of living, but with the danger of enforced idleness, and all the evils liable to result therefrom. Does the present condition of things in the iron region, where we evidently see some of the workings of a high tariff, afford evidence that it really protects American labor? Does it not, on the contrary, indicate the importance of a modification of the tariff toward free trade?

EMERSON'S HUMOR.

The degrees and differences of that laughter-generating force which is called wit, humor, irony, satire, and sarcasm, are hard to specify. None of the classifiers satisfy us wholly. But, in the meantime, the differences exist, and we recognize them easily in their personal manifestations. Voltaire and Rochefoucauld are always witty, never humorous; while Charles Lamb is always this. For perfect irony, we go to Thackeray's Luck of Barry Lyndon or his Book of Snobs. The mask must be lifted just a little, or the fun will be taken for sober earnest, as it was indeed with certain of the pamphlets of Defoe. Thackeray does not lift the mask quite enough for Taine to see his smile. Taine sometimes takes his irony as soberly as the good woman took the assertion of Sydney Smith, when she had asked him what made his dog so fat, and he had answered that he had a parish-boy for breakfast every morning. "Does he really, Mr. Smith?" said she.

The delight of wit is commonly the sudden joy of seeing an apparent likeness where none could be expected. The very essence of the pun is in this situation. But humor is the sense of incongruity—of "descending incongruity," says Herbert Spencer,—a "come-down," as we say. Incongruity alone is no sufficient pledge of humorous situations. For the most part, incongruities are painful. The things which are incongruous must not involve too serious elements. The sudden change that breaks the surface of our equilibrium into a smile, shatters our cloudless heaven with a sudden peal of laughter, must be a descending change; a change from something more to something less serious; hereby, the superfluity of nervous energy (such is the physiological account of laughter) being obliged to expend itself in certain muscular movements. "Advice to young persons about to marry: Don't." Here is descending incongruity. The idea first presented develops an uncounscionable amount of nervous energy which the second idea liberates at once. Hence, an explosion. The preference of Emerson was for a laugh that "broke inside." He protested that no perfect gentleman would laugh aloud. Carlyle was of a different opinion. He believed in the morality of hearty laughter, and he practised what he preached. Emerson tells a story of a boy learning his alphabet. "That letter is A," said the teacher. "A," drawled the boy. "That is B," said the teacher. "B," drawled the boy, and so on. "That is W," said the teacher. "The devil!" exclaimed the boy, "is that W?" Now, I have heard the most perfect gentleman I know laugh at this simple story so heartily that, if Emerson had been there, he would have revised his theory. And did not the Olympian gods shake the Olympian heights with inextinguishable laughter? I am certain that Carlyle is right, and Emerson wrong, about this matter of laughing.

Humor is differentiated from mere wit by nothing else so much as by its kindness. The wit may be good-natured; the humorist must be. The wit may be a "cruel wag." The humorist must be a "kindly wag," or he is not a humorist. We see the difference oftentimes in one and the same person. Heine is a kindly wag when he says that the Celtic faith in immortality is so strong that you can borrow money of an Irishman on the promise that you will pay him in another world. He is a cruel wag when he insists that he has always loved his enemies, though at the time he thought they were his friends. The humorist "begets the smiles that have no cruelty." Emerson himself is quotable to this effect: "The perpetual game of humor is to look with considerate good-nature at every object in existence aloof, as a man might look at a mouse comparing it with the eternal whole; enjoying the figure which each self-satisfied particular creature cuts in the unrespecting All, and dismisses it with a benison." Here, consciously or not, Emerson is defining his own method. Nothing is more characteristic of him than his "considerate good-nature," the benison with which he dismisses all things human and divine. Nature is not more inclusive than Emerson of all phenomena. He is as tolerant as she of sinners and of saints.

The sense of humor often has a very modest place assigned to it in the inventories that are made of mental furniture. But it is one of those little things which like Emerson's Titmouse has lessons for the wisest and the strongest men. The lack of this, if not "the last infirmity of noble minds," is one of the worst of possible infirmities. Long is the catalogue of able men whose power would have been doubled if, to their other qualities, this also could have been added. For this being primarily the sense of incongruity, it would save them from a multitude of intellectual and personal mishaps resulting from the lack of any quick perception of incongruous elements. There was much force in Shaftesbury's idea that ridicule is the test of truth. The truth is not and cannot be ridiculous. There are systems of theology which men accept, wonderful for their symmetry and logical coherence, which at the first gleam of humor would vanish into thinner air than ghosts at cock-crowing. Nothing is more groundless than the common notion that the greatest minds can easily dispense with humor. Emerson did not think so, suggesting that the lack of this in Jesus was a conspicuous deduction from his fame. "It appears," he said, "to be an essential element in a fine character. Wherever the intellect is constructive, it will be found. We feel the absence of it as a defect in the noblest and most oracular soul." The biographies abound in proofs of these positions. Who does not feel that with a little humor super-added John Stuart Mill would have been twice the man he was and never have written so incredibly concerning the genius of his wife? Carlyle was a gigantic humorist, but capable of temporary lapses of his gift as in that line about the "babbling cohue of Sands and Eliots," and his perpetual demands for silence in a shriek that lengthened out into thirty volumes octavo. But in all the range of history there is perhaps no more signal instance of the lack of humor, and the consequent deterioration of a splendid gift, than that of Auguste Comte. Never was man more absolutely devoid of humor—Swedenborg, perhaps, excepted. Emerson's delight in Swedenborg, in spite of this immense defect, was based upon his utterance of a few noble sentences. These made the man for him, and encouraged him to use a tone concerning him, which has raised up for him many readers with this result, that those who have read him most have liked him least.

"The absolute devotion of the Puritan to a Supreme Will," says the historian Green, "tended more and more to rob him of all sense of measure and proportion in common matters. Humor, the faculty which above all corrects exaggeration and extravagance, died away before the new stress and strain of existence." Nevertheless, from seven generations of Puritan ministers came Emerson at length, the most fundamental humorist of all our men of letters. Our major poets can hardly be said, in this matter of humor, to represent degrees of difference; for of this celestial ichor Bryant has not a drop, and Whittier but little more. The humor of Longfellow is delicate and faint and thin; but that of Holmes and Lowell is hearty and robust, Lowell's the more subtle and penetrating of the two. The humor of Emerson is not so palpable as theirs. So many humorous sentences and stanzas cannot be quoted from his writings; but none the less, it seems to me, that he is fundamentally the greatest humorist of all. His possession by this spirit is as complete as Bryant's lack, or, shall we say, as Whitman's,—shown nowhere more offensively than in his magisterial judgment upon Emerson, his condescension to approve his character and gifts as not inferior to any but his own!

The humor of Emerson is everywhere in his writings as an unseen corrective. Out of the heart of it came his last printed essay on "The Superlative." It preserved him from all bathos and extravagance, from all "those perverse tendencies and gloomy insanities in which fine intellects sometimes lose themselves." I hardly know whether as perceptive or creative it has the better operation. As perceptive, it brightens his pages with "wise saws and modern instances" innumerable, and with others that are of great antiquity. It enabled him to correct the vagaries of Plotinus and Jamblichus and Boehme with the shrewdness of Montaigne. As creative, it gives the last impression to a great many sentences that were already sound and good. Of other sentences, it is the beginning and the end; as when he says, "The Frenchman invented the ruffle, the Englishman added the shirt"; or, when he defines conservatism as "a prehensile tail." "Pope and his school," he says, "wrote poetry fit to put round frosted cake." Often his application of a story is more humorous than the story that he tells. Does he expect our laugh to break inside when he tells us of George Borrow reading the apostles' creed in Roman to the gypsies? "When I had concluded," says Borrow, "I looked around me. The features of the assembly were twisted, and the eyes of all turned upon me with a fearful squint: not an individual present but squinted. The genteel Pepa, the good-humored Chicharona, the Cosdami,—all squinted. The gypsy jockey squinted worst of all."

But the humor of Emerson is not to be fairly measured by these casual scintillations. It is himself whom he describes, and perfectly, when he says, "There is no joke so true and deep in actual life as when some pure idealist goes up and down among the institutions of society, attended by a man who knows the world, and who, sympathizing with the philosopher's scrutiny, sympathizes also with the confusion and indignation of the detected, skulking institutions." Emerson, the "pure idealist," was constantly in his own person "attended by a man who knows the world." There was this doubleness in him. The disparity of the ideal and actual did not embitter him, because he never failed to see its comic implications.

Was Emerson's perception of the absurdity of any supernatural claim for Christianity as much an affair of reasoning with him as an affair of humor? He saw the incongruity of this toy house theory with the general make of things. I have often wondered how any man with a particle of humor in him could look up at the stars and still believe the doctrines of the Christian supernaturalist. Isolate any object, said Emerson, a turnip or an umbrella, from the connection of things, and it becomes at once ridiculous. It is as true of a religion as of a turnip; as true of Jesus as of an umbrella. "The soul knows no persons." The deification of Jesus is the grand historic testimony to the meanness of men's thought of God.

Too often has the humorist worn "a face that's anything but gay" behind his mask. Emerson tells the story of a man who was advised by a physician to go and see Carlini, who was convulsing Italy with laughter, as a cure for his excessive melancholy. The patient answered him, "I am Carlini." With Emerson, it was not so. The smile upon his face was rooted in his heart, because, although he saw the halfness and the imperfection, he also saw "the Perfect Whole," and yielded himself to that, a willing thrall.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

CARLYLE AS FREE-THINKER.

Of course he was a free-thinker. The fact goes without saying. What fetters or bandages could have restricted such a spirit as his? To have compressed his intellect within the petty limitations of a dogmatic creed, of "Thirty-nine Articles" of any sort, would have been an impossibility. It would have been a greater marvel to have found the grim Scotchman resigning himself to the dictates of Orthodoxy than were the giants of the Arabian Nights, who had been compelled by Solomon to shrink themselves within the compass of small brazen vases. Carlyle was really as tumultuous and revolutionary a spirit as Byron, as intense a foe of conventionalism and cant as was the latter. He occasionally sneers at Byron, in his writings, it is true; but Mr. Froude informs us that he would permit no one else to do so in his presence. In answer to a letter from his affianced in 1824, announcing to him the death of Byron, he wrote, "O God, that so many souls of mud and clay should fill up their base existence to its utmost bound, and this, the noblest spirit in Europe, should sink before half its course is run!" Carlyle, in his secret idolatry of the great poet of passion and revolution of the first half of the nineteenth century, had for companion and sympathizer no less a personage than his German master, Goethe. Carlyle was by birth a Scotch peasant, and the Scotch peasantry in their seriousness and stern devoutness more nearly resemble the Hebrews of the days of their great prophets than even do the descendants of those ancient Hebrews now living. Carlyle himself might have been one of those prophets had he lived in the palmy days of Nineveh and Babylon. The ancient Hebrew prophets were not in the least blinded by the power and splendor of the primitive valley emperors of Mesopotamia, or daunted by the omnipotence of their monarchs. They thought only of the colossal wickedness, cruelty, sensuality, and abasement of the princes and populations of the vast Assyrian capitals. They were not esthetically given, but stern moralists, looking at men and things not from the stand-point of taste, but of the moral sense. Thus they poured forth torrents of denunciation against the ruled and rulers alike of those capitals, when they were at the height of their power and prosperity. The stream of Carlyle's talk, as he sat in his room in a suburb of the Babylon of the world of to-day, when he was excited by indignation at the shams and hypocrisies of his time, resembled, in its graphic and burning eloquence and startling metaphors, epithets and imagery, the outpouring of an Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel, when their tongues were set on fire by live coals from the altar. But, true Scotchman as Carlyle was, with all his fiery emotions and prejudices in favor of the bigoted Presbyterianism of his parents, of his mother, especially, whom he idolized, and fond as he was of spicing his talk with the imagery and aphorisms of the Bible, still he, at a quite early day in his life, repudiated the Orthodoxy of Scotland, and declined to be a professional mouthpiece of it in the pulpit, where his mother hoped to see him. He would do anything to please her, but he could not make such a sacrifice of his deepest convictions as compliance in that matter would have involved. But he always had a kindness for Christianity; not for doctrinal, sophisticated, ecclesiastical Christianity, but for the primitive, genuine article. To him, it was the "Worship of Sorrow," as it was to his master, Goethe,—the religion of reverence for that which is beneath us. "The temple of Christianity," he says, "founded some eighteen centuries ago, now lies in ruins, overgrown with jungle, the habitation of doleful creatures." He saw in the founder of Christianity Man morally at his highest and best, and no so-called God or Son of God, and vulgar miracle-monger.

Everything in Carlyle's early family and social environment had a tendency to keep him orthodox, in the narrow, conventional sense of that word in the then, and perhaps now, next to Spain most theologically bigoted country in Europe. For such was Scotland in Carlyle's youth, if it is not now. But the young Carlyle could not be false to the dictates of his marvellous intelligence and reason. His wide study of modern literature, says Mr. Froude, had shown him that the Presbyterian belief that "the Old and New Testament not only contained all spiritual truth necessary for guidance in word and deed," but that every fact related in them as literally true "had appeared to many of the strongest minds in Europe to be doubtful, or even plainly incredible." Carlyle had early read Gibbon and the essays of Hume. He could not but have felt that the famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of Gibbon not only gave a marvellously correct historic account of the rise and progress of Christianity in its nascent period, but that the historian's "solemn sneer" at the tissue of myths and fables, in which primitive Christianity is involved, was fully warranted. Carlyle, too, in the light of a more intelligent and scientific period than that in which Gibbon lived and wrote, saw more plainly than he could into the origin and philosophy of the canonized myths and supernaturalisms of Christianity. Yet Gibbon, the most conscientious and scrupulous of historians and moralizers, was for generations under a cloud for persistently hinting at the real state of the case in regard to Christianity in its origin and incipient stages. Orthodoxy, with a bronzed effrontery for generations insisted on decrying Gibbon and Hume for their undaunted championship of truth and nature against cant, bigotry, blind faith, and an absurd supernaturalism. Christianity, as a venerable social institution, involving all sorts of interests, pecuniary and official as well as spiritual, was not to be impugned, forsooth!

Hume's summary disposal of miracles by an irrefutable logic was attempted to be howled and hooted down in the absence of an ability to cope with it by a counter-argument. But Gibbon and Hume still live, and are great forces in the intellectual world, and will continue to be as long as reason, good sense, and truth are of any weight in human affairs. Carlyle's earliest and best friend, the celebrated mystic and sensational preacher of his day in London,—Irving,—knew of Carlyle's hostile attitude to Orthodoxy, but loved him none the less for it, to his honor be it said. Even in the height of his London popularity as an evangelist, Irving never indulged in any ex officio cant about "the Lord" to his friend Carlyle. He knew his man too well for that. For Carlyle was unmerciful toward all cant and affectation, and of course especially detested the cant and snuffle of evangelicism. Irving and Carlyle used to take long walks together in London; but the great enthusiast and preacher dropped all mystical and religious topics in favor of literature and personal matters and the news of the day. Had Irving only had a moiety of Carlyle's sturdy and uncompromising rationalism, and refused, as his friend did, to be a mouthpiece of Orthodoxy, he might have been one of the literary lights of the nineteenth century, second only to Carlyle himself, instead of perishing prematurely a poor theomaniac.

B. W. BALL.

LIGHT AND LIFE.

Wir' nicht das Auge sonnenhaft,
Die Sonne könnt' es nie erblicken.

—Goethe.

"Were the eye not sunlike, it could never behold the sun." Are these words true, or do they express but a pretty conceit? If the senses assure us that the sun rises and goes down, still more strongly do they assure us that it shines; and to assert that the eye must be sunlike, or itself a source of light, in order to recognize the sun's radiance, might seem like saying that a mirror must be manlike in order to reflect the human figure. Yet the point at which Goethe arrived, it may be, by poetic divination chiefly, is now to be reached by the paths of physiological science; and we may logically conclude that the poet's words were not only true, but perhaps more literally true than he himself thought. For, strange as it may sound, there is good reason to think that the rays which proceed from the sun are not in themselves bright, but dark, and that what we know as light is born in the brain, a creation of that marvellous magician, nerve-energy. In other words, life is the maker of light. Certain conditions to this production are supplied from without. Nevertheless, life itself makes the light by which it sees. A statement so at variance with our habitual and powerful impressions must indeed seem paradoxical at first sight; but, if the reader will consider attentively the physiological facts, he may probably find it to be well founded. And the truth, if it be such, has a bearing of great importance upon the entire doctrine of evolution. For, taken in connection with others of like kind, it indicates an order or law of relation between all life and its physical surroundings, which is precisely the reverse of that asserted by the philosophy of evolution now chiefly in vogue. And this law, if verified, leads to far-reaching conclusions.

If modern science be not utterly deceived, light as proceeding from the sun is simply the undulatory motion of an exceedingly subtle æther. Now, it is not only difficult, but quite impossible, to conceive how the mere motion of a fluid should be in itself light, and render the world visible. From this fact, however, I argue nothing; for it is equally impossible to conceive how certain masses of brain-substance should create light, and make the visibility of the world, by an interpretation put upon such motion, or rather, as we shall see, upon a nervous motion two degrees removed from it. But the latter is no more inconceivable than the former. We may therefore set the one inconceivableness against the other, and take them together as forbidding a presumption either way. Standing, then, on neutral ground, we may look at the facts, and see what is indicated by them.

The solar rays enter the eyeball, pass through it, and beat upon a nervous sheet, the retina, extended in its rear, where they excite a responsive motion. Behind the retina, and joining its centre, is a nerve which runs back to certain ganglia of nerve-matter lying deep in the brain. And here it is, in dark recesses of the brain which the solar rays never reach, and not in the eye which they enter, that the sense, at least, of light arises. Of this there can be no question; for, if the nerve be severed at any point between the eye and these ganglia, total darkness ensues, though the eye itself remains perfect, and the rays enter it to beat upon and excite the retina as before. The sense represents it as external, but this is sense-representation simply, and gives us the product of the inward act. And, if what we know as light exists otherwise than as produced by that expenditure of nerve-energy from which the sense of it arises, we can never have any slightest evidence of the fact; for it is only after that act, and in consequence of it, that light is perceived. Were the optic nerve a hollow conduit or tube, and did the solar rays, streaming through it, reach the ganglia, we might suppose that the latter, though they have not at all the form of eyes, nevertheless in some inscrutable way see a light which was already full and complete light before reaching them. The nerve, however, is not only no tube, but is wholly insensible to the sun's rays. Professor Tyndall has proved by conclusive experiment that a point of pure darkness in all our vision corresponds to the point where this nerve joins the retina. So far, therefore, from transmitting those rays which enter from without, the nerve is quite unaware of their existence. It is sensitive only to the excitement of the retina. By some telegraphic motion of its own, it signifies the nature of this effect, even to the minutest particular, to the ganglia; and these respond with an exercise of nerve-energy, whose mysterious and marvellous product is that glorious aureole of nature, "Offspring of heaven first born," which we name light. It is one of those natural miracles which science encounters at every turn; but, however wonderful, this is the only consistent interpretation which can be put upon the facts. And this interpretation is supported by direct evidence. If the optic nerve be mechanically pressed, light issues from the ganglia, though the eye be in perfect darkness or even though it be quite destroyed. The pressure induces in the nerve a telegraphic motion similar to that caused by an excitement of the retina, and the ganglia create light in response to the signal. The same effect follows when a current of electricity is sent along the nerve. I have had occasion to know that an eye quite dead to the solar beam may nevertheless blaze at times with splendors of beautifully colored light. This effect was attributed to a contraction of the retina, which, so to speak, deceived the nerve, and induced it to telegraph as usual. Every one has at some time had a blow upon the eye which caused him to "see stars." This light is indeed not vision: an object becomes visible only when rays reflected from it enter the eye; and accordingly there is in vision a very intimate connection, however mediated, between such rays and the action of the ganglia. Nevertheless, light no less than sight is evolved from within rather than received from without.

Sound is produced by a process strictly analogous. The external condition to it is an undulatory motion of the air. The air-waves enter the ear and beat upon the tympanum. The effect upon this is telegraphed to the appropriate quarter of the brain, and the sense of sound is produced in response. And, so far as we know or can know, sound exists only in the sense of it. There is no shadow of evidence that the air-waves are in themselves sonorous. Of course, our impression is that the sound is external; but the brain is itself the author of this impression. It gives us, however, no impression whatever concerning the aerial waves, for we are not conscious of their existence. Sound, too, like light, may be produced by the brain quite independent of any action from without. In short, all the evidence points to the conclusion that sound and the sense of sound have the same origin and are the same fact. It is a product of nerve-energy, which is usually, but not always, brought into action upon occasion of an aerial motion in itself silent.

If we pass to the sense of touch, the same order continues. One touches a red-hot iron, and the intense heat causes a certain disintegration of the flesh. This disintegration is the whole effect of which the hot iron is the efficient cause. A sense of pain ensues, but the organism is itself the maker of this sensation. That effect upon the flesh is telegraphed to the brain, and this telegraphs in return, Up signals. The sense of pain, and with it every sensation whatsoever, is a product, a creation, of the nervous organization. It arises commonly upon occasion of an effect from without; but its proper author is always, and can be only, the organism itself. And, if this be true of simple sensation, how much more of perception and thought!

These facts conduct us to a general truth of some importance. It is that external forces and influences can only appeal submissively to existing powers of the organism, without being able of themselves to accomplish anything whatsoever in the sphere of life. Forces from without may indeed oppress, mutilate, or crush and destroy the body, quite without its concurrence; but they can do no better, nor of themselves can produce even physical pain. In order to produce any formative, nourishing, informing, or otherwise serviceable effect, they can but submit themselves to its powers to be made use of, as food is submitted to the transforming action of the stomach and its associated organs. Food has, in and of itself, no power to nourish: it is but the raw material from which the organism manufactures nourishment. Yet the processes of digestion and assimilation are the lowest modes of vital activity, and here the ratio of what the organism does for itself to what it receives from without is at its inferior limit. The nutritive elements are received into the interior of the body, though received only to be treated as raw material and transformed, with a sovereign selection of fit and rejection of unfit elements. Moreover, the reception is itself the act of the receiver; while, in the case of man, the action which brings food into existence goes out largely from the organism itself. But, on passing from nutritive to sentient processes, we observe that there is no such reception of the outward. The light-waves stop short at the retina, the sound-waves at the tympanum: they are admitted only into small vestibules, shut off rigorously from the interior. Here, they humbly deposit their effect, such as it is; and whatever may follow, from a simple sensation upward, is the work of the organism exclusively, determined by and accomplished for itself.

Now there is a current doctrine or persuasion which runs to the effect that light has made sight, that sound has made hearing, that all sentient powers are the product of influences from without, and that the origin of everything in man must be sought in that which is external to him. But, if the foregoing be true, this doctrine will scarcely bear examination. If external influences can but address and submit themselves to powers of the organism already existing; if, accordingly, they can bring about in the sphere of life no formative effect whatever, nor even a sensation, by their proper force; if their fitness to be in any degree influential arrives only as subsequent to a formative effect gone before,—if this be the fact, the assumed all-potency of "environment" is a conception very much strained, a conception by which the lesser part of the whole truth is made to cover and conceal the greater. It is not indeed wholly false, but it is somewhat less than half true. Nothing lives or moves but in and through relation; and, of all terrestrial beings, man is related the most widely, most variously, and most subtly. This relationship, moreover, is essential to his being and motion as man. The individual man, imagined as out of all human relation, to speak of no other, disappears: his human quality can no longer be found. For this reason, I long since discarded individualism as the primary principle in political life. But we must distinguish two great categories of relation, human and physical. According to the doctrine spoken of, the original sources of man's constitution lie in the relation of all men to their physical surroundings; and it must be indeed true that this relation was in some measure, though not to the extent often supposed, precedent to the other and higher. But it is still farther held that the positive or productive pole of this relation lies in the outward world, and that man is the slowly accumulated deposit of external influences.

To this, I answer, in consistency with what has been seen, that these influences could not at all be such, did they not find in the organism the very powers they are supposed to form; that they can only address, solicit, and submit themselves to such powers as are already there; that life is ever its own builder and fashioner, incapable of being built or of being raised from one degree to another by aught but itself; that, accordingly, it is the superior active and productive term in all its outward relations; and that the perpetual order of this relation is signified by the fact that, as external to the powers of life, light is dark and sound silence. Generation, then, of vital faculty from without is simply impossible. All the physical forces and influences of the universe could not add one power to one worm, for they could but yield themselves to the powers the worm possesses. It can be served only by what its organism takes and makes use of, and both the use and the taking will be determined by the actually existing powers of the organism. A tree will take and use but so much water, though all Lake Superior were offered it; and what it shall do with what it does take will be determined wholly by its own constitution, not at all by the water. Equally true it is, however, that generation of vital powers merely from within, or by life as isolated, is impossible. Relation and its effect there must be; but what is the order of relation between life and its surroundings? This is the question. The answer is that the principles and powers of life are addressed and supplied from without. But the principles to be addressed and the powers that shall receive, transform, and put to use the elements furnished, must be already there. This law, if it hold good at any point, must do so along the whole line from the rhizopod up to Shakspeare, or from the lowest powers of vegetative life to the highest faculties of mind. The germinal principle of morals, for example, is the condition precedent to the existence of all the natural influences which serve toward its development and of all the pabulum it feeds upon, to their existence; that is, as indeed influential and nutritive. If one seek downward to discover its origin in a lower stage of life, he engages in a legitimate inquiry, and, if he look searchingly, may probably find anticipations of it; but, with respect to these, the same necessary antecedence, the same perpetual order of relation, will remain. But if, instead of seeking to follow a descending line of germinal force, he labor to compound that principle from inferior elements now co-existing with it, such as pleasure and pain, he simply tries to draw rational conclusions in the teeth of a natural impossibility. The moral principle grows, not being a goddess that leaps forth in full panoply from the head of a god; but, for that very reason, it follows the order of vital development, which is that growth can proceed only from a seminal or germinal principle of like nature with that which is to come of its activity, and that all which ministers to it can do so only as taken up by it, to be transformed and made consubstantial with itself. Get the acorn, and you may have an oak, but not otherwise. For the oak grows only by transforming inorganic elements into organic substance, which transformation can be effected only by itself; and the process can be initiated only by the oak-principle, embodied in the acorn. The like holds of conscience, as of all which lies in the order of vital production.

To resume. Nothing is in the nature of light until there is sight, nothing in the nature of sound until there is hearing, nothing in the nature of food until there is the vital power to digest and assimilate; hence it were irrational to suppose that light has made sight, sound made hearing, and food made assimilative power. The method of life is that of appropriation and transformation from above; and mental are related to sentient powers, as the latter to external conditions and forces. Life uses the elements beneath and around it, and the user is not the product of the thing used. To imagine the contrary were like conceiving of water as not only running up hill, but as making the hill by running up.

I leave the argument for the present, perhaps finally, at the point thus reached, and invite examination of it. Whoever shall clearly prove it fallacious will have the hearty thanks of one person, if of no more.

PRACTICAL MATERIALISM.

The pulpit and the religious press of late have been profuse in warnings against the dangers of the materialistic philosophy that is rife in our time. There may be such dangers. But meantime there is another kind of materialism which is a hundred times more dangerous and with which modern civilization is already deeply infected. This is practical materialism, or the engrossment in material aims, pursuits, and pleasures to the neglect of the mental and moral objects of life. Philosophical materialism may consist with a high morality. Practical materialism is immorality itself. In it a multitude of evils have their root.

And this is a kind of materialism that is found quite as much inside of churches as outside of them. Human life, wherever we look, is largely given up to the achievement of material success. The enormous development of material enterprises, the stimulus given by scientific discovery and invention to the increase of all forms of mechanical appliance, the rapid accumulation of wealth, the whirl and rush of the business world after wealth at any cost—these are characteristics of the age. We are living, in fact, in a material civilization. We see it in the tendency to costly extravagance in public and private buildings, to outward decoration and show, to pleasures of the table and fashions of dress, to external æsthetics of every sort. It sinks to lower form in the disposition to use wealth, or even one's smaller income whatever it may be, in surrounding one's self with all possible bodily comforts and luxuries and the easy helps to self-indulgent habits. And again it sinks to lower and lowest form when it descends to pamper fleshly appetite and passion and, in the enjoyment of the overgrowth of these lower satisfactions, kills out the nobler ambitions of the mind. It appears in the sensational types of book and newspaper that have to-day the popular favor, in the feverish thirst among young people after some constantly recurring social entertainment and excitement, in the forms and phases of much of the popular art-aspiration, and even in certain marked tendencies of religious demonstration. Those churches appear to be the growing ones which appeal to the senses more than to thought; and the art, the ornamentation, the order of architecture and equipage most in demand are such as most strike the eye.

Now all this is not to be complained of by any wholesale style of denunciation. There is much in it that is good,—good because it indicates a passage to something better. The body must have all its natural wants cared for. It must have at least the necessities and some of the common comforts of life before in general we can expect much mental or moral power: though it should be remembered that some of the highest illustrations of mental and moral power have appeared in connection with a stern struggle for the very necessities of existence. Yet the body should be wholesomely housed and fed and clothed as a basis for mental and moral culture. Let the emphasis be laid on that word wholesomely, and let it include mental and moral as well as physical health. It is to this end that the growing knowledge of natural laws and forces should lead. And the body also needs its rests, the brain its recreations, the social nature its social satisfactions. All this is good, natural, necessary. But all this is not the end. We make no plea for asceticism. But there is legitimate ground of complaint that these material satisfactions are usurping the place of the object instead of being kept in their proper subordination of healthful instrumentality. They are draining off the vital forces of society without as yet bringing much food to the mind and heart and moral nature. Material objects and pursuits and pleasures are uppermost. Things are in the saddle and ride, while thought and philanthropy, the interests of education and morality, have to plod wearily on foot, living on beggar's scrip.

Cities and colleges, for instance, are building palatial edifices, with every equipment of luxury, for the outward uses of education. Are they as lavish and ambitious in provision for improved methods of instruction within these costly edifices? States and nations and municipalities vie with each in the erection of magnificent structures for the various uses of civil government. But they display much less zeal in the competition to put into these splendid buildings the most efficient ability and honesty for doing the work of government. Private citizens of wealth, in the cities and the rural suburbs, are spending fortunes on their dwellings to make them capacious, gorgeous, attractive in variety of decoration and in harmony of color, and equipped with every luxurious furnishing that shall minister to physical comfort and sensuous enjoyment. And those of humbler means catch the ambition and brighten up their old houses and add an ornamentation to some corner, and put upon them a general exterior smartness. Yet it must be seriously questioned whether there is in either class an increase of diligence to put into their houses any more of the wealth of the domestic virtues; to brighten up the old love; to ornament the daily behavior of the inmates with the graces of mutual helpfulness, forbearance, magnanimity; to glorify their homes with the splendor of self-sacrificing deeds; and to make them attractive with all those refining aspirations, generousities, and hospitalities, without which pictured walls and glowing words and marbles are but vanity. Dress, too, is an absorbing object of study and expenditure. Not only woman studies it, but man also in his narrower and more severely conditioned way. The body must not only be comfortably dressed, but handsomely dressed: and appearance counts for more than health. The colors must mingle, the draperies flow, to please the eye, always, however, in subordination to one power,—the tyranny of the passing fashion. Would there were half as much study and expenditure to clothe the character handsomely, to array the mind in the habiliments of knowledge, to mingle the virtues in a seamless habit for the soul, to put on, above all, that "beauty of holiness" which is at once the cloak of humility and the shining garment of worshipful service.

The imperfection, the incompleteness, of this material civilization, though it is carrying us all along to greater or less extent on its tumultuous torrent, are apparent to all noble minds. It does not satisfy that which is deepest in man. And sometimes we see illustrations of character where its tyrannous domination has been broken and the pursuits of mind and heart are enthroned in supreme sovereignty, and material possessions and achievements are made to serve. And when the number of this band of emancipated souls shall have become large and strong enough, this material and sordid civilization will open into those higher cultures, humanities, and vocations which are alone the normal goal of human aspiration and faculty.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

FROM the reports given in various journals concerning the recent anniversary meeting of the Home Missionary Society in New York, we judge that the society might profitably do a little missionary work very near home; and perhaps the coming year it will turn its attention to the needs of its own members. There being a difference of opinion with regard to the management of the society, the two parties appear to have hotly contested the ground for the advantage. Mr. Beecher and members of his society are charged with having "packed the house." The Congregationalist, while reluctant to credit this, says that there was an "undeniable appearance" which "gave color to such a charge," and also that a "substantial confession" of its truth had been made by one in a position to know. But however this might be, it adds, "More arbitrary and persistent unfairness in similar circumstances we never have witnessed." Since these gentlemen were met to consider methods of spreading "the gospel" in the United States, it is evident that a few home-lessons from the Sermon on the Mount would do them no harm.

THE Home Missionary Society is an organization of the Orthodox Congregationalists, and the Congregational Union is another propagandist body of the same sect. This latter society also seems to have had an exciting and exasperating time at its annual meeting, the bitterness, perhaps, having been increased by the recent discussions over the appointment of Dr. Smyth to the Andover professorship. The Christian Union, naturally lenient to "Mr. Beecher and his supporters," has an article on the two meetings, which admits "some hard words" and "some indecorous action," but takes, on the whole, an optimistic view in this wise:—

The scenes in both societies were prevented from becoming disgraceful only by the strong sense of self-respect and decorum of the individual members; and the evils of a system which allows votes to be purchased in the open market for the purpose of enriching the treasury of a Christian society were so strikingly illustrated that probably no one who attended either meeting would dissent from such modification of the constitutions as would strike these provisions out. If, however, the meetings illustrated the truth that the saints are subject to prejudice and passion as well as the sinners, and that it is never safe to adopt an evil system in the hope that it will not be abused, they also conspicuously illustrated the power of Christian character to moderate and control passion and prejudice, and to prevent abuse even under an evil system. Despite some hard words that ought not to have been uttered, and some indecorous action which we have not thought it for the interest of Christ's church even to report, moderation and candor and consideration on the whole characterized the two assemblies, and the final result was a victory not for either of two contending factions, but for conciliation and good sense.

The evil system referred to is, that "both of these societies have a clause in their constitutions allowing any man to become a voter on the payment of a specified sum of money: in the Home Missionary Society, ten dollars; in the Congregational Union, one dollar."

THE Independent has an article on the same subject. It trusts that the "exasperation" caused in the Home Missionary Society will not diminish the contributions from the churches to its treasury; and in view of the finances, especially, beseeches the factions to make peace, or "at least a truce for a year."

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal, in its issue of May 20, has the following not very friendly comment on The Index :—

If the real animus of the Free (?) Religious Association toward Spiritualism is evidenced by its organ, The Index, it had better change its name. About the only allusion to Spiritualism which that paper makes is to republish some ridiculous twaddle; thus, with genuine Yankee cunning, bringing ridicule upon all Spiritualists, and leading its readers to infer that such nonsense is all The Index can cull from its Spiritualist exchanges to interest "Free Religious" readers. We have repeatedly noticed this trick until we are forced to conclude it is done with malice prepense, and hence this reference. The last report of spirit mush set before the Free Religious people in their organ of May 11 is as follows.

Then follows our paragraph concerning Mr. Allen Putnam's explanation of the use to which the aroma of flowers is put in spirit materialization. We beg to assure our brother of the Journal that we have very great respect for large numbers of Spiritualists, and especially for the class represented by the Religio-Philosophical Journal. But we must confess that our respect for the now prominent Spiritualistic doctrine of materialization has been reduced to very low terms since we began habitually to read the Spiritualist papers, and particularly the Journal. The latter organ has been so successful in its courageous, persistent, and praiseworthy fight against frauds in connection with this species of manifestation, that it is difficult for some of us to see where the test-line is between the true and the false. Why, for instance, if there be any philosophical fact underneath the phenomena of materialization, and the whole be not either a fraud or a delusion, should the Journal declare Mr. Putnam's assertion (on spirit authority), that the aroma of flowers is materialized into spirit-wrappers, to be "twaddle" and "spirit mush"? If there is any truth in materialization, why may not this be true? We ask seriously for the test.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on the 1st and 2d of June, 1882, with sessions as follows :—

THURSDAY EVENING, June 1, at 7.45 P.M. Business meeting for election of officers, hearing of reports, and action upon the Resolutions referred from the Conference of March 28. The following amendment to the Constitution, prepared by a Committee appointed for the purpose by the Executive Committee, is to be proposed for adoption in lieu of present Article III. :—

The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and twelve Directors. They shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the Association; and the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors be chosen. The Directors shall be chosen for four years, and, at the expiration of that term, shall not be eligible for re-election until after two years. One fourth of their number shall be chosen annually; but, at the annual meeting of 1882, the full number of twelve shall be chosen in sections of three respectively for one, two, three, and four years. The President, Secretaries, Treasurer, and Directors shall together constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. They shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number, or in the list of Vice-Presidents, between any two annual meetings. Six members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

FRIDAY, June 2.—A Convention for essays and addresses at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M., with the following programme of speakers and topics :—

Morning: T. W. HIGGINSON, "A Tribute to Emerson"; W. J. POTTER, "Liberty, but Religion also"; S. J. STEWART (Bangor), "Morality as the Aim and Crown of Liberty and Religion."

Afternoon: W. M. SALTER, "Do the Ethics of Jesus satisfy the Needs of our Time"; ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, "The Appeal of the Unchurched to Free Religion"; E. C. TOWNE, "The Permanence of the Christian Method in Religion"; B. F. UNDERWOOD, "Science as a Factor in Moral and Social Progress."

An address will be made by FELIX ADLER at the morning session.

FRIDAY EVENING, a Social Festival will close the proceedings, with the usual features of interest. WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WE have received an article by Moncure D. Conway too late for publication this week.

MR. W. E. DARWIN, son of the distinguished naturalist, in a business letter to the editors of The Index writes, "I may add that the reading of your journal gave my father great satisfaction to the end of his life."

A REFERENCE to the standing notice in this journal as to the responsibility of editors and contributors will enable any reader, who may feel displeased with some thought or expression he finds in its columns, to bestow his censure according to the principles of "distributive justice."

RECENTLY, at an auction sale of Church livings or rectorships in England, a gentleman arose on behalf of the Curates' Alliance, and denounced the sale as iniquitous and shameful. But the auctioneer, in reply, defended the practice, and said that "even should the Church be disestablished by Mr. Gladstone, the compensation to possessors of livings would be large; while, should the conservatives be in office, it would be still larger."

ONE of the merits of evolution is, that it does not go outside of nature to find an explanation of phenomena, does not lay in or import any outsider, or pretend to be on terms of intimacy with any unnatural or supernatural agency. It says in general, that any given state of the world is the result of all past conditions, that each of us mortals has a vista of immeasurable generations behind him, of which he is the living, breathing outcome, and that he was sure to make his appearance at this particular era of the nature of things with just such features and mental and moral characteristics as we possess. It is objected that evolution acquaints us only with the process and order of development, leaving the nature of life unexplained. The objection has just as much truth urged against any theory or theology. Life is volatile, and, like Proteus of old, is apt to elude the analyst, and refuse to be defined in terms of neat propositions and articles of faith. A complete explanation of life would be a complete explanation of the cosmos.

"Is it to be wondered at," asks the Christian Register, "that Adam found it uncomfortable to live in the beginning of the nineteenth century, and that he sometimes sighed for the retirement of his Semitic home? Is it surprising that his theological guardians should have waked up very recently to find that Adam had really made his escape? For nothing is truer than that Adam has gone, and that a large number of his bereaved offspring are bewailing his loss. To-day, it is not the Lord God, but humanity, that asks the question, 'Adam, where art thou?' The groves of Eden are silent, and we must turn to very different books from those of Genesis to get the answer. . . . Thus, thanks to Mr. Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, thanks to the geologists, antiquarians, and comparative mythologists, the theological, sin-laden, Eden-cursed Adam has beat a retreat into the night of the past; and we trust he has taken a good deal of his theological baggage with him. There are encouraging signs to-day that, with the disappearance of Adam, the artificial theology which was built on his shoulders—the doctrine of a fallen world, an angry, vindictive God, and a yawning pit of hell, and the fictitious righteousness which was necessary to neutralize it—will all vanish into forgetfulness, or be preserved only as relics of archaic thought."

AN excellent entertainment was given at the Hawthorne Rooms on the evening of May 25, in behalf of the Normal School for the training of colored teachers, at Tuskegee, Ala. Since the opening of this school, in July, 1881, pupils have flocked to it from all parts of the State, until the number, beginning with thirty, has swelled to one hundred and twelve. The enterprise began with very meagre accommodations, the general exercises being held in a church, with the use of two small shanties in its neighborhood for class-rooms. By the aid of friends in Tuskegee and in the North, a farm was purchased in the outskirts of the town, where the pupils can work their way, for they are very poor; and the State makes no provision for school property, but appropriated in 1880 an annual fund of $2,000 for the payment of colored Normal teachers. The foundation of a building has been laid on this farm, which will cost some $4,000, one-fourth of which has already been raised. The hearty spirit with which the colored population of that impoverished region have entered into these arrangements for the elevation of their race calls for substantial aid from the more favored classes of other sections. The State Superintendent of Education in Alabama has lately promised his influence toward an increased appropriation for this movement, so needful for the ignorant and destitute colored populace of that State. Funds may be sent to Gen. J. F. B. Marshall, treasurer of the Hampton Institute, at Hampton, Va.

BISHOP HUNTINGTON in the Sunday School Times says of Emerson: "If it is the end of the Christian system to make man blameless in these human relations, then it could hardly be disputed that here was a Christian man. If, besides this ethical element, Christianity includes and requires certain definite and conscious relations to be established in the soul by faith and will, through Christ as a Redeemer with God the Father, then, so far, the ground for that conclusion appears to be wanting. . . . If I believe that the welfare of mankind is bound up in an honest and a practical acceptance of the creeds of the Church, as I do, how can I ever think of this man's religious frame without a painful sense of its desolation? How can I be loyal to my Best Friend on earth and in heaven, and at the same time hold out the right hand of Christian fellowship to even the noblest among the sons of men who discredits that Friend's claim to be the only Son of God? It may be safely said that Mr. Emerson's genius and eloquence have done more to unsettle the faith of the educated young men of our age and country in the Christianity of the Bible, as it there stands written, than the influence of any twenty other men combined. Accordingly, whatever other exalted services he may have rendered to mankind, it is amazing almost beyond belief that, his life being closed, Christian ministers should, without abatement or qualification, extol his philosophy as a Christian philosophy or his religion as a Christian religion. It may be little to his friends how the Church regards him. But it is no less of great moment to us, who are trying to follow our Lord, to seek to unite fidelity to him with justice and charity to every brother man. And we will remember, with the special comfort of a grateful hope, that limitless declaration of his love,—“Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring.”

At Winchester, Mass., in the afternoon and evening of the 25th of May, the National Woman Suffrage Association of Massachusetts held a convention, at which addresses were made by Harriette R. Shattuck, Nancy W. Corell, Harriet H. Robinson, Mr. Bicknell, Mr. Fay, and others. The convention was called to order by Mrs. Shattuck, the President of the Association, who in a modest, easy, and graceful manner stated the object of the meeting to be the advocacy of woman's right to the ballot. The Association did not wish to force its opinions upon the people without giving them an opportunity to object, if they had any objections to offer; and so an opportunity would be given for an open and free discussion, in which all were invited to participate. The Association was formed in January last, and has held three successful conventions. It is an auxiliary of the National Woman Suffrage Association, of which Elizabeth Cady Stanton is President. The method of work in all associations connected with the National body is to appeal to Congress for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, making woman suffrage universal throughout the States and territories. It was argued by the President of the convention at Winchester, that, though any State might grant women the right of suffrage, she would lose it the moment she took up her residence in another State where women did not possess that right, and therefore the United States owes it to women as well as to men to guarantee their rights to the full privilege and exercise of citizenship without regard to State boundaries and laws. It was announced that this State Association is not in any way or in any spirit hostile to other State associations working for woman suffrage; but, while working heartily with such, it conceived that a larger work of usefulness might be done by directing the attention of the people to the fact that an amendment to the Constitution would be the quickest, surest, and altogether the safest way of securing the desired end. If the legislature should this year make laws granting the right of suffrage to women, the legislature of next year might annul them; but once secure it by amendment of the National Constitution, and it is placed above the danger of party legislation. The Association solicits the membership of all who are interested in its object and method. Communications for such purpose may be addressed to Mary R. Brown, 660 Broadway, South Boston.

“THE INDEX” will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

POETRY.

NIAGARA.

For The Index.

Far stretching in the morning beams,
And blazing in the golden gleams,
The mingling of a thousand streams.

And trembling many-hued among Thy shifting mists, the rainbow, hung
Before thee, o'er thy gulf is flung.

Over thy wave of tender green,
That falls forever down serene,
Then foams into the whitest sheen,

Its gauzy veil the mist-film throws,
Through which the shimmering sunshine flows
Down to thy deep of watery snows.

The avalanche, from mountain height,
Sweeps, shuddering, in its awful might,
And robed in mantle dim and white,

Slow gathering in its downward sweep,
Into some gulf's unfathomed deep,
With wild and long and fearful leap,

Down, down, into the abysmal mist,
Whose mysteries mortal never wist,
No eye hath seen, nor ear may list;

And silence all the air doth fill,
Save of some moorland-bird the trill,
Or trickling of the mountain-rill.

But ever-changing thou dost pour,
Yet still the same, with solemn roar,
O'er thy dim cliff for evermore.

And, standing on thy shore, I seem
As one who, in a silent dream,
And launched on some mysterious stream,

Is borne, from whence he knows not, hither,
And with vast sweep is hurried thither,
He knows not why, he knows not whither;

While through my brain, in sounding rhyme,
All thoughts eternal and sublime
Course slow: the universe, and time,

And endless change that ceaselessly
Hymns of eternity through thee,
And I enter into infinity.

LINES

For The Index.

Read at the Celebration of Emerson's Birthday, in Concord, Mass., May 25, 1882.

Why did the Rhodora blossom so late,
And the Spring keep back her flowers?
Did the May-day know of her poet's fate,
And was Nature's grief like ours?

Let us honor our friend indeed
As the Singer of the May;
For he bade New England's wintry creed
To a sunnier faith give way.

His words were the flood of life and light
Which have burst that icy chain,
And he walked himself in the sunshine bright
That never will cease to reign.

The summer of thought draws near,
Bringing truth hitherto unknown;
But the herald of Spring is dear,
And the might of his work we own. F. M. H.

RELIGION is the free effort of man to expand, elevate, enlarge, beautify—in one word, perfect—his own nature in all its aspects, not by any means neglecting his nobler part,—his intellect and reason; and this effort of his to realize his own ideal by a natural process of free development is the mirroring in his little career of Nature's own religion, her own endless striving to realize an unattained better, for which there is no name but evolution.—F. E. Abbot.

The Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 1, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, “To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history”; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to “THE INDEX,” 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

THE GRANDER GOD.

An Essay read before the Parker Memorial Class, Boston.

BY CHARLES ELLIS.

People who are now outside of the Church were born in it; or, if not born there, its influence has been around their early life. The theological conception of the universe has been their mental environment. Any person who has thought himself out of that into the philosophical environment knows what a long, hard road stretches away between the two. The difficulties of travel are such that it is safe to say not one person in ten thousand of those now living has succeeded in changing the theological for the philosophical environment. What is the result? People become sceptical in regard to theological dogmas; then they become unbelievers; then they may or may not go as far as open denial; but there they stop and settle into a state of indifference. They are convinced that the theological conception must be erroneous, but they have not arrived at the truth which is to take its place. They may pass as “Liberal,” “Infidel,” or what not, but, in point of fact, they are simply neutral, have no clear ideas upon the subject, and belong nowhere. The mass of these people have not time and means to study and find for themselves the truth that would carry them to the position of sincere believers and supporters. They wait and look for others to come and show them the light, the truth, and the way.

With a hope that I can cast a glimmer upon the way to the successful development of Liberalism, I have attempted the preparation of this essay. I want to point out the fact that scientific Liberalism has a positive and affirmative basis. Without further preliminary I will come at once to the lesson of the day.

Underlying all theology is the conception that the universe is the “work of God.” Even the theistic evolutionist, while he maintains that things have been “evolved,” and not “created,” still falls back upon the assumption of a spiritual power which is the “unknown,” but which stands to his mind as God, and as such is the author of the universe. But in all theologies the object presented for belief is unreal. The God represented as an infinite Person and the God represented as an infinite Spirit are unreal, are unproved, and furthermore they do not admit of proof. Savage and civilized people believed in God in times past, not because that existence was proved, but because they were afraid not to believe. In modern times the more civilized people believe in God more from accident of birth and environment than from either fear or conviction. They have inherited the belief, or a tendency to it. The prime condition of the continuance of such a state of belief is not “Christianity” or “free thought,” but no thought.

As long as people do not think, they may believe or acquiesce in the beliefs of others, which is the equivalent of no thinking.

But, change the conditions. Give men minds capable of thinking, and society that will protect them in thinking, and there will soon appear a growing class of people who do not believe in God according to the long-prevalent conception. Common-sense naturally asks for evidence, and refuses to believe without it. When knowledge was at zero and marvellousness at a hundred in the shade of superstition, people believed what they were told to believe by their spiritual superiors. But belief in the long-prevalent conception of God and the origin of things has suffered such terrible abatement through the fall of the marvellous and the rise of intellect that people are rapidly becoming unbelievers in that conception. Their minds are waiting for a fact that shall re-establish the inspiration of belief that has fallen in the decadence of the theological conception of God. They have turned their backs, mentally, on the half god and are waiting for the whole god to arrive. Proof and not guess is what they want. The sophistry of the spiritual hypothesis of God and universe may silence them, but it will not satisfy them. Spirit is not fact. They demand fact.

The one great, solid, irrefutable, irrepressible fact that forces itself upon us is the existence of matter. The intellect refuses to indorse any attempt to explain it away through the spiritual aspect of states of consciousness. The human mind that has outgrown the theological garments of its infancy will be contented only when it can settle down into a reasonable belief in a God that can, at least in part, be seen and known. It is not because people do not want to believe in God—if we except an occasional crank who dethrones God to worship himself—that there are so many sceptics; but because they want a reasonable conception of God in which to believe. They are not atheists from lack of reverence, but because they want a reality that they can revere and worship in sincerity. It is a sign of honesty to see a man refuse to worship a conception that can offer his reason no logical proof of its truthfulness. There are thousands of intelligent men and women in and out of the Church to whom worship of God is a mockery, because they can find no satisfactory evidence that God, as presented to their minds in the prevailing conception, is a reality. What the world needs as a moral tonic is a conception of God that will make worship of God a sincerity instead of a prudential farce. But this can only come through a radical change in our conception of God.

The common and decaying conception of God came through emotion. There, God was a creation of feeling chiefly. The new conception is slowly coming through the intellect, because the intellect has superseded the emotions. It has already come, indeed, but lingering survival of the old blinds us to such a degree that we do not or will not recognize it. The intellectual conception must come, however, from the most reliable source of knowledge: that is, it must be arrived at by the "scientific method" of study. In short, it must be, not assumed, but proved.

What, now, does science give us as an unquestionable fact, an ever-present reality, in which we can and must believe? THE MATERIAL UNIVERSE. Scientific men are agreed that we do not know how or why or what matter is; but they also agree that it is. That is sufficient for my purpose here. The "how" and "why" may be safely left to those who will continue such investigations as have brought us hitherto what knowledge we possess. But here I must caution the hearer against the sophistry that will attempt to confuse and bewilder the minds of those who are not familiar with this line of thought. The objector will attempt to cast discredit on our certainty of the existence of matter, because we know only states of consciousness. He will draw a conclusion from this fact that, as states of consciousness are mental, or "spiritual," as he will put it, therefore spirit is the fundamental fact of consciousness. This argument has the advantage of age-long beliefs and prejudices, and presents an attractive face; but it is nevertheless a deceitful coquette. Spencer says: "It is rigorously impossible to conceive that our knowledge is a knowledge of Appearances only, without at the same time conceiving a Reality of which they are appearances; for appearance without reality is unthinkable." That is to say, we could have no consciousness of things, if things, or the external world or the material universe, were not a reality. To argue that things exist only in an immaterial or spiritual mind is to claim that nothing can produce something, which is an absurdity.

But in order to make our course of reasoning clear from first to last, and to lead up to our final conclusion by legitimate steps, we must consider how states of consciousness are derived. Remember, I do not ask what consciousness is, but "how is it derived?" although I shall venture to offer a suggestion as to what it is.

To start with, we postulate an animal body having a system of nerves centring in a mass of cellular matter called "brain" and "spinal cord." From these to all surfaces of the body, inside and out, run lines of nerve somewhat like telegraph-lines having a common battery. Let us use a circuit of this system to illustrate the thought. I suspend this object over my hand. Hanging there, it represents potential mass motion. I let it fall upon my hand. What has taken place? The mass motion represented by that object falling through this distance is arrested and translated from mass motion in the object falling to vibratory motion in the molecules of the hand and the object itself. A portion of that vibratory motion is taken up by the nerves running to the surface in my hand, and is carried along them by a series of molecular waves to the brain. There the vibratory motion of the nerve that has been excited in my hand is again translated into the motion of the molecules or atoms of the cell in which the nerve ends. Now, as the mass motion of that object when arrested was converted into a finer and more intense motion in the nerve, which we call "molecular vibration," so, reasoning from analogy, we are bound to admit the extreme probability that, even while we are unable to see it, the translation of the molecular motion of the nerve must give rise to a still finer and more intense and sublimated motion still in the brain-cell; otherwise we cannot account for the apparent loss of this motion in contradiction to all known laws of its correlation and conservation, or indestructibility. What we should call that motion, I do not know; but my ignorance does not in the slightest degree militate against the perfectly legitimate argument from analogy which I have used; and until the objector can demonstrate as clear and strong a probability as to what consciousness is, our argument remains unanswered. And, if so, the logical inference is that the time will come when it will be known that consciousness itself is a mode of motion of the atoms that constitute the cellular tissue of the brain. Tyndall says: "I hardly imagine there exists a profound scientific thinker, who has reflected upon the subject, unwilling to admit the extreme probability of the hypothesis that, for every fact of consciousness, whether in the domain of sense, of thought, or of emotion, a definite molecular condition of motion or structure is set up in the brain; or who would be disposed even to deny that if the motion or structure be induced by internal causes, instead of external, the effect on consciousness will be the same."

What is the bearing of this thought upon our subject? It shows us that matter is necessary to consciousness. To every state of consciousness there must be an objective or external-material side, and a subjective or mental-material side. Mansel says: "To be conscious, we must be conscious of something." So Spencer and Fiske, in their statement of the relativity of knowledge, prove that while we can only know things relatively, never absolutely, it is only through knowing things as real that we can obtain any actual knowledge. Spencer says: "When we are taught that a piece of matter, regarded by us as existing externally, cannot be really known, but that we can know only certain impressions produced on us, we are yet, by the relativity of our thought, compelled to think of these in relation to a positive cause,—the notion of a real existence which generated these impressions becomes nascent."

Fiske says: "We know a thing only when we classify it in thought with some other thing, only when we see it to be like some other thing. In short, cognition is possible only through recognition." And Spencer again: "A thing is perfectly known only when it is in all respects like certain things previously observed." Thus, while it is the undoubted conclusion of all psychological study in modern times that we can only know things relatively, still, the conclusion is equally undoubted that "things" must possess a real objective existence before we can obtain any knowledge of them at all. That is to say, matter is necessary to all states of consciousness. There may be a hundred ears in this room, and fifty tongues might be talking here at once, but if there were no matter about our heads upon which the motion of tongues and lips could act, there would be no sound. So there may be ethereal waves in motion here, and tongues uttering speech, but, if there were no ears, there would be no sound. There may be eyes here, but without ether-waves there will be no sensation of light. So there may be ether-waves, but without eyes there will be no light. There must be an objective real in motion, and a resisting body susceptible to sensation before there can be any states of consciousness. Right here it becomes pertinent to our discussion to ask those who object to this line of reasoning, those who depend for their immortality upon the argument that we know only states of consciousness, and therefore know nothing about matter, how they, without material organization, and with nothing but immaterial mind, can obtain states of consciousness. If there were nothing in existence but mind,—which, for lack of a better fancy, I figure as an immaterial spider brooding in the brain in her web of nerves,—if there were nothing in existence but that, if there were no objective flies also in existence to shiver that web in their unwary flight and wake consciousness of game in that brooding mind,—if this were all, then throughout the shoreless deep no sensation would ever thrill the brain of man! Will the ardent believer in spirits demonstrate how a spirit, or anything answering to the common conception of spirit,—for it is that which I mean,—can take on mass motion and fall, under the law of gravitation, unless it first becomes matter susceptible to that law? Will the opponent of scientific materialism have the kindness to demonstrate how nothing can fall upon my hand and excite in it molecular motion which is conveyed to the brain and there translated into consciousness? Can nothing produce such an effect? If not, then, our whole claim is conceded at once, and we arrive at the logical and irrefutable conclusion that there can be no excitation of nerve motion, and consequently no sensation, without material causes. Grant that we know only states of consciousness. It is also a state of consciousness, a law of things, an experiential fact, that there must be matter in motion before we can have even the lowest possible condition of consciousness. The very state of consciousness by which we prove our own existence is proof of material reals external to us; and this, as we shall presently see, is proof also of an infinite material universe.

I shall ask your indulgence if in presenting proof of this I may seem to retrace my ground. I am trying, conscientiously, to make myself understood, and am fully aware of the fact that I am running against the Mississippi of popular belief. But, as I intend to show you, God is on my side; and as has been said, "One with God is a majority!"

I say that we have proof of matter and a material universe; let us see where that thought leads. There are able men like Spencer and Fiske and others, who reason onwards until they come to "unknown" and "unknowable" and there they rest with the implication that this may be God, but that, in the language of Tyndall, it must remain an "inscrutable mystery."

That position, standing, as it does, for the wisdom of great men, is used as a bulwark for the assumption of the existence of a Spirit God. The strongest argument in its support, however, is that to which I have already alluded, namely, that all we know is states of consciousness. I must notice it again.

Here (touching the table) is a material object. But that I may not be accused of making an unwarranted assumption, I will ask if there is any one present who will deny that this is a material object? If not, the point is conceded, and we postulate without denial that the table is a material object. Through my sense of touch I have a consciousness that it is hard. Through my sense of sight I have a consciousness that it is what we call brown. If I were to whittle off a piece and chew it, I should obtain a consciousness that it tasted like something else that is bitter or sweet or acid. Through the ear I might arrive at a consciousness as to its density. Now a general name which we apply to this object aside from the particular name, "table," is "matter." But if I appeal to my mind to inform me what that matter is, it will be unable to determine whether it is brownness, or hardness, or sweetness, or acidity. Are we, then, all at sea because states of consciousness do not determine what matter is? I think not. We have simply arrived at the limit of vision of Messrs. Spencer, Fiske, Tyndall and Company. But are we not men, as they are? If they went beyond others, are we bound to swear forever by them? They made their step, let us make ours. Let us go a step farther into the unknown. If we are to trust our states of consciousness as reliable, that is, as actual, and that we must do so you all admit, in your admission that this table is a material object, then we must trust the sources through which that consciousness is derived; that is, we must trust our senses. This is the basis of all knowledge, all science, and all philosophy. We can know nothing if we cannot trust our senses. But in this case they all testify to the existence of something external to themselves that is possessed of properties that excite in us consciousness of hardness, of softness, of color, of extension, of taste, and that something, we are bound to admit, is not a spiritual, but a material something, because, as I have pointed out hitherto, it is a contradiction to say that nothing can excite a sensation or be possessed of properties of matter.

Let us make no mistake here. The chronic objector who hugs his delusive belief in spirit with the fond, but vain hope that it is his immortality he is trying to save from destruction will attempt to throw us off the track at this point. Indeed, I already see in the distance the gray old form of sophistry fixing his splintered and tattered obstacle across the way. He would wreck the truth to save an error that feeds the quibbling vanity of his egotism. Of course we must remove it. But what is it? The same old and only argument, that we cannot "bridge the chasm" between motion and thought, that we can know only states of consciousness, and they are mental or spiritual or immaterial, and therefore we cannot know matter; but we do know "the Ego," and that is spirit. At last we have found an objector who knows what spirit is. It is "Ego," not "Iago," oh, no; it is just "Ego." I'm so glad! But what is that? How is it derived? Perhaps I can make you understand.

In the beginning was nothing; and nothing emanated something that took on form and differentiation and became the material universe; but nothing itself became "Ego" and dwelt in the flesh, and yet it was not flesh. The flesh was an emanation from nothing; but the Ego was the real nothing, and it antedated the flesh and is spirit. I hope you understand it.

The fact is there is no "chasm" between thought and motion, because thought is the subjective aspect of motion. Without matter and motion there is no thought, as far as we know.

Now, after having repeatedly exposed the sophistry of that old argument, I think we can safely turn to the headlight of common-sense to dissipate what remains of the last fogbank of superstition that hangs between us and our prospective goal of full and satisfactory demonstration.

We are here to reason. As Pope said, "How can we reason but from what we know?" Truly, there is no other way. All states of consciousness formulate themselves in language. We think a thought in words. I do not say that we have not states of feeling so dim, so vague, so diffuse, so obtuse, that we cannot express them, and this may be the reason why we never can get anything satisfactory in regard to spirit, but I do say that all states of consciousness, formulated, and expressed, must be stated in language; and by the consensus of mankind it is conceded without question that when we say of anything that it is hard or soft, white or black, sweet or sour, we are speaking, not of a spiritual, but a material existence. He, then, who insists that when our senses testify to the existence of objects external to themselves they thereby prove the existence of spirit instead of matter, because states of consciousness are mental, can only do so by wresting language from its true meaning as established by the usage of the civilized world. He who asserts that our senses prove the existence of spirit must prove it by methods of conception, expression, and reasoning as yet unknown to mankind. To attempt it by twisting language into support of his theory is pettifoggery and sophistry.

Therefore I come back and repeat my conclusion, that in acquiring knowledge we have no other source than our senses; that if we consider states of consciousness as actual, we must trust the senses through which alone they are derived, and that in the case of any object we may choose to contemplate or examine, our senses testify to the existence of something external to themselves which possesses properties that excite in our minds states of consciousness that it is hard or soft, blue or green or red or otherwise; that it has length, breadth, and depth; that it is sweet or sour or neither; and that something, by all ordinary, all philosophical, all scientific usage and meaning of language, we are bound to admit, is not a spiritual, but a material something. Further, if this reasoning is correct as regards the table upon which I write, if it is true of an apple, if it is true as respects a grain of sand, it is equally true of the universe.

Next let us consider what we may and must believe of a material universe. It is a common truism that matter cannot exist without space, and so we have the conception that space is infinite. The same is true of time. Existence must have duration, and hence, with infinite space we have infinite time. But why is not the opposite of this just as true? Why is it not a fact that infinite space and time imply and necessitate an infinite material universe? To my mind, the fact is there. The mind cannot conceive a limit to space or an end to time or duration. If, now, it is true that space and time have no existence without matter, then there must be an infinite material universe. What can we say in support of the proposition that space implies matter? This very strong argument is to be considered. It is the opinion of the scientific world that it is impossible to produce a perfect vacuum, that is, an empty space, or a limited portion of something with nothing in it. If we are to reason but from what we know, this fact would be enough to settle the question; for, if a perfect vacuum is an impossibility, then infinite space proves an infinite material universe. The only obstacle perhaps in the way of a ready acceptance of this conclusion is the lingering conception that space is an entity. The same is true as regards time. But failure on the part of a listener to comprehend a statement does not prove it untrue. It may be difficult for the mind that has believed space and time to be entities to realize at once that they have no existence whatever save in the extension of matter and the duration of its existence; and yet it seems to me that this is the only logical conclusion at which we can arrive through a study of the subject. A finite universe is a contradiction. The mind cannot conceive a limit or boundary to it, because every such limit must be itself limited and bounded; and so we are obliged to go back and back in an infinite series of boundaries that can only blend at last in an unbounded infinite. But, now, as it is impossible to find or to produce a perfect vacuum,—that is, a circumscribed place in which nothing exists,—and as it is impossible to limit the universe, it follows that there must be an infinite material existence. Furthermore, it is unthinkable that such an infinite ever began to exist. To say that it did begin to exist would necessitate the conclusion that at a definite past time an infinite vacuum existed. But we have seen that space containing nothing is an impossibility. Hence, we arrive at the logical conclusion that the material universe has existed eternally in the past and must exist eternally in the future. The question of the existence of God is thus narrowed down to the existence of an infinite material universe that never began to exist, and that, owing to the indestructibility of matter, can never cease to exist. All further question as to whether the material universe is the manifestation, emanation, or work of a spiritual power, the existence of which we do not comprehend, is therefore logically ruled out, since an infinite material universe that had no beginning cannot be a manifestation of anything but itself. GOD, THEN, IS THE MATERIAL UNIVERSE; OR, CONVERSELY, THE MATERIAL UNIVERSE IS GOD.

The establishment of this conclusion, however, does not remove the existence of mystery or narrow the boundaries of the unknown. It has only dissipated the mists of erroneous conception and belief that have veiled our eyes, and afforded an unobstructed view of the truth. It has simply discarded the term "spirit," with what that implies in the ordinary acceptance, and given us reality instead. Any infinite must be incomprehensible to the human mind until that has itself become possessed of infinite knowledge. But we have succeeded in locating the mystery, and henceforth, in studying the universe, we shall be intelligently studying God, having our minds filled with that sublime reverence that caused a wise man to declare "the undevout astronomer is mad," and which is characteristic of all students and lovers of nature; and in bringing humanity more and more into harmony with the upward tendency of the grand law of variation and selection, we shall, in the only possible sense in which the expression can contain a truth, be really "walking with God."

If I have not made the doubtful and indifferent to share my convictions, I do not think it is because I have not the truth, but because I have not been able to state it in sufficiently clear and convincing language. A world of thoughts crowds for utterance to develop, elucidate, strengthen, and embellish the rich garden of truth wherein I stand. To me, every question of life, love, labor, and duty rises with new meaning before the changed conception of our relation to God. Long-maligned, abused, denied, and misrepresented Matter is seen to be bursting into blossom of thought and speech of an intellect eternal and divine. From the lowliest worm burrowing sightless, soundless, tongueless in the sand, to the loftiest intellect that towers skyward among the Himalayan heights already scaled by the mental development of man, and still on beyond the fulfillment of the profoundest prophecy of growth and grandeur that the loveliest dream of poetic Hope can conceive, there extends the wondrous web that God is weaving on the loom of evolution these ages long, and in which the small and great, the each and all of existing things, do fill their place and perform their part as warp and woof! Therefore, I behold everywhere the consanguinity of all existing things. Our kinship extends to all worlds and stars and suns that roll and sweep and burn and shine beyond us. Ocean, earth, and atmosphere; mountain, valley, and meadow; forest, flower, and fruit; bird and beast and man; every affinity and repulsion of matter throughout the universe; all order, law, beauty, and harmony; each sunset sky; the morning dew, the glittering frost, the falling snow, the pattering rain, the laughing rill, the roaring torrent, and the rolling seas; the arctic cold and the torrid clime; the singing bird and the voice divine of human song; dream of saint and wisdom of sage,—all, all are father, mother, sister, brother to me; for, in every atom of the infinite material universe, there inheres the eternal intellect that is expressed in every form and feature, in every growth and development, in every change, dissolution, and translation throughout the wide, far-reaching, unbounded All!

As a final word, I ask you to remember that however much I may have seemed to be using the axe of the Iconoclast, I have not denied anything for which, to my mind, there exists a probable basis of fact. Should this strike some of you as inconsistent with my denial of spirit, let me remind you that until my arguments are refuted, it cannot be conceded that spirit has even a possible basis of fact. Spirit, in the common acceptance of the term, and by scientific use of language, is nothing, and that alone I have denied and do deny. Belief in God, the most cherished belief of countless thousands of the best—and worst too—of all lands, I have not only not denied, but have affirmed in canons of logic before which the atheist must halt. The immortality of man, that thought which, next to belief in God, claims highest place in the human mind, which, indeed, high-poised upon the pinnacle of hope, overshadows even the belief in God, that I have not denied, and do not deny. The immortality of man may be a fact. All that we can say as yet is that it is an open question. Demonstrative evidence in proof of it has not yet been found. But this thought, based upon the conclusions at which I have arrived in studying the subject presented to you today, I would emphasize; namely,—that when immortality is demonstrated, it will be found to be true that immortal man is immortal matter. That is to say, immortality will be found to include not only mind, but matter, also; and in the æons beyond the veil of death, it will be forever true, as it is here and now, that there can be no life without material existence.

There is one other point to which I would like to refer, for I can do no more than that, as I have already exceeded the limits of my time. It is the question of the existence of intelligence or intellect. It is a question which, as you see, arises in connection with the study of our subject. Bear with me, then, but a moment more, that I may say in closing that, on the hypothesis of the eternity of matter, past as well as future, all that has ever been found in the universe, and all that ever shall be found in it, must also have an eternal, actual or potential existence. Hence, wherever we find intellect we have found something that belongs to the material universe; and whether we confine it to man alone, or ascribe it to the infinite all, the conclusion forces itself upon us that nothing exists in the parts that does not exist, potentially, at least, in the whole. The whole must be equal to all the parts. Potentially, then, in the shoreless deep of the eternity behind us, the intellect of man lay growing in the womb of time; and thought and speech are the infinite God bursting through the upward struggle of matter into the sublime promise of the ultimate perfection at which our race must in the far future arrive.

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

Fragment No. 6.

"The mind should be introduced to principles through the medium of examples, and so should be led from the particular to the general, from the concrete to the abstract." What is the law of evolution? It is that law or principle in nature by which the complex is evolved from the simpler. It is the law of growth, progress, development; and, so far as succession is concerned, it is the law of relationship.

The scientific exposition of this law, by which higher forms are gradually evolved from lower ones, is but partly true; for evolution is by its very nature twofold: evolution implying and necessitating involution, the former being impossible without the latter; evolution without involution being as inconceivable as the production of the material universe from nothing. No new form of life can appear that has not its equivalence in energy in pre-existing forces. The higher forces—the spiritual, the divine forces—are involved in the material forces, even as the divine spiritual life is involved in our material life; and it is from this involution of creative forces that evolution is possible. The correlation between the Infinite Soul of the universe and that universe is as perfect as the correlation between psychical and physical forces. Evolution, then, is the result of the constant interaction of Divine Energy with material or human energy, stimulating and developing it until a given point of development is reached, when new types of life appear. For, just as there has been a conservation of energy in the production of higher forms of life from lower ones, so has it been in the domain of psychic or mental force.

Thought, commencing in the lowest and simplest form in the childhood of the race, has, through countless accretions, variations, specialization of function, and differentiation of expression, attained its present complexity. Each successive system, whether of philosophy, science, or religion, has been in some regards an advance upon preceding systems, transforming old thoughts into new and higher ones, but still retaining in the transformation the essential features of the old. In every case, evolution is through the partial conservation of the integrated energy of previous forms, whatever those forms may be. Just as there has been this coördination of all the lower forms and forces of life with the higher forms and forces of to-day, so has it been with religion. One invisible bond of energy connects the lowest fetichism of the savage with the most highly developed system of worship of the enlightened Christian.

As the human commenced existence in a perfect although germinal form,—perfect, inasmuch as all the forces of the past, all the potentialities of the future, were latent within him, only awaiting unfolding,—so was it with Christianity. The germinal life was perfect. All the forces for the perfecting of the individual and the race are contained in the Christian religion,—contained, but not yet unfolded. Now that humanity is tending along the line of intellectual and moral development, with its concomitant spiritual illumination, energy, and force, Christianity is also undergoing a change, and is about to be seen in its true light, that of a spiritualized, energized form of life, a differentiation from the present social and religious order, and the introduction of a new social and religious order of life.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

Editors of The Index :—

The lecture-room of the Smithsonian was occupied by the National Academy of Sciences for four days.

The Academy was very much delighted with its new quarters, which it owed to the courtesy of the acting secretary. These consisted of the Room of Archives, where the council meetings were held; the original west range lecture-room, which, as it opened out of the larger one, finally put to use, and as it was well supplied with blackboards, was convenient for the private sessions; the lecture-hall itself; and the pleasant east gallery, where an excellent daily lunch was held under the auspices of Professor Baird.

Some years ago, especially in those pleasant times when the Academy held its semi-annual sessions at Northampton, the New York Tribune and the New York Times published very complete reports of the public meetings, which began every day at noon. This no longer happens, so a few scattering notes may interest your readers. The private meetings were devoted almost entirely to the discussion of sorghum.

In the service of the government, the Academy appointed last November a committee to report upon this industry, and especially upon the costly experiments made under Le Duc at the Department of Agriculture. It has heretofore been easy to get a large quantity of excellent syrup from the sorghum, but it has been difficult to reduce it to sugar. A great many people came to the public meeting, expecting to hear the report on sorghum, which Professor Silliman was to read; and a great deal of disappointment was expressed when it was found that the report was to be private. The reasons why were not well understood; but it was said that, as the investigation might compel criticisms of government officers, it was best to withhold information for the present.

On the first day, Alexander Agassiz read two related papers, some "Notes on the Geology of Yucatan" and the "Course of the Gulf Stream since the Cretaceous Period." His diagram of the Gulf Stream showed an enormous submarine river, doing a great work of erosion on the sea-coast all the way from the Gulf of Mexico to Hampton Roads.

Mr. Scudder read an interesting paper "On the affinities of Paleocampus as Evidence of the Wide Diversity of Type in the earliest known Myriopods." In exhibiting the delicate complexities and exquisite finish of the Paleocampus, Professor Scudder said that these were far in advance of what an evolutionist would expect, considering its position in the natural scale of things. This difference between fact and hypothesis, he urged, should spur every investigator to greater diligence.

On Wednesday, Professor Riley had a paper "On some Discoveries which enhance the Value of the Cotton and Orange Crops." It is finally established that the moth of the cotton-worm hibernates in rank wire-grass in the more heavily timbered portions of the South, and begins very early to lay on the rotten cotton, when not more than an inch high. This fact, it is hoped, will at once force cotton-planters to abandon their present slovenly fashion of leaving the stalks standing from one year to the next. The second point of Professor Riley's paper related to an effectual method of applying kerosene, at a harmless dilution, to the under surface of the leaves.

On Thursday, Mr. Cushing read before the Academy, at their request, a written paper upon the "Mythology of the Zuni Indians as founded on their Sociology, or vice versa." As the head of his own bureau,—Major Powell is a member of the Academy,—it was natural that this compliment should be paid him. He brought his Zuniis into the hall with him, and those of us who have met them often and know them well were shocked to see how pale and ill they looked.

On Friday there were two papers that were both amusing and intelligible to the audience.

Charles Peirce read a paper "On a Fallacy in Induction," taking twenty minutes at least to prove what it would take only a second to assert; namely, that the soundness of induction depended on the soundness of the premises. We did not see the profound scientific value of the paper. Mr. Peirce talks to his blackboard, as his illustrious father used to do; but he does not imitate the old professor's genial and fascinating way of taking the audience into his confidence.

In this indifference to his listeners, Professor Gibbs resembles him. Do you remember a certain remarkable letter of Margaret Fuller's, written to Harriet Martineau, where she tells that lady, apropos of certain things in her lately published book on America, that, while she does not feel prepared to judge as to the truth of the facts recorded, she is perfectly capable of deciding in what manner Miss Martineau has dealt with them? I have often felt as if I should like to copy that letter, and send it to Wolcott Gibbs. It is a pleasure to see any man the complete master of his subject, even when we cannot follow him every step of the way; and we often know far more of what he is about than he suspects.

Joseph Leconte sent in a paper "On the Formation of a Metalliferous Vein at Sulphur Bank, California," which was read by Professor Brewer. This showed that the quicksilver veins at Sulphur Bank are being formed at this moment. The deposits in California have always been supposed to be late; that is, they have been attributed to the close of the eocene period. The opening of the mines at Sulphur Bank has stopped a process at this moment going on. The paper called the silicate interposed between the nodules of cinnabar gelatinous. There were also opaline veins, just ready to crystallize, as soft as putty. This wonderful paper was listened to in the coolest manner. I was amazed after the meeting to hear several persons say that they had seen the same thing in other places. Does this mean that members were ignorant of the immense importance of such a fact, or that they were indifferent to its publication? It made my blood stir in my veins; for here was a scientific man stating facts, with all needed precision, in complete harmony with the doubts as to scientific accuracy which filled my own mind throughout my California journey.

The Academy was thinly attended this year, and the number of papers offered of interest to the general public was much smaller than usual. If the Academy attempts a public meeting at all, it is impossible to understand why it should not advertise it and give those who wish to attend the opportunity to do so.

A THEOLOGICAL "SURVIVAL."

Editors of The Index :—

The subjoined, from a recent copy of The Temple Outlook, a religious (?) paper published in the interest of Rev. Justin D. Fulton, late of Boston, now, alas! of Brooklyn, deserves to be embalmed in some "Reluge of Superstition" or other appropriate department of your paper.

For concentrated falsehood and subtle fiendishness of spirit, I think it would puzzle even Fulton to produce another paragraph of the same length to match this.

Yours faithfully,

At the Door of Hope.

A people's church is a power, and a great congregation in a great city is a source of immense influence. The Music Hall congregation, to which Theodore Parker ministered, became a terror to the Christian heart; and when in answer to prayer God removed him, and the people turned to the support of evangelical truths in Tremont Temple, the effect was seen throughout New England. That church has a building placed at their disposal, free of rent and without expense of fire or light, which cost the Baptists of Boston $220,000.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW. Biography, Anecdote, Letters, Criticism. By W. Sloane Kennedy. Cambridge: Moses King, publisher. Price $1.50.

With commendable energy and enterprise W. Sloane Kennedy, whose name is familiar to our readers from his contribution to The Index of poems marked by originality of thought and uniqueness of style, has stolen a march on the other biographers of Longfellow, by getting out ahead of them this handsomely bound volume; which, though fragmentary, "contains," as the publisher's prospectus states, "everything which the average American cares to know about the illustrious poet. . . . The three hundred and fifty pages," it continues, "are not the words and thought of one man, but the systematic and admirable welding of the thought and words of upwards of one hundred persons who best knew the poet, who were most familiar with his writings, who were the most competent critics of his work, who could most feelingly sympathize with him under all circumstances." The frontispiece portrait of Longfellow is an excellent one, and is taken from a copy highly approved of by the poet himself.

Mr. Kennedy being a resident of Cambridge, a great admirer of Mr. Longfellow, and himself a poet of no mean ability, writes con amore, and his book cannot fail to give satisfaction to those interested in his subject. In addition to those biographical details pertaining to Longfellow already familiar to the public, there is much that is altogether new in the way of characteristic anecdotes collected by Mr. Kennedy from residents of Cambridge and friends of the poet. Collected in this volume are thirty-four memorial poems, contributed to different periodicals, by some of the best American writers. There are also given a dozen or so of the hitherto unpublished shorter poems of Longfellow, and over a dozen illustrations pertinent to the biography. The clear type and handsome binding help to make it one of the best memorials possible; and we are sure all who purchase it will be grateful to Mr. Kennedy for the promptness, variety, and thoroughness of his work, in spite of its apparently fragmentary character.

NOTABLE THOUGHTS ABOUT WOMEN. A Literary Mosaic. By Maturin M. Ballou. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price $1.50.

We have received from the author the above-mentioned volume. It is a handsomely printed and bound book of over four hundred pages, containing short extracts from multitudinous authors, all about, or pertaining to, women. At the present stage of the women movement, Mr. Ballou has rendered signal service to the cause by assigning to their true source the many sayings current about women. Though many of these sayings, by both men and women, are contemptuous in tone and contemptible in spirit, it is well to know of them and to know to whom to credit them. So, too, with the sweeter and truer "notable thoughts"; for the compiler has been conscientiously impartial in his collection, and has included with the bitter the sweet, with the weak the strong, with the false the true. These "notable thoughts" furnish an arsenal of weapons, offensive and defensive, to the many who are to-day deeply interested in "the cause of woman."

THE Popular Science Monthly for June opens with a contribution on "Speculative Science" by J. B. Stallo; who endeavors to defend his work, The Concepts and Theories of Modern Physics, from criticisms by Prof. Newcomb. Other articles are "The Eye-like Organs of Fishes," by Dr. E. Krause; "The Appointment of College Officers," by F. W. Clarke; "Sir Charles Bell and Physiological Experimentation," by Dr. Wm. B. Carpenter; "The Zuni Social Mythic and Religious Systems," by F. H. Cushing; "Astronomic Panics," by Daniel Kirkwood, and "The Stereoscope," by W. Le Conte Stevens; "The Jews in Europe," by Dr. J. Von Döllinger, translated by W. M. Salter, is a terrible record of the injustice and cruelty to which the Jews have been subjected in different ages by Christian people. "Chemistry in High Schools," by Eliza A. Bowen; "A New Theory of the Sun," by C. William Siemens; "The Future of Mind," by Peter Bryce, M.D., and "About Molds," are all suggestive and instructive. "The Introduction of Domestic Animals" is an article that must interest every class of readers. Professor Tyndall's letter to the London Times on "The Cause of Tubercular Disease," is given a place in this number of the Monthly. "The Sketch of Charles R. Darwin, LL.D.," is brief, but comprehensive. "The Editor's Table" and the "Literary Notes" are in keeping with the high character and general excellence of this magazine.

Among the most instructive articles of the full "Table of Contents" in the June Wide Awake is "The Ruskin May Day at Whitelands College," with portrait of Ruskin and an interesting sketch of the great art critic, by Sarah K. Bolton; "How a White Man became the War-chief of the Zunis," by Fred A. Ober, with five illustrations by Garrit and Lewis, which explain very fully the story of Frank Cushing and the Zunis; "How to Photograph," by Fred A. Ober; and "The Triumph of an Idea," a bit of history by Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood. These do not include all the articles, scattered amid much that is merely amusing, which help make this magazine a teacher as well as a companion to its young readers. Lothrop & Co: Boston.

THE Catholic World for June has, beside its two serial stories, the following list of contents: "Methodist Missions in Heathen and Catholic Lands," by John McCarthy, who concludes that "Methodism as a missionary force is a dead failure"; "St. Cyril of Alexandria," by John J. A. Becket; "The Foray of Queen Meave," a fragment of a poem by Aubrey De Vere; "The Roman Primacy in the Third Century," by Rev. A. F. Hewit; "Portraits of the First President," by A. J. Faust; an interesting article on "The New Comet and Comets in general," by Rev. George M. Searle; "Irish 'Outrages' in the Olden Time," by W. F. Dennehy; and a review of "New Publications."

THE Herald of Health for June, Dr. M. L. Holbrook, publisher, 13 Lighthouse Street, New York, is at hand, and is a more than usually interesting number, containing, in addition to Prof. Tyndall's exposition of Dr. Koch's discovery of the tubercle parasite in all consumptive diseases, some excellent hints on the infectious characteristics of diphtheria, on hygienic diet, and other pertinent topics.

THE Western Magazine, Chicago, Ill., comes to us changed in form from a monthly to a weekly, and in name from The Western Magazine to The Weekly Magazine. The change promises improvement in every way, and the two numbers of The Weekly Magazine which are at hand are extremely readable and interesting, full of vigorous and timely articles by good writers.

We have received from the publisher, S. W. Straub, Chicago, Ill., a collection of Sunday-school hymns entitled Good-Will, which is extremely orthodox in tone; and, though it contains some new tunes and new hymns, is apparently not much different in spirit or treatment from other collections of the same class.

OUR LITTLE ONES for June, from the Russell Publishing House, Boston, is as charming as usual in its numerous illustrations of scenes in child-life, and as choice in its refined and amusing reading matter for the youngest members of the family circle.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. HELEN M. SLOCUM, of New York, a leader in the woman suffrage party, is dead.

PETER COOPER, although past ninety-one, and rather infirm, is still able to attend to business, and may be seen daily at his office in the Cooper Union.

DR. JOHN BROWN, author of Rab and his Friends, and Pet Marjorie, died at his home in Edinburgh, Scotland, a week or two ago, at the age of seventy-two.

ONE of the latest acts of Mr. Darwin's busy life was to indorse the programme of the new Free Education League of England, and make a generous subscription to its funds.

ERNEST RENAN is described as short, fat, and elderly. He has a round, full face, with a forehead not particularly wide or high. The point most indicative of character in his face is his nose, which is "heavy and dipping."

THE Keely-Motor inventor, in answer to the suit brought against him by the stockholders of his invention, owns that he has thus far failed in his efforts to bring his discoveries into any practical use, but believes that he will yet succeed in doing so.

MISS LILLIAN TAYLOR, daughter of Bayard Taylor, has lately translated, with great success, two of Mr. Edwin Booth's acting plays into the German, receiving a thousand dollars for the work. Mr. Booth will use this translation during his German engagement next summer.

ROBERT BROWNING's English and American friends, learning that he did not possess a complete or uniform set of his own works, commemorated his seventieth birthday, on the 7th ult., by presenting him a set handsomely bound, and contained in an oak case, carved with emblems suggestive of his poems.

MISS LILLIAN OLCOTT, a Brooklyn young lady of fine family and high education, who has just gone upon the dramatic stage, had so much regard for Herbert Spencer's expression of regret that Prof. Giacomo Barzelotti's work on psychology remained untranslated that she rendered and edited an American edition.

MRS. FAWCETT, the wife of the blind English statesman, is an accomplished writer and clear thinker. Her Political Economy for Beginners is being translated into two of the native languages of India, Canerese and Marathi. Her Tales in Political Economy are also being translated into the latter language and into Swedish.

HERBERT SPENCER will not lecture during his visit to the United States, although he has received propositions to do so, and has been offered £300 for a single lecture in New York city. His health is such that he is obliged to avoid all public appearances, and he carefully husbands what strength he has for work nobody but himself can do.

BLONDIN, the hero of Niagara, who, in spite of his once great fame, has for some years been relegated to the populous—though not popular—regions of the forgotten, comes to the front once more in Cardiff, Wales, where he is to give a gymnastic exhibition on the 29th instant. He is afterward to give a series of exhibitions during the summer in the principal cities of Europe, for which he is to be paid enormous sums.

MR. BANCROFT, the historian, has been forty-eight years writing the history of the United States, and yet it is only brought down to the election of the first President, so careful and painstaking is his work. Like Gibbon, he is said frequently to rewrite whole sections which do not exactly suit him. Though now eighty-two years of age, the venerable historian is still at work, and hopes to bring his history down to the time of the Mexican War.

A LONDON correspondent of the Chicago Inter-Ocean writes: "I do not expect ever again to witness so impressive a sight as that of Darwin's funeral, last Wednesday, at Westminster Abbey. A man who, 'far from the madding crowd,' devoted a long life to the passionate pursuit of truth, was followed to his grave among the greatest of England's dead by the greatest of England's living. Behind that plain oaken coffin, borne so slowly up the long aisle to its last resting-place by the side of Newton, walked many of the most eminent men in literature, science, statesmanship, law, and theology that England can boast. I doubt if at any former period of English history such a cortage contained greater men, or if in any other country to-day such an assemblage of great men could be found. England may have passed the zenith of her power, but it has not of her intellectual greatness."

A LONDON correspondent of the Boston Herald writes: "Charles Bradlaugh is the best advertised man in Europe. He knows how to turn every little atom of public sentiment into a sensation for his own uses. He guides his conduct upon the settled principle of doing what will get him into the most apparent trouble and cause him the least actual inconvenience. He goes around perpetually with a chip on his shoulder, daring the whole world to knock it off. But he holds a club in the other hand with which to hit the fellow who accepts his invitation. And, if he gets a good chance to thump his man below the belt, so much the worse for the man. . . . He is simply a strong man, a tenacious fighter, and a stickler for every one of his rights, no matter how trivial that right may be. He is no charlatan, and would have made his mark in the world, even if he had pursued the prosaic path. As it is, he made a wider mark by choosing turbulent and excited methods. The nation may congratulate itself upon having made him. If they were to let him alone for a year, even now, to go in peace where he liked, to do as he chose, to harangue and sit in Parliament at will, they would destroy his influence sooner than they ever will by opposing him. He lives peacefully enough at home, brings up his family in a careful, affectionate, and praiseworthy way, and is deeply loved by them. His neighbors like him sincerely; and, after all, there must be a great percentage of good in a man who is held dearest by those who know him best."

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

A friend desirous of completing his collection of Samuel Johnson's published works will give a fair price for certain of his sermons and essays in pamphlets or old newspapers (not THE RADICAL). Address Dr. B. F. C. INDEX Office, stating titles of discourses, newspapers, and terms.

Frothingham's Sermons.

The sermons are neatly printed in pamphlet form, and our friends who wish to do missionary work for the Liberal cause will find them admirably adapted to that purpose. To such as order them in lots of 25 or more, the price will be reduced to 3 cents. Single copies 5 cents.

RIGHT-HON. CHRISTOPHER PALLES, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, in opening the Dublin Commission, said fifty-six per cent. of the crime in the city and seventy per cent. in the country was undetected. This was a matter for grave reflection. As to the Phoenix Park murders, he understood there was no chance of bringing the perpetrators to justice.

LAST week, Guiteau remarked that his religious views would probably attract more attention than anything else connected with his life. "To preach the gospel," he continued, "has been the great object of my life; and my book, The Truth, contains the provision that, should I depart suddenly and without a formed will, I desire that the income from the sale of my book, The Truth, be given to the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York and Chicago, to be used in preaching the gospel."

THE English and French Governments have agreed to submit the Egyptian problem to a conference of the Great Powers, at which Turkey also shall be represented, thus insuring a line of policy soon to be formulated and enforced. Meanwhile, Arabi Pasha has received a letter from the Porte, warning him that he was held personally responsible for the preservation of order and for the safety of the European residents. Arabi Pasha assures his friends that he is perfectly secure with the Sultan, and can prove that his conduct throughout the crisis has been warranted and authorized by documents in his possession.

WHEN will the law recognize and judges be permitted to act upon the methods of true justice? A judge in Springfield, Mass., being appealed to to deal as leniently as possible with an ignorant but loving Irish mother, who, to shield her erring sons, had ignorantly committed perjury, said that the lightest punishment the law allowed for such a crime was one year's imprisonment; and to this he sentenced her, in spite of the fact that she had a family of helpless children, one of them a babe, to leave. The local paper states that her frenzied cries over "her poor children" at the sentence were too much for the stoutest hearts to bear.

DR. LASKER, the distinguished liberal leader in the German Parliament, says: "Germans settled in foreign countries must not despair if at times, for a little while, in the inner development, Germany seems to go against the great current of civilization. Let our faithful ones wait patiently, and may they not be deceived by that which occasionally appears on the surface. Germany will not perish in intolerance and militarism. After some little heaving, she will maintain her old place among the foremost nations of science, of enlightenment, and industrial ability. We who stand in the midst of the battlefield, but with clear and calm and unbiassed judgment, may be justified in exciting such hope in others with fullest confidence."

GARIBALDI is dead. The old soldier and commander, who was within a few months of seventy-five, died at his home in Capra, surrounded by his weeping friends, on the 2d inst., after a career of remarkable activity, marked by unsurpassed heroism, passionate devotion to liberty, and most brilliant and substantial services to the cause of human progress,—a career that made his name illustrious, and not only gave him a place of unchallenged preeminence in the hearts of his countrymen, but a strong hold on the affections of the friends of popular rights throughout the world. All Italy is in mourning over the death of her hero and liberator, and the announcement of the event has been received with profound sorrow wherever men love liberty and know the story of Garibaldi's brave, brilliant, and useful life.

THE very positive law enacted by Congress for the suppression of polygamy seems to have diminished in no way the zeal or activity of the Mormon missionaries, who are constantly travelling through Europe gathering recruits. About three hundred converts, who came in the steerage among other immigrants, were landed at Castle Garden last week. The missionaries in charge of them, who rank as Elders in the Mormon Church, came as cabin passengers. The proselytes, mostly Swedes, Norwegians, German, English, Swiss, Scotch, and Welsh, are represented as of a low grade of intelligence and of inferior physical development. There were nearly as many women as men; and the majority of both sexes seemed to be of middle age, although the party included a few children and aged people. The converts were watched by the Elders with the most jealous vigilance, much to the chagrin of the reporters who attempted to obtain information from them.

A. T. STEWART during his lifetime, though very successful in his business transactions, never seemed to be able to make much progress in any of his often-talked of charitable schemes. Since his death, his chosen friend and co-legatee, with Mrs. Stewart, Judge Hilton, seems to have failed both in charitable and financial affairs. The Working Women's Home proved a failure, and the business of the once prosperous house of A. T. Stewart is about to come to a close. In view of these things, we are glad to note the fact that Mrs. A. T. Stewart is somewhat more successful in her charities; and Bishop Littlejohn, through her kindness, has been furnished, free of expense, with a fine residence nearly opposite St. Paul's School in Garden City. For twenty years or more, it is said, the Stewarts, with characteristic disinterestedness, kept a finely furnished suite of rooms in New York, called "the President's Rooms," for the use of any stray President of the Republic who might find himself stranded in that city.

GEN. LORIS MELIKOFF has been placed at the head of the commissions in charge of the reforms which the Czar has promised the Russian people. These commissions take into consideration three separate interests,—the central offices at St. Petersburg, local self-government, and the share in the administration to be given to the people. It looks now as though Russia would, at no very distant day, have something like a national Legislature, perhaps an upper chamber of princes and noblemen, and a lower chamber chosen by the provincial bodies. The Czar says he expects to be able to announce his reforms on the day of his coronation. Gen. Melikoff is a practical man of great ability; and no better person could perhaps be selected as the head of a commission for the redistribution of the sovereign power between the Czar and the Russian people,—a reform that needs to be managed with the greatest caution and wisdom, and which calls for the highest qualities of statesmanship.

THE great strike of the iron-workers, which we mentioned last week as imminent, is now in progress. The workmen know that large profits have been made in the iron business the last three years, and say that the small increase of pay which they ask is rendered absolutely necessary by the increased cost of living. The employers declare that they cannot accede to the demand, because any such addition to the rate of wages would leave them no profit at all. Meanwhile, not only are the furnaces fireless, but the companion interests are beginning to feel the effects of the suspension of the iron mills; and, unless terminated at an early day, it must seriously affect many of the trades of the country. There is a strong conviction among intelligent people that these labor troubles indicate that the industry of the country is suffering from unnecessary burdens imposed by the tariff and certain parts of the internal revenue law, as well as by State and municipal taxation. An unreasonably high tariff has stimulated production beyond the demands of the market, while taxes add so to the cost of all the necessities of living that the wages of working-men are insufficient to obtain them; and, at the same time, the present exorbitant taxation so adds to the expenses of manufacture and business that enterprise is paralyzed.

SANGREAL.

Every youth of English blood, if his development be not arrested, will find his life interpreting the "Legend of Arthur" better than the Laureate can do it for him. He will know why there came a day when for all valiant knights the consecrated chalices of Christendom were not enough, and they must needs leave their fine castles to seek the ruby cup which held the real blood of the divine Man. He will be happy if his experience interpret for him the farther fable that Arthur, flos regum, never died, but still—as peasants, whose hearts never flowered, fondly believed—lives in the Vale of Avalon, to return again when the hour that needs him shall strike. So it happened to me when, turning from the conventional chalices, I found my way to Concord, and there listened to the discourse of Emerson. Never shall I forget that first evening when I listened to his lecture. It was grave, it was humorous and witty, it was various as the forms and growths of nature; but it was more than eloquence, it was transfusion. Within me there was a whisper, which said: "Wanderer, take, eat. This is his blood that he is shedding for you: this is your Sangreal, flushing in the ruby cup of purest beauty." And I did not need philology to tell me "Avalon" means "apples," for the flower of men I knew in his own orchard. And there, too, was the Round Table of loyal hearts. Some of them still fulfil their oath of knighthood in the work of the world, some rest by their leader's form in the grove well called "Sleepy Hollow"; for their dust only sleeps that more purely their life may pervade the world. The poems that Emerson wrote await their setting in his life-history,—an epic whose stately march, from the Star Chamber of England to morning stars quiring the dawn of a new ideal world, will turn Paradise Lost into a prelude.

Lately, a true Round Table became visible for a moment here in London also. While Kuenen was giving his Hibbert Lectures here and at Oxford, a dinner was given to him at a club in St. James', fourteen gentlemen surrounding the large circular board, on which every luxury appeared. Every variety of religious opinion was represented, from Agnosticism to Catholicism. I say represented; for these persons were not present to suppress their convictions and talk about the weather, but to converse on matters of deepest import to them. The Roman Catholic sat very affably beside the free-thinking nephew of Sir Charles Lyell and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Kuenen's translator, successor to Martineau's pulpit. Next was the able Rabbi Marks. The active Liberal, Mr. Price, chief Hibbert trustee, had the old radical member of Parliament, James Heywood, on his left, and Kuenen on his right. Then came James Martineau, and, farther on, the eminent clergyman of the Church of England, the Rev. Malcom McColl. Next him was the previous Hibbert lecturer, Rhys Davids, a genuine Buddhist. Then a D.D. who has left the Church, his thought having quite outgrown it; and, beside him, the present chronicler of this notable banquet. Once, as I glanced around, there appeared to me a curious vision. The usually genial country gentleman and, I believe, magistrate, at the head of the table, assisted by the quondam M.P., began to burn Kuenen by a slow fire. The clergyman bound Rhys Davids to a stake, and began to recite the burial service over him. The Roman Catholic began to hunt Martineau as a Huguenot, who retreated into a cave. The rabbi smote a Baalite prophet near by, and was himself set upon by the ex-D.D., and had his teeth pulled till he produced a lot of gold. For a minute there was a strange confusion. I cannot think my wits got mixed with the wine; for the next minute this phantasmal scene had vanished, and there were the fourteen gentlemen, in unruffled evening dress, conversing as politely as possible.

In truth, a phrase which Kuenen used in opening his series that morning had recurred to my memory as he sat there, with his grand form, his large, peaceful forehead, and soft, luminous eyes. He had called our time "the age of Darwin." This catholic company of thinkers, this happy symposium and banquet, was indeed an evolution. Behind its pure humanity were saurian ages of intolerance and persecution; and even now it would not have been possible but for the work of two men whose mighty shades stood around us and canopied us,—Darwin and Emerson! Twin discoverers, one of nature's unity, the other of its genesis; one learning from the ages what to the other was shown by the hours,—they first liberated mind and heart from the prison of system, and harmonized religion with endless growth. In 1836, Emerson published, in Nature, his vision of progression "from the sponge up to Hercules," which Darwin, returned that year from circumnavigating the globe, ultimately proved to be traced on every organism in nature. In Emerson alone is evolution spiritualized; and for many years he has been the darling poet of English science, albeit his very important relation to evolution is not understood. "Things fixed he has made fluid," I heard one say of him. No dogmatic system can do more than raise a smile since Emerson's age. When Dean Stanley returned from America, he wrote a paper in Macmillan (July, 1879), in which he stated that the development of American religion had been from Jonathan Edwards to Emerson, that the spirit of Emerson was the new covenant of both American and European Christianity. Of course, a Dean of Westminster must label everything Christianity, just as the Pope was wont to put "Pontif. Max" on everything in Rome from Coliseum to curbstone. For a Dean is an evolution, and cannot be conscious of the "survivals" adhering to him. But a more decisive influence has been exerted by Emerson upon the Unitarian movement. The tendency is setting very strongly in the direction of a religion solely occupied with moral earnestness, human welfare, the cultivation of individual character, and consecration of the intellect to truth. My own fluid faith has lately been recognized by some of the young Unitarians. I have given discourses and lectures in Glasgow, and have just reopened a beautiful church in Preston. The Rev. Frank Walters is the minister at Glasgow, and I was not surprised to see a full set of the Dial on his shelves. The Rev. Mr. Taylor at Preston is one of the same spirit. In fact there is a full Round Table of young ministers, who refuse to bind their thought or their sympathies in any system, who know perfectly well that the highest mounted opinion must become a lower round beneath the climbing intelligence of man; and who have resolved to "hitch their wagon" to the moving star of evolution.

In due time, these admirable young knights will have passed by the last conventional chalice which stands between them and the Sangreal. When Elizabeth Peabody advised Emerson to print "friend of man" with a big F (in his great oration of 1838), he said, "No: if I put in that large F, they will all go to sleep again." The genius of Giotto was shown in his O: the inspiration of Emerson was in that small f. He adhered to it, and the doctors slept no more. The big F in England is the word "Christian." The real religious life and enthusiasm of the country are rather in the Unitarian stem than in Positivism or in Theism, both "arrested developments"; and when it shall have unsheathed itself from the Christian name, and found Christ and every great soul in the transfigured Day, with Moses, Elias, and Jesus waiting on it, and Paradise present in it, then will another flower expand in the land of Shakspeare and Milton, of Newton and Darwin,—a flower of ruby heart, and calyx flushed with the True Blood.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

MARGARET FULLER.—A WOMAN'S WOMAN.

The recent death of Emerson recalls to mind the more intimate friends of his early manhood, the audience, "fit though few," who were among the first to recognize the poet and the seer, the sympathetic souls who were quick to perceive in this serene thinker a master mind. Among the most prominent of these was Margaret Fuller, who, if she had lived until Tuesday, the 23d of May last, would have been seventy-two years of age, but whom we cannot think of as ever growing old. The Transcendentalists, Brook Farm, the beginnings of Liberalism, all mingle amid our reminiscences at this time; and it seems to me a most fitting time also to recall the memory of Margaret Fuller, and the help and courage she gave her sex in its demands for equal rights. She was among the first in America to demand "not only equal power with man,—for, of that, omnipotent nature will never permit her to be defrauded,—but a chartered power too fully recognized to be abused." Of the last sentence of this declaration of rights, Col. Higginson remarks, "Never were there ten words which put the whole principle of impartial suffrage so plainly as these."

If Margaret Fuller, with all her phenomenal learning and genius, had turned her power against her sex, it is tolerably certain that she would not today be so tenderly remembered or so richly deserve the meed of praise bestowed upon her memory. She it was who gave the first impulse toward the study of classical and metaphysical subjects among the women of Boston, and so helped to fix that tendency toward culture which has now, according to popular belief, become a characteristic of Boston women. Born and bred under the shadow of Harvard College, she seemed to have drawn in with the classic air of Cambridge a mental hunger and thirst, which nothing but the highest knowledge could satisfy. We hear of her translating Latin at five, and speaking it fluently at seven; and at twelve years of age,—as Miss Elizabeth Peabody, who knew her well, avers,—"her parents concluded to give her a party for her birthday. Everybody was talking about that party; for, though she was but twelve years old, her parents had her send out invitations to the President of Harvard College and to all the professors. So Margaret invited them, and the learned and literary people in Boston and Cambridge; and they all went. At the party, Margaret conversed with the President and professors; and they went away and said that she was 'the most remarkable person that they had ever met.'"

She was an omnivorous reader, a close student, and an excellent linguist, teaching and translating Latin, French, German, and Italian, and understanding other languages. To those not fully acquainted with her, a certain frank, assertive self-consciousness of manner and speech gave the impression that she was rather supercilious and vain,—a manner which, as Emerson expressed it, gave the impression of "a rather mountainous Me"; but this impression on more intimate acquaintanceship disappeared. Miss Peabody confesses that this haughty manner kept her apart from Margaret for some time, as it did Emerson; but, after having a long interview with her, she was not only personally won by the charms of Margaret's high, thoughtful conversation, but lost no time in enlisting Mrs.

Emerson in her endeavors to bring the seer and Margaret into closer communion, and from that time Emerson and Margaret were appreciative friends. Harriet Martineau, who after another fashion was quite as opinionated and self-conscious as Margaret herself, did not take kindly to her, failing to understand her to the last. Speaking of Margaret, she says, "The difference between us was that, while she was living and moving in an ideal world, talking in private, and discussing in public about the most fanciful and shallow conceits which the Transcendentalists of Boston took for philosophy, she looked down upon persons who acted instead of talking finely, and devoted their fortunes, their peace, their repose, and their very lives to the preservation of the principles of the Republic." Although Margaret seems from this and other portions of Miss Martineau's biography not to have made a very good impression upon her English contemporary and co-laborer, yet a closer acquaintance would, I think, have convinced Miss Martineau, in spite of her evidently captious spirit, of Margaret's earnestness and utter sincerity.

Margaret was always eminently the friend of woman. That wonderful conversational class was instituted and conducted by her solely in the interest of womanhood; for, as Higginson observes, "she held that women were at a disadvantage as compared with men, because the former were not called on to test, apply, or reproduce what they learned, while the pursuits of life supplied this want to men. Systematic conversations controlled by a leading mind would train women to definite statement and continuous thought: they would make blunders, and gain by them mortifications; they would seriously compare notes with each other, and discover where vague impression ended and clear knowledge began." This conversational class consisted of women only. One season, for some reason, men were admitted; but it was found that the meetings lost in tone thereby, and the innovation was discontinued. Probably, Margaret saw that the presence of men had a restrictive effect upon the freedom of expression in the women.

While she had many appreciative gentlemen friends, among the most intellectual of whom she took and kept her place as their peer in thought and culture, yet her firmest friendships were made with women. Men admired her, women and children loved her. Horace Greeley, always level-headed, did not mean to be overcome with Margaret's fascinations; and yet his splendid tribute to her in his autobiography shows plainly how her true, earnest womanhood conquered his prejudices. "Personally," he says, "I regarded her as rather my wife's cherished friend than my own [Greeley having engaged her as literary editor of the Tribune, with a home in his family at his wife's suggestion, and on the strength of Mrs. Greeley's warm attachment to her]. Possessing many lofty qualities and some prominent weaknesses, and a good deal spoiled by the unmeasured flattery of her little circle of inordinate admirers... I half consciously resolved to 'keep my eye-beams clear,' and escape the fascinations which she seemed to exert over the eminent and cultivated persons, mainly women, who came to our out-of-the-way dwelling to visit her, and who seemed generally to regard her with a strangely Oriental adoration." Another of his grievances against her at first is thus frankly stated: "One other point of tacit antagonism may as well be noted. Margaret was always a most earnest, devoted champion of the emancipation of women from their past and present condition of inferiority to an independence of men. She demanded for them the fullest recognition of social and political equality with the rougher sex; the freest access to all stations, professions, and employments which are open to men." To all this, Mr. Greeley gave assent; but as Margaret was, he thought, rather exacting of the chivalric courtesies due from men to women, he fancied this inconsistent with her demands for equal rights as well. Of another phase of her interest in the truest welfare of her sex, Mr. Greeley speaks as follows: "I have known few women, and scarcely another maiden, who had the heart and the courage to speak with such frank compassion in mixed circles of the most degraded and outcast of her sex. . . . I think, if she had been born to large fortune, a house of refuge for all female outcasts desiring to return to the ways of virtue would have been one of her most cherished and first realized conceptions."

Her book, Woman in the Nineteenth Century, which ran through the columns of the Dial, of which she was one of the editors in 1841-42, under the cumbersome title of The Great Lawsuit, Man against Men, Woman against Women, was, I think, one of the first works published in this country in favor of the political rights of women. While Margaret was the literary editor of the Tribune, she reviewed favorably and glowingly the writings of Mary Wollstonecraft, Madame de Staël, and George Sands; and her articles brought these writers to the favorable notice of the American public. The limits of this article confine me to dealing with only one phase of Margaret Fuller's richly endowed nature and many-sided character. Some time I may speak of some of her other and as strongly defined characteristics. That the woman's movement of to-day is as successful as it is, is owing greatly to her steadfast loyalty to her sex; for not only did she work and write for its enfranchisement, but the influence she exerted on the minds of such men as Emerson, Parker, Alcott, Higginson, and others, has helped to make these as ardent for woman's enfranchisement as she herself was. These, again, have influenced others by their enthusiasm and genius; and so to-day Margaret Fuller "still lives" in the lives and thought of hundreds to whom she is only a name. At one of the sessions of the Woman Suffrage Anniversary, held last week in this city, I heard an enthusiastic young speaker declare that on Decoration Day she had gone out alone to the grave of Abigail Adams, and decorated her grave with flowers, because she was among the first to defend the cause of her sex in this country; and I thought as I listened that there was a tombstone in Mount Auburn Cemetery which should also have been decorated, though she whom it commemorates does not sleep beneath, but found a more appropriate burial-place beneath the waves of the Atlantic, where we can fancy that she has only such as befits this Margaret,—this pearl of women.

"Suffered a sea-change Into something rich and strange,"

At this stage of American culture,—much as that is sneered at by our English critics, Matthew Arnold and Oscar Wilde,—it is not impossible to find women as highly cultured and as richly endowed with genius and as brave as Margaret Fuller. But the opportunities of the women of to-day are far greater than hers: there is a large and respectable minority who accept the teachings which were then so new. The times in which she lived, the environments by which she was surrounded, the select coterie of thinkers with whom she was identified, were all singularly exceptional; and so there can never be, I think, another so exceptional a woman as Sarah Margaret Fuller, Countess d'Ossoli. But it is in the power of every woman, and should be the desire of every one worthy the name of woman, to emulate her constant, undeviating loyalty to her own sex.

THE REWARDS OF SINCERITY.

From the column of "Personals" in a recent number of the Boston Transcript, we clip the following: "Having successively experienced bad, worse, and worst failures as preacher, anti-Christian lecturer, and actor, Mr. George C. Miln has now gone to Fargo, D.T., to engage in the lumber business." This is a specimen of the treatment which Mr. Miln is receiving from the newspaper press generally, both secular and religious. We only take the Transcript's item as a text, because that is the last which has fallen under our eye. It has become the fashion for the newspapers to fling at Mr. Miln these little paragraphs of mingled fun, contempt, and ridicule; and the Transcript was only following a fashion. Fun, contempt, and ridicule are sometimes legitimate weapons. They are dangerous weapons, but they have their place in the struggles for advantage against error and wrong. Yet we know not what Mr. Miln has done that he should be exposed to this persistent and petty kind of guerilla warfare. And when in many of the items, as in that quoted above from the Transcript, the abuse is seasoned with positive mendacity, a limit is reached at which even those Jesuitical moralists who are ready to justify a lie, if the occasion be the glory of God, might hesitate. This four-line item contains four statements, and every one of them is a misstatement; and at least two of them are misstatements which (to keep within the limits of parliamentary language) every editor in the country ought to know, and every prominent editor doubtless does know, better than to make.

As to the first statement, that Mr. Miln has experienced a bad failure as a preacher, we will admit that on this point there may be an honest difference of opinion. All depends on what one regards as success "as a preacher." But it must certainly be said that, up to the time when Mr. Miln resigned his pulpit last December, he had had, according to the ordinary standards applied to the ministerial profession, a very successful career in the ministry. He had preached for eight years, rising from one post to another until he had reached one of the most conspicuous pulpits in the land. His gifts as writer and speaker were regarded as excellent. He drew large congregations, and had a society apparently warmly and unitedly attached to him. Till the hour of his resignation, because of broken health and a change of views which he did not think his society was prepared to accept, there was no shadow on his pathway. And, when he was persuaded by the society to withdraw his resignation on the assurance of liberty to speak his utmost thought, the crisis that soon came in his dismissal from the pulpit arose from their failure to comprehend the full meaning of their own action. He was forced to leave the ministry because of this change of his views, and not because of any other kind of "failure" than that of failing to preach such doctrines and praying in such manner as the society had expected of him.

The second and third statements, that Mr. Miln has made "worse and worst failures as anti-Christian lecturer and actor," are assertions without a shadow of foundation in truth, Mr. Miln not having yet entered upon either career. With his gifts as a speaker and the splendid advertising which the newspapers gave him last winter, it is altogether probable that he might have made a most successful lecturing tour and laid by several thousand dollars before this, had he been thus disposed to take advantage of the wave of excitement. But he seems purposely to have resisted the temptation to go into the field as a lecturer. On most urgent special invitation, he came to New York and Boston, and gave one lecture in each city to overwhelming audiences; and later he lectured once and again to a large crowd in the Opera House at Chicago. Other invitations to lecture he has declined. These are not data that look like supporting the assertion that he has made a failure "as lecturer." His acting has been confined to his reading a portion of "Hamlet" in costume before a private circle of friends in Chicago,—a small basis, surely, on which to brand him as having failed "as actor." It will be time enough to judge of his failure or success "as actor," when he appears on the stage, if he shall decide for that career.

The fourth statement, that Mr. Miln has gone to Dacotah for the purpose of engaging in the lumber business, may be excused so far as it is erroneous, since it cannot be expected that the newspapers, even with the help of telegraphic despatches from Chicago, will learn all of Mr. Miln's private movements and motives. He has gone, or is about to go, to Dacotah; but he goes by the advice of his physician for a temporary rest and recruiting. He has a brother there in the lumber business,—a most reputable business, certainly; and, if for the summer he takes hold with him of some of the healthful branches of that employment, he may find it recruiting to both body and mind.

But the greatest wrong to Mr. Miln in all this newspaper abuse is that it persistently overlooks the real cause of his present position, and treats his misfortune of being obliged to seek a new career after having achieved success in his chosen profession as if it were the result of folly or of something worse, whereas it is the result of a brave act of sincerity. Leaving aside here the question of the right of Unity Church to have a minister who could preach in accordance with the views of the majority of its members, and leaving aside the question of the breadth and profundity of Mr. Miln's present views, the simple central fact in his action is this: after having achieved a most honorable success in the ministry and reached a pulpit which is one of the most prominent and influential in the Unitarian denomination, with an assured salary of five or six thousand dollars, at a moment when everything looked prosperous before him, he gave it all up, because he could not keep it and be true to his convictions. There is no question that he was in this action loyal to his conscience. The temptations must have been strong for him to hold his position. He could easily have done it by keeping back some of his new views and conforming a little to the conventional standards of the pulpit, where the conflict came with his conscience, as many ministers do. If he had thus held on, though at the cost of his intellectual honesty, he would have been called a successful preacher. But because he was too true for that,—because with sincere, manly resolution he let go the prize he had won, and, though nearing middle life with a family to support, stepped out again into the field of the world's competition to find for himself a new occupation whereby he might earn his bread and keep an honest conscience,—for this he is called a failure and treated with ridicule and abuse. Shame upon the press that thus meanly follows with reproaches a man whom sincerity has compelled to such sacrifices! Shame upon the press that thus makes its praise a premium on insincerity in the pulpit! And this is the kind of reward that the free press of America is offering for a brave and noble action of fidelity to conviction.

WM. J. POTTER.

CHARACTERISTICS OF TRANSITIONAL PERIODS.

This is emphatically a period of transition. Such periods are invariably marked by inconsistencies of belief and conduct. The foundations of the old are unsettled before those of the new are established. From the decay of old beliefs and the abandonment of old methods, accompanied with glimpses of new truths and attempts to construct new systems, results an intellectual interregnum, a temporary chaos, from which emerge new philosophies and faiths. The change with some individuals is rapid, and the adjustment to new conditions often imperfect; while with others the change is gradual, the thought assented to is assimilated, and the development from the old to the new is an harmonious growth. Men cannot break away suddenly from their acquired beliefs and inherited tendencies, nor can they wholly resist the thought and tendency of their time. The popular beliefs always embody the forms of the traditions and superstitions of the past, while they contain more or less of the substance of the thought of the present, which percolates rapidly down through the lower intellectual strata. Thought that is new is partially assimilated, and expressed in a phraseology that belongs to the past. On the other hand, old thought is presented in phraseology that is new, carrying with it, by the implication of the words, meanings that could not have been understood in earlier times. The historic connection of thought and of language is thus maintained in conformity with the law of evolution, which manifests itself not less in the realm of mind than in the world of physical causation; but the adherents of the old order of things are often shocked, and those of the new as often provoked by the inconsistencies and anomalies involved in the transition.

It is unavoidable in times like these that men who substantially agree should dispute about terms, and that others who widely differ in their theoretical views should be in practical sympathy with one another; for many who have outgrown ancestral beliefs retain a reverent regard for the names and symbols of the past, while others who have been unable to cast aside speculative beliefs, the conditions of which came to them as a birthright and the germs of which were implanted in their minds in early youth, have nevertheless imbibed much of the liberal, catholic, and cosmopolitan spirit of the age. We find broad, generous, honest men, with no belief whatever in supernaturalism of any kind, who yet insist on classing themselves among Christians, and others who admit the truth of large portions of the Christian system, or who are largely influenced by its ecclesiastical methods and dominated by its doctrinal spirit, yet scornfully repudiate its name. Thus, we see that the past everywhere asserts itself. The influence of the dead is greater than the influence of the living.

The advanced leaders of organizations representing decaying beliefs endeavor to secure contact with modern thought and affiliation with modern thinkers by encouraging identification with them of minds who can teach the new science without offensively assailing the old faith; and organizations which are the outgrowths of modern thought maintain their connection with the past by a not less cordial welcome to their platform of nominal representatives of the old faith, who are known to be largely in sympathy with the liberal philosophy and spirit of the day.

The result is that the old organizations through their organs and representatives give expression to a large amount of the most advanced thought of the day; while it must be confessed that the new organizations, through their exponents, encourage much of the thought as well as the terminology that is closely allied to, and indeed is a part of, the superstition of the past. Since the most temporizing exponents of modern thought and the most cautious and compromising statements of its meanings and implications are likely to have the largest number of adherents, the tendency is to discourage boldness of expression and a fearless presentation of the most radical thought, and therefore to promote similarity between the old and the new. The immediate success of liberal organizations depends upon this compromise. Hence, the tendency of radical organizations to become conservative, even while conservative organizations are becoming radical. One of the effects is to drive away from organizations the best minds, the pioneers of science, philosophy, and progress, the fearless and honest thinkers, those who are clear, consistent, and direct, regardless of an unreasoning and unreasonable public sentiment, and to force them to work in their own individual way, which is rarely approved or appreciated until they are dead. Fortunately, minds of this type have, with the courage of their convictions, strength of character and singleness of purpose, that enable them to pursue the even tenor of their way, undisturbed by the inappreciation of those who cannot understand them, and unembittered toward those who understand them, but lack the moral courage to give them the credit and honor to which their unswerving loyalty to truth entitles them. To this class belong Darwin and Emerson,—Darwin, the calm, candid, original, systematic thinker and discoverer, who more than any other man of the century has revolutionized fundamental theological beliefs, while presenting a noble example of unostentatious pursuit of knowledge; and Emerson, the seer, who had woven in his nature generations of intellectual and moral culture, and who, in his fragmentary but unique manner, gave to the world, in poetry and prose, all the best thought and noblest aspiration that he and his ancestors had experienced. Such men rise above organizations; and the powerful and far-reaching influences which they exert modify the largest organizations, from which are evolved in consequence others in adaptation to the more advanced conditions that result from enlarged knowledge.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

In the Secular Review (London), Mr. H. G. Atkinson, the intimate friend of Harriet Martineau and co-writer with her of "Letters on Man's Nature and Development," has an article to correct certain mistakes concerning Miss Martineau's religious position made by the late Mr. Greg, as published in his posthumous essays. Mr. Greg says: "She began as a Unitarian of the driest and most dogmatic form, and ended life as an enthusiastic agnostic. She began as a disciple of Belsham, and finished as a disciple of Comte." To this, Mr. Atkinson replies:—

Miss Martineau was not a disciple of Comte, but ignored his religion altogether, as exhibiting, with much other writing, a morbid turn in the progress of his mind. . . . It is not correct to say that Miss Martineau ended as "an enthusiastic agnostic." She was a positive philosopher, in the Baconian sense of nature as an eternal verity, and in its substance and power the source of all effects and of all forms of life, and of the abstract idea of the fundamental cause in nature, personified as God, including not a mere negation, as Mr. Greg says, but "a creed—not an atheism—as firmly held as doctrines which take martyrs to the stake; and, moreover, seemingly as joyous as any which ever brightened the last hours of an intelligent and a beautiful career." A preacher of Comtism Miss Martineau was not, nor of what is understood as agnosticism. Her faith rested on the Rock of Ages, not on the doubtful and shifting sand-heap. She believed firmly in philosophy, founded on science, as the source of all progress of rational beings.

It is to be hoped that Dr. Newman Smyth will be settled somewhere before very long. What between professorships, lectureships, and pastorates that are offered to him, the problem of his physical whereabouts is likely to become as confusing as that of his theological. It seems that there is some prospect that he may go to Andover yet, though he declines the appointment of lecturer for a year. The Independent explains the situation thus:—

As we understand the case, it was the desire of the trustees, as soon as they found that the visitors had rejected Dr. Smyth, to adopt the suggestion of the Congregationalist, and provide a new endowment, on which a man could be supported who should not be under the control of the visitors. While making their plans and seeing if it would be possible to raise the fifty thousand dollars required, they wished to hold Dr. Smyth and make, if possible, a temporary arrangement. The temporary arrangement he declines; but it is now hoped, we understand, that the necessary amount will be raised, and that Dr. Smyth will be able to go to Andover on a basis that not even the Ambidexterous Congregationalist, which now cuffs the Creed with one hand and now Dr. Smyth with the other, can object to. Then the Abbot professorship can be filled by the candidate of the New Hampshire Journal, the Rev. Mr. Jasper, of Richmond, Va.

APROPOS of the Dr. Smyth case, the Christian Union further says that, when he was nominated professor, applications from students in colleges for the Andover seminary catalogue and for other information concerning the school were numerous; that, when the nomination was rejected, these applications ceased, and that on his temporary appointment as lecturer they were renewed. Thus, this alternate connecting and disconnecting of Dr. Smyth's name with Andover seems to be a kind of barometer of the theological condition of the clerically inclined young men in the colleges. The Christian Union adds:—

Perhaps nothing has shown the blindness of some of the gentlemen who attempt to manage the affairs of our seminaries so forcibly as the objection lodged against Professor Smyth by an eminent theological professor, that he was still an "inquirer," a "seeker after truth," and not the exponent of a perfectly settled system. Unless seminaries study the wants and sentiments of the young men whom they hope to fit for the ministry, they will discover too late that the "inquirer" and "truth-seeker" is precisely the man for whom the really valuable young men of the country are looking, and they will gather about such a man wherever they can find him, as they have done ever since the days of Socrates.

BISHOP HUNTINGTON, in two articles in the Independent on Emerson, which, as a whole, may be said to be appreciative, but with a good deal of reserve, is too consistent with his creed to try to make out that Emerson was a Christian. The article says:—

Not a few of his virtues were those of a Greek Stoic. As his ethical teaching was cosmopolitan and ethnic and not avowedly due to Christianity, so his temper and conduct were moulded upon principles belonging to universal morality, and not distinctively to the Gospel or Kingdom of Christ. It seems to us a grievous defect in the generosity of his spirit that he did not with emphasis acknowledge his own indebtedness and that of the world to the supreme and sole moral perfection of Jesus, Son of God and Son of Man. . . . It is easy enough to make the term Christianity synonymous with general goodness, and then to affirm that every good man is a Christian believer, and to whimper or groan if everybody does not assent to this confusion of ideas and abuse of language.

But Dr. Huntington's definition of Christianity is evidently not the above, but is given in the following sentence:—

If it means a visible society, drawing all its vitality from the person of Jesus Christ, adored as the only Son of God and Saviour of mankind, forever rooted and centred in him, a Spiritual Kingdom, having a constitution, laws, and officers of administration, held together by definable principles or a creed, then the case appears to be otherwise.

What Emerson did as a revolutionizer of Unitarian thought Dr. Huntington well indicates in the following paragraph:—

Till about the time of Emerson's graduation, the College at Cambridge followed, as its masters in psychology and ethics, Locke and Priestley and Paley rather than Cudworth and More and their Continental companions. The systems of expediency, empiricism, and common-sense, so-called, ruled without much question. There were always exceptions, and even those who held to those systems failed to see by what easy steps their disciples might be led into sheer materialism and the worship of the senses. So far as that danger was avoided, it was largely by an escape from philosophic thought into the regions of an intense dogmatical or emotional evangelical piety. More than any other one man, Mr. Emerson, in his thinking, writing, and lecturing, faced this downward, sensuous tendency, exposed its hollowness and barrenness, and resisted it. Asserting the value of man's moral and spiritual intuitions, drawing largely upon Kant's Critique, looking steadily into his own clear soul, and by no means disinheriting himself of the ancestral devotion which had burned in the hearts of eight generations of godly ministers in his own family, he reported what he saw and spoke what he believed. To the end of his earthly days, he delivered unceasingly and eloquently his message of anti-materialism. Through all his utterances, on all platforms, as the speaker at numberless anniversaries and celebrations, there runs this fine vein of serene spirituality.

THE Presbyterian gives us this truthful tidbit:—

The immediate cause of Ralph Waldo Emerson's leaving the Unitarian pulpit, where in early life he preached, was his refusal to administer the communion. He did not believe in the duty of thus commemorating the death of Christ, and the command "Do this" had no authority to him.

TO MEMBERS AND FRIENDS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association beg leave to call your attention to the plan of work adopted at the annual meeting, held in Boston, June 1 and 2, and incorporated in the report of the same printed elsewhere in this paper.

In accordance with this action of the Association, it becomes our immediate duty to appeal for contributions to the fund of at least $2,000, which it is deemed wise to raise for putting this plan into effect.

Cash subscriptions or pledges, large or small, may be forwarded to the Secretary at the office of The Index, or to the Treasurer, John C. Haynes, 451 Washington Street, Boston. Upon the sum placed at our disposal will depend the character and amount of the work to be done.

There are earnest men and women throughout the land to whom life is sweeter, truer, diviner, because of the ideas for which Free Religion stands. Many such have large means, many more have a competence; and all feel, we are sure, a desire to help carry to other souls the glad tidings which have come to their own.

We not only solicit, therefore, but we look forward with confidence to an early and a favorable response to this appeal.

For the Committee,

WM. J. POTTER,

President.

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,

Secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

It is rather consoling after Mr. Matthew Arnold's recent patronizing and contemptuous diatribe on America and American culture to find another Englishman—whose opinion Americans, as a class, will value more highly than Mr. Arnold's, namely, John Bright—recommending the study of American writers to English readers, particularly emphasizing Whittier and Bancroft as among the best of our poets and historians.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, Jr., David A. Wells, W. G. Sumner, and A. L. Perry have petitioned Congress to remove the tariff duties from woollen goods instead of abolishing the tax on bank-checks. Among the reasons they give is that the tax on bank-checks is paid chiefly by those who are abundantly able to pay it; while the duties on woollen blankets, which are from seventy-four to ninety-two per cent., increase the burdens of the poor, who are so constituted that "it takes just as many blankets to cover them and their offspring on cold nights as it does the rich."

TO AN inquiry whether Emerson and Longfellow were "indeed unbelievers in the Christian religion," the editor of the New York Sun in a leading editorial replied as follows: "We answer that Mr. Emerson and Mr. Longfellow were unbelievers in the Christian religion. The essence of belief in the Christian religion is belief in the Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Without the Godhead of the Christ, there is no real Christianity. It is true there is a sort of doctrine which many people fancy to be Christian; and, according to this doctrine, Jesus Christ was not God, but a creature, a man, or a created being somewhat superior to man. But this is not the doctrine of the Christian religion. It is a foe of Christianity. It is a station on the broad road to total unbelief, to infidelity. This sort of doctrine we understand to have been the doctrine of Emerson and Longfellow. They were Unitarians. They were not believers in the Christian religion."

SAYS the Jewish Watchman: "At the Paris Academy of Moral and Political Sciences on April 1, a paper was read by Dr. Lagneau on the statistics of births among Protestants, Catholics, and Jews in different countries. In Prussia, Baden, and especially in France, the rate of increase of population is smallest among the Catholics. In Tuscany and Hesse, on the contrary, the rate of increase is highest among the Catholics. In Prussia, Baden, and France, again, the rate of increase is markedly higher among Protestants than among Catholics. In France, though they only increase half as fast as the Jews, they multiply at three times the rate of the Catholics. Generally speaking, the respective increase of Catholics, Protestants, and Jews in Europe is in the proportion one, two, and three. The birth-rate of Catholics, however, is in different countries, especially in Russia and Tuscany, higher than that of Protestants and Jews. The birth-rate of the Jews is lower than that of the Protestants and Catholics in Russia, France, Baden, and Tuscany, and several other countries, and equal to that of the Protestants in Prussia, and higher than that of the other inhabitants in Austria-Hungary and Roumania. Illegitimate births show in general little difference as between the Protestants and Catholics, but the illegitimate birth-rate of the Jews is much lower than that of other inhabitants. Thus, the Jews have fewer children than the Catholics and Protestants, but keep more of them alive. As regards the proportion of boys and girls born, it is among the Protestants and Catholics one hundred and five to one hundred. In Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Hungary, the proportion is as high as from one hundred to one hundred and thirty boys to one hundred girls. Dr. Lagneau, by way of explanation, refers to the fact that Jews, as a rule, marry at an earlier age than Protestants and Catholics."

THE Fifteenth Anniversary of the Free Religious Association was celebrated at Parker Memorial Hall in this city, on the evening of Thursday, June 1, with morning, afternoon, and evening sessions on Friday, June 2. All the meetings were full of interest and largely attended; although a little disappointment was felt in the unavoidable absence, through illness, of Col. T. W. Higginson. All the other speakers promised, however, were on hand, with a number of unexpected but very welcome ones. Thursday evening's meeting was devoted to business. Mr. J. W. Potter was elected President of the Association, and Mr. F. H. Hinckley Secretary. A board of officers and directors was chosen, and the work of the Association for the coming year laid out. Friday forenoon, the speakers were W. J. Potter, Felix Adler, Rev. S. J. Stewart of Bangor, Me., and A. B. Alcott of Concord. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity with an attentive and appreciative audience. The afternoon speakers were W. M. Salter of Brooklyn, N.Y., Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Rev. E. C. Towne, and B. F. Underwood. The evening meeting was a kind of social reunion, prefaced with an hour devoted to brief addresses from different speakers, interspersed with singing by Miss Lucy Garlin's delightful Euterpe Club, a quartette of young ladies, with well-drilled, charming voices. Among the evening speakers were Fred. H. Hinckley, Bronson Alcott, Miss Mary F. Eastman, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, and Capt. R. C. Adams, son of Rev. Nehemiah Adams, who spoke wittily, wisely, and well. All the speeches of the evening were sparkling and animated, and the appearance of the two well-known and talented ladies on a Free Religious platform was greeted with applause. The singing was repeatedly encored, the lavish display of floral decorations was arranged in excellent taste, and the exercises were voted in every way a success. A bust of Emerson, with its base buried in the crimson blossoms of the rhodora, a favorite flower of the poet, was conspicuously displayed on the right of the speaker's desk; while at the left, wreathed in flowers hung a life-like picture of the late Samuel Johnson. References were made at all the sessions, by different speakers, to the loss sustained by the Association in the death of these two notable members. Mr. Alcott dwelt feelingly on the death of Emerson; and Mr. Potter read Mr. F. M. Holland's pathetic little poem, written for Emerson's birthday, and published in last week's Index, to which the presence of the rhodora adorning the poet's bust lent an added though mournful interest. Very many notable speakers and writers were present at the meeting, so many that it would be invidious to name any. The new speaker on our platform, Rev. S. J. Stewart, spoke vigorously and unmistakably, and made an excellent impression. On the whole, the Association has reason to congratulate itself on the success of the celebration of its Fifteenth Anniversary, the proceedings of which, with the speeches made, will appear in full in The Index.

THERE is a great deal of unmapped country within us, which would have to be taken into account in an explanation of our gusts and storms.—George Eliot.

Faithfulness.

Fade not away, O sunlight! only gained
By tolling upward through long, weary hours,
Remain until life's beaker we have drained,
Then pass with me to super-sensuous bowers!
Groping in doubt, 'mid dark and discontent,
My days in seeming useless strivings passed,
What if my light, late found, from heaven be rent,
Nor wait my closer coming, o'er the vast!
O Sun, be faithful! for all speed I make
To lessen distance 'twixt thy self and mine:
I'll laugh at shadows now, for thy sweet sake,
And overcome all but shall keep me thine,
And count as nought but gain the vanquished hours of Time!

Unforgotten.

A picture always graces Memory's halls
Of one who crossed my wand'rings o'er earth's strand,
Who won distinction in fair Freedom's cause,
And should claim title at her grateful hand!
A scholar with a poet-soul is he,
Who blends this mundane with his astral lore,
Who notes the constellations' music-chime,
But keeps his feet upon terrestrial shore.
The electric thrill when co-respondents meet,
Rhythmic with unexplained, yet constant law,
Is but the fulfilled circuit of the clock
Whose poles, responsive, touch and then withdraw
With spark and power,—epitome of Universal Law!

FAUNS.

For The Index.

Yes, man was wild in some gone time
Far back in nature's savage prime,
And cave-roofed pricked a furry ear
At sound of foe or peril near;
And still the spell of lonely wood
Wakens the faun or satyr rude
In the sophisticated breast,
Which civilization has opprest
With weary weight of fopperies vain.

Who would not be a faun again,
Heedless of wind and dew and rain,
A citizen of out-of-doors,
Blivouacking on the forest floors,
Knowing the speech of birds and leaves,
With moon for lamp and boughs for eaves,
A tenant of the open air,
Not yet arrived at thought and care,
Dappled with shade of wildwood trees,
Footing it in the sylvan breeze,
With beauteous maiden fountain-born
Or dryad ruddy as the morn?

EARTH AND ART.

The bondage of the winter way
Doth ever come again
To claim thee after fruitage day
Of all of earth and men.

And round and round, across Endeavor,
The circling seasons dart,
And from ourselves all things dis sever
That answer not to Art.

And Art's attempted soul expression,
Emotion blossom-dressed,
Hath ever Springtide's fair possession,
Embossomed and at rest.

The Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 8, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association,
June 1 and 2, 1882.

The annual meeting of the Free Religious Association opened, as usual, with the business session. This was held on Thursday evening, June 1, in the Fraternity Hall of the Parker Memorial Building. It was called to order at 8 o'clock by the Secretary, and in the absence of the President, who had telegraphed that he was unable to reach Boston in season, Mr. Charles H. Codman was chosen chairman pro tem.

The record of the last meeting was read by the Secretary, and accepted. Mr. John C. Haynes, Treasurer, presented his report for the year as follows:—

BOSTON, June 1, 1882.

Voted, That the Report be accepted.

The Annual Report of the Executive Committee was then read by the Secretary.

Report of the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee present herewith their Fifteenth Annual Report.

The relations between the corporate Trustees of The Index and the Free Religious Association remain the same as were announced last year. The plan established has thus far worked harmoniously and to entire satisfaction. The expenses of the office, 3 Tremont Place, are shared equally between The Index Trustees and the Association, and also the salary of the clerk at the office. One change has occurred in the Board of Trustees. Mrs. E. D. Cheney's term of service having expired, she declined a reelection; and Miss Helen M. Ireson was nominated by the committee in her place, and the selection confirmed by the Trustees. As the President of the Trustees is required by the By-laws of the Board to present to the annual meeting of the Association a report on the general condition of The Index, no further mention of its affairs need be made here.

We have in this report chiefly to give the results of a certain definite line of action which we were directed to follow by resolutions passed at the last annual meeting. It was then voted, "That, in order to obtain the preliminary knowledge necessary to more effective work, the Executive Committee be instructed to select and appoint some able and zealous member of the Association, so far as possible, from each State, to act as local correspondent." It was further voted that these State correspondents be furnished with a list of questions to be answered, relating to legal restrictions upon religious liberty, sectarian influences in education, social conditions as affecting free thought, and the conditions in respect to liberal religious organization in their respective States, and that a midwinter conference should be appointed, at which their answers to these questions should be presented, together with such supplementary report on similar matters as might be prepared by a General Agent of the Association, if one were to be employed. At this Conference, a special committee, appointed at the annual meeting to consider and, if possible, devise some plan of increased activity for making the work of the Association more national and more effective, was also to present their report.

The Executive Committee, accordingly, at their first meeting, directly after the annual meeting, appointed a sub-committee to have charge of the selection of State correspondents and the preparation of the questions to which it was desirable to secure answers. This was a work, particularly the proper selection of correspondents, which required considerable time, and for which the summer vacation months were not favorable. For this reason, it was not until the latter part of October that the plan was so far completed as to be put into operation. Correspondents were appointed for twenty-one States; namely, the six New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Arkansas, Colorado, California, and Oregon. From sixteen of these, reports more or less complete were received. The correspondent selected for New York was obliged to decline on account of broken health, and his place was but partially supplied by others. The correspondents who accepted the appointments for Iowa, Missouri, Colorado, and Oregon, failed to send their answers. Efforts were made to secure correspondents in several other States, but without success; and, after the failure to secure them in several of the border Southern States, it was not deemed worth while to make the attempt at present any further in that direction. The correspondents selected were not in every case voting members of the Association. The aim was to secure always persons of substantial character, competent knowledge, and sound judgment. And where these qualifications were believed to exist, together with interest in the general principles and aims of the Association, and persons exhibited that interest by willingness to undertake the work, it was deemed that the requirement of the resolution authorizing the appointment of the correspondents, that they should be members of the Association, was sufficiently met under the clause in the Constitution defining general membership without the function of voting. It was judged desirable, too, that the correspondents should represent various phases of liberal thought; and, as a matter of fact, those chosen range all the way from the Liberal who thinks that the word "religion" is only a synonyme of superstition and wrong to those who are still acting to some extent in harmony with the regular organizations of liberal religious sects. Evidently, the reports received might thus lose somewhat of that unity which depends on the observers all looking from one point of view; but the loss in this respect, it was believed, would be more than compensated by this actual representation of the differences in Liberalism, since due note of this fact is one of the preliminary conditions in any just consideration of the problem of more effective organization, and since no plan of organization can be considered as consistently successful in the line of the Free Religious movement which does not bring into working unity as many as possible of these thought-differences. The questions sent by printed circular to these correspondents covered a wide range, and could not all be answered without giving to them a good deal of time and careful inquiry. The date of the Conference therefore at which the answers were to be reported, though named in the resolutions as "midwinter," was at first fixed for the latter part of February. But circumstances compelled a still further delay, so that the Conference was not actually held till the 28th of March. It should here be said that the thanks of the Association are eminently due to the correspondents for the thorough and conscientious manner with which for the most part they performed their gratuitous tasks; and, if the State correspondents are to be continued, no better appointments perhaps can be made than the majority of those already existing.

The reports received from these correspondents were too voluminous to be read entirely at the Conference. Nor was there occasion to read the whole, since to a considerable extent, particularly in regard to constitutional and legal provisions affecting free thought, there is a close resemblance among them; and, in other aspects, groups of contiguous States are much alike. Selections, accordingly, were made among them for reading, so as to give fair samples of them in the aggregate. A brief summary of results drawn from them may, however, here be given.

1. With regard to constitutional and legal provisions that concern freedom of thought, it is evidently the intent of the State constitutions in general to protect religious liberty. They start out with conspicuous assertion of the rights of individual conscience in all matters of religion. But, from a failure to see the full extent of the application of this principle, the statute books follow with equally conspicuous violation of the assertion; and, in the constitutions themselves, it is common, in immediate connection with the assertion of the rights of private opinion and conscience, to find positive theological affirmations which discriminate in favor of the opinions of one portion of the citizens against those of another. For instance, the Constitution of Connecticut says, "It being the duty of all men to worship the Supreme Being, the Great Creator and Preserver of the Universe, and their right to render that worship in the mode most consistent with the dictates of their consciences, no person shall by law be compelled to join or support or be classed with or associated to any congregation, church, or religious association." Here, the conclusion seems to be all that could be asked in behalf of freedom of thought and conscience, but it is not at least the logical expectation excited by the theology affirmed in the opening premise. Nor does Connecticut's statute, exempting church property from taxation, and thereby compelling all tax-payers, whether they will or not, indirectly to support the churches, appear logically to harmonize with the plain constitutional assertion that "no person shall by law be compelled to join or support any congregation, church, or religious association." And this is a sample of the inconsistency between the evident intent of the State constitutions in general in respect to religious liberty and the manner in which the intent is carried into execution. In some of the recently organized States, freedom of conscience is better guarded in form as well as substance. But, in most of the States, while it is meant to secure the equal rights of opinion and conscience, there are sections of the constitutions and laws that do discriminate unfairly against these rights in some classes of citizens. These laws in many cases have been outgrown by public opinion, and are not enforced; but they are on the statute books, and may be, and sometimes are, resuscitated in a way that works gross practical injustice. And, of both the constitutions and laws in these particulars, it should be said that they are survivals of a time when the religious opinions of citizens ranged through much narrower limits than now, and that, in the interest of common veracity, sincerity, and justice, it is full time there were a revised edition of both the constitutions and the statutes, from which all theological and sectarian discrimination shall be thoroughly eliminated.

2. The reports of the correspondents show that, while sectarianism is weakening, there is still not a little of its spirit and power manifest in the management of the public schools and in the composition of some of the text-books and singing-books used in them, and also in certain general social conditions that tend to debar persons of pronounced unpopular liberal views in religion from places of public position and influence which otherwise they would be likely to hold. A portion of this kind of sectarian control could be reached and removed by a revision of the laws; but largely it is a matter that is only to be remedied by a general enlightenment and liberalization of public opinion.

3. The conditions in respect to liberal religious organization are shown by the responses of the correspondents to be quite different in different States, though here especially some allowance must be made for the difference in the point of view from which the correspondents look, as before mentioned. It may be said, however, that, while from some of the States the conditions are not reported as appearing favorable to any enterprise in behalf of the organization of Liberals, there is hardly one of the correspondents who does not speak of his or her belief (some of the most efficient of the correspondents are women) in a large amount of latent liberalism of thought, and who does not express a wish at least that some efficient plan might be found for bringing it into cooperative activity. In general, the reports are favorable to attempts of some kind toward a more systematic organization of the liberal sentiment of the country, without, however, indicating the methods for effecting this. In a few of the States, the conditions are represented as thoroughly ripe for an organizing movement, and all that is wanted is a few leaders to point the way, and rally the people who are all ready to supply the material of the new societies. The States where the conditions are reported as most ready for organization are, in the East, Maine, Massachusetts, and the western portion of New York; and, in the West, Michigan and Kansas. In the two latter States there appears to be a special receptivity to liberal religious ideas, and a good deal of activity is already awakened in the direction of local organization,—in Michigan, largely under the auspices of a very liberal form of Unitarianism; and in Kansas, under an association recently formed, called the Liberal Union, which is an attempt to solve the problem of uniting in local work and fellowship all the different phases of Liberalism.

One session of the March Conference was devoted to a consideration of the report made by the special committee appointed at the last annual meeting to devise, if feasible, some plan of increased activity for making the work of the Free Religious Association more national and more effective. That committee made an elaborate report, ably and earnestly presented by its chairman, Mrs. Spencer. The report has been printed in The Index; and the resolutions embodying the plan of organized activity which the committee recommended, together with the votes of the Conference upon them, have also been printed in a circular, and sent to all members whose addresses were known, and will be circulated among the members at this meeting. It is therefore unnecessary to repeat here the resolutions or the action of the Conference concerning them. The whole matter, by the vote appointing the committee, comes from the Conference before the Association again for further action at this annual meeting. As the statement of the votes of the Conference, printed in the circular, shows, there was then a nearly equal division of opinion on some important points in the committee's recommendations, and since there is the same division of opinion, though perhaps the sides may not be so nearly equal, in the Executive Committee, it is manifestly impossible that this report (which is the report of the Executive Committee) should give the committee's judgment on the question. As it must needs be a divided judgment, it is not deemed important nor desirable that they should express their individual opinions as members of the committee, nor make any recommendation on the question upon which even a majority might unite; but they are content to leave the whole matter where it was properly left by the Association last year,—to the judgment of the annual meeting,—with only the expression of the hope that some course of action may be found which shall command the united support of our membership. But even if the way does not appear to open freely as yet for that increase of organized activity which has now been under discussion among us for several years,—so long, perhaps, that some members are becoming impatient of it as impairing the dignity and usefulness of the Association in the ways in which it has been wont to work,—this condition of things does not necessarily betoken that the Association is nearing the limit of its career or that it is incapable of adapting itself to the new demands that may be made upon it. Its organic form was designedly made as simple and free as possible, that it might be accessible to the tides of new thought and ever open to the inspiration of fresh impulses for human benefit. It has never aimed to shape the free religious movement, but rather to hold itself shapable by it. The fifteen years since the Association was organized have certainly brought important changes in the aspects of the religious world. The discussions with regard to increased organization now are somewhat similar to those that occurred then concerning any organization at all. The conditions existing then were met, certainly, with tolerable wisdom; and the organization that came found a sufficient field, and has had a sufficient success to justify its coming. Let us not despair that the new conditions which may have arisen will also be successfully met. If the Association to any one has seemed slow to heed the new conditions, let this be set down to its care not to foreclose the ways of natural evolution and growth by extemporizing organizations before the time of healthful vitality has arrived. Possibly, the caution has been excessive, and is in danger of becoming chronic. Yet possibly, too, the opportunities are ripening for work in directions not yet much considered, but which ere-long will appear so clear as to command our united approval and support. Certainly, during the past year, though we have held no conventions, aside from the annual meeting and conference, nor arranged any courses of lectures, there has been shown an increasing interest in the Association on the part of persons who have not previously manifested any interest in it or even known of its existence. As illustrating this statement, it may be said that within the last few weeks the Secretary has received letters from a Universalist minister, from an Orthodox Congregationalist minister, and from an ex-Presbyterian minister and doctor of divinity, all expressing full sympathy with the objects and principles of the Association. While new friends are thus just discovering our cause and coming as fresh recruits to our standard, it is not for the veterans of the cause to show that they carry the standard with any less vigorous or believing grasp.

And at this time especially we have great memories to encourage us. Renowned names that have been closely connected with the Free Religious Association and its cause, and that will long linger on our reverent lips and abide in our grateful hearts, death has now lifted from our side. Ten years ago, Ralph Waldo Emerson, with his full and cordially expressed consent, was elected a Vice-President of the Association,—the number of Vice-Presidents at that time being enlarged to make the list more widely representative,—and ever since his name has stood at the head of the list. Nor was this with him merely an honorary expression of interest. For one who stood in general so independent of organizations, this Association had in an exceptional manner his sympathies. He was one of the speakers at the crowded meeting in Horticultural Hall, 1867, when the Association was organized, and, at the close of the meeting, was one of the first to come to the Secretary's table to have his name enrolled as a member. He has given his thought by lecture or address several times on our platform, and rarely missed attending the annual meeting. And, what is of infinitely more importance than these details, the whole aim and purport of his life's work was the emancipation of religion from bondage to creed, tradition, and conventional authority. More than any other one person, he may be said to have originated the Free Religious movement in this country. The Free Religious Association is one of the products of his vitalizing thought, and his name must ever remain engraved in letters of ineffaceable light on its chief cornerstone. A few weeks before Mr. Emerson, Samuel Johnson died. Though never nominally a member of the Free Religious Association, he was through all his life such a brave, consistent worker for free and universal religion that he belonged preëminently to the movement which the Association has aimed to represent. By voice and pen, he was ever ready to respond to any calls which our committee made upon him, and he appeared with his wise words so frequently at our conventions that we never noted any defect in his title to membership. His ideas, his various work as preacher, lecturer, and philanthropist, and the noble volumes he has left on the Oriental religions, are all in the direction of the goal toward which this Association moves. And, across the Atlantic, we may reckon Darwin, too, as among the now "starred" leaders of the free religious movement. Who more than he has been laboring for the effectual removal of erroneous and superstitious theologies, and the disclosure to men's eyes of the pure, actual truth of things as the only safe basis not only of science, but of religion and morality? And Darwin, in the midst of his assiduous labors for science, showed a special interest in the principles and objects for which this Association stands. He was a reader and financial helper of The Index for years, and, as a letter from one of his sons just received says, continued his appreciative regard for the weekly coming of the paper up to the time of his death.

Representing as we do in this Association a cause which has won the fealty of such men as these, it should be our aim and our pride to make the Association worthy of their memories. And we cannot better close this report than by quoting some of the closing sentences of Emerson's speech at the meeting when the Free Religious Association came into existence: "Pure doctrine always bears fruit in pure benefit. It is only by good works, it is only on the basis of active duty, that worship finds expression. What is best in the ancient religions was the sacred friendships between heroes, the sacred bands, as in the relations of the Pythagorean disciples. . . . I wish that the various beneficent institutions, which are springing up, like joyful plants of wholesomeness, all over this country, should all be remembered as within the sphere of this body,—almost all of them are represented here,—and that within this little band that has gathered to-day should grow friendship. The interests that grow out of a meeting like this should bind us with new strength to the old eternal duties."

Voted, That the report be accepted.

Messrs. R. P. Hallowell, W. H. Hamlen, and D. H. Clark were appointed a Committee to take names of members and collect membership fees among those present.

The President of the Board of Index Trustees, Mr. Potter, reported concerning the changes that had been made in the editorial and business management of The Index within the year, the enlargement of its list of contributors, the improvements in the make-up of the paper, and its general financial condition. The situation was represented as pecuniarily encouraging. The subscription list had increased sixty per cent. since the paper had come under the auspices of the Free Religious Association. There had not, however, as yet been a proportionate increase of receipts, since the new subscribers of the last six months were mostly trial subscribers on the offer of the paper six months for one dollar. These were beginning to renew, and the prospect was hopeful. Members of the Association, however, were urged to feel their personal responsibility to subscribe for the paper and to secure other subscribers, and so to increase its circulation as not only to spread more widely the truths it represents, but also to insure its permanent financial success.

The report from the Conference of the Association held on March 28 was presented in printed form (as already published in The Index), and circulated among the members.

Voted, That the report be accepted and taken up for consideration.

Mr. F. A. Hinckley moved a substitute for the recommendations made in the report, the substitute covering, with some revision, all the resolutions on which the Conference was united, and omitting wholly those resolutions on which the vote of the Conference was divided.

Voted, unanimously, That the substitute be accepted for consideration in place of the original report, and that its resolutions be taken up singly for action.

This being done, the resolutions, with some verbal amendments, were all unanimously adopted, and as adopted are as follows:—

Resolved, That this Association herewith instructs its Secretary, acting with the advice and consent of the Executive Committee to superintend the following work for the ensuing year.

1. The preparation, as thorough and exact as possible from data furnished by the State correspondents and other sources, of the following memoranda of information, namely:—

(a) A complete list of the names and addresses of members of the Free Religious Association, classified according to States, towns, and cities, and a similar list of well-known persons in sympathy with the Free Religious Association, not members.

(b) A full list of organizations, State and local, whose constitution and methods are in substantial conformity with those of the Free Religious Association, with names of officers and description of form of union and of work appended to each.

(c) A brief statement of the needs and conditions of each State in relation to the Free Religious movement, compiled from the returns of the State correspondents, so far as reported.

2. Aided by these memoranda of information, the Secretary, with the advice and consent of the Executive Committee, shall choose not less than two (2) nor more than six (6) States, which in their opinion present the most favorable conditions for the spread of our principles and thier local organization, as the immediate field of work.

3. The Secretary, or some one selected by him with the advice and consent of the Executive Committee, shall visit the selected States, and call in each, by letter and personal interview, a private conference of our members and friends, for the purpose of stimulating their interest in our cause, and urging them to pledge pecuniary and moral support sufficient to secure either a successful convention or a course of lectures by the accredited speakers of the Free Religious Association in the most promising centre of liberal thought in said States, the choice between the two methods of work being left with the Association's representative on the ground and the local friends.

4. When the local friends are unable to raise all the money necessary for this work, the Executive Committee shall be empowered to aid, in cases promising good results, as hereinafter provided.

5. The Secretary, or person representing the Association, thus visiting a State for the purposes indicated above, shall, if possible, be present and speak at the convention, if such be held, or, if the lecture course be given, shall, if possible so to arrange it, deliver the first or last lecture, and in either case shall present the principles and objects of the Free Religious Association, and the need, the possibility, and the most practicable methods of organization for State or local work.

6. In order to carry on this work for one year, it is desirable that $2,000 be raised, and the Executive Committee are hereby instructed to take immediate steps to secure that sum. And what-aver amounts shall be received for that purpose or used from the funds in the treasury shall be appropriated under the direction of the Executive Committee.

7. That the office of State correspondents be continued, and effort be made to secure one in all States not now represented by such an officer, in order that the memoranda of information be kept as complete as possible.

The amendment to the Constitution, with regard to a change in the number and tenure of office of the Directors, of which due notice had been given in the advertisement of the meeting, was presented, and adopted in lieu of the third Article by a unanimous vote. It is printed in its new form on next the last page of this paper.

The committee on the nomination of officers for the ensuing year were then called upon for their report, which was presented by their chairman, Mr. George W. Stevens, in the form of a printed ballot. It was unanimously voted that, to save time, the chairman of the committee be authorized to cast the ballot as read for the voters as a whole. The ballot was thus taken, and the following officers elected for the year 1882-83:—

President, William J. Potter, New Bedford. Vice-Presidents, Octavius B. Frothingham, Boston; Felix Adler, New York city; George W. Curtis, Staten Island, N.Y.; Edward L. Youmans, New York city; Frederick Schuenemann-Pott, San Francisco, Cal.; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Cambridge, Mass.; Elizabeth B. Chase, Providence, R.I.; George Hoadly, Cincinnati, Ohio; Nathaniel Holmes, St. Louis, Mo.; Rowland G. Hazard, Peacedale, R.I.; Bernhard Felsenthal, Chicago, Ill.; Annie L. Diggs, Lawrence, Kansas. Secretary, Frederick A. Hinckley, Providence, R.I. Assistant Secretary, Hannah E. Stevenson, 32 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston, Mass. Treasurer, John C. Haynes, 451 Washington Street, Boston, Mass. Directors (four years), B. A. Ballou, Providence, R.I.; William H. Hamlen, Boston; Anna Garlin Spencer, Florence, Mass.; (three years) Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Arthur G. Hill, Florence, Mass.; Richard P. Hallowell, Boston, Mass.; (two years) Charles D. B. Mills, Syracuse, N.Y.; John L. Whiting, Boston, Mass.; Helen M. Ireson, Lynn, Mass.; (one year) Minot J. Savage, Boston, Mass.; William C. Gannett, St. Paul, Minn.; Caroline M. Severance, Boston, Mass.

The meeting then adjourned, to assemble again on Friday, at 10.30 A.M., for the general Convention.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Editors of The Index:—

The fourteenth annual meeting of the New England Woman Suffrage Association convened at Tremont Temple, Monday evening, May 29, at half-past seven o'clock. Mrs. H. B. Blackwell (Lucy Stone), President of the Association, called the meeting to order, said she had no speech to make, and introduced Rev. Mr. Hamilton, "of the People's Church," who said that the first Woman's Rights Convention was held in Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848. The subject had been growing ever since, and would eventually triumph.

The president next introduced Mrs. Mary E. Haggart, of Indiana. The lady said the woman suffrage movement is a return to first principles. There is no sex in government. The ballot is a part of our God-given rights as human beings, and not as either men or women. The right of the ballot for all existed before there were any governments. Mrs. Haggart's address, which was quite long, had been well written and was very thoroughly committed, so that she spoke with perfect freedom, although there was a monotony in her voice that detracted a trifle from the interest of the audience.

Miss Mary F. Eastman, the next speaker, thought the cause of Woman Suffrage did not need logic now. The community is saturated with our idea; and, where we know the condition of society in a community, we know about how long it will take our cause to triumph there. The whole view of woman has been changed by our work. Whereas rich people once thought that it degraded a woman to work, now they were fast coming to believe that work, self-support, and independence gave a woman a decidedly attractive "air."

The convention continued its sessions Tuesday forenoon and afternoon, and again was called to order on Tuesday evening, at half-past seven, by Mrs. Blackwell, who introduced Miss Annie Jenness as the first speaker. The lady is quite youthful in appearance, and will doubtless become an attraction in the field of feminine politics. Her speech was long and well prepared. She described the woman suffrage work as a bloodless war of entering wedges. In reply to the charge that politics are foul and would soil woman, she said women are good at cleaning, give them a chance. She thinks the domestic life is what most women would prefer. The good true home is the place where the best work of elevation will be done. But morals and education require the united efforts of the best men and women working together, and hence there must be no political limitations or boundaries to keep them apart. As a whole, the speech was good, and was well received.

At this point of the proceedings, a resolution acknowledging the good services of R. W. Emerson and others, deceased since the last anniversary, to the cause of woman suffrage, was offered; and, after brief remarks by Mrs. Livermore, the resolution was adopted. The president then introduced Mrs. Haggart, who, in telling how the woman suffragists of "Injiannie" treated the "Mossbacks" of her State, what a defence of the cause could be found in the conduct of women of the Bible, and sundry other points, made the first wide-awake speech of the whole convention. Your correspondent was at last rejoiced that at least one person had appeared who didn't seem to be dozing under the overshadowing wing of fastidiousness. Mrs. Haggart seemed at length, after forty-eight hours' exposure to the intellectual East winds of Boston properness, to have realized that something must be done to warm the well-nigh frozen emotions of "the cause" into life again; and so she opened with a brisk breeze, full laden with the fresh, wild, free, and strong thought of the walnut forests of the Hoosier State, knocked the stilts from under presiding prudery, and woke the audience to something of the old-time enthusiasm. She thinks woman suffrage began with Eve in the Garden of Eden, when she defied the commands of the Almighty, and took upon herself the penalties of eternal damnation in order to have the freedom and privilege of knowing good from evil. She declared that, while women are admitted to the gallows and the jail and the tax, they ought not to be debarred from the ballot. As to general opposition to woman suffrage, on the ground that it was against the law of God, she thought that doubting editors, cross-roads politicians, and dyspeptic preachers did not know any more about the will of God in regard to woman than woman did herself, and that, if God really had any revelation to make on the subject, he would not choose any of those classes of men for his prophets. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore was then introduced, and she fanned the new enthusiasm into a still higher flame. To the objection that woman suffragists were trying to make themselves "manny," she replied that woman does not aim to be man. He is not her ideal. She is simply trying to be all that she can be as woman. She thought the movement was never so alert as it is to-day. The heart of woman is throbbing its life into the head of the nation. She did not care whether man was considered the head or not. She placed the two sexes together as essential and necessary parts of one complete being. Call man the head and woman the heart, neither can exist without the other. There is a duality in nature, of which this of the sexes is an illustration. The average men and women are very much alike everywhere. But it is impossible for either to be at their best without the freedom of both. She described the condition of woman in Europe, and thanked God that she was an American; and, when she realized the improved conditions of women in her own country, she could almost worship her countrymen. It was a grand speech. But it stirred up Mrs. Blackwell, who protested against the idea that American men had done anything for the freedom and elevation of woman. Yet I think the facts are altogether with Mrs. Livermore and her statement. But still I was glad to see Mrs. Blackwell aroused. It showed the audience that her fire was not dead, but "banked." Last of all, like an angel's benediction flung down from regions of bliss and beauty came the quiet, modest, sincere, thoughtful, and wise words of Mrs. Howe. I hurried away; but left my best wishes with the workers, and carried with me a conviction that the cause is a good one, and deserves all success.

THE PRACTICAL VALUE OF SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY.

Editors of The Index:—

It is astonishing how many critics have misunderstood Herbert Spencer. Some have looked upon him as a scientist instead of a philosopher. Some have represented him as a materialist, a Comtist, a disciple of Hume, etc. But, in reality, he is a philosopher in the true sense of the term, who has taken the facts furnished by many sciences, and shown that they demonstrate the truth of the evolution philosophy. He has more especially collected the facts or principles of psychology, biology, and sociology, and shown that they all lead to the truth of evolution. More especially important, in a practical view, is the fact he has demonstrated that every individual is a "unit of force, constituting, with other such units, the general power which works out great social changes," and that it is the duty of every one to give expression to his innermost convictions. He has shown very clearly that it is not right to hide our individual opinions on the plea that the masses are not ready for them. This plea, so common among intelligent liberals, is recommended by a sort of "benevolent condescension," which blinds us to the fact that we are thereby hindering the farther progress of the intelligent classes. Interchange of ideas is shown to be one of the main forces that bring about social development. Another most important practical fact demonstrated is that there is a constant current of faint and vivid ideas passing through the mind, and that these ideas are for the most part as independent of the will as the circulation of the blood; that the quality of these ideas and sentiments is dependent upon our education, the books we read, our social environment, and our inherited constitution; that, in short, "man is a product of his times and social surroundings." He shows how important it is that these currents of ideas and individual convictions to which they lean should be expressed and interchanged with others so as to get at the truth.

Another very significant fact is brought out in his Psychology; that, whenever a habit has become established, it produces an organic change in the brain, which quality is transmitted to posterity. And, if this were not a fact, indeed there could be no permanent advancement in the race. What advantage might be gained in this generation would be lost in the next. Another practical good derived from his philosophy is that every individual will feel the necessity of self-exertion and of mutual help toward social development by means of clubs, social meetings, and conventions. As a philosopher, Spencer has reconciled, or rather explained, the differences between the old metaphysicians: that Berkeley was partly right in asserting that our senses are deceptive; that Hume was wrong in ascribing all knowledge to individual experience, losing sight of those intuitions or innate tendencies of thought and feeling which are so conspicuous; that Kant was right in recognizing these intuitions or "forms of thought" as not derived from individual experience, but that Kant failed to see they were the product of the experience of ancestors. These innate tendencies or "forms of thought" Spencer shows very clearly are the result of organic changes in the brain, caused by the experiences and long-continued habits of ancestors.

FORCE AND MIND.

An answer to Subscriber's query in "The Index" May 11.

Editors of The Index:—

To separate matter and force into two different entities, and to subdivide these into various elements and certain different processes, are useful metaphysical arrangements which enable us to learn something of the universe, yet show how difficult it is for us to understand it all.

Such artificial classifications owe doubtless their origin to the high specialization of our senses, each of which gives admittance to an entirely different set of natural phenomena, without any intermediate ones. But in the amoeba, sensitive without special senses, we have reason to think that all external irritations which do not differ in degree must appear alike to that animal.

Matter has never been isolated from force, nor force from matter; for, as Tyndall remarks, even the heat and light waves are supposed to be particles of ether,—a rarefied matter, in vibration.

The division of man into soul, mind, and body is liable to the same objection, as one of these is not seen without the other two.

J. B. Stallo, in The Concepts of Modern Physics, says that "Metaphysical thinking is an attempt to deduce the true nature of things from our concepts of them."

"That force is motion" seems true enough, since we have no instance of a mass of matter absolutely at rest. And the attraction of certain bodies by the earth is an hypothesis, while the motion caused by such gravity is what strikes our senses as actual and certain.

Comparing various forces, a writer lately said: "A mental picture of energy in general may be made by conceiving sound to consist of motion of any substance with a rapidity between sixteen and forty thousand vibrations per second; light being constituted by rapid molecular movements numbering four hundred and fifty billion at the red end of the spectrum, to eight hundred billion at the violet end; even gravity is estimated by La Place to be produced by matter in motion." Stallo calculates that "the formation of 36.5 grams of hydrogen chloride gives rise to a power by which a weight of ten thousand kilograms can be raised to the height of one metre in a second."

By statical electricity is meant, according to Ganot, electricity generated by friction, as in the Holtz machine, in which there is a transformation of motion or mechanical action into electricity; dynamical electricity is that generated in cells, in which there is a transformation of chemical affinity into electricity.

Herbert Spencer gives perhaps a better illustration of the difference between dynamical and statical force, when he says (Biology §6), "The colloid is, in fact, a dynamical state of matter, the crystalloidal being the statical condition. The colloid possesses energia. It may be looked upon as the primary source of the force appearing in the phenomena of vitality."

"Force," says Stallo (p. 167), "is not an individual thing or entity that presents itself directly to observation or to thought; but, so far as it is treated as a definite and unitary term in the operations of thought, it is purely an incident to the conception of the interdependence of moving masses."

Although the works of Grove, Helmholtz, Mayer, Faraday, Liebig, and Carpenter support the fact of the conservation of force, a later writer, Balfour Stewart, conveys a different idea, in his work on The Conservation of Energy, when he writes, §232, "We are thus induced to generalize still further, and regard, not only our own system, but the whole material universe, when viewed with respect to serviceable energy, as essentially evanescent, and as embracing a succession of physical events which cannot go on forever as they are."

"Mind being a force" is an assertion liable to be denied, if force is only an incident, and while Carpenter "aimed to show that the general doctrine of the 'Correlation of the Physical Forces' was equally applicable to those vital forces which must be assumed as the moving powers in the production of purely physiological phenomena, these forces being generated in living bodies by the transformation of the light, heat, and chemical action, supplied by the world around," Alexander Bain states that "one member of our vital energies, the nerve-force, allied to electricity (?), fully deserves to rank in the correlation"; but Joseph Le Comte, writing still later, is less positive when he says: "The correlation of vital force with these (physical and chemical forces) is not universally acknowledged, and, where acknowledged, is only imperfectly conceived."

Granting the correlation of mind with electricity, heat, etc., it would cease to exist as mind whenever it became transformed into any other force. According to the doctrine of evolution, the germ of any man's mind must have existed through its ancestors far back into the Silurian Period; which shows that man must have been immortal in the past rather than in the future, representing, as each of us do, the accumulated experience of the fish, and that of the mammal for several millions of years. But as to the mind, as force, having no ending, we would refer to the above quotation from Balfour Stewart. Perhaps a simple way of treating this important subject would be to look upon the universe as one, and make abstraction of individuals; then to look at any atom or molecule as a representative of the whole universe, possessed of the same attributes, thus we have the intelligent, active, immortal, atom of matter, which can neither be created nor destroyed.

But we have inherited so large a share of erroneous ideas from our ancestors, besides the errors they have transmitted to us in their books, that we could not, if we would, form very clear notions in regard to the World-Problems; and we may be content to say, with Emil Du Bois-Reymond, dubitemus. REPLY TO M. J. SAVAGE.

Editors of The Index:—

Allow me space for a short rejoinder to Rev. Mr. Savage's reply to me, which appears in The Index of May 11, p. 538. Mr. Savage says he does not know where I found the words about the "best modern thinkers"; and, further, he says, if he ever used them, he is sure it was in a different sense to the one in which I have applied them. If Mr. Savage will refer to his volume entitled The Religion of Evolution, page 244, he will see them there. And I think he will find that they are incapable of any other interpretation than the one I put upon them. The subject, too, in connection with which they are used, is essentially the same. In one, he asks, "What is the Relation of Mind to Brain?" In the other, he asks, "What are Brains for?"

The answer of the physiologist to both inquiries would be equally applicable to one or the other. To the first, he would say, brain and mind bear the relation to each other of organ and function: the brain works, and mind is the outcome of its operation. "Operations of mind [says Huxley] are functions of the brain, and the materials of consciousness are products of cerebral activity." And if you put the question, "What are brains for?" the physiologist would reply, The office of the brain is to perform mental operations, to feel and think and will. Dr. Ferrier says, "The brain is the organ of mind, and mental operations are possible only in and through it." Prof. Virchow says, "Man has a mind and rational will only in as much and in so far as he has a brain." We therefore see that the same answer would be equally applicable to both forms of the question. We repeat, therefore, Brain is the organ, thinking is its functional operation, thought the product.

Now, if Huxley and Ferrier and Virchow and the other gentlemen I mentioned in my last communication are worthy to be classed among the "best thinkers," and if the foregoing statements are to be accepted as an answer regarding the power and province of the brain, then Mr. Savage has misrepresented the "beliefs" of the "best thinkers" in saying, "They are inclined to believe that the only real things that exist are mind and God." God, as we see, is never mentioned when speaking of the relations of mind to brain; and mind, instead of being the primary and real thing, is mentioned only as a function or product of the brain. The brain of the physiologist is the only real existence. Mr. Savage must therefore now either "refute" these statements or deny these men a place among the "best thinkers."

I fear Mr. Savage was rather premature in his reply to me, when he said, "Most of his positive statements I heartily assent to, and indeed have never thought of denying." It may seem rather ungracious in me not to accept such a concession; but when I find him saying, "That, so far from minds being explained as the product of the brain, all we know is that the action of mind coincides with certain molecular movements in the brain. Thus [says he] modern science has found it utterly impossible to explain mind, either as a part or a product of matter." Now, in direct contradiction to this, I stated that "facts had been disclosed, proving that, while the brain is a bodily organ, it is also the instrument for producing mind. This fact [said I] is just as demonstrable and conclusive as that the larynx produces voice or the stomach digests the food."

As authority for this statement, I quote Prof. Huxley, who ought to know as much about the achievements of modern science as Mr. Savage; and he says, "In my belief, consciousness and molecular action are capable of being expressed by one another, just as heat and mechanical action are capable of being expressed in one another." Prof. Haeckel also says, "The spirit and mind of man are but forces which are inseparably connected with the material structure of our bodies, just as the motive force of our flesh is involved in the muscular element, so is the thinking force of our spirit involved in the form element of the brain." Claude Bernard, too, says, "From a physiological point of view, those metaphysical phenomena of thought, consciousness and intelligence, which serve for the various manifestations of the human soul, are nothing but ordinary vital phenomena, and can result from nothing but the action of the organ which expresses them." Now, if Mr. Savage had read the foregoing statements and considered them as authoritative, as all the leading physiologists do, I cannot see how he could say that "modern science had found it utterly impossible to explain mind either as a part or product of matter." Language, it seems to me, cannot be clearer and more positive. No scientific man doubts that the equivalents of heat and mechanical motion can be traced and made to account for and correspond with each other; and consciousness and molecular action are equally capable of being expressed by one another. And Mr. Huxley supports this statement by a recital of an experimental fact. Haeckel and Bernard can no doubt support their statements with equally tangible experimental proofs. Therefore, as I said before, Mr. Savage must either acknowledge that he has misrepresented the beliefs of these men or deny them a place among the "best thinkers." Which will he do?

Mr. Savage will kindly refrain from conjuring up phantasms of "wind-mill slaughter," as they are not a necessary part of the subject under discussion. If he does not know, I may inform him that wind-mills are facts, but observation and experience have taught me that facts are a very infinitesimal portion of pulpit thunder. Words are their artillery, and they seldom kill. Acknowledging your courtesies for former insertions, I am yours respectfully, W. MITCHELL.

ANSWERS TO "SUBSCRIBER."

Editors of The Index:—

I offer the following, in answer to sundry questions given in Index of May 11, by "Subscriber."

Gravitation actual is a state of motion. Gravitation potential is the power of that state of motion. Static electricity, I understand, signifies electricity confined within limits by means of nonconductors. It, whether confined or not, may be in the actual or potential state. Science certainly does not define force as an "immaterial substance," for such is literally a nonentity, is like an untruthful truth. Force does not exist apart from matter; it consists simply of the varying or changing relations of matter to matter (i.e., motion), unless we use the term in an abstract-concrete sense to signify matter in state of change, or again, as simply matter. Motion is no more effect than cause. It is convenient to use abstract names for causes and effects, but they are misleading. It is always matter in a state of motion or power of motion that causes motion in other matter. We cannot ascribe a cause to that primal condition of mobility of matter, any more than we can ascribe a cause to the existence of matter itself; both are co-existent and infinite in time, and hence have no cause. It does not logically follow that mind, being a force, never had a beginning; and, as power of thought by evolution, it can have no ending, any more than that electricity or combustion as force never had a beginning; and as power of electrifying or heating by evolution (how else can any effect be produced?) it can have no ending. We err by assuming mind a universal or general principle, instead of a special, as we only know it to be. Like all special forms of force, it may pass partially or wholly out of existence as such, and may or may not reappear, as conditions may determine. All special forms of force are embodied each in a special organization of matter, and can exist only so long as the organization normally exists. This is given according to the light of another subscriber.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BUT, though Mr. Darwin has not directly attacked current religious opinions, it is doubtful whether any man of this generation has done so much to change them. We are not aware that he has ever discussed Biblical interpretation; but no man has done more to undermine the doctrine of verbal inspiration and of the scientific and historic infallibility of the Old Testament records. He has rarely entered the domain of moral philosophy, never that of theology. But thousands of preachers who have never read his writings now habitually treat the history of the race as a development, and Christianity as a growth, though from a divine seed and under a divine Husbandman. He was a scientist, not a philanthropist. But the course of modern philanthropy in endeavoring to cure crime by an improvement of its environment—by cleanliness, pure air, good food, and adequate rest—is almost wholly due to his influence and to that of the school of modern evolutionists of which he was the founder. In controversial circles, he is chiefly known as the propounder of doubtful theories, which conservatism scoffs at, piety dreads, and the value of which even science has yet to determine. But his real monuments are two,—the records he has left of his acute, careful, and absolutely unprejudiced observations, and the influence which he has exerted in liberating and shaping theological thought, and in giving a new impulse and a new direction to practical philanthropy.—Christian Union.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON was born in Boston, May 25, 1803, in a house on Summer Street long since removed, where his father, Rev. William Emerson, was then living as pastor of the First Church in that town, for Boston was not yet a city. His ancestry on the paternal side was an unbroken line of ministers for three generations, William Emerson of Boston being the son of Rev. William Emerson of Concord, who was the son of Rev. Joseph Emerson of Malden, who was the grandson of Rev. Joseph Emerson of Mendon. By his grandmother, he was descended from another famous minister, Rev. Daniel Bliss of Concord, belonging to the same family as the Blisses of Springfield; by another feminine ancestor, he traced back to the Waldos of London and the continent, who were of the Waldensian Christians, famous in history; by another feminine ancestor, to the family of Bulkeley in England, in which stood, in Shakspeare's time, a learned doctor of divinity, Rev. Edward Bulkeley of Odell in Bedfordshire, who was the eighth degree in ancestry earlier than Ralph Waldo Emerson, and first of his clerical forefathers of whom we have any account. Beyond Dr. Bulkeley, the line reaches back to a baron of King John in the county palatine of Chester, who held the manor of Bulkeley; and beyond Rev. Joseph Emerson of Mendon the paternal line runs backward to the landed gentry named Emerson in the county palatine of Durham, and perhaps to that Ralph Emerson who in 1535 received from Henry VIII. a grant of the heraldic arms which Ralph Waldo Emerson inherited from his first American ancestor, Thomas Emerson of Ipswich, Mass. This Thomas was a baker and farmer on the old plantation of Agawam, now Ipswich, as early as 1638, and lived in a house still standing on the "Turkey shore" of Ipswich River, not far from "Labor-in-Vain" Creek, where he died in 1666. One of his sons was Rev. Joseph Emerson of Mendon, from whom the poet Emerson descended. From another son, Rev. John Emerson of Gloucester, descended Wendell Phillips, Phillips Brooks, "Warrington" Robinson, and many other Massachusetts men and women of distinction. It is worth while to mention this unquestionably gentle descent of the Concord poet, because the subtle influences of ancestry and tradition mould the characters of all men more or less, and men of genius most of all. In the contrast between Carlyle and Emerson, nothing could be more marked than the rude force of the Scottish peasant, flowering into genius, but never quite free from churlishness, in distinction from the thoroughbred courage, combined with gentleness and consideration for others, which accompanied the star-like genius of Emerson. There was also in Emerson, as in Washington, and for the same ancestral reason, a certain superiority that was not wholly the effect of genius. "Though it never showed itself in contempt for any human being," said Burke of his friend, "Lord Keppel was something high. It was a wild stock of pride on which the tenderest of all hearts had grafted the milder virtues." But no man held this pride more under the control of courtesy and wisdom than did Waldo Emerson.

"For in those lofty looks was close implied
Scorn of base things, disdain of foul dishonor.
Was never in this world aught worthy tried Without some spark of such self-pleasing pride."

BOOK NOTICES.

ADVENTURES IN THE FAR WEST, AND LIFE AMONG THE MORMONS. By Mrs. Catherine V. Waite. Chicago: C. V. Waite & Co. Price $1.00.

Under the disguise of a story, the writer of this book relates what appears to be her own personal experiences and observations, with the personal experiences obtained from others, both Mormon and Gentile, in Utah. The story is simply and straightforwardly told, though many particulars given of the methods pursued by Brigham Young and other Mormon leaders seem to savor a little of sensationalism. But, making allowances for these, the book will do a good work in adding to the array of facts which make some of the doctrines of Mormonism so repulsive to all thoughtful people. It is interestingly written, and will be read by many whose attention would not otherwise be drawn to the subject.

THE charming full-page illustration, "Three Babies in a Row," with its accompanying poem, which adorns the first pages of Babyland for June, is alone worth the price (fifty cents) of a year's subscription to this bright magazine for youngest readers. D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, publishers.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

It is said that Mr. John Morley will retire from the editorship of the Fortnightly Review in November.

PROF. WILLIAM DENTON, we learn from the Dunedin (New Zealand) Echo, has been threatened in Australia with prosecution for blasphemy.

JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY has received a despatch from Michael Davitt, saying he will reach Boston June 17, and will stay in the United States twelve days.

LEADING citizens of Boston have caused to be painted a life-size portrait of Robert C. Winthrop for the Hall of the House of Representatives at Washington.

GRACE BABE, a Maine girl, recently stood first and passed the best examination in a class of one hundred and ninety-five at the College of Pharmacy of Philadelphia.

It is said that there was a very strong feeling in Brooklyn against the committee who engaged Robert G. Ingersoll for orator at the Decoration Day services.

CANON ERNEST WILBERFORCE, son of the late Samuel Wilberforce, the English anti-slavery agitator, has been appointed first Bishop of Newcastle, in England.

MRS. OLE BULL has abandoned for the present her intended trip to Norway, and will spend the summer in or near Boston, busied with her forthcoming book of reminiscences.

THURLOW WEED is in his eighty-sixth year, but continues active, and is busy writing his reminiscences, which will be a valuable addition, when finished, to American biographical history.

THE Emperor William of Prussia and Queen Victoria of England are both made great-grandparents by the birth of a son to the son of the Crown Prince of Prussia and Victoria's eldest daughter.

THE New York Commercial Advertiser thinks that Camp Meeting John Allen of Maine "is not only a monument of God's mercy, as he says, but also a sort of human obelisk to prove that allopathic doses of religion in the woods are conducive to longevity."

A PARIS correspondent of the Catholic Review speaks of M. Renan as the "brilliant, cynical, sentimental sceptic, who took Jesus Christ in his divine humanity for the hero of a romantic and blasphemous legend, and who has constituted himself the leader of the atheistic-spiritualists, if we may invent a definition for his impious philosophy."

HERBERT SPENCER has a great aversion to going to church, being opposed to encouraging ecclesiasticism in any way. He did, however, attend Darwin's funeral. An intimate and most happy friendship had existed between them for years, and the great philosopher was willing to do almost anything to show his deep regard for the great scientist.

THE exercises of the graduating class of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology were brought to a sudden and sad termination on Decoration Day by the death from heart disease of Prof. W. B. Rogers, while in the midst of an address to the students. Prof. Rogers was seventy-six years of age, a man of large views, scientific attainments, and sterling character, who will be greatly missed.

MISS ANNE WHITNEY of this city has completed an idealized, life-size, plaster cast of Harriet Martineau, which gives great satisfaction to those who have seen it, and which will soon be shipped to Italy for reproduction in marble. The price of Miss Whitney's work, over twelve thousand dollars, was paid by subscription by Boston ladies, enthusiastic admirers of the talented, free-thinking, English authoress.

GEN. JOHN C. FREMONT, a name which, though now almost forgotten, was once very familiar to the fickle public, is said to be living quietly in New York city, and, in spite of his seventy years, his whitened head and beard and wrinkled face, still walks with a firm step and erect form.

MRS. KATE CHASE SPRAGUE has been granted a divorce from ex-Governor Sprague of Rhode Island, with the custody of her three young daughters, her eldest child, a son, preferring to remain with his father. Mrs. Sprague is writing the biography of her father, the late Salmon Chase.

THE one hundred and third anniversary of the birth of the mellifluous Irish poet, Thomas Moore, was celebrated on the 28th ult. at the Catholic Union Rooms, on Washington Street, this city. An address was given by M. J. Mahoney on the life, character, and works of Moore; and other appropriate services were held.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

A friend desirous of completing his collection of Samuel Johnson's published works will give a fair price for certain of his sermons and essays in pamphlets or old newspapers (not THE RADICAL). Address Dr. B. F. C., INDEX Office, stating titles of discourses, newspapers, and terms.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association, its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and twelve Directors. They shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the Association; and the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall hold their offices for one year, or until their successors be chosen. The Directors shall be chosen for four years, and, at the expiration of that term, shall not be eligible for reelection until after two years. One fourth of their number shall be chosen annually; but, at the annual meeting of 1882, the full number of twelve shall be chosen in sections of three respectively for one, two, three, and four years. The President, Secretaries, Treasurer, and Directors shall together constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. They shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number, or in the list of Vice-Presidents, between any two annual meetings. Six members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place and with such sessions as the Executive Committee may appoint, of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers elected for the year 1882-83:—

PRESIDENT.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

THE Chinese Government has just issued a handsome edition of the Code Napoléon in Chinese.

By a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, the testimony of atheists is to be allowed on an equal footing with that of Christian witnesses.

LAST Sunday, according to the Boston Transcript, Jumbo "had an immense audience, numbering thirty thousand people, at the levee given unconsciously in and around the Coliseum grounds."

SOME time ago, a Catholic merchant of Australia died, leaving by his will $7,000 to the church "to deliver his soul from purgatory." But the executor of the will, adopting the C.O.D. principle, refuses to pay the legacy until proof is furnished that the soul of the dead merchant has really been delivered from the purgatorial regions.

THOUGH it is quite true, it seems like an anachronism, at this stage of the world's progress, that, in a small town in Illinois, a whole family became so far the victims of religious fanaticism that a wife and mother, supported by the faith of her husband and son, the latter a student of theology, was allowed to starve herself to death at the mandate, as was fancied, of God. She believed herself, without any actual symptom of coming maternity, about to become the mother of a second Messiah.

REFERRING to Felix Adler's criticism of the Free Religious Association, the Chicago Alliance, after stating that he "should remember that the Free Religious Association was organized only for the purpose of affording a platform for a free discussion of religious problems, and not as a centre for works of benevolence," justly adds, "Such impatience, however, is easily understood when one recalls the magnificent enterprise in the direction of benevolence of Prof. Adler himself and the society over which he presides."

THE society of many initials is apparently an adept in advertising methods; for the society itself, or some member of it, is always doing something or other which helps to keep its name before the public. Its last sensation consists in the fact that its agent at Hoboken, N.J., James Timmins by name, has been arrested for horribly beating his wife and little son. Mr. Timmins was probably unaware of the fact that women and little children are included by naturalists in the animal kingdom, otherwise they might have appealed to his sympathies.

ARABI PASHA, the present dictator in Egypt, who is largely accountable for the outbreaks of race and creed prejudice which the latest despatches from that country announce, has declared that, sooner than submit to the proposed policy of France and England in the government of Egypt, "We shall proclaim a holy war, and enkindle, if we must, a fire which shall put the world in flames." A crisis has come in Egyptian affairs, and whether it is to be met by a diplomatic conference of the Great Powers or by an immediate armed interference on the part of France and England will be determined probably in a day or two.

UPON hearing of the death of Darwin, the students of Kieff University drew up, for transmission to his son, the following telegram: "The students of Kieff University deplore with you the loss of the grand master and puissant soldier of science. The Russian youth bows with respect before the profound genius who has revealed to man the mysteries of the struggle for existence, has assigned to him his place in nature, has indicated to thought the way of indefinite development, and who by his own example has shown how truth ought to be served. The memory of your father is immortal as his glory." The Russian censorship suppressed this telegram. The Pall Mall Gazette suggests that the censors dread, with good reason, any recognition of the doctrine of the survival of the fittest, and in their own stupidity may perhaps find cause for doubting its universal application.

THE American Medical Association, at its annual meeting at St. Paul, excluded the delegates of the New York State Medical Society, because it had adopted rules permitting members to hold consultations with any legally qualified practitioner, and had declared that "emergencies may occur in which all restrictions should, in the judgment of the practitioner, yield to the demands of humanity." It is time for the American Medical Association to revise its code of ethics, and put itself in harmony with the spirit of the age, or else dissolve, and no longer perpetuate Bourbonism in the medical profession. A good proportion of intelligent people employ physicians of the homeopathic school, and, so far as we can learn, with no worse results than those who intrust their sick to the medical care of "regular" physicians. Sectarianism and close communionism are no more desirable in medicine than in theology.

FROM Australia comes a good illustration of the growth of rational thought in the Church, and of the influence of traditionary beliefs in preventing cordial assent to what is shown to be true by the observation and experience of all intelligent men. The Bishop of Melbourne has refused to prepare special forms of prayer for rain, declaring that natural changes are governed by natural laws, and that the people should turn their attention to an economical use of the water at their disposal, instead of calling on God for a fresh supply. Many orthodox people are offended, and say that the bishop has taken this method to censure the Colonial Government, because it has not accepted his plan of a general irrigation system.

"A TARIFF commission," says the Sunday Herald, "intent on a reasonable revision of the tariff for the general benefit of the country, might call before it some of the men selected by President Arthur as members of the commission; but it would be liable to a charge of unfairness, if it did not extend its researches beyond this list. Here is a commission made up of the representatives of the most 'protected' interests in the country. Not a free trader, and scarcely a low tariff man, appear in the list. Even our esteemed contemporary, the Advertiser, organ par excellence of protection, protests against a commission so manifestly unfair and one-sided. Besides, there is scarcely a member of the commission beyond Mr. Wheeler who may be said to have a national reputation; and his reputation is not connected with any special study of political economy. It is the strangest commission to revise a tariff that ever was advised, and its composition naturally strengthens the suspicion that the whole scheme was arranged to stave off tariff reform."

A DETACHMENT of the Salvation Army in Paterson, N.J., have been in the habit of marching through the streets singing a song, to which the refrain is

When the Salvation Army paraded through the streets on a recent Sunday evening, singing the above refrain and songs to the tune of "Champagne Charley," "Up in a Balloon," etc., some pious people were shocked, and offered a protest, which was, however, disregarded. The next morning, they made complaint before the Recorder, charging the "Army" with disorderly conduct. The warrant was served, and two of the leaders were arrested. According to the New York Herald, they were followed to the police court by the rest of the members of the "Army," including several women, two of whom, dressed in uniform, fell upon their knees and uttered a fervent prayer. The officers indignantly denied the charge of having been disorderly, and declared that the vengeance of the Lord would fall heavily upon all who had been concerned in arresting them. When asked whether they desired a trial, they wanted to know who would have the hardihood to appear against the emissaries of the Lord. The Recorder replied that the city council would run that risk, and set the case down for a hearing. The "Army" then endeavored to convert some of the police, but, not succeeding in making even the first impression, retreated in good order.

NO SECTARIANISM ON DECORATION DAY.

A good deal of complaint has been made, especially in evangelical journals, because Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was chosen by the Grand Army of the Republic in New York to give the address in that city on Decoration Day. That some sensitive souls should have been apprehensive lest Colonel Ingersoll should say something shocking to their religious feelings may be natural, though the remarks which he has made on two or three funeral occasions, and which have been published, have been so full of the sweet pathos of memory and hope and grieved affection that there was really little ground for even such an apprehension. But when the complaint against the committee for choosing him as orator rests on the assumption that to participate in the ceremonies of Decoration Day implies belief in a resurrection of the dead and a future life, as is the case in an article in the Sunday-school Times, the narrow, partisan bigotry of such an objection should not be allowed to pass without a vigorous protest. The Sunday-school Times says:—

To honor the memory of the dead and to care for the resting-place of their remains have, in all ages and in all lands, been an evidence of a belief in the resurrection of the dead and of a life beyond the grave. In this light it is that our national observance of Memorial Day for the decoration of the graves of the men who died for their country has commended itself to the better sentiment of all. And in this light it is that the recent invitation to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll to deliver the address in New York City on that day was nothing less than a public indecency. Whatever charity or tolerance may be asked for Colonel Ingersoll on the ground of his sincerity of conviction and his right to his own opinions, it is worse than a bitter mockery for a man who professes to believe that the noblest Christian soldier who ever lived and died has to-day no more life than a dead dog; to stand up before the mothers and widows and children of our dead soldiers, and to fling in their faces, by his very presence, the cruel taunt that their dead are dead forever. It is a shame for him to have taken the place: it is a greater shame to the committee to have invited him.

The Times, in its evangelical zeal, even goes so far as to declare that "to have found a man who was filling the air with curses upon the mothers of our land, and to have invited him to make an address at the opening of an orphan asylum, would have been a felicitous act of good taste, in comparison with this social outrage."

Now, we respectfully submit that Decoration Day has nothing whatever to do with a belief in the resurrection of the soldiers or any other theological idea. If the survivors have a faith in immortality, this may make the day one of greater cheer for them. But, if they have not, they may none the less sincerely and worthily participate in the tender and sacred ceremonies for which the day has been set apart. The beautiful custom of decorating the soldiers' graves with flowers means as a national ceremony but one thing,—the grateful memory of their soldierly deeds for their country and its liberties. It is a patriotic, not an ecclesiastical nor a theological service. No questions concerning creed were asked, when enlistments in the army were called for. Catholic and Protestant, believer and infidel, fought and fell side by side. We remember one as brave a man as ever went to battle, who fell with no hope of any resurrection morning, who believed that in giving his life to his country he was giving the only life he should ever have, and yet gave it none the less willingly. We remember another whose thumb had been shot off, and who brought the severed member to the tent of the Sanitary Commission with a request for a vial of alcohol for preserving it, that it might be buried at some future time with his body, and so be in its proper place at the resurrection day. He, too, was a faithful soldier.

And, as men of all religious faiths and of no religious faith thus marched and fought and fell together for their country, so let their surviving comrades come together at least one day in the year, putting no dividing questions concerning the religious faith of the living more than of the dead, as they for dear memory's sake deck the graves of those who have fallen from the ranks. If any have the gift of speech, so as to fan into a flame again the patriotic recollections of the war, and bring to a white heat the smouldering fires of the old love of country and of liberty, pray let him speak, whether he be Calvinist or freethinker. Liberal believers are accustomed to hear many things on that day contrary to their reason, but they let them pass for the sake of the common memories and convictions that are below all words. Shall not evangelical believers be as magnanimous? There was no sect in the Union Army which saved the country. Let there be no sect on the day when annually the living assemble to greet with flowers the memory of their dead companions-in-arms.

CHURCH AND PEOPLE.

The Apostles.

"The words that come unuttered by the breath,
Looks without eyes,—these lighten all the globe.
They are the ministering angels sent where Death
Has walked so long the earth in seraph's robe.
See, crowding to their touch, the groping blind!
And ears long shut to sound are bent to hear.
Quick as they speak, the lame new vigor find,
And language to the dumb man's lips is near.
Hail, sent to us, ye servants of high heaven!
Unseen save by the humble and the poor,
To them, glad tidings have your voices given;
For them, their faith has wrought the wished-for cure;
And ever shall they witness bear of you
That He who sent you forth to heal was true."

This remarkable sonnet appears among the yet unpublished papers of that singularly pure-souled man and exalted poet, the late Jones Very. It is so timely a reply to the wail of lamentation which has gone forth from the late varied anniversary meetings over the diminution of faith as shown in the decay of the ecclesiastical fabrics, we print it now, in advance of the fuller collection of Mr. Very's poetical work which, it is hoped, will be given to the world in the ensuing autumn.

We have been hearing great outcry about the falling off of attendance on public worship, and it has been assumed that it is an index of a supposed decay of the religious principle in the life of the community. There is, however, another side to this question, which does not appear in most of the public discussions on this subject, though it is admitted that all philanthropic agencies were never more active and vigorous than at the present time.

The real fact is, the trouble is not in the people, but rather in the churches themselves. Mr. Very is quite right in this. Are not the true apostles, the "ministering angels," the silent, unseen forces of individual character rather than the vested servants of the declining institution that

Mr. Very's own experience was a striking illustration of this, for, in his sacerdotal capacity, he could never attract an audience; but, when he died, clergymen and laymen of forms of faith the widest apart hastened to bear testimony to the constant inspiration his life had been to them. It was the power of individual character, the Deity in the man, not the sermonizer who had preached to them. And what greater sermon was ever uttered! The eloquent pulpit orator excites our admiration, but is it not the silent saint that moves us to deeds?

A young devotee of nature died some time ago, poor, comparatively unknown, but whose whole life had been a noble lesson of unworldliness; and one of the many clergymen attending his funeral said to another: "Sir, this man would not enter our churches. Why? Because, sir, he saw that, while we preached the Christ, and him crucified," it was he who lived the self-denying Christian life. That, sir, is a lesson to us all!"

This remark explains in part why attendance at church has fallen off now that the tremendous pressure of social opinion is relaxed, and the non-church goer is no longer ostracised. It is not that people are less religious than formerly. The reverse is very possibly quite as true. Purity of life and noble purpose are revered as highly as ever. Witness the apotheosis of Garfield,—a deification of a lofty ideal of human character rather than homage to the actual man. And the same feeling is apparent to day in the Italian worship of Garibaldi, and in other cases too numerous to mention.

It is not that people care less for the Good, the Pure, and the True, but because they feel more strongly the fatal discrepancy between the ecclesiastical enunciation of these Eternal Principles and ecclesiastical practices. As has been hinted in the late admirable article by Dr. Bacon in the North American Review, mankind is surfeited with words, and now it demands deeds. As he aptly suggests, one thoroughly, unswervingly honest man is worth all the theology Andover has ever listened to.

Young men say: "I cannot go to church and join in solemn affirmations that are at variance with my life. I cannot begin to live up to the standard of the life of Christ. And, as I look at the people round me, I do not see the Christians who 'have not where to lay their heads.'" They say: "It seems to me that, if I went in for formal Christian observances, I should tend to let them take the place of good morals. I should open a debtor and creditor account with the Lord. I should, in short, deacon my apples." Now, we reply to them, "But our churches are not churches of ritual." "Yes," they answer; "but they are not filled, as nature is, with the awful presence of the Deity. They are of wood and stone, not of the spirit."

In other words, mankind is no longer willing to accept on faith whatever may be told it, but demands of every man his credentials, and is not satisfied with any pretension unsupported by visible evidence. This is spoken of as a decay of faith itself, which should be welcomed as an enfranchisement from the bonds of credulity. Mankind has never been more ready and eager to welcome its apostles than now, when it so severely scrutinizes the pretensions of sainthood. And this very scrutiny is one of the most active incentives to the better life on the part of those who claim its homage.

Man is as worshipful as he ever was; but now he has begun to look beyond the methods employed to stimulate his spirit of reverence to the great end of all religious forms, to real religion, whose apostles are clothed in the garment of sanctity, not the stole of sacerdotalism. He looks, to quote from Jones Very again,

"To find a man who walks with God, Like the translated patriarch of old," and worships not our "lofty shrines of stone and wood," but rather the loftier temple which "ye are."

We would not speak slightly of the valuable labors of the present race of, for the most part, poorly paid and overworked clergymen; nor has the writer much sympathy with the desire rudely to uproot established forms, since they still help the aspirations of many struggling souls. Let each seek the Power that makes for righteousness in his own way, be it through priest or saintly layman, or the calm of nature's solitudes, musical with the majestic harmonies of the universe.

But, if the outward Church decay, need we fear for the Great Realities of which she herself is but the sign and symbol? Because forms grow cold, will Eternal Truth and Goodness fail, any more than sovereignty vanishes with his majesty the king, who is himself but a ceremony? Nature covers with her mantle of flowers and tender green the slaughter fields that have reeked with the blood of the Church's victims. Must faith perish with this outward symbol? Can we not trust that Eternal Law of nature which has made for goodness through all the ages?

Symbols of Faith, ye vanish! One by one,
Ye fall and fade from out men's busy lives,
'Till naught of outward imagery survives,
And man no longer worships the great sun,
Or kneels at bell, as he long years has done,
For science from all fane the priesthood drives;
Yet not the less each nobler purpose thrives,
And the whole race a loftier height has won.
Creed after creed has perished, and no more
Men for beliefs are stoned and torn and burned,
Or maidens slowly drowned by creeping tides.
Yet though all forms and rites were given o'er,
And all mankind had from their temples turned,
Faith, Beauty, Power,—the Good, unchanged, abides.

BELIEF AND CONDUCT.

From those who have escaped from the intellectual bondage of dogmatic theology, we often hear the remark that it is of no importance what one believes, if his conduct is correct, and in confirmation of this view are often quoted the words of Pope, who, in contempt for "modes of faith," said, "He can't be wrong whose life is in the right." This sentiment, the natural result of a reaction from the orthodox doctrine that God will torture forever creatures of his power for erroneous theological beliefs, was born of intellectual cloudiness not less than of tenderness of heart and tolerance of spirit. In the sense only that a man's life includes his theories and thoughts as well as his deeds, is it true that "he can't be wrong whose life is in the right." If one's theories and thoughts are wrong, then an important part of his life is wrong. The acts of an individual are more direct and immediate in their observed influence on society than his beliefs; but the latter are not less real, and are quite as far reaching and often more powerful in their effects.

An individual's acts appeal to the senses. His beliefs, with which his conduct may be glaringly inconsistent, manifest themselves in ways so numerous, subtle, and imperceptible, and frequently blossom forth and ripen into the fruit of action at periods and places so remote from those at which they were expressed that the connection between the beliefs and their legitimate effects generally escapes the ordinary observer. Hence, the popular notion that theoretical beliefs are of but little, if any, significance as factors in human progress, and that a man's influence should be judged chiefly by his character as manifested in his conduct. Yet a belief adopted by one whose conduct is scarcely affected by it, because determined by inherited tendencies, early impressions, or social environment, may through his influence be adopted by those into whose lives, long after he is dead, it shall be incorporated as an active force in the formation of character and the determination of conduct.

A thought, a theory, a discovery, or an invention, whatever be the moral character of the individual who first announces it, may profoundly influence the conduct and modify the conditions of millions through countless generations. A political or social theory originating in the mind of one who is regardless of the conventional standards, and of even the just and reasonable requirements of morality, may prove a great benefaction to the race. Equally true it is that a false theory advocated by a sincere and an enthusiastic philanthropist, and recommended by his own purity of life and nobility of character, may in time poison the social organism, producing possibly a moral cancer which only the surgery of revolution and war can cut out of the system, still leaving perhaps the taint of disease to be combated and overcome in the on-going years. Error incorporated into individual or social character renders harmonious development impossible; and the more deeply it is implanted and the more numerous and firmly established are the false adjustments to which the character is forced in accommodation to the disease, the greater the suffering to be endured before the permanent conditions of healthy growth can be reached.

Clear thinking then is quite as important as correct living; and the man who helps to make men think aright thereby helps to advance not only intellectual, but moral progress, and to augment the sum of human happiness. He, on the contrary, however unexceptionable his conduct and pure his motives, who helps to befog, mystify, and confuse the minds of men by his shallow, dreamy thought, is quite as much the enemy of moral as of intellectual advancement. Slovenliness in thought is certain in the long run to result in slovenliness in morals. Thought cannot be divorced from conduct, even though the thought, true or erroneous, of one generation, shows itself the most conspicuously in the conduct of succeeding generations. A teacher of error may be sincere, but his sincerity in no way severs the connection between cause and effect, and therefore in no way diminishes the results of the error. Indeed, intellectual error is dangerous and harmful in proportion to the sincerity of its adherents, upon which its growth depends.

The poison lurking in many theories is the more effectually hidden, like the serpent in a bed of roses, by the drapery of language and a false sentimentality, which while they charm often conceal the implications and absurdity of a belief; but time strips such theories of all that deceived and deluded men, and shows their real results in the moral rottenness as well as the intellectual deformity which they produce.

It is evident that he who, in laying stress on conduct, attaches but little, if any, importance to theory or belief, and judges men's influence wholly or mainly by the acts by which they project themselves out upon the field of active labor, ignoring or assigning to a secondary place the influence of philosophers and thinkers, takes a view of life that is narrow, and narrowing in its tendency. It is not necessary to say that we in no way depreciate the importance of conduct, or undervalue the efforts of those who appeal directly to man's moral and philanthropic nature. We ask only that they recognize the not less needed and not less useful work of those who stimulate thought, increase knowledge, and in science and philosophy, as well as in poetry and song, help educate the race in the principles of truth and virtue.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

NOT TOO FAST, GENTLEMEN!

As we had expected, Prof. Adler's withdrawal from "active participation" in the affairs of the Free Religious Association, as he himself phrases it, is drawing the fire of the editorial fraternity against the Association. In giving his reasons for withdrawal from the Presidency, we think he was led into an unintentional injustice both to the Association and to many of his individual comrades in the Free Religious movement. Of this, we may have something more special to say next week, when his speech will be printed in full in our columns, in the proceedings of the annual meeting. But meantime, Messrs. Editors, be not too hasty in bringing out your obituary notices of the Free Religious Association. The Association is not going to die yet. It stands for ideas which have gained much headway since it flung out its flag fifteen years ago, but which are yet far from being comprehended in all their length and breadth. It then declared for a religion emancipated not only from bondage to sectarian creeds, but from the authority of special faiths and founders. It declared for conduct as above creed, for fellowship in spirit and work as better than any ecclesiastical bond, for reason and science as the noble and needed allies of religion. These principles are spreading. The churches are beginning to be shaken by them. The creeds are falling. The ancient faiths of the world are beginning to recognize each other's merits. The sects are more and more turning their attention to philanthropy. But still the end is far from reached. Still the Association has a mission, and it proposes to keep the field for fulfilling it. But the Free Religious movement is larger than the active membership of the Association; and the Association has always recognized that fact. Prof. Adler and others in their individual way are nobly working out its aims, whether actively participating in its special membership or not. Even some of you, Messrs. Editors, who are now prophesying an early demise of the Association, are working toward the same end. When this class of workers becomes numerous enough, the Association may go. Its concern is for the triumph of its principles, not for its own perpetuity. But for the present it means to stay.

W. J. P.

TO MEMBERS AND FRIENDS OF THE F. R. A.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association beg leave to call your attention to the following plan of work adopted at the late annual meeting:—

Resolved, That this Association herewith instructs its Secretary, acting with the advice and consent of the Executive Committee, to superintend the following work for the ensuing year:—

1. The preparation, as thorough and exact as possible from data furnished by the State correspondents and other sources, of the following memoranda of information, namely:—

(a) A complete list of the names and addresses of members of the Free Religious Association, classified according to States, towns, and cities, and a similar list of well-known persons in sympathy with the Free Religious Association, not members.

(b) A full list of organizations, State and local, whose constitution and methods are in substantial conformity with those of the Free Religious Association, with names of officers and description of form of union and of work appended to each.

(c) A brief statement of the needs and conditions of each State in relation to the Free Religious movement, compiled from the returns of the State correspondents, so far as reported.

2. Aided by these memoranda of information, the Secretary, with the advice and consent of the Executive Committee, shall choose not less than two (2) nor more than six (6) States which in their opinion present the most favorable conditions for the spread of our principles and their local organization, as the immediate field of work.

3. The Secretary, or some one selected by him with the advice and consent of the Executive Committee, shall visit the selected States, and call in each, by letter and personal interview, a private conference of our members and friends, for the purpose of stimulating their interest in our cause, and urging them to pledge pecuniary and moral support sufficient to secure either a successful convention or a course of lectures by the accredited speakers of the Free Religious Association in the most promising centre of liberal thought in said States, the choice between the two methods of work being left with the Association's representative on the ground and the local friends.

4. When the local friends are unable to raise all the money necessary for this work, the Executive Committee shall be empowered to aid, in cases promising good results, as hereinafter provided.

5. The Secretary, or person representing the Association, thus visiting a State for the purposes indicated above, shall, if possible, be present and speak at the convention, if such be held, or, if the lecture course be given, shall, if possible so to arrange it, deliver the first or last lecture, and in either case shall present the principles and objects of the Free Religious Association, and the need, the possibility, and the most practicable methods of organization for State or local work.

6. In order to carry on this work for one year, it is desirable that $2,000 be raised; and the Executive Committee are hereby instructed to take immediate steps to secure that sum. And whatever amounts shall be received for that purpose or used from the funds in the treasury shall be appropriated under the direction of the Executive Committee.

7. That the office of State correspondents be continued, and effort be made to secure one in all States not now represented by such an officer, in order that the memoranda of information be kept as complete as possible.

In accordance with this action of the Association, it becomes our immediate duty to appeal for contributions to the fund of at least $2,000, which it is deemed wise to raise for putting this plan into effect.

Cash subscriptions or pledges, large or small, may be forwarded to the Secretary at the office of The Index, or to the Treasurer, John C. Haynes, 451 Washington Street, Boston. Upon the sum placed at our disposal will depend the character and amount of the work to be done.

There are earnest men and women throughout the land to whom life is sweeter, truer, diviner, because of the ideas for which Free Religion stands. Many such have large means, many more have a competence; and all feel, we are sure, a desire to help carry to other souls the glad tidings which have come to their own.

We not only solicit, therefore, but we look forward with confidence to an early and a favorable response to this appeal.

For the Committee,

WM. J. POTTER, Pres.

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY, Sec'y.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

NEXT week, we shall publish the addresses of Dr. Felix Adler and Mr. S. J. Stewart, in continuation of the report of the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association held in this city.

DR. FELIX ADLER writes us that in about a fortnight he hopes to be able to send us one of his lectures for publication in The Index, and he adds, "My interest in the paper has of late increased."

THE ignorant dwellers along the Nile gave expression to their feelings in a shout of wonder and horror, when, during the recent total eclipse of the sun, they saw on the right of the hidden luminary the form of a flaming comet, which was a new comet that had been concealed by the sun's rays, and was revealed by the withdrawal of the light.

A COPY of the "History of the Free Religious Association of Florence, Mass., with its Articles of Association and By-Laws," a pamphlet of especial interest and value to those desiring to form societies on the plan of one of the successful and prosperous liberal organizations in this country, will be sent from this office to any person on receipt of a stamp with which to prepay postage.

"We have for many years agreed with Jefferson that an entire 'uniformity of opinion is neither possible nor desirable'; and we have ever kept in mind and acted upon that other noble sentiment of his, — 'I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility to every form of tyranny over the mind of man.' Then, since we cannot all believe alike, let us labor to secure mental liberty for all; and, when this is accomplished, bigotry will die, and genuine liberality everywhere prevail." — Boston Investigator.

THE Pundit Doyanund Saraswati, head of the Arya Somajes, who invited Col. Olcott to India, has excommunicated the American "theosophist," and expressed his opinion of him in the following language: "Neither Col. Olcott nor Mme. Blavatsky knows anything of Yog Vidya (occult science) as practised by the Yogis of old. * For them to say that they perform their phenomena without apparatus, without any secret prearrangement, and solely through the forces existing in nature, and by what they call 'their power,' is to tell a lie."

"RAD," in the London Secular Review, says: "The gospel of science, in its methods and aims, is far superior to that of Christianity. While the latter is endeavoring to raise a few individuals here and there to a better life, the former is gradually elevating the mass of mankind to a higher moral level. The churches may succeed in getting sweeter fruit than formerly from an unsatisfactory tree, by a process of grafting; but the modern evangel is laboring as an ethical nurseryman. Intelligent reformers perceive that the amelioration of human life is dependent upon improved social conditions. There is no objection to Dr. Sexton and his fellow Christians baling the vice, crime, and misery out of humanity with their little sectarian cups; but let them not cry out against wiser men who are trying to find and stop the leaks."

THE flags placed upon the soldiers' graves in the Catholic cemetery at Milford, Mass., were pulled up, the sticks broken, and the bunting torn to shreds. This mean act may not have been done by the hand of P. Cuddihy, the priest, who forbade the Grand Army Post to decorate the soldiers' graves in that cemetery, but it was in consequence of the position he took. Says the Republican: —

No decent and sensible Roman Catholic among us but must feel that he is insulted and injured as an American by the position of this Milford priest and the consequent outrage upon the memorial flags, and must sympathize with the Milford Grand Army Post in their resolutions of indignation, wherein, among other things, they say, "That the act be branded as cowardly, and one to be condemned by every loyal citizen in the land; and that the person or persons, to us unknown, who committed this act of vandalism, deserve no better treatment than is allotted to traitors."

S. T. POMEROY, a correspondent of the Indianapolis, Ind., Iconoclast, writing to that paper from England, says, speaking of Mr. Charles Voysey's church in London which he attended: "Imagine how refreshing to a reader of the Iconoclast to hear in the recital of the liturgy quotations from F. W. Newman's Theism, sandwiched in with Solomon's proverbs and the psalms of David, and to hear the author's name boldly announced from the sacred (?) desk. Mr. Voysey's congregation is much smaller than I hoped to find it; but it is composed of very intelligent-looking people, and they seem to be as much in earnest as their pastor, and withal devotedly attached to him. After the services, a fresh arrival of The Index from America was announced; and I was pleased to see a large pile of them disappear with the rapidity of our traditional 'hot cakes.' I had quite a scramble to obtain one, but succeeded, and greeted it as an old friend in a foreign land."

ROBERTS BROTHERS, publishers, 299 Washington Street, Boston, propose to publish a reprint of the Dial, the organ for four years of New England Transcendentalism, provided they can be assured of two hundred subscribers at fifteen dollars each. They will also publish in connection therewith an index to the whole work, containing a list of the contributions, with names of the writers, so far as it shall be possible to procure them, to which will be appended a full historical account of the Dial, with anecdotes, incidents, or gossip, that will in any manner illustrate the influence of a work which marks an era in American literature. The Dial contained many of the first and freshest effusions of Emerson, Thoreau, Dana, Channing, Ripley, Margaret Fuller, Alcott, Theodore Parker, and many others quite or nearly as famous as those mentioned. All who wish to become subscribers at the above rates are requested to write at once to Roberts Brothers, or to The Index office, signifying their willingness to become subscribers for one or more copies of the required two hundred. The price to those who are not subscribers is to be twenty instead of fifteen dollars per set.

"HALF our institutions," observes the Boston Transcript, "are educational. The State represents the principle of intelligent citizenship in the free-school system, and fully one-fourth of civilized society is employed in one way or another in the intellectual training of another fourth. Happily for society, organizations for the mutual improvement of members, for free comparison of opinions, and for open discussion of all moral, social, and scientific questions, have always been identified with New England history. The moral tone and purpose of such associations are taken for granted. It is a matter for congratulation that society is really advancing, so that we may unite for the noblest purposes, leaving moral reform, for the nonce, as a thing apart. But it is not easy for those who are consumed with the fire of philanthropy and moral reform to see anything but an intellectual selfishness in those who do not enroll themselves in philanthropic work. Let us convince ourselves, once for all, of the grandeur and rightfulness of association for mutual intellectual growth. Such adult associations are precisely one of the means that shall redeem us from the charge of vulgarity and mediocrity of culture in contrast with the best European classes."

AT the close of an address on Darwinism last Sunday before the Parker Memorial Science Class, by the junior editor of The Index, the following resolutions, presented by Miss M. A. Hardaker, were unanimously adopted by the class: —

Resolved, 1. That the Parker Memorial Class unites with other associations in Europe and in America in the expression of indebtedness to the life and labors of Charles R. Darwin.

2. That the example of more than fifty years devoted to the most painstaking acquisition of new truth should constitute an inspiration for us and for all lovers of positive knowledge.

3. That, in the theory of the origin of species by natural selection as announced by Darwin (however it may be modified by subsequent study), we recognize the most important and suggestive scientific generalization of our own century, — a generalization which bears comparison only with the establishment of the heliocentric theory of the solar system, with the discovery of the law of gravitation, and with the later proof of the indestructibility of matter and of the conservation of force.

4. That, as the work of Darwin has occasioned the reconstruction of biology, forming the incitement of students throughout the civilized world, becoming a part of the instruction of universities, and penetrating scientific literature, we, as the inheritors of this culture, feel a strong personal gratitude for new intellectual life.

5. That, as Darwin avoided dogmatism in the propagation of his own theory, we and all scientific workers should emulate his spirit; and that, as it was his distinction to add largely to the knowledge and thought already in the possession of men, our best emulation will be not only to repeat what he taught, but to seek, like him, for new facts and principles whereby the sum of truth may be increased.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

The Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 15, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association,
June 1 and 2, 1882.

The Convention on Friday, June 2, was held at the Parker Memorial Hall, forenoon and afternoon. At the morning session, the hall was completely filled; and there was a good audience present in the afternoon. The platform, through the thoughtful kindness of friends, was profusely decorated with flowers. On the right of the speaker's desk stood a fine bust of Mr. EMERSON; and on the left, resting upon an easel, was an excellent likeness of Rev. SAMUEL JOHNSON, reminding all present of two friends, honored and beloved, but lately lifted out of our sight.

The meeting was called to order at quarter to eleven o'clock by the newly elected President, WILLIAM J. POTTER, who addressed the assembly as follows:—

Opening Remarks of the President.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—Friends and fellow-members of the Free Religious Association, and any strangers who may have come within our borders, on this fairest of June mornings, I greet and welcome you at this our fifteenth anniversary as an association.

Our honored friend, Octavius Frothingham, who presided over these meetings so many years, used to say that, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, the officers of the Free Religious Association were unchangeable. But even as the laws of the Medes and Persians, as the centuries rolled on and opened into æons, were changed, so recent years have shown that the officers of this Association, like all mundane things, are mutable; and by the decree of an election which occurred at the business meeting last evening, —a decree which became necessary, because of the invincible determination of my friend, and our more recent President, Dr. Adler, not to allow his name to be used for re-election,—it has become my duty to open this meeting this morning.

Last evening, the election occurred so late that I was not willing to detain those who were present for even a "Thank you" for the kindness, if I can so call it, which has brought me to this post. Indeed, I do not know that I can say, with sincerity, that I do thank you. I can, however, say this,—that I am at least grateful for the kind regard you have thus endeavored to express toward me, though I can but distrust your judgment. I know indeed of but one valid ground upon which you could have made this selection, and that is the ground of the principles of "the civil service reform." I have certainly, by a lengthened term of service in the subordinate capacity of Secretary, had at least opportunity for learning the ways and principles and purposes of the Free Religious Association, and ought certainly by this time to know what is in the heart of the movement which we here represent. Perhaps, however, the very length of time during which I have served in that subordinate capacity may have brought me to the verge of that limit where even civil service reformers admit that their principle no longer applies. There is such a thing as staying in one office so long as to be disqualified for any other. Long adhesion to one official routine may bring desuetude of the faculties required for another kind of service. Decrepitude, inelasticity, and other ills, are apt to come after a very long term of service in any office. However, you have made the choice, and I have yielded to the inevitable, and will, with you, now hope for the best. I am grateful, moreover, that, by the same choice with which you elevated me from the secretaryship to the presidency, you chose a younger man, more fresh in this movement, to the secretaryship,—Mr. Frederick A. Hinckley,—to whose enthusiasm, zeal, and energy in the service of the Association I shall certainly be much indebted for whatever of success may attend my administration of affairs as President.

And now, without any further introductory remarks,—which were not arranged for as coming from me this morning, but for the other President,—I must proceed to give the essay which I was to have read under the old arrangement. Let it be understood, however, that this paper which I have prepared on the subject of "Liberty, but Religion Also," is not to be regarded as a manifesto which I specially put forth as an inaugural address. I was to have given it all the same, you will remember, if I had not been thus elected; and so you will please to consider it not as any official declaration, but, as every address from this platform according to our constitution ought to be regarded, simply as the speaker's individual expression of opinion. Let me then proceed at once to the delivery of that essay.

LIBERTY, BUT RELIGION ALSO.

ESSAY BY WM. J. POTTER.

Ever since the awakening of human intelligence in Europe near the close of the thirteenth century, which historians now designate as the Renaissance, and which was the precursor of the Protestant Reformation, liberty has been gaining ground in all the civilized regions of the world. It has been one of the most dominant forces in the production of modern civilization. Before that epoch there was not much liberty in the world in our modern sense of the word,—not much liberty of thought nor of speech nor of civil and social rights. What little of it there was in the centuries immediately before that epoch was in Mohammedanism much more than in Christianity. In Christendom, the State and the Church and almost the home had become one; and that one was the Church. The ecclesiastical power ruled everywhere, and ruled with a stern and often bloody hand,—ruled to the repression of thought and learning, of individual faculty and aspiration, of scientific research and civil freedom. At the Renaissance, the liberty of intellectual inquiry, which Mohammedanism had tolerated and which had crept up through Spain into Northern Italy and Central Europe, revolted against the ecclesiastical tyranny, and began to defy its boundaries. And from that time onward, during the five centuries that have followed, history has been a succession of conflicts between these two powers,—of conflicts in silent suffering, though with deadly hand-to-hand grip, or of conflicts amid the din and rush of arms. It has been a succession of conflicts, but through them liberty has been steadily gaining the field. At times, crushed by the heavier powers against her, she has yet risen again to the struggle, with redoubled ardor, to win her cause at last. And, now, her victorious forces have gone so far that from her present vantage-ground she can easily descry her coming complete triumph, and knows that there is no power on the earth that can prevent it, nor in the heavens that will. Every year brings the final battle nearer. There may be a fierce contest yet in Russia between the now strangled, struggling aspirations of the people and the semi-ecclesiastical despotism which the Russian government is; but every intelligent man—American man at least—knows what must be the end: the people must win. Despotism must yield to them the full measure of their rational rights. Fortunate if it shall be wise enough to yield in time by peaceful reformation, and so draw off the power of the violent revolution that is already seething under the throne of Russian ecclesiastical imperialism. Everywhere, the signs multiply that modern civilization is rapidly becoming anti-ecclesiastical; that is, is being emancipated from the Church, the Christian or any other, as an all-dominant power in civil government and among social forces.

The full triumph of liberty, indeed, as against the long dominion of ecclesiastical authority, is so near at hand—so near relative to these great movements of history, even though it do not come for several generations yet—that the question already presses, What is to be the consequence? and especially, What is to be the consequence to religion? It is not possible that any thing, be it institution or idea, which has held through so many ages such a place of supreme command in human affairs as has the Church, should be degraded from that position without bringing a great change into the elemental forces that operate upon human life and destiny. Some very important, very momentous consequence must follow. What is it? There are many persons who affirm, and who affirm it with all earnestness and seriousness of conviction, that the consequence is to be no less than the ultimate disappearance of religion itself. All those who have resisted the advance of liberty and still adhere to the old order of things, all those who still believe that as religion is the supreme interest of men, so the ecclesiastical institution and power, which represent the embodiment of religion, should properly hold the supreme temporal as well as spiritual sovereignty in all human affairs,—all who still hold to this doctrine, in Christendom or any other religion, assert that this degradation of the ecclesiastical power is to be the destruction of religion. That is the argument which the Roman Catholics use for maintaining the temporal sovereignty of the Church as represented in the Pope. And that is what the Jesuits are saying of the republican régime in France to-day. When the Republic converted the monasteries and their presiding priests from masters into servants, Jesuitism cried, "We must be masters or nothing," and went away. And now it points back to the alleged growing irreligion and godlessness of France in proof of the truth of its position. All these, of course, are defenders of religion; and they use the argument as a warning. If you would have religion exist and keep its power, you must equip it, they urge, with all the substantial realities of power. Denude it of its externals of authority, and you expose it to perish.

But, on the other hand, there are not a few among the hosts of liberty who affirm the same thing; who also declare, and declare it with equal earnestness of conviction, that the overthrow of ecclesiastical sovereignty will be followed by the ultimate destruction of religion itself; and who further declare that this is the very thing they desire and aim at; that religion is the arch-enemy of human liberty; that it is religion that has created all the ecclesiastical tyranny, all the superstitions that have degraded and idolatries that have enslaved and priesthoods that have defrauded and hoodwinked mankind. Therefore, it will be the proper climax of liberty's victories when, not merely the material throne or palace where religion has held sway, but religion itself, shall perish.

Now, in spite of the fact that these two extremes of the opposing armies are thus unanimous in their conviction of what will be the result of the contest, if liberty goes on to triumph, I venture to doubt their prophecy. I count myself and have always been proud to be counted by others among the most uncompromising advocates of liberty on all questions of religion whatever. I would put no fetters on human thought, lay no yoke on the human mind but that of subjection to the laws of its own best service, place no limits at which human inquiry is to stop in its researches, draw no lines about any institution or book or person and say, "Approach not here, this is holy ground." Nothing can be holier than human thought in the reverent search after truth. Truth and thought are but the two sides of one whole. Thought is dangerous separated from truth. Truth is impracticable without a thinker to embody it. They come together to "frame the shrine for Godhead meet." The magnetism that draws finite thought toward boundless truth, henceforth to trust it and follow it, is the very spirit of worship. I say, then, draw no limits beyond which human research is not to go. Send down the plummets into earth's most hidden depths. Dredge the protoplasmic ooze from her deepest seas. Pierce the farthest skies with your telescope, and catch the creative elements, if you can, in the very secret of beginning a world from a chaos of fire-mist. Apply all the possible powers of microscopic invention to the dust-atoms under your feet, and learn how they may possibly rise into a human brain and set up thinking and doing righteousness. Stop nowhere where thought, with sanity, can go. And from every point bring back the exact facts, whatever they are. Flinch from no one of them. Shrink from none of them, as if they could be possibly harmful. Cover up and conceal none of them, as if your judgment of what ought to be true were better than the truth itself. Even if, after the final search by the whole human race, could such a search ever be final,—in one man's experience, it must needs be infinitesimally small,—the answer to the search must be that there is no God nor God-power anywhere, but only blind forces and cells that account for everything, both matter and spirit, still I would say, were that answer ever possible to the untrammelled search of the best aggregate mind of the human race, shrink not from it, trust it, and make the best of the powers that do exist. If that is the truth, we want to know it. If that is the truth, we have to live in constant relation to it, and so for us it would be the best thing to know. This full, free, and absolute right of inquiry on all themes and realms of thought do I claim for the human mind. I claim it, because without liberty as a condition there can be no growth of human nature to a completed manhood, no development of the essential and natural faculties of humanity to their evidently destined goal.

But, while I thus unqualifiedly make the plea for liberty, I just as unqualifiedly make the plea for religion also; and I make it on the basis of free, rational thought. Liberty? Yes, by all means, but religion notwithstanding. I find the foundations of the one just as adequate as those of the other. As I find liberty to be a necessary condition of humanity's development and progress to destined completeness of existence, so I find religion to be elementally rooted in human nature, its elements essential elements of human nature itself, and its proportional development a necessary part of the completed, harmonious development of humanity. I cannot rationally accept the doctrine, advanced by some members of the liberal school of thought at the present day, that religion and liberty are incompatible, and that, as liberty of thought progresses, religion must wane to its end. I believe, on the contrary, that, while they have often been most bitter enemies, they may be the best of allies. I believe, indeed, that each is absolutely necessary to the best condition of the other. Religion without liberty becomes ecclesiastical despotism. Liberty without religion becomes a selfish and suicidal individualism.

But it may be asked, and is asked by some of the enemies of free inquiry, Does not liberty of thought, when allowed this unrestricted course in religious things, inevitably lead away from the religion? Look, it is said, at Russian Nihilism, at French Communism, at German Socialism, at the international societies and leagues, at all those popular yet half hidden movements where liberty seems to be the main doctrine and impulse, liberty in its extreme applications. In general, they are bitterly anti-religious, materialistic, atheistic: they not only decry the existing institutions or theologies of religion, but they decry religion itself as one of the causes of the people's misery. They cry not only, "Down with the king!" but "Down with God!" whom they consider as a greater despot behind the monarch on the human throne. And sometimes they even cry, "Down with morality!" because they consider morality one of the attachments of religion which has aided it in defrauding the people. With such a picture of what free thought leads to, what are the chances for religion? Or look at some of the increasingly active phases of free thought in our own country, it is said,—at its materialistic philosophy, its spirit of dogmatic denial and destruction of religious beliefs and institutions; the coarseness, vulgarity, indecency, as illustrated in some of its representative journals; its frequent denial of the moral law as anything more than a social conventionality; and its not infrequent practice and sheltering of fraud and concubinage. Yes, the picture, as thus drawn, is a dark one on both sides of the Atlantic. And though some discriminations might have to be made before absolutely allowing it, for the argument, let it be admitted as correct. But what follows? Not so much that free thought is brought into dishonor as that free passion is; and not so much that genuine religion has been abandoned as that it has not yet been found. As to the irreligion and anti-religion of the Nihilistic and Communistic populaces in Europe, this is easily explainable as the reaction which has followed the old priestly oppressiveness of the religion in which they were bred. Religion to them has meant little more than their relation to a despotic, mercenary, and often immoral priesthood. The Church, the creed, morality (taught always as theological and not as natural), the being of Deity himself, were to them all represented in the priesthood. Having revolted, therefore, from the despotism of the priesthood, they let all go which it has represented to them, and, in the first taste of liberty, engage in a wild, reckless rollicking in the very holy of holies of the world's most sacred associations. What is to blame? Not freedom. That is the natural instinct of growth. Not thought. That they have not been trained to and have not yet reached. Not religion. That they know nothing of except as embodied in the priest. None of these is to blame, but the ecclesiastical power which kept them ignorant or tried to bend their minds to its own superstitions and despotic uses. That must father the guilt of their reckless outburst against all the bonds of society, bad or good. And what these embittered, long oppressed people most urgently need, in order to make liberty the boon of noble service that it may be to them, whether already largely found, as in France, or still fiercely and passionately struggled for, as in Russia, is the training of the faculty of reason to steady liberty, and the spirit of religion to consecrate it. I do verily believe that if Russian Nihilism could be thoroughly penetrated with a genuine religious conviction and motive, so as to make it a struggle for religious liberty against ecclesiastical despotism, it would soon become armed with a power that would win not only religious, but civil rights. For it is a fact, which those who argue that liberty and religion are incompatible should remember, that it has not infrequently happened in the world's history that liberty's most important battles for civil rights have been fought and won in the name and power of religion.

What has just been said of the causes and the remedy for the acknowledged unsatisfactory condition of certain sections of Liberalism abroad may be said, with some modifications made necessary by the difference of national conditions, of those phases of free thought alluded to in this country. There is not, of course, the ignorance here that exists in those priest-ridden countries. Yet the knowledge in some classes of Liberalism is, we must confess, of a superficial kind. They are thinkers, but they are not trained nor profound nor progressive thinkers. They think in certain narrow and continually repeated grooves. They catch at science in shreds and fragments, and leap therefrom at once to conclusions. They are in the mood of dogmatic reaction still against the old Orthodoxy from which they have broken, and are too intensely partisan to be productive seekers and promoters of truth. As to coarseness and immorality, because these are sometimes unhappily found in connection with liberal phases of thought, it no more follows that they are the consequence of the free thought than it follows that the coarseness and immorality which are not infrequently found in Christian churches are the consequence of the Christianity there taught. These things are, as said before, the offspring of free passion, but not of free thought. Freedom alone, unguided, unbridled, might bring them, and does bring them, whether among church members or in the great unchurched world outside. And therefore it is that I say liberty alone is not enough. Liberty must be steadied by reason, and consecrated by the spirit of religion. Liberty of thought and thoughtful religiousness must be wedded together to produce the highest types of character. We want a freedom that is religious and a religion that is free.

But why, ask some of our liberal friends, is not free thought enough without the religion? Allow, they say, that freedom alone is dangerous; but give it (as an ally to morality) enlightened, rational thought, and you balance it, and make it safe. Yes, if the thought is large enough, profound enough. But, when it is that, it takes religion in its scope. I have never seen broached any philosophy of the universe which did not seem to me fatally narrow and shallow, if it did not include the substance of idea and motive which underlies and pervades man's religious history. I know how they argue who think that liberty of thought and the discoveries of science and increasing general knowledge are to dissipate and destroy religion. They identify religion itself with the institutions and dogmas it has created, with the superstitions it has tolerated and fostered, with the false and monstrous creeds it has produced, with the oppressive ecclesiasticisms it has established, with the outrages and atrocities which have been committed in its name against freedom of thought and freedom of person. While I write these sentences there comes to my table a letter bearing the testimony of one of this class of free thinkers who are antagonists of religion. An honest antagonist he evidently is, as he writes these burning words: "I abhor the word 'religion,' and never like to see it attached in any way to Liberal or Liberals. Keep it where it belongs,—with the Orthodox Church. Its hands are red with blood. Its bowels are full of the fire of the Inquisition, and the tears and groans of the thousands it has murdered and tortured for their honest beliefs." Now, I can honestly respect an opinion thus bluntly and honestly spoken. And I can well understand how religion itself should be denounced and fought, because of the long catalogue of cruel inhumanities standing against its name. These opponents argue that, where there is so much of evil in the result, the source must be evil. Cause and consequence are, in their view, all one, and fatally implicated together. And since increasing knowledge and freedom achieved, in spite of religious repression, are certainly removing the evil consequences, the cause, they say,—that is, the religious sentiment and idea (which are only a superstition),—must go with them. Superstition is the cause, inhumanity is the result. They must both go together.

But let us look again at this argument. The work of removing the evil consequences that have developed in the history of religion is no new thing. The form of the work in our time may be somewhat new, but the process itself is old. The institutions, the creeds, the ceremonials of worship, the forms of church government, the quality and measure of ecclesiastical power, have been in process of flux and change throughout the whole history of mankind. And yet religion itself,—the soul, the inner idea, the vital, creative essence of creed and institution and church and ceremonial,—has survived. They count without their host, who think that religion is easily to be destroyed. Among the oldest human forces on this planet, it bids fair to remain among the latest that man will have at his service. From the beginnings of primeval tradition a supreme and dominating interest in human affairs, nothing in the whole career of human development has shown itself more persistently vital. Through all the external changes to which it has been subjected,—the wars, the downfalls of civilizations, the migrations of peoples, the transformations of kingdoms and nations,—it has held its course, and is as alive to-day as it ever was. Violently attacked and sometimes thought to be slain and buried, it has revived with fresh life and power. When the splendid civilizations of Greece and Rome went to pieces, their religious systems went down with them. Pious men and women, seeing the havoc that was being made among the shrines and the deities, prophesied that religion was about to perish, and that all human hopes would be wrecked with it. A new religion came along. The old shrines and statues and hopes and festivals, with some modification of meaning and form, were baptized with new names; and religion became more powerful than ever, grasping even the imperial sceptre of the Cæsars. In our own country, when liberty demanded that State and Church should be separated, and religion was left without government support, the alarmists said it would die of starvation. It adapted itself at once to the situation, devised ways and means for the new condition of things, and has prospered all the more. After resistance in any conflict is vain, religion picks up indeed the very arguments you have hurled at it as stones to kill it, turns them over, examines them at its leisure, and finally eats them, converts them into nutriment, and lives upon them. This all-assimilating power of religion is what gives it its inappreciable hold on existence. And this process of vital assimilation is going on rapidly to-day. The Church is taking the very things which you say are going to destroy it,—the increasing knowledge, the liberty of thought, the new science, the demand for humanity enfranchised from the tyranny of dogma,—and is going into council upon them. She is looking them over; and by and by she will make them into good, digestible bread, and eat them, as she has so many like things before, and live on by the new nourishment thus gained. It is plain that you cannot easily kill such a power as that.

Now, what is the secret of this marvellous tenacity of life which religion possesses? It is to be found in the fact that religion is rooted ineradicably in the constitution, in the very soil and substance of human nature itself. It draws its sustenance from the same sources from which the human mind itself is fed, and therefore has the same tenure of existence as has man's capacity to think or to feel. The root of religion goes down far below the creeds that are changeable, the ecclesiasticisms that are shaped by the exigent beliefs of special epochs and nations, the ceremonials of worship that come for a season, for a sect, for an age, and go as they come, at the demand of new ideas. All these come and change and pass in their season, as the foliage and fruits of a tree. But the trunk, the root, remains, one and the same, going down deep to the very bottommost elements of human nature, perennial with the life of that nature itself, susceptible to the same culture, ready to vitalize the grafts of new thoughts and to produce fairer and more abundant harvests of gracious action for humanity's ever-recurring needs. The secret of religion's hold on existence, its root-idea and motive, consists in the fact that man finds himself in actual relation to a universe as part and product of it, which continually elicits from him the question of the Whence and Wherefore of things. He is bound to this universe and its vital forces, whatever they are, and whether he understand them aright or not, by ties of thought, of sentiment, of action, which he can no more sever than he can sever the chain of gravitation which binds the earth to the sun. From this actual relation to the universe and its life-powers, he can never escape until he can accomplish the feat of escaping from himself. And religion, to venture a definition, is the expression of this relation,—the expression of it in thought, in feeling, in deed. It is conscious mind's gravitation to truth,—and to truth conceived as a complete, full-rounded globe, even though the mind is also conscious that it can never comprehend the whole circumference of that globe. It is the conscious heart's recognition of a sovereign law of rectitude and love, even though the heart knows it cannot fathom the whole process of that law. It is human life in practical, organic, present union with that truth and rectitude and love, even though unable to solve all the problems of the Whence and the Whither.

A word, before I conclude, on the expression of religion in outward forms, corresponding to those of worship, if not still called by that name. Theological ideas, which are now becoming obsolete, have doubtless been the staple beliefs that have determined the ceremonials of worship in Christian and other churches. But is it not possible that, when these theological beliefs shall have been displaced by more rational conceptions of man's relation to the universe, or, if still held, shall be subordinated to practical objects of righteousness, people will still find it to their profit to come together in a common meeting place, for mutual incitement in the pursuit of truth and the practice of right, and for self-consecration to worthier ideals of living and to more efficient services for humanity? That simple old Puritan word, meeting-house, and that old-fashioned phrase, "going," not to church, but "to meeting," contain the germ of the free, rational, and democratic idea of the assembling for such a purpose. It is a place and way for people to meet each other,—for thought to meet thought, conscience to meet conscience, heart to meet heart, on equal terms and common ground for mutual quickening and helpfulness in the best things. What loftier aim can there be in life than to live and to wish to live for the sake of helping on a universe which is in struggle to establish a society of conscious souls in harmony with the lines of truth and right and moral beauty? What joy can be finer, purer, than that of participating in such a work? What cause for gratitude more profound than that of having the opportunity to live for such an end? And it is not too much to expect that these sentiments and motives will at some time all find a fit embodiment in a common social service, independent of specific theologies, as an expression of human adoration of the highest and best,—a service wherein even more than the words of wisdom from inspiring speakers, poetry and song and a nobler music than has yet been composed, shall lend their instrumentality to utter the reverence, the gladness, the aspiration, the fraternal sympathy, the consecrated enthusiasm of the participants, and to lift them upward to a higher and ever ascending level of moral deed. Shall not the actual facts which even science discloses of this wondrous world, in which human beings bear so responsible a part, be as good a basis for such a service as has been the blind faith of superstitious religions? Shall not the mature, disciplined mind of humanity's manhood, with its established serenity and courage and joyous love in serving, furnish better material for worshipful utterance than did the childish fears and yearnings that were begotten of weakness and ignorance in the more youthful ages of mankind?

At least, if religion be, as I have endeavored to show, an inherent, constitutional relation and function of the human mind, we may trust it for staying in the world and giving always a fitting account of itself. Discover the secret of the natural magnetism between the thinking mind and the facts of the universe, between the sentient heart and the sovereign law of virtue, and you are near religion's primal force. Let the magnet be powerful enough, let the attraction become a practical, working enthusiasm, and call it philosophy, call it science, call it social philanthropy, call it morality, it is, under any and every name, the essence of religion. It binds humanity to an eternal search after an Eternal Cause; it binds humanity to the service of the law of an Eternal Right.

The PRESIDENT.—At the Business Meeting last evening, certain resolutions were passed, embodying a plan of work for the coming year. It has been thought well that those resolutions should be read now to this entire Convention, preparatory to taking up contributions that are to be called for, either in the form of cash donations or of pledges. Mr. Hinckley, the Secretary, will read the resolutions.

[These resolutions were printed last week, and are reprinted on another page in this week's paper.]

You see, friends, by these resolutions, the plan of work which it is hoped to carry through during the coming year. Although the details are arranged more definitely, it is essentially the same kind of work that we have done before, only an extension of it, in a more systematic form,—finding the places where the conditions are most favorable, and applying our energies directly there. And now, in furtherance of the special point in these resolutions, so far as this body here is concerned, a Finance Committee is to be appointed to go through the hall, and to solicit either membership fees or patron membership fees, the simple membership fee being one dollar and the patron membership fee five dollars, or any donations or pledges that may be given for the raising of this sum. I will appoint as this Finance Committee Mr. R. P. Hallowell, Mrs. Sara A. Underwood, Mr. John C. Haynes, Mr. H. P. Hyde, and Mr. E. A. Sawtelle.

AT THE

Laying of the Corner-stone of the Workingman's School and Free Kindergarten, New York.

[Stenographically reported by ALBERT L. LEUBUSCHER.]

In New York city, on Decoration Day, from two o'clock till past four in the afternoon, the members of the "United Relief Works" of the Society for Ethical Culture assembled to lay the corner-stone of their new Workingman's School Building. The "United Relief Works" is an incorporated institution, embracing several charities, and supported mainly by members of the Society for Ethical Culture, though almost half of its subscribers are outsiders, who, not being able to assent to the religious position of the Society, yet cordially believe in their educational and charitable work. The purposes of the school are fully set forth in the addresses delivered. As for the structure itself, it is to be fifty feet by eighty, with a large yard, four stories and a basement, and is to be built of brick with stone trimmings. The cost of lot and building will be about seventy-five thousand dollars. It is to be heated by steam, and especial attention will be paid in its construction to ventilation.

There will be committee-rooms, and one large lecture hall about fifty by seventy feet. On the lower floor there will be assembly-rooms, cloak-rooms, dining-rooms; on upper floors, eight class-rooms and a gymnasium. The children—over two hundred—are provided with a warm dinner.

The following articles were placed in the foundation for the inspection of future generations:—

The Index; Scientific American; all the New York daily newspapers of May 30; American coins; By-laws of the Society for Ethical Culture; Last Annual Report of the Secretary of the Society; same of United Relief Works, embracing reports of the Workingman's School, Free Kindergarten, and District Nursing Section; list of members of the Society, and also of Relief Works; "The City of Light," a poem by Prof. Adler; a song, also by Prof. Adler, sung by the children at the laying of the stone; addresses of the teachers and of the parents; and programme of exercises.

The parents of the children presented Prof. Adler with a silver trowel at the ceremonies. As the stone was lowered, the children of the school sang this song, composed for the occasion by Prof. Adler:—

Now lay the deep foundation,
And build it sure and fast:
Raised up for our salvation,
This house for years shall last.

Knowledge and freedom mated
In it enthroned shall be;
It shall be dedicated
To the true humanity.

May we repay your nurture,
And be what you did plan,—
The heralds of the Future,
Of the Grander Workingman.

A better time is nearing,—
'Twill hush the poor man's groan:
The Future you are rearing,
Be we the Corner-stone!

There were over a thousand persons present during the exercises. Among other distinguished parties, there were President Thomas Hunter, of the Normal College, Dr. A. Doual, and Mr. Wm. M. Salter. Col. Aug. G. Paine, the President of the Society, presided. The chorus of the Arion Society, led by Dr. L. Dammrosch, commenced the proceedings by singing Geisterchor, by Schumann; and closed with Der Abend senkt sich leise, by Volkman.

Address by Col. Augustus G. Paine.

Mr. President of the United Relief Works,—In behalf of the Society for Ethical Culture, permit me to acknowledge this special mark of esteem in inviting its Chairman to preside at these ceremonies. Like dutiful children gone out into the world and set up for themselves, you remember the old folks in your season of rejoicing.

So many of our own members are active workers in your school and in your charities, and we all feel such a deep interest in the development of your plans, that we may well be pardoned if we sometimes call this our school; but, as those of us who are not members of your society, hope to become such in good time, we shall leave you no opportunity to correct us in this.

I need not recite the history of your small beginning, nor your rapid progress in your educational and charitable work. The large daily attendance at your Workingman's School and Free Kindergarten, and the grateful acknowledgments of the hundreds of sick poor, give ample evidence of the unexampled success that has attended your efforts up to this hour; but I may congratulate you upon your prospects for the future. You are to have a commodious and well-located building, suited to the purposes of your work. You have earned the recognition of thoughtful persons both in public and private life, here and elsewhere, and will have their assistance and coöperation more and more as your work goes on. You have the hearty indorsement of the members of our Board of Education, themselves restricted from similar efforts, who are watching hopefully and with friendly interest the development of your educational scheme.

The number of your annual subscribers will increase as your work becomes known, and your members will grow more and more generous in their contributions, so that you will have no lack of means for the prosecution of your work. I congratulate you that your earnest and tireless leader, the founder and head of this Institution, notwithstanding the intense labor given to this work during the past five years, has still the health and strength to go on. Let us bear as many of his burdens as we properly may.

I congratulate you that my remarks end here; and I have the pleasure to introduce His Honor, Mayor Grace, whose presence on this occasion will ever be a pleasant memory with us.

Address by Hon. Wm. R. Grace, Mayor of New York City.

Ladies and Gentlemen.—We have met for the purpose of laying the corner-stone of the Workingman's School and Free Kindergarten, an institution which is intended by those who are interested in the present movement to be a new and radical departure in methods of education. While I am no expert in educational matters, I have nevertheless listened to the experts; and I know that some of our wisest men are firm in the belief that existing educational systems are far from accomplishing the work they set out to do. Anything that tends to remedy existing defects must be welcomed by the entire community; and I understand your purpose, to use the words of your leader, Prof. Adler, "to exhibit by one example what the right method of teaching is, and to show how superior its results are to those commonly achieved." This work consequently is one which commands the sympathetic approval of all who are interested in the conditions of our welfare; for to my mind the problem of education, moral, mental, and physical, lies at the very roots of good citizenship, as good citizenship lies at the roots of the perfect state. How far the State itself should go in the direction of industrial education I am not prepared to say, for it is a very nice question as to the limit which the State should set for itself in the matter of free teaching; but of this I am satisfied,—that, apart from all questions of the limits which should be set to the curriculum, the best method, whatever it may be, to secure the desired end, is the one which the State should adopt. Education to be perfect should not be of the mind alone, but of the hand and of the moral instincts as well. Technical education, so far as it be general and not special, and so far as it is regarded as a part simply of educational methods and not training for a particular trade, would seem to deserve incorporation into our existing system. The idea has been better expressed by Mr. Bamberger, whom you have trusted with this good work, when he says that he seeks "to combine industrial instruction organically with the ordinary branches of instruction." The Workingman's School will apply in a larger and higher field the methods of object teaching which have made the name of Frederick Froebel renowned the world over; and I entertain the profoundest hope that the gentlemen who have instituted this movement will see it crowned with success greater even than they have dreamed of. And if this school shall realize the hopes that have been entertained for it, in affording a practical example of the benefit of the new methods, no fear need ever be entertained as to the adoption of those methods in a larger sphere.

Col. Paine, before introducing Mr. Walker, read the following resolution from the minutes of the Board of Education:—

IN BOARD OF EDUCATION, May 17, 1882.

The Board of Education, recognizing the importance of every well-devised effort in the work of educating and training the children, hereby gives it welcome to the committee under whose auspices the Workingmen's School is projected and maintained; and, while itself restricted by legal limitations from entering upon the province of a Department of Polytechnic Instruction, it recognizes the intelligent enterprise which seeks to test the question practically in our city.

The Board having received an invitation to attend the exercises at the laying of the corner-stone of the Workingmen's School, it is hereby Resolved, That said invitation be accepted with the thanks of the Board.

Resolved, That Hon. Stephen A. Walker, President of the Board, be, and he is hereby, requested, in accordance with said invitation, to represent the Board of Education on the 30th of May instant, at the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the Workingmen's School, under the auspices of the special committee of the United Relief Works.

Address by Hon. Stephen A. Walker, President of the Board of Education.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen.—The Board of Education accepted with great cordiality the invitation of your Society to these exercises; and, for myself, I personally have the greatest pleasure in being here present on this occasion, and in welcoming a new ally in the great campaign against illiteracy and vice in our city. I do this with the greater cordiality from the fact that I know that the methods and purposes that you have adopted and now entertain are not in the traditional groove with which I am familiar. They are not in the line handed down to us as a part of the traditions of the common-school education. And my heartiness of welcome to this enterprise is not diminished from the fact that I believe that these methods and your purposes are possibly, in some sense, a criticism upon the methods and system of the public schools.

Now, my friends, I do not believe there is a person among those who have undertaken this enterprise, nor a person in this great assembly, who would dispute the proposition that there is no instrument known to our civilization the equivalent of the public school system in its product, advantage, and profit to the general public. That proposition I do not believe there is any one here will dispute. But there may be some here—I have no doubt there are many here—who would claim that those results are less beneficent and less wholesome than they might be; and there may be some here who would advocate the adoption of the plan which you contemplate in the building to be erected upon this spot, would advocate the adoption of such plans and methods in our public school system.

What are those plans and methods? I understand your fundamental principle is this: that the education of the hand and the eye should go along with, pari passu, the education of the mind. You believe in making a good workman as well as in making an educated intellect. You think these are things that can be done at the same time,—these two things. You seek a double result by a double means; and your proposition is, as I understand it, that each can be done better together with the other than it can be separately.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I am not here to controvert that proposition. If I did not believe in it, I would not use this platform as a place for disputation. But I am satisfied that any one who has really looked into the condition of affairs in respect to educational matters must halt, and look to see whether he has fully got to the bottom of things, before he denies the truth of the proposition which is the foundation platform of this institution. But, my friends, I must here say that this very evident proposition, to which I am ready to give my assent, is a proposition that must be carried on, must have its fruition, through voluntary associations and by private munificence. It is for this reason that I welcome undertakings that seek to do outside the public school system that which the public school system is by law and by the instincts of the people forbidden to undertake. And, if there be those here who say that we should do as you intend to do, I wish that they would think a minute before they launch into criticism upon our methods or upon our system. The fact of it is, the public school system, as now organized, has its basis and has its best support in the inbred conviction of the American people as to some one or two or three propositions. The American citizen, the citizen of the city of New York and the State of New York, has come to believe that an education in the common-school branches is to him a personal, an inalienable right,—to him, his children, and his children's children. And he demands that this education, in the common-school branches, should be entirely without bias in respect to creeds or sect. He demands further than that,—and this is the point to which I wish one moment to speak,—that that education should be absolutely without any particular forecast upon the line of the pupil's future course of life. It should be an education adapted to any purpose which the child himself wishes to follow or the parent wishes the child should follow. It is an education in things that are just as suitable for the mechanic as they are for the professional man, and are essential to both. It is an education in things that the housemaid must know just as well as the lady whom she serves.

Now, that inbred conviction in the American mind is what makes our public schools what they are to-day. They are not workshops; they are places for learning common branches. And, controvert it who may, that man is ignorant of the work we are doing in these buildings which we see over this great city,—that man is ignorant, not informed about the actual facts, if he says that that mission which the American people have committed to us we are not now and here well performing.

Now, my friends, if it be true, perhaps this experiment is going to develop the fact that it is an essential thing, on the best plane and in the highest way, that education should be connected,—the industrial and the mental, the teaching of the workman and the teaching of the professional man, at the same time,—that technical schools are the right thing. If this is to be proved, it is to be proved through such agencies as this. We, as representatives of the public school system, must adhere to the American principle which lies at the basis of the public school. They do things very differently in Prussia. The Emperor of Germany, in a very real sense, owns every man-child born in his domain. It is within his power to direct the course of life which each individual boy shall lead. He can see that he is bred a carpenter or blacksmith. Most of all, he will see that, at twenty-one, he is able to bear a musket; more than that, that he knows the construction of a musket. Technical schools, industrial schools, are absolutely essential, as an underlying basis of a government of that order. The principle of individual liberty must be ignored; it has no place in a system of that character. How different is it with us! The basis of individual liberty, the freedom of choice, lodged in the parent and lodged in the child, is the foundation principle of our common-school system.

Now, my friends, I can bear all sorts of criticism of the public schools and of the public school ways, if it only be intelligent criticism. Some of my Murray Hill friends complain a great deal about the superficiality of the instruction in the public school. Some of them say we are making candidates for teachers in the Normal College to an enormous extent, and are leaving no house-servants for the supply of the people. Others say that we make boys that can draw salaries, but that can never earn wages. I hear a great deal of that talk; but I notice one thing,—that a great many who discuss this subject apparently know as much about it as I would know about what is going on in a hospital by going outside of the building. There are a great many here who notice a public school-house: the outside they are quite familiar with. It is a singular-looking building. It is something between a church and a factory. But as to the inside of it, how many floors there are, and how many teachers there are, exactly what is going on there, they know very little. Now, I don't like criticism from those who stay outside the public schools and the public school system.

There is another class of people I don't like criticism from, and that is the people who never find success anywhere. There are lots of those people in the world. I want to know where there is an institution—I don't care what the institution is,—that is doing everything all the time that you might conceive possible for it to do. Where is there success? Are State's prisons a success? Are our churches a success? Where is success? Is our civilization itself a success? I welcome criticism from those who are satisfied that work, being well done, even though it be not perfect, is to be looked upon with favor and not in a carping spirit.

Now, my friends, I welcome you in this work you have undertaken. If it shall be possible, at some future time, that there should be such a thing on this broad land as an ideal republic, if it comes to be possible that the parent of a child shall one day say, I surrender the education of my child to the State, I love it so,—then I should say the methods that are common in the monarchical countries, and are right and proper there, may prevail here. And the mission of the public school may be to do what you intend to do here,—to turn out good workmen as well as good scholars. But, until that day comes, the public schools in their own sphere, and based on this principle of individual liberty, must adhere to the traditions which they have hitherto observed; and we must look to voluntary associations, to organizations of this character, to supplement what is lacking in our work, and to diminish, so far as possible, the number of those who, having received all that the State can do for them, are still but imperfectly equipped for the functions and exigencies of life.

Mr. Paine then introduced Rev. R. Heber Newton as one of the most honored and liberal-minded clergymen of the city, who had shown a generous sympathy with the philanthropic objects of the society.

Address of Rev. R. Heber Newton, D.D.

I am a modest man, my friends, and do not like to come in under such an introduction. I suppose I am here, not only because I have the honor of the friendship of the head of this society, but because I am connected with the churches, and am here therefore to extend the cordial and hearty congratulations of the churches, so far as I may be authorized to speak for them, to the Society for Ethical Culture. It is true, your motto is deed, not creed,—if I read it rightly,—and our motto is creed and deed, or rather creed in deed; but we are always ready to welcome the deed, whether the creed be there or not. We believe that the heart of all creed is after all in the deed, and that the creed which does not fruit in deed is pretty well rotted already.

As I came across the streets hither, a great word of Emerson was ringing in my ear. I thought of this solid piece of stone which you are here to lay,—nothing more solid, nothing more substantial,—and I saw the poet standing beneath Monadnock musing, espying something there more solid than the granite, and asking himself,—

"Through the granite seeming
See'st the smile of reason beaming;
Can thy style-discerning eye
The hidden-working Builder spy?"

Within this solid bit of stone to-day there seems to me to be something more real than granite, more solid than stone. It is the dream of a brave and wise and noble man, surrounded by a society that can appreciate his dreams and turn them into stone. I know how long this dream has been in his heart, what visions he has had of the time when a house should rear itself, in which this society should embody its creed of deeds, and whose doors should be open to the poorest of the poor for the richest education that the rich can have. While extending to him and to you my cordial congratulations, may I remind you that the best way in which this society can testify its loyal love for the leader it has chosen is to help him turn those other dreams he has brooding in his mind into stone as solid as this, with its $40,000 of endowment?

I am sure that everything that is best to-day is tending in one direction, and that is the direction of education. Wherever any one tries earnestly to benefit his fellows, he is pretty certain to burn his fingers. I know of no exception in any line of philanthropic endeavor. Everything turns more or less to disappointment, save one good work. If we can take childhood while it is tender and impressionable, if we can surround it with the right conditions physically, mentally, and morally, if we can develop out of it the possibility that lies there,—if, at the touch of mind, the angel in the block can leap forth,—that is the one hopeful work philanthropy can do. Everywhere, men are turning back to-day, from every direction in which they are laboring, in every sphere and field of work. The air is full of one word,—education. Your papers and magazines and reviews are teeming with notices of new studies in the line of education. The oldest essays are being studied, from Greek education down to the Middle-Age education. So that to-day, when we are learning that everything comes back to education, we may at least begin to build a system of education which rests upon all the wisdom and experience of the ages that are past. And I think that whatever wisdom is coming to us from all the experiences—bad, good, and indifferent—of the past is teaching us, first of all, that great word of wisdom of the wisest of the Greeks, that we must not rest short of Infancy; that we should not let the early years go idly by; that it will not do to take a child when he is seven years of age, and say, Now, we will begin to educate him; that, already, a thousand influences have been educating him daily and hourly; that, ten to one, he is already formed beyond our power entirely to change him. So did the greatest of the Greeks tell us,—that, if we would educate rightly, we must go down to the nursery, where we think is only idle play, and, taking these tender, pliant, little ones, surround them with every condition for the best development of body, mind, and soul, and then look to see health, intelligence, and virtue blossom, just as the lilacs are blossoming now, when the sun lies warmly upon them by day and the rain falls gently by night.

This is what your leader is saying in opening this school to-day, what all who are laboring for human uplifting are coming to see,—that the only true way of educating men for the divine human life is to educate the little ones from the start, letting no bungling hands spoil them, but using the ripest wisdom of the wisest, and thus bringing them up for all that is best.

There is another idea closely linked with this in your leader's mind,—if I have watched its working aright,—which is to be bodied here in this school; and that is that the true education which is coming upon the earth cannot be made—as it has been so largely in the past, as we will not say it is in the public schools of to-day, but as it was in the schools of yesterday at least—the education of words apart from things, the education by instruction apart from work. His idea is the idea that is already embodied in many a technical school of the Old World—in France and Germany—with most happy and beneficial results. The only way to get the whole man is to train the whole man,—not the thinking powers only, but the eye, the ear, the hand. One of the best ways to train the mind is through the physical powers, and this is one of the best ways to train character also. What is the meaning of that grand story of George Eliot, I think the finest she has written,—Adam Bede? Whence came the wisdom of this man, so profoundly wise? He was not taught in schools; he would not have been so wise, if he had been taught in the schools of that day. He was taught at the carpenter's bench, through eye and hand. Virtues and mental energies came with his strength and skill of hand. This was his education and the secret of his power.

I think that your brave-hearted leader would embody these two ideas in this school to-day, gathering the children while they are young, moulding them, as they grow, in a system that shall train eye and hand as well as mind, and shall train mind and soul through eye and hand.

And in this I thoroughly believe with him. May he live to see the day when these his dreams shall turn to solid reality! There was an old fable which we all recall, over which I dare say many of you have puzzled in younger days as I puzzled in the times gone by, about Orpheus leading the stones to build a city; at the piping of his flute, stone after stone uprearing into its position, laying themselves in successive strings, until a city fair for men to dwell in rose in stately form. Have you not the old myth here to-day,—the music of a soul loving its fellows and believing that this is to love God, awaking in your hearts the melodies of aspiration, which in the rhythm of brave action turn already into that fine harmony in which, following your wills, your money pours apace, and following your gifts, from fields and quarries, the bricks and stones are coming to take their place, obedient to the master's plan, into this school to train the coming man?

Address read from the Parents of the Pupils.

NEW YORK, May 30, 1882.

On the occasion of laying the foundation-stone of the school-house of the Workingman's School, we, the parents of the pupils, beg leave to express the following sincere sentiments:—

We have long felt and realized the love and the noble intentions which have called into life and maintained this school.

We are also convinced that no other foundation is able to bear that high work than this very love and the noble purpose which has actuated the founders of the Institute.

We hope and wish for ourselves as well as for all who participate, and for all who have the best interests of education and rational instruction at heart, that the work may prosper and develop more and more.

We wish the noble men and women who have founded this work and who are erecting this building the satisfaction of success as their thanks; and we offer them herewith the expression of our lasting gratefulness and love.

In solemnly declaring such sentiments and begging to be permitted to deposit this document in the foundation-stone of the building, we wish to indicate symbolically:—

1. That we must participate in the foundation of the high task of education.
2. That we have perceived this to be our holy duty, and we are resolved to fulfil it with love and cheerfulness with all our might and power.
3. That the union of school and house as it was ever fostered and maintained is necessary, and that we are convinced of its utility and benefit.
4. That we shall endeavor to coöperate with this work as much as lies within our power.

We deposit also our heartfelt wishes and our fervent prayer for the prosperity of the work and the continued happiness of all who act nobly.

Address from the Teachers of the School.

We, the undersigned teachers, have, in a regular meeting, passed the following resolutions, and beg for their friendly acceptance and reception into the corner-stone of this building:—

1. We rejoice in the erection of this school-house, since it betokens the outward growth and prosperity of our school.
2. We consider ourselves fortunate to be co-workers in this great work, which aims at the most humane and most rational education of the working-class.
3. We rejoice in being permitted to work according to the latest and approved results of the science of education, free from all sectarian influence, untrammelled by any selfish motive, and in harmony with the noble purposes of the founders of our institution.
4. We look forward with confidence to the inward growth of an institution whose safe development is thus guaranteed.
5. With such an outlook before us, we shall find new strength and joy in our work, and may hope to conquer more easily the difficulties that usually beset the path of the teacher.
6. The conviction felt by us all of the greatness of this undertaking and our common enthusiasm for its success will form a bond of union between the teachers, and will secure that concentration and harmony of work in the school which is so essential to its highest usefulness.
7. We wish and implore with all our soul that this work may receive the recognition and approval of all the intelligent and the good.
9. We wish and implore that all the noble-minded men and women who have called this work into life may long be spared to the institution and to us. We wish and shall endeavor to preserve for ourselves the love of the children and of their parents; and we do hereby earnestly pledge ourselves to apply our energies and exert our efforts to the full extent of our ability toward the fulfilment of those purposes for which this institution has been founded.

Address by Prof. Felix Adler.

It is with emotions difficult to express that I stand here before you to-day. After years of expectation and preparation, we are at last enabled to lay the corner-stone of our new building, and are planting ourselves in the community, declaring it our purpose to become one of the effective factors that build up the best life of our city. The presence of His Honor, the Mayor, and of the President of the Board of Education, is indeed most welcome and most helpful to us. Hitherto, we have labored in secret, hardly daring to expect a late recognition of our efforts. But, now that those in whose hands repose the educational interests of this metropolis have themselves perceived the importance of the reform that is here being attempted, we shall feel a new incentive to become indeed what is expected of us, to make this school a field of experiment where the newest and best methods may be tested not for the benefit of our pupils only, but, if possible, for the benefit of the entire public school system. We aim to be, in a word, the advance-guard of education, whose business it shall be to reconnoitre the obstacles that lie ahead, to suggest how they may be overcome, and to mark out the line of progress along which the whole host may safely follow. And nothing, let me say, can be more deeply the desire of our hearts than to maintain intact and sincere the cordial relations which have been established to-day between ourselves and the system of public education for whose advantage we are imposing upon ourselves such heavy burdens.

The laying of a corner-stone was in former times accompanied by the most cruel acts of superstition. As recently as in the Middle Ages, it was customary, when the corner-stone of a great public edifice was laid, to impale a human being in the foundation-wall, and usually it was a little child—some beggar's child, perhaps—that was selected to be thus walled up underneath the edifice. It was believed that a sacrifice must be brought to propitiate the unseen powers, and that the happiness of the more favored depended upon destroying the happiness of some less favored one. It is the very opposite spirit to that which has dictated our enterprise. The principle from which we start is that the highest happiness, even of the more favored, can only grow out of the common happiness of all. While, therefore, we aim at serving the general cause of reform in education, whose benefits will accrue to all classes, we are yet bound to confess that it is chiefly one class that interests us; namely, the class of the poor,—the working class. It is the cry of the poor that we hear constantly in our ears, the cry of the poor that constantly pierces our souls. And to help them is above all things what we desire. And precisely because we believe that there is no way of helping the poor so effective and so radical as education, therefore do we take a profound interest in education; and because, furthermore, we believe that education, to become really as serviceable as it might be, needs to be thoroughly reformed, therefore do we take so anxious an interest in the reform of education.

Now, it is chiefly in one direction that we believe our system of public education needs to be reformed; namely, in the direction of technical instruction. And here, again, I would warn you against a possible misunderstanding. The best possible system of education we desire for the poor: the best for the poorest is our motto. For as those who are the sickest need the best physician, so those who are poorest need the best educators and the best education. It is not, therefore, technical instruction on its own account that we value so much, but technical instruction as a part of the best possible system of instruction in general. Because no system of instruction seems to us at all adequate that does not supply an outlet and a stimulus to the productive faculty of the pupils, no matter whether those pupils are going to be merchants or lawyers or manufacturers or physicians in the future, therefore do we so earnestly demand technical instruction for the children of the working people. But it is not to be denied that there are also special reasons why the children of working people, who are likely to become working people themselves later on, should early receive the benefits of an elementary technical education. Let me briefly summarize a few of the points to be gained in this wise. First, technical instruction will enable the future workman to earn higher wages. This is an advantage which even the most obtuse can appreciate. While the tendency is to supplant unskilled labor more and more by machinery, the time will never come when the product of the machine will not stand in need of the finishing touch of human skill. The more skilled the workman is therefore, the more valuable will his service become, the more of the comforts and decencies of life will he be able to procure for himself. Secondly, by technical instruction in the schools, the wealth of the whole nation will be increased. Not only the individual wage-earner will be benefited, but the country as a whole will make a huge stride forward. That people will outstrip all others in the markets of the world whose industrial products embody the highest intelligence and taste. England was compelled to enter upon the path of industrial education, when she beheld herself beaten in the great Exposition by the superior intelligence and taste of the workman of France. In our own country, in legislatures and in the press, the cry for industrial education has already been raised; and we believe ourselves to be wholly in a line with a sound and wise national policy in the attempt to demonstrate the feasibility of industrial education. We believe that we are only doing what the dictates of enlightened selfishness themselves would suffice to urge upon us.

But higher than any servile obedience to the dictates of enlightened selfishness is the regard we owe to the principle of humanity. And the principle of humanity enjoins that we should increase the intelligence and develop the skill of the workingman, for no one is a true man who does his work without intelligence and without understanding. So long as the workman is a mere drudge, so long he is not a man. So long as he simply does what he is told to do without understanding the reason why, so long he is not a man. So long as his actions are mechanic-like, so long as he himself is a mere machine moving among machines, so long he is not a man, and his work will degrade and cannot elevate him. We hear much said about the dignity of labor, and many useless sermons are preached to the working people in the pulpit and the press upon the importance of their remembering that labor is dignified; but the truth is that labor, as at present carried on in too many instances, is not dignified, and no amount of preaching will make it so. It is wearisome, it is tedious to mind and body, it is a drag upon the energies, it is a heaviness to the human being that groans underneath its weight. But, if labor were only made more intellectual, then it would become more dignified. If the laborer could only be made to see the mental operations that underlie his manual operations, then the very work that now degrades would elevate him. For every form of manual labor is, as it were, a window that lets out on vast reaches of science. Even agriculture, perhaps the most toilsome of occupations, looks out on chemistry and geology. And the same is true in other directions: only the difficulty is that these windows are usually darkened, that the eyes of the workers are dim, and they do not look away from their immediate tasks to see what lies beyond them.

This, then, is the ultimate object of our efforts,—to increase the intelligence of the workingman, so that by added intelligence he may become more of a man. Not only that he may earn higher wages, not only that the value of the manufactured products may be enhanced, and the wealth of the country in dollars and cents may be increased, but that the humanity of the workingman may be enlarged, that the wealth of the country may be increased in a far nobler sense, that our land may become rich in the number of those who are true human beings, self-respecting as well as self-sustaining.

And, O friends, to these efforts our new school shall be dedicated. The problem before us is vast and difficult: we do not pretend that we have solved it; but the problem as such is clearly before our minds, and to its solution all our energies shall be bent. And, in attempting this great task, we feel that we are acting for the best interests of our country and of mankind at large; and we claim the right and the privilege of consecrating our efforts to these high interests. We are not here bounded in our undertaking by any narrow sectarian considerations. We come together here, in this common labor, members of various races, nationalities, and religious beliefs. We never stop to ask of any one who would join us what his opinions may be in respect to politics or creed. We simply ask whether he is willing to help in this great and glorious work; and, if he is, we count him as a brother, and so welcome him into our ranks.

We are—a part of us who have joined in this enterprise—descendants of a race that has been persecuted for the last eighteen centuries, upon which all the bitterness and fury of the hatred of men have been expended, and which even to-day in certain quarters of the world is not yet allowed to rest, but is made the object of atrocious outrages, before which the barbarities of mediæval persecution pale in comparison. But we do not therefore accept the inexcusable counsel—inexcusable it would be even on the part of the most bigoted—that the members of such a race should withdraw into their own lines, and become selfish and clanish in their charities, and shut themselves off from abounding sympathy with their fellows of every race, and regard all thought of human benevolence, outside their narrow ranks, only as an after-thought. Rather do we remember the noble words which the Buddha spoke,—it is now twenty-five hundred years ago,—that hatred is not conquered by hatred at any time, hatred is conquered by love. Rather do we remember that, if there is persecution even in our age, ignorance and barbarity are the cause of that persecution; that ignorance and barbarity therefore are the foes; that with these we must grapple; that these we must root out, that in removing them we are freeing the human race, we are freeing ourselves, and we are freeing also the pitiable persecutors from their own darkness and their crime.

And so, friends, let us go on in the path we have chosen. In it there is light, in it there is joy, in it there is satisfaction. And as we stand here to-day, members not of the one race that I have mentioned, but of various races, nationalities, and belongings, yet all bound together by one common and sacred purpose, let us remember in conclusion that this is the day which the will of the nation has set apart in order that on it may be recalled the great sacrifices which this people has brought for its liberty, and the examples of heroism and devotion which have secured the union of the States, in whose blessed protection we now stand. The winds of May breathe softly over thousands of graves, and thousands of loving hands are busy to-day strewing with flowers the places where sleep our unforgotten dead. These are solemn memories for any nation to have; but they convey not only tender reminiscences, but also warning and lessons to us, the survivors. The battles of the civil war were fought, whatever the nominal issue may have been, to vindicate the principle that labor shall be free, that the toil of one man in the service of another shall be justly requited, and that the workers must be redeemed from slavery. To-day, this principle in a higher form needs once more to be vindicated. Let us then do our part to vindicate it. Let us do what in our power lies to emancipate labor from the slavery of ignorance in which it is still enthralled. Let us endeavor to make the working classes intelligent: then we can safely trust them that they themselves will make themselves, in the full sense, free.

And so to the higher intelligence, the higher humanity of the working classes, do we dedicate this new building; and as we found it to-day in the glorious sunlight, so, when completed, in the light may it ever stand, itself a centre of light, radiating light far and wide throughout the community.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE REMEDY FOR IRISH TROUBLES.

Editors of The Index :—

Will you permit me to state in your columns what seems to me the only true remedy for Irish troubles, and why Ireland has been, for two centuries, in a state of perpetual, though sometimes latent, anarchy.

The chief cause of this, I cannot but think, is the political sentimentalism of the British people, which had led them, for fear of hurting the poor creature, to cut off its dog's tail inch by inch. We laugh at the French for believing that new street names and fine phrases effect administration or other reforms; but we English are victims of the same political childishness in worshipping as little gods things which are but means or symbols; as, for instance, trial by jury. Political institutions are like drugs; however beneficial a drug may be to a given person at a given time, it would work only mischief under different circumstances. Physical nearness destroys the power of perspective, and prevents the British from seeing that trial by jury, etc., are practically as inapplicable to Ireland as they would be to India.

The panacea for Irish troubles is nothing new; it was tried, and tried successfully, by King James; and the only reason why Ireland is not to-day as peaceable and prosperous as Southern England or Massachusetts is that his policy was not continued by his successors, except in a small way, by Cromwell. The British had a like state of things to struggle against in the Scotch Highlands, and they struggled in vain; till, after 1745, they removed the cause of the troubles to Canada and India. For with Celtic Irish, Highland Scotch, and red Indians, but one policy can be successful, and that is, to assert the right of eminent domain possessed by a race of superior civilization, just as it is possessed by man in general as against the beasts of the field. Making due allowance for exceptions, the Irish have no more right to be in Ireland than the red man to be in Massachusetts. The necessity of removal does not justify cruelty or injustice such as have been practised against the red men; a removal, however unpleasant a necessity, may be carried out with gentleness and kindness. Distributed throughout the world as the Jews are, the Irish would not only be a valuable element in the life of every nation among which they dwelt, but they would be better off themselves. When they form the numerical majority, they are a source only of evil.

A HARVARD GRADUATE.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

[We print the above letter, but think the writer's statement in regard to the cause of Irish troubles and what is needed to remedy them wide of the truth, and his estimate of the Irish people neither generous nor just.—Ed.]

IN MEMORIAM.

Editors of The Index :—

With deep regret, I have to record the unexpected demise, after a comparatively short illness, of William McDonnell, Jr., only son of the well-known Canadian liberal author, William McDonnell, Esq., of Lindsay, Ontario. Mr. McDonnell passed away at the family residency in Lindsay on Sunday morning last, at the early age of about thirty-three years. His sickness of about a month's duration was borne patiently and cheerfully, and he died like a philosopher. He leaves a widow and infant son.

Mr. McDonnell was a young man of irreproachable character, of fine abilities, and of superior education. As a consequence, notwithstanding his unconcealed heterodox opinions on theological questions, he was popular with all, and highly esteemed by his many friends.

In science, language, and literature, he was a great reader and diligent student. Besides his mathematical and classical attainments, he read German, French, and Spanish, and was well up with the results of modern scientific thought. After a very creditable career as a student, and having visited England, Ireland, France, and the United States, spending two years in the Polytechnic College, Philadelphia, where he graduated as a mining engineer, Mr. McDonnell was finally admitted to the bar of Ontario, at Osgood Hall, Toronto, as a barrister at law.

The deceased has filled various public positions of trust and responsibility with credit and ability; while his numerous excellent qualities and varied acquirements had marked out for him in the minds of his many friends a future career of honor, brilliancy, and usefulness. The great esteem and respect in which he was held were evinced by the largest funeral cortege ever seen in Lindsay. Business was suspended throughout the town during the solemn and painful ceremony of sepulture, and deep sympathy shown by all.

Mr. McDonnell, Sr., has the sincere sympathy of all Canadian Liberals in this sad bereavement of his only son, whose future was so promising, but whose sun has sadly set long before reaching the meridian of life.

ALLEN PRINGLE.

SELBY, ONTARIO, June 4, 1882.

[The young man of whose untimely death Mr. Pringle informs us, and whose character he well describes, we met and frequently conversed with during a visit to Lindsay four or five years ago; and his intelligence, education, and moral courage impressed us strongly, and led us to believe that a brilliant and useful career was before him. It is with deep regret and sorrow that we have learned of Mr. McDonnell's death. To the family from which he has been suddenly taken, we tender our heartfelt sympathy in their sad bereavement.—Ed.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

"SINCE the interdiction of Leaves of Grass by the Massachusetts authorities, writes a New York correspondent of the Springfield Republican, and the non-issue in consequence of the volume by James R. Osgood & Co., it is asserted that not less than six publishers here have written to Walt Whitman, offering very liberal terms for the privilege of issuing his very peculiar poems. The action of the State Attorney has given the work a far better advertisement than any ordinary amount of money would purchase."

MARY T. ROWLAND, President of the Parnell Branch Ladies' Land League, in a defiant open letter replying to the threat of Bishop Gilmore, of Cleveland, to excommunicate all Catholic women who persist in remaining members of the organization, writes: "In answer to your official of last week, and in the face of your terrible threats, I stand forth in the name of the women of the Parnell Branch of the Land League, and say that we will not deviate or falter in the righteous cause we have undertaken. . . . The stigma of immodesty, indelicacy, and political brawling you try to cast upon us, I fling back. Our conduct, our pure, high motives, would be worthy of imitation by any lady outside the Parnell Ladies' Land League."

A LONDON correspondent of the Nation mentions seeing Darwin at his home last January, and remarks: "He did not speak with any air of authority, much less dogmatism, even on his own topics; and on other subjects, politics for instance, he talked as one who was only anxious to hear what others had to say and resolve his own doubts. One remark struck particularly the two friends who had come to see him. He mentioned that Mr. Gladstone had some months before, while spending a Sunday in the neighborhood, walked over to call on him; and, speaking with lively admiration of the Prime Minister's powers, he added: 'It was delightful to see so great a man so simple and natural. He talked to us as one of ourselves. You would never have known what he was.' We looked at one another, and thought that there were other great men of whom this was no less true, and in whom such self-forgotten simplicity was no less beautiful."

A UNIQUE innovation in memorial anniversaries was that held recently in Jeffersonville, Ind., at the house of Mr. Dennis Murphy, a merchant of that city, in commemoration of the birthday of Mrs. L. M. Nicholson, a recently deceased sister of Mr. Murphy, and a lady of considerable ability and of liberal principles. Those who received cards of invitation to attend this anniversary "wondered greatly within themselves" what could be done or said on such an occasion that would be agreeable or pleasant, but found, before the evening was over, their queries satisfactorily answered. The invited guests found the parlors of their hosts prepared for the occasion with appropriate emblems, floral decorations, and mottoes arranged around the walls of the rooms, and a portrait of the deceased lady occupying a prominent position, surrounded by wreaths of immortelles, with the words "At Rest" below the picture. The exercises were opened by the singing of the hymn, "Let her rest," by a select quartette choir, followed by the reading by the hostess, Mrs. Murphy, of Mr. F. M. Holland's "Agnostic's Requiem," recently published in The Index. After this, Longfellow's beautiful poem, "Resignation," was read by Mrs. Reuben Daily; and his "Builders," by Miss Loomis. Mrs. Robinson then read Whittier's "The Eternal Goodness"; and Reuben Daily, editor of the Jeffersonville Daily News, read Bryant's "Thanatopsis." Longfellow's "Psalm of Life" was read by Miss Nicholson. A poem dedicated to the deceased was read by William Lee; and "Forsake not the Right," by the bereaved husband, Mr. Nicholson. At a rather late hour, the guests departed, softened in heart and elevated in thought by these dignified yet touching services, which seemed to rob the grave of half its victory and death of half its sting. Mr. Murphy, who was devotedly attached to the sister thus commemorated, designed by this means to throw a halo round the memory of a consistent Liberal, and thus to prove to friends that rationalism is not more gloomy in the face of death than is superstition. We cannot resist the inclination to add that we remember Mr. Dennis Murphy as an army comrade with whom, he being a devoted Catholic at that time, we had many animated discussions on the banks of the Potomac, twenty years ago. We saw him taken from the battle-field of Ball's Bluff during action, wounded and apparently dying; but he recovered, and we again met and shared together several months of Southern prison-life. When we parted, he was a "good Catholic"; and we never expected to hear of his adoption of liberal views.

BOOK NOTICES.

PARTIAL CORRECTIONS OF ENGLISH SPELLINGS is the title of a pamphlet published by Trübner & Co., London, issued under the sanction of the Philological Society of London, Eng., and offered for sale by Burns & Co. of New York. This treatise gives, in condensed form, the history and causes of many of the irrational features of our written and spoken language, and states succinctly the remedies needed, bringing into view at the same time the main obstacles that stand in the way of their adoption. The complications that hedge up the avenues to any reform so radical as that proposed require patient and vigorous handling. Doubtless, the changes constantly creeping into the most cherished usage will by slow degrees renovate the plague spots, but the ordinary eye consents only with reluctance to undo the forms so entangled with the busiest experience of daily life. The art of phonographic writing, which is growing so fast in popular favor, will prove a powerful stimulus toward the uprooting of useless items that encumber our common print. Mrs. Burns offers a variety of publications in the aid of this pursuit.

THE Unitarian Review for June is a bright and an interesting number. This magazine seems to gain in vigor and interest with every issue. In this number, Rev. John C. Kimball deals with "The Church as a Mediator between the Different Classes of Society," in which he utters many sensible thoughts as to the true uses of high culture. "Kant and his Critics," by Prof. B. C. Burt, will just now find many interested readers. A nameless writer discourses charmingly "On the Worship of the Natural." Theo. C. Williams treats of "The Moral Dynamic," "Spirit" inspires the pen of Rev. James C. Parsons, and "Living from Hand to Mouth" is the pertinent subject of Rev. Rufus Ellis' article. The "Editors Note-Book" and "Review of Current Literature" will be found full of interest.

OPTIMISM.

Thoughts suggested by a Bright, Beautiful Morning.

There is beauty all around, all around:
Though we may not comprehend
That a scourge may be a friend;
Though we may not always see,
Holding not the one true key
In the hand as we're journeying around,
There is goodness all around.

There is love all around, all around:
Can you see, my honest friend,
That this life is not the end;
That "the grave is not the goal"
Of a man's true, inmost soul?
What a pleasure in the truth we have found,—
There is justice all around!

UNDER THE ROSE.

An atom of conscious matter
Returns to its repose
Under the leaves of autumn,
Under the winter snows,
Under the first spring grasses,
Under the bloom of the rose.

An atom once unconscious,
Unknown and unknown,
It woke to life and feeling,
To know and to be known.
It felt a little pleasure,
A little more of pain;
When full the scanty measure
It becomes unknown again.
The atom's life is over,
It seeks its old repose
Under the leaves of autumn,
Under the winter snows,
Under the fragrant clover
Under the bloom of the rose.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

AFTER more than a year's absence, the Princess Louise has returned to Canada and her husband, the Marquis of Lorne, who has been for the most of that time a Marquis forlorn.

JOHN L. STODDARD, the lecturer, was arrested in the neighborhood of Warwick Castle a few days ago for trespass. A few shillings mollified the over-officious individual who made the arrest.

THE tablet placed by Alderman Stebbins on the fence surrounding the site of the old elm, on the Common, will read, "The old elm destroyed by a gale, Feb. 15, 1876. This elm planted A.D. 1876."

THE murdered Chief Secretary of Ireland, Lord Frederick Cavendish, was the nephew by marriage of the Premier of England; and Gladstone loses by his death not only a beloved relative, but a faithful adherent to his policy.

THE Czar of "all the Russias" has promised to promise to "renounce the devil and all his works" in behalf of the great-grandson of Kaiser William of Prussia; that is, he is to be god-papa to the new heir to the German throne.

OSCAR WILDE's second and (presumably) last appearance on a Boston platform called out but a small audience to the Globe Theatre on the 2nd inst. His lecture is reported as an eloquent plea for beauty in every-day life. As Mr. Wilde is generally from fifteen minutes to half an hour behind time, making his audience wait for him, a lecture from somebody to him on punctuality might not be amiss; but, then, a man who gets himself up in the stunning style described by an enthusiastic Herald correspondent as follows really needs extra time for his toilet: "He was clad in a suit of black velvet, coat, waistcoat, and knee breeches. Around his stalwart neck and down his stalwart chest fell a profusion of lace, and the same material adorned his robust wrists. He looked big and strong, and quite picturesque. A murmur of appreciation arose from his admirers in the auditorium. His attitudes, during the delivery of his hour and a half lecture, were supposedly graceful and statuesque, or sculptural. His long hair flowed romantically down upon his broad and sturdy shoulders."

Frothingham's Sermons.

The sermons are neatly printed in pamphlet form, and our friends who wish to do missionary work for the Liberal cause will find them admirably adapted to that purpose. To such as order them in lots of 25 or more, the price will be reduced to 3 cents. Single copies 5 cents.

THE citizens of Virginia are righteously indignant over the proposal, at this late day, to move the remains of Thomas Jefferson from the "sacred soil" of Virginia to Washington. "The mother of Presidents" is naturally enough averse to having the bones of one of her most honored and loyal sons removed for the purpose of adding fame to another part of the Republic. And the "degenerate" grand-daughter of Jefferson, who proposed this removal, has been refused the liberty to carry out her wishes.

THAT superstition is far from eradicated, and still survives even in the most cultured classes of society, is clearly demonstrated in the recent "pilgrimage" to the shrine of "Our Lady of Lourdes" by the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk with their son, the infant Earl of Arundel, in the hope that a miracle would be worked in the restoration to sight of the baby earl, who is blind and ill. But though the faith which could thus survive the scientific iconoclasm of this age must be much stronger than a grain of mustard seed, yet in this case it has been found to be of no avail.

IT appears from reports of the proceedings of a meeting of the New England Society of Friends, recently held at Newport, that the society numbers over four thousand; that last year there were only twenty-nine births, which fact was regarded as an indication that the society was losing ground, although it was stated that more than one-half the members married persons of other denominations, whose children were not included in the above number. Among the causes given in explanation of the decline of the society were included the conditions of New England, which are unfavorable to large families, and the emigration of many Friends to other parts of the country.

ON the 12th inst., a vote was taken in the House of Lords on the motion ordering to its second reading the bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. The vote stood 128 for and 132 against the motion, showing an adverse majority of four. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Albany, and nearly all the members of the Government, voted with the minority; but the dispatch states that all the bishops were united in opposition to the motion. In the House of Commons, the acceptance of the bill is beyond doubt; and a favorable vote in the Upper Chamber would be equivalent to enactment. The proposed change in the English marriage law is likely to be effected at no distant day.

THE medical officer of the State Board of Health of San Francisco, in a recent report of the sanitary condition of that city, speaks in the following terms of praise of the hygienic habits of the much reviled Chinese: "They eat to live, and do not live to eat. They are clean in their habits, and they drink no whiskey. I have never seen a drunken Chinaman in my life. They consequently obtain a better resisting power to the attack of disease. They constantly wash themselves, and keep themselves and their clothes clean. The death rate is greater among the whites than among the Chinese, greater with adult white people than with adult Chinamen. There have been no epidemics among them; and there has been less small-pox among them than among the whites, the ratio of population being allowed."

"A SPECIAL to the Tribune," says the Religio-Philosophical Journal, "sets forth that political circles are very much animated in Milwaukee, Wis., over the quarrel between the Hon. Arthur Bate and the Roman Catholics. In the Legislature last winter, Mr. Bate supported the Church Taxation Bill and other measures which were opposed by the Catholics, thus bringing down upon his head the bitter condemnation of the whole denomination. Mr. Bate is a trenchant writer, and the controversy is ably handled on both sides. He claims that the followers of the Pope are bent upon overthrowing the public school system and eventually controlling this government. The quarrel will be as protracted as it is bitter." Next week, we shall publish a letter from our Milwaukee correspondent, giving an account of the controversy referred to in the above paragraph.

A SPECIAL correspondent of the London Daily News, with the English Eclipse Expedition, says that on May 17, "while the sky darkened and assumed a leaden hue, the hills bounding the Nile bathed in purple, the great silence gave way, and from river and palm-shaded slope arose a shout of wonder and fear, which reached its climax at the moment of the sun's disappearance, nor ceased then; for in addition to the horror of an eclipse—which the natives here as in India attribute to the act of a dragon—there appeared in the heavens, on the right of the sun, an unmistakable scimitar." The eclipse had brought to view a new comet. All the astronomers in the world, however, would not be able to convince those superstitious natives that the sword-shaped comet they saw on that terrible day was not an omen of the warlike events which have since transpired in Egypt.

MICHAEL DAVITT, the Irish patriot, in a speech in New York last Monday night, said: "I am convinced that a calm consideration of the question will dissipate the idea that the nationalization of the land of Ireland is any more of a recognition of England's right to rule us than is involved in the payment of taxes or in calling upon its government to advance the necessary funds for the carrying out of the scheme of peasant proprietary. While I yield to no Irishman alive in my allegiance to the principle of Ireland's right to govern itself, I would infinitely prefer to deal directly with an English government than with its exacting and unscrupulous mercenaries, the Irish landlords. Better to have the land of our country administered by even an executive English authority than see it made the instrument of social slavery and degradation, of tyranny and exaction, by the merciless and polluted hands of Irish landlordism."

SOME of the colored churches are very mild in their discipline of sinners within their folds. We read lately of the arrest of a member of a colored church in Washington for stealing chickens; and, though it was proven in court that such thieving was his regular occupation, yet his pastor visited him in jail, and comforted him with the assurance that the congregation would raise the amount of his fine, which they did at the next meeting. And a colored preacher of Alexandria, Va., who whipped his wife, and was fined four dollars therefor, not having any money with which to pay his fine, begged from the judge who sentenced him a week in which to raise the sum. On the next Sunday, he preached from the text, "Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth," and proved conclusively to his congregation that his love for his wife led to her punishment, and appealed to his hearers to contribute the amount of his fine, which he succeeded in raising after passing the hat six times.

THE Boston Commonwealth sees nothing wrong in political assessment for party purposes. "We are not of those," it says, "who think the office-holders should be exempt from this tax. They are the very ones who should bear the burdens of what is needed to maintain their party. This is expected of them in the best circles even." That is to say, whoever works for the government should also work for the party. A good reply to assumptions of this sort we find in the Springfield Republican. It asks: "Is the armorer or the postal clerk paid more than he earns? If he is, the government is extravagant and wasteful. But, if not, why should these public servants be taxed to support the Republican party? Oh, but party government requires it. Not at all. Party government requires nothing of the kind. We have no party government. But, if we had, it would govern through Congress and the President and his cabinet. Armorers, navy-yard employes, postal clerks, letter-carriers, the one hundred thousand civil officers of the United States government, have nothing to do with party government. These are each employed for specific tasks, not partisan, but in the service of the whole people. For the party in power to demand their political services and their money is a monstrous usurpation, which it is time to throw off."

PROFESSOR ADLER'S ADDRESS.

In that part of the report of the late Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association which we publish this week, our readers will find the address of Professor Adler, in which he gave his reasons for withdrawing from active participation in the Association's affairs. As presiding officer on the occasion, we did not deem it our place to reply to the address at that time, but in the brief remarks at its conclusion, prefatory to introducing the next speaker, we took occasion to call attention to the central thesis of his speech,—that the practical result of the Free Religious Association should appear in better work for human benefit,—as not removing him from actual participation in promoting the objects and purposes which the Association has chiefly at heart. But this, it is evident, did not meet the whole range of Professor Adler's criticism. Doubtless, he would admit that the professed aim of the Association, as declared in its constitution and in the official reports from time to time of its Executive Committee, is the social and moral improvement of humanity.

But the chief point of his criticism is directed against the methods and practical policy of the Association. His arraignment is that it has not put its professions into practice; that it provides for discussion, but does nothing else; that it talks, but does not act. And his criticism thus considered shows such a misconception of the position of the Free Religious Association and of its relation to the liberal cause and work as to call now for further comment.

The address seems to us to exhibit three strange misconceptions. First, Dr. Adler arraigns the Association as if it were only a Boston society, and were thus responsible for the delinquencies in practical philanthropy which he charges against Boston Free Religious circles, and apparently against the Parker Memorial Society in particular. In point of fact, the Free Religious Association, though having its headquarters and holding its annual meeting in Boston, is a national society, and always has been. It has a membership scattered through the country. It has had at times, if it does not have now, as many members in New York as in Boston. Its officers represent nine different States. Though its directors have been chosen with some reference to convenience of attending committee meetings in Boston, a majority of them have not been residents of Boston nor its suburbs. As to connection with the Parker Memorial Society, there have not been during the fifteen years of the Association's existence more than two or three officers of the Association who were members of that Society. Dr. Adler was addressing an audience, of which it may be safely said that not one-third of it was made up of residents of Boston. The annual meetings of the Free Religious Association are gathered from numerous towns of Massachusetts, and from all the New England States, with representatives not a few from more distant parts of the country. As a national association, drawing its funds from a constituency spread through many States, it cannot be expected to establish in Boston such special beneficent institutions as workingmen's institutes and hospitals and young men's reform societies more than in New York or Philadelphia or Chicago. The Free Religious Association seeks—to quote from a standing notice of the objects of The Index—"to emancipate religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare." But it necessarily leaves the establishment of the special practical institutions and works that would come in the line of this aim to its members in their several localities, and to the awakening sentiment of society in general. It disseminates the ideas, urging that they should and must result in increased moral and philanthropic activity. And, as a matter of fact, the members of the Association are engaged in their several communities—in Boston, Providence, Florence, New York, Cincinnati, St. Paul, Milwaukee, and numerous other places—in doing various works for human benefit according to local conditions and needs, though not always copying the excellent models of philanthropy which Mr. Adler is organizing in New York. The relation of the conventions and discussion which the Association provides to these local and individual applications of its teachings is precisely the same as the relation which Mr. Adler's Sunday lectures bear to his charitable organizations. There he "talks,"—"discusses" questions both speculative and practical,—in order that people may be incited to more thoughtful and earnest activity in these works of humanity during the week. So the Free Religious Association brings earnest talkers together on its platform to promote that mental and moral education which shall result in more thoughtful and vigorous efforts for human welfare. And to arraign the Association as doing nothing, because it does not itself establish local philanthropies, is as unreasonable as it would be to complain of the National Social Science Association for not cleaning the streets of New York or building sewers in Memphis, or to decry the National Teachers' Institute as useless, because it does not support a model school in Boston.

But, though the Free Religious Association is not to be expected to locate philanthropic institutions in Boston, Mr. Adler seems to us seriously to err again in underrating the beneficent work that is being done in "Free Religious circles" in Boston. Possibly, these circles might be doing more in some specifically organized way of their own. And particularly do we think that the Parker Memorial Society might strengthen itself in numbers and resources as well as more largely benefit the community, were it in its organized capacity to take charge of some special field of practical philanthropy. But, whatever may be said on this point, it cannot be denied that members of that little band who still keep alive the society that Theodore Parker founded, and also the "Free Religious circles" generally in and around Boston, are fully represented in the charitable and educational activities for which the city is noted. And when Mr. Adler exclaims, "What living thing for the good of mankind, for the perfecting of morality among yourselves and others, has emanated within the last twenty years from the Free Religious circles of this city?" he goes beyond the limits of rhetorical license, and commits an injustice against men and women who were growing gray in the service of humanity before he was old enough even to think of his work in New York. To go back only "twenty years," it has been within that time that the Freedmen's Commission has done its extensive and most excellent work among the negroes in the South,—a society that in Boston was very largely officered and supported by those who would be counted in "Free Religious circles." It has been within that time that the Public Library has been opened on Sunday,—a result which Liberals in religion were conspicuous in achieving. It has been within that time that the Art Museum opened its doors, too, on Sunday; and the movement that effected this object (though the fact has not before been made public) was begun in the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association. It has been within that time that the New England Hospital for Women and the Moral Education and Moral Reform Societies and the Society for promoting the Higher Education of Women have come into existence,—all of them extensively helped, some of them almost sustained, by the same class of men and women that are found in the Free Religious conventions and on the Free Religious platform. Other beneficent societies and institutions might be named, to say nothing of individual charity, in which the "Free Religious" people of Boston are specially prominent. Our Cambridge correspondent, in another column, opportunely and justly treats this point; and we need not dwell on it longer. Mr. Adler has been so absorbed in his own noble enterprises in New York that he has not had time to learn of all the beneficent work that his comrades in the Free Religious movement have been doing in Boston and elsewhere. And on some points of social and moral reform, as is natural from his years and partial educational isolation from other reformers, he appears to be just awakening to facts and principles that have been long familiar to those older in the field. If he should reply that these beneficent activities do not come distinctly in the name of "Free Religion," it must be said that it is one of the principles of "Free Religion" to work for humanity with others, wherever work can be done without compromise of any religious convictions. Mr. Adler has himself recognized this fact by disconnecting the benevolent organizations which he has originated in New York from the Society for Ethical Culture, so that people who may not like his religious views or his Sunday services may not thereby be deterred from joining in the philanthropic work which they do like.

Dr. Adler's third misconception is one that appears first in his address, but which we place last, because of its theoretical rather than practical character. In referring to the fact that the Free Religious Association has laid special stress on the idea of the sympathy of religions, he points out, and properly, the danger that this idea of the sympathy of religions may be pressed so far that distinctness of individual religious conviction may be lost, and with it that intellectual vigor which always goes with strong individual conviction. He then adds that, so far as Free Religion means a free platform for all religious opinions, and that this free platform is to be a substitute for a definite religion of his own, he has never been able to stand on its ground. This remark, we think, explains a certain sensitiveness which Mr. Adler has always shown on the Free Religious platform, lest his own convictions were somehow to be compromised by the differing convictions of other speakers. The remark, also, in our view, discloses his failure to comprehend one of the most fundamental principles of the Free Religious Association; namely, its assertion, in the interest of truth, of the right of differing religious opinions to a full and fair hearing, each speaker speaking on his own individual responsibility, but each also, for the same reason, being left perfectly free to urge his own opinion, there and elsewhere, with all the mental and moral power at his command. In offering a free platform for various religious opinions, and in emphasizing the idea of the sympathy of religions,—that is, the historically demonstrable fact of the similarity and even identity of certain religious and moral elements in all the religions,—the Association never dreamed of merging the individual religious convictions of its members into a general mass of "nebulous sympathy." Rather has it aimed to secure free room and opportunity for the development and assertion of individual conviction, not only in pulpits and on platforms, but in pews and in society at large. It says to every man: Stand, wherever you are, faithfully to your own guns, having once rationally chosen and planted them. Think and speak your own best thought, without fear or favor. Have and declare a conviction of your own, and not merely echo another's. But at the same time remember that both you and the people around you may be benefited by hearing impartially your neighbor's honest conviction on the other side of the way. This, according to our understanding, is the position of the Free Religious Association on this point. This certainly is the principle laid down in its constitution. And, therefore, we entirely fail to see why the fact that Mr. Adler has "a distinct religious conviction" of his own should compel him "to retire from active participation in the affairs of the Association,"—if he still adheres to the principle of free discussion and liberty of individual conviction for all.

We have criticised Dr. Adler's address with the same friendly candor with which he made the address. But we cannot close without again affirming our entire acceptance of his major premise that Free Religion, like every other form of religion or of philosophy, is to be finally tested by the benefit it brings to mankind. If it be true, it cannot but be helpful and healthful to humanity. Nor would we say one word to break the force of his stirring appeal for more of moral and philanthropic activity in all local societies and circles of Liberalism. Our aim has been simply to correct these misconceptions which his address exhibits concerning the position of the Free Religious Association and concerning the actual practical work done in Boston and other local "Free Religious" circles, and also to point out the usefulness of a general association in which local teachers can come together to compare views and methods and to inspire one another to clearer thinking and to better work in the future.

And that none may possibly misunderstand us as disparaging Mr. Adler's own work, we wish to say again that we have the greatest admiration for his power as an organizer of practical philanthropy, and for that wonderful gift of impressive and inspiring speech which is such a force behind his organizations. We rejoice every day to be able to point to the work he is doing as one of the practical forms of Free Religion. And we expect his work to grow in this direction to something much greater than he has yet achieved or attempted. We wish there were a thousand such practical workers as he in the liberal ranks of this country. But that also is most needful work which aims specially to clarify and strengthen thought and to disseminate ideas.

WM. J. POTTER.

PROBABLE RESULTS OF DISESTABLISHMENT.

I have endeavored to make it clear on what a slender base, either of force or reason, the Established Church of England reposes. This shows that the hour of disestablishment is drawing nigh. The question may not perhaps assume vast proportions just at present, because the English people are occupied with other and more immediately pressing questions. But, as these are settled, the church question will more and more definitely force itself on popular attention; and, whenever it is once admitted into what is called the "region of practical politics," the issue is as absolutely certain as anything human can be. Religious equality will become a fact in England by separation of the Anglican Church from the British government. What will be the probable results of this great revolution, for revolution it will certainly be? There will be two sets of results,—one political, the other religious. In the political sphere, the disestablishment of the State Church will ultimately, though not immediately, involve also that of the monarchy and aristocracy. There can be no doubt of this. Of course, the average English Dissenter, who dislikes the Church of England on social, ecclesiastical, or what he calls "Scriptural" grounds, has no thought of attacking the monarchy to which, he would tell you—and with all sincerity—he is devotedly attached. But it is the merest commonplace of history that men are quite ignorant of the ultimate and necessary consequences of their deeds. Hampden and Pym had in their minds no thought of the execution of Charles I., when they resisted the despotic pretensions of that monarch. When Washington in like manner withstood the monstrous claims of the English government, he had no conception that he was laying the foundation of a democratic republic, to which men from all tribes, nations, and races should resort alike, new both in form and essence in the history of the world. And, if this be true of such great figures in human history, how can it be supposed that the respectable non-conformist deacon, who is ready to go into ecstasies about Queen Victoria, can imagine, when he gives his subscription to the society for the liberation of religion from State patronage and control that he is helping on a movement which shall relegate that royal lady's descendants to the sphere of private life? Yet such seems to me the probable, nay, certain result of disestablishment. Both Church and Crown are parts of a system built up in past times, the outcome of the thought of those times, but wholly unsuited to our own age. Let a principal factor of that system be eliminated, and the system itself is broken up, never again to be restored.

"It is a massy wheel,
Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
Are mortised and adjoined; which, when it falls,
Each small annexment, petty consequence,
Attends the boisterous ruin."

This is doubtless an important reason why so many who care nothing for the Church as a church are anxious to preserve the ecclesiastical establishment. The preservation of that establishment signifies the perpetuation of the historic form (as well as essence) of the English political system. That which is true of the monarchy is true of the aristocracy likewise. The Church serves as a bulwark of privilege: it is closely allied with the aristocracy, dependent for its prestige upon them as they upon it. The country rectories are nearly all in the gift of the landholders, and so the parson and squire are bound to be close friends and allies. They are usually of the same politics, of the same social creed, often of the same class. They have been together to the same public school and university, and have necessarily imbibed the same class prejudices, the same sectional traditions. When, therefore, you strike at one, you necessarily affect the position of the other also. Supposed by its early constitution to be the common heritage of all, its funds public either in their origin or in their application, the Anglican Church has gradually become, like nearly everything else in England, the mere appanage of the aristocratic and wealthy classes of society. The affections of most of its clergy centre in these classes, and these classes make use of the Church to serve their own political interests. So much is this so, that, as I have already said, the average clergyman is the most useful Tory electioneering agent. The Anglican Church teaches the people to "obey," to "submit themselves," to be content with their lot, to honor the magistrates, and so on; while, by its fulsome adulation of the throne and the royal family, it serves, more than any other cause, to keep up that absurd superstition about monarchy which is the most patent blot on the public life of England at the present time. Prof. Huxley says, and says truly, that large numbers of English people imagine that the "Queen and the gentlefolk" govern the country very much as King David and the elders governed the people of Israel. The number of those who are controlled by this sort of superstition is diminishing, thanks, largely, to the spread of education; but the disestablishment of the Anglican Church will be a powerful stimulus to popular intellectual instruction. The Queen and the peers and the clergy are all partners in a great political system, which most men of intellect really despise, which the masses of the people care very little about, but which is kept up largely on account of the influence of the teaching of the Church of England on a great section of that middle class which still controls English politics.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND.

MR. WASSON ON LIGHT AND LIFE.

Mr. Wasson has given a very interesting statement in The Index, June 1, of some of his objections to the evolution philosophy, showing the repugnance naturally felt by his school of philosophy to what is called "materialism." And yet the closing words of his article indicate dissatisfaction with his present views, and that he is probably in a transition state, waiting for more evidence to bring him over to a belief in evolution. "Whoever shall clearly prove his argument fallacious will have the hearty thanks of one person, if of no more."

To prove clearly his argument fallacious would occupy more space than The Index could afford, and I fear would require more ability than the writer possesses; but I would respectfully refer him to Spencer's Biology, Vol. I., part third, on the Evolution of Life, and Vol. II., on Organic Development including the development of the eye, the ear, etc. In the mean time, however, it may do some good to point out where Mr. Wasson makes the frequent mistake of confounding the subjective with the objective.

"What we know as light is a creation of the brain, does not exist objectively because the sun's rays are dark." Certainly, the sun's rays exist whether we see them or not; and the effect produced upon the brain, through the means of the retina and nerve tissue, we call light. "Life" does not make the light, brain does not make the light, any more than a piano or an organ creates the music we delight to hear. The sun's rays have to play upon the retina, just as Ole Bull has to play upon the violin or piano to call forth its melody.

The "sense" represents light as external, referring to the sun's rays as the cause; but, when referring to its subjective effect, of course it is internal. What we know as light exists by the play of natural forces (sun's rays, etc.) upon the brain, just as what we know as music exists by the play of natural forces (musician's fingers, etc.) upon the piano. The optic nerve is sensitive to the excitement of the retina, just as the piano strings are sensitive to the fingers of the musician, and give forth the "glorious melodies" of an Ole Bull or a Beethoven. "If the optic nerve be mechanically pressed, light issues from the ganglia, though the eye be in perfect darkness, or even though it be destroyed." Certainly, this is true; and if an Æolian harp be placed in a window, so that the wind can play upon it, we shall have music,—much more real music than the light produced by pressure is real light.

"Every one has at some time had a blow upon the eye which caused him to 'see stars.' Such light is not vision; but, nevertheless, it is evolved from within rather than from without." Certainly, this is true; and so is the fact that, if you strike a piano or a harp a blow, you will have music which comes from within the instrument, but it is not good music any more than the light caused by the blow upon the eye is good light.

So with the sense of sound, caused by the undulatory air motion. Sound is the subjective effect, but the objective air-waves are a reality outside of the mind. Sound is not a product of nerve fibre any more than music is a product of the piano. Nerve fibre and brain are the instruments played upon by external forces, just as the piano is played on. So with all the senses: they are "played upon" by the external forces of nature, and it would be as untrue to say the piano creates all the melodies we delight to hear as to say the nervous structure creates all our sensations. There would be no sensation, unless there were external forces to play upon the organization,—just as there would be no music, unless there were some musician to play upon the instrument.

So with perception and thought. Forces from without call them into play. There could be no thought, unless the senses were first operated upon: no reflection, no reason. "External forces can only appeal submissively to existing powers of the organization." This is not true: on the contrary, sensation, emotion, and thought are constantly active independently of the will, so much so that no person, while awake, can remain even for five minutes without a current of thought or feeling passing through his brain. And so with the emotions and sentiments: love, joy, fear, hope, etc., are all excited into action independently of the will by external forces. All that man can claim is a certain limited control of sensation, thought, and emotion; and even this control depends upon a stronger feeling, which surroundings have developed either in himself or his ancestors.

"The light waves and sound waves humbly deposit their effect at the retina and at the tympanum, and are not admitted further." Not so humbly, seeing that their effects are independent of the will. We can't help seeing, can't help hearing, whether we will or not. "If external influences can only address and submit themselves to powers of the organism already existing, if their fitness to be in any degree influential arrives only subsequent to a formative effect gone before, the assumed all-potency of environment is a conception very much strained." This is fully answered by Spencer's Biology, Vol. II., on Organic Development. So far as external influences submitting themselves humbly to the organism, the reverse holds true: the organism submits itself to the surroundings,—can't help growing when the outward conditions are supplied with the chemical elements in the food, and can't help dying, if they are not supplied.

"What is the order of relation between life and its surroundings?" The answer is, The principles and powers of life are addressed and supplied from without. But, says Mr. Wasson, these principles to be addressed and the power to receive, transform, and put to use the elements furnished, must be already there. Whence did they come from, then? Special creation? This is answered by Spencer's Biology, on the Evolution of Life, etc. Where does the germinal principle of morals come from? Is it a special creation, or has it been gradually evolved? Mr. Wasson admits moral principle grows. "Get the acorn, and you may have an oak." But where did the acorn come from? See Spencer's Biology, Vol. II., on Evolution of Plants, Trees, etc., and Data of Ethics.

Mr. Wasson's recapitulation or "resuming" may be best answered by adding the word "subjective."

"Nothing is in the nature of subjective light until there is sight," "nothing in the nature of subjective sound until there is hearing," etc. Hence, it would be rational to suppose that objective light (sun's rays) has made sight, objective sound (vibrating waves) has made hearing. "Life" is forced to use the elements beneath and around it (or perish); and the user, life, is the product of the thing used and of its environment.

J. E. SUTTON.

A CHURCH OF SOCIAL WORTH.

We are told that the famous Robert Hall confessed that reading Miss Edgeworth's novels (a once universally popular novelist, whose works are unknown to the present generation of novel-readers) hindered him for weeks in his clerical functions. He was completely disturbed by her pictures of a world of happy, active people, without any visible interference of religion,—a sensible, and, on the whole, healthy world, in which there was no prayer nor exhortation, no allusion to the supernatural persons of theology whatever, or the evangelical scheme of salvation, and no apparent alarm concerning the state of souls here or hereafter. The great preacher found himself intensely interested in Miss Edgeworth's delineations and characters, although the fact of Christianity was utterly ignored by her. In other words, the world which she sketched was strictly human and natural, and its people lived the life of their own time and locality without any reference to the notions, ideas, and beliefs of a remote and barbarous past. And who will say that a community which lives such a life—the life of to-day according to the ideas of the present—is not likely not only to be a wiser and more prosperous community, but also a more moral one than are those stagnant races which cling blindly to the past, and will not leave the ruts of antiquated beliefs and usages? Everybody knows that the most intelligent, orderly, thriving, kindly, progressive communities of to-day are precisely those in which the external signs or visible symbols and emblems of religion are fewest and least obtrusive, and in which the activity and stir have reference to this life and its needs and requirements. In such enlightened and powerful communities as the United States, Northern Germany, and Great Britain,—communities which are thoroughly alive with the life of this epoch, and which are the leaders and chief promoters of current civilization, the traveler sees no wayside shrines, sees no poverty-stricken peasants kneeling in public to worm-eaten images of gods and saints, sees no gaudy pomps and processions of the religious sort. The English poet Swinburne had to go to the continent to write his "Before a Crucifix":—

"Here, down between the dusty trees,
At this lank edge of haggard wood,
Women, with labor-loosened knees,
With gaunt backs bowed by servitude,
Stop, shift their loads, and pray, and fare Forth with souls easier for the prayer."

In Asiatic countries, religion and devotion are everywhere in the foreground. Everything is primitive, everything is done in the name of Allah and his prophet. At certain hours of the day, all occupations are brought to a standstill, and the populace, wherever they happen to be, and without reference to what they may have on hand, prostrate themselves in a perfect fever of devotion, becoming suddenly transfixed and insensible to all things about them. Their devotion is perfect. But what is the social, moral, intellectual, and material condition of Mohammedan communities? It is deplorable, a disgrace to human nature. But their piety and religiosity are exemplary, and to the last degree admirable. If we pass from Islam into Spain and Italy, we shall find not such an intense and fierce religious spirit as characterizes Orientals, but still piety and devotion and religious symbols and emblems are everywhere obtrusive. Prayer and beggary strike the observer on all hands. Other worldly interests are in the foreground, brass and crucifix are visible everywhere. Goethe tells in his Italian Journey (if I am not mistaken) how this symbol of Christianity became associated in his mind ever after with the smell of garlic. And what is the condition of the masses in Latin Europe? It is a condition of complete mental, moral, and material destitution.

The newspapers have just chronicled the landing at Castle Garden of more than a thousand Neapolitan emigrants, with not more than fifty dollars in the whole crowd to begin life with in the New World. It is a curious fact, that while the people of enlightened, progressive countries are becoming more and more intelligent in regard to man and nature, and more and more capable of utilizing the forces of nature in the interest of progress and civilization, they are obliged frankly to confess their utter ignorance of supernatural persons and things, of which they never have any personal experience whatever. For their knowledge of such is second-hand, traditional hearsay knowledge derived from the alleged experiences of people who lived twenty and thirty centuries ago. In view of this fact, the new terms agnostic and agnosticism have been brought into circulation, to describe the mental attitude of intelligent modern men and women toward the mysticisms and supernaturalisms of the past. They do not really know of their own knowledge anything at all about such matters. But fortunately their knowledge of things within the circle of nature goes on increasing. Thus it happens that the religion of to-day is getting to be more and more a religion of social worth, right conduct, ethical culture, universal tolerance, cosmopolitan largeness of sympathy, kindness, and fair dealing. Mysticism and supernaturalism are at a discount, and the most popular church is one of character and an enlightened and kindly this-worldliness. If this life should turn out to be a vestibule of another, it is not therefore to be lived as if it was of no account; because it is a stage in our spiritual history, uncertain, it is true, as to its continuance, but still a stage. Meantime, by way of foretaste of a better social condition in the future, it is well occasionally to recall Emerson's fine lines:—

"When the State House is the hearth
And the church is social worth,
Then the perfect state has come
The republican at home"

Then politicians, office-holders, and demagogues will have become extinct species, and there will be needed only a minimum of government or no government at all.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Catholic press has been unitedly and abusively vociferous for the recall of Minister Lowell from London, but by the wildness of its abuse has probably hurt its own cause. Latterly, it has been aided by more influential secular journals, notably by the New York World and Herald. Doubtless, strong influence has been brought to bear on the administration to effect such a result. The argument of the Herald rests chiefly on the ground that Mr. Lowell does not satisfy a large section of American citizens,—a very poor reason, if there be no other. To our view, the head and front of Mr. Lowell's offending appears to be that he has tried to discriminate among the imprisoned American "suspects," between genuine naturalized American citizens temporarily residing abroad and a class of Irishmen who may have been in this country long enough to take out naturalization papers, but have gone back to Ireland and become de facto citizens there again, voting, paying taxes, and actively participating in the Irish disturbances. If a man gets into prison in a foreign country and appeals to the American flag for protection, he should be able to show that he counted himself under that flag before he got into prison; and, if he was a bona fide citizen of America, then he had no right to aid in fomenting rebellion against the government where he may chance to have been temporarily residing, America being at peace with such government. Mr. Lowell is no renegade American, but his course has been both wise and just.

THE Catholic Review for June 10 is in a very excited frame of mind. Zion's Herald, Col. Ingersoll, Swiss Liberalism, The Index, all come in for a share of its righteous (?) wrath. But the name of Garibaldi seems to have been the "red rag" that has specially enraged it. That the old hero of Italian liberty should be bedecked with praises so generally by the American press is more than this devoted advocate of the papacy can endure. Of course that he should have delivered the Two Sicilies from the rule of the Bourbons, and that his name should have been a tower of strength for the public opinion that made Italy one and free, are facts that only count for crimes in the judgment of the Review. Hear it:—

Garibaldi is dead, most probably as he lived. There is no news by the cable whether on his death-bed in Caprera he repented of his numerous crimes and endeavored to repair his sins of unbelief. His life was a notable one, in its own way. Without talent, without education, without morality, with a rejected faith, by a trampling under foot of every law, human and divine, he attained notoriety as a prominent agent of the secret societies of Europe. He was a type of the godless, creedless, and codeless civilization which the grand masters of the secret societies would substitute for the religion, the order, and the civilization of Christ. . . . It is shocking to find influential organs of public opinion, like the Tribune and the Herald, vying with each other in placing the halo of heroism and self-sacrifice on the brow of a dead rascal. Garibaldi was a rascal through and through; adventurous in his early life, but none the less a rascal. . . . We do not care to dwell on Garibaldi's known vices; but we say again it is shameful to set such a rascal up as a model or a hero. Is it possible to mention the names of Washington and Garibaldi in a breath? The one was a hero and a model citizen: the other was a cut-throat and a social leper.

The vices of Garibaldi, to which the Review refers, are not to be concealed nor excused because of his services for liberty. But the inquiry is pertinent whether the Roman Catholic Church, which for centuries has claimed to have the morality of Italy in its keeping, and has been the all-dominant power there, has itself set a higher standard of morality than that which Garibaldi has followed.

ORGAN-MUSIC.

For The Index.

When through storied windows bright
Falls the dim, religious light,
Echoing all the air with Iris sweet,
Then with mellow thunder deep
Let the ocean-throated organ speak;
Let its rolling billows sweep
Through our souls with might, with might!

'Tis not the voice of puny man
That issues from these pipes of Pan,
Nor yet some yearning spirit of the air.
Rather we seem to hear from out the skies,
Now low, now loud, through opened gates of Paradise,
The deep-toned viol, and the golden trumpet's blare,
And far hosannas from the innumerable caravan!

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THE True Religion, heretofore published at Norway, Me., has changed its place of publication to North Conway, N.H.

WE shall next week give our readers a contribution from Moncure D. Conway on "Mummies," an article by Capt. Robert C. Adams, a letter from Mrs. Caroline H. Dall, and other interesting communications, in addition to the report continued from this week of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association.

THE Kansas Liberal, removed from Valley Falls to Lawrence, Kan., with Mrs. Annie L. Diggs as managing editor, seems to have taken a new lease of life. It is a bright, breezy journal; and we wish the editors, Mr. Harmon and Mrs. Diggs, who are earnest workers in the field of liberal thought, the fullest success in their literary co-partnership.

THE Presbyterian, mentioning the fact that Herbert Spencer attended the "funeral of Darwin in the stately Abbey of Westminster," exclaims, "What a silence falls upon atheistic speculations when death steps in!" It were well if a similar silence fell upon dogmatic theology on such occasions, when, indeed, "Speech is silver, silence is gold," and when, as Holland says, "Silence is vocal, if we listen well."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Church Union asks the following pertinent question:—

Please inform me if it is considered honest and consistent for professed Christians to use the "Founder Fund" of Girard College to further the faith or beliefs which the founder endeavored to prevent? I did not write Andover.

The question is left unanswered. A fair statement of the facts relating to the practical violation of Stephen Girard's will, through the influence of Christian zealots, would show—what, however, need not be shown intelligent observers in these days—that a maximum of theological "faith or beliefs" is compatible with a minimum of honesty and fair dealing.

AN English lady, Mrs. Anna Kingsford, who is an enthusiastic emulator of Mr. Bergh's good work, and has written several severe anti-vivisection letters to Nature, recently gave an account before the Vegetarian Conference at Birmingham of her endeavors to eliminate from her clothing all products which involve the death of an animal. She had been successful, she stated, in doing so, though she had some difficulty in obtaining boots in the manufacture of which no particle of leather was used. This tender-hearted lady evidently does not realize the enormous destruction of animal life involved in the preparation of even vegetable textile fabrics, and necessitated by the very conditions of human existence.

MR. CHARLES BRIGHT of Australia (from whom we give an interesting letter this week) will speak next Sunday evening at Parker Memorial on "The World-wide Conflict,—Superstition vs. Freedom." This gentleman comes highly recommended as an accredited representative of the Dunedin (New Zealand) Free Thought Association and of the Liberal Association of New South Wales, whose President, speaking for the Association, says, "Mr. Bright is the ablest, most eloquent, and most philosophical liberal lecturer Australia has produced." Very favorable mention of his lectures has been made by the press of San Francisco, Chicago, and other cities in the United States in which he has spoken.

"THE Free Religious Association," says the Jewish Watchman, "has done much to increase freedom of thought. It has protested against every species of spiritual slavery, exposed many superstitious and erroneous theologies, and encouraged independence of thought and action in all matters of belief, character, or conduct. It was established for the purpose of affording a free discussion of the religious questions from its platform. . . . Men of reason have, since the last fifteen years' existence of the Free Religious Association, been closely connected with its cause; and we hope that the new president, Rev. William J. Potter, will exert himself to carry out the liberal objects and principles of the Association."

THE following we find in the Independent:—

. . . The Christian Intelligencer gives the fact that Darwin was a subscriber to the Boston Index as conclusive evidence of his infidelity. What is the significance of that other fact,—that he was a contributor to the South American Missionary Society? We recall the statement by an ecclesiastical dignitary of the Church of England,—that nobody, of any account, had ever questioned the Christian faith of this "holy man of God."

Will our able contemporary frankly state whether it regards Charles Darwin as a Christian, and whether it indorses the statement "that nobody, of any account, had ever questioned the Christian faith of this 'holy man of God'?" Does the Independent believe that either of these statements can be made honestly by any person who is in possession of such information as may be obtained in regard to the views of Darwin?

CHARLES DARWIN, after reading Cosmic Philosophy, wrote its author, John Fiske, as follows: "You must allow me to thank you for the very great interest with which I have at last slowly read the whole of your work. I have long wished to read something about the views of the many great men whose doctrines you give. I never in my life read so lucid an expositor (and therefore thinker) as you are; and I think that I understand nearly the whole, though perhaps less clearly, about cosmic theism and causation than other parts. It is hopeless out of so much to specify what has interested me most, and probably you would not care to hear. It pleased me to find here and there I had arrived, from my own crude thoughts, at some of the same conclusions with you, though I could seldom or never have given my reasons for such conclusions." We have here a splendid compliment to Mr. Fiske, and an example of modesty in a greater thinker which some of our younger philosophers would do well to follow.

MR. EDWIN D. MEAD, at the Cleveland Conference, according to a quotation from his speech which we find in the Christian Register, said of Mr. Adler's movement in New York:—

This New York movement seems to me, too, in its first principles, a genuinely Christian movement,—whatever it names itself,—because based on Kant; and what bases itself on Kant has God behind it, and if it be indeed a movement, and do not embalm itself, God and immortality before it.

Mr. Mead's logic is as execrable as the movement to which he refers is praiseworthy. It would be difficult to put into one short sentence more assumption and slipshod reasoning than are contained in the above quotation. What seems more than anything else to be needed by the adherents of the theologico-transcendental philosophy, of which the sentence given above is a sample, is a society for the promotion of clear thinking and accurate expression of thought. There is a clearness, consistency, and tonic strength in the old Calvinistic writers, which have tended to develop robustness of intellect and character, and thereby have helped to destroy the worst features of the theology they taught, that many who reject that theology would do well to cultivate.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

The Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 22, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association,
June 1 and 2, 1882.

THE PRESIDENT.—I have now the pleasure, friends, of introducing to you Mr. Felix Adler, whom I am sorry to have to introduce to you as an ex-President, but whom you will all, I know, be rejoiced to hear this morning in any capacity.

Address of Felix Adler.

I have come before you this morning with some reluctance,—a reluctance which is due to the fact that I shall have to make a few remarks which, while made in no spirit of unkindness, may yet be construed into a criticism. But, as my good friend Mr. Potter has just said that Religion usually swallows the arguments that are directed against her, and actually feeds on criticism, I trust that Free Religion will be in the like position, and will only derive additional nutriment from such arguments as may be brought forward. Indeed, I can say this the more earnestly, since the spirit of my remarks is certainly, at the core, most heartily friendly to the purposes indicated in the platform of this Association, and just now once more so nobly set forth by its present President.

The subject upon which I would address you is one intended to explain my own position. It is a subject which I might entitle "Practical Religion." And let me say that I choose the word "Religion" advisedly. I do not say "Practical Ethics" nor "The Practical Realization of the Higher Life," nor any similar phrase that might be selected, but "Practical Religion"; meaning thereby to place myself squarely and fully on the ground of religion; meaning to indicate that, however the attitude of those who hold with me has from time to time been mistaken, we at least feel ourselves to be wholly within the pale of religion,—nay, that we desire nothing so earnestly as to revive and refresh, if possible, the religious life.

In order to make clear my meaning, I shall have to draw a distinction, which will be found fundamental to what I have to say,—a distinction, namely, between religious conceptions and religious ideas. I believe that hereafter religion will be founded upon ideas, or upon an idea, and that we shall be compelled to throw overboard conceptions. Conceptions are of the understanding. Ideas are of the reason. A conception always implies an attempt to fill out a thought with the material derived from experience, more or less directly so derived. An idea may be held without our attempting to give it a concept at all. It may imply nothing more than a necessary concept of human thought.

Now, concerning religious conceptions, the world has been in dispute for ages; and, indeed, every one of the great religions of the world has successively claimed that its peculiar religious conception is alone adequate to the expression of the truth. The Mussulman has condemned the Christians and the Jews; the Jews have been intolerant of the Pagans; and Christians among themselves have practised a like intolerance, the Catholic denouncing the Protestant, and the Protestant denouncing the Catholic. But, however much these various parties might dispute, they were agreed that there was some conception which really was fundamental to religion, only they disagreed about which particular conception that might be. And the Free Religious Association, when it set out upon its course fifteen years ago, proclaimed—if I understand rightly its platform—a very important truth, and had a very important mission in asserting that truth; namely, that there should be friendship between those parties that had hitherto warred. Its great point, upon which it lay such very emphatic stress, which it still lays such emphasis upon, was that of the sympathy of religions,—that persons of various religious opinions should come together and endeavor to find out those points in which they were harmonious, and learn to respect each other's differences. Upon that platform, the Association has stood, has prospered; and, so long as this idea was a novel one, it gave strength and a large measure of outward success to the Association. But I believe that reflecting minds the world over are coming to see that, however important mutual tolerance may be, and however much we may respect each other's differences, these differences must continue to exist, and that we may err upon the side of too great tolerance. I mean, of course, intellectually, and not socially. I mean to say that the doctrine of the sympathy of religious opinions may be pressed so far that those who hold it may lose the possession of distinct religious convictions of their own; that their own individuality, mental and religious, may be merged in a nebulous sympathy. For my own part, therefore, I have never stood on the ground of Free Religion to the extent of believing that Free Religion—so far as represented by the idea of a free platform for all religious opinions—could ever become a substitute for a religion of my own. I have always had a distinct religious conviction of my own; and I ask your kind indulgence for a few moments, while I proceed to indicate what that religious conviction was and is, and also to indicate why this peculiar religious conviction of my own induces me at the present moment to retire from active participation in the affairs of this Association.

I say there has been for centuries a prolonged dispute concerning which particular religious conception might be fundamental in religion; but the one point upon which all parties have agreed is that some one religious conception is fundamental. And now there arises a new party in religious controversy,—and I own that I am one member of that party,—which holds that no conception is fundamental. In general, we understand by "conception" a product of the understanding. This new party holds that no religious conception can be fundamental, because of no one conception can we be sure that it is true; that the finite nature of the human understanding is such that, concerning the infinite, we can have naught but ideas, and can never hope to fill these ideas out with a concept from experience through the senses.

To illustrate the difference which I would draw between an idea and a conception, let me take this very theistic doctrine, which by many is supposed to be so important to religion of any and every kind that they believe that he who still adheres to it, whatever else he may have lost, is still to be counted religious, while he who has lost that one conception, whatever else he may have that is true and good, has lost his title to be regarded as a religious person; and let us ask ourselves how this doctrine of a personal Deity originated among men, assuming that we cannot receive the wholly unsubstantiated statement that it was miraculously revealed to any one, or that it was at creation implanted in the human heart whatever that may mean. If we consider this doctrine, like every other, the result of growth and development in the human mind, and if we ask ourselves, How did this doctrine this conception of a Deity arise? we shall find that underneath it there is an idea which is more deeply fundamental than the conception of a personal God. And, how that idea to which I refer arises in the mind, let me briefly indicate.

The soul of man goes out, as has been said, to the universe. We wish to know, not only that all things are well here; but we wish to know that all things are well throughout the world. No human interests can be bounded by this terrestrial life; and the religion of humanity is misunderstood indeed, if it is supposed that it implies a limitation of our ideals simply to the circle of humanity that was, is, and will be. No: the soul of man goes forth to the universe. We need to know not only that it is well here, but that all is well; that, on those world-ships that steer through space, all is well.

Now, how can we reach such a conclusion? I am giving a statement here, without attempting to substantiate it by argument; simply to define my position, not now to prove it. My belief is that we obtain this certainty with regard to the universe, that all is well, simply from the view of our own conscience; that the voice of conscience would be absurd, if there were not a good purpose running through the infinities; that the command to us, as individuals, to aspire toward perfection would be absurd, if there were not perfection accomplishing through the wide world. In fine, I believe and hold that the pull of our own conscience toward the good is only a part of the universal strain of all things toward the good, and hence its imperativeness, and hence its categorical power. I believe, therefore, that when we interpret this microcosm, this human world of ours, in terms of this inner commandment, in terms of conscience, we obtain Morality; when we interpret the larger world, the macrocosm, in terms of conscience, we obtain Religion.

And now it may be asked, How does this apply to the distinction between religious ideas and religious conceptions, and how will these instances illustrate that distinction? The idea to which I refer as being fundamental, upon which all religion is really based, is the idea of a good purpose running through the infinities; and that idea is of equal authority with the authority of conscience. So far, therefore I hold, as we allow the authority of conscience, in so far do we accept the postulate of conscience, or this idea of a good purpose running through the infinities. But now, with this idea alone the human mind, bound in the conditions of time and time, has not rested content. The idea is necessarily vague. Indeed, it is not only vague,—that is, difficult or uncertain of conception,—but is positively inconceivable. The human mind, however, clinging to the tangible, has proceeded at once to translate or express in terms of the conceivable that which is, by the very hypothesis, inconceivable; to express in terms of the finite that which is, in the beginning of the discussion, assumed to be infinite. The human mind, in brief, has asked, If there is a straining toward perfection, a tendency toward the morally perfect in the world, a good purpose running through the infinities, how did it come there, who put it there? And the conclusion has been drawn that there must have been a good Being who put this good purpose into the world; and, in order to have such power over nature that he may accomplish his good purpose, he must be omnipotent; and, in order to exercise his omnipotence in the right way, he must be omniscient; and, in order to conceive such purpose at all, he must be all-loving. We have, therefore, a Being omnipotent, omniscient, and all-loving.

But, I say, if we analyze these epithets more closely, we shall find that every one of them is derived from our finite experience, and becomes meaningless when applied to the Infinite. We can conceive only of discursive intelligence, but of an infinite intelligence we have no conception. We can conceive only of a love between limited beings. The very nature of love implies limitation. Of the love of an unlimited Being we cannot conceive. We can conceive of power only so far as it implies resistance; but of power to which there is no resistance we have also no conception. And if, then, we are asked, How shall we secure this necessary confidence in the universe, that there is a great and holy purpose living in it?—how shall we gain for ourselves that assurance that this is so?—(the theologian says we can and must, in order to believe in a good purpose in the world, assume the existence of an omnipotent Being; but how shall we, who do not assume the existence of a good and an omnipotent Being, explain the manner in which the good purpose of the world is to be accomplished?)—for us, friends, there is but one reply: we do not know, we cannot know, because it is not in the nature of the human mind to know. There is no use in practising self-deception, and imagining that we have an explantion, when we have none. Is it not sufficient to know that our lives are not meaningless; that there is a tendency toward moral perfection here; that there is progress in the world; that this drama of life, with its pain, its sorrows, its afflictions, all its harrowing experience, is culminating, is bound to culminate, in the course of time and of eternity, in a sublime denouement? Is not that enough to make a religion? Is it not enough to make a very vital religion for any one?

Now, I ask, if, in moments of doubt and of weakness, I lose that assurance, lose that certainty, how shall I refresh my courage, and go on in the world to fight its battles? The adherents of the old religion go to the church and address the Deity in prayer, and so lift up their hearts in that sublime confidence in the good purpose that sways all things. But how shall I, who have lost the power of prayer, build up in myself that assurance, that confidence, that vital belief in the good that it is bound to be triumphant? I answer again, as I have answered so often before: Do the good, and then you will believe in it. Plunge into the stream of good tendencies: let it bathe you, and wash all around you; feel its animating current, and then you will not doubt the tendency is toward good. Become yourself one of the creating agencies in the world, help yourself in building up moral energies in the universe, and then you will not doubt for a moment that moral power is shaping the world.

So, friends, the pith and the core of the whole matter to my mind is this: we can only cure the doubt of this generation by getting them to do. They doubt, because they do not do. And, therefore, I claim that the one necessity for us is to have less discussion and more deed. What I ask, and what I seek for my own part, and my friends with me, is not henceforth to be satisfied with deeds and to leave aside faith. It is not true that we have inscribed the words "Ethical Culture" upon our standard as a symbol that we have given up a high and glorious faith in the world, and are saying in disappointment and despair, "Let us address ourselves merely to deeds of human benevolence." No. We still need faith,—a larger faith, a faith that shall grow out of deeds. Not deeds without faith, nor faith without deeds, but deeds as the very foundation, the very soul, the very fountain of our faith.

And here, also, you have my criticism. It is with a heavy heart that I speak of it. But what has Boston done for the honor of our principles? What great charitable movement has found its source here among those who maintain the principle of freedom in religion? What living thing for the good of mankind, for the perfecting of morality among yourselves and others, has emanated within the last twenty years from the Free Religious circles of this city? I say to you, friends,—do not believe that I come here in a spirit of disparagement,—I say to you, these annual meetings will not answer. It is not enough that, once every year, in Anniversary Week, a company should assemble and fill this hall, and listen to a careful discussion of weighty matters, and then retire until another annual meeting calls us together. I remember the words that were spoken by one of the most religious men that ever lived, when he spoke of his God as "the God of the living, and not of the dead." And our religion, friends, must also be a religion of life, and not of death. It must lead out into life. It must lead us to do notable and significant deeds in the community, which will be a monument to our principles, and do them honor.

I believe, therefore, that the prime necessity in our Association at the present day is to enter upon some practical movement for the effecting of the highest morality among the members of our societies themselves, and for the good of the community that surrounds them. I believe in setting up a standard of genuinely high living, a standard of the higher life,—a more sincere, a more simple, a more chaste, a more noble, a more beautiful life among the members of such societies themselves. I believe in making our principles distinguished by the actions which we show forth in our every-day existence, and by the larger charity—not the less charity, but the larger charity—which we do in the community which surrounds us. No edifice that we can erect will be a monument to us. This building which you have erected to the memory of the great prophet of freedom, our venerated and noble Theodore Parker, fitly shows forth the love and affection which his society feels for his name. But how much grander and nobler would be the monument to the name of Theodore Parker, if you were to institute a "Theodore Parker School for Working-men," or a "Theodore Parker Home," from which district nurses could go forth among the poor, or a "Theodore Parker Association" for the moral reform of young men! If you could inscribe Theodore Parker's name above such living actions, then you would honor him as he has never yet been honored, and you would live out the grand spirit of that mighty soul.

And now, friends, I ask, What is the use of our meeting here year after year, unless it will come to something like this? These phrases are applauded; but, unless the action follows, what good is done? I am full of these feelings; and, believing that I may be too full of them, that I may be too insistent on deeds and too impatient of yearly discussion, I have thought it wisest,—and I think it wisest, Mr. President, to be perfectly frank to-day on this platform,—I have thought it wisest to go away, seeing that all counsel in this direction has thus far, at least, been ineffectual, and hoping that others may have such influence and weight with the members of the Association as to lead them in the direction of real and genuine progress.

If you ask me whether there is no field at all, in my opinion, for the Free Religious Association, whether these meetings and conventions that you have just planned are not a sign of progress in the right direction, I will reply, in all candor, that the difficulty with our movement is not that people will not come and hear. You need, friends of the Free Religious Association, to take no great trouble to organize conventions or lecture courses. We need no Free Religious Association to get people all over the country to hear a living speaker who has something to say. Follow the train of Mr. Ingersoll across the country, and you will find that that one man, little as we may sympathize with him, simply by the force of what he has to say (one side of the truth, certainly, he is saying), is drawing, by his single voice, wherever he goes, thousands and thousands of people,—more, probably, than our Free Religious Conventions, with all our careful planning and all our judicious correspondence, would obtain in the same cities. Get men! What we want is MEN. We have not, in all these United States, I believe, a dozen men who can really carry the standard of our principles. And this has been my urgent plea to the Association from the beginning,—that it should utilize its efforts in order to train men; that we should endow professorships at universities for teaching the science of religion, in order that we might obtain students who were trained for the work; or, at least, that we should endow fellowships, so that students who might be ready to come into our work might be helped: for, from all sides, we hear of men and women who would come into the work, if they could only be sustained.

A second difficulty, which is essentially the same kind as the first, is this: that our methods are not yet perfected. It is too early to propagate largely. What is it you wish to propagate? Simply the idea of freedom, simply general points? That work may be of great importance, and I believe that we have enough to say to the people far and wide, mainly to those who are disposed to coincide with us; but the great majority of men, if we go to them with our principles, will ask for our methods of organization, for our text-books for teaching the young, and for a great many other practical and important points which have not yet been fully considered. The general idea of freedom in religion has been carefully worked out; its special applications have not been worked out, and until they are worked out, so that they can be utilized, so that societies—really vital societies—can be built up on those methods, our principles will fail to be generally accepted; and, until then, I believe it will be too early to think largely of propagation. What we want is to work at home, to make our own societies more perfect, to experiment in small societies in New York, in Brooklyn, in Boston, in Chicago, and elsewhere; and let every one do his very best in his own place, at his own post and work, to practise the methods of Free Religion, and then they will go, without much propagation, over the whole land.

THE PRESIDENT.—When Mr. Adler spoke of withdrawing from active participation in the society, I suppose the hearts of some of us sank, for a moment at least; but when he went on to make that grand, inspiring speech, directly in the purpose and line which the Free Religious Association has always professed to hold,—that deed should follow discussion,—I think that our hearts were again cheered. It must have seemed to you, as you listened, that it was of some use to have this platform, just to get that speech; and that the essential doctrine and ideas of that speech are just what this Association would like to propagate through the country. And, again, we must have reflected that, when Prof. Adler goes back to his own work in New York, to put into it that energy and enthusiasm that he always brings to us here, he is really working in the movement of Free Religion, and pointing out one of its most important pathways; and he cannot help but thus actively participate in the movement, even if he is not at the head of this particular organization, as I, in all sincerity, wish he still were.

And now, friends, we have another speaker this morning, who is to follow directly in the line of the discussion which Dr. Adler has so forcibly opened. We have always said,—and, if we have not done it, it is because we have failed, as people have failed from the beginning of the world, to make professions and actions agree,—but we have always said that there ought to grow out of these meetings actual deeds; that people ought not merely to come here to listen or to speak, but to be inspired, and to go from this place to their several posts of duty, wherever they may be, to put what they have here felt in their hearts into work, into moral action. Now, our friend, Mr. Stewart from Bangor, is to tell us how both liberty and religion culminate in morality. I introduce to you Mr. S. J. Stewart.

Address of Mr. S. J. Stewart.

MORALITY THE PRACTICAL RECONCILIATION AND AIM OF BOTH LIBERTY AND RELIGION.

For a variety of reasons, certain virtues or principles or causes are often set in array against each other by their advocates. Partly because of education and partly because of peculiar experiences, some one watchword is upheld by particular men as expressive of the most supreme and exclusive principle. With some men, it is liberty which is the essential principle; with others, it is fraternity or religion or equality. Naturally, therefore, there arise antagonisms between men with perhaps the same essential ideal and purpose. In the world to-day there seems to be an irrepressible conflict between liberty and religion. Religion is sometimes made to appear the enemy of personal liberty, and also of intellectual honesty and manliness and sincerity; and, on the other hand, unrestricted liberty is thought, by certain believers, to be the enemy of all religion, and even of virtue. To hear men plead sometimes, it would seem as if there never could be any reconciliation until men give up the idea of absolute liberty or else destroy the very name of religion.

Moreover, when we hear earnest, sincere pleaders for either liberty or religion, if we are free from prejudice and fair-minded, we shall probably for the moment catch their enthusiasm, and feel that here, after all, is the only vital principle.

The advocate of religion as the supreme principle denounces so-called liberty sometimes in the interests of virtue and humanity. Thinking, as he often does sincerely, that the safety of society and the salvation of men depend upon the acceptance of certain beliefs already arbitrarily fixed, and submission to a certain supernatural authority, he cannot but think that unrestricted liberty is an enemy of man and of virtue. In order that men should be virtuous, they must accept the system of faith already fixed and settled. But, if men have unrestricted liberty to think and to utter their thoughts, they may unsettle that system, and thus destroy the foundations of society. Besides, what particular advantage is there in liberty in itself? the religionist may ask. Unless a man has some sense of moral obligation, and knows just what to do with his liberty, he is likely, not only to destroy himself, but to ruin others. Some men must be restrained, or they will destroy their own virtue and bring anarchy into society. Besides, the advocate very justly makes an appeal to facts and history. Look at your French revolutions, he says, and see how unrestricted liberty works. Look at liberty gone mad without the restraints of religion. Licentiousness has been set up and worshipped in the name of liberty, and virtue and decency sometimes made to drag their garments in the mire.

So, too, in a calmer age and in our own midst, we cannot always see that liberty is such an excellent principle, when made supreme or when made a substitute for religion. Men often seem to desire liberty, in order to satisfy their passions and prey upon society at large. With many people, unrestricted liberty seems to imply that certain coarse, selfish men should have license to destroy that fine sense of virtue and honor and purity that has at last been produced in the long evolution of humanity. Even admitting that all the logic is on the side even of such a liberty, it is no wonder that, in the name of religion as well as virtue, men should oppose it. If the practical effect of a certain kind of personal liberty is to enslave others and ruin them, then all the more will there be good reason to oppose absolute liberty in the name of religion. As a matter of fact, too, many theoretical rationalists will uphold to-day the most authoritative form of religion, even a Roman priesthood, because they think it is practically superior and more conducive to present human happiness than a liberty which seems dangerous. They understand but little of the motives of men who suppose that all those who oppose liberty in religion act in a spirit of selfishness. That some of them oppose liberty for their own selfish purposes is an undoubted fact, but that many are actuated by the most sincere desire to aid humanity is just as obvious. Even some of those who take the narrowest view of life and morality, and who would like to amend our Constitution so as virtually to take away citizenship from all but Bible Christians, sincerely believe that this would be in the highest interests of men, and even of human happiness. Narrow as their view may be, some of them sincerely think that religion—their religion—is alone safe, and that absolute freedom of thought and belief would be ruinous in its tendencies.

Even in the realm of sentiment and emotion and idealism, the religionist may present a good argument against unrestricted liberty. What particular advantage is there in a man having liberty to stand up, and with his iconoclastic hammer destroy inherited faith and sentiment and hope? Men obtain some consolation and morality even out of theologies which contain some error. It will be difficult to persuade men that it is entire gain to give up what little they did obtain from an old system merely for the sake of having liberty, when perhaps they will not know what to do with the liberty, when obtained. The majority of men feel that they would rather have the emotional and ideal nature satisfied by a religious cult which is even superstitious than to have their nature dwarfed; that they would rather worship an anthropomorphic god than to have no supreme object of excellence, would rather be soothed by doubtful promises of some future happiness than to have no consolation. There is nothing so very desirable, to them, in the mere privilege of having the liberty to do what they please as to make it a substitute for what have so long been considered realities. As liberty has so often been used merely as a means of destruction, without giving anything positive and vital for that which is destroyed, it is easy to see how there can be a good argument against unrestricted liberty by the believers in religion. Even so stoical a man as Stuart Mill wrote, "So long as earthly life is full of sufferings, so long will there be need of consolations." Without dwelling longer here, it is only fair to say that religion has a good case against unrestricted liberty, so long as the Church can produce even a modicum of virtue and consolation, and so long as liberty is so often proclaimed by men who think they have reached the desideratum when they have asserted their right to destroy the work of the evolution of the ages and to revolutionize society.

But the advocate of liberty has even a stronger case against religion. Remember that at this point I must use words in their historical sense. It is in this sense, and not according to the interpretations by which a few advanced thinkers of our age have made religion seem to be something so very beautiful, that the lover of liberty criticises it. To begin down in the lowest stratum of facts, it was historical religion itself that was really the cause of French revolutions and anarchy and licentiousness. The revolution in France was caused by a long process of tyranny upheld by a Church which, from the days of Charlemagne, had ruled even kings, and then with kings had tyrannized over the people, until at last the people revolted, and because of the ignorance caused primarily by the priests, not knowing how to govern themselves, ran into anarchy. Thomas Carlyle is no eulogist of free thought or of the people, because he never trusted either; but even he says of the revolution: "Shall we say then, Woe to philosophism that it destroyed religion? . . . woe rather to those that made the holy an abomination and extinguishable. . . . This unfortunate clergy, . . . an anomalous mass of men of whom the world has already a divine understanding that it can understand nothing!" If some men have abused the word "liberty" in the interests of vice, in the name of religion the human thought and conscience have been destroyed in uncounted instances. If some men would go to extremes in the interests of liberty, tyranny, oppression, hypocrisy, and error have been continually upheld in the name of religion. If one man makes himself or others miserable because he does not know what to do with his liberty, tens of thousands of men have been made miserable because in the interests of religion a few have taken away the liberties of the masses. Historical religion when set over against liberty has, at the best, made a few great men and degraded the multitudes; it has tried to please a god, while making men and women slaves; it has upheld a system of theology, while making men so faithless that they dare not investigate the facts and laws of the universe. If it has built churches and almshouses, it has opposed science, commerce, patriotism, and natural genius, and made men so weak and ignorant that they have become paupers. If terrible crimes have been committed in the name of liberty, worse crimes have been committed in the name of a god. Whatever our theory of either, men would naturally conclude that, on the whole, that is the highest principle which tends to the preservation of life. Religion, however, has made human life of no consequence in comparison with its own objects. Prof. Goldwin Smith so far overlooked history as to write in a recent article that "the sacredness of human life in particular is a religious conception." On the contrary, religion has considered human life of no consequence in comparison with itself. We need not dwell on the fact that every religion in the world, not excepting the Christian, has upheld human sacrifice as an important part of religious doctrine or the religious cult. Human life has been repeatedly destroyed everywhere in the name of religion. Perhaps all wars of ambition and all destruction of life in the interests of patriotism have not caused so much destruction of life as has been caused in the interests of religion. In the interests of religion, too, every species of immorality has been upheld. Homes have been laid in ashes, virtue ravished, pity silenced, the cries of love and tenderness hushed, all in the interests of a religion which has been set above morality.

But liberty has a philosophical plea, even in the most advanced modern civilization. We can never find out the real truth in regard to the universe and ourselves and our probable destiny, unless every man has the most unrestricted liberty. But religion, in an historical sense, has always presupposed an infallibility and a fixedness of thought. The advocate of liberty very properly demands, therefore, that such a religion should be removed in the interests of truth. The historical religion, even down to its most advanced exponents, would, if it dared, have suppressed a Darwin and an Emerson, and would to-day silence every man who thinks beyond a certain limit. If liberty had not triumphed over religion, we would to-day be upholding theories which intelligent men now consider myths. It is no wonder that some men, in the interests of truth, demand that religion should be absolutely eradicated. Historically, it has been continually set in array against truth. Not to dwell on the past, it stands practically in the position of an enemy of truth to-day. Even in those circles where men would like to be considered free from bigotry, religion is often set above truth. If a man were to declare himself a materialist, for example, no matter how well he proved his theory, no matter how noble he was, he would be denounced, simply in the interests of religion. In the most advanced religious circles, the truthfulness of a man's arguments would not be considered, but he would be blessed or denounced, simply from the stand-point of religious prejudice. If his theory is true, it will injure religion,—that is enough. "Let us condemn him," cries the religionist. It does not change facts, either, to call things by different names. Much of so-called liberal Christianity deliberately opposes truth and honesty in the interests of a system. It is hardly liberty to tie a man to a stake by a rope twenty feet long, and then tell him he is to have absolute liberty. Practically, he only has twenty feet of liberty, no matter what fine names men call it. If he gets outside the little path he has made in walking in his old footsteps, he is at once brought to task for breaking away from his religion. A man may have liberty; but, if he should venture to get outside of the theories of men of fifty years ago, who were supposed to have a great deal of rope, he would be at once denounced as an enemy of religion. But no man has any real liberty who is tied in advance to any opinions; and an understood creed, forged by conventionality and respectability, is not essentially more broad or more in the interests of truth than Calvinism. Within a year, men have been denounced by a large portion of the press and society, and driven out of pulpits, not primarily because they opposed truth, but because, if what they said were true, it would injure what is understood as religion. Really brave men are therefore sometimes tempted to believe that there can be no intellectual liberty and no honest search after truth, while something called religion is made a final test. The philosophy underneath these practical facts is simply this: that, as virtue and manhood cannot be developed by the method of placing something called religion above intellectual honesty, and as this is tacitly done even in the most advanced religious circles to-day, therefore liberty has a just criticism upon religion, and therefore some men oppose religion in the name of common honesty.

Now, the question arises whether there is any reconciliation among such conflicting principles. Can either liberty or religion be made fundamental principles so as to include the other, and so that it may also include every other fundamental fact or cause for which moral men contend?

A final philosophy would be a principle around which all single principles could be united and reconciled: it would be something fundamental, all-comprehensive, and universal. If liberty and religion both stand for realities, then they can be united in some complete philosophy. For important reasons, however, it is not easy, even if possible, to state in words any principle which, in a philosophical sense, is fundamental. Practically, to-day we have no philosophy of religion. We have not even any definition of religion which will be accepted as final by intelligent men. How is any man to reconcile religion and religious liberty with anything, until there is some agreement as to what religion is? In brief, no philosophy to-day is universally accepted among men, and there is not precision enough in definitions to make it possible to state in a proposition a final philosophy which will reconcile all apparent antagonisms. But we must live, whether we have a final philosophy or not. The night cometh in which no man can work, and we must therefore come to some practical decision. If we would find any reconciliation therefore between different principles or causes, it must be something which can be proved practically comprehensive, even if men still wait for exact definitions and a final philosophy. It is not my ambitious expectation, therefore, to find the solvent of difficult elements in some phrase about morality. I might simply become another specialist, if, like the man who thinks "religion" is the final word, or "liberty," I, too, were to shout "morality," with the expectation that the word was philosophically broad enough in the present condition of society to be accepted as all-embracing. But we seek some practical reconciliation among the principles for which moral men are contending. Not to go outside of a discussion of the principles suggested by our theme, what is practically the fundamental principle and aim and test? I think it can be shown that, when we consider such principles as liberty, religion, and morality in the light of history, two of them will be found by themselves too exclusive and too destructive of each other to be fundamental, and too narrow for a practical basis of reconciliation.

In the first place, liberty is not broad enough to take in all fundamental principles. It is a grand principle, so far as it goes; but it does not go far enough. Liberty simply means that a man shall have a right to follow his own desires, but that by itself is not all-sufficient. Of course, it is important; and there have been times in human history when for the hour it has properly seemed all-important. But, philosophically, liberty is only a means to an end. Liberty to do what, to be what? Because a man can swing himself in any way he pleases is not in itself of supreme importance. What does he wish to do with himself? What ought he to do with himself? It is possible to conceive of liberty by itself exterminating men from the face of the earth, and thus practically ending human history. Recognizing liberty as of importance, it can only be one end; and we must go farther to discover the end.

Religion, on the other hand, cannot be the principle of reconciliation for good reasons.

In the first place, any thing in order to be a fundamental principle must have its distinguishing characteristics defined in such a way as to be accepted at least among intelligent men. There is not now, however, any definition of religion which is accepted, even as expressing its essence among men. But, when we come down to a philosophy which will embrace all principles, we must have something which can at least be expressed in essence. But the most intelligent men use the word "religion" with different and even opposite meanings. This man calls it an impulse toward the highest ideal of excellence. Matthew Arnold calls it "morality touched with emotion." John Fiske says that "religion views the individual in his relations to the Infinite Power manifested in a universe of causally connected phenomena." Other men identify religion with Christianity, and others with a theology. Some of these definitions, and perhaps all, contain a truth; and with the noble purpose and ideal we all might agree. But a word which may mean a theology which includes eternal damnation, and at the other extreme the broadest hope and ideality and culture, will not do for the expression of a practical working principle. If some noble lover of truth says that his definition is so broad as to include ideality and morality, we may honor him and accept the substance of his idea; but perhaps some other man might embrace ideality under the head of morality. Mr. Spencer, for example, suggests that "a recognition of the truth that all existence is an unfathomable mystery, in its essence, contains more true religion than all the dogmatic theology ever uttered." But there are men around us that, with the same belief in the unknowableness of the essence of things, declare that, therefore, there is no such thing as a true religion at all. That is to say, in the interests of the same reverence and humility, one man upholds religion, and another would obliterate even the word. Do not misunderstand me to be so unwise as to declare that men are talking about nothing, when they use the word "religion." I, too, use the word as expressive of a reality. But, while the word may be interpreted to mean devotion to a god on the one hand and poetry on the other, we must seek some more practical principle of reconciliation, even if as individuals we use the word to express a reality. In other words, while we wait for a philosophy and for exact definitions, we must find some practical reconciliation for different principles.

[We are sorry to divide Mr. Stewart's address, but its length and the demands on our space this week leave us no alternative.—ED.]

DR. ADLER'S CRITICISM OF THE F. R. A.

Editors of The Index:—

The former President of the Free Religious Association, Dr. Adler, criticised in such a kindly manner the Association from which he has withdrawn, so far as concerns active participation, and was listened to with such courtesy and attention, and, moreover, his address was followed by such hearty applause, that an outsider might almost imagine that the members whom he was arraigning were themselves making a confession of their shortcomings, and declaring themselves unprofitable servants. Some, however, felt that the implied rebuke was undeserved. Dr. Adler's mistake is in his one-sided definition of poverty. A poverty of ideas seems not to concern him. To clothe the naked, feed the hungry, establish hospitals and evening schools for working men and women, in his opinion alone justifies any organization, if we may judge by his address before the Association. He ignores the narrow conceptions, the slavish adherence to creeds, the bondage of the Churches, the poverty of thought, which everywhere prevail, and which it is the special object of the Free Religious Association to meet and overcome. Its main work is to broaden and enlighten men's minds. Ideas of the brotherhood of man, a real love for humanity, a tolerance of others, a worship of the truth, and a mental rectitude are the best stepping-stones to the "work" of which

Dr. Adler speaks; and these ideas the Free Religious Association seeks to disseminate.

It is given to some reforms to point to definite results. Such was the anti-slavery reform. The workers in other movements must be content to scatter seed which may not, cannot, bear immediate fruit. It is theirs to enrich the soil, to make possible certain conditions from which will spring grand results, to invigorate and charge the atmosphere with life-giving, life-imparting elements, and to watch for the fruits of their labor in every undertaking for physical, mental, or moral improvement which is projected for the elevation of humanity. A defence of the large-hearted charity of the members of the Free Religious Association seems almost superfluous. Look where you will among good works, and you see their names enrolled. Upon every board of managers of every organization not distinctly sectarian, you find them. They work persistently, earnestly, and successfully in the Moral Education Society, in all societies for the freedom and elevation of woman, in temperance organizations, in cooking and sewing schools for women, and in the mechanical art schools for men. They are practical organizers in matters of education, both moral and mental, and, as a class, need not hesitate to be judged by their fruits. Yet, because they do not organize specially as free thinkers for all these purposes,—because, in their judgment, it is often better to work as individuals in already existing organizations,—they are criticised as do-nothings. With the greatest respect for Dr. Adler and an admiration for him and for his efforts in behalf of all men, I think he is mistaken. There is a special field for the Free Religious Association to work in, and by all means let the Association go on with the kind of work which it has undertaken. Let it disseminate ideas, in the sure confidence that work such as Dr. Adler suggests will be the necessary consequence. EDITH BRADFORD.

CAMBRIDGE, JUNE 13.

LIBERALISM IN NEW ZEALAND.

Editors of The Index:—

My own personal acquaintance with the splendid colony of New Zealand began in January, 1876, since which time I have spent a good part of three years within its bounds, and have lectured in all its principal cities. At the time of my first visit, it had just centralized its form of government, following the pattern prevailing in the Australian colonies, the nearest of which is distant from it some twelve hundred miles. Previous to this, the different provinces of New Zealand—Otago, Auckland, Wellington, Canterbury, etc.—occupied much the same position toward the central government, located at Auckland, as these States do toward the federal government at Washington. Each province had its representative assembly and superintendent elected for a term of years, and passed its own laws independent of the legislation of other provinces. Hence, it happened that there were more liberal developments in some than in others. This marked diversity in the form of government of New Zealand and that prevailing in Australia was caused by the physical differences in the two countries, and thus furnishes a modern illustration of the truth of the main hypothesis advanced in Buckle's History of Civilization. Each of the Australian colonies in the early days of its settlement constituted a compact country, readily accessible from its capital. New Zealand, on the other hand, has a coast as wild and broken as that of Norway; and its numerous settlements could, prior to the construction of railways, only communicate one with the other by short but hazardous sea voyages. The provincial form of government was therefore a necessity, and it is even yet doubtful whether it was not abolished at too early a date for the best welfare of the colony. With the excellent coasting steamers now plying, it is still, including the ports of call, a five days' trip from Invercargill in the south to Auckland in the north. Another of the outcomes of the wild configuration of New Zealand is this,—that there is no city enormously preponderating in population over the rest. Dunedin, the metropolis of the province of Otago, is at the head with a population of about twenty-five thousand; but Auckland, Wellington, and Christchurch, capitals of other provinces, are not far behind. In the Australian colonies, the capitals are enormously disproportionate in size to the other towns. Melbourne, for instance, with its suburbs, numbers nearly three hundred thousand souls; and in this particular ranks as the ninth largest city of the British Empire. The physical peculiarities of the various colonies, as I have said, control these developments; but I think it will be generally admitted that for the true well-being of a state a number of towns of average size is better than one enormous wen of population. In the crisp words of the prophet-poet of America, Walt Whitman,—

"The great city is that which has the greatest man or woman:

If it be a few ragged huts, it is still the greatest city in the whole world.

Where the city of the faithful friends stands,
Where the city of the cleanliness of the sexes stands,
Where the city of the healthiest fathers stands,
Where the city of the best-bodied mothers stands,—
There the great city stands."

And, regarded from this nobler stand-point, I think the great cities will be found where humanity does not herd together too closely.

It will be seen then that, in writing a letter under the ambitious heading of "Liberalism in New Zealand," the best that I can do, in limited space, is to give your readers some idea of the most notable advance which has been made there. To do this, I must turn to the city of Dunedin. In nearly all the towns of fair size there are large bodies of free thinkers; in most of them there are organizations, and liberal lecturers receive a hearty welcome. Thus Nelson, the capital of the provincial district of the same name, with a population of only six thousand, has a splendid secular society, of which Mr. Schofield, a gentleman who in England was one of Charles Bradlaugh's fervent disciples, is the life and soul. But Dunedin is quite exceptional in the progress it has made, and presents itself as an example of what may be achieved in a comparatively small city by combined ability, pluck, and persistency.

Settled by a brave band of pious Scotchmen less than forty years ago, Dunedin (the poetical name of Edinburgh) was intended to be, to its very latest generation, a stronghold of Calvinism. Now, a Free-thought Hall, capable of seating eight hundred people, is being erected in the most central portion of the city, the building formerly used as the "First Church" having to be pulled down to make room for it. How has this come to pass? Unlike the Australian capitals, Dunedin has not been trained toward freedom by Unitarianism. It has never possessed a Unitarian congregation. But Calvinism, grim and cruel though it may be, is a profoundly logical system. It declines to take its Bible diet diluted. Grant that the writings attributed to Paul are a part of the word of God, and the Calvinistic doctrine of redemption—or rather damnation, for that is its main feature—follows with diabolical consistency. Moreover, Calvinists, Scotch ones at any rate, are for the most part earnest religious men. With this basis of earnestness, religiousness, and logic, once let a Scotch Calvinist come to see that the Bible is a natural outgrowth from humanity and not a supernatural message from the Power inspiring the universe, and he becomes a grand free thinker. No meshes of half and half theology can hold him. He goes down to the bed-rock of thought, and makes careful division between what he knows and what he guesses at. Though by no means unwilling to indulge in metaphysical speculation, he declines any more to allow such speculations to be presented to his mind as dogmas.

It is to these characteristics that I attribute the fact that from the moment when the crust of Calvinism began to crack in Dunedin free thought became a power. The free thinkers there comprise various sections of Materialists, Spiritualists, and Agnostics; but, happily, they have managed thus far to work well together on behalf of the common desideratum,—freedom. It was about the year 1866 that the first society was formed with a view to untrammelled discussion of subjects which priests endeavor to shroud as mysterious and sacred, and from that time forth there has never been any long interval bereft of a similar organization. The Echo, a thoroughly liberal journal, was soon afterward started by Mr.—subsequently the Hon.—Robert Stout; and, although it was compelled after a year or two's struggle to succumb to adverse circumstances, it has lately been resuscitated under the same masterly control, and is now a potent organ on behalf of Liberalism and enlightenment. The career of Mr. Stout would be regarded as a notable one in any community, combining as it does successful labors as an outspoken free thinker and a politician rarely witnessed, as yet, in any portion of the world. Mr. Stout is a native of Lerwick, in the Shetland Islands, whose rugged peaks form the northernmost ramparts of the British Isles. For some time after his arrival in Dunedin, he occupied the position of schoolmaster, filling up his leisure hours by the editorship of the Echo and by the still more laborious task of reading for the bar. Within ten years after his becoming a barrister he was Attorney-General of the colony in Sir George Grey's administration, having been frequently returned as member of parliament for Dunedin, in spite of all the opposition which local bigotry could bring to bear against him. At the present moment there is no lawyer in New Zealand of superior reputation, while at the same time he is President of the Dunedin Free-thought Association, and ready at any moment to champion the cause of Liberalism in all directions. As he is now a man of only forty years of age, possesses a strong and vigorous frame, and most temperate if not abstemious habits, it will be recognized that his future is likely to be one full of beneficial effort on behalf of his fellow-men.

The first liberal lectures, apart from local talent, delivered in Dunedin were given early in 1872, by Mr. James Smith of Melbourne. The course was a brief one, and was mainly devoted to an exposition of the philosophy of modern Spiritualism; and, as Mr. Smith's lectures are essays of exquisite polish and culture, they were received with much satisfaction by the thoughtful audiences which welcomed him. In the following year, Mr. Peebles, who was then paying his first visit to the Australian colonies, addressed large gatherings in Dunedin and New Zealand towns. An episode occurred in connection with these meetings which has had considerable effect in helping forward the good cause. Mr. John Logan, at the time clerk to the Provincial Council, and a prominent deacon of the Presbyterian Church, took a conspicuous part in them. For this heretical behavior, the authorities of the church sat in judgment on him, and he was excommunicated. As he appealed from the Presbytery to the Synod, the affair attracted much attention; and, from that time to this, Mr. Logan, who has since been an avowed Spiritualist and Liberal, has exerted himself to the uttermost in the distribution of liberal literature among the creed-bound classes.

It was at the beginning of 1876 that I paid my first visit to Dunedin, and, under the supervision of a local committee, delivered a series of Sunday evening lectures in a large circus tent located in the hay market.

Throughout the greater part of 1877 and the whole of 1878, I delivered lectures every Sunday in the Princess Theatre, Dunedin, with occasional week-night addresses elsewhere. My connection with this progressive town ceased (temporarily only, I trust) early in 1879, fitly terminating with a public debate extending over four evenings, my opponent being Rev. M. W. Green, an able minister of the Campbellite denomination,—who had previously debated with Mr. Thomas Walker in Melbourne. The encounter took place in the Queen's Theatre, which was crowded to the ceiling. On the stage alone were seated some two hundred persons. The report of the debate was published as soon as possible in a shilling pamphlet, and the whole of the first edition of two thousand sold in twenty-four hours.

Since my departure, Dunedin has been occasionally visited by liberal lecturers; but the community has had to depend mainly on local talent for the maintenance of its meetings, and this has proved amply sufficient. An excellent Sunday Lyceum has been formed; at which the attendance of children, whose minds are thus preserved from orthodox desecration, has numbered nearly one hundred. It is a feature of this institution that Spiritualists and Materialists meet in it without difficulty, a most admirable compilation as a "Lyceum Guide" having been prepared for the purpose by Mr. Stout, assisted by Mr. Joseph Braithwaite. Music—that great harmonizer—receives prominent attention; a really excellent band of eighteen performers and a choir having been organized through the exertions mainly of an enthusiastic musician, Mr. John Parker. The Liberals have hitherto rented halls for their use, but now find themselves in a position to erect an institution of their own, which must by this time be approaching completion.

As stated in my letters on Australian Liberalism, the educational system of New Zealand is completely secular. The act which established this was passed some five years ago in the face of many obstacles. Vehement efforts are now being made by the sects to obtain Bible-reading in the schools. Of course, if the Bible were to be read and discussed the same as any other print, no Liberal could object to such a proposition. But what is desired by those who are agitating the matter is that children shall be taught to regard it as a sacred fetish which came from the heavens, and whose statements, however absurd or wicked, are to dominate over human reason. Hence, this retrograde step is resisted to the uttermost. As showing the direction of popular feeling in Dunedin on this question, I may state that at the School Board election, for the current year, one of the oldest, most active, and outspoken rationalists in the colony was returned at the head of the poll. This gentleman is Mr. W. M. Bolt, who acted as secretary to the lecture committee during my various engagements, and who has taken a prominent part in the work of liberal organization. Mr. Robert Rutherford, another outspoken free thinker and Spiritualist, has several times been elected to offices of public trust in spite of Church opposition. These facts, taken in conjunction with the remarkable career of Mr. Stout to which I have adverted, tend to prove that in this portion of New Zealand, at all events, the advocates of Liberalism have fought a good fight, and are likely, before many years are past, to score a complete victory.

CHARLES BRIGHT.

LIBERAL WORK IN ENGLAND.

Editors of The Index :—

Surely, your correspondent, H. N., who wrote from Liverpool about the Unitarian Conference there, is not very gracious to us all in England. He speaks of the Secularists as, with a few individual exceptions, "an ignorant and a prejudiced body of men, who give Sunday concerts and cheap lectures." I do not know that a lecture is any worse for being cheap, or Sunday concerts objectionable; but it is misleading to suppose that the lectures of the Secularists are by ignorant people. They have an examining body, and are very careful about admitting lecturers. It is doubtful whether many sermons preached in England are as able, quiet, and instructive as those of Dr. Aveling, G. W. Foote, Mrs. Besant, in London; and, in the provinces, the Secularist lecturers are well read and generally eloquent. This I may say without bias, not belonging to the Secularist organization. I do not understand why H. N. should give my dear old South Place, the oldest free-thinking church in the world, such a slap in the face as to say: "We hardly know of a single satisfactory congregation representing reverent and cultivated free thought. Such a society as Dr. Adler's in New York is not known here." The average congregation at South Place is five hundred. It consists generally of educated and reverent free thinkers. It is thoroughly organized, and contributes liberally to all good public objects. If H. N. will only attend one of the South Place soirées, held on the first Monday in every month, perhaps he will obtain a more "satisfactory" conception of us and our work than he would be likely to form in the lobby of the Liverpool Unitarian Conference; and not only of us, but of the various important movements which he ignores,—such as Mr. Voysey's church and the Liberal Social Union and the Dialectical Society and the liberal work of such men as Walters at Glasgow, Taylor at Preston, and many another.

NOTES FROM MILWAUKEE.

Editors of The Index :—

A Labor Lyceum has been instituted here, under the direction of the Trades Assembly, and on each Sunday afternoon some social or industrial question is discussed, the discussion following a paper or talk upon the subject in hand, read or made by some interested or prominent citizen.

The question of capital and labor, so momentous everywhere, looms into importance even in our very young city; and large bodies of intelligent working-men are combined for self-protection and education. In fact, the Trades Assembly here has grown into such magnitude that at the late spring municipal election they nominated an entire ticket, and by a coalition with the Democrats carried it.

The present great strike of iron-workers will be seriously felt here, as there is an extensive plant for the manufacture of railroad iron that has built up a little city to the south of us.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 5, 1882.

A CORRECTION.

37 NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Editors of The Index :—

H. N., in his able and otherwise excellent account of the late National (Unitarian) Conference at Liverpool, which appeared in The Index, says of the Secularists of London that they are "an ignorant and a prejudiced body of men who give Sunday concerts and cheap lectures." It is a falsehood and a slander to say they are ignorant and prejudiced; they do not give Sunday concerts, and all credit to them for their cheap lectures.

Yours truly,
W. MAWER.

MISCELLANEOUS.

"In one of our 'Letters from Practical Men,' " says the American Machinist, "occurs this expression: 'There are more men too lazy to think than too lazy to work with their hands.' Very true, perhaps; but does it occur to the author that thinking is more exhaustive labor than working with the hands? It requires greater moral as well as physical effort to devote one's self to mental labor; for, while laboring with the hands wearies the physical system alone, mental work exhausts both brain and body."

It is really amusing to see the efforts of the Dame Partingtons in the Massachusetts Medical Society to sweep back, with their stubby old brooms, the ocean of progress. They won't admit women physicians to their membership, though a majority of the society is ready to receive them, and thousands of the most refined and cultivated women of the land are joyfully welcoming thoroughly educated physicians of their own sex to their sick-rooms. And they won't "recognize" any other 'pathy, if they die for it; though a large and growing percentage of the intelligent classes is employing homeopaths and other so-called irregulars, and their sick ones persist in getting well under this treatment a great deal more comfortably than under the old school, and in quite as large a proportion. A professional man must value his independence at a low figure, when he permits an association to dictate to him whom he shall permit to consult with him.—Boston Herald.

THE celebration of Mrs. H. B. Stowe's birthday last week was an unusually interesting occasion. The presence of the venerable John G. Whittier, now in his seventy-fifth year, and of Dr. O. W. Holmes, fast nearing that stage of life, would alone have made it noticeable. These are the survivors of that immortal circle of authors of New England of which death has removed the half in the present year. The younger women novelists came there to do Mrs. Stowe homage: Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, who next to Mrs. Stowe has written the most successful book of the era; Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, with the laurels gained in the field of fiction freshly adorning her brow; and the latest debutante of all in the person of Miss Lucretia Noble, the author of A Reverend Idol. Henry Ward Beecher, with his picturesque presence and his electric oratory, formed a striking feature of attraction; J. T. Trowbridge, a worthy compeer of Mrs. Stowe in depicting New England character; and Judge Tourgee, who has so recently found success in painting the life which has succeeded that made vivid on Mrs. Stowe's canvas, was also there. The occasion was a memorable one, as marking an era in the history of the nation, aside from its literary significance. It was a tribute to one of the most potent agents in redeeming the land from slavery, as well as to the most phenomenally successful writer in modern literature.

THE Boston Courier says: "Considerable comment has been excited by Prof. Adler's resignation of the presidency of the Free Religious Association for the alleged reason that that body was not sufficiently active. Effective as is Prof. Adler's work in New York, and clear-sighted as he has usually shown himself, it is possible that in this case he does not appreciate how completely the field of charitable work is covered in Boston; and it is possible, too, that his own most admirable methods have begun to seem to him the only ones. The Association, it is true, is not a very militant body; but its work and influence are excellent in their way." The following from the Transcript is of the same purport: "The raison d'être of the Free Religious Association is called in question by the address of its retiring president, Felix Adler. According to his view of its history, it has employed the past fifteen years in mere discussion, whereas it should have been engaged in philanthropy. Philanthropy, in the form of free kindergartens, training-schools for nurses, and workingmen's classes, is the favorite inspiration of Dr. Adler; and it is not strange that he should have wished to infuse his purpose into this Boston organization. But Boston has a philanthropy at every street corner already. Not every one a model of activity, perhaps,—still, wise or unwise, our city may be said to blossom with charities. That an eloquent reformer from New York should insist on establishing another on a large scale inevitably suggests the proverb of carrying coals to Newcastle."

THE English correspondent of the Indianapolis Journal, S. T. Pomeroy, writes from London thus interestingly of one of the most valued contributors to The Index: "Mr. Moncure D. Conway, as your readers know, is now one of the leading minds of the world. He went from Washington, D.C., about 1870, to reside permanently in London. At the time, all liberal and progressive minds felt bereaved at what we considered our loss. But now we see that we only sent this our son and brother, this great scholar and humanitarian with his cosmopolitan aspirations and his beacon-light of free and noble thought, to a higher eminence, a better point of view, whence the priest-ridden and superstition-laden of the whole world may more easily catch a cheering and guiding ray. He is in no stereotype use of the word 'preacher'; but he has gathered about him a society, or congregation, of several hundred people of mind and culture,—no others would come to listen to Mr. Conway,—and they meet regularly every Sunday in a small chapel in 'The City,' a term always applied by Londoners to the ancient walled city of London, embracing hardly a twentieth of its present dimensions. This creedless association of thinking men and women seem fully to appreciate Mr. Conway's teachings, and to enjoy them as well as the mutual interchange of ideas and thought always following his discourses. . . . Mr. Conway is in middle life, an impressive speaker, but not what would be called a fine orator as to delivery. He is a great worker, and is now an acknowledged literary authority and respected critic in both hemispheres, embracing in his scope all current themes, as well as history, art, politics, and religion in general."

PLAINLY stated, the demand of the Hubbell committee means this: You, gentlemen of the custom-houses and navy-yards, are Republicans. Many—the most of you—hold your places and draw your salaries from the national government by the favor of ourselves or of our predecessors. The tenure of your offices is in our hands. Now, you ought to be interested, whether you are so or not, in the election of a Republican House of Representatives, and in the reelection of ourselves in particular. It is true we have a Republican President, Cabinet, Senate, House, and civil service. We have had a chance to recommend ourselves to popular favor by the legitimate methods of passing wise and useful laws, of filling the public offices with persons whose fitness for their respective places must be recognized, and of making the administration of the government just and business-like in its processes as well as pure and honest. But we are conscious that we have failed to that extent that we must ask you to help us. The fault is ours, but you must repair it. We cannot go before the country boldly to demand a continuance of its confidence on the strength of the good we have done. Deficiencies on that score must be made good with money,—your money. Please send so many dollars to Washington. You had better do so. We know of other people who are ready to take your places, if you decline to comply. It is open to you to say that you have discharged your duties faithfully, and that no man will dare to discharge you on the ground that you have not paid your assessments. Bless your simple hearts, no collector or postmaster will assign any such reason for your dismissal, but you will be dismissed all the same: that will be the reason, and you will have no redress. We keep a book in which the names of those who pay up are entered, and we can easily ascertain who neglects his duty. It may be—who can tell?—that some bird of the air will carry to your superior the information that you are not as efficient as you should be. Checks may be made, etc.—Boston Advertiser.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE GOSPEL OF LAW. A Series of Discourses upon Fundamental Church Doctrines. By S. J. Stewart. Boston: George H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, 1882. Price $1.25.

In this volume, the author has taken up the issues between liberal thought and supernatural theology, and treated them with unusual directness, vigor, and ability, "using as far as possible," as he says in the Introduction, "the method of modern science and the facts furnished by the best scholarship." A large amount of information on subjects of current interest in this age of inquiry and activity in the religious world is brought together, and presented in a style well adapted to the wants of the general reader. Mr. Stewart is a clear, logical thinker; and he evidently has the courage of his convictions. He examines the history of the Old and New Testaments, discusses miracles, presents his views on God, on Satan, Prayer, Morality, Jesus, Immortality, Law, and other cognate subjects. However much the reader may differ from the author on some points, he can hardly withhold from him credit for fairness, breadth of thought, and fulness of information. The work is designed for popular reading; and it ought to have a wide circulation; for it brings within the reach of readers to whom large and expensive works by original investigators are inaccessible, much of the thought which they contain in a condensed form and in language that all readers can understand.

THE North American Review for July opens with a paper by E. P. Whipple on "Emerson as a Poet." While conceding that Emerson had command of two or three metres only, he claims that, as one with intuition of the deeper truths of nature and possessing the true poetic spirit, Emerson must rank with the greatest geniuses. "The Business of Office Seeking," by Richard Grant White, is the title of an article portraying the moral ills that come from the perennial struggle for place. In "Hydraulic Pressure in Wall Street," an anonymous writer exposes some of the tricks and devices by means of which fictitious values are created. In "The Ruins of Central America," Désiré Charnay continues the record of his exploring expedition and the discovery of a great ruined city in the hitherto unexplored country of the Lacandones, Guatemala. In "Things which Remain," Gail Hamilton attempts to relieve the civil service from the aspersions cast upon it on account of Guiteau's crime. Francis Marion Crawford writes of "False Taste in Art."

THE rich treasures of the July Wide Awake are too numerous to allow of mention in detail; but we must call attention to the exquisite picture of child-life and summer time, called "The Pipers," drawn by Mrs. Jessie C. Shepherd, and accompanying a melodious little poem of the same title by Elizabeth Cuming, also the charming poem, "The Fairy Flag," written by that delightful balladist, Mary E. Wilkins, with its series of beautiful illustrations. "A Visit to a Camphor Refinery," by Laura E. Nichols, is interesting to old and young, as is "The Assistant," a well-told, realistic story of Western life and enterprise, by Mary Hartwell Catherwood. The fourth number of the "Wild Flower Papers" is especially attractive and interesting; while the contributions to the Chataqua Reading Course is alone worth the price ($2.50 per year) of the magazine, being this month and always filled with articles of substantial value and aids to true knowledge. D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

THE Revue de Belgique for May opens with an article on Marcus Aurelius, which gives a much more correct and interesting picture of his early life than that recently drawn by Renan. While placing him in the foremost rank among the sages and saints of humanity, and doing full justice to his lofty virtues and mighty reforms, among which were several in the interest of women, M. Hocart makes some very able and discriminating censures on his partiality toward Verus, Faustina, and Commodus, as well as on his superstition, which is all the more to be regretted because it led him to permit the persecution of the Christians. We have also a history of the difficulties attending the erection of an epitaph to the heretic bishop, Jansenius, in the seventeenth century, a lively narrative of an excursion to Capri, and a story on which we pass no judgment before its completion, though it does promise to be interesting.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE Christian Union calls Oscar Wilde "a faded lily." Somebody will be calling him "a superannuated sunflower" next.

AMONG the recent candidates who have been examined and found qualified for admission to the bar is Miss Lelia J. Robinson of this city.

THE Earl of Rosebery has purchased Mr. Boehm's fine statue of Carlyle, and will place it in the hall of his mansion, Dalmeny Castle, near Edinburgh.

OBITUARY poetry does occasionally pay, for Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes is said to have got eight dollars a line for his poem in the Boston Globe on Garfield.

"NATURE" is publishing an interesting series of articles on the life and work of Darwin from the pens of capable writers like Dr. G. J. Romanes, Prof. Geikie, and W. T. Thiselton Dyer.

SENATOR H. B. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, bids fair to rival Col. Thomas H. Benton in his years of service in the United States Senate, having been recently reelected for the fifth term.

THE Princess Helena, bride of Prince Leopold, is the tallest princess in the royal family of England, a very well-grown brunette, with sharply pencilled eyebrows, fine dark brown eyes, and dark hair.

A LADY, Madame Beatrice, is the accredited envoy extraordinary from Costa Rica to this country. She is a native of Alabama, but has lived in Costa Rica many years, and is said to be a remarkably brilliant and cultivated woman.

FORTY of the professors of Andover, Mass., with six women (their wives and daughters), chief among the women being Mrs. Stowe and Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, have published books with a circulation of over a million copies.

COUNT VON MOLTKE, the great field marshal of Germany, represents a small borough in the Reichstag, and is so conscientious in his attention to his duties as a deputy that he never misses a sitting without a reason of the most urgent nature.

ON Commencement day, June 14, at Oxford University, England, the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law was to be conferred upon the following distinguished persons: Robert Browning, M. Louis Pasteur, Prof. Nordenskjöld, Goldwin Smith, and others.

GARIBALDI died with the window of his apartment wide open, and while the sun was setting. Before his last agony, a bird alighted on the window-sill, where it remained twittering. Garibaldi saw it, and stammered, "Quanto è allegro!" ("How joyful it is!")

PROF. ABRAHAM DE SOLA, who was for over thirty years rabbi of the Portuguese Synagogue at Montreal, Canada, died recently in New York city, aged fifty-seven. He was a man of great scholastic attainments, and was accounted an authority among Hebrew scholars in this country.

A THOUSAND dollar monument to Jonathan Edwards, New England's great theologian, has just been completed at Hartford, by order of Mrs. Kirtland. It is of polished Waterford granite, bears the names of the great metaphysician and of his direct descendants, and will be placed in the family lot at Northampton.

HERBERT SPENCER will sail for this country on the 15th of August by the "Servia," and upon his first arrival will be the guest of Dr. Youmans, of New York. He will remain about three months in the country, and will avoid public appearances and lionizing as much as possible; but he is expected to be present at the meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science at Montreal. Mr. Spencer will travel quite extensively in this country.

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE, whose country is the world and whose religion is to do good, whose heart and hand are ever open to those in want irrespective of race or creed, has shown us a letter from Rudolph Adams, who was captured and held by brigands in Turkey, and to whom Mr. Fiske had sent twenty dollars on hearing of his release. "I was so surprised and moved by your extraordinary generosity," writes Mr. Adams, "that I can hardly find adequate words to express my thanks. I shall take the liberty to give you an account of my captivity, and to send you my photograph." Mr. Adams writes from Salonica. Mr. Fiske is one of the Boston Free Religionists, whose contribution for educational and charitable purposes amounts to hundreds, if not thousands, of dollars annually.

Frothingham's Sermons.

The sermons are neatly printed in pamphlet form, and our friends who wish to do missionary work for the Liberal cause will find them admirably adapted to that purpose. To such as order them in lots of 25 or more, the price will be reduced to 3 cents. Single copies 5 cents.

CURRENT TOPICS.

SPEAKING at the Religious Tract Society, Canon Tristram, the accomplished traveller, "referred," says the London Standard, "to the Armenian people, who, although they have no literature of their own, as soon as they learn to read, eagerly seek after such books as those of Bain, John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer."

WORK has been resumed in many of the iron centres; and there is a prospect that the differences between the employers and the employes in Pittsburgh will soon be settled, and work resumed there. The strikers have generally been orderly, and have shown unusual intelligence and independence in disregarding the dictation of rulers and managing their own affairs in their own interests.

THE Young Men's Christian Association, by their action a few years ago of placing racks containing a Bible or Testament in cars for passengers' use, have done more good than many gave them credit for, if to that action we owe the suggestion, soon to be carried out it is said, by leading railroad companies, of railway circulating libraries from which travellers can be supplied with temporary reading.

JOSEPH COOK's lectures in India, though well received by some, have been severely criticised by several of the leading journals. The Philosophical Inquirer of Madras, one of the native papers, says, "His utterances were mostly of untruthful nature; his tongue was vile; his wisdom, above the average order, was seen in his smashing under his heels the names of the leading thinkers, scientists, and heretics of the day on both sides of the Atlantic."

THE French divorce bill has been read a second time in the Chamber of Deputies. In the Senate, it is likely to encounter strong opposition from the monarchists and from the followers of Jules Simon. If this bill, which has passed the Lower House, becomes a law, a husband or wife may sue for divorce for adultery, brutal violence, the condemnation of one or the other to a degrading punishment by the law courts, desertion, or incompatibility of temperament, proved by the joint petition of the husband and wife for release from matrimonial bonds, indorsed by the parents or other surviving relations.

IN October last, in Dunedin, New Zealand, the foundation stone was laid of a "Free Thought Hall," capable of seating about eight hundred persons. On Sunday, April 30, this edifice was publicly opened, an excellent address being delivered on the occasion by Hon. R. Stout, the President of the Association. A session of the Children's Lyceum was held in the new hall, and a vocal and instrumental concert given. As illustrating the wide-spread influence exercised by the liberal speakers of America, we notice that on the following Sunday Mr. Bolt was announced to read one of Mr. M. J. Savage's discourses.

THE public expression of liberal views is making rapid headway in New Zealand. The Dunedin Echo publishes some statistics of religious beliefs as given in 1878 and 1881 respectively, from which we learn that, while in the former year only 490 had the courage to declare themselves "free thinkers," in the latter year there were 2,422,—a marked increase in three years. The return in 1881 of those of "no denomination," "no religion," "unspecified Unitarians," and "object to state," amounts to one twenty-fifth of the entire population. As the Echo remarks, "If the latent unbelief in the churches had also been shown, where would Orthodoxy be?"

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE writes us: "For some time past, I have had the intention and pleasant hope of revisiting America in August next. I made certain promises when I was before in your country to lay before the governments of Washington and Ottawa the plan of an Emigrant Guide Book, which I had the honor to propose they should issue. And the preparation of these plans and their presentation will involve considerable expense. Some members of Parliament, aware of the facts, made a representation to the government to that effect; and Mr. Gladstone has made me a grant from the Special Service Fund in aid of this object. When I come, I hope to be accompanied by my youngest daughter, who will assist me in correspondence which will necessarily devolve upon me."

THE telegraph is making rapid way in China. The Shanghai-Tientsin line is working well; and another line is now being constructed between Canton and Hong-Kong, a distance of one hundred miles. The first section is to connect Canton with the frontier of British Kowloon. This line is a purely private enterprise of a company of Chinese merchants who desire to be in quick communication with the markets of the world. Who can calculate the great social and governmental changes to which this enterprise will in time give rise? "It seems hardly credible," says Nature,—"but the fact is stated in the Hong-Kong journals,—that opposition is made by the British authorities to the further construction of the line, and especially to the cable across the harbor necessary to connect Kowloon with Hong-Kong, unless it is constructed by a British company."

olic, when about to die recently at Denver, Col., was told by Father Plato, a priest who had been called to attend him, that he must renounce Freemasonry before he could receive the last rites of the Church. Otero, refusing to comply with the requirement, died under the ban of the Church; and his body was excluded from the Catholic graveyard. The funeral was conducted with great pomp by the Masons. Plato, of Denver, Cuddhy, of Milford, Mass., who forbade the Grand Army Post to decorate the soldiers' graves in the Catholic cemetery, and Bishop Gilmore, of Cleveland, who threatens all ladies with excommunication, if they join a Ladies' Land League, are fair representatives of the Roman Catholic Church and of the sort of "freedom" she allows.

COINCIDENT with the recent outburst of destructive tornadoes and other atmospheric disturbances in different parts of the country, there has been also a remarkable outbreak of what are called "sun spots,"—darkened places on the sun's disc,—indicative, scientists say, of electrical and other disturbances in the sun itself. And it is now surmised that the two phenomena are, in some way not yet determined, correlative. If so, it is to be hoped that science will soon be able to determine in what manner they are interdependent, so that, when the sun spots again appear, people may be on their guard against the attendant cyclones, tornadoes, and electric storms. It would be a good thing to have these apparently sudden and cruel freaks of nature explained in a scientific and satisfactory manner, instead of ascribing them, as too many still do, to the freaks of a Being who "moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform," and who "plants his footsteps on the sea, and rides upon the storm," sometimes very much to the upsetting and bewilderment of helpless human beings.

MESSRS. WHEELER and Whitridge, counsel for the Civil Service Reform Association, have published a letter to Hon. J. A. Hubbell, declaring they are ready to accede to his proposition of "testing the soundness of the circular" recently issued by the Association. The letter concludes as follows: "In conclusion, permit us to inform you that there is a very general fear among the employes of the government that, if they do not make the contributions you request, they will be dismissed from the service of the United States. We have been appealed to by many whose families are dependent on them for support, who can ill spare the two per cent. you ask, but who cannot afford to lose their places and their meagre income, in the words of the late President Garfield. These requests are made of employes with the distinct understanding that, unless they pay that per cent. upon their salaries, others will be found to take their places who will pay the assessment; and we believe that a very large proportion of the money received by you from such office-holders is paid under duress. We will gladly join you in a letter to the President, asking him to issue an executive order that no removal shall be made for a refusal to pay the contribution you request."

MUMMIES.

An amiable and a hard-working antiquarian of Halifax, England, not long ago showed me the old churches of that place and other relics of the past. He was a chief worker in the fine Museum there, where also Tyndall was employed in earlier life. It was about that time Tyndall found his prophet in Emerson, and wrote in the book picked up from a stall, "Purchased by inspiration." But the antiquarian was a Roman Catholic, and a very resolute one, as I found whenever we came to any part of an old church where Protestant ugliness had overlaid the older symbolism. Now, a strange thing happened in the Halifax Museum. A gentleman of that place brought over to it from Egypt a number of heads of mummies, to be added to the craniological collection. The task of preparing the skulls, by boiling the dried flesh off them, was committed to this Catholic antiquarian, who opened box after box, in which each had been stored for its voyage. Soon after he began, he detected a pleasant odor, as of spices in the room, and perceived that it came from one of the boxes, which appeared moist. Hastening to open it, lo! there looked into his face the countenance of a lovely Egyptian lady. The box had been steeped on its voyage in seawater, gradually the embalming substances had relaxed their hold on the flesh, which had expanded. Even the eyes looked clear in the sweet and placid face. The antiquarian called aloud to others in the building; and one or two of them hurried in soon enough to look upon this countenance out of the far past before it passed away, as it swiftly did, in dissolution.

If that Egyptian lady could only have conversed with the Catholic antiquarian, there might have been an interesting dialogue. Let us suppose her to have been a contemporary of Christ. Had he asked her about the religion of that period, she might have inquired if any Osirian were near, and then said: "Alas! the people around me were sunk in superstition. They believed in a terrible Deity, who had prepared a heaven for his favorites, a hell for all others; in a devil called Set, who as a serpent tempted, as a black demon tortured, millions; in a good God, Osiris, who came down to save men from Set, but who, after he had been slain and raised from death, became a judge of the dead, and sentenced to tortures the millions he came to save. Such was the fearful dogma of the masses. But there were a few of us who, in secret, dreamed of a beautiful religion, of a human providence, whose love, like sunshine, should be on the good and the evil, and imagined a good teacher who should break the power of the priesthood, and lead on the kingdom of human freedom, peace, and joy. Of such a day I died dreaming. Tell me, O strange man, has it ever come? What is thy religion?" The Catholic would have had to confess to exactly the same creed as that described by the mummy, names only being changed. "Then," the Egyptian might say, "I have not been dead long." "Only eighteen hundred and fifty years." "What! In that time have not men outgrown such fables? Can it be there are still temples and priests using monstrous superstitions to oppress the people and appropriate their earnings under pretext of services to God?" "There is a Church which, by its priesthood, devotes to divine service a decillion gold pieces. It is true this wealth might make every home in Europe comfortable; but God and Christ and his Mother would be very angry, if not attended to, and we should all burn in hell forever." "Alas! then, my dream of a fairer future was a delusion! But are none free from these horrible beliefs?" "There are people called 'infidels,' who regard humanity alone as objects of religious devotion: they have certainly done much to make this land disbelieve in these supernatural beings. The Mother of God has gone, and Satan is laughed at, and many temples have no sacrifice, but only music and pleasant lectures. Insomuch that just now I was envying these Egyptian heads their age of faith when people believed, when God in Christ walked the earth, healing the sick, raising the dead"— "Nothing of that kind occurred in my time!" exclaims the Egyptian. But just here we will suppose that Tyndall, revisiting his old Museum, happens in and overhears the last remarks. Recovering from his amazement, he asks the head, "Did you ever hear of one Jesus?" "Oh, yes: my father took me over to Jerusalem once, and there was a good deal of talk there about a street preacher named Jesus. I believe they killed him soon after. I never saw him." "And so," Tyndall would have to reply, "while you were dreaming of a great teacher in the far future, there he was beside you; and you never knew it. He was making that future, of which you dreamed, a present fact in himself and those who received him. We now dwell in your visionary paradise; but your opportunity to enjoy it was then, and alas! you missed it irrecoverably. My Catholic friend makes the opposite mistake. He misses the earthly paradise of your vision by dreaming of a heaven back there in Palestine. In our freedom and humanity, Christ's heart is realized, and he calls it 'infidelity.'" "Alas, poor man! may he not continue in the error worse than mine, nor forget that the world organized by his creed was a perpetual night, with the sun added." These were the last words of the Egyptian ere she turned to that fine skull which I remarked at Halifax,—whiter than all the rest. For there is nothing imaginary in my story but the conversation.

Sometimes there are hopeful signs that the force of scholarship in the universities of England will overcome the tendency of the clergy to travel into antiquity and turn to mummies. (I have heard a bit of Syria preach even over the dust of Shakspeare.) On Wednesday last (May 31), the Convocation of Oxford University declined a bequest of a thousand pounds from Mr. N. T. M. Lushington Tilson. The gentleman who made this large draught on the alphabet bequeathed the money to pay for two annual sermons by an evangelical M.A., to be given in the university, "upon the past history and religion of the Jewish nation, and upon the prophecies in Holy Writ relating to the return of that nation to Judea, and the restoration to it of its former glory." Oxford declined. That it was not from lack of archaeological enthusiasm is proved by the fact that the same Convocation accepted the superb anthropological collection of Gen. Pitt Rivers,—showing the evolution of weapons and implements,—agreeing to build a new museum for it. These two incidents of one Convocation put together will bear much reflection. This "restoration of the Jews" notion, once the burden of much Protestant preaching, has become a mummy within our memory, by which I mean that the brains have gone out of it. But living mummies struggle all the more when brainless, and lately the more intelligent Jews of Paris and London have had as much as they could do to prevent an exodus of Russian Jews into Palestine,—which would have been worse than their ancient pilgrimage in the wilderness, and ended in a tomb. The fanaticism of Russian and Polish Jews was interweaving with that of vulgar English sects a fatal mesh around these poor people, when, lo! the Sultan steps in and welcomes the Jews to every part of his dominions—except Palestine. The one place desirable to the deluded being thus most wisely foreclosed, it may be hoped that the new exodus will be into the New World. The Jews may carry their ceremonial mummy across the Atlantic, and it may even seem to revive after a sea change into liberty; but it will pass away. From a land of ruins spake Ibn Jemin, to find his response in the best head of the New World:—

"I read on the porch of a palace bold,
In a purple tablet, letters cast,—
'A house, though a million winters old,
A house of earth comes down at last.'
Then quarry thy stones from the crystal All,
And build the dome that shall not fall."

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

THE LINES DRAWN AGAIN.

There was a small meeting held in Boston Anniversary Week which, so far as we have seen, has escaped the notice of the newspapers, but which had considerable significance, as showing the Unitarian proclivity to cut off somebody from fellowship by a shibboleth. It was a meeting of "Women Ministers," and was called under the auspices of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with reference to an organization among them for mutual encouragement and help. All appears to have gone smoothly in the little convention while the women talked only of general matters pertaining to their professional experience and their relation as ministers to the public. But, when the plan of organization was broached, the inevitable query came, Who shall be members? Shall it be a fellowship of all "women ministers," according to the terms of the call for the meeting, including all women who have suitably prepared themselves for the ministerial office and are practically engaged in it, or, if not yet at work, still earnestly wish to devote themselves in this way to the good of humanity? No: this was too broad a platform, too "all out of doors," even for that small company of women preachers; and so it was decided that only those could be admitted as members who were endorsed by some "Christian" conference. A plea was made for an untheological constitution and for an unsectarian article of membership,—a plea that they plant themselves at once and simply on character, both as an adequate basis of fellowship and as the supreme object of the ministry. But in vain: at least, the shibboleth "Christian" must be pronounced by somebody over every candidate for membership.

The immediate consequence of the establishment of this test was the compulsory withdrawal of one of the most earnest and successful practical workers among the nine or ten women present, because she could not conscientiously accept this qualification for herself. She was really left outside of the line by which the others wished to enclose and define their organization. And so, with expressions of friendly interest and good-will on both sides, they parted.

The woman who was thus left out of this new organization of "Women Ministers" is Mrs. Clara M. Bisbee, who has the charge of a new society recently organized in Dorchester. Mrs. Bisbee is the daughter of Rev. Wm. G. Babcock, the esteemed minister of the Warren Street Chapel in Boston, who has well kept up the good repute of that institution as the people's friend. She took the full course of three years' study at the Divinity School in Cambridge, and graduated there a number of years ago, with great credit both to herself and the school. Soon after, she married Rev. Herman Bisbee, a Unitarian clergyman, and resided with him for some time in England. Left a widow with two children, she returned to this country, and has been putting her scholarly acquirements to account in teaching private classes for maintenance of her little family. But she has not been content to see her ideal of being a preacher vanish. A year ago, she started a Sunday-school, on an unsectarian basis, near her home in Dorchester. The school was a success in itself; and out of it has also grown a regularly organized society, free and independent, over which Mrs. Bisbee has been ordained as minister. The society has about fifty families, drawn from many denominations,—Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, and even Episcopalians. It is evidently a live body, made so in great measure by Mrs. Bisbee's own marvellous energy and exhaustless moral vitality. To this society, which is essentially on free religious ground, where the character of Mrs. Bisbee's teaching inevitably places herself, she preaches on Sunday, and also plays the organ and leads in the singing. The Sunday-school is still under her supervision, and an adult class is studying with her historical religion. The grand central aim with her in all this work is the training of character in moral principles and practice.

This energetic, zealous, accomplished woman minister, the Unitarianized Women Ministers' Association is too narrow to fellowship, because she prefers to call her work human rather than Christian. "Free Religion" is broad enough to welcome her and her work to its ranks.

THE CATHOLIC PAPERS.

The Catholic Review, in reply to a paragraph it found quoted in the columns of The Index, says:—

The Catholic papers are as free as any that we know of to speak their whole mind on any subject, provided they speak with knowledge and truth, and with due regard to the proprieties of life and discipline. We certainly do not consider them at liberty to speak falsehood. Is that the liberty that The Index craves? Catholic papers are bound to be in harmony with their principles, and nothing more. Is that a cruel infringement of our liberty? Can The Index imagine a scientific paper, for instance, at liberty to deny or throw ridicule on the Forty-seventh Proposition of the First Book of Euclid, or to evade the Asses' Bridge? Is The Index itself at liberty to defend the doctrine of transubstantiation or that of papal infallibility? We think that our very brilliant contemporary will find on examination that even itself, whether before or after it dropped its title of Free, is not a whit more free than the Catholic press.

The Catholic papers are free "to speak their whole mind on any subject," provided they do not dissent from the decisions of councils, the decrees of popes, or the pastorals and pronouncements of bishops. It is the unquestioning obedience to ecclesiastical authority, which every faithful Catholic is expected to yield, that destroys the independence of Catholic journalists, and reduces their power and influence in proportion to the intelligence and progressive character of the people among whom their papers circulate. The Catholic Review recently said that, "in Catholic lands, like France and Italy, the secular press is distinctively and aggressively anti-Catholic"; that "the number of sincere Catholics is far larger than that of all non-Catholics put together, and yet they have no press that begins to compare with the anti-Catholic press."

A free thinker who differs from another individual or from a body of men, ancient or modern, on any subject, feels at liberty to express his views and to give his reasons therefor, without stopping to inquire whether they will subject him to excommunication or call down upon him the displeasure and censure of a bishop or priest to the injury of his reputation and business. He can give his thoughts to the public freely on all subjects, political, social, or religious, unhampered by any ecclesiastical authority, undeterred by any hierarchy. Even if his views are erroneous, still he may present them for the consideration of the public, to be discussed and criticised, and finally accepted or rejected, as the judgment of mankind shall determine.

Men do not "deny or throw ridicule on the Forty-seventh Proposition of Euclid," because it admits of demonstration, and therefore does not admit of dispute among intelligent people; but, if it were open to doubt and were disbelieved by millions of intelligent men, including many of the most learned and profound minds, it would be a legitimate subject for discussion; and, certainly, the denial of it could involve no moral criminality, call for no censure, and afford no justification of an attempt to prevent the discussion of the subject by a pretendedly authoritative statement regarding it, with the alternative of accepting the statement as true or suffering loss of reputation and position here and eternal torment hereafter. The mistake of journals like the Catholic Review consists in the assumption that dogmas which cannot be demonstrated to be true, which, indeed, are rejected and regarded as absurd by millions of enlightened minds, are beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt; and that it is foolish, and not only foolish, but sinful and criminal, to call them in question.

If a free thinker, changing his views, comes to believe in "the doctrine of transubstantiation, or that of papal infallibility," there is no tribunal, no hierarchy, recognized by free thinkers as having authority, that can anathematize or censure such person for the expression and defence of his convictions; but, in becoming a Catholic, he subjects himself to an arbitrary authority, obedience to which makes freedom of thought impossible, and henceforth he is classed properly, by Catholics and free thinkers alike, with those who submit to this authority. And it is obedience to this authority, as we have before remarked, that renders impossible in the Catholic press the independence, advanced thought, and progressive spirit which characterize so many secular journals in France and Italy as well as in England and the United States.

While the editors of this journal have their own views on the different subjects treated from week to week, they make no attempt to enforce them by any sacerdotal authority; nor do they exclude from these columns articles on subjects upon which thinkers are not agreed, because the conclusions of the writers are opposed to their own views. The Index is open to the editors of the Catholic Review, if they wish to make an attempt to prove either or both the doctrines named above. And we may add that the Free Religious Association, in the interests of truth and in the spirit of charity, invites to its platform representatives of the most divergent views, confident that truth will win in a free and an open encounter with error.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

OUR DEAD.

Among the survivals of past superstitions still prevailing in civilized communities, there are none more repugnant to the feelings of many thoughtful people than the ceremonies which fashion and custom dictate shall attend the burial of our dead.

Who that has lost a friend by death, especially if that friend was one peculiarly near and dear to him, can recall without emotions of painful repulsion the terrible ordeal through which he was compelled to pass by the senseless dictum of our social customs, before he was permitted to be alone with his grief, and before he had time to take in the full scope of the calamity that had befallen him? That is a barbaric and relentless custom which takes forcible possession of the stunned mourner, and exhibits him and his grief and his sacred dead in ghastly parade before the eyes of a curious, gaping, even if sympathetic, crowd; which forces him to endure the added agony of admitting into his home and the privacy of his innermost life, of his most sacred emotions, the intruding presence of comparative strangers; which obliges him, in the hour of his most passionate grief over separation and his tenderest remembrances, to listen to half-hearted laudations or critical dissections of the beloved dead from the lips of a stranger to all that was best and truest in the character so passed in review.

Though there is a slowly growing effort at reform in these particulars, that effort is yet by no means a general one. With the majority of people and especially with the religiously inclined, this fashion of burial has become associated with their religious faith, and is looked upon as a sort of conciliatory offering by which may be propitiated that Supreme Being to whom they vaguely attribute their misfortune. In the hour of extremity, when man finds himself helpless in the grasp of a relentless necessity, it is only natural to look in every direction, however unavailing, for help. When all the usual reliances fail, we look in unusual places for new props. Understanding this, it has been one of the primary aims of theology to make itself necessary by supplying this deficiency; and it has thus taught men, in place of bravely facing the inevitable at such times, to rely blindly on some Unseen Power, which in some ill-defined way is somehow and sometime to repay for present loss. Mrs. Browning was only stating a fact in human nature, a fact largely the result of ages of this blind and benumbing reliance upon the unseen and unknown, when she wrote the lines so often quoted to silence the unbeliever:—

"There is no God," the foolish saith;
But none, 'there is no sorrow';
And nature oft the cry of faith
In bitter need doth borrow.

"Eyes that the preacher could not fill
By wayside graves are raised;
And lips cry, 'God be pitiful!'
That ne'er said, 'God be praised.'"

In this view of the case, it is not then to the most orthodox that we must look first to break away from the present senseless and painful fashion of funeral ceremonies. It should become the aim of all rational thinkers who, in common with their Christian friends, still submit to these forms rather than "make talk" or shock the prejudices of the community in which they live, to dare to follow the dictates of reason in this matter and arrange for something better. Such prejudices need shocking, in order to induce sensible thought and action. It is time to break away from these customs by substituting more rational ones. Not as some rabid iconoclasts have already occasionally attempted by replacing one set of absurd ceremonials by another set equally absurd, but by obeying the plain dictates of common-sense in doing away with all ceremonies not required by sanitary precautions, and by daring to lead the way in making it possible for the friends of the dead everywhere to consult their own feelings and wishes in the matter of burial, and thus make it possible in the future for private grief to be kept free from public intrusion, and mourners safe from merciless comment and criticism in consulting their own feelings. Should there be those who wish to keep up the present customs, let it be as much a matter of course for them to do so as for those whose most delicate sensibilities are outraged by them to adopt other and more congenial forms of burial. If, indeed, cremation even is preferred to interment by some, make it possible that such preference may be acted upon without unkind criticism or comment.

Among the things which are disagreeable to the majority of people in the present fashion of obsequies are the public funeral; the "taking leave" of the mourners in the face of a concourse of inquisitively observant people; the "viewing the remains" by a crowd of strangers; the set forms of address by a clergyman, whether such clergyman was a personal friend of the deceased or not; the weird singing of mournful requiems, adding intensity to grief, and inappropriate as an expression of such grief; the "remarks at the grave" in the hour of final parting, when silence alone seems most fitting; the donning of sable weeds at the funeral as an outward expression of a woe too deep for such expression, when felt at all; the wearing of "mourning" for a set time, whether there is any real mourning or not in the hearts of the wearers, and often entailing useless expense to those who can ill afford it; the admission of anybody and everybody to "see the corpse" at the home of the family; the "following to the grave" by any who are curious to watch the manifestations of sorrow shown by the friends at the last sad rites; all shams, in short, which real mourning detests and hates as a cruel mockery of the heart's unspeakable woe. These can be made by force of example as rare and obnoxious as they are now common and expected. Here and there, already we read in the daily papers at the end of a notification of death such notices as these: "Burial at the convenience of the family," "Burial private," "Friends are respectfully requested not to send flowers," etc., showing an awakening in the public mind in regard to many of the nonsensical practices which have been fashionably imperative at funerals. Already, too, it is no longer considered a mark of disrespect to the beloved dead by the relatives to fail to clothe themselves in the dismal garments which seem ever to cry aloud in ostentation of grief to an unheeding world: "Behold, I am bereaved. I present myself as a suitable claimant of your commiseration. Pity me, and sympathize with me!" The really bereaved shrink from taking the world at large into the secret sanctuary dedicated to the memory of the loved and lost. The really loving do not care to make their dead darlings the common property of those who could not appreciate them at their truest value. Nor, on the other hand, do they wish to make their dead so very dead that their names must be forever breathed with bated breath and in accents of woe, that the mention of the loved names must throw a shadow of gloom upon the brightest hour of their surviving friends. It is time to treat our dead more kindly, more sensibly. It would rob the grave of half its terror to us living people, if we could be assured that, when death the inevitable came, we would not be thenceforth banished from the daily life and conversation of those we love; and that, so long as any beloved one lived, we, too, would go on living in their memories, recalled in their cheerful daily conversation, and our name never conjured up as a dark shadow to bring sadness to the heart of those to whom living we only cared to bring happiness.

Let us bury our dead as we ourselves would wish to be buried by those who survive us: in the presence of only those who knew us intimately and loved us sincerely, no matter how small the number such requirement would include; without ostentation, within the real means of our friends; divested of any outward advertisement, in the shape of sable garments, of our inward sorrow; in utter silence, if so grief could be best expressed, or with only the utterances of those friends, eloquent or otherwise, whose full hearts craved speech as the expression of love and sorrow in parting. Let individual preferences be respected at this, of all times, when the wishes of the mourned and of the mourners should be held sacred. It is by no means necessary that the funeral of one person should be an exact imitation of the funeral of all other persons. It would be a good plan for each person, while living, to write out in detail the manner in which he or she would prefer to be laid to rest. Let those who crave the shams of pomp and show at their burial so declare and decree in writing; let the wishes of the thoughtful majority, who crave for the loving hearts left behind them, silence and privacy, be also respected; let orthodox clergy or unorthodox laymen speak, as is thought most fitting by those who alone should have the right to decide,—the family and dearest friends of the dead, provided that their wishes coincide with those of the mourned-for one. But, above all, let the privacy of grief be respected; let there be no intrusion of the uninvited public. Who will lead in this reform?

SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

MORALITY.

It is asked, If you take away the doctrine of the inspiration and infallible authority of the Bible, what foundation is left for morality? Those who ask the question believe that the Bible has created religion, instead of religion having made the Bible; and that morality springs from the ten commandments, instead of the commandments being the expression of human morality. Morality is the result of experience. That conduct which men have found to produce the best results has been inculcated by maxims which superstition ascribes to the finger of God upon stone tablets. The experience of ages is compressed into the Golden Rule, of which, when quoted by Christ, it is said, "For this is the law and the prophets" (Matt vii., 12); and Moses gives the precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This rule and most of the maxims ascribed to Christ are found in writings centuries before he lived and are the inheritance of the ages, needing no thunders of Sinai nor sufferings of Calvary to give them authority.

Thales, about 600 B.C., said, "Avoid doing what you would blame others for doing."

Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, about 570 B.C., said, "Avoid doing that to your neighbor which you would take amiss if he did it to you."

Confucius, the Chinese sage, 500 B.C., said: "Do to another what you would they would do unto you, and do not unto another what you would should not be done unto you. Thou only needest this law alone: it is the foundation and principle of all the rest."

To one who has been accustomed to regard Jesus as the author of our present morality, it is instructive to read the maxims of the ancient philosophers of Greece and Rome and the teachers of Persia and India. Jesus summarized the morality of the past. If the Golden Rule be expressed in these words, Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you and yours, do ye even so to them and theirs, it seems impossible to imagine a relation in life to which it would not apply sufficient guidance and restraint. It teaches us to treat a man and his wife, sister, daughter, house, property, cow, dog, as we feel it would be right that a man should treat us and ours, and to set the example in speech, dress, and behavior we wish him to set. By this simple rule, we are thrown upon our conscience, and are relieved of all the burden of an immense code of maxims, which by their conflicting and unbending letter often destroy the spirit of morality. Education, which secures an enlightened conscience, will enable men to apply this rule rightly; and morality will not only stand, but grow purer and gain in universality, even though the Bible takes its rightful place among human compilations of man's deeds and thoughts. As Christ delivered his disciples from a yoke of ceremonials, which neither they nor their fathers "were able to bear," so modern criticism delivers men from the bondage of a multitude of rules which they call the word of God, but habitually violate, and leaves them with this grand "law of love" as the simple but effective guide.

The liberty which the Golden Rule gives is well expressed in the words of Herbert Spencer, in Social Statics: "Every man has freedom to do all that he will, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man"; and its restraints may be summed up in the words of Lecky, in his History of European Morals: "Man must abstain from whatever injures happiness or degrades character."

Men will be more moral when they learn that morality does not rest for its authority upon arbitrary edicts thundered from the skies, but that its foundation is the experience of mankind as to what is best for man. Now, some men abstain from evil because they say God forbids it, or they do good because it is commanded so to do; but, when they learn to choose the good for its own sake, they will lose the sense of bondage which imbues virtue with the idea of self-sacrifice, and they will find, as Herbert Spencer says in the Data of Ethics, that "the good is universally the pleasurable. Conduct is good or bad as its results to self or others is pleasurable or painful: the need for commandments from God disappears." He also remarks: "In the improved state of society there will be less self-sacrifice in helping others, and it will become pleasure. . . . Great miseries are caused by persevering in actions repugnant to the sensations, and neglecting actions which the sensations prompt."

We may with hope look forward to a day when men will instinctively and from pleasurable motives "refuse the evil and choose the good," though this will be attained to neither by eating "butter and honey" (Isaiah vii., 15) nor by slavish obedience, but by enlightened study of the laws of man's nature. But men are not yet all susceptible of control by moral suasion or "the enthusiasm of humanity"; and other restraints and impulses may still be necessary, as the "edicts of God" have been in the past. Morality must become approved to self-interest as well as to benevolence. Men must realize that it "pays better" to be good, but "the prosperity of the wicked" now weakens this conviction. Some indeed see but little advancement in the goodness of mankind, and are disposed to agree with Buckle that man only improves intellectually, not morally. A great impetus has been given to improvement in every other department of life, but some think there is not a corresponding advancement in morals. Even in the Church, where morality is believed to have made its highest progress, frailty is apparent. The large number of defaulters who have been "pillars of the Church" has excited much comment, and a good Christian lately remarked that he never had trusted implicitly in a religious man without being swindled.

As new forces have been discovered and applied by science and invention to the material use of man, may not a new motive be produced, which will give an impetus to the moral advancement of the human race?

In the past, the fear of God has been supposed to be the chief deterrent from the commission of evil acts; but experience proves that men are now only slightly influenced by the idea of the displeasure of God, and consequent future punishment. The scepticism of intelligence and the indefinite distance of the fulfilment of the threat alike make these motives ineffectual in restraining the accomplishment of present desires by improper means. The other great controlling motive against crime is the fear of the written and unwritten laws of man, but concealment makes these so often inoperative that their power as a deterrent is greatly modified. Not only is this evidenced among criminal classes; but in all the departments of business and social life, and even in Church and State, we continually see the futility of all known means of restraint to prevent deception and unfairness. The fear of God apparently exercises but little restraint, and the difficulty of detection and conviction abrogates the fear of man. Sir William Harcourt, when introducing the bill for the repression of crime in Ireland, said, "The mainspring of crime is the expectation of impunity." The telegraph, railroad, and detective police have done much to lessen the security of criminals; but we need to find a way in which evidence can be secured, of so positive a character that concealment of wrong-doing shall be impossible, which, without resort to the old tortures of the Inquisition, shall extort the truth from witnesses or criminals, and prevent them from obtaining the shelter of "I don't know."

The researches of scientists have given plausibility, if not probability, to the theory that all mental action produces a permanent organic impression. As the phonograph registers sound by dents in the tinfoil, so mental consciousness may produce an ineffaceable record upon the organism of the brain; and, as the phonograph is made to repeat what has been stamped upon its cylinder, so, under certain conditions, may the tablet of the brain give out its inscriptions. When read by the owner of the brain, the act is called "memory." Many occurrences are not thought of for years, until, under some intense mental excitement,—as in the act of drowning, the strife of battle, or at sudden alarm,—the mind becomes cognizant of certain records which these past events have made upon the brain. But it has been demonstrated that occasionally the records of the brain are read by others. Instances of this occur in what is known as second-sight, mind-reading, and clairvoyance; and it is beyond dispute that many persons have been able to discern the present thoughts and past history of others. The following case is mentioned in Fairfield's Ten Years with Spiritual Mediums: Heinrich Zschokke, the Swiss poet and statesman, remarks, in his autobiography, that it has frequently been given to him, on his first interview with a stranger, to see the man's life passing before him like a dream. When dining with a friend at the hotel at Waldshut, a stranger entered into argument with him. Zschokke turned to the stranger, and at that moment he says, "The man's life passed before me; and I offered to tell him the various events of his past, if he would but frankly confess whether I was correct." He assented, and Zschokke proceeded with the narrative, from his student life to his later career, including a liberty he had once taken with the strong-box of his principal, describing the room and the black box on the table and the manner of its perpetration. The stranger was astounded, but frankly confessed the exactness and accuracy of the story. Numerous instances of this sort are well accredited, and even impressions made upon the eye without affecting consciousness have yet been so recorded upon the organism as to be legible to the mind-reader or clairvoyant.

Some writers, such as Blavatsky in Isis Unveiled, go so far as to claim that all things that occur "are recorded on the tablet of the unseen universe. The adept can read and know all."

Superstition attributes this power to supernatural agency; but science suggests that there is a subtle condition of the faculties, as yet undefinable, in which the ability exists of becoming conscious of the brain records of others.

If this power of mind-reading is a physical trait, say it not, with advancing knowledge, be more clearly traced to its sources, and, as a result, may not its cultivation be possible, and thus certain persons be so trained as to be able to discern all the mental record of other persons? In time, this faculty might be wide-spread, so that one man could read another as he reads a book. What would be the effect of this upon crime? If the power of concealment is now the chief promoter of sin, will not the absolute certainty of exposure and conviction be the most repressive force that can be conceived of? If a man knows that the moment he meets another his record will be read, will not fraud, lying, theft, and murder be generally abandoned, simply because in most cases they would fail to attain their objects? This would either be the result, or else society would be so demoralized by the universal evidences of sin as to cease to reprobate or punish evil, and a moral degeneracy would everywhere prevail. But moral laws are now so well based upon natural necessities that there is little fear of this result.

The mere possibility of developing this faculty of mind-reading, and the consideration of the results which would flow from it, should excite great interest in the study of psychology; and if, through its researches, this power is secured to a reliable extent, we may see society regenerated by the fear of man.

Spencer says, "Not by authority is your sway to be obtained, neither by reasoning, but by inducement." When doing wrong invariably ceases "to pay," men will cease to do evil and learn to do well.

Buckle says, "The moral actions of men are not the product of their volition, but of their antecedents." And Herbert Spencer remarks, "All evil results from the non-adaptation of constitution to conditions." With a more enlightened understanding of the laws of heredity and a more rational and universal system of education, we shall find the tendency to crime diminishing. In the last forty years, criminal convictions in England have decreased fully one-half, while church attendance has declined. It is therefore not religion that has wrought the reform; but it may fairly be traced to intelligence, as manifested in the affairs of physical, mental, social, and industrial life. Were we wise enough, we could see that a man's ancestry, organism, and surroundings have made it necessary that he should act and think as he does, and that neither the "influence of the Spirit" nor his own free will are the true motive causes of his conduct. If this is true, eternal punishment for one's own sins is hardly just, even though some may praise God's justice in tormenting forever men born in this century, because Adam was immoral and they inherited his nature. It also encourages us to seek the moral improvement of man through material causes, instead of relying upon supernatural influences. Work and not prayer must be our instrument of reform. Pythagoras divides virtue into two branches,—to seek truth and to do good. The truth is to be sought through the study of the laws of nature, especially of those relating to man; and good is to be done through efforts to improve the terrestrial condition of man. Men need to learn that truth is not only to be found in the Bible and through an imagined rapturous intercourse of the mind with Deity, and that good does not consist chiefly in church-going, psalm-singing, and saving men's souls.

One may worship the Good and serve the True, even if he does not personify them as God and Christ. The differences in the beliefs of good men are rather matters of definition than questions of fact. Men may be equally devoted to the welfare of others, though one calls it "working for Christ," and another "helping man."

The moral maxims of the New Testament have in many instances become obsolete, and the development of society is evolving new rules of conduct. Another table of commandments is in preparation, and will be given to men by God as truly as were the first. But they will very likely find utterance in the "resolutions" of a convention, composed of the wisest and best men of the world. Perhaps the new table will embrace such laws as these:—

Thou shalt give women equal rights with men.

Thou shalt give a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, and the laborer shall share with the capitalist the profits of their enterprises.

Thou shalt not protect one industry at the expense of another, and thou shalt not refuse free trade with other nations.

Thou shalt tax all property alike, religious or secular.

Thou shalt not give religious instruction in public schools, nor force any to pay for the support of religious practices which they do not approve.

Thou shalt not advance the price of merchandise by "corners."

Thou shalt lay up treasure upon earth, but shalt use it for the benefit of man.

Many rationalists do not accept this "utilitarian" scheme of morals, which rests upon experience and results; but, with the transcendentalists, they believe that man possesses innate ideas or intuitions, which are above the senses, telling what is right and just, without regard to consequences as a motive for action. Lecky, Theodore Parker and the Concord philosophers, are among the expounders of this view.

It is perhaps the greatest question now before the thinker; for the grandest problem of life is how to make men better and happier, and the way in which moral ideas are gained is an essential factor in the solution. ROBERT C. ADAMS.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE New Church Life, a recently established Swedenborgian paper in Philadelphia, naturally does not like the whole of Mr. O. B. Frothingham's article on Swedenborg, in the June number of the North American Review. It says:—

Mr. Frothingham regards Swedenborg as a very wonderful man, and is disposed to like many of his teachings; but he does not like the New Church. He holds that "the age has overtaken Swedenborg, who anticipated its drift, interpreted its secret, and was for a few years in advance of its course. To get the start again is impossible. The New Jerusalem Church ranks among so-called liberal churches, whose future is extinction." Mr. Frothingham does not believe in the divinity of Christ or the inspiration of the Word; but he does hold to the doctrines that man is saved by a good life, and that there is no personal devil. The latter doctrine he seems to regard with especial favor and to consider of deepest importance. The article contains some very curious errors and misconceptions, which space does not now permit us to notice.

THE Presbyterian seems to us to hit the matter about right when, in reference to the letter of the Andover professors indorsing Dr. Smyth's appointment, and considering the present status of the Andover debate, it says:—

The real question now rising to thoughtful minds is not so much whether the newly appointed Professor was of questionable soundness in the faith, but whether the six existing professors have sincerely adopted and signed the creed itself, and whether, having signed it, they do not, by their letter, proclaim to the world that they feel entirely at liberty to teach doctrines which the public believe are antagonistic to that creed, and tend surely to undermine it. By coming before the public as vouchers for Dr. Smyth, whose credit for Orthodoxy is at a sad discount with very many who have carefully read his books, do not these six professors cast a doubt on their own Orthodoxy, and lead men to question whether the teaching of Andover Seminary is not tending in the same direction in which the old Unitarian leaders formerly led their followers?

It may be added that Prof. Thayer has resigned his chair, because he cannot subscribe to the Founders' creed as literally interpreted. His letter on the matter does him great honor. He says, "My obligation to be, and to be known to be, an honest man, outweighs all other obligations to Trustees or Seminary." Dr. Smyth has accepted the call to the New Haven (Dr. Bacon's) church.

THE Alliance (Chicago), in announcing the theatrical combination which has been formed between Mr. George C. Miln and Mr. John L. Burleigh, called "The Miln-Burleigh Dramatic Company," says:—

A year ago, in announcing his lecture on Hamlet, the Alliance said: "Mr. Miln has a face that reminds one strikingly of Edwin Booth, with elocutionary gifts that are not equalled by any reader before the public, together with a delicate appreciation of the shadings of Shakspeare's thought that would naturally be expected from such a thinker and scholar as he is. . . . Mr. Miln is a young man, having just attained his thirtieth birthday, has a striking face and impressive presence, and a voice capable of filling the largest hall and possessing that rare range that allows the expression of every shade of feeling." We see no reason to modify this opinion on account of Mr. Miln's theological views, and now take our place among the prophets of good, and predict for him a great and continued success as an actor.

We may add that we know by a private letter from Mr. Miln that, after much pondering on the problem of his future career, he has definitely decided to enter the dramatic profession, and expects to make his debut next autumn. He has returned from Dacotah,—thereby spoiling the reporters' story of his going into the lumber business,—and intends to spend the summer quietly in the pleasant village of Geneva, Ill. Mr. Burleigh, with whom he has formed an alliance, only recently came upon the stage himself. He was, when eighteen years old, a lieutenant-colonel in the Union Army, has been a State Senator in Michigan, and is a man of character and culture. Last fall, he began his dramatic career in the part of Othello, and won distinction. For this alliance, we echo the good wishes of the Alliance newspaper, when it adds:—

Together, Messrs. Miln and Burleigh will have it in their power to do much for the profession which they enter. They bring to it character and culture. Let us hope they will not bow in servile submission at the feet of that tyrant, "stage tradition." We shall look for something of crudity perhaps in "stage business," but shall expect no stupidity in the reading of Shakspeare's immortal lines. Let us see what brains coupled with energy and ambition can do in the dramatic profession.

POETRY.

BITTERSWEET. For The Index.

Within the heart that feels the deepest sorrow,
The sweetest notes of joy are often stirred;
And lips that tremble with the keenest anguish
Are sometimes parted with the brightest word.
(Only in souls most sensitive to feeling
Can the extremes of joy and sorrow meet:
For them, life's bitter cup is more than bitter,
And life's delights are very, very sweet.

Those suffer most who give no outward token,
But every heart-pang struggle to repress;
Who smother in their own unhappy bosoms
All memories filling them with wretchedness.
(O brave, brave souls, that faint not with their burthens,
But with each trial stronger, purer grow,—
'Tis sweet to hope the compensation 'waits them,
Of heavenly balm, for every earthly blow.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WE shall give a contribution from George Jacob Holyoake next week.

A LONDON paper says: "In the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland there are about 40,000 places of religious worship; while it appears to be a well-ascertained fact that for every 1,000 persons attending the house of God above 2,000 are to be found on Sunday in the public house."

REFERRING to the claim that Emerson was a "Christian theist," the Christian Intelligencer sensibly observes: "If this means anything, it means that he was a Christian; and, if so, why not say it? He was a Christian,—that is, he accepted the claim and the doctrine of Christ,—or he was not. If he did so receive Christ, he was of course a theist; if he did not, he might be a theist, but certainly was not a Christian. In reality, these vague un-thinkers imagine that, by adding on the word 'theist,' they in some way modify the force of the word 'Christian.'"

A FLORENCE correspondent writes: "On Sunday, May 21, the students and professors of the Faculties of Science and Medicine of Florence assembled to celebrate the memory of Charles Darwin. The large aula of the 'Istituto' was crowded with auditors, and many had to be content with standing-room in the corridor outside. An address was read by the representative of the students, and an eloquent study of the genius and character of the great man of science by Professor Mantegazza. I was struck by the note of religious solemnity that marked the proceedings." Similar testimonies of the high veneration in which the name of Darwin is held abroad come to us from other parts of Italy, as well as France, Germany, Norway, and Russia.—Nature.

THE Boston correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, speaking of Prof. Adler and the Free Religious Association, says: "Mr. Adler is a man of large humanity and ardent faith in an ideal future, while the Boston 'Free Religionists,' as a rule, are utter materialists, who recognize nothing higher in a spiritual fact than they can evolve from a laboratory experiment. They limit all phenomena to a physical basis. It is natural that a man of Mr. Adler's finer feeling and broader vision should cease to be the avowed leader of a body with which he must have little real sympathy, and which does not in the least comprehend his motive and purpose." It is quite evident that this correspondent "does not in the least comprehend" what he, she, or it is talking about. Yet it is thus that public opinion is made!

THE higher education of women has made some advances in Great Britain since 1877, when the examinations of women for the degree of LL.A. began at St. Andrews' College. In that year there were entered 9 candidates, of whom 8 passed in one or more subjects, and 3 received the coveted title. This year there were 255 candidates, 215 being recorded as passed, and 63 entitled to the degree. The proportions of partially and completely successful candidates are smaller than they were five years ago; but the figures are of interest, as indicating an increased interest on the part of women in the higher branches of learning. It should be noted that the standard of the papers in each subject on which the candidates were examined ranked with that of the M.A. papers in the Scottish universities.—Boston Transcript.

THE very orthodox people who yet feel that Emerson was so good he ought to have been orthodox, too, are trying to make out that, as Jo Cook once stated, he "recanted" in his latter years, and was a believer in the atonement and other solid Christian doctrines. The Independent in this line represents Mr. Emerson as declining to write for The Index, when invited to do so by Editor Potter, and for the reason that he did not find himself "in a frame of mind" to write for that paper. But Mr. Potter spoils the story by stating that he never asked Mr. Emerson to write for The Index, and that the last letter he ever received from Emerson was "a generous check" for F. E. Abbot, then chief editor of that paper, accompanied with "warmly appreciative words of his work." The fact is, Mr. Emerson never became any more of a Christian than he was when he wrote "Nature." His religion was the older and eternal one that is always true, while theologies and mythologies pass away.—Springfield Republican.

In an admirable letter to Congressman Hubbell, George William Curtis writes:—

Undoubtedly there are legitimate political expenses for every party, and in a free country everybody should be at liberty to aid and to refuse to aid his party. But the public employés of the government are usually selected in a way which practically deprives them of the liberty of giving or withholding such aid at their pleasure. If a man knows that he holds his place by personal favor, he will naturally propitiate that favor in order to retain his place. It was the knowledge that the liberty of the office-holder in this matter is thus impaired which led Congress to pass the act of protection to which our circular refers. That act recognizes, as universal experience and the reason of the case show, that a government employé whose family depends upon his wages is not deluded by the phrase "voluntary contribution," and fear that he cannot refuse to pay without taking the risk of dismissal. His refusal, indeed, would not be alleged as the reason, but it would be the reason; and to say to an employé, as the circular of the congressional committee says, that his "contribution will not be objected to in any official quarter," is merely to tighten the screw. It is a hint to him that the demand is known and approved by those who can dismiss him.

A CONVENTION of the Massachusetts Congregational Sunday School Union was held recently in Springfield, at which a Prof. J. E. Vose, of the rural town of Ashburnham, created a decided sensation by a vigorous attack on the new methods of Bible teaching in Sunday-schools, especially decrying the International Series of leaflets. He declared that, nowadays, "the bit of Scripture is so bound up in leaflets, pictures, blackboard exercises, etc., that it becomes as completely lost as the babes in the wood. . . . The only way to learn either geometry or the Bible is by downright systematic study. . . . Then, we are losing hold of the doctrines. . . . Doctrine is sneered at nowadays, and Liberalism is heralded as the thing." Prof. Vose apparently stirred up a theological hornet's nest by his talk. One man said he did not intend to stay; but, when he heard the method of Sunday-school teaching advocated, which drove him from its influence, he felt that he must raise his voice in protest. Others spoke in the same strain; and Mrs. Crafts, of Brooklyn, spoke at length, saying that Prof. Vose, instead of the International Association, was fifty years behind the times. Mrs. Crafts then proceeded to explain some of the new methods of Sunday-school teaching as adopted or devised in her own practice. "She has a 'birthday box' in her Sunday-school, into which the children drop as many pennies as they are years old at each anniversary of their birth. . . . To give the children an idea of the size of Goliath, she pinned a paper on the blackboard cut out to represent his foot." After learning Mrs. Crafts' "new and improved" system of Sunday-school teaching, even a Liberal must feel somewhat inclined to sympathize with Prof. Vose.

The Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 29, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association: namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER. } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD. }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all unsigned editorial matter, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association,
June 1 and 2, 1882.

Address of Mr. S. J. Stewart.

When we have no exact definition of religion, we are forced to look at it in the light of history and facts. When we so look, we discover that it is too narrow to be at present a fundamental principle. Any principle which is broad ought to produce the best manhood and the best moral character. But, judged by this standard, religion has not been a broad principle. Historically, religion has meant submission to some higher power, some god or gods, or some vicegerent of a god, without any special regard to the question as to whether such submission would really make men nobler and better. Of course, in obeying a god or a civil ruler, some kind of a code was necessary, whether written or understood; but this code has not necessarily meant a summary of really moral teachings. It has only meant a collection of commandments, in obeying which a man would please a god or chief without any regard to righteousness. Even when, after a long development, men began to develop a system of morality for their special guidance separate from their religion and religious conduct, the morality, the naturally proved good conduct, has been made secondary to religious conduct,—conduct with reference to the gods or priests. But not to dwell in the historical past, or on the historical growth of morality and religion, religion is still in the most cultivated circles of our age, outside of rationalism, made superior to morality. No man knows very much about the belief in his fellow-men who does not know that, among a majority of professing religious people, even in America, a theory of religion is upheld that is philosophically immoral. Prof. Goldwin Smith again overlooks facts, when he says that no form of evangelical Christianity upholds the idea that God is pleased by self-torture. On the contrary, the evangelical Christianity, still upheld by the majority, holds that God was pleased by the sufferings of his Son, and that it is laudable for a man to deny himself for the sake of his religion, even if such a denial is immoral and destructive of life and happiness. Religion, in the popular sense, is so narrow that it excludes a full, well-developed manhood. Now, no man can be a man, in the highest sense, who cannot make the most of himself. How is a man ever to be a man, who cannot think out his best thought and satisfy all true desires of his nature? But the whole subjective philosophy of the popular religion is in the interests of something separate from a complete manhood. Even men who would like to be considered scholarly talk about the importance of "saving one's soul," in distinction from the complete development of manhood. They obtain their conception of "soul-saving" from the old philosophy of a narrow distinction between mind and body, a philosophy in which matter was considered sinful in itself, and the soul alone of importance. The conception is, however, that man does not need to be developed, to be brought into moral symmetry, and made a whole and moral man, but that his soul is to be saved. But, in order that it may be saved, it is often quite necessary that all the spontaneity and naturalness of men should be destroyed, necessary that the intellect should be checked and the truth be suppressed. Any broad principle would demand that, both physically and intellectually, a man should be made as complete as possible; but, in the interests of religion, it is taught that the soul is an entity separate from the man as a whole, and that the principal thing is to save that soul at whatever cost to development or complete natural manhood. If a man thinks too much, he may lose his faith, and thus lose his soul. But he must have faith in order to be saved. In other words, he must be religious, even at the expense of morality. Because morality must at least mean manhood, it is the proper development of the whole man; but here comes in a religion which declares that, if a man develops all of his nature, especially his thought power, he may lose his soul. But no man can be moral in any real sense, who does not develop all of his nature, who does not fill up the measure of man. And, even if we enter the most cultivated circles outside of pure rationalism, we find this same essential tendency. Even if a Channing did make a protest in favor of moral character as the supreme test, and an Emerson left a liberal Christian pulpit in behalf of truth and nature, morality is still made subservient to religion. Let it be remembered that a religious creed is no less binding and exclusive, even if it be understood and handed down by tradition, than if it is written. Practically, religion has never yet gone beyond some conception and belief in regard to a god, and it therefore shuts out honest investigation; that is, the development of thought, and therefore manhood: because no dogma in the world is broad enough to be a fundamental basis which does not take in everything which is vital and real and noble. Even so scholarly a man as Prof. George P. Fisher virtually teaches that there is to be no intellectual liberty outside Christianity. In an article in the North American Review, October, 1881, he says: "The Puritan inculcation of the supreme authority of religion in every province of human life has lost none of its importance. All parties unite in the conviction that the civil authority should be neutral as regards the different denominations." He implies, therefore, that there is not to be liberty outside the denominations.

I am forced, therefore, to find in morality the only practical aim and reconciliation. In the first place, there is substantial agreement as to what morality is. Men do, of course, differ as to the nature and origin of conscience, and as to the standard and motive of morality; but they practically agree as to the essence of morality. It is the practice and science of good conduct in this world. Moral conduct is such conduct as will produce the most life and happiness in this world. Here there is a practical agreement even among men who differ as to the meaning of religion. The man who calls religion obedience to a God, and the man who calls it a sense of mystery or devotion to ideal excellence, substantially agree that morality is practical good conduct. The man who says "mere morality" is not enough tacitly confesses that it is a practical reality so far as it goes, although he may sometimes set religion above it. That is, he confesses that, if there were no God and no future life, there is something which may be practically called morality; and the man who calls religion "morality touched with emotion" recognizes a distinct reality in the morality which is to be touched by emotion. I may safely say, therefore, that, if men knew there were no God nor immortal life nor revelation, there would still be conduct that is good for something; and it would then be conduct that would produce the most manhood or life in the existence we know, because there would be no other standard of measurement. It is not my purpose to discuss the different theories of ethics; but all theories agree practically that morality will result now in the highest and most complete manhood and happiness, if no other principle were to be considered. Now, here we have a reconciliation in the very beginning. The man who opposes religion because he thinks it is merely superstition, and the man who upholds it because he believes it is an aid to manhood, agree in making manliness, or moral manhood, a supreme test. Until some men can give infallible proof, therefore, that there is some other standard for man than his own manhood, morality, or such conduct and teachings as produce the most manhood, is the practical starting-point and the only principle that can be all-embracing.

But morality is the only principle of reconciliation, because, first, it takes in practical human needs. We are sure here that we are starting with something all men can recognize as a reality. Do not all honest, sincere men feel sometimes that it would be well to be rid of all sentimentalism, and come down to a practical basis? Remembering that a murderer, Jesse James, had a most magnificent ovation at his funeral, and that over his body men sang the hymn, "What a friend we have in Jesus!" and remembering that a large proportion of our defaulters and criminals in general during the last few years have been Sunday-school teachers and deacons, it does seem as if men ought to make morality or every-day good conduct the supreme test of every thing, at least long enough for an experiment. When any man sits down and calmly considers the condition of society in the light of facts, he cannot but see that what is needed is every-day morality. How pathetically some of our writers contend for a religion or a theology, and how they mourn over the fact that men are to be robbed of their comfortable dogmas, if rationalism is accepted! Yet, all the time, the real causes of a large portion of the misery of our age are over-reaching and fraud and dishonesty and impurity,—all simple breaches of a morality which can be proved good. Men are continually mourning over heresy who are cheating widows out of their inheritance and making business men bankrupts by their selfishness. All our fine scholarship and philosophy will not avail much, unless they lead men to pay one hundred cents on the dollar and to produce a dividend here and now. Talk as we please about the superficiality of some men who seem to ignore poetry and idealism in the interests of simple good works, they will assert their right to be heard as teachers and even iconoclasts, until we can show some practical result of our fine idealizing in common, every-day honesty. Even morality in the lowest sense will be a tougher principle than ever religion has been, if it touches the every-day miseries and wants of needy men and women.

But morality is broad enough to embrace something more than practical good conduct. It throws the only real light upon unrestricted liberty, and gives the only real explanation or interpretation of it. I should be sorry if, in anything I have said, I have seemed to overlook the necessity of the most unrestricted liberty. Under the name of religion or moral necessity, there sometimes comes in a species of slavery in a sinister manner. The religionist often proclaims the need of a certain amount of liberty, but says it is not best to go too far. Then, he turns about and makes his little world of dogma the limit for liberty of thought and speech. In the interests of a theology founded on a book, large portions of which could not be read to a promiscuous audience, a Massachusetts officer has recently condemned a book of poems which has been on the market for years, and the author of which has had the confidence of some of the best and most moral thinkers of the age. Liberal Christianity, too, proves that religion can never be the proper standard by which to measure liberty, because, with all its fine talk, it often draws the limit at some dogma about the nature or existence of a god, and says, "Thus far, and no farther." Under the spurious guise of defending public virtue, it opposes free thought and upholds its dogmas. But there can be no real liberty, and truth can never be even relatively discovered, if there is one assumption or opinion that a broad, sincere man cannot examine, analyze, and report upon in the interests of truth. But morality furnishes both aim and reconciliation. It declares that it is in the interests of the highest virtue and manhood to allow each man liberty, in order that he may fully develop himself and that truth may be discovered. It recognizes that the highest manhood can only be reached where there is the most knowledge of truth; and, as truth can be discovered only where each man can have absolute freedom of thought, it encourages free investigation in the interests of human welfare. The only limit to liberty is liberty itself; and here morality declares that, in order that there shall be the most liberty, a man must not be immoral, and thus transgress on the liberty of others. In one word, morality refuses to do what religion has so often done,—to suppress free thought,—but encourages it in the interests of men, and then restrains it from anarchy in the interests of other men.

But, even if we leave practical facts and come to poetry or aspiration, morality is the only practical principle of sufficient breadth. Among our best thinkers, religion has been interpreted to mean aspiration, and to include all that is noblest in man's nature. But morality must still be the place of reconciliation, because there can be no aspiration which is worth anything, which is not moral. Morality, therefore, takes in every subjective fact in man's nature. No religion is worth anything which does not draw out all that is noblest in man. But nobility can only be interpreted in terms of morality or manhood. In other words, no religion is worth anything whatever, which does not subjectively make a man manlier and more moral. All aspiration or idealization is therefore but mere moonshine, unless it draws out some latent life and energy in man, and produces manhood. No religious aspiration can give any reason why it should be developed, that cannot be shown to be a moral ideal or impetus. It seems to me that men are superficial, who think that outward business morality will satisfy men. Integrity and honesty would of course be much more than we have now in average circles. But, aside from all merely external good works, there are such facts as aspiration and hope and a consciousness of a relation to the universe. Individuals may call these facts the essence of religion, if they will; and, at least, any man is superficial who ignores them.

What I contend for is that, while men wait for a philosophy of religion which will be accepted, morality is the practical principle of reconciliation. It includes subjectively all that is good in what some men call "rational religion." Morality, in its broad sense, includes everything that is noble in man,—all true devotion and aspiration and the finest sense of honor. But not only philosophically, but actually, morality is all-comprehensive. Philosophically, morality must include the broadest manhood. Actually, it has made and does make men of the most ideal sense of honor. I may be permitted here to appeal to an illustration that is in the mind's eye of the public. Religion ought to include surely, in this nineteenth century, the highest devotion to an ideal and the most complete veracity and a manhood above suspicion. Yet even in our own New England, in the interests of religion, men have upheld a standard that many a common soldier and sailor would spurn under the tests of common honor. The Andover faculty has proclaimed to the public that it is perfectly legitimate in the interests of religion for a man to profess to believe in an eternal hell of fire and the hopeless condition of the wicked after death, while really believing in probation and doubting the reality of the hell. Hundreds of so-called infidels have suffered rather than dishonor their nature, but here are men that think religion is of much more importance than absolute integrity. It is refreshing to find one orthodox writer who shows the dishonesty of the whole Newman Smyth-Andover controversy,* and who says: "The country and the world are suffering far less for lack of expert theologians than for the lack of men so fanatical of truth that they will not swerve . . . one hair's breadth . . . for all the treasures or honors in the gift of the corporation of Phillips Academy." He also shows how men have made a religious dogma about Jesus a substitute for real self-denial for a cause by saying that the cross Jesus "bade them take up was not a doctrine of atonement,—it was a gallows." Now, as men in the interests of morality alone, and in obedience to their sense of honor, have given up office and a large salary rather than conceal their opinions; and as the most conspicuous faculty of theology in New England has shown so little honor as to profess to believe what is not believed for the professed glory of God, the fine sense of honor which is supposed to inhere in religion really inheres in a finely developed morality. But nothing can be left out of real manhood which is necessary for the full development of man. Here is where morality proves itself practically such a broad principle of reconciliation.

Devotion to an ideal—such a devotion as will make a man submit all his present interests to it—is included in a broad morality. Rome was to the Romans as much of an ideal as even a religion with reference to a Deity was to the Jews. In other words, any ideal object of excellence becomes an object of devotion, when men can live for it supremely. As John Stuart Mill has well said, "The essence of religion is the strong and earnest direction of the emotions and desires toward an ideal object recognized as of the highest excellence." What Mr. Mill would show is that, so far as man's nature is concerned, there may be just as much devotion and aspiration and conscientiousness when a man is devoted to a cause as when devoted to a god. In other words, religion, in its most rational sense, is morality in a state of ideality, as the sense of obligation to a principle or an ideal. The "religious elevation and comfort" may be just the same when moral men recognize that certain conduct and character will produce a certain result, and that they must loyally submit to the principles and absolute power in the universe, and that obedience will result in good, as when they submit to a god. Morality may therefore mean practical good conduct, and also the broadest manhood possible; that is, such a condition of manhood as shall take in the purest aspiration and the deepest devotion and enthusiasm. Such an exalted conception of religion as that of Mill still has its roots and its culmination in morality. If devotion to Rome—that is, to a country which includes men—is equivalent to any devotion to a god, it only shows that morality, which is the source and aim of this devotion, is the final test of religion. In other words, there is nothing in true religion which is not included subjectively in morality, because the very highest ideal of the religion of our age is a real devotion to facts and to men, which is the essence of morality itself.

On the subjective side therefore, a man is practically religious in the most advanced sense, when he is devoted to the highest, even if that highest leaves out an antiquated theology and a personal god. Morality is therefore the only principle which, in the present state of definition and philosophy, will take in all of manhood. Our moral friend we recognize as a religious man, and safe enough even if he does technically reject religion, because we believe that, on the subjective side, he is conscious of all the mystery and devoted to all the ideal conceptions which are possible to any of us. A large conception of morality will demand that a man shall make the most of himself. But he cannot make the most of himself while he allows a single nerve-cell to remain unmoved, a single capacity of manhood to remain undeveloped. Go up to the highest realms where a Beethoven will carry you, be thrilled by the grandest sea storm or the strangest sunset, and still morality will take in everything but your dogma, because it takes in all that makes you the most manly.

But even the believer in a personal god must find his aim and reconciliation in morality. If there be a personal god, and if he is moral, then at least he could only demand that every man should be moral like himself. If the god is not moral, if he only follows whims and arbitrary fancies, then, all the more, morality is all there is left. If the god has no moral principle, then it would be of no manner of use to try to please him, as no man could tell what he might demand. A man might be damned, if he did or if he did not perform certain actions. All the basis that would be left, therefore, would be such a morality as would satisfy a man's own deepest nature.

While therefore so-called moral men would often rather suffer loss and death than lose their sense of honor; and while, contrariwise, men for the sake of a religion will suppress their fine sense of honor; while, too, there is no exact philosophy of religion; and while the most progressive and intelligent men agree that a moral impulse toward excellence and devotion to an ideal is the essence of all that could be good in religion,—the reconciliation must be down in a morality which includes all of human nature. A morality which in the interests of truth and personal development demands unrestricted liberty, and then beginning down among the commonest good works ascends into the regions of ideality and reverence, and includes a manhood so sublimated as to appreciate the beauty and mystery in a flower and the sacredness of a child, the charm of the purest music and the glory of a sunset on the Alps, the necessity of devotion to an ideal object of excellence and the mystery behind all manifestations, is the practical aim and reconciliation of any cause for which men plead and of every eternal principle.

THE PRESIDENT.—Those of you who read the advertisement for this meeting have remembered all through the morning that Col. Higginson was announced to speak to us on "Ralph Waldo Emerson." Col. Higginson had engaged to be present, but was taken suddenly ill last week, yet still hoped up to the last moment that he would be well enough to be here to perform that reverent duty; but at the last he had to give up that hope, and informed me that he could not come, that his physician had absolutely forbidden it. And so we have not had that word from him for Mr. Emerson. But all the morning, in this bust on the platform, Mr. Emerson has been speaking to us through those silent lips, and has been beaming his benignant presence upon us. This evening, at the festival, there will undoubtedly be some words fitly spoken concerning him; but now, the hour having come for our adjournment, we will have an intermission until three o'clock this afternoon.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The meeting was called to order shortly after three o'clock.

THE PRESIDENT.—By an oversight last evening, there was one small portion of business that was not done. No committee on nominating officers for next year was appointed. I think it would be well if a committee were chosen now to nominate such a committee. That has been the course of proceeding we have adopted the last two or three years,—that the Chair should not himself name the nominating committee, but should appoint a committee to select the nominating committee, and then the Convention itself should vote upon their selection.

On motion, it was voted, That the Chair appoint a committee to select a committee to nominate officers for next year.

The Chair appointed as such committee Mr. John Curtis, Mr. D. H. Clark, and Mrs. Anna Aldrich.

THE PRESIDENT.—Before the essayist begins his paper this afternoon, our friend Mr. Alcott, who is present and who was with us this morning, will say a few words of Mr. Emerson. I remember, in one of Mr. Alcott's speeches here a few years ago, he referred to Ralph Waldo Emerson as "the father of the Free Religious movement"; and those words of his are printed in one of our pamphlets, where I happened to come across them the other day. Will he now speak to us again of Mr. Emerson?

Address of A. Bronson Alcott.

Mr. President, and Ladies and Gentlemen,—When I heard that not a word was to be spoken of Mr. Emerson during the session of this Association, I had the feeling that it would give me great pleasure to speak a word, if opportunity should offer; and I came here this morning, thinking that possibly, during my stay in the Convention, an opportunity might offer, and I am now invited to say a few words.

Time is very precious, and you have other speakers to follow me; and yet I think you will allow me to hold you a little while on a person so illustrious, whose fame is world-wide, whose thoughts are the deepest, I think I may say without doing injustice to any one, in our time. And, if that word will not answer to my thought, I should say, also, his words are the most transcendent and crowning of all words that have been uttered in our generation,—I mean the one to which I myself have the honor to belong.

Mr. Emerson was a dear friend of mine, my friends; and not to have known him would have been a great misfortune to me, and knowing him has been the best part of such culture as any human being can give to another. Mr. Emerson was a person possessing all the virtues in such a universal sense that all sects, all persons, all institutions, nearly, in Christendom, wish to own and claim him as a member of their association, their Church. But his universality was so great that you will not think I am uttering what is not pertinent when I say that all sects belonged to him,—if there is any belonging to a human being,—because he was so universal that all the different sects and different individuals of extreme opinions, as well as of the most orthodox (using the word in its commonly accepted sense), claim something in sympathy with him.

Now, that is transcendent greatness. That is something more than fame. That is the worship we pay to excellence, transcendent excellence, wherever we find it; and it is not confined to the ancients. The little children of to-day, as they saw him in the streets, looked up with reverence and with love to this modest, gentle, sweet, and holy soul. I happened to live in the same town. I know how dear he was and is to all my townsmen, as he is to all of you. And, although I do not recall any such statement as was quoted by your President, if any one person is entitled to be called the father of a movement which espouses the widest liberty under law, under the moral sense, allowed to human beings, it is Mr. Emerson; and, in that sense, he is the father of this Association. But he is the father of many more. It has been my happy fortune to travel West, on a seven months' tour, and to be brought into communication with persons of all denominations and of all ages, and, moreover, to receive the tribute,—to which, perhaps, I was not entitled,—though a layman, of invitations to speak in the pulpits of all denominations throughout the West,—in Episcopal churches, and in churches held to be narrow,—and I have had opportunities of sitting with distinguished teachers and private persons during all that period; and I found all these persons curious to learn of Mr. Emerson, believing that here was a grand man, who somehow represented what no other man did. Indeed, I was in the habit of saying: "He belongs to a superior type of human beings. Here is a soul that was born in the kingdom of heaven, and never lapsed out of it." That is the class of men and women which this Association needs in some way to nurture and to grow, so that its fruits may be seen at some future day in a finer group of young men and women, out of whom shall grow institutions in harmony with the times. That is one of the great ends of this Association, as I understand it.

But I know that you will wish me to say more about this friend. See what a head that is! [Pointing to bust.] See what features those! Do you think that man could be bought? Do you think any human being could lay hands upon his lips and say to him: "Silence! Speak not!" Do you think that he had not words which have broken the silence of ages, and set us all thinking? I have been in the habit of saying to persons who perhaps had never heard his name, "You have caught from him, my friend, that which is best in yourself, though you know it not"; for his words, through that admirable manner of his, so charming, so attractive, have been scattered broadcast through the West and all over this country, even to the Gulf on this side, and to the far North, and in Europe, and even as far as Egypt. Those words of his are memorable; and they have passed not only into the literature of the time, but into the lives of so many persons that we are all to-day more or less the debtors of this superior man.

Now, call not this eulogy. Words are not adequate to express the transcendent virtues of this man. When I was asked in those circles out in the West, "What does Mr. Emerson believe?"—for just at that time he had somehow been brought a little more before the public, and the public were inquiring, "What does he think?"—I said, "My friends, he tells me, and he told me a few days before I left: 'This thought which inspires me, transcends me, diffuses itself all over me, gives me all that I am and all I utter and all that I shall be or can be, is too great, too fine, too sweet, too holy, to be formulated. I fall down and worship it.'" Hence, Mr. Emerson did not formulate any creed. Words were not adequate to express the beauty and the truthfulness and the holiness of the sentiment which we call "religion." And so do you not see that those who measure all men by their creed would perhaps come to me and say, "Why, he thinks as we do"? But when I said, "He thinks for a power above him that is thinking in him," then do you not see that no sect could claim him? Neither would he wish it; for, like one who said, "Call no man master," so he said: "Call not me master. I say the words given to me. I do not seek to demonstrate it. If it does not tell the whole story, then it must not be told. I say what I think, and do not seek to demonstrate it; for, after all, the Supreme Personality is an idea, an entity. God himself is the unspeakable in words; but he is not the unfelt nor the unthought, nor the knowledge which cannot be communicated and put into life." And how they all thanked me for saying the word!

I remember the time, my friends, when it was thought that this person was unfortunate in being born in a certain family where there had been, in former years, persons who had a little obscurity of intellect. My friends, we are all obscure in intellect compared with this transcendent mind. The obscurity is ours rather than his.

But I should talk too long, if I were to tell you all I feel and think; and so I must sit down very soon. I will simply say to you: Read this man's books. Give them to your daughters, give them to your sons. They will live as long as the English tongue survives; and, if you wish to give your sons and daughters the gift of pure English speech, give them his pages to read, for there we have the most perfect example of the pure, sweet Saxon tongue. And not only that: we shall find, as time passes over us, that the world will come more and more into his thought, will believe more and more in the inspiration of this grand soul, and will come to say, as he might have said in these latter days, and as he doubtless felt, but what I will quote not from him, but from the old fable of Tithonus, who begged Aurora to grant him the privilege of immortality, and she did. But he soon grew weary of this immortality, and he asked to be mortal; and it was granted. But Emerson did not tire or weary of his immortality. He never asked to be mortal. He never lapsed into mortality, except to come with that sweet, pure voice of his, and utter oracles to us from within, and then retire again. Two days before he left us, I called, and was told that I could see him. I went to his bedside, and he sweetly took me by the hand, with that ineffable smile of his, and said, "Are you very well?" I said, "Yes." "Are you sure?" said he. Now, those seem very simple words to utter: they meant much from Emerson, who never uttered a word which was not significant. About to retire, I was called back again. He took my hand with the same beautiful smile, and said, "You have a very strong hold on life, and you will hold it firm." Now, whether he meant the mortal life or the immortal life you must judge.

Let me then sit down by saying, May the hope of my friend in my own case be followed out by the result, and may I hold fast on that immortality, out of which if I have lapsed at all, it has been in part owing to the teachings of my friend that I was restored again into the kingdom, if I am now in it.

THE PRESIDENT.—I am sure that I speak the thought that is in all your hearts when I say that I thank Mr. Alcott for these tender and most fitting words.

And now, friends, we will take up the programme that was announced for this afternoon. We have heard in these recent years of a migration from Orthodoxy toward Liberalism. This morning, our meeting closed with a speaker who has made that migration from an orthodox pulpit to one of the most radical of Unitarian pulpits. This afternoon, we were to begin, according to the announced programme, with an essay from another of these men who have migrated from Orthodoxy, Mr. Salter, who will discuss before us the question, "Do the Ethics of Jesus satisfy the Needs of our Time." I have the pleasure of introducing to you Mr. W. M. Salter.

[Mr. Salter, having further immediate use for his essay, desires to withhold it from publication for the present, but, we are glad to say, may furnish it to The Index subsequently. Meantime, he gives the following brief abstract of his paper.—Ed.]

Asking the question, "Do the Ethics of Jesus satisfy the Needs of the Time?" the first need considered was that of intellectual honesty; and it is in vain that we look through the ethical teaching of Jesus for any positive statement respecting the intellectual virtues which are so sadly needed at the present time. The second need is that of a higher conception of political duty. But Jesus expected the ends of justice to be wrought out through another medium than the State. He himself was to be the one, under God, who should come and establish justice on the earth. We need a new reverence for the State,—that is, for its idea and mission,—a new patriotism, and the State must be summoned to new obligations; and the ethics of Jesus contain no enunciation and slight inspiration in this direction. The third need is that of a new economical morality. Jesus felt for the poor and taught charity; but his promises to the poor were in connection with the "kingdom" he would come to establish, and he did not strike at the causes of poverty in the lack of economical justice between man and man. What is needed in industrial relations is justice, the regarding every one concerned in the production of the means of subsistence as an end as well as a means, and as entitled to profits as well as wages,—that is, coöperation. The fourth need of the time is a new statement of the end of human existence. The Christian "heaven" has come to be mythical to many, and the salvation of their individual "souls" no longer an object of concern; and there is danger that a generation so affected should be contented with material aims. But perfection, and the perfection of all, can alone be the goal of human aspiration or endeavor; and this is not alone our own end, but that to which the world is tending. This goal has been nobly portrayed in Prof. Adler's "City of Light," which is not to be taken as a secular paradise, but is rather a world city, in which universal issues are summed up.

A LETTER FROM WISCONSIN.

MILWAUKEE, June 5, 1882.

Editors of The Index.—

A significant announcement appeared in the Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin, on June 2, to this effect: "During the latter part of September next will be seen in Milwaukee one of the grandest demonstrations ever made in the North-west. At that time, the International Society of German Catholics, embracing all the German Catholic Societies in the United States, will meet in this city. The object of the meeting is to discuss matters of general interest to the Catholics, and particularly this year will politics be entered as one of the subjects for analysis. After this, no candidate for office will be supported, unless he either belongs to the Catholic Church or sympathizes with what the Catholics term their rights."

The Catholic representatives of this demonstration in Milwaukee make particular reference to Hon. Arthur Bate, Member of Assembly from the First District, and his course in the Legislature last winter. It will be remembered by the readers of The Index that Mr. Bate presented in the Legislature two bills in favor of the taxation of church property, and spoke vigorously in their defence. By so doing, he has gained the everlasting enmity of the Catholics in the State. These representatives urge that Mr. Bate's course, and that of others who have been elected by Catholics, "is a matter that must be looked into, and support must be directed toward those who shall in a manner respond to the demands of the Catholics."

A very emphatic carrying out of this idea has caused much public interest in the city during the past three weeks. A new commissioner for the Board of Public Works was to be appointed. The Mayor sent in the name of Hon. Arthur Bate, subject to the vote of the Council for confirmation, upon the recommendation that he was particularly well qualified, both by business experience and intelligence, for the position. A bomb-shell exploding in the Council-room could not have created more sensation among the Catholic members of the Common Council than did this name. It excited them beyond self-control. The President of the Council immediately left his seat, and rushed to the Mayor's office; and an impromptu meeting of the Council was called for that evening, at which Mr. Bate was loudly condemned, and a combined action was instituted to secure his defeat. An energetic and a persistent onset was made, and the result was just what was predicted by every daily journal in continuous paragraphing during the two weeks pending the date for confirmation: "Mr. Bate's qualification for the position is universally acknowledged, but his course in the Legislature will cause his defeat"; and it did.

There seems to be enough significance in this action of the Catholics, together with the combined effort to be made in a grand convention for the same purposes, to invest the matter with a degree of interest. It is "a matter that should be looked into," as the Catholics say,—and "looked into" from a secular as well as from an ecclesiastical stand. There is a manifest resistance on the part of the Catholic Church to any civil course which is likely to limit its power or interfere with its determined plans; and a struggle is imminent between the ecclesiasticism of the Church and the secularism of civil government. It may be no idle dream which recognizes in the present domination of the Church a "menace to our civil liberties,"—"a standing danger," as Father Stack, one of their own priests, has said, "to the liberties of our country."

The pastoral letter issued recently from Cincinnati is plainly a defiance of republican ideas. It was the boast of Brownson, the great American Catholic, that "the Roman Catholic Church would decide whether this country should remain a republic or not," and that "democracy was a mischievous dream, wherever the Catholic Church does not predominate to inspire the people with reverence and teach and accustom them to obedience to authority."

In the face of such boasts and assertions and the knowledge of the increase of the Catholic population in this country and their increasing influence in political affairs, we perhaps should not be content to maintain a thoughtless confidence in our own strength, albeit we may not be apprehensive of such dangers as are contemplated by many persons.

Secular education will prove our most important weapon against this insidious power,—"that education which bodes," as Cardinal Manning has said, "ill to the Church and the State." "Ill for the Church," assuredly. It is the agency which is to avert the danger of that "abyss" Manning predicts as "opening before civil society, into which thrones and laws and rights and liberties may sink together."

Secularism is applying its scattered forces here and there and everywhere, in this struggle between it and ecclesiasticism. Without organizations, and with but little blowing of trumpets, it is steadily and surely accomplishing astonishing results. It is the power with which Catholicism must inevitably come into conflict. In the struggle, the superior intelligence of the rank and file of rationalists will be felt; while the ignorance and weakness of the ranks under cramping authority will handicap the Catholic contestants. In the march of intellectual progress, Catholicism with its substratum of credulity and ignorance is doomed; and its ultimate defeat in the struggle is certain.

Meanwhile, among the army of secularists and rationalists there will be individuals who must, as has been the case in all religious contests, suffer loss of position and pecuniary loss, if they adhere uncompromisingly to convictions, disregarding policy. They have left, however, the satisfaction of aiming square blows in a serious and an important issue, and stirring up public sentiment to an immediate sense of the real dangers that are imperilling our civil liberties. A LETTER FROM MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL.

Editors of The Index:—

Just as I was leaving Washington, a lady who has a good deal of experience among the poor told me that she had been going about among the colored people, with some members of the Charity Organization. She said that, in spite of her experience in Boston and New York, she had never dreamed of such poverty as she saw among the colored people; and, "More than all the rest, it astonished me," she added, "to see how little they asked for." This suggested to me afresh some of my own thoughts on the subject. It takes several generations to educate a class of paupers; and is it not a pity that the Congress of the United States should so industriously set about it in the District of Columbia? Before the war, the negroes had all their natural needs of food, clothing, and shelter supplied with greater or less completeness by their masters. After the emancipation, those who were not intelligent or skilled enough to help themselves, under the new order of things, settled into stolid endurance. It never occurred to them that society owed them anything. The hen-roosts were bare, the clothes-lines held a scanty provision for families that had been used to abundance; and, when the poor creatures had tried to retrieve their miseries by a resort to them, and in vain, they knew no other resource. Industrial education on homesteads in the Far West, under officers appointed by the government, is what America owes not only to the negroes "Sherman brought round," but to the children born of them. Who can echo this cry, so that it shall reach the proper ears? who emphasize it, till it makes the needful impression? The money annually spent in providing soup-kitchens and taking care of the criminals a neglect of this duty has created would accomplish all that is needed, aided by the labor of their own hands.

I do not think there is anywhere so helpless a set of people as those who have thus for the last seventeen years "squatted" in the District. I am as fully convinced as anybody can be of the ability of the negroes and of their thrifty habits, in which I do not think the Chinese themselves excel them, when they are properly trained. The planters who fed their people entirely on corn meal had very little idea of the final result of their miserly habit. Hundreds of families who can earn nothing better continue to live on this, with the possible addition of a few herring in the season. But, while this fills their stomachs and keeps off the feeling of starvation, it gives nothing toward a reserve of strength. Negroes will live, so fed, if they are kept warm, well clothed, and lightly worked; but they cannot resist exposure, hardship, or disease, and so a large proportion of the younger population die of these every year.

The only religious body that seems fully alive to its duty in regard to these unhappy creatures is the Roman Catholic. Anywhere within a hundred miles of Washington, you will find their teachers at work, with more or less success according to the character of the individual employed. Very often, these teachers are educated colored women. I was too ill to finish my last letter to you from Washington, and it was mailed from Frederick County. I was staying at a wheat-farm, and the freedman who has charge of its harvests has a fine mountain fruit-farm of his own. There lives his wife with seven children. The older boys are now large enough to carry it on, while their father earns a good salary at service. Last year, he sold two hundred dollars' worth of peaches, to say nothing of plums, damsons, and the smaller fruit.

When I left the farm, this man drove me to Crampton's Gap, where I was to take a branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to Hagerstown on my way North. The drive lay along a lovely valley and over the mountain beyond Burkittsville. The views are superb all the way. From one of the heights, Robert pointed out the location of his fruit-farm. At a certain triangular space, where our road divided, there was a sharp skirmish during the war.

"Clagett's Station" is on a farm, so, besides being obliged to get in and out to let down and put up bars, the traveller is dropped into the soft red mud without as much as a plank to defend him from the "sacred soil." We ran through a most delightful and highly cultivated region all the way to Hagerstown. For a space, the road overlooked the rich green slopes of "Pleasant Valley." All along the way, on farms of two or three acres, we saw the freedmen's houses, freshly whitewashed. Not a "muck-heap" anywhere in sight. None of them seemed large enough for anything more than two rooms and a loft. At one point, where we ran on trestles over a deep ravine, we saw five or six half-grown pigs swimming the river. It was a funny sight. Every now and then, one jet-black porker would stop to rest on a projecting boulder, give his neighbor a humorous poke with his snout, and then resume his exercise. We passed by the new cemetery, where there is a green mound covered with Confederate graves, with a monument in the centre. On our arrival, in a heavy rain, we were tumbled into the funniest little omnibus, dragged by two long-eared, despairing creatures, which might have been to all appearances either mules or horses. Fastened by a broad, short tongue to the back platform was a wretched, little, open van for the luggage. A child five years old dubbed a similar machine in use at the Frederick jail "Black Maria and her baby!" This is a "Queen Anne" town, and it would do the admirers of that archaic period some good to come and examine it. The houses are very low-studded; and some of them are entered under deep arched doorways that look as if they were intended to shelter carriages, or at the least Mr. James' "single horseman." The panelled shutters suggested Philadelphia. As we rattled through the narrow streets to the Baldwin House, it was almost impossible to believe we were not in an English provincial town. The hotel itself is a brick affair of three stories, with a music hall at one end, and crowded close to the sidewalk. It has a clean, bare dining-room, two little scraps of parlors, with wide corridors and spacious stairways flanked by small bedrooms, without closets or wardrobes, and opening into each other by wide doors, as a defence in case of fire. The food at this hotel was wholesome, clean, and well-cooked. Never have I seen anywhere a finer set of colored men than the dozen waiters who served in the dining-room. In the afternoon, I walked out. I went up a queer little street, with no sidewalk, paved with sharp stones, most of which were set "on edge." The houses were not more than one story high, and nearly every one had an eye to business. At one, we saw a wisp of straw and an ear of corn hung out to indicate what was for sale, on a ground-floor six feet square. The windows had very small panes of glass, which would have satisfied the demands of Queen Anne or her henchman, Oscar. Here and there, a heap of muffins, a pile of gingerbread, or a stick of "peppermint" advertised the enterprise of some old lady knitting or knotting in plain sight.

This queer street runs under what is called the "dry bridge"; and, just above the arch, we turned aside to look at the new Episcopal church, to which is attached the Baldwin Memorial Tower, built by a husband in honor of his wife. It is built of blue limestone with white trimmings, the limestone in rough, irregular blocks. All the windows, including those of the chancel and choir, are of stained glass, protected by wire screens on the outside. The colors are very rich, but the drawing of the figures worthy only of "ages unborn." Isn't that a good way to twist the word renaissance inside out? At the left of the chancel there is a door opening into the vestibule under the tower. The windows of this queer place are made of bulls' eyes, colored to the tint of champagne jelly. The walls of the structure are made of sage green tiles, decorated by hand with Easter lilies and other symbols of the resurrection. Through the blue vault above, five pointed stars are cut, one in the centre of each panel. From each of these, the gas-light streams in a fine frenzy at night. This tower is the last great achievement of the town. A little further down the street is a Presbyterian church of the same stone, but as bare and ugly as it is new. This shire town has some significance from the fact that, nearly a hundred years ago, some of the best people went out from it to settle the wild regions of Central New York. Colonel Rochester, who went to the site of the town since named for him, was born in Westmoreland County, Virginia. His wife was a Miss Beatty, of Hagerstown. He lived here with her at first; and I looked with pleasure at the dear old house, built long and low, at a time when to belong to Queen Anne was a necessity and not a vain pretence. A long succession of arches screen the offices. The grounds are full of box, trees, and hedges. The turf terraces of the grand lawn are buttressed by blue and white periwinkle, at that time in full bloom. The long path from the street to the front porch runs between hedges of box. Beside it are some fine old sycamores.

Governor Hamilton's house is nearly opposite. It is a stately affair, crowded between meaner walls, with neither lawn nor garden visible. I saw many beautiful iron railings here. One represents a trellis with a grape vine running over it. I am told that they are made in Hartford, Ct.

In the morning, one of the porters came to me to know if I belonged to Dallton, in Washington County. I told him, No, but that the former propriétaire was my cousin, and I had one of her grand-children with me. "I married my wife out of the estate," returned my ebony friend, "and her wants to see any one of the old family." When I tell you that this wife was the one creature out of the well-stocked plantation who stayed to serve and help those who had reared her, after she was free to go, you will not wonder that I also was glad to see her. CAROLINE H. DALL.

BOOK NOTICES.

WRESTLING AND WAITING. Sermons by John F. W. Ware. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1882.

There was a peculiarly strong quality of manliness about Mr. Ware's preaching, and these sermons give a good specimen of it. He did not go profoundly into problems of thought, he rarely touched theology; but he met his congregation on topics drawn from the midst of the common experiences, temptations, trials, struggles, and sins of life, where he was indeed but a common mortal with them, but with a healthful and courageous spirit determined to overcome all buffeting ills, and so imparting vigor and purpose to others. His sermons were in the region of sentiment, yet the sentiment was always of a robust kind; it never sank into sentimentalism. They were simple, helpful talks of man to man on the every-day questions of practical feeling and doing and bearing, and all on the plane of assuming the truth of a special Christian revelation. The intellectual doubter, the mental inquirer, would here find no help. The preacher was not speaking to his case. But the moral doubt, the faltering will, the half-hearted resolution and effort, the tempted and defeated conscience,—these were always before the speaker's mind, and to these needs he spoke with good effect. Sometimes, he came so near to the problems of thought and doubt that one can but wish he had gone into them, at least far enough to state his opinions on certain points where it seems hardly possible that he could have accepted the common traditional view. But he does not gratify the wish. He preaches on the resurrection of Jesus, and speaks of the New Testament accounts as perplexing and unsatisfactory, yet talks of the rolling away of the stone from the sepulchre, and leaves his reader uncertain whether he believed there was a miracle or not.

Mr. Ware was fond of short and picturesque texts. Of the twenty-seven sermons in this volume, fifteen have texts of only six words or less; and most of them are short, sometimes a mere phrase. And the texts are evidently taken, not for the sake of elucidating the Scriptural thought with which they are connected, but because suggestive of some present practical experience in life and capable of rhetorical use in unfolding certain moral lessons. The editor has apparently made a good selection, and Mr. Ware's parishioners and friends in the several places where he successively labored will be grateful for this memorial of him.

SIX INTERVIEWS WITH ROBERT G. INGERSOLL ON SIX SERMONS BY THE REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D. To which is added a Talmagian catechism. Stenographically reported by I. Newton Baker. Washington, D.C.: C. P. Farrell, publisher.

A handsome book, worthy in paper, type, binding, and all other respects of the witty and versatile Colonel, is this latest literary venture of that popular and brilliant orator. It is an elaboration of his well-known lecture, "Reply to Talmage," in the somewhat original form, for a book of this size, of a series of six reportorial interviews in elucidation of six sermons delivered by Talmage against Ingersoll and his teachings. Though this is Col. Ingersoll's latest, it is not his best work, since the subject does not allow of much exhibition of the higher and more poetic side of his genius; but it is of course, like all that emanates from his pen, extremely readable and sparkling with humor, while all through the work are strewn in spots the richer jewels of his poetic imagination. An original protest in favor of more equitable laws protecting authors' rights is embossed in letters of gold on one of the outside covers in the following words: "This is the only correct and the only authorized edition of these interviews. R. G. Ingersoll. April, 1882."

THE Atlantic Monthly for July devotes considerable space to fiction and poetry, as befits a midsummer number. There are long instalments of each of the three serial stories, with a short completed story by Sarah Orne Jewett, and poems by Longfellow, Susan Coolidge, H. C. Bunner, and Annie R. Annan. There is also more than usual space devoted to literary criticism and reviews. Of the more solid articles there is one from O. B. Frothingham, entitled "Care for the People under Despotism," showing the better care and apparently deeper interest taken in the welfare of the masses by despotic governments than by the governments of republican countries like our own. It seems to us, however, that Mr. Frothingham does not fully recognize the fact that most of these "despotic governments" are also very old governments, and that the public comforts and conveniences granted the people of those countries are mostly concessions yielded bit by bit during long ages of class warfare to the imperative demands of the people themselves at times when their power was momentarily stronger than that of the despotism which ruled them. Henry Cabot Lodge treats of "Naval Court Martials and the Pardoning Power"; Henry D. Lloyd, in "The Political Economy of Seventy-three Millions," preaches a salutary sermon from a recent incident in the life of Jay Gould; and Willard Brown discusses the question, "Shall Members of the Cabinet sit in Congress?" "Studies in the South," the fifth instalment of which appears in this number, is unusually interesting, dealing with the political aspects of the South during and since the war.

THE opening article in the Popular Science Monthly for July is an account of "Plant Cells and their Contents," by Prof. McBride, of the State University of Iowa, illustrated with drawings of cells from familiar plants. The nature of "Porcelain and the Art of its Production," the processes of shaping, baking, and decorating articles of china-ware, are explained by M. Charles Lauth, administrator of the French National Manufactory at Sevres. In "The Physiology of Exercise," Herr Emile du Bois-Reymond inquires how and why exercise promotes the development of the muscles and the various tissues and secretions of the body and of the nervous system, and how every act of voluntary exercise of the body is equally and fundamentally a mental exercise. Lieut. G. Kreidler describes "A Curious Burmese Tribe" which he met near the western border of China. Among the other striking articles are the "Problems of Property," which are carefully considered by Mr. George Iles, who shows how deep and difficult those problems are, as concerns both landed and corporate property, and enumerates, without attempting to decide between them, the principal remedies that have been suggested for their correction, and "A Premature Discussion," wherein Mrs. Z. D. Underhill aims to expose some fallacies in Miss Hardaker's views of the inferiority of women. The editor's table announces and laments, in common with all friends of knowledge, the cessation of the publication of Mr. Herbert Spencer's "Descriptive Sociology."

SOME of the timely topics treated in the July number of the Catholic World are "Ireland in the Future," by F. Galwey, John Bigelow on "Molinos the Quietist" by Rev. Henry A. Braun, and Froude's "Life of Carlyle" by Jane Dickens. The book reviews are numerous; and there is more than the usual space given to poetry and the stories, "The Lady of the Lake" and "Stella's Discipline," the former of which is begun, and the latter ended in this number.

AMONG the best of the beautiful pictures which help make Our Little Ones for July so delightful a number are those illustrating "London Town," "The Robin and the Boy," "Playing Horse," "A Little Dream," "Scamp's Ride with Buttercup," and "Woolly, Woolly Black Sheep." Boston: The Russell Publishing House.

"BABY-LAND" for July contains the poems "Out-Witted," "Grandpa's Guests," "Doll Eunnie," and the stories, "Girl Jennie's Wish" and "The Silly Bird," all prettily illustrated. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

CETYWAYO, the name of the Zulu ex-king, is pronounced Ketchewayo.

THE venerable Josiah Quincy still writes a very plain, legible hand, and an excellent letter, withal.

Gov. LONG has accepted the invitation to deliver the Fourth of July oration before the city authorities of Boston.

TWO sons of Garibaldi's daughter Theresita, wife of General Canzio, are named Abraham Lincoln and John Brown.

MR. BRADLAUGH made an abortive attempt to present a petition at the table in the House of Commons on the 22d, but withdrew under protest at the order of the speaker.

THE Russian papers announce that collections are being made at the Russian universities to purchase a wreath to place upon Mr. Darwin's grave in Westminster Abbey.

IN a few weeks, John Bright will have represented the borough of Birmingham in Parliament for twenty-five years. The English Liberals propose to mark the event by an appropriate celebration.

M. D. CONWAY has prepared, under the title Travels in South Kensington, a volume of notes on decorative art and architecture in England. The Harpers will publish the work, which is to be illustrated.

AT the Unitarian Conference recently held at Cleveland, Ohio, Miss Mary F. Eastman preached a sermon on "Immortality," which elicited much favorable comment and of which the Cleveland papers published long extracts.

IT turns out that Laurence Oliphant, the eccentric Englishman, is the author of the Moral Reflections of a Japanese Traveller, whose satire upon American institutions and customs enlivened the North American Review a few years ago.

MR. LECKY, the historian, is announced as the latest recruit to the Home Rule party as distinct from the Parnellite party. He would give Ireland self-government by a parliament in Dublin, whose duties will be defined and strictly limited.

LYDIA MARIA CHILD's grave is in the Wayland Centre (Mass.) Cemetery. It is marked by an unpretentious white slab, bearing her name, age, and the date of her death, also the inscription: "You call us dead. We are not dead, but truly living now."

THE family of Phillips Brooks, like that of the Beechers, seems to have a penchant for the Church, as besides himself two brothers, John and Arthur, are pastors over large and prosperous churches, the first in Springfield, Mass., and the latter in New York city.

THE author of the latest sensation in American novels, A Reverend Idol, is Miss Lucretia Noble, the daughter of a retired clergyman living in Wilbraham, Mass. She lives a very quiet and secluded life, but has dabbled in literature somewhat, though hitherto anonymously.

THE Boston correspondent of the New York World is authority for the story that a large lot of letters and manuscripts in the handwriting of Daniel Webster has been found in an old junk-shop in this city. He also says the papers are to be given to the Smithsonian Institute.

JUNE 7 was the semi-centennial anniversary of the passage of the reform act by the British Parliament. The only member of the House of Commons who has occupied his seat in that body uninterruptedly during those fifty years is Mr. C. R. M. Talbot, who has been the representative of Glamorganshire since 1830.

CAREFUL search for the birthplace of Madame de Sévigné has resulted in finding the house, which is situated in the Place des Vosges, Paris. It is now to be marked by a marble tablet, placed on its façade, bearing the inscription: "Dans cet hôtel est née, le 6 Février, 1626, Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, Marquise de Sévigné."

MANY years ago, it is related, Emerson and Theodore Parker were walking in Concord, when a well-known leader of the Second Adventists rushed up to them in great excitement. "The world ceases at midnight!" he cried out. "Well," replied Parker, coolly, "I am not concerned: I live in Boston!" "As for me," added Emerson, equally undisturbed, "I can get along without it!"

WENDELL PHILLIPS, in a recent note to Elizur Wright, gives the following reasons for declining to accept the latter's invitation to attend a gathering at Middlesex Fells: "We've just been flung out of our home of forty years, are covered with rubbish; and Mrs. Phillips, who was brought thence in an ambulance, still lies so gravely ill that I rarely leave the house. So you must excuse me."

FRANCIS DARWIN writes from Down, Beckenham, to Nature thus: "Will you allow me to mention that I am collecting my father's letters with a view to a biography? I shall be much obliged to any of my father's friends and correspondents who may have letters from him, if they will kindly allow me to see and make copies of them. I need hardly add that no letter shall be published without the full consent of its owner."

PRESIDENT GREVV, who comes from a family belonging to the lowest grade of French society, has not the personal bearing of a great ruler. He is short, dapper, undignified, and has little magnetism or enthusiasm in his disposition. The secret of his success lies in his coolness and courage, his habit of working while his rivals are talking, and his clean, honest record. His wife was, some years before he married her, employed by him as a cook and laundress. She has never yet been "recognized by society"—that is, by the "society of nobility"—in Paris.

THE lecture by Mr. Charles Bright, at Parker Memorial last Sunday evening, was an able, earnest, and eloquent effort; and the close attention with which he was heard, in spite of the oppressive heat, during a long discourse, indicated the appreciation of the audience. Next Sunday afternoon at three o'clock, Mr. Bright will lecture at Paine Memorial, on "What Christianity owes to Civilization." No lecturer has spoken from the platform of Paine Hall for many months as well worth hearing as this gentleman, who is regarded as the ablest representative of Liberal Thought in Australia; and we hope to see his second lecture in this city well attended.

Frothingham's Sermons.

The sermons are neatly printed in pamphlet form, and our friends who wish to do missionary work for the Liberal cause will find them admirably adapted to that purpose. To such as order them in lots of 25 or more, the price will be reduced to 3 cents. Single copies 5 cents.
