LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

NATURE without learning is like a blind man; learning without nature is like the maimed; practice without both these is incomplete. As in agriculture a good soil is first sought for, then a skillful husbandman, and then good seed, in the same way nature corresponds to the soil, the teacher to the husbandman, precepts and instruction to the seed.—Plutarch.

HABIT, if not resisted, soon becomes necessity.—St. Augustine.

If we are told a man is religious, we still ask what are his morals? But, if we hear at first that he has honest morals, and is a man of natural justice and good temper, we seldom think of the other question, whether he be religious and devout.—Shaftesbury.

ALL nature's difference keeps all nature's peace.—Pope.

WHEN we have broken our God of tradition and ceased from our god of rhetoric, then may God fire the heart with his presence.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

TALK not of this or that subject being too sacred for investigation! Is it too much to assert that there is but one object beneath the skies that is sacred, and that is Man? Surely there is no government, no institution, no order, no rite, no day, no place, no building, no creed, no book, so sacred as he who was before every government, institution, order, rite, day, place, building, creed, and book, and by whom all these things are to be regarded as nothing higher or better than means to an end, and that end his own elevation and happiness; and he is to discard each and all of them, when they fail to do him service or minister unto his necessities.—William Lloyd Garrison.

THE tendency to estimate and treat ideas according to what appear their probable effects on human character has been, no doubt, a great besetting sin of spiritual teachers always. This is the way in which a great deal of half-believed doctrine comes to be clinging to and cumbering the Church. Men insist on believing and on having other people believe certain doctrines, not because they are reasonably demonstrated to be true, but because, in the present state of things, it would be dangerous to give them up. This is the way in which one man clings to his idea of verbal inspiration, and another to his special theory of the divine justice, and another to his material notion of the resurrection, and yet another to his notion of the Church's authority and the minister's commission. It is a very dangerous danger, because it wears the cloak of such a good motive; but it is big with all the evil fruits of superstition. It starts with a lack of faith in the people and in truth and in God. Never sacrifice your reverence for truth to your desire for usefulness. Say nothing which you do not believe to be true, because you think it may be helpful. Keep back nothing which you know to be true, because you think it may be harmful. We must learn in the first place to form our own judgments of what teachings are true by other tests than the consequences which we think those teachings will produce; and then, when we have formed our judgments, we must trust the truth that we believe and the God from whom it comes, and tell it freely to the people. He is saved from one of the great temptations of the ministry who goes out to his work with a clear and constant certainty that truth is always strong, no matter how weak it looks, and falsehood is always weak, no matter how strong it looks.—Phillips Brooks.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THERE has been less complaint for the past week about cool weather.

OF course it was Dom Pedro who was the first discoverer of the comet. He has gone on getting up in the morning earlier and earlier until he is two days ahead of other folks. When astronomer Gould and other people in South America were getting up on the 5th of June, the Emperor had already been up forty-eight hours for that day, and saw the comet by so much sooner than Gould and the rest. That explains the discrepancy between his and Gould's despatches.

A MOST opportune discourse appears in the Popular Science Monthly for July, upon the possibility of human beings saving themselves from drowning by simply treading the waves as animals do. The exercise of firm self-control in shutting off groundless, or perhaps one should say waterless, fears, seems to be all that is wanting to take the miracle out of the well-thumbed New Testament story. Had the Noachic world understood this matter, the Old Testament ark also might have lost its monopoly of live stock.

THE State of New Jersey has done a good thing in passing a law "to prevent the adulteration of food and drugs." The Sanitary Engineer, which claims for itself a considerable share in effecting the result, thus refers to it: "The people of this State are to be congratulated; and if the law is efficiently enforced, as we expect it will be, the public health will be protected; and the food products and pharmaceutical preparations made and sold in this State will command a premium over those in States where similar laws do not exist or are not enforced."

THE Christian Statesman has unearthed an old order issued by General McClellan, it says, soon after taking command of the army of the Potomac, wherein "The Major-General commanding desires and requests that in future there may be more perfect respect for the Sabbath on the part of his command. We are fighting in a holy cause, and should endeavor to deserve the benign favor of the Creator. Unless in case of attack by the enemy, or some other extreme military necessity, it is commended to the commanding officers that all work shall be suspended on the Sabbath; that no unnecessary movements shall be made on that day; that the men, as far as possible, shall be permitted to rest from their labors," etc. The Statesman has possibly here ferreted out the secret of McClellan's failure as a general. He was so strenuous in "observance of the Sabbath" that he not only rested his army on that day, but seems to have spread the "rest" over into most of the other days of the week.

THE Brooklyn Board of Health gave very creditable proof of its efficiency the other day by closing a school-house in that city on account of its unhealthy condition. The Board of Education had been duly advised in respect to the defects of the building in this particular, but paid no attention to the matter. According to the report of the Health Commissioner, "five hundred little children were packed into the space intended for three hundred. The number of cubic feet of air per child was about fifty, entirely an inadequate supply. Fresh air was admitted in the different rooms by a direct draught, as that was the only means provided for ventilation. Some twenty feet in the rear was a vault, which was used, and seems to have had no sewer connection, and was furnished with no means of flushing. The unpleasant and poisonous air from the vault found ready entrance into the different school-rooms through the open windows, which were lowered for ventilation." This is one of the modern ways of sacrificing the innocents!

IN an article on "Wasted Power" (March 31), we urged that the Bible reform most needed was a large elimination of the contents of the Bible in all editions intended for popular and church use; that the parts of the Bible really serviceable for moral or religious instruction would make but a small volume; and that the vast expense of printing and circulating the whole in the multitudinous copies issued, and the attempt, on the part of multitudes of people, to read the whole through, chapter by chapter and verse by verse, were a waste of material and moral resources. To one of our orthodox critics, the article seemed little less than blasphemous. But now Rev. Dr. Swing, of Chicago, who is at least semi-orthodox, comes alongside with a similar argument. He says: "It so happens that all modern difficulties of any moment, in the direction of the holy Scriptures, are not difficulties with a rendering, but with the subject-matter, however interpreted. There should be in the new versions eliminations of whole chapters and whole books, on the ground that they make the sacred volume too large to be printed in good type and still be portable. A small Bible always means that the type is almost microscopic. A popular Bible should be at once portable and of fair, clear type; and, to make this possible, a large part of the Old Testament should be omitted from the editions of the future. Not only are the laws of the Mosaic state repealed and dead, and therefore unworthy of a place in this guide of the public, but they are the laws of a semi-barbarous age, and cast no little of their imperfection over upon the fair pages of the New Testament. The New Testament has suffered much from thus being found in bad company. Those treatises are valuable as being a part of the history of the Jewish state, but not as being a part, much less a valuable part, of Christianity. Many of the Hebrew laws were so unjust that their presence in the popular Bible makes it essential that each clergyman and each Sunday-school teacher shall spend much time in explaining the relation of Mosaic things to Christian affairs, an explanation to be made easier by a withdrawal of the cause."

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

Free Religious Association, May 26 and 27, 1881.

The meeting on Thursday afternoon was called to order shortly after three o'clock by the Secretary, who said:—

We have considerable business to attend to this afternoon, and we need to economize our time. This morning, we had a discussion of as practical a question as can be brought before any audience,—a question of wide interest at this time. This afternoon, we bring a question of special interest to those who are associated, either as members or friends, with the movement for Free Religion represented by this Association. The question will be, "Will Free Religion organize?" It is to be opened by an essay by Mr. Frederic A. Hinckley, of Providence.

WILL FREE RELIGION ORGANIZE?

ESSAY BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

It is now fourteen years since the first public meeting "to consider the conditions, wants, and prospects of Free Religion in America." In answering the question, "Will Free Religion organize?" I am to discuss precisely the same problem to-day. But how changed in all its aspects! Then, it was simply a protest against ecclesiasticism and dogma: now, if anything, it is the positive proclamation of freedom, duty, fellowship. Then, it was simply a free parliament for the progressives of all sects, a platform of toleration: now, it is the mighty affirmation of a religion as all-pervading as the sunlight, as ample as the wants of man.

Far be it from me to belittle the birth and childhood of this movement. Some of the finest minds of the century rocked its cradle. The spirit of liberty guided its youthful steps. Who of us will ever forget the logic, the eloquence, the soul brilliancy of the men and women who made its early history famous, and gave it the first place in all our hearts? And yet at this hour, reading history with critical and impartial eye, I must be permitted to say that our movement was then a negative one. It had positive, constructive men and women in it: I think we were all of us, old and young, more or less constructive; but the truth which was in us found obstacles in its way, and so the first public form it took, naturally and inevitably, was that of protest against these obstacles. In this respect, it was, like all other movements, subject to universal and ever-present laws. Organization is always, in the last analysis, the outgrowth of an affirmation in the human breast, a still, small voice whispering in secret to the individual soul, until, owing to some outward oppression, the mighty "no" leaps forth, the attack upon the outworks of tyranny begins, and in time, under the hard, iconoclastic blows of a righteous anger, they totter to their final fall. Then comes the still small voice again, saying, "Thou hast destroyed the old error, build now in glorious proportions the new truth"; and so the positive follows the negative work, construction follows destruction. Such is the lesson of all organic life, whether in outward nature or in human nature. Our Free Religious movement is no exception to the rule. I can seem to hear John Weiss now, as he made his fiery appeal to us, at that first meeting in Horticultural Hall:—

"Press on, press through all obstructions, all obstacles. Tear down this insurgent barricade, piled up from the rubbish of all the streets of all the cities in America,—things so insignificant in themselves,—that become, when heaped together, a barricade against the incoming, the inflowing of the Father. Tear down the obstructions, and let the tide roll in." For fourteen years, in answer to that clarion call, the liberal mind has been tearing down the obstructions of ignorance and fear and hate. In has rolled the tide of knowledge, faith, and love. The very ocean of truth is pouring in; and now we are summoned by an exigency no less pressing, by a call no less divine, to study and understand that truth, and to apply it to human affairs. The protest has given way to the affirmation: the free parliament of opinions has become an organized, aggressive, if you please so to call it, missionary movement for liberty and the rights of man.

What that movement is,—in other words, what Free

Religion means to-day,—it is now my purpose to inquire. Let me say at the outset that I do not assume to define Free Religion for any one but myself. If there are those who at this stage of our progress are afraid of definitions, they have an undoubted right to their fears. I do not share them. I think Free Religion is, in accordance with the law of all organization, coming to have a distinct, clearly defined, unwritten creed or body of generally accepted principles. I am not at all afraid of them. I am not at all afraid to state them as they appear to me. Indeed, I must do so, here and now, before I can intelligently answer the question, "Will Free Religion organize?"

What, then, is the significance of our movement to-day? I say first that in our vocabulary free, natural, practical, universal, as applied to religion, have become convertible terms,—at least, they are all parts of the same thing. By that, I mean that to us religion must be at once natural, practical, free, and universal. Let me illustrate.

The little child no sooner begins to notice things than he is struck with the marvellous beauty which everywhere surrounds him. At first, a bright color, afterwards flowers, trees, animals, and landscapes. Did you ever see a healthy little child without enthusiasm and reverence and awe? I never did. It is always a pretty flower, it is always to him a wonderful thing, he has discovered and grasps. And even with us, children of older growth, when we stand in the presence of some unusually fine sunset, when we behold the sublimity of some great mountain peak, or gaze in dreamy admiration upon the sea, where "In listless quietude of mind,

We yield to all

The change of cloud and wave and wind,

And wander with the waves, and with them rise and fall,"

how the same enthusiasm, the same spirit of reverence and awe, take possession of our moods too! That in child and in man is the natural attitude, the natural religion, of the human soul in the presence of the wonders of creation. No sectarianism, no system of historic religion, has any exclusive claim to it. It is just as natural, just as much religion, in the Hindu child and man as in our children and ourselves. In other words, it is universal as well as natural, and universal because natural.

We find the individual, then, whether child or man, standing at the centre of an ever-enlarging circle of truth and beauty. As he develops from babyhood, as his thought takes hold of the problems of life, the first thing it encounters is himself. He begins, not by asking concerning his origin or his destiny, but by trying to comprehend himself as he is. Naturally, he respects his body, and wants to understand its every part and function; but so-called religion has macerated the physical being in one age and utterly ignored it in another. In this respect, then, so-called religion has not been natural, it has been unnatural. With the progress of science, it has become more and more apparent that sound minds and healthy hearts cannot exist in unsound bodies. So the religion which is natural, personifying itself, may say, must say, with the ancient Roman, "I am a man: nothing that is human do I think unbecoming in me." It takes up the words which Chilo is said to have caused to be inscribed in letters of gold on the Delphic temple, twenty-four centuries ago,—words which have remained an unmeaning phrase on men's lips,—and says: Man, "know thyself,"—study thy body, its every law and function, what it needs for food and drink, what it should breathe and how it should be clothed, what will develop it in harmonious proportions and how it may be kept clean and pure; study thy mind, the laws which govern thought, the highest uses which thought may be made to serve; study thy heart, what it is to love and to be loved, what it means to love not only persons, but truth, virtue, justice, as thy very self. And, having done all this, see how thy physical, thy mental, thy affectional parts are so intimately interwoven that thou canst not draw a line of separation between them. See and know that thou art the temple of temples, whose incessant sacrifice is ceaseless aspiration for divine ideals, a never-ending search for knowledge, and a warm, unbounded love. This surely is natural, practical, universal religion. No sect, no system, has patented it. It is equally natural in all sects and under all systems. No word signifying less than universal will do for a prefix to it.

But man does not stop in his investigations with himself. His mind goes out to the remotest corners of the world in which he lives. And, instead of finding one sacred book, he finds this world full of bibles. The crust of the earth becomes to him one mighty volume of imperishable story. The very rocks, he exclaims,—

"Cry out history, Could I but read them well!"

In wonder and awe, he discovers that each little plant has a voice and is chanting the anthem of the creation. So, in learning to see beneath the surface and to get at the hidden meanings of natural objects, he experiences religion, and feels his own heart throbbing against the great heart of nature. To an oysterman, the star-fish is only a kind of nuisance with no marketable value; but the naturalist has discovered that even this apparently useless little fellow has a wonderful contrivance of about two thousand suckers or tiny feet with which to propel himself. A very simple statement to make, but typical of the wonderful construction of everything in the natural world, from the smallest protozoan to man, the highest of the vertebrates. It has been said the unadoring farmer is a brute. I doubt if there be such a thing as an unadoring naturalist; but, if there be, he is a brute too. To follow the wonderful evolution of life through the mineral, the vegetable, and the animal kingdoms, is to see a constructive design and power, before which any healthy soul, whether Christian, Buddhist, or Jew, will bow in worship.

Nor is the soul's attitude less curious and less reverential when it reaches man, the latest development of the animal creation. The mind wonders naturally concerning his origin. It wonders if the different races of men all sprang originally from one race. The Church has promulgated some very definite ideas upon this point. It has its story of the Garden of Eden, which, interpreted however broadly, must mean a special creation; and it has emphasized the differences between men out of all proportion to the traits they have in common. All this has been contrary to nature, and has tended to create distinctions and limitations. The advantage of Free Religion, if I understand it, is this. It has no special desire to prove the Bible story true. It will be just as well satisfied should Darwin's theory prove true. It is seeking simply the truth, and will be satisfied to get as much of that as it can, and to confess frankly its ignorance of all else. It is also seeking for the universal, and so is just the religion for discovering that the unity of the human race is an infinitely greater force than the comparatively superficial differences of the individual races. A distinguished preacher of the Unitarian faith has recently advanced, most truly and beautifully, this idea of the unity of the human family; but he made the claim, which to me seems preposterous, that this unity is to come through Christianity. "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus." I submit that the oneness of the human family is back of all limited systems and deeper than they can possibly go. Mankind are not one, probably can never be one, in the Lord Jesus, any more than they can be one in the Lord Buddha. They are one because of certain characteristics they hold in common, because offspring of the same creative power, heirs to a like inheritance, and subjects of a common destiny. Not Christianity, not any limited system of belief, you see again, but the natural and the universal in religion, resting upon the natural and the universal in man.

But the human cannot long contemplate itself and the world in which it lives, without asking: Whence came I? Whence came this bright and beautiful universe? Thus, it reaches back naturally after the first great cause, of all things most dogmatically treated and yet of all things least understood. Not one of the sects but has asserted more about God than it really knows. That of course is not natural, it is not practical, it leads to differences which prevent its being universal; and, when it becomes a creed which the mind must accept or be lost, it is not free. Now, how much can be known, is known, affirmatively, about the power men have called God? Let us investigate that question for a moment from a scientific stand-point. Everything we know about has a cause. We never knew of anything without a cause. Is it likely, if everything the mind can comprehend has a cause, that those things which are too great for the mind to comprehend have no cause? That is to say, otherwise stated, that the smaller and more simple a thing is, the greater the necessity for something or somebody to produce it. That does not commend itself as commonsense. No: deep down in the solid foundations of logic, scientifically demonstrable, rests the conviction that something does not come from nothing. As Mr. Weiss said, Man is never quite able to tumble over the edge of nothingness. It is then a conviction of the human mind, not an opinion because the Bible says so, but a conviction based on science and logic, that beyond the region where the mind can penetrate there is a vast realm which has been most aptly called the Unknown. In other words there is power beyond the human. That is a safe, natural, universal conclusion of mankind. May we know anything about that power? It has been described in all sorts of ways by so-called saints in so-called sacred books. It has been pictured as a man with flowing beard; it has been pronounced a jealous power, a harsh, cruel avenger of wrongs, an austere judge; and finally as a kind and loving father: these representations showing in all ages how man has made an image of God in his own mind, reflecting simply his own crude and ever-changing guesses. And these guesses have furnished the basis for the world's theologies. So far as the Church has been built upon this basis, it has not been practical, it has not been free, it has not been universal. But this sense of the unknown is all of these combined. More than that so far as we can understand it, we see an intelligent design running through all creation. Means are adapted to ends. Like causes always produce like effects. All is order, system, law. That seems a plain indication that within this realm of the unknown is not only a creative power, but an intelligent creative power. Indeed, it is hard to conceive of creation without intelligence. I believe the sane mind, wherever found, will assent to that. So, then, we may say there is intelligence at the centre of things. There is also love there. It may not be that the hairs of our heads are all numbered, but that the care of the animal for its young, the affection which knits families together, and the fellow-feeling which tends toward unity in the human race are more than suggestive of the principle of love in and through all creation, no one can reasonably doubt. To suppose that the unknown does not involve a power working ever for intelligence and love is to suppose that ultimately ignorance is to prevail over knowledge and hate over brotherly kindness, a supposition of which any healthy mind is incapable. What, then, has Free Religion to offer for a God? As it seems to me, the Unknown and the Universal, acting through and in all, with a higher than human intelligence and love. And there it stops. It will not proceed one step further, with child or man, to be lost in the wilderness of assumption and dogma. It rests with all the reverence, the natural reverence of a little child, on that rock of ages, infinite wisdom and infinite love. And so here again we have a religion owned by no sect or system, but as practical, as free, and as universal as human nature itself.

I hardly need say, then, that to me Free Religion stands for a reverent attitude before the wonders of creation, careful study of and care for the individual in his bodily, his mental, his affectional faculties, the recognition of unity as running through and prevailing over variety in the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, prevailing in the human race even, over all individual race differences, and the existence at the heart of things of infinite wisdom and love. These all based not upon exclusive revelation through some Chinese sage, some Hindu hermit or some Judean Saviour, but upon direct and not less divine revelation to every human soul.

Now what follows from, what is an indispensable part of, such a religion as this in the realm of practical ethics? I confidently assert, nothing less than the ultimate establishment of a science of society. To-day, life is full of caste distinctions. The recognition of the necessity for charity is only a confession of injustice. Human beings are brought into the world by accident; many of them find their places after being in it by accident; they go out of it, frequently, by accident. The relations of capital and labor, of men and women, of parents and children, here and now, are unsolved problems. Why? Because religion has been the attitude of the soul toward its God whom it hath not seen instead of the attitude of the soul toward its brother man whom it hath seen. I except no church in this criticism. I know the old definitions, I know what the dictionary says, and I appeal from them all to the future "consensus of the competent," to say with Mr. Wasson, and with perhaps a grander meaning than Mr. Wasson knew, that henceforth "religion is the sense of universal relation;" that it means oneness with the outward universe, that it means ceaseless aspiration after divine ideals; but, more than all and because of all this, it means a constant growth toward human brotherhood and love. It means that it must find its way inside prison walls, not to trouble itself about the prisoner's belief, but to look after the conditions which shall better his life; it means that it must find its way into counting-room and work-shop, not to solicit subscriptions for carrying the gospel of Jesus to the heathen, but to enforce the gospel of common honesty and self-respect right there; it means that it must find its way into politics, not to sanction or be indifferent to trickery and time-serving, but to demand the application of just and impartial law to all conditions, as the free, legitimate outcome of the people's thought and will; it means that it must find its way into factory and mine, not to talk to overworked, half-starved, aimless children of toil about the blessings of labor, but to secure to them such equitable rewards of industry as shall make labor really a blessing; it means that it must find its way into the home, not to prate of the sacredness of domestic drudgery and unlimited self-sacrifice, but to hold up such an ideal as shall make every home a nursery of strong, well-balanced character, where the individual shall be recognized as the holy of holies, not to be safely profaned by so much as an impure thought; it means in brief that it must dig down beneath all sects, all systems, all charities, all reforms, and find the universal principles of truth and love underlying them all. In other words, reverently approximating the conditions in which a new life is to be summoned into being to the highest ideals of purity and love, it would surround that life, through every stage of its development, with abundant opportunities for the highest possible growth,—not as a matter of charity, but as an eternal principle of justice. For, if there be one thing in its philosophy more clearly settled than another, it is that the very fact of birth entitles the individual to all that is necessary to such growth, provided that he does not infringe upon a like right for every other individual. The good things of life, it says, whether natural agents or the products of labor acting upon natural agents, are not to be monopolized: under a system of equity, where competition has melted into cooperation, they will be the blessed birthright of all. Thus viewed, to me, the platform of Free Religion denies less and affirms more than any other. It is not limited to the Christian past; it inherits the whole past. It is not limited to its own disciples, to one race, class, or condition of men; its field of duty is the undivided present with all the present contains. It is not limited to a future mapped out in creeds or guessed at by dreamers: it is ready to take the whole future, whatever it may be, assured that it cannot be otherwise than very good. This is the gospel of freedom, fellowship, character, founded upon natural, practical, and universal principles which Free Religion brings. Not an attempt in it to define God, to use Matthew Arnold's phrase, as if he were a man in the next street; not an attempt in it to assume the fact of personal immortality or to take any other fact on the supposed authority of sacred man or book; not an attempt in it to save souls for a future of lazy bliss, not one; but simply a recognition of man's universal relationship, and of religion as the bond binding all men together and all men to the world of ideals, in the truth-seeking and the truth-loving spirit. With its sainted Lucretia, it says, "Truth for authority, not authority for truth."

Now, I admit that if this gospel is championed by some other movement than our own, as is frequently claimed, there may be a question as to how much we have to do for its propagation. But I look in vain for the movement which thus champions it. I know of no Church willing to surrender, rather let me say obliged to slough off because it has outgrown, its special emphasis of its special sect and its special system. The liberal Unitarian Church certainly is not ready to launch the individual upon the great ocean of Truth without its Christian charts and compasses. I honor the great souls—and there are many of them—occupying liberal pulpits, who, under the various sects of Christendom, are serving liberty. I honor the feeling on their part and among ourselves which seeks a mutual fellowship of the spirit; but it must not be gained at the expense of wiping out real distinctions. No sane mind will refuse to Christianity its great place among the religions of the world; but the word "Christian" is a limiting word: it signifies a part cut off, it is but a limb, it never has been, it never can be the whole body. Neither does any reform or charitable association, or all reform and charitable associations combined, represent our ground. They are all confessedly fragmentary, some of them plainly superficial. The merest statement of the natural, practical, universal basis upon which Free Religion stands is a demonstration that its work is a distinctive one. Any attempt to make it appear identical with the work of any other movement, in or out of the Church, will fail and ought to fail. The toleration in which we believe, I take it, is not a mush of concession, satisfying nobody. It is a manly respect for honest differences of opinion, on a basis of the largest mental liberty. I feel, therefore, that while the fellowship of the spirit, in which it is to be hoped we all share, is broad enough, and ought always to be broad enough, to include every human being, whatever his condition, his race, his color, or his creed, the mental and moral attitude of Free Religion is one which rightfully and inevitably draws the lines between it and the Church clear and strong. We have a word of our own to utter, a work of our own to do. Shame, say I, shame upon the coward fear that, if we open our lips to speak that word, we shall say something which ought not to be said; or, if we put our hands to that work, we shall do something which ought not to be done!

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
Who fears to put it to the touch
To gain or lose it all."

And that is just as true of organized bodies as of individuals. We need the courage of our convictions, if we have any such things, to show by our earnestness of purpose, our full measure of devotion, that we are the custodians of a gospel of momentous import for the sons of men.

And the multitudes stand eagerly waiting to hear this gospel preached. Tired beyond expression with the formalism of the Church, the human mind to-day demands thought,—thought not about what we cannot know, but about what we do know and ought to know. The unchurched are not without susceptibilities to practical religion. There is more of such religion out of the Church than in it, and the proportion is constantly increasing. There is scarcely an intelligent community anywhere but will respond with an audience of thoughtful people to a course of lectures from our stand-point. Those who have tried it know that people are hungry for the mental and spiritual food we have to offer. Instead of three distinctively Free Religious movements in New York and New England represented here to-day, we might have a dozen, if we had half the rational missionary zeal that has moved prophets and martyrs in all ages for causes in no way superior to ours. Because I will not consent to a written creed, I am not therefore estopped from standing in the presence of men, an advocate of the ideas which are a vital part of my life. And if, as they listen, they approve, and enough of thinking alike is discovered to make a cooperative movement for the spread of those ideas seem wise and natural, I see no reason, not the shadow of a reason, why the movement should not be attempted. Depend upon it, friends, we have not outgrown religious organization. Religion may lead to the closet; but, if it be really religion, it will make the isolated individual long to get out again upon the street, where something is to be done for his fellow-men. There is nothing evil in the principle of organization. You see it everywhere in outward nature. The whole universe of mind and matter speaks of it as natural and inevitable. But organization necessarily represents the spirit of the organizer. Tyrants organize tyranny. It is for us to organize freedom. I am here to-day because I believe it to be the mission of Free Religion to organize men on a basis of freedom, fellowship, and character, because I think we are blind to the opportunity at our very doors, because I would arouse you to a deeper sense of personal obligation, because I would make this movement an affirmative but aggressive champion of radical truth, the representative of a religion good to live by, good to trade by, good to teach by, good to grow by,—a religion which, knowing no system, is yet essential under all systems; a religion of universal liberty and light and love. I recall, in this connection, the beautiful poem of Lizzie Doten at one of our early Conventions:—

"Deeper than all sense of seeing Lies the secret source of being;
And the soul, with truth agreeing,

Learns to live in thoughts and deeds.
For the life is more than raiment,
And the earth is pledged for payment
Unto man for all his needs.

"Nature is our common mother,
Every living man our brother;
Therefore let us serve each other,
Not to meet the law's behests,
But because through cheerful giving
We shall learn the art of living,
And to live and serve is best.

"Life is more than what man fancies,
Not a game of idle chances,
But it steadily advances
Up the rugged heights of time,
Till each complex web of trouble,
Every sad hope's broken bubble,
Hath a meaning most sublime.

"More of practice, less profession,
More of firmness, less concession,
More of freedom, less oppression
In the Church and in the State,
More of life, and less of fashion,
More of love, and less of passion,—
That will make us good and great.

"When true hearts, divinely gifted,
From the chaff of error sifted,
On their crosses are uplifted,
Shall the world most clearly see
That earth's greatest time of trial
Calls for holy self-denial, Calls on men to do and be.

"Then forever and forever
Let it be the soul's endeavor
Love from hatred to dis sever;
And in what-e'er we do,
Won by truth's eternal beauty,
To our highest sense of duty
Evermore be firm and true."

That is an epitome of religion; Free Religion we call it to distinguish it from the old superstitions. And I am asked to answer the question, Will this religion organize? Friends, the question is not, Will Free Religion organize? The question is, Will we organize it? Has it obtained such complete possession of our souls that we cannot help doing our level best to carry it to other souls? That is the problem to-day. You cannot solve it for me. I cannot solve it for you. But, all together, we can solve it by encouraging the work of local organization. All together, we can solve it by sustaining the Index and making it the representative of the most affirmative and aggressive radicalism. Are we ready to do that? Are we ready to become rational missionaries of the faith we hold? As one of many, I voice the question. As one of many, I await with profound solicitude the answer.

The PRESIDENT.—The question has been stated by Mr. Hinckley, and there were one or two points in his able discourse which seem to me to hint at the answer. I desire to take a few minutes of your time to refer to those points, and also to improve the opportunity of supplementing something to what I said this morning. The first question is, Will Free Religion organize? The next question that will be asked is, On what basis can it organize? Have we anything positive to give? I know we have a very large work to do in dispelling from men's minds certain opinions now prevalent and injurious to the progress of morality. I believe that work will be done; but, after that has been accomplished, what basis of organization can be offered? It seems to me that our work, so far as it is negative, will never be successfully done, unless, in conjunction with our criticisms, we can offer our positive substitutes. I believe that the majority of our fellow-men will cling to the old they have, and of which they know, and which gives them certain comfort and consolation, even at the expense of sincerity, rather than cast that away without knowing what is to take its place; and so I believe that, even in order to do the work of criticism effectively, it becomes necessary to place before the world our position affirmatively, supplying something to take the place of that which we remove. Besides supporting the Index and sending out lecturers to discuss the question of Free Religion,—a most useful undertaking,—something else is required. After these lecturers have been heard a few times, and after the Index has been read a few years, unless the substitutes to which I refer come into prominence, the movement will not gain strength, and will eventually be lost in the world.

Now, on what basis are we to organize? I stated this morning my own conviction that we ought to organize on the basis of moral culture, and Mr. Hinckley has named a few points. He says it is the duty of Free Religion, for instance, to settle the relations between capital and labor; at least, to give the moral motive power for the just settlement of that question. He has also referred to other injustices that prevail, and declared it to be the duty of Free Religion to attack those injustices. But I ask, How is the Free Religious Association to do that work? Is it supposed that we can level these accretions of wrong? If we cannot, and we merely protest against them, that is what others are doing, probably with greater effect than any teacher of Free Religion has yet done. It strikes me (and here comes in the idea of organization as it suggests itself in my mind) that Free Religion is not to stop with merely protesting against these wrongs, but that we are in our own persons to do away with those wrongs so far as we are concerned. That is to say, adopting Emerson's advice, who tells us, "To thine own self, in thine own place be true, and do not one act which is wrong," let us, if we cannot do this individually, organize in societies for the purpose of doing it together.

In our own case, I believe that the reform movement which Free Religion is to organize will be a reform of our own lives first. A great many reform societies have been instituted for reforming the lives of other people, and a great many persons are willing to join such associations. And there have been also a few associations which have been organized on the basis of personal reform; and those associations have invariably been strong. The temperance movement is strong, because it is organized upon what is known to be vital to every member in his own life. But the defect in all these associations is in this: that all these are partial, embracing only one aspect of moral life, while a reform organization for a higher life under the auspices of a Free Religious movement must be such an organization as means the whole life. If we find society to be wrong, to be constructed on an unjust basis, the thing first to do is to ascertain in how far society can and shall be reconstructed on a just basis; and then not only to proclaim the results of our inquiry, but at once to proceed to action in our own life, and to say, If the whole of society is not yet ready for these things, we are ready and will do them.

To give you an idea of what I mean, I may say that political economy of the more radical type has suggested the idea of graduated taxation. This is truly just. It means that not all of the members of the community are to be taxed alike, but that the rate of taxation shall rise with the income, because it is clearly just that those who are possessed of larger incomes should be taxed more in proportion to their incomes than those who are possessed of only a small income; for those who have a small income need the whole of it in order to bear their expenses, and it is unjust that a man who has a thousand dollars income should pay five per cent. tax, and a man who has a million should only pay five per cent. of his income. The man who has a thousand dollars income can much less afford to sacrifice five per cent. of it than the man who has a million can afford to sacrifice twenty per cent.; and so the demand has been made for a graduated scale of taxation, the ratio of taxation to rise with the income. But some of our practical friends have told me that it is absurd to suppose that selfish society as organized at present should make such a change in the law, and that the great vested interests of those who possess and those who hope to possess large incomes will prevent such a reform. Now, by this one instance, I can explain to you what I mean by an organization for the reform of the individual life under the auspices of Free Religion. Those measures of justice which the community ought to accept, but which it is not yet ready to accept, we can accept. Why should not one hundred persons, why should not two hundred or five hundred persons, who mean what they say when they say "higher life," show that these words are not mere sham, by conforming to their conceptions of right and duty even without civil law, under the inspiration of higher law? Why should not those persons who are so minded say, "We will form a new religious association, and one of the pillars of our organization, one of the foundations upon which we will base it, is this: a graduated taxation according to the income is a just principle, and we will voluntarily do, in the name of justice and duty, that which no written law has yet exacted from us?"

My friends, that is one instance of many which might be shown that it is possible for a number of persons to practise in their own life the higher conceptions of duty which they proclaim as a principle. You can do it, if you will do it; and it seems to me that the leaders of Free Religion ought to understand this, and construct the societies which they organize upon such a basis. And, if we have such societies in the villages of this country, men can point to our members and say, "This man gives twenty per cent. of his income for the purposes of taxation, because he is a Free Religionist." Then shall we stand in a position before our countrymen which will command their respect, and such action will be a propaganda for Free Religion than which we can find none better and none more equitable.

In consequence of the somewhat abrupt manner in which I was obliged to close my remarks this morning, I thought I would throw out this practical suggestion, showing just exactly how this view of life can be carried out, and how we can make our Free Religious Associations what they ought to be,—types of the ideal; that is to say, the imperfect approximation to the ideal of human society constituted upon principles of perfect justice. It seems to me that such an attempt is a necessity, from the very principles that we start from. The Christian Church, you know, originated as a human approximation to its ideal. The ideal of Christianity was the kingdom of heaven in heaven. The Church was an attempt to realize that ideal on earth. Our ideal is humanity upon the basis of justice. The object of our religion can be none other than the attempt, now and here and among ourselves and by our own labors, to realize that ideal, so far as it can approximately be realized under existing conditions.

[With the writer's permission, Mr. Salter sends the following extracts from a private letter of Mr. E. D. Mead, in response to a recent communication of his in the Index (June 9) on "Mr. Mead and the Christian Name."]

I think that you quite fundamentally misconceive my conception of Christianity and my relation to it. It would no more occur to me, in calling myself a Christian, to think of Christianity as indefectible, final (save as reason stamps and continues to stamp certain of its truths as absolute), or hindering any forward movement, than it would occur to me to think the same of Kantianism, when I call myself a Kantian in ethics, and preach, as I do with all my heart, that only staunch Kantianism can save society from the body of this utilitarian death. At the same time, I must distinctly say that I do not regard any such movement as the intimations of your paper seem to outline as a movement to the better, a really forward movement. No movement, depend upon it, has the seeds of a long, deep life, which is "too earnest" in its very genuine and hearty and intense longing and effort to ameliorate the hard material conditions of men, to vouchsafe room to thoughts and words of God and of the eternal in man's nature. The attempt especially to make it appear, in however slight a degree, that the alternative to which men are brought to-day is that of believing in immortality and God, and of doing one's duty and working to improve the condition of the world,—this is of all antitheses the falsest, the most mischievous and most melancholy. It is true enough, Heaven knows, that men are dragged by religiosity, by fancying that religion lies in passivity and speculation and opinion, into uselessness and bigotry and spiritual death; but I do not believe that it is half so common as hardness and selfishness in those who ignore God and immortality and generally the speculative element in religion. History does not show that these have been the men who have been the great and efficient apostles and leaders in the work of social regeneration. It shows quite the contrary; shows that the men who have done this are the Garrisons and Parkers and Channings and Mazzinis and Castellers and Cobdens, almost invariably men of this type, men who have believed in God and eternity. These will always be the men who will do the great moral work of the world, and the reason for it is not remote. Divinity and eternity within are the creators naturally and necessarily and only, as I believe, of a commonwealth whose forms have infinite worth. The greatest mistake in the world is that of thinking that a transcendental philosophy makes impractical or inefficient men. Look at our own New England Tranaccidentalists. Never was there a generation of more practical and untiring reformers, and it was their very philosophy which made them such. In any second or third generation of "Positivists," I should expect to find chiefly mere Negativists or Laodiceans. Where there was something better, it would be along with the revival of some transcendental element,—just as I find the criterion of excellence in the first generation itself the amount of Transcendentalism, or of the spiritual idea, present in some disguised, transfigured state.

Nothing can ever long do the work of religion in the world, which does not recognize God first and last; and that, not simply abstractly and logically, but actively and passionately and really, as the first principle. It is true enough, as I suppose nobody, least of all Christ, would ever think of denying, that, if justice is to be done and a better social order instituted among men, we have got to attend to it ourselves; only we are not hindered, but are helped in this, by realizing that, in working with truth, we are working with the nature of things and that the fundamental power makes for righteousness. "In the moral deed," says Mr. Adler, in the very admirable address which you loaned me, and the same was involved in his defence of a transcendental ethics against Mr. Savage, at the May meeting, "we act a universal law, and feel ourselves to be the authors of the law we act, ourselves partakers of the divine nature, ourselves the channels through which the everlasting waters pour their tides." The "moral deed" does give this consciousness of participation in the universal and divine; and equally does the consciousness of participation in the universal of an immortal nature, rooted in the divine and absolute, move to the moral deed, and consecrate the man. It is a mistake to look upon this consciousness as a mere resultant, and not also as motive power. But get the consciousness as men may and place it where they may, if they really do get it and hold it in their heart of hearts, not keeping it in some pigeon-hole to draw out for the climax of occasional emotional addresses, I will trust it to do its work and to bring any philosophy of religion to some fair proportions and to real vitality and wholesomeness. If the apostles of "Free Religion" or "Ethical Culture" or what not have this consciousness, then I am with them in spirit: where they have it not, then, heartily as I will cooperate with them in any common cause, I feel that they omit what is most fundamental to religion and to the work of elevating men. I cannot count such consciousness as they may have instead an advance upon the consciousness of Christ; and I believe that the main effect of any new religious movement that attempts to get on without God will be to drive men backward instead of forward. The soul of man thirsts for the living God, has its life in the consciousness of its divine origin and destiny; and, if men cannot find this need met, along with a rational philosophy, then they will get satisfaction of some poor sort in superstition.

With relation to your idea of what Christ stood for, I find myself unable to set things in the proportions which seem to satisfy you. You doubt whether Jesus was not too much in earnest to talk metaphysics at all, in the ordinary sense. I have not found, either in history or experience, that talking metaphysics was any indication of lack of earnestness; but Jesus certainly did not talk metaphysics, in the ordinary sense. He certainly did, however, in his whole life and teaching, give to the speculative element the most striking and constant prominence. It is true enough that he who sees in Jesus only, or primarily, a passive theosophist has a conception barren and false enough; but a false conception is that which sees in him only, or primarily, a clever social reformer. The primary thing with Jesus was his transcendent consciousness that his mind was, in its reality and essence, a part of the universal mind, one with God. He was a religious genius, and realized immediately and naturally what other men laboriously define. He felt a response to this in what was true in every man, knew men as his brethren in it, however unequal to himself, and demanded of all the divine perfection. That such a man should be the most radical of social reformers was, of course, inevitable; and it was, of course, as I suppose no one would ever dream of questioning, his action,—that is, the application of his thought to existing institutions,—and not his mere thought in itself, which drew opposition and persecution. As to any scheme of social reform, I do not believe that Jesus ever formulated one. He was a great idealist, who launched his great seeds of thought and of reform into the world of men and left them. When you look upon his "kingdom of heaven" as something primarily to be brought about by his miraculous reappearing and triumphant organization of affairs in Judea, excuse me for saying that you seem to me to miss the mark very lamentably, and, instead of making a true historical reading (which "historical reading," by the by, is not true and not good for anything, if it does not keep the essence and spirit and philosophic import ever uppermost), become confused by a possible—to my own mind, let me say, very improbable—accident. Were it indeed a fact that Jesus dreamed of an actual speedy return to earth, the primary fact was that his "kingdom of heaven" was something within men, "not of this world," and that he looked for social redemption, not essentially through some organization or miracle, but through the spread of his spirit in the hearts of men.

You quote Emerson. I am always jealous at having Emerson quoted against me. As concerns the present instance, I would remind you that the words which you quote from The Preacher appear in almost the same form in the Harvard Address of 1838, which was substantially a plea for that universal conception of incarnation for which I stand, and would also remind you of the special purpose of this very essay on The Preacher. "I see," says Emerson here, "in those classes and those persons in whom I am accustomed to look for tendency and progress, . . . character and truthfulness, they will not mask their convictions, they hate cant, but more than this I do not readily find. The gracious motions of the soul—piety, adoration—I do not find. . . . I see movement, I hear aspirations; but I see not how the great God prepares to satisfy the heart in the new order of things. . . . The open secret of the world is the art of subliming a private soul with inspirations from the great and public and divine soul from which we live." The "old faith" and the "new faith" which Emerson speaks of are the faith in Christ, as a Columbus whose ocean is his own, all men depending on his accounts for their knowledge of new worlds, and the knowledge that the ocean is all open and that we may all sail upon it, as Christ sailed upon it, with liberty to adopt any "modern improvement" that approves itself. I should be sorry to believe that the thought of humanity had advanced in nothing since Christ's time, and that there were not sublime principles for us yet to discover and to apply, which Christ never dreamed of,—some things, it may very well be, which, from the stand-point of his civilization, he might not personally approve, but which are justified and demanded at our point in the historic process. Yet the greatest principle which we yet have to appeal to, the greatest principle now at work in the world, I do most emphatically believe to be Christ's principle,—of oneness with God, of a humanity rooted in the absolute, of a kingdom of God, as in heaven, so on earth. Whatever the historical conditions under which the principle was enunciated, whatever its accidents (and, though I should be glad to give reasons enough for my firm conviction that Christ's teaching was more spiritual and universal, and not less so, than is indicated by the reports of his Jewish disciples, narrower minds than his, I do not attach great value to that controversy), that principle is clear and is the controlling thing, and was enunciated and continuously illustrated by Christ, with an original power which demands that we shall call it the Christian principle, if there be any reason for naming any idea in the world after its author. I care no sixpence for names and certainly no penny, as you very well know, for any "authority." But, in the name of history and culture, I do protest against this opposition to a simple, free, and hearty use of the term Christian in its natural and just place. As I call myself a Kantian, let me say again, so much more shall I continue to call myself a Christian until I hear some reason against it of a very different character from any which I have ever heard yet. Meantime, I am free to lend my poor influence to every "forward movement" under the sun.

[Here again is a partial confusion of issues. We are, indeed, glad to have provoked so spirited a statement of transcendental philosophy (though we object to its assumed identity with Christian Theism); but we make no issue with such philosophy, and cannot understand how our article could have stirred the suspicion of trying to make one. Surely, the denial of supernaturalism does not of itself mean positivism, when it is just as consistent with a fundamentally spiritual philosophy; and the earnest recognition of duty (the ideal of which is limited to no amellorated "material conditions," but is as great and unmeasured as the "still unattained ideal of Jewish and Christian faith") was hardly such as to suggest the antithesis between believing in God and doing our duty, which is as false to us as it can be to Mr. Mead, though, we must add that, if the real identity of the two things is recognized, it can be no fault to speak strongly of duty, though not one word is uttered in reference to God.

Let us not, however, ignore the real differences that have developed themselves in this discussion, and of which we were not aware before. Perhaps it is worth while to state them clearly. Mr. Mead has a philosophical interpretation of the universe, which he views as of such supreme importance that he would put it first and foremost in advancing any thought or ideal for religion at the present time. We—partly because the speculative problem is still in a degree a problem to us, partly because we know it to be still a problem to many good and profoundly thinking men of our time, but chiefly because we have a general theory that the first word for religion should be a moral and not a speculative one, one immediately seen to be commanding and not one about which good men may differ—would not put a philosophy of any kind first and foremost, even were it one so eminently fitted to religion as we think Mr. Mead's is, and were our convictions as to its truth quite as unquestioning. We crave first and foremost, for ourselves and for society about us, a reinvigoration of the moral sentiment, a clearer perception of what right and justice and humanity demand of us here and now. After this, logically at least, we will yield to none in our concern and zeal for the solution of the speculative problem. And our language about "talking metaphysics" must receive entirely this comparative interpretation. Metaphysics are much better worth being in earnest about than not a few concerns about which men are so laughably serious; but there are concerns before which, for the time at least, even metaphysics must give way. And, if Mr. Mead will not suspect us of trifling, we will say that what we want is a state of things in which all men can "talk metaphysics."

But this is aside from the motive of our original criticism on Mr. Mead, which bore on historical interpretation and the attitude that a man of his thought and capacity to discriminate should take toward the forces of this distracted time. As our suggestions were gratuitous, and were in deed (if we may confess it) not so much with hostile intent upon him as to outline a thought and possible work for ourselves, we cannot take it ill if he seems to have given them no serious consideration. W. M. SALTER.]

At the recent Free Church General Assembly, it was agreed, by a majority of 137 to 45, to petition Parliament that the country is ripe for disestablishment in Scotland, and against any action being taken in connection with the funds until the question is raised whether they ought not to be administered and applied with a view to the good of the community. A correspondent writes: "While the disestablishment motion was being carried in the Free Church Assembly, the State carriage of her Majesty's representative broke down on his way to the Established Assembly. No injury ensued, but the Commissioner arrived in a plain carriage."

QUESTION.

Seek, with the dusty sage, the beams which wrought
Woof of the universe,—its milky streaks
Of flocculent suns; its embryo planet whorls;
Primeval, century-sleeping ferns that wake
To science (kiss of Tyrian-talma'd Prince Bearing the puissant sceptre of the age);
Huge, crawling forms that ruled a creeping realm;
Weird, old-world shapes that flew; strange, finny shoals;
And all the prisoned secrets of the hills.
Then hold within thy haud a stalklet green
Of wayside grass, upon whose quivering point,
In the sphered silver of its drop of dew,
There dwells a palpitant world in miniature,
And ask thyself if THAT which reared the walls
And to towers of its delicate microcosm,
Which writ, in tracery of love, its laws
Inviolable, named whatso'er thou wilt,
God, Nature, Will, First Cause, Force Absolute,
Can lose its crown through wordy strifes of men;
Can shift its sceptre to a worthless heir!
Ask! And the ripple of the countless rills,
Fresh-leaping arteries of the nutrient earth,
The sibyls of the trees, the voice of birds,
Breezes and bannered clouds that float in rhythm,
Sunbursts and sinking moons shall make reply.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 7, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

WITH this number of the Index, we begin a second volume under the auspices of the Free Religious Association. We have no promises to make for the new year except to do our best, with the resources at our command, to make the Index still more worthy of the cause it represents. We hoped when we took this post that some one else would be here at this time to make his editorial salute to Index readers. But still we wait for that coming man. Meantime, friends and subscribers everywhere, you can help us greatly in the task we have assumed. You can help us, first and foremost, by increasing the circulation of the paper: if you are only members of the Association, but not Index subscribers, become subscribers; if already a subscriber, get another one. You can help us by adding to the ten thousand dollar fund we are trying to raise as a little capital to work with. Though not just now publicly urged, this is not yet completed, nor is it by any means abandoned. And, by no means least, if you are on the debtor list of the Index, you can help us by paying your dues. Our bookkeeper informs us that, if all the money now justly due us from subscribers by the published terms of payment were to be at once paid, we should be placed above all anxiety and all want for several months to come. Please look at your mail-tags and see if you owe us anything. Remember that printers' bills take no summer vacation, and consider whether your own summer will not be pleasanter if you do your part toward paying them. Then may you have a clear conscience for serene repose, whether among the hills or by the sea.

It is announced that the Nation is about to be absorbed in the New York Evening Post, and published as the weekly edition of the latter journal. The Nation has been for quite an extended term of years distinguished for its scholarly, solid, and critical character. But, as the most prominent representative of its editorial staff and proprietorship has recently become a partner in the ownership and management of the Post, the alliance is not unnatural; and both papers may be strengthened

THE HORROR AT WASHINGTON.

The dastardly deed which prostrated the President at Washington last Saturday, and which may result in his death before this reaches our readers, has caused a profound agitation throughout the country. As never before has it been felt that President Garfield is the President of the whole country, and of all parties and factions and races and citizens in it. If there are any individuals anywhere skulking in hidden corners, away from the burning glare of the people's indignation, who do not feel that in this outrage against the President's life a blow has been struck at the heart of the country itself, they must be by nature the kindred of the miscreant who has struck that blow. Among the numerous telegraphic despatches and comments that have appeared in print, we have seen nothing that seems so nearly to voice the general sentiment as what was said by the New York (Democratic) Express: "There is but one party, in view of a crime like this. This country is not large enough for political assassins to live in. The hand that would destroy a constitutional President would apply the torch to the temple of Liberty herself." In the shot that prostrated the President, the fair form of constitutional government, resting on the good-will of the people without a bayonet to guard it, has been assaulted.

One of the first feelings, consequently, among all good citizens, has been one of unutterable shame and abasement. Is it possible that this country hereafter, like the monarchies of Europe, has got to face the barbarian risks of the assassination of its constitutionally chosen head? When Lincoln fell by the assassin's hand, even then shame divided with grief the stunned, patriotic heart of the nation. But that was a time of war, when all the furious elements of human passion had been aroused to activity, and horrors were expected. We are now sixteen years away from the war, in a time of peace and national prosperity. If such a crime can be committed now, why not at any time, against any man who may be raised to the conspicuous responsibility of the Presidential chair? For, even though we adopt the theory that this was a madman's act, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it was committed not against Mr. Garfield as a private citizen, but against him as President, and was committed only because he was clothed with the responsibilities of that high office. It had, therefore, the same kind of motive, though not the same reason in the motive, as that which impels the attempts at assassinating the crowned heads of the Old World; and hence it seems to place our democratic republic on the same level with those nations that are still fettered with the traditional customs of feudal and barbarous times, but from which we had proudly hoped our republican freedom had forever emancipated us.

Would that we could believe that this deed had been committed by a raving lunatic! But there is too much method, too much coolness, too much motive confessed, to admit of that belief. Eccentric, intellectually unbalanced he may have been; morally unbalanced, he certainly was; personal disappointment at not having his desires for office recognized by the government may have incensed him to his act of crime: but he was no madman. The deed was not done even in a fit of temporary frenzy. It was done deliberately and with a confession of motive that, unfortunately, connects—even though the connection be through a disordered brain—too closely with certain political evils in the present condition of our country to make it pleasant for us to trace the crime by strict logic to all its sources. It is not our belief for a moment that there was any political conspiracy behind Guiteau's pistol. We have not fallen yet to that low level,—the level, not of Russia, but of Turkey. Corrupt as are New York politics, reckless of the country's good as are the strifes of her political factions, for the country's honor we will not believe they have yet gone to that bottomless death. If Guiteau was acting for anybody but himself, it was for some criminal whom the administration is hunting down, and not for any politicians whom it has offended. But most likely, according to present evidence, he was acting for himself alone.

But, none the less, there are certain evil political conditions of our time that suggested to him his act, and are at least indirectly responsible for it.

First, he and his act are the product of the office-spoils-system, that has become the curse of our country. He came to Washington with the plea that he had been a worker for the party in power, and had therefore a claim upon it for an office. His idea of governmental administration was mainly that it was a device for providing livings for its political friends. Had it not been for this idea, so largely acted upon, so openly advocated, though in more disguised form, by leading men in all the political parties in our country for the last half-century, he would not have been in Washington at all as an office-seeker, much less would have thought of slaying the President for not recognizing his claim to an office. It was only his belief, resting on the teachings of experience, that in the change of administration there would be a general change in and scramble for the offices that took him to Washington as a beggar for office; and, when disappointed in this purpose, he resolved to punish the administration, even by the assassination of its head, he only did in this extreme fashion an act of the same intent with what men in higher ranks have been doing, in less violent way, to show their disapproval of the administration's distribution of offices. It is the "spoils-system" that from the beginning has been the one peril threatening to wreck this administration. It is the "spoils-system" that has now charged the pistol which has shot the President.

Again, this crime, horrible as it is, is in the same line with (though at the extreme end of it) other methods that have been in recent years countenanced in the election of presidents, or in undermining the confidence of the people in them after elected. The slanderous story, the forged letter, the fraudulent vote, the false count of the vote, the reckless, baseless charge, reiterated in public journals day after day, that the occupant of the Presidential chair holds it only by fraud and usurpation or that he was elected only by corruption and bribery, at which he connived himself,—these are methods of political warfare from which it is not a very long step to the pistol and the dagger. If some of the rougher and more irresponsible followers of the political armies take this step, it should not much amaze those of the leaders who have given any countenance to the previous steps leading that way. A newspaper in Washington, for weeks, has been violently assailing President Garfield,—as a newspaper in New York assailed throughout his term President Hayes,—in a spirit and method directly provocative of such acts of crime and bloodshed as this which is now likely to rob the Presidential chair of the best equipped man that has come to it for fifty years.

But should the country, roused by this grievous event, learn the lesson involved in these considerations, and profit by it, the end may be worth the sacrifice, however costly it may be. Only in learning that lesson will the nation surmount the greatest dangers that threaten it.

CERTAIN POINTS IN SCIENTIFIC ETHICS.

After my address at the last meeting of the Free Religious Association, the President took occasion to make some critical remarks. Out of compassion for Mr. Chainey, who was being crowded for time, I refrained then from making any reply. But now, as both address and critique are in print, I wish to call up a point or two, and ask attention to them.

I pass by the—to me—novel conception of the duties of a presiding officer as including the "setting right" of each speaker as a meeting progresses, and come at once to the point.

1. It does not seem "strange" to me that a Theist or a Christian should find the test of actions in their experienced results, any more than that a Theist or a Christian should study any department of science in a like manner. Since, as Professor Adler himself says, we can have no "absolute" knowledge of anything, what else is left for us save the observed effects of actions? It is in this way that we study electricity, for example. In what other way do we study any department of science? The "certain logical truths which are not the result of experience" do not, so far as I can see, touch the question of the scientific study of ethics any more than they do the scientific study of anything else. Whether God, or only an unknown force, is working in human society; whether or not there are ultimate grounds of experience that "make experience possible,"—in either case, we deal with courses of conduct, and judge them by their results on human well-being.

2. The objection to judging actions by their results, that "it is simply impossible to say what is helpful and what is hurtful," seems to me more like a verbal quibble than a serious argument. Practically, and sufficiently for all ordinary living, I assert that we do know. The two statements, we don't and we do, may stand facing each other until Professor Adler explains what it is that he would substitute in the place of the effects of conduct as a means of deciding them to be good or bad.

3. Professor Adler asserts that "the laws of morality are different from the laws of gravitation." And he explains wherein this difference consists by adding, "The law of gravitation is a law which we cannot escape from." This, of course, means that we can escape from the laws of morality. Now, this statement seems to me a strange and startling one. Let us note some of its logical results.

1. If the laws of morals are "different from the law of gravitation"; if they are not natural, universal, and always in force; if they can sometimes be escaped,—then all talk of a science of ethics is absurdity.

2. If these moral laws can sometimes be escaped; if they are not natural and always in force,—then there must be times—minutes or days or years—when moral action may not produce any result, good or bad. For, if moral action does always issue in some result, good or bad, then the law is never escaped, but is always in force. A man can attempt to defy the law of gravitation by leaping over a precipice; but the law holds him and produces disaster. So a man may attempt to defy the moral law; but the law works and holds him just the same, and produces moral disaster. If it does not always do this, then, as I said above, some actions must be devoid of all results; and there must be times when doing evil hurts nobody.

The words of Mr. Adler logically lead to these results. But it must be that he did not mean just what he said.

4. The President seems to me to be quite astray when he talks about freedom as being inconsistent with natural and necessary laws of ethics. Freedom does not quite imply the ability to suspend a law, but only, in popular language, to break or keep it. But, whether we break a law or obey it, the law is not touched. We only take the appropriate and natural result, according to our attitude toward the law.

I cannot go further into the question here, though nothing is just now more important than clear ideas on this subject. Nothing less is involved in the point here and now raised than the question as to whether a science of ethics is possible.

M. J. SAVAGE.

AN APPEAL FROM AN OLD FRIEND.

Will the subscribers of the Index permit an old friend of theirs, whose heart is still warm with affectionate remembrances of their many words and acts of kindness toward himself, to urge them to renewed and vigorous aid in support of the paper to which he gave ten of the best years of his own life? It is just a year since he retired from the editorship; and the Index to-day begins its second volume under the charge of his dearly loved and honored comrade, Mr. Potter. During this time, he has watched its course with profound interest, recognizing and admiring the signal ability, fidelity, and disinterestedness, which his successor has evinced in a most difficult and trying position; and, although circumstances beyond his power to alter have prevented him from rendering himself all the aid he had hoped and purposed to give, he nevertheless yearns to see Mr. Potter seconded and supported more fully than he has been by the combined energies and efforts of all friends of Free Religion.

It is clear to all who are large-minded and unselfish enough to rise above the level of their own whims and personal preferences to the higher level of the needs of a great cause that the Index is by far the most important instrumentality now existing for the advancement and spread of Free Religious ideas. As such, it ought to be supported, earnestly and persistently, by all who have those ideas deeply at heart. No one can sanely expect it to represent every notion of his own. No one can fairly or justly or unselfishly refuse it his support, merely because he fails to find it managed precisely as he himself desires to see it managed. No matter who might be the editor, the Index could not possibly suit everybody in all respects. It never did, and it never will, as no other journal ever did or will. But the main question which every true and wise Liberal will see to be such is simply this: Is not the Index the ablest, noblest, purest, most cultivated, most deservedly respected journal now devoted to the promotion of genuine liberalism in religion, and, as such, ought it not to command the generous and unstinted support of all Liberals throughout the land?

It is easy to criticise and to carp: it is noble to forget trivial criticisms, and to remember only the great, undeniable claims of a grand cause grandly served. Mr. Potter's services to Free Religion have been from the very beginning of the movement inspired by the spirit of modest and unpretentious self-sacrifice, of consummate charity and superiority to all that is ignoble or egotistic or mean, of unparalleled fairness and justice to all beliefs and all believers, of lofty enthusiasm for freedom and humanity and truth. The qualities of mind and heart which he has unvaryingly shown in the Free Religious Association have been no less unvaryingly shown in the Index, conspicuous to all that have eyes to see; and they are the qualities that command my own deepest reverence. Under his able conduct, the Index has been true to its original purpose, and felt everywhere as a great power in the service of the cause to which it was dedicated at the first. Let that one great fact suffice to rally to its support all who love its cause, and, for the sake of that cause, stimulate them all to give their money, their time, their efforts, in order to build up the Index on a solid and permanent foundation. Let it not be said that, while Christians spend and are spent in the service of Christianity, Liberals have not unselfishness enough to maintain their one journal devoted solely to the service of genuine liberalism!

Evolutionists as Moralists.

The new philosophy has succeeded so much better than any system of theology or metaphysics in solving the great problem of our origin, that we know where to go to learn about that part of our nature which forms a firm foundation for morality.

Herbert Spencer, in disclosing the truth that all development, whether of individuals or of races and species, is directed by a universal tendency of progress from the simple, vague, and homogeneous toward the complex, definite, and heterogeneous, has shown that this involves the growth of those emotions and ideas out of which arise the moral laws. His Principles of Psychology explains two of the most important facts: first, that social sympathy makes us disinterestedly desire to promote the welfare and maintain the rights of our neighbors; and, second, that our sensations of pleasure accompany actions which favor not only the safety and health of the individual, but also the continuance and progress of the race, while pain shows that we are doing what will harm our race as well as ourselves. Thus, the most intense pains are those of wounds, hunger, thirst, freezing, poisoning, and suffocation, all which indicate danger to life; while such strong pleasures as are given by activity of mind and body, or by interchange of affection between lovers as well as between parents and children, attend actions highly favorable to personal welfare and general progress. The salutary pains and dangerous pleasures are comparatively few, and result from our having advanced so far that many propensities which formerly were among the necessary conditions of existence have now lost their value, but still survive as relics of barbarism, though destined to pass into insignificance. Vicious propensities are seen by those who look at all their results to be, on the whole, painful. That vice and pleasure are so often thought synonymous is largely due to the theologians having, in their zeal to show that moral distinctions result from supernatural decrees, done all they could to make a breach between Virtue and her best friend, Happiness.

Spencer, in spite of his criticism made in Social Statics on the rude methods followed by the early Utilitarians, has, on the whole, adopted their system, as is plain from his letter in Mill's Utilitarianism, and from his recently published Data of Ethics. There the great evolutionist proves, not only that the moral laws are the conditions of individual happiness, social welfare, and human progress, but also that this beneficial tendency of morality has been so fully recognized as to have the fundamental precepts sanctioned by religion, jurisprudence, and public opinion, from which general recognition of moral precepts arises that disinterested desire to follow them, and that judgment of ourselves and our neighbors as worthy of praise or blame, accordingly, which are the essential elements of conscience. And Spencer's Data of Ethics is further valuable for demonstrating, as had already been done in his Study of Sociology, that to live for others is not the fundamental precept of morality, and that the obligation to self-sacrifice, while not to be overlooked, has been greatly overrated. Each man can usually take much better care of his own happiness than any one else can; and this proves that, if we each looked out for other's welfare instead of our own, the result would be that every one would be less happy. Then, again, if everybody wished only to give pleasure, there would be nobody to receive it. And, finally, if part of us were constantly to make sacrifices, and the rest of us constantly to accept them, the former would decline in health and mental vigor, and the latter be encouraged in selfishness. This is no imaginary danger; for the preaching of self-sacrifice has actually led one sex to injure itself mentally and physically, with the result of injuring the other sex morally. Thus, women have been kept weak and men vicious.

In fact, we make others happier by practising self-culture and self-control, just as we make ourselves happier by obeying the laws of kindness and justice. All our duties may be arranged in these four great classes; and these should have equal authority, no preference being given to any one group, except in so far as it may for the time be better adapted to the service of humanity. This service is always obligatory, but humanity is sometimes best to be served by me in my own person, and sometimes in my neighbor's. I must never forget either that my own happiness is not the whole of the universal welfare, or that it is the factor through which I am usually able to do the most to increase the sum. Fortunately, my own highest happiness is so interwoven with that of my neighbor that neither can be benefited except to the advantage of the other also.

Those who would understand this fact—namely, that the connection of the conditions of social welfare and progress with those of individual growth and happiness is the real foundation for the moral laws—should study Spencer's Principles of Psychology and Sociology, Darwin's Descent of Man, Bain's Emotions and Will, third edition, and also his Moral Science, Clifford's Essay on the Scientific Basis of Morals, and the chapter on The Genesis of Man Morally in Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy.

This interesting book, which exhibits all the fruits of the new philosophy, gives an especially valuable account of the fact that, as infancy lengthens at every stage of the ascent from fish to man, there is ever-increasing need of parental care. Families where such care is withheld pass away, families which give it endure. This need of parental care for human existence develops the fatherly and motherly affections, and these supply a disinterested basis for morality. The same result follows from the fact that it is the tribe whose members are willing to die in its defence that will become a great nation and sweep cowardly races away. Considering these facts, and also the way in which families and tribes are built up by conjugal fidelity, we see why this quality, together with courage and parental affection, came to be early recognized as fundamental virtues. Whatever traits of character promote social welfare and progress have been developed under the law of the survival of the fittest, long before their advantage was so well understood that they were insisted upon as moral duties, but the full significance of this name was not understood until it had been in use for ages. One great step in our moral evolution was taken by establishing what Clifford calls the tribal self, that regard of a tribe's members for its welfare, which leads them to think that they do right whenever they promote it, the result being that "this self-judgment in the name of the tribe is called conscience." That great power owes its peculiar force largely to its expressing public opinion and social authority, as has been shown by Bain in his Moral Science and Emotions and Will, books of rare ability and thoroughness, which qualities are especially discernible in the fulness and fairness with which the views of the other great moralists are stated in the book first mentioned, as well as in the fact that the other work has been rewritten in order to enable its author to use the new light given by Herbert Spencer.

And I must not omit that these great psychologists have been clearly and vigorously supported by the Rev. Minot J. Savage, whose sermons, especially those of the series called The Morals of Evolution, are doing much to strengthen the popular faith,—that life is really worth living, irrespective of theology; that morality is grounded in the nature of things, and not to be upset by changes in doctrine; that high virtue is impossible without thorough intellectual culture; and that the real welfare of the race and of the individual are in perfect harmony.

All these writers agree in presenting the promotion of happiness, both for the race and for the individual, as the practical test of right and wrong. If any one thinks that this fails to supply high enough motives for effort, and firm enough safeguards against temptations to low indulgences, he should remember that all the conditions of general happiness are also conditions of universal progress. Study of the history of social development shows that it has been aided by all the virtues and retarded by every vice, so that we may define virtuous as favorable and vicious as unfavorable to progress. Substantially, this view is presented by Edith Simcox in Natural Law, a book remarkable for elevation of sentiment, vigor of style, and frankness about theology. Fortunately, we reach the same results, whether we guide ourselves, as she does, by the laws of progress toward social and individual perfection, or follow the conditions of universal happiness which Spencer and Bain have shown us. Either method enables us to see that the great precepts of morality stand on their own foundation, outside of theology and metaphysics. Whether perfection, or universal happiness, is the nobler ideal, is a question yet to be decided. Of this we may be sure: that we are able to build up our system of secular and practical morality as fast as we please, and that no work can have greater value than this, or prove more conclusively that we are not mere disturbers and destroyers. The day cannot be distant when it will be generally recognized that no teachings are so well fitted as ours to promote not only private goodness, but social order, prosperity, and progress.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

A CORRESPONDENT of Nature, referring to a violent thunder-storm at Tynron, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, May 28, thus describes the conduct of different kinds of birds at the time: "During the storm and even when the thunder-peals were loudest, the chaffinches kept singing, and the blackbird's notes alternated with the thunder-claps. The rain was moderate; and, as the air filled with insects and perfume, the swallows kept busily skimming, even while forked lightning was flashing. Horses in the fields, however, exhibited symptoms of terror."

Apropos to the comet, Professor Dubleau, a famous French astronomer, says of them in general: "These celestial forms that we occasionally see are merely masses of metallic matter thrown out by the sun, a few of which come within the range of our vision, either naked or by means of the astronomical glass." He further adds: "It is plainly to be seen that the tail is no material substance but merely the reflection of light; for the reason that you can readily see through and beyond the light, the same as you can see and read print through the rays of the sun, coming through a small crevice in the wall." He thinks we never see the same comet twice; that, once gone, it is lost,—it is lost forever.

WHATEVER serves to throw light on prehistoric times, or contributes data toward the confirmation of the theories generally accepted in respect to those periods, is of special interest. There has been for this reason a growing attention to the evidences that have appeared of the stone age in Egypt among anthropologists. The finds of stone implements in that country until recently have not proved very helpful in the way of such investigations, inasmuch as they have been wholly upon the surface. But, last March, General Pill Rivers, President of the Anthropological Institute, England, discovered worked flints two or three metres deep in stratified gravel and mud near Thebes. "The gravel had become so indurated in Egyptian times that they were able to cut square pillars in it, and these have remained in their original condition to this day. Some of the implements were chiselled out of the gravel in the sides of these tombs."

TWENTY-FIVE years ago, or thereabouts, Mr. Gerald Massey, a young Englishman, gave to the world, through the press of his native country, a volume of poems, which was received with much favor. Subsequently, Mr. Massey was heard from as an ardent representative of Spiritualism, and as a lecturer in its interest, and on other subjects, paid a short visit to the United States a few years since. Mr. Massey is now the author of a work, entitled A Book of the Beginnings, in two large volumes, in which he appears to have brought together the accumulation of a great amount of research. "Some portions of his theories," says a reviewer of his book, in Nature, "are undoubtedly correct, especially those which go to prove that the Egyptians are the oldest historical race; that they are an African people of a peculiar type, and by no means an Asiatic tribe filtered through the Isthmus of Suez, and in course of time building up a Semitic population in Africa; that evidence of their primitive development is to be found in their physical type,—for Mr. Massey is a decided evolutionist, and regards man as evolved from some of the anthropoid apes, especially the black races, whose color he considers marks their animal descent; that flint and stone weapons, principally of the neolithic period, have been found in Egypt at different points, is undoubted; and that the aboriginal inhabitants of the Nile Valley gradually rose to a higher state of civilization, and that without a foreign predisposing of them, is probably true." But, when the author leaves the ground of ethnology and enters upon philology, it is maintained that his conclusions are wild and startling. This is particularly illustrated in his disposition to trace the "beginnings" of English words to Egyptian sources, in a way that is often exceedingly capricious and fanciful. It is admitted, however, that "the author has a full right to oppose that system of comparative philology which has been built up from the Sanskrit, the supposed oldest representation of the Aryan languages, to the utter neglect of the older Egyptian, Sumerian, Babylonian, and Chinese. The stately edifice built upon the sand of Sanskritism already shows signs of subsidence, and will ultimately vanish like the baseless fabric of a vision. For by it not the study of the general laws of speech, but of a comparatively recent development, is exhibited." The weakness of Mr. Massey's speculations, it is declared, is strikingly evinced when he deals with languages which he does not understand, "nor does he seem to be aware of the knowledge recently acquired of a prehistoric Chinese." Still, he is credited with having made, in the midst of many inconclusive deductions, some hits even where the authorities have missed the mark. Thus, it is said: "He is, however, right when he points out that such a Hebrew, not British name as Adam is more likely to be derived from Tem or Atem, the Egyptian word for 'Creator' and 'created' being, than Sanskrit Adima, proposed by Max Müller, the more so that the Pentateuch abounds in Egyptian words, and Sanskrit philology is vainly and ridiculously applied to it." "He has taken all reasonable care to insure a fair and correct list of words and facts, yet for all that the embroidery of his parti-colored threads has produced a weird and grotesque pattern of strange and fantastic conceptions, such as might have been planned by elves and fairies to dazzle and bewilder mortal imagination as much as to amuse and delight themselves. It is too warm and rosy for the chill glance of science." D. H. C.

A WEDDING DISCOURSE.

BY MONSIEUR LOUIS LEBLOIS OF STRASBOURG.

[The following remarks, delivered by M. Louis Leblois, of the liberal church at Strasbourg, Germany, at the recent marriage at Paris of Mr. Theodore Stanton, son of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, are interesting, apart from the breadth and nobility of their sentiments. M. Leblois is one of the few liberal ministers who are found scattered over Europe with the paucity of oases in the desert. He is one of those Christians who, beginning as a Unitarian, has in advanced years left far behind him the inspirers of his youth. His forthcoming work on the founders of religion, which has been referred to more than once in these columns, places him among the solid thinkers of Liberalism. This address is also remarkable as having been pronounced at a double wedding, which linked together three liberal families of the Old and New Worlds. The De Barraus and the Berrys, holding radical views very seldom entertained by French families of position, two households which have been united by the closest ties of friendship for a long period of years, each gave a daughter away on this occasion. Madame Caroline de Barrau, whose name has long been favorably known in France as an educator and reformer, bestowed her only daughter, one of the very few French girls who has taken a university degree at Paris, on one of the sons of the Berry family, whose youngest daughter Mr. Stanton married.]

In these days, when the tendency among Liberals is so strong to make marriage only a civil contract, a lesson may be learned from this discourse of M. Leblois, who appeals to the highest and holiest sanctions in interpreting the marriage relation.]

Address.

It is a grave and solemn act which is about to take place. Under the form of a private ceremony, it is an event of public interest, one of those events which carry the mind beyond the narrow limits of this room, and open before it the wide prospects of future ages and human progress. This event is marriage. Whence does marriage derive this importance? It proceeds from the fact that marriage is the foundation of a new family. In this world where are continually at work opposing forces, where truth and error, honesty and hypocrisy, greatness and meanness, are constantly struggling for the mastery, a new force is brought into play by the foundation of a new family. Where is the upright witness of such an event, where is the heart preoccupied with the interests of humanity, who, on seeing these young couples entering upon life together, does not breathe this sincere wish: Oh, in the great comingling of fighters, some of whom unite under the banner of justice and truth, and others under that of error and iniquity,—oh, may these young people battle for the first, thus helping to promote moral progress and intellectual enlightenment, and so prepare patiently and perseveringly the establishment of a new and better world. Is not such your aim, dear friends? Is not what we have just said the exact expression of your desires? And, in striving to attain this object, should you consider that you are doing anything extraordinary, that you are departing from the regular and normal path of marriage? Quite the contrary. You will, in following this course, take the real and sure line,—the line which ought to be considered the only one fit for those who enter into the marriage state and who lay the foundation of a new family.

It is not rare to find young married people, future fathers and mothers, who forget every other interest in the world, forget humanity and even their native land, and think only of themselves and their own advancement. They see in marriage the gratification only of their own interests and pleasures. How completely such young men and women degrade themselves! You, my young friends,—you will have higher aims and loftier thoughts. Knowing that much is required of those to whom much has been given, you will look upon marriage as an opportunity of employing your strength, your talents, your abilities in behalf of general interests. You will strive for the progress of intellectual light and pure morality—for both ought always to advance together—in the circle where you are called to live and act. This is the ideal marriage; here lies the path you should follow. The more you strive after this ideal, the more you will feel that you are on the right way, and the more you will experience of real joy, pure happiness, inestimable gratification, forever unknown to the selfish and hidden from their eyes and hearts. And when, after the lapse of time, you shall look forward into the future or back into the past, you will have cause only for rejoicing and contentment in the consciousness of having performed every duty.

There is no doubt of this. What is the future? It is the domain which lies open to your own posterity. If you perform your task, your love for the inheritors of your name will be free from the fears and misgivings which so often assail the hearts of parents at the thought of the trials which await their children in the midst of social difficulties and worldly conflicts. You will find comfort in the fact that you have worked to improve the social medium in the midst of which your children are to live, that you have striven to uproot the tares of the field in which will have to grow the beloved offspring of your families. Yes, your future will be less clouded, freer from cares and anxieties.

If now you turn to the past, do you not feel that in striving to attain this ideal marriage you will be paying a debt which you owe your parents? What is this house from which three of you are going forth? What is it, if not a sanctuary sacred to study, science, meditation, consecrated to those holy, invisible powers which unveil to our minds the constitution of the universe and the laws which govern human existence, and which are to our hearts the divine sources of true and universal religion,—that religion foreign to sects and heresies, which clasps in a maternal embrace all human kind?

To whom are you indebted for the ideas—as yet, unfortunately, entertained by the few—which you profess? Who set you the example of intellectual work, of patient and persevering labor in behalf of justice and truth? You have answered in your thoughts; and all of you, my young friends, turn gratefully toward the source from which you imbibed the purest love for truth and right.

(To Mr. Stanton.)

You, my friend,—you have not the pleasure of having at your side the noble parents who have given in another form the most admirable example of complete and disinterested devotion to the holiest causes of humanity. However, you know that, though far away, they are with us in thought and in spirit, and that they mingle their ardent wishes with ours for the future happiness of their own child and of these other children.

(To the Four Young People.)

It is in seeing around you in reality or in spirit the authors of your being, it is in bearing in mind the great intellectual privilege you have in being their children, it is by remembering always what you owe to them, that you will discover the most fitting way of showing them your gratitude, that you will ever be steadfast in your endeavors to accomplish nobly and truly the duties of life. Those duties, such as your parents would state them, are in a word to conscientiously perform the task for which you have been brought up with so much care, solicitude, and sacrifice.

The children who inherit from their parents titles of nobility—and this expression may be taken in both the literal and the intellectual and moral sense—can follow two very different paths. Some will think it enough to be proud of their birth, and will blazon it before the world as the most precious of their ornaments. They will even imagine themselves superior to the rest of men simply because they are possessed of a privilege which they owe to their birth, and not to any effort of their own. Others, on the contrary, would blush to plume themselves on the glory and renown of their parents, and will strive to honor their fathers' and their mothers' names by their own worth and personal efforts. These children are alone worthy of the precious advantages of birth. More still, they are the cause of a just pride and supreme joy to the parents whom they honor by following in their footsteps, and who are indeed prouder of their children's success than they would be if it were their own. They consider it their highest pleasure to be able to say, I am the father, I am the mother of this son or of this daughter.

Young people, you will be such sons and such daughters. We hope, we are sure that the honored names of your parents will stimulate in you the power to accomplish a noble and fruitful task; and your life will be noble and fruitful in proportion to the elevation of your thoughts, to the generosity of your views and aims, and to the disinterestedness of your actions.

THE BURIAL-PLACE OF WILLIAM PENN.

The following interesting description of the old English graveyard where William Penn is buried was sent by cable to the Boston Herald, when the project of removing Penn's ashes to Philadelphia first took public shape a month ago:—

LONDON, June 5, 1881.

A report having been spread that the bones of the founder of Pennsylvania were to be transferred from their quiet resting-place in Buckinghamshire to America, I determined to make a pilgrimage to Jordan's meeting-house churchyard. I made my way to Rickmansworth, a quaint little town in Hertfordshire, and thence to Chalfont by confusing and winding roads. Chalfont is in the heart of Buckinghamshire. It is several miles from the railroad station, and is off the high road. The little burial-ground of the Friends, in which Penn is buried, is about three miles beyond Chalfont, St. Giles. After topping a slight elevation, I was surprised by a sight quite out of keeping with the prevailing solitude. I was looking down upon a thickly wooded hollow where two paths join, and saw a score or two of people, both men and women, passing to and fro. A glance assured me that most of them were Friends; and that this must undoubtedly be the place which I sought, some extraordinary occasion having brought a crowd together. A short walk brought me within view of a humble building ensconced amid a grove of magnificent trees, which are doubly sacred to the Friends as having served the co-religionists as a worshipping-place for generations, and as being the chosen resting-place of William Penn. No mouldering ruin or rich-sculptured tracery attracts the gaze. Not a single object of artistic beauty, not one form of earthly grandeur, meets the view. It is a simple, barn-like structure. In front of it are a few unpretending gravestones, and that is all. One might almost fancy it the cemetery of some ruined and deserted hamlet, but for the people that were there assembled. I found that I had hit upon the rare occasion of an annual meeting of the Friends of the district. It is almost the only meeting held here during the whole course of the year, and the very matter which took me there had brought a larger concourse of Friends. All had heard of the removal of William Penn's bones. Although none believed that it could be done, all wanted to hear what was said on the subject. Among the number were some American Friends, who were on their travels, and who had devoted the day to seeing a spot which was so endeared to them. Among them were Dr. King of Baltimore, Mr. J. C. Thorn of Baltimore, Mr. Amos Hains of New York, and nearly a dozen others. I found a group of gentlemen gathered about one of the unpretending graves, or gravestones, I should say; for there was hardly a mound to indicate where a body had been laid. It bore the simple inscription, "William Penn, 1718." A few years ago, a stranger would have been unable to distinguish the grave of William Penn from the surrounding grass-covered hillocks. No sign declared the former rank and character of the sleeper.

Wild flowers grew alike over all. It was Granville Penn, of Stoke Pogis, the great-grandson of William Penn, who suggested the erection of a small stone to mark the resting-place of his ancestor. His advice was adopted. Headstones mark not only the grave of Penn, but those of his two wives, his children, his relatives, his intimate associates, and his fellow-laborers. The greater number of graves remain unmarked by stones. Only fifteen stones are found in all, three being close to the grave of William Penn. Near the entrance gate, to the left of the narrow path, a slab points out the graves of the five children. On the right of the path is a row of graves, five marked by headstones. The second and third are those of Isaac Pennington and his wife. The fourth is that of Penn's first wife, Gulielma Maria. The fifth bears the name of William Penn and his second wife. To molest any of those graves, to molest, most of all, the chief among them, that of William Penn, would be a desecration. Such was the opinion of all with whom I spoke, Americans as well as English. They would not like to see the graves touched on any account. Nowhere could Penn's remains rest so suitably as beneath the elms of the quiet spot where, with others, he had worshipped in quiet and dangerous times, and where, at his own request, he was buried. This opinion found unanimous expression in a resolution which was passed at the meeting, to the effect that nothing would ever induce the trustees of the little graveyard to allow any of the graves to be molested. They had heard that a sum of money had been collected to purchase a grave for Penn's bones, but the people smiled at the simplicity of any one who could suppose that money could have any effect upon them. For anything which they intended to do, or which they could be induced to do in the matter, the remains would stay where they are forever. Minutes to this effect were entered upon the record of the day's proceedings; and a committee was appointed to see that nothing was done contrary to this resolution, should any direct application be made for the removal of Penn's body. Up to the present, this has not been the case. It should be said that these views are in accordance with the wish of Colonel Stuart, whose wife is a descendant of the founder of Pennsylvania, and who still enjoys the pension of $4,000 which was granted to the family in lieu of the money lent by William Penn to Charles II. Among those elected upon this committee for the safeguard of the grave may be mentioned the names of Mr. R. Littleboy of Newport, Pagnell; Mr. Tuke Hitching and Mr. Brown-town, counsellor of Liston. The first-named is the chief trustee of Jordan's meeting-house, and it is he who writes to the London Times to-day that the remains cannot be removed.

A CHINESE FUNERAL.

Commonwealth Avenue was surprised, on a recent Sunday afternoon, with a funeral cortege that, in the number of carriages, was somewhat anomalous. The hearse was conspicuous with six tall black plumes. It proved to be a procession on the way to Mount Hope to inter a Chinaman, named Moy Yit Yu, a small grocer formerly doing business on Green Street. He had become a Christian; and regular services had been held at Mount Vernon Church, by Rev. Dr. Herriek. There were about a hundred countrymen in the carriages, generally six in each. They were unusually decorous, only one being discovered indulging in a smoke. Arrived at the grounds, the remains, in a costly silk robe and enclosed in a rosewood coffin, were placed in one of the "single graves," so called, and covered as usual. Then, candles, joss-sticks, and paper-money were burned; and food—consisting of chickens stuffed and cooked, rice, and oranges, with a bottle of wine—were left upon the grave. The money was intended to pay for the passage of the departed spirit to the other world, and the food to sustain it on the journey. The company then left in an entirely decorous manner, as it had arrived. A detail of police went out with the mourners to prevent any disturbance from "outside barbarians," should any attempt it. We have to add that no sooner had the party left than a horde of young Irishmen from "Canterbury Street," in the back neighborhood, invaded the cemetery and speedily made way with all the oranges. It was a "free blow" to them. Thus, did the superstitions of heathendom and the vices of Christendom join hands over the grave of the Asiatic laid to rest in the mellow soil of America. Which was the more culpable, let our moralists decide. —Boston Commonwealth.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE CHANNING CENTENARY IN AMERICA, GREAT BRITAIN, AND IRELAND. A report of meetings held in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of William Ellery Channing. Edited by Russell Nevins Bellows, Boston. Geo. H. Ellis, 1881. Price $2.00.

This volume has five hundred and thirty-two pages, and a heliotype of Morse's bust of Channing as a frontispiece. It is carefully edited, and preserves in a very convenient form the best that was said of Channing at the anniversary meeting a year ago. Perhaps there could be no better testimony to the influence of Channing than this volume, showing, as it does, the many minds that great preacher has deeply influenced. Here are the addresses and sermons of Bellows, W. H. Channing, Hale, Savage, Furness, Hedge, Osgood, Gottheil, Swing, Thomas, Martineau, Hughes, and W. B. Carpenter. The remarkable meetings in Brooklyn, Chicago, and London, are fully reported. The numerous letters read at the various meetings are also given in full. Altogether, this is a remarkably interesting volume, bearing testimony, in many ways, to the humanitarian spirit of our time, and to the tendency to overlook sectarian lines. That Channing's theology was of any great value, or that he really had any theology, one may doubt with assurance that he cannot be very readily contradicted; but he had what was infinitely better, moral power and the humanitarian spirit. Evidently, his sweet, pure, and lofty religion deeply appeals to the best thought of this age, meets a real want of the time, and hence many of the best minds have been attracted to his writings. The wider his spirit extends, the better for the world. He was one of those men who attract and inspire, not by the greatness of their thought, but by the beauty of their lives and the lofty tone that extends to all their words. The Free Religionist may not be able to accept all that Channing taught, but he ought to accept that purity of life, that strong moral sense, that great love of man, that eager desire for truth, and make them his own.

COMPANION OF THE REVISED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. Explaining the reasons for the changes made on the authorized version. By Alexander Roberts, D.D., Professor of Humanity, St. Andrew's, and member of the English New Testament Committee. With Supplement by a member of the American Committee of Revision. Authorized Edition. New York: Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co.

This is a small book with a long title. But in some aspects it is the most important book that the Christian Church has given to the people since it gave the Bible itself. It is a frank, clear statement not only of the rules and principles which have guided the learned revising committee in their work, but of the imperfect condition of all the manuscript versions of the New Testament. It gives information concerning the origin and multiplication of the manuscripts, and the sources of mistakes in them and the certainty of mistakes in the King James translation; information which hitherto the clergy, for the most part, have thought it most prudent to keep to themselves, even if they themselves possessed it, which, it is safe to say, not all of them did. There are matters in these two hundred pages of which not a few preachers have been as ignorant as the laymen in the pews. The titlepage gives so complete an account of the book that we need not characterize it further, except to welcome it, with the revised New Testament itself, as signaling a new era in the history of Biblical inquiry,—the era of rational criticism.

THE International Review for July offers, as usual, an appetizing list of contents. "The Army Question in Europe," by H. Von Holst, is an important article. "What Makes the Rate of Interest," by Edward Atkinson; "Eight Decades of a Century," by Robert P. Porter; "The English Evolutionists," by William Myall; "The Reform in Pronouncing Latin," by A. C. Hopkins; "The First San Francisco Vigilance Committee," by Thomas G. Cary; and "Colonization," by J. Lawrence Laughlin,—complete the number of articles, and present a varied and useful contribution to our higher-class current literature.

The illness of Prince Bismarck has grown lately more severe.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A CANADIAN judge has decided that the word "whereabouts," used as a noun, is slang, and will vitiate an indictment because it cannot be clearly defined.

In Wendell Phillips and George W. Curtis among its specially invited guests, Harvard College did honor to reform ideas last week. Mr. Curtis was made an LL.D.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS lately visited the home where he lived as a slave, not having been there for fifty-six years before. The surviving members of his old master's family received him with marked hospitality.

MISS BLANCHE NEVIN, of Lancaster, Pa., who received the contract from the State of Pennsylvania for making the statue of Muhlenberg, has sent a model to St. Louis to enter the competition for the Gen. Blair statue.

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON is described by an interviewer as being non-committal as to church or politics, deliberately reserving her force of judgment, as well as her finance, for matters of independent benefaction. She moreover inveighs with emphasis against the channels of much that is misnamed philanthropy.

JOHNS HOPKINS, the founder of the university in Baltimore bearing his name, accumulated nine millions of dollars. One day, he said to his gardener: "Next to the hell of being utterly bereft of money is the purgatory of possessing a vast amount of it. I have a mission; and, under its shadow, I have accumulated wealth, but not happiness."

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, the founder and late editor of the Index, received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Harvard College at the Commencement last week. Among all the degrees given, none was more worthily bestowed. Mr. Abbot has long been widely known for his able discussions of philosophical questions; but this honor was won by special work presented to the Philosophical Faculty of the College on the thesis, "Scientific Philosophy,—a Theory of Human Knowledge, accompanied by Tables of Cosmical and Mental Categories."

PROF. WILLIAM JAMES, of Harvard College, who has served as assistant professor of physiology, and who has been lately chosen to a chair of the same grade in the department of philosophy, is regarded as one of the most scholarly and impartial of the younger professors of the University. He has recently spoken to the students upon the use of alcoholic liquors. He considered the arguments for and against moderate drinking, and concluded that, without reference to the moral aspects of the question, the evidence was in favor of total abstinence. This evidence he regards as of two kinds: the observation by physiologists of the effects of alcohol on men and animals; and, secondly, generalizations from experience.

FOREIGN.

THE admirers of Victor Hugo among the members of the Republican press in Paris intend to place a statue of the aged poet in the Avenue d'Eylau, which street is in future to be named after him.

THE Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung says that there are no signs of improvement in Prince Bismarck's health. He "remains all day on a sofa, and only transacts the most important State business."

At a meeting held at Knockmore, County Mayo, on Tuesday, June 7, the following resolution was passed: That, as Mr. O'Connor Power has separated himself from the faithful who represent Ireland in the English Parliament, we hereby declare that he can no longer claim to represent the electors and non-electors of Mayo.

UNDER the title of "Thomas Carlyle at Home," a series of six etchings, executed by Howard Helmick from original portraits and sketches in the possession of Mr. Alexander Carlyle, has been published by the Etchers' Society. These likenesses represent Carlyle at various ages, and the different aspects and expressions that accord with these are well brought out.

GEORGE STEPHENSON's centenary was celebrated at Newcastle-upon-Tyne June 9, in the presence of very large numbers of people from all parts of the north of England. There was also a commemoration at Chesterfield; and at the Crystal Palace an exhibition of models of important railway appliances was opened in aid of the funds of the Railway Orphanage at Derby. Demonstrations in honor of the occasion also took place in Rome and Vienna.

The death is announced of Dr. Jacob Bernays, Professor of Classical Philology and Librarian of the University of Bonn. Dr. Bernays, who was of Jewish origin and faith, was born at Hamburg in 1824. He graduated in philosophy at Bonn, and became a privat-docent in that university in 1849. In 1853, he was called to Breslau as professor of classical philology in the Jewish seminary in that city; but he subsequently returned to Bonn, and the greater part of his life was spent at that university. Dr. Bernays was universally recognized as one of the profoundest and most learned Greek scholars of modern Germany. He knew English well, and had many friends in this country.

The tenth anniversary of the fall of the Paris Commune was celebrated by a pilgrimage in procession to the graves of the men who died in endeavoring to withstand the advance of the Versailles troops into the capital. Some violent speeches were made at Père-la-chaise, and a harangue by a Russian Revolutionist was greeted with cries of "Vive la Commune!" "Vive la Nihilisme!" The Daily Telegraph's correspondent, who sends an account of this gathering, asserts that the Communists before leaving the cemetery "insulted the tomb of M. Thiers by spitting on it, and hurling at it in chorus a quantity of offensive epithets." Throughout the proceedings, the police discreetly kept out of sight.

A SERIOUS riot occurred in Cork, Ireland, recently, during which the houses in two streets were completely wrecked, several persons were injured with stones. Five persons have been arrested at Glenbeigh, near Killarney, for having attacked the house of a tenant of the Hon. Mr. Wynne, and cut off one of his ears. A bailiff named Cambridge, while engaged serving writs near Clonakilty on the previous Wednesday, was pursued by the crowd and narrowly escaped. His cart was sent away without him. A large mixed force of military and police proceeded to Michelstown for the purpose of ejecting tenants on the Kingston estate. On Saturday, the Kilmallock Land League subscribed £30 toward a national testimonial to the Rev. Father Sheehy.

A CONSPIRACY to assassinate the Czar is reported to have been discovered in St. Petersburg. A carpenter is said to have informed the police of a conversation which he overheard being carried on in a room next to his own in a house in the Sabat Roanski Prospect. A police officer was accordingly concealed in the room, and, it is stated, heard the details of a plot to shoot the Emperor. Five of the conspirators present voluntarily offered themselves to accomplish the deed. A definite choice was about to be made when the officer suddenly jumped out of his hiding-place, fired into the air, and declared to the twenty-one conspirators present that he would kill the first who moved. At the same time, the police rushed in and arrested the whole company. They were almost all very young people, some being mere school-boys. It is also stated that fresh arrests of naval men have taken place.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

The following is known to have been printed in a New England city, and to have been in use among Catholics within a very few years. We print it verbatim as found:—

The Prayer, Prayer, Prayer.

This Prayer was found in the Grave of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in the year of our Lord 1505, and sent from the Pope to the Emperor Charles, as he was going to Battle, for his safety. They who shall repeat this Prayer or hear it repeated or keep it about them shall never die a Sudden Death, nor be Drowned in Water, nor shall they fall into the hands of their Enemies, nor be Burned with fire, nor shall they be overpowered in Battle, nor shall any Poison take any effect on them; and it being read over any Woman in Labor, she shall be safely delivered, and be a glad Mother; and when this child is born, say this Prayer on the right side, and him or her shall not be troubled with Thirty-two Misfortunes. And if you see any person in Fits, say this Prayer on their right side, and him or her shall stand up and thank you; and he that shall write this from house to house shall be blessed of the Lord, and they that laugh at it shall suffer.

Honorable Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, dying on the Gallows for our sins. O Holy Cross of Christ, ward off from me all sharp, heating words. O Holy Cross of Christ, ward off from me all Weapons of danger. O Holy Cross of Christ, ward me from all things that are evil to me. O Holy Cross of Christ, stifle me in all things; Protect me from my Enemies. O Holy Cross of Christ, Protect me on my right to happiness. O Holy Cross of Christ, ward off from me Dangerous Deaths, and give me Life Everlasting. O Crucified Jesus of Nazareth, have mercy on me, that the enemies may keep off from me now and forever. Amen.

In honor of Jesus Christ, and in honor of his Blessed Death and Sacred Passion, and in honor of his Holy Resurrection and God-like Ascension, to which he liked to bring us to the right way to heaven; the time as Jesus was found on Christmas Day in the Stable, the time when Jesus was Crucified on Good Friday, the time as the Wise Men brought their offerings to Heaven, so may the honor of Jesus keep me from my enemies, visible and invisible, now and forever. Amen.

To thee, O Lord Jesus, I offer my spirit. O Jesus have mercy on me, Mary and Joseph. Oh, pray me through Nicodemus and Joseph, who took our Lord from the Cross and buried him. O Lord Jesus, through thy Bitter Anguish, through thy Sufferings on the Cross, for truly then your Soul was parting from this world. Oh, have mercy on my poor Soul when it is parting its Material Body from this sinful world. O Jesus, give me Grace that I may carry my Cross with Thee, and teach thee when that I suffer, and that without complaining; and that through suffering I may escape all Danger. Amen.

Believe this for certain which is written here, for it is true as the Holy Evangelist. They who keep it about them shall not fear Thunder nor Lightning; and they that repeat it every day shall have three days' warning before death. When Jesus saw the Cross whereupon His body was to be crucified, His body Shook. The Jews asked Him had He the Fever or an Ague; or did he shake for fear of them. He answered and said, I have neither a Fever or an Ague; nor do I shake for fear of you. Whoever carries these lines in mind or in writing shall never have a Fever nor an Ague.

Jesus, Mary, and Joseph help us.

JESTINGS.

MUMBLE-JUMBLE.—Visitor: "Is Mrs. Brown at home?" Plumbs, the new footman, who speaks rather indistinctly: "Yes, sir, but she's dining." Visitor: "Dying! Why, what's she dying of?" Plumbs: "Boiled mutton and caper sauce, sir."—Judy.

"THERE'S one thing I like about the new version," said old Blunderbuss. "That ere text about 'the boy being father to the man' is left out altogether. I always thought that was wrong end to." And he didn't know why the smile went round.—New Haven Register.

AN EARLY LESSON IN ART.—While visiting the Louvre in Paris, a lady showed the Venus of Milo to her little daughter. "But tell me, mamma," remarked the child, "what did they cut her arms off for?" "Because she was always sucking her thumb, my child."

A CLERGYMAN was travelling through the Humboldt Mountains with an old miner. Said the miner, "Do you really believe that God made the world in six days?" "Of course I do." "Well, don't you think," returned the miner, "that he might have put in one more day to advantage right round here?"

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

" 26 " 51 " . . .	6c. " "
" 52 " " . . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution", by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

It is the universal opinion of all philosophers that God is never angry and never does harm.—Cicero.

According to some theologians, it is necessary for God to wind up his watch from time to time, or it would stop outright. According to their view, he was not far-sighted enough to make a perpetual motion.—Leibnitz.

CENTURIES are but seconds in the mighty development of advancing humanity. The swelling curve, however, has its little indentations; and it is irksome to find one's self in such an interval of decadence.—Alexander von Humboldt.

THE old divines preached equality in heaven; but they little thought it was the kingdom to come on earth. They were the electric chain, unconscious of the celestial fire they transmitted. Little would they have brooked these days of unquestioned equality of rights, of free publishing and freer thinking.—Catherine Sedgwick.

ALL are bigots who limit the divine within the boundaries of their present knowledge.—Margaret Fuller.

THE first condition of human goodness is something to love; thesecond is something to reverence.—George Eliot.

It is marvellous how long a rotten post will stand, provided it be not shaken.—Thomas Carlyle.

HEAVEN must scorn the humility which we telegraph thither by genuflection: it must prefer the manliness that stands by all created gifts, and looks itself in the face without pretence of worship.—John Weiss.

It is time that the ill-suppressed murmur of all thoughtful men against the famine of our churches, this moaning of the heart because it is bereaved of the consolation, the hope, the grandeur, that come along out of the culture of our moral nature, should be heard through the sleep of indolence and the din of routine. This great and perpetual office of the preacher is not discharged.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

THE Christian world, just now, is like a ship that is tacking: it has lost the wind on one side, and not quite got it on the other.—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

High thoughts!
They come and go
Like the soft breathings of a listening maiden,
While round us flow
The winds from woods and fields with gladness laden:
While the leaves quiver
By the lone river,
And the quiet heart
From depths doth call
And garners all,— Earth grows a shadow, forgotten whole,
And heaven lies in the blessed soul!

High thoughts!
They visit us
In moments when the soul is dim and darkened,
They come to bless
After the weariness to which we hearkened:
In joy and gladness,
In mirth and sadness,
Come signs and tokens:
Life's angel brings
Upon its wings
Those bright communings the soul doth keep,
Those heavenly thoughts so pure and deep.
—Nicoll.

CURRENT TOPICS.

SECRETARY KIRKWOOD, it is reported, has taken a step which looks well, at least. It is to bring the Indian to the front, so far as he may, in dealing with him. As an example of this, he has made a brother of "Bright Eyes" a clerk in the Indian Bureau, and intends to appoint others of the same race to positions in this department, as fast as they can be qualified for the work.

THE prospective bad results from the unchecked devastation of our timber lands have been of late years more and more apparent to reflecting people, and a good deal has been written and published on the matter. We are pleased to learn that a reaction has begun to set in among farmers and others in the West, in respect to the soil, and that forest culture is getting to be a rising enterprise in that section. It is said that some large companies have been formed for this object, and that capitalists believe that it offers to pay well for investments.

THE Christian Union makes a good suggestion. It is evening excursions during this season for work-people, whose exacting labors seldom enable them to enjoy such pleasure trips in the daytime. It proposes that the day boats be used, leaving convenient docks after six o'clock, and making a trip up the river, through the sound or narrows, returning at nine or ten o'clock. Rested, cheered, and comforted by the knowledge that there is thought for their comfort and well-being in the hearts of their more fortunate fellow-mortals, life will be more to them than the mere earning a living and having a little "fun."

It is to be feared that the theory of Dr. MacCormac concerning "water treading" may lead to fatal experiment by its emphatic assurance of safety in indiscriminate application. For, if the deductions from personal experience in its test by a late contributor to Nature are duly considered, there is quite plausible evidence that only organizations of a definite type can make the practice available, namely: those in whom the adipose tissue renders their specific gravity inferior to that of water; for, in the words of the writer, "the human body is not always lighter, bulk for bulk, than water"; . . . "with spare people, who consist mainly of muscle and bone, the specific gravity must be greater than that of water. The body of a fish, when the animal is dead, will sink until decomposition sets in and causes it to float."

THE assassin Guiteau claims to justify his atrocious deed by professing that it was prompted by a "revelation from God." He also has been accustomed to style himself "Theologian," in connection with the other distinctions which he in his vanity assumed. Perhaps there was as much reason in his use of the title as in that of many who have adopted it, since he has lectured on "The second coming of Christ," and has made other pretensions to profundity in divinity. At one time, he figured as the "eminent Chicago lawyer" who, in the lecture-field, was to demolish Col. Ingersoll's infidelity. At another, he was prominent in the Moody and Sankey revival meetings. It is strange, yet true, that some of the most shocking crimes in human history are mixed up in some way with religion. But we do not believe there is even an insane sincerity in the religious professions of the would-be-assassin of the President.

SINCE Tuesday of last week, the daily bulletins concerning the President have relieved the people of their intense anxiety. The danger is by no means past, but the chances are now favorable to his recovery. He is himself hopeful and full of courage, and means to do his part to get well. The physicians in charge report him as the best of patients. Though the intense and painful anxiety of the country is past, the sympathy of the people of all classes and parties, and in all sections of the country, is as deep and demonstrative as ever. Never did a people rally more loyally around a ruler than have the citizens of the United States, without distinction of party, rallied around their constitutionally chosen President, since the attempt to destroy his life. As one evidence of this loyal sympathy, an effort, started in the New York Chamber of Commerce, to raise a quarter of a million of dollars for Mrs. Garfield, so that the President's mind may be entirely at rest with regard to the future of his family in case of his death, is likely to be at once successful. It is not often that a country is stirred by so unanimous a sentiment. This government is not yet to go to pieces by the act of assassination.

THE Presbyterian records a verdict in the "Lenzie Case" of the Assembly of Scotland, which accepted the apology of a recreant minister who had been dallying in the pastures of Reason when they thought him due in the hard road of Revelation. But, although the Assembly gave credit to his stout assertion that he meant no harm and to his humble promise never to do so again, and lifted him high and dry out of the speculative swamp, the Presbyterian declares him unfit for any future gospel service. Thus hazardous is it for employés of the theological tread-mill to make excursions into the moist meadows hard by; for just one sermon, albeit, as solemnly asserted, designed in the interest of confuting opponents, may ruin the young minister's claim to ecclesiastic confidence. He must shut his eyes and ears to all that happens in the world of thought around him, and stoutly deny in never-varying terms the possibility of any truth outside his own snug workshop. Under this lesson, the case of the victim of the Narragansett disaster last year, who had declared on the fly-leaf of Paine's Age of Reason his shame at having it discovered near him at that moment, and that his purpose had been solely to learn how to refute it, is most pathetic. Moral: Read nothing but the Bible; if unrevised, the safer.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

Free Religious Association, May 26 and 27, 1881.

[Concluded from last week.]

The PRESIDENT.—We are now anxious to hear a friend who has come a long distance to meet us, and to bring us thoughts from the fresh, fruitful West, where there is an opening, as I understand, and a grand field for the labors of the Free Religious movement. I take great pleasure in introducing Mrs. Anna L. Diggs, who has come to us from Lawrence, in Kansas, to be present with us to-day, and will now say her word from the platform.

ADDRESS OF MRS. ANNA L. DIGGS.

Friends.—It is my part this afternoon to offer a few words about Western Liberalism, and its probable capacity for and tendency toward organization.

If there are two words in use more especially vague and ill-defined than all others, those two words are (I think) Western and Liberalism. Our San Francisco people go East to Denver and Omaha. Denverites go East to Kansas City. Kansas City quotes the Eastern ways and doings of St. Louis and Chicago, and so on. I could not find, in my journey through, just where the East began and the West left off. So, to be definite, I will say that I shall speak only for and of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Kansas. Not that the facts which I shall report are peculiar to the States I have named; similar conditions exist (doubtless) in all "the East" and all "the West," the difference being only in their greater or less proportion. I knew before I came here that I might have the privilege of saying a few words concerning the Western situation. The difficulty lay in the fact that I must say only a little about so large a subject. Not knowing what to leave unsaid, I decided to leave my message to shape itself, after I had learned something of the situation here, after I found how much or how little the Free Religious Association really knew of Western Liberalism. Judging from questions that have been asked me, I believe that I can be most serviceable, pointed, and clear, by avoiding all generalizing, all theorizing, all philosophizing, and just simply reporting instances, and telling (in a very realistic and personal manner) of facts which have come under my own observation.

But, first, I must say a few words about that other loose and elastic word, Liberalism. You all know what a misnomer it is, and what widely differing classes and types of individuals it is supposed to include. There is in our part of the West a very large class of people who have an utter distaste (even a dislike) for everything which is called by the name of religion, church, or minister; and yet curiously enough these topics seem to possess for them a strange fascination. They certainly seem to derive a vast deal of satisfaction in the discussion of them. These people are well posted concerning the atrocities and barbarities of church history, and all the shortcomings of ministers, and all the unclean portions of the Bible. Their one proud boast is that they are FREE,—free from superstition. I think you recognize the class. I call them the primary class of Liberalism, because they have only learned the first word of rational religion,—“freedom,” merely that and nothing more. They have not yet come to our second word, “fellowship.” Then, besides these, we have of course a very large proportion of thoughtful, cultivated people, of whose religious status I need say nothing further than that they are in sympathy with Free Religion as expounded by the Index and with radical Unitarianism. Of “Spiritualists,” happily, we may say as Josh Billings says of women, they are everywhere. Then there are many, very many young people, bright young men and women, graduates from our high schools and colleges, a keen-sighted, clear-thoughted class, who are entirely without any sort of a church home. The established churches fail utterly in meeting their need. This is not the hour to discuss whether or not religious organization would be beneficial or is necessary for them. Of course, we believe in the possibility and the helpfulness of thoroughly rational religion,—rational church work and a rational ministry,—else we should not be here. The question is not, Does Liberalism need to organize, but does it care to organize?

Let me speak first of the large class which I named first. There is scarcely a village, not even a crossroad settlement in the West, where you may not find a liberal club, a debating society, a lyceum, or something of the sort, managed or mismanaged as the case may be, by persons of whom the last thing you would suspect would be that they were religiously inclined. So anxious are they to avoid and to steer as clear as possible from everything which would in any way commit them to churchly ways that I think they would not even hold their meetings on Sundays, if they could find time from business on another day. And I do not think that even the word “free” prefixed to the word “religion” would so sugar-coat the pill that they would be willing to take it, even though Free Religion has just the message to offer which they are longing to hear. But so fearful are they of being entrapped or betrayed by “priestcraft” that not until their confidence can be gained, not until they are absolutely certain that the religion offered them has no “nonsense” about it, will they coöperate, or consent to organize in any larger, more orderly or effectual way than the dreary, nude, and sorry little attempts which they are constantly making, and in which they are constantly failing, because they do not know how to work together. I have known of very many (I may safely say hundreds) of just such pitiful, yet hopeful little attempts toward organization. I know of them, because I keep close to them. I sympathize with these people, and believe in them. I will not let go of them, because they are ours. They are yours, friends of the Free Religious Association,—your responsibility and your opportunity. It is part of the good and great work, which I am sure you will do, to help them. They need you, and you need them. I am very certain that back of all their protestantism there is a great want and a great desire for fellowship. Their confidence once gained, and competent guidance secured, they would gladly and profitably work together. Already it is beginning to dawn upon many of them that they have elbow room enough for a little constructive work. Many of them are beginning to guess that something else might be done besides meeting fifty-two times a year and resolving upon each occasion that Christianity is tyranny, and that they will not be held in bondage by it.

Then, too, there are times when their boasted freedom does not cover all their needs. Death comes, their friends or little ones are taken away, and the leader of their lyceum is not quite competent to serve them; in fact, he only knows how to talk about the “Demands of Liberalism.” And it would scarcely be appropriate to step up to a bereaved mother, just as she was taking the last look at the still white face of her darling, and say: “Be comforted, sad soul. Church property shall not always be taxed.” And so the stricken mourners must ignore the custom, and have no hallowed little service over their dead; they must brave all the unpleasantness and be called barbarians just at a time when their hearts are broken and they feel least belligerent. Or they must call upon an orthodox minister, and more than probable he will embrace the opportunity (he will, if he does his duty) and exhort the mourners to take the dispensation of Providence as a warning, and prepare to flee the wrath to come.

And there are other occasions when a liberal minister would be a convenience in a neighborhood. Quite frequently, the liberal young man finds that he has a decided liking for the society of the liberal young girl; and the girl reciprocating, a minister is a necessary evil. And the minister doesn't half do his duty, if he neglects, just after the ceremony, to say, “Will you come to my church next Sunday?” And the grateful young couple haven't heard the word,—no, for a long time. So they promise to go; and, there being no better place provided, it may be they will keep on going. I am very sure that the primary class of Liberalism is ready for organization.

Then, of another phase or grade of Liberalism, I can say it is equally ready. A large majority of our most cultivated men and women are entirely out of sympathy with Orthodoxy; and they either ignore the churches altogether and spend their Sundays with their books and papers at home, or they go to the easy Congregational churches and hold their mental reservations. Of those who stay out, some would need to be aroused and inspired (not an easy task, but a genuine Rationalism, sufficiently in earnest, could do it). Others are weary of their isolation; and many more are anxious, at least for the sake of their children, to welcome a Rational Religious Society.

I must not stop to take time to speak of still other signs which indicate a tendency toward organization,—such as the calls that come from all quarters, asking advice and instruction about Sunday-school work; also the springing up, like mushrooms, of little liberal newspapers, pitiful little things, which almost make one cry, because of the hunger and thirst back of them, and because of their utter incapacity to do anything else but just protest. Of these and other signs, I must not say more, because I want to say a little word about the kind of organization which will be successful. But, first, let me guard against the creation of a false impression about the ease with which societies might be organized in the West. Notwithstanding all that I have said about the ripeness and readiness and the desire for organization is true, yet let no one suppose that I mean to report that every town is ready and eager to rally round a leader just the hour when he puts in an appearance. For instance, Mr. Charles D. B. Mills worthily presents, I suppose, the best phase of Rational Religion. Mr. Mills was expected to be in Lawrence the day after I came from there. We will suppose that Mr. Mills was announced and gave a lecture. If he did, it is more than probable that his audience did not exceed fifty persons, perhaps not twenty-five. And so Mr. Mills, following up my showing of the Western situation, might say that he did not believe the liberal element so large in the West, certainly not active or warm, hardly ready for organization. And yet I am sure I speak far within bounds when I say that I know of three hundred Liberals in the town of Lawrence who would, eventually, work together splendidly under the right kind of leadership and upon the right sort of basis. But they do not care so much just for a lecture or so. It would be the society work and activities, the social, educational, and charitable work, which would bring and bind them together; and so the lecture system is inadequate. But the Rational Religious minister, teacher, organizer, who goes out to settle and to stay, will just as surely succeed in building up a profitable, permanent, and powerful society,—just as surely as he goes and stays and tries.

But let it not be supposed that anything labelled liberal minister could do this work, even though he might remain his natural lifetime and live twice the allotted time. First of all, of course, he must have moral uprightness, cleanliness of character; and then brains. Let no one think that unculture or shallowness can fill the bill. There will be uncultured people to be dealt with, to be sure; but all the more will scholarship be needed to guide. The man who goes out West to be a leader of religious life and thought will have something more than the uncultivated to deal with: he will have to encounter the gaze of keen-eyed young men and women; and, if he be superficial, they will see through him in less than half an hour, and have no farther use for him. He must have tact to reconcile the various factions, he must have patience,—oh, so much!—and, above all, an unbounded enthusiasm and devotion to the principles which this philosophy of life that we call Free Religion stands for. There is no need to send to the West teachers who have simply a negative lesson to give. Even though one of this sort, a noisy, defiant, belligerent person, might be welcomed and applauded, yet, nevertheless, he would be a calamity. Col. Ingersoll was and is a splendid necessity, but Col. Ingersoll is enough for a whole country. Young liberal preachers may rest easy, and turn their attention to constructive work. As a religious guide, Col. Ingersoll is good enough,—what there is of him, and there is plenty of him, such as he is. There is little need longer to antagonize anything, not even Unitarianism. Western Unitarianism is just that with which Free Religion may gladly coöperate. Of course, the kind of Unitarianism which insists on its Christian name, which administers the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which has its baptismal font, its first reading from the Old Testament, its second reading from the New, its audible address to the Deity, and all the rest of it, has no sort of mission out West. Western Liberalism would walk several blocks on a hot Sunday morning to get out of its way. But the Unitarianism which Mr. Gannett, Mr. Crooker, Mr. Blake, Mr. Wendte, Mr. Hosmer, and others, stand for may be very heartily aided and abetted by Free Religion; and Free Religion need fear no detriment by affiliation with it. Especially may Free Religion emulate their hearty, faithful work for the elevation of humanity.

There are, in the State of Kansas alone, at least ten towns where a liberal leader might go next week and begin work, and in one year's time be established permanently. These points will not long be left unoccupied. Western Unitarianism is looking after them; and if you, of the Free Religious Association, leave the work for them, why, they can do it. Rev. Jenkin Ll. Jones, editor of Unity, has energy and vim and enthusiasm enough to do it all himself; but, then, you know it is not fair for you to leave it all to him. Besides, you know, without my stopping to say it, that even Western Unitarianism still needs Free Religion to spur it on to thorough and entire Rationalism; for it is yet hampered by its own family troubles.

The Free Religious Association cannot yet afford to die the death of the righteous, neither to merge itself into any other body. There was never a time when its opportunities and responsibilities were greater. Even though some of the grand old workers may be weary and a little discouraged, I am still sure that there is no other organization in all the world that stands for so much that is noble in purpose and clear in thought as this Free Religious Association; and, along with the glorious little Index, I want it to live a thousand years.

The PRESIDENT.—I am sure that I am expressing the sentiment of the Association in thanking heartily Mrs. Diggs for the bright, cheerful, and cheering words which she has uttered. I shall ask Mr. Charles Ellis to succeed her.

ADDRESS OF MR. CHARLES ELLIS.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,—The question before the Convention is so indefinitely stated that I am not sure I understand it as it was intended to be discussed. Certainly, I quite agree, in the main, with what has been said in the address opening the discussion; and, if the question means no more than what Mr. Hinckley has indicated, I am on the wrong track. Being left to interpret the question for myself, and believing the following to have been the intention of its framers, I have taken it to mean this: "Will Free Religion adopt a form of organization that shall embody a platform of principles or religious dogmas pledging its members to a mode of faith or a prescribed line of action?" So understanding it, I take the negative of the question, and, as my time is limited, will strike the trail of argument at once.

Thus viewing it, I would say that whether Free Religion will so organize depends entirely upon how useless it is. If it has been duly defined, limited, labelled, and "laid out," as we say of a corpse, then it will so organize. If it has lost its soul and inspiration, it will so organize. If it has been struck with fear of public opinion, or is suffering moral fever of anxiety to be considered "respectable," in the colloquial sense of the term, it will so organize. If it has then the only thing it ought to do is to so organize as speedily as possible, and die.

Either Free Religion stands for a new voice of God in the world of man, a new voice of man in the world of God, each for the other and both as one for all, proclaiming the living, pulsing truth of to-day, or it stands for nothing. As a platform for the union of all sects, and the representation of all "ologies" and "isms," it has not been remarkably influential. Evidently that is not its mission. The theological flies have never shown any great readiness to walk into the parlor of the, to them, heretical spiders. Theology knows its inherent weakness too well to court friendly discussion in open meeting.

Free Religion has wasted its opportunity by its failure to recognize, or at any rate to act upon, the undeniable fact that scientific knowledge and modern truth are in direct hostility to the theological conception of the universe and man's relation thereto. Theology has for ages assumed to be the heaven-sent guide of human life, and it has succeeded in keeping up the assumption through the ignorance and fears of the masses. But the fact cannot be disguised that it is no longer a guide. Scepticism in regard to theology has become a storm that rapidly rises to the proportions of a hurricane; and thousands are being driven from their old moorings and out to sea without chart or compass, without wisdom or skill, to carry them safe to harbor of higher faith and sublimer trust. The world of man is in a transition state, and the fever of uncertainty works havoc in the ranks of society. The guide of the past was Theology. Guide of the present there is none. The guide of the future will be Philosophy. But that guide has not yet crystallized to definite form. Free Religion has a golden opportunity to do a divine work by counselling, encouraging, and steadying humanity in this its perilous hour. If it will not see its opportunity, if it refuses to stand for this duty, if it is not willing to leave the question of organization until the philosophy that is to guide the future has taken form and place in the natural order of evolution, then, I say, it stands for nothing.

A new truth never comes by rule. You cannot lay down a formula by which the next new truth shall be compounded, measured out and sold, or given away in advance. Some brain becomes its womb, the soul wakes to inspiration under its electric vibration, and the tongue or pen proclaims it to the world. Sometimes, a truth so proclaimed has been so far in advance of the capacity of the world to comprehend it that the prophet has been stoned to death, or nailed alive to the cross, or starved to death in secret, silent, horrible dungeons, or torn to pieces on the rack, or burned at the stake. By and by, the world rises to the level of the rejected truth, and it is accepted. The bones, the ashes, the dust of the martyr are sought for, are inurned, are piled high with sacred monument erected in memory of a divine Messiah of the ages. Then comes organization to promulgate the truth he brought to the world. The organization sits down by its truth, or on it, to watch, to protect, and to propagate it. The organization demands that the world shall accept its truth, and deals out damnation to all who decline. The prophet who next sounds the new truth over the world is persecuted by those who have organized in the name of the last.

It is impossible to organize until you know what you want to organize for, until your object is clearly defined. Let a man go to Boston capitalists, and propose to them that they shall organize a company, giving him a large percentage of stock and control, and they will inquire what the object of his company is to be. If he informs them that he wants to have a company ready for the manufacture of a useful piece of machinery which he thinks he may possibly invent, they will dismiss him as a lunatic. "First produce your machine." First produce your truth, then you can organize for its promulgation; but you can't organize for the promulgation of a truth yet unborn, or one only dimly and half perceived. Free Religion is not yet grown to definite proportions. It doth not yet clearly appear what manner of man it shall be.

Furthermore, such organization, as I understand the question to imply, kills the inspiration of truth. It puts bit and bridle on the liberty and power of thought. It makes men think, believe, and work in harness. It destroys the spontaneity and thrill of free action, and makes machines or slaves of its members. Think of young Jesus working under the direction of an organization! His power lay in his freedom to voice the inspiration of his soul for the hour. Imagine him going into the Temple and notifying those brokers (?) that the organization for the spread of a truth that it is supposed somebody may pick up somewhere, sometime, has voted unanimously that there shall be no more shaving of notes, changing of money, or what not, in this synagogue. Compare the result of such an action with the splendid frenzy of moral heroism that, with drawn scourge, declared that they should no longer make the temple of God a den of thieves, and forthwith compelled them to decamp. They crucified him for his freedom of thought and speech, and long afterwards organized his truth,—or disorganized it,—and made the mightiest system of slavery in the world.

To take an example from our own times, see the history of Unitarianism. Horrified with the teachings of the Church in regard to God, men declared that the trinity, the fall of Adam, total depravity, and eternal torment were false dogmas. Then began a war between the Titans of new truth and the Hydras of organization such as has seldom been seen. While men fought under the inspiration of that truth, they moved to higher level. But when they had won their victory, and the enemy admitted their right to exist, they settled back, organized their truth, drove their stakes, drew their lines, and set to work to build up a sect. They have become "respectable," as is said; but the prophetic soul can live at their hotel no longer. They virtually say to heretics, as Judge Hilton said to the Jews at his house in Saratoga, "You interfere with our trade, and we don't want you here." Emerson went from them for freedom nearly half a century ago. Parker tried their organization with the weight of his new inspiration, and it threw him overboard. He, the grandest soul that the Church has produced in this century, got glimpses of something beyond organization. His great soul, with its "skylight ever open" to the heavens of thought, received the truth and proclaimed it; and his friends turned from him in anger and fear, and went away to watch their little organization that it should not lose its respectability by contact with his heresy. Then, when the whole organized force of theology condemned him, and some of its leaders prayed to God to destroy him, a dozen men met and

"Resolved, That Theodore Parker shall be heard."

It was not Theodore Parker they meant, but the truth that he stood ready to proclaim, that he had to some extent already proclaimed. From that resolution grew volume upon volume of eloquent advocacy of truth, of new revelation of life and nature, until to-day the whole world knows and largely loves Parker, not for any organization that he was or represented or advocated, but for the grander liberty and purity he gave to mankind. The people heard him gladly. They crowded forward to sustain him. Whatever organization was necessary to keep up his opportunity to be heard crystallized around the social nature of his friends. By social attractions, they drew and held the young. They afforded them opportunity for development, and to-day there are many well-to-do and highly respected people in the world who took start in life from the social meetings that grew out of that simple

"Resolved, That Theodore Parker shall be heard in Boston."

I do not know that any one ever attempted to organize Mr. Parker; but I imagine that, if they had tried to put a collar on his neck duly labelled with theological ownership, the organizers would not have stood upon the order of their going, but would have gone at once. Such men can't work under organization. It is tyranny to them. It puts them in an attitude of perpetual dishonesty to themselves. Their minds must be free, totally and forever free, free as the sunlight and the air, or their inspiration dies, they sink to the level of organized mediocrity, and voice the soul of the world no more.

Free Religion, then, as I have said, will not organize as I have indicated, unless its usefulness has gone. It stands, or should stand, as I think, for a new and newest revelation of truth. Supernaturalism ran on down through the ages, weakening from age to age, until at last Unitarianism carried it to the very verge of collapse, but stopped just in time to prevent what would have been a very useful funeral. In the house of theological development, Unitarianism was the last upward step, and occupied the attic floor. There was no longer room for growth on the supernatural basis therein. When Parker rose in that old house, he raised the roof with him and set religion free. Henceforth, the lines are distinctly drawn. The work he began can only go on by an equal freedom. That "equal freedom" demands and requires that the truth of to-day no less than the truth of his day shall be heard in Boston and elsewhere; and the truth makes an issue every time it is heard. If Free Religion stands for anything, then, it must be for the truth of science, the truth of knowledge (I use the terms in their broadest sense, for all that relates to the well-being of humanity), against the persistent errors, fables, and bondage of a system of theology that rose like a myth from the sea of ignorance that once rolled around the world. Has Free Religion realized that such is its mission? I do not know. To accept this, it needs not to narrow its limits. All may ever be welcome to stand in its forum and proclaim their conception of the right, but in the thunder of theological reverberations the part of Free Religion should be that of the lightning.

The world wants less noise of theological thunder and more light of living truth. Let Free Religion, then, stand for the light of truth in the present and future hours; and it will stand to bless and save. Let it stand with soul brimful of earnestness and heroism that will speak the truth to-day and leave the event to time; and it shall lift humanity from the mud of social mire and lead it to the highway of wisdom and happiness. Let it become the swift lightning of the infinite heavens of thought, riving the old fortresses of hoary superstition and theological fraud; and it shall stand for the liberty and progress of humanity, and light it to the goal of all hope, the ultimate perfection of our race.

To this end, all that is needed is that men and women who possess the means and the courage shall Resolve, That the TRUTH of TO-DAY shall be HEARD.

When Garrison rose to the zenith of moral heroism, and declared, on the question of the abolition of slavery in this country, "I will not retract, I will not equivocate, and I will be heard," he touched the slumbering sense of justice in hearts that came forward, not to organize the truth he was proclaiming, but simply to secure it a hearing; and for thirty years the only organization the Abolitionists knew was one of ways and means to be heard. The result, you know.

To-day, and for years to come, the greatest contest in the world will be between the truth of science and the errors of theology. All that the truth asks is a hearing. Where it is heard, it will wake sympathy, sympathy will arouse action, action will engender social ties, and these will find satisfaction in social intercourse by ways and means that will suggest themselves, in harmony with the environments of time and place. Thus, the mind will be left forever free; and Free Religion will be at liberty at all times to advocate the truth of the day, to cast off error and take on strength with the growing mind and thought of the world.

What it wants, then, in my opinion, is not organization that shall define what it is to represent in the field of belief for future years, but means to give all truth a hearing. Knowing the modesty of the managers of the Free Religious Association, I am going to say for them that money, and plenty of it, is what Free Religion needs to-day. The prophets of the present can't subsist on "locusts and wild honey." As commissary stores, those articles are not a success. But, with the money that is spent in one year in efforts to make "the wicked heathen" understand the mystery of godliness, the glory of total depravity, the justice of eternal torments, the joy of infinite vengeance, and the absolute correctness of the triune multiplication table,—with that amount of money in the hands of the earnest workers for Free Religion,—to hold public conventions in city and town all over the country, to load the mails with Free Religious literature all over the world,—it could shake the theological pyramids of superstition, mental bondage, and social demoralization to the ground, open the tombs of sacred errors and crumble the forms of hoary falsehood with the oxygen of living truth, and wake the world to a sense of duty and a joy of liberty that it never knew before. Thus, Free Religion may ever stand for the eternal and inalienable right of freethought and social purity; while, for practical work of benevolence, the poor, the sick, the sorrowful, and the unfortunate ye have always with you, and charity will ever be a kiss and blessing from the lips of infinite love laid gently upon the human heart to thrill and quicken it to nobler action and diviner life; and when there are no more poor in the world, when the last haggard form of poverty has disappeared, when the last groan of misery has died away, when the last tear of sorrow has been dried, when the last broken heart has been healed, when the last cloud of ignorance has been dispelled, when the last bondage of the mind has been broken, when the last fear of God has forever flown, and the whole wide world of man is perpetually bathed in the bright sunlight of knowledge, wisdom, and happiness, and the world-old dream of heaven has become a glorious reality upon earth, and woman, source of all that is good and true and great, has indeed become "the Mother of God" in the perfect humanity that shall then ennoble our dear old world, then the work of Free Religion will be done; and it can organize and die in glory and honor, and be embalmed in history among the Godlike agencies that have lifted the world, but not till then.

THE PRESIDENT.—The address of Mr. Ellis, which we have just heard, and which was so very interesting in its statement and in its outline, does not appear to touch the position which Mr. Hinckley has assumed in his discourse, as I understand it, and certainly not the position indicated by myself. The speaker himself has justly said he is giving his own interpretation of the question. I do not think there is any one here—certainly not among those who have introduced this question—who would limit the belief or the opinions in matters of religion of any member of such an organization as is contemplated. In my view, the point taken by Mr. Ellis is not at all at variance with the position which has been taken by those who advocate organization here. They solemnly protest against the desire to limit or influence the religious belief of any member of the Association, or to make any common statement of faith, but do desire more effective organization, or an extension of organization, in behalf of the Association's principles; an advance in the line of moral and humane work already begun.

I have now the honor of introducing to you Mr. Giles B. Stebbins.

ADDRESS OF MR. GILES B. STEBBINS.

Mr. President.—I am aware that there must be a limit to human endurance; and, the hour being so late, the words that I have to say shall be very brief.

I think the real problem before us, the nature of the change that is going on in religious organization, is one of great importance. All over the West, where my home is to-day,—and I presume it is the same here as there,—you will find multitudes of thoughtful, earnest men and women who fear religion as the burnt child dreads the fire. They think of religious organizations as prisons. They cannot separate the idea of organization from the idea of religious bondage and spiritual slavery and death; and the problem before us is to change all this, and bring about some method of organization that shall mean for such people not slavery, but liberty; that shall mean not darkness, but light; that shall mean not bigotry, but the broadest and most liberal fellowship. That is the problem before us, and now let me briefly point out some of the hindrances that are in the way, in the West especially, and some of the encouragements as well.

A few months ago, in the city of Detroit, my then home, I met a gentleman one day in the street, and spoke to him about something that was going on in his church. "Why," said he, "I don't go there to church now." Said I, "I thought you had a pew there." "Well, I did," said he. "We had a pew, and paid our quarter's due; but, when the collector came round at the time the last instalment became due, I found that none of the family had been there for three months, and I thought it was useless to throw away the money for no purpose, so I gave it up. Now," he said, "I think there are families in about that position enough to fill a dozen churches in the city." That is one element in the solution of this problem.

Then there is another idea connected with this question. It is rather difficult to induce people who differ somewhat in their opinions to come together on a broad, free platform like this, for instance, and preserve and maintain toward each other their mutual respect. Now, I may be said to represent a large body of liberal-thinking people in the West who are called Spiritualists. I say that, because I have been asked to speak of the progress of organization among that people, and therefore I speak somewhat in their behalf. And let me say here that every Spiritualist is of necessity a Free Religionist, because the spiritual philosophy, broad, eclectic, and inclusive, knows no prejudices, no limitations, no barriers, recognizes no authority for truth, but only the truth of the soul for authority, and accepts the intuitions of the human spirit, the testimonies of the human reason, the truths of human experience, and the results of scientific experiment as its basis of education. But then there is a text which says, "They are not all Israel who are of Israel"; and this is true of the spiritual philosophy in the broad sense, for there are many who imperfectly comprehend it, and would accept it if they truly understood it, just as on the Free Religionist platform you find some souls who more perfectly comprehend the beauty of the Free Religious idea than others do. This is a very great difficulty in the way of progress in the West,—to induce people, differing quite heartily in their sincere and earnest convictions, to come together with mutual respect for each other, and engage in some common work. Now, if I come on a platform with another man, and I treat him in conversation as though I was stooping from my elevated position to come down to his level, or if I treat him with a sort of ill-concealed contempt, why, if that man has any self-respect, he will go his own way and leave me alone. It is a hard lesson to learn,—this lesson of mutual reverence and respect; and the want of that is one great difficulty in the West as it is in the East.

Another great difficulty there is in the difference of opinion that prevails even among the advocates of Liberalism. We have very conflicting and contradictory elements in this day of transition. We are coming out from the shadow of the old traditions, and we are just at the turning of the paths; and the one path leads toward Materialism, and the other leads toward Spiritualism. The paths diverge so entirely it is difficult to bring these two classes together. If we can devise some means whereby these two classes can be brought together, and maintain harmony while respecting the conscientious convictions of each other, a great gain will have been made.

Then, as to the encouragements, they are many. I believe in organization. I believe it must come. I believe it ought to come, if it is a good thing. I believe in what Napoleon said when a general said of a plan of his on the battle-field, "It is impossible." The imperial commander said: "I know nothing about the impossible. I have no such word in my dictionary." And so it seems to me that, if this is a good thing, we ought to have no word "impossible" touching the organization of Free Religion in our dictionary. One great help in the West is the heart-hunger of the people. They are hungering and thirsting for spiritual, intellectual food,—men living on their farms, women toiling in the household vocations, men sitting in their offices. They are not satisfied with the few husks they are fed with: they want something more; and, after waiting and hungering and thirsting, the time must come when they will have something more.

Now, how is this demand met in the West? Let me say there has been a large class of people who do not feel like being tied down to the old bondage of going to meeting once a week. They feel they can get along with more distant intervals, and sometimes they are compelled to. I know one very marked and excellent feature that shows a tendency to accept a simple and practical organization in the West; and that is, that all over this new country—in distant Kansas, where our sister dwells who has addressed us to-day—you find associations very simple in their form and very free from narrow restrictions, on which people work together in a common-sense way for certain practical results. We have, for instance, grove meetings in the summer; and those in charge invite men and women to come and speak to them. They always say to those they invite, "Come here to our grove, and speak before God what in your own soul you believe to be true." Never do they limit them. I believe there will be held one hundred of these great grove meetings this year. Night before last, I had the pleasure of going to Music Hall, and sitting in the gallery, and looking on that magnificent audience of four thousand people listening to the eloquence of that wonderful organ; but, friends, I presume there will be a score of audiences gathered in the far West during the coming summer larger in numbers than the immense audience at Music Hall night before last. These are very encouraging signs indeed, and I have no fears for the future. It is wonderful, the progress we have made in the direction of liberty of thought and speech in the last twenty years. It is like the transition from the ice-bound drifts of winter to the floods of spring, that make devastation for a brief space, but prepare the earth for the fruits of summer and the golden harvest of the autumn. Let us take heart and hope, and move right on. Sectarianism has been organized long enough. Sectarianism is being honey-combed with freethought everywhere. Thinking ministers in the pulpits do not believe half they preach, and thinking people who hear them do not believe half they hear. This is a very unsatisfactory condition of things, and it cannot last through many years to come. So it seems to me all we have to do is to move right on, and carry on the good work of freedom and fellowship in religion. That is the great work of the nineteenth century. It is the great need of the age.

I want to thank my friend Mr. Hinckley for his fine statement of the leading points and ideas of the Free Religious movement. I indorse that statement. I was very glad that he was able to make it here, and especially glad that the time was so well filled as he filled it in making that statement. I think it is of very great consequence that, while we do not limit each other, while we do not browbeat each other, while we show the fulness of the spirit of religious freedom and fellowship, yet at the same time it is of great consequence that we strive to conform to certain great, sublime, eternal principles and moral ideas that have been the inspiration of the best thought in all ages and in all places, and in the name of all the religions that have sprung up and gone down again in the world; and it was the statement of those great truths in the address of my friend that I like. Permit me to add just one thought, and then I will draw my words to a close.

In addition to his admirable statement, I would say we need to receive the great, the lasting, the never-dying truth of the immortal life. We need an outlook over, above, and beyond that change which we call death. We need the thought of the broad eternity that we are beginning to live now. We want an outlook of such a nature that the injustice of to-day shall be rounded out into justice to-morrow, that the ignorance of to-day in the great to-morrow shall be changed to wisdom, that the prejudice of to-day, in the great to-morrow, if not before, shall melt away in the sunlight of love and truth. I am glad, friends, that it is one of the signs of the times in this nineteenth century that there is a revival of this glorious conception that binds the life that is with that other and higher life that is to be. I am glad that we are alive in this nineteenth century, when there are witnesses to an accumulation of facts which have been verified as thoroughly as any facts in the whole realm of natural science, and that these facts go to prove the great truth that man shall never die. But, friends, the great thought is to be free, to help each other's growth, and help each other to a higher, a more beautiful, and a diviner life.

Something has been said here about the Index. I am glad it has been said; and the only reason, Mr. Chairman, why I do not put $5,000 into the treasury of the Index is the unfortunate fact that I have not it to put in. It is well that the Index lives; but, as a little reminder of the progress of the cause in the West, I want to say to you that there is a journal published in the city of Chicago, asking no contribution of anybody, asking not a dollar's help, and it has not asked a dollar's help for the last fifteen years, save the patronage that its subscribers give it, and this journal is circulated by the thousand all through the Western States, through Oregon and California, over into that Australian continent, over into Europe, Africa, Asia, and England, and in New England as well. That journal is the Religio-Philosophical Journal; and, although in some respects its views might not accord with the convictions of some of you, yet, I want to say, and I speak it from a sort of intimate knowledge, that the idea, the aim, and the scope of that journal are exactly the same as the idea, the aim, and the scope of this Free Religious Association, advocating and claiming freedom and fellowship in spiritual truths.

But I must draw to a close. Let me do so by reading a few lines from the inspired soul of a New England woman, Lucy Larcom. I read them because they seem to contain the great central thought and inspiration toward which the Free Religious movement, and the advocates of fellowship, under various names, ought to reach. It is the MOUNTAINEER'S PRAYER.

Give me with the strength of thy steadfast hills,
The speed of thy streams give me!
In the spirit that calms, with the life that thrills,
I would stand or run for thee.
Let me be thy voice, or thy silent power,
As the cataract, or the peak,—
An eternal thought, in my earthly hour,
Of the living God to speak.

Clothe me in the rose-tints of thy skies,
Upon morning summits laid!
Robe me in the purple and gold that lies
Through thy shuttles of light and shade!
Let me rise and rejoice in thy smile bright,
As mountains and forests do!
Let me welcome thy twilight and thy night,
And wait for thy dawn anew!

Give me of the brook's faith, joyously sung
Under clank of its icy chain!
Give me of the patience that hides among Thy hill-tops, in mist and rain!
Lift me up from the clod, let me breathe thy breath!
Thy beauty and strength give me.
Let me lose both the name and the meaning of death,
In the life that I share with thee!

The President then requested all interested to remain awhile longer, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, to consider the series of resolutions which had been handed in by Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, at the business meeting, with reference to bringing about a more efficient organization of the Free Religious movement.

At the request of the President, Mr. Hinckley, Chairman of the Committee to whom they had been referred, read the resolutions, remarking that the Committee, without recommendation for or against, simply referred them back to the meeting:—

Resolved, 1. That, in order to obtain the preliminary knowledge necessary to more effective work, the Executive Committee be instructed to select and appoint some able and zealous member of the Association, so far as possible, from each State, to act as Local Correspondent.

2. That the Executive Committee furnish said State local correspondents with a list of questions to be answered by them, relating to legal restrictions upon religious liberty, to general educational and church influences, to the possibilities of forming Free Religious Associations in their States, and to such other moral and social conditions as may be of use in gaining accurate statistical information respecting the progress and needs of our movement throughout the United States; and, further, that, wherever said local correspondents desire and the Executive Committee think advisable, the General Agent (if one be employed) be sent to aid in collecting these facts.

3. That a midwinter conference of the Association be held at such time and place as shall be determined by the Executive Committee, before which the reports of the local correspondents shall be presented, together with the General Agent's supplementary report of state conditions.

4. That, in order to attain greater solidity and breadth of action, we now appoint a Special Committee to report to said midwinter conference a plan for the formation of State Auxiliaries to the National Free Religious Association, and for the suitable recognition of the delegate power of such auxiliaries in our Constitution, which plan, if approved by the conference, shall be submitted to the next annual meeting for final action.

Mrs. Spencer then said that, if the words "free" and "religion" can properly be put together, the question of organization is already settled. The real question is, Can this Free Religious Association, with its present constitution and with the present feeling in its membership, properly take hold of this work of organization individually, and help it forward? That is the question; and I believe that the constitution not only permits us to take hold of this work of organization, but really obliges us to do so, if we accept it fully. The word "free" opens the door from the close atmosphere of the Churches, while the word "religion" takes us in from the brawling mob of what we might call the dogmatism of Liberalism. The word "association" does not mean an organization like a despotic government: it does not mean that we can take forceful possession of some field, and seed it according to our own ideas, but that we lie in wait to give the sympathy and help that our fellows need; and so much I believe we ought to do. Mr. President, as I said last evening, if we can do nothing more than come up here upon a free platform once a year, even that is a good thing to do. I thought this morning, as I was listening to the President, that it was worth the fourteen years' existence of the Association to have heard that statement of Free Religion and its possibilities. But if, as I think, the meeting fourteen years ago was the proclamation of the proposed marriage between freedom and religion, children of adverse and previously antagonistic ancestry, if that was the betrothal, as I think it was, and it has taken all these years of courtship to get acquainted, I believe to-day should be the marriage day; and I believe we should go out from this Association to form a religious home to which all the Liberals who are driven from the looseness of Liberalism on the one side, and driven out by the oppression of church organization on the other, can come and sit down together to learn righteousness, and to make righteousness a fact in their life.

Mrs. Spencer then read the resolutions one by one, and explained their meaning, repeating at the close her remark of the preceding evening, that it was not so much this particular plan that she urged as that some plan should be adopted for more effective work.

A discussion ensued, in which considerable opposition was manifested to the final resolution, as too much committing the Association in advance to the plan of Auxiliary State Associations. A division of the resolutions being called for, they were put to vote singly, and the first three adopted. Mr. Potter then moved, as an amendment to the fourth resolution, the addition of the words: "or, if such plan shall not in the judgment of the Committee be feasible, to report any other plan of increased activity which shall make our work more national and more effective."

Mrs. Spencer accepted this amendment, and the resolution thus amended was adopted. It was voted that the Special Committee provided by the resolution be appointed by the President, and that officer nominated Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Mr. B. A. Ballou, Mr. W. H. Hamlem, Mrs. Anna L. Diggs, and Mr. Arthur Hill.

The tellers, on a recount of the ballot of the preceding evening for officers, announced in detail the vote, showing that all the officers on the ticket presented by the Nominating Committee had been elected excepting one Vice-President,—one of the two vacancies caused by the death of Lucretia Mott and Lydia Maria Child not having been filled. Another ballot was taken for a Vice-President, and resulted in the election of Mrs. Anna L. Diggs, of Kansas. [The full list of officers elected will be found on next the last page of this paper.]

The committee appointed the previous evening to select a committee for nominating officers next year reported the names of George W. Stevens, Miss Matilda Goddard, and Harlan P. Hyde, who were elected.

After a notice from the Chair of the Social Festival in the evening, the Convention adjourned.

Social Festival.

In the evening, the social festival, held in the same building, proved a very interesting and enjoyable occasion. Abundant provision had been made in the lower hall for supper for all who wished, as also for a lunch at noon, so that many took advantage of these opportunities for social intercourse. From 8 to 9 P.M. there were exercises in the upper hall, under the arrangement of the Festival Committee, consisting of brief addresses and music. These exercises were in part commemorative of Mrs. Lucretia Mott and Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, Vice-Presidents of the Association who had died within the year. Mrs. E. D. Cheney made an address particularly on their character and work as representative of woman's place in the Free Religious movement,—an address so full of strength and beauty that we much regret we have no report of it to give to the Index readers. Appreciative reference was also made to Mrs. Theodore Parker, who, though not an officer, had always been a good friend of the Association. Portraits of Mrs. Mott, Mrs. Child, and Mrs. Parker were hung at the rear of the platform, amid tasteful decorations of ivies and flowers. Briefer and more general remarks were made by Mr. F. A. Hinckley, who presided. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Mr. W. M. Salter, and others. The hymns heretofore appended were sung,—that of Mr. Gannett having been written for a memorial occasion two or three years ago, and that of Mrs. Cheney specially for the close of this meeting. At nine o'clock, the people repaired again to the lower hall, and spent the remainder of the evening in social conversation. Opportunity was offered for making contributions to the treasury, which many improved, and congratulations were exchanged, perhaps at ice-cream tables, over the good speeches heard during the day, and at the prospects of the Association and its cause, as another year's milestone was reached and passed.

In Memoriam.

"Green Pastures and Still Waters."

BY W. C. GANNETT.

Clear in memory's silent reaches
Lie the pastures I have seen,
Greener than the sun-lit spaces
Where the May has hung her green:
Needs no sun and needs no star-light
To illumine these fields of mine,
For the glory of dead faces
Is the sun, the stars, that shine.

More than one I count my pastures
As my life-path growth long;
By their quiet waters straying
Oft I lay me, and am strong.
And I call each by its giver,
And the dear names bring to them
Glory as from shining faces
In some new Jerusalem.

Yet, O well I can remember,
Once I called my pastures, Pain!
And the waters were a torrent
Sweeping through my life again!
Now I call them Peace and Stillness,
Brightness of all happy thought,
Where I linger for a blessing
From my faces that are naught.

Naught? I know not. If the Power
Maketh thus his pastures green,
Maketh thus his quiet waters,
Out of waste, his heavens serene,
I can trust the mighty Chemist
Of the May-lands and the Soul,
And the faces of my dead ones
Pledge no waste within his Whole!

Apple Blossoms.

BY MRS. EDNAH D. CHENEY.

As the apple-tree to-day,
Blossoms in the sun of May,
Yet long months must work and wait
Till it bear its precious freight,
Till the golden fruit appear,
Noblest harvest of the year;

So to-day we sing our song,
Speak our word; but, waiting long,
Rain and sunshine meet our need,
Thought shall ripen into deed;
Love, with faith and beauty rife,
Slowly bring the fruit of life.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 14, 1881.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE MORAL LAW SELF-EXECUTING.

Reward for moral obedience, punishment for moral transgression, are no arbitrary fiat of a distant deity enthroned in the heavens, to be pronounced at some spectacular judgment-day at the opening of a future world; but they are principles of mental and physical vitality which are working right here in this world, and in all worlds where intelligent beings are living and acting together,—principles which are a part of the very machinery of human action. Right action produces some kind of good fruit as its natural consequence; and wrong action produces some kind of evil fruit as its natural consequence. The good fruit is physical health and power, mental and moral productiveness, individual and, in time, social happiness, order, prosperity, peace; in fine, all the natural results of observing the natural laws of life and growth and progress. The evil fruit is disorder, pain, individual and social misery, physical derangement, mental and moral incapacity and disaster; in fine, all the natural disturbances, failures, wrecks, caused by a violation of the natural laws of life and growth and progress.

In the complicated relations and mixed activities of human beings under the conditions of modern society, we do not, of course, always see moral observance and moral transgression working simply by these direct lines to their respective results. In the confusion and contradiction of manifold actions there may be mutually neutralizing tendencies; and sometimes it seems as if moral transgressors were prospering in happiness, while the morally faithful are the ones who find the way hard. But could we see everything in the process precisely as it is, and the whole of the process to its completion, we should doubtless see that the law of moral cause and consequence is nowhere for an instant broken, and that the net product at any time is always the exact result of the really operative moral forces. There may be a superficial, exterior action that may appear moral without really being so, and that may attain, yet also superficially, certain of the rewards that belong to virtue. And this for a time may veil our eyes against discerning the real moral transgression of the actor, and also against detecting the moral degeneration that is surely going on in his character, and is the real and unescapable punishment of his transgression. But such successful temporary concealment of the process does not prevent the operation of the law of moral cause and consequence. It is just as impossible for a man to continue to do evil, however secretly, and still keep his nature good, and so go on perpetually to reap the rewards of goodness, as it is for a thorn-bush to bring forth grapes. Most likely, the gradual growth of the immorality will of itself after a time push away the disguise, and the character will stand revealed for just what it is, with no farther capacity for any companionships or enjoyments or activities that are not suited to its own degenerated condition. But, even if the disguises remain, though they conceal, they do not heal the moral disease and constantly lessening moral power within. No disguise is thick enough to evade the piercing sharpness of that penalty.

Equally impossible is it for the character of genuine virtue to miss its highest rewards, however outward appearances may seem to belie the rule. It may be easy to take from the deserving some outward crown of happiness and to press a wreath of thorns in its place. But it is the lot of the most virtuous that they care the least for the outward crowns,—that they are grandly content with virtue itself and with what that will ultimately do for the world; and there is no force in the universe that can rob them of the highest possible reward which can be accorded to any human soul,—the growing power for virtue, and a corresponding decreasing susceptibility to every kind of evil.

And here in this natural system of moral reward and retribution, as the legitimate different consequences of certain courses of conduct, shall we find all needed sanctions for the practical enforcement of the moral law. The law, in fact, is self-executing; and the ethical teacher has only to study the process and carefully to direct the attention of his pupils to it. Illustrations of the power of the law will flock to him from all phases of human life. And when the theological theories of ethics, with their reliances upon some outward act of atonement for the removal of moral guilt, with their decrial of morality as "filthy rags," with their appeals to escape some indefinite wrath and wretchedness in a future world rather than a very palpable misery right here in this world,—when these theories shall have ceased to obscure and obstruct the natural moral vision of mankind, it will become, not as is sometimes feared more difficult, but more easy to appeal to the moral motives of men in their practical conduct one with another in daily life, and to do it effectively. Then, as never before, will it be seen that mankind is responsible for its own condition; that into the hands of human beings themselves, through their capacity for understanding nature's laws and their ability to coöperate with them, has been committed the progress, happiness, and destiny of the human race.

ALEXANDER II. AND NIHILISM.

This is the title of the opening article of the May number of the Revue de Belgique, which also contains essays on the Monetary Standard, on the Teaching of Physiology in the Berlin University, and on the unwillingness of the Belgians to vote. A serial story, Un Fils d'Adam, by Alfred Maville, commences with this number; but its most interesting article is that which has been already referred to, and which is full of shrewd observations and of startling facts collected during a residence of many years in Russia. Among the most remarkable of these are some about education, which will be presented as nearly as possible in the author's own words:—

"Official statistics give but few schools and pupils in comparison with the population; but these figures are far above the reality, and one might say that there are scarcely any schools, except in the cities and important towns. It is not the central government that deserves credit for such schools as exist, but the cities, the provincial assemblies, and the clergy. Moreover, the number of schools is not increasing, but diminishing; and this is owing to the hostility of the minister of public instruction. This is proved by facts which have been published in Russian newspapers. For instance, a private person who would open a school must pass through so many formalities, and demand permission in so many quarters, that it needs much courage to make the attempt, which indeed is almost sure to fail. I knew a land-owner in Southern Russia who wished to found a school on his estate. He encountered a lively opposition from all the authorities, but, being a very obstinate man, he would not own himself vanquished, and, after two years of disappointments and manoeuvres, and after making an appeal to the Senate, he finally obtained the permission. As soon as the provincial assemblies were established, they almost all went zealously to work in founding normal and elementary schools. They came at once into conflict with the agents of the minister, who refused to have such schools carried on, unless wholly under his own control. The local assemblies yielded, except that, as they had to pay all the money, they claimed a right to control its expenditure. This the minister refused, and most of these schools were closed. Indeed there are scarcely any normal schools left in Russia. A long struggle against the same minister was carried on by the city of St. Petersburg. The schools there depended on this official, and were few in number, badly kept, and without proper teachers or buildings. As soon as the city was allowed to elect a council, the latter asked for the control of the schools, offering to make great sacrifices to put them in good condition. The minister refused, and then began a struggle which lasted as long as the Trojan war. At the end of ten years, the victory was won by the city; and within ten years the schools were more than doubled in number, and every way improved. In some villages, the peasants try to make up for the absence of regular schools by employing private teachers to show their children how to read and write. If this is found out by an agent of the State, the class is promptly broken up, and severe threats made against the teacher and the village authorities. Even where there is an authorized village school, it is so much interfered with by the inspectors and the priests, that a good teacher will not remain there long. The result is that most of the few schools which exist outside of the cities are very poor. Every attempt to improve public instruction has been opposed by the minister. The provincial assemblies attempted during the vacations to hold teachers' institutes, but scarcely anywhere has this been more than once permitted. A national society for the improvement of popular education was founded under the lead of people above all suspicion. It gained a great many members and founded many local circles, but ceased to exist after a few years, on account of the ill-will of the authorities. A general, who was at the head of one of these circles, once called the teachers of his city together to talk about improving their work. The next day, the teachers were all summoned before the director of primary instruction, and reprimanded. The general was told to mind his own business, and resigned his place in the circle, which soon dissolved. In St. Petersburg, there formerly existed a pedagogical society, composed largely of professors and provided with every kind of authorization. Attention was given exclusively to education, and nothing said about politics. However, it is but two years since, without previous warning, sudden orders were given that this society must be given up. Such was the opposition made to popular education by Tolstoi, who was officially bound to aid it, and who had been fifteen years in power when he was removed in 1880. This great obscurantist set himself against the study of medicine by women. The minister of war, Miloutine, gave them access to the Academy at St. Petersburg, where they studied faithfully, and in due time graduated. The provincial assemblies were eager to employ these ladies for country practice, for which they were greatly needed, and to which they were ready to devote themselves most disinterestedly; but they could not practise without Tolstoi's permission. He refused it, and the peasants were left at the mercy of their sorcerers."

No wonder that such a government had enemies, whose number was constantly increased by the conduct of the secret police, which our author considers as bad as the Spanish Inquisition, and whose agents could arrest any one they please, keep him in prison as long as they liked, and banish him to any place they chose, no other court being able to restrain them, and no official being able to escape their clutches. Two years ago, the Russian papers were all talking about a functionary who had been exiled for several years as a political offender, because he had quarrelled with the friend of a member of this force. These facts were proved legally, but the false accusers could not be punished.

It is with such tools that the courtiers who wished to control Alexander II. by stirring up his fears had gradually led him to work. And for this purpose they had made many arrests of innocent persons, like the journalist, Tchernychevsky, and the falsely accused accomplices of the would-be regicide, Karakosof. Thus alarmed, the emperor was led to sanction such acts as the imprisonment for two years, and exile for eight, of Vera Sassulitch, simply for writing an unimportant letter found on the person of the friend of a conspirator, and the sentence, to ten and twenty years of forced labor in prison, of such moderate Nihilists as do nothing worse than circulate pamphlets. The result is that those who simply love liberty are provoked into sympathy with Bakunin and that ultra section of the Nihilists who approve of assassination. Well is it said that the punishment of every conspirator calls forth ten new ones, and that it is the secret police that has made the Nihilists.

SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY ON LIBERALISM.

The editor of Scribner's Monthly (July number), in his desire to identify Liberalism "with the love of moral dirt," gives an extract from one of Mr. Abbot's editorials in the Index, and exclaims, "Has anybody more thoroughly identified the majority of Liberals with the love of obscenity than the old president of the Liberals themselves?"

Of course, Mr. Abbot has done nothing of the sort, and the extract given utterly fails to sustain this untruthful representation. "Nothing could be more wicked," Mr. Abbot wrote, "than the persistent attempt to represent us as saying that the 'seventy thousand' (?) signers to the Bennett petition are consciously in favor of obscenity. We never said anything of the sort." And, all through the controversy growing out of the action of the National Liberal League at Syracuse, Mr. Abbot, while earnestly advocating reform of the postal laws against obscenity, and opposing and denouncing "the policy of repeal," recognized and admitted the sincerity and worthiness of the great mass of men and women who adhered to that policy, and frequently protested against the unfairness of his opponents in representing that he had declared the repealers were in favor of obscenity.

The membership of the National Liberal League has never been large, and the number of delegates has never exceeded a few dozen. It was never authorized to speak or act for the majority of Liberals, although, while it confined itself to the work of State secularization, it probably represented, so far, the views and objects of Liberals generally. Yet under no circumstance could the Liberals of the country be justly held accountable for the action of such an organization.

It is very certain that the majority of Liberals in this country, numbered by hundreds of thousands, have never, in any way, indicated their approval of the action of the League at Chicago. On the contrary, after extensive travel and observation, and with unusual opportunities to learn the views of Liberals, I am satisfied that comparatively few of them either approve the demand for the repeal of postal laws against obscenity, or take the slightest interest in the League with its present policy or under its present administration.

But, if all the Liberals of the United States were in favor of the repeal of the so-called Comstock laws, it would be no evidence whatever of "love of obscenity" on their part. These laws are of recent date; and their constitutionality and wisdom are a subject of discussion among intelligent and honest men, irrespective of their religious views. Common fairness, therefore, demands the admission that those generally who ask for the repeal of these laws have no sympathy whatever with obscenity, and rely on other agencies for its suppression.

In view of these facts, is it not pretty small business for Scribner's Monthly, which circulates largely among the class it insults, to make the action of the Liberal League regarding certain postal laws grounds for charging "the majority of Liberals with the love of obscenity"?

It is true that, during the controversy in regard to postal laws, men and women who had manifested no interest in the National Liberal League or its work showed great eagerness to join it, solely to strengthen the repeal movement. And, to the honest adherents of repeal, it must be confessed, were added characters that are no credit to any movement. "Free-lovers," of course, sided to a man and a woman with the repealers, and helped to form new leagues and add to the membership of old ones in order to get a majority for "repeal" at the conventions. Special efforts were used to have all the Leagues in favor of repeal represented at the annual meetings. After the Syracuse Convention, about the only active Leagues were of this character, those not approving the administration of the National Liberal League not caring generally to be represented at all. So it is not strange that the "free-love" element increased, and was strong enough, after the adoption of resolutions at Chicago in favor of repeal, and when Colonel Ingersoll had resigned, to elect in his place a woman who had been in no way identified with the organization or its legitimate work, but who was the most notorious apostle of "free-love" in the West. The very ascendancy of this element had driven from the organization, or kept from joining it, those Liberals whose absence from the Chicago Convention left it wholly under the leadership and control of the repealers. The "majority of Liberals" were not present; and the few opponents of "repeal" who attended, hoping they would be able to dissuade the Convention from a policy that would leave the League a wreck, were doomed to disappointment.

It was in view of these facts, if I mistake not, that Mr. Abbot wrote, as quoted in Scribner's:—

"By a year of such unscrupulous falsification as we never saw equalled, and such as can be appreciated only by those who have waded through it, the vicious and sensual type of Liberalism contrived most absurdly to identify itself in myriad credulous minds with the love of liberty, the higher type of Liberalism remained apathetic and indifferent to clear and repeated warnings, and the consequence was that the National Liberal League, with all its splendid possibilities of service to the liberal cause, was suffered to fall into the hands of the free-love ring by the mere abstention of those who ought to have been present."

Mr. Abbot lacked experience with organizations, and had expected too much from the organization of which he was the chief founder. Doubtless, he had a right, on high moral grounds, to expect the cooperation of Liberals who sympathized with him after the Syracuse Convention; but when so few were interested enough in the Liberal League to join it ere fanaticism or folly could be charged against it, when it received but little encouragement from prominent Liberals or from the mass of Liberals before the controversy in regard to postal laws occurred, when liberal thinkers of reputation, like Draper, Fiske, and Youmans, stood aloof from it, when prominent "Free Religionists" like Higginson remained indifferent to it, or declared it unnecessary or its methods unwise, even from its inception, it is not strange that Liberals generally did not come to its vindication and support after the League had passed from the control of its founders, and the object for which it was formed had been subordinated to a demand for the repeal of postal laws against obscenity.

I admit with sadness that I know something of the "unscrupulous falsification" of which Mr. Abbot speaks. I was a victim of it hardly less than himself. The severity of his language when applied to certain individuals is not undeserved. But personal wrongs must not color our judgment, nor allow us to misjudge honest men and women because of the acts of unworthy men acting with them. I know that the majority of the people still adhering to the National Liberal League, with their President, Mr. Wright, are worthy people, many of them regretting the action of the Chicago Convention; and, if in favor of repeal of the Comstock laws, they are actuated and influenced by love of justice and liberty, and not "love of obscenity." The characters in the Liberal League the most open to criticism, as is not unfrequently the case, are certain persons who have been the most eager to identify themselves publicly with the organization; while the mass of members, neither seeking notoriety nor having ulterior purposes in view, are honest, worthy people. I say this in simple justice to the majority of men and women composing the League, with many of whom I am personally acquainted. And the great mass of Liberals, in no way represented by this organization or responsible for its policy or its quarrels, have as little "love of obscenity" as has the editor of Scribner's Monthly, by whom they are so outrageously misrepresented and slandered.

THE oration of Wendell Phillips before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Cambridge, as we meant to say last week, was in every way worthy of the orator and the occasion. We have heard Mr. Phillips many times during the last thirty years; but, barring some deterioration in the silvery tones of his voice, we never heard him when his great qualities as an orator more impressed us than in this last address. In the terseness and strength of his sentences, in rhetorical grace and finish, in the aptness of his illustrations, and in the logical elaboration of his thought, he excelled himself. His main proposition was that human progress is effected more by the common-sense and the healthy moral sentiment of the mass of the people than by book-learning; and his main purpose was to defend the fundamental principle of American government, which is trust of the people, against the growing distrust of democracy on the part of the scholarly and cultivated classes. A part of his oration, his defence of the struggling Nihilists in Russia, has been severely criticised, especially since the attempted assassination of President Garfield. But Mr. Phillips distinctly said that in this country the opportunity for free speech and a free press made the methods of the Nihilists not only irrational, but criminal; that it was only the unyielding severity of Russian despotism that could excuse them. And, at the most, this was but a subordinate point of an oration of an hour and a half, which bristled with points from beginning to end. It is fifty years since Mr. Phillips graduated from Harvard, and this is the first time in his long career as an orator, standing among the few foremost in the country and in the world, that Harvard has honored itself by inviting him to speak at any of her celebrations.

THE Concord School of Philosophy opened on Monday, July 11, at the Hillside Chapel, at 9 A.M., with an address of welcome from Mr. Alcott, followed by a poem from Mr. Edmund C. Stedman. The school will continue five weeks, with eleven lectures each week at 9 A.M. and 7.30 P.M., Saturday evening excepted. An unusually large attendance is anticipated this year.

THE PROGRAMME.

The entire programme is as follows:—

First Week.

Monday, July 11, Mr. Alcott (Address of Welcome); Poem, by Edmund C. Stedman; Lecture, by Prof. Harris.

July 12: Prof. Harris.

July 13: Dr. Jones and Prof. Harris.

July 14: Mrs. Cheney and Mr. Alcott.

July 15: Dr. Jones and Prof. Harris.

July 16: Mrs. Howe.

Second Week.

July 18: Mr. S. H. Emery, Jr., and Mr. Alcott.

July 19: Dr. Jones and Mr. Blake.

July 20: Dr. Jones and S. H. Emery, Jr.

July 21: Dr. Kidney and Mr. Albee.

July 22: Dr. Jones and Mr. Albee.

July 23: Dr. Bartol.

Third Week.

July 25: Mr. Snider and Prof. Harris.

July 26: Dr. Kidney and Mr. Snider.

July 27: Dr. Jones and Prof. Harris.

July 28: Mr. Alcott and Mr. Snider.

July 29: Dr. Jones and Mr. Snider.

July 30: Dr. Kidney.

Fourth Week.

Aug. 1: Dr. Jones and Mr. Snider.

Aug. 2: Dr. Hedge and Mr. Cabot.

Aug. 3: Prof. Watson and Prof. Harris.

Aug. 4: Mr. Alcott and Dr. Mears.

Aug. 5: Prof. G. S. Morris and Mrs. Howe.

Aug. 6: President Porter. "The Kant Centennial."

Fifth Week.

Aug. 8: Prof. Harris and Mr. Sanborn.

Aug. 9: Dr. Mulford and Mr. Sanborn.

Aug. 10: Dr. Jones and Prof. Harris.

Aug. 11: Mr. Alcott and Mr. Sanborn.

Aug. 12: Dr. Jones and Prof. Harris.

Aug. 13: Miss Peabody and Mr. Alcott.

THE following comes to us from a perfectly trustworthy source: About a year ago, a lady in this city at the South End received a call from a well-dressed man who desired lodgings. He stated that he was a lawyer occupying a room in the Studio Building on Tremont Street, and, as a voucher of his respectability, announced his connection with

Dr. Withrow's society at Park Street Church. The lady rather precipitately consented to let the room to him, which he was to take possession of at nine o'clock that evening. A lady friend, happening in just after tea, was informed of the step taken, and immediately warned her of possible danger. So a gentleman from an adjoining house was called to their assistance,—he going down at once to the Studio Building, where the janitor informed him that such a party had some time previously occupied a room there, but they had been compelled to change the lock on the door to prevent his return, for he would neither give up the room nor pay the rent. The neighbor hurried back to Mrs. — with this intelligence, and the inmates watched from darkened windows till the hour appointed, when the applicant made his appearance at the front door, and rang for admission. The inmates made no sign of life, and after repeated ringing he departed. It was noticed that he had a small box under his arm, and every time he approached nearer to the door (as he strolled off occasionally between the pulls at the door-bell) a sensible odor of chloroform came through the closed blinds to the watchers within. The card of this stranger was retained, and now proves to be the Washington assassin, Charles Guiteau.

THE revised edition of the New Testament does not carry everything before it quite as effectually as was expected, or at least desired. The American Bible Society withholds its endorsement, it is reported, preferring to wait for still another revision by American scholars.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD is to have editorial charge of the Index for two months, while we take a vacation, beginning the last week of July.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

IT is maintained that it is a more difficult task to reclaim women who have fallen in the path of rectitude and virtue than men. The Massachusetts Home for Intemperate Women nevertheless presents a good report for the second year of its labors. Of the two hundred and forty inmates of the home, there were women of all ages, from seventeen to sixty-five, and of a diversity of occupations. The results of the year's work are shown in the following table:—

Sent to situations procured for them	103
Cared for by friends	77
Returned to their homes	28
Sent to hospitals and asylums	12
Discharged as hopeless cases	9
Number of inmates, March 15, 1881	20

Total

This has been accomplished by an expenditure of $3,387.61, of which less than a half was derived from donations, the remainder having been received for labor performed by, and board furnished to, the inmates.

THE importance of proper drainage and plumbing in our dwelling-houses, and in fact in all buildings, cannot be over-estimated. The frequent occurrence of disease from imperfection in this particular is well attested. Too often such work is entrusted to incompetent and insufficiently trained persons in respect to this art. It is hence gratifying to notice that more stringent regulations in reference to the plumber's craft are coming into effect in some parts of the country. By a recent act of the legislature of New York, all plumbers in that city and Brooklyn are required to be registered and "published in the City Record at least once a year." The law prescribes that "the drainage and plumbing of all buildings, both public and private, hereafter erected in the city of New York, or in the city of Brooklyn, shall be executed in accordance with plans previously approved in writing by the board of health of the said health department. Suitable drawings and description of the said plumbing and drainage shall in each case be submitted, and placed on file in the health department."

THERE are obvious symptoms of the appearance of small-pox on the other side of the Atlantic, as well as on this. In some parts of London the contagion has of late been quite prevalent; and, as a consequence, fresh discussion has been excited in respect to the efficacy of the usual mode of protection from the disease. Dr. Buchanan, the medical officer of the Government Board of London, contributes some important data bearing upon this point. He cites statistics, kept at the Registrar-General's office, to show the relative mortality among vaccinated and unvaccinated persons. From these it appears that the deaths from small-pox last year among the unvaccinated were at the rate of 3,350 persons for each million living, and that among the vaccinated the rate was only 90 persons in the living million. Among the young the rate is even more striking. It was 61 per million among the vaccinated, and 4,520 per million among the unvaccinated. Among infants it was 40.5 per million among the vaccinated, and 5,950 per million among the unvaccinated. Thus it will be seen that the mortality is at its highest among unvaccinated infants. Dr. Buchanan freely admits that vaccination is not absolute protection against small-pox; but he claims to demonstrate that the vaccinated are much less liable to die of small-pox than the unvaccinated. He says to the mother with her infant in her arms, that 116 unvaccinated babies attacked with small-pox die for every 1 that is vaccinated. Still, in the face of these figures, anti-vaccination societies exist in England, and count a considerable number of sympathizers in this country, who are inflexible and persistent in their opposition to what is designated Jenner's "great discovery."

THE subject of parasites in meats, and especially the species known as trichinae, which has acquired so much celebrity of late years, is one of universal public concern. For whatever may be due to exaggeration, as to the occasion for alarm, and whatever to motives of commercial selfishness, as instanced across the water, there is no doubt that the danger is much more than a product of the imagination. The agitation pertaining to it has been mainly confined to the West, or the demonstrations of the existence of the dreaded little creature and its effects; but, as the meats in our markets or those consumed in the East largely come from the West, we naturally take our share in the risk of the general public as to this kind of food. Dr. Leidy, an eminent scientist of Philadelphia, has communicated to the Lodger of that city the results of the attention which he has directed to the subject. This is some of his testimony in regard to it:—

Let all meats be properly cooked, and all danger of parasitic infection is removed. The writer is uncertain how far salting and smoking meats will secure us complete exemption from parasites, though in all instances in which he has had an opportunity of examining meats prepared in this way, and containing parasites, they were always dead.

DR. LEIDY in his letter touches also upon another unpleasant matter of kindred interest, and not so easily dealt with as the one just mentioned. Again we let him speak for himself:—

In conclusion, the writer may refer to another probably serious source of disease, and this is the dust of our cities. When we reflect that this is the dried and pulverized dirt and filth of our streets, derived from all kinds of refuse matter, its dangerous qualities may be suspected, if they are not clearly obvious. Conveyed by the winds, it is diffused everywhere, and settles upon or adheres to everything. We inhale it, drink it, and eat it with our food. A speck of mud on our bread excites disgust; but who minds the same thing when it is nothing but a little dust? If our food, just brought from market or the provision store, is examined with the microscope, it is found to teem with particles of dust, consisting of fine sand, bits of hay, straw, filaments of cotton from old paper and rags, wood fibres, hair and scurf scales of man and beast, starch grains, spores, etc. Recent investigations render it probable that dust contains the germs of decomposition, gangrene, and contagious diseases. While our view of the dangerous qualities of dust may be exaggerated, there is certainly sufficient reason to regard it with apprehension and make it desirable to avoid it. Its subtle and all-pervading character renders this to a great extent impossible; but it may be much reduced by the removal of its sources of supply,—the accumulation of dirt and filth. For this purpose, the streets should be kept clean by sweeping and washing, and to facilitate this they should be as smoothly paved as will be consistent with safe walking and driving. Especially is this desirable in the vicinity of the depots of our provisions, the market-houses, where, unfortunately, we often observe the greatest accumulation of dirt. The streets around our markets should have an asphaltum or other smooth pavement, and should be swept and washed weekly or oftener.

Unfortunately, the public in this last case is at the mercy of street contractors and city politics, not to mention the responsibility of market-men and hucksters themselves. But we can do something in the way of getting people to think about these causes for serious consideration, and prepared to efficiently act, sooner or later, with reference to them.

ADDITIONAL TESTIMONY ON VIVISECTION.

Mr. Editor:—

You gave us lately the opinion of Mr. Darwin to the effect that the amount of suffering inflicted by vivisection was not positively great, and not, all things considered, of consequence enough to bar the continuance and increase of the practice. Approving your idea of presenting both sides of that subject to public notice, I will make a brief abstract of the substance of a recently published Italian volume, in which Prof. Mantegazza narrates his own proceedings under the title of A Year of a Vivisectioner's Life.

This year was spent in the elaborate production of pain upon animals for the purpose of solving certain scientific questions, among which were the influence of pain on animal heat, on the chemical constitution of the breath, and on the action of the heart. The pains thus inflicted were classified under four heads,—namely, moderate, severe, atrocious, and most atrocious,—and were produced by cutting, pinching, crushing, burning, nailing the feet of the victims to the table, and “larding” or passing skewers through the most sensitive parts of the guinea-pigs, rabbits, fowls, doves, etc., which were his subjects. To gain more accurate results, these experiments were tried upon healthy animals and also upon sick and feeble animals, and the varying results carefully noted. For convenience in these researches, Prof. Mantegazza devised a tormenting machine, a drawing of which is given in the book, in which an animal was so fixed that successive portions of it might be crushed or lacerated at will by iron pincers with claws.

One experiment was on a guinea-pig nursing its young. Another on a dove enclosed in the machine and tormented for nearly two hours, then taken out, and after some respite put back again for another hour and fifty-five minutes, with “many nails in its feet and wings.” A rabbit, after two hours’ torture and a few minutes’ rest, has four long nails stuck into its extremities; and the professor “succeeds in producing a pain much more intense than in the second experiment.” Another rabbit was placed for six hours in the machine, and next day larded with nails and shut in the machine for six hours more.

The professor says (p. 101), “These, my experiments, were conducted with much delight and extreme patience for the space of a year.” His concluding chapter (38th) is devoted to ridicule of the “Arcadian poesy” of “tenderness for animals,” and a scornful rebuke to those who have written against vivisection. (p. 436.)

These details are but a few of those given in The Zoöphilist (Friend of Animals), an English publication, in which Prof. Mantegazza’s book is elaborately reviewed. Two things should be kept in mind in judging of them: first, that the cruelties here recorded are not conceived and executed by a brutal nature, unsoftened by instruction, but by a person of the highest culture intellectually, as well as elegant and refined; next, that, as this person is a popular lecturer and teacher, recommending that his pupils practise experiments like his own, the barbarities noted in his book are probably only a tithe of those committed by others through his precept and example. It does not appear that the fragments of scientific knowledge obtained in this way have very much practical value; but if, for the sake of argument, we suppose that value to be great, it must be far more than counterbalanced by the depravation of moral character wrought, year after year, in the classes of young men who copy such a teacher. Science is too dearly bought by the systematic transformation of its votaries from human into inhuman beings.

An Explanation.

MR. POTTER: Dear Sir,—If you publish my address before the Free Religious Convention (I suppose it was reported), I wish you would do me the favor to publish at the same time or earlier, if it suits you as well, this letter, in which, as a duty to your Convention and in justice to myself, I want to state the reasons for my appearance on the negative of the question advertised as the subject for “discussion” in the afternoon.

It had been intimated to me that there would be an effort made to adopt some statement of faith, or “views” of some sort, by which Free Religionists should hereafter be known. In support of this intimation, I possessed the knowledge that one of the principal speakers for the Convention had recently delivered a public address on “The Radical Church,” in which such an “article of faith” was offered, and an attempt was made, a few days later, to have it adopted by the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston (Theodore Parker’s old society). I knew also that the Index had been discussing the matter recently, and had offered something as basis of union for local societies. I knew also that Free Religion had been organized for fourteen years as an association; and to add organization to religious organization seemed suggestive, in itself, of “close communion.” It was suggested to me that the probabilities were that the “conservative” voice would be quite prominent in the afternoon, and that the radical side of the question should be presented. Add to this the fact that the question as stated conveyed the idea that some definite form of religious organization was intended, and you may understand why I conceived the question to mean, “Will Free Religious Societies adopt a form of organization that shall pledge their members to a mode of faith?”

It was with precisely this conception of the question that I prepared my address. Had I been the last speaker instead of the third, I would have withheld several statements that I made in developing my argument, and certainly should have been obliged to admit that I had misconceived the intention of the managers of the Convention. If they wanted an article of faith, they certainly did not say so there. But I knew that the most persuasive voice was saved for the last, and that it was very potent on the “article of faith”; and I supposed it would make its desire on this matter known and felt when its turn came. So I felt it my duty to oppose any such tendency in the Convention, and thus advocated the negative. In the end, I found that all that was intended was to advocate the formation of auxiliary Free Religious Associations. Against such a movement, I should have said nothing, but, on the contrary, would have spoken in favor of it; and I actually prepared an address on that very subject over a year ago. The misunderstanding of the question threw me into an attitude of antagonization, when, if the question had been stated so as to convey the idea that the managers wanted to consider the wisdom of attempting to establish auxiliary associations (which was precisely the question which was discussed by the principal speakers, both of whom were members of the board of directors, and so must be supposed to know just what was intended by the question, “Will Free Religion organize?”), I should have urged it most heartily with them. If it will show the importance of making questions clear and definite, my part in the discussion will have a constructive side to it yet, which will be of some value on future occasions.

I think it highly important that auxiliary associations should be formed, and that such sort of organization cannot be urged too vigorously. At the same time, it should be done wisely. With this thought in view, I want to say that I think the speakers who represented the West as ripe for organization have been misled in their judgment. It would be fatal for Free Religion not to learn a great deal of wisdom from the brief history of the Liberal League. Its purpose and spirit were equally high with that of Free Religion; but it went to pieces in the very first storm it encountered. Why? Because the people did not understand either their own duty or the meaning of the Liberal League. They understand Free Religion as little as they did the League: they will fail equally to support it in the hour of trial. Hence, it was that I advocated, as the all-important work of Free Religion, the holding of public conventions and the circulation of Free Religious literature, for the purpose of making people acquainted with the meaning, the place, and the purpose of Free Religion. When once the world understands the true condition of society, in the dissolution of theological power and guidance, the dangers to which it is exposed in drifting away from the old moorings and out to sea of uncertainty, and understands also the Messianic character of Free Religion, it will implore the latter to come and save. “Moral Interregnum” is already come. The well-balanced and well-to-do man or woman who finds mental repose in Free Religion and supposes that the world is as well-off as they, is blind,—and not only blind, but false to his or her day and duty. The world is actually without a moral guide to-day. It must inevitably suffer deterioration until the guide of the future comes to place. Free Religion can only become that guide by advancing boldly to the front and taking its stand on Scientific Knowledge and in the “Scientific Method.” Then make the people understand it; and auxiliary associations will come into being and place of themselves, and they will come to stay, and, when the storm of filth and fraud rises against them, they will not fall. The first need is money. Let the managers of the Free Religious movement have money, and there can be no question of the success of the work. Without that, it can only drag its slow length along the field of hope, and see the world drift further and further away from social purity. Sometimes a cause needs measures, sometimes it needs men more than measures. Free Religion needs money more than either.

CHARLES ELLIS.

[Since the question, “Will Free Religion Organize?” was so greatly misunderstood by Mr. Ellis, one of the invited speakers upon it, the Secretary of the Association, who framed the question, must confess that it could not have been stated so clearly as it ought to have been. The question of adopting any common statement of views, any article or articles of faith, had never been raised in the Association, and could not be raised without direct contradiction of the Constitution. The thought therefore did not occur that such an interpretation of the topic were possible. For two years or more the question has been before the Conventions of the Association, and before the Executive Committee, of adopting, without any change of the Constitution either in form or spirit, some more extended and systematic methods of organization for making the work of the Free Religious Association both nationally and locally more effective. And this is the question which it was assumed would be understood as presented for consideration at this Convention. Underneath it is the more general inquiry whether Free Religion will be likely to produce any institutions among rational religious thinkers, not like, but in any way corresponding to, the outgrown "church." But the question as stated, it is now evident, was open to other interpretation by those not immediately conversant with the proceedings of the Association. We may add that the Index, so far as its editor is concerned, has offered nothing as a "basis of union for local societies," except the expression of a purpose,—and this only by way of suggestion.—Ed.]

ANOTHER REPLY TO MR. NEVILLE.

While it is unquestionably true that our liberal papers should be conducted solely and clearly in the interests of the highest and noblest morality, and with that elevation of tone and sentiment always characteristic of a first-class family newspaper, and while the adverse criticism of some of the liberal journalism of the day, by an able and interesting correspondent of the Index, may not be wholly undeserved, it seems to me also a matter of great importance that the campaign now in progress, as never before, against priestcraft, bibliolatry, and superstition generally, and in behalf of reason, justice, and humanity, should be, as I am happy to know it is, prosecuted vigorously and uncompromisingly by our Materialistic, Free Religious, and Spiritualist editors. Upon just this point, I think, the correspondent referred to needs criticism. No great reform has ever been accomplished except by sturdy blows at superstition and the most unsparing denunciations of hoary-headed and popularly cherished errors. The only criticism I have to make on Mr. Neville's communication, if I may be allowed (and it will apply as well, perhaps, to some previous communications of his), is that his idea and method of theological reform are too conservative; they lack that iconoclastic spirit which has proved itself so advantageous and beneficial in the anti-slavery, temperance, and woman's rights movements. We read that, in the olden time when the Jews were rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, "every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded." While building, they were in constant danger from the common enemy, hence the necessity of being provided with destructive as well as constructive implements. And so it has ever been in the history of the world's progress. We frequently hear, among liberals, expressions of disapproval of the methods of Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll of our own time. But have either or all of these men together excelled old Martin Luther in his righteous indignation, and harsh and bitter denunciation against the cruel and ruinous sway of popes and priests? Had the great and grand Protestant Reformation been left to the care of Erasmus the Conservative, where would Protestantism have been to-day? Would anything bearing the slightest semblance to Free Religion be now known among men?

Very respectfully, W. C. BOWEN.

BROOKLYN, June 27, 1881.

OUR AUSTRALIAN FRIENDS.

Dear Editor:—

"The Voice from Australia" has the pleasure to tell you that the seed of the Index sown by you in Sydney has germinated, developed, and brought forth fruit in the shape of five subscriptions of twenty shillings each for the paper, for which I send you five pounds sterling.

The subscribers wished the subscription to begin with the new era of the Index, in response to Mr. Abbot, and to strengthen your onerous position; but please arrange date of their subscription to meet your own business convenience.

Please acknowledge receipt by return post, stating names, and oblige your well-wisher, B. R.
SYDNEY, N. S. WALES, May 18, 1881.

REV. JOHN JASPER, the negro preacher at Richmond, Va., who was made famous by his sermon on "De Sun do Move," is dying. His congregation of four thousand people was the largest in the South.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

BREATH OF THE FIELD AND SHORE. By Louisa Parsons Hopkins, author of Motherhood. Boston: Lee & Shepard, publishers. New York: Charles T. Dillingham. 1881.

The author of Motherhood has found her audience; and, though the peculiarly tender beauty and strength of that unique poem may not be found in this miscellaneous collection of verses, it is a collection that will be read by readers of the former volume with genuine interest and delight. There is the same poetic insight into the common facts of life and nature. The song may not always sing itself so spontaneously as it did there; the utterance may occasionally seem to labor or to droop toward prose; but, in general, the poetic expression is well sustained, and the thought is always high and ennobling. The poem that has most interested us is the longest and perhaps the most ambitious in the volume,—the one entitled "Persephone." It is an attempt to read the universe philosophically as well as poetically. But some of the shorter poems have more of real poetic grace and fire, and will be greater favorites with the generality of readers. It will be a pleasant little book to take to seaside or mountain.

THE Popular Science Monthly for July is full of solid articles of quite uniform excellence. The opening paper by E. B. Tylor, entitled "The Races of Mankind," is a very valuable discussion in regard to the influences that have contributed to such distinctions, by one who has acquired eminent reputation through his anthropological studies. N. H. Egleston gives an interesting account of "European Schools of Forestry." Alexander Graham Bell continues the report of the results of his experiments in relation to the "Production of Sound by Radiant Energy." Dr. Oswald has a paper on "Sleep" in his valuable series on "Physical Education." Other continued articles are "The Development of Political Institutions: VIII., Consultative Bodies," by Herbert Spencer; and "On Fruits and Seeds," by Sir John Lubbock; "How to Prevent Drowning" is adapted particularly to the season, and has excited considerable comment on account of the importance of the subject and the novelty of its suggestions. In addition to these papers, not less worthy of mention, perhaps, are "Recent Advances in the Law of Intellectual Property," by Benjamin Vaughan Abbot; "Improvements in Electric Lighting," by W. H. Pierce; "Degeneration," by Andrew Wilson; "The Phenomena of Death," by Thomas S. Spencer, M.D.; "Union of Telegraph and Postal Service," by A. B. Huet; a "Sketch of Dr. Charles T. Jackson," and the rich and varied miscellany at the close of the number.

THE North American Review for July opens with an able article on "Present Aspects of the Indian Problem," from the pen of Carl Schurz. Whatever may be thought of the attitude of this distinguished statesman concerning the Poncas, none will deny that his general study of the Indian question has a special value. Speaking from deep conviction as well as in the light of practical experience, Mr. Schurz regards full citizenship as the terminal rather than the initial point of Indian development. In order to fit the red men for ultimate absorption into the body politic, he recommends: first, that they be taught to work by making work profitable and attractive to them; second, that they be educated, especially the youth of both sexes; and, third, that they be individualized in the possession of property. It hardly need be said that this article is a valuable contribution toward the solution of one of the most difficult of problems.

This number also contains a readable essay on the "Religious Conflicts of the Age," by a Yankee Farmer; a vigorous chapter from James Parton on "The Power of Public Plunder"; "The Common-sense of Taxation," by Henry George; "The Cost of Cruelty," by Henry Bergh; and "A Study of Tennyson," by R. H. Stoddard.

WIDE AWAKE for July is exquisitely adapted to the midsummer month. The frontispiece is a thoroughly artistic piece of drawing, and is full of suggestion of sea-shore recreations and out-door scenes at this season. "The Academy Boat Race" and the children's operetta of "Dragon-fly Day," also very timely, inter-perse the instalments of continued stories, and the array of quaint and finely executed pictures and varied illustrated sketches and gems of delicate poetic fancy in which the number abounds. Surely the boys and girls who have the reading of Wide Awake have good reason to count themselves among the favored.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE Ashantees have sent as a present to Queen Victoria a gold axe.

MRS. J. W. MACKAY intends to purchase one of the French crown jewels and present it to the Pope.

COLONEL INGERSOLL has become part owner of the Ivanhoe gold and silver mine, a big bonanza in the Black Range (N.M.) district.

NEW details from the life of the poet Heine have made their appearance in a memoir just issued in Paris from the hand of his niece, Princess Della Rocca.

COUNT BAWOROWSKI has left his fortune of two million guildens (about $1,000,000) to the Austrian province of Galicia, for scientific articles and philanthropic purposes.

AN unknown man who was one day last week pouring forth a volley of abusive language against President Garfield, in a Chicago reading-room, was knocked down by another stranger, who proved to be an ex-confederate soldier who served under Stonewall Jackson.

HASTINGS HUGHES, brother of "Tom" Hughes, denies the recent letters from Rugby, Tenn., that the colony is a failure. Although many difficulties have been encountered, the prospects of ultimate success are very encouraging. The soil is good, and many Americans are taking up land.

SENATOR HOAR's advice to the graduates of the Yale Law School brought to the front such sentiments of honorable and generous dealing that, if possible of application to the present state of legal administration, would bring about a sort of judicial millennium. Verily, the modern jurist would fail to recognize himself in the old mirror of Scribes, Pharisees, and doctors of the law.

REV. EDWARD COWLEY, an Episcopal clergyman who was convicted by a secular court of gross ill-treatment of children in his asylum, has been acquitted by an ecclesiastic court in New York city, and retains his clerical standing. The halo of apostolic succession, so dear to the Episcopal heart, probably sheds a confusing glamour over details that are clearly guilty in the eyes of the unanointed.

At the Teachers' Association meeting at Saratoga, Principal Thurber, of Boston, discussed the recent newspaper criticisms on public schools. The tendency of education, he said, is not to create a distaste for work. It is not the business of schools solely to fit boys and girls to earn a living. Parents who are able should pay for tuition of their children, and those not able to pay should be compelled to send their children to school a certain part of each year.

It is stated in reference to M. Littré's supposed death-bed conversion, that all liberal companionship was excluded from his dwelling, and that one exceptionally intelligent and amiable nun of the Sisters of Charity who were called in attendance won very high regard from him. His experience during his whole life had been such as to foster veneration for noble feminine character; and it is implied that this nun's influence, together with that of the learned and modern, spirited Abbe Huvelin, might have wrought upon his judgment in the closing portion of his life.

REV. R. R. SHIPPEN, late Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and lately installed as pastor of the Unitarian Society in Washington, writes thus to a friend in Boston of a recent very close though casual acquaintance with the assassin Guiteau: "This man Guiteau, who shot the President, has slept next room to me and sat by my side at table for a month, and up to last Friday. He is no more insane than I am. He is level-headed, and knows what he is doing. I never suspected him as a villain. When we talked of politics, he was a Conkling man, but never talked harshly of the President."

In a lengthy notice of Theodor Benfey, the eminent philologist of Göttingen, just deceased, the Boston Advertiser speaks of him as "an ornament of oriental philology in almost all its departments. And oriental philology, though among the latest of learned pursuits, has already produced enough to affect modern poetry, liberal religion, and even the instruction given in our secondary schools. For mythology is no longer taught as it was twenty years ago, and even the grammatical study of Latin and Greek is being changed on the ground of oriental research. Perhaps the greatest of all changes effected by the philology of the Indo-European family is that of etymology, which rests now altogether on the rational though extremely laborious method of verified history. It is strictly within the facts to say that Buddhism excites interest now among all students of religion, and that our views of law and institutions are receiving a new foundation since oriental philology has unfolded the life, the literature, and the history of the Aryan family. This research was begun by Englishmen, especially Sir William Jones; it was continued and refined by Germans; it is now conducted in all civilized countries,—in St. Petersburg no less than in New Haven and Melbourne; and books like Holmes's on the Common Law, Stubbs's Constitutional History, and Maine's Institutions, could not have been written but for the great philologists who studied Sanskrit. The founders of this school are men like Jones, Colebrooke, Wilson, and after them Humboldt, Grimm, Savigny. The second generation is represented by such names as Max Müller, W. D. Whitney, A. Röntlingk, T. Benfey. Nor have these mighty scholars been without issue. The third generation of oriental scholars now coming to the front is working with a refinement not known to the fathers. Hence it is that the decease of scholars like Benfey excites no feelings of unrelieved sorrow. They have done great work, and they hand it down to worthy successors. And America has now entered the field with blushing hopes."

FOREIGN.

THE International Socialist Congress, which was to have been held at Zurich, in September next, has been prohibited by the authorities of that city.

A HOTEL is to be built close to the Observatory on Vesuvius, furnished with every comfort, and affording the means of breathing cool and pure mountain air to persons tired and weak with the summer heat of the city.

THE Russian Socialist Mokriewitch has succeeded in escaping from penal servitude in Siberia, and reaching Switzerland. There is only one other instance on record of a political prisoner making good his escape from Siberia.

RUSSIA.—Intelligence received from St. Petersburg states that M. Pobedonosstzeff, Procurator of the Holy Synod, has received a threatening letter warning him not to continue what is described as his jesuitical advice to the Emperor, whereby His Majesty is induced to revert to the policy of Ivan the Terrible and Nicholas the Tyrant. The letter further declares that, should the knout be reintroduced in Russia, M. Pobedonosstzeff shall himself be knouted to death.

THE Golos publishes intelligence from Saratoff, stating that large numbers of peasants from the interior are emigrating to Siberia, principally to the Government of Tomsk, with the view of obtaining more and better land than at home. It is added that the ferry on the Volga is scarcely able to transport the continually arriving caravans of the half-naked peasants and lean horses. No cows, and not even dogs, accompany these peasants, who are unable to gain a living at home, and migrate without assistance or guidance, on the mere chance of bettering their condition.

MR. H. SMITH, the representative of the British Secular Union in Liverpool, writes: "A religious census has been undertaken in Liverpool, which, for various reasons, it is expected will not be published. I was informed by the curate of a newly-formed parish here that the deeper he got into his work the more people he found who denied having connection with any religious sect. I have been informed by one news-agent here that, in consequence of the recent anti-Atheistic meeting at Hope Hall, there has been a tremendous increase in the demand for secular literature in Liverpool."—Secular Review.

ITALY.—The Chamber of Deputies, on Tuesday, June 14, continued the discussion of the Electoral Reform Bill. The motion of the extreme Left that all Italians, including those who are not actually Italian subjects, should have the right of voting, was rejected by 314 votes to 32. On Wednesday, the amendment of Signor Crispi, proposing to give the right of voting to all persons who can read and write, was rejected by 220 to 154. In opposition to the proposal of the government that the franchise should be granted to all who paid taxes to the amount of twenty lire, and could read and write, Signori Morana and Butret moved to substitute ten for twenty lire. The government, however, declared the point a vital one, on which they were determined to stand or fall, and the Chamber rejected the amendment by 212 votes to 173. All the other important votes were also given in favor of the ministry.—Lloyd's Weekly.

FLOGGING is better for juvenile offenders than imprisonment, under conditions likely to make them criminals for life; but it is not such a panacea as Mr. Sheil, of the Hammersmith police court, seems to think. Two little boys were before him on Saturday, one charged with breaking into a school, the other with drinking some milk out of a can left on a hall-door. In each case the young culprit, for similar offences, had been flogged at home to the parents' full satisfaction, but without any of the ennobling effect which, in the opinion of Mr. Sheil and other moralists, such treatment ought to have. Therefore, each was flogged again by order of the magistrate. It is certainly a pity that, under existing arrangements, such boys cannot be sent to proper reformatories. That ought to be done, and the parents, who are really responsible for their children's misdeeds, ought to be made to pay for their maintenance.—Weekly Dispatch, June 12.

THE allegations in regard to the conduct of English officials in Japan, in a recent article in the Atlantic Monthly, entitled "The Martyrdom of an Empire," by E. H. House, having been called in question by the Pall Mall Gazette, the author takes occasion to reassert them with more explicitness in the journal just mentioned. At the close of his communication he says: "I am ready to supply further details at any moment, if called upon; but I do not care to prolong a series of painful recitals, if the desired end can be accomplished more briefly. What the desired end is appears to me quite plain. It is an investigation of such searching character as shall definitely determine the question whether the true interests of England are safe in such guardianship as that which has controlled them in Japan during the past twenty-five years; whether, indeed, it is judicious to allow the hatred engendered by such treatment as the Japanese rulers have endured to increase and intensify until a restoration of genuine friendliness shall be impossible for generations to come."

JESTINGS.

THEY were speaking of a miser, just deceased. "Did he leave anything?" asked Smith. "He had to," was the laconic answer of Fogg.

A PROFESSIONAL beggar-boy some ten years of age, ignorant of the art of reading, bought a card to put on his breast, and appeared in the public streets as a "Poor widow with eight small children."

A YOUNG officer thought to puzzle the editor of Le Figaro by asking him, when two men of equal age and rank met, which should be the first to bow. The editor calmly replied, "The more polite of the two."

"THE old version is good enough for me," remarked Mrs. Brown, sententiously. They had been speaking of the New Testament. "Yes," replied her visitor, casting her eyes at the well-preserved copy at her elbow: "it makes just as good a table ornament."—Boston Transcript.

A WITTY New York society woman was standing with a friend before Zola's greatly admired picture of Lot and his daughters, which was on exhibition in an art store on Fifth Avenue. "Oh!" remarked the friend, dolorously, "what do you suppose Lot thought, when he beheld his poor wife turned to a pillar of salt?" "I suppose," replied our wit, with admirable gravity, "he thought how he could get himself—a fresh one."

"HAVE you enjoyed our strawberry festival, boys?" "Oh! yes, sir." "Then," asked the teacher, seeking to append a moral, "if you had slipped into my garden and picked those strawberries without my leave, would they have tasted as good as now?" Every little boy in that staid and sticky company shrieked, "No, sir!" "Why not?" "Cause," said little Thomas, with the cheerfulness of conscious virtue, "then we shouldn't have had sugar and cream with 'em."

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
AT
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be published by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impenitence of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

THINK not that morality is changeable; that vices in one age are not vices in another; or that virtues, which are under the everlasting seal of right reason, may be stamped by opinion. Though vicious times invert the opinions of things, and set up new theories against virtue, yet hold thou unto old morality. And, rather than follow a multitude to do evil, stand like Pompey's pillar, conspicuous by thyself and single in thine integrity.—Thomas Fuller.

BETTER than sovereignty over the earth, better than going to heaven, better than lordship over all worlds, is the reward of the first step in holiness.—Buddha.

HUMANITY is the equity of the heart.—Confucius.

THE beloved of the Almighty are the rich who have the humility of the poor, and the poor who have the magnanimity of the rich.—Saadi.

HE that loses his conscience has nothing left that is worth keeping. Therefore be sure you look to that. And in the next place, look to your health; and if you have it, praise God, and value it next to a good conscience; for health is the second blessing that we mortals are capable of, a blessing that money cannot buy; therefore value it, and be thankful for it.—Izaak Walton.

SHALL we speak of the inspiration of a poet or a priest, and not of the heart impelled by love and self-devotion to the lowliest work in the lowliest way of life?—Charles Dickens.

IGNORANCE breeds monsters to fill up all the vacancies of the soul that are unoccupied by the verities of knowledge. He who dethrones the idea of law bids chaos welcome in its stead.—Horace Mann.

THE vending of old clothes has been a prominent occupation among the Jews,—a fact in which those who look for spiritual correspondence may perceive significance. When I hear Christian ministers apologize for slavery by the example of Abraham, defend war because the Lord commanded Samuel to hew Agag in pieces, and sustain capital punishment by the retaliatory code of Moses, it seems to me it would be appropriate to have Jewish clothes-dealers stationed at the doors of our theological schools, shouting at the top of their lungs, "Old clothes! Old clothes! Old clothes, all the way from Judea!"—Lydia Maria Child.

WHY should I wear my grandfather's hat? My head was never measured for it.—A. Bronson Alcott.

O MAN! I've not deceived thee, Wisdom cries;
My first denials end in generous light;
As winter yields to spring, hate yields to love;
Who think to stem, but raise the water's might!
Great truths, in measureless, increasing pile,
By their huge mass oft darksome shadows cast,
Before whose depth man stands with anxious heart:—
So, Providence with grandeur dims our sight;
So, sinister and holy night doth weave
Her veil of shadows with the star-depth's light.
—Victor Hugo.

THE human mind is intolerant of finalities. The best statements of one age are bettered by the next, and possess only a transitional importance. . . . As crystallizations of the highest thought of the times, systems have great value, for they constitute the chief materials for the intellectual history of the race; but taken as isolated products, their value depends on their intrinsic character. They are salutary or pernicious according as they foster or fetter the free movement of thought.—F. E. Abbot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD within the last few days has made rapid progress toward recovery. In the healing of so dangerous a wound, there is always a possibility of something untoward happening; but all the probabilities are now in favor of the President's triumph over Guiteau's villany.

DEAN STANLEY, after a sudden and brief illness, died in London on the 18th inst. The Broad Church party loses by his death, not its ablest but its most active and conspicuous leader. With scholarly gifts and accomplishments, he was yet popular in the style of his work, and has had great influence on all classes of the English Church.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY sends forth this year eighty-seven graduates, thirteen of whom were women. They average as follows: age, twenty-three years; weight, one hundred and forty-seven pounds; height, sixty-eight and three-fourths inches. Their religious sympathies are thus stated: "Presbyterians, eight; Baptists, four; Congregationalist and Episcopal, three each; Lutheran and Methodist, two each; Agnostic, Jewish, Radical, Positivist, Catholic, Friend, Fatalist, Natural, Spiritual,—give it up,—one each; Materialists, Atheists, Infidels, none."

THERE are some gratifying signs that miracles, even in Roman Catholic countries, do not thrive as well in our day as they did formerly, notwithstanding occasional instances that might lead to an opposite conclusion. It is reported that the people of the village of Gony l'Hôpital, in the northern part of France, had been for some little time beguiled by stories which a certain carpenter had put afloat, to the effect that the Blessed Virgin, in the form of a beautiful woman, had honored him with visitations. The people of the place where the wonderful event was alleged to have occurred accordingly arranged a series of demonstrations, in the form of "processions" and "illuminations" to celebrate it. But the good bishop of the diocese, much to the disappointment of all concerned, and with a rather rare inconsistency, has quite unexpectedly shown a disposition to throw cold water on the affair. He has issued a pastoral letter to his clergy, forbidding them to participate in it, and charging that it is calculated to bring religion into discredit. It would seem that he is sceptical about this particular miracle, whatever he may be in regard to miracles in general. It is probable a good many of the citizens, apart from religious considerations, would have preferred the bishop to have been either a little less honest or more superstitious.

THERE is gratifying proof that Liberalism has found its way to New South Wales, and is preparing substantially and efficiently to domesticate itself there. There have been for a number of years earnest friends of the Index in that distant portion of the globe, and the list has been extended during the past year. We are now in receipt of a little pamphlet, entitled "Rules of the Liberal Association of New South Wales." The following principles are announced as the basis on which it is formed: 1. "The universal brotherhood of Man." 2. "The inherent right of all individuals to hold, practise, and proclaim any opinions, on all subjects whatsoever, which their conscientious convictions may demand, always provided that this is done in such a manner as may induce no breach of the public peace, or interfere in any way with the like liberty of others." 3. "The duty of every individual to conserve and maintain this liberty." 4. "The supreme authority of demonstrated fact, Fidelity to Knowledge." 5. "Aspiration after the highest morality." 6. "Respect for known worth." 7. "The sanctity of truth." 8. "The emancipation of woman." 9. "The right of every one to the product of his own labor." 10. "Complete secularization of the State." We also learn from a communication which accompanies the "Rules" that the association is the first comprehensive organization of its character that has ever been attempted in Australia. It contemplates the founding of a reading-room and library for the use of its members. May all its hopes and desires for usefulness be realized.

THE following item appears in one of our religious exchanges: "The upper classes in Japan are drifting rapidly into scepticism. Every one of the six hundred young men in the University of Tokio is an atheist. The great middle class, however, is more accessible. Of the Scriptures, sixty-six thousand volumes were sold during 1880." It is not always apparent what is meant by "scepticism" when the word is used by Orthodox people. Nor has the more definite word "atheism" always possessed a uniform significance in religious history. Still it is not inconceivable that both of these words, in this instance, are intended to imply the renunciation of all religious beliefs. It is common for the human mind to pass from one extreme to another. The people of Japan, like those of all heathen, as well as Christian, countries, have been educated in superstition, and the tendency of modern scholarship everywhere is toward a loss of faith in such conceptions. The science of to-day is in direct antagonism to mythologies of every kind,—Christian and Jewish, as well as pagan. But we believe that science and scholarship are compatible with a truer religious faith, which we trust is destined to dawn on the countries of the East, as we think we see even now premonitions of it in those of the West. But we cannot expect that Orthodox propaganda, not even the circulation of the Bible in those eastern countries, will very much accelerate the advance of this truer faith. Indeed, such methods are more likely to operate as an impediment to it; to become the fruitful source of the scepticism and atheism which Orthodoxy deplures, and which we ourselves very probably should not consider the perfection of life or thinking.

AFTER FREE RELIGION, WHAT?

A Discourse delivered before the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, Boston, June 12, 1881.

BY W. M. SALTER.

Free Religion was at once an assertion of the rights of the human intellect and a craving for a deeper fellowship. As an intellectual thing, it was a pronounced assertion of some of the best tendencies of the modern world. In principle, it was anticipated by Luther with his doctrine of private judgment. Of one barrier to free intellectual development the Reformation ridded us,—the Church. But Luther had no feeling that the Jewish and Christian Scriptures were not a final authority. Freedom was to be in the interpretation of the Scriptures in a first-hand manner, even as modern science sets itself to a first-hand study of the external world, but without a question as to the truth of the Scriptures themselves. But the free spirit of the Reformation could not be held within the narrow bounds at first marked out for it, and in time dared to question the truth of the Scriptures themselves. This free attitude toward the Scriptures marks the rise of Liberal or Unitarian Christianity, with its emphasis on the rights and dignity of human reason. There might be a revelation, but there was something prior to and independent of revelation, which could judge of it, and was nowise to be overawed into submission to it. But Unitarianism, while it questioned the old view of the infallible authority of the Bible, did not question such authority in Jesus; and, in the same naïve and unhesitating way in which Luther rested on the Scriptures, it rested upon the teaching and personality of Jesus as something especially divine. But it was inevitable that this last resting-place should be estimated, according to its worth, by human reason; that Jesus, once brought face to face with us as an historical person, should be seen and judged as freely as the Church is judged by Protestants generally, or the Scriptures by Liberal Christians. Once seen thus, as he actually was, with the helps that modern historical criticism puts in our way, seen not only as a man, but as a man with many of the limitations of his time, with beliefs that to our minds are indistinguishable from superstition, with even erroneous estimations as to his own place in the drama of the world's history, with some even of his moral teachings vitiated by what we must call his mistaken general view of the world,—the old attitude of enthusiastic loyalty, which made men glad to own him as Master and Lord, became impossible to some minds; and a religion, which should be avowedly free even from his authority, became a want and a necessity. Protestantism made only a half-way use of its great principle; and Unitarianism, though making an advance upon ordinary Protestantism, and for some time holding spirits in its communion for themselves entirely free, and giving occasion to the hope that it would, without any break and by easy transitions, grow into the great religion of the future, yet by its public and formal action refused the complete demands of its principle, declared its allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ, and took its place as a Christian sect. Hence the necessity for the Free Religious Association. For that which had been working in Protestantism, but to which Protestantism had been unfaithful, which found a new exponent in the Unitarian movement, but to whose demands in their entirety Unitarianism proved unfaithful, that principle sought and found its complete expression in an association that is "free" in unlimited sense, and avows its first object to be the interests of "pure religion,"—i.e., as I take it, religion divested of whatever was untrue or harmful in its Christian form. All honor to those men, few yet faithful, who had the wit to see the issues and the courage to come out and hold up a banner, whose sentiment their own early education had made dear to them, yet to which their brethren in arms in a critical hour had been too faint-hearted to give allegiance! I say the very spirit of Unitarianism, the very wine which glowed in the heart of Channing and made him always "young for liberty," required that they should come out from Unitarianism, and fling out the flag, with the words themselves legibly upon it, of Free Religion.

The intellectual demands of the modern spirit were then met, so far as the relation to Christianity goes, by the Free Religious Association. But there were other demands; and they too, so far as the circumstances seemed to permit, were met. The utilization of the liberal religious forces for practical and humanitarian work was one of the objects of the calling of the Unitarian Conference itself, at which the Christian position of Unitarianism was avowed. There were wide differences in the Unitarian ranks, but why should these hinder coöperation and organization for practical ends? I have read of the stir which this call made in the hearts of some who afterward became leaders of Free Religion, but were then connected with Unitarian churches.* What a grand idea, this overlooking of speculative differences, to unite in much-needed work, this actual and formal exalting of the deed above the creed! And when the Conference, by the virtual adoption of a creed, in effect repelled those who were ready for the work, but could not in honesty subscribe to the creed; and when they went out and formed the Free Religious Association, the old motive and spirit were still uppermost in their minds, and they declared, as the first object of their Association, "the practical interests of pure religion." And, now, for these ends, they would have the widest possible coöperation. The Unitarians would limit their fellowship to those who were disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ: Free Religion held up the idea of "a fellowship in the spirit." If one recognizes the claims of humanity, shall he not work with, and be glad to work with, all who, with whatever speculative belief or unbelief, feel the same claims? The work of freeing those who are in bonds, of bringing out into the light and joy of the day those who sit in shadows and darkness, of elevating, developing man in all his parts and all his interests in the direction in which nature and reason declare that he ought to go,—is not this work great enough, sacred enough to lead us to sink our differences of opinion and unite in a common purpose for its accomplishment? And then, a third object of the Association was to encourage "the scientific study of man's religious nature and history." Not from the Christian stand-point, but in the same free spirit with which we study any branch of natural science, should we approach the religious nature of man, anxious not to support any set of presuppositions, Christian or other, but only to learn the truth, to find the actual impulses and principles under all forms and systems of religion. I need not speak to you of this place, of the valuable work that has been done in this direction, of those who have thought and studied and brought back to you their convictions that religion was no shifting phenomenal thing; but that, however varied its forms, itself lies deep and imperishable in human nature. It is the thirst for the perfect, the awe before the great unwritten laws, the looking and longing for some unknown good, for some measureless satisfaction to the measureless needs of man. Definitions of God, pictures of the immortal life, we may not have had, but such definitions and pictures are the outgrowth and not the essence of religion; and the work that was needed was not to sketch the possible outlines of the completed structure beyond the limits of this present world and life, but to indicate to us and lead us to plant ourselves firmly on the deep foundations of religion in the reason and conscience and heart of man. It was surely well to find and feel that there is a natural religion beneath all supposed revealed religions, that there is a universal religious nature of man, out of which all special religions have grown. Any special religious movement in the future will be the stronger for knowing that in a deep sense it can be no new thing, but only a new expression of the unchanging, undying aspirations of man.

But while I say this, and am glad to say it, I must now pass on to say that I cannot consider Free Religion as anywise final, but rather as a beginning, hint, and suggestion of some greater thing yet to be. Let me indicate why it is not final, why it is not sufficient even to the needs of to-day. Free Religion is, in the first place, religion free from a confession of the assumptions of the Church or the Scriptures or Jesus to rule and order our modern life. But plainly this is negative, and gives no hint as to what positive rule of life is to succeed. Freedom from the special claims of the old religion may be a necessary preliminary step; but it is also possible that, when a new faith arises and takes proportions, many will be attracted to it immediately from the old, and will pass through no such period of suspense as we are now passing through,—we who, as Matthew Arnold says, are

* See Tract by F. E. Abbot, "The Battle of Syracuse," p. 14, and remarks by W. J. Potter at the Abbot Dinner, reported in Free Religious Index, July 29, 1880, p. 52; also a pamphlet by the latter, "Some Aspects of Unitarianism in its Past and Recent History," pp. 26, 27.

"Wandering between two worlds, one dead,
The other powerless to be born."

In the first place, Free Religion compels us to think, but it gives us no commanding and systematic outcome of thought, such as the old faith gave us; and when some one does give us such an outcome, some Free Religionists may give their assent, and others as honest and as free may not; so that Free Religion itself cannot be said to stand for one outcome more than another. I believe the spirit of Free Religion, that is, of absolutely free thought, is that out of which any commanding philosophy for the future must be born. But out of free thought already various philosophical tendencies have developed, and they by no means agree; so that the above assertion means much, or nothing, according as we estimate the meaning of much and nothing. It may be said that Free Religion is committed to the methods of modern science, and is to give us a scientific philosophy. But it may be doubted whether observation and experiment give us more than the materials of philosophy; whether the ultimate questions can be settled by any observation or experiment; whether they are not to receive their settlement from pure thought. There may indeed be scientific pure thought in the sense of thought wholly self-consistent and systematic, but this is another use of language from that before spoken of; and such thought is not a peculiar demand of our modern time. My conviction is that, while, in general, a philosophy of the world giving answers to the final questions about man and nature, and whence they come and whither they go, is a pressing need of the present time, no one can be put forward in the name of Free Religion; and the different philosophies will have to take their chances very much as if Free Religion had never been born.

Nor, so far as religion can be considered apart from philosophy, does Free Religion stand for any definite conception of religion. Its object is pure religion; but "pure" is probably first negative, i.e., in contrast with the special claims of the Christian religion, and positive only as it hints at that natural, universal ground of religion in human nature out of which all religions spring. Hence the view that has found perhaps most wide-spread acceptance among Free Religionists is that of a universal religion, which, neglecting all the special differentiating characteristics of the great historic religions, should hold fast simply to what they have in common. This thought is indeed a grand one; the new sense that we must all have of the commonness of our instincts and aspirations with those of man over the wide world is humanizing in the best sense, and a distinct gain upon the old view, which would regard men outside a certain limited fold as subjects for our pity, if not our reprobation. But I take it that the best uses of this thought and sense are to lead us now, and in the light of our time and its needs, to give a fresh expression to the religious sentiment; and, while conscious of our fellowship with the past and with the universal longings of man, to press on to that which the past has not yet won, and for which the heart of man cries out here and now. In other words, a special religion must arise again, which, planting itself on the common religious nature of man, shall yet express and promise satisfaction to the special needs of this present and coming time. Intelligence is the common attribute of humanity. All men have perhaps more in common than they have of differences from one another; the child and the man are essentially one; but nevertheless do not intelligences widely differ, and are not the differences of importance? Is there not an ideal of intelligence, which so far from being simply intelligence in general is intelligence in all the fulness of specialized development, and according as they approximate to which we measure the worth and rank of special intelligences? Does not the child come to maturity in the man? The bearing on religion is evident. The special religions are the directions in which universal religion must go, if there be movement in it, if it be universal life and not death. And special religions may widely differ in rank and worth; and the manhood of religion,—may we not say it is yet to come? Yet if one recognize this and feel compelled to set before him certain special objects, to which he gives and seeks to win from others an entire and religious consecration, who does not know that some will heed him, and others, equally dissatisfied with the old faith and equally recognizing with him the common aspiration, will not; and that many for the very sake of freedom, and glorying in the non-committal attitude for which Free Religion, to their mind, stands, will feel shy of the definiteness and earnestness of his convictions? Pure religion, universal religion, are to my mind simply the general possibility of a religion that shall really mould the lives of men after some diviner pattern, and work transformations in human society. In a word, Free Religion is simply an opportunity and not a finality; and a religious faith with a body of positive convictions and purposes will probably have to take its chances very much the same as if Free Religion had never been born.

Nor, so far as morality can be spoken of apart from religion, can Free Religion be said to strike any clear, commanding note as to that, i.e., any more so than the liberal Christianity out of which it sprung, if indeed as much so; since liberal Christianity did, by avowing allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ, assert the binding character of the moral and social ideals of Jesus himself. A question of importance is, What attitude do we take to the Christian morality of the past? Do we assert it or deny it, or in part assert and in part deny? Probably our answer would be, We accept so much as commends itself to our free judgment. But how much does so commend itself? An answer to this is necessary before anything can come knowing itself well enough to in any wise take the place of the Christian Church. What of motive and action, what of poverty and wealth, what of marriage and divorce, what of charity, what of forgiveness, what of the ideal of social life, what of the attitude to the State,—these are not questions to be decided by a simple appeal to unprejudiced thought, or a rational as opposed to a theological ethics, or by the declaration of a scientific morality, but only, with whatever recognition of these things, after extended consideration of the special problems. The universal sentiment of right and wrong is no substitute for the specialized and elaborate ethics of the New Testament, and this native sense or the recognition of it is no peculiarity of Free Religion or modern thought generally. It is that to which Jesus and Paul and every prophet of every religion has addressed himself; and it is for us, it seems to me, now, knowing that it is there, to make a fresh and direct address to it, and provoke a response that shall show itself in not less, but more specialized and higher and nobler forms of moral and social life than the world has yet seen. I incline to believe that the old law is not to be abrogated in any important respect; that the moral gains of humanity are among its most solid and durable treasures. And I incline to say that not less but more than Christians have done, or than in any avowed and express way they have attempted to do, must be done by those worthy to succeed them; that our righteousness must verily exceed the righteousness of the Christian world, as much as the righteousness of the early Christians exceeded that of the Scribes and Pharisees before them.

And yet, who does not know that if any outline of that righteousness is held up before men, and before men entirely free in thought, some will give heed to it and others will not, and many, perhaps most, will prefer the righteousness they now practice to any supposable higher righteousness? Free Religion does stand for righteousness, for the practical interests of pure religion. It is a part and an expression of that general movement in our time which calls for deeds more than creeds, and demands that the time and energy, still so largely given to other worldly thoughts and aims, shall be given and consecrated to the needs that are so patent here and now. Out of this general spirit, the future religion will be born. But the general spirit is not enough, righteousness is not enough; the question is, What is righteousness? The Christian world, the Buddhists, all religions, agree as to the desirability of righteousness; and, if we have no ideal of righteousness in any way different from or in advance of theirs, our differences are intellectual and not moral; we may have a truer philosophy, but not a nobler religion. It is the deed and not the creed: but this was Channing's voice, as well as ours; it was the message of ancient Hebrew prophets, as well as ours; it was Jesus' own, as well as ours. What is the deed to be? that is the question. Channing said to the Unitarians of his time, "It is time that as a class of Christians we should disappear, if we will not take our part in the great work of regenerating society."

(Works, p. 92.) And by regeneration he did not mean a glittering generality, but "a social reform which shall meet the most depressed ranks of the community." Let me not say this of the Free Religious Association. Intellectual differences are something, and they count on methods of moral work; and Free Religion has still to do what it has done,—insist on a freedom greater than Unitarianism allows, and expose the weakness and inadequacy of past religious systems. But for all this, there is other and more pressing work to be done; and for it not indignation, nor declamation, nor even the defining of the ideal and the indicating of the methods, will suffice; but only the actual doing of it, only the putting our hands to the plough, and never looking back till at least the beginnings of the accomplishment show themselves. The first step is perhaps education, and the education of the young and the youngest, and those of the youngest who most need a better education, and education after the most intelligent and thorough methods; and when Free Religious societies begin with radical work of this sort, as the possibility of it is being shown in a not distant city, they will indicate the insight and the earnestness that are hint and prophecy of the great faith and work that are to come. Yet, doubtless, if ultimate moral and social aims are defined to any extent along with the particular methods of work and education which they require, some will assent and others will not; and Free Religion itself cannot necessarily be committed either way, and will, in the separate growths and fruits to which it gives rise, lose itself and its separate name. Those who love freedom more than association for definite objects will, perhaps, not care earnestly to support even this association; those who have positive convictions and feel that they must unite for their expression, propagation, and organization in human society, will probably find the platform of the association quite too vague for their purposes, and, though they may not be unwilling to speak upon it, will feel that it is not theirs in any peculiar sense, and that their first and foremost duty lies in the lines of their own proper work.

To the question, then, "After Free Religion, what?" I offer no definite answer. I am no prophet of the new faith: for, when he comes, he will not have the hesitating, tentative method of address that I have used; I am a searcher along with the rest. But I hope it will not be labor lost to suggest the question, and at least positively to say that it must be answered before anything great and commanding—and not merely leading us to ask, Shall we organize? but compelling us with a blessed interior compulsion to organize—can come. Free Religion has a legitimate and an altogether honorable place in the historical development of religion in this country. I count it an intellectual advance in an important sense upon Christianity or even the freest form of Christianity,—Unitarianism; and I count it a moral advance, in that it puts the practical interests of religion in the foreground, while limiting none of those who enlist under its name by any test of speculative opinion or belief. It excludes none, even if they be atheists or materialists, as those words go, if they feel that they have something or want something that may be called religion, and it would invite all, whatever their philosophic or lack of philosophic views may be, to unite "in the service of a higher morality and an improved social welfare." This last phrase is the interpretation which the journal of this Association puts upon Free Religion, and is probably as nearly authoritative as anything we can find. I raise the question, whether this is not a natural starting-point for a serious attempt to state in what "the higher morality and improved social welfare" consist, and then for a serious and united endeavor to bring that higher morality and improved social welfare to pass in the world? And if I may, I would suggest to those who would organize Free Religion that their main strength go in the direction of this necessary preliminary to organization, that they determine for us positively what is that in which we are to go beyond the faith of the past and really bless the world. For, depend upon it, the heart of man is ready to go in this direction. There is the craving for the higher and nobler. We do not create it,—it is there already in men, and beneath the hard surface, yes, beneath the wildness and ungoverned self-will of every man. Man is made for the perfect, and he owns it when the idea of it is given to him. Let us speak to that longing, let us hold out promise to it, and the world will bear us, as the flower turns to the sun.

We say creeds are unimportant, that they are almost chaff compared with the living, crying needs of the heart and conscience. Is then the negation of creeds, relatively speaking, of much more importance? Men crave freedom: but it is not merely to be rid of an old law, but to freely give themselves to higher law. A "wild, unchartered freedom" is that whereof at last they "tire." A freedom for the good is what they crave; and to the pure-minded the good becomes law,—law widening and never diminishing in its demands, law better than the actual and stretching far away beyond it, yes, law infinite, and calling for a no less than absolute and infinite consecration on our part.

A fresh, specialized, and practical statement of the moral law would seem, then, to be the demand of Free Religion, and could claim, perhaps, to be its natural and logical development. Yet we cannot deny that, if such an ideal were held up, it would be in effect a dividing-line; and, though Free Religion, by the logic of its own ideas, were pledged to accept it, some who bear that name would be faithful and others would not, and Free Religion, as a name and a constituency, would perhaps be injured, if not disintegrated.

But though I leave my question as a question, and attempt no detailed answer to it, and wish indeed that I might make you feel that it is for you to answer quite as much as for me, I am not averse to indicating, in a very general way, the lines which I think an answer must take.

First, I think it important distinctly to feel that Free Religion is not sufficient. It marks to some of us our entire dissatisfaction with the old faith, it in general points the way to some better faith to be; but it is neither one nor the other, and cannot expect to enlist the enthusiasm of young men who wish to work under strong convictions for great objects. One man, with a thorough understanding of himself and of some worthy aim for which he works, will win us more than a whole body of men with no greater agreement than in the recognition of the desirability of freedom, fellowship, and character.

Second, I think it important that we turn our thoughts and energies in the right direction. To some, the supreme questions are relative to God and immortality. We cannot stand on the old ground in reference to these great matters,—on what ground, then, can we stand? I think those whose attitude is of this character, whose first concern is for the solution of the speculative problem, are more under the dominion of the old faith than they are aware. To my mind, these questions are not of the first importance: not that they are not important, not that some answer may not be won by purely free and rational thought, but that I think there is a great call going up from the heart of this present human world that we give our first thoughts to it. The whole tendency of our modern time is secular. This earth is real, human society is real. One generation succeeds another. Good and evil now mean good and evil a hundred years hence. There is a continuity in history, and a solidarity of the human race. This is a feeling different from that of the early Christians who thought this world a shadow soon to lose its individual existence. Secular the modern world is set on being; and I think religion is to accept the situation, and heroically attempt to make of this world and our concrete human society something like that scene of perfect justice and humanity which the Omnipotent hand was to unfold to our view in another. I suspect that a religion that gives its main strength to seeking for or declaring convictions about God and immortality is doomed to unprofitableness: for the mass of mankind, I believe, are not deeply sceptical about the ultimate integrity of things, or a possibly noble outcome of the course of things; but they are sceptical about the divinity and finality of the present order of things; and there is a profound call, it seems to me, for some enlightening and helping word about it. When this country becomes as populous as the old countries, there will come the same problems for us to consider that are now being forced upon them. Yes, the mutterings of discontent and of some coming thunder we have already heard, and will, I believe, more and more hear, till either some happier scheme for industrial society than the present one is found, or the thunder and the storm in their full fury burst upon us. Religion, I say, must enter into secular life, and not allow that any department of it is out of the reach of the application of the principles of justice and humanity. Some time ago, a man is reported to have said in this city, "Will any business man tell me the difference between buying labor and buying hay, grain, horses, and other supplies?" Has religion nothing to say to that? If the old religion has not, then is there indeed a call for a new religion; and I believe there is no course for this religion but to pronounce its word, and hold up its ideal for the most material and worldly concerns of men. To allow itself to be deemed impracticable, to turn from the frights and distractions of the time, and seek its peace in contemplation and mystic sentiment and prayer, is to confess its impotence.

But, if the religion for the time must be first secular rather than theological, so I think must it find its basis of union in a moral and social ideal rather than in a special philosophical system. A philosophy is not so different from a theology, for both are concerned with the ultimate nature of things, and seek to comprehend the universe in some unifying law or principle. The formal utterance of Free Religion seems to point in this direction, for membership in its association is not to be limited by any test of speculative opinion or belief; and the first purposes of the Association are other than the propagation of a creed, Christian, "scientific," Kantian, or other. If men cannot unite unless they are agreed as to a theory of the world,—for that is what a creed or philosophy is,—then the whole tendency and thought of our time are a mistake, and point nowhere. And, by a moral basis of union, of course, I do not mean some theoretical view of morals, transcendental or utilitarian, but a moral aim, reaching after something about the desirableness of which we are agreed, and to which, and the realization of which, we give ourselves, and think and speak and work. As to the place of this ideal in the universal system of things, i.e., as to its ultimate philosophical interpretation, there may be varying opinions; and there will be no harm, so long as no effort is made to impose any individual opinion upon those associated with us in the work; such effort would indeed be the beginning of schism, and a voluntary denial of our first principle that not the creed, but the deed, is alone of the first importance. Christendom has seen the unlimited development of the ideas of God and another world. What is wanted is, I think, an unlimited development of the idea of duty in relation to this world. I do not object to division, but I think we want division on the right ground, and in relation to the right ends. If men will not recognize the claims of justice and humanity, I can have no company with them in a religious association. If, too, they will not recognize the claims of ever higher and concreter applications of justice and humanity, I can have no such company with them as men must have who mean something by justice and humanity, and are not indulging fine sentiment while the conscience sleeps. A religious man, I take it, is distinguished from the conventionally moral man as one who grasps morality in its principle, and assents to the uttermost demands of the moral law upon him. But he who joins me in such assent,—I care not what his view of the ultimate meaning of morality, what his view of the soul or of God or of the future life may be,—he and I are one in that which gives supreme meaning and worth to life; we are one in that which is of such transcendent importance that all theologies and philosophies are as chaff for the wind in comparison with it.

If I mistake not, then, the religion of the future must be first and foremost ethical; must begin with a fresh publication of the requirements of morality in the circumstances of modern society. Free Religion must pass into Ethical Religion, if it is to survive and take any commanding place in the world. Something more than ethics may come; a general view of the world, a philosophy, may gradually develop, and, simply because most rational, most naturally fitting to the ethics we recognize, may win general acceptance; and a worship, a joy, a music and an art, and a richness of life in all its aspects may come,—I believe they will; but first there must be heeded in its simplicity, and perhaps somewhat of severity, the still voice of conscience; first, there must be a deepening and invigorating and enlightening of the moral sentiment, and then sane thinking and glad worship and art and joy of every sort will come with the necessity of the bloom and fragrance of the flower. The secret of joy—is it not?—is with those who do not ask for it; and so may not the secret of religion be with those who for the time are indifferent to the refinements and graces, and even consolations, of what passes under that name, to the end that they may the more singly ask, What ought we to do, in view of the wrongs and miseries that still dare show themselves on this earth, in view of the failures to rise to the joy and blessedness of life that we see on every hand? To know the world, to find the order in the maze of facts, to delight in the products of the human spirit, in the creations of art, to have freedom to develop one's own possibilities,—this is indeed good. But how can I rest here, when I reflect that it is good for others as well as for me,—how can I rest till the same freedom which is mine is theirs in some measure also? If so, then the pressing duty of religion is to find out why others have not that measure of freedom, to scan our industrial, our political, our educational systems, to see where the hindering causes lie, and to find out and hold up a way out of the difficulties,—which way shall constitute our ideal, and which we shall feel is so for the world, and especially for those who now bear such heavy burdens in it, that we can herald it with something of the evangelical spirit, and say to the poor, and to those who mourn, and to those who, from bitter stress of circumstance are meek and comfortless,—“the earth is yet for your inheritance, the present order is to give way to a diviner order, and joy shall yet be the birthright of every child of man.”

THE JESUS OF HISTORY.

The article of Mr. Chadwick under the caption “Are We Still Christians?” which appeared in the Index of March 17, and that of Mr. Salter upon “Mr. Mead and the Christian Name,” printed in the issue of June 9, show that, while both writers accept the main conclusions regarding Jesus reached by the Tübingen school, they hold them with different degrees of conviction,—Mr. Chadwick, in his article, seeming at times to forget them, Mr. Salter keeping them in mind from first to last.

Those readers of Mr. Chadwick's paper who appreciated the praise that he awards Strauss, at its beginning, must have been surprised and disappointed by what he puts forth at its close as the duty of rational religion. He says: “It is the duty of rational religion—a duty which it cannot shirk without incurring its own self-contempt—to vindicate the fame of Jesus from the hideous distortions of the popular theology. It is the shame of rational religion that is so often less ready to do justice to the founder of Christianity than to the founder of Buddhism or to Confucius or Zoroaster or Mohammed. Let him be approached with the same generous disposition that we bring to the appreciation of his spiritual kin, and he will take place among them as the most grandly moulded of them all.”

Mr. Chadwick here charges rational religionists with a grave fault, and also tells them what he considers is their urgent duty. The fault is that they are often less ready to do justice to Jesus than to the founders of the other great religions. This is partly true; but the words “less ready” imply that they are often animated by a spirit of injustice toward Jesus, which is not their feeling. It is true that many rational religionists, so called, make the mistake of comparing Jesus, after they have applied the Tübingen method to the study of the Gospels, with Buddha, Confucius, and the rest, the stories of whose lives have not yet been subjected to this method; but this does not prove an unreadiness to do justice to Jesus. That they are unjust to him by such comparisons is admitted; but the cause is the use of a lax method of criticism employed unconsciously, not an ungenerous disposition; and it should be remembered that not all rational religionists use this lax method.

But, regarding what Mr. Chadwick considers the “duty of rational religion” toward Jesus, no such admission of error or shortcoming can be made by its adherents: for they clearly see that some of the “distortions of the popular theology” are logical outcomes of certain beliefs and teachings which Jesus himself held and taught. It is not a sufficient reply to say that, when Jesus claimed the Messiahship, or when he promised to return and judge the world, or when he held up his “I say unto you” as the standard of faith and practice, he did so in quite different senses from what the Christian Church apprehends. These claims, were they never so mildly put forth, contain germs of error whose natural unfoldings must necessarily be “distortions of theology.” Neither is it a tenable reply to say, because the teachings of Jesus were in the main truly spiritual, and are destined to remain ever fresh and young, that we ought, therefore, to leave out of our portrait of him his limitations and imperfections. We might by this process make a more human, a more lovable picture of him than now exists; but, by adopting this method, we should do as the Catholic, the Orthodox, the Unitarian, and other sectarians have done. We could not call it an historical portrait.

This, so it seems to one rational religionist at least, is sufficient reason for refusing to accept the estimates of Jesus which many liberal thinkers are putting forth. Such phrases as “Jesus, the great teacher of the ages,” “Jesus, the perfect example,” “Jesus, the ideal man,” we put aside as having no support from history, and as unjust to the memory of other heroes the records of whose lives are authentic; and the wonder grows that those who well know that the Gospels are but meagre transcripts of history should continue to talk about Jesus in this indefensible manner. Would they but consider that the synoptic Gospels mention only about thirty-five days of the four hundred and fifty (fifteen months) which they assume to cover; that the greater part of the concurrent testimony of these Gospels is given in identical phraseology (that of Mark, for instance, which out of six hundred and seventy-eight verses has but sixty-eight peculiar to it); that the sources of the earliest Gospels were “oral rills” that had been running twenty or thirty years at least among a credulous and uneducated people,—would they but rationally consider these and other facts of similar import, they would be helped to put aside their false ideals of Jesus, and would also be helped to form new ones more in accord with history.

THE NATION'S WARNING.

In the attempted assassination of President Garfield, there is a lesson of the deepest warning to the people of this republic as well as to the whole civilized world. Admitting the hypothesis that the assassin was insane, there is, back of the crazy fancy that prompted the horrid deed, a lawless sentiment in the community, which is to some extent responsible for this national calamity. Assassination has lately been applauded as a legitimate means of righting political abuses, and a distempered spirit of destruction has been dignified with the name of reform. This vicious sentiment may easily find an instrument of death in any distempered mind that falls under its wicked influence. Even a madman would not plan such a fiendish deed as the assassination of the President, if the crime were not suggested by some evil sentiment of the times. It is the fruit of a pernicious theory of individual sovereignty that has been too much lauded of late. An insane view of the methods of reform has been inculcated by a class of destructionists in this and other countries, and, in the presence of this diseased spirit, human life loses its sanctity, and established order becomes hateful.

We need just now a little more faith in the old-fashioned doctrine of human depravity together with a more vigorous method of dealing with the human demons who seem to delight in the most hideous crimes. We have been teaching a refined philosophy that almost eliminates crime from human conduct. The plea of “emotional insanity” now generously covers the most bloody crime that a murderer can commit, and a villainous assassin finds himself caressed by a maudlin sentiment of sympathy, instead of being sternly punished as he deserves. Crime is almost sanctified as a religion by many of our human philosophers. Instead of being painted as the dark and devilish thing which it is, crime is called by mild and generous names, and the “circumstances” surrounding it are made to carry the blame. The old idea of individual responsibility is too much ignored in modern philosophy. The homeopathic treatment of crime is a very beautiful theory for a convention of large-hearted reformers to discuss; but, in the presence of such ghastly deeds of human depravity as confront us in daily life, we instinctively demand a more rigorous application of the older remedies.

These two advanced ideas, that the assassination of rulers is one legitimate method of political reform, and that crime is only a kind of disease to be treated very gently, are bearing too much of their own logical fruit of late. The one leads to political anarchy, and the other to the overthrow of individual responsibility. Established authority must be respected and maintained until a healthy, capable public sentiment demands a change in the administration of the State, and criminals who assail the lives or rights of others must be made to feel that the way of the transgressor is still hard. A more rigid punishment of those who go crazy to commit murder would assist many reckless men in preserving their mental balance. Better hang a few murderous monomaniacs than expose the lives of all good citizens to the blood-thirsty emotional mania that is now so prevalent.

CELTICISM.

The Celts are defined to be the early inhabitants of the south and west of Europe, the primitive population of Gaul, Spain, Britain, and Italy. Here, the word "Celt" is used as the synonyme of Irishman; but the Welsh are Celts. Their Celticism, however, has been greatly modified by the prevalence among them of Methodism. It seems that the great French writer and apostle of freethought, Ernest Renan, is a Celt, his family having migrated from St. Renan, in Cornwall, in the fifth century, across the channel to Brittany. Renan is an instance of a Celt transformed by modern thought into a liberal thinker. The people of Western and Southern Ireland, on account of their isolation from the world, exhibit an unmitigated Celticism, unalloyed by a modern idea. It is now said, apropos of the disturbed condition of Ireland, that there is an utter incompatibility between the Celt and Anglo-Saxon,—that they are moral and social antipodes. That goes without saying. In the English Revolution of 1688, the Celt in Ireland fought for the old Stuart dynasty, which represented the past. It is said that the Celt is constitutionally unmodern, "romantic, emotional, and unpractical." A writer in the Nineteenth Century of June says, in an article on Ernest Renan: "Let us turn to the race from which M. Renan sprang, the race whose character is traceable in all that he has written. The nationality of the romantic, emotional, unpractical Celt, surviving in his western isles and promontories from an age of less hurrying effort, less sternly moulded men, has fallen into the background of the modern world. Yet every now and then we are reminded, by some persistent loyalty, as in la Vendée, to a dethroned ideal; by some desperate incompatibility, as in Ireland, with the mechanism of modern progress, that there exists by our side a nation whose origin, language, memories, differ so profoundly from our own." The Irish Celt is now part and parcel of the English-speaking world in both hemispheres; but, in both hemispheres, he shows a determined disposition not to amalgamate with the Anglo-Saxon and other races among whom he finds his lot cast, but to keep himself isolated as much as possible. He turns his back on the common school, and prefers to submit himself to the guidance of the priest. The modern Roman Catholic priests are to all intents and purposes as much the rulers of the Celts of to-day as the Druids were of the ancient Celts of Gaul and Britain. In his government, the Celt wants the priest to be the foremost figure, wants the Church exalted above the State. The Celt is a loyalist, and not a rationalist. His emotions are stronger than his reason. He migrates into this free country, and forthwith proceeds to set up a private hierarchy of his own, so to speak, inside of a political and social order, which utterly ignores priest and king both. The Celt really cares nothing for the freedom, which is the boast of this country. He only values his vote as a means of getting money and office, not at all as the symbol of personal and popular liberty. The Vendéans, who were Celts in the time of the French Revolution, were fierce monarchists, and fought to the death for throne and altar against the French Republic. They preferred a régime of priest, king, and noble, as the Irish Celts do. It is perfectly evident from the tone of the Irish newspaper and periodical press that they have not the least respect for the institutions of this country. Indeed, they have imported a Roman cardinal, as a sort of opposition to the authorities of this country. We are not blaming the Celt for his racial characteristics, because in him feeling overpowers reason, because he respects power made visible in the person of a high priest or king more than he does a popular government of principles rather than of men. Of course, in the English-speaking world, the Celt is in a hopeless minority, and must submit to forms of government which were established irrespective of his ideas and beliefs.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE LEGEND OF THOMAS DIDYMUS, THE JEWISH SCEPTIC. By James Freeman Clarke. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1881. pp. 448.

The purpose of this book, its author tells us, is to reproduce the times in which Jesus appeared, the characters who surrounded him, the opinions, beliefs, and prejudices of the Jewish sects and people, and also Jesus himself, as he may have appeared to the people of his own day; a special effort being made to represent the purpose and expectation of Jesus, his own view of the Messiah and the Messianic kingdom. This view is given mainly in the form of an autobiography of Thomas, surnamed Didymus, or The Twin, who, in the Gospel according to John, is represented as demanding and receiving the evidence of sight and touch before he would believe in the revivification of the body of Jesus. But besides this view, which the author calls the sceptical one, short narratives or opinions are given, representing Jesus as he may have appeared to a liberal conservative, a narrow zealot, a man of the world, a Jewish Epicurean, a Jewish Stoic, a noble Roman matron, and an ardent, enthusiastic Jewish woman.

In this work, Dr. Clarke has sought to avoid the bias both of theological and anti-theological prepossession. Accepting the idea that Jesus possessed some extraordinary and hitherto unexplained power over nature and life, he yet offers a natural explanation of many of the events popularly classed as miraculous.

The book is interesting, and seems justly to represent the prominent features both of the land and the people of Palestine. Its most important part is its delineation of the substance of what Jesus said to the twelve missionaries who were to spread abroad his doctrine,—its substance, for Thomas prudently pleads imperfection of memory, and will not vouch for the words. Here are some of his recollections of what Jesus taught in the latter part of his career:—

"He spoke now with more authority, and did not hesitate to declare himself the true Christ foretold by all the great prophets, who was to reign by truth and love. He explained the nature of the kingdom, and showed how it would embrace all mankind. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob would be worshipped throughout the whole earth; the law of works taught by Moses would be fulfilled by the law of love; the whole Jewish nation would be the prophets of this faith, and teach it through all the world. With love for God would be joined the love of man; all kinds of selfishness and cruelty would be conquered, and the long-predicted time arrive when the sword should be beaten into a ploughshare, and wars should cease throughout the earth. All this, as I repeat it, seems like a mere dream; but, as he described it, it was a coming certainty. This vast hope rested on no illusion, but on knowledge."—p. 308.

"He spoke with great confidence of immediately establishing the new kingdom of Israel. The world would be made new; he should be seated on a glorious throne; and we his missionaries should also have twelve thrones, each one of us ruling one of the tribes of our nation, and all subject to him, the supreme King. I indeed did not hear him say this, but it was told me by Matthew; and I think that Matthew might have mistaken his language, as this was very different from his usual teaching. He might have said, Ye shall be greater than kings, and shall rule the tribes of Israel by the power of my word."—p. 332.

Further on, in reply to their inquiries,—

"He described to us the nature of his coming, as afterward he described it in his conversations at the last supper. And some of us thought that he meant to appear visibly in the clouds, with a great sound of a trumpet, and surrounded by whole troops of angels; but others of us thought that he meant to say that he should be seen inwardly in the soul, and would bring light and love to the hearts of men all over the world."—p. 362.

And, in the same conversation,—

"Though he did not fix the year or the day of these events, he said that this generation should not pass away till all was fulfilled."—p. 363.

In this book, as in his forty years' ministry to the Church of the Disciples, Dr. Clarke holds a position distinctively Unitarian, and also distinctively Christian, since he recognizes Jesus as truly the Christ, and also accepts him as Master and Lord. He rationalizes a little, avoiding the orthodox blunder of assuming infallible inspiration in the gospel narratives; on the other hand, trying to represent the new kingdom as spiritual instead of temporal, he puts into the mouth of Jesus predictive claims which have as utterly failed of fulfilment, after the lapse of eighteen hundred years, as the promised second coming in the clouds of heaven failed within the lifetime of that generation.

A ROMANCE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By W. H. Mallock, author of The New Republic, Is Life worth Living? etc. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1881.

Mr. Mallock is the prurient prude par excellence of his day and generation. There is for him, apparently, but one virtue, continence, and but one vice, impurity. So zealous is he for this virtue and against this vice that he cannot refrain from speaking of them for any length of time. If he is not mistaken, the culture and refinement of modern England are but the thinnest varnish,—veneer would be a better word,—superinduced upon a life that reeks with sensuality. He is continually introducing us to men and women, moving in the best society, whose walk and conversation are horribly indecent. If, as in the present story, he for a moment conjures up a vision of perfect purity, it is only that he may revel in our discomfiture when suddenly he informs us that this vision masks a life of coarsest criminality. But for the present we decline to accept Mr. Mallock's account of English morality as even tolerably correct. We may do him injustice, but our impression is that he has an essentially dirty mind, and that the general immorality which he depicts is only the reflection of his own mental grossness. Prevented by his scruples probably from living a licentious life, he revenges himself by continually "committing adultery in his heart"; for he cannot look upon a woman with the eye of his imagination and not lust after her. His New Paul and Virginia was such a book that we consoled ourselves with thinking, "Well, he can never write a nastier." But we were much mistaken. His last production is a great advance upon all his previous writings in point of nastiness. It is probably a novel with a purpose, but the purpose is not easily divined. Particular pains are taken to make the elegant hetaira of the story a reader of Strauss and Renan and sceptical literature generally, but the connection between her reading and her criminality is not made evident. The winding-up is very tragical. The hero is shot by the heroine's oldest paramour; the heroine dies of heart disease opportunely; and a third of her many lovers is presumably at present indulging at Vienna in a thorough course of sensuality. It is hard to credit Mr. Mallock with a sincere desire to benefit his fellow-creatures by this book. It will have little influence, but this little will be wholly bad. Every pure-minded reader should place it on his private Index Expurgatorius.

POETRY.

HARVEST.

BY H. H.

"What enemy hath done this thing?" I cried.
"Oh! treachery that plotted while I slept!
Oh! foe that stole while I, confiding, kept
No watch my fairest, dearest field beside,
My noble field, so sunny and so wide.
Only at midnight could a foe have crept
To work this harm."
Alas! in vain I wept;
Too late the poison tares to pluck or hide.
My loss is loss; such hurt cannot be healed;
Forever, spite of all new seed I sow,
Past summer's sun and winter's purest snow;
Forever poison tares my beauteous field,
Its shining harvests waving to and fro,—
Forever poison tares is doomed to yield!

And I, with swift clear-sightedness from pain,
Like one long blind, who, sudden gaining sight,
Cries out at first, in suffering at the light,
Look back and know, with anguish keen as vain,
No foe who hid in treacherous ambush lain,
And stealthy sowed his poison tares by night,
Did work upon my beauteous field this blight.
Humble I walk beside the loaded wain,
My head bowed down by shame, and dumb my tongue;
Fate gives each man the gifts he has bestowed,
And metes exact all measures which are owed.
The seed from which these poison tares have sprung
One idle day my own hand careless flung.
I only reap the harvest that I sowed.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 21, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ARNOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index three months on trial for fifty cents in advance.

WE would call attention to the English and Classical School of Mr. Nathaniel T. Allen, in West Newton, Mass., advertised on our last page. For nearly a generation, this school has been in existence under Mr. Allen's charge, with the aid of accomplished assistants, and has deservedly won a wide reputation. We can commend it to those of our readers who are seeking a school of this kind for their sons or daughters. Both the school and the family influences will be mentally inspiring and morally wholesome.

AS ANNOUNCED last week, we now leave the editorial charge of the Index to Mr. B. F. Underwood, for two months. Mr. Underwood has been so long and favorably known to readers of the Index as a regular contributor to its columns that he needs no introduction to them. We are sure that the interests of the paper will suffer no detriment in his hands. He is to be in Boston during the time, and all communications intended for him or for the paper should be addressed to the Index Office, 3 Tremont Place.

AN instance of the peril to which human life is exposed, through the heedlessness of those who should have a keener sense of their accountability, was presented in a serious accident which occurred a few days since in this city. Two men started to go down from one of the upper stories of a factory, in which they were employed, with a quantity of goods, in an elevator; but, when they reached the third floor, in their descent, the rope of the elevator broke and they were precipitated at once to the bottom, and badly, if not fatally, injured. Such occurrences show the need of a more careful inspection, not only of elevators, but all kinds of machinery and fixtures of buildings in which accidents are a possible contingency; and the importance of impressing upon proprietors and those in charge in these cases a due appreciation of their responsibility for the care that should be exercised. The practice of entrusting boys to run elevators, as is not unusual in some of our large buildings, unless they are more trustworthy than those we occasionally observe in such places, is a questionable economy.

THE MEANING AND SCOPE OF "FREE RELIGION."

The thoughtful and earnest discourse of Mr. Salter, entitled "After Free Religion, What?" and printed in our columns this week, will command and will repay the attention of our readers. We welcome it specially as the word of one of the younger men who have come to the study of religious problems since the Free Religious Association was organized; and we welcome it none the less for the criticism it makes of the present or probable practical outcome of that Association. Mr. Salter is one of the genuinely earnest young men, who has thoroughly prepared himself for the ministry, and is now looking about for a place on which to plant his lever for practical work. He evidently is in entire sympathy with the position and spirit of the Free Religious Association in its assertion of the claims of reason against any kind of ecclesiastical authority, and he cordially accepts the statement of objects made in its constitution, so far as it goes; but, as a working body, it seems to him to lack definiteness and positiveness of aim, and to have too little coherency of conviction to make a rallying-point for enthusiastic devotion. Some more "commanding and systematic outcome of thought" seems to him to be needed; "a fresh, specialized, and practical statement of the moral law;" a new and marked emphasis on the ethical side of religion and on the secular interests of society,—these are the directions in which he thinks Free Religion must move or else be supplanted by something else. And all through the discourse appears to run the question whether Free Religion can proceed so definitely in these directions or can tolerate the statement of any such commanding philosophy of life as is needed, without dividing its own constituency and disintegrating its platform, and thus ceasing to be.

To those who have been conversant with the Free Religious Association from the beginning, the first thought on reading Mr. Salter's discourse is likely to be, whether he has sufficiently acquainted himself with the internal history of the Association, and whether he understands "Free Religion" just as they do. We think that those who have been most prominently identified with the Association would say that all that Mr. Salter indicates as coming after "Free Religion" is to come with it as a part of its natural, logical results. If it be asked, Why has it not more fully come? (for it has come to some extent), the answer must be, Because religions are not made, but grow. Fourteen years are a short time for counting up all the products of a religious movement as broad and deep as that represented by the Free Religious Association. And if it be asked, Why has not a more definite statement of these believed-in and hoped-for results been made by the Association as a whole? the answer must be essentially that which Mr. Salter gives when he discusses the impracticability of putting into an organic basis of union for such a Free Religious society as he sketches, any "theory of the world," any "philosophical system," any "theoretical view of morals," or "ultimate philosophical interpretation of the moral ideal,"—anything, in fact, except the agreement in "a moral aim." He appears himself plainly to see that anything but this would be out of place in a platform pledged to perfect freedom of thought. And with regard to any joint expression of this "moral aim," further than what is included under the general phrase, "the practical interests of pure religion," he well says, in one part of his discourse, that it is "not declamation, nor even the defining of the ideal and the indicating of the methods," that will suffice, "but only the actual doing of it."

In fact, it seems to us that Mr. Salter has introduced some confusion of thought into his discourse by using the term "Free Religion" in different senses. Sometimes he uses it simply as the negation of old ecclesiastical assumptions,—as having, therefore, a merely critical attitude and service. Again, he seems to identify it with the small visible outcome in accepted systematic thought or institution for practical work which can be traced directly to the Free Religious Association; and if this be all of "Free Religion," certainly we may all of us well be looking for something to come after it. But again he appears to think, and as it seems to us more truly, of Free Religion as a new spirit and method by which religious problems, both theoretical and practical, are approached; and looking at it thus he says, "I believe the spirit of Free Religion, that is, of absolutely free thought, is that out of which any commanding philosophy for the future must be born"; and also that the "fresh, specialized, and practical statement of the moral law," which he thinks the particular need of the age, would not only "seem to be the demand of Free Religion," but "could claim, perhaps, to be its natural and logical development." Now, why may we not accept this latter view as the real interpretation of Free Religion? In our opinion, it indicates pretty nearly what is in the heart of the Free Religious movement.

That the Free Religious Association, for instance, has not regarded the universal or coming religion as merely a summary of what is common to all the special religions of the past, or as anything that is yet fully formulized, is evidenced by the statement of the Executive Committee in their Fourth Annual Report: "We do not assume that the order of [religious] development has reached its ultimate,—that the religious sentiment has historically exhausted itself, and spoken the final word of absolute religion. On the contrary, we would assert that the religious consciousness is as vitally organic to-day as it has ever been; and that, whatever changes are coming in the religious condition of the world, these changes are to be brought about by no mechanical, eclectic combination of the virtues of past religions, but are to be the product of regular organic growth and progress."

And with regard to the possible scope of the Association concerning questions of social and moral reform, the third Annual Report of the Executive Committee spoke as quoted below. The extract is long, but it is important as showing that as long as eleven years ago the constructive and positive aspects of Free Religion were well comprehended:—

Your Committee believe, indeed, that the Free Religious Association has a great mission before it, if it only take the opportunity presented to its hands. The very atmosphere of our age is impregnated with the germs of the mightiest social and moral problems. And this country, from the freedom which it offers, seems to be the historically chosen field where these problems are to have their development. The old question of the relation of religion to civil government, which has generally been assumed to be a settled question in the United States, is coming up anew to demand a settlement on the ground of fixed, substantial principles, and not on the mere accident that a vast majority of the citizens chance to be of one form of religious faith. The question of the relation of religion to the public schools, with its still more subordinate question of the reading of the Bible as a religious exercise in the schools,—a question which is now just opening a gigantic struggle that is to extend through the country,—is but a part of this greater question of the connection between religion and the State, which lies behind, and where the real conflict must finally come. Involved with this are the minor conflicts in regard to Sunday laws, and the unjust statutes in some of the States concerning legal oaths and the religious qualifications of jurors and witnesses in courts. Then there are the multiform problems, speculative and practical, which are raised by modern science and philosophy; and which already, though crudely solved or not solved at all, are affecting the actual life of vast numbers of people. Add to these the great social problems that are now everywhere seeking of public opinion some solution,—as the demand for a new and more equitable adjustment of the relations between capital and labor; the agitation for a readjustment, in accordance with the new light and civilization of the age, of the relations between man and woman in the various functions of society; the search for better methods of meeting the evils of pauperism, intemperance, and crime of every kind; and, generally, the call for some more effective application of the intelligence, virtue, and culture that are anywhere stored up in individuals or families, or in favored portions of the community, to the conduct of governments and to the improvement and elevation of society at large. And add still again the problem, both social and civil, which we in this country have to work out, of a nation which is to assimilate into its own life and institutions all religions and races of men,—which is to do justice and give citizenship to all: to the African, the Indian, and the Mongolian, as well as to the Caucasian stock; to the Irish Catholic, the German septic, and the Chinese Confucian and Buddhist, as well as to the descendants of Protestantism and Puritanism. Such are some of the problems, aside from those more purely ecclesiastical and religious, which are put into the hands of America to solve. Now, if religion, out of its manifold historic career and experience, out of its claim to touch the deepest things in human nature and to represent man's grandest inspirations, has any aid to offer in the solution of these problems (and, if it has not, then it must indeed stand aside as a force that has had its day, and is no longer available in human society),—but, if religion in any form can help forward the settlement of these questions, then surely the Free Religious Association, committed to the defence of no dogmas, untrammelled by traditions, having no lines of church authority to hold, utterly disencumbered of all ecclesiastical impedimenta, cordially allying itself with science, free to accept truth wherever and however found, and holding itself perfectly plastic to the spirit of the age, should be able to render some service in the struggle with these great problems whose solution is to determine the future of American government and life. Such is a hint of the opportunities which await the personal faith and fidelity that shall transform them into living forces and accomplished facts.

DIMAN'S "THEISTIC ARGUMENT."

The late Professor Diman, of Brown University, delivered somewhat more than a year ago a course of lectures on "The Theistic Argument as Affected by Recent Theories," before the Lowell Institute, in Boston, which has just been published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

There is little that is new or striking in this well-printed volume. It presents essentially the argument of "natural theology" already familiar to students. Professor Diman says [p. 272]: "My steady aim from the beginning has been, not to reason from abstract premises, but from the evident and acknowledged phenomena of nature and life,—not from the unknown to the known, but from the known to the unknown. We began with the facts given in the external world; from those we argued back to an intelligent cause; we proceeded next to the facts of human consciousness, and from those argued back to a moral cause." In fact, he explicitly declares at the outset [p. 30]: "The aim of this discussion will be to show that the rational grounds on which belief in the existence of a Supreme Being must be rested have not been essentially modified by modern thought."

Consequently, the author argues still for the existence of a God distinct from and anterior to the universe itself, a supramundane and supernatural being that must not be confounded with the natura naturans of Spinoza, or with the immanent and omnipresent force recognized by modern science. Nor does he at all favor the Transcendentalist intuition, but presses against it some of the objections that Transcendentalism has never yet satisfactorily answered: "If we are so made that we have a direct and immediate intuition of the existence of a supreme being, an intuition independent of all external evidence, a direct revelation to the soul, we may well inquire, Why has the question of the divine existence given rise to so much discussion? . . . The assertion that man knows God by immediate intuition is, in fact, mere dogmatism. . . . None, in fact, but the most extreme school of mystics have consistently claimed an intuition of God independent of the ordinary laws of cognition" [i.e. the laws of the logical understanding]. Nevertheless, Professor Diman himself is obliged to appeal to intuition in a different sense, in order to prove the "infinity" of the supernatural deity he has inferred from nature [p. 316]: "We have shown that the universe must have had an inconceivably powerful and intelligent author, a supreme framer and governor who has adjusted, throughout its wondrous frame, means to ends with marvellous exactness, who has formed his creatures to recognize a moral law, who has made the course of their history through the ages an increasing expression and illustration and demonstration of a moral purpose. We have further shown that we are so made, or, if another statement of the fact be preferred, have grown so to be, that we have intuitions which are the very framework of all our thought, of infinity and eternity. When we have reached this point, the idea of God spontaneously completes itself. We irresistibly connect these intuitions with the first cause. The author of the universe must be the being of whom these are predicable. When the mind has been brought to admit the existence of a supreme intelligence and will, it will not hesitate to believe that this intelligence and will are also infinite and eternal."

Perhaps this is the best that Orthodoxy can do, in the attempt to bridge the chasm that yawns between nature and a supernatural deity, however conceived; and the God of Orthodoxy is necessarily and essentially supernatural. An entirely different treatment of the "theistic argument," however, is required to maintain it in the respect and confidence of an age trained more and more to discredit the dualism which Orthodoxy thus postulates. For a hint of what this different treatment, as I conceive it, must be, I can now only refer to the Index Tract called "The God of Science," and simply add here that Professor Diman's book is characterized throughout by a sobriety of statement and fairness of spirit which must command the respect even of those who dissent from his essential position.

CONCERNING SLADE, THE "MEDIUM."

As the Index is read by many excellent Spiritualists, some of whom I am happy to number among my personal friends, I desire to warn them against putting too much confidence in the manifestations of the notorious Dr. Henry Slade, for the simple but sufficient reason that at least a large part of his proceedings are fraudulent. I am sorry to be compelled to give this warning, but the prominence of Slade for many years, the great extent of his journeyings, the renown given to him by the works of Professor Zöllner and Mr. Epes Sargent, and the use made of him in the lectures of Joseph Cook,—all combine to strengthen my conviction that it is a clear matter of duty for me to put into print some facts concerning him which have recently come under my own observation.

Slade has been visiting the city in which I am at present residing, and has given exhibitions of his powers as a "medium." In company with other candid investigators, I attended several of his "séances," and can testify that from beginning to end his performances were either unadulterated trickery, or were explainable upon natural hypotheses which require no intervention of "spirits" or other supernatural agencies. I enclose with this communication an article which appeared as an editorial in the Saginaw Evening News, and which explains the modus operandi of the most important of his wonderful feats. He was detected in his mode of obtaining raps, in his playing upon the accordion, in his slate-written messages, in his tossing of pencils and other light articles into the air, in his table-lifting, and, in short, in nearly all the different manifestations which have rendered his name so well known in this country and in Europe.

I desire to say, moreover, that any thought of detecting Slade had not entered my mind prior to my visits to his rooms. I had previously read with care the works of Zöllner and Sargent, and was disposed to give Slade the credit of being concerned in phenomena which it would be beyond my power to explain. I was disposed, moreover, to believe that the review of the above-mentioned books which recently appeared in the Index was unfair to their authors. I do not even now pretend to account for all that these two writers have said of Slade; but I now know, as a result of personal investigation, that Slade is guilty of downright humbuggery; that, during several sittings given to myself and others, he endeavored throughout to impose upon us by juggler's tricks; and that in no instance did spirits have anything to do with the writing of his messages, nor did they take part in any of his performances. So complete in fact was the exposure of his frauds that, although he had previously announced his intention of remaining several days longer, he incontinently decamped at the close of the last "sitting," and life-long Spiritualists have since announced their abandonment of him and of his delusions. I think that a fair logic must hereafter throw grave doubts upon all arguments for Spiritualism which are founded upon any manifestations connected with the name of so arrant an impostor as Slade. It is far easier to believe, for instance, that he imposed upon Zöllner and others than it is to believe in the necessity of imagining a fourth dimension of space in order to account for his manipulations.

I may add that other discreditable facts concerning Slade have recently come into my possession, but the above is sufficient to put all fair-minded persons upon their guard against him.

ROWLAND CONNOR. /

A RIGHT GAINED IN RHODE ISLAND.

The three years' discussion as to the right of the resident minister of the Free Religious Society of Providence to join parties in marriage has resulted in the removal of all doubt on that subject by the action of the last General Assembly. The law originally said that the ordained minister of any religious denomination and either justice of the Supreme Court may join persons in marriage in any town or city of the State. The question raised was this: that the Free Religious Society could not be considered a religious society within the meaning of the statute. To this, it was replied, on good Roger Williams ground, that the State could not deny the claim of this Society to be religious without, in so far as that was considered, undertaking to define religion,—the thing which of all others it had no right to do. The following amendment to the law drawn by Mr. Hinckley was passed by the last assembly, and went into effect July 1:—

"Section 2. Any society professing to meet for religious purposes and incorporated for the promotion of such purposes, and sustaining a minister publicly ordained according to the customs and usages of such society, and holding stated and regular services, shall be considered as belonging to a religious denomination within the meaning of Section 7, Chapter 149, of the General Statutes; and its minister shall have all the rights conferred by said section upon ordained ministers of religious denominations."

By this action, it will be seen that not only has the resident minister of the Free Religious Society henceforth the same rights under the law as the ordained ministers of the churches, but any society and any minister under like conditions will hereafter have the same rights. This is a radical and significant departure from the old authorities, and a step forward toward a larger religious freedom.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE identity of the British inch with the unit of measurement used in the construction of the Egyptian pyramids was argued by Mr. Charles Latimer, in an address at the late meeting of the American Society of Civil Engineers at Montreal. Mr. Latimer maintained also that the French metre was a novel and arbitrary standard of measure, and should not be adopted by English-speaking nations in place of their own time-honored unit.

THE report of the Astronomic Royal to the Board of Visitors at the annual visitation was listened to with special interest, and the attendance of astronomers was larger than usual, because it was generally understood that it would be the last time the veteran astronomer, Sir George Airy, who is about retiring from the charge of the observatory, in order to devote all his time and energies to researches he has on hand, would be seen at his post. It was stated that "the sun's chromosphere has been examined with the half-prism spectroscope on twenty-nine days during the year. Fourteen sun-spots have been examined on twenty days, with reference to the broadening of the lines in their spectra. The results confirm the remark that some of the lines of iron are broadened in some spots, while others are broadened in other spots. Displacements of some of the lines of iron toward the red, and of others toward the blue, have also been noted in the case of one spot. A remarkable spectrum of a sun-spot showing seventeen strong black lines or bands, each as broad as b_1 in the solar spectrum (except some very faint lines), has also been subsequently remarked in the spectra of several spots." The report mentions that "between 1880, May 9, and 1881, May 13, photographs of the sun were taken in one hundred and forty days, and of these two hundred and eighty-four have been selected for preservation. There are only eight days, out of one hundred and forty-nine days, on which the sun's disk was observed to be free from spots." "The number of hours of bright sunshine, recorded with Campbell's sunshine instrument, during 1880, was one thousand two hundred and fourteen, which is about the same as the average of the four years for which we have a record."

It could hardly be expected that a German scientist, and especially one whose reputation is so identified with purely physical investigations, would be likely to lend very important support to spiritual ideas, and especially the continuity of personal life beyond the present sphere of existence; and yet, if Prof. Helmholtz is to be counted on either side of this question, it is certainly upon the positive. According to his view, such a perpetuation of existence beyond the grave is inconceivable apart from the "dense material of organic life." Thus he reasons in one of the essays in the volume of his scientific papers lately published: "Just as the flame remains the same in appearance, and continues to exist with the same form and structure, although it draws every minute fresh combustible vapor and fresh oxygen from the air into the vortex of its ascending current, and just as the wave goes on in unaltered form, and is yet being reconstructed every moment from fresh particles of water, so also, in the living being, it is not the definite mass of substance which now constitutes the body to which the continuance of the individual is attached. For the material of the body, like that of the flame, is subject to continuous and comparatively rapid change,—a change the more rapid, the livelier the activity of the organs in question. Some constituents are removed from day to day, some from month to month, and others only after years. That which continues to exist as a particular individual is like the flame and the wave,—only the form of motion which continually attracts fresh matter into its vortex and expels the old."

THE very interesting series of papers on a somewhat trite subject, entitled "Physical Education," which have been running through the Popular Science Monthly for some months past, are remarkable not only for the wide range of observation and reading which they evince, and bright and pungent treatment of the theme, but also for the sharp thrusts that are occasionally given at the old theology and current crudities and falsities of popular thinking. A few specimens of these will fall very properly into this department of the Index; and, although some of its readers no doubt have read them before, the repetition will give them additional emphasis, while to others they will possess a fresh interest. The doctor places at the head of his articles the following new rendering of one of the Beatitudes, not from the "revised edition," we conclude: "Blessed are the pure, for they can follow their inclinations with impunity." "Unnatural food is the principal cause of human degeneration. It is the oldest vice. If we reflect upon the number of ruinous dietetic abuses, and their immemorial tyranny over the larger part of the human race, we are tempted to eschew all symbolical interpretation of the Paradise legend, and to ascribe the fall of mankind literally and exclusively to the eating of forbidden food." The author advocates abstemious living and indicates his preference for vegetable food in such a passage as this. Alluding to the old Roman habits, he says, "In their application of the word, a frugal diet meant quite literally a diet of tree-fruits; and that our primogenitor was a frugivorous creature is the one point in which the Darwinian genesis agrees with the Mosaic version." Referring to the bad effects of over-eating, he says: "For children, a nearly infallible peptic corrective is a fast day passed in cheerful out-door exercise." There is wholesome good sense no less than keen sarcasm in these words, which it would be well for our Roman Catholic brethren to consider: "There are worthier objects of charity than famine-stricken nations that send their bread-stuffs to the distillery."

"MANY of our physical educators still hold to the cardinal error of their spiritual colleagues, who consider depravity and wretchedness as the normal condition of man, and happiness as the reward of a self-abhorring suppression of all natural desires and of a blind confidence in the efficacy of an abnormal and mysterious remedy; nay, who despise earth herself as a 'vale of tears,' and life as a disease whose only cure is death, whose only anodyne a dream of a supernatural elysium." "We should try to restore life to its original purity and healthfulness instead of despising it and looking for happiness beyond the grave." "But the deluge of medieval superstition is past assuaging, and many a submerged truth has reappeared like a bequest of a former and better world, and now stands as a way-mark on the road to a true science of life. We have rediscovered the truth that the weal and woe of earth are not distributed by the caprices of a mysterious fate, but that they follow as sure effects upon ascertainable causes. Our best thinkers have ceased to doubt that man can work out his own destiny; that the Creator has made us the keepers of our own happiness on conditions which he never violates; that he has attached pleasure to every good act and pain to every wrong; that he fulfils the promises of our yearnings and never permits us to sin unwarned. We have at last begun to realize the fact that the physical laws of God find an echo in the voice of our innate monitor, and only hereditary mistrust in our instincts makes us still hesitate to commit ourselves to its guidance. But experience will overcome that prejudice by and by, duty and inclination will go hand in hand, and the result will justify our trust in the wisdom and benevolence of nature."

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE study carried on at home by means of correspondence from all parts of the land is represented as having eminent success. It is managed without ostentation, and has for the last year's showing nine hundred and sixty students with one hundred and seventy-four officers and teachers. The Secretary is Miss A. E. Ticknor, of 9 Park Street, Boston. English literature is a favorite branch, being pursued by three hundred and forty-eight students. Mathematical science is taught by five women trained by Professor Maria Mitchell, of Vassar College. A new branch is about to be added to the curriculum, bearing on Paleontology and Archaeology. Books are loaned at a cost of one cent for two days, and are sent by mail. The lending library contains one thousand one hundred and fifty-five volumes. This course is a real beneficence to farmers' wives and others, who find in it stimulus and refreshment amid their dreary round of petty household cares.

THE Eighth Annual Session of the National Conference of Charities and Correction will meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives, State House, Boston, at 10 A.M., July 25, 1881, and will continue in session six days. The following is the order of business, so far as can now be announced: At 10 A.M., Address of Welcome, by His Excellency Gov. Long, of Massachusetts; at 11 A.M., address of the retiring President, Mr. F. B. Sanborn, of Massachusetts; at 12 M., Reports from the States represented in the Conference; at 4 P.M., a Report from the Committee on the Work of Boards of State Charities, by General Brinkerhoff, of Ohio, Chairman of the Committee, followed by a discussion; at 8 P.M., a special paper from the same Committee, on "The Utility of State Boards," read by Hon. George S. Robinson, of Illinois, and followed by a discussion.

Tuesday, July 26.—At 9 A.M., Reports from the States continued; at 10 A.M., a Report from the Committee on Charitable Organization in Cities, followed by a discussion; at 12 M., a special paper from the same Committee, on "Out-door Relief in the United States," read by Seth Low, Esq., of Brooklyn, N.Y., and followed by a discussion; at 3 P.M., visits to the city charities of Boston; at 8 P.M., a paper by Mrs. C. R. Lowell, of New York, "Considerations concerning a Better System for the Public Charities and Corrections of a City."

Wednesday, July 27.—At 9 A.M., Final Reports from the States; at 10 A.M., a Report from the Committee on Immigration, read by the Secretary, Dr. Charles S. Hoyt, of New York, and followed by a discussion; at 12 M., a special paper from the same Committee, followed by a discussion; at 3 P.M., visits to State charitable establishments in the vicinity of Boston; at 8 P.M., the Report of the Statistical Secretary, Rev. F. H. Wines, of Illinois.

Thursday, July 28.—At 10 A.M., a Report from the Committee on Crime and Penalties, presented by the Chairman, Professor Wayland, of Connecticut, and followed by a discussion; at 11.30 A.M., a special paper from the same Committee, followed by a discussion; at 1.30 P.M., a visit to the Reformatory Prison for Women, at Sherborn, followed by a visit to the State Prison at Concord, if desired.

Friday, July 29.—At 10 A.M., a Report from the Committee on Preventive Work among Children, followed by a discussion; at 12 M., a special report by the Auxiliary Visitors of Massachusetts on "The Care of Friendless Girls," followed by a discussion; at 3 P.M., visits to the public and private reformatories in Boston and its vicinity; at 8 P.M., an evening session for the business of the Conference.

Saturday, July 30.—At 9 A.M., a session for business; at 10 A.M., a Report from the Committee on Imbecility and Idiocy, presented by the Chairman, Dr. H. B. Wilbur, of New York, and followed by a discussion; at 12 M., a special paper on "The Care of Epileptics," presented by the same Committee.

There will be no afternoon or evening session on Saturday, and the closing business of the Conference will be transacted at the sessions on Friday evening and Saturday morning.

Governors and Lieutenant-Governors of States, and delegates specially appointed to represent States or Provinces, and all members of Boards of Charities and Prison Commissions are ex officio members of the Conference. All persons officially connected with State or municipal charitable, penal, or reformatory establishments, who attend in that capacity, are also members of the Conference; and all persons regularly delegated to represent private charitable organizations are admitted as members on presenting their credentials. All other persons interested in charitable work are invited to be present.

F. B. SANBORN, of Massachusetts,
President of the Conference.

DILLER LUTHER, of Penn.,	Secretaries of the Conference.
JAMES O. FANNING, of N.Y.,
H. B. WHEELRIGHT, of Mass.,
GEORGE C. HOWE, of Conn.,
A. G. BYERS, of O.,
HENRY W. LORD, of Mich.,
H. H. GILES, of Wis.,

Boston, June 4, 1881.

Town, City, and County Overseers and Superintendents of the Poor are specially invited to attend the Conference on the 25th, 26th, and 29th of July.

THE SLATE-WRITER.

The Result of the Investigations into the So-called Spiritual Manifestations by Men who Honestly Looked for the Truth.

Dr. Slade, "slate-writer," left our city very suddenly Thursday afternoon, having had abundant reasons for his departure in the fact of which he had probably become aware, that a public exposure of the emptiness of his pretensions as a spiritualist "medium" was about to be made. Dr. Slade has long been regarded as in some respects the most wonderful medium in the world. Mr. Epes Sargent's Scientific Basis of Spiritualism would not have been written, in all probability, but for the astonishing performances therein ascribed to Slade, and the same statement is true with regard to the still more wonderful book of Professor Zollner, of Germany. Without any desire to pass judgment upon the alleged facts of these two publications, we will state plainly some results of an investigation of Slade's performances while in this city; and we confine our statements to what was positively seen by candid investigators whose names can be furnished, if necessary.

All of his accordion-playing is very simple trickery. The instrument employed is easily worked, and sounds may be produced upon it when in sight of the "sitter" by concealing the fingers of the medium's hand in the folds of the flexible sides, and working them backward and forward, or by holding the accordion so that it will draw out by its own weight, and thus produce sounds. But no regular music is produced except when the instrument is out of sight of the visitor, and the lower part of it held fast under Slade's knee. In this position, he manages to grind out a tune. When held by a visitor on the opposite side of a table, Slade reaches out his leg and pushes up the bottom of the accordion with his foot. He was seen to do this at least once, and was subsequently foiled in several attempts to repeat the trick.

His elevation of the table was effected by sitting close to the table and contracting the muscles of the abdomen and upper leg, assisting himself when necessary by his knee. The table dropped again and again when a visitor presumed to look under it, but it did not drop soon enough to hide the deception. Slade's painted cheeks aid in this performance, as the paint conceals the flush attending the muscular effort. Any one may raise a table of considerable weight in this manner, the hands and elbows resting on top of it.

The location of his raps was accurately determined at two different sittings, and the methods of obtaining them were clearly ascertained. Most of them are slight tapplings upon the under side of a slate, by Slade's fingers. A favorite method, however, is to use his foot against the leg of a table or against the visitor's chair. Sometimes he varies the amusement by striking a slate against the table leg or against a chair, and endeavoring, at the same time, to direct attention to a remote door as the locality of the raps. More than once he was thus seen to hit a chair with a slate, and immediately indicate a door back of the visitor as the place of the raps. During two prolonged sittings, one of which was regarded by Slade himself as very successful, all the raps were thus easily accounted for.

Nine-tenths of Slade's famous slate-messages were written by Slade while holding the slate upon his knee, the sound of the pencil being obscured by coughing or some other noise, and the attention of the visitor being drawn away, if possible, from what he is doing, by muscular contortions, conversation, and various other devices. The slate is then held under the table for the convenience of the "spirits" (as though the message were not already written), and attention is now directed to the sound of the pencil, which is only Slade's finger-nail scratching a corner of the under side of the slate. The two sounds, that of the pencil and that of the finger-nail, are not separable by an ordinary ear when a pencil of the requisite degree of softness is employed. After Slade has scratched long enough, the slate is triumphantly held up as containing a message from the angels. Every detail of this manipulation was distinctly traced out many times by three different investigators. Once, when the slate was held under the table by a visitor, the message having been previously written upon it by Slade, the angelic scratching was produced by some contrivance worked apparently by Slade's knee. All of the messages thus produced are apt to be ill-written, sometimes almost undecipherable, and are usually brief answers to questions asked by visitors. When a question is written by a visitor upon the slate, Slade puts the slate under the table, turns it over and reads the question, and is thus enabled to furnish a direct answer. Several investigators distinctly witnessed this manipulation. The long and plainly-written messages are probably put upon a slate before the visitors enter the room, and the slate containing them cleverly substituted for some other which the visitors have ascertained to be clean. This can be readily done, as there are plenty of slates within reach. The investigators were not wholly agreed as to the precise method of this manipulation, and several of them went to Slade, Thursday morning, to request a final sitting; but the bird had flown, and it is safe to say that Slade will not be seen again in this city.

It is not necessary to detail the mode of several other less important tricks. Enough that nothing in any of Slade's manifestations went beyond very ordinary slight-of-hand performances; in fact, any clever twenty-five-cent juggler can furnish better illusions than this five-dollar charlatan. We pronounce no judgment upon Slade's doings elsewhere, or upon mediumistic manifestations in general, or upon the philosophy or beliefs of Spiritualists. Spiritualism may be true; but Dr. Slade is a rank humbug, unworthy the countenance of any self-respecting Spiritualist, or any other honest man.—Saginaw Evening News, June 25.

A SCENE lately took place at St. Etienne, where a Workmen's Congress was being held. The organizers of it, in spite of the prohibition they had received from the authorities, bedecked the platform with revolutionary red flags. The Prefect dispatched police to the meeting to remove the objectionable colors. The audience protested, but did not attempt to prevent the police from carrying out their orders.

'WAY DOWN EAST.

DEAR INDEX,—“New England,” “New Brunswick,” and “New Scotland,” or “Nova Scotia,” as it is called in a “vulgar tongue,” lie side by side, and yet are far apart. They are neighbors, and yet strangers. In “colonial” times the three were better acquainted, more familiar with each other, than they are to-day, perhaps. Since the days of '76, the Revolution and Independence, differences in government have made vast differences in the people. A hundred years ago, the life, customs, habits of New England, were substantially the same as existed here; but how different now! It requires but little activity of imagination, on the part of one accustomed to the life of present New England, to conceive himself in the midst of just about such peculiarities of life, custom, habit, manners, religion, etc., as existed here, and all along the coast to the Harlem River, a hundred years ago. The community wherein I am at present located is made up in the main of descendants of men and women who left the neighborhood of Boston at the time of the “evacuation,” rather than become disloyal to their king. They were called “Blue-noses” by the “Yankee Rebels,” because of their devotion to the blue-blooded royalty of the “mother country”; and the term is yet a stigma in the mouths of New Englanders when alluding to their maritime cousins, although the origin of the term is unknown to them; but it is on this side of the line of nationality a mark of fidelity and honor. I have recently been conversing with an old lady eighty-seven years of age, born here in 1784, whose parents came from Braintree, Mass. Others came from Somerville, Mass.; and the land upon which the city of East Somerville stands is vested in the descendants of “Tories” who left it at the time of the Revolution, and is held to-day without legal title. But the old spirit of loyalty to king has dwindled and died. The descendants of those Tories are fully imbued with the spirit of republicanism, and would like nothing better than to see this territory, Nova Scotia, become one of the United States.

It is a beautiful country in summer, and will become an attraction for tourists, and a choice spot for quiet vacations in hot weather, in time. I doubt if any spot on the globe will surpass in natural beauty the place where I am located, on the northern shore of the “Basin of Minas,” as it is known in geography. The Bay of Fundy extends far up from Cape Sable, between New Brunswick and New Scotland, like a liquid wedge, tapering gradually to its point at Cape Split, the northern extreme of Blomidon. There Fundy ends, but not so the sea. Through a narrow strait there the tides ebb and flow with a wild velocity that is sometimes a marvel to behold. When the tide is running at its strongest, whirlpools form; that in light winds will spin a vessel like a top. Above this strait, the shores recede and form a shallow, oval basin, sixty miles long and about thirty miles wide at its widest part. When it is said that this basin empties and fills itself—not entirely, but, in truth, nearly so—every twelve hours, and that the water rises and falls an average of fifty feet perpendicularly, the reader will understand that the water, at least, is generally very busy here. The basin, locked as it is all around by highlands, and nowhere open to the sea, is, when the tide is full, on a calm day in June, such as to-day, for instance, as fair a bosom as ever waked dreams of beauty in the mind of man. Besides being beautiful, it is very useful. The people who inhabit its shores get their living in great part out of it. That is, it is full of fish through the spring and summer seasons,—herring, codfish, halibut, pollock, haddock, while the water is warming up under the northern sun. And then, about the twenty-second day of June, year after year, the longest day on the roll, up come the silver-sided thousand-scaled shad; and for five or six weeks this country wakes to action. Then, for one who has never seen it, a few days among boats and weirs, fishermen and fish, is an experience that will be talked of in summer vacations for years. Perhaps Index readers might be interested enough to warrant an attempt to give briefly an idea of the work.

Conceive, then, if you can, that it is “low-tide.” Where at “high-tide” you saw only a beautiful expanse of water, you now see thousands of acres of bare “flats” almost as level as a floor, sloping back from a clean and pebbled beach, with just enough dip to drain it, as smooth and hard, much of it, as a race-track. The water is now from two to three miles away from the shore. On these "flats," well out toward "low-water,"—i.e., the lowest point reached by the ebbing tide,—the weirs are built by driving stakes into the bottom, and weaving into them a woof of long brush wattles. They are open to the shore, and contain at the lowest point a "bend" into which the fish settle on the "ebb" tide. Then they are swept out by nets, and hauled home on tip-carts,—the primitive "one-hoss shay." That is the way the weirs do the business. There are miles and miles of these brush traps along these flats, and for many years it was the only method known to the natives. The other and best way of catching shad is in "drift nets." These nets are made with a diamond-shaped mesh large enough to catch the shad as it attempts to pass through. "All hope resign who enter here" would be a good motto for them. The nets are fifteen feet deep, and from a half to two-thirds of a mile long. The bottom rope is loaded with lead, and the upper one with wood, so that when the net is in the water it hangs perpendicularly, and the meshes stand open for the game. Some idea of the extent of the work may be gathered from the statement that there are on this little basin about one hundred and seventy-five boats, drifting up and down with the tide, and spreading in the water not less than eighty miles of net. The inhabitants are naturally somewhat exacting worshippers of the famous Nazarene who understood the fishing business so thoroughly that he could tell on which side of the boat a net should be cast to secure a good haul. There is not much, if any, Free Religion among them; but still they "are exceedingly religious," as was said of a more ancient people. For instance, the weirs, once built, must catch fish on Sundays as long as they stand. Now Free Religion would say: "If you catch the fish, it is your duty to save them. To leave them in the weir to spoil, simply because it is Sunday instead of Monday, is wrong. If you, the owner, have conscientious scruples about taking them yourself, here are plenty of poor men who would be very thankful for permission to save them, that they might thereby have store without cost for winter. Bid them come to the feast." But there is no Free Religion here, I am sorry to say. On the contrary, there is more old-fashioned, blue-stocking Presbyterian bigotry here than you can find on the same amount of territory anywhere outside of Scotland itself. They are all alike. There are no degrees in it. All sects are united in a vigorous determination to damn everybody who doesn't do exactly as they want him to do. The prominent ones in all churches are fishermen. Their theology won't let them fish on Sunday. Their bigotry and selfishness won't allow them to let anybody else fish when they can't. It is like the big boys forcing the little ones not to go coasting because the big boys can't coast too. The consequence is that there are theological vultures roosting along-shore o' Sundays, watching for poor fellows who attempt to cheat, not God, but the Church, and get a load of shad on the "Lord's day." When they find a poor devil thus trying to fill his barrel, they pounce upon him, take his fish-cart or boat,—such is the law,—and fine him. It is quite refreshing to meet a man who has the courage to defy their bigoted laws, and such an one I heard of the other day. On a Sunday morning, about ten o'clock, he was driving his team home from his weir loaded with shad, and met the Scotch Presbyterian minister on his way to preach. Said the fisherman, "Good morning, sir; where're y' goin' to preach to-morrow?"

Minister.—"I am going to preach in the church to-day."

Fisherman.—"What! is this Sabbath?"

Minister.—"Deed, sir, I think you know that yourself."

Fisherman.—"Oh, the deuce! I've made a mistake! I thought all the time to-morrow w's Sabbath; 'nd the wimmen said somethin' about goin' to wash to-day, too. I must hurry home 'n' stop them."

Notwithstanding the preacher had talked about using revolvers as a possible prevention of Sabbath-breaking, he never attempted to disturb this fellow. His "cheek" was too much for the other's "jowl," and he was left undisturbed.

I intended, when I began, to write of the quaint oddities of the people; and here I am at the end of your patience, and nothing more, or much more, than a "fish story." But, broil the shad, with the usual grano salis, and I hope you will like the dish.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

SECRETARY WINDOM recently said that he was "a good deal more of a civil-service reformer than when he entered the secretaryship."

M. D. MILLS, of San Francisco, has given $75,000 to the University of California to endow a chair of intellectual and moral philosophy and civil policy.

REV. DR. BARTOL gave the address before the Bowdoin College Alumni last week. His subject was "The Infinite in Man." Dr. Bartol is a graduate of this college of the class of 1832.

MISS M. A. HARDAKER has been engaged for editorial assistance on the Boston Transcript. Her vigorous and incisive thought will be a marked element in the columns of that deservedly popular sheet.

A VALUABLE series of hand-books of sanitary information and health-primers has come from the press of Presley Blakiston, of Philadelphia, that are judged worthy of credit to "an increasing philanthropic purpose on the part of intelligent physicians to popularize their knowledge."

MRS. PRUDENCE CRANDALL PHILLEO, the Quaker woman who, in her girlhood, horrified the town of Canterbury, Conn., by undertaking to teach some colored children, is still living in Kansas. She is now a widow of nearly seventy-eight years, well preserved and happy in a placid life upon a farm owned by herself.

REV. S. J. STEWART, of Bangor, Me., one of the recent accessions to the Unitarian pulpit from Orthodoxy, has lately printed a discourse on Morality, which is a timely contribution to the current discussion of the relation between moral conduct and the decay of theological creeds. Mr. Stewart is both radical and strong. We have marked the discourse as one to be reprinted for Index readers when there is room.

A LUCKNOW fakir has been astounding the natives of his vicinity by various marvellous feats, of which the latest was to sit in perfect quiet and unconcern close to an enormous fire. The heat was so great that no spectator could approach within two hundred yards of the blaze, which was fed by eleven cart-loads of material. This fire-proof hero sustained such exposure for four hours without singe; and he has naturally become the recipient of pious offerings from all quarters of Hindu faith. The rush of pilgrims made it necessary to employ a police detachment. His method of immunity from burning remains to be shown; but, verily, he is a first-class candidate as ambassador to His Majesty the Square-foot.

THE honor which is ascribed to thieves seems to be ventilated by a gang of California cut-throats, who declared it against their principles to rob ladies or cripples, and allowed one of their male victims to keep a watch which had been the gift of a dead father. The cripple had only lost an arm. And they even listened to the prayer of one who begged to retain fifty cents to purchase a drink with on arriving at Alamosa, giving him back five times the sum he craved. Another band of Circassian highwaymen were moved by the power of the gospel. A missionary relates that after being robbed he preached to them so effectively of "righteousness and judgment to come" that they restored to him article after article, till, to his surprise, they bade him go his way, having retained for their own unlawful use only the modest sum of twenty-five cents.

THE decease of Dr. Benjamin H. Crandon, who had filled a long term of years with successful effort as a specialist practitioner in this city, saddens deeply all who had enjoyed his acquaintance. Through all the varied experiences of life, he held to a firm conviction of the worth of high and generous esteem for the possibilities of human character. Whatever might be the disabilities or misfortunes of those he met, his own course toward them was marked with the beauty of candor and the warmth of genuine regard for all that could lay claim to honor. Enjoying, personally, freedom from sectarian bias, he seemed imbued with a spirit that was never weary in the attempt, by all available means, to lighten the burden and gloom of dogmatic prejudice for all whom it was possible to reach. Indeed, human needs, or suffering in any form, ever prompted him to hearty and patient self-sacrifice in its behalf. One such noble life radiates with incalculable energy to the uplifting and cheer of associated lives.

A FEW weeks since, we published a thrilling narrative from Mrs. Louise Suter, an English woman residing in Asia Minor, concerning the seizure and abduction of her husband by brigands, and the imminent danger of his being murdered unless a heavy ransom was paid for his deliverance. Rev. Mr. Fiske hands us the following additional particulars in a letter from the same lady: "My dear husband's life has been spared. He was set at liberty a fortnight ago, the government paying the full ransom. The brigands would hear of no reduction, and the £15,000 were paid over to them. . . . The brigands, having friends in town, knew exactly what the consul-general was doing, what telegrams he received, etc. The English government, in hopes of getting a reduction, tried to temporize with the brigands, and this so infuriated them that discussions and disputes frequently took place as to the propriety of beheading Harry and sending his head to the consul. For the whole time he was a prisoner, the brigands, twenty-five in number, had to be supplied with food, shoes, drink, socks, calicoes, combs, and innumerable other things; the tobacco bill was heavy, and we have reason to believe that the things we sent them were not for present use, but stored away for future use. They robbed me of every little valuable I possessed,—remembrances of my mother, my children, my husband's mother,—and loaded themselves with sheets, towels, handkerchiefs, table-cloths, and napkins, and anything else that was likely to be useful to them; and my husband tells me that the first day they could sit down quietly and in safety they drew lots and divided their booty, and set themselves sewing shirts, having supplied themselves even with scissors, needles, and thread. They are very superstitious, and before eating always made the sign of the cross, and at Easter chanted hymns, kissed each other, and my husband and his servant also. Their conversation was chiefly of murder, and they related tales and their experiences. They had all been driven to the mountains by ill-treatment at the hands of the Turks. I wish my husband to write a little book wherein to relate his adventures, but he hates to think or talk of the past two months. When he was brought down from the mountains, he was covered with boils and sores from top to toe, to say nothing of the vermin which crawled all over him. It would be a good lesson to the Sultan if he could spend a month in this style among his subjects, the kings of the mountains."

FOREIGN.

A VOLUME will soon be brought out in London entitled Punishments in the Olden Time, by Mr. William Andrews, honorary secretary of the Hull Literary Club. The book will contain an historical account of the ducking-stool, brank, pillory, stocks, drunkard's cloak, whipping-post, etc.

FOR the future, Russian seamen are to wear beards. This measure is due to the action of the Czar himself, who dislikes everything that smacks of western culture, and, above all things, shaving. Since the time of Peter the Great, the Russian sailor has always had to be an expert with the razor. For the first time for nearly two hundred years, this practice, borrowed from Europe, is to be discontinued.

THOSE who are inclined to doubt whether the world is really advancing in intelligence may take comfort in the fact that the comet which is showing itself to English people has by none been looked upon as a supernatural messenger from heaven, foreboding any sort of ill. Astronomers have yet to explain to us a good deal that is mysterious in the composition and movements of comets; but they have finally disposed of the superstitions about them which were in vogue even within the memory of living men.—London Weekly Dispatch.

THERE are few things more amusing than the sight of M. Phillippoteaux endeavoring to keep order in the Chamber of Deputies during a noisy sitting. He becomes nervous and agitated, stutters out weak words of admonition which pierce the target like leaden-tipped arrows, but makes a worse din than all the other clamor together by furious rappings with his paper-knife and jerkings at his bell. As the ring-leaders of the obstreperous boys grow more daring and meet his Jove-like frown with scoffing jests and antics, a prominent feature of M. Phillippoteaux's face glows with scarlet wrath, and his hand, clutching wildly at the bell, seems to act under a confuse notion of its whereabouts, the effect of which is very odd indeed.—Paris Journal.

The effort of women to gain admission to the University of Durham in England has had this result, according to the London Spectator: "The university has granted only half their prayer. 'You want degrees, do you? Certainly, provided that you prove yourselves qualified to take them. And you want scholarships, in order to be enabled to qualify yourselves for degrees? Oh dear, no! Scholarships are for men, not for women. You shall have free permission to make as many bricks as we do and to use our ovens for making them, but you must make them without straw. We want all that there is in that way for ourselves.' It is shocking to have to chronicle such ingratitude, but the memorialists call this granting 'only one and that the least important part' of the request made to the university."

The Nihilist who was arrested a few days ago in Germany, and was then reported to be Hartmann, is now said to be the son of a Russian ambassador at one of the principal European courts. If this be so, it is only another instance of what is well known at St. Petersburg, that the great secret army of Nihilism is recruited quite as much from the upper as from the middle ranks of the Russian society. This fact makes the movement all the more appalling to the court and bureaucracy of which Alexander III. is the invisible centre. Neither concessions to the peasantry nor sops to the trading-classes can check its progress. The revolution for which the Tsar and his advisers are impatiently waiting, the foes they dare not face and know not how to shrink from, are men, and women too, of their own households.—London Dispatch.

The Bishop of Peterborough, who, on the strength of a genial speech at the Church Congress last year, has been regarded as a friendly adversary by the Non-conformists, has lost that reputation by a foolish attack on the Liberation Society. He accuses Liberationists of wishing to turn churches into drinking-saloons and cathedrals into factories; and when challenged for his authority, instead of pleading guilty to a jest, he tries to defend his statement by an elaborate argument founded on the Liberalist principle that ecclesiastical buildings are public property and should be administered for the benefit of the entire public. His entertainer at Leicester makes the best retort possible by sending a large donation to the society. The bishops would consult their own interests best by leaving the Liberation Society alone.

If anybody wonders why the Irish should not love England, let him look at the comic papers just now. Hatred and contempt glisten in every line of these caricatures of the national type. It may be said that such things as these are trifles, and that Irishmen do not mind. It may be so, for anything that we know; but, if it is, then the Irish are more callous than any other people ever were before. As a matter of fact, it is pretty certain that they do mind, and that these ferocious satires, showered by a strong, dominant people on a very weak one, produce an angrier and a deeper resentment than would come of ever so many harsh laws. Nobody would be so stung as an Englishman by odious caricatures like those which he relishes without scruple when directed against Irishmen. Yet we profess to be amazed at Irish ingratitude and antipathy towards us.—Pall Mall Budget.

On the spot where the late Emperor fell, slain by the bomb of the assassin, the Russians are building an expiatory church, the cost of which is defrayed by subscription throughout the empire. The subscriptions received in St. Petersburg alone amount to close upon £9,000. Another historical church is about to be built at the foot of the Balkans to commemorate the passage of the mountains in midwinter and the brilliant battle of Senova, which brought the serious fighting of the campaign to a close. It also will be paid for by subscription. The fund already amounts to £8,200, and its erection will be taken in hand at once. An institution of more practical utility than either the Church of Expiation by the Catherine Canal or the Church of the Nativity at the foot of the Balkans is the University which is being established in Siberia. Subscriptions have been received amounting to £48,500. Of this, £35,000 is appropriated to the building, £10,000 to the educational apparatus, and £3,000 to scholarships. The library of this newest of universities already contains thirty-five thousand volumes.—Pall Mall Budget.

The other week, the greater part of the walls of the ruined castle which for centuries has dominated over the little borough town of Launceston fell to the ground without any previous warning. Antiquaries have long speculated as to the date of its construction, and many of them have professed to find in the remains some traces of Roman work. For many generations, part of the building was used as a prison, and within its walls were confined some of the enthusiasts whose religious opinions have been obnoxious to the government of the day. In the reign of Elizabeth, one of the most eminent of the English Roman Catholics was kept there until he was sent to taste of the horrors of prison life in the Fleet. Dr. John Bastwick, a victim of the Star Chamber, was condemned to be immured within its precincts; and even then his wife petitioned for his removal, as the building was "so ruinous that it was formidable to behold." Under the government of the Commonwealth, a still more persistent disputant, George Fox, the Quaker, was subjected to eight months' imprisonment in a "noisome den" of the castle; and in later years many of the professors of the same opinions saw the inside of the same cell as their religious teacher.—Pall Mall Budget.

JESTINGS.

A CHICAGO man wants to know when the new Bible goes into effect.

THINGS are not exactly right. A careful political economist closely calculates that women in this country might annually save $14,500,000 in ribbons, which the men might spend in cigars.

"HAD drank" is not good English grammar, says a high authority. It certainly is not. "Was drunk" is better grammar, and more in accordance with the facts nine times out of ten.—New Haven Register.

"You say that you were possessed by the devil when you took the pants?" the Justice said. "Yes, sah," was the reply, "it wa'n't me, but the debbil dat was in me." "Well, then, in order to punish that debbil, I will send you to prison for six months."

"WELL, Charley, what are you reading?" said a father to his son last Sunday. "Oh, I'm reading 'Daniel in the Lions' Den.'" Father goes over and picks up the book and finds it is a dime novel called Pete Jones in Africa. "Why," says he, "this is a dime novel." "No, pa, that's only the 'revised' of 'Daniel in the Lions' Den.'"—Puck.

AN Oil City man, who suspected that his servant-girl was in the habit of using kerosene for kindling, put just a taste of nitro-glycerine in the oil-can, as a test. Contrary to expectation, nothing happened; but a day or two later the girl came around and asked him to subscribe something toward buying a new stove for her poor old mother, as the old one had fallen to pieces.

"MAKING a call the other day," writes a fair correspondent, "I casually opened a Bible on the drawing-room table while waiting for my friend. There was a folded piece of paper inside, and it was marked,—I couldn't help seeing it,—'Recipe for punches.' My friend entered at the moment and I handed it to her. 'Why, where in the world did you get that?' she asked; 'I've been looking for it for six months!'"

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

WHAT if a man save my life with a draught that was intended to poison me? The providence of the issue does not at all discharge the obliquity of the intent. And the same reason holds good even in religion itself. It is not the incense or the offering that is acceptable to Deity, but the purity and devotion of the worshipper.—Seneca.

THE vast extent of the field of prehistoric study, the treasures of knowledge which have been already gathered, and the harvest which is still in the ear, impress the student more and more, the deeper he advances into the study. Surely, if from some higher sphere, beings of a purely spiritual nature—nourished, that is, not by material meats and drinks, but by ideas—look down upon the lot of man, they must be before everything amazed at the complaints of poverty which rise up from every side. When every stone on which we tread can yield a history, to follow up which is almost the work of a lifetime; when every word we use is a thread leading back the mind through centuries of man's life on earth,—it must be confessed that, for riches of any but a material sort, for a wealth of ideas the mind's nourishment, there ought to be no lack.—C. F. Keary.

THE applause bestowed on Nature for being economical is a curious transference to nature of human necessities. Why, with a whole universe at her disposal, should Nature be economical?—G. H. Lewes.

Who has not thrilled at the lofty question of Volumentia to Coriolanus?—

"Think'st thou it honorable for a noble man Still to remember wrongs?"

Shall God be less honorable and remember the wrongs done against him, not by his equals, but by his own frail creatures?—G. J. Holyoake.

VERILY, verily, travellers have seen many monstrous idols in many countries; but no human eyes have ever seen more daring, gross, and shocking images of the Divine nature than we creatures of the dust make in our own likenesses, of our own bad passions.—Charles Dickens.

THOUGH it is well for sin to be atoned for, it is better for it not to be committed; no unimaginable eventualities hatching under the brooding wings of the Unknowable can turn its commission into a good in disguise.—Edith Simcox.

THE happiest life is that which constantly exercises and educates what is best in us.—Philip Hamerton.

REVERENCE that which is best in the universe; and this is that which makes use of all things and directs all things. And in like manner also reverence that which is best in thyself; and this is of the same kind as that. For in thyself also that which makes use of everything else is this, and thy life is directed by this.—Marcus Aurelius.

WE are quickly enough sensitive about what we suffer from others, and dwell upon it; but what they have to bear from us, that we never think of.—Thomas a Kempis.

THERE is no subject on which the sage will think less than death.—Spinoza.

DRUMS and battle-cries

Go out in music of the morning star;
And soon we shall have thinkers in the place
Of fighters, each found able as a man
To strike electric influence through a race.

—Mrs. Browning.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A CONVENTION of Freethinkers will be held at Hornellsville, N.Y., four days, commencing September 1.

THE Independent speaks of the Observer's "characteristic willingness to slander anybody, if it can thereby do God service," and says of one of its statements regarding Prof. Robertson Smith that "the only proper word to apply to such a statement is spelled with three letters." The Observer's disregard of truth and common fairness in referring to infidels and heretics is equalled only by the impotent wrath with which it views and tries to resist all progress in the domain of religious thought.

ALTHOUGH the Baptists have a special translation of the New Testament, they are apparently not satisfied with it; and, as the revised New Testament does not suit them, they have revised the revision, incorporating into the text the readings and renderings preferred by the American Committee, changing the spelling, dropping some words and substituting others, and making the work conform to the requirements of their denomination. The phrase "baptize with water," wherever it occurs, is made to read "baptize in water." The Baptists have always been enterprising in matters affecting the interests of their own sect.

THE negroes of Richmond have been greatly excited by the appearance of the comet, to the influence of which they ascribe the attempt to assassinate the President, the dangerous illness of their favorite preacher Jasper, of "the sun do move" notoriety, and a multitude of other calamities and misfortunes, public and private. The fear that the comet will destroy the earth is very general among them. Revivals prevail in all their churches, to which large accessions have been made the past few weeks. This "hairy monster of the upper skies," since its appearance, has probably made more "converts" than all the lectures and essays addressed to the reason in defence of theology during the year.

REFERRING to the death of Littré, the Positivist, under the offices of the Catholic Church, and the advantage taken of his extreme age and weakness by his wife and daughter, both devout Catholics, whom he tenderly loved, and priests and nuns who swarmed about him in his dying moments, the Independent sensibly remarks "that Christianity is not made more honorable before the world when it lies in wait for the intellectual decadence of sickness, and the enfeebled will of fourscore years, and finally, by playing on the conjugal and parental affection of an old man on his death-bed, persuades him to submit to rites that he cares nothing about. . . . It presents to us a God who is implacable to a man of spotless character and benevolent life, simply because, as it seems to him, he fails to see the force of the arguments for historical Christianity; but a God who will be instantly placated if the paralytic tongue, at the gurgle of the last breath, can be persuaded not to forbid the application of three drops of water in the name of the Trinity."

GEORGE WASHINGTON WARREN, in his oration in this city on the Fourth, opposed the taxation of church property on the ground that it "would be rendering tribute to the State for what is not the State's, but is dedicated to God." Without exposing the fundamental fallacies involved in Mr. Warren's proposition, we simply remark that the churches, although "dedicated to God," are not guarded by him, are not protected even from the lightning of heaven; and since their protection by the State, therefore, in common with other property, is a necessity and involves expense which is met by levying a tax, why should they be exempted from taxation? As President Garfield, in a speech in Congress, June 22, 1874, said: "The divorce between Church and State ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any State or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a church tax upon the whole community."

"DISTANCE lends enchantment to the view." This is true of the Indians on at least some of the government reservations. Sentimentalists, who imagine that a race with nothing but ages of savagery back of it can, in a few generations, by any policy be brought to the level of a people whose civilization is the growth of centuries, overlook facts and disregard the conditions of intellectual development. Near Netawaka, Kansas, are about two hundred and fifty of these "civilized" and "Christianized" Indians. Their religion is a low type of Christianity mixed with the old superstitions of their tribe and race. But a small portion of their land is tilled, and that is only half tilled. A school-house and teacher are sustained by the Government, but the interest and progress in education are the smallest possible. Diseases, especially scrofulous diseases, are very prevalent, and one hardly sees a healthy child. But few grow to manhood or womanhood, and the number on this reservation diminishes every year. The extinction of these poor creatures, whose sudden change of environment and exposure to the vices of civilization have been too much for them, is only a question of time. No effort should be spared to mitigate the hardships of this undeveloped race, brought in contact with an aggressive civilization, which the savage can neither adjust himself to nor successfully resist; but it is well to make facts, not mere fancies, the basis of our expectations, and not idealize the savage, look for reforms that are impossible of accomplishment, and then, in our disappointment, sentimentalize over the fate of the Indian, and denounce the Government and its officers for failure to do what is impracticable.

German "Academic Liberty" vs. "Political Liberty,"—Which?

BY R. J. HINTON.

A correspondent, "D. W. B.," in a recent Index quotes approvingly some remarks made at the recent Schurz's Boston Dinner by Dr. De Gersdorff in relation to Germany and its universities, as having "ever been the hearths and nurseries of intellectual liberty. The proud distinction of German universities," he said, "has been academic liberty,—a liberty superior to political freedom, a higher, a philosophical and critical liberty of the mind and conscience, a liberty in teaching and learning, uncontrolled by despotism, untrammelled by Church interference or protection, uncontaminated by any schemes for gain." "D. W. B." adds, "This was a well-administered slap at his adopted country by Dr. De Gersdorff, and it was merited." I beg leave to take exception to this judgment. There is a vast amount of trash written about the German freedom of thought and opinion. Usually in America it is done to the disparagement of that objective political and economic activity which is so marked a feature of our own life. If, as "D. W. B." says, Dr. De Gersdorff meant, as suggested, what is quoted by his admirer, the doctor was guilty of impertinence, while his utterances are conspicuously marked for incorrectness of statement. I have italicized certain portions of the quotation, and think that it would be well to read in connection with them the very readable essay on Hegel which is found on the second page of the same copy of the Free Religious Index in which "D. W. B." is admitted. If there is a more parsonic or bureaucratic ridden country than Prussia in matters of control over education and university direction, it would be worth while to point it out. I put aside for the moment the sneer at "political liberty," and point the moral of my denial of the correctness of the whole attempt to exalt the German horn of self-righteousness, by an illustration.

The public schools of Prussia culminate in the Gymnasien or classical high school and Realschulen or scientific academy. In that land of rule and rote, where philosophy à la Hegel has taught State-craft how to use education to limit and restrain the "political liberty," which Dr. De Gersdorff and "D. W. B." both seem to belittle,—the nine years course of the Gymnasien leads to the university, while the same course leads to the higher technical institutions for the student of the scientific academy or high school. The purpose is plain. In that land of "academic liberty," the chief idea seems to be to fit a man for his place in the government machine, and, in so fitting, to make his environment so firm as to prevent his getting out of it. Education is the means to that end,—compression of intelligence for force, not the broadening of capacity for power, which despised "political liberty" may, nay will, most surely bring.

There has been for some years a considerable agitation for the admission of the Realschulen students to the universities on equal terms with those of the Gymnasien. The objection has been general on the part of the theologic and jurist faculties. The proposition has not been welcomed in that land of "academic liberty," so much greater, "you know," than "political liberty," by the parsons and the lawyers, and only in part by the professors of the other faculties. And what is the reason given for refusing to the great body of the inquiring, aspiring, critically-minded students the privilege freely accorded to those from the other schools? In the one, Greek and Latin are taught, and all the old classical forms are adhered to, the result being good parsons, fair jurisprudents, excellent recruits for the ranks, and opportunities of officialism, as well also as a body of fine scholars. In the other, Latin, with French, English, and the modern tongues, and the natural sciences are taught, and as a rule well taught. Why, then, should such students be debarred from entrance to the university? Simply because the faculties, and the government too, dread their critical, inquiring, sceptical spirit. This was and is the chief reason given against admission of Realschulen students in those defenders and centers of the "academic liberty" certified to as so much greater than "political liberty,"—the Prussian universities. In the appendix to an inaugural address on "the question of subdividing the faculty of philosophy," made Oct. 15, 1880, by Dr. Aug. W. Hofmann, Rector of the University of Berlin,

I find some remarkable information bearing on this point of academic freedom. In fact, the very question itself discussed by the rector is a pertinent illustration. The issue considered is whether or no the faculty of philosophy shall be so divided as to permit the natural sciences separate development in teaching, and progress in appliances and methods. The admission of Realschulen graduates is a necessary part of this discussion. The question was submitted to the nine universities in the Prussian kingdom, and voted down. The following table shows the action of the various university faculties:—

	Theology.	Jurisprudence.	Medicine.	Philosophy.
Berlin.	No*	No*	No	No*
Bonn.†	No (2)	No	No	No
Breslau.†	No (2)	No	No	Not
Göttingen.	No	Yes	Yes†	Yes†
Greifswald.	No	No	Yes	Yes†
Halle.	No	No	No	Yes†
Kiel.	No	No	Yes	No
Königsberg.	No	Yes	Yes	Yes††
Marburg.	No	No	Not†	Yes

This gives eleven theological, seven jurisprudence, five medicine, and four philosophy—twenty-seven—faculties opposed to the admission of scientific students. Only eight voted for them unqualifiedly, and three for admission under restrictions. These were two of law, four of medicine, and five of philosophy; and it is noteworthy that the most liberal votes cast by any one university is that of Göttingen in conquered Hanover. Perhaps it may not be out of place to ask how much political feelings and influences may have had to do with this?

If anything so flagrantly opposed to the spirit of "academic" or any other form of "liberty" can be found in the "adopted country" of Dr. De Gersdorff, and the native land of "D. W. B." (as I suppose by the allusion), I should be very glad to know it. There is something too much indiscriminate deification of the German "Kult" at the expense of personal, political activity and economic freedom. I fear that there is too much basis for the feeling that is spreading so widely, to the effect that practical freedom as to maintenance in law and advancement in institutions and environment receives very little help from the philosophers, and that on many sides, when they find that a free society can tolerate no hierarchy except that of service, and applies a practical, direct, and often objective test thereto, the philosophers and thinkers so called, the scholars and writers and teachers, are found, à la Carlyle, Ruskin, Wason, Parkman, et al., as the intellectual champions of authority and force, loud and virulent in putting upon the laboring shoulders of the en masse and its champions the burdens of all the evils and ignorances, limitations and superstitions, which the systems of exclusion from intellectual and political liberty, as well as freedom of economic action, have in the past created and left as a hideous legacy for the present. "There is nothing like leather," cries Æsop's currier at the council board, when the question of civic defence is considered. So there is nothing like philosophy, say the idealists, of whom after all in an humble way I count myself a follower and pupil. But a philosophy which, for instance like that of Hegel, heads two such monstrosities as the State absolutism of German Bismarck, and the nihilistic anarchy of Russian Bakouine, is not the most desirable rule for a social life based on liberty and directed by law. By the allusion to Bakouine, I must not be understood, however, as condemning per se or criticising even the political struggle the world know as Nihilism. My reference is directly applied to Michael Bakouine's doctrine of absolute negation as applied to society and all present social order, of which the root was found in Hegel. It is time to cry a little "Halt!" in this extravagant eulogy of the German "Kult" when applied, as it generally is, to a more or less direct decrying of our own political life, activities, environment, evolutionary action. It is a pity that this "academic liberty" so loudly boasted of does not produce more definite fruits than the narrow illiberality of the Prussian universities, or the following evidence of a wide illiteracy which Dr. E. Engel, Director of the Royal Prussian Bureau of Statistics, gave at the International Statistical Conference at Paris, in July, 1878:—

* This indicates that the negative was emphatic. † Indicates that there are faculties of Catholic and Protestant theology. ‡ The majority was small.  The vote was unanimous. †† Admission is conditional. ††† A division was demanded in these cases.

At the last census, we have found that twenty-five million of inhabitants can neither read nor write: the schools are not numerous enough. The reports in Prussia are very reliable in this respect. There are communes where eighty per cent. of the population can neither read nor write.

In the further illustration of the sort of liberty, "academic" or otherwise, which is so often held up for our admiration, I find that Von Pultkarner, Prussian minister of Public Instruction, has forbidden all teachers of elementary schools under his jurisdiction from attending the sessions of the General German Teachers Association, which meets June 9, 10, and 11 next, at Karlsruhe. The reason is obvious. Pultkarner fears that "academic liberty" in Prussia may be influenced by the wider thought which is likely to filter through the numerous conduits of such an assembly.

A QUESTION.

In Prof. Adler's reply to Mr. Savage (see Index of June 30), he says, "An action which is done with the necessity of the law of gravitation, in my estimation, ceases to be moral: it is instinctive; it has not the attributes of morality."

The gentleman will pardon me if I say that there seems to be an error in his statement. I do not defend Mr. Savage. His argument, drawn from the analogy between law of gravitation and law of morals in opposition to the idea of moral interregnum, is ingenious, but sophistical, as it seems to me. At the same time, the other statement appears to be lacking in harmony with the unity of the universe.

Behind our understanding of the law of gravitation is logic. We see, mentally, that, owing to what we call a law of nature, an unsupported body must fall toward that point at which it ceases to be moved by the largest body with which it is in juxtaposition. Such is the fact, and we cannot convince ourselves that it is not so. Mr. Savage will never try the experiment of jumping "off of a five-story brick building," because there is no probability that reason will ever lose its seat in his brain. Nor yet is it likely that there could be found any sane savage (the other kind, I mean now) who, though he were in utter ignorance of the law of gravitation, could be prevailed upon to do it. The instinct of danger would protect him as thoroughly as the knowledge of the law of gravitation protects the nobler Savage.

But a question of right and wrong must come at last to logic also. It must compel our mental assent just as clearly and as fixedly as does the existence of what we call the law of gravitation. Logic is law of mind, as gravitation is law of physics. Instinct of danger, that is, fear of injury, may restrain people from wrong conduct, just as the same instinct will protect them from physical injury. But develop the minds of these sufficiently, and the law of logic must become a more powerful restraint upon them than instinct. At last we see that instinct and mind work to the same end, safety; but mind, in working, grows and lifts the race with it. Reason is the motive power and logic the engineer. When we have come to the "science of ethics," it will be found that morality involves the necessity of doing thus instead of so. That is, we will understand as clearly that to do a certain act instead of a certain other act involves an injury to ourselves or others or both as we do that jumping "off of a five-story brick building" would injure us. So far I see the logic of necessity behind both law of gravitation and law of morals. Now, in regard to "moral interregnum," the thing to be feared is not suspension of law, for no one outside of a very orthodox church supposes that there are any miracles performed to-day, and we cannot even conceive either law of gravitation or law of morals or anything that we call "law of nature" as being for a moment suspended; but—and here the danger lies—people who know the law may forget it and instinct may be stupefied. Every time a person gets drunk he forgets both law of gravitation and law of morals, and he at the same time drugs his faithful instinct to sleep, and so exposes himself to all possible dangers. He for the time falls far below the unreasoning brute whose instinct never loses its head. There is danger that a large share of most communities may fall into the condition supposed by the phrase "moral interregnum."

I see that I am in danger of writing a longer article than is acceptable, but I want briefly to point out why I think there is danger.

There is no science of ethics. Intelligent men and women are largely law unto themselves. But, to the masses, theological dogma is moral law. They do certain acts or refrain from certain others, not because logic, the law of mind, convinces them that there is no other right way to do, but because this act would insure reward, that one punishment. The actual guidance of such is not of as high an order of merit as is the instinct of the brute. It is degraded reason, reason usurped and controlled by fear and an ignorance that thinks it knows all there is to be known. Now, to all these people must rise the flood-tide of evolution that is everywhere lifting humanity, like all else, to higher level. Unconsciously, intellectual development has sapped and mired theological dogmas of man's place in nature and his relation to the universe, until, without knowing it, men and women have largely lost faith in the God of theology. Having lost that faith, they sail along in the Church Fleet as before, because it is unpopular to leave it; but they are governed by a theory that, if men and women don't know of their private lives, they'll risk it with God. Having lost faith in their God, they have lost at the same time the restraint of fear which was moral law unto them; and hence they have lost all the moral guide they ever possessed. Just as long as this condition continues, those people must inevitably fall in the scale of moral conduct, and the end will certainly be deplorable.

Now, therefore, while I believe it to be a necessary act of Mr. Savage that he will not jump off the afore-said five-story brick, and an equally necessary act of Prof. Adler that he will not do any violence to his own conscience, i.e., to what he understands to be logically true and right, I at the same time think facts are abundant to prove that men and women may ignore laws of all kinds and sink into evil conditions that will become ruinous not only to themselves, but also to the community or the country that allows them to exist. The law of nature is impartial. It picks up points of variation in all directions and multiplies them. The splendid development out of savagery is proof of what she can do in that direction. But give her the opportunity and she will reverse the order of development; and, as passion is stronger and lower than intellect, the downward course will be a thousand times more rapid than was the upward.

Through the death of the God of theology, society stands to-day in a position of peril, without a guide. The half-god has gone, but the whole has not yet arrived for the masses. They need help to open their eyes. Will Free Religion be the good physician?

CHARLES ELLIS.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM.*

Every old fog of fifty years and upward will remember that one of the standing questions in college debating societies in his student days was, "Has this country anything to apprehend from the spread of Romanism in it?" Well, at that time Romanism was a mere drop in the bucket, a thing insignificant in every way; yet alarmists were on the alert even then and denounced it as a menace to our Republic. Years have gone by and Roman Catholicism has become a large religious phenomenon on this free soil of the United States. Pope Pius Ninth has lived and died, issuing during his pontifical career the syllabus distinctly denouncing our system of popular education, our system of popular sovereignty and popular suffrage and all that. Everybody knows that the papacy has declared war against free institutions and the great republican movement in Europe. Nevertheless, in the leading Roman Catholic country of Europe, namely, France, the republic has become apparently a fixed fact. Notwithstanding that the papacy has declared war against popular freedom, Roman Catholics continue to come to our shores, and we continue to receive them hospitably, and American-born demagogues, mostly of the so-called Democratic persuasion, continue to court them for their votes. These European adherents of the papacy continue, we say, to come to the United States, when they might go to Mexico, Central America, and South America,—regions in which their religion is predominant. It is possible that Irish Catholics and Catholics of other European races come here with the idea that they are going ultimately to transform this great American Republic into a great papal domain, whither the Pope, when hard pressed by European democracy and liberalism, can betake himself for refuge. For it is almost as good as certain that when the republican movement does finally triumph in Europe, and triumph it will in a few brief years, the Pope will share the fate of kings and emperors, and become a refugee from European soil. Doubtless a great many fanatical papists think that they are going to work America over and new leaven it like a mass of dough with their religion. Ardent Romanists are like all other ardent religionists. They think and proclaim that God is on their side, and will ultimately give them victory and triumph for their present humiliation. Old Mr. Brownson, a Vermont Yankee turned papist, used to write three or four hundred pages in his Review once a month or once a quarter, to demonstrate to his benighted fellow-countrymen of Vermont and the other States of this Union that American freedom wanted just one additional ingredient to make it perfect and what it ought to be, namely, a leaven of Roman Catholicism. Brownson's idea was that there could be no genuine freedom without the Pope to dictate belief and opinion, and to supervise not only morals, but politics also. Strangely enough, Brownson professed to be a thorough-going American, and a believer in American ideas and institutions. We forget whether or not the voluminous old gentleman was alive when Pio Nono issued his syllabus. If he was, he was bound, as a true son of "the grand Old Church," as ex-Senator Thurman called it once on a time, to renounce his democracy and Americanism as vicious heresies and humbugs. Brownson was a stalwart man in mind and body both, and sincere in his Romanism, or in his attempt to be an American and papist rolled in one. A too long and exclusive devotion of his mind to metaphysical and theological questions and subtleties had addled what was originally a strong brain. We have no doubt that the priests, who are swarming on our shores from Europe, intend to papalize the United States. Notwithstanding that Pius Ninth denounced universal suffrage, the priests allow their numerous and highly unintelligent subjects in our large cities to vote the—Democratic ticket. If the Democratic party by the aid of Jeff. Davis and the Southern Bourbons could get control once more of the Federal Government, we have no doubt that we should have a Cardinal Legate from Rome, resident at Washington and exercising a paramount influence in Democratic circles. But, after all, this country is like a coquette or the Italian language,—when you think you are in the good graces of the one and have mastered the other, it turns out upon trial that you are utterly mistaken. The London Times long years ago announced that the population of the United States would ultimately be substantially Irish. Now, numerous and prolific as the Irish are here, it is evident that the Irish element of our population will remain only a single one of several elements, some of which ultimately will outnumber it,—the German element for instance,—while the descendants of the original settlers of the old Thirteen States will always be the controlling element of population in the great Western Republic. As everybody knows, American institutions were established by men who hated priests and kings both. There is not a particle of priestism or royalty in them. We do not believe that Romanism can be such a menace and peril to this Republic as Southern Slavery turned out to be. Our European friends in Italy and elsewhere are kind to give us seasonable warning. But the United States is new soil, and not like Italy crushed under the load of inveterate and hoary institutions out of gear with the spirit of the world of to-day. We are altogether modern, while Italy is old with an antiquity and conformity to the past which almost defies innovation and progress. The purposes of Roman Catholic priests are well understood here. Indeed, they are not disguised at all. The organs of Romanism are refreshingly frank and outspoken. European Catholics of the lower orders, transferred to our soil, seem to cling to their old-country religion more tenaciously than ever, and to be ostentatiously devoted to their priests. Naturally enough, away from home in a strange land with strange manners, usages, laws, institutions, and faces confronting him, the poor Roman Catholic immigrant, torn up by the roots as he is, flies for consolation and support to his religion and the ministers of his religion here. Immigrants have more respect for their priests than for our institutions. That is a relic of Old Worldism, of which the alien born is not likely to divest himself. The Irish are ostentatious and demonstrative as Roman Catholics because they like to be regarded as a peculiar people. They have no State of their own, so they cling to their Church with a twofold tenacity. The American people are kindly, good-natured, and tolerant to the last degree. They are not easily jealous, but, being wrought up by any deliberate movement against their liberties, they cannot be appeased. The Catholic question got into politics as long ago as 1835, but the question of Southern Slavery overshadowed it at that time and so it subsided. But Southern Slavery is dead and no longer a burning question.

"IS MOSES A MYTH?"

In response to this query, Mr. Ball refers me to Bishop Colenso. The earlier written parts of his elaborate examination of the Pentateuch and Joshua were, I think, the first writings of the historico-critical school of exegesis I ever read. This was a number of years ago, and since then I have carefully read and now have in my library his more recent publications; but in none of them can I find aught in sustentation of the theory that Moses is a myth. Colenso demonstrates that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, and that a very large portion of the record concerning him is mythical and legendary; but he states a number of times that the legends of the exodus are based on historical facts,—that the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, and escaped therefrom "under the guidance of an eminent leader such as Moses." (Pentateuch and Joshua, part ii., ch. xvii.; New Bible Commentary Examined: Exodus, p. 5; Pentateuch and Moabite Stone, pp. 277-8.) Moreover, Colenso, after quoting the Manethonian narrative of the expulsion of the "lepers," in which their leader is said to have changed his name to Moses, remarks, "It is probable that we have here the Egyptian version of the exodus of Israel." (Pentateuch and Moabite Stone, pp. 280-1.) The fact that the name of Moses is found alike in the Hebrew and Egyptian traditions indicates, I think, the strong probability that the leader of the Israelitish exodus bore that name, and is no myth? As shown in my original article on this point, the "consensus of the competent" has decided that, so far as his personality is concerned, Moses is historical, though as regards his life and teachings almost all we have is mythical and legendary. In the case of Homer, no settled opinion has been arrived at by the "competent." As yet it is impossible to satisfactorily determine the problem involved in the personality of the blind bard; the "competent" are divided in opinion thereupon, the tendency of thought, I believe, at present being to relegate him to the realms of the mythos. No strict analogy inheres, therefore, in the two cases of Moses and Homer. Undoubtedly, most or all ancient peoples were given to eponyme-making, the Hebrews being as strongly marked in that direction as any other nation,—Greek, Hindu, Chaldean, or Phœnician. Yet it is true that various names in their national annals supposed by some scholars to be eponymous have been proven to be the genuine names of historical characters: Moses, I take it, may be classed with these latter.

A fact stated by Brugsch-Bey in his History of Egypt under the Pharaohs (New ed., London, 1881, vol. ii., p. 117) may have some bearing upon the question of Moses' identity. In the reign of Rameses III., about eighty or a hundred years after the generally accepted time of the exodus (the latter circa 1300-1320 B.C.), a place is mentioned in Middle Egypt bearing the name of the Hebrew leader. It is called I-en-Moshé, the "island of Moses" or the "river-bank of Moses." It lay near the city of the heretic king, Khu-n-aten. This king, Amenhotep IV., was of Semitic extraction, and made some radical changes in the religious worship of his day. It is significant that Egyptologists usually render Moses in that Egyptian language by Mesu; but this island is not named Mesu in Egyptian, but is called Moshé, a transliteration of the Hebrew word for Moses, Mosheh or Moshe.

A LETTER FROM AN EARNEST WOMAN.

Assured that good words can but be acceptable to those engaged in good works, I wish, from the fullness of a grateful heart,—grateful almost to tears,—to express my thanks to the Free Religious Association for the privilege of reading the address of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, published in the Index for June 23. I consider that one number of the Index worth its price per year. Since my earliest recognition of the fact that neither in law, religion, nor society, was I my brother's equal, and that only through mortification and degradation could one expiate the crime of being of the female sex, I have been an earnest advocate of the cause of woman, pleading in my humble way at the bar of society for a juster justice,—a justice wide enough to include the female as well as the male; for purer laws,—laws so untainted by the infusoria of social evils that neither drunkenness nor prostitution might be hatched within; and for that best and noblest religion that is tender toward the humanity in every human being, black or white, Pagan or Christian, Protestant or Catholic, male or female. And the words of Elizabeth Cady Stanton give me joy. What man among us, hearing or reading her words, dare say, "She is not my equal?" What manly man among us who is able to comprehend what she has said does not feel impelled to reach a hand down to woman and lift her up on to the heights of freedom beside himself? In my early school-days, more than twenty-five years ago, when the mournful truth dawned upon me that the word male was the only sesame to the higher institutions of learning, I was stung by a divine jealousy; and I asked of a friend and teacher, Why are these things so? But the answer I received only awakened within me anger, sorrow, and a fierce spirit of resistance. Later on, when reason had developed, I questioned history, poetry, science. History is a tale of bloodshed, cruelty, and wrong; of the oppression and tyranny of kings. It is the story of man's own struggle from servitude to freedom; and women's quiet lives find scanty record there. But now and then some story of her heroism, her noble spirit of self-sacrifice, her love and kindness, of her lofty devotion to truth, honor, and virtue, graces the page, seeming to refine and civilize the savage narrative. I learned of Lucretia, Cornelia, Joan of Arc, Elizabeth, Madame de Staël, Madame Roland, Florence Nightingale, and was not ashamed of woman's record. From Greece and Rome, from modern Europe and young America, came no reason for the subjection of my sex; no reason why, in the nineteenth century, under the shadow of the stars and stripes, I should find the doors of any college shut in my face. And as for the poets, I learned that but for woman's goodness, kindness, gentleness, love, beauty, and holiness to write about, there would be no poets. Spenser's Faerie Queen, most of Shakespeare's dramas, Tennyson's Princess and Idylls of the King, Meredith's Lucille, Longfellow's Engelina, are all tributes to woman's deep sense of duty, to her cheerful faith in life, and to her wonderful power of self-sacrifice. And would not any or all of these qualities be good for the politics of our country?

With somewhat of fear and trembling, I questioned science. But from first to last the naturalist tells us that in all rude, primitive stages of society, women are little less than beasts of burden; and on up through all the successive stages of progress, they are patient, plodding, self-sacrificing toilers, side by side with the men, often pulling the heavier part of the load; and when, in its progress, the race reaches that highland called civilization, woman by her toil, her earnestness, and patient plodding has earned her right to an equal share in all its benefits and advantages. Woman's toil and woman's care, side by side with man's, has helped to earn all the blessings of our time, not excepting colleges, universities, and the franchise! This was what I drew from science. What then? Not jealousy any more, but a divine despair actuated me,—that despair of which strength is born. And with all my soul I have fought that prejudice that would degrade me on account of my sex. Said an older brother once, who loved me well, "What a pity you can't be a cabinet-maker, since you love the business."

"Who would not rather be a cabinet-maker than a cook?" I said, brushing aside the shavings that fell from his plane; for he was himself an amateur carpenter, and did his own cabinet-work, and was at that time making a table. "Something is wrong with the world," he said; "you women, especially if you are gifted in any way, are dissatisfied, sad, unhappy. There is a screw loose somewhere, or women would sing at their work as men do." Then I broke in: "Men sing at their work because they are free to choose; their work is whatever they can do the best. But they would prescribe for us: they draw a line, and if we go beyond we are 'unsexed,' we are 'strong-minded' outlaws. Yes, sir, something is wrong. There must be a readjustment, a better adjustment of things; and I feel a sort of power within me, a something that defies and scorns our present state of servitude, and that tells me the day is coming when women will be as free to choose as men; and when schools and colleges will no longer be considered masculine property, nor the acquisition of knowledge the male prerogative." Do we not behold yonder upon the heights, where Cambridge is making room for women, the dawning of that day? Even among the Greeks, the ideal government was that in which women participated, man's equal in privilege and power. To-day we aspire to universal suffrage. And only when woman as well as man is able by the ballot to protect herself and children against the passage of bad laws will the aspiration be satisfied. History teaches nothing more plainly than this,—that custom advances, slowly it may be, but surely, and in spite of all nibblers at the heels of progress, into harmony with our highest ideals. Upon this certainty rests the hope of the world.

Most sincerely yours,

EMILY BURTON.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE REPUBLIC OF GOD. An Institute of Theology. By Elisha Mulford, LL.D. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881. Price $2.50.

This book is another instance of the influence of Hegel's philosophy. For some minds, Hegel has a great fascination, and he awakens them to a vigorous activity of thought. His influence is shown in Mead's book about Carlyle, and it deeply tinges Heber Newton's sermons on Jesus published some months ago. It is especially shown in a valuable work by Prof. Caird on the Philosophy of Religion. The present book is not the equal of Caird's, is not so able and profound. It attempts to prove more, and so falls far short of that really suggestive book. Yet the inspiration of it comes from the same source, and it is animated by much the same ideas. The being of God is assumed in both works as the basis of philosophy, and God is to be known through consciousness. Here is the method and the idea of Hegel, and it is followed throughout the book, not abjectly, but in his spirit and with his philosophic instruments. The influence of Maurice is also constantly shown, and the author has been one of the most diligent of the students of this great English preacher and professor. He quotes frequently from many other authors, as often from Dr. Hedge as from any one. That part of the book which would challenge the most attention from the readers of the Index is contained in the chapter on "the precedent relations of religion and philosophy to the revelations of God." This chapter and two others were read to the Concord School of Philosophy last summer. It is the latest of the contributions that school has made to literature. Mrs. Howe, Mr. Albee, Mrs. Cheney, Prof. Keduey, and now Mr. Mulford have published their lectures given at that school last year. In his third chapter, Mulford writes of the history of religion with a good deal of wisdom; its bad features he very readily recognizes. It is only when he comes to deal with Christianity that we learn that he has a special theory. It is that Christianity is not a religion, has not the characteristics of the great religions. He says: "The revelation of and in the Christ is not a religion and it is not a philosophy. It cannot be brought within the scope or province of any definition of religion that has a justification in history. It is not a product of any distinctive religious progress; it is not within the process of the history of religions." He says that Christianity is not one of the religions; that Christ did not set forth a religion, because he made no creed, ritual, or holy days. "There is in the words of the Christ the directory for no penance nor shrine nor pilgrimage. There is the pattern for no altar nor temple. The Christ institutes no cultus of worship and prescribes no system of dogma. There is no suggestion of worship or formula of doctrine." The difficulty with this theory is that it is not borne out by facts. Recent inquiry attaches Christianity at too many points to the religions that preceded it to make such a theory possible of proof. Yet this book is a real advance on the old "institutes of theology." There is more of reason in it, a broader spirit, more of real religion. It has been extravagantly praised by some who are in sympathy with its ideas. It indicates a new school of theology based on Hegel, Maurice, and the other transcendental philosophers. It is largely an outgrowth of the Broad Church movement, but it has its friends elsewhere. It dwells not on the letter, but on the moral spirit of the teachings of Jesus. This book is one likely to be read with profound interest by this class of thinkers. Its influence will be to lead away from the hard and harsh features of theology into a more genial and sympathetic interpretation of religion.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF CARLYLE. By Edwin D. Mead. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881. Price $1.00.

The author of this little volume is well known to the readers of the Index. He has also been a frequent contributor to the Unitarian Review and other magazines. The recently published volume of Stopford Brooke's sermons was edited by him. In the spring of 1880, he gave a valuable course of lectures in Boston on the German philosophers. Having spent some time as a student in Germany, he gave much attention to philosophy. The present volume was originally a lecture given a few months since at Harvard University. Mr. Mead is well qualified to write of Carlyle, and he has made a valuable contribution to the Carlyle literature. We have seen nothing else that has taken up the subject in so thorough and conscientious a manner. Bayne, in his My Masters, comes the nearest to this work; but Bayne has too much of prejudice, writes rather from the religious than the philosophical stand-point. This book is specially valuable for the light it throws on Carlyle's relations to German thought. It does not by any means accept all of Carlyle's teaching, but criticises him pretty sharply now and then. The critic differs from his author especially in regard to history, preferring to accept the organic rather than the individualistic theory. He believes the race has moved forward all along the line rather than through a few great men. Though Mr. Mead here appears to be in sympathy with the scientific theory of heredity and the evolution theory, yet he regrets it, as he does much else in the recent theories. He is a thorough lover of the German constructive philosophers, frequently shows his deep reverence for Kant, Fichte, and Hegel; and this is the secret of his interest in Carlyle. He speaks of "the utilitarian rignarole about boiled-down and trebly-distilled and compressed heredity," and has many other expressions of contempt for the agnostic and materialistic philosophy. In a few passages he betrays his acceptance of Hegel's philosophy as having found the center of truth more perfectly than any other. His criticisms of Carlyle are sound and just, such as will be approved by the large majority of the students of Carlyle. His praise, too, is calm, judicious, and wisely directed. He writes with enthusiasm, as of a master he loves and venerates, but never is he blind to the real qualities of his subject. The petty criticisms of the newspapers he severely condemns, and he says some wise things about the publication of the Reminiscences. His style is clear and crisp and fresh. It is marked by great correctness and conviction. The book is one that will do much good toward placing Carlyle in a right light and keeping his readers from losing sight of those things that are worthy of consideration. It is a very timely publication and ought to be widely read. The American admirers of Carlyle will rejoice that the best book about him should have been written by an American.

BLESSED SAINT CERTAINTY. A story by the author of His Majesty Myself, etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

The title of this story stands in singular opposition to the author's method of treating his subject. It is by no means clear what he is driving at. The certainties on which he insists, sometimes with a good deal of vehemence, are the eternal God and the eternal self; but there is nothing in the course of the story that brings these things into any special prominence or at least throws any light upon them. The hero of the book is sceptical of God and immortality, but he is not made to appear any less so in the course of the story. And indeed there is no reason shown why he should be so. Guernsey, the protagonist of the certainties, has simply nothing to say for himself. He foams at the mouth and brutally denounces his friend for his unbelief; but the argument, so far as there is any, is always on the other side. One could almost suspect Mr. Baker of a covert attack upon the two great certainties, so feeble has he made their representative and so much stronger, comparatively speaking, their opponent. At the same time, the book is not without considerable effective writing. This is pretty nearly coextensive with the realism of the book. There are touches of frontier life that are remarkable for their vividness. The most life-like character in the book is Governor Beauchamp, a broken-down politician, whose living representative Mr. Baker must have known. At least it would seem so. There are bits of scenery and atmosphere in the painting that also afford the reader some temporary relief from its average dreariness.

HEBREW REVIEW, VOL. III., IV.—There is a marked difference between Vols. I. and II. and Vols. III. and IV. of the Hebrew Review. The sensational element prevailing in Vols. I. and II. seems to have been abandoned with disgust in the two last numbers, and articles purely instructive have been in order. These articles are carefully selected and show to the reader the earnestness, sincerity, and profoundness with which questions of literary value are treated by Jewish scholars. Christians desirous of informing themselves about Judaism will find more interesting topics in the Hebrew Review than they can expect for the small outlay of subscription. ($2 per annum.)

Still we miss not a little the so-called sensational part in Vols. III. and IV., and we deem it rather a defect than an improvement, that the continuation of articles dealing with the burning questions of the day have been so carefully avoided. The public (with the exception of professional theologians or scholars) does not have as much interest in erudite investigations of by-gone questions as of questions pertaining to the present state of affairs. If the Hebrew Review is intended for the exclusive use of scholars, no doubt its course is correct. But if its aim is to reach all classes of society, if it is to represent Modern Judaism, if it is to give expression to the wants and needs of the present time, then the Hebrew Review should be rather the battlefield of contending opinions than the quiet sanctum sanctorum of students; it should rather delight in stormy disputes than in tame treatises.

It seems to us as if the Progressives had been disheartened by the Antiques "in their attempt to have their say"; and the Index, which indulges the luxury of saying what it thinks, bids them encouragingly to cheer up.

THE North American Review opens with a polemical discussion between Col. Ingersoll and Judge Black, which has awakened lively interest, and called forth from the daily press all sorts of comment. A contest in regard to "The Christian Religion," between two such disputants as these, is indeed a novelty in this Review. The publishers evidently understand that there is a popular demand for the presentation of both sides of this subject, in a style adapted to common readers, and they selected two laymen whose reputation alone is sufficient to insure a general reading of these essays. The orator of the platform, in preparation for a judicial overhauling, curbs himself with wonderful gravity, and trims off the fringe of his every-day garb so as to appear decorous and dignified in such unwonted company. We miss his usual wit and sarcasm and beautiful word pictures in this article, which, compared with his lectures, is indeed tame. It is very much like many articles that have appeared the past quarter of a century or more in anti-Christian papers. The Colonel states fairly the framework of the system he assails, and he shows clearly that the Bible contains errors and absurdities, and barbarities even, utterly inconsistent with the theory of its divine origin. He confines himself chiefly to the obvious objections of common sense, such as were used by Paine, and makes no attempt to avail himself of the arguments against the divinity of the Bible which are furnished by the elaborate scientific and historical researches of the past quarter of a century.

All we can say in favor of Judge Black's reply is that it is vigorous in language and pungent in retort. It is positively discourteous and insulting in tone, not only to Colonel Ingersoll, but to all who reject the Bible as the revealed Word of God. It is very clear that Judge Black has given but the smallest attention to the subject, and that he is entirely unfamiliar with the position of educated and advanced theologians of to-day,—theologians even of the orthodox school. He repeats the old, obsolete arguments of a hundred years ago, which are rarely advanced now except by uneducated exhorters of the Moody type. He makes statements about Pagan antiquity which we find in old "Evidences" for Christianity, but which every scholar knows to be untrue. Judge Black is a Bourbon. One quotation will suffice. He says: "That slavery is a crime under all circumstances and at all times is a doctrine first started by the adherents of a political faction in this country, less than forty years ago. They denounced God and Christ for not agreeing with them, in terms very similar to those used here by Mr. Ingersoll. But they did not constitute the civilized world, nor were they, if the truth must be told, a very respectable portion of it. Politically they were successful; I need not say by what means, or with what effect upon the morals of the country." Enough. The remaining papers are "Obstacles to Annexation," by Frederic G. Mather; "Crimes and Punishment in New York," by Howard Crosby; "A Militia for the Sea," by John Roach; "Astronomical Observations," by Simon Newcomb; and "Public Lands of the United States," by Thomas Donaldson.

THE August Atlantic commences a story by Howells, which promises well. There is always a good fresh breeze blowing through his romances. John Durand contributes a long essay on "French Domestic Life," with the didactic purpose of showing its superiority to American and English customs. The article is interesting, but hardly accomplishes the end. Edmund C. Stedman's poem, "Corda Concordia," read at the opening session of the Concord School of Philosophy, was very appropriate to that occasion. Its thought is concealed in the mist which shrouds nearly all the Concord literature. A few gleams of poetic light shine through its obscurity. Mary Hallock Foote's "In Exile," which is to be completed in the September number, promises well for interest. The scene is in a Californian mining settlement, and the heroine a Connecticut school-mistress, young and sensible. The hero is a young engineer, ambitious, poetic, and heart-hungry. "The New York Art Season," by M. G. Van Rensselaer, contains good criticism and abundant information. One gets from it a good conception of the rapid development of art in America. Richard Grant White writes on "The Acting of Iago" to show that every actor on the American stage has misconceived Shakespeare's greatest villain. We are by no means sure that Mr. White himself is not under a misconception. Shakespeare did not work his characters up to such an elaborate self-contradictoriness as this essay indicates in "Iago." Mr. James' "Portrait of a Lady" receives a good deal of paint, but very little proportion in this number. Ralph Touchett, who is the only perfectly healthy character, does not appear in this number; but we get a glimpse of the domestic infelicity of the Osmonds which throws some light on former dark passages. E. P. Whipple's "Recollections of James T. Fields" is a pleasant addition to the many pleasant things which have been written of him. James Freeman Clarke has a review of Parton's Life of Voltaire, and F. H. Underwood of Ward's English Poets.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE.—The June number opens with an article on "La Science des Religions au Collège de France," by Count D'Alviella, who has already been introduced to our readers, and who here gives an interesting summary of the views of the origin and reality of belief in God held by Réville, Max Müller, Spencer, and Littré. From the latter is quoted this criticism of J. S. Mill's attempt to discern God in the region beyond knowledge: "I do not venture so far. I accept the solemn lessons which proceed from the unknowable, and it forbids me to reason rashly; opposing this without discussion and simply by its presence. It needs only a look upon the throne of its sombre grandeur to free me from all the dogmatists, both mystical and materialistic."

Then there is a short account of the production of Liszt's music at Brussels and Anvers, and a more elaborate one of the explorations of a Belgian named Cambier, in Central Africa, where we find that much more is to be effected for religious progress by commercial enterprise than by missionary zeal. The only other article of much length treats of the financial situation of Belgium; but we also have a fine poem on "The North Sea," and a number of book-notices.

THE Unitarian Review for July opens with an article by Rev. S. R. Calthrop of Syracuse, entitled, "The Great Synthesis, or the Foundation on which all Things rest." In this he controverts some of the modern cosmogonists, beginning with Mr. Tyndall. Anne Keene gives us a very judicious paper on "The Duty of Christians in the matter of Amusements," in which she says that "many otherwise intelligent people seem strangely oblivious of the fact that an essential element of amusement is that it shall amuse." Rev. James T. Bixby discourses on "The Nature of Religion as shown by Hierology," and D. Charruau describes "The Reformed Church of France." Appreciative notices are given, "In Memoriam," of J. F. W. Ware, George B. Emerson, and John G. Palfrey; and interesting matters appear in the "Editors' Note-Book," "Things at Home and Abroad," "Notes from England," by John Page Hopps, and "Foreign Periodical Literature."

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.
TWO-FOLD.

O Life! for thee did plan
(Unguessed of friend or kin), a viewless Power (Ere thy swift arteries leaped, thy flaming currents ran),
A realm of matchless dower!

White wonder it hath reared
Of palace pure, with secrecy and skill,
Where never grief shall brood nor steel of foe be feared.
Its stately halls to fill,
Its corridors to grace,
Were brought the marvels of far lands and strange,
That thou should'st have, at will, a sure withdrawing place,
Beyond thy little range

Of daily toil and tears!
That thou from eastern windows might'st behold,
Where, from the mountain-tops, the misty cloud-fleece clears,
The free, forth-breaking gold!

What purple prince outvies
The high-wrought splendor of thine other world!
Its fragile, fretted towers that, lace-like, gleam and rise
From azure wavelets curled

At their unquivering base!
What silver swell from seraph-throated lark
Can thee so subtly thrill as voices that upraise
Against that velvety dark

Where thou dost dream and rest,
Thoughts fathomless—the glimpsed things of God—
That shake thee with their vastness, Ah! so nobly blest,
My Life, in thine abode!

Heed well, lest e'er should stray,
Past its fair lintel, foot of guest unmeet!
Watch, lest thy hand should slight small duties of the day,
To gain that loved retreat!

NATURE.

Each fleeting generation formulates
A theory of me, then goes its way;
But I, the mute and always-living, stay.
The strong, bright present tense me ever dates,
While hampers man to-morrow, yesterday,
Cheated by hope and memory's idle play.
The god-creators he erst thron'd o'er me
A wider vision has dispelled, as dreams;
A watch-like mechanism no more he deems
The living All, a mere contrivance wrought
By puny cosmoplast once on a time
To be to ignominious ruin brought.
At last his soul invades the truth sublime
Of an eternal Now, a dateless might,
A surge ineffable of life and light.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 28, 1881.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

For two months from this date, during my temporary absence, Mr. B. F. Underwood will have the entire editorial charge of the Free Religious Index. All communications intended for the paper should be sent to him, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER.

MR. WARREN, in his oration in Boston on the Fourth, said that "the republic was founded upon the rock of the Christian religion." The assertion is sufficiently disproved by the following distinct declaration made in 1796, in a treaty between the United States and the State of Tripoli, signed by George Washington: "As the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion, . . . no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries."

THE work of destruction is just as necessary as the work of construction. We must expose the false, in order to establish the true. We must tear down the old and useless, that we may build up the new and useful. We must remove from the ground the rubbish of superstition, that we may erect in its place the temple of science. When old systems are decaying and new systems are growing, we must discard whatever is bad in the old and take from it whatever is good and incorporate it into the new. Negation, as well as affirmation, has been a part of the work of all great thinkers and reformers. Buddha, Socrates, and Jesus, Bacon, Newton, and Humboldt, Locke, Kant, and Mill knew how to criticise, deny, and denounce, as well as to affirm and construct. But let it be borne in mind always that criticism is valuable only as a means unto an end.

AMONG the exercises of a "Summer School of Christian Philosophy," opened (or to be opened) at Greenwood Lake, under the direction of Rev. Dr. Deems, of New York City, will be a series of discourses by eminent representatives of Orthodox views. The afternoon of each day, it is stated, will be devoted to a discussion, by all who care to take part in it, of the topic of the morning lecture. Men like Dr. Deems evidently begin to see that thoughtful and fair-minded people are getting dissatisfied with hearing one side of a subject dogmatically presented, Sunday after Sunday, with no opportunity to the hearers for criticism or even inquiries. The new feature that is promised the public indicates progress, and will, no doubt, add to the attractiveness and to the good results of the meetings. A little vigorous debate in an arena open to every class of thinkers is just what is needed by the churches.

INHERITED THEOLOGICAL TENDENCIES.

The papers report that Colonel Ingersoll, just from the bedside of the President, whose wound, it was thought, would prove fatal, remarked, "If the President recovers, it will be a miracle; . . . God help the country if our President dies." Religious and secular journals have contained many references to these remarks, as proof that belief in the supernatural finds expression even through the lips of an infidel, when, under the influence of intense feeling, he makes audible his actual thought, his real convictions.

The fact seems to be overlooked that we use expressions long after we have outgrown belief in their popular meaning, and remain under the influence of superstitions even when they are condemned by our reason and judgment. Men of the greatest originality, even, cannot wholly disconnect themselves from the past; and in emotional natures, especially, tendencies which are the result of accumulated ancestral experiences are often quite irresistible, and exceedingly fitful in their expression.

Belief in the supernatural—an acquirement, the result of observation and reflection, as we believe—has prevailed through we know not how many centuries; and this belief, with all the fears, the hopes, the aspirations, the superstitions, the bigotries and hatreds it has generated, has come down to us as a heritage, in the form of aptitudes, tendencies, predispositions. Hence, the individual who no longer believes in the supernatural may yet be unable to free himself from the popular verbal expressions of this belief,—familiar to him from childhood,—and from the emotions which have been developed by the belief, and which are the result and subjective expression of its persistence through centuries. Madame De Staël, asked if she believed in ghosts, replied, "No, I don't believe in them, but I am afraid of them."

Moments of danger or of profound sorrow, when the reason is overpowered by fear or grief, are times that these tendencies assert themselves with the least resistance, and with the greatest demonstrativeness. If Colonel Ingersoll used the expressions ascribed to him, they indicate, not that belief in the supernatural is a part of man's primary nature, implanted when "God created Adam," and implying the existence of a personal Deity; but rather that the heart of a poetic and emotional man, aching with acutest agony over a terrible tragedy and a national calamity, found unstudied expression in familiar forms of speech, tinged, perhaps, with the influence of beliefs to which his reason can no longer subscribe.

The question as to the truth or falsity of these beliefs is a proper topic for reflection and discussion; but it cannot be decided by an appeal to inconsistencies of speech or action in men who, although they have discarded many of the dogmas of theology, yet continue the use of popular religious phraseology, and remain under the influence of convictions instilled in their minds in youth, and of the religious and devotional tendencies inherited from the past.

If the editors who are so fond of referring to Ingersoll's emotional expressions as proof of what he denies or disbelieves, would take the pains to acquaint themselves with modern psychology, in connection with the now generally conceded theory of evolution, the superficiality and folly of their comments would be apparent to themselves.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

A writer in the Investigator takes exception to some remarks made at the recent convention of the Free Religious Association, and infers that "Free Religion, as it is not Liberalism, must be what its name implies,—a religion of some kind." "It may be a little improvement on Unitarianism, but not much." This writer concludes by saying that he prefers to remain where he is, rather "than go backward to Free Religion."

The readers of the Index are familiar with the common Orthodox objections to the Free Religious movement. Here is an objection from a contributor to a free-thought paper, whose article is signed "Liberal," and which seems to have been written without any knowledge of the scope, object, or methods of the Free Religious Association, with which it finds fault. For the benefit of such "Liberals," it may be well to state that this organization was formed for the purpose of promoting courageous, independent thought, and eliciting and disseminating truth on the subject of religion and cognate subjects. It encourages the study of religion in its relations to science and philosophy, and in all its bearings on the varied social and moral interests of the race; and, at the same time, invites discussion from the stand-point of every intelligent and serious thinker.

No speculative opinion or belief is required as a condition of membership, nor does the Association interfere in any way with "that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being." Among its officers and members are men of science, like Professor Youmans; men of literary reputation, like Ralph Waldo Emerson; liberal Christians, like M. J. Savage; thinkers, like Felix Adler, its accomplished president, who is "not even a theist"; and radical atheists, like the German orator and writer, Schuenemann-Pott. If no Orthodox Christians belong to the Association, it is not because they are excluded, but owing to the fact that they are not accustomed to, and do not believe in, such breadth, liberty, and catholicity of thought as it encourages. It invites to its conventions and upon its platform representatives of all schools and all phases of religious and philosophic thought,—orthodox and heterodox, theistic and atheistic, materialistic and spiritualistic; and no restrictions whatever as to thought or utterance are imposed upon its speakers.

The organ of this Association is the Free Religious Index, which is devoted to the consideration and discussion of all religious questions, and all subjects pertaining to the freedom and progress of man. Among its contributors are men and women distinguished in different departments of thought and work, like George Jacob Holyoake, of England, Francis E. Abbot, John W. Chadwick, Felix Adler, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney.

The Free Religious Association is a truly liberal organization, in which love of truth, with liberty to think and to speak, unhampered by creeds, and willingness to "hear all sides" of every subject discussed, is the common bond of union. It deserves the support of all who have convictions of their own, and are not content to repeat, parrot-like without discrimination, whatever has been taught them; who have the courage to examine all creeds, theories, and systems; and who are satisfied that, in a "free and open encounter" with error, truth has nothing to fear, but everything to gain.

THE CONCORD SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

This school has entered upon its third year with a promise of equal or greater success than in the preceding years; and, with the hope of permanence thus afforded, it becomes of importance to understand its objects rightly, and to estimate its merits fairly. I cannot but feel that it deserves more generous recognition from those who are interested in the promotion of freedom and religion than it has heretofore met.

What is the origin and purpose of the school? It represents the tendency and aims of those who were active in the Transcendental movement thirty years ago, and it is the accomplishment of a long-cherished wish on the part of Mr. Alcott, who connects that time with the present, as his vigorous old age keeps us in close relation to his early rigor and originality. Substantially, Mr. Alcott is the same man that he was then,—his faith, his thought, his arguments, are similar, but they are modified by the experiences of a long and thoughtful life; and he is less extreme in his opinions, and more sympathetic and possibly more conservative in his utterances. I lately heard a high authority say that Mr. Alcott's conversations afforded the only instance of perfect freedom of thought which he ever knew; and I do not think he has changed to-day in wishing the atmosphere of the Concord School to be one of perfect openness and freedom.

This school has the great advantage of being free from the control of any sect or college; and, while it by no means covers, in its teachings, the whole domain of philosophy, I do not think any speaker there feels himself hampered by restrictions in speaking his whole mind fully and forcibly. Of course, it mainly represents the views of its founders. "Birds of a feather flock together," and the very air of Concord, the very name of its founder, would attract to it those who are rather ideal and spiritual, than material and practical.

But is there any danger that this side of philosophy is being too largely represented in our day and country? Is there not a preponderating interest in the other direction which ensures a full presentation of that side? And is it not thoroughly in the interest of truth and therefore of Free Religion that the earnest views of thoughtful men should thus be presented, not in the excitement of a revival meeting, but in the quiet classroom, to a critical and thoughtful audience, that they may be calmly and fairly judged?

Among the remarkable men who have been attracted to this school, the foremost is Dr. Jones, who, while practising his profession in an obscure town of the West, has studied Plato and the other master minds of the ages, and who gives the results of his own original speculation. Is not this of great value, whether we accept his statements or not? Is it not good that we should know what such a man learns from a long life of such study and thought? It has been the assertion of the freest thinkers, of such men as Mr. Adler and Mr. Abbot, that we need, most of all, a sounder philosophy, a more thorough knowledge of mental science. Does not this school afford a valuable contribution to it?

Mr. Harris, the other member of the trio who have mainly led the studies of the school, is well known, not only as a metaphysician, but as a man of the greatest practical value as an educator; and his wide range of thought and observation entitle all that he says to a respectful hearing. His great eloquence enables him to hold the attention of his audience to the closest and driest reasoning; and is not this an admirable training, and an influence which is greatly needed to counteract our hasty and slipshod manner of thinking? It is true that Mr. Harris is an avowed Hegelian, and expounds this philosophy as the best explanation of the facts of human nature and development which has yet been given. We may not all agree with him in this view; but is it not, at any rate, a great gain to have the views of so important and prominent a thinker clearly and ably set forth, so that we may put them in their true relation to any and every other form of philosophy? These three leaders of the school differ widely in their mental traits, in their methods of reasoning, and in many of their views; and I have rarely heard a more animated discussion than arose between them at the conclusion of one of Dr. Jones's lectures. Their hearers profit alike by their union and their differences.

The other lectures give variety to the exercises, and in them a wide diversity of subject and treatment may be found. Two especial charges have been brought against the school. The first is that it is hostile or indifferent to science. It does not seek to be a school of science, but of philosophy, and any direct teaching of natural science would be as out of place as gymnastics in a church, or a moral lecture in a ball-room. The scientific teacher needs to work by different methods. But relation of science to other forms of mental inquiry is fully in place in a school of philosophy, and the faculty of the Concord School have by no means neglected to consider it. They have not always succeeded in procuring the services of the eminent scientific men whom they have invited to stand on the platform, but Prof. Peirce was warmly welcomed there. This subject has been especially considered this summer, and very recently Prof. Harris paid a most cordial tribute to the men of science of our own day for their moral value, and for the generous spirit in which they pursue the inquiry after truth.

Another charge is that the school is devoted to abstract philosophy instead of practical philanthropy. Schools of philosophy usually are; but it is a curious comment on this charge that the Secretary, Mr. Sanborn, is almost wholly devoted to reform and charitable work, and presides next week at the Conference of Charities, which aims to be as practical as any Gradgrind could desire. Surely we need not grudge six weeks of summer leisure to philosophy and idealism in this busy, hurried, work-a-day world of ours.

It is also supposed by some that the influence of this school is hostile to Free Religion, and tends to uphold an exclusive and dogmatic Christianity. Its principal leaders call themselves Christians, certainly, and probably feel an attachment to some ecclesiastical expressions and forms of thought; and also look upon the position of Jesus in history in a way which we could not all accept. But even Mr. Alcott, with all Mr. Joseph Cook's endorsement, would hardly pass for a sound orthodox believer with bigoted evangelicals. Dr. Jones strongly claims the knowledge of the true unity of God, and the presence of high religious feeling among the most ancient people of India and Egypt. Is not this precisely the truth which Mr. Higginson sets forth in his Sympathy of Religions? Mr. Alcott believes in a trinity, but it is the philosophical one founded in the very nature of mind, not a theological one known only to the Christian Church. Mr. Harris speaks of Christianity, and explains it to mean the whole civilization of Europe, with all the influences which have helped to make it what it is. Is not this as Chadwick has represented it?

Why should we not welcome this free, simple, independent effort of a few earnest minds to carry on the search after truth? Even if they do not choose exactly the path which we think the broadest and most direct, it cannot fail to stimulate young minds to thought and life; and if it bids many pause and consider views of truth which they have hitherto overlooked, it will do signal service to them in giving balance and firmness to their mental action.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN AGNOSTIC.

This is the title of a story in Littell's Living Age for June 18. The hero is represented as doubting every thing, and refusing to believe in what he cannot demonstrate with infallible certainty. Thus he refuses to admit that he is the son of his own father and mother, and the latter is so provoked that the sceptic is disinherited. He will not even answer an invitation to become private tutor to the son of a Duke, for he fears that the latter is a hoax. He loses his beautiful betrothed, because he avows his suspicions that they may be mistaken in thinking that they love each other. The argument involved in this little satire is that he who is uncertain about God and immortality, would, if he were consistent, be equally uncertain about everything else. Very similar ground has just been taken by a lecturer on Goethe's Faust, who is held up as a horrid example of the mental misery and moral dangers thought to beset Agnosticism.

Such representations take it for granted that we can know the infinite in the same way and with the same certainty as the finite, so that, for instance, we can be as sure of the existence of a heavenly Father as of an earthly parent. But the fact is that we can know the finite well enough to reason about it and believe in it, but we cannot know enough about the infinite to have any ground for knowledge or belief. Man is finite, and therefore he cannot understand the infinite, but the finite only. It is knowledge of this difference that makes a man an Agnostic. He is not a sceptic, for he can be as sure as any one else about whatever comes within the range of observation and experience; and about what is outside of that range, he knows it is useless even to speculate. He is not an atheist, for he does not know enough about God to deny that he exists. He does not have any of Faust's desire to understand the infinite, nor of his scorn for finite wisdom and practical knowledge. The Agnostic delights in such truth as comes within reach, and resigns himself to the fact that much that is called truth is not to be reached by any man. He finds himself all the more at liberty to devote himself to working out the great problems of social existence, earthly life, and moral duty, because he has found that all theological questions are insoluble. If the Agnostic be asked why he does not believe in a heavenly Father as well as in an earthly parent, he answers, "Men can be known through the senses, but God cannot." If told that he must either admit that his neighbors have a real object for their religious feelings, or deny that he has any real object for his love, he replies, "I admit that both my love and your worship are realities; but the one feeling is directed toward an object which can be proved to exist, and the other toward one which cannot."

REV. DR. NEWMAN having said that "God never employs the assassin's revolver to accomplish his exalted purposes," the Christian Statesman feels called upon to comment thus: "To say that God never uses the hand of a criminal to accomplish his exalted purposes is to contradict the plainest declarations of Scripture. . . . The greatest crime of all history, the crucifixion of the Son of God, is expressly said to have been according to the 'determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God,' although it was 'wicked hands' which accomplished the deed." The Statesman imagines that, in the recent tragedy at Washington, it already sees some of "the wise and kindly purposes of God." Undoubtedly, this is a Scriptural view; but none the less its clear implication is that God is an assassin. If God directed the bullet that shot our President, using Guiteau as the instrument of his "purposes," then, to our unregenerate mind, the conclusion seems irresistible that the man awaiting trial for the crime is as innocent as though some other person had been selected, and compelled to act as the agent of God's will and the instrument of his power.

THE exclusion of Bradlaugh from a seat in the House of Commons by a religious test that originated in bigotry, and that is not in accordance with the present administration of the British Constitution, very naturally excites the indignation of fair-minded men. A Congregational minister of London, in reply to a printed circular requesting him to announce to his people a meeting to protest against Bradlaugh's admission, wrote, "I confess to a feeling of shame to see Christian men acting so crookedly in the name of Him who prayed the Father to forgive his enemies, and never used force and duplicity to despoil them of natural or civic rights." Yet political and theological opponents have combined to work up popular feeling against Bradlaugh, and a petition in favor of his exclusion has been signed by one hundred and ten thousand persons. But he is a remarkably plucky and persistent man, and has a way of making himself very troublesome to those who attempt to wrest from him his rights. We expect to see the Parliament which admitted John Stuart Mill, and more than a third of whose members are unorthodox, yet admit to his seat Charles Bradlaugh. Once recognized as a member of the House of Commons, he will be sure to make his voice heard and his influence felt in that body.

IN an article in the Springfield Republican, Senator Dawes gives a vivid picture of the harassment and bondage of the average Congressman held in the grip of rabid office-seekers, who continually hold over him the taunt of duty to his constituents, the "best men" of whom furnish greedy applicants with papers of recommendation. Then the result is exhibited,—the discomfiture and demoralization of those who are lured into the wild-goose chase, and a pathetic view presented of broken friendships, and enmity to the member himself from disappointed neighbors and associates. The supposed political injury from these thwarted applicants, he asserts, is far less operative than the loss of confidence sustained with those of his intimates who expect office, but are disappointed. As a partial remedy for this evil, which threatens the conversion of the legislator into "a mere purveyor of offices," two brief orders are suggested, by which the President can insist that "No man shall be appointed to any office while he is in the city of Washington," and "No man who brings, unasked-for by the appointing power, the recommendation of any member of Congress." To make it possible for the President and Congressmen to beat back the army of assailants, the constituents themselves must change their tactics; and an earnest appeal is made to Massachusetts for her own example of judicious action.

A NEW ENGLAND minister, referring to Guiteau's deed, says: "There is a dangerous fallacy in the assassin's pretension that he was sent by God to do the deed, and the same idea possessed the murderer Freeman. It is unsafe to follow one's impressions unless they coincide with the Word of God, yet many good people do this." But it is just as unsafe for an unbalanced mind to go to the Bible for his conceptions of duty, and to follow impressions which he imagines "coincide with the Word of God," as to rely on impressions believed to come direct from an Almighty Being. The Orthodox clergy, as a class, are so unaccustomed to close thinking and careful reasoning, and so anxious to make great events, good or bad, occasions for expounding and defending their faith, that they are constantly making themselves ridiculous by their crude, undigested notions and emotional declamations regarding matters which require in their treatment, plain, practical common-sense, unperverted by theological theories or speculations. The study of the Bible will not make a fool a wise man, nor a lunatic a sane one. On the contrary, we can conceive that from dwelling on the sacrifice of Jephthah's innocent daughter, in accordance with a vow made when "the spirit of the Lord was upon Jephthah," or pondering over the story of the assassination of Sisera by Jael, for which the inspired prophetess said, "Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber the Kennite, be," a deranged religious or political zealot might find what would to him appear sufficient authority and precedent for an act like that of Freeman, who slew his own child, or that of Guiteau, who attempted to kill the Chief Magistrate of a nation. This is true, without saying that Guiteau was influenced in any way by these or other Bible narratives.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THERE is no doubt that the tendency of the temperance agitation to limit liquor-selling to licensed druggists has not always operated as has been expected. Under the name of prescriptions and one form of application and another, these places have frequently supplied the demands of the drinking appetite as freely as though they were established for the purpose. At the meeting of the Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association, two or three weeks since, this was openly recognized in a code of ethics adopted for the conduct of the trade. Among the rules of this code "was one denouncing the practice of encouraging in any one the use of alcoholic liquids, and characterizing as degrading the practice of permitting its use as a beverage in their places of business."

THE Sanitary Engineer announces, as follows, the decision of the State Board of Health of New York at a late meeting to deliberate in reference to its course of action pertaining to the law recently passed in that State in regard to the adulteration of food: "It was decided first to ascertain what articles of food and medicine are adulterated under the meaning of the act, and of what these adulterations consist; and also to determine what methods of examination are best suited to detect them. To accomplish this object, eight chemists were appointed, to each of whom will be assigned a group of drugs or food products for study and investigation on the above points. In this way, much valuable and necessary information will be obtained, and that in a much shorter time than though the whole matter was referred to one person. We heartily approve of this plan, by which the responsibility of methods of analysis, etc., is assumed by the State Board and not left to the discretion of individual analysts, as is generally done in the carrying out of adulteration laws. In this way, a reasonable uniformity in the results obtained by different analysts will be insured, and much annoyance and doubt saved the analysts themselves."

THE dictum is very generally received that the marriage of cousins ought not to take place. But the opinion has been developing of late years that the results attributed to such unions were not as well attested as they should be for the confidence with which the statement is accepted. Dr. Mary J. Safford, a distinguished physician of this city, has undertaken to investigate the subject, and for the purpose of obtaining the requisite data has issued a circular asking the following questions:—

- I. Is the marriage between the given parties that of first or second cousins?
- II. Has marriage of first or second cousins occurred previously between father and mother, or grandfather and grandmother?
- III. Was there great disparity in the ages of husband and wife thus united?
- IV. Give name and place of birth of husband and wife? Were husband and wife of like complexion and temperament?
- V. Are one or more children born of this union of first or second cousins diseased or imperfectly developed in body, defective or diseased in mind and morals, or are there any marked idiosyncrasies in temperament or taste? If so, state in what way.
- VI. State if these abnormal conditions have existed in father or mother or in preceding generations on the paternal or maternal side.
- VII. State if any disease or accident occurred to the mother previous to the child's birth, or to the child after its birth, to account for its abnormal condition.
- VIII. If no defects, mental or physical, are known to exist in the offspring of a consanguineous marriage, please give information to that effect.

The most accurate information is desired. All names will be withheld should the results of this investigation be published.

DR. B. W. RICHARDSON, the eminent English physician and scientist, commends the work of sanitary reform as an appropriate line of effort and interest for woman. He maintains that she is peculiarly fitted for such research and observation by her character and tastes and relation to the care of the home. The Popular Science Monthly comments upon the proposition as follows:—

The training required for the proper performance of this function is really very simple. A woman can master physiology so far as to understand the general construction of the human body; she can make herself acquainted with its nine great systems, can be taught to comprehend the leading facts bearing on the anatomy and physiology of those systems, and to understand what part food plays in the economy, the relationships and effects of particular foods, and their relative adaptation to different ages and conditions of the body. Women should also be acquainted with the construction and operation of the heart and the lungs. Were women trained in the knowledge of elementary truths about the visual function and guided by them, they would see that their children did not assume those positions in study that conduce to shortsightedness and curved spines; if they carefully studied the nature and functions of the skin, they would learn to insist upon the necessity of daily purification by the bath. Women might also, and ought to, learn all that health requires in the construction and maintenance of the house: to maintain economically within it an equable temperature at all seasons; to keep the air free from dust; to know all about and watch all the drain-pipes, and see they are kept as systematically clean as the china; to distinguish whether the water is wholesome and agreeable with as much facility as she determines the looking-glass is clear; to superintend the purification of the water, and to see that the sunlight finds its way into every apartment and that damp has no place in any one of her rooms. She ought to study the nature and uses of foods, so as to be able, not only to make the best selections and carry out the best modes of preparation, but even to introduce new and improved modes of cooking. The knowledge of the diagnosis of disease is not necessary for women except in a limited degree; but they ought to know the correct names and characters of common diseases, to be acquainted with the facts relating to the periods of incubation of those diseases, and to have the best methods of preventing diseases at their fingers' ends.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MAYENCE ON THE RHINE, GERMANY, }
June 21, 1881. }

The low temperature of the Hartz mountain regions, even at this season, forces the enfeebled Americans to seek more genial skies in the Rhine valleys, where outdoor exercise may be had, free from chilling frosts and cutting winds. Nature has indeed been niggardly in her gifts to the Hartz mountaineer. Long, severe, cold winters, short summers, arid hills, rocky cliffs, an unproductive soil, mines of iron and coal, which yield such small quantity and inferior quality of ore that they would not be worked in America, with life to the poor one constant, ceaseless, grinding toil, with no hope of bettering the financial condition. The wages of a week are less than we pay in a day, and food supplies are much dearer than in the United States. Such is the dark side of life in this densely-populated, sterile country. The bright side is the cheerful heart of the mountaineer, his love for the old verdure-crowned hills, which are planted to pine and beech forests, wherever a bit of mother earth adheres to a stone or rock, the bracing air, the songs of the bullfinch, cuckoo, lark, thrush, and other sweet warblers, and the capacity to not only make the most of, but to find great enjoyment in, pleasures which cost nothing but labor. The sour, black rye bread, which the American stomach resents with intense suffering, is like ambrosia to the native mountaineer; and fatiguing walks of miles to enjoy a beautiful prospect from some lofty, rocky eminence is as great a pleasure as when an American makes the tour of Italy or Switzerland. The capacity of these people to find happiness in things which cost no money, and content in a laborious humdrum existence, is wonderful. The many picturesque localities throughout these regions are enhanced by historical and traditional truths and myths. Amid the lower Hartz near Nordhausen, Frederic Barbarossa had his great feudal stronghold, and from Kiffhauser Castle organized the German crusade in the thirteenth century, during which he lost his life by drowning in Palestine. The ancient ruin of Kiffhauser Tower yet remains; and for centuries his Saxon descendants preferred to believe he was sleeping an enchanted sleep in the old ruin, instead of accepting the truth that he had died from bathing in an infidel river. It was not safe for the defeated crusaders to return home and tell their countrymen that their God had permitted death to overtake the warlike champion of the Cross; and, as the Saxons had a strong faith in the power of the devil, the myth was believed hundreds of years. Even now, it is being rehearsed in the public school readers, more as a truth than a fiction, with the addenda that since Kaiser Wilhelm has restored German unity Frederic Barbarossa has awakened from his enchanted sleep and died a natural death. I have enjoyed some opportunity of visiting the public schools throughout this locality; and, though they hold the highest rank in the world, I find them inferior to those of Ohio, whose system I have also been enabled to study thoroughly. I find very, very much humbug about the German public schools. The pupil's memory is strained at the expense of his reasoning faculties. There, in the heart of Protestant Germany, myths are taught as half-truths. An immensely great amount of rubbish is taught. Though we in Ohio are not free from this failing, we have so very little in comparison to Germany that we may well congratulate ourselves. Much time is taken up in study of the prevailing theology, and though thoroughness is aimed at, and the system may answer for this country, it would not be practical enough for ours.

There are many delightfully picturesque localities throughout the Hartz regions, where the air is pure. Few American visitors come here in comparison to Switzerland and Italy, which is not to be wondered at, since living is so very unsuited to American tastes. The fine views and mountain air are no compensation for food stinted in quantity and poor in quality, with higher prices than in France or the Rhine-land. Thale, Die Rosstrappe, Der Heesentanzplatz, Ilsenstein, Der Broken, Regenstein, Blankenburg, Wenegerode, Harzburg, and various other localities in their vicinity, would be delightfully charming resorts, if there were ever warm summer weather. But to the present time the air has been intensely bleak and chilly. The villages lie under the mountains, hemmed in the valleys, and their atmosphere is often poisoned by filth and malaria breeding cesspools and vats, where fertilizers are made of animal refuse matter. It is astonishing, with the amount of intelligence of the average German mind, that sanitary precautions are often so utterly disregarded. In several of the Hartz villages, typhus fever is prevailing as an epidemic, in spite of the cold weather. The mountain air is pure and invigorating, but there are no accommodations for tourists on the elevations. The houses one finds there are mere summer restaurants, without lodgings, with very expensive prices for food and drink, even water costing ten fennig, or two and a half cents of our money, for a small tumblerful.

My associations brought me in contact with an intensely loyal or rather monarchial-loving population. Church and State are far more closely united than I could have believed possible, had I not been an eye witness to their workings, which I hope to explain more fully to the readers of the Index when I return to America. Those of the people who do not emigrate are apparently satisfied with existing conditions. Though the emigration from Germany is so immensely great, the country is still vastly overpopulated for its resources. There is very much sterile land, and the hitherto productive valleys are yielding lighter crops annually, notwithstanding the wonderful agricultural knowledge of the German farmer, who studies the chemical properties of the soil and seeks to return the nutriment through fertilizers which he draws therefrom. At Wenegerode, where Duke Stolberg-Stolberg, the Assistant Premier and the President of the Imperial Senate, has a palace and large forest and very valuable estate, I had the pleasure of meeting a German gentleman of great thought and high culture. In speaking of the immense emigration from Germany, he said: "It is a necessity. Germany cannot produce food and clothes for forty-seven million souls. Her resources are annually diminishing. Her soil refuses to pay back the cultivator for the labor he expends thereon. Her coal mines are becoming exhausted. Her people must emigrate or starve. Our families are too large; and I tremble for the future of my country, unless some way is devised to restore to her the prosperity in future generations, which she has been steadily losing during the last half-century." As he was a loyalist, and I his guest, I deemed it rude to add what I mentally thought, that, with the immense taxation requisite to pay the Emperor alone his salary of $5,000,000 dollars annually, to maintain the enormous standing army, the established church, the many princes, to pay the thousands of pensions, and the expenses of the Imperial government, the future prospect of Germany is dark indeed; and, in the inevitable course of events, she must sink, unless her tremendous taxation is lessened, and the humanity of her laboring classes is recognized.

American readers and scholars who know Germany only through her universities, her literary life, and the intellects of her authors, professors, and novel writers, see but one little bright spot of the Germanic world. Through kinship amid the hereditary aristocracy and the governing classes, I am seeing the dark side of German social life, and, should health and life permit, hope to present to the American world the reality which has never, never been told. Alas that fiction has so strong a hold upon the human heart and mind that truth can never overtake her, and that romance and song, while they inculcate one good lesson, propagate ten thousand lies! The work of the true humanitarian, who, instead of nursing and feeding the social evils of civilization which result from ignorance, tyranny, vice, and wrong living, seeks to point them out and prevent their cause instead of increasing them is truly herculean, and is nowhere in the broad earth more needed than right here in Protestant Germany, the home of Luther and Melancthon.

The journey from Cassel via Frankfort lies through a pleasing country, somewhat less sterile than the Hartz-land. The Rhine country is more genial, fruitful, and inviting to an American woman, accustomed to courteous treatment from railway officials. In Saxony, railway officials are very rude, almost barbarous, and often so boozy from beer-drinking, that German travellers get on the wrong trains, even when they have season-tickets, which are customary in the Hartz country. Thorough acquaintance with railway guides is a necessity, if one desires to avoid travelling in wrong directions. Last week, three English ladies, not speaking German well, desired to go to the Mähdensprung, a Hartz resort, and instead found themselves in Magdaburg. It was all owing to the stupidity of the railway conductors. Fortunately for them, they met a German lady who spoke a little French; and, as they also understood that language, she conducted them to a German girls' boarding-school in Magdaburg, where some English misses were studying "Weibliche Arbeiten," as the Teutons call darning, embroidery, tatting, and other useless work which keeps the minds of women in an idiotic condition, where they made their dilemma known and were sent in the right direction.

Unless American women desire to study music or the German language, it is rank folly to come to Germany to obtain education while every possible avenue in literature and science is open to man: the one, sole idea of education for woman is to "clap a padlock on her mind," and teach her such things as will fit her to become the mother of a servile race. I have not visited the art centres of Germany, and know not what advantages women may obtain there, but this I know, that German girls are kept studying the dogmas of the prevailing theology, and making abominable needlework, not fit to be seen and of no earthly use when finished, more than half of the time during school hours. A little music, a smattering of modern languages is added sometimes, and these are acquired more thoroughly where women fit themselves as teachers. While I have found considerable natural intelligence among the women of Germany, and great kindness of heart, I have not yet seen one intellectual woman. Goethe's Charlotte, cutting rye bread and butter for a dozen little brothers and sisters, is the favorite household picture of Saxon Germany, where woman when young, rich, or beautiful is a toy, and in every other age or condition a slave. Carl Schurz years since extolled, in a public lecture, the house-keeping qualifications of the German woman as superior to those of her average American sister. My experience "of home life in Germany" proves this to be a myth. There is not, cannot be, a comparison. The German housekeeper with her bunch of keys dangling from her belt has three servants, while her American sister has one or none. No bread, pies, or confectionery is baked in the German home, the baker attending to that. Living is so simple, that the five daily German meals are less work than one good "square" one in the "States." And while the German woman is industrious with her hands, she has no managing mind, and an ordinarily "smart" Yankee housekeeper can "turn off" three times as much work as her Teutonic sister, do it better, and find time to attend "woman's rights" meetings, and write for the papers, if so inclined.

ROSA L. SEGUR.

MR. CARLYLE's opinion of the clergy to-day is given in this interesting bit from Mr. W. Knigton's account of conversations with him recently published in the Contemporary Review: C.—"The position of the clergy is one of ignominy and deep degradation. The spectacle of a body of enlightened men solemnly, and in the face of God and man professing their steadfast faith and belief in that which they know they do not steadfastly believe in, is enough to make any thinking man sick at heart. What enlightened man can conscientiously in these days tie up his reason by formulas and articles drawn up centuries ago, and say, 'I believe,' while the inner soul of him all the time is exclaiming, 'I do not believe—it is a lie?' " K.—"Some men, like Dr. Newman, for instance, first persuade themselves that there is an infallible Church that cannot err, and then, taking refuge therein, are troubled no further about the matter, accepting all its dicta as heaven-descended truths, whatever their reason may whisper about the matter." C.—"And what is that but moral emasculation?—one of the most lamentable religious phases of our times. Even with respect to the clergy of the English Church, they doubtless have persuaded themselves in most instances that they did believe before they made their declaration to that effect. For the time being they do not believe, but—believe that they believe. There is little hope for a Church existing under such circumstances. No, no; things cannot go on long in this way."

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Notes.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these, if at all, with great freedom. THE WORLD WE LIVE IN.

THE MINERAL KINGDOM.

THE VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

THE ANIMAL KINGDOM. (Except man.)
MAN.

Study 11.—The Vegetable Kingdom.

*The Parts of a Plant.*Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pp. 5 and 6.

Specimen: Some familiar plant, for example Morning Glory, showing plainly Root, Stem, and Leaves; also blossom and fruit of some sort.

We have now studied what in the great Bible of Nature?

What kingdom is this called?

What is the next higher form of life?

What is this kingdom called?

We are now, then, to learn what?

What is this?

[Show specimen plant, and see how much each member of the Group will tell about it. Also see figure 4, page 5.]

What are the three principal parts of a plant?

What are these called?

Why are they thus called?

What do plants produce?

What is the use of these to the plant?

They are called what?

Why?

What is the Root of a plant?

[Illustrate with the specimen.]

What is it for?

What is a Rootlet?

[Illustrate with the specimen.]

What is the stem?

[Illustrate with the specimen.]

What is the Leaf?

[Illustrate with the specimen.]

What do these different parts do while the plant is growing?

After the plant has grown awhile, what takes place?

For this purpose, it does what?

[Show specimen blossom.]

What is the object of the flower?

[Show specimen fruit.]

What is the essential part of the fruit?

[Illustrate with specimen fruit.]

What is the essential part of the seed?

And this is really what?

Did we see this, when we looked at our little plant?

How many things have we discovered besides what we saw at first?

Do these same parts exist in all plant life?

What is the science which treats of them called?

What does the study of this science do for us?

SELECTIONS.

Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.—Jesus.

The grass which springs up in the cracks of city streets, or which in meadows the farmer's ox licks up by handfuls,—what a beautiful thing it is in shape, in color how exceeding fair!—Parker.

The roots which the beasts and which men feed upon,—what comely things they are!—Parker.

How handsome are the shapes of the apple, pear, peach, quince, plum; of the acorn, the nut, the pine cone; yea, of every leaf!—Parker.

There never yet was flower in vain,

The seasons toil that it may bloom again.—Lowell.

Each hath its place in the Eternal Plan:

Heaven whispers wisdom to the wayside flower,

Bidding it use its own peculiar dower,

And bloom its best within its little span.
We must each do, not what we will, but can;
Nor have we duty to exceed our power.—Burbridge.

Suggestions to Leader.—It cannot be too often said that the aim of the leader should be to master the thought of the study. To this, its form is and should always be secondary. Do not fail to study from the specimens. If you and your children can grow your own, so much the better. The seed should be such as will easily show the embryo to the unpractised eye. The selections may be divided among the members of the group or all placed upon a blackboard and repeated in concert. In either case, they should be talked about, and their meaning made clear to the children.

Study 12.—The Vegetable Kingdom.

*The Parts of a Plant, continued.*Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pp. 7, 8, and 9.

Specimens: A blossom for each member of the group, if possible from same kind of plant shown in preceding lesson; also fruit showing seeds plainly.

What is this?

[Show one of the specimen blossoms.]

How many things can you say about it?

Do you know what the Calyx is?

Where is it in this flower?

[Let members of Group find it.]

What is the Corolla?

Can you find it in this flower?

What are the Stamens?

Where are they in this flower?

Each Stamen consists of what?

What is the stalk called?

What the little case on the top of the stalk?

What does this contain?

What do we find in the centre of the flower?

These are called what?

What is their use?

What are the parts of the Pistil?

What becomes of the Pollen dropped from the Anthers?

And what results from this?

Do all flowers have the same number of Pistils?

What are the little bodies which are to become seeds called?

Can you name now all the parts of a flower?

Do all flowers have all these parts?

What is the Fruit?

How is it formed?

How many classes of fruits can you mention?

What are the Seeds?

What is the Embryo or Germ.

Of what does it consist?

[Let members of Group find out for themselves.]

These little leaves are called what?

The little stem what?

Did you ever hear of this word before?

What does it mean?

SELECTIONS.

One impulse from a vernal wood

May teach you more of man,

Of moral evil and of good,

Than all the sages can.—Wordsworth.

The cowslip startles in meadows green,

The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,

And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean

To be some happy creature's palace.—Lowell.

I can hear the violet's chorus

To the sky's benediction above;

And we all are together lying

On the bosom of Infinite Love.—Gannett.

It is my faith that every flower

Enjoys the air it breathes.—Wordsworth.

Rhodora! if the sages ask thee why

Thy charm is wasted on the earth and sky,

Tell them, dear, that, if eyes were made for seeing,

Then Beauty is its own excuse for being.—Emerson.

Dear common flower that grow'st beside the way,

Fringing the dusty road with harmless gold,

* * * * *

How like a prodigal doth nature seem,

When thou for all thy gold so common art!

Thou teachest me to deem

More sacredly of every human heart.—Lowell.

Suggestions to Leader.—The illustrations on pages 7, 8, and 9 of the Text-book can be used to good advantage in connection with the specimens, but should not be allowed to take their place. Show how the flowers and leaves are the palaces of the "happy creatures" to which Lowell refers. Let the members of the Group guess what the "dear common flower" is. The intelligent mind will readily see that each of the selections furnishes a text for quite a little sermon.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

CHARLES ELLIS is spending the summer at Economy, Nova Scotia.

REV. J. W. CHADWICK spoke at Florence for the Cosmians last Sunday.

MR. WM. J. POTTER, the editor of the Index, will take his summer rest at Gloucester. Prof. Adler is already located there at the Bass Rock House.

CONKLING's humiliation is complete; but the great State of New York, which should be represented by statesmen only, has no reason to feel proud of her present senators.

COL. J. C. BUNDY, proprietor and editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, who went to the Azores for his health, some months ago, has visited England and is now on his way home.

MR. HENRY G. VENNOR, the Canadian weather-prophet, is forty-one years of age. He is a professor in the University of Montreal, and the author of a book entitled Our Birds of Prey.

A NUMBER of the friends of Mr. Mendum, proprietor of the Investigator, met at his house in Melrose, one evening this month, to celebrate his seventy-first birthday. Mr. Horace Seaver and Hon. Eliza Wright, among others, made appropriate remarks.

T. B. WAKEMAN gave an address at Paine Hall last Sunday on the "Age of Revision." He emphasized the importance of recognizing the advances among theologians, and meeting them on their present and not their obsolete positions. The lecture was able and well received.

DEAN STANLEY was the most influential of all the representatives of the Broad Church wing, but his favor with the Queen shielded him from the hostility of the High Church Anglicans. His last audible words, according to Archbishop of Canterbury, were, "I have labored, amidst many frailties and much weakness, to make Westminster Abbey the great centre of religious and national life in a truly liberal spirit."

By a vote of three hundred and fifty to thirty-eight, the English Army and Navy Club have restored Col. Baker to active membership, on the ground that the offence for which he was expelled did not affect his character as a gentleman. As his offence was an attempt to outrage a young lady in a railway carriage, the question naturally arises, What, in the estimation of this aristocratic club of which the Prince of Wales is a member, constitutes an ungentlemanly offence?

OF Guiteau, Ingersoll says: "He went about the country, replying to me. I have seen one or two of his lectures. He uses about the same arguments that Mr. Black uses in his reply to my article in the North American Review, and denounced me in about the same terms. He is undoubtedly a man who firmly believes in the Old Testament, and has no doubt concerning the New. I understand that he puts in most of his time now reading the Bible, and rebuking people who use profane language in his presence."

REV. DR. NEWMAN, known as Gen. Grant's chaplain and "inspector of consulates," delivered a sermon on the Fourth, in which, from the act of Guiteau, he drew the lesson that foreigners should be disfranchised, and infidel lecturers, like Ingersoll, should be silenced. Newman's hatred of our German citizens who insist on spending Sunday to please themselves, and not him, and his impatience with unbelievers in his theology, are bad enough in his normal state; but in the sermon alluded to they must have been intensified by some unusually malign influence.

CAPT. ADAMS, son of the celebrated Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Adams, who was as much esteemed in this city, where he lived and preached, for his personal qualities as he was censured by anti-slavery people for his famous South Side View, called at the Index office one day last week to inquire about his classmates at Harvard, F. E. Abbot and W. C. Gannett. Capt. Adams followed the sea several years, but is now a merchant at Montreal. He retains none of the ultra theology in which he was brought up, being in sympathy with the liberal and progressive thought of the day.

Says a correspondent of the Springfield Republican, "Only a few women appear among the lecturers, and not many among the talkers, at the Concord School; but those who do speak have something important to say and say it gracefully and well." So far only two women, Mrs. E. D. Cheney and Julia Ward Howe, have given lectures in the Concord course; but those two have been followed by more than usual interest in the conversational discussions which ensue after each discourse. Mrs. Cheney spoke on "The Relations of Poetry and Science," and Mrs. Howe on "Philosophy in Europe and America."

HERBERT SPENCER, it is stated, will soon visit the United States. The interest in this great thinker's views widens, and the demand for his works increases every year. Joseph Cook, with his "incontrovertible propositions" and "axiomatic truths," tried to demolish Spencer, "whose star," said he, "touches the Western pines"; but the fame of the philosopher increases and his star rises higher and grows more luminous, while that of the American theological Don Quixote has disappeared from the intellectual heavens. Indeed, Cook's "star" was nothing more than a meteorite, which men of science tell us "contains large quantities of gas with a considerable proportion of water."

COL. INGERSOLL, it is said, has brought a suit against a Chicago publisher for piracy. The New York Herald says it is safe to assume that the alleged offender will "seek to rout his assailant by claiming that the literary wares of the great heretic are ungodly, and therefore without the pale of the law." Although the English Chancellor, Lord Eldon, refused to restrain the piratical publication of Sir William Lawrence's lectures in London because they called in question or implied doubt concerning a future state, declaring "that the law does not give protection to those who contradict the Scriptures," it is not likely that on such grounds any of the higher courts of this country would to-day refuse to protect the copyright of an author.

FOREIGN.

CHEERING accounts come from Geneva as to the richness and abundance of harvests in Switzerland and the adjacent portions of France, Germany, and Italy.

MISSIONARIES in China find the foot-binding practice among the females more barbarous and horrible than before supposed, and have established an anti-foot-binding society in one of their cities. But the custom is so firmly held by caste-rules as to render its abolition very difficult.

EVEN Spain is clearing a highway for the car of humanity, if action is suited to this word of her King Alfonso: "We must repair the mistakes of our ancestors, and we must repair a cruel act of injustice and of intolerance. Let the Hebrews come back to their old fatherland, whose language they yet speak in its old dialect in the East."

THE grave defects of Orthodox dogmas ingrafted upon heathen communities have some palliation if the testimony of an English peer can be credited. He speaks of great benefit in the way of gratuitous education in a city of Northern India from the schools of an American Society having been bestowed upon the natives in a quiet and unostentatious way.

THE minority of the Scottish Free Church Assembly in the case of Prof. Robertson Smith have issued a protest against his removal, which concludes as follows, "We also declare that the decision of the Assembly leaves all Free Church ministers and office-bearers free to pursue the critical questions raised by Prof. W. R. Smith, and we pledge ourselves to do our best to protect any man to pursue these studies legitimately."

THE French are made happy by the skull of Cardinal Richelieu and the heart of Voltaire being placed in safe keeping. But would they like to know where the heart of "le Grand Monarque" is? It reposes in Westminster Abbey. An émigré brought it over with him to England during the French Revolution. Being hospitably entertained at Newnham, in Oxfordshire, on his departure, he made a present of the heart to his host. There it remained for a considerable number of years as a curiosity. The late Professor Buckland was on a visit at the house when the heart was shown to him. It is well known that the Professor, during the latter years of his life, was eccentric. The heart looked like a small piece of dried leather. The Professor handled it, then he smelt it, then he put it between his teeth, and then, to the horror of the spectators, he swallowed it. The remains of Professor Buckland repose in Westminster Abbey, and consequently in Westminster Abbey reposes the heart of Louis XIV.—London Truth.

A CORRESPONDENT in New Zealand writes that "The Freethinkers in Dunedin conduct a successful organization, instructing large audiences, and purpose building a place of meeting of their own." And further: "Our national educational system is secular. The Bible is not read in the schools, but the use of school-rooms may be had before and after school-hours by ministers and others who wish to read and teach the Bible to children they may induce to attend. Some of the clergy—Anglican particularly—are not satisfied with this amount of accommodation, but agitate to have the Bible read within the school-hours, and even go so far as to urge that the regular teachers should conduct this reading. The press in Auckland have hitherto opposed this movement on the ground of expediency." The writer sends with his letter specimen copies of a weekly newspaper published in Otago, New Zealand, called The Echo, and announced as "devoted to liberty of thought on political, religious, scientific, and all questions affecting the social welfare."

JESTINGS.

"MOTHER, what is an angel?" "An angel? Well, an angel is a being that flies." "But, mother, why does papa always call my governess an angel?" "Well," exclaimed the mother, after a moment's pause, "she's going to fly, immediately!"

"LET us play we were married," said little Edith. "And I will bring my dolly, and say, 'See baby, papa.'" "Yes," replied Johnny; "and I will say, 'Don't bother me now. I want to look through the paper.'" Children have strange ideas of grown folk's ways,—now, don't they?

A MAINE paper prints a laconic correspondence between two personal friends. One wrote to the other: "Do me the favor to lend me a dollar, to get my cow out of the pound." The other wrote back: "I would, but I paid my last dollar to the boys to take the cow to the pound."

"THE Bible says, 'Love your neighbor as yourself,'" the parson remarked; "but, of course, we must not take this literally. If you manage to love your neighbor one-hundredth part as much as you do yourself, many of you, it will be all that can be reasonably expected of you."

LESSONS

For Liberal Sunday Schools or for Home Use.

I. THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. Freedom and Fellowship in Religion.

A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

TRACTS.

These Tracts, of which have attracted so great an interest, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for Affirmations, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

WHAT a cage is to the wild beast, law is to the selfish man. Restraint is for the savage, the rapacious, the violent; not for the just, the gentle, the benevolent. All necessity for external force implies a morbid state. Dungeons for the felon, a straight-jacket for the maniac, crutches for the lame, stays for the weak-backed; for the infirm of purpose, a master; for the foolish a guide; but for the sound mind in a sound body, none of these.—Herbert Spencer.

TO THE minnow, every cranny and pebble, and quality and accident of its little native Creek may have become familiar; but does the minnow understand the Ocean tides and periodic currents, the Trade-winds and Monsoons, and Moon's Eclipses, by all which the condition of its little creek is regulated, and may from time to time (unmiraculously enough) be quite over-set and reversed? Such a minnow is Man; his Creek this Planet Earth; his Ocean, the Unmeasurable All.—Thomas Carlyle.

GIVE unqualified assent to no propositions but those the truth of which is so clear and distinct that they cannot be doubted. The enunciation of this first great commandment of science consecrated doubt. It removed doubt from the seat of penance among the grievous sins to which it had long been condemned, and enthroned it in that high place among the primary duties which is assigned to it by the scientific conscience of these latter days.—Huxley.

ANY society which is not improving is deteriorating, and the more so the closer and familiar it is. Even a really superior man almost always begins to deteriorate when he is habitually king of his company.—J. S. Mill.

IF the swiftest thinking has the pace of a greyhound, the slowest must be supposed to move, like the limpet, by an apparent sticking, which after a good while is discerned to be a slight progression. Such differences are manifest in the variable intensity which we call human experience, from the revolutionary rush of change which makes a new inner and outer life, to that quiet recurrence to the familiar which has no other epochs than those of hunger and the heavens.—George Eliot.

HE prays best who, not asking God to do man's work, prays penitence, prays resolutions, and then prays deeds, thus supplicating with heart and head and hands.—Theodore Parker.

THE profoundest minds know best that nature's ways are not at all times their ways, and that the brightest flashes in the world of thought are incomplete until they have been proved to have their counterpart in the world of fact. Thus the vocation of the true experimentalist may be defined as the continued exercise of spiritual insight and its incessant correction and realization.—Tyndall.

THE great thinker is the secretary of his age. If his quick-glancing mind outrun the swiftest of his contemporaries, he will not be listened to; the prophet must find disciples. If he outrun the majority of his contemporaries, he will have but a small circle of influence, for all originality is estrangement.—G. H. Lewes.

AMONG the many strange servilities mistaken for piety, one of the least lovely is that which hopes to flatter God by despising the world and vilifying human nature.—G. H. Lewes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE general interest in the Civil Service Reform is a very hopeful sign of the times.

THE people of England are putting forth efforts for prayer to be offered throughout their domain for increased godliness. If Parliament can be persuaded to enact juster laws for suffering dependants, a marked accession of that desirable quality supposed to constitute piety will forestall the wordy church petitions.

THE London Times says: "Had it been fashionable in America to exile its disturbing elements, Mr. Phillips would have been picking fish-bones in Alaska long ago, for his country's good." "Disturbing elements," like Wendell Phillips, are the salt that has not lost its savor. Such men are needed both in this country and in England; and, when they are "exiled," revolution will be in order.

THE Catholic Review characterizes the complimenting of Catholics by Protestant editors, on their sympathy with the President the last few weeks, as "an impertinence. At least, it would be one, did the journalists know as much as they ought to know." Certainly, the Catholics of this country are not so destitute of common human sympathy or common patriotism that their horror of the attempt to assassinate the President and their prayers for his recovery should be referred to as an unexpected manifestation of feeling or of interest in the Republic.

IT seemed from observations reported by professors of the Cincinnati observatory a few weeks ago that the noted guest among the stars was following the fashion of mundane politicians by getting up a "split" for sensational variety. Observed facts in other astronomical quarters, however, failed to corroborate the supposition. But very curious phases of change in form from night to night have been detained by photographic skill, and render this heavenly fugitive as helpless of disguise as any other famous eccentric who is compelled to face the camera for future detection.

"OUT of a class of one hundred and twenty-six which was graduated this year at Yale College," says the Presbyterian, "only five propose to enter the ministry." Our pious contemporary is at a loss for an explanation of this fact. It wants to know why, "as colleges grow strong, wealthy, and conspicuous, the number of ministers coming out of the successive classes diminishes." It is just possible that the proportion of educated young men, such as graduate from our first-class colleges, having faith in Christianity, is not as large as formerly; and that, in this sceptical, practical age, the ministry has not the attraction it once possessed for young men of ability, energy, and earnestness. If this be so, it is easy to understand why, from inferior colleges, come the larger number of ministers.

THE Emperor and Empress of Russia arrived on the 29th at Moscow, the original capital of the empire. The day following, twenty thousand troops were passed in review; and, Sunday last, a pilgrimage was made to the convent of St. Sergius. The Emperor's chief reliance is evidently on the bayonets of soldiers and the superstition of the masses,—the main support of despotic government wherever it exists. His anxiety and trouble, and the difficulties and dangers that surround him, are doubtless great; and with the sad fate of his father, which is yet fresh in the public mind, they begot for him much sympathy in all lands. Yet what are his individual griefs and fears, in comparison with the sufferings of the "dumb millions" under his imperial rule? He deserves no peace of mind until he shall change his policy, and try to lighten the burdens of the Russian peasants. Kings and emperors are for the people, not the people for them. The man who commiserates the condition of a ruler, and ignores the hardships of the people for whom all governments and rulers exist, "pities the plumage, while he forgets the dying bird."

GOVERNOR ROBERTS, of Texas, in response to a letter from Governor Foster, of Ohio, telegraphed as follows: "My failure to answer you favorably is not on account of any want of sympathy for the President, but because I deem it inconsistent with my position as governor to issue a proclamation directing religious services, where Church and State are and ought to be kept separate in their functions. I doubt not the people of Texas have as strongly wished and will as devoutly pray for the recovery of the President as any people in the United States." Governor Roberts seems to have a correct idea of the scope of his official duties, and is evidently a man who has the courage of his convictions. But the Boston Herald characterizes his refusal to unite with the governors of other States in appointing a day of religious service as a "phenomenal oddity," for which he "is likely to pay dearly"; adding, "The act is almost universally condemned by the press of the State, and will not be forgotten should his name ever come up again for the suffrages of the people." No doubt every orthodox editor and every orthodox preacher in the State will condemn this just and brave reply to Governor Foster's letter. Orthodox Christians generally, without any conception of what the separation of Church and State implies, will unite in making this reply a reason for denouncing its author as an infidel. Every office-seeking politician, and every man who cares more for popularity than for principle, will join in the condemnation. And other men, in office and out, who clearly see the correctness of Governor Roberts's position, will be intimidated into silence, if not hypocritical approval of the popular judgment. This will be only one more illustration of the manner in which orthodox Christianity offers a premium upon cowardice and hypocrisy. This language may seem severe, but its severity is in its truth.

THE ORIGINS OF EVIL.

BY J. E. PECK.

In the light of modern science, that reputed insoluble problem, the origin of evil, with the correlative questions of its nature, penalty, and remedy, stands revealed. It is solved in so far as the fact of existence is solved, and no further. Good and evil, being a part of existence, are as unexplainable ultimately as gravitation or any other fact of the cosmos. When we have said that gravity is a mode of motion of matter, that both matter and its motion are eternal, we come to the fact of their existence, to which fact our ideas of causation do not apply.

It is the attempt to reconcile the idea of a universe of mixed good and evil with that of an infinitely wise and merciful Being as its absolute Creator that has rendered the question so inscrutable. For, if any being created the universe, he created not only the substance of all being, but its modes of action, from which result all phenomena, including good and evil.

To obviate this, the theologians invented a system by which they shifted the responsibility upon the free will of man. In respect to free will, we will here only ask the question, Whether will does not always decide in accordance with the strongest motive at the time being. And, as motives are caused by the external world or environment acting on the physical organization, both being by the theological supposition created, we might well inquire how far the responsibility is shifted from the Creator to the created.

With the Christian, all good is founded in the nature of Deity. Whatever God commands men to do, that is good. What he commands them not to do, that is sin, which causes all evil, thus making sin and evil identical. With the theologian, evil is not found in the nature of things, but in disobedience of arbitrary commands. The reputed battle in heaven was a contest of personalities. This first rebellion of free will against superior power is made the germ of physical and mental evil. For after this it is said that two beings were created on the instant, perfect in all human faculties. They had but one command, not to eat of the fruit of a certain tree. But, being endowed with free will and being tempted by Satan, they decided to eat of the fruit. Then not only were Adam and Eve, but the constitution of nature and of all animals, changed from good to evil. Before that event, the lamb lay down outside of the lion; after it, inside of him. In this childish manner, which is peculiar to primitive nations, not only the evil in man, but in unconscious nature, is removed from a Creator to the will of man. Thus all evil is a punishment of disobedience by a superior will. It is made a conflict of finite, immaterial will against the immaterial infinite. The first result of Adam's sin was knowledge. It was a practical objective knowledge: witness the clothing of fig leaves. Now, to say that Adam obtained this knowledge is to say that good and evil actually existed objectively outside of the human mind. Joining this with the assertion that the constitution of nature was miraculously changed, we see that the theologian overshoots himself, and makes the origin of evil fall back upon a Creator.

We have only referred to these stories to show that they are the real foundation of the Orthodox theology of morals, in order to contrast it with the utilitarian idea. The first makes evil to be a disobedience of commands because they are commands, and not because certain modes of action are, in the nature of things, inimical to man. Evil is both the act of disobedience and the punishment inflicted by Deity, which follows the act.

In the language of J. S. Mill: "According to the Calvinistic theory, the one great offence of man is self-will. All the good of which humanity is capable is comprised in obedience. You have no choice; thus you must do, and no otherwise; 'whatever is not a duty is a sin.' Human nature being radically corrupt, there is no redemption for any one until human nature is killed within him. Man needs no capacity but that of surrendering himself to the will of God."—Essay on Liberty, p. 119. It is evident that such ideas in the human mind can develop no love for moral principles for themselves alone. To make man a mere obeying machine is to deny him all original power for good. To quote again from the same essay: "It fosters a low, abject, servile type of character, which, submit itself as it may to what it deems the Supreme Will, is incapable of rising to or sympathizing in the Supreme Goodness."—p. 19. Doubtless, there are many Orthodox persons who are controlled more by their reason and moral emotions than by force; but it is no less true that fear is an antagonist of a true love of virtue.

The theological idea, then, of evil, of its origin, nature, penalty, and remedy, is briefly this: There is, first, belief in an infinite, conscious Being, usually considered as distinct from and outside of matter. The origin and nature of evil is man's disobedience to the commands of this infinite Being. The penalty is direct punishment in this world by special providence, and eternal torment in another. The remedy is belief in and practice of the opinions of the Church, which is considered to be the only true morality.

As a basis for a rationalistic idea of ethics, I propose the two following propositions. But first, there are two kinds of evil, that which man encounters in the external world, and of which man is supposed not now to be the cause, and also the evil which men inflict upon one another. It is to remedy this last form that systems of ethics are originated.

Our first statement is this: If there were now, and had been, but one single conscious being in existence, then good and evil, right and wrong would be impossible. We suppose this being to correspond to the Orthodox idea of God, who, being single, and infinite in power, could not be injured by or have any relations to other things. Therefore, to arrive at good and evil, we must go from unity to diversity.

Hence our second proposition: All moral good and evil arises from the relations which individual conscious beings bear to other individual conscious beings, and that these relations can all be referred back to the doctrine of utility as the real fact which lies at the bottom of all right modes of human action. Of course I mean the good and evil in nature when it becomes differentiated into man; it is of this alone that ethics can take cognizance.

To illustrate, let us suppose the existence of only two persons. If the ten commands had been given to them, there are but five of them that they could have violated, simply because the others imply something done by individuals to individuals. We suppose these two persons to be one in interest. Immorality began when the human race had multiplied sufficiently to act on each other. Two isolated persons could have no inducement or occasion to commit the crimes prevalent in a large society. As the race increased, separate interests arose. The struggle for existence, combined with the sense of individual right, gave rise to the idea of property. On individual right is based the ethical idea of justice as embodied in the five commands,—Thou shalt not kill, steal, commit adultery, bear false witness, covet. These laws rise spontaneously, through experience, in the human mind. Perhaps it is worthy of note that in this code there is no reference to strong drink, opium, or tobacco. The first was a small evil then, the other two utterly unknown to the Jews. Is this not a hint of moral evolution, that man forms his moral laws and sentiments in reference to the objective evil of his own time?

What, then, is evil, as shown to man by his reason and experience? And what is its origin? Its origin is in the nature of existence. Its nature is simply the suffering of that part of existence which becomes conscious in sensation and thought. The historic age, and the age whose history is written in the stone pages of the rocks, show that life has been a state of some joy, but mostly of suffering and carnage. After some of the primeval forms of force were converted into vegetation, these again nourished the lowest forms of life possessing little sensation. But, as the forms of life became more highly organized, the law of self-preservation led animals to prey upon one another. Birds and animals tore one another asunder. There are some so constituted that they cannot live except upon the flesh of others. Instead of animals being at first peaceful, fossil remains of prehistoric times show that many of them were armed with the most terrible weapons. There is hardly a yard of the earth's surface but has been the scene of suffering and death. Look at the suffering man has inflicted on animal life. Man, like other animals, preys on them for food. He kills them for sport.

"As when some hunter in the spring bath found
A breeding eagle sitting on her nest
Upon the craggy side of a hill lake,
And pierced her with an arrow as she rose,
And followed her to find her where she fell

Far off; anon her mate comes winging back
From hunting, and a great way off describes His huddling young left sole. At that he checks
His pinion, and with short, uneasy sweeps
Circles above his eyry, with loud screams Chiding his mate back to her nest; but she Lies dying, with the arrow in her side,
In some far stony gorge out of his ken,
A heap of fluttering feathers. Never more Shall the lake glass her, flying over it;
Never the black and dripping precipices
Echo her stormy scream as she sails by."

And, in the long ages of his ignorance and partial development, see the cruelties man has inflicted on his fellow-man. For centuries it has been one long struggle for political liberty. Even now, in the modern republic, the true principle of government, the protection of all by the protection of each individual, is not fully carried out. Petty class and race persecutions, tyranny over women and children and over the defenceless generally, social ostracisms on account of theological opinion, are all too prevalent. For all these things, the Orthodox makes man alone responsible. But man is a part of nature; as such, his actions are the result partly of his conscious self and partly of that unconscious nature.

Is the origin of all this evil in personal will? Or is it in man alone, or in unconscious nature alone; or is it caused by man and nature both?

If we make all material existence phenomenal, and infinite mind the only reality, we make all the evil in phenomena to be caused by that conscious Will. To suppose that a Being infinitely good created matter with the seeds of evil in it, is to destroy the idea of justice in any sense in which it is cognizable by us. Mr. Spencer, referring to certain modes of conduct and their results, says, "These good and bad results cannot be accidental, but must be necessary consequences of the constitution of things," etc. The clause which I have italicized contains the whole secret of the origin of evil as far as it will ever be known by man. The Orthodox theist has no alternative but to refer the "constitution of things" to a personal Deity.

If, for instance, the Creator could not make matter incapable of producing alcohol, he would not be infinite in power. If alcohol were purposely made, then he is the author of that evil. So it might be said of any vice. So also of the supposed crime of unbelief, or that habit of mind which requires evidence instead of faith. Shall we refer the various poisons to design, or to the countless interactions of matter? We cannot with reason apply the terms tyrannical or cruel, good or evil to that which is unconscious. If it is true that existence as a whole is unconscious, we need not try to solve the problem how an infinitely good and wise Being can be the author of evil.

To explain is only to show the facts of that which exists. To explain an origin is to show a preceding cause adequate to produce it. As there is something which never was preceded by any cause, it is unexplainable, and is the constant factor in existence. Science and philosophy show that matter, being eternal, is a constant factor in existence; if not the only factor, science has no means of proving it. In it are the forms of force, the modes of action which produce all phenomena. But is mind matter? Science seems to consider intelligence as a form of force or motion of matter, and that it is only exhibited in organisms. In this view, good and evil are the result of unconscious nature. Nature in finite parts becomes endowed with sensation and thought, and only through them does evil become such. If fire, earthquake, tornado, and pestilence cause suffering, it is to necessary forces in matter that we refer them. They are not punishments for disobedience. Even death becomes not a punishment for sin, but a necessary law of nature. By the constitution of matter, all organisms change. Matter is constant, but organism not. This change in animal organisms is called birth, life, and death.

The rationalistic idea of the origin of evil is that it springs from unconscious nature. The nature of moral evil is the perversion of man's faculties. He does not do wrong because he is desperately wicked, but because he has not the reason, the knowledge, the inducement to restrain necessary faculties within due bounds. Self-preservation is the law of all animal life. Personality implies not only self-preservation, but the acquisition of property, and more than all implies the right of individual feeling and opinion, and everything which makes every person separate from every other. We have seen that, where only one person exists, or two with one interest, moral evil or crimes upon others is impossible. The old tradition states that the first murder was caused by envy. Now, envy is a perversion of the rightful and necessary instinct of property, by causing us to hate others more successful than ourselves. The same is true of all other crimes. They are caused by the perversion of the necessary faculties of our minds and bodies; and man is not responsible for the faculties, but to a certain extent for their perversion. The theologians say that sin consists in the desire of the soul to do evil. But they lose sight of this simple fact, that if we had no bodies we should have no desire. And, according to the theist, God made our bodies. Strong drink deprives a man of his senses. Yet a proper use of food and drink is a necessity. Here the origin of the evil is in physical nature; the nature of the evil, what it really is, is the bad effect which the drink has on himself and others.

I do not attempt here to prove the doctrine of evolution. I assume its truth. By it, man is the crown and summit of the unconscious forces of nature working through millions of years. Geology and astronomy prove the great antiquity of the earth. Biology shows man's descent or rather ascent through the lowest forms of life, until his body has attained its present state, and his perception of himself and the universe around him has become his consciousness or mind. Side by side with his physical nature, which he shares with the animal, has grown up his intellectual nature. His animal nature is selfish and cruel. It is the inheritance of an ancestry struggling through long ages for existence. But his intellectual side is the desire to know what is. His moral side is his recognition of the fact that others have the same rights as himself. Having arisen from unconscious nature, he must partake of the forces of that nature. Good is what conduces to man's welfare, evil is what is inimical to him. He has obstacles in nature to overcome, and in that sense nature is evil; but from this same nature he draws his sustenance. But man's conduct toward man is moral or immoral conduct; and it is inevitable, in the long struggle between animalism and the full consciousness of right, that man should mark his course by tyranny and wrong. He must be what his physical nature and his environment, modified by his knowledge or consciousness, make him. He is neither naturally depraved, nor perfect in morals or in intellect.

But, it may be said, you admit that man is to a great extent evil; but where is your penalty? Does not wrong-doing somehow presuppose punishment? Yes: there is a penalty, but first let us examine that of the popular theology.

There are but two assignable motives for imposing pains and penalties: one is that of prevention to secure protection, the other is revenge. Because society has to enforce laws for the protection of its members, some have supposed it an attribute of Deity to invent punishments. But no one can injure Deity; he does not need to protect himself. No Orthodox will admit the idea of revenge on the part of God. Now, the idea of a penalty enforced in this world implies the idea of prevention; but the idea of a penalty enforced in another, when there is no chance to prevent anything, points to something analogous to revenge. Revenge is the defensive principle carried to extremes. It is considered a mark of a little soul. Its opposite is expressed by the words "humane," "magnanimous," which last means great-souled. It is also an idea among religionists that the more man resembles God, the more humane he is. But, in attributing punishments which do no good through prevention, to God, they make him fall short of their own standard. They make God more unrelenting than man in at least three particulars: First, after death there is no change of state, but that condition and that punishment is eternal. Whatever chance there may be for increase of knowledge, so that we might perceive our errors of this life, there is no chance to avail ourselves of it. In all the penalties of civilized countries, there is room left for reformation. Indeed, the true idea of a prison is that of a reformatory school, and not a place for revenge. Second, in the kind of punishment. See where the imagination of man has led him. Supposing God to have devised punishments outside of and in no way connected with the crime, men have cast about for a punishment as much above the power of man in intensity as God is above man in power. As the only thing worthy of Deity, they hit upon fire as the agent, eternity as the time. Burning by fire is torture. In all civilized countries, torture has been abolished as a relic of barbarism. Mohammed, twelve hundred years ago, being greatly offended by a certain man, ordered that he be burned. But afterward he relented and said, "It is for God alone to punish men with fire." But what is fire? Simply the union of carbon with oxygen.

Third, by the equality of the punishment for unequal characters. For the man who leads a pure life, who deals justly with his fellow-man, the pure-hearted maiden, and, according to the Calvinism of a hundred years ago, even the infant are all assigned the same punishment. For the place is the same for all, hell; the torture the same, fire; the time the same, eternity. This is the fate of the murderer and of the man who has never done anything worthy of prosecution by the civil law.

UNIVERSAL EDUCATION.

BY D. S. G.

My attention was some time ago drawn to a contribution to the Princeton Review, by Dr. Philip Schaff, Union Theological Seminary, on the subject of "Universal Education"; also to one on "Secular Education," by President R. L. Dabney, Hampden-Sydney, Theological Seminary; and to another entitled "Religion and Morality," by Rev. Henry N. Day, D.D., New Haven.

Dr. Schaff, in his essay, says: "Universal suffrage in large cities has thrown the ruling power into the hands of an ignorant multitude of voters under the control of selfish demagogues, and even our national elections are not free from disgraceful frauds. . . . But universal suffrage, once given to the people, can never be recalled except by a revolution, and its evils can only be counteracted by universal education. Some look upon universal education as the remedy for all evils, forgetting the inborn depravity of human nature. But intellectual education is worth little without virtue; and virtue must be fed and supported by piety, which binds men to God, and inspires them with love to their fellow-men, and urges them on to noble thoughts and noble deeds. Our safety and ultimate success depend upon the maintenance and spread of the Christian religion. This was the conviction of our greatest statesmen from Washington to Daniel Webster and Abraham Lincoln. . . . God's Church, God's Day, and God's Book are the pillars of American society."

Not so fast Dr. Schaff. "God's Church," with "God's Day" at her command, and with "God's Book" in her hand, resisted the abolition of slavery until resistance was no longer reputable or safe, notwithstanding all her monopoly of piety and virtue; and the work had to be done and was done by those whom the churches denounced as "infidels," "fanatics," and "traitors." He quotes General Grant's message of Dec. 7, 1875, advising a constitutional amendment making it the duty of the several States to establish and forever maintain free public schools, adequate to the education of all the children in rudimentary branches within their respective limits, irrespective of sex, color, birthplace, or religion, forbidding the teaching in said schools of religious [sectarian?], atheistic, or pagan tenets; thus confining the State schools to purely secular instruction and leaving all religious instruction to the churches and Sunday-schools.

But he argues that it is impossible to draw the precise line of separation between secular and moral and between moral and religious education. "Absolute indifference to morals and religion is impossible. It must be either moral or immoral, religious or irreligious, Christian or anti-Christian. Religion enters into the teaching of history, mental and moral philosophy, and other branches of learning which are embraced in our common-school system, and which public sentiment deems necessary. What should we think of a text-book of general history which would ignore the creation, the fall, the revelation, Abraham, Moses, and even Jesus Christ and the Christian Church? An education which ignores religion altogether would raise a heartless and infidel generation of intelligent animals, and prove a curse rather than a blessing to mankind," and more of the same sort.

I think Dr. Schaff unfortunate in his selection of notables when he quotes Daniel Webster in behalf of Christianity as an essential element in good government, as all who remember or ever knew that great man's practical exemplification of good morals must readily perceive. He might as well have quoted Admiral Lord Nelson as an authority in behalf of the union of Church and State as the foundation of the only secure moral government of a nation, or of Napoleon I. against the evils of military despotism and domestic tyranny.

President Dabney, on "Secular Education," says: "On what moral basis shall the teacher, who suppresses all appeal to religion, rest that authority which he must exercise in the school-room? He will find it necessary to his pupils, 'Be diligent, lie not, defraud not,' but on whose authority? There is but one ground of moral obligation,—the will of God; and, among the people of this country, he who does not find the disclosure of that will in the Scriptures finds it nowhere. Then his mere might must make his right, or else the might of the parent or the magistrate to whose delegated authority he points back, or his appeal may be to mere self-interest; and, as he asks the question, Will this government be wholesome for a youth's soul? what shall be the answer. But from a pupil the youth becomes a citizen, the end of the State schooling is to fit him for this?"

We are not disposed to split logical or theological hairs "between the north and north-east side" in discussing the subject of secular education as distinct from religious, or the teaching of morals without teaching Christianity. Common-sense, reason, and the nature of things might successfully be appealed to to show the necessity of truthfulness, honor, consistency, and equity, without quibbling over the difference or identity of morals and religion, and, in case of any controversy arising about where the line should be drawn, the supreme judiciary would be the authority to settle that as a constitutional question.

Dr. Day labors through twenty-five pages of the Review, in the same strain, to show the difference and the no-difference between religion and morality; and his religion is of course Christianity of the "Orthodox" stripe. Anything else with him would not be religion, and without religion there can be no true morality.

But all the education with which these gentlemen seem to be acquainted, whether religious, moral, or secular, would not fit the pupils in our common schools, who are to enjoy no farther schooling, for the rest of their lives to become intelligent voters and to escape the arts and wiles of selfish political tricksters and demagogues. They might become versed in grammar, geography, mathematics, and history, including that of Adam and Eve and Abraham, and pile thereon all the virtue and piety that all the churches can teach, and yet be incapable of distinguishing between the principles and the expediency of the measures of two or three political parties; and, therefore, we have at the present day all the Christians and non-Christians in the land divided among the political parties, each claiming for his own side all the virtue and attributing to the others all the vice and corruption that exist.

From the arrival of the "Mayflower" to the adoption of our national Constitution, Christians had the education of the people in their own hands, and also for the entire century of our national existence they have been permitted to teach religion to what extent they could; and yet we had slavery existing in many of our churches, and justified and apologized for in nearly all, while those who denounced it, in the name of God, justice, and humanity, were stigmatized as "infidels," "blasphemers," and "traitors." As a consequence of such teaching, we have passed through one great rebellion and are yet hanging in the balance of consequences.

Ever since the days of the apostles, Christians of some sort have claimed the right, and have been permitted to exercise the privilege, of instructing mankind; and during the mediæval ages a bloody record they gave to the world. But, laying the practices of Rome out of the case, what have been the results since the days of Luther? In all Protestant Europe, not a single nation, no, not one, has yet learned that aggressive war is contrary to the doctrines of the Master whom they profess to serve, nor that it is unchristian for the strong, the wealthy, and the learned to war upon the weak, the poor, and the ignorant, to take away their possessions and reduce them to bondage, to keep them in ignorance, and to introduce among them vices of which they were previously ignorant, as witness Christian Protestant England to-day in Africa and Afghanistan.

Nor has Christian teaching made the people of this nation just toward the grievously wronged Indian, the negro, nor the proletarian classes of our white population. Look into English society in the Church, as represented by English writers, with their exclusiveness, their pride, and their egotism, with their peculiar worship of mammon and Christ, and what is the record that Christian teachers have to offer in their own behalf?

Look into American society to-day as it is exemplified in the Christian churches, and we have the pride of wealth, fashion, and exclusiveness, with the same mammon worship that we find abroad.

Let us try a rational and secular education for a while, at least for one generation, and see the effect. It cannot prove more abortive and disappointing than such as we have had.

FRAGMENT OF THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

No. III.

"Science consists in the possibility of reducing all natural phenomena within the terms of human thought, so that its highest generalizations are always the most abstract intellectual conceptions.

"Science is the systematic knowledge of relations, and that which perceives relations must itself be related. All explanations consist in nothing else than in establishing the relation which external facts bear to some corresponding order of thought; and it follows from this truth that the highest explanations of phenomena must always be those which establish such relations with the highest faculties of our nature."

Before any subject can be thoroughly mastered, a preliminary course of abstract reasoning is essential to its development. In the assimilation of these abstract ideas, we grasp the central principle, and make it our own.

In tracing matter through all its various stages of development, its solid, liquid, gaseous, and ultra-gaseous state, to where it wholly eludes the senses, and becomes one with spiritual energy or force, it is not traced to a mere abstraction, devoid of reality, but to an energy, containing the possibilities and potentialities of its entire subsequent development. Primitive matter, or the substance from which all things were derived, was not a tangible substance, although it was an actual one.

All the qualities characteristic of matter had only a potential, and not a positive existence. They existed as the beauty and fragrance of the rose exist in the seed, as the subtle aroma and flavor of the ripe grape exist in the germ. Only as matter was resolved into form did these inherent possibilities and powers work themselves out into definite actualities. In these forms of life, the innermost principle or essence of things gradually discloses itself. For, as matter is capable of being resolved into its primordial condition of spiritual energy, so energy can be resolved into one supreme energy or force or cause of all that is. As the greatest force is that of a self-conscious intelligence, a force that is gradually mastering and transforming the globe, and as intelligence is the product of this unknown primal energy, so this unknown energy, which includes all and is the cause of all, must be a self-conscious intelligence,—for the stream can rise no higher than its source,—an intelligence which evolved from out the infinitude of being the invisible elements which, through the wondrous alchemy of combination, were transformed into visible material elements. For, even as the material universe is the organized expression of the forces and elements of Deity, so the immaterial universe is the unorganized expression of the forces and elements of Deity,—elements that are eternally existing, uncaused, uncreated, and unchanging in their nature.

Matter being derived from a self-conscious intelligence, it necessarily follows that the creative power is in nature as well as external to nature; that is, to nature in her visible manifestations. For, the universe of life being the organized expression of the forces of Deity, there can be no part, no place, in the whole economy of nature where the divinely creative forces of the spiritual universe are not in active correspondence with the divinely created forces of the material universe. For, spirit and matter being so related that they in essence are one, the laws which govern one govern in varying degrees the other also.

The spiritual principle of matter in its earlier manifestations disclosed itself in what can be called the laws and forces of nature,—laws and forces which still are operative, but which in the evolutionary process passed from out the realm of law into that of life. Moving under certain laws which are part and parcel of its own nature, matter gradually evolved from out the realm of law into that of organic life. The spiritual principle, which is an integral of matter, has undergone and is still undergoing the process of growth and development. When nothing existed save water, land, and rocks, then this life principle inherent in matter manifested itself in elemental forces which can be expressed as laws of nature.

Passing from out the stage of law, through countless differentiations and development, this principle next advances into organic life, albeit that life is of the simplest kind,—that of vegetable existence. From vegetable to animal, it still ascends; from animal to human, with all its differentiating complexities, where at last it manifests itself in a self-conscious, spiritual intelligence. For the thinking spirit within us is one with universal life. It is one with all beneath it, it is one with all above it. In the governing intelligence of a self-conscious individuality, all the forces which were first manifested as laws of nature, all which existed in an undeveloped condition in the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, reappear with increased and higher activities in man.

Still, the work of development goes on; for "man is a product not yet determined, creation a process not yet completed." There has been a conservation of energy, which is force in motion, through all the changing forms of life. "Life is the continued adjustment of internal relations to external relations." Just as heat is resolved into motion, and motion back again into heat, just as mechanical force is transmitted into chemical, and chemical again into mechanical,—the energy persisting amid all the changing forms,—so has there been this transmutation and conservation of an unseen, unknown, living, spiritual principle, from its primordial condition of law through all its differentiating and developing forms of action, to where it expanded into a self-conscious intelligence. In this conservation of energy, every form and force of life, the elemental, which expresses itself as law, the vital and physical as life, and the spiritual force of thought, stand in direct relation and correspondence. The force which manifests itself in thought can also be expended in physical action; and, conversely, the force which too often is recklessly expended in physical action can be conserved and translated into thought. The force which manifests itself in the most material acts is the same which weaves the airy filaments of thought, and constructs all that ministers to the necessities of man.

Yet, while mental or spiritual energy is matter carried to its utmost possible degree of refinement, that degree is so great as to constitute divergence in kind. Force, whether in its developed or undeveloped condition, is the innermost principle or soul of matter, acting with undisclosed and undiscovered properties. Conservation of energy, and its subsequent transformation into new forms of action, is a universal law of nature. Whether it be the gradual transformation of the inorganic mineral kingdom into that of the organic or that of lower forms of life into higher ones, or whether it be what we are all silently witnessing to-day,—the rapid transformation of a great religious system into a greater, because a universal and spiritual one, its energy meeting resistance, disappearing to reappear under other forms and other conditions,—still the law remains: that, while all progress is from the indefinite to the definite, it is through the conservation of the energy of all the differentiated parts. In this absolute relationship of all the forces and forms of life, we grasp the thought of unity in variety, and know that all "phenomena are differing expressions of one force, which can be nothing else than mind."

Hence, we see that, while the materialist is right in declaring that everything originated in a material source, he errs in not properly defining the nature and conditions of matter, in not perceiving that matter, in its evolution or transition from state to state, differentiates into new and more complex conditions, those conditions being so radically and completely different in degree as to essentially constitute a difference in kind. The Spiritualist is equally right in affirming that all material phenomena can be traced to a spiritual source; but he also errs in not perceiving that duality centres in unity, and that spiritual energy is matter differentiated into spirit. All that is necessary is a combination of these two opposite poles of thought, so that they will be seen to be simply two expressions of one common thought of one great fact. Just as the material human organism resolves itself into the energy of a self-conscious intelligence, so the universe of life resolves itself into the energy of a self-conscious intelligence.

Wondrous alembic of creative power! Matter originated in spirit: it culminated in spirit.

A LETTER FROM G. B. STEBBINS.

Allow me to correct a single error in your report of my remarks at the Free Religious Annual Meeting in Boston.

Some other minor mistakes can be passed by, and the report—taking into account that my talk was without notes, at a late hour, and under the pressure of an aim to condense—is good. In speaking of Materialists and Spiritualists, and of their divergent modes of thought, I am made to say: "If we can devise some way whereby these two classes can be brought together, and maintain harmony while respecting each other's convictions, a great gain will be made."

Exactly what I did say it is not possible to recall; but that I did not say. In substance, my thought and expression was and is, "While I would respect honest opinion, and surely have high personal regard for some Materialists; and while it is well to meet them at occasional gatherings for the free statement of their views and of ours, in mutual respect and freedom; yet, to organize for an effort for religious education, in such way that opposite ideas and theories must be taught, is the confusion of alternate building up and pulling down. Its benefit or possibility I fail to see. A convention, for instance, where Materialists, Spiritualists, and others were asked and expected to state their views, an equal footing of common respect, is good. But to plan for an organization in a town or neighborhood, for continued effort and education, is a different matter. Take in these opposites in thought, and one day theism is taught, the next atheism; one day matter is king, and the shell evolves the germ; the next day spirit is king, and we are taught how all is built and grows from within, an invisible spiritual potency in all things moulding their outer form; one day unintelligent force and law rule, the next we are taught of mind in all of which law and force are the process and power; one day religion with its "freedom and fellowship" is upheld, the next day all religion is a sham and a pest, all spiritual thought a survival of savage crudeness and of the infancy of the race.

To pull down and deny, then to build up and affirm, on alternate days, is not a wise or successful way ever to make the temple stand.

Negation has its useful province; but if we end with that, of what avail? We must only destroy, to build the fairer; and, in this denial of old faiths, the time is come to affirm higher ideals.

I fail to see now we can organize for permanent teaching of opposites. But whoever makes the trial, in good faith, we can wait and watch the result; help even in the trial, if need be, for out of a poor method may grow a better.

Yours truly,

G. B. STEBBINS.

CASTING OUT DEVILS BY BEELZEBUB.

I notice, in a recent number of the Index, an article containing what purported to be facts showing that a larger proportion of unvaccinated persons died of small-pox than of those who had been vaccinated. Assuming those statements to be true, I ask, What would accurate statistics show as to the comparative mortality from other diseases than small-pox, among vaccinated and unvaccinated children? For most persons are vaccinated in childhood.

I have been recently informed, by one of the ablest allopathic physicians of the Connecticut River Valley, that where children are of slender constitutions, with predispositions to certain diseases, vaccination is very perilous. He says that where, for instance, there is any latent scrofula, vaccination will develop and intensify it; so that, although he practises vaccination, he has refused quite a number of applications for vaccination, on the ground that, in those cases, it would be attended with extreme danger. In view of these facts, I ask, What are we to think of the enforced wholesale and indiscriminate vaccination and revaccination of children and adults, without any knowledge of their respective constitutions and morbid tendencies?

One can scarcely allude to vaccination, in any company, without hearing of some case of serious disease caused by vaccine virus. I have heard, within a short time, of a person now living in Springfield, who was dangerously ill for six months, in consequence of vaccination. A man living in an adjoining town says his wife has not seen a well day since she was vaccinated. The town clerk of Northampton, in his official report of deaths the past year, notes one death from vaccination. A regularly educated physician and surgeon of extensive practice, in an article on Vaccination, says: "I have seen a most horridly loathsome case of scrofulous disease, in which the patient literally rotted alive at the age of fifteen, from unhealthy virus received when he was but three years of age. Parents often find some one of their children tainted with morbid humors, unlike any other member of the family, and which they are wholly unable to account for except on the supposition of foul matter taken into the system by vaccination." This physician, although favoring vaccination in certain conditions, says further: "My own practice would be to keep children as healthy as possible, and, if the small-pox happens along, let it have its natural course." He also says: "I am fully convinced that, if people could bring up their children in strict physiological habits, the non-vaccinating plan would be altogether the best." In view of the above facts, and a multitude of other similar cases which might be cited of healthy constitutions being ruined by vaccine virus, is it strange that many thoughtful people are appalled at the disgusting practice of sowing broadcast, by vaccination, the seeds of disease in the systems of healthy children?

And now that the vital question of vaccination is being discussed, permit me, as an anti-vaccinationist, to say a word on one point that is made by the defenders of vaccination,—namely, that, if the lymph or matter be taken from a cow, its introduction into the human system is safe. Of course it would be safer than matter taken from the human body, because the cow is purer than man in its eating and other habits; but the vaccinationists seem to forget, or at any rate do not bring into prominence, the fact that the matter, whether bovine or human, is diseased matter, which if put into our systems will corrupt and infect them, and probably in the end produce consumption, typhoid fever, diphtheria, or other fatal diseases.

MATERIALISM AND MORALITY.

In a former article, I have spoken briefly of the difficulty which materialism must meet in defining a standard of right. I wish to add a few thoughts to the subject now, as the Index is giving such prominence to the question of ethics.

The ethical sentiment of most natures demands, I believe, a conception of right that makes it a universal and eternal principle. Few, if any, of those to whom right is a word of beauty and an idea of moral sublimity would be satisfied with the thought that the standard of ethical qualities varies according to time and place, that a thing may be right in London and wrong in San Francisco, or wrong to-day and right to-morrow. This idea of the universality and permanence of the moral standard is at the very foundation of our ethical feelings. We love to speak of the "eternal right," when we are stirred by moral enthusiasm; and any other conception than this, that there is in some unknown way an immortality for truth and justice, would chill our zeal for every righteous cause.

How can materialism give man this conception of an eternal right? If human life is the product of blind material forces, what does right rest on except the changing fancy of each individual mind? There was no right until this thoughtless force, which moved the original atoms, had built up the social structure of life to the dome of consciousness called man, and then right and wrong could only be what custom approved or condemned; for conduct, according to the philosophy of materialism, is unrelated to any standard outside of and superior to the manners of the times. Suppose all men were thieves, how could materialism say that stealing is wrong? Where would it get its standard by which it could condemn such conduct? If life, in all of its forms, is only a modification of that force which inheres in the atom, why is there any more moral essence in human actions than in gravitation, chemical affinity, and magnetism? In this process of life-making out of unintelligent force, where and how did right and wrong creep into the self-developing series? What assurance has the materialist that the new circumstances of life in the future may not sweep away every footprint of our boasted nineteenth century morality? These are questions which I think materialism will find great difficulty in answering, and they certainly are not irrelevant to the subject of ethics.

The materialist can, in turn, challenge me to prove the existence of an eternal right that will serve man as a standard in all times and places; and then I find myself lost in the night of ignorance and doubt. But I can say in full confidence that this conception of right lies at the foundation of our ethical system, and, if false, much of the moral enthusiasm of the world is due to this idea that there is an eternal right. In their devotion to moral convictions, the good of all ages have not thought of right as something determined by the accidents of every time and locality; they have not worshipped what seemed to them a mere fleeting fashion of thought. They have felt, at least, that they were serving a principle which in some way emanates from the soul of the universe, which derives not its existence from man's thought or conduct. That a man, believing himself endowed with an immortal soul related to a Being of supreme wisdom and goodness, should have a different conception of right from one who thinks "nature forms without purpose and obliterates without regret," does not seem at all improbable to me. Finally, a given belief does embody itself in the character of those who embrace it; and, should materialism supplant the spiritual theory of life, human conduct will ultimately be governed by its logic, whatever the consequences may be. The bearing of the materialistic philosophy on the ethical system of the present time is a subject that I think demands a candid discussion. H. CLAY NEVILLE.

AN exchange says: "A woman belonging to the sect called Perfectionists undertook to run herself to death at Dallas, Texas. She got the idea from a Scriptural passage about 'running the race to the end,' supposing that if she ran till she died she would go direct to heaven. Being unable to kill herself by pedestrianism, she resorted to drowning instead." This instance of insane folly furnishes no argument against Christianity; but it shows that something more than mere belief in the Bible and faith in Christ are necessary to "save" people in this world, whatever they may do for them in the next.

THE Presbyterian quotes the Duke of Argyle as saying that "The process of evolution seems distinctly to have been a process not of an ascending, but descending, order." This is substantially what the Duke has been saying many years; but, in spite of such declarations, the theory of evolution has gained ground and become established among scientific men; and what the amiable but somewhat fossilized Duke has to say now about the "process of evolution" is not of the slightest consequence to anybody with whom the title of a nobleman does not outweigh the facts and demonstrations of science.

THE Christian Union says Dean Stanley "neither repudiates the miracles nor maintains them. In truth, it is difficult to guess whether he believed or disbelieved in the miraculous. He believed in the moral and spiritual beauty of the story; he told the story for its moral and spiritual beauty; and he left the believer to accept and the disbeliever to reject the miracles. Whether he believed them, but would not allow the belief to interpose an obstacle between himself and the rationalist, or disbelieved them, and would not allow his disbelief to prejudice the believer against him, we defy any man to determine from a mere reading of the volumes." Was Dean Stanley a Christian?

A DEPUTATION of Irish laborers have laid their grievances before Parliament. There is no gainsaying the need of such appeal, for the wretched condition of these farm laborers is directly chargeable to neglect and oppression. They are forced by the exactions of unscrupulous landlords to live and toil under circumstances that would not be tolerated for the provision of physical comfort and well-being to the meanest animals on the proprietors' estates. Such conditions cannot be passively endured forever; and, if conscience cannot be aroused to adequate action by ordinary means, extraordinary pressure is brought to bear upon the selfish and reckless owners. Much benefit is hoped for in the fair execution of the Tenant-right Bill.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Investigator, replying to Gen. Dahlgren, who has been lecturing on "Assassination and Infidelity," and denounced infidelity as the cause of the attempt to kill our President, says: "Probably no one is more devoted to Christian observances and faith than has been and is this creature who at one time (1867 to 1869) was a member of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, and a member of the Bible class at the Bethel; at another time (1877) the chief usher in Moody's tabernacle concern in Chicago; and, in 1879, the author of A Book for Every One to Read. The Truth; A Companion to the Bible, by Charles J. Guiteau, lawyer, theologian, and lecturer, . . . the preface to which delectable volume being as follows, 'A new line of thought runs through this book, and the author asks for it a careful attention to the end, that many souls may find the Saviour.'"

At a ministers' meeting, held at Northampton recently, "Rev. Joseph Scott," says the Springfield Republican, "made a commotion when he asserted that the doctrine of eternal retribution was not one of the fundamentals of Christianity. He argued that vice and virtue could not walk hand in hand, and that one who accepted the spirit and purpose of Christ would be found on the side of Christ in the world to come. Rev. F. J. Wagner, of this city, said that he had known men who were generous, kind, and benevolent, and honorable in all their dealings with their fellow-men, but at the same time were antagonistic to Christ in their belief, and he was not prepared to class them as Christians. Dr. William Rice, of this city, said that he could imagine a man who might not believe certain portions of the Bible were inspired of God, or who might deny the doctrine of the resurrection, and yet have a high seat among the good and faithful in the higher life. When a man has become in harmony with him who was God manifest in the flesh, he had attained to the perfect ideal of humanity in this world."

Were cast some chance unselfish seeds,
Fruitful for future human needs.

And nature, loving well the race,
Nourished the germs which grew apace,
Developing in perfect grace.

Till bursting bloom of sympathy
Perfumed the air o'er land and sea,
With fragrance for humanity.

Afar and near the singer sees
The flowering of the centuries;
Rare blooming of philanthropies.

CENTURY FRUIT.

But still, the growth of human needs
By far all human aid exceeds.
Now, we must sow ripe knowledge seeds.

Teach man self-help; with this shall he Supplant the wastes of misery
With healthier crop than charity.

The future that in thought I see Puts forward Eden's knowledge tree
Into a coming century.

Its fruit can only bless mankind;
The curse of ignorance left behind.
Our lost inheritance we'll find.

That heritage of happiness
Which we were destined to possess;
Our loss we but begin to guess

When the prophetic eye foresees
The fruitage of the centuries,
Down-dropping from the knowledge trees.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 4, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABRIOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

For two months from this date, during my temporary absence, Mr. B. F. Underwood will have the entire editorial charge of the Free Religious Index. All communications intended for the paper should be sent to him, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index three months on trial for fifty cents in advance.

A CURIOUS sort of interchange as to conservative and liberal views seems to be in progress, some of the former advocates of rational views leaning strongly to the mystic side, while the former sticklers for revealed authority are yielding stealthy concessions to the rationalistic method. Possibly, the human faculties chafe under the restraint of too long bending in one direction, and get relief from tension by an opposite flexion for a time.

A CENSUS of churches taken in the heart of London in May of this year brings to light the facts that in fifty-seven churches within one square mile, where the sittings are 31,055, and the united incomes of which are £40,266, the average attendance, including clerks, beadles, and porters, only aggregates 6,731 persons. It is a great pity that these churches, with their empty pews and rich incomes, could not be turned to some account as institutes of education and science.

THE Boston Commonwealth, a very liberal and excellent journal, referring to Governor Roberts' declining to appoint a day of thanksgiving with religious observances, as invited by Governor Foster, of Ohio, says: "The Governor, in principle, is right; but this occasion is one in which a breach of rigid policy is permissible. We all want to rejoice at the President's recovery, and it is not at all necessary we should enter a 'meeting-house' to do it." If "the Governor, in principle, is right," why not sustain him? It is true that "we all want to rejoice at the President's recovery," but is that any reason that the Governor of a State should appoint a day for religious services? Is not a principle as important as that of State secularization worth maintaining, under all circumstances, through evil and through good report?

DESTRUCTIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE LIBERALISM.

Liberalism, considered simply as a protest against prevailing theological beliefs, is necessarily iconoclastic and disintegrating in its tendency. It gives special prominence to individualism, which often manifests itself in an impatient spirit, in crude, undigested thought, and in the use of methods not always according to refined taste. When men first perceive the error and folly of beliefs in which they have been educated, without comprehending the positive thought that must supersede the discarded doctrines, they are very liable to be unsympathetic in criticism, indiscriminating in denial, and unjust in denunciation. Those who reject the supernatural features of theology, with no knowledge of science, with no appreciation of the best modern thought, are in a rudimentary state; and, although they are imbued more or less with the spirit of propagandism, and exhibit their aggressive disposition in ways that attract attention, their zeal and their methods are derived from the theological system which they imagine they have outgrown: and the applause bestowed upon them and the support they receive indicate that large numbers are escaping from the thralldom of old creeds that have not yet accepted and assimilated the principles of constructive Liberalism.

In an age of intense faith, it is exceedingly difficult to break away from old beliefs and traditions, and the minds that do this are usually marked by vigor and originality of thought and a courageous, self-sacrificing disposition; but when old theological systems are decaying, when scepticism and disbelief prevail everywhere, inside the Church as well as outside, and in the pulpit as well as in the pews, when the assailants of the Church can command general attention from the platform and through leading journals, the mere fact that an individual calls himself a Liberal is no evidence whatever that he possesses unusual sobriety of judgment, clearness of thought, independence of character, or liberality of spirit. In such times, many change their positions with scarcely more reflection than did those pagan converts, who in becoming Christian, as Gibbon informs us, simply substituted the name of Christ for that of Jupiter. There are men and women who, in becoming "Liberals," simply change their associations, and give another name to their narrowness and intolerance, who mistake rant for radicalism and vituperation for argument. They are as easily imposed upon in the name of Liberalism as they were while in the Church, in the name of religion. They are satisfied that in a few months, or a few years at most, religious beliefs and institutions will disappear and Liberalism will everywhere prevail. Only when their fanaticism has so far abated as to permit them to take a larger and more sober view, only when they have come to see that systems of religion like constitutions grow, that sudden transitions are neither possible nor desirable, that progress in religion, in common with all development, is possible only by gradual modifications of beliefs and institutions that exist, that evolution is along the line of existing social and religious system as much as it is along the line of existing species of plants and animals, do they understand those who express dissatisfaction with mere criticism and denial.

Any one who refers to those occupied mainly with the work of demolition,—however necessary much of the work they are doing—as representatives of the entire strength and value of Liberalism,—or who points to the eccentricities and follies incident to transitional stages of thought as indications of the superficiality and weakness of the liberal movement, shows thereby a lack of candor or the limitations of his own intellect. The highest representatives of liberal thought are not a few obscure persons, of whom scholars and thinkers know nothing, men who have written books which serve only to reveal their own unfitness for the work, or whose utterances at conventions have simply furnished reporters matter with which to amuse the public; but they are men and women like Humboldt, Haeckel, Vogt, Strauss, and Lange; Darwin, Spencer, Mill, Lewes, and Tyndall; Buckle, Grote, and Lecky; Harriet Martineau and George Eliot; Fiske, Youmans, and Abbot, Emerson, and Higginson, and a host of others whose ability and scholarship, and whose known liberal views, give them a representative character that none can dispute. The advanced liberal thinkers of this age are impressed with the importance of positive constructive work in the domain of science, history, art, fiction, and social reform, as well as in that of theological belief; and they are devoting their energies to their respective provinces with splendid results. Their contributions to the world's knowledge and thought are doing more perhaps to modify creeds and permanently advance rational views pertaining to religion than all other influences combined. Their work is constantly diffusing and strengthening liberal thought, which is affecting our whole intellectual, moral, and social life.

EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

The United States Bureau of Education has published a table of comparative statistics of elementary education in fifty principal countries. It gives some interesting points of comparison, and the results are rather difficult to account for. For instance, in England and Wales, the school age is given as from three to fifteen; and the estimated number of children between the ages of seven and fourteen is just about one-tenth of the whole population. In Prussia, the school age given is from six to fourteen, only eight years; and the number of the school population is a little more than one-sixth of the whole. In the United States, the school age is from four to twenty-one; and the school population is more than one-third of the whole. The number of pupils in England and Wales is given as exceeding the school population about as three to two. This can only be accounted for by including children of younger age among the pupils.

Another interesting point is the proportion of teachers to pupils. In England and Wales, it is only about one to fifty-three pupils; in France, about one to forty; while in Prussia, which we count as ranking foremost in education, the proportion is less than one in sixty; in the United States, as in France, it is nearly one to forty.

These statistics are somewhat rough, but it would be of great value to trace out more fully the real meaning of these differing figures. Is it the result of careful normal school preparation that a German teacher can do as good work for sixty pupils as one in France or the United States can for forty? Or is the difference in the methods and machinery of the schools or in the class of pupils? It seems difficult to compare a country like Prussia, having an old government and a long settled system of schools and a compact and nearly homogeneous population, with our own, with its wide area, its great diversity of conditions, and its mixed races. What statistics can have much meaning which include Connecticut and Georgia, Michigan and Texas, in the same classification? But, if the best results hitherto attained in education can be gained by so small a proportion of teachers, it shows the immense economy in mental power to be gained by proper methods in education, and is a great argument for the increase and improvement of our normal schools.

And yet there was a certain value in the old method of supplying the schools with teachers fresh from college, or even still pursuing their studies there, and who taught for a season only as a stepping-stone to other work. In looking over a record of the lives of the present leading men in Michigan, now judges, senators, and governors, it was curious to see how large a proportion of them had been teachers at some period of their lives. Must not these young, bright, ambitious men have had a great influence upon the future lives of their pupils, although they did not understand the very best methods of teaching, and had not made a special study of pedagogy? It seems quite desirable that this element of freshness and life should be kept in our schools, in combination, if possible, with other permanent and orderly means of instruction. We do not think it wholly an evil that our lawyers and ministers, as well as the wives and mothers, have been teachers in their day, and do not think their influence on education is lost when they exchange the school-room for a wider field of action; and yet no system can be fully carried out without some experienced veterans who have given years of training to the work, to which they have added the experience of a life. OUR LIBRARY.

XIII.

(Conclusion.)

What the new philosophy will do with theology is yet to be seen. As instances of what may be said on this platform for faith in God and Immortality, there are Savage's Religion of Evolution and Belief in God, Chadwick's Faith of Reason, and O. B. Frothingham's Religion of Humanity, Creed and Conduct, Rising and Setting Faith, and Visions of the Future; but this brilliant author's most elaborate productions are certainly his Biography of Theodore Parker and his Transcendentalism in New England. Conway's fame, too, seems likely to rest mainly on his Demonology and his literary essays, though his Anthology has proved very useful in enabling our preachers to read from the scriptures of all the nations, and his Earthward Pilgrimage and Idols and Ideals are doing much to teach us to believe in the sanctities of the present life. No elaborate and scholarly presentation has yet been made of the recently introduced and rapidly growing view, that the Infinite is beyond the reach of belief or disbelief alike, so that all problems about Deity and immortality must be given up as insoluble. This is not atheism, but agnosticism,—the system more or less imperfectly presented in Statham's From Old to New, Leslie Stephens' Freethinking and Plainspeaking, Harriet Martineau's Autobiography, Spencer's First Principles, and the writings of Comte and his disciples.

Another class of books I need speak of but briefly, since they will probably attract fewer readers in the future than in the past. I mean works on Biblical criticism. It would be ungrateful not to mention Dr. Noyes' excellent translations of the New Testament and the best portions of the Old, or Lord Amberley's daring and masterly Analysis of Religious Belief, which involves examination of the whole Bible, Furness' great series of books about Jesus and his biographers, Bishop Colenso's famous works on the Pentateuch, Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church, and Newman's Hebrew Monarchy; while we must not overlook such recent books as Heilprin's Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews and W. Robertson Smith's Old Testament in the Jewish Church, the latter volume being a collection of the facts which this brave scholar has told in the Encyclopædia Britannica, and been punished for disclosing by suspension from his professorship.

And then again there are the translations from Dutch, French, and German, for instance those of the Introductions to the Bible, by Bleek and De Wette, of Bunsen's God in History, of the lives of Paul and Jesus by Renan and Strauss, and of that excellent work by Kuenen, Oort and Hooykaas, entitled The Bible for Young People. Particularly important is the fact that many of the best books in German—like the commentaries of Meyer and De Wette on the New Testament, and that of Knobel, Hitzig, and Bertheau on the Old—have never yet been translated. The only way to become a Biblical student is to master German thoroughly; and he who has done this will not need to travel further than into the Boston Public Library and those possessed by the Cambridge School and Harvard University, to find all the guides and teachers he needs.

Such authors should not be overlooked by those who wish to know what the Bible really is; but the attention of advanced Liberals is likely to be directed mainly toward duties we have yet to do, and problems on whose correct solution the future of civilization must rest. Nothing is so imperatively necessary, either for our own cause or for social welfare, as thorough and general knowledge of the works of Spencer, Bain, Mill, Taine, Comte, Buckle, Lecky, Miss Cobbe, Parker, Emerson, and Fiske. And, besides these books which we need to study, there are others which we can use to brighten our hopes, rouse our courage, cheer our weary or lonely hours, and keep our noblest emotions in strong and healthy life. For such purposes, some of the works of the authors just mentioned will be found useful; but our main reliance must be on Shelley, Hood, Swinburne, Holmes, Lowell, Whittier, George Sand, Victor Hugo, Goethe, Lessing, Auerbach, Mrs. Linton, Miss Macdonald, Mrs. Lewes, and Charles Kingsley. These poets and novelists and the popular writers on science are our best missionaries. All these books bring us into ever closer sympathy with our cause, and there is no better way to serve it than by keeping our friends interested in our literature. And that freethought has a literature which already circulates well and deserves to be circulated still more actively, it is the main purpose of this series of articles to show.

Full justice has not, however, been done by me to our literature, for I find I have omitted to mention several important works, not only some of recent interest like Parton's Voltaire, Victor Hugo's Religions et Religion and Tylor's Anthropology, but also several which we ought all to be familiar with; for instance, Clodd's Childhood of the World, Life of Jesus, etc., and Mrs. Underwood's spirited account of the Heroines of Freethought.

But, by mentioning these authors who ought to have a place on every freethinker's shelves, I do not mean to give the idea that there are any books worth reading which should be excluded. The more fully such a library represents every shade of opinion, every branch of knowledge, and every step in mental progress, the better it will serve our cause. I should certainly not call that collection of books a library which does not contain a volume of Plato, Aristotle, Epictetus, or Marcus Aurelius, Thomas à Kempis, Dante, or Milton, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, or Wordsworth, Bacon, Locke, Swift, Hallam, or Hamilton. Nor would I have Scott, Thackeray, and Dickens fail to muster in full force. The freethinker's library should be a full and impartial gathering of all the books which can stir up intellectual activity, sustain moral vigor, or give healthy recreation. And the room which holds them should be adorned with pictures, engravings, busts, statues, and musical instruments.

It is through these agencies, as well as through poetry and novels, that we must meet those emotional demands which we cannot afford to overlook. We must feed the heart as well as the head; we must satisfy feeling as well as thought; we must rule all the tender sympathies, lofty aspirations, and profound sentiments of reverence which fill the human soul, or we cannot keep her devoted to our cause. To do this, we must have all the help we can get from Art, whom we may imagine as speaking thus:—

Peace and hope of old were given
You by me, their brightness mine:
This the might in which you've striven;
Art ye worshipped at each shrine.

Womanly and manly feeling
By my aid grew kind and pure,
Varied loveliness revealing,
Took my forms, which shall endure.

In my spirit were constructed
Church and temple; this the light,
Prophet, psalmist, priest instructed
I to kindle in your night.

Veda, Bible, Koran pages,—
All were written by my hand;
Christian mystics, heathen sages
Did the work which I had planned.

All you've worshipped, hallowed, sainted,
Made the theme of prayer and praise,
Was what I have sung and painted;
From my brightness flowed its rays.

Safely now may be rejected
Much I did when I was chained;
Nobler work may be expected
Now that freedom I have gained.

Trust my poets for revealing
All the duties ye should do;
My musicians, that each feeling
May grow clear, and strong, and true.

Trust my painters for portraying
Each ideal of the soul;
Trust my sculptors for displaying Loftily your destined goal.

Science hath his light imparted;
He hath won me as his bride.
All the darkness hath departed;
Trust me now, your perfect guide.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES.

The Conference of Charities, which has been in session at the State House in this city during the past week, has ably discussed many subjects pertaining to the welfare of mankind; and the discussions have brought out various useful suggestions and facts by which the public at large, even those not at all interested in these meetings, must ultimately profit.

Among the most notable of the addresses given were those of President Frank B. Sanborn, on "Insanity and Pauperism," and by Mrs. C. R. Lowell, of New York, whose paper was entitled "Considerations upon a Better System of Public Charities and Corrections." Mr. Sanborn, who keeps abreast of the times in all philanthropic reform, seems to favor the plan of having only women physicians for the insane of their own sex,—a measure which, although it looks plausible, is of questionable wisdom; for it must be borne in mind that the insane more than the sane recognize the authority of physical force, being more at the mercy of their inherited proclivities, owing to their lack of the reasoning faculty; and, since physical force has heretofore given to men the right to command, it would as yet be hard work to bring the unsound mind to recognize and yield to the sole authority of women. However, one lady physician at least, among those consulted by Mr. Sanborn who has had experience of the care of insane women, assures him, in answer to his queries on this point, that she is often asked "if women, unassisted, have any trouble in controlling the insane," and she is "able to answer positively, No." Yet, in spite of this favorable reply to Mr. Sanborn's chivalric hope, the wisest course for the present seems to be that indicated in the words of another and male physician of the insane, consulted by Mr. Sanborn: "I confess to doubts whether at present a general change of that kind would be an improvement, all things considered. I think it is one of the things which will work itself out in due time, and the best way will come to be seen." Still, he advocates the calling-in of women doctors for cases of more than ordinary delicacy among female insane patients. In another part of his address, Mr. Sanborn points out that, while in the present era of national prosperity other forms of pauperism have been reduced one-third, his investigations bring to light the sad fact that insanity has been steadily on the increase, at least throughout Massachusetts, where most of his inquiries have been made. He ascribes this in good part to the tax on the nervous system due to our high-pressure mode of living at the present time.

Mrs. Lowell in her address made a strong and urgent plea for an immediate civil-service reform, so far at least as political red-tapeism hinders the true methods of dispensing charity and keeping it within proper and effective limits. She instanced how this red-tapeism can and does place hindrances in the way of effective philanthropic work, by stating a recent case in New York City. Last spring, the mayor "nominated a man to the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of one of the three commissioners, solely for his fitness. That nomination was sent in eleven weeks ago to the Board of Aldermen, who laid it on the table without discussion, and have never taken it up, without doubt intending to confirm no nomination which is not the result of a political bargain."

In spite of the hot weather, these meetings of the Conference have been well attended, and have evoked general discussion and praise from the daily press. The delegates have visited a number of the charitable and reformatory institutions in and around Boston, and have shown a lively interest in their management and results.

This Conference is apparently doing a noble work, and we hope that its reports will be carefully read and thoroughly appreciated by all who have the good of their fellow-beings at heart. The next annual Conference, it is thought, will be held at Madison, Wis., a State which Mr. Sanborn thinks takes the lead in humanitarian reforms.

S. A. U.

THE statement was widely published that the discussions following the lectures before the Summer School of Christian Philosophy, at Greenwood Lake, N.Y., would be open to all persons wishing to participate in them; but Rev. Dr. Deems now qualifies the announcement by saying: "We shall allow the largest latitude which is consistent with Christianity. The questions will be discussed scientifically, in the light of Christianity, and must therefore be discussed by Christians." Comment is unnecessary.

MR. VERNON, a Campbellite preacher, objects in the Nation to the term "Campbellite," as applied to his denomination. He says those of his religious faith should be called Christians. Mr. Tomlins, replying, says that "intelligent people who are also Christians will never consent to call a sect, originating as an organization fifty-three years ago, by a name which gives the impression that they alone are Christians, or followers of Christ. Could they go back as an organized body to the day of Pentecost, there would be some reason in their claim." No theologian of the ability and scholarship of Alexander Campbell has appeared among his disciples since his death; and those who adhere to the sect he founded suffer no reproach from being called "Campbellites." Throughout the West and South, they are generally thus distinguished from Christians of other denominations, and are likely to be for some time to come.

THE Presbyterian is gracious enough to allow the late Dean Stanley to have been "a man of most attractive character and fine accomplishments"; and, after the qualification that "the fine qualities of the man should not conceal from us the evil work which he may have done in resolving clear, definite, and important articles of the Christian faith into a haze, dim and indefinite, in which many things become obscure and some utterly lost,"—even after such a grave charge as this, they pronounce him "gone to his rest." Where are the anathemas of Patmos? They, too, must have vanished into "a haze, dim and indefinite."

REFERRING to the baptism of Littré, which it says "makes religion seem earnest, but foolish and unscrupulous," the Independent suggestively remarks: "And yet Rome had a better way. For invincible ignorance she allows hope. What ignorance is more invincible than was that of M. Littré? For such invincible ignorance or incapacity, for one reason or another, to believe in the truth of Christ's story, every Christian has a place." If a religious journal of the general ability and liberality of the Independent can attribute the rejection of "Christ's story" by an accomplished thinker to "invincible ignorance," when the same story is disbelieved by many, if not the majority, of thinkers and scholars of the age, what may be expected from second and third class religious papers? And the idea that the rejection of the narrative in regard to the miraculous birth and resurrection of Christ implies "invincible ignorance," when it can be believed only by a sacrifice of common-sense and a disregard of all the canons of historical criticism! But it is gratifying to observe that the Independent is not hopeless as to the fate of men like Littré, even though they die without belief in Christianity.

MR. ALCOTT, in defending the doctrine of "pre-existence," says, "The highest minds do not reason; they see, they divine." A very convenient way this is to excuse oneself from adducing evidence or giving reasons for an unsupported or even irrational notion. It is the lowest, not the highest, minds that "do not reason," or that reason the most feebly. Savages act largely from impulse, emotion, and imagination. "The highest minds" only are capable of profound, comprehensive, and sustained reasoning, like that of Newton, Kant, Mill, and Spencer. The men who "see," who "divine" truths are those who reason with accuracy and swiftness, who take in at a glance a multitude of facts with their numerous and complex relations, who make enormous mental leaps that common minds cannot understand, and whose conclusions, although based upon a wide induction, are arrived at with lightning-like rapidity. The child in reading slowly spells every word. The practised reader does not need to see every letter nor every word; for his larger knowledge of the relation of words and expressions enables him at a glance to gather the meaning of a whole page. Common minds are obliged to go through a process of reasoning slowly, with laborious care, with frequent pauses, with ignorance of important factors, and with great liabilities of mistake; while men who "see" and "divine"—if indeed they do so in fact—are those whose power of reasoning is as much greater than that of ordinary minds as the walking-ability of a Rowley or a Weston is superior to that of a toddling babe.

WHENEVER a man who has been regarded as a devout believer in Christianity is by some circumstance brought into prominence, and shown to be a villain, the orthodox clergy assume at once that he must be a religious hypocrite. Their views and words illustrate very well what Lange says in his History of Materialism: that "universal piety, in the popular eyes, is either genuine saintship or a wicked cloak of all that is vile. For the psychological subtlety of the mixture of the genuine religious emotions with coarse selfishness and vicious habits, the ordinary mind has no appreciation." That strong theological convictions, together with a sincerely devotional spirit, often exist in persons the moral part of whose nature is inactive and undeveloped may be further illustrated by a quotation from the orthodox Rev. Dr. Schaff, who says, in the Princeton Review of September, 1879, "The negroes are very religious by nature, and infidelity is scarcely known among them; but their moral sense of honesty and chastity is weak." It does not follow, of course, that these vices are the result of the religious beliefs or devotional spirit of the negroes; but it would be folly to affirm that their undeveloped character and imperfect lives are an indication that they are religious hypocrites. And Guiteau may be and probably is a very unworthy follower of Christ, if, indeed, he be not an insane and irresponsible man; but neither the immoralities of his private life nor his act that has shocked the civilized world is any evidence that he is a religious hypocrite.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

It is interesting, in view of the class in science on Sunday, initiated and successfully conducted at the Parker Memorial the past year, to read this note pertaining to a similar enterprise across the water: "A Sunday science school at Edinburgh, Scotland, has enrolled ninety-two pupils, and enjoyed an average attendance from November to July last of sixty youths who were not able on account of late business hours to attend the evening classes."

THE author of the article entitled "The Blood and its Circulation," in the Popular Science Monthly for August, observes a striking analogy between the amoeba and the white corpuscles of the blood, and finds a concurring recognition of this resemblance in Professor Huxley's definition of the amoeba, as structurally "a mere colorless blood corpuscle leading an independent life." And, again, the same high authority says: "Leaving out the contractile vacuole, the resemblance of an amoeba in its structure, manner of moving, and even of feeling, to a colorless corpuscle of the blood of one of the higher animals, is particularly noteworthy"; also in a foot-note to this: "Contractile vacuoles have been observed in the colorless blood-corpuscles of amphibia, under certain conditions." "Is it possible," it is remarked, in connection with these quotations, "that the human body is an aggregation or colony of low individuals, something like a sponge?"

IN a notice of Edward Blyth's book entitled The Natural History of Cranes, in Nature, the tendency to confound this group of birds with those of other divisions is thus alluded to: "The name is quite wrongly applied to the heron in Scotland and Ireland, while in America and Australia the white egret herons are also called cranes. Old Esop's fable of the stork being captured in the evil companionship of the cranes, and being condemned to death for thus even associating with notorious plunderers of grain, indicates that he well enough knew the two kinds of birds; far better indeed, as Blyth truly remarks, than did that renowned master of medieval painters, who commits the curious zoölogical mistake of introducing cranes instead of storks in his world-known cartoon of the miraculous Draught of Fishes."

We are not done, it would seem, with modes of telegraphing. Professor Loomis has conceived the idea of the possibility of aerial telegraphy. It is thought that, if wires are run up to a certain height, they will reach the current of electricity, which can be utilized for this purpose. Professor Loomis has been for several months making experiments of this kind in the mountains of Virginia, and with success.

SCIENCE has had its martyrs as well as religion. But it is hardly correct to count every one worthy of the high distinction of belonging to its class who pretends to represent its spirit, because he imposes upon himself tests of extreme physical endurance, for evident sensational purposes that may possess some scientific value. It is no more than might have been expected that Dr. Tanner's starvation feat of some months since should have incited others to attempt the same performance. There are almost always several fools at least of a kind in the world. Dr. John A. Griscom has just completed, at Chicago, a fast of forty-five days. Whether he contemplates the lecture platform, à la Tanner, we are not informed; but the case naturally excited a good deal of attention, especially from the physicians, which, Tanner-like, again appears to have been gratifying to the recipient. The Scientific American sums up some of the results obtained, or probable, as follows:—

The daily observation upon the blood of Dr. Griscom is said to prove the important fact that the relative number of blood corpuscles is not materially diminished by fasting; and there is reason to expect that, when the details of the physician's observations are digested and published, the sanitary value of fasting—and of eating less, habitually—will be scientifically established. As a remedy for obesity, fasting, partial or complete, would seem to be both safe and efficient; but it must be persisted in for longer periods than have heretofore been thought prudent. Curiously, the distress of hunger seems to vanish after a few days' abstinence.

THE following note occurs in the miscellany of the Popular Science Monthly for August, in reference to burying the souls of the drowned by a barbarous tribe:—

Whenever an Abchasion is drowned, his friends search carefully for the body; but, if this is not found, they proceed to capture the soul of the deceased, a measure which has then become a matter of importance. A goat-skin bag is sprinkled with water and placed with its mouth, which is stretched open over a hoop, looking toward the river, near the place where the man is supposed to have been drowned. Two cords are stretched from the spot across the river, as a bridge on which the soul can come over; vessels containing food and drink are set around the skin; and the friends of the deceased come and eat quietly, while a song is sung with instrumental accompaniments. The soul, it is believed, is attracted by the ceremonies, comes over on the bridge that is laid for it, and goes into the trap. As soon as it has entered,—that is, when the bag is inflated by the breeze,—the opening is quickly closed, and the bag is taken to the burial-place, where a grave has already been prepared. The bag is held with the opening to the grave, and the burial is afterward completed. This rite is considered of equivalent value with the burial of the body, and the grave is treated with the same honor as if the body were really within it.

D. H. C.

HENRY DAVID THOREAU was born in Concord, July 12, 1817. He died May 6, 1862, aged scarcely forty-five years. Yet, recluse and part misanthrope as he was, with a life only half-lived, his love of nature binds him for all time to all hearts who love nature as he did, without capacity to so clearly express that love.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

I foresee that I am destined to be an involuntary member of the can't-get-aways this summer. I console myself, nevertheless, with the reflection that the order is numerous, and in some degree respectable, with representatives scattered far and wide, in country and town alike.

The neighborhood where I pass my nights and mornings has become subdued into an unwonted quiet of late. The curtains are down at a good many of the windows, and the shutters appear to be permanently closed. Those "horrid boys"—I quote the complimentary title given to them down-stairs sometimes—who used to clamber the fences, and occasionally drop through the grape-vine on our side, upon Amelia's flower-bed, and race up and down the sheds of the backyards opposite my window, with perpetual noise and racket after school hours at their games, have evidently disbanded and gone to summer quarters. Now and then a solitary survivor of the boy-strous set appears out of doors with a sort of downcast air, and tries to amuse himself in an awkward and spiritless way, but plainly with poor success. There are few more impressive examples of loneliness than a boy thus bereft of his accustomed fellowship.

It is a good while since I have been a regular attendant at church; and as parts of animal organisms are at last lost through disuse, so in this case the desire, in common with the experience of many another in this time, under a like discontinuance of the habit, has quite dropped away from my life. Luckily we of the rational or more rational order of the animal kingdom, have an advantage over the orders below us in this particular: we can better understand our degeneracy, if such it be, and in some degree recover what we have lost, when desirable.

I am not quite sure that it is advisable for any one, even a radical, never to go inside a church. I am disposed to think it is a question of more than intellectual agreement. It is questionable whether it is well for any class of society or the community to stand altogether apart from another. Our interests and fellowship intermingle continually, whether we will or not. Why should we not seek to know others at their best; to understand the things that are most sacred in their thought, and powerful in inspiration and influence upon their lives? Think what we may of the theories of the different classes of religious people, would it be the best mode of moral and intellectual culture for a child to be brought up without ever beholding their worship, or having the doors of their temples opened to him? May it not be that we radicals and infidels are in danger of exercising a narrowing influence upon the minds of our children, of checking legitimate and healthful sympathies by a too rigid adherence to such a course?

I was musing in this strain this morning when the church bells began to ring and turned my decision in regard to an idea I have had in mind for the summer. It is of making a Sunday circuit among the churches for a few weeks, and taking some notes of my impressions for these columns, if they should be deemed worthy of the honor.

The most imposing and striking specimen of church architecture in Boston is unquestionably Trinity Church. The parish is one of the oldest in Boston, and dates back to 1828. It first worshipped in a wooden building with gambrel roof, on the corner of Summer and Hawley Streets, on the site of which it subsequently erected a stone one of gothic design, which stood until the great fire of 1872. The present church was consecrated Feb. 9, 1877. The occasion was an unusually impressive one, even among Episcopalians; several bishops and many of the more eminent clergymen of the denomination, as well as the mayor and governor, and other notables, being present. It is said to bear a close resemblance in its external appearance to St. Marks, Venice. The cost of the structure was $750,000. The stained windows are of European workmanship. It is probably the most unique in style, elegant and artistic in finish, of any church in New England.

It seemed to me very proper to begin my church-going with Trinity. I concluded I would go to the afternoon service at five o'clock. There was a shaded and subdued light as one looked into the great church, and a cool air seemed to play about the open doorways, which was in refreshing and inviting contrast to the heat and glare without. There are two attractions to Trinity Church,—one is to see the splendid building itself, the other is to hear Phillips Brooks, its famous preacher. Of course the latter did not await us on this occasion. The great preachers are not paid $10,000 a year, more or less, to stay sweltering in the city, working out their sermon a week in summer-time. No, it is not the high-breeds of the profession that are expected to do these things, but the truck-horses, the men of moderate salaries and abilities. The congregation plainly told it was summer-time. The number of empty pews far exceeded those that had occupants, and the female occupants the males in the ratio of about six to one. It was evident, too, that not a few of them were strangers, drawn thither by motives similar to our own. There has been much said of the vigor of phraseology and devotional impressiveness of the Episcopal liturgy, and with justice too. But yet it is pretty clear that one's intellectual nature must be much in accord with it and long accustomed to its use to feel this deeply. We are free to confess that its length tries us, and the low mumbling tones of the responses and general character of the service seems to us more mediæval than consonant with the spirit and tendencies of our modern life; and yet the Episcopal Church is flourishing, and is to-day one of the strongest of the Orthodox faith in this country. It is at once one of the most conservative and, in the elasticity of its church bonds and a certain spirit of toleration it includes, one of the most progressive. But yet, before the great reforms which have agitated the country, it has stood with folded arms. It had no part in the great anti-slavery agitation, and in the war of secession its sympathies, North and South, appeared to be as much, if not more, with the enemies of the country than its friends,—conclusive proof that something more than an imposing ecclesiasticism, than an impressive ritual, and even a devotional temper, are needed to fit people for great occasions, or to make the life strong in unselfish characteristics, in keen moral perceptions and instincts.

The music on this Sunday was good as it usually is in all the great churches, the Episcopal in particular. The sermon was from rather a feeble preacher, whose voice was neither deep nor clear, and with a slight lisp, as we thought. The text was from Genesis, and its treatment such as one might hear from an ordinary pulpiteer any Sunday.

ATTICUS.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

HISTORY OF MATERIALISM AND CRITICISMS OF ITS PRESENT IMPORTANCE. By Frederick Albert Lange, late Professor of Philosophy in the Universities of Zürich and Marburg. Authorized translation by Ernest Chester Thomas, late scholar of Trinity College, Oxford. In three volumes. Boston: Houghton, Osgood & Co. 1875-80-81.

The original publication of this work in Germany excited considerable interest; and, as far back as 1870, Prof. Huxley, in his "Lay Sermons," took pains to say that a translation of the book would be a "great service to philosophy in England." And Tyndall, in 1874, in his celebrated Belfast address, acknowledged his indebtedness "to the spirit and to the letter" of the work. It is the most thorough examination and the most complete history of materialism ever published. It is characterized by profound thought, great critical ability, thorough knowledge and appreciation of all schools of thought, ancient and modern, a generous recognition of truth in all systems, and a fairness and impartiality in the treatment of the subject, equalled by few writers, and surpassed by none.

The first volume is devoted to "Materialism in Antiquity," "The Period of Transition," and "The Seventeenth Century"; the second volume embraces "The Eighteenth Century," "Modern Philosophy," and "The Natural Science"; and the third is given to "The Natural Sciences," "Man and the Soul," "Morality and Religion." All these themes are treated in a masterly manner. There is no attempt to conceal the weak points of materialism, nor to underestimate the merits or influence of other systems; but, rising far above the level of controversial writings of the class to which Büchner's works belong, Lange, with great comprehensiveness and with admirable candor, has traced the principles and methods of materialism through all the ages of philosophic thought, stated them with absolute impartiality, and given their historical connections and their intricate relationship with the innumerable agencies and activities that have profoundly influenced the mind and affected the interests of the race.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS. Sir William Hamilton. By W. H. S. Monck, M.A. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1881. Price $1.25.

This is the second volume of Putnam's reprint of a series of English books on the English philosophers. Each is to have about two hundred pages, gives a short sketch of the life of the subject, a résumé of his philosophy, and a list of his books and the books about him. This work is very well done. The biographical introduction is very short, quite too short; but the six chapters in which his philosophy is summarized show a full and accurate knowledge of the subject. Such a summary is especially valuable in the case of Hamilton, as he did not himself leave any systematic elaboration of his philosophy. All his work was fragmentary; much of his system is found in his notes on Reid and elsewhere. His students will find this a very helpful little book. The appendix contains a brief chapter on Hamiltonian literature, and a glossary of the philosophical terms Hamilton used.

THE Board of Education have issued as their Circular No. 6, for 1880, a report on the Teaching of Chemistry and Physics in the United States, by Frank Wigglesworth Clarke, S.B., Professor of Chemistry and Physics in the University of Cincinnati. This report is very full and interesting, giving a detailed account of the amount of teaching in these sciences in the principal colleges and schools in the country. Much light is thrown upon three very important topics:—

1st. Upon the inestimable value of laboratory work, and the practicability of its use even with very small expenditure of money, and also with quite young children.

2d. Upon the importance of the study of these sciences, especially that of chemistry, by women. A good account is given of the work done at the Women's Laboratory in Boston connected with the Institute of Technology, which conclusively shows the desire of women for this knowledge and its great usefulness to them.

3d. Upon the great deficiency in instruction in these important branches in our medical schools and colleges. Ignorance of them is not only disgraceful in the physician, it is positively dangerous; and no medical school is worthy of the name which does not require this knowledge as a condition of obtaining a degree. The valuable list of text-books will be a welcome help to students and teachers.

THE Catholic World for August has an urgent plea from the Romanist side on the subject of "Restitution! If not, why not?" by R. F. Farrell. S. Hubert Burke gives a graphic account of the wrongs of Mary, Queen of Scots, under the tyranny of her rigid Cousin Bess. "The Jacobite and Later Celtic Poetry of Ireland" has a graceful showing from Alfred M. Williams. A ramble amid the "Chambers of the Saints" by M. P. Thompson is redolent of the odors of sanctity from historic cloisters. Among the remaining articles are an entertaining "Pilgrimage to the Shrine at Drei Eichen," by the Hon. Alice Seymour, and a discourse upon "French Canada and its People" by A. M. Pope.

"EDUCATION," a bi-monthly international magazine, gives, among many other thoughtful papers, the second number of a very valuable contribution to educational literature by Wm. Jolly, H. M. Inspector of Schools, Scotland, on "Real Education: its Principles and a Little Known Chapter in its History"; a lively description of "Eastern Colleges for Women: their Aims, Means, and Methods" (Part II.), by John Tetlow, A.M., of the Girls' Latin School, Boston; and an eager defence of "The Public School System" (also Part II.), by Geo. Hicks, A.M., Jamaica, W.I.

THE Art Amateur for July contains a caustic review of a recent loan exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum and an interesting letter from its Boston correspondent. Mr. Clarence Cook calls attention to some of the humbugs practised by the directors of the Metropolitan Museum. The magazine has a positive and incisive manner, which is in delightful contrast to the non-committal style common to art periodicals.

OUR LITTLE FOLKS. Boston: Russell Publishing Company.—The July number of this monthly we thought hardly up to its standard for beauty of design and execution; but the August issue more than makes up for any real or imagined deficiency.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

REV. S. P. PUTNAM lectured at Paine Hall last Sunday.

MISS DOROTHY DIX, the great-hearted nurse of the late war, is slowly dying at Washington.

THE Phi Beta Kappa address by Wendell Phillips is published in pamphlet form by Lee & Shepard.

MISS M. A. HARDAKER has been added to the editorial staff of the Boston Evening Transcript. She is a vigorous and brilliant writer.

A NEW edition of "Theodore Parker's Prayers," with an introduction by Miss Louisa Alcott, is in preparation by Roberts Brothers.

THE Emperor of Germany has conferred on Professor Whitney of Yale College the order "for Merit," made vacant by the death of Carlyle.

JUDGE CLIFFORD, of the Supreme Court, died last week in the seventy-eighth year of his age. Recent mental infirmity had made his place practically vacant for some time past.

THE Khedive of Egypt, it is announced, will soon decree the total abolition of slavery throughout his dominion. Even in this "base kingdom," there are signs of progress. The world moves.

THE Star and Covenant says Miss Bowen has lost her position as teacher in a public school in Danville, Ill., because she read to the school the article on the "Ark and the Flood" in Frothingham's Stories of the Patriarchs.

MRS. MARY CLEMMER, one of the most independent of the Independent's contributors, a crisp, breezy, and, in the main, just writer on current topics at Washington, is domiciled for the present at the Aquidneck House at Newport.

MR. CONKLING says, "I am done with politics forever." We are sorry that your vanity and stubbornness betrayed you into such an exhibition of yourself as you have made of late, and we cheerfully bid you good-bye, Lord Roscoe, politically speaking.

THE Reverend Jasper is outstripped by another colored Reverend in Toronto, who doubts the rotundity of our planet. Revised Astronomy is as much at a discount with these sturdy saints as is revised Scripture with divers of their fairer brethren of the cloth.

PRESIDENT BARNARD, of Columbia College, suggests that girls be admitted to the colleges on equal terms with boys. This is sensible. The recognition of the rights of women to an education is gaining from year to year, and its complete triumph is only a question of time.

It is said that Mr. Lorrillard proposes to give the winnings of the Derby race to build a church. How is it that nobody has embraced such a rare opportunity to advertise that he shall preach on the next Lord's day from the text, "Ye did run well"?—Congregationalist.

DISTRICT-ATTORNEY CORKHILL continues to receive postals directed to his charge from "the immortal sage of Madison Square and the mighty psychological motor of the universe," Charles Francis Train. One of these bears the address, "Charles J. Guiteau, theologian and assassin."

SURELY the whirligig of time brings its revenges. July 2, Fred. Douglass visited his old home in Maryland, from which he ran away, a slave, fifty-six years ago. The great-grandson of his "owner" received him cordially at the old mansion, and presented him a bouquet of flowers from the grave of his master.

AN exchange says: "The Congregational Church at Meriden, Conn., is willing to give the Rev. G. H. Hepworth $5,000 a year to become its pastor, but he hesitates to accept on account of the lack of a large consulting library at Meriden!" One would never suppose, from reading his sermons or stories, that Hepworth consults libraries.

IN a paragraph commenting on the statement that the "man named Miller," who has been selected to represent New York in the Senate, is a devout Methodist, the Boston Herald remarks that "it is always a little suspicious to see a man's—and especially a politician's—piety too well advertised. Such a one is apt to need watching, however ill he may bear it."

THE trust fund created by Prof. Tyndall upon his departure from this country has accumulated sufficiently for the purpose to which he devoted it,—the assistance of needy American students in physics who should show aptitude for original study and should wish to complete their education in Germany. The fund will now furnish a moderate income to two students.—Scientific American.

DR. EDMOND DE PRESSENSE says that Littré was baptized on his death-bed, not by a spirit, but by his wife. She had become a zealous Catholic since her marriage, and felt that she was living in sin, as the Catholic Church pronounced civil marriage a state of concubinage, and her act was to make a religious marriage possible. There was no expression from the dying man indicating any change of views.

MR. F. E. ABBOT, whose interest in the paper he founded remains undiminished, although new duties have taken him into another field of labor, looked in upon us one day last week on his way home from the Adirondacks, where he had been spending a few days of his vacation from teaching, wooing back the energy and strength lost in his months of hard work. The readers of the Index, we know, will always be pleased to hear of or from him.

WE received a call last week from Mr. A. N. Alcott, of Fredericksburg, Ohio, who has been attending the Concord School of Philosophy. He was eleven years in the Presbyterian ministry; but, two years ago, unwilling to be hampered by the doctrines of his denomination, as defined by the Presbytery, he established an independent society,—many members of his church and outsiders generally supporting him,—and now his society has a substantial building, and money in the treasury with which a "parsonage" will soon be built.

DURING the sessions of the School of Christian Philosophy, held at Greenwood Lake, N.Y.,—as stated by a "Christian Union" correspondent,—"Prof. Winchell argued that evolution is not inconsistent with Christianity; Dr. McIlvaine, that the Bible does not claim to be infallible in matters of science, and in point of fact is not so; Mr. Abbott, that the foundations of the Christian's faith are not historical and logical evidences, but personal, vital experience; President Bascom, that losses of faith from science are temporary and partial, its gains substantial and lasting."

THE Boston Sunday Herald, referring to Wendell Phillips' late oration at Cambridge, says: "It cannot be denied that Mr. Phillips has as fine an instinct as a hornet just where to plant a sting. He believes in the old heroic practice of blisters, cupping, and cauterization. Martin Luther was won't to say, 'When I get mad, then I can pray mightily'; and for working up his fellow-creatures to this same devout pitch, Mr. Phillips must be confessed without a rival on either continent. Indeed, it is privately whispered that, as the oration progressed, sudden and energetic invocations of the Supreme name were heard at intervals from many a lip."

"JUSTICE CHILSON was engaged all day Saturday with the case of two boys who have been in the habit of breaking into the barn of A. T. Lilly, at Florence. After Mr. Lilly arrested them, he generously engaged counsel to defend them, saying that they should have a fair show. He also agreed to pay for the witnesses for the defence. The lads got off on a legal quibble, but the unusual course of Mr. Lilly will probably have a salutary effect upon the boys who have caused so much trouble in the western part of the town."—Springfield Republican. Don't know about that. Boys nowadays are smart, and if those two urchins "got off on a legal quibble," look out for some more youthful pranks in that neighborhood.

MRS. WOODHULL says, in an English paper, that "during no part of my life did I favor free love, even tacitly." She is particularly severe on Stephen Pearl Andrews, and her former husband, Colonel Blood. The Springfield Republican says she "tells the simple truth when she says that her platform utterances have never been tainted with free love"; but Colonel Blood, in Heywood's Word, speaks of Mrs. Woodhull as "a glorious woman," who "dared to unfurl that banner, and declare open warfare on existing social institutions, uttering the ever-memorable words: 'I have the right to love whomsoever I may; make that love as long or as short as I can; to change that love every day if I please, and neither you nor any law that can be framed has any right to interfere. Not only have you no right to interfere, but it is your duty to protect me in such loving."

BISHOP POTTER's Committee admit that Rev. Cowley, as manager of the Shepherd's Fold, was guilty of "the most atrocious cruelty" to little children, yet see no reason for subjecting him to a church trial. The Congregationalist observes: "These strike one as rather new views of ethics; and we seem compelled to understand that, in this Committee's judgment, meanness, stinginess, and barbarity are in no such sense criminal or immoral as to interfere with the good and regular standing of the clergy of the Episcopal Church, or require one of them to be presented for trial in a church court. Congregationalism we suppose is very 'loose,' but we thank the Lord that it has not yet fallen to the adoption of any such 'views' as to crime and immorality as these." This Committee cannot hold, with Emerson, that "the unpardonable sin is to be hard on a tender child."

FOREIGN.

SIXTY thousand Jews from Southern Russia are to settle in Spain.

THERE is intellectual activity in Japan. A strong feeling exists in favor of representative institutions.

A STATUE of Byron has been erected at Missolonghi, by national contributions throughout Greece. It is pleasant to see benefactors remembered and honored.

CARDINAL NEWMAN, now in his eighty-second year, preached three Sundays in succession in the Oratory Church, Birmingham, and has never been in better health.

PROFESSOR ROBERTSON SMITH has been invited to continue his lectures on Biblical criticism next session, and will give a course of four lectures next winter at Inverness, on the Spirit of Hebrew Poetry.

A VERY stringent law for compulsory secular education in France deprives the parent of any choice as to the amount or quality of instruction his child is to receive,—an overshooting of the mark by the anti-clerical party.

WOMEN are rapidly entering the medical profession. There are forty-two women now studying medicine at the School of Paris, three of these being American, eighteen English, eleven French, and ten Russian.

THE Jesuits have been expelled from the Republic of Nicaragua. They wanted to run the government, and aroused a controversy which they so managed as to force the issue whether they or the people should rule. They have been defeated, and are now compelled to leave the country for their country's good.

MANY of the clergy, college professors, and wealthy and influential laymen of the Free Church of Scotland, stand by Prof. Robertson Smith in his critical positions; and either the Free Church must modify its requirements or a secession will ultimately ensue. In either case, controversy and the progress that comes from it are certain.

THE Peruvian national library, which was established in 1822, and numbered fifty thousand volumes, has been plundered by the Chilian conquerors, and the books sent to Valparaiso in sugar casks. It is stated that even the books and scientific apparatus of institutions of learning were seized by the Chilian officers and sent home. This is an outrage, in violation of the spirit and practice of modern warfare; and all civilized nations should unite in a demand that the treasures be restored.

THE Irish Land Bill is on a fair way to its final passage, and will go to the House of Lords early in August. It certainly possesses some admirable provisions, and will prove a bar to capricious evictions in future. It also provides funds to enable tenants to purchase their holdings, while the emigration clause has been so modified as to render it harmless. On the whole, the bill appears to be an honest one, and will do much to settle the land question, and remove one of the great causes of Irish distress and discontent.—New York Tablet.

THE body of Pope Pius IX. was recently removed from St. Peter's to the church of San Lorenzo, its final resting-place. The removal was made at midnight. The procession was interrupted by a crowd that extinguished the candles, overturned the bier, and shouted, "Long live Italy!" "Down with the Pope!" "Away with the black gowns!" The authorities were compelled to intervene. Since Victor Eman-uel's assumption of authority eleven years ago, the Pope had not been outside the walls of the Vatican till the dead body of Pius IX. was carried out and thus insulted. In a land cursed by priestcraft, these demonstrations, however rude, are not without significance to the lovers of liberty and the haters of ecclesiastical despotism.

JESTINGS.

SIDNEY SMITH once rebuked a swearing visitor by saying, "Let us assume that every thing and every body are damned, and proceed with our subject."

A MINISTER had preached an hour; then he remarked, "Another wide field opens from the subject in another direction." Just then an old colored saint ejaculated, "Please, Lord, shut up de bars."

"It's a long way from this world to the next," said a dying man to a friend who stood at his bedside. "Oh! never mind, my dear fellow," answered the friend, consolingly. "You'll have it all down-hill."

BEECHER.—Mr. Beecher said recently, among other things, that the "great vice of politics is lying and whiskey. Some of the greatest statesmen of New York and New England died drunkards." He might add that all of them died lying.

A MAN called out to his creditor, "Get out, you ornithorhynchus!" The man departed meekly. "Who's that?" inquired a friend of the speaker. "An ornithorhynchus." "How's that?" "Well, Webster defines him as 'a beast with a bill.'"

THE MIXTURE AS BEFORE.—Doctor: "Well, Mr. Giles, is the Missus taking the medicine I sent yesterday?" Farmer Giles: "Takin it? She 've took it! Sent me for some moor! Cos why? I mixtees it in rum shrub! Tell 'ee wot! Yew doctors 'ud make a dale moor if ye allus mixed un noice and tasty loike!"—Fun.

Supplied by FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont place, Boston.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion; to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calhoun, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion"; and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

If a man is at heart just, then in so far as he is God. He who does a good deed is instantly ennobled.—R. W. Emerson.

It is not true that a man can believe or disbelieve what he will. But it is certain that an active desire to find any proposition true will unconsciously tend to that result, by dismissing importunate suggestions which run counter to the belief, and welcoming those which favor it. The psychological law, that we only see what interests us, and only assimilate what is adapted to our condition, causes the mind to select its evidence.—G. H. Lewes.

People can easily take the sacred word "duty" as a name for what they desire any one else to do.—George Eliot.

One does not see his thought distinctly till it is reflected in the image of another's.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The intellectual life is sometimes a fearfully solitary one.—P. G. Hamerton.

Are ye then masters of humanity that ye seek to penetrate divinity?—Socrates.

Unity, agreement, is always silent, soft-voiced. It is only discord that loudly proclaims itself.—Carlyle.

He that shuts love out in turn shall be Shut out from love, and on her threshold lie
Howling in outer darkness. —Tennyson.

There is an incalculable power of conviction and devotion of idea in the daring of one man against all. To brave at once with no other power than individual reason, with no other support than conscience, human consideration, that cowardice of the mind masked under respect for error; to dare the hatred of earth and the anathema of heaven is the heroism of the writer.—Lamartine.

What is companionship where nothing that improves the intellect is communicated, and where the larger heart contracts itself to the models and dimensions of the smaller?—W. Savage Landor.

In order to discover truth, we must be truthful ourselves, and must welcome those who point out our errors as heartily as those who approve and confirm our discoveries.—Max Müller.

Remember that to change thy opinion, and to follow him who corrects thy error, is as consistent with freedom as it is to persist in thy error. For it is thy own, the activity which is exerted according to thy own movement and judgment, and indeed according to thy own understanding too.—Marcus Aurelius.

When we see men holding certain theological opinions which are flatly contradictory of their scientific opinions, we are not on this ground alone to conclude them to be hypocrites. Each position may be held in perfect sincerity, though not with perfect logic; the one set of conceptions being in a great measure the expressions of their emotions. Sentiment, not reason, weaves the web of argument. The other set of conceptions being impersonal, objective, unconnected with emotions, reason is left free to estimate the objective relations.—Lewes.

Just as the tested and rugged virtue of the moral hero is worth more than the lovely, tender, untried innocence of the child, so is the massive strength of a soul that has conquered truth for itself worth more than the soft peach-bloom faith of a soul that takes truth on trust.—F. E. Abbot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

MONDAY, August 1, was the forty-seventh anniversary of the passage of the Emancipation Act abolishing slavery in the West Indies and all the British Colonies.

THE Pope replies to those who urge the reopening of the Œcumenical Council that such councils are unnecessary since the proclamation of infallibility, for he can create even new dogmas.

A LONDON quotation respecting the fair appearance of the Irish country this year, namely, "1881 will be marked with golden letters," has the following tacked to it by the quoter: "Yes, golden letters upon a black background."

THE accustomed gravity of the English pulse is somewhat shaken, as evidenced in the suppression of the little German sheet, the Freiheit of Herr Most; a stroke at liberty of the press more in accordance with the ordinary alarm-policy of the neighboring continental provinces.

A NEW fortnightly called Liberty, published and edited by Mr. Benj. R. Tucker, has appeared. It says, "Liberty requires that every institution be separated from the State until there shall be no State left." James Parton says in a letter to the editor: "Yours is the best first number I have ever seen."

THE agitation of the spoils question is getting very lively, and promises to increase in significance when the political fleets sail into their autumn conventions. It is thought by some that it will be bandied about from hand to hand, and finally get ignored by those whose duty it is to put it into effect, but may then be reasserted with such energy by the people as to compel legislative action.

CONSIDERING how few years it is since China, a nation keeping apart from the rest of the world in disdainful silence, sullenly, and with looks and words of suspicion, opened her gates to the commerce of other nations, it seems odd now to read in an exchange that she has serious thoughts of holding the next International Exhibition in Shanghai in 1882. The Foreign Missionary, New York, says that twenty-two thousand applications for space in the proposed exhibition have already been made by European and American manufacturers, and the project is looked upon with great favor by the Chinese authorities.

IDA LEWIS, the self-sacrificing heroine of the Lime Rock Light-house, was recently presented by the United States Life Saving Service with a gold medal, as a token of its appreciation of her services to humanity in having, mainly by her own exertions, saved thirteen persons from death by drowning. At various other times, she has been the recipient of honors in the shape of a yacht from James Fiske, Jr., a boat from prominent citizens of Newport, medals from the Life Saving Benevolent Association and Massachusetts Humane Society, resolutions of thanks from the Legislature of her own

State, and from the United States government the post of light-house keeper for life, if she chooses, of the light-house on the sea-encircled bit of rock, which has been for so many years her home. Only once, so far as we know, has any gift of money been given to her; and that was subscribed by the officers and men at Fort Adams, several of whose soldiers owe their lives to her exertions. Now, though medals, resolutions, and boats are all well in their place, and are doubtlessly thoroughly appreciated by our modern Grace Darling, yet they do not go far in supplying the physical needs of even a heroine, such as Ida Lewis undoubtedly is; and, as she is dependent on her own exertions for a livelihood, besides having, we understand, a widowed mother to care for, and as this time of our national prosperity seems to be the era of pecuniary reward for heroism of all kinds, we hope this most deserving woman will not be forgotten by the American public in the bestowal of such rewards.

DR. LEONARD BACON condemns with bitterness the sympathy for oppressed Russians shown by Wendell Phillips in his late address at Cambridge. This learned divine sets forth the discontent of the people of Russia to be a direct result of hatred toward the late Emperor for his efforts in the cause of free institutions, and elevates him to the position of a first-class martyr in the annals of political leadership. The proximity in point of time of the desperate deed at Washington and the delivery of the sentiments contained in the Cambridge address is made to serve for a point of suggestive possibility, —an inference as conspicuous for improbability as for its essential injustice. Adroit allusion to the sacrifice of the real defenders of liberty in our own land by reckless adventurers serves for ground of comparison of two civil structures whose spirit and executive system are as wide apart as are their respective physical locations. Indeed, the line of comment and comparison further pursued in this article would indicate to a modern observer of civil polity that this doctor of theology and laws was yet unemerged from the innocent cradle of the "divine right of kings." Nothing in all history strikes him as equal in depravity to the despotism of that seething mass of Russian slaves,—for slaves they are in all classes and conditions under that iron-heeled despotism. A brief concession is made to the necessity of reform in the government, but the emphatic tone is given to a conviction that resistance to oppression, even so galling and comprehensive as the case under consideration, must end in absolute anarchy. "Dynamite and the dagger" are indeed ill-visaged agents; but their victims, if comparison of evil and cruelty is admitted, are mercifully dealt with in view of wholesale legal inflictions of life-long torture in dungeons or arctic mines. However, let the difficulty of adjustment be what it may, it is difficult to imagine a more distressing complication of tyranny and revolt than the present exhibition of the Russian Empire.

THE ORIGINS OF EVIL.

BY J. E. PECK.

(Concluded from last week.)

And what is this terrible punishment for? Not only for real crimes against humanity, but mostly for being a low, vile, finite creature, and not holy like an infinite Deity; for exercising the passions of matter, which are unholy in the eyes of an immaterial Deity who can have no material passions; for not believing that a good man who lived eighteen hundred years ago was God; for even doubting that the universe as a whole is conscious, or that there is an infinite Consciousness separate from it.

There are penalties for evil-doing, but they are in this world. Man belongs to this earth. He has never been away from the earth, he does not know that he ever will be. The sun is his father, the earth his mother; in her bosom he will come to rest. It is said that man stands with his feet on the earth and his head in the clouds. But it is not his head that is in the clouds, it is only his imagination. His penalties and his rewards, so far as he knows, are in this life. The words "God," "immortality," "the Infinite," if they represent facts, are facts which he cannot understand. The present life, nearness, contiguity,—these things concern man. Even things on the opposite side of the globe rarely affect him. After all, personal contacts with material things in local places constitute a great part of life.

The germ of the punishment idea is seen in the observation of nature by the savage mind. Fire burns, cold freezes, water drowns, the earthquake upheaves, the tornado blows down, uproots, and devastates, and the ghost of some renowned ancestor has become a god and torments him after death.

When society is organized, there are the penalties of the civil law. As knowledge of the laws of life and health increase, man sees that the penalty of violating those laws is disease. The young man who takes a moderate drink may suffer no visible penalty. But if you should see him twenty years after, a tottering drunkard, his property spent, his family freezing and starving in a hovel, you would see the punishment of excess. The libertine meets his punishment in exhausted powers of life. Even overwork at any honest occupation will produce ill effects on body and mind. There are some who believe that they will have to give an account at the day of judgment for every idle or useless word. Science tells us something more wonderful than that. It tells us that for every action of the body a definite amount of muscle and nerve substance is destroyed, and this substance has to be restored by the burning of the carbon in our food. The scientist tells you exactly how much carbon is consumed by a man in climbing Mont Blanc. Science tells us that, for every thought or volition of the mind, numbers of the atoms of the brain are destroyed. If by overwork the waste of the system exceeds the nutrition, the day of judgment is here and now.

And besides physical penalties, there is the mental disquietude that results from real evil-doing. Few are so depraved as not to feel the degradation of falling from virtue into vice. They cannot help feeling remorse for crimes against humanity.

The Orthodox remedy for evil is so well known that it seems superfluous to state it here. That it is a system built up by the human mind, there is no doubt. It is a direct outcome of the principle of force of the right of the strong over the weak. Man, a vile creature, is so offensive to his Creator that that Creator will punish him in everlasting fire. Those who believe that God's own Son satisfied his anger and took the punishment, will be saved, and no others. The preachers coolly tell us that no one will go to hell unless he has a mind to. But common-sense tells us that no one will go to hell unless somebody puts him there.

It has been asserted of Liberals that they tear down, but do not build up. Have we then no antidote for evil? Certainly we have; but the Liberal remedy is short and heroic: Be good. Do right. Act justly. It is not so very new, either. The moral thinkers of all ages have thought it out and lived it in their own lives. But they arrived at it by the metaphysical rather than the scientific method. Jesus was a moral teacher. Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, Socrates, proved the value of human virtue as deduced by human reason. Buddha, who lived long before Jesus, was a practical reformer. We find the Golden Rule in the mouth of Confucius long before Christ. When asked to give a summary of his doctrines, he gave the one word reciprocity. This word may be taken to represent the difference between the selfish animal nature and the developed, enlightened, altruistic nature of which man is capable.

The key to the whole subject is in evolution. Man's moral nature, by experience, perception, thought, cultivation, is evolved from the necessarily selfish animal nature which he shares with the lower animals. And it is not by making evolution a kind of God, and sitting down and waiting for him to perfect us, that we shall arrive at the best moral character. Man's will, acting from knowledge, is a part of evolution. The growth of his desires from a savage to a civilized state, which desires include both good and evil, is evolution. But, although the world is still comparatively full of evil, the growth of ideas among thinkers has been toward a true and rational theory of the universe and of the life of man.

But it is so easy to say, Be good. How are we to do it? Some think by belief in Church dogmas. They read in a Hebrew book and pray to the Hebrew idea of Deity, and compel their children to hear it. They go to church, but often at home they have no more sense of right and justice than to deliberately injure the feelings of their wives, and in every possible way bring them into subjection. But Moses and Paul believed in the subjection of women, so why not they? Human liberty is not the basis of theology. The remedy for moral evil is found in the action of the human will based on knowledge. The question of free will has always been a puzzling one in theology and philosophy. This is not strange while the human mind was regarded as an immaterial entity, divided off into a number of immaterial faculties of which the will was one, like the rooms of a house. The will being immaterial, it had no physical equivalent. It was difficult to determine its natural strength, or its strength when tempted by the devil or when aided by grace. One writer cuts the Gordian knot, by saying, We know that we are free, and that is all there is about it. Yes, we are free to decide according to the strongest motive, that is all. We are neither wholly bound nor wholly free. The will is only one action of man's consciousness. The mind is developed from the two primitive sensations of perception and desire. The intellect is the outgrowth of physical perception; the will is the outgrowth of physical desire. The will was in the first place nothing but the sensations of desire, as, for instance, the desire for food. The desire leads to action. The impulse to action becomes in man conscious decision. Now it is evident that, to produce material welfare, man's will is of no effect until he has a knowledge of nature upon which his will can act. The difference between the material conditions of a savage society and a civilized one is due to the difference in their knowledge. Two hundred years ago, the people of London thought the plague was a punishment for sin. Since then, they have found out that it was caused by the action of filth upon the human system. The remedy for physical evil is knowledge of nature, and the proper action thereon.

It is just as true that the remedy for moral evil is knowledge of moral truth. It is no more a supernatural revelation, and is just as demonstrable as the facts of mathematics. Every person knows that he has no right to kill or steal, and he would know it without any alleged supernatural command. The common principles of the ethical code are well known. They are written in books and in the popular mind. But it may be said, Although we have the knowledge, how about the will? You say the will acts only on the strongest motive. Is it not necessary to have some strong, ever-present motive, such as eternal punishment or reward, to control the will? Yes, it is necessary to have a motive; and it is simply this: to so cultivate and educate the mind as a whole in knowledge that it will always decide to do right through a love of virtue and morality for itself alone. And when we love anything, it is for its value, it is for something. Morality is the highest essence of utility; it is man's very life and well-being. On this earth it brings him his reward; and vice brings its own punishment. O foolish man, to think that an infinite Being can have any desire to torment you eternally in hell! For what good? How absurd for an organized lump of matter to attribute to Deity those molecular motions of his own finite brain called anger! Every person has in a measure a solitary consciousness of his own. Why then should any person try to compel another to think and feel just as he himself does? The fact is that a moral life is a life lived in accordance with the commands of what a just God should be, whether there is one or not. For it is inconceivable why God should lay any commands upon man except for man's own good or utility. Therefore, even from the low ground of fear, the moralist is safe.

In every civilized community, the mass of the people are already educated to an instinctive horror of the baser crimes. But some are not so plain. To those who believe in a personal God, swearing is, of course, a crime of disrespect; yet it is more a habit than a crime, in the proper sense of that word. There is a cause for it deeper than original sin. The various impressions from the external world often affect us by involuntary movements of the muscles. Pain produces contortions. The Orthodox perceives something of this. But he does not know why mental agitation should find vent through the organs of speech in various expletives. He does not understand nervous reflex action. Neither did Moses. The well-educated mind should be able to express itself in some other way than by oaths, yet such forms of expression are hardly worthy of eternal punishment. Just imagine the old Romans roasting in hell for saying By Jupiter! But, to the Romans, Jupiter was chief of the gods. I only refer to this to show that what are considered crimes have their roots in the necessities of nature; and that it is by thought and cultivation that character reaches its possible nobility.

It is a common idea that by utility is meant material welfare. But poetry, music, painting, art in all its forms, and, above all, moral principle are of use; they are of use to man's consciousness. Man's salvation is in knowledge. If he has knowledge, his desires will be in accordance with it. If he desires to do right, he will decide to do right, and his decision will be by the strongest motive. It seems to me that free agency, based on knowledge of what in the nature of man and of things is right, is the only solution of free will in moral conduct. Physical knowledge for material welfare, ethical knowledge for his conduct to man,—that is all he can really know. Morality is man's conduct toward man, including each one's conduct toward himself. Evil and its penalty, virtue and its reward, are in this world. If we go to any other, the same principle will apply to it as to this,—namely, acting upon what we know. If we take the word "soul" to mean the conscious being of man, we might say with the versifier:—

"Why raise that old brute, Fear,
The unwilling heart to win?
Soul is its own reward
If its virtue choose, or sin.
"Why force to outward forms?
Each soul has its own share
Of the good, the true, the beautiful,
That we worship everywhere."

The sun is the physical God of our solar system. It puts the atoms in motion, and silently but surely builds up all the forms of life. As silently and surely is the noble character built up by the human reason acting upon the unshaped material of knowledge.

Let us now restate the chief points in the two ideas of evil. The one makes evil identical with sin, man's free will transgressing the commands of a personal Deity. This is both its nature and origin. The penalty also depends upon will, and is eternal torment. The remedy is submission to that will, and can only be through a belief in the dogmas of the Church. The other idea makes the origin and nature of evil to consist in the constitution of uncaused matter or nature, which being unconscious as a whole, the suffering in the world cannot be caused by conscious will. The penalty is what man brings on himself, and is not inflicted by will. The remedy for physical evils is for man to produce suitable correspondence between himself and his environment. For the cultivation of moral truth or ethics, he should mould himself to demonstrate principles founded in existence itself. The basis of all is knowledge.

But what of religion? Religion is a word which is a name for the indefinite feelings of man toward the mystery of existence by which he is surrounded. With the Orthodox, it is the worship of an infinite Person, whose attributes are exaggerations of their own. With the atheist, it is the feeling of awe and love with which he regards nature and man. To the pantheist, the universe is alive and God is its spirit. As the poet Shelley expresses it,—

"The awful shadow of some unseen Power
Floats, though unseen, among us; visiting
This various world with an incessant wing
As summer winds that creep from flower to flower."

But the ideas of religion are in the region of mists and shadows, not of demonstration. As Shelley says in the same poem,—

"No voice from a sublimer world hath ever
To sage or poet these responses given;
Therefore the names of Demon, Ghost, and Heaven Remain the records of their vain endeavor."

But ethics lie in the field of real knowledge, the here and the now.

I have been in the bright summer-time to a church in the country. I have there heard the old, false, tyrannous dogmas of man's vileness, his sin, and his redemption by vicarious sacrifice, and the gloomy doctrines of the churches. And what a relief to go forth into the free air, to hear the birds sing, to see the fleecy white clouds, to see the sunlight dance and glisten among the rustling leaves, and breathe in the beauty and peace of nature! So may the world leave the gloomy halls of ignorance and tradition, and step forth into the fields where is taught the peaceful gospel of humanity. The fact of being implies the right to live and to be happy; for behind the fact of being we cannot go. Let Gods be known by Gods, but Humanity by Man.

AN OBJECTION ANSWERED.

The gentlemen who have the care of the will of God insist that reason, when used in religion, is "irreverent," and, sin of sins, it is "atheistic." But what of it? If reason, after hundreds of years of careful, conscientious investigation, calmly, without prejudice, and in face of the piled hatred, slander, and abuse of theological bigots, declares it to be her honest conviction that there is no God of whom we need to be afraid, shall we therefore murder reason and worship a figment of the untutored imagination of savage man? It is not a crime to be laid on the head of reason that she cannot anywhere find a God answering to the description given of him in the history of the mental childhood of the world. Nor can we suppose that reason is under any obligation to search for such a God, who, if he is the almighty personal being described, could so easily settle all question and save his children from eternal woe by making himself known.

Science has searched for God both long and well, in the heavens above, in the earth beneath, and in the finer world of psychical phenomena; but is she guilty because he has not been found? Whose is the fault? Is God playing blind-man's-buff with us poor mortals only for the fun of seeing us writhe in torment because we can't catch him in his noiseless slippers and invisible cloak? There is something rotten in the theological Denmark? We are called upon to smother our minds and blot out knowledge, because they do not harmonize with the vagaries of mythology. That reason may be atheistic regarding the God of theology in general will be more and more true as we grow wiser, but that it is either atheistic or irreverent in the light of knowledge and wisdom is not true. A man must transfer his adoration from the Hydra of theology to the bona fide existence of a grand and beautiful world of form and life around him, before he can begin to realize how much consciousness of God it is possible to feel. Hence, the objection amounts to nothing.

The wisest and best men in all ages have been the most reasonable men. We owe every advance in science, art, literature, all the industries, all the activities that have advanced the well-being and happiness of mankind to the influence of reason; and we know that in the field of progress "revelation" has continually denied and opposed the activity of reason as heresy and worse. In the history of the sciences of astronomy and geology, we learn of men who were imprisoned, compelled to "recant," forced to lie, in plain, because what they knew to be true was contrary to the "revealed word of God." In the province of morals, the same is true of the intolerance of the gentlemen who know all about God. Socrates and Jesus were murdered because they were better men than their judges. Paine and Parker were slandered and belied in a fearful hubbub of unprincipled liars, because they followed reason instead of revelation.

Human progress, in short, is but a record of the labors, the trials, and triumphs of reason; and, if the day ever comes when we shall know that God exists, it will come through scientific knowledge acquired by the use of reason. At present, however, the truth is that the popular belief in regard to the existence of God is sadly demoralizing. You may scare a child with a mask; but the child has no true conception of the nature of the mask, and is frightened only for that reason. So your horse may take fright at an unusual object by the roadside; but, if you treat him with as much good sense as he has himself, and give him time to look the thing over, to "nose it around" a little until he gets a reasonable conception of it, his fear leaves him. So, also, you may frighten weak-minded men and women with a mask or caricature of the supremacy of natural law which you call "God," but they are frightened simply because they have no intelligent conception of either the law or the caricature of it. The moment a man looks at the universe intelligently through reasonable eyes, he ceases to fear both Gods and Devils. Whether there be one or none or many, they have forever ceased to be objects of fear to him. He, therefore, is the atheist who is the unreasonable man. There can be no knowledge or worship of God without full and free activity of reason.

Thus, it comes out clear at last that reason is the sublimest and best of the universe. It exalts itself before the magnificent manifestations of the eternal laws. Under its beneficent influence, man gazes in peaceful trust upon the wide all, content to accept whatever may be locked in the unknown for him without murmur or regret, in full assurance that no demon of vengeance, but only and always impersonal, unimpassioned law is at the helm, and will guide the ship of life as correctly as it guides the universe, of which, in fact, we are but a part. Reason washes itself in the waters of affection, and touches in faith of intelligence the robe of beauty that adorns the world and moves on with new life. Existence now becomes heaven upon earth, and the "old Adam" skips with joyous freedom again. We worship best in deeds. Words are only symbols by which we strive to make known the thoughts and feelings of our consciousness. The grandest thoughts are never expressed, are inexpressible. So the material universe is everywhere bursting into the blossom and sweetness of sublime thought that it has no language to express. There is no religion, no faith like that which flows from a proper development of reason as it stands in trust before its conception of the sublime law, or absolute cause,—

"Whose power o'er moving worlds presides."

There can be none; and, therefore, the objection urged against reason by the orthodox clergy becomes a savage's boomerang, swooping back to wound the barbarous theology that hurled it. CHARLES ELLIS.

JUDGE BLACK'S REJOINDER.

In Judge Black's rejoinder (August North American Review) to Mr. Ingersoll's article against Christianity, some allegations of the latter are left unnoticed, and others are met by contrary assumptions, some unproved, some unprovable, and some often before disproved. The bulk of the rejoinder consists of what logicians call argumentum ad hominem and argumentum ad invidiam. In other words, Judge Black seems to have followed the custom of a certain class of lawyers; namely, when you can find nothing else to say, abuse the opponent's counsel. C. K. W.

THE GROWTH OF ECCLESIASTICISM.

Ecclesiasticism is religious aristocracy or snobbery, the Toryism and Bourbonism of piety. It is piety gone to seed in ceremonialism. It is a religiosity which delights in incense and voluptuous music. The growth of ecclesiasticism in our large cities and among our newly enriched people is not remarkable, but the most natural thing in the world. It is partly the result of European travel. The established churches of Europe, whether the Greek, Latin, or English, have all the festal pomp of the old paganisms of which they are more largely the offshoots than of primitive Christianity. The elaborate ritual of these churches and the costumes of their priests and prelates are survivals of times when the priest was a magician and enchanter supposed to exercise power over nature. The European cathedrals were built for purposes of pomp and ceremonial, and to awe the masses of the people, and to exhibit royalty and priesthood in the most effective manner. Most of our people who have wealth, and their name is legion, travel abroad. Of course, only a percentage of them are capable of a proper historic appreciation of European things and institutions. Being thus left to the glamour of their senses, they in multitudes of cases return infected with ecclesiasticism and a respect for royalty and imperialism. Prelacy and royalty and imperialism are all birds of a feather, each implying the other. Then, again, our cities are full of foreigners who have been brought up under the shadow of cathedrals and priesthoods. We should think that the low mental, moral, and material condition of the mass of the serfs of priestcraft, who are migrating to our shores and choking up our cities, would be sufficient evidence to the most obtuse of the debasing and demoralizing character of priestly rule on the multitude, and lead them to thought and historic investigation. There are hosts of people native and to the manner born here, who hate our popular system of government. There has always been a percentage of such haters of popular sovereignty among our native population. These of course are only too ready to welcome ecclesiastical innovations and superstitious observances, which have a tendency to undermine and sap our institutions. Then, again, an elaborate ritual and frequent ecclesiastical observances afford a diversion for our wealthy do-nothings of both sexes and an opportunity for display. Only a thoroughly disciplined mind, fortified by a thorough knowledge of the past, and by science and reflective thought, is proof against the seductions of ecclesiastical superstition. Senator Thurman, a man of uncommon natural ability, allowed himself to speak of "the grand old Church," meaning the Church of Rome. He was oblivious of the fact, when indulging in such an utterance, that if the Stuart dynasty, which was Roman Catholic through and through, had succeeded in keeping on the British throne, there would have been no great American republic with free popular institutions. Even in this age of intelligence and enlightenment, the amount of ignorance among the well-to-do and well-dressed classes, in regard to their own inner nature and the historic development of their race, is scarcely credible, and this, too, in spite of the omnipresent lecturer and newspaper.

Business and politics monopolize their mental activity almost exclusively. A European or Canadian peasant, perfectly illiterate of course, is not to blame for being the creature of habit and inherited belief. Reason in such is little more than instinct. A man who announces himself as a believer in the speedy and probable second advent of Christ in the streets of New York is not regarded as a monomaniac, but as socially more respectable than the ablest liberal thinker or scientist. Theological declaimers like Tyng, Phillips, Moody and Sankey, who deal in Oriental miracles of two thousand years ago, are still far more influential and highly esteemed than Huxley, Tyndall, or our own Professor Fiske. Luckily, theology and priestism are inextricably linked with civil despotisms, with the fortunes of Kaiser and Czar, and must inevitably share the speedy doom of the latter. For the masses, even in the most benighted countries of Europe, are evidently beginning to be bent on riding themselves of their oppressors; and popes and high-priests of all descriptions are in the same boat with the civil and political oppressors. Who wonders that there is, among intelligent Frenchmen, such an impatience of the farther continuance of Popish superstition and its degrading rites in France as to cause occasional exhibitions of irrepressible indignation at the sight of them? For instance, recently in the church of St. Ambroise in Marseilles, as a priest was bearing what are called the sacred emblems down the aisles, while the ignorant crowd of worshippers were on their knees, a man suddenly rushed from behind a pillar, struck the priest thrice with his clenched fist, and then snatching the monstrance, a sort of machine for exhibiting the sacrament, from the priest's hands, dashed it violently to the ground, where it was broken in pieces. Of course there was a scene. Cases of a similar kind are said to be of frequent occurrence in churches all over France. Evidently there has got to be one more catastrophe in Europe to get rid of the rubbish of superstition, and that catastrophe is near. No wonder that the sight of the remains of old Pius IX., the pontiff who thought he could throttle modern civilization, as they were recently removed by a monkish procession to some other burial-place, caused indignation among the liberals of Rome. The Lega della Democrazia expressed regret that the carcass of the dead pope was not flung into the Tiber. We are told that anti-clerical clubs are forming to promote the perpetual expulsion of the papacy from Rome. Perhaps the pope will yet turn up as an emigrant at Castle Garden.

A RATIONALIST'S FUNERAL.

The proper observance of the funerals of freethinkers has frequently been a subject, with me, of serious thought. Several conspicuous occasions during the recent past have stimulated thought to more than the usual consideration.

I have within a few years attended the funerals of persons known as anti-Christian, who were not attendants upon any church, who had outgrown creeds, who inclined to a natural religion, who held scientific truths above all superstition; who were, in fact, so-called infidels. The funerals of these persons were observed in all respects in accordance not only with all social, but with all Christian customs. Either the Episcopalian form of service, or the scarcely less stereotyped ceremonial of the Unitarian Church, or the prayers and remarks of orthodox ministers were used on each occasion. Sometimes, this was done out of regard to the wishes of some relative or friend of the deceased; but oftener, apparently, it was the force of custom and a pressure of orthodox influence upon bereaved ones too stricken with loss and grief to assert the opinions or wishes, expressed or unexpressed, of the deceased, or to insist upon observances more in accord with the life and thought of the dead parent, husband, or child.

This course cannot but be deplored by all consistent rationalists. When a life has been healthy and honest, just and tender and beyond reproach, without reliance upon creeds, church rites, pastoral aid, or religious consolation, ought not the death and subsequent ceremonies to be marked by the absence of such accessories? Ought not the funerals of these persons to be conducted in accordance with their past lives and opinions? I certainly think they ought. I am continually distressed by this prevailing wrong to freethought. It causes a continual reproach upon rational religion if, in the season of bereavement by death, we succumb not only to grief, but to the pressure of church influence, and yield to Christian customs. Each occurrence of such inconsistency but reaffirms the statement so often made by pietists, that our religion, the rationalist's religion, will not stand the test of death or deep affliction. It emphasizes the Christian's claim that the desolated and stricken ones can be comforted alone by their religion.

Reform in rationalists' funerals is demanded in justice to the many noble lives that are wholly governed by rational ideas. Beautiful, hallowed, and appropriate services are possible without the aid of established religious forms. The exceptional occasion needs the exceptional observance. Better the absence of all ceremonial than fall back upon the Christian Church, and thus give its adherents cause for self-glorification, and let our extremity prove their opportunity.

To-day, my attention has been again turned to this theme, which I use in my letter in place of others more pertinent perhaps to correspondence, by attendance upon the funeral of a young married woman—a freethinker, the child of freethinkers—who has been reared wholly without superstition, without any Christian aids. This funeral was the exceptional instance among many others, and was marked by consistency. It was so extraordinary and yet so touching in its unusual simplicity that I could not forbear writing some account of it.

Mrs. Rosa Gordon Senior was in character altogether lovely. In the home of her parents, she was an affectionate, trustworthy, helpful, joyous girl. As a wife, she was faithful, loving, and still helpful and joyous. As a mother, she was tender and devoted; and, when her only boy was taken away by death, she was heroic though heart-broken, stifling her own great grief lest she should add to that of her husband and the child's grandparent who worshipped him. Socially, she was a cheery companion, never given to gossip, joining in the pastimes of young people with happy zest. Intellectually, she was fond of reading and study, was an ever-interested member of the Popular Science Society, and belonged to classes which pursued the studies of physiology and chemistry, and to clubs arranged for general literary efforts. She was simple in dress, modest in demeanor, without a tinge of purse-pride, respectfully gentle to those who served her, an attentive listener among intellectual people, unobtrusive and unpretending always. She was a sincere lover of nature, spent much time out of doors in out-door sports, and was all in all the embodiment of cheerful content with her life just as it was, and beloved by all who knew her well. Her life went out after giving birth to a daughter who survives her. Her death was sudden, unexpected, and attended with intense physical suffering. When she discovered that she must die, she expressed no fear, no distress. She "had not thought of dying," she said, "so young, only twenty-six; but," she added, "I must, of course, die sometime." She bade husband, parents, and sister a tender good-bye without a murmur to add to their agony, begged for every neighbor and friend to be sent for that she might see them to say good-bye, and left pleasant farewell messages for those who could not reach her, gave her little baby to her mother, and said, "Be kind to Fred, my boy," her husband, "and keep him and the baby at home." Some one at the bedside trying to comfort her said, "You can look back, and see your little baby." "I do not know that," she replied: "I shall be glad if I can, but I guess not." The good-byes all said, she lost consciousness and passed into the final bitter physical struggle with death.

The sudden loss of child, of wife like her, was of necessity a shock that left this family bewildered as well as bereaved. They, however, were consistent rationalists. They did not turn to any Christian source for help to carry out the necessary obsequies attending the burial of their beloved dead. They bore the shock as bravely as they could, and kind friends rendered every assistance that sympathy prompted, but respected the rationalistic opinions of the family, and made no arrangements contrary to their convictions and simple, quiet customs of living and doing.

Social customs were observed to the extent of inviting all friends to the funeral, and the burial casket was covered with love-offerings of rare, sweet flowers. At the appointed hour, the friends assembled and grouped themselves about the ample and beautiful grounds, speaking in softened tones, the summer morning sun shining down glorifying the scene of natural and artificial beauty. This sweet, true child of nature was thus surrounded by the objects she loved. Sights and sounds were in harmony with all but the great grief which pervaded human life. Just as the coffin was being carried to the hearse for removal to the cemetery, a forest bird carolled loud and full a song from the tall tree-top, a jubilate, not a requiem,—nature's manner, heedless of the death of leaf or bird or even men. And this was the only sound that broke that sweet summer stillness.

At the grave there was no word uttered. The coffin was lowered in solemn, tearful silence, the heart-broken mourners subduing expressions of grief to suit that strange hush of burial. A lady whispered to me, "Not a word to be said?"

What word was there to say. There are no words that can console in this stricken time. Could it soften the pangs of that bereft husband, parents, and sister to call this death a dispensation of Divine Providence, the righteous will of a loving Creator done with wise purpose? Was it needful, in view of the disbelief of this by those suffering ones, to say that this untimely death was the result of some innocent or ignorant violation of some physical law, or an accident? Could any commonplaces of customary consolation give any comfort? No! True, that life which had been so eloquent of all excellence could have been dwelt upon, but every word of this nature would have harrowed the feelings of the bereaved ones. Her excellence was woven into every fibre of their being, her beautiful graces were indelibly written in their thought, and now turned in tender agony to behold them only the more beautiful in the fading light of her departure; and she was dead to them forever. No hope beyond that grave. They were striving, in spite of all this, to be calm and heroic; and the silent sympathy of that band of attached friends helped them to do this far better than any formula of words, or of words all eloquent with sympathy or eulogy.

But Nature's voice was eloquent through the soft summer air, the glowing sunshine, the rustling trees, the blooming flowers, speaking of death as but a process in harmony with life, sad only in severing the human strands that make the ties of family, love, and friendship.

The impressiveness of this scene cannot soon be forgotten. At first thought, it may seem to be disregarded of the dead to thus disregard all established customs. But second thought not only finds in this method something far more fitting than the falsitudes which so often obtain at the funerals of freethinkers, but also something exceedingly beautiful in its harmony with Nature's manner, that consigns the dead noiselessly into mother earth to be recombined into some new form in her ever-acting processes.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

No. II.

It is to be observed that the horse-cars which take people away from the churches on Sunday are more crowded than those that go to them. To immense numbers in our great cities, Sunday, at this season, is almost the only opportunity for enjoyable and healthful recreation. Tied to the wearisome routine of labor six days in every week for long hours in the factory, the workshop, and the store, and the innumerable occupations of such a populace; crowded at night into contracted and ill-ventilated apartments, as so many of them are,—what wonder that they turn their backs on the churches, when Sunday comes, and flee to any spot where they may breathe fresh, pure air, get a glimpse of the green earth, the blue sky, and the sheen of moving waters, and share, if but for a few hours, the reviving influences of nature!

The New Old South, which stands in open view, across the way, just above Trinity, is scarcely less impressive than the last-mentioned in its exterior appearance and the elaborate and costly finish of its interior. Nobody need be told that the society occupied until the great fire, for a period that the memory of the oldest inhabitant runneth not to the contrary, the Old South building, on the corner of Washington and Milk Streets. The latter at that time became the temporary Boston Post-office; and the society, joining in the movement, which had already begun, of churches and various institutions, before the invading wave of business down-town, fled to the more attractive Back Bay Lands, where now they thickly cluster under so much improved conditions. The society was organized in 1839, and is associated with memorable events of the Colonial and Revolutionary times. Sitting in one of these grand religious structures in "the still hour" of one of these vacation Sundays, as the eye wanders over the many devices of art and beauty displayed, it is natural for a train of thought to arise in the mind of the radical visitor, not suggested by the worship. What testimony there is here to the depth and sincerity of the religious sentiment in man! Surely, this lavish outpouring of wealth and fine wrought effect of artistic dream and devotion, that, with the accompaniments of the hour, possess such a mysterious power to tranquilize and compose the human spirit, indicate they are the products of something more than a superficial impulse or feeling. Do they not evince something so inwrought into the intellectual and spiritual life of mankind that all the forces of modern science and criticism are not likely to wholly obliterate it for generations to come, if indeed that shall ever be. What shallow intellects are those that suppose, because of the modifications of religious beliefs they witness, or incidental signs of the decline and weakness of the Church, that its end is near! And yet religion and the Church must change with the changing time, and are changing continually; but it may be questioned whether it is a change that forebodes its absolute extinction,—the extinction of worship. What their future is to be we leave to others to speculate upon for the present. This elegant and stately temple is quite unlike the previous one, in some respects far exceeds it.

The Rev. Dr. Manning, its pastor for the last twenty years, though orthodox, represents, in a fair degree, the orthodox pulpit under the influence of the modern culture and spirit. During the slave-holder's war, and before it, he was one of the preachers who carried the cause into his sermons and prayers, and exhibited a fervor of earnestness and eloquence in its behalf not unworthy of the historic associations of the old church in which they were uttered, and eventually marched to the field of conflict at the front of a regiment.

The preacher last Sunday was the Rev. Dr. Coe, of New York. He is evidently a person of education and refinement. His bearing was dignified, graceful, and quiet. His tones were clear, and his style of expression strong and flowing without redundancy. Indeed, one would suppose that there was not the slightest suspicion on the part of the preacher that any part of the New Testament had ever been questioned. Yet the sermon was entirely free from anything of the dogmatic character. The names of Christ and God were used as interchangeable terms. Christ was the divine and exceptional life of the world, manifesting, even in childhood, his supernatural nature, yet full of human sweetness, gentleness, affection, and sympathy; the constant, unfailing companion of man through all his life journey, leading the weaker brother through dark and devious ways in which he sometimes stumbles and falls, yet bringing him out at last, through faith in his direction, to wise and beneficent ends. Indeed, he was the voice of conscience, who is always with us, and whose presence we should seek to recognize in all the relations, cares, and concerns of our lives. In the words of the text, "Whatsoever he saith unto you do it." The marks of the orthodox creed were clear and distinct; and yet it was evidently the orthodoxy of a new school, largely transformed and relieved of the stern features of its past. It had more of sweetness and light, and I must confess that I was not quite sure that the hour had been misspent at the close, or that it were advisable to stop even orthodox preaching and close its churches at present, even if we should turn them into lectures on science or art galleries and museums. AN EXPERIENCE IN ORGANIZATION.

There has been considerable discussion in the Index recently, I notice, as to whether Free Religion can or will organize. Possibly the following, as bearing somewhat on this question, may not be without interest. Two years ago, the writer withdrew from the Presbyterian Church, because forbidden the liberty of preaching an unlimited atonement. A large colony followed from his old charge. We at once organized a new society on the ground not only of a general atonement, but also expressly on the broader and deeper ground of the right and duty of a minister to think his own thought and to speak it, rather than the thought of a class or a standard. Not yet two years old, we already have a new stone church of exquisite taste, wholly paid for and nearly completed. It will be dedicated some time next September. The means have also been raised for building a parsonage. Our congregation is large, prosperous, enterprising. The attempt to organize a church expressly on the principle of intellectual liberty has with us proved a complete success. I interpret the Bible according to the principles of the scientific method of study; make the whole volume of nature within us and without us a part of it, as Genesis, Job, the Psalms, the Proverbs, the Gospels, and St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, intimate; find in it certain elements which are revealed and inspired in a direct and strict sense, though not in the old sense of these terms; hold it also to be a record, not infallible, but fallible, of man's speculative thought on these elements and his legal use of them for ages in a real religious experience; and, in these changing speculative views and in this changing ritual, read the great lessons of intellectual and legal liberty. While we negate much, we posit more. The miraculous and the final we negate. A. N. ALCOTT.

FREDERICKSBURG, OHIO, Aug. 1, 1881.

PRAYER.—A reporter of the Chicago Times has been interviewing leading lawyers, physicians, and clergymen of that city on the subject of prayer. Rabbi Hirsch of the Sinai Synagogue said: "Prayer offered in behalf of the wounded President, we hold to be merely an expression of the highest sympathy. We lay no claim to being able by prayer to interrupt or divert the laws of God, or of nature, as they are sometimes called. I am not a believer in miracles, and hold the so-called miracles described in the Scriptures to be simply legends and traditions associating the names of national heroes or famous characters with certain places." Rev. L. P. Mercer, Swedenborgian, believes "in the efficacy of prayer, but not as a means of changing the divine will or lighting the divine wisdom, but of putting the person praying into a receptive condition." Dr. Byford declared: "I have no faith in the curative power of prayer. . . . I am a Methodist." Dr. Delemater said: "I do not know anything about it. Prayer is not in my list of remedies. I never prescribe it as a medicine." Dr. Wickersham said: "If I had a patient with a broken leg, I should put splints on it. The covers of a good family Bible might answer for that purpose, possibly. Mechanical appliances are more reliable agents for the extraction of a bullet from a man's anatomy than prayer. Still, prayer does no harm that I know of." Dr. Horsey said: "While not wishing to be quoted as talking slightly of prayer, I must admit that I do not believe that prayer had a great deal to do with the President's cure. . . . On several occasions, when priests have administered the extreme unction to patients under my charge, they have got well. I attribute this to the fact that the giving of absolution for sin relieves the mind of the patient from all uneasiness, and produces a state of tranquillity that is very favorable to recovery." Emery A. Storrs, the distinguished lawyer and orator, said: "In the case of the President, I think the efficacy was delayed too long. If there is any power in prayer, the bullet of the assassin ought never to have penetrated the presidential person. The churches have been praying for months that he might be preserved from danger. Still, prayer is a good thing; and, taken in conjunction with several excellent physicians, a naturally cheerful spirit, all the modern appliances for keeping the temperature of a sick-room at the proper stage, a large corps of the best nurses money can hire, and a robust constitution that has never been impaired by excesses of any kind, it is liable to work wonders. It is like the man who tried smoking for corns. 'Smoking and loose boots,' he subsequently remarked, 'is the best thing I ever took for corns.'"

A FEW years ago, a clergyman who had been reading Darwin, Huxley, and Haeckel, called on me and avowed himself a Darwinist. "Now," he said, "as soon as I saw this truth on the pages of Darwin, I knew I would find it on the pages of the Bible. I have searched and found that Moses was a Darwinist and David was a Darwinist and they were all Darwinists." He turned to the hundred and thirty-ninth Psalm, and read: "My substance was not hidden from thee when I was curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect, and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned when as yet there was none of them." "Now," he went on to say, "what does this mean? In our translation, nothing at all. But look at it in the Hebrew and translate it into the language of modern thought. Substance, that means protoplasm. Curiously wrought, the Hebrew word means 'embroidered,' and it does not describe the present body. It describes the Medusa, which is embroidered with frills and furbelows and flounces. Lowest parts of the earth, that, of course, means the Lower Silurian strata. But the inspired penman has put the rocks for the time." The passage translated properly would read thus. I give the translation from memory: "My protoplasm was not hidden from thee when, aeons gone by, I floated on the bosom of the Old Silurian deep, a frilled and flounced jelly-fish. Thine eye did see my sarcod, and in thy scheme all my members were determined before differentiation had begun!"—W. D. Gunning, in Unity.

A work on The Cat by St. George Mivart has just been published by Scribner's Sons. The distinguished author maintains that the various kinds of cats, and the whole cat group have been evolved through the orderly operation of powers divinely implanted in material creation. More than ten years ago, St. George Mivart wrote: "The general theory of evolution has indeed for some time past steadily gained ground, and it may be safely predicted that the number of facts which can be brought forward in its support will in a few years be vastly augmented. But the prevalence of this theory need alarm no one; for it is, without any doubt, perfectly consistent with strictest and most orthodox Christian theology."—Genesis of Species.

F. M. EHRLICHER writes from Watertown, N.Y.: "Under the head of 'Current Topics,' you give the religious sympathies of the graduating class of Cornell, but make one very important omission. Among the fifteen members who gave their beliefs the title of 'liberal' and some of the others who called themselves 'agnostics,' 'naturalists,' etc., are materialists, infidels, and atheists, who however preferred a less aggressive name, which equally well expresses their convictions. As a member of the class whose religious beliefs are certainly very curious, I hope to see the error corrected."

SAYS Goldwin Smith: "There is no use any longer in quoting or misquoting Scripture to prove that God wills the mass of mankind to be always poor and always dependent on the rich. The very peasant has now broken that spell, and will no longer believe the rector if he tells him that the world belongs to the squire, and that justice is put off to the rent. Hodge has determined to find out for himself, by a practical experiment, what the will of God really is."

MRS. MARY CLEMMER, the well-known Washington correspondent of the Independent, wants Guiteau whipped. "If he cannot be hung," she writes, "the one thing that should not be left out of this man's punishment is whipping." Here the feelings of a woman get the better of her judgment, and constrain her to appeal for a revival of barbarism.

HOW TO BE BRIGHT.

BY H. L. HOWARD.

"How to be bright?"
Said wise uncle Bill.
"Why, look at this 'ere Cucumber down here,
Hugging the ground
Away from the light,
Under the vines
All out of sight.
There's not a bit
Of sunshine in it.

"But look at the peach
Up there in the tree,
Within the sun's reach;
Bright colors you see:
Be like this 'ere
Rare-ripe so clear,
With its ruddy cheek
Inviting you near,"
Said wise uncle Bill.
"There's sunshine in it;
In that, not a bit.

"See suns in all kinds
Of people you meet,"
Says bright uncle Bill:
"Yes, find in them light
And warmth; make them bright.
The cynic make stare
For being a bear,
And never able
To make you unstable,
And feel as does he.

"So speak to the proud
With not a cast face,
Nor forced answer loud,
But with pliant grace;
That they'll think of you
In pleasant degree,
And hope you'll again
Cross their way,"
Says my uncle Bill.

"At the unhandsome
So look as to cheer
Them with the idea
That, after all,
They might proceed straight
To be photographed,
And not crack the plate."
That's my uncle Bill.

"Give the unfortunate Souls you may know
A pry; make it plain
That 'tis the world's gain.
Their career, and they Have not lived in vain."
Just like uncle Bill.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index three months on trial for fifty cents in advance.

THE annual meeting of the Liberals of Kansas and adjoining States will be held in Forest Park, Ottawa, Kansas, commencing August 25th and continuing until the 29th. Mrs. Mattie P. Krekle, editress of the Kansas City Mirror, Rev. Jenkin Ll. Jones, editor of Unity, Dr. Samuel Watson of Memphis, Tenn., G. G. Howland of Lawrence, Kan., and J. E. Remsburg of Atchison, Kan., are announced among the speakers who have promised to address the meeting. Other speakers are expected, and a large gathering and a pleasant time are anticipated.

ENGLAND surely has a tough problem to grapple in her relations with her animated neighbor. Long delayed justice when at last meted out is likely to be taken with an ill grace, and under the pressure of Irish excitability the best intentions may be parried and misconstrued. It would seem to an outsider a happy settlement for the English side, if the crown could make up its mind to abandon the keeping of the Emerald premises to the peculiar people who are struggling for possession. If any adjustment were possible in view of the English-born portion, whose life-long homes are established on Irish land, it would appear to be the cheapest course for England to drop utterly the hot chain that bids fair to be hotter before it is cooler. But the relaxing of muscles that have the habit of centuries in their grip is more easily mentioned than executed. It would be an interesting spectacle to lookers-on to note the course that Ireland would take for her own management if severed from British control; but humanity at large can generally be trusted to bump its head in its own fashion, and learn by degrees how to keep its feet out of ditches. How much of the ignorance and caprice that gets mixed with the manifest dues that are claiming attention are attributable to the bad training of past ages of neglect and usurpation, it is not easy to determine; but the difficulty of undoing the effects of selfish and unwise administration is a clear lesson to every student of national policy.

SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Science is classified knowledge. Its province is the entire world of phenomena. For human convenience, this vast province is ideally divided into distinct departments; and all the facts and principles pertaining directly to each are grouped under a name—like astronomy or psychology—designating that department. All the sciences are but different segments of one circle, but different parts of one science.

Theology claims to be a science, and the greatest of all the sciences. But we are justified in declaring it is not even the least; for, far from having a basis in the facts of observation or experience, in anything calculable or verifiable, the object of its study is the nature, attributes, and purposes of a Being who is inaccessible to the human mind, and whose very existence is a question of discussion. The man of science studies the order of Nature and the relations and dependencies of her parts. The theologian claims to see by "the eye of faith" what is not revealed to the senses or discovered by the intellect,—“a light that never was on sea or land.” Science enjoins the duty of investigation before believing. Theology demands that we believe first, and investigate, if at all, afterward; for doubt is dangerous and disbelief is damnable. The realm of science is the region of natural law. The scientist, when he has traced force beyond force, and law above law up the chain of causation, until he can proceed no further, appealing to a thousand corroborative facts and analogies, holds that a keener vision and a wider induction will disclose beyond only an extension of the realm of natural law. The theologian, on the contrary, whenever the mathematics of human intelligence has failed to solve a problem, has had recourse to supernaturalism for a solution.

Theology claims to be able to give, at least, a general explanation of this universe; but it gives us assumptions only. The absolute nature of things is unknown, and the puzzle of existence man cannot solve. A mystery to ourselves, we are in the midst of mysteries we cannot unravel. The widest observation and the largest experience during a lifetime, and the most complete familiarity with the results of all investigation, past and present, will not remove the barriers to a solution of the problem of the universe; because no amount of knowledge possible to man can relieve him from the organically imposed limitations of human intelligence. All our ideas of the external world are and must be relative. We can know things only as they are related to us, as they are colored by our consciousness, as they are modified by the conditions of the human organism. Suppose we were so constituted that, instead of five, we had fifty senses, and our susceptibility so great that every motion of the outer world would excite a response in the organism, how much larger would be our view of nature, and how different from many that we now have would be our conceptions of the objective world! But, even then, we could know the world only through sensation, only by the modes in which we would be affected. So long as there is organism and environment, knowledge is possible only in the form of a relation,—a relation between the subject, man, and the object, external nature. We can know things only as they are related to the mind. By no power of thought, or ingenuity of reasoning, or effort of the will, can we scale or destroy the wall which confines us to the region of the relative and makes forever impossible knowledge of the absolute, or of "the Thing in Itself."

But it is concerning the unknowable that theology dogmatizes and demands faith, while science is occupied with her discoveries and researches in the field of attainable knowledge, and with adding every year to the comforts, elegances, and luxuries of life. Thus, it is seen that theology begins where science ends. As Haeckel says: "Faith has its origin in the poetic imagination: knowledge, on the other hand, originates in the reasoning intelligence of man. Science has to pluck the blessed fruit from the tree of knowledge, unconcerned whether these conquests trench upon the poetical imaginings of faith or not."

Theology still dogmatizes about the origin of the universe, in regard to which it uses language that belonged to the childhood of the race. Science teaches that the solar system, and probably all suns and planets, have come to their present condition by innumerable changes, extending back through the measureless past in accordance with natural law. As Strauss observes, quite likely the universe is like great tropical tree, on which at the same time is fruit in various stages of maturity and perfection. Planets, suns, and systems come and go. Such are the indications of science; but of matter and force we see no evidence of a beginning and no prospect of an end. The Bible account of creation has no scientific value whatever. Those who attempt to reconcile Genesis with geology attempt, as Huxley says, "to force the generous new wine of science into the old, worn-out bottles of Judaism." Evolution is now accepted in some form by almost every scientific man in Europe and America. We see that the formation of worlds needed no miracle. The universe is not a manufactured clock set to going by some force without, and requiring to be wound up once in a while, or to be tinkered in any of its parts. And, according to evolution, carried out legitimately into the field of biology, life has appeared on this globe as naturally as the globe itself has been rounded into its present form, with all its variety of land and water, of hill and dale; of climate and production. When life appeared, nothing was created. There was no actual life in the fiery globe, but there were forces which admitted of conversion into life. There was no protoplasm in the nebulous mass, but there were elements which would combine and produce it. True, these affirmations refer to a period of which we possess no positive knowledge; but it is for that very reason theology makes conjectures concerning it the basis of a dogmatic system; and we have a logical right to indicate the weakness of this theological system by reference to a more probable hypothesis, one that the more advanced theologians themselves are beginning to treat with respect and even approval.

Theology would have us believe we are fallen creatures. Science says we are the advancing descendants of a rude ancestry. Theology says the lower instincts and ungovernable passions of our nature date from "Adam's fall," in which "we sinned all." Science says that ages of savage experiences are organized in the race, have become "consolidate in frame and mind," but are being gradually outgrown. Theology traces evil to a devil,—“the evil one,” a creature whom God made perfect. Science says evil is non-adjustment, and that man overcomes it as he understands not theology, but himself and his relations. Theologians say salvation is through a miraculous scheme called the atonement. Science teaches we are "saved" by knowledge, by restraint, by the improvement of our intellectual and moral nature.

Theology says, "Pray to God for what you need." Science says: "Rely on yourself, utilize the forces of nature and make them ministers to your well-being. God will never help you when you are in distress: you must help yourself." Theology says we should prepare for the world to come; but the teaching of science is that we learn to live in the world in which we now are. Theology makes belief a test of man's worth in the sight of God. Science—moral science—judges man by his character and conduct. Science aims at the enlightenment of man, theology at the glorifying of God. Theology says, Banish doubt from your mind. Science says, Without doubt no investigation, without investigation no knowledge, without knowledge no progress. The authorities of theology are Moses and St. Paul: those of science are investigators, explorers, and discoverers, and they may be corrected without censure. Beyond them, we may go without threats of hell.

Theology, by stereotyping old errors and antiquated methods, has become the enemy not only of intellectual growth and material prosperity, but of social progress and natural morality. Science is radical and progressive. Theology is the Bourbon of the world of thought. Science is the friend, the benefactor, the "savior" of mankind; its mission is to bless and benefit the race; it hath its "victories no less renowned than war." Theology has persecuted and murdered reformers, strangled genius, reddened the earth with human blood, and covered it with a mantle of darkness. But science is gaining ground every day, while theology is losing its influence over the minds of thinking men and women. Scientific men have "the majesty of fact on their side, and the eternal forces of nature are working for them. Not a star comes to the meridian at its calculated time, but testifies to the justice of their method. Their beliefs are one with the falling rain and with the growing corn. By doubt they are established, and open inquiry is their bosom friend." Thus speaks one of her most illustrious votaries, and his words indicate the confidence and moral enthusiasm of her sons in every land.

MR. WASSON ON "RIGHTS."

In the International Review for August, Mr. Wasson has printed the able essay on "Rights," which profoundly interested his audience at the Chestnut Street Club last winter.

It treats of the most important of all political questions,—the formation of organized society, or governments, and the relation of the individual to them.

If we understand Mr. Wasson aright, he bases the right of governments to exist on their just representation of general ethical laws, whose fulfillment secures the welfare of mankind; and the right of individuals consists in the power to develop their own personality under such laws, with the help of the whole force of society. Thus, he says, "The general right, therefore, which comprehends all particular ones, is the right of every man to a governed life of all." Society has therefore no right to exclude any individual from its benefits; and no person has a right to carry out his own peculiar schemes of advantage to the injury of the common weal. Tried by this standard, absolutism is condemned, since it sacrifices the whole being of society to the fulfilment of its own will; and anarchy is equally subversive of all right, since nobody gets the advantage of order and security. Excessive individualism runs to one or other of these forms, and the revolt of the masses against the former is the struggle of individualism with itself. When Louis XIV. said, "L'état, c'est moi," he obliged the sans-culottes of Paris to assert, "Et moi aussi."

The analysis of personal rights is full of profound suggestions. Mr. Wasson defines three kinds of rights:—

1st. "Those conditioned only upon the fact of personal existence."

These, we should say, are the rights which belong to man as man, and are what the Declaration of Independence endeavored to set forth. These rights in society can only be secured by a form of organized government, and Mr. Wasson puts this statement in the form of "the right of man to be governed." "So far, at least, a governed life of all is due to every personal being." If society is truly organized, this is to every individual the highest personal right, privilege, and opportunity; but we think history proves that the personal right to represent this governed life in one's self, in defiance of ill-organized and false government, is also inherent in man's moral nature, and out of it come the heroisms and martyrdoms of moral life.

2d. He names those rights conditioned upon definite relations between persons, etc.

This point is admirably illustrated in regard to the marriage relation. This relation is based upon the great natural fact of sex, and the whole continuance of society rests upon its proper fulfilment. Still, it is a matter of voluntary choice with the individual to enter into this relation or not. But, having entered into it, he has made, as it were, a contract with nature itself to fulfil all the duties growing out of it. Instead of an absence of contract, as Mr. Wasson says was asserted by a follower of Kant, we should recognize this as the most binding of contracts, remembering those fine words of old Porphyry, "A man should so live with a wife, the companion of life, as remembering that other contracts are written upon brass, but this upon children."

The third division includes the rights of function; and here Mr. Wasson comes upon the question which usually calls forth antagonism between him and his warmest admirers,—the question of suffrage. Of the general right of man to do only what he can do without periling the welfare of others, with which Mr. Wasson begins his examination of the question, no one would differ from him. But to us it seems that the right of suffrage is the expression of that very right which he claims in the beginning,—the right of every man to a part in a well-governed society. It is the expression of his wish and choice to be well governed. All laws restricting suffrage seem to us necessary simply as rules of convenience, making it possible to carry out the function in an orderly manner, but that any single man or body of men has a right to say to any other body of men, "You are incompetent to think and judge what is good for you: we will decide for you, and you shall not decide for us," seems to us the most monstrous denial of a common humanity, and an arrogant usurpation of function, which is directly contrary to Mr. Wasson's own claim of "fitness the only ground of right."

The act of putting a vote in the ballot-box is not necessarily the only means of expressing this right. Sometimes, it is done simply by acquiescence, as where a ship's crew in a storm turn from the nominal captain to obey their real leader, who inspires them with confidence. The formal method of consent to the government may vary, but the essential fact, that every moral, personal being in society has a right to a share in the determination of how society shall carry out the ethical law on which it is based, is to us unshaken by Mr. Wasson's arguments. In this as in all other things, we are yet far from a perfect practical result, and, as Carlyle says, with "any not insupportable approximation we must be patient"; but the fullest conception of a truly organized society does require the representation, not of the whims or the will, but of the innermost moral life of every one of its members. But, with this difference of view on some points, we are fully in accord with what seems to us the general scope of Mr. Wasson's thought, that society and government in its true sense are not matters of arbitrary will or invention on the part of any men or set of men, but are the true expression of laws lying at the basis of human nature, without which no progress in civilization, in human happiness, and especially in the development of man's real freedom to use all his mental and moral powers, is possible. Rights and duties, as he shows, are always in relation to each other; and both of them are based upon the permanent laws of right which govern the universe.

MIDSUMMER RELIGION.

"The turf shall be my fragrant shrine,
My temple, Lord, this arch of thine."

The writer of these words had no reference to this era of "camp-meetings," "grove-meetings," or even "Summer Schools of Philosophy"; yet they might be appropriately used as a motto by the devout people of all grades in America to-day, from the devout Adventist, always expecting, through some mysterious jugglery of faith and arithmetic, the coming of his Lord in the near future, to the devout Pantheist or Atheist who fancies he sees the only Lord of nature in nature's self.

It is within the memory of middle-aged men and women that this summer phase of religion began. The Methodists and Adventists were the pioneers in this movement, but with no thought of pleasure or comfort for their poor despised bodies, or of relaxation and rest for their fatigued brains. Their only motive was the "good of souls." They assembled out of doors in those days of deep religious conviction, because larger audiences could thus be gathered together, and the work of salvation go more briskly on. Those were the days when the principle of self-abnegation yet existed inside the churches; and there was still a strong flavor of humility and self-immolation in the spirit that refused, no matter how severe the weather or how long the sermon, to introduce carpets or stoves into their houses of worship through fear of encouraging self-seeking in devout souls: for at that time it was believed that the truly religious heart should be so absorbed in the love and worship of the Father-God that no thought or feeling of bodily discomfort could find admittance into its consciousness during the hours of worship. At that time, the Baptist convert did not undergo the rite of immersion by a tepid bath in a well-warmed and every way comfortable church, but rather preferred to pass through the ordeal in the coldest weather, out of doors, and in water where the ice had first to be broken, that he might thus testify to the warmth imparted to him through the presence of Christ's love in his heart.

But, now, nearly all the religious sects, also many who are only in the faintest degree sectarian, with some who are religious only in the sense of devotion to some moral ideal, have come to recognize the hygienic virtue of out-of-door or midsummer religion. Only the Catholics, and a few of the more strait-laced sects among Protestants, have not succumbed to the tendency toward open-air worship. Even the Presbyterian Church has this year started, at Greenwood Lake, N.Y., an out-of-door "Summer School of Christian Philosophy," with Dr. Deems and others as noteworthy as its leaders. This, with some other indications of the same sort from various sources, shows a leaning among even the strictest sects to seek in nooks "Exempt from public haunt,

... tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in everything," while it is several years since the Spiritualists—the emotionalists of Rationalism—first began to gather themselves into phalanx "under the green-wood tree." And now even the freethinkers—irreligious as they are thought to be—have caught the idea of the hygienic and socialistic value of camp-life, and make their annual grove-meetings the grand rallying-point from which to augment their forces, and form an idea of their numeric strength, while they recruit their health and enjoy social interchange of views. In former years, when heterodox opinions were held only by occasional individuals, and were from their unpopularity rarely given utterance to, save under stress of conscientious scruple, camp-meetings were undertaken solely for "the glory of God," and not at all with a view to the health or happiness of man, and were then depended on by the sects which employed them as "a means of grace," as camps from which to issue forth to capture the souls of the impenitent, and bring them into "the service of the Lord," and so augment the number of efficient church members. In those days, no day of camp-meeting life was considered as having been of any avail, if, at its close, a goodly number of "sinners" had not been brought to "kneel at the mercy-seat," and, after a due season of "anguish of spirit," become "converted to Christ." The questions then asked by the stay-at-homes of those who had been able to attend the camp-meeting were not as now: "Did you have a pleasant time?" "Did you form any nice acquaintances?" "Are you refreshed by your woodland experience?" and "What amusements had you?" but rather: "How many converts were made?" "Did you get converted?" "Was the spirit of the Lord strongly manifest?" "Who was the most powerful preacher?" Nowadays, even the most orthodox churches—always excepting that grand old fossil of a past age of credulous faith, the Catholic Church—are everywhere yielding slowly but surely to the truths made manifest in Rationalism. Science, whose mandates cannot be gainsaid even by religion,—for science is truth, and religion ever professes to seek and to acknowledge truth,—has shown that duty to God is not incompatible with duty to God's so-called masterpiece, man; nay, that duty to one's self must be among the first duties owed to a Creator who thought man worthy of being.

So, by slow gradations, our midsummer religious meetings have come to hold to even the most orthodox the triune significance of health to body, mind, and heart. The churches, too, ought to congratulate themselves in the concession made to their religious methods by those whom they call irreligious, in the adoption by the latter of the summer grove and camp-meeting as the nuclei of their efforts at organization and propagandism and health.

While we write, many different classes of thinkers are enjoying their religion or their philosophy in the self-same way. They are, too, all in their own way seeking, under different names, for a glimpse of that power back of all nature which Christians call God, and which Rationalists, more doubtful of their knowledge, name the unknowable, but whose manifestations come to all alike, Christian or doubter, as that which, according to Pope,

"Warm in the sun, refreshes in the breeze, Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees."

The Adventists meet thus in open air to-day in Springfield. The Methodists have already held several of their camp-meetings at Northampton and other places. This sect, shocked by the secular use now made of this "means of grace," once peculiarly their own, limit now the time of their camp-meetings between Sundays, from Monday to Saturday, so as not to infringe on the "sanctity of the Sabbath." An odd reason, if the meetings, as they think, are attended by and blessed of God. There is also now in session the "School of Christian Philosophy," convened at Greenwood Lake, N.Y., under Presbyterian auspices. The Grove Meeting of Unitarians is held at Weirs, N.H. Moody is holding meetings of all sorts of Christians at his quiet home in Northfield. The Spiritualists are worshipping after their own odd fashion at Lake Pleasant, Onset Bay, and other places. The Freethinkers will soon convene in open air in New York, Kansas, and various other points. While, "last, but by no means least," the "Concord School of Philosophy" is in high session while we write; and, though we understand that its sittings are under shelter, it would seem more fitting that these disciples of Plato and other ancient philosophers should hold their councils where they would feel more at home, within the "academic groves" of Concord, consecrated as they are by the genius of Thoreau, Emerson, Alcott, and other Transcendentalists.

In each and all of these midsummer religious gatherings there will be good work done, apart from all sectarianism. Health will be renewed, tired energies rested, new sympathies awakened, new hopes born, higher aims adopted, new friendships formed, and life will seem sweeter, brighter, and more hopeful for all to whom this relaxation from life's cares has been granted.

S. A. U.

THE expounders of the Concord School of Philosophy are, without doubt, men and women of culture and taste; but, judging from the abstracts of addresses published in the Boston daily papers, they are discussing metaphysical theories that are very old, without throwing upon them any new light. The materialism which they criticise so unsparingly is not the scientific materialism of to-day, and the sensationalism they all agree in rejecting is a sensationalism that is now obsolete among all first-class thinkers. That school of thought in which Kant's "a priori Forms of Thought and Understanding" and the experiential philosophy of Locke and Mill are united and harmonized in a complete synthesis, and made a part of the system of evolution, is, so far as we can judge from the reports, either ignored altogether, or treated with disdainful contempt. Dr. Jones seems to think that about everything worth learning can be learned from Plato; and some of the others who have read papers are evidently satisfied that the way to obtain knowledge is to make consciousness, not the objective world, a subject of study. Such men as Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Haeckel, Spencer, and Lewes are not apparently held in high regard by these Concord philosophers; and the important facts and principles which have the past twenty years been brought to light in the field of biological and psychological science, they appear to regard as of no philosophical value or importance. Some of the speakers refer to science as though its work were simply to collect dry facts, failing to recognize the truth that science is classified and systematized knowledge, and involves not only the observation of facts, but the study of their manifold relations, their countless dependencies and implications, together with the laws and principles underlying them. The reports of some of the addresses given at Concord the past week have afforded considerable amusement to common readers, and have been read with more serious interest by those who are fond of metaphysical speculations; but they are not likely to awaken any very general interest in the pre-existence of the soul and other a priori theories to which prominence has been given in the discussions, nor to bring into favor Mr. Alcott's or Dr. Jones' method of treating philosophical subjects. In justice, it should be said, however, that the lectures of Professor Harris show the thinker, and are replete with information regarding speculative questions. The paper read by Mrs. Howe possessed historic interest. That of Mrs. Cheney is spoken of in high terms. Mr. Snider's graphic pictures of Greek life are very interesting. President Porter's address on Kant was able; but some of its statements should have been examined from the stand-point of representatives of modern thought, to whom he referred, like Spencer and Lewes, but to whom it seems impossible for the President of Yale to do justice.

THE Advertiser of the 4th inst. says: "The point on which Bradlaugh's case turns is not his election to Parliament, which is not disputed, and still less his so-called atheism, which is not a matter of intellectual or practical importance." The same journal, a day later, says that "the law regarding oaths does not stand in the way of the 'freethinker' Bradlaugh, because the aforesaid 'freethinker' is willing to take the oath, while the Commons are not at all unwilling to accept an affirmation instead of the oath. . . . Is the House obliged to accept any kind of man that electors may see fit to return? The salient point, legal and otherwise, in Mr. Bradlaugh's case, is his insolence; and the House of Commons has instructed its officers to deal with that. How so simple a question can be magnified into a constitutional conflict passes comprehension." Now, what are the facts? When Mr. Bradlaugh had been elected to the House of Commons, he refused to take the customary oath on the ground that he did not believe in the existence of a God. Finding that he would not be admitted to his seat without taking the oath he expressed a willingness to take it. For this, he has been censured by many of his freethinking friends. The House of Commons, however, now declined to permit him to swear, on the ground that he had shown an oath placed him under no religious obligations. Had he consented to take the oath without protest, he would probably have been admitted with as little objection as was John Stuart Mill and a score of heretics who are now members of the House. Not satisfied with Bradlaugh's exclusion, one of the members of the House of Commons brought a suit against him for illegal voting while in the House; and an enormous fine was imposed upon him, which he had no means of paying. But, satisfied that he was legally entitled to a seat in the House of Commons, to which he had twice been elected, the member from Northampton determined to test the legality of his claim, and made an attempt to enter the House from which he had been excluded, as he believed, in violation of law. The authorities adroitly manœuvred to prevent his entrance and at the same time, to avoid the necessity of arresting him and incurring the risk of a trial. Petitions from all quarters are pouring in, in Bradlaugh's behalf; and the Cabinet, it is said, must soon take his case into consideration. The impression is growing stronger every day that he is entitled to a seat in the body to which he has been elected, and that the people must stand by him, whether he has acted prudently or imprudently. The Evening Traveller of this city says, with truth: "The House of Commons has no right to inquire into Mr. Bradlaugh's religious opinions. . . . Undoubtedly, the great trouble with Bradlaugh is that he is a republican in sentiment. He is one of the people, and has criticised, in severe terms, the landed aristocracy. He has no love for the Church of England. He has a right to these views, and he has already a large constituency."

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE recent session of the National Conference of Charities in this city, in the comprehensiveness of its organization, the variety of subjects considered, and the high character of those who participated in its discussions, was a gathering of so much importance that it has a special claim to notice in this department of the Index. Some points in the proceedings of the Conference were touched upon in the communication of Mrs. Underwood last week; but others may be here properly referred to. The Legislative Hall of the State House afforded a very fitting and favorable place for the meetings; and Governor Long's hearty and eloquent introductory words of welcome served to impart an agreeable and auspicious beginning to the occasion.

This was the eighth annual session of the Conference; and it was gratifying to learn from the address of the president that the Association has been steadily growing in interest from year to year, and in delegates from a wider circuit of the country. "At the Cleveland Conference last year," it was said, "no less than sixteen States were represented; and, during the present week, we hope to welcome to Boston the official or the volunteer representatives of more than twenty States and Provinces."

There was a general concurrence in the position that in the administration of charity in cities it is of first importance that there should be co-operation among the various societies established for the purpose, in order to prevent imposture; and that giving to street beggars ought to be rigidly abstained from. This system had been adopted in Buffalo and Brooklyn, N.Y., as well as Boston, with eminently satisfactory results.

Mr. George Abbot James gave an account of the Provident Wood-yard of Boston, a form of charity by which applicants for help are provided with the work of wood-sawing equivalent to the assistance they receive. The charity is reported to have been very successful.

The importance of industrial education for the poor was forcibly dwelt upon by Mrs. James T. Fields, a view which we are pleased to note is gradually acquiring increasing recognition. Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney gave a very interesting report of the work of the New England Hospital for Women and Children. It was stated to have two leading objects in view,—one educational, the other charitable. With the exception of the one attached to the Boston University, it is the only hospital in New England in which women students can have an opportunity for the practical study of their profession. The appreciation of this fact is shown in the large number of students who have been attracted to it from all parts of the United States, as well as from England, Scotland, and even Russia. The education of nurses enters largely into its work, which includes lectures upon the care of the sick, hygiene, and correlative subjects. Its charitable work consists in affording to women and children the care of women physicians, which they can obtain in no other hospital in New England. The hospital has connected with it a dispensary, from which thousands receive advice and help in sickness. The physicians and students are accustomed to visit the poor at their homes, when necessary, thus giving an opportunity for sanitary instruction as well as medical aid.

The report of the Committee on Immigration, which was presented by Dr. Charles S. Hoyt of New York, referred to the very great increase of our population from this source as cause for serious concern. In 1878, 75,000 immigrants arrived in New York. In 1880, the number at that port reached 327,000; and this year it will probably be 500,000. The number arriving at Boston, Portland, and by the Canadian lines in the Western States, will swell the number to about a million. It was maintained that legislative action should be taken to restrict immigration, or at least the shipment of incompetent and helpless persons to this country, to become a burden to society. Such transportation, it was stated, is continually being carried on by foreign countries. Many of this class are sent across the river at Detroit, thus avoiding the Commissioners of Immigration. It was urged that some system of registration should be enforced at the point of shipment; and also that steamship companies should be held responsible for those they receive, and forced to return improper persons at their own expense. The subject was conceded to be a difficult one to deal with, some holding to the view that, instead of strict laws to prevent immigration, the special aim should be to make of those who thus come to our shores enlightened and useful citizens.

Rev. J. L. Milligan, Chaplain of the Western State Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, presented the report of the Committee on Crime and Penalties, of which he is chairman. He also read a paper on the "Model Prison," by Mr. T. H. Nevins. No state prison or prison system, it was affirmed, can claim to be a model, if all that is attempted or proposed for the good and moral rehabilitation of the prisoner ends with his term of sentence.

The difficulties and obstacles that surround the liberated prisoner at the close of his sentence, who may seek to carry out any good resolutions he may have formed, or desires that he cherishes for a reformed life, were pointed out, and the necessity shown of a state prison system that should reach beyond the walls of the institution, and guard and strengthen the weak and put the eye of judicious authority and restraint upon those of the confirmed criminal class who only expect to make their liberty a new opportunity for attacks upon the property of honest citizens.

The Rev. F. H. Wines, the Statistical Secretary of the Conference, gave an interesting report on the census of the defective, dependent, and delinquent classes of the United States. The whole number of the dependent classes will probably foot up in round numbers to three hundred and fifty thousand. Mr. Wines also gave a statement of the conduct of the work of the bureau over which he presides.

The above running sketch indicates somewhat the character of the Conference, and the social and philanthropic problems to which its attention is directed. D. H. C.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these, if at all, with great freedom. Study 13.—The Vegetable Kingdom.

*How Plants Grow from the Seed.*Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pp. 10-22.

Specimens: Maple Seeds, Beans, and Corn, also the embryo bean and corn in different stages of development.

We have now learned what about plants?

What does the Seed contain?

Do Seeds always show signs of life?

How long will they live?

What is meant by Germination?

What does the Seed need to make it germinate?

How do these affect it?

[Show embryo in different stages of development, tracing its growth.]

Why does the root always grow down and the stem up?

That they always do so shows what?

Does the little plant become complete very soon?

All its future growth, then, is what?

How are plants supplied with food?

Where is the food for the young plant kept?

How is it kept in good condition?

Is it always kept outside the embryo?

How is it in Indian Corn?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

How in Maple Seeds?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What is Maple Sugar?

What does it do for the young tree?

Do all plants grow in precisely the same way?

How is this shown by the Maple and the Morning-glory?

Do we find great variety of growth everywhere?

But what does a close study of plant life show?

How does a Bean grow?

How does Indian Corn grow?

What are the seed-leaves called?

How many seed-leaves has Indian Corn?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

Indian Corn, then, is called what kind of a plant?

Why?

How many seed-leaves has the Bean?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What kind of a plant, then, is it?

Why?

Pine trees, and plants like them, have how many seed-leaves?

They are called what?

Why?

Into what divisions, then, according to their number of seed-leaves, are all plants divided?

Did you ever hear of the law of evolution?

How is that illustrated by the growth of the plant from the Seed?

SELECTIONS.

While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.—Genesis viii., 22.

The grandest of all laws is the law of progressive development.—Bovee.

All our progress is an unfolding, like the vegetable bud.—Emerson.

Nature knows no pause in progress and development, and attaches her curse on all inaction.—Goethe.

Progress is the law of life.—Robert Browning.

In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand.—Ecclesiastes xi., 6.

Suggestions to Leader.—It will be less trouble than at first appears, to have the little specimen plant in their different stages growing in a small box, and will add very greatly to the interest of the children. Indeed it will be a most excellent study for them to raise their own specimens, as they can with very little help. Explain in a simple way the law of evolution as suggested by the development of the embryo plant, avoiding all technical phrases. The illustrations in the text-book will be of service in this, as in the preceding lessons; but do not allow them to take the place of the specimens.

What have we learned about the organs of the young plant?

How, then, does the plant grow year after year?

What happens to the roots?

What to the stem?

Do plants ever have more than one stem?

How is it with Indian Corn?

What is this called?

Can you mention any others which have only simple stems?

When there are other stems, what are they called?
Are all branches above ground?

So here again we have, what great lesson everywhere taught in Nature?

SELECTIONS.

What a wonder is each returning year of growth!

How the flowers, the trees, and even the little blades of grass, awake after their winter's naps to a new period of active life and beauty!

Who can paint

Like Nature? Can imagination boast,

Amid its gay creation, hues like hers?—Thomson.

Suggestions to Leader.—Of course specimens can be selected ad libitum, care being taken to have them illustrate the points involved. An opportunity is offered in this, as in all the accompanying studies, for cultivating the powers of observation, and also the power of describing accurately what has been observed.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

QU'EST-CE QUE LE DARWINISME? Résumé d'une Conférence de Monsieur Leblois, 5 avril, 1881. Strasbourg: J. H. Ed. Heitz.

As early as the end of the last century, a few leading minds had begun to study the question of the origin of species. The French naturalist, Lamarck, and the German poet, Goethe, to cite but two names, solved the difficulty, both in the same way, by substituting for the theory of the creation of different species, independently one of the other, that of the descent of actual types from inferior forms, or, as we now say, that of the evolution of beings.

Here is what Lamarck says: "Systematic divisions, such as classes, orders, families, genera, and species, as well as their denominations, are a purely artificial work of man. Species are not all contemporaneous; they are descended from one another, and possess only a relative and temporary fixity. The diversity of the conditions of life has an influence on the organization, the general form, the organs of the animal, etc., which modifies them."

About the same time, Goethe wrote: "If one examines the plants and animals placed at the bottom of the scale of beings, they can scarcely be distinguished from each other. We may therefore say that beings, at first confounded in a common parentage, where it was almost impossible to separate them, have, little by little, become plants and animals, perfecting themselves in two opposite directions so that some have taken on the nature of firm, immovable trees, others, that of man, which represents the highest degree of mobility."

The authority of Cuvier has so extinguished Lamarck that that distinguished thinker is almost unknown. An heir to the ideas of Lamarck, Geoffroi Saint-Hilaire was violently attacked by Cuvier. The discussions occurred at the meetings of the Academy of Sciences the same year that the Revolution of 1830 broke out, and the last days of Goethe were brightened by the news of the support given by Geoffroi Saint-Hilaire to the theory of evolution. The very day that the German newspapers announced the Revolution of July, Goethe's friend Soret visited the poet, who was then eighty-one. "Well!" exclaimed the illustrious old man, "what do you think of this grand event? The volcano is in eruption; all is in flames; it is no longer a discussion in private." Supposing that he referred to the political event of the day, Soret said to him, "It is indeed a great event; but, with such a ministry, the expulsion of the royal family is a matter of course." "We do not understand each other," said Goethe, in reply; "I am not speaking of those people. My mind is on something very different. I am speaking of the bomb-shell which has just burst in the midst of the Academy,—the debate so important to science which has begun between Cuvier and Geoffroi Saint-Hilaire. We have in the latter a powerful ally who will not abandon us. I have noticed the interest with which the French scientific world is watching this discussion. The public has gotten hold of the question; it can no longer be kept secret, disposed of, and smothered with closed doors." Such was not the case, however, for some time thereafter. The theory of evolution had not yet been sufficiently founded in fact.

At the moment of Goethe's death (March 22, 1832), an English vessel, the Beagle, sailing in the Indian Ocean, had on board a young naturalist of twenty-three, who, during this voyage around the world, was collecting a quantity of facts which were destined to come to the support of the ideas of Lamarck. This young man was Charles Darwin. During this tour, Darwin, a perspicacious and conscientious observer, was struck with the numerous varieties, the changes in form and character, presented often by one species of animal or vegetable, according to the zone or the climate in which it lives. Returned to England, the young scientist was led to make a comparison between the natural facts which he had observed and the transformations which English gardeners and breeders produce artificially in plants and animals.

In these words, M. Louis Leblois, minister of the Church of the Temple-Neuf at Strasburg, traces briefly but clearly the historical growth of Darwinism, in the excellent little pamphlet whose title is placed at the head of this column. A few citations are added to show the spirit in which M. Leblois treats this question which has so sorely troubled the Church.

Speaking of the repugnance which the Orthodox always profess to the scientific explanation of the origin of man, M. Leblois says: "According to the second chapter of Genesis, man was formed from the 'dust of the earth,' and nobody that we know of has been shocked at this rather mean origin." Referring to the Biblical doctrine that Adam and Eve are the father and mother of the race, he says: "We need not dwell upon the fact that there exist white men, black men, red men, yellow men, etc.; that some have straight hair, others woolly hair, and that, if all descended in a direct line from Adam and Eve, it is difficult to imagine what colored skin and what kind of hair these first ancestors of the human race had." Commenting on the theory of Cuvier, who, in the words of Victor Hugo, may be said to have had "one eye on Genesis and the other on nature, endeavoring to please Orthodoxy by making fossils agree with Scripture and by flattering Moses with the mastodons," M. Leblois says: "It is contrary to good sense, which cannot accept a God performing the task of Penelope, by amusing himself with the production of one series of beings in order to destroy them and then proceed to the 'creation' of new ones. It is not less contradictory to the Bible than to the facts of geology itself." The author quotes with approval this witty sentence from Carl Vogt's scholarly Lessons on Man, "Our friends will doubtless admit, with one of their comrades, that it is better to be a perfect monkey than a degenerated Adam." THEODORE STANTON.

THE Popular Science Monthly for August contains a portrait of Robert Wilhelm Bunsen which it is a pleasure to look upon: there is also a sketch of Bunsen. The first article in the number is a lecture on the Herring by Prof. Huxley, delivered at the National Fishery Exhibition, Norwich, Eng., this year. Insignificant as the theme might appear to a novice, under the distinguished author's treatment it is compact with information. Dr. Oswald continues his excellent papers on "Physical Education." His subject this time is "Recreation." An illustrated article by Herman L. Fairchild on "The Blood and its Circulation" is of special interest. "The Teachings of Modern Spectroscopy" gives an account of the application of this remarkable instrument to physics, and particularly molecular combinations. Theodore Wehle has a brief summary of the "Origin and History of Life Insurance," which also explains in a succinct manner the principles of this mode of providing against the chances of life. Dr. Dyce Duckworth, under the title of "The Insufficient Use of Milk," puts in a strong plea for a greater use of this liquid as an article of food. "The Intelligence of Ants" is discussed by George J. Romanes. The other articles of the number are "Lunar Lore and Portraiture," by F. E. Fryatt; "The Visions of Sane Persons," by Francis Galton, F.R.S.; "School Room Ventilation," by Dr. P. J. Higgins; "Origin and Uses of Asphalt," by Leon Malo, C.E.; "The Unit in Plant Life," by Byron D. Halstead, Sc.L.; "The Electric Storage of Energy."

THE Art Amateur for the current month has among its articles of general interest in the art world a brief sketch of Corot, and a collection of anecdotes of print-collecting and collectors. Greta's Boston letter considers the recent pedantic report and pedagogic tendencies of the permanent committee in charge of the school of drawing and painting at the Museum of Fine Arts, with an incisive sarcasm. The several departments of the magazine devoted to practical matters are well filled with instructive matter.

WIDE-AWAKE for August is a number of unusual excellence. There are a few short sketches that will be found of very absorbing interest. Of these may be mentioned "A Night with Paul Boyton," which recounts a night experience of a companion swimmer of the daring adventurer, and "A Boy's Race with General Grant at Ephesus," which is of a striking character. Some of the poems are by distinguished writers, as is much of the other matter, and with their numerous and finely conceived and executed illustrations fit in admirably with the general and varied contents of the number.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

KING KALAKUA has a son and daughter at college in Naples.

It is stated that Mr. Froude, the historian, is to be made a peer.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT was among the callers at the Index office last week. His interest in all the reforms of the day is unabated.

MR. EMERSON is described as looking full of a sweet serenity, a beautiful calm: he does not look broken, though his tall figure is slightly bent.

MRS. HOWE's lecture on "The Result of Kant" at the Concord School, Friday night, was largely attended and, as an intellectual effort, is spoken of in high terms.

MR. GLADSTONE's clothes never fit him. His butterfly suit hangs on him like a sack. His claw-hammer coat is said to fit around his shoulders like a horse-collar.—Springfield Republican.

THE bride of Lord Campbell is the youngest daughter of Edmond Blood, of County Clare, Ireland, and not a "Blood" of the unsavory Woodhull type, as stated by some American papers.

CONKLING remarked in his famous letter of resignation that he was "ready to bow" to the decision of the Legislature. We presume he is in the same frame of mind now. What the public is waiting for is the bow. —New York Sun.

RENAN intends writing a history of the Jews up to the second exile, and is about to visit Palestine as a part of his preparation for this work. He will pronounce the eulogy on the late M. Littré before the French Academy.

MOODY has commenced a series of religious meetings at Northfield, Mass., "assisted by a large number of Biblical scholars." Moody's way of making converts seems to be more effective than the methods of thinkers and scholars.

BISHOP HAYES, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died at Portland, Oregon, the 4th inst., sixty years old. He was a man of acknowledged scholarship, kind disposition, and earnest convictions, and had great influence with his denomination.

BOSTON counted among her honored guests last week Augusta Evans, the most famous fiction writer of the Southern States, author of St. Elmo, Beulah, etc., and the Quaker poet, John G. Whittier, whose humanitarian muse has made every New England heart proud of him, and endeared him to all true, loving hearts everywhere.

SECRETARY BLAINE deserves a good word. His bulletins stating the condition of the President were all in excellent taste. As a public man, Mr. Blaine has been accused of an over-fondness for making points; but his communications to foreign governments, respecting the condition of Mr. Garfield, show a keen sense of the fitness of things and words.

REFERRING to Darwin, St. George Mivart says: "It would be difficult to name another living laborer in the field of physical science who has excited an interest so wide-spread, and given rise to so much praise, gathering around him, as he has done, a chorus of more or less completely acquiescing disciples, themselves masters in science, and each the representative of a crowd of enthusiastic followers."

A CHICAGO correspondent of The Presbyterian, who is very much annoyed by Sunday theatres "and the cries of newsboys that on that day vex the ears of persons in their homes or on their way to church," says the committee appointed to present charges of heresy against Rev. Dr. Thomas has done its work, although it will not be made known immediately. He adds: "That committee deserves a vacation. It must be a fearful job to wade through all the egotistical and heretical vagaries of Dr. Thomas." On the contrary, we think a committee, composed of men accustomed to read average sermons and general theological literature, must have found the writings of Dr. Thomas very interesting and instructive reading.

FOREIGN.

MR. PARNELL and the leaders of the national movement in Ireland pronounce themselves in opposition to skirmishing and dynamite methods.

A BANQUET was given to the British ministers on the 6th. Gladstone, replying to a toast, spoke hopefully of the land bill, and praised the loyalty of the Boers.

THE affectionate subjects of Alexander III. witnessed his departure on a summer-trip, preceded by a body of police four hundred strong, over a home road of four hundred miles, bordered with "a double line of troops armed to the teeth." Blessed ruler of a happy domain!

THE conservative organs of Spain oppose the royal decision respecting the readmission of Jews and provisional intentions for securing their liberty of worship. They think it very inconsistent to receive again sixty thousand, when one hundred and sixty thousand at least were expelled by their ancestors under Ferdinand and Isabella.

BISMARCK is represented as seeking amicable relations with the Catholic Church: "Cardinal Hergenröther is about to visit Würzburg, and it is believed he will arrange an interview with Prince Bismarck on the church question. Prince Bismarck needs the support of the clericals in the Reichstag, and desires to be reconciled with the Pope."

REGRETS from the government of Spain have been sent to Italy concerning the disturbance during the removal of Pius IX.'s remains. The Archbishop of Paris also sent condolence to the Pope on the same subject. The Primate of Spain, Archbishop of Toledo, has used strong means to persuade all whom he can influence to work for the restoration of the independence and temporal power of the Pope. Upon the protest, however, of the Italian minister at Madrid, the Spanish cabinet rebuked the ardor of the Primate.

THE London Daily News says: "Mr. Bradlaugh's own imprudence cannot alter the facts that he has been treated with the grossest injustice, and that he represents a principle of the highest political importance. A ministerial statement on the subject is expected before the close of the session. We are informed Mr. Bradlaugh will take no farther steps pending the hearing upon the summons." Bradlaugh addressed a meeting of fifteen thousand people at Northampton last Saturday, and expressed his determination to win. The speech was received with great cheering.

A SECULAR Conference was held at Leicester, England, last Sunday. The Marquis of Queensberry was announced to read a paper. George Jacob Holyoake writes in the Secular Review: "Doubtless, many members of the British Secular Union would be pleased to meet the Marquis of Queensberry, and would listen with very great pleasure to whatever he might think useful to address to the Conference, and would be gratified by his taking part in it. His treatment by the Scottish peers has been similar to that experienced by the junior member for Northampton; and on this ground he will be regarded with sympathy, not merely by secularists, but by all liberal politicians who hold that the right of political service should be regulated by fitness to discharge political duties, and not made dependent on any personal or speculative opinions a member of parliament or peer may hold."

JESTINGS.

GOING to the School of Philosophy? Kant.

MR. STEPMAN poetically asks, "Where broods the Absolute?" We give it up. Propound an easier one.

THE army-worm got as far as Boston, when a miss with eye-glasses called it by its real name. It immediately laid down and died.

THE latest languidly fashionable æsthetic folly is the blowing of soap bubbles from decorated pipes. It is a very precious utter pastime.

A PHILOSOPHER explains the Concord School on the ground that "when the Soul of Man is-es, the Mind thinks thinging Things." Guess he's about right.

PRESIDENT BARNARD, of Columbia College, suggests that girls be admitted to the collegiate halls on the same footing as boys. The name of Columbia College should therefore be altered to "All Soles," after the college of that name at Oxford.

THE New York Commercial Advertiser says, "The Concord philosophers were thrown into an intellectual heap, a day or two since, by a worldly young man who invited them to come over to his house and take a Plato (plate o'?) soup with him."

A PHILADELPHIA scientist was given an honorary degree by a certain college, and was at first much pleased; but, since looking over the list of others who had received the same degree from the same college, he is inclined to sue the institution for libel.

LESSONS

For Liberal Sunday Schools or for Home Use.

I. THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

A series of Twenty Lessons by Mr. LEWIS G. JAMES, of Brooklyn. Written entirely from the Rationalistic stand-point. Prepared originally for use in Mr. Chadwick's Sunday School. Each lesson printed in a separate slip. Twenty-five cents for the series, including postage.

II. FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP, AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION. A series of Five very suggestive Lessons, by Mrs. KATE GANNETT WELLS. Each lesson contains enough material for several exercises. Seven cents for the series, in separate sheets, including postage.

III. THE WORLD WE LIVE IN. A Series of Elementary Lessons in Natural History, by Mr. FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. Adapted both to interest and profit a class of children. To be completed this autumn. One cent each lesson, exclusive of postage, at present.

Supplied by FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont place, Boston.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

SELECTIONS.

What a wonder is each returning year of growth!

How the flowers, the trees, and even the little blades of grass, awake after their winter's naps to a new period of active life and beauty!

Who can paint

Like Nature? Can imagination boast,

Amid its gay creation, hues like hers?—Thomson.

What a reserve of power lies in the scale-clad buds on oak and apple-tree!—Parker.

What gnarled stretch, what depth of shade, is his! There needs no crown to mark the forest's king.

—Lowell.

This perpetual renewal of vegetation, this annual wonder of blossoming,—what a revelation it offers to us! How it fills us with admiration, trust, and love!—Parker.

Suggestions to Leader.—Of course specimens can be selected ad libitum, care being taken to have them illustrate the points involved. An opportunity is offered in this, as in all the accompanying studies, for cultivating the powers of observation, and also the power of describing accurately what has been observed.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

QU'EST-CE QUE LE DARWINISME? Résumé d'une Conférence de Monsieur Leblois, 5 avril, 1881. Strasbourg: J. H. Ed. Heitz.

As early as the end of the last century, a few leading minds had begun to study the question of the origin of species. The French naturalist, Lamarck, and the German poet, Goethe, to cite but two names, solved the difficulty, both in the same way, by substituting for the theory of the creation of different species, independently one of the other, that of the descent of actual types from inferior forms, or, as we now say, that of the evolution of beings.

Here is what Lamarck says: "Systematic divisions, such as classes, orders, families, genera, and species, as well as their denominations, are a purely artificial work of man. Species are not all contemporaneous; they are descended from one another, and possess only a relative and temporary fixity. The diversity of the conditions of life has an influence on the organ-

About the same time, Goethe wrote: "If one examines the plants and animals placed at the bottom of the scale of beings, they can scarcely be distinguished from each other. We may therefore say that beings, at first confounded in a common parentage, where it was almost impossible to separate them, have, little by little, become plants and animals, perfecting themselves in two opposite directions so that some have taken on the nature of firm, immovable trees, others, that of man, which represents the highest degree of mobility."

The authority of Cuvier has so extinguished Lamarck that that distinguished thinker is almost unknown. An heir to the ideas of Lamarck, Geoffroi Saint-Hilaire was violently attacked by Cuvier. The discussions occurred at the meetings of the Academy of Sciences the same year that the Revolution of 1830 broke out, and the last days of Goethe were brightened by the news of the support given by Geoffroi Saint-Hilaire to the theory of evolution. The very day that the German newspapers announced the Revolution of July, Goethe's friend Soret visited the poet, who was then eighty-one. "Well!" exclaimed the illustrious old man, "what do you think of this grand event? The volcano is in eruption; all is in flames; it is no longer a discussion in private." Supposing that he referred to the political event of the day, Soret said to him, "It is indeed a great event; but, with such a ministry, the expulsion of the royal family is a matter of course." "We do not understand each other," said Goethe, in reply; "I am not speaking of those people. My mind is on something very different. I am speaking of the bomb-shell which has just burst in the midst of the Academy,—the debate so important to science which has begun between Cuvier and Geoffroi Saint-Hilaire. We have in the latter a powerful ally who will not abandon us. I have noticed the interest with which the French scientific world is watching this discussion. The public has gotten hold of the question; it can no longer be kept secret, disposed of, and smothered with closed doors." Such was not the case, however, for some time thereafter. The theory of evolution had not yet been sufficiently founded in fact.

At the moment of Goethe's death (March 22, 1832), an English vessel, the Beagle, sailing in the Indian Ocean, had on board a young naturalist of twenty-three, who, during this voyage around the world, was collecting a quantity of facts which were destined to come to the support of the ideas of Lamarck. This young man was Charles Darwin. During this tour, Darwin, a perspicacious and conscientious observer, was struck with the numerous varieties, the changes in form and character, presented often by one species of animal or vegetable, according to the zone or the climate in which it lives. Returned to England, the young scientist was led to make a comparison between the natural facts which he had observed and the transformations which English gardeners and breeders produce artificially in plants and animals.

In these words, M. Louis Leblois, minister of the Church of the Temple-Neuf at Strasburg, traces briefly but clearly the historical growth of Darwinism, in the excellent little pamphlet whose title is placed at the head of this column. A few citations are added to show the spirit in which M. Leblois treats this question which has so sorely troubled the Church.

Speaking of the repugnance which the Orthodox always profess to the scientific explanation of the origin of man, M. Leblois says: "According to the second chapter of Genesis, man was formed from the 'dust of the earth,' and nobody that we know of has been shocked at this rather mean origin." Referring to the Biblical doctrine that Adam and Eve are the father and mother of the race, he says: "We need not dwell upon the fact that there exist white men, black men, red men, yellow men, etc.; that some have straight hair, others woolly hair, and that, if all descended in a direct line from Adam and Eve, it is difficult to imagine what colored skin and what kind of hair these first ancestors of the human race had." Commenting on the theory of Cuvier, who, in the words of Victor Hugo, may be said to have had "one eye on Genesis and the other on nature, endeavoring to please Orthodoxy by making fossils agree with Scripture and by flattering Moses with the mastodons," M. Leblois says: "It is contrary to good sense, which cannot accept a God performing the task of Penelope, by amusing himself with the production of one series of beings in order to destroy them and then proceed to the 'creation' of new ones. It is not less contradictory to the Bible than to the facts of geology itself." The author quotes with approval this witty sentence from Carl Vogt's scholarly Lessons on Man, "Our friends will doubtless admit, with one of their comrades, that it is better to be a perfect monkey than a degenerated Adam." THEODORE STANTON.

THE Popular Science Monthly for August contains a portrait of Robert Wilhelm Bunsen which it is a pleasure to look upon: there is also a sketch of Bunsen. The first article in the number is a lecture on the Herring by Prof. Huxley, delivered at the National Fishery Exhibition, Norwich, Eng., this year. Insignificant as the theme might appear to a novice, under the distinguished author's treatment it is compact with information. Dr. Oswald continues his excellent papers on "Physical Education." His subject this time is "Recreation." An illustrated article by Herman L. Fairchild on "The Blood and its Circulation" is of special interest. "The Teachings of Modern Spectroscopy" gives an account of the application of this remarkable instrument to physics, and particularly molecular combinations. Theodore Wehle has a brief summary of the "Origin and History of Life Insurance," which also explains in a succinct manner the principles of this mode of providing against the chances of life. Dr. Dyce Duckworth, under the title of "The Insufficient Use of Milk," puts in a strong plea for a greater use of this liquid as an article of food. "The Intelligence of Ants" is discussed by George J. Romanes. The other articles of the number are "Lunar Lore and Portraiture," by F. E. Fryatt; "The Visions of Sane Persons," by Francis Galton, F.R.S.; "School Room Ventilation," by Dr. P. J. Higgins; "Origin and Uses of Asphalt," by Leon Malo, C.E.; "The Unit in Plant Life," by Byron D. Halstead, Sc.L.; "The Electric Storage of Energy."

THE Art Amateur for the current month has among its articles of general interest in the art world a brief sketch of Corot, and a collection of anecdotes of print-collecting and collectors. Greta's Boston letter considers the recent pedantic report and pedagogic tendencies of the permanent committee in charge of the school of drawing and painting at the Museum of Fine Arts, with an incisive sarcasm. The several departments of the magazine devoted to practical matters are well filled with instructive matter.

WIDE-AWAKE for August is a number of unusual excellence. There are a few short sketches that will be found of very absorbing interest. Of these may be mentioned "A Night with Paul Boyton," which recounts a night experience of a companion swimmer of the daring adventurer, and "A Boy's Race with General Grant at Ephesus," which is of a striking character. Some of the poems are by distinguished writers, as is much of the other matter, and with their numerous and finely conceived and executed illustrations fit in admirably with the general and varied contents of the number.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

KING KALAKUA has a son and daughter at college in Naples.

It is stated that Mr. Froude, the historian, is to be made a peer.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT was among the callers at the Index office last week. His interest in all the reforms of the day is unabated.

MR. EMERSON is described as looking full of a sweet serenity, a beautiful calm; he does not look broken, though his tall figure is slightly bent.

MRS. HOWE's lecture on "The Result of Kant" at the Concord School, Friday night, was largely attended and, as an intellectual effort, is spoken of in high terms.

MR. GLADSTONE's clothes never fit him. His butterfly suit hangs on him like a sack. His claw-hammer coat is said to fit around his shoulders like a horse-collar.—Springfield Republican.

THE bride of Lord Campbell is the youngest daughter of Edmund Blood, of County Clare, Ireland, and not a "Blood" of the unsavory Woodhull type, as stated by some American papers.

CONKLING remarked in his famous letter of resignation that he was "ready to bow" to the decision of the Legislature. We presume he is in the same frame of mind now. What the public is waiting for is the bow. —New York Sun.

RENAN intends writing a history of the Jews up to the second exile, and is about to visit Palestine as a part of his preparation for this work. He will pronounce the eulogy on the late M. Littré before the French Academy.

MOODY has commenced a series of religious meetings at Northfield, Mass., "assisted by a large number of Biblical scholars." Moody's way of making converts seems to be more effective than the methods of thinkers and scholars.

BISHOP HAVEN, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died at Portland, Oregon, the 4th inst., sixty years old. He was a man of acknowledged scholarship, kind disposition, and earnest convictions, and had great influence with his denomination.

BOSTON counted among her honored guests last week Augusta Evans, the most famous fiction writer of the Southern States, author of St. Elmo, Beulah, etc., and the Quaker poet, John G. Whittier, whose humanitarian muse has made every New England heart proud of him, and endeared him to all true, loving hearts everywhere.

SECRETARY BLAINE deserves a good word. His bulletins stating the condition of the President were all in excellent taste. As a public man, Mr. Blaine has been accused of an over-fondness for making points; but his communications to foreign governments, respecting the condition of Mr. Garfield, show a keen sense of the fitness of things and words.

REFERRING to Darwin, St. George Mivart says: "It would be difficult to name another living laborer in the field of physical science who has excited an interest so wide-spread, and given rise to so much praise, gathering around him, as he has done, a chorus of more or less completely acquiescing disciples, themselves masters in science, and each the representative of a crowd of enthusiastic followers."

A CHICAGO correspondent of The Presbyterian, who is very much annoyed by Sunday theatres "and the cries of newsboys that on that day vex the ears of persons in their homes or on their way to church," says the committee appointed to present charges of heresy against Rev. Dr. Thomas has done its work, although it will not be made known immediately. He adds: "That committee deserves a vacation. It must be a fearful job to wade through all the egotistical and heretical vagaries of Dr. Thomas." On the contrary, we think a committee, composed of men accustomed to read average sermons and general theological literature, must have found the writings of Dr. Thomas very interesting and instructive reading.

FOREIGN.

MR. PARNELL and the leaders of the national movement in Ireland pronounce themselves in opposition to skirmishing and dynamite methods.

A BANQUET was given to the British ministers on the 6th. Gladstone, replying to a toast, spoke hopefully of the land bill, and praised the loyalty of the Boers.

THE affectionate subjects of Alexander III. witnessed his departure on a summer-trip, preceded by a body of police four hundred strong, over a home road of four hundred miles, bordered with "a double line of troops armed to the teeth." Blessed ruler of a happy domain!

THE conservative organs of Spain oppose the royal decision respecting the readmission of Jews and provisional intentions for securing their liberty of worship. They think it very inconsistent to receive again sixty thousand, when one hundred and sixty thousand at least were expelled by their ancestors under Ferdinand and Isabella.

BISMARCK is represented as seeking amicable relations with the Catholic Church: "Cardinal Hergenrother is about to visit Würzburg, and it is believed he will arrange an interview with Prince Bismarck on the church question. Prince Bismarck needs the support of the clericals in the Reichstag, and desires to be reconciled with the Pope."

REGRETS from the government of Spain have been sent to Italy concerning the disturbance during the removal of Pius IX.'s remains. The Archbishop of Paris also sent condolence to the Pope on the same subject. The Primate of Spain, Archbishop of Toledo, has used strong means to persuade all whom he can influence to work for the restoration of the independence and temporal power of the Pope. Upon the protest, however, of the Italian minister at Madrid, the Spanish cabinet rebuked the ardor of the Primate.

THE London Daily News says: "Mr. Bradlaugh's own imprudence cannot alter the facts that he has been treated with the grossest injustice, and that he represents a principle of the highest political importance. A ministerial statement on the subject is expected before the close of the session. We are informed Mr. Bradlaugh will take no farther steps pending the hearing upon the summons." Bradlaugh addressed a meeting of fifteen thousand people at Northampton last Saturday, and expressed his determination to win. The speech was received with great cheering.

A SECULAR Conference was held at Leicester, England, last Sunday. The Marquis of Queensberry was announced to read a paper. George Jacob Holyoake writes in the Secular Review: "Doubtless, many members of the British Secular Union would be pleased to meet the Marquis of Queensberry, and would listen with very great pleasure to whatever he might think useful to address to the Conference, and would be gratified by his taking part in it. His treatment by the Scottish peers has been similar to that experienced by the junior member for Northampton; and on this ground he will be regarded with sympathy, not merely by secularists, but by all liberal politicians who hold that the right of political service should be regulated by fitness to discharge political duties, and not made dependent on any personal or speculative opinions a member of parliament or peer may hold."

JESTINGS.

GOING to the School of Philosophy? Kant.

MR. STEDMAN poetically asks, "Where broods the Absolute?" We give it up. Propound an easier one.

THE army-worm got as far as Boston, when a miss with eye-glasses called it by its real name. It immediately laid down and died.

THE latest languidly fashionable æsthetic folly is the blowing of soap bubbles from decorated pipes. It is a very preciously utter pastime.

A PHILOSOPHER explains the Concord School on the ground that "when the Soul of Man is-es, the Mind thinks thinging Things." Guess he's about right.

PRESIDENT BARNARD, of Columbia College, suggests that girls be admitted to the collegiate halls on the same footing as boys. The name of Columbia College should therefore be altered to "All Soles," after the college of that name at Oxford.

THE New York Commercial Advertiser says, "The Concord philosophers were thrown into an intellectual heap, a day or two since, by a worldly young man who invited them to come over to his house and take a Plato (plate o'?) soup with him."

A PHILADELPHIA scientist was given an honorary degree by a certain college, and was at first much pleased; but, since looking over the list of others who had received the same degree from the same college, he is inclined to sue the institution for libel.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Religion Real Christianity? Two Essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

Nor only the individual experience slowly acquired, but the accumulated experience of the race, organized in language, condensed in instruments and axioms, and in what may be called the inherited intuitions,—these form the multiple unity which is expressed in the abstract term "experience."—G. H. Lewes.

A TRANSITION from an author's book to his common conversation is too often like an entrance into a large city after a distant prospect. Remotely, we see nothing but spires of temples and turrets of palaces, and imagine it the residence of splendor, grandeur, and magnificence; but, when we have passed the gates, we find it perplexed with narrow passages, disgraced with despicable cottages, embarrassed with obstructions, and clouded with smoke.—Dr. Samuel Johnson.

It is right that man should love those who have offended him. He will do so when he remembers that all men are his relations, and that it is through ignorance and involuntarily that they sin,—and then we all die so soon.—Marcus Aurelius.

It is part of the irony of life that the strongest feelings of devoted gratitude of which human nature seems to be susceptible are called forth in human beings toward those who, having the power entirely to crush their earthly existence, voluntarily refrain from using that power.—J. S. Mill.

The great enemy of knowledge is not error, but inertness. All that we want is discussion; and then we are sure to do well, no matter what our blunders may be. One error conflicts with another: each destroys its opponent, and truth is evolved.—H. T. Buckle.

In the world of morals as in the world of physics, strength is nearly allied to hardness.—Lecky.

"We want thee, O unfound
And sovran teacher! If thy beard be gray
Or black, we bid thee rise up from the ground
And speak the word God giveth thee to say,
Inspiring into all this people round,
Instead of passion, thought, which pioneers
All generous passion, purifies from sin."
—Mrs. Browning.

Religious bigotry is a dull fire, hot enough to roast an ox, but with no lambent luminous flame shooting up from it.—Sara Coleridge.

Men who wish to disbelieve in the existence of a personal, more or less righteous Deity, because they imagine that such an existence is the only obstacle to their finding happiness in unprincipled self-indulgence, have not even taken the first step toward embracing the doctrines of scientific 'atheism.'—Edith Simcox.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM will never be obliterated from the ideas of the unintellectual. Their God, at the best, will never be more than the gigantic shadow of a man,—a vast phantom of humanity, like one of those Alpine spectres seen in the midst of the clouds by him who turns his back to the sun.—J. W. Draper.

The future life being beyond experience, and inaccessible to reason, offers an attractive playground for the unbridled imagination.—Editor of "Science Monthly."

The Christian superstition—now at last giving way before science—of the contemptible nature of the body and its antagonism to the soul has shockingly perverted our morals as well as injured the health of Christendom.—Harriet Martineau.

CURRENT TOPICS.

UNLOOKED-FOR and alarming changes occurred in the condition of the President last Monday, and his situation is one of grave peril. The sympathy and hopes of millions are with him.

A MEETING was held at Genoa last Sunday in favor of the abolition of the law granting guarantees to the papacy. The police interfered, a tumult ensued, and arrests were made.

THE "Dean" of the Concord School of Philosophy says that "animals have descended from men." This is the latest theory evolved from the depths of the inner consciousness of this remarkable man.

THE conservative Lords, under the leadership of Lord Salisbury, are in an attitude of opposition to the House of Commons on the Irish Land Bill; but the opposition is sure to be overcome one way or another.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone announced last week that the resolutions preventing Mr. Bradlaugh taking the oath would expire with the present session, that at the next he might present himself, and meanwhile the government would "consider the matter."

LAST week, the papers contained accounts of two fox-hunts, one at Newport, the other at Martha's Vineyard. The former attracted three thousand people. Several ladies followed the hounds in the hunt. Wherein are these exhibitions more decent than the bull-fights of Spain, or the cock-fights and dog-fights with which brutal fellows amuse themselves?

THE papers state that ten thousand people gathered at Northampton last Sunday to witness the laying of the corner-stone of a new Catholic church, and the same number was present at the Lake Pleasant Spiritualistic Camp-meeting. The majority were probably attracted to both places by curiosity, desire for recreation, and other secular considerations.

On the 5th, President Grévy gave audience to Levi Morton, the new American minister, and to the retiring minister, General Noyes. In reply to General Noyes, President Grévy said: "Our two nations have a common duty to perform, and are, in a manner, charged with the protection of souls. They have a great mission; namely, to show to the world that the true guarantees of human liberty are centred in republican institutions." President Grévy concluded by expressing sympathy for General Garfield and the people of America.

THE Fair of the New England Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Institute opens in this city the 18th at 11 o'clock A.M., in the Exhibition Building, said to be the largest in the United States. The larger hall is capable of seating one hundred thousand, the smaller ten thousand people. Governor Long will open the Exhibition, and the Hon. Geo. B. Loring will deliver the oration. All the Governors of New England have promised to be present, and

New England's resources and industries will be fully represented. This Exhibition, it is thought, will be the grandest ever held in this city; and we hope to be able in some future number to give a description of its most interesting features.

AUGUST 17 was the forty-third anniversary of the release of Abner Kneeland, founder of the Boston Investigator, from Leverett Street jail, this city, where he was imprisoned two months for "blasphemy." He had said in a discussion that "the Universalists believe in a God which I do not; but I believe that their God, aside from nature, is only a chimera of their own imagination." Although he declared that he was a Pantheist, and meant only that he did not believe in the sort of God believed in by the Universalists, the court ruled that his language involved a denial of "the God of the statute"; and after three trials, the jury disagreeing on the first and second, he was convicted. Mr. Kneeland was a learned man, and all who knew him bear testimony to the uprightness and purity of his life.

THE Salvation Army, which some time ago opened a campaign against the devil and all his works, is, according to the Philadelphia Press, being rapidly disorganized. Its leaders are charged by their fellow-soldiers with misappropriating funds and with immoral conduct in general, and between the officers the greatest jealousy is said to exist. An army composed of such material and led by such officers is not likely to give much trouble to the ubiquitous Prince who has contended in battle with all sorts of foes, earthly and heavenly, and whose wonderful powers of strategy are sufficiently shown by the condition of the world to-day, if, as theology teaches, all the evil in it came from the little occurrence that took place in Eden six thousand years ago. The Salvation Army may as well disperse or surrender at once.

A QUEER dispute has arisen about the efficacy of dead men's bones. The majority of mankind are less concerned about the final disposition of their bones than they are with the effort to keep them comfortably covered with living tissue while engaged in the activities of mortal career. However, it might be well to foster an interest in the personal remains of the departed, if it could divert the quarrels that are more frequent over the worldly goods they have left behind. The proposition to convey the ashes of the beneficent founder of Pennsylvania from the European ground of his ancestry to the land of his adoption, with a view to promoting a livelier remembrance of his virtues, is met by the remark that the bones of the great French hero might as well have stayed at St. Helena as far as respect for the Napoleonic dynasty is concerned in present indications. The great moral hero of American radicalism was under no mistaken conviction in deciding that his principles would thrive just as well in his native land if his bones were suffered to remain under foreign sod.

ODIUM THEOLOGICUM.

In re Jeremiah S. Black vs. Robert G. Ingersoll.

BY T**

It is proverbial that clerical education—whether in the preparatory training of the student in polemical theology at the Seminary, or in the later development of the preacher of unchallenged homily and dogma in the pulpit—but poorly qualifies the special messenger and minister of divinity for either the critical analysis of evidence, or the logical discussion of the creed inherited or adopted. On the other hand, the training of the law—by its methods of precise definition, of critical sifting of testimony, of relevant pleading, and of rigid demarcation—is peculiarly adapted to cultivate and sharpen the faculties of comprehensive investigation and of close and cogent reasoning; attributes which we find in the clear and passionless decisions of the bench, their culmination and most honored recognition. When, therefore, it was announced that a severe impeachment of Christianity by the popular infidel Col. Robert Ingersoll would receive in the pages of the North American Review an examination and answer from a former Judge in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, an Attorney-General in the cabinet of President Buchanan in 1857, and his Secretary of State in 1860 (at the outbreak of the great slave-holders' rebellion), the Hon. J. S. Black, it was generally believed that we should enjoy an intellectual treat of solid and convincing logic, in notable contrast to the inane vituperations so familiar from the pulpit; and expectation stood on tiptoe for the promised feast of reason and the flow of argument.

Although the papers of these two champions have now been read by many thousands (a "second edition" of the number containing them being already rapidly exhausted), there are other thousands who have read only the unsatisfactory abstracts furnished by the press; and, for these, the mental and moral stature of the two contestants will be best portrayed by a few selected passages of attack and defence, in their proper juxtaposition. The reader's attention to particular passages is occasionally invoked by italics not in the original.

Judge Black says with great propriety: "We can appeal only to that rational love of justice, and that detestation of falsehood, which fair-minded persons of good intelligence bring to the consideration of other important subjects, when it becomes their duty to decide upon them. In short, I want a decision upon sound, judicial principles. . . . I will confine myself strictly to the record; that is to say, I will meet the accusations contained in this paper, and not those made elsewhere by him or others."

Col. I.—Commences his paper sententiously: "A profound change has taken place in the world of thought. The pews are trying to set themselves somewhat above the pulpit. . . . The idea is abroad that they who know most of nature believe the least about theology. The sciences are regarded as infidels, and facts as scoffers."

Judge B.—Mr. Ingersoll is not, as some have estimated him, the most formidable enemy that Christianity has encountered since the time of Julian the Apostate. But he stands at the head of living infidels, "by merit raised to that bad eminence." His mental organization has the peculiar defects which fit him for such a place. He is all imagination, and no discretion. . . . A fancy is as good as a fact, and a high-sounding period is rather better than a logical demonstration. His inordinate self-confidence makes him at once ferocious and fearless. He was a practical politician before he took the stump against Christianity, and at all times he has proved his capacity to "split the ears of the groundlings," and make the unskilful laugh. The article before us is the least objectionable of all his productions. Its style is higher, and better suited to the weight of the theme. Here the violence of his fierce invective is moderated; his scurrility gives place to an attempt at sophistry, less shocking, if not more true; and his coarse jokes are either excluded altogether, or else veiled in the decent obscurity of general terms. . . .

It will be seen that I am assuming no clerical function. I am not out on the forlorn hope of converting Mr. Ingersoll. . . . My duty is more analogous to that of the policeman who would silence a rude disturber of the congregation, by telling him that his clamor is false and his conduct an offence against public decency.

[So much for the advocate's estimate of the opposing counsel. But "policemen," from the nature of their associations, do occasionally commit some grave mistake. Judge Black was well aware that hundreds of his prospective readers had never seen or heard the utterances of his antagonist, and could only receive the words before them. Where, then, was the relevancy, or the honesty, of these intangible imputations of more "objectionable" productions, of "fierce invective," of "scurrility," of "coarse jokes excluded," and to be found—elsewhere! Did the learned judge so soon forget his "judicial" promise, "I will confine myself strictly to the record"? Or was this announcement intended as a mere Pickwickian embellishment? Did he hug himself in the fancied security of having the "last word" in this magazine allotment?]

Judge B.—The first sentence of his essay is a preposterous blunder. It is not true that "a profound change has taken place in the world of thought," unless a more rapid spread of the gospel and a more faithful observance of its moral principles can be called so. . . . Thus far at least, the promise has been kept that "the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it." [This therefore cannot be the direction of its danger]. . . .

There is another totally false notion expressed in the opening paragraph,—namely, that "they who know most of nature believe the least in theology." The truth is exactly the other way. . . . At the same time, the lamentable fact must be admitted that "a little learning is a dangerous thing" to some persons. The scientist, with a mere smattering of physical knowledge, is apt to mistake himself for a philosopher; and, swelling with his own importance, he gives out, like Simon Magus, "that himself is some great one." His vanity becomes inflamed more and more, until he begins to think he knows all things.

Col. I.—The Bible has been the fortress and defence of nearly every crime. No civilized country could reenact its laws; and, in many respects, its moral code is abhorrent to every good and tender man.

Judge B.—Mainly, principally, first, and most important of all, is the unqualified assertion that the "moral code," which Jehovah gave to his people, "is in many respects abhorrent to every good and tender man." Does Mr. Ingersoll know what he is talking about? The moral code of the Bible . . . is entirely separate and apart from the civil polity. . . . This is a distinction which every intelligent man knows how to make. Has Mr. Ingersoll fallen into the egregious blunder of confounding these things? Or, understanding the true sense of his words, is he rash and shameless enough to assert that the moral code of the Bible excites the abhorrence of good men? . . . If this vain mortal is not blind with passion, he will see upon reflection that he has attacked the Old Testament precisely where it is most impregnable.

[Does Judge Black regard the tolerated and encouraged crimes of Biblical antiquity as palliated by a dialectic distribution, or as any less "abhorrent to good and tender men" by being relegated to a civil code? Does he not know that the famous "distinction which every intelligent man knows how to make" is a modern artifice, unthought of and uncomprehended by the ancient Jews, one repugnant to the contents of every chapter in Exodus, in Leviticus, or in Deuteronomy, one which shatters the stony tablets of the vaunted decalogue itself into shapeless fragments?]

Col. I.—The believer in the inspiration of the Bible is compelled to declare that there was a time when slavery was right, when men could buy and women sell their babes. He is compelled to insist that there was a time when polygamy was the highest form of virtue, when wars of extermination were waged with the sword of mercy, when religious toleration was a crime, and when death was the just penalty for having expressed an honest thought. . . . There has been such a change in the conditions of man that, at the present time, the devil is in favor of slavery, polygamy, religious persecution, and wars of conquest. That is to say, the devil entertains the same opinion to-day that Jehovah held four thousand years ago.

Judge B.—His language is recklessly bad, very defective in method, and altogether lacking in precision. But, apart from the ribaldry of it, which I do not feel myself bound to notice, I find four objections to the Jewish constitution (not more than four) which are definite enough to admit of an answer. These relate to the provisions of the Mosaic law on the subjects of (1) Blasphemy and Idolatry, (2) War, (3) Slavery, (4) Polygamy. In these respects, he pronounces the Jewish system not only unwise, but criminally unjust. . . . But through the whole of this cloudy paper there runs a vein of presumptuous egoism, which says, as plainly as words can speak it, that the author holds himself to be the ultimate judge of all good and evil; what he approves is right, and what he dislikes is certainly wrong. Of course, I concede nothing to a claim like that. I will not admit that the Jewish constitution is a thing to be condemned merely because he curses it.

Col. I.—Most nations at the time the Old Testament was written believed in slavery, polygamy, wars of extermination, and religious persecution; and it is not wonderful that the book contained nothing contrary to such a belief. The fact that it was in exact accord with the morality of its time proves that it was not the product of any being superior to man. "The inspired writers" upheld or established slavery, countenanced polygamy, commanded wars of extermination, and ordered the slaughter of women and babes. In these respects, they were precisely like the uninspired savages by whom they were surrounded. They also taught and commanded religious persecution as a duty, and visited the most trivial offences with the punishment of death. . . . Will any one claim that the passages upholding slavery have liberated mankind; or that religious liberty found its soil, its light, and rain in the infamous verse wherein the husband is commanded to stone to death the wife, for worshipping an unknown God? . . . Every civilized man believes in the liberty of thought. Is it possible that God is intolerant? Is an act infamous in man one of the virtues of the Deity?

Judge B.—First: He regards the punishments inflicted for blasphemy and idolatry as being immoderately cruel. Considering them merely as religious offences, as sins against God alone, I agree that civil laws should notice them not at all. But sometimes they affect very injuriously certain social rights which it is the duty of the State to protect. To utter blasphemy or obscenity in the presence of a Christian woman is hardly better than to strike her in the face. . . . [Why this sophistical conjunction of blasphemy and obscenity? Is it parcel of the ethical system which would associate vulgar profanity with murder or light-hearted "Sabbath-breaking" with adultery?]

Under the Jewish Theocracy where God was the personal head of the State,—there blasphemy was a breach of political allegiance, idolatry was an overt act of treason, to worship the gods of the hostile heathen was deserting to the public enemy, and giving him aid and comfort. These are crimes which every independent community has always punished with the utmost rigor. [Proving that the Jewish Theocracy had no higher sanction or defence than any other "independent community." In our own very recent history, they were repressed [to wit, blasphemy and "copper-headism"] at the cost of more lives than Judea ever contained at any one time! Mr. Ingersoll . . . professes to believe that all kinds of worship are equally meritorious, and should meet the same acceptance from the true God. It is almost incredible that such drivel as this should be uttered by anybody.

Col. I.—"I, Jehovah thy God, am a jealous God!" Contrast this with the words put by the Hindu in the mouth of Brahma: "I am the same to all mankind. They who honestly serve other gods involuntarily worship me. I am he who partaketh of all worship, and I am the reward of all worshippers." Compare these passages. The first, a dungeon where crawl the things begot of jealous slime; the other, great as the domed firmament inlaid with suns.

["Blasphemy" (which is but one of the inventions of religious intolerance), as "an offence against God," can, in the eye of reason, have no existence. It is everywhere and always the creation of man's evil passions; the badge and banner of malign resentment against those who will not accept, or who will dare to repudiate, the grotesque conceptions of the propagandist. The bigot and the hierophant rest never contented with the empty maledictions of a creed. Their self-appointed mission is ever to vindicate by carnal penalties the slighted dignity of their teraphim and shekinah. If there were such "an offence against God," to whom would the offence be better chargeable,—To those who invest their eidolon with anger and jealousy and revenge, with remorseless cruelty, consuming vanity, and insatiable lust of despotism, with all the conscious egotism and fierce vindictiveness of barbaric prophets, who, in olden times, projecting their own Brokenspectre of the Oriental Bashaw upon the heavens, imagined races of countless serfs, for their "chief end" especially created "to glorify Him forever," or to those who with indignant protest and invective deny their authority and impugn their fabrications? Is "blasphemy" to be charged on the mild atheist, who, confessing his agnosticism, questions the evidence of Deity? Were those Ephesian disciples who frankly avowed to Paul, "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost" (Acts xix., 2), then guilty of unpardonable crime? (Mark iii., 29.)

Col. I.—In all civilized countries, it is not only admitted, but it is passionately asserted, that slavery is and always was a hideous crime, that a war of conquest is simply murder, . . . that nothing is more infamous than the slaughter of decrepit men, of helpless women, and of prattling babes, that captured maidens should not be given to soldiers, that wives should not be stoned to death on account of their religious opinions, and that the death penalty ought not to be inflicted for a violation of the Sabbath. . . . To every one (except the theologian), it is perfectly easy to account for the mistakes, atrocities, and crimes of the past, by saying that civilization is a slow and painful growth, that the moral perceptions are cultivated through ages of tyranny, of want, of crime, and of heroism, that conscience is born of suffering, that mercy is the child of the imagination, of the power to put one's self in the sufferer's place. . . . Theologians have exhausted their ingenuity in finding excuses for God. It seems to me that they would be better employed in finding excuses for men. . . . When the whole question is thoroughly examined, the world will find that Jehovah had the prejudices, the hatreds, and superstitions of his day.

Judge B.—Second: Under the constitution which God provided for the Jews, they had, like every other nation, the war-making power. The right to exist implied the right to repel, with all their strength, the opposing force which threatened their destruction. . . . In your treatment of hostile barbarians, you not only may lawfully, but must necessarily, adopt their mode of warfare! . . . This sufficiently answers the silly talk of atheists and semi-atheists about the warlike wickedness of the Jews. But Mr. Ingersoll positively, and with the emphasis of supreme and all-sufficient authority, declares that "a war of conquest is simply murder." He sustains this proposition by no argument founded in principle. [If the respondent finds no such "principle" within his own bosom, an argument ab extra will scarcely prove to him convincing.] . . . It is only necessary to recollect that Mr. Ingersoll is himself a warrior who stayed not behind the mighty men of his tribe when they gathered themselves together for a war of conquest. [.] . . . But it is certain that his refined and tender soul took great pleasure in the terror, conflagration, blood, and tears with which the war was attended, and in all the hard oppressions which the conquered people were made to suffer afterward. [.] . . . If his own conduct (for which he professes neither penitence nor shame) was right, it was right on grounds which make it an inexcusable outrage to call the children of Israel savage criminals, for carrying on wars of aggression to save the life of their government.

[It is certainly difficult to enter into the conceptions from which this wonderful historical parallel was constructed; or to unfold the principles on which the apologist of treason can thus boldly stigmatize as "a war of conquest" the tardy and reluctant arming by our citizens, in defence of nationality, liberty, and independence ("to save the life of their government"), against the aggressive onslaught of a slave-spreading oligarchy, banded by the only motive of patriarchal domination; and in the same breath can justify the wholly unprovoked "aggressive wars" of the chosen people upon peaceful and unoffending states, instigated by the controlling impulse of rapacity,—"to possess their land" (Numbers xxi., 24, 32, 35; xxxi., 17, 18; Deuteronomy iii., 6, 7, 8; Judges xviii., 7, 9; xxi., 11, 12, 21),—and prosecuted with every circumstance of cruelty, brutality, and horror (Joshua viii., 23, 29; Judges i., 6; viii., 16; II. Samuel xii., 31; I. Chronicles xx., 3; II. Chronicles xxv., 12). While to characterize these bloody and barbarous "wars of aggression" by any fitting terms is held to be "an inexcusable outrage" on the other hand, a compulsory and inevitable war of pure defence ("the right to repel a threatened destruction" admitted as necessarily "implied in the right to exist") is alluded to with hinted censure, as exhibiting in the patriot soldier a gloating "pleasure in the terror, conflagration, blood, and tears" with which a wicked rebellion overspread our unhappy country. On the public utterance of such sentiments, what can be said of the moral obtuseness of an accomplice in the giant political crime of history ("for which he professes neither penitence nor shame"), excepting that "his mental organization has the peculiar defects which fit him for such a place," and for such a function?

Col. I.—In all civilized countries, it is not only admitted, but it is passionately asserted, that slavery is and always was a hideous crime. . . . But the believer in the inspiration of the Bible is compelled to declare that there was a time when slavery was right, when men could buy and women could sell their babes. . . . There has been such a change in the conditions of man that at the present time the devil is in favor of slavery. . . . We find that other nations besides the Jews had similar laws and ideas, that they believed in and practised slavery. . . . It is not claimed that they received a revelation. And yet, by a strange coincidence, they practised the same crimes, of their own motion, that the Jews did by the command of Jehovah. From this, it would seem that man can do wrong without a special revelation.

Judge B.—But Jehovah permitted his chosen people to hold the captives they took in war or purchased from the heathen as servants for life. This was slavery; and Mr. Ingersoll declares that "in all civilized countries it is not only admitted, but it is passionately asserted, that slavery is and always was a hideous crime." Therefore, he concludes that Jehovah was a criminal. This would be a non sequitur, even if the premises were true. That slavery is a crime under all circumstances and at all times is a doctrine first started by the adherents of a political faction in this country, less than forty years ago. . . . My faith and my reason both assure me that the infallible God proceeded upon good grounds when he authorized slavery in Judea. . . . There can be no question that, when a Jew took a neighboring savage for his bond-servant, incorporated him into his family, tamed him, taught him to work, and gave him a knowledge of the true God, he conferred upon him a most beneficent boon.

[This cool assumption—"taming the neighboring savage!" this poor apology for rapine and for wrong—is made in the face of the well-known fact that in civilization, in mechanic and manufacturing arts, in all the refinements of life, the Jews were far excelled by these same neighboring savages (Judges i., 19; I. Samuel xiii., 20; II. Chronicles ii., 7; and I. Kings vii., 14, 45), to say nothing of the artistic wealth of luxury in India, in Egypt, in Chaldea, in the presence of which the "chosen people" of God were rude barbarians. The advocate of slavery is consistent in his moral instincts. "His mental organization has the peculiar defects which fit him for the place." He is one of those who have been sometimes reputed as alike incapable of forgetting—and of learning.]

Col. I.—Polygamy is the enslavement of woman, the degradation of man, and the destruction of home. . . . The "inspired writers" upheld or established slavery, and countenanced polygamy. . . . Has Jehovah improved? Has infinite wisdom intellectually advanced? Will any one claim . . . that we are indebted for our modern homes to the texts that made polygamy a virtue?

Judge B.—Fourth: Polygamy is another of his objections to the Mosaic constitution. Strange to say, it is not there! It is neither commanded nor prohibited: it is only discouraged! [The barrister should be familiar with the decisions of his books. Or, if familiar, he should be careful not to suppress his own legal authorities. Has the Judge's eye never chanced upon Exodus xxi., 10; Leviticus xviii., 17, 18; Deuteronomy xxi., 11, 14, 15; and other similar passages heralded by a "Thus saith the Lord"? Has he never read the adjudged "case" of David, reported in I. Kings xv., 5, and II. Samuel v., 12, 13, xii., 8? "Only discouraged!" In what Mosaic scripture will he find it?] . . . Why, then, does he throw polygamy into the face of the religion which abhors it? Because he is nothing if not political. The Mormons believe in polygamy, and the Mormons are unpopular. . . . It is a cunning manoeuvre, this of strengthening atheism by enlisting anti-Mormon rapacity against the God of the Christians. I can only protest against the use he would make of these and other political interests. It is not argument: it is mere stump-oratory!

[The arrow seems to have been effective. In spite of protest, the modern Christian is compelled to accept this alliance with the olden believer, and to recognize the "chosen people" as the progenitors of the only true Church. The "cunning manoeuvre" of "throwing in his face" the ancient morality of his charter, and of bringing into direct comparison the venerable polygamy of "inspired" patriarchs, and the vile "unpopular" polygamy of modern Mormons (which the religion of the present day "abhors"), may seem to the apologist irreverent and may excite his ire. But by no restraining decree of injunction can the considerate student be prevented from recognizing these indisputable evidences that the world does move, that "a profound change has taken place in the world of thought," or from anticipating by a fair induction that it probably will still further "move," that farther "changes will probably continue in the world of thought." Counsel for defendant has here omitted to avail himself of an important "distinction which every intelligent man knows how to make," and has failed to note the exception, that polygamy pertains exclusively to the "civil polity, entirely separate and apart from" the immutable code of Biblical ethics, and for which the latter is not to be held responsible. To confound these opposing codes "is not argument: it is mere stump-oratory."]

Col. I.—One great objection to the New Testament is that it bases salvation upon belief.

Judge B.—This is a misrepresentation, simple and naked. No such doctrine is propounded in the Scriptures or in the creed of any Christian Church. [John iii., 15; xi., 26; Romans x., 9; Hebrews iv., 3.]

Col. I.—It was reserved for the New Testament to make known the frightful doctrine of eternal pain. It was the teacher of universal benevolence who rent the veil between time and eternity, and fixed the horrified gaze of man on the lurid gulfs of hell. Within the breast of non-resistance was coiled the worm that never dies!

Judge B.—The future of the soul is a subject on which we have very dark views. In our present state, the mind takes in no idea except what is conveyed to it through the bodily senses. . . . Speculative opinions concerning the punishment of the wicked, its nature and duration, vary with the temper and the imaginations of men. Doubtless, we are many of us in error. [This passage deserves a particular commendation, as being exceptionally mild and pertinent.]

Col. I.—A certain belief is necessary to save the soul. It is often asserted that to believe is the only safe way. If you wish to be safe, be honest. Nothing can be safer than that. No matter what his belief may be, no man, even in the hour of death, can regret having been honest. . . . The dogma of eternal punishment rests upon passages in the New Testament. This infamous belief subverts every idea of justice. A finite being can neither commit an infinite sin, nor a sin against the Infinite. A Being of infinite goodness and wisdom has no right, according to the human standard of justice, to create any being destined to suffer eternal pain.

Judge B.—"The mere failure to believe is punished in hell." I have never known any Christian man or woman to assert this. [John iii., 36; viii., 24; Mark xvi., 16; Romans xiv., 23; II. Thessalonians ii., 12.] . . . Lunatics and idiots are not in the least danger; and, for aught I know, this category may, by a stretch of God's mercy, include minds constitutionally sound, but with faculties so perverted by education, habit, or passion that they are incapable of reasoning. I sincerely hope that upon this or some other principle Mr. Ingersoll may escape the hell he talks about so much. . . .

[From what Scriptural text did the learned Judge discover that "lunatics and idiots are not in the least danger"? What hint is there within the lids of the Testament to give encouragement or suggestion for his benevolent and confident announcement? If it be true (as asserted) that "it is universally agreed that children too young to understand it do not need to believe it," such universal agreement certainly did not exist among Christian believers two hundred years ago. If, then, we may fondly accept the expounder's testimony to this ameliorated sentiment, it happily affords us one more proof that the creed of Christendom to-day is better than its standard, that the so-called "All-merciful" is surpassed in mercy by his worshippers, that the Church is (very slowly) growing ripe for a new revelation, and a third "Testament" of Jehovah's will.]

The bad classes of society always hated the doctrine and discipline which reproached their wickedness, and frightened them by threats of punishment in another world. Aforetime, they showed their contempt of divine authority only by their actions; but now, under new leadership, their enmity against God breaks out into articulate blasphemy.

Col. I.—According to the prevailing Christian belief, the Christian religion rests upon the doctrine of the atonement. . . . We are told that the first man committed a crime for which all his posterity are responsible; in other words, that we are all accountable, and can be justly punished for a sin we never in fact committed. This absurdity was the father of another, namely, that a man can be rewarded for a good action done by another. . . . Under these circumstances, God, by allowing the innocent to suffer, satisfactorily settled with the law, and allowed a few of the guilty to escape. . . . It seems to me that the doctrine of the "atonement" is absurd, unjust, and immoral. Can a law be satisfied by the execution of the wrong person? . . .

If the Jews had been a civilized people when Christ appeared, a people whose hearts had not been hardened by the laws and teachings of "Jehovah," they would not have crucified him; and, as a consequence, the world would have been lost. If, when Christ was on his way to Cavalry, some brave, heroic soul had rescued him from the holy mob, he would not only have been eternally damned for his pains, but would have rendered impossible the salvation of any human being.

Judge B.—The plan of salvation, or any plan for the rescue of sinners from the legal operation of divine justice, could have been framed only in the councils of the Omniscient. Necessarily, its heights and depths are not easily fathomed by finite intelligence. . . . Nevertheless, here is a rash and superficial man,—without training or habits of reflection,—who upon a mere glance declares that it must be abandoned because it seems to him "absurd, unjust, and immoral." I would not abridge his freedom of thought or speech; and the argumentum ad verecundiam would be lost upon him. Otherwise, I might suggest that when he finds all authority, human and divine, against him, he had better speak in a tone less arrogant.

Col. I.—Under the Mosaic dispensation there was no remission of sin except through the shedding of blood! . . . The greater the crime, the greater the sacrifice; the more blood, the greater the atonement! . . . Every priest became a butcher, and every sanctuary a slaughter-house. Nothing could be more utterly shocking to a refined and loving soul. Nothing could have been better calculated to harden the heart than this continual shedding of innocent blood. . . . The idea that God wants blood is at the bottom of the atonement, and rests upon the most fearful savagery. How can sin be transferred from men to animals? And how can the shedding of the blood of animals atone for the sins of men?

Judge B.—He is struck with horror by the sacrificial solemnities of the Jewish religion. . . . A carnivorous American, full of beef and mutton, who mourns with indignant sorrow because bulls and goats were killed in Judea three thousand years ago, has reached the climax of sentimental goodness, and should be permitted to dictate on all questions of peace and war. Let Grotius, Vattel, and Puffendorff, as well as Moses and the prophets, hide their diminished heads! [Another characteristic illustration of "the peculiar defects of his mental organization."]

Col. I.—To make innocence suffer is the greatest sin: how, then, is it possible to make the suffering of the innocent a justification for the criminal?

Judge B.—This raises a metaphysical question which it is not necessary or possible for me to discuss here.

Col. I.—Why should a man be willing to let the innocent suffer for him? . . . What would we think of a man who would allow another to die for a crime that he himself had committed? What would we think of a law that allowed the innocent to take the place of the guilty?

Judge B.—I answer that a man who by any contrivance causes his own offence to be visited upon the head of an innocent person is unspeakably depraved. But are Christians guilty of this baseness?

Col. I.—To render benefits for injuries is to ignore all distinctions between actions. He who treats his friends and enemies alike has neither love nor justice. The idea of non-resistance never occurred to a man with power to protect himself. This doctrine was the child of weakness, born when resistance was impossible. To allow a crime to be committed when you can prevent it is next to committing the crime yourself.

Judge B.—This is the whole substance of a long, rambling diatribe, as incoherent as a sick man's dream. Christianity does not forbid the necessary defence of civil society, or the proper vindication of personal rights.

Col. I.—If Christ was in fact God, he knew all the future. He knew exactly how his words would be interpreted. He knew what crimes, what horrors, what infamies, would be committed in his name. . . . And yet he died with voiceless lips. Why did he fail to speak? Why did he not tell his disciples, and through them the world, that man should not persecute, for opinion's sake, his fellow-man?

Judge B.—There is but one way to deal with this accusation, and that is to contradict it flatly. Nothing can be conceived more striking than the prohibition, not only of persecution, but of all the passions which lead or incite to it. . . . Universal philanthropy, inexhaustible charity, are inculcated in every line of the New Testament. It is plain that Mr. Ingersoll never read a chapter of it. Otherwise, he would not have ventured this palpable falsification of its doctrines. Who told him that the devilish spirit of persecution was authorized or encouraged or not forbidden by the gospel? The person, whoever it was, who imposed upon his trusting ignorance, should be given up to the just reprobation of his fellow-citizens. [Matthew x., 34, 35; Luke xii., 49, 51, 53.]

Col. I.—And yet, under the banner of "non-resistance," the Church has shed the blood of millions, and in the folds of her sacred vestments have gleamed the daggers of assassination. With her cunning hands, she wove the purple of hypocrisy, and placed the crown upon the brow of crime.

Judge B.—It is true that some persons professing Christianity have violated the fundamental principles of their faith by inflicting violent injuries and bloody wrongs upon their fellow-men. But the perpetrators of these outrages were, in fact, not Christians. . . . The discussions of theological subjects by men who believe in the fundamental doctrines of Christ are singularly free from harshness and abuse. [As I have labored diligently here to show.] Of course, I cannot speak with absolute certainty; but I believe most confidently that there is not, in all the religious polemics of this country, as much slanderous invective as can be found in any ten lines of Mr. Ingersoll's writings.

Col. I.—Take from the New Testament all passages upholding the idea that belief is necessary to salvation, that Christ was offered as an atonement for the sins of the world, that the punishment of the human soul will go on forever, that heaven is the reward of faith, and hell the penalty of honest investigation, take from it all miraculous stories, and I admit that all the good passages are true. . . . Reason must be the final arbiter. Inspired books, attested by miracles, cannot stand against a demonstrated fact. A religion that does not command the respect of the greatest minds will in a little while excite the mockery of all. . . . My position is that the cruel passages in the Old Testament are not inspired, that slavery, polygamy, wars of extermination, and religious persecution always have been, are, and forever will be, abhorred and cursed by the honest, the virtuous, and the loving, that the innocent cannot justly suffer for the guilty, and that vicarious vice and vicarious virtue are equally absurd, that eternal punishment is eternal revenge, that only the natural can happen, that miracles prove the dishonesty of the few and the credulity of the many. . . . The dogmas of the past no longer reach the level of the highest thought, nor satisfy the hunger of the heart. While dusty faiths, embalmed and sepulchred in ancient texts, remain the same, the sympathies of men enlarge.

Judge B.—"The hunger of the heart." That depends upon what kind of a heart it is. If it hungers after righteousness, it will surely be filled. . . . That was an expressive phrase which Carlyle used when he called modern infidelity "the gospel of dirt." Those who are greedy to swallow it will, doubtless, be supplied satisfactorily. . . . Mr. Ingersoll, as a zealous apostle of "the gospel of dirt," must be expected to throw a good deal of mud. But this is too much! . . . I am not merely putting one assertion against the other; for I have the advantage, which he has not, of speaking what every tolerably well-informed man knows to be true. . . . If Mr. Ingersoll thinks himself wronged or his doctrines misconstrued, let him not lay my fault at the door of the Church, or cast his censure on the clergy.

[Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur.]

The distinction drawn by the apologist in his concluding sentence is rather formal than substantial. In methods and in manner, in feeling and in spirit, in language and in logic, he has so happily imitated the tone and temper of those engaged in "exhorting the sinner to leave the seat of the scornful," and in threatening doomed, unshriven souls with formulated anathemas, that we may justly hail him

Docte sermones utriusque lingue.

The disposition and the capacity for oburgation and invective have not, however, been equally displayed. Where he has aimed at severity, he has attained only to acerbity; where he has assumed imperiousness, he has fallen into superciliousness; where he has striven at satirical flagellation, he has risen only to petulant vituperation; where he has fancied his blows most crushing, they have only bruised himself. Although we have been furnished with the moral dictum (in justification of Israelitish atrocities) that "in dealing with barbarians you may lawfully adopt their mode of warfare," and although an inviting opportunity is offered of retribution with Judge Black's favorite weapons, in a needed lesson how they may be skillfully employed, it is to be hoped that Col. Ingersoll (indisputably his master in the art of polished and effective sarcasm) will not be tempted by the theatrical "last word," in me convertite ferrum, to engage in a rejoinder. It is not called for in the interests of truth, and it tends to divert attention from the merits of the controversy to the fence of the combatants. The papers, as they stand, afford a sufficient exposition of the mental and moral attitudes of the disputants; and the elimination of the chaff from the wheat is "a distinction which every intelligent man knows how to make."

The Judge has taken for his motto the familiar gibe of Bassanio to his friend Antonio, the merchant of Venice, "His reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff"; and it may be safely said that few preachers are accustomed to so closely confine their discourses to their texts as has the Rev. Jeremiah S. Black.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

No. III.

I attended Sunday morning, the 7th, the Methodist Church at the corner of Tremont and Concord Streets. I recognized in the congregation two or three faces that were familiar to me in the days of my Methodist fellowship of twenty-five years before. It was evident, whatsoever the fact might be as to myself, that they were still not far from where I had left them. Of intellectual advancement there had probably been but little. At least, I could discover no sign of it. Apart from the marks of time upon their countenances, they wore the same look of meek and acquiescent emotional zeal and piety, peculiar to the Methodist type of physiognomy, in common with those present. But this was only what might be expected, since Methodism does not aim at or desire other results. It does not seek, intellectually, to advance its adherents, but simply to impart the assurance they are on firm and solid ground. It is an excellent religion for veal sort of people, those in whom social and affectional feeling and a kind of animal good-nature predominate over intellect. Of course, in such a definition of its class, due allowance should be made for those exceptions to the general average of all religious bodies.

I was attracted to this church this morning, because in the meagre bill of fare in the papers of the churches for the day it was announced that the preacher would be one of the Western secretaries for the National Conference of Charities, which counted for so much in his favor.

It is so natural to me to associate Methodism with large congregations that I could not but feel some surprise to see, even in vacation time, on a bright Sunday morning so few present. Although there were two clergymen in the pulpit, the entire number of those in attendance did not exceed sixty persons. There was but one in the choir, and he appeared to be at once organist and precentor. I am not sure, however, but that this is an improvement on the ordinary church custom, since all joined, with the rich and melodious voice of the leader, in the singing.

The preacher evinced Western characteristics. The manner seemed to betray something like a lack of ease and self-possession. There was little indication that he had taken lessons in vocal culture or the art of public speaking; but it was evident, as he proceeded, that he had been thinking outside of the more distinctive spheres of Methodist preaching. The sermon was in keeping with the work of charity in which he had participated during the week, and showed that he had imbibed its spirit. It aimed to show that the great distinguishing principle of Christianity is the law of love. So far as this found expression in the teachings that preceded Christ, it was limited in its application to the people or tribe of the teacher. Christ was the first who taught the principle of universal benevolence. This is the supreme thing in Christianity, and should be exalted above all doctrines and tests of its faith and fellowship. It was in this that was its indestructible vitality. The old civilizations, like that of China to-day, were stationary or had perished. One system after another of philosophy had been superseded; but Christianity survived and was penetrating the utmost parts of the earth, so that the heathen was becoming its inheritance. It need hardly be said that Free Religionists are familiar with this line of argumentation, and have broader and more critical ways of looking at the subject. It is doubtless true that there was a tendency to give a more limited application to the principle of benevolence, even when it was emphasized in their religion and teaching, among the people of antiquity than it acquired in those of Christianity. Altruism is a sentiment, as Herbert Spencer has pointed out, which begins with the clan and tribe, and then, in the course of their development, as they co-mingle and assimilate with others, expands into a more inclusive comprehensiveness. Indeed, this is the invariable and inevitable course of human nature. Christianity itself has never been able to take more than a circumscribed view, or to exemplify more than a limited application of this principle of universal benevolence, as all its history, and the narrow sectarianism into which it is still divided, show. Still more, are not hate and antipathy prominent characteristics of Christianity, as well as love; and do they not find even in the conduct and teaching of its founder a sanction? If not, whence the wars which Catholics and Protestants, orthodox and heretic, have waged so relentlessly upon each other? Nor is it fair to say that the principle of returning good for evil, of doing unto others as we would have them do unto us, or of universal benevolence, was first enunciated by Jesus or inculcated to his followers, since we know that the golden rule was taught centuries before by the great Chinese sage, Confucius, as well as by the Persian, Zoroaster; and numerous precepts of like import are found in all the Pagan religions and in the teachings of moralists and philosophers, of different ages and lands, before Jesus was born or preached in Galilee. Nevertheless, the discourse upon which we have commented was liberal and excellent in spirit from the criticism we have indicated, and worthy of all commendation. It indicated the preacher was afloat, and gradually and insensibly, doubtless, was slipping his hold on the anchorage of old faith and doctrine, and tending toward the broader view and the open sea and sailing of Free Religion.

ATTICUS.

DARWINISM.—The following from John Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy is the best condensed statement of the Darwinian theory that we have seen: "A moment's inspection will reveal the absurdity of the thoughtless remark sometimes heard from theologians and penny-aliners, that the Darwinian theory rests upon purely gratuitous assumptions and can never be submitted to verification. On the contrary, the theory of natural selection, when analyzed, will be found to consist of eleven propositions, of which nine are demonstrated truths, the tenth is a corollary from its nine predecessors, and the eleventh is a perfectly legitimate postulate. Let us enumerate these propositions: 1. More organisms perish than survive; 2. No two individuals are exactly alike; 3. Individual peculiarities are transmissible to offspring; 4. Individuals whose peculiarities bring them into closest adaptation with their environment are those which survive and transmit their peculiar organization; 5. The survival of the fittest thus tends to maintain an equilibrium between organisms and their environments; 6. But the environments of every group of organisms is steadily, though slowly, changing; 7. Every group of organisms must accordingly change in average character, under penalty of extinction; 8. Changes due to individual variation are complicated by the law that a change set up in any one part of a highly complex and coherent aggregate, like an organism, initiates changes in other parts; 9. They are further complicated by the law that structures are nourished in proportion to their use; 10. From the foregoing nine propositions, each one of which is indisputably true, it is an inevitable corollary that changes thus set up and complicated must eventually alter the specific character of any given group of organisms; 11. It is postulated that, since the first appearance of life upon the earth's surface, sufficient time has elapsed to have enabled such causes as the foregoing to produce all the specific heterogeneity now witnessed.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal, one of the leading papers in this country devoted to Spiritualism, commenting on the views of professional men interviewed by the reporter of the Chicago Times concerning prayer, says: "Glimpses of the coming ideal of prayer are seen in the statements we give, especially in that of Rev. L. P. Mercer. Spiritualism will make this conception more complete. We shall look on prayer, whether spoken or silent, as the uplifting wish and effort for strength and hope, for light and tranquillity, not moving any mysterious power to set aside the divine and eternal laws, but lifting up the prayerful seeker into harmony with those laws, into unity with the great currents of light and life that sweep through all space and flow through all time, and into that unity with the Infinite Life of which the poet says:—

'Nearer, my God, to thee'

Then, in ways we know little of, 'the soul's sincere desire' attracts to us unseen friends from the life beyond; and they help us, not miraculously, but naturally. Magnetic strength, tranquil peace and hope, clairvoyant glimpses, visions of beauty, and help from the Spirit-world, all come as answers to prayer, as helps to such as help themselves by reaching up. All this will not stand in the way of the use of outward help, of medical aid, of labor for support. Spiritual strength and common-sense go hand in hand." The general view seems to be that prayer is of no avail except so far as superstitious people who believe in it are put into a quiescent or hopeful condition by giving expression to their belief. To this view, the Spiritualistic journal mentioned is an exception; for it thinks prayers attract "unseen friends from the life beyond," a notion that many excellent people entertain, but of which the evidence seems to be not of a kind to satisfy those who cannot believe without proof.

THE Morning Chronicle (Quebec) recently published a letter from the rector of St. Matthews Episcopal Church, recommending that a petition be sent to the Legislature in favor of taxing church property, and the editor commented on the letter as follows: "We believe many will read the letter with more than ordinary interest, because it is suggestive of a movement which in time is bound to take place. It seems unreasonable that the religious and charitable institutions of the city should enjoy immunity from taxation, and at the same time be in receipt of all those benefits of protection which the public at large have to pay for. . . . This is clearly unfair and unreasonable, and we are glad to see clergymen like Mr. Hamilton coming forward and saying such principles are wrong, and asking to be placed on the same footing as the citizens are. . . . We know how unpopular a thing it is to ask the religious bodies to pay lawful tribute to the city, whose protection they claim almost as a matter of right; but, nevertheless, we think the time has come when we ought to do it. We owe this much to ourselves; and we think if the religious organizations will only look into the matter in an impartial way, they will be disposed to do their share in lightening the people's burdens, in the manner pointed out."

THE venerable mother of ex-Governor Andrews of Connecticut, who is nearly eighty years old, said at a recent prayer-meeting in her house at North Sunderland: "I hear the young men praying for the recovery of the President. I hope he will recover: I believe he will. But I hope these young men will learn the lesson, and vote so that such a sad crime will never be attempted again. I hear that the President had been worried almost to death by office-seekers. God ordained that man should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. I believe that many of these office-seekers want office because they are unwilling to submit to God's law. I am a poor, ignorant woman, but I think I could improve the present system of giving office. I would have the applicants for office examined, and no man appointed that was not willing to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. I believe the first influence that led Guiteau to assassinate the President was revenge, because he had failed to get an office, and the second influence the actions of the Conklingites.—Springfield Republican.

No comments are necessary to make those who mingle and converse with men and women appreciate the following statement by Margaret Fuller: "The man habitually most narrow toward women will be flushed, as by the worst assault on Christianity, if you say it has made no improvement in her condition. Indeed, those most opposed to new acts in her favor are jealous of the reputation of those which have been done."

"The constitution of man," says Draper, "is such that, for a long time after he has discovered the incorrectness of the ideas prevailing around him, he shrinks from openly emancipating himself from their dominion; and, constrained by the force of circumstances, he becomes a hypocrite, publicly applauding what his private judgment condemns."

VACATION VERSES.

Tired heart, tired brain, and tired hands
To-day seek rest on mount, on sea,
Near healing springs, by pebbly strands,
In sunny glades, or forest free.

Yet still the city's ceaseless din,
Sharp echoed by each town and farm,
Proclaims how many fail to win
The longed-for rest,—vacation's charm.

Still there are workers forced by fate
To toil 'neath summer's sultriest sun,
Whose sure vacation does not wait
Their doubtful leisure,—it is won,

Through patient hands,—enduring hearts:
They find release from grief's worst pain,
Who learn that labor's self imparts
The needful rest to soul and brain.

LUCIAN.

I

Thou honey-bee of later, larger Greece,
All flowers of Grecian song and Grecian lore,
Of every age, you sucked, and evermore
Their sweetness lived in tomes, which never cease
To charm new generations, as they rise,—
Tales, essays, dialogues, that every phase
Of that rich, old Hellenic life unfold.
Sage, sophist, rhetor, and impostor bold,
Athenai's soiled doves fair your page displays:
We hear and see them through your ears and eyes.
Voluptuous description, wisdom, wit,
Flow intermingled from your easy pen.
We know the world you knew, its things and men;
Our own time leaving, through you enter it.

II.

That world was waning: e'en its gods were old,
Their nectar stale and withered Hebe's bloom,
But, still, over the Ægean's wave did loom
The Maid of Wisdom wrought of ivory and gold;
The bright Levant with cities manifold
Still gleamed,—for countless marble fanes found room
On isle and mainland. East and West had met
In Egypt's many-languaged mart, which yet
Survives. There Grecian reason was defiled
By dreams of Orient enthusiasts wild,
And turned to mystical madness. At last,
A throng of filthy anchorites o'erpowered
Savan and sage, and mental twilight lowered
O'er earth, blotting the glorious Grecian past.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 18, 1881.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ARBOTT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

For two months from this date, during my temporary absence, Mr. B. F. Underwood will have the entire editorial charge of the Free Religious Index. All communications intended for the paper should be sent to him, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

MR. L. G. REED, of New York, writes: "It should be observed that, while a few excellent, silver-haired philosophers are writing and reading cultured essays on the different systems of religion, the bulk even of our own children are being inoculated with the popular theology. The teaching of the child moulds the future man. It is necessary to compete with the different churches, using their means to win the little folks. Each association should have its Sunday-school, with the usual attractions,—singing, playing, feasting, prizes, etc. In this way, a little money would do much good, and give the best assurance that the Free Religious movement of this generation will not die out."

"THE Margaret Fuller Society" is the fitting name of an association of ladies recently formed in Chicago, with the following useful and definite aims in view: "To prove that women are citizens; that they are needed in the administration of the outside home as well as in the domestic circle; that patriotism and statesmanship need to be nourished in the souls of the women and mothers as well as the men and fathers of the land; that it is time, in the progress of human affairs, for the active expression of womanhood, represented by woman herself, and therefore that women should furnish themselves with appropriate knowledge by study and discipline." That last clause is excellent, and would do good service if adopted as a resolution by voters generally.

KANT AND THE EXPERIENTIAL SCHOOL.

President Porter, in his essay read some days ago at Concord, maintained, according to published reports, that Spencer and Lewes, among other thinkers of the experiential school of philosophy, "have travelled in Kant's footsteps, while denying him." A statement like this coming from the President of Yale College is liable to mislead many who are not well acquainted with the philosophy of Kant and later philosophic thought, and calls for a brief statement of facts.

Kant maintained that mind is an entity, whose forms or laws are entirely independent of experience. The proposition that "there is nothing in the intellect which was not previously in the senses" he opposed by calling attention to the fact that the intellect itself has a priori conditions without which experience is impossible, that there are fundamental concepts which are inherent in mind, and in no way due to experience.

Spencer and Lewes on the contrary, while recognizing the insufficiency of the old sensational theory that limits experience to the acquisitions of the individual, maintain that the experiences of ancestors have become organized in the race, that the individual of to-day possesses not only the results of his own experience, but the results of innumerable ancestral experiences, that what Kant thought was inherent in mind and independent of experience is the result of accumulated experiences of the race, and that the forms and "laws" of thought which precede and condition the experience of the individual have been evolved as the branches of a tree are evolved from the seed; so that the mental forms, although connate, and therefore a priori in the individual, have their genetic explanation in the development of the race, and are just as much a part of experience as are the perceptions or the acquired ability of the individual.

Thus, the question is changed by modern thought from one of psychology to one of psychogeny, from a consideration of the nature of mind to that of its genesis and evolution. The experientialists ask the adherents of the a priori school to show that the mind has any conceptions which are not reducible to sensible experience or combinations of such experience. That there are logical processes called by Kant "forms of thought" which are indispensable in the formation of judgment, as are the laws of geometry in the construction of figures, is admitted. The question is whether there are concepts antecedent to all experience, individual and ancestral, whether they are primordial and inherent elements of mind or are mental conditions, which, although irreducible to any individual experience, are due to the evolved experience of the race. Kant declared they were antecedent to all experience. The modern school of evolution endeavors to trace their evolution from the simplest perception of the babe or the savage to the complex conceptions of a Shakspeare or a Newton. It is admitted that the mental forms are connate and so far a priori, but as products of ancestral experiences they are acquired, and therefore a posteriori.

Experience is "the registration of feeling," and "feeling is the reaction of the sentient organism under stimulus." Experience, then, implies two factors, organism and environment; and every modification of structure and every accompanying sensation must be experiential. The infant, when it enters the world, has no innate idea of space or time, but it has organized tendencies—Kant's "a priori forms"—which have arisen in experience because of the constancy and universality of the external relation to which the organism has been subjected. And, in like manner, all the phenomena of the fully developed mind, exhibited under the rubric of sensibility, which are viewed by the Kantian as initial phases, as primary conditions of mind, are viewed by Spencer and Lewes as the result of ages of acquisition and modification, like "the wealth which a merchant acquires through his own efforts, by employing the accumulated results of the efforts of previous generations." Every truth, whether "universal or particular," "necessary or contingent," is learned by experience, and its ascertainment is possible only by the conditions of experience.

We have sufficiently indicated the difference between the school of Kant and that of modern experiential thinkers to show how little foundation there is for President Porter's statement, which is repeated and quoted far and wide. The experiential philosophy is a necessary part of the theory of evolution, which is now accepted not only by scientific men generally, but by the ablest representatives of theology. They who imagine that they can consistently accept evolution, and at the same time hold dalliance with metaphysical transcendentalism, show thereby, we think, that they understand the implications of neither.

A DAY AT CONCORD.

Several years ago when visiting in a little village in Southern Missouri, twenty-five miles from railroads or any large city, I found myself in a home where Emerson, Thoreau, Alcott, Parker, and other Transcendentalists were household gods, where full-length portraits of Emerson and Parker adorned the walls, and the works of the Transcendental philosophers in a large and well-selected library bore marks of most frequent use. It was an intellectual and charming family of half a dozen grown-up young men and women, with a noble, old-time type of Southern woman as their mother. Their father, a member of the Missouri Legislature, had been some years dead. One of the youngest of these girls had so charming a face and form that she might have served as an inspiration, had they known her, to some of the writers she so admired. But I have never been able to forget the look of utter disappointment which crept into her eyes as, knowing I was from New England, she asked me to tell her all about Concord and to describe to her the personal appearance of Emerson, Alcott, and others; and I was obliged to confess to her that I had never been at Concord, and could only tell her of the impressions of others who had seen her heroes. "What, live in New England and never have been to Concord!" she exclaimed. "Why, it seems to me that, if I lived within a hundred miles of that place, I would find some way of going, if I had to crawl on my hands and knees!"

So, since then, I have been haunted by the memory of this "sin of omission," but have hitherto always waited for "the more convenient season." The "convenient season" came one day last week; and for the sake of many others who, like my enthusiastic Missouri friend, may be living in some of the out-of-the-way nooks of the world, whereto the Index has penetrated, and who, though isolated, yet know all about Concord and the men and women it has given, directly and indirectly, to the world of thought and literature, I give, through the Index, a few of my impressions in regard to what I saw and heard in a day at Concord.

We walked from the station to the "Hillside Chapel" where the sessions of the Concord School are held,—a delicious walk to a stranger in Concord, especially on a sunshiny morning like that on which we enjoyed it. It is reported that the villagers, generally, have but little sympathy with the philosophers; but, somehow, they seem to have caught a glimpse of the outside world's interest in the historic and transcendental town, for it is a marvel of neatness and taste from end to end. There is an indescribable air of a realized ideal pastoral life in the aspect of Concord as a whole. Such elms, such greenswards, such flower-gardens, such sweet, clean fields of hay and grain are rarely seen. One drank it all in like a living poem.

For the sake of a little niece of ten, who loves Louisa M. Alcott and her Little Women, I took a long look at the pleasant old Alcott homestead, where the "Little Women" grew to be big women and took their appropriate part of the world's work. The "Hillside Chapel" is within the same enclosure and within call of the brown farm-house where Louisa and her sisters dreamed and played until dreaming and playing were all over in the sober actualities of life. When I entered the Chapel, I took a survey of the women present, comprising fully two-thirds of the audience of seventy-five or so, and wondered if among those present was the one daughter of the "Mystic" of Concord who, it is said, attends these meetings. As I looked at the noble form of the aged patriarch, whose daughters have done Concord and himself so much honor, I recalled, with a thrill of love and pity, the pathetic lines he wrote so short time since on his dead artist daughter, May Alcott.

I did not, of course, venture to attend one of the discourses on speculative philosophy without a due sense of my own incapacity for grappling with the deep questions there discussed; but I "took heart of grace" in reading over the prospectus of the School, that "no preliminary examinations are required, and no limitations of age, sex, or residence in Concord will be prescribed." So as I was to be a "student" for only one session, and had primed myself in the mysterious nomenclature of speculative philosophy by a careful reading of the daily papers, I decided to risk it, the more willingly that I had found myself able to understand some of the more abstruse ideas of Spencer, Mill, and others, although I was fully aware that these thinkers were too modern for their methods of thought and expression to receive any countenance or consideration from the Concord philosophers.

I fear my expectations ran too high. I was disagreeably disappointed in finding myself fully able to understand, thanks to the daily press, most of what Professor Jones said; but, alas! for my receptivity. I found myself dissenting from most of his conclusions and dogmatic assertions, and they were dogmatic. He said of some of the hypotheses of the scientific thinkers of to-day, "This is not true"; "that is a false idea." Begging Dr. Jones' pardon, I must say that it seems to me the attitude of the earnest seeker after truth should be always that of the humble, teachable inquirer. The theory of evolution was—in Dr. Jones' opinion, as given in his morning lecture—a wholly unwarranted one; and yet there were several evolutionists present who breathed a little easier after he and Mr. Alcott had "cried 'havoc,' and let slip the dogs of war" upon that abused theory, to find how weak, how very weak the arguments brought to bear against it are, and they went to sleep that night more confirmed Darwinists than ever.

Dr. Jones, a blonde, elderly gentleman in spectacles, read very finely; and his lecture was embellished with many axiomatic gems of cultured thought, but his attack on the evolution theory was a piece of speculative Don Quixotism. He gave his own interpretation to that theory, and with great valor attacked that which did not exist outside of his own "inner consciousness," or at least was never taught by any recognized leader among the evolutionists. He was particularly severe on the "ooze" which he said the evolutionists claimed to be the beginning and source of all mind. Somehow, when he was working himself into a Platonic rage over this mythic "ooze" with its vast pretensions, I found myself able to imagine it only in the words of some "nonsense verses" written by somebody in imitation of a Transcendental poet:—

"Source immaterial of material naught, Focus of light infinitesimal."

In the discussion which followed the lecture, Professor Harris, in his gentle way, came gallantly to the rescue of the evolutionists. That discussion waxed a bit earnest, on which the tender-hearted "Dean of the Faculty," Mr. Alcott, vaguely fearing something was going wrong, began to deprecate any misunderstanding between the gentlemen. Whereupon, Dr. Jones, looking surprised, exclaimed, "I don't know what you mean, Mr. Alcott." "Nor I either," echoed Professor Harris. Then the philosopher, discerning his native Concord again, smiled, and said as he subsided into his seat, "Well, I don't know as I know what I mean myself," adding, as a laugh rippled over the audience, "I am a 'Mystic,' you know," on which the merriment became general.

It was very warm in the tiny chapel, a decidedly unique building, which from its odd shape, unplanned woodwork, and its "woody" background of grass, trees, and shrubs, gives one a pleasant impression of camp-life, or would do so, if the camp-chairs, which are the only seats, had been made on a plan that would give ease or comfort to the human frame; but then they may have been designed purposely to test the philosophy taught in the school. I am quite sure that any philosophy which would render them endurable for three hours must be sublime. I had been very much interested, especially when Mr. Alcott gave it as his opinion that we could by right living prolong our present short term of life to one or even two hundred years,—indeed, he hinted that it might yet be possible to give grim Death the slip altogether; and as he is nearly eighty, with faculties unimpaired and his six feet of humanity unrent by age, I was not sure that the thing was impossible, but I was glad to get out into the open air where I could give such overwhelming ideas room to expand.

I was sorry not to catch even a glimpse of Emerson, but had to content myself with a long look at his home, a white-painted, green-blinded, thoroughly New-Englandish residence, situated on one of the main streets of Concord, but like most of the houses of the village separated from the road by a verdant lawn, and shaded by trees.

From the windows of the hotel where we took dinner, we caught a glimpse of a deserted-looking graveyard opposite, filled with ancient and moss-grown stones. We found the names of Emerson and Thoreau there; but, as this is one of the earliest burial-places of Concord, and now disused, these were probably distant branches of these distinguished families. A copy of some of the long eulogies on these old-time tombstones would not be uninteresting reading in these days.

Thanks to Mr. Holland, whose contributions to the Index have made him well known to all its readers, the last few hours of our stay were rendered very delightful. In his row-boat, he conveyed us to the spot where, in the words of Concord's poet, carved on the monument there erected,

"By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world."

Within a stone's throw of this historic ground, half-hid midst the embowering trees, stands the "old manse" where and of which Hawthorne wrote in his "Mosses." It is a lovely, lonely, and romantic spot; and one needs a vigorous imagination to realize that it was once the scene of bloodshed, even with the aid of the iron rails which mark the enclosure where lie buried the dead English soldiers who fell there. After we had looked our fill, we returned to the boat again, and spent a pleasant hour rowing on the peaceful waters of the Concord River, gathering some of its late water-lilies as souvenirs. Then came our reluctant adieus to our kind friend, and our day at Concord was over. S. A. U.

THE scattered associations existing in various parts of the country for the purpose of establishing a cleaner civil service sent their delegates to Newport last week, in the interest of combining effort for united national work. The convention had the advantage of the presence of such men as George W. Curtis and Carl Schurz, the former serving as moderator, and the latter throwing the weight of his judgment and experience into junctures that threatened unsettled issues of debate. On the whole, there seem to have prevailed ripe honesty of purpose, and a single aim bearing upon the solution of this fettered problem; and the results of such simple and direct earnestness in this initial gathering cannot be other than wholesome in their bearings upon subsequent effort. A disposition to face calmly the obstacles in such a track, and to bring to them the pressure of deliberate and persistent force, is morally sure to end in their removal, sooner or later. The resolutions finally adopted at this meeting ran thus:—

Resolved, That the bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, provides constitutional practice and effective measures for the remedy of the abuses of the spoils system, and that associations represented in this conference will use every honorable means, in the press, on the platform, and by petition, to secure its passage by Congress.

Resolved, That we regard it as an important part of a system of competitive examinations that there should be local examinations at various points, convenient for those who might wish to be examined for the different States, these examinations and the local boards by which they may be conducted to be under the supervision of the National Civil-service Reform League.

Resolved, That the several civil-service reform associations here represented be invited to form a national organization, under the name of the National Civil-service Reform League, for the purpose of securing as the centre of correspondence, and of facilitating such united action as circumstances may demand; that the executive committee of the Civil-service Reform Association of New York is hereby authorized to act as a provisional central committee of said league, and that the several civil-service reform associations be requested to designate one person each to be a member of said provisional central committee.

Resolved, That we consider the organization of civil-service reform associations auxiliary to the National Civil-service Reform League in every congressional district highly desirable for the promotion of our objects, and we request existing associations to apply their energies and influence to that end.

Resolved, That the bill introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States, by Mr. Willis of Kentucky, at the last session of Congress, provides practicable and judicious measures for the remedy of the abuse known as political assessment, and that the associations represented in this conference will use every honorable means, in the press, on the platform, and by petition, to secure its passage by Congress.

Resolved, That we are uncompromisingly opposed to arbitrary removals from office, as well as all interference by members of Congress, with the exercise of the appointing power.

Could the spirit of the closing member of the series be effectively operative, the nation would be spared the reproach of such cases of capricious injustice as exhibited in those of late collectorship notoriety. The press, in ringing changes upon this reform, adduces the examples of English and also of Canadian effort in the same cause, and calls attention to the accordance of the principles at stake and the methods adopted among them all. The unanimity of judgment thus displayed under conditions otherwise so varied is a strong proof of the wisdom and virtue of the movement; for, however defective or tardy the process may have to be, there is a clear sense of its necessity at heart. When the American people get their conscience fairly aroused, their characteristic energy and ingenuity will inevitably hew out a way of accomplishment for any clear principle like the one under discussion; and the barriers of party prejudice, usage, fearful apprehension, or whatever arises to resist its application, will surely, in the long run, be forced to yield. The illustrations are not few or easily forgotten of the curious features that have come unexpectedly to the surface in national experience for the expulsion of formidable elements from the body politic. The ripest statesmanship irrespective of party lines, and the soundest tenets of practical sense among the people at large, come into play with overwhelming force when vital issues are unmistakably disclosed.

THE Equal Rights Association has published a pamphlet entitled The Constitution of Rhode Island and Equal Rights. It contains facts and arguments that were presented last spring in favor of "a new constitution, and an equal and extended suffrage for Rhode Island." The pamphlet contains contributions from many citizens, including prominent men; and its object is simply to secure for Rhode Island a suffrage similar to that of other States. The Association has issued a small circular which says:—

"The rule of a minority, as a permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible."—A. Lincoln.

For more than twenty years, Rhode Island has been ruled by a minority.

"No taxation without representation."—The Spirit of '76.

At the recent election of Representatives to Congress, forty-eight thousand tax-paying men in Rhode Island did not vote.

"Equality of Rights is the first of rights."—Charles Sumner.

A property qualification is required of some voters, but not of others in Rhode Island.

The city of Providence having more than a third of the population, and paying more than half of the tax, has only a sixth of the representation of the State.

Governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed."—Declaration of Independence.

Of the seventy-seven thousand men in the State of Rhode Island, about twenty thousand will this day vote for its Governor.

"Nor is it decent to call any State republican when any considerable portion of its people, constituting an essential part of its 'body politic,' is permanently disfranchised."—Charles Sumner.

The qualified voters in Rhode Island this year are thirty-one thousand and sixty-five: more than that number are disfranchised.

"We agree before God and each other that the freely expressed will of the majority shall be the law of all, which we will all obey."—The Pilgrim Covenant in the Cabin of the "Mayflower".

The "law of all" in Rhode Island is the will of something over half of the twenty thousand men who vote.

"Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."—Lincoln at Gettysburg.

It has perished in Rhode Island, where instead is a government of a few, by a few, and for a few.

"Abraham Lincoln also said that the rule of the minority is anarchy or despotism."

Less than one-third of the male adults of this State rule the remaining two-thirds; hence, Rhode Island is a despotism.

"Cicero in his oration against Verres said that the citizen by choice is equally worthy with the citizen by chance."

A truth spoken in Rome two thousand years ago is denied to-day in Rhode Island.

"I reiterate that the majority should rule."—A. Lincoln.

Of more than thirty thousand men in the city of Providence, less than ten thousand vote for its mayor. To-day, it ought to poll twenty-five thousand votes.

"In Virginia, at least, there should be a free suffrage."—Senator Mahone, March 28, 1881.

Why not in Rhode Island, as well?

"The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and alter their constitutions of government."—George Washington.

More than sixty thousand men of Rhode Island, four-fifths of all, desire a better constitution for the State.

Are the above facts satisfactory? Are they an honor to us? Are they right?"

It is hoped that the work of the Equal Rights Association will not cease, until, by a revision of the constitution of Rhode Island, a republican government is made possible in that State.

THE Catholic Review, referring to some remarks of Colonel Ingersoll on "prayer," says: "He is far too small a potato to be crushed by such a steam-hammer as Father Weninger, S. J.; but when that advertisement-seeking and self-described infidel indulges in the very cheap sneers which he has recently given to the public, there is some excuse for the Jesuit, who has the ear of the public, setting before it a right view of the magnificent demonstration of faith in God and prayer, which this deplorable tragedy has evoked throughout the length and breadth of the land." Here is a sample of this "steam-hammer's" crushing efforts: "As an American citizen, I united with intense sympathy my prayers to those of all honest Americans; but, as a priest of the Holy Catholic Church, I could do and did far more. I offered the Holy sacrifice of the Mass to the Almighty for the wounded President. Holy Mass being the divinely ordered sacrifice of the New Law, according to the teaching of the Church, is regarded with greater favor in the eyes of God than all the prayers of angels and men united, since it is the offering of Christ himself to his heavenly Father for the benefit of mankind." A number of rude epithets are hurled at the good-natured Colonel, and the article concludes as follows, "But, Americans, I am afraid that this Tom Paine monkey cannot blush, but only bite, scratch, and sneer." It is not possible that Ingersoll, "crushed" by "steam-hammer" blows like these, will ever again show signs of life. Good-by, Robert! We deplore thy untimely death! Who will next fall under the crushing blows of this Jesuitical giant, whose unrestrained power to "crush" heretics is frightful to contemplate?

REV. HENRY A. STIMSON, in a recent address before the Congregational Club of Worcester, Mass., said: "Half of the pupils in the Jesuit schools in Denver are from Protestant families; and it is said that there are, in Roman Catholic schools of California, more scholars, by perhaps two thousand, than are to be found in all the Protestant schools, academies, seminaries, colleges, normal schools, and universities combined." This is one of the many indications that the real contest in the future is to be between not Catholicism and Protestant Christianity, but "Rome and Reason." Protestantism legitimately carried out ends inevitably in the rejection of all theological dogmas and authorities. All advanced Protestant countries furnish illustrations. The recognition of the right of private judgment and the right of protest must result ultimately in destroying the Protestant Churches or reducing them to the level of secular institutions. But the Church of Rome, unprogressive and rigid with age, with its hatred of all intellectual freedom and independence, with its pretended divine revelation and infallible authority, with its centuries of experience and "selection," with its unequalled organization and discipline, is likely to endure when every Protestant Church now existing shall have disappeared amid the unbelief, indifference, and secular tendencies and interests of the Protestant world. And the principle and spirit of secularism, which means independence, enlightenment, and progress, will, we believe, ultimately triumph. But it is very evident that the greatest and most enduring enemy which free thought, free schools, and a free government will have to encounter in the future is the Roman Catholic Church.

THE German-born lady who lectured on Schopenhauer at Concord is mentioned by the Springfield Republican as the "only woman at the school who could think on a level with its men." According to competent report of the average thought issuing from those men, that "level" in all those abounding and protracted tides of thinking was not always remarkable for reaching high-water mark. Outside of the compact body of the Harris lectures, whichever height of wave is had in mind, thinking womanhood in the mass need not feel very crushingly snubbed by this implication.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

It is not known to every one that the earth, on the 10th of this month, entered upon its annual passage through a meteor-zone of ten million miles in width. The substance of this immense belt is supposed to be the debris of a comet once travelling in its path, that long since went to pieces. The passage of the earth through this substance is attended by a collision which results in meteoric showers that are visible for a period of about eight nights. The point at which they are seen is the constellation Perseus that rises in the north-east of the heavens not far from nine o'clock. But, as its radiant is then very low in the horizon, the most favorable time for the observation of the display is toward the morning hours,—a circumstance which is likely to have the unfortunate tendency to check the enthusiasm of the non-professional astronomer. Still, if the moon is not too bright, somewhat of the effect may be seen by the patient watcher in the evening.

THE comet discovered by Professor Schaeberle, of Ann Arbor, July 13 (Comet C. 1881), is now visible to the naked eye. Its identity is uncertain: most probably there is no record of its previous appearance. It is expected to be one of the most conspicuous comets of the century, and has already developed a tail as marked as that of Donati's comet. Up to the 15th of August, the comet will be visible in the morning, in a direct line between Alderbaran and Theta Ursa Major. It will then cease to be visible in the morning, not rising until after twilight begins. On August 19, it will be near Nu Ursa Major, with its tail pointing toward and perhaps reaching Gould's Comet, then visible only in the telescope, in the Little Dipper. On August 25, it will be in the constellation Coma Berenices. Early in September, the comet and its tail will pass below our horizon.

THE American Naturalist for July contains the following note of curious interest:—

Carl Vogt thinks it a mistake to conclude that the whole nature of mankind is radically changed, because "it has walked for a while with a varnished cane instead of a knotty club." He finds a melancholy reminder of this in the part which the students and professors in the German universities have taken in the late persecution of the Jews in that country. This, he thinks, is largely to be attributed to the influence of a mediæval system of education, which still is so preponderating in institutions of learning, and sustains the closest relations with barbarous and violent use of power. "The Spanish mock stateliness of mediæval scholasticism," he says, "is indivisible from the savagery of mediæval university life; and we have accepted it in these modern days, along with the rest of our inheritance, and find it cherished and protected in our universities by the powers that be." The liberalizing and humanizing influence of science as contrasted with classical studies is described in the following words: "Our age strives and struggles for the recognition of the exact sciences which have thoroughly penetrated our life, as opposed to those systems of so-called humanist education handed down to us from the Middle Ages. Unresting, unfaltering, each science presses forward with its methods and results. It feeds and clothes us, multiplies our means of intercourse, controls our whole political and domestic economy, masters our thought and our feeling, and daily wins us new fruits of good in the struggle for existence. It knows no distinctions of people, castes, and nations, no qualifications of territory or geographical restriction. There is no such thing as German steam-power or Semitic electricity or Roman magnetism: it bids any and every people welcome that will promote science and lend it help."

A TOUCHING LETTER.

On the morning of July 4, Benjamin W. Martin, of Montreal, son of Mr. George Martin of that city, who is known to the readers of the Index by his contributions to this paper, was drowned in the St. Lawrence by the accidental upsetting of a boat in which he, with a companion, was crossing the river. The deceased, who was but twenty-one years of age, was a young man of unusual intelligence; and he possessed a character in which, with the firmness and strength that command respect, were combined the amiability and sweetness of disposition which inspire with sentiments of friendship and esteem. Those who knew him intimately testify to the rare purity and beauty of his life, and dwell on the unselfishness with which he was ever ready to sacrifice his own pleasure for the happiness of others. "We have heard," says the Montreal Gazette, "a story about poor young Martin, who recently met his death by drowning, which illustrates great nobility of character. He and young De Zouche, his companion, had been talking the evening before the accident of the possibility of such an occurrence, of the frequency with which drowning people seized others in the water, preventing them from swimming, and thus bringing them also to a watery grave; and they agreed that in the event of accident neither would thus seize the other. The next day, when both were in the water, Martin felt his strength leaving him. He seized De Zouche by the foot, but almost instantly let go, his last thought being probably the conversation of the night before and the danger he was inflicting upon his companion. It was a noble impulse, worthy of being recorded." One who knew him well writes us: "The example which he has left behind is a contribution to the fidelity of manhood and to the progress of the race. His character was an answer to all tongues that questioned the sufficiency of reason as the guide of life, or that insist on the necessity of supernatural agencies to sustain and shape the human soul in the performance of the highest virtues, the noblest self-sacrifice. The act that crowned his last moment, the release of his hold on his companion from fear of depriving the latter of life, was so thoroughly consistent with the lofty character of the boy that I have not a particle of doubt that he did it consciously and purposely. De Zouche feels certain such was the case."

From Mr. George Martin, the father of the deceased, we have received a letter in regard to the sad event, which, although not intended for publication, is so touching and noble a tribute to the worth of his lost son that we cannot withhold from the readers of the Index the following extract:—

I must spare both you and myself the rehearsal of many particulars. He was carried to his final place of rest, in Mount Royal Cemetery, on the morning of the 7th, followed by more sincere mourners than I have ever seen at any funeral in this city,—mourners of no kinship, with the exception of those of his own family, but youths and grown people who had known him, and knew how much nobility of character had by his death been blotted out from the world. Every one who had known him knew that he was noble in mind, generous in soul, and tender of heart. He never made an enemy in his life, but endeared himself to Christian and Rationalist alike, wherever he made acquaintance. I can say, most sincerely and conscientiously, that I cannot imagine a single fault that he ever had; and this is saying very much indeed. He was rounded out in fulness of character as near perfection as it is possible for mortal to attain. His greatest happiness lay in seeing and in making others happy. He never knew the deceptive taste of alcoholic drinks, nor the use of tobacco; was industrious, economical, and meet in all his ways. Do you wonder that I took pride in pointing to him as an example of the teaching of Rationalism exercised by his parents, and expounded to his apprehension from his earliest days? He was in perfect harmony with our views, read largely and thought deeply, and was never vexed with the forms of theological assumptions and sophistries, but knew precisely where he stood, and felt the ground firm under his feet. Wise and prudent boy as he was, he never provoked argument, never dogmatized; but he never hesitated to defend our principles when attacked, and he soon taught any one who thought to corner him in religious disputation that reason was stronger than faith, that he knew the ground of his belief, while his opponents took theirs from somebody's command, or mere say so.

And now, my friend, I come to a point that will interest you. He was the youngest member of our Freethought Club. He heard all your Montreal lectures, and you may possibly remember him. I knew it would be a question in the minds of many Christian friends and acquaintances as to what course I would choose in regard to religious services under such a severe test. My mind was settled on this from the outset. I knew that my loved and lost one regarded the usual clerical ceremonies over the dead as hollow and fallacious,—the outgrowth, to a large extent, of superstitious error. I considered that it would be an injustice to and a degrading of his memory to yield to the popular current, and resolved that no solemn mockery should dishonor the unexcelled virtues of my good and noble boy. For the first time in the city of Montreal, so far as I know, one being was laid to rest "without benefit of clergy."

A friend, Mr. Thompson, President of the Toronto Freethought Association, delivered an exceedingly appropriate address at the grave; and I never saw such proofs, and so many, of the deepest emotion, the most earnest sympathy and sorrow, as I witnessed around the grave of the young freethinker, the blameless boy, "who perished in his prime." It was an occasion when the fidelity of human nature to humanity rose above and overflowed all creed-barriers, and paid tender tribute to the close of a pure and sweet life. I am pleased to be able to say, in this connection, that the respect and sympathy of my Christian friends and neighbors have not been withheld nor lessened. Many have given me credit openly for consistent action, and for having evinced the courage of my convictions. I had visits from two clergymen, one Methodist and the other Unitarian, who proved themselves true gentlemen by the courteous and kindly manner in which they addressed me and my wife, avoiding any semblance of theological expression that might be distasteful.

I need not say how black and seemingly cruel this affliction has pressed upon myself and wife. He was our pet son, our home child, my loving companion in countless walks, my friend with whom I took counsel, alike in our intellectual tastes, having read largely the same books, whose merits we delighted to discuss. My wife, you will be glad to know, at the worst moment of her crushing grief, never wavered in her convictions, never showed that "theology" could afford the slightest glimmer of consolation.

We have passed through the ordeal. We have shown our Christian friends that we had to be true to ourselves, that no calamity, no sorrow could shake the foundations of our honest thought; and, respecting their beliefs, it affords us great satisfaction to bear testimony now that they have respected ours.

This is the third attempt only at writing since the darkness fell upon me. I was very doubtful when I sat down whether I could keep master of myself sufficiently to write you as I wished. You will pardon me, I know, if I have carried you through too many particulars, chiefly interesting, or only so perhaps, to immediate relatives. But I feel in writing to you that I am speaking to a brother, and hence have run on unreservedly.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

BOSTON MONDAY LECTURES. CHRIST AND MODERN THOUGHT. With a preliminary lecture on The Methods of meeting Modern Unbelief. By Joseph Cook. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881.

All these lectures, except that by Joseph Cook (which was given in London), were delivered in Boston "by gentlemen invited by the committee in charge of the Monday Lectureship."

The first lecture, by Mr. Cook, is vigorous in language and fertile in suggestions as to "methods of meeting modern unbelief." He thinks the only safety of government "is to be found in the government of the saints, by the saints, and for the saints of the Church. . . . American experience," he says, "proves that the separation of Church and State prevents the State from governing the Church, but does not prevent the Church from governing the State." His hope is in Church membership. Much of the lecture consists in loose talk about "American infidelity," "rationalistic negation," the "Supreme Somewhat," "dull-eyed," "wild-eyed," and "wall-eyed" scepticism, "axiomatic theology," "agnostic, atheistic, materialistic, and pessimistic speculation," "mignosticism," "total self-surrender," "God as an atoning God," "spontaneous generation," "Christian contact with the unconverted," "district visitation," "scepticism in Germany," "Strauss's theory," "Dr. Carpenter and Lionel Beale," "Schleiermacher, Neander, Trendelenburg, and Teveston," "Dorner, Semisch, and Steinmeyer." He speaks of "my friend Mr. Fiske," whose review of his lectures, under the title of "Theological Charlatanism," in the North American Review, he had not read, and says that "Mr. Emerson's is the only prominent name that was quoted in America in support of rationalism, and to-day it can be quoted in support of theism, although I do not dare yet to call Emerson exactly a Christian theist, in spite of his calling himself so." He concludes by referring to "theological battle-fields," and announcing, "I obtain glimpses of a heaven opened: and behold, a white horse! and he that sits on him is called the Word of God, King of kings, Lord of lords. He is clothed in a vesture dipped in blood, but his eyes are as a flame of fire, and on his head are many crowns." The comet had not appeared when this lecture was delivered, and of course no allusion is made to it.

The lecture by Bishop Clark, on "The Seen and the Unseen," is quite able and unexceptionable in style, although it contains no new contribution to the thought of the day. Its spirit is broad and generous. "The Place of Conscience" is the title of a lecture by Rev. Mark Hopkins, and is substantially a repetition of the views he presented in a published work a few years ago. The lecture by Dr. McCosh, on "Development," is perhaps the ablest discourse in the volume, although Herbert Spencer, or even Fiske, whom he criticizes, would not find it difficult, we apprehend, to exhibit fallacies in some of his attempts to defend supernaturalism. Chancellor Crosby's "Calm View of the Temperance Question" forms one of these lectures, much to the regret of adherents of total abstinence, who are interested in the circulation of the Monday Lectures. "The Facts as to Divorce in New England" is the subject of a lecture by Rev. Samuel W. Dike, and it would be valuable for its statistics if one had any assurance of their accuracy. Some of the other lectures possess merits; but nothing in them entitles them to special mention, as they are for the most part commonplace in thought and language.

A MATTER-OF-FACT GIRL. A novel. By Theo. Gift, author of Pretty Miss Bellew. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

Readers of the "Leisure Hour Series" some time since made the favorable acquaintance of Theo. Gift in his pleasant story of Pretty Miss Bellew. The present story will be found about equally agreeable. It is not particularly strong; and the characters are not remarkably lifelike, with the exception of the old grandmother of Berrie, the matter-of-fact girl. For a wonder, the story is not pessimistic. It turns out well. Everybody is made happy. The hero gets well rid of the beautiful, bad woman who has trifled with his affections; and Berrie gets well rid of her rustic lover, who consoles himself easily with her younger sister, who is delighted with this new arrangement. The conclusion of the book is very clumsily managed, and even cruelly. The stale device of afflicting the heroine with small-pox and spoiling all her pretty looks was entirely uncalled for. There was no need of any such test to prove the sincerity of Randal's affection, and it leaves a painful image on the mind. The book has much of incidental charm that does a good deal to heighten the average impression that it makes upon the reader's mind.

THE July number of the Revue de Belgique contains articles on the University of Oxford and the Belgian parliament; an obituary notice of the liberal journalist, François van Meenen; a spirited letter from Paris, full of literary and artistic criticism, by Marguerite van de Wiele; and a lofty poem by Eugène Gens. This veteran laborer in our cause, who has but recently passed away, describes the Simeon of Luke and Rubens rejoicing over the infant Redeemer, but reminds us that our real redemption has come as man has gradually mounted in the scale of being, feeling his way in ignorance and terror, gradually making his mental power prevail over the strength of the brutes around him, learning by every fall, and constantly saving himself by his own labor and energy, with no redeemer but his own genius. "And thou whom Simeon bore in his arms, hast thou realized his hopes?" exclaims the poet. "Thou didst wish to put an end to war, and hast promised to open an era of happiness, but for two thousand years thy name has kindled discord and war. Yet thy gentle word shall have an answer, even in this age without faith. It is we, the freethinkers, who will be thy apostles, thy rules of love shall be ours. It is we whom thy spirit is to lead henceforth. What we are to work forward to is the reign of liberty, the mother of all progress, and the downfall of those superstitions which still keep the mind in chains, though the body is now free; which check thought, honor stupidity, and curse knowledge; which make a duty out of blind routine, and put their creeds like bolts upon the mind. These are the tyrants we are to overthrow, and their fall will enable us to abolish ignorance and war. This is the salvation for which we may hope."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

BISHOP O'REILLY confirmed three hundred and seventy children at Northampton last Sunday.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES is engaged in preparing his personal reminiscences of Dean Stanley for the next number of Harper's Magazine.

MRS. FLETCHER, the spiritual medium who was tried in London for swindling a credulous woman, asked permission to introduce the testimony of a spirit. The court refused.

MR. CHARLES ELLIS informs us that he will reënter the lecture field next fall. His ability is so well known to the readers of the Index that no words of commendation from us are needed. Applications for lectures by him may be sent to this office.

THE wife of the author of the Light of Asia is said to be a grandniece of Dr. Channing. She is considered a fine architect. Mrs. Arnold is appropriately superintending the preparation and painting of the memorial window for the Channing Church at Newport, R.I.

M. BARTHOLOMEW, the Russian Minister, who is at Newport, says he has received no instructions whatever in regard to Hartman, the Nihilist. Why should official representatives of the United States Government make any reference to him, unless they wish to advertise him?

THE Committee appointed by the Rock River Conference to formulate charges of heresy against Rev. H. W. Thomas, of Chicago, accuse the doctor of denying the inspiration of the Scriptures, the doctrine of the atonement, and teaching probation after death. The trial will take place next month.

the liberal course of his uncle toward that eminent institution, and is also credited with founding an old men's home in Poughkeepsie as well as endowing a local literary and scientific society in that city.

ON DR. that Miss Louisa M. Alcott, the popular authoress, does not grace by her presence the sessions of the Concord School of which her well-beloved father is "Dean" and chief among its leaders. She is said to hold the opinion that there will be time enough to study speculative philosophy in the world to come.

HORACE SEAYER, who has been familiar with "spiritual phenomena" in this city from their first appearance, and who has often been claimed as a believer in Spiritualism, says, "As yet we see no proof in nature and reason that Spiritualism, in its teachings of a future existence, has any foundation whatever in science and truth."

DR. THOMAS HILL, ex-President of Harvard College, has proposed a method of computing time that shall conform to the Greenwich standard in all meridians, by a simple mathematical process that would involve calculation of only even hours of difference, these to be indicated by prefixing Roman numerals to the time of differing localities.

MR. GEORGE CHAINY spoke at Paine Hall last Sunday afternoon on "The Wandering Jew." The lecturer touched on a variety of topics, said many good things, and presented his thoughts in an earnest and eloquent manner. The audience, which was quite large for these vacation days, seemed well pleased with the discourse, and was generous with its applause.

THE following are among Mr. Moody's recent utterances: "As to the punishment of sin, I never allowed myself to discuss the point. That one verse, 'Shall not the God of heaven do right?' settled it for me." "I thought years ago that I had searched the depths of my own heart. I am finding out, day by day, that it was a mistake. I know God's heart to-day better than I do my own."

REFERRING to Bradlaugh, the Independent says that "the real wrong is with Parliament that attempts to judge of his sincerity, and keeps him from the seat where the source of all power has put him." The above is commended to the attention of the Boston Advertiser, whose articles on the Bradlaugh case are the most unjust and untruthful that we have seen in any American journal.

GUITEAU has completed his autobiography. It contains from seventy-five thousand to one hundred thousand words. He wants it to appear as volume one of the "Life and Writings of Charles Guiteau," and his theological essays to follow as volume two. Many second-rate publishers want the privilege of publishing the work, but it is not likely the Government will gratify Guiteau's vanity by permitting its publication.

ROBERT BROWNING, the poet, is described as being frequently met in the crowd at the Royal Academy in London, where he greets with kind words and a cordial hand-grasp his many friends, who often detect him in a stolen glance of affectionate pride at his son's pictures, as he passes them silently by. This son, offspring of two of England's greatest poets, seems to be best able to express his high thoughts in the poetry of painting.

WE admire the independence, honesty, and courage of Col. John C. Bundy, of the Chicago Religio-Philosophical Journal, in exposing the palpable frauds of Spiritualism. At the same time, every attempt to expose the trickery of men and women like Bliss, Holmes, Huntton, et id omne genus, only advertises them, and brings to their defence every person and paper interested in supporting their rascality. Many illustrations occur to us.

REFERRING to Crowe and Rossa, the New York Tablet with much good sense says: "We could laugh at the harlequinading of such mountebanks, if they were not bringing Irishmen and the cause of Ireland into contempt and ridicule in the eyes of the American people. Tread-on-the-tail-of-my-coat patriots, who are continually plotting harmless sensations and proclaiming their designs to the world beforehand, are more dangerous to Ireland than to England."

THE late Dean Stanley won hosts of friends in America, during his visit, by his almost boyish enthusiasm over the Republic and its institutions, which he seemed thoroughly to understand. When asked, on his first arrival in Boston, what points of the city he wished most to see, he laughingly replied: "The old historic madness has broken out in me. I want to see history. Show me the Old Elm on Boston Common. I know it has blown down, but I want to see where it was. Show me anything that carries a reminiscence of Washington."

THE Congregationalist says, "The most scrupulous accuracy in the use of language has never been claimed to be the crowning and conspicuous virtue of Joseph Cook"; and that, "in the fervid rush and turmoil of his thoughts, large words sometimes get into small places with an inexact result." A mild way of saying that this theological Don Quixote has but little regard for truth, and that no reliance can be placed on what he says. The religious papers are now acknowledging what independent thinkers discovered and stated at the commencement of his career.

MR. CEPHAS B. LYNN, a prominent Spiritualist, gave a lecture at Lake Pleasant last Saturday on "Ingersoll and his Critics." He said: "Ingersoll is bold in his utterance, pointed in his wit, terrific in his sarcasm, thrilling in his eloquence, and inimitable in the general characteristics of his oratory. He is a phenomenon. He is a success, because he represents in a unique and able way the reaction against sectarian theology. He is not a philosopher. His interpretation of religion and its function in the human economy is superficial. He is an iconoclast in the realm of doctrinal theology."

THE Investigator, referring to a statement of the editor of the Banner of Light, that materialists "seem to think of nothing but what they shall eat and drink," says in reply: "Now, we find that this is not so: that they believe in ideas,—that is, in common-sense ones. Ideas, they say, improve the mind as pure air does the health. Nor are eating and drinking to be despised, as the rotund and jolly appearance of our spiritual neighbor bears witness. He has not been idle with his knife and fork; for he shows very well materially, though one of his lecturers lately said at the camp-meeting at Lake Pleasant that "Spiritualism will annihilate Materialism."

MRS. DELIA STEWART PARNELL, the American mother of the Irish agitator, recently addressed a union picnic of Land Leaguers in Washington, D.C., where her enthusiastic address in favor of the Land Leagues was greeted with "uproarious applause" from the assembled thousands. She is described as "about fifty years old, of large frame, rather portly, with black hair in which the grey was scarcely discernible," and as being richly and tastefully attired. Besides the Parnell, she has two other sons, one of whom owns a cotton plantation in Georgia and is an earnest Land Leaguer, while the other is a land-owner in Kilkenny, Ireland, and a strong conservative. One of her daughters, Miss Anna, is doing effective work for Ireland in arousing the enthusiasm of her own sex.

A DISPUTE having arisen in regard to the reputed great age of Sojourner Truth, the negro lecturer, who claims to be a centenarian, but who looks still so young and vigorous that her statement has been often doubted, a correspondent of the Lansing (Mich.) Republican says that a Mr. Waring Latting, of New York City, wrote, in February, 1879, in substance as follows in answer to the inquiries of a Mrs. Titus, of Battle Creek (Mich.): "As a slave, Sojourner was held for many years by John L. Dumont, an uncle of Mr. Latting, who resided on the west bank of the Hudson, directly opposite Hyde Park. In 1819, she was still held in slavery; and from her appearance, as he saw her in that year, she could not have been less than forty-four or forty-five years of age. . . . Accepting this as a basis, Sojourner would now (in 1879) be between one hundred and six and one hundred and seven years of age."

A WASHINGTON dispatch says Guiteau based his hopes of marrying a rich widow upon obtaining a Government appointment. The New York Tablet says: "While conducting revival meetings last June, Mrs. Sarah Van Cott exhibited several letters written to her by Charles J. Guiteau, prefacing the act with the statement, in substance, that Guiteau was formerly an infidel who had been converted through her efforts, and that since his conversion he was the smartest and most influential young man in Chicago. The letters were neatly tied together with a perfumed blue ribbon, and were a mixture of ambiguous dissertations upon things spiritual, rhapsodical references to his all-absorbing affection, profound admiration for and inexpressible gratitude to the lady evangelist, who, he said, had saved him. Said one of the ladies who was privileged to read the letters, 'Mrs. Van Cott expressed great pride in showing the letters, and seemed highly to esteem the author.' The lady says that she knows that Mrs. Van Cott is the wealthy widow the crack-brained fellow thought he could marry. Mrs. Van Cott is at present engaged in revival work in the interior of Wisconsin. We hope that she will not make any more converts like Guiteau."

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE of this city has done much in a quiet way for the cause of suffering humanity, and more especially in cases in which freedom or enlightenment was concerned. We are permitted to quote the following passage from a letter recently received by him from one of the recipients of his kindness, a lady who has sacrificed health and strength in teaching the freedmen of the South and helping them to help themselves, but who is now helpless through illness,—an illness fortunately made endurable by the thoughtful care of Mr. Fiske and others: "Mr. — brought me to-day your golden bounty of fifty dollars, to be deposited with the one hundred of last year, and assured me of your good-will in words of beautiful sympathy and respect for the work it has been my privilege to do for the freedmen. Your lovely offerings of flowers and cologne have been a source of constant pleasure and refreshment in my sick-room. . . I am greatly indebted to you for long years of continued help and cheering sympathy in our Virginia work; and I well know that is only a part, a small part, of your incessant and unselfish benefactions to make this world brighter and happier for human beings." We give these extracts in the hope that some richer man than Mr. Fiske may be moved by his example to win a like gratitude from the sick and needy.

FOREIGN.

EDWIN ARNOLD, author of the Light of Asia, is very ill in Scotland.

MR. WARRINGTON WOOD, the sculptor, now in London, has been commissioned to execute in marble a bust of the late Dean Stanley for the members of the family.

SIR EVELYN WOOD, the English general of South Africa, has a baby-girl who rejoices in two royal godmothers, her name retaining both of theirs, "Victoria-Engenie."

KOSUTH is living in Piedmont, not far from Turin. He is nearly eighty, but retains his power to work, and reads without glasses. He leads a retired life, but Americans he receives cordially.

POPE LEO XIII. regards the ascendancy of the civil power as a personal indignity, and is unhappy in Rome amid the scenes and symbols of lost glories. It is rumored that he will leave Rome and establish his court at Malta.

THE House of Commons has passed a measure for the relief of the Irish tenant farmers. With their usual indifference to the requirements of the Irish people, the Lords refuse to concur in the measure. The deadlock between the two houses of the English Parliament is likely to be broken and the bill adopted, but with some amendments.

REV. J. M. FLAD, a Swedish missionary, writes that King John of Abyssinia is a "fanatical Coptic Christian," that he will not tolerate European missionaries, Catholic or Protestant, and that he had all Moslems baptized. He punishes those who offend him by having their feet and legs cut off. His brutalities are said to rival those of the King of Dahomey. But Mr. Flad says, "I am glad to say that he is not against the circulation of the Word of God and good tracts, and so I hope that some good will come from the Scriptures and tracts I have brought this time into Abyssinia in such large numbers."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Pall Mall Gazette comments with severity upon the anti-Jewish feeling in Germany. This prejudice is carried to the basest extreme in excluding Jews, irrespective of their culture or position, from the barest civilities of social intercourse at home or abroad. Tourists desert any localities most frequented by these hated countrymen and neighbors, and, when forced into their presence by circumstances, treat them with absolute scorn and rudeness. When reminded of the different feeling existing in England, they declare it impossible that the Jews of that land should resemble those of Germany.

THE progressive women of England may possibly, hereafter, be a little less demonstrative of loyalty to the Queen, if she is going to place stumbling-blocks in the way of their material and intellectual advancement, as her veto of the admittance of women doctors to the recent international medical congress, held in London, would seem to indicate. They had been admitted in six preceding congresses, and were about to be in this, when Sir. William Jenner declared he was empowered by the Queen to withdraw her name as patron of the congress, if women were admitted to its sessions. Of course, that changed the vote and the resolution. Forty-three properly qualified lady physicians entered public protest against this unjust exclusion, to no avail.

JESTINGS.

A YOUNG lady, says a Chicago paper, on the West Side has just returned from Boston. While there, her uncle, who is a reporter on a sporting paper, took her to the Summer School of Philosophy at Concord. She heard some one read an essay on "The Absoluteness of Absolutism," and became infatuated with the doctrine taught. "Chawles," said she to her lover the other evening (he is a clerk in a harness store), "Chawles, do you realize that you cannot differentiate the indissoluble absoluteness of the absolute?" "No," he replied, "to tell you the truth, I don't." And, as it was the first time he had seen her since she got back, the suggestion uttered struck him with some alarm. "Do you ever stop to inquire," she began again, "into the inchoation or the rudimentary incipience of the rhapsodical coagmentation of your thoughts of love?" "Well, not to speak of," he said. "Then, if there is one drop of blood in your heart that pulsates for me, if there is one conceit, nooscopic or psychological, that, in the incogitancy of your dreams or in the perquisition of your waking hours, absorbs a thought of me, I beg that you would eliminate any abstruse or equivocal particles of distrust from the profound and all-transpicious abnormality of your love." "Great heavens, Maria, have you swallowed a dictionary?" "No, I have not," she said, with a look of stern and forbidding displeasure: "I have been to the School of Philosophy at Concord."

Supplied by FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont place, Boston.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873.

Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874.

Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875.

Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876.

Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses by the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations," and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Fall of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aims. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

If you do anything above party, the true-hearted ones of all parties sympathize with you.—Charles Kingsley.

We should surely learn henceforth not to identify Christianity with anything that science can assail or even question.—Mallock.

With regard to the choice of friends, there is little to say; for a friend is never chosen. A secret sympathy, the attraction of a thousand nameless qualities, a charm in the expression of the countenance, even in the voice or manner, a similarity of circumstances,—these are the things that begin attachment.—Mrs. Barbauld.

The world recognizes nothing short of performance, because the performance is what it needs, and promises are of no use to it.—Philip G. Hamerton.

Where no interest is taken in science, literature, and liberal pursuits, mere facts and insignificant criticisms necessarily become the themes of discourse; and minds, strangers alike to activity and meditation, become so limited as to render all intercourse with them at once tasteless and oppressive.—Madame De Staël.

There is a progress that elevates and betters the race in this pushing life of to-day, notwithstanding its evils. Education is the remedy that works surely in the mass beneath our civilization to make a part of it. The people are thinking, feeling, knowing more, becoming more capable of managing nature and managing themselves. It is still true that "through the shadow of the globe we sweep into the younger day." Pessimism is not the philosophy of the future, however it may at times seem so to a sensitive soul touched too deeply with these evils that appear so gross, because seen in the blaze of such light as never shone on the ills of elder days.—Editor of Springfield Republican.

"ALL my hurts

My garden spade can heal. A woodland walk,
A quest of river grapes, a mocking thrush,
A wild rose, or rock-loving columbine, Salve my worst wounds."

—Bronson Alcott.

The lonely man is lord of his own hours and his own purse, his days are long and unbroken, he escapes from every form of ostentation, and may live quite simply and sincerely in great calm breadths of leisure.—Philip Hamerton.

What matters it, if the vast torrent of the world's life bears down to the future on its bosom no memory of our petty lives? Enough be it, enough it is, that the grand eternal beauty of the idea that has visited us has not been selfishly secluded in the privacy of our own "chambers of imagery," but has been painted for all eyes on the canvas of an outward, living fact.—F. E. Abbot.

Duty speaks with the lawful authority of many voices: pleasure has no strength except in the longing desire of the hungry unit.—Edith Simcox.

"He, out of nothing, made sky, earth, and sea,
And all that in them is, man, beast, bird, fish,
Down to this insect on my parapet:
Look, how the marvel of a minin crawls!
We sit to kneel among the halt and maimed
And pray, 'Who mad'st this insect with ten legs
Make me one finger grow where ten were once,'
The very priests would thrust me out of church.
'What folly does the madman dare expect?'
No faith obtains, in this late age at least,
Such cure as that! We ease rheumatics, though."

—Robert Browning.

CURRENT TOPICS.

ALTHOUGH the President is in an extremely critical condition, there is yet a ray of hope that he will recover.

THE recent elections in France strengthen the position and influence of the radical progressive Republicans in that country.

THE statutes on the subject of divorce are so conflicting in the different States that they give rise to a vast amount of litigation based on perjury and fraud; and a sentiment is growing in favor of a uniform national law of marriage and divorce.

In the legislature of New Hampshire, a bill to repeal the law taxing church property in excess of $10,000 in value was recently defeated, after a protracted debate, by one hundred and twenty to ninety-nine. Even a bill like this, sustained by so large a minority, is a very encouraging indication of the growth and strength of a public sentiment in favor of the taxation of church property.

THE British House of Lords is a remnant of feudalism and the foe of popular liberty and progress. Five hundred men representing the aristocratic classes have the power to veto, simply by the privilege of birth, measures concurred in and adopted by the representatives of thirty-five million people. The best interests of the masses demand the total abolition of hereditary peerage in England.

OUR amiable "but seldom accurate" New York contemporary, the Catholic Review, commenting on a paragraph in the Index, says: "Even infallible popes do not 'create' dogmas. Definition is something different from creation." To this, we need only reply that the authority to define dogmas, to say what is and what is not true doctrine, implies the power to change,—to take from, or add to the creed of the Church; and therein is involved the power to create dogmas.

COL. MALLERY, in an address of uncommon ability, delivered at the thirtieth meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, now being held at Cincinnati, maintained that sign language, yet in use among Indians, is an instructive vestige of prehistoric speech, and points clearly to the progress of mankind from savagery. He is confident that sign language was the primitive language of man, and the true predecessor and parent of oral speech.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, the venerable President of the "National Liberal League," announces that this body will hold its fifth annual convention at Chicago, from September 30 to October 2 inclusive. The object of this organization is announced to be the secularization of the State; but it is to be regretted that it adopted resolutions at its convention last year which virtually exclude from participation in its proceedings men who, like Hurlburt, Abbot, Ingersoll, and Julian, believe in the total separation of Church and State, but are unconvinced of the wisdom of demanding the repeal of all postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails.

MORMON exhorters from Salt Lake City have been zealously at work the past few years in the mountain districts of Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, and Tennessee; and their reports that they have made numerous converts find confirmation in the announcement that a Mormon conference is to be held in Georgia. The New York Independent proposes the formation of an anti-Mormon missionary society, "whose object shall be to master fully the plans of the propaganda of the Latter-day Saints, and meet and circumvent them." Opposition of this sort is just what the Mormons want; for it attracts attention to them, awakens interest in their doctrines, enables their preachers to speak to large crowds of credulous men and women, and increases the number of conversions to their faith.

DR. LORING, in his address at the opening of the Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Fair in this city last Thursday, referred to the numerous evidences of New England labor and ingenuity by which he was surrounded, as the legitimate fruits of protection. But a Lowell is made possible because its manufacturers obtain higher prices for their goods than they could command without a protective tariff, and a part of the community is taxed to pay these prices. The burden falls largely on the agriculturists; and, although they have thus far borne up under it, an emergency may arise at any time that will cause the great West, with its enormous agricultural interests, to demand a policy more favorable to a general and equal distribution of the burden, and that will revive our foreign commerce, and bring back that maritime supremacy which was once the boast and glory of this country.

THE astute judge who lately indulged in a lively skirmish upon defunct theological remains is now trying a pitiful experiment with the bones of a long deceased associate in political life. But they serve a poor purpose as a sheltering wall against the sharp overhauling of present criticism of his past career; and he is not likely to find anything more substantial to add to the crumbling and thin barricade than the laughable features of his doctrinal refuge. If he were endowed with any noticeable degree of moral sensibility, he might well regret that his own bones had not accompanied those of his comrade to that earlier retirement from public scrutiny, and would privately wail over the new attention that has been aroused to the survey of unscrupulous items in his political past. The younger dabblers in nefarious schemes may see, if they will, that the shade of vanished years is not always sufficient to hide events and principles from the search of public conscience.

Influence of Theology on Society.

BY CHARLES ELLIS.

Every theology has been, in point of fact, a pseudo-solution of the problem of the universe and man's relation to it. Starting at the primitive savage's dream, we come up through fetichism and polytheism to monotheism, see anthropomorphism shade off into theism, theism into the absolute, unknown, unknowable. The modern evolutionist is the legitimate successor of them all. He has stripped the question of dreams, ghosts, vast spirit powers, anthropomorphic gods, and all supernatural agencies, and placed it upon natural law. Henceforth, the whole question is purely one of science. But, for this very reason, there must arise a fiercer conflict between theology, the supernatural method, and philosophy, the scientific method, than the world has yet seen. If, on the scientific side, the question has become so clear that he who runs may read, still the supernatural side is fortified with age, wealth, keenness of sophistical argument, and power of inherited superstition. People are slow to change mental conditions.

"Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers."

While it is by no means a welcome task, it is a necessary one, that the real character of theology and its relation to and its influence upon society shall be made so plain that sophistry and superstition can no longer uphold it. The end—which is the freeing of the human mind from the thralldom of falsehood and the establishment of harmony between man and his environment, the universe—not only justifies, but necessitates the means, which is to give truth possession of the world of man. Theology holds its sway over the human mind largely through the fact that the masses are incapable of investigating it for themselves, and so must rest upon the representations of theological teachers; and the world never had as many men capable of compounding theological sophistries as it has to-day. They are often as capable of understanding the truth of modern science as are the scientific investigators themselves; but they hide the truth or distort it, and give their whole energy, generally speaking, to fortify the lingering error of the supernatural origin of things and the mistaken conception of man's place and duty in the universe. To this fact is due the singular inconsistency between the intellectual and the moral conditions of society at large. Were people as moral as they are intelligent, society would be vastly better than it is. That it is not so is because society is governed morally by theological doctrines that have been outgrown intellectually. In this essay, I shall show wherein I think the influence of theology is injurious to society.

The theological conception of the universe and man's relation to it is utterly irreconcilable with intellectual development and knowledge. If accepted, it must be either through still existing ignorance, or a surrender of mind to quiescent faith, on the ground that our knowledge is untrustworthy, and nothing but "revelation" is reliable. While many do surrender and accept the situation, and pass through life in perpetual imprisonment, many more refuse to surrender, and, hounded in the hunt for heresy, finally stand at bay and forswear all respect, not only for what they believe to be a false theology, but for whatever restraining moral tendencies exist along with it in the Church. There are others who render only a "make-believe" allegiance to theology for its value from a business or social point of view.

Measured by their attitude toward theology, there are four classes of people in society:—

1. Those who honestly accept theology, with all it implies, try to believe it, and who do, as nearly as possible, live up to its requirements.
2. Those who secretly reject it, but keep up a pretence of belief.
3. Those who reject it because of its apparent absurdities and contradictions of common-sense, but who are incapable of putting anything better in its place than their own egotism. They are people who have wit enough and courage enough to see and reject the brawling terrors and pasteboard mask of horrors that theology sets up as person and will of God, but not also enough to find the true heart of things behind the priestly farce; and so they stop right there in the east wind of denial, which develops only a cold selfishness of indifference and "individuality" that dethrones God and erects self in its stead, and worships its own vanity, and, finding that the world will not also worship there, settles down into the slough of pessimistic disgust, and henceforth gives everything a bad name, and at last does its one good act in dying, and so removing a "spot" from the face of the sun of hope.

4. Those who not only reject the theological conception, but who fill its emptiness and horror with truth, beauty, joy.

The first class are honest. They do as well as they know or dare. They are slaves to their fears, and hate freedom of thought, because it is to them a wife of Satan for the destruction of their souls.

The second class are clearly dishonest.

The third class, though honest in their attitude toward theology, have no ideal of life, sink to the level of immorality, run into the second class by invisible shadings, and with them help to fill the ranks of the vicious.

The fourth class are in all time the embodiment of the prophetic soul in the world, and must forever be the saving and elevating power of mankind. They are the only resounding voice of God that can ever speak to humanity; and upon their shoulders is fixed, by the nature of things, the high duty of proclaiming the way, the truth, and the life to the groping, wallowing world of man.

What are the prospects for the continuance of these classes in their present proportional numbers? To answer the question, we must consider the influence of theology upon society.

It might be objected that my use of the term "theology" is too sweeping, that I do not distinguish between theology and religion. Let me anticipate the objection by saying that I have not arrived at that point where I really see any distinction. We have had both theology and religion, it is true; but the religion has never, to much extent, been more than admission on the side of the people of the correctness of theology on the side of the priests. The one has been the revised statutes of theocracy, the other has been the observance of them by the governed. When theology and priestcraft have become obsolete, or prospectively so, at least, like kingcraft, then we will begin to see the coming prince of religion. In this wise looking at it, I feel justified in my understanding and treatment of theology.

What are its pretensions? That it covers the entire field of human action and life, that all correctness of life here and all happiness of life hereafter are under its direct supervision and control, that the first can be realized only under its direction, the second be gained only through implicit obedience to its commandments. It holds the keys of heaven and of hell, too, and will send us here or there as we do or disobey its instructions. That it pretends to act for God through "revealed will" does not alter the case. Though the prosecution has been on the calendar for ages in the name of God, he has never been put on the stand. Until he is, we will not recognize him as a party to the suit, and shall hold ourselves to be strictly correct in considering the use of God's name in the suit to be merely a trick by which the intelligent priesthoods of to-day, who know better, hide their fraud and keep alive their power. Logically, there is nothing in theology but pretence. If such a despotism were put forward to-day for the first time, even in the name of God, it would receive no other attention than laughter. It is powerful because it is old. Fear of it has been handed down in our blood for thousands of years. Yet it started in the name of man. It was the rule of the chief over his tribe. Glance at its genesis. Out of dreams grew crude conceptions of spirits. Out of the belief in spirits grew belief in gods. A chief died, and his successor found it easier to rule by pretending to hold intercourse with the spirit of the departed chief. From the control of a tribe through fear of the spirit of a dead chief, it was but a step to a more absolute control in the name of an almost equally dream-born God. Once that dread ghost of the infinite darkness obtained its sway, based, as it was, on the ignorance of the governed, it was fixed until such time as slowly evolving intelligence should lift the slave into the light of knowledge and the freedom of the mind. How slow, how long, how dismal, how horrible often, has been the struggle of the human mind to throw off that nightmare of despotism, we, enjoying the peaceful sleep of freedom and intelligence, can never fully realize. Nor is the struggle ended. Even now, in the midst of "foremost civilization of the world," in "chief intellectual centres," how few there are who have the moral and intellectual courage to declare their independence of that old, old theocracy that, in the hands of priests and the name of God, commands us all to "believe or be damned"! The sacerdotal managers of the grand consolidated lottery of heaven, in which every ticket (sold only for cash invariably in advance) is warranted to draw a prize, fully understand the situation, and none laugh so loud at the stupidity of their victims as they. No vaster humbug will ever rise, though our race should run its course from infancy through savagery to barbarism and civilization a thousand times. But shame on the cowardice of the intelligent world that it does not paralyze the pretenders with laughter and derision! What intelligent person does not smile at the doctrine that God created the universe out of nothing! Who dares to believe that about six thousand years ago God gathered up his arms full of nothing, as a man gathers up a bundle of hay, rolled it up into a ball, and sent it spinning from his fingers through space over a thousand miles a minute? Or, supposing that done, where would the earth have been at the end of the second or third day, when God had the trees, the plants, and grasses ready to set out? Or, when he had got the animals ready to turn out to pasture, where would the pasture have been? I can imagine God's predicament. Away off yonder is the world, singing through space wilder than ever minnie bullet flew, three days gone at a rate of sixteen hundred miles a minute, and here is God trying to get his planting done, trying to get the trees and shrubs and potatoes and onions and cabbages and roses and lilies set out so that they would bear fruit right away, or, poisoning himself on a loose cake of nothing and tossing a mammoth so as to overtake the earth and not get hurt in stopping, or starting our solitary first parent off at the end of the fifth day, with the injunction to brace up and look alive if he wanted to get home before dark. Perhaps I ought to ask pardon for this. Still, it is done only to call attention to what everyone knows, but has forgotten, the emptiness and absurdity of theology even in its very first step. Of course, people don't believe such things, but for long the wildest of such vagaries were accepted as true; and the doctrine of creation out of nothing is yet a fundamental dogma of much Christian theology. As of this, so of other dogmas. If people will only think them through, they carry their own destruction with them. The doctrine of the trinity is one. No person who has ever learned the multiplication table can ever for a moment believe that three times one are one. But, when there was no multiplication table, it was as easy to believe that as any other statement of which nothing was known. Again, the idea that some one could commit murder, for instance, and that the law is doing the will of God if it hangs an innocent person, which is "vicarious atonement," is so preposterous that the mind cannot now seriously entertain it. But it was all right when there was no sense of justice, and only a sense of vengeance that must have satisfaction. So the doctrine that "baptism" is better for the soul than common-sense bathing is something that the mind cannot understand. So the common belief that condemned criminals, when they lose hope in the plea of "insanity," can "get religion" on the trap of the scaffold and enter heaven broken-necked, transformed into angels of light, is another of the mysteries of theology, the knowledge of which is not for the wise, but for "babes and sucklings," apparently. But enough. These absurdities can only be accepted by a surrender of mind. They are, therefore, evil; and, the more absurd they become, the greater the evil that results from belief in them. They declare war between wisdom and fear; and, as long as they reign, so long must mind wear chains. But with mental development must come doubt of them, and with doubt on the one hand there grows hypocrisy on the other, just as long as, for any reason, a seeming allegiance to theology continues. The first of the four classes before named was once the only class. It comprised all. But for hundreds of years that class has been more and more ceasing to be universal. Still, the power of theology is scarcely less than almighty yet. Under it, the imagination still clothes the darkness of the unknown with terrors that are tyrants.

Now, for the reason that the majority of people openly or tacitly admit that theology is right, a rapidly increasing number of people, forming the second class spoken of, play the rôle of hypocrites, pretending to believe what it is unpopular to doubt or deny. Here is an open door to a whole host of evils. If people play the hypocrite in their religion, where will they not be hypocrites? If they dare to practise deception in their relation with God, where will their deception end? If they are false in what they have been taught to believe is the highest possible concern of human life, when will they not be false? Clearly, we can answer these questions in but one way. Such people have entered upon a downward road whose legitimate end is a bottomless pit. Yet this result is due to the influence of the theology. How? It arises from the long-prevalent teaching that morality is a part of theology, that it embodies man's relation and duty, not to man, but to God. For ages, the world has been taught that morality consisted in obeying commands said to have been made by God. Thus, millions of human beings have been murdered in obedience to the dictates of theological interpretations of a supposed will of God. Thus, human beings have been murdered on "sacred altars," as gifts presented to God; thus, the persecution of witches; thus, the burning of infidels. The most atrocious of crimes against men and women have been committed with a sense of moral duty done to God, utterly regardless of the immorality done to man. That is, the world has been taught that morality was a duty of belief and worship forced upon mankind by will of an almighty God, who was swift to visit eternal pains upon all who did not obey, and upon all who did not punish those who did not obey. In the name of God, Theology, bloodiest tyrant of all the ages, has raised the hand of man against his fellow-man, and crimsoned the world with the blood of innocence.

But look again. As men and women rise to a stage of development in which they secretly or openly doubt and reject the God who has been exacting such service and inflicting such punishment, it follows with the rigor of logic that they will at the same time doubt and reject, or simply forget, all idea of morality based upon their conception of such God and such service. Thus, it follows that a decline of the hold of popular theology upon the public mind is accompanied by a decline of morals as well. It has often been said that the doctrine of eternal torment has been good for mankind. In one way, it has. As long as people believed honestly that such doctrine was true, fear held them under restraint. To great extent, such restraint is in actual existence to-day. There are thousands who refrain from evil because they believe in theology. But, with the rush and rise of a Bay of Fundy tide, scepticism in regard to "hell" and "future punishments" is sweeping people rapidly away from their old moorings of belief. Few preachers now dare to teach that ancient doctrine of terror. People are fast outgrowing it; but they, in the exuberance of their joy, fail to realize the corollaries of that scepticism. When that has lost its hold, the old conception of God must have gone before. But that is not all. The moment the mind arrives at a doubt of the correctness of that conception of God, it is in nine out of ten cases, so to speak, all at sea. Then comes the period of passage, the voyage of uncertainty between the crumbling empire of despotic "divine" government and the republic of mental freedom and the God of science. Few people there are who can sail direct from one to the other. Generally, they are tossed about in storm of doubt and regret, hope and despair; and many at last are driven back to the shore from whence they started, and crawl back to the "bosom" of the Church never to move henceforth again; while many more become pirates upon the open sea of society, and in defiance of all law, human or divine, prey upon their fellow-men for the gratification of their own heartless selfishness, greed, and passion; and only the few possessing the clearest and strongest powers of head and heart reach the shores of liberty in safety and with profit. But, and this is the hope of the world, this latter class must steadily increase with the outward sweep and development of mind. The point that cannot be reasoned away is this: that, when people come to believe that hell and future torments, as punishment of disobedience to "revealed will of God," as set forth in prevailing theology, are mythical, are untrue, fear ceases to be a factor in the status of their lives. Then, so far as fear has been a restraint upon them, holding them out of evil toward which temptation was ever decoying them, the destruction and removal of that restraint will plunge them into the evil. To the mass of people growing sceptical in regard to the prevailing theological conception of the universe and of the government of the world by terrorism, there has yet come no proper conception of moral sense and the real place and use of moral conduct. This, I am aware, seems perhaps too broad a statement, but still I think reflection upon the real condition of the half "unchurched" masses in our centres of population will warrant it; and it is to such, and not to those who grow out of theology by the head and heart, that I refer. They see that the accepted theological doctrine of things is at variance with common-sense. Earnest reflection upon such subjects they are incapable of making. They skim over the surface of the logic against it, catch up the popular clamor for liberty, and, without knowing what that is or means, convert it into license, cultivate a prejudice against theology and church, and God of these two, and henceforth swell the rabble of dissonant hooters against all idea of divine law, order, and development. This is an evil that has never been fully realized by those who eagerly spout their latest radical yawn for the speedy reign of "liberalism" and what not. It is an appalling evil, when seen at its intrinsic ugliness and prophetic hideousness of effect upon society. It is the malarious quagmire of mental and moral discontent that breeds communism, free-love, dark circles, affinities, and all manner of cancerous curses that destroy. But it is all the result of false theological conceptions and teachings. For it, all these will formulate a certain kind of logic for excuse of their infernalisms. They will turn and say: "You taught us that God was thus and so; and you proved it by your 'divine will' and 'revelation.' You taught us that morality was obedience to the commands of your 'divine will' revealed. You taught us that morality was the measure of our favor with God and the surety of our escape from hell. We believed you. But we have found that your God is a mask, your divine will a falsehood, your revelation a lie, your future torments a humbug, manufactured and exhibited like Punch and Judy before a terrorized world for the benefit of priesthoods that have been the utmost frauds of all. Go to now! We will obey you no longer. Your Bastille walls are down, and we are free. The world is our fair field, and we propose to riot in liberty. Our lives are our own: we will take the consequences of our own conduct, and run all risks of future woe. So come," they exclaim in the voice of their favorite Byron, "let us have wine, women, and song to-day, even if we can have only headache and soda-water to-morrow." Villany, from top to bottom, from garret to cellar, and down into sewer substratum of vice, relies upon this sophistry of the brain for its excuse to live and grow. Thieves, prostitutes, liars, and murderers, in short the whole crew of social fiendism, solace themselves with such argument. They plan by day and prowl by night, with a bloated satisfaction that their argument is sound; that they have mastered the problem of the universe; that there is no God, no morality, no hell, no future torment, and the chief purpose of life is to obtain the greatest amount of gratification for the strongest passion of the hour. When the law of the State or the law of nature overtakes them, and they stand on the gallows or gasp on the bed of death, and know that the end has come, they reveal the rottenness of their logic by crawling back into the Church to die with confession of faith on their lips; and so die as they lived, with a lie on their tongues.

All this hateful fact, this deadly poison in the veins of society, is traceable to theology. It is the legitimate result of insisting that the world must believe, or be damned, what the world was sure to discover to be a fraud. It has plunged the world of man, that it has been professing to save, into degradation and woe; and still, with blind or wilful obstinacy, it stands shouting, "He that believeth not shall be damned!" Still, it adds to the evil by vainly striving to cure the degradation that itself has produced, is still producing, by insisting upon its exploded and fatally ludicrous theories and doctrines of the universe, of God, and of man's relations thereto. In times long past, when the mind of the best man was but little, if anything, more than that of the child to-day, questions were easily answered. Ignorance answered unto ignorance, and all went as well as could be, then. But to-day mind asks and asks questions of theology, to which it gives only, or substantially, the same answers that it gave to the childhood of the human mind. To-day, we ask theology in vain for wisdom concerning things that we would know of the vast universe and our relation to it. As far as theology can help it or answer its appeals, humanity is "An infant crying in the night,

And with no answer but a cry."

If we have no source of light, of knowledge, of wisdom, and relief but theology, we are indeed hopelessly stranded on rocks of despair. For the deepest questions that rise to the sober, thoughtful soul, it has no answer save the old command of surrender or threat of woe. For the thousand ills of society, it has no cure but faith in what is impossible, even to the dullest mediocrity of the times. So far as it is accepted honestly, ignorance is peace, if not bliss; but beyond that smaller growing class comes that larger growing class of those who play the farce of acceptance before the eye of the Church, while in secret they practise the tragedy of hypocrisy and follow the downward lead of immorality.

While it is thus that the thoughtful can get no help, no hope, from theology, and the unthoughtful get only acceleration of downward velocity, what is there as representative body of men and women from whom light and wisdom can come; or where is there body of benevolent men and women who will be ways and means for the voice of truth that, as of old, must "hire a hall" and "dead-head" an audience, while humbug and charlatany draws its thousands with "reserved seats" at dollar and dollars each? Will it ever exist? That depends on whether moral courage can be found in connection with knowledge of truth and possession of wealth. That is how the matter stands now; and, on the whole, it is not too encouraging. Apathy stands at the helm, the sails fall idly against the masts, the ship rolls and staggers in the dead calm of indifference, and we drift with the times.

Thus, the condition of things implied in "moral interregnum" has already to some extent come, and will remain in worse and worst conditions until the world realizes that no civilization, no society, can be safe that is not based upon natural instead of theological morality. The first step out of interregnum is the elucidation of a philosophy of the universe and man's relation to it that will place morality in direct line of evolution and natural order of development of human mind and heart, the intellect and the emotions. Morality must take its place by the side of intellectual development as guide and regulator not of man's duty to God, but to man. Philosophy of transcendentalism will not do the work. It may be well enough for those who need not the physician; but, for the sick society that suffers from loss of faith in a theology that has so long controlled by fear, there must be the "heroic treatment" of plain, solid truth. Such a philosophy as suggested above has been already to great extent made by such men as Spencer, Lewes, and others; but it has never been applied as antidote to evils of society. It may be that it is not yet sufficiently perfected. If so, then the great need of the times is a mind that can so perfect and apply it. That done, society will have a foundation upon which civilization can grow, to stand while the ages endure. Until then, theology must continue its disintegrating work of destruction.

Here stand we to-day. What, now, is the attitude of the very best Liberals, Freethinkers, and Free Religionists toward the problem? Almost wholly one of indifference. There is, doubtless, a powerful reason for this to be found in the objectionable character that has been given to such movement by the mental vagrancy that has captured, disgraced, and degraded it of late. But, happily, that moral interregnum has spent its fury; and sober wisdom is gathering up the reins for a more guarded advance in the future. The opportunity to-day before Free Religion and Freethought to do a grand work for the moral health of humanity has never been equalled: the need has never been more apparent, the duty more importunate, than now. By rising to the importance of the occasion, by putting itself into action as the leader of that work, true Liberalism will become a new Messiah, and fill the void of uncertainty and unrest that exists among the masses everywhere, make darkness bright with the light of new meaning in life, make our relation to the universe clear, bring the world into harmony with the grander God, make worship a joy instead of a duty, change unrest to happy trust, and open up a glimpse of that golden time when conception of God shall have risen to the "perfection" of the long-lingering guess in the dark, through the ultimate development of humanity itself to the same perfection. To wake this work to enthusiasm is within the power of any company of men and women who will furnish the truth, not the guesses at it in times long gone, when a guess was all that could be had at best, but the truth as it is known beyond question to-day, an opportunity to be heard. Ways and means are needed. While millions go yearly to keep alive the baneful influence of theology, Liberalism is obliged to take five-cent contributions in the hat. While, also, the vile trash of half or wholly obscene publications fattens on contributions to feed libertinism, liberty and up-riety starve. As brave a man as ever fought for truth and honesty in any country was compelled to drop his pen and turn to other pursuits to live, and charlatanism triumphed in his abdication. But, until the battle he waged is fought to the end and victory secured for the principles upon which he stood, Liberalism will be used as a cloak to cover the fraud of designing men who make commerce out of the world's disgust with the falsehoods of theology; and, until theology is replaced by scientific knowledge, fraud will continue to draw its strongest support from a mistaken use of the name of God.

THE CATHEDRALS OF EUROPE.

Great edifices, with an elaborate and impressive architecture, adapted to and symbolical of some prevalent belief or idea, are, so to speak, the clothes or outer integuments of that belief, to borrow a phrase from the philosophy of Herr Teufelsdröckh. They make it palpable to and appreciable by the multitude whose awe they command. For centuries, the cathedrals of Europe, the temples of mediæval Christianity, have been the dominant edifices of European cities and towns, as the feudal lord's castle used to tower over the cabins of his serfs and retainers. The cathedrals were, in fact, the ecclesiastical counterparts of the feudal castles. They towered over men's minds, as the castles did over their habitations. They are vast, awe-inspiring instruments of the gloomy and abject faith of the dark ages. They were built, like the Egyptian Pyramids, to last as long as the earth itself. At length, in the course of human development, these mighty minsters, like the old Ionic and Dorian temples which preceded them on the soil of Europe, have become mere relics of the past, without significance to the modern world. What is to become of them? Of course, as long as priests, kings, and emperors lord it over Europe, they will continue to stand, and even have a finishing touch put upon them after the lapse of centuries, as in the case of the cathedral of Cologne. But priests, kings, and emperors are, evidently, on the eve of "going." The great old Greek temples at Olympia, Ephesus, Delphi, Delos, and the other centres of ancient polytheism, were finally destroyed by the fanatical fury of filthy Christian monks, who were the dirtiest beasts on record. Gibbon gives a graphic account of the destruction of the great pagan temple at Alexandria in Egypt, probably the vastest structure ever dedicated to religious superstition, beside which St. Peter's at Rome would appear puny. It was generally believed by Alexandrians of the period that the world would collapse, if the titanic idol enshrined in this temple was demolished. A sailor, if we remember aright, with the proverbial daring of his class, dealt the head of the idol a blow with an axe. Presently, the god was being hauled through the streets of Alexandria amid the derisive shouts of the mob, the earth meantime revolving as usual in the most unconcerned manner. Milan cathedral, St. Peter's at Rome, Notre Dame, Cologne cathedral, etc., belong to the same category of edifices to which the temple of Jupiter at Elis and of the Celestial Venus at Carthage and of Diana at Ephesus belonged. The latter were the prototypes of the former, not in architecture, but in purpose and significance. All the cathedrals of Europe and the puny imitations of them, which are being erected at this time of day by foreign papists in our free American cities, are huge anachronisms, without the least relation to current human life, mere promoters of superstition. But it will be said that, from an æsthetic point of view, they are worthy of preservation as old curiosity shops. But the great old Greek temples were remorselessly destroyed by a filthy, monkish canaille; temples which, in architectural grandeur and beauty, were far more deserving of conservation than are those huge kennels of mediæval superstition and idolatry, the cathedrals. Of one thing we may be certain: that, if there comes another final struggle to vindicate the rights of man and clear the soil of Europe of rubbish, the Church of St. Peter's at Rome will stand "a right smart chance" of mounting on the wings of dynamite into the atmosphere. Amateurs and dilettanti may shrink aghast at the mere thought of such desecration, as the cant phrase is; but the church in question, as the great central edifice of a debasing superstition, which has greatly overlived its day, is unspeakably pernicious. The best thing we know about it is that it was partly suggestive of Emerson's magnificent poem entitled "The Problem." That fact still entitles it to some respect, along with the farther fact of Michel Angelo's part in its erection.

ICONOCLASM.

That the spirit of reform must sometimes enter the temples of error and break with righteous severity the images of a superstitious faith is no doubt one of the necessities of progress. But there comes a time in the progress of reform when the hammer of the iconoclast should cease pounding the fragments of broken symbols, and begin shaping material for the new temple of faith that must succeed the old shrine of the past. A passion for destruction as a finality is not the true spirit of progress. To kick and defy prostrate idols is as puerile as it is unprofitable.

I have before several times said that the iconoclastic mission of Liberalism was being too liberally construed, that the affirmative and constructive work which should follow the decay of the Christian faith was not prosecuted with sufficient vigor and enthusiasm. This to many Liberals is evidence of superstitious cowardice on my part, and the freethinker is still urged to carry the sledge-hammer warfare into the temples of the "gods." This continued fondness for image-breaking after the world has so little faith in these symbols, of a departing religion, seems to me a childish weakness in Liberalism. The destructive work of freethought has been too much in excess of its building energies. Doubt in every form has been inculcated everywhere. The world to-day meets everything with negation. Ask almost any one his belief, and you find he has only disbelief. Doubt, paralyzing, hopeless doubt, is on all sides of us; and thousands of human hearts are hungering for the bread of life, yet find only the hard, pitiless stones of denial. Do not Liberals already disbelieve enough? They have explored the skies, and found no God, no heaven. The devil and his sulphurous realm have vanished before their dauntless research. The rigid analysis to which they have subjected man has discovered no immortal soul. Leaving the vagaries of religion as unworthy of serious thought, some of our restless iconoclasts have found the moral law itself as unsubstantial as the claims of theology. Still, the hammer of destruction must not stay its vengeful strokes, or the "gods" may get possession of the world again, and enslave once more the human mind. How many readers of the Index have grown tired of this din of mimic battle with the helpless "gods"? How many of them still enjoy seeing the poor images of a dying faith shattered by the merciless strokes of heroic iconoclasts? How many are made strong in mind and heart by the constant repetition of those rude assaults on the Bible and the Church, that for years have characterized the iconoclastic method of Liberalism? Who have felt their sympathies for every noble cause, their love for genuine righteousness, expand under the ministry of those iconoclastic apostles who never tire of spitting in the faces of the "gods," and of talking familiarly with the devil? How many Liberals have been led to hate obscenity of speech and thought more intensely by the vulgar comments made on certain passages of the Bible by those brave reformers who have such acute olfactories when hunting for a stench associated with religion? I am anxious to find the man, and especially more anxious to find the woman, to whom this style of liberal preaching has been a means of spiritual growth. That this crude and childish manner of opposing religious error should ever have been tolerated by intelligent and self-respecting Liberals is to me one of the enigmas of reform.

Throughout the West are thousands of young men who have been taught to disbelieve every doctrine of the Church. They know where to find the worst passages of the Bible, and are fluent in ridiculing all forms of piety. They are too chaste to read such a filthy story as the myth which the priests have written about the birth of Jesus, but a coarse joke in a saloon is not so repugnant to their moral sensibilities. Iconoclasin has taught these young men to despise the "gods," but it has done no more. It has freed them from the superstitious bondage of the priests, but it has not bound them to a higher law of righteousness. It has given them contempt for piety, but no reverence for the sanctity of life. That Liberalism which thus sets the young sons and daughters of liberty adrift on the perilous sea of doubt, and leaves them to the chances of this uncertain voyage, is an evil against which every friend of humanity should make an unequivocal protest. To teach the young men and women on whom the destiny of the world must soon rest to disbelieve the Bible by making fun of its absurdities and emphasizing its most objectionable passages, and then leave them without any moral guide for life's dangerous journey, is a reform only in name. It will require something more to reform the world than to induce the majority of mankind to discard the capital G in writing the name of the Christian Deity. Familiarity with the most indelicate passages of the Bible will not of itself make men and women chaste. Believing that the Church is the hiding-place of hypocrites and villains will not alone convert young Liberals into paragons of integrity.

Liberalism can now be a blessing to the world only by becoming vitally constructive, and emphasizing the affirmative side of life. Doubt will maintain itself: it needs no nursing. Infidelity will increase faster than it can be utilized in the conservative processes of moral growth. The world needs now to learn to believe: it already doubts and anxiously gropes in darkness. What has Liberalism to give that will make man better than the faith of the past, this is the question now to be answered? Human life cannot be sustained on doubt. Man is saved by faith; and, unless Liberalism learns this truth and conforms to it, the future will know the image-breakers of to-day only as blind and foolish fanatics, reformers merely in their own childish conceit.

In all that I have said against the kind of Liberalism that is objectionable to me, I have certainly been free from personal prejudice; for I do not know one man or woman who is now in any way prominent as a liberal teacher. I have had for several years decided convictions that Liberalism was in danger of abusing its opportunities for good; and I believe the Index has many readers who will say that I have not criticised imaginary evils in the iconoclastic phase of freethought.

H. CLAY NEVILLE.

[It is our conviction that "faith in these symbols of a departing religion" is yet so strong that the work of criticism is not only justifiable, but greatly needed. The labors of the earnest iconoclast will not be without value, so long as irrational dogmas are believed by millions, and talent, treasure, and moral enthusiasm are misdirected in their defence and perpetuation. At the same time, we think with Mr. Neville that more prominence should be given to the positive and constructive side of Liberalism. There may be erratic individuals who "have found the moral law itself as unsubstantial as the claims of theology," but no class of Liberals so believe; and Liberalism, general and inclusive as the name is, should not be held responsible for all the nonsense uttered or written by anarchists and vagabonds. Mr. Neville is offended by exposures of the indecencies of the Bible; but these exposures, although often unwisely made, are but a natural result of the absurd claim that the Bible is God's inspired word. Until that claim is surrendered, unbelievers will continue to point to the defects of the Bible; and, until the clergy as a class stop associating Liberalism with immorality, and learn to treat objectors to their theology with common courtesy, there will be persons who will retort in like spirit, and sometimes with less delicacy than vigor. "To teach the young men and women, on whom the destiny of the world must soon rest, to disbelieve the Bible, by making fun of its absurdities and emphasizing its most objectionable passages," is right and proper while these absurdities are defended by thousands of clergymen and are believed by millions of people to be inspired truth; "but this does not leave them without any moral guide for life's dangerous journey." "A moral guide" depends no more upon the absurdities of the Bible than it did twenty-three hundred years ago upon the vagaries of the Grecian mythology. Morality has its real, indestructible foundation in the nature of man and his manifold relations, and not in the assumptions of supernaturalism. "Man is saved by faith," but by that faith which is based upon observation, experience, and reflection. Theological faith is the enemy of science and of progress.—ED.]

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

NO. IV.

There are few things which more decidedly mark the growth of rationalistic tendencies in our day than the change that has taken place in regard to the opening on Sunday of libraries and museums of art and science. Indeed, these very institutions themselves have indirectly contributed in an important degree to this result. They are, at least in the number, magnitude, and measure of influence in which they now exist, comparatively a recent public development. Once having arisen, it was very easy to see that to shut them up on Sunday was virtually to exclude a very large class of the community, and one that should be especially considered, from their benefits altogether. But the proposition for this reasonable concession, in behalf of the people, met with strenuous opposition from those who were righteous overmuch. Here in Boston, when the innovation was under consideration a few years since, the clergy were particularly bitter against the movement; those of some denominations taking the subject up, just as they have the running of horse-cars and Sunday trains, and as they opposed the opening of the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia in their conventions and "ministers' meetings," and passing protesting resolutions in regard to it, more distinguished for bigoted intolerance and pharisaic rant and narrowness than they were for a sensible and practical view of the case. But this clamor has very notably subsided in this city, so far as the institutions referred to are concerned, as is sure to be the ultimate issue of any similar controversy in respect to a modification of the customs of society in which conservatism and pietism array themselves against what is likely to be beneficial and desirable. But let no one suppose that the surrender of the opponents to the step in the direction of progress, here mentioned, was in consequence of intelligent conviction or willingness. It was quite the reverse. It was simply because they were compelled to yield, being overpowered. "The lost cause" in this instance, like that of our brethren in the South, would be resumed at any time by many of them, if they thought there was a reasonable chance of victory. Whenever the same proposition comes up in any city, or even in one of our New England towns, there is sure to be a similar hostility for a time. The clergy and religious people in general in fact are dull scholars, and learn to conform to new ideas and social changes, that conflict with the habits of thought to which they have been accustomed, but slowly. They never lead in such instances, but move only as they are impelled and driven forward.

I have taken occasion of late to look, from time to time, on Sunday, into some of these public institutions here in Boston that are open on this day, and to observe the effect of the change. It is, I think, one of the innovations of President Eliot's administration at Cambridge that the great Museum of Natural History and Paleontology of the University is now open on Sunday, a thing, if I am not mistaken, unknown before to its classic precincts. How heartily it would have enlisted the sympathy and gladdened the heart of the great naturalist whose enthusiastic labors were so long and generously given to building up this most important and incalculably valuable adjunct of the University! Indeed, we have heard it intimated there were those in that quarter, in his more conservative time, that were a good deal disturbed because he preferred to work in the museum on Sunday to going to church.

It is more than twenty years since the museum was founded, but it is yet incomplete. There are apartments of its structure which have not yet been opened, and large quantities of collections that remain unassorted and unarranged; while more are being constantly added to those deposited, and that are destined to make it, eventually, equal in this respect to any institution of the kind in this country, if it shall not even exceed them.

It would be a futile effort, of course, to attempt to describe this vast collection in the space allotted us in these columns. The mode of classification pursued is a strictly scientific one. There is no regard to mere show or outward effect. It is an exhibition designed not to entertain idle curiosity, but to instruct the intelligent observer. Each division of the objects embraced is assigned to its own room or apartment, and arranged in a complete system of its subdivisions in the order of their natural relations. The labelling and explanatory cards in connection with them are very clear and helpful to the unscientific or but partially scientific visitor. It was pleasant to observe that a considerable number of those present were evidently of the uneducated class. For, even to these, the influence of what they saw could not but tend greatly to enlarge their acquaintance with the wonderful organisms of nature of the ages past and that now exist on the earth, and quicken the desire for greater knowledge in respect to all that pertains to them; while, to the intelligent student, the aid afforded in pursuing special lines of inquiry and research is at once a privilege and service beyond all estimation. To deny, under such circumstances, these advantages to those who desire to use them on Sunday, and can use them on this day perhaps better than on any other, is sheer stupidity and intolerant foggyism.

At another time, I may have occasion to say something of other public institutions in Boston or the neighborhood which are also open on Sunday.

REPLY TO G. B. STEBBINS.

The members of the Cosmian Society of Florence, who read Mr. Stebbins' report of his own remarks at the Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, will not share in his fears that truth would be worsted in a conflict with error. The Cosmian Society was organized on the very principle which he condemns; and its eighteen years of harmonious and successful working practically refute the notion that persons of different views cannot organize in a town or neighborhood, for continued effort in education and for the promotion of truth and goodness.

It is said, if we bring together opposites in thought, the result will be that on one day one doctrine will be taught, and on the next its opposite. But how are we to get at the truth, unless we reason together and examine all sides? Shall we adopt the theory that man is infallible, and that certain doctrines are not to be questioned? The first requisite in a searcher for truth is a teachable spirit, like the modest bearing of Sir Isaac Newton, who, with all his profound knowledge and splendid discoveries, said that he seemed to himself to have merely gathered a few pebbles on the sea-shore, while the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before him. Let this spirit animate our organizations, and we need have no fears of a union of opposites, or that, in grappling with error, truth will not come forth unscathed, and with all its invincible strength and majesty.

Friend Stebbins seems to fear negations, and wants us to build up as well as to pull down. Negation, however, may be the highest affirmation. Pulling down an old temple, to erect a better one in its place, is really a part of the construction of the new. All great reformations are great negations. Without egotism, the Cosmian Society can say that its efforts in building up, or in positive reformatory work, have been equal to, if not in advance of, any other religious society in its vicinity.

SETH HUNT.

WHEN he was President, Thomas Jefferson, in reply to a request that he appoint a day for fasting and prayer, said: "I consider the Government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from meddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises. . . . But it is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe, a day of fasting and prayer. That is, that I should indirectly assume to the United States an authority over religious exercises, which the Constitution has directly precluded them from. It must be meant, too, that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it,—not of fine and imprisonment, but with some degree of proscription, perhaps, in public opinion. And does the change in the nature of the penalty make the recommendation less a law of conduct for those to whom it is directed? I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercise, its discipline, or its doctrines; nor of the religious societies, that the general government should be invested with the power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises: the enjoining them, an act of discipline. Every religious society has a right to determine for itself the times for these exercises, and the objects proper for them, according to their own particular tenets; and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it. . . . Every one must act according to the dictates of his own reason; and mine tells me that civil powers alone have been given to the President of the United States, and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents."

ANOTHER contribution to American botany has been made by Prof. Asa Gray in a work entitled "The Vegetation of Rocky Mountain Region, and a Comparison with that of Other Parts of the World." He holds that not only all the members of a species, but all the species of a genus, have been evolved from a common stock.

KNOW LESS.

I own an angel given

Me to bless;

His only voice the signal,

"Do know less."

Next to divine this angel,

Sure to bless,

If I discern his gospel

Of "know less."

I once knew how I'd practise

To be rich:

He whispered, "Don't fly, son: let's

'Ride and hitch.'"

Once I no doubted I could

Keep hotel:

Quoth he, "You need know less to Keep one well."

I once guessed I could manage

Our dear church:

He nudged me, "You're in danger

Of a lurch."

When once a bird in hand I

Would let go

For two in bush, he timely

Said, "Go slow."

This remedy reduces

My big head,

And wings that chafe to open

Are not spread.

So when I feel some swelling

In my pate,

I've learned to let my angel

Operate.

MOONLIGHT.

A silver silence and the night

Are over all the moonlit hills,—

A silver silence full of light;

And all the petty, warring ills

Of labored thought for evil needs,

And balancings of death and shame

'Gainst jarring harms of labored deeds,

And jarring breath of pained blame,

Seem only evil things bygone,

That never may return to claim

Their half-forgotten names.

A silver silence and the night

Are over all the moonlit hills,—

A silver silence full of light

And fair forgetfulness that fills

All things with potencies of song,

Unheard, but felt and understood,

And takes away the weary wrong

Of seeking after doubtful good,

Of sound and words and fitful rhyme,

And takes away all masterhood

And makes all nature one.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 25, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

MONEY due the Index is greatly needed at this season, and subscribers who are in arrears will confer a favor by sending at once the amounts they owe.

MR. ELLIS' essay this week will repay a careful perusal.

HERBERT SPENCER does not maintain, as some have represented, that there are a number of different ultimate existences, that matter and force exist as absolute realities, and that behind them is another absolute, the Unknowable; but that matter and force are terms which express states of consciousness, or, in other words, the modes in which the Absolute Existence manifests itself in consciousness.

A LADY of ability and reputation writes us: "From a glance at Mr. Hale's article in the North American Review, I infer that he considers a just basis of exemption to be the good the churches do to the community. He argues, I think, that churches should all be taxed, but that the taxes might be remitted or refunded to the extent that the churches show they have earned the remission by the benefit they have done the community. Would he apply the same principle to manufacturers and to corporations generally, and, for that matter, also to individuals? For a corporation is only a legal individual. If so, the whole body of our jurisprudence will have to be remodelled so as to make every individual an officer of the law, to the extent, at least, implied in being a dispenser of public charities or in keeping a reform school."

AGREEMENT AND DIFFERENTIATION IN LIBERALISM.

The word "Liberal" in this country to-day means one who does not acknowledge the authority of the Bible or admit the supernatural character of the Christian system. Understood in this sense, it will be conceded by all that the class to which the term is applicable is very large, and constantly increasing. But, although this class is unanimous in rejecting Christian supernaturalism, the persons who compose it are by no means agreed on other subjects which many of them regard as of equal or of even greater importance. Their agreement in rejecting the Christian theology by no means helps them to unity of thought or concert of action in the sphere of party politics, on questions of finance, on social problems, on political economy, or the multitude of questions, speculative and practical, which constantly present themselves for the consideration of the thinker and the philanthropist. Nor are they agreed as to the attitude Liberals should assume toward the prevailing theological system or the proper method of counteracting its evil influence.

Some Liberals are interested chiefly in criticising and denouncing the absurdities of theology. Some find more congenial employment in popularizing science and diffusing general knowledge. Others insist on systematizing a certain class of scientific and philosophic truths, and presenting them as "Constructive Liberalism." While others contend for the propriety of retaining the name "Christian," and employing, to some extent at least, ecclesiastical methods for the advancement of liberal thought.

Liberals represent different degrees of culture and different social conditions. They have arrived at the conclusions they hold in common by different methods and under widely different conditions. One class has outgrown theological beliefs in an atmosphere of religious bigotry and under influences that have stimulated the critical and combative tendencies. Persons of this class are usually direct in opposition and harsh in criticism, often impolitic in their methods, and impatient with those whose general agreement with them and dislike of their methods they regard as evidence of timidity and hypocrisy. They are very much inclined to think that genuine Liberalism is limited to their own phase of thought and methods of procedure. Another class is composed of persons who have outgrown their old religious beliefs amid influences in harmony with their feelings, who have had but little contact with avowed unbelievers, who have but little, if any, knowledge of D'Holbach, Voltaire, or Paine, who feel no intense hostility to Christianity, but would be glad to see it reconciled with reason and common-sense. In this class are included a large number of Unitarians and "Liberal Christians," who have no belief whatever in Christianity, who are no longer in a transitional stage of theological thought, but whose position is clearly one of prudence and policy when not the result of lingering feelings of attachment to a system which they have intellectually outgrown. Another class that rejects Christianity has never been greatly interested in religious subjects. It has never had any personal experience of the suffering involved in the conscientious rejection of theological beliefs once intensely believed, but is unbelieving from a predisposition to scepticism, from intellectual inability to accept unproved propositions, and philosophical indifference to questions of a speculative and unverifiable character. Persons of this class are usually the most cool, "level-headed," and dispassionate Liberals, but the least enthusiastic, the least aggressive, and the least interested in sustaining or encouraging organized efforts to destroy or check superstition. Spencer and Tyndall, Youmans and Fiske, are very good representatives of this class.

Then, among Liberals are men and women of constructive and destructive tastes and tendencies; those who, although they entirely agree in their general views pertaining to Christianity, have but little community of thought or feeling in their work; those who are devoting themselves to science, literature, art, or mechanics, with but little interest in a theology they have discarded; and, on the other hand, those who, like Ingersoll, think the "Mistakes of Moses" a proper and important subject for public discussion.

The words "Radical" and "Conservative" are often used to distinguish two classes of Liberals, but usually with little propriety or justice. The Liberals who imagine they are radicals par excellence are almost invariably superficial and erratic persons who have some crotchets in their heads, some theory or scheme by which they fancy, in their simplicity, that the world is soon to be disenthralled, regenerated, and redeemed. These enthusiasts mistake invective for investigation and loose talk for lessons of wisdom. The radical Liberals are the men and women who think, who go to the root of things, who acquaint themselves with bottom facts and basic principles, and not those who denounce from a disposition to find fault, and who clamor for great social changes, with no knowledge of economic principles or sociological science.

Just as the word "republican" is applicable to a large class of men with whose views and practices many Republicans have no sympathy whatever, so the word "Liberal," as commonly used, refers to a multitude of people with many of whose theories and methods the liberal thinkers of the world have not the slightest sympathy.

Orthodox writers take advantage of the indefiniteness of the term "Liberal," to denounce in the name of religion all persons however erratic, and all opinions however grotesque, that come before the public under the name of Liberalism; but they are very careful to separate from the name whatever is of scientific or literary value, or noble and sublime in character and conduct. Even the editor of Scribner's Monthly, a few weeks ago, made the action of a certain association the occasion for characterizing Liberals generally as lovers of obscenity, forgetting that among the Liberals of this age are men and women like Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall, Spencer, Haeckel, and Helmholtz, Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and Victor Hugo, Buckle, Lecky, and Froude, Parker, Emerson, Garrison, and Lydia Maria Child, with a host of others whose intellectual greatness is equalled only by the moral grandeur of their lives.

If the advocates and adherents of the orthodox theology think it worth while to refer to every vagary and folly advanced by so-called Liberals, as evidence that Liberalism is superficial and corrupt, let them not ignore the scientific discoveries, the mechanical inventions, the literary achievements, the benevolent enterprises, and the moral excellence of those who belong to the same general class.

JUVENILE LITERATURE.

There has recently been considerable discussion in the daily press throughout the State in regard to the suggestion by Mr. Hubbard and others, that the trustees of the City Library should supply some sort of index by which books of immoral tendency, however brilliant in style or pungent in wit, may be refused admission to its shelves, because of the malign influence such books exert upon the character and morals of the unformed minds which have untrammelled access to all the Library contains.

While agreeing with Mr. Hubbard in his opinion as to the laxity of moral tone in most of the writers designated by him, we are obliged, in common fairness, to indorse the action of the trustees in refusing thus to "blackball" any of these authors, even on the ground of their acknowledged immoral tendency, since to do so would be to give such works the widest advertisement possible, and increase their circulation, by sending them directly into the hands of those who most crave that sort of literature.

But it is certainly a question of vast importance how we are to save the young and impressionable minds that in this age of cheap books and papers are far more than ever before in the history of the world left to their own discretion, or rather lack of discretion, in the choice of the wealth of literature open to them. This is an age of readers, education is so general, books and reading of all kinds are so cheap. Steam, telegraph, and telephone keep us so aware of and interested in all that is going on in all parts of the world that we have become a nation of readers, from the little boot-black on the street, in his intervals of leisure, to the student, journalist, or author, to whom literature is business and bread-winner.

"There were once, it is true," the Springfield Republican justly remarks anent this question, "hundreds of children whom it could not injure to turn freely as Lamb would have all children turned, to browse as they would among the treasures of a library without expurgation, secure to pass the evil without knowing it to be evil, and to gain the incalculable good that comes from familiarity with good books. . . The child of a former generation, who read Shakespeare without knowing he was coarse, has, as a grown man, to adjust himself to the needs of a new race of children, who see at the outset what he did not discover until he had left his childhood behind." But "times change, and men change with them," children as well; and though happily there are yet many children and half-grown youth living in quiet, refined, and pure homes, under the guidance of thoughtful, careful, and intelligent parents, it is none the less true that the majority of children in these times are "wise in their day and generation," and are especially too mature in such knowledge as can only satisfy their curiosity without helping to make them grow to be better, braver, purer, or more intelligent men and women.

So it is full time that parents and all others who have the interests of future generations at heart, as far as possible, carefully guide and direct the tone of our current literature, which more than all other educational agencies must give bias to the character and impulse to the aims of our future men and women.

And, if this is true in regard to the literature of children in general, it is much more true in regard to that of the children of unorthodox parents. Besides the general fear of their children's imbibing a loose morality as a result of indiscriminate reading, there is also, to parents who have emancipated themselves from false dogmas and a tyrannical religious belief, the additional fear of having their children inoculated in a religion in which the parents have lost faith. This question as to the proper reading for, and untheological education of their children, is agitating the minds of many Liberals. They are so fearful lest the theological gyves from which they so painfully freed themselves may be used to shackle the minds of their children that there is danger of their running into the other extreme by refusing to let their children have liberty to "choose the good and refuse the evil," by allowing them access to orthodox as well as unorthodox literature, a method which, especially at this early stage of the free-thought movement, when many of the most interesting, most instructive, and most moral books for the young are still written by those nominally within the orthodox fold, would tend to narrow and weaken instead of broadening and strengthening the youthful mind. Liberalism, in its busy struggle to make good its own position against contending forces, has not yet found time or opportunity to give more than an occasional anxious glance in the direction of the education of its young people, although there has always been an undercurrent of sturdy determination to attend to this matter as soon as the time for it can be found. But, if the children of freethinking parents were to be confined, as some wish, to a wholly liberal diet in their "browsing," it would at present be but a poor, hard, and stinted fare. Fortunately, despite the fears of some parents, there is no need of so stinting them. There is, in the first place, a wealth of literature to choose from, such as was never known previous to the present age. Then, the writers of most books nowadays have caught the scientific, progressive, and questioning spirit which permeates all Christendom. It would be well if all parents could acquaint themselves with the merits of the different writers whose books are liable to be read by their children; but life is too short, there is too much other work to be done, and the words of Solomon are truer now than when he uttered them,—that "of making many books there is no end."

So it is impossible for parents to know just what to do in this matter. Still, most parents can catch a general idea, through book reviews, as to the reputation of most of the writers of the day; and, since no child can read everything, it would be a good plan to advise the reading of the authors of whose intellect and moral tone the parents have the best opinion. There will come a day ere long, in this busy life of ours, when every person will have catalogued for him the names of the books best adapted to his peculiar needs. But, as that day has not yet come, we hope it will not be deemed presumptuous if, for the benefit of some perplexed liberal parents, a few names of orthodox and liberal writers, whose works can do the children of Liberals no harm, and some good, be here mentioned. Besides the standard works of the writers, like Shakespeare, Dr. Johnson, Goldsmith, Miss Edgeworth, Harriet Martineau's stories, Byron, Burns, etc., there is a host of later writer, all good and all innocuous. We have space to mention only a few of many whose writings are calculated to raise the moral ideal and stimulate the thinking brain. Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, and Proctor among scientists; all books of travel, especially those of Livingstone, Stanley, and all Arctic explorers; among moralists, Carlyle, Emerson, Ruskin, and Theodore Parker; among historians, Gibbon, Macaulay, Froude, Lecky, Bancroft, Buckle, and Justin McCarthy; in fiction, George Eliot, Dickens, Wilkie Collins, Charles Kingsley, Mrs. Stowe, Arthur Helps, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Dinah Muloch, Fredrika Bremer, Louisa M. Alcott; in humor, Mark Twain, Miss Holly, author of Semantha at the Centennial, My Opinions and Betsey Bobbet's, etc., Artemas Ward and Nasby; in poetry, Goethe, Mrs. Browning, Tennyson, Lowell, Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, and Jean Ingelow; among essayists, Carlyle, Richter, Frothingham, Higginson, and Hamerton. These are but a few of the names that occurs to me in a few departments of general literature, yet sufficient to indicate how large the field in which it will be perfectly safe for the young mind to be turned in to browse at will, without fear of any special religious bias being given. S. A. U.

THE magnitude and complications of the business of an entire nation serve to enwrap the view of the private citizen in a sort of distant perspective that palpably weakens a sense of immediate personal relation to such affairs. Consciousness of individual responsibility is thereby at a low ebb, if indeed existing at all. It is only under the impulse of some powerful lens that his latent apprehension can be coaxed into activity; and, when something like a fair estimate of proximity and proportion is established, he begins to harbor some notion of personal interest and duty. If it were proposed to the superintendent of a private mercantile establishment that he should be the recipient of special favors from without if he would take into employ a larger number of hands than the business required, and moreover shut his eyes to any special unfitness by either endowment or training for the required duties of such hands, it is easy to imagine his reply or the speedy relief from his trust that would accrue, in case he were weak enough to accept the bribe. No corporation or single proprietor of such a house could be caught napping to the extent of a day's submission to such imposition and fraud. Yet such corporations and proprietors all over the land are dozing in blindest oblivion as to the regulation of such interests in the huge national counting-house and mill. The same qualities in every detail as to fitness, training, and fidelity, are demanded for the efficient discharge of the duties involved by national revenue, expense, book-keeping, and records; and, in their neglect and entanglement, the entire nation bears the burden and discomfort of confused affairs and heavier taxation, whether conscious or not of the cause. But, grave as is the detriment to material prosperity through such mismanagement, it is of light significance, beside the debased standard of public morals that gains a wide ratio of corruption by its unhindered exercise. The moulders of private fortunes, too busy and absorbed to give a helping hand toward the just and honorable transaction of the nation's business, are putting their fair structures upon ground that will spoil their value with its foul emanations in the future, if no adequate check is devised for the insidious growth of reckless greed in the public service. With the bulk of considerate minds, there needs only to be a clear presentation of facts for such conviction of working necessity as will insure definite progress for the reform in question.

A LIBERAL is a liberty-lover. The love of liberty does not imply license or libertinism. Restraint of passion, regard for the interests of society, obedience to law, without which society is impossible, is a necessary condition of liberty. If government is converted into a despotism, thereby defeating the very object of its existence, rebellion and revolution are not only a right, but often a duty. If a law is outrageously unjust and oppressive, obedience to it is not always a duty; but let him who resists a law consider well what he is doing, and fear not to bear the consequences of his resistance, the wisdom of which must be tested by its results, not in his own day perhaps, but long after he is forgotten. Men who disregard law are generally the enemies, not the friends of freedom; yet when a wise and sagacious man—with whom an enlightened conscience is the supreme authority, whose life is an exemplification of the principles for which he contends, whose principles are founded upon the impregnable basis of justice—assumes the responsibility of resisting, individually, an outrageous law, willing to give up his freedom and happiness, and even life, if necessary, in order to inaugurate some great and needed reform, such courage and sacrifice must ever command the respect and admiration of independent, honest, truth-loving men and women. But when from ignorance, conceit, or craving for notoriety, a man foolishly resists the law, and in justification of his folly appeals to the example of the great martyrs to liberty and truth, he very naturally excites not respect and admiration, but pity, if not contempt.

THE following reprint of an extract from a speech of Josiah Quincy is highly applicable to the present state of civil service:—

I shall never see any of these notorious solicitors of office standing on this or the other floor, bawling or bullying, or coming down with dead votes in support of executive measures, but I think I see a hackney laboring for hire in a most degrading service,—a poor, earth-spirited animal, trudging in his traces with much attrition of the sides and induration of the membranes, encouraged by this special certainty, that at the end of the journey he shall have measured out to him his proportion of provender. . . . Let, now, one of your great office-holders, a collector of the customs, a marshal, a commissioner of loans, a postmaster in one of your cities, or any officer, agent, . . . or person holding a place of minor distinction, but of considerable profit, be called upon to pay the last great debt of nature. The poor man shall hardly be dead, he shall not be cold, long before the corpse is in the coffin, the mail shall be crowded to repletion with letters and certificates and recommendations and representations and every species of sturdy, sycophantic solicitation. . . . Why, sir, we hear the clamor of the craving animals of the treasury trough here in this capital. Such running, such jostling, such wriggling, such clambering over one another's backs, such squealing because the tub is so narrow and the company so crowded.

At the banquet given to Gladstone, previous to the passage of the Irish Land Bill, John Bright, referring to this measure, said: "I believe it is not possible for legislation to do a greater or more complete act of justice to the tenant farmers of Ireland than the government has intended, and that Parliament has nearly accomplished, by the bill which is now almost ready to receive the royal assent. I have been, as many of you know, for the last thirty years asking Parliament and the country to make certain changes with regard to the tenure and the holding of land in Ireland. I have paid strict attention to the subject. I have felt upon it as strongly as I have ever felt upon any political question; and I am free to say that I believe that this measure is as great and noble a measure on that question as it would be possible for the English Parliament to pass, and one which, when it is passed, it is impossible the Irish people should not regard as a complete measure of satisfaction and redemption for their country, unless they are unable to understand a policy which is intended directly for their benefit."

THE Catholic Telegraph declares that, if the Roman Catholic Church had retained all its children, the members of that Church would now number from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000, whereas its present membership is less than 7,000,000. The great loss is ascribed to the influence of the public schools. But the fact is a multitude of agencies, of which the public schools doubtless are one, are constantly in operation in this country to neutralize the influence and check the growth of the Roman Catholic Church. A free press and a free platform, the independent, liberal tone of current literature, the incessant mingling of Catholics with Protestants and Liberals in factories and shops, and in all the relations of business and the pursuits of industry, have contributed to the loss complained of by the Catholic Telegraph, in spite of the unwearied vigilance of the leaders of this Church and their Herculean efforts to guard their people from the influences of Protestantism and unbelief.

PIUS IX. was bitterly hostile to Italy, and excommunicated its king. To the Catholic nations of Europe, he appealed for restoration to his temporal sovereignty. Personally an amiable man, as a pope he was ready to excommunicate and anathematize all who desired to limit his province to that of a spiritual ruler. The King of Belgium and the Sultan of Turkey were the only monarchs with whom he was on speaking terms before his death. The Springfield Republican says therefore, with truth, that "the animosity to Pius IX. is personal; for the people of Rome yet remember what his rule was, and how false he was to the promises his reign began with, and his curses still ring in their ears. Against Leo XIII. there is no such personal feeling. If he could acknowledge himself the spiritual head of a spiritual body alone, and forego the artificial honors of a temporal sovereign, the matter between him and the people of Rome would be settled at once."

THE editor of the Banner of Light says: "Having witnessed such materialized forms and recognized our ascended friends, we can safely say we know they are immortal." Admitting for the moment that it is certain man's intelligence survives the dissolution of his body, and that individuals have seen their "ascended friends," and know they still exist, how does it follow that they "know they are immortal"? May not "spirits" lose their consciousness and identity? If, as many Spiritualists declare, "spirit is refined matter," is not this refined matter subject to the laws of matter? If not, how refined must matter become to be exempt from mutation, from aggregation, and disaggregation? Whatever a man may believe in regard to immortality, can he say with truth that he knows he or any other being is immortal, will live forever?

REFERRING to recent arrests of boys in Salem for playing ball on Sunday, the Boston Herald says: "With Sunday universally devoted to merry-making, as it now is, it looks very small to single out any particular kind of amusement, especially such an innocent diversion as ball-playing, as a violation of a law that is practically a dead-letter. It is no worse for boys to play ball or to skate than it is to row, swim, or sail on Sunday. If they are guilty of an offence, let them be punished for it, and not for something that is not an offence."

REFORMERS who begin their work with expectations impossible of realization often lose their enthusiasm, and become discouraged, disheartened, and hopeless of anything good in the future. Knowledge of the vices of man and the evils of the world, repeated disappointments and the experience of ingratitude from those for whom sacrifices have been made, frequently breed cynicism and despair. "Misanthropy is philanthropy turned sour."

PRESIDENT BENTLY, of the Philadelphia Telegraph Company, thinks the almost forgotten phonograph has yet a mission to fulfil in various ways, but especially as the accompaniment and register of telephonic orders. Edison, he says, has not quite completed the phonograph as a useful invention, but he will probably take it up again some time when he has leisure and is in the mood, and make of it something as useful as it is wonderful.

THE Echo is the name of a freethought paper that comes to us from Dunedin, New Zealand. It discusses with boldness and vigor current religious topics, and emphasizes the importance of keeping religion out of the schools and secularizing the government in all its departments.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE State Board of Health of Michigan has adopted a similar plan for determining the influence of meteorological conditions upon disease to that put in operation in London in respect to weather for this purpose, and which was recently explained in Nature at some length. The method is likely to throw much light upon the subject, and lead to important practical results both in contending with disease as well as preventing it.

THE Sanitarian for August contains a paper by Dr. H. B. Baker, Secretary of the Michigan State Board of Health, read before the last sanitary convention of that State upon "The Systematic Study of Causes of Sickness and Death," in which the mode employed in Michigan for determining the extent to which these causes are meteorological is graphically described. The Board of Health receives contributions of meteorological records from about thirty observers in different parts of the State. Each observer makes records of observations three times a day relative to temperature, humidity, barometric pressure, clouds, winds, ozone, rain, and snow. These reports are compiled in tables showing for each locality the average for each meteorological condition which is observed. In order to estimate the influence upon the disease by each meteorological condition, it is the custom to so perfect the data that it can be represented to the eye on a diagram. These diagrams consist of a succession of intersecting longitudinal and lateral lines at equal distances. Between the spaces of the former, at the top of the diagram, are the names of the months for a given year; while between the latter or at the side are figures that denote a scale of percentage. These lines are crossed by irregular ones that indicate, according to their course, the months when the diseases they represent are more or less prevalent. The percentage may also be seen at a glance by the figures at the side of the diagram. By a comparison of these diagrams with the tables made, in regard to meteorological conditions, it is possible to gain information that can be obtained in no other way. "They enable a person to follow with his own eyes the rise and fall of each disease, and of the temperature, ozone, pressure of atmosphere, or other meteorological condition, and to see at a glance whether the rise and fall of the disease coincide with the rise and fall of any condition of the air, or whether there is any constant coincidence such as would indicate a relation of cause and effect. These diagrams, for example, show, "that very strongly marked relations exist between the heat of summer, and the rise in the lines representing sickness from diarrhoea, cholera morbus, cholera infantum, etc., and between the cold, dry air in winter and spring, and the increase of sickness from inflammation of the lungs (pneumonia), etc., diseases which nearly disappear during warm months." Of course, it is recognized that there are other factors which must be taken into account in these calculations besides meteorological conditions, such as the measure of vitality of persons at different periods of life, and the relation of different localities, as, for instance, high or low land, swamps, etc., upon disease. The relations which exist between the outbreak of communicable diseases among children at certain seasons of the year and the general opening of schools at the time is also to be considered. There will come in with these investigations also those pertaining to the mode of propagating disease, as to whether they are contagious, whether also the invisible germs or elements of poison, whose presence in the body causes the disease, are reproduced in substances outside the body, and how long they can live in such substances and retain their deadly power. The State Board is aided in this work by the cooperation of about one hundred prominent physicians, in nearly as many different parts of the State, who send the Board weekly reports of the sickness under their observation, and promptly notify it of the outbreak of any communicable disease. This enables the Board to send at once to such localities documents conveying information in respect to the disease, and the most approved methods in use for restricting and dealing with it. The system devised by the Michigan State Board of Health for collecting facts and diffusing intelligence in respect to pathological science, which comprises so large a province of its labors, we believe to be more thorough and detailed in its plan and methods of operation than has been attempted in any other part of the country. It cannot fail to contribute much to the sum of exact knowledge in regard to disease, and the solution of the complicated problems in which it is engaged.

A SUGGESTION BY AN M.D.

Editor of the Index:—

I desire to call attention to the following facts, and to the suggestions therefrom derived:—

It has been very marked of late, the increase of the evil results, in poor men and women, as well as children, of excessive use of intoxicants of a poor quality. A large proportion of the male medical applicants this summer at the Boston Dispensary, for instance, acknowledge themselves, even, this fact; while their symptoms render their assertions needless. This increase must be due to some particular cause, coming as it does to notice within a year or two at most. And it has been suggested that a poorer quality of liquors is furnished at these many licensed places, in order to make up to the proprietors, in their profits, for the price paid for licenses, etc. In fact, inquiry in several instances, of proprietors and agents, has obtained answers fully sustaining this suggestion.

In view, therefore, of the obtaining for the masses a true temperance in these matters, would it not seem as if the present laws were exactly at variance with those of health and common-sense, causing poor liquor to be very largely sold to ignorant people, who in due time have to learn the dear lesson of their experience through sickness thus produced? Without question, poor liquor is to blame for fully one-half of the cases calling for charity, whether medical or otherwise, as I do not believe any real prohibition can be enforced, neither do I believe that the present laws prevent the evils of intemperate liquor-drinking in the least degree. It has become more and more impressed on my mind that, were the masses instructed as to the usual results on the human system of too much liquor, by newspapers, lectures, and school-teaching, and no restrictions whatever were made on the selling, but a graver penalty for any breach of the peace so caused, fewer charity patients would apply to our hospitals and dispensaries than now, as fewer would be sick and more could pay their own physician than now.

One word in regard to penalty. I would suggest that, as now provided, no reform by this means is expected, none in the majority of cases is obtained. Whereas, if common drunkards, when convicted in court, had publicly to clean the streets, remove offal, etc., some possible element of shame might be reached, and a better result, both for the convict's future welfare and the city expenses, might be obtained.

Very truly, JOHN DIXWELL, M.D.
BOSTON, Aug. 7, 1881.

THAT jealousy which charges others with "feeling above" you is contemptible, because it indicates both extreme self-consciousness and lack of self-respect. It arouses suspicion that you are not yourself genuine, else why do you care for another's assumptions? Why are you not "dowered with scorn of scorn"? Anybody whose philosophy is so scant, whose religion is so narrow, whose life interests are so meagre, that he is troubled by people "looking down" upon him, ought to be looked down upon, whether or not people do it!—Springfield Republican.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE Modern Review, No. 7, July, 1881.—The leading article on "The Example of Jesus" is by Dr. Hooykaas, well known as an able representative of the Dutch School of criticism. It is a reply to certain strictures of Mr. F. W. Newman on the example of Jesus. There is force in some of his considerations. Others are more ingenious than profound. Our own Minot J. Savage contributes a characteristic article on "Evolution and Theism." An article on "The Morality of the Medical Profession" will probably attract more attention than any other. It is an answer to the article in the April number, which was a terrible arraignment of the medical profession. The present writers have an easy victory in the main over their antagonist. Mr. Wicksteed writes with intelligence of "The Place of the Israelites in History," his article being nominally a review of Robertson Smith's Old Testament in the Jewish Church. It is to be regretted that it was not confined more closely to its text, for the lectures of Professor Smith are in some respects deserving of the sternest reprobation. An article on William Blake has comparatively little merit. "The Modern Unitarian" reviews a volume of sermons by different English Unitarians that has been lately published. The article on "Married Women's Debts" is an astonishing revelation of the irresponsibility of English married women. If their debts exceed their allowance, no tradesman can collect them. "Some Notes on the Revised Version" are instructive and suggestive. J. Allanson Picton contributes an article entitled "A Rationalist of the Sixteenth Century." It is mainly taken up with a speech inserted in Lord Herbert's Life of Henry VIII., which Mr. Picton contends is an imaginary speech of Lord Herbert's own composition.

THE International Review for September has eight articles of interest and value, all important in the sphere of discussion to which they pertain. Mr. Alexander Bliss writes upon "Naturalization." Mr. Wm. J. Armstrong contributes a very readable sketch of "Spain of To-day," which gives a good idea of the political progress of that land since Queen Isabella abdicated the throne in 1808. Mr. John Codman writes of "Mormonism." "The Difficulties of Prison Reform" are treated by Mr. A. S. Meyrick, who has made the subject a special study for several years. Mr. Henry C. Adams discusses the "Payment of Public Debts," and concludes that future issues of bonds should be so drawn that the government will have full control over them, and a sufficient amount be each year redeemable to consume the treasury surplus devoted to debt-payment. "The Endowment of Colleges," by Rev. Charles F. Thwing, gives some very interesting facts relative to the value of college property and productive funds, income, scholarship endowments, etc. "Baron Bettino Ricasoli," the Italian statesman, and one of Victor Emmanuel's staunchest supporters, is made the subject of a critical and biographical sketch, by Mr. Wm. Chauncy Langdon. The number closes with the first instalment of a series of studies of "Victor Hugo," by Auguste Laugel.

THE North American Review for September opens with an article by William T. Harris on "The Church, the State, and the School." M. J. Savage contributes an able article, well worth reading, on "Natural Ethics." John A. Kasson has an article in exposition of "The Monroe Declaration." Rev. E. E. Hale advocates the taxation of church property, with exemption only to rebate the public relief afforded by its charities. The titles of the remaining articles, every one of which is very readable, are "Jewish Ostracism in America," by Nina Morais; "The Decay of New England Thought," by Julius H. Ward; "Ghost Seeing," by Frederic H. Hedge; and "Factitious History," by Rossiter Johnson.

THE Catholic World for September has an interesting article on "Latin and French Plays at the College of Louis le Grand," from the pen of the late Lady Blanche Murphy, whose romantic story was made the subject of so many newspaper paragraphs at the time of her death, some months ago,—a story in which interest has been revived by the recent death of her father, Lord Gainsborough. Dr. Nolan contributes an instructive paper on "The Opium Habit." The other articles are mainly of interest to Catholics. The literary standard of this periodical is always excellent.

THE Atlantic Monthly shows a brilliant array of notable names among its contributors to the September number. Prof. John Fiske, W. D. Howells, Henry James, Jr., E. L. Godkin, Mary Halleck Foote, Helen Hunt,—names that give assurance of excellence in their several departments. The other writers are Edith Thomas, J. V. Sears, Wm. Chauncy Langdon, and J. B. Matthews. An interesting number.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

KING KALAKAU will sail for New York next month. "SUNSET" COX was in Constantinople, on his way to Syria, last week.

GENERAL SHERMAN is to visit the New England Fair at Worcester, September 7.

F. A. HINCKLEY preached last Sunday at the Memorial Chapel, Tiverton, R.I.

SIR W. HARCOURT the other day called Gladstone "the foremost man of the age."

SENATOR BAYARD will give an address on civil-service reform in Cambridge some time in October.

DR. JONES, the Platonist, has returned to his home at Jacksonville, Ill., and has resumed the practice of medicine.

CAPT. EDWARD TRELAWEY, who wrote biographies of Shelley and Byron, is still living in England at the age of ninety.

REV. GEORGE C. LORIMER, of Chicago, of "unconscious absorption" fame, preached in Allentown, N.H., last Sunday.

WE are sorry to learn that Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton has been for some weeks and still is prostrated with a severe fever.

BARTON, the stage-robber, now under arrest at Denver, was pardoned by President Hayes last winter. Since then, he has robbed five stages.

HON. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS will deliver the address before the Alumni of Brown University at their next anniversary preceding Commencement.

BISMARCK, who is passing the summer at Kissengen, has grown so corpulent that, like Senator Davis, an arm-chair is constructed specially for his use.

QUEEN VICTORIA's hostility to physicians of her own sex is generally regarded as ungenerous and unwomanly, and it has cost her the loss of no little respect.

MRS. JULIA WARD HOWE, Lucy Stone, and Rev. J. W. Chadwick are announced to speak at a Suffrage Convention to be held at Cummington, Mass., the 23d.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY, in a recent paper before the London Zoological Society, said he was not aware of any zoologist who maintains the independent creation hypothesis.

THE Commonwealth thinks "now that George Eliot is gone, there is no woman in England so well equipped for general literary work as Miss Frances Power Cobbe."

JOHN BRIGHT is said to be a very charitable man in an unobtrusive way. He has a library of twelve hundred volumes presented him by admirers after the passage of the corn laws.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Advertiser says, "Mr. Alcott has the opportunity of writing a chapter on degeneration, which will make a sensation among naturalists, if not in philosophical circles."

It is not likely that Leo XIII. will come to this country. If he does, he will be cordially welcomed by many, and, if he does not meddle with politics or religion, will be treated well by all.

"MISS GRUNDY" writes from Saratoga: "Four senatorial widowers have been here at once,—David Davis of Illinois, Jones of Florida, and 'the Rhode Island twins,' Anthony and Burnside."

THEODORE D. WELD, of Hyde Park, will give the first discourse after the summer vacation in Cosmian Hall, Florence, on Sunday, September 4. Subject: "Poetry: its Educational Power."

GUITEAU said, in reply to a postal card addressed by Mrs. Scoville, his sister, to the Prison Warden, "Inform her that I am well, and am praying daily for the recovery of the President; and I regret my deed."

THE New York Times asks: "What would become of Mr. Phillips' rhetoric, pray, if he were obliged to consider facts? Mr. Wendell Phillips, dealing solely with facts, would cease to be entertaining or even eloquent."

THE Evening News of this city speaks of Dr. George B. Loring's address, at the opening of the Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Fair, as "the Loring bouquet of glittering generalities. All very proper and very nice."

CARDINAL MANNING is described by Mrs. Livermore as spare almost to emaciation, and bald as if shorn; his appearance severely monastic. His voice and manner, however, are pleasant; and his speech is full of kindness.

GLADSTONE'S greatness as a statesman is shown in his willingness to endure taunts that he was cowed by the Tory peers rather than allow the Irish Land Bill to be defeated in the fight between the Radicals and Conservatives.

MRS. CAROLINE WEBSTER DAY, the last of six children of Fletcher Webster, and the last but one of the grandchildren of Daniel Webster, died at Marshfield, Mass., the 16th. The distinguished grandfather died twenty-nine years ago.

It is provoking and humiliating to read of the inefficiency of the captain and the cowardice of the crew and many of the passengers of the "Plymouth Rock" during the recent accident on the trip of that steamer from New York to Long Branch.

CAPT. AMOS SHIRLEY, the fallen commander of the Salvation Army, has eloped with a pretty girl he had converted; and now he is a runaway from his wife and children and from the army with which he was going to carry dismay into the ranks of Satan.

MR. SETH HUNT and wife of Northampton, old-time friends of the Index, and Rev. W. H. Spencer of Florence, Felix Adler, F. E. Abbot, George Chainey, J. P. Mendum, George W. Park, and W. H. Hamlin favored the Index office with their presence last week.

THERE was another fox hunt at Newport last week. Twenty-five persons, including several women, followed the hounds, and pursued to the death a little frightened fox. "The brush was given to Mrs. Sally Hewitt of New York and the pate to Mrs. William Bassett of London."

ANNA DICKINSON told a woman's temperance meeting at Ocean Grove the other day that "woman's proper work is with her sisters, and not with men"; and in the afternoon a good sister, who probably has no notion of having a woman for her husband, prayed for Anna's conversion.—Springfield Republican.

It is proposed in Iowa to present a testimonial to Kate Shelley, the brave Irish girl who saved a passenger train from going through a bridge in a storm, and who is now very ill from exposure in that heroic act. What is proposed in Iowa, if it appeals to the generosity of the people of that noble State, is usually carried out.

ACCORDING to the Springfield Republican, the best newspaper reports of the Concord School were those written by Mrs. Harriette Shattuck for the Boston Transcript. She is the daughter of the well remembered and regretted "Warrington," and inherits, the Republican says, "the gift of her father for exact reporting."

PROF. ROBERTSON SMITH is only thirty-five years old. At the age of twenty-four, he was elected to the Hebrew chair in the Aberdeen Free Church College. "Here I continued," he says, "for seven years, pursuing my own studies and occasionally writing, till my connection with the Encyclopædia Britannica suddenly aroused the conservative party." His present residence is in Edinburgh.

SUNDAY, the 14th, three thousand people gathered at Sea Cliff, L.I., in memory of Capt. Charles P. Smith, the pilot of the "Seawanhaka," through whose heroism hundreds of lives were saved at the cost of injuries that resulted in his own death. Hon. Richard O. Gorman, who witnessed the brave act of Captain Smith, was the principal orator. He dwelt on the fact that to-day live courageous, unselfish men, in whose hands no swords are held, and who live to save and bless, and not to kill.

PEOPLE on Cape Cod have been guessing as to the author of the interesting story Cape Cod Folks. The novelist is said to be Miss Sarah McLean, of Simsbury, Conn., daughter of Justice McLean, a leading citizen of the town. Miss McLean is described as a handsome woman, twenty-two years old, who spent a year at Mt. Holyoke Seminary, but completed her course at Madison, Wis. She spent a season or two on Cape Cod as a teacher. The first edition of her novel has been exhausted.

ROBERT BROWNING has an antipathy to publishing his poems in any of the current periodicals before they appear in book form. He has only made an exception to this rule when by breaking it he could gain money for some charitable object. He did so to gain £100 for the fund for the relief of the sufferers from the Paris siege. To help Hood when on his death-bed, Mr. Browning wrote a number of shorter poems for Hood's Magazine. These are the only known infringements of his rule.

THE business-tied snatcher of the inner needful is sadly familiar with the features of the ordinary city restaurant. The nondescript flavors, heat, flies, untidy and bawling confusion, to say nothing of the homœopathic amount dispensed. The sickening "inwardness" and recoil of the home-bred stomach from these horrors find relief in the neatness, order, and abundance at Marston's, on Brattle Street, where a "big clock" rising above the curbstone indicates prompt and ample accommodation.

THE State Department has invited the living representatives of the family of Baron Steuben to visit this country on the occasion of the Centennial Celebration of the final surrender of the British army under Cornwallis at Yorktown, Va., Oct. 19, 1781. Acceptance of this invitation would tend to strengthen the friendly relations between Germany and the United States, which, as the Emperor remarked to the retiring American minister a few days ago, have existed between these two countries from the time of Frederick the Great.

DR. T. L. NICHOLS, who several years ago published a monthly in Ohio, in defence of Spiritualism and free-lovism, and who with his wife became a convert to Roman Catholicism, is now in London. He says: "I by means of Spiritualism became a Roman Catholic, as I have remained to this hour. As all Catholics are Spiritualists, I do not see why Spiritualists may not be Catholics." The Religio-Philosophical Journal thinks "one who has 'boxed the compass' as free-thinker, spiritualist, free-lover, and Catholic, lacks mental and moral health, and is not safe to follow or affiliate with."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, in the Atlantic Monthly, referring to his cousin Wendell Phillips and a common Dutch ancestry, says:—

"Like our Motley's John of Barnveld, you have always been inclined

To speak,—well,—somewhat frankly,—to let us know your mind,

And the Mynbeers would have told you to be cautious what you said,

Or else that silver tongue of yours might cost your precious head.

But we're very glad you've kept it; it was always Freedom's own,

And whenever reason chose it she found a royal throne; You have whacked us with your sceptre; our backs were little harmed,

And while we rubbed our bruises we owned we had been charmed."

MR. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York, who for over two years has been in the south of Europe, has just passed a few days in London, and is now among the lochs of Scotland. He is accompanied by his wife and daughter, and they will sail for New York in a month from now. Although Mr. Frothingham has recovered his health in a good degree, New York will not again be able to listen to his brilliant discourses. His profession will hereafter be that of literature, and he will at once enter upon it by undertaking a biography of George Ripley. There is no man better fitted than Frothingham for a task which is of less importance as concerning Ripley personally than in connection with the transcendental, rationalistic, and socialistic movements in New England, of which he (Ripley) was the vice-admiral.—M. D. Conway's London Letter.

IN a letter to the New York Herald referring to Secretary Blaine and the Hartmann case, Wendell Phillips says: "His trumpet gives, indeed, in this critical moment, such an uncertain sound as discredits the administration, belittles the nation, and brings in doubt that grand independence of all foreign dictation on which England and America have prided themselves for the last century. Of course, no one believes that the State department in Mr. Blaine's hands is to set about a curious search for some such disgraceful distinction as will enable it to pander to Russia, soil the record of Anglo-Saxon freedom, and join in a slave hunt more disgraceful than those which followed the fugitive slave bill of 1850. And, if that is impossible, why allow Europe and two or three hundred muddled editors to believe in its possibility for the next six months?"

ROBERT COLLYER tells a contributor to Potter's Monthly that his change from Methodism to Unitarianism was due to "a little, great woman, and the African; that is, Lucretia Mott and the slave. Two years in England I had been a Methodist local preacher, and the same eight or nine years in this country, working in the hammer factory near Philadelphia through the week and speaking religiously to the people on Sunday. I preached because I loved the cause, not for money. I think all I ever received as a Methodist preacher aggregated $7.50. Mrs. Mott came to hear me preach. I thought her grand, and I grew in favor with her. I was made the welcome guest of herself and husband. But, as I became also a convert to immediate emancipation, perhaps half the motive to change was that I was ashamed and confounded, in those years just before the war, that my Methodist desk was not high enough for sermons against slavery and for liberty, but that the Unitarian was. I thought Christ stood beside the slave, and I turned toward that light."

LAMARTINE, in one of his works, pays a deserved tribute to the far-reaching influence of intellectual womanhood everywhere, when, speaking of the literary salons presided over by women, which have been for many years a marked feature of literary and political life in France, he says: "They are throughout the sign of an exuberant civilization. They are also the sign of a happy influence of women on the human mind. From Pericles and Socrates at Aspasia's, from Michel Angelo and Raphael at Vittoria Colonna's, from Ariosto and Tasso at Elenora d'Este's, from Petrarch at Laura de Sade's, from Bossuet and Racine at the Hôtel Rambouillet, from Voltaire at Madame du Defant's or Madame du Châtelet's, from J. J. Rousseau at Madame d'Epinau's or Madame de Luxembourg's, from Verginand at Madame Roland's, from Chateaubriand at Madame Recamier's,—everywhere it is from the fireside of a lettered, political, or enthusiastic woman that an age is lighted up or an eloquence bursts forth. Always a woman, as the nurse of genius at the cradle of literature!"

THE Independent says it fails "to recall evidence in his writings that Dean Stanley was a believer in the supernatural history of Jesus Christ. He seems to speak in such a way as to leave it in doubt what was his belief. We question whether he ever satisfied his own mind on this subject. His sympathies seem to have been too much with the wing of the English Church called 'Broad,' a word in England used of a latitudinarian faith, rather than, as here, of breadth of comprehension. This phase of his influence we deeply regret, and doubt if Baptists and Presbyterians and others who have been charmed by his fraternal Christian fellowship and his frank acceptance of their right scholarly positions have not been too ready to condone his lack of positive, expressed faith. We should like to omit this criticism on the writings of a man whom we so much admire; but it cannot be passed by in a fair review of his life. But this does not detract from the value of his writings, for the objects which they intended, nor from the spiritual profit with which they are read."

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, who is himself not only a polished writer, but a brilliant orator, says in the "Editor's Easy Chair" of Harper's Monthly that "the great Commencement event of the summer was Wendell Phillips' oration at the centennial anniversary of the venerable Phi Beta Kappa, at Cambridge." He says: "Mr. Phillips rises and buttons his frock coat across his white waistcoat, as he moves to the front of the platform. Seen from the theatre, his hair is gray, and his face looks older, but there is the same patrician air; and with the familiar tranquillity and colloquial ease he begins to speak. He spoke, perhaps, for two hours, perhaps for half an hour. But there was no sense of the lapse of time. His voice was somewhat less strong; but it had all the old force and the old music. He was in constant action, never vehement, never declamatory in tone, walking often to and fro, every gesture expressive, art perfectly concealing art. It was all melody and grace and magic, all wit and paradox and power. . . . But here is an orator without an antagonist, with no measure to urge or oppose, whose simple theme upon a literary occasion is the public duty of the scholar. But he touches and stirs and inspires every listener; and, as he quietly ends his discourse with a stanza of Lowell's that he has quoted a hundred times, every hearer feels that it is an historic day, and that what he has seen and heard will be one of the traditions of Harvard and of Phi Beta Kappa."

A SPECIAL library has been established by subscription in Paris for secular education. The subscribers have resolved to adopt a scientific creed, and to proscribe the use of fiction in books written for young people.—Nature.

PRESIDENT SOLOMON, of the Republic of Hayti, is a coal-black negro, a man of education and refinement, and an executive who is doing his best to promote the prosperity of the country. Minister Langston finds society in Hayti mixed as to color, miscegenation being the rule.

COUNT WILHELM BISMARCK, the youngest son of the German Chancellor, has joined the anti-Jewish faction, and delivered an address a few evenings ago to the members of a Conservative anti-Semitic Association at Berlin. The Bismarcks are inveterate foes of equal rights and popular liberty, and it is about time for the German people to resent and resist their insolence.

The eruption of Mauna Loa, which has been going on eight months, is attracting visitors from all parts of the world to the Hawaiian group to witness the grand display. The entire destruction of the lovely town of Hilo is threatened. Mauna Loa is situated on Hawaii, the largest island of the group; and it rises from the ocean's shore, a snow-capped dome, fourteen thousand feet high.

A FEW weeks ago, the Jewish congregation at Emetzhofen (Middelfranken) were invited by the Roman Catholic priest of a neighboring town to attend the service of his church and to listen to his sermon, the nature of which would convince them that the persecutions of the Jews which had taken place in Germany and Russia were looked upon by the Church as a disgrace to Christianity. The invitation was accepted; and the Jews, at the termination of the service, warmly thanked the priest for his tolerant and timely remarks.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Otago, New Zealand, Echo writes: "The friends of freethought are mustering strong in Auckland." They have formed an association "to discuss the advanced opinions of the age." Another correspondent says: "I am afraid that freethought must have penetrated further than most people imagine. I hear that at the lyceum, the other Sunday, the conductor asked the children to name some heroes; and one boy said 'Thomas Paine,' another 'Galileo,' and a third 'Jesus Christ.' What would our grandfathers have said to this?"

THE Lanterne publishes the following despatch from its St. Petersburg correspondent: "The executive committee of the Russian revolutionary party held, a few days ago, a great and solemn meeting, at which several members of the exiled committee, who had secretly gone to St. Petersburg for the purpose, were present. It is impossible for me to communicate to you the resolutions adopted. All I can say is that, before three months are over, a fresh catastrophe will break over Russia. The new Emperor, having deceived the hopes everybody had centred in him, will be sacrificed,—in what manner I am unable to state, for that is a secret known only to the chiefs of the revolutionary movement."

THERE are, it is said, about nine hundred Wesleyan chapels in the Fijian Islands, and the missionaries have made many converts; but Miss Gordon Cumming, in a recent work entitled A Home in Fiji, says that these missionaries find it one of their hardest tasks to subdue the cannibal appetite in these savage converts. She instances, among others, one case where an ex-cannibal, creeping up close to his pastor, who chanced to be unusually plump and healthy-looking, took hold of him, and then, as if he could not refrain, he put out his hand and stroked him down the thigh, licking his lips, and exclaiming with delight, "Oh, but you are nice and fat!" A rather dangerous sort of affection that.

THE American government is criticised for refusing coöperation with certain European measures asking Russia to suspend its persecution and pillaging of Jews in that empire. The attitude of Russia toward all "heretics" is described, by a writer in St. Petersburg, as bitter and unrelenting in the extreme: "There are settlements in Siberia whose inhabitants are to this day called 'Kolovitchi,' or descendants of men who have been impaled for their faith. The public squares were dyed with the blood of 'heretics.' Thousands of them have perished under torture in prisons and casemates of convents or on the scaffold, their only fault being that they wished to believe and pray according to their consciences." With fourteen million dissidents remaining in the present population, it is not strange that ferment is beyond forcible suppression.

JESTINGS.

PAPA: "That picture shows the story of Prometheus, and the vulture that fed on his liver. Every day the vulture devoured it, and every night it grew for him to eat it again." Sympathetic Child: "Poor, dear old vulture! How sick he must have been of liver every day!"

A YOUNG lady became so dissatisfied with a gentleman to whom she was engaged to be married that she dismissed him. In revenge, he threatened to publish her letters to him. "Very well," replied the lady: "I have no reason to be ashamed of any part of my letters, except the address."

BURNE JONES was made a D.C.L. of Oxford the other day, being greeted by the undergraduates with an uproarious chorus of "A most intense young man,

A soulful-eyed young man,
An ultra-poetical, super-aesthetical,
Out-of-the-way young man."

THE following is from an amusing letter to the Evening Traveller by a Concord correspondent: "The hardest of all for me to bear was the question of a Western lady to Dr. Harris, 'If the word "outside" or "inside" should be applied to the potentiality of an atom?' He went on to explain at length in a manner utterly unintelligible to me, until I am sure he was struck by the utter absence of light or hope in my countenance; and, turning toward me, he said kindly: 'You can say either "outside" or "inside" with perfect propriety, as you can say of a handful of potatoes in a hat that they are either outside or inside the hat. They are both outside and inside.' I have thought a good deal on that. He meant probably outside as regards the texture, inside as regards the form; but, oh dear, the outside or inside of the potentiality of an atom! But I may get used to it. I hear conversation on the transcendent deductions of the categories, on entity ('entity is mind'), on Entelechias first and second. That is easy enough. The first is one who has not, but can realize the totality of his potentiality; the second is one who has realized the totality of his potentiality. That does not seem exactly as it was given to me; but my poor head is in such a confused state that I must renew the ice bandage, and hastily sign myself, AN ATOM OUTSIDE OF POTENTIALITY."

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to make the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society's labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Watson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartoli, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. H. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873.

Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874.

Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartoli's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian."—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Watson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875.

Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876.

Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Broke Herford, and John Weiss.—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877.

Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Intellectual Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878.

Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mr. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879.

Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and brief addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by F. E. Frothingham, exposes the debasement of the popular notions of presents conceptions of him that of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. R. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. Its ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aims. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

THE most ardent votary of science holds his firmest convictions, not because the men he most venerates hold them, not because their verity is tested by portents and wonders, but because his experience teaches him that, whenever he chooses to bring these convictions into contact with their primary source, Nature, whenever he thinks fit to test them by appealing to experiment and observation, Nature will confirm them. The man of science has learned to believe in justification not by faith, but by verification.—O. B. Frothingham.

NEVER violate the sacredness of your individual self-respect. Be true to your own mind and conscience, your heart and your soul, so only can you be true to God.—Theodore Parker.

"NAY, falter not: 'tis an assured good
To seek the nobler; 'tis your only good,
Now you have seen it; for that higher vision Poisons all meaner choice for evermore."

—George Eliot.

If thou seekest thine own will and pleasure, thou shalt never be quiet nor free from care; for in everything something will be wanting.—Thomas à Kempis.

"WHERE'er a single slave doth pine,
Where'er one man may hope another,
Thank God for such a birthright, brother:
That spot of earth is thine and mine!
There is the true man's birthplace grand,
His is a world-wide fatherland."

—J. R. Lowell.

WE might all, without much difficulty, be just a little wiser than we are; and the aggregate effect of a number of such small improvements would be considerable.—Edith Simcox.

LET truth and falsehood grapple: who ever knew truth put to the worst in a fair and open encounter?—Milton.

WHY, of all things living, art thou made capable of blushing? The world shall read thy shame upon thy face: therefore do nothing shameful.—Brahminic.

THE free and lovely impulses of hospitality, the faithful attachment of friends,—these, too, are a holy religion to the heart.—Schiller.

TO do good, which is really good, a man must act from the love of good, and not with a view to reward here or hereafter.—Swedenborg.

THE chief of men is he who stands in the van of men, fronting the peril which frightens back all others.—Carlyle.

BEGIN the morning by saying to thyself, I shall meet with the busybody, the ungrateful, arrogant, deceitful, envious, unsocial. All these things happen to them by reason of their ignorance of what is good and evil. But I who have seen the nature of the good that it is beautiful, and of the bad that it is ugly, and the nature of him who does wrong that it is akin to me, not only of the same blood or seed, but that it participates in the same intelligence and the same portion of the divinity, I can neither be injured by any of them; for no one can fix on me what is ugly, nor can I be angry with my kinsman, nor hate him. For we are made for coöperation, like feet, like hands, like eyelids, like the rows of the upper and lower teeth. To act against one another, then, is contrary to nature; and it is acting against one another to be vexed and to turn away.—Marcus Aurelius.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE death of the President was momentarily expected last week; but the news has been more encouraging the past few days, and there is now renewed hope of his recovery.

A NEW code of criminal procedure went into operation in the State of New York last Thursday. One of its provisions is that no person charged with crime can be subjected before conviction to any more restraint than is necessary to detain him to answer to the charge.

THE Boston Herald thinks the "Massachusetts Greenbackers are quite too modest and self-denying in their proposition to divide the surplus income of corporations above six per cent. among the employés, when a law to divide the capital and earnings would be just as practicable."

THE people this season evidently prefer going to the seaside to going to church. Twenty-four thousand pleasure-seekers were conveyed last Sunday to Nantasket Beach by the Boston and Hingham Steamboat Company. Thousands went by rail. The scene at the beach was one of great gayety.

THERE is a strong and growing conviction that all the telegraph lines of this country should be purchased and controlled by the General Government, as in England, where messages of twenty words, exclusive of address, can be sent from one part of the land to another for twenty-five cents.

THE Presbyterian calls Wendell Phillips "a Communist and a Nihilist," and characterizes extracts which it copies from his late address as "his expression of elegant deviltries, for which he ought to be placed in the category of Hartmann and Rosa and Guiteau, if not that more pestilent list of assassins who will instigate others to do what they have not the courage to do themselves."

THE Memphis Appeal, in an article upon the progress of the negro as a laborer, says: "It is an undeniable fact that the negro is making his way, and is winning a more forward position than had been thought possible in the same generation that saw him a slave. . . . Their children are absorbing education with a power of assimilation they had never been credited with possessing; and events are proving that, as working-men, they are not to be tied down to the position of mere hewers of wood and drawers of water."

IT begins to look as though the Westboro' Reform School needs reforming. When a superintendent makes himself so obnoxious to all the boys under his charge that they dare the most desperate measures, regardless of any future punishment, in order to free themselves from his despotic sway; when he resorts to firing pistols dangerously near the heads of two or three half-grown lads who had entrenched themselves in a room, determined to resist what they considered his tyrannical authority,—it seems about time for the credit of the old Bay

State that some sort of a change be made either in method or masters.

THE Nation, referring to the recent French elections, says that their most striking consequence lies in the fact that, "for the first time in French history, the Chamber contains an overwhelming majority—a majority so great as to make the minority of no account—of members who are loyal to the republican form of government, while differing about policy. In other words, the French Republic has now, for the first time, a loyal as distinguished from a revolutionary opposition,—an opposition which seeks not to overturn the established government, but simply, as in England or in this country, to administer it in a different way."

AN agitation in the Mormon Church in Utah in favor of the abolition of polygamy is reported. With this relic of barbarism thrown aside, the Mormons will be entitled to respectful recognition as a Christian sect that has eliminated from its creed and practice a doctrine which, although sanctioned by the Bible, is plainly in conflict with the civilization of the nineteenth century. Joseph Smith, son of the founder of Mormonism, who is President of the "Primitive Mormons," now numbering fifteen thousand, informs us that polygamy never had the sanction of his father, but that it is one of the "corruptions" of true Mormonism.

THE bearing of sectarian bias on Southern politics brings to mind an incident attributed to President Jackson. It is stated that, when a newly appointed foreign minister asked his opinion of a young clerk whom the Secretary of State had commended for his selection, the President emphatically denounced the youth as unfit for service. His reason for this judgment was frankly stated. It seemed the clerk in question had been observed at church, where the Methodist Episcopal discourse had greatly refreshed the President; and, on asking the youth's opinion of it at a chance subsequent interview, Jackson was disgusted at his blunt disagreement with the eloquent divine, and declared "the upstart" to be "no judge of preaching," hence unworthy of business confidence.

GOV. HAWKINS, of Tennessee, following the example of Gov. Foster, of Ohio, has addressed a circular letter to the Governors of all the States and Territories, suggesting that, in the event of the President's death, they request by proclamation the suspension of all secular business, and the assembling of the people at the hour "set apart for the funeral ceremonies, for the purpose of holding memorial services, and devoutly invoking the blessing of Almighty God upon our stricken country." Whether Gov. Hawkins sincerely believes in the efficacy of prayer, or is an unscrupulous politician, whose object is to attract attention and improve his political prospects, we have no means of knowing; but it is certain that his letter deserves the censure of every man who believes in the total separation of Church and State.

The Method of Science and its Application to Metaphysics.

BY GEORGE HENRY LEWES.

1. No one meditating on the present condition of the intellectual world can fail to be arrested by the evidences of its deep-seated unrest. Yeast is working everywhere. Ancient formulas and time-honored creeds are yielding as much to internal pressure as to external assault. The expansion of knowledge is loosening the very earth clutched by the roots of creeds and churches. Rejoice over this or deplore it, the fact is unmistakable. Sects and parties, in the endeavor to sustain their positions, and to preserve at least their watchwords and the outward semblance of their creeds, nowadays snatch eagerly at compromises which a few years ago would have been scouted as heresies. Science is penetrating everywhere, and slowly changing men's conception of the world and of man's destiny. Doctrines which once were damnable are now fashionable, and heresies are appropriated as aids to faith. Ours is no longer the age described by Carlyle, "destitute of faith, yet terrified at scepticism." It is an age clamorous for faith, and only dissatisfied with scepticism when scepticism is a resting-place instead of a starting-point, a result instead of a preliminary caution. The purely negative attitude of Unbelief, once regarded as philosophical, is now generally understood to be only laudable in the face of the demonstrably incredible.

2. The great desire of this age is for a Doctrine which may serve to condense our knowledge, guide our researches, and shape our lives, so that Conduct may really be the consequence of Belief. We are growing impatient of futile compromises and half-beliefs: we see that it will not do to believe, or pretend to believe, one theory of the universe, yet show, in every way wherein confidence can show itself, that our lives are ruled by another theory. In consequence of this desire, while thinking men appear, on a superficial view, to be daily separating wider and wider from each other, they are, on a deeper view, seen to be drawing closer together: differing in opinion, they are approximating in spirit and purpose.

There is a conspicuous effort to reconcile the aims and claims of Religion and Science, the two mightiest antagonists. The many and piteous complaints, old as religion itself, against the growing infidelity of the age, might be disregarded, were they not confirmed on all sides by the evidence that religion is rapidly tending to one of two issues, either toward extinction or toward transformation. Some considerable thinkers regard the former alternative as the probable and desirable issue. They argue that religion has played its part in the evolution of humanity, a noble part, yet only that of a provisional organ, which, in the course of development, must be displaced by a final organ. Other thinkers, and I follow these, consider that religion will continue to regulate the evolution, but that, to do this in the coming ages, it must occupy a position similar to the one it occupied in the past, and express the highest thought of the time, as that thought widens with the ever-growing experience. It must not attempt to imprison the mind in formulas which no longer contain the whole of positive knowledge. It must not attempt to force on our acceptance, as explanations of the universe, dogmas which were originally the childish guesses at truth made by barbarian tribes. It must no longer present a conception of the world and physical laws, or of man and moral laws, which has any other basis than that of scientific induction. It must no longer put forward principles which are unintelligible and incredible, nor make their very unintelligibility a source of glory, and a belief in them a higher virtue than belief in demonstration. In a word, this transformed religion must cease to accept for its tests and sanctions such tests as would be foolishness in science, and such sanctions as would be selfishness in life. Instead of proclaiming the nothingness of this life, the worthlessness of human love, and the imbecility of the human mind, it will proclaim the supreme importance of this life, the supreme value of human love, and the grandeur of human intellect. Those who entertain this hope, and this view of a religion founded on science expressing at each stage what is known of the world and of man, believe, and I share the belief, that the present antagonism will rapidly merge in an energetic coöperation. The internecine warfare which has so long disturbed religion and obstructed science will give place to a doctrine which will respect the claims of both and satisfy the needs of both.

3. This future may be undetermined, but it will come. It will not come without contention. The ground will be contested inch by inch. The pathway of progress will still, as of old, bear traces of martyrdom, but the advance is inevitable. The signs of the advent are not few. Looking at them with some closeness, one observes that science itself is also in travail. Assuredly, some mighty new birth is at hand. Solid as the ground appears, and fixed as are our present landmarks, we cannot but feel the strange tremors of subterranean agitation which must ere long be followed by upheavals disturbing those landmarks. Not only do we see physics on the eve of a reconstruction through molecular dynamics, we also see metaphysics strangely agitated, and showing symptoms of a reawakened life. After a long period of neglect and contempt, its problems are once more reasserting their claims. And, whatever we may think of those claims, we have only to reflect on the important part played by metaphysics in sustaining and developing religious conceptions, no less than in thwarting and misdirecting scientific conceptions, to feel assured that before religion and science can be reconciled by the reduction of their principles to a common method, it will be necessary to transform metaphysics or to stamp it out of existence. There is but this alternative. At present, metaphysics is an obstacle in our path: it must be crushed into dust, and our chariot wheels must pass over it, or its forces of resistance must be converted into motive powers, and what is an obstacle become an impulse.

4. It is toward the transformation of metaphysics by reduction to the method of science that these pages tend. Their object is to show that the method which has hitherto achieved such splendid success in science needs only to be properly interpreted and applied, and by it the inductions and deductions from experience will furnish solutions to every metaphysical problem that can be rationally stated. Whereas, no problem, metaphysical or scientific, which is irrationally stated, can receive a rational solution. I propose to show that metaphysical problems have, rationally, no other difficulties than those which beset all problems; and, when scientifically treated, they are capable of solutions not less satisfactory and certain than those of physics.

To one class of readers, this announcement will perhaps seem extravagant, and the attempt absurd; to another class, the limitation to scientific method will seem narrow and insufficient. But, if I succeed in showing the first that solutions can thus be reached, and in showing the second that only thus can any solution be reached, the gain will be obvious. Not only will a vast region of speculative disorder be reduced to order, not only will one obstacle to the reconciliation between religion and science be removed, but we shall be in possession of a method which will make religion also the expression of experience, and thus dissipate the clouds of mystery and incredibility which have so long concealed the clear heavens.

5. Should these pages fall into the hands of readers who on former occasions have given me their attention, they will doubtless feel some surprise at this announcement of my present aim. I may here seem to be unsaying what it has been the chief purpose of my labors to enforce. But it is not really so. I have indeed incessantly, for some thirty years, tried to dissuade men from wasting precious energies on insoluble problems. That purpose still animates my efforts. But, although formerly I regarded problems as insoluble which I now hold to be soluble, there has been no other change than this: that I now see how problems which were insoluble by the method then in use are soluble by the method of science. This is not a retreat, but a change of front. Throughout my polemic against metaphysics, the attacks were directed against the irrational method, as one by which all problems whatever must be insoluble.

6. Descartes opened modern philosophy by his famous "Discourse on Method." It was a brilliant effort, but the consecration of experience has been wanting to it. History proves that it was not really capable of furnishing any satisfactory solutions.

Auguste Comte opened the new era by his great conception of method; namely, the extension to all inquiries—even morals and politics—of those inductive principles which alone have been found fruitful in any inquiries. I shall not be supposed to underrate the value of the Positive Philosophy, as conceived by Comte, in pointing out a defect of that scheme which has often been pointed out by its opponents; namely, that it displays no effort to apply the positive method to one great branch of speculation, that of metaphysics. He peremptorily excluded all research whatever in this direction, declaring metaphysical problems to be essentially insoluble, consequently idle and mischievous. Nor can there be any dispute that the speculations he had in view are inane, when pursued on the method traditionally followed; but an extension of the principles of positivism may legitimately include even these speculations; and scientific method, rightly interpreted, will find its employment there. It is surely more philosophical to bring metaphysical problems under the same speculative conditions as all other problems than to exclude them altogether, since our ignoring them will not extirpate them. The problems exist, and form obstacles to research. Speculative minds cannot resist the fascination of metaphysics, even when forced to admit that its inquiries are hopeless. This fact must be taken into account, since it makes refutation powerless. Indeed, one may say, generally, that no deeply rooted tendency was ever extirpated by adverse argument. Not having originally been founded on argument, it cannot be destroyed by logic. The very mind which admits your evidence to be unanswerable will swing back to its old position the instant that the pressure of evidence abates; and the opponent whom you left yesterday seemingly converted is found to-day no less confident than of old. Contempt, ridicule, argument, are all vain against tendencies toward metaphysical speculation. There is but one effective mode of displacing an error; and that is to replace it by a conception which, while readily adjusting itself to conceptions firmly held on other points, is seen to explain the facts more completely. The one permanent victory over a false method is by philosophizing better. The disciples of Descartes were not drawn over to the side of Newton by arguments exposing the imperfections of their system, but by examples of the greater sweep and efficiency of the Newtonian system, interpreted on principles common to Descartes and Newton. The hypothesis of vortices gradually sank into neglect when the law of gravitation was seen to be equally consistent with the mathematical principles advocated by Descartes, and more competent to explain the phenomena.

7. No array of argument, no accumulation of contempt, no historical exhibition of the fruitlessness of its effort, has sufficed to extirpate the tendency toward metaphysical speculation. Although its doctrines have become a scoff (except among the valiant few), its method still survives, still prompts to renewed research, and still misleads some men of science. In vain history points to the unequivocal failure of twenty centuries: the metaphysician admits the fact, but appeals to history in proof of the persistent passion which no failure can dismay, and hence draws confidence in ultimate success. A cause which is vigorous after centuries of defeat is a cause baffled but not hopeless, beaten but not subdued. The ranks of its army may be thinned, its banners torn and mud-stained; but the indomitable energy breaks out anew, and the fight is continued. Nay,—instructive fact!—even some great captains of science, while standing on triumphal cars in the presence of applauding crowds, are ever and anon seen to cast lingering glances at those dark avenues of forbidden research, and are stung by secret misgivings lest after all those avenues should not be issueless, but might some day open on a grander plain. They are not quite at ease in the suspicion that other minds confessedly of splendid powers can deliberately relinquish the certain glories of scientific labor for the nebulous splendors of metaphysics. They are not quite at ease lest what to their unaided vision now appears a nebula may not one day by aided vision resolve itself into stars. This hesitation is comprehensible: it is due in some measure to an imperfect appreciation of the limits and possibilities of research, and in many cases due to the fact that many minds well trained in science are imperfectly trained in philosophy. Hence, a want of harmony in their conceptions leads them to follow implicitly in one direction the principles which they peremptorily reject in another.

8. Few researches can be conducted in any one line of inquiry without sooner or later abutting on some metaphysical problem, were it only that of force, matter, or cause. Since science will not, and metaphysics cannot, solve it, the result is a patchwork of demonstration and speculation very pitiable to contemplate. Look where we will, unless we choose to overlook all that we do not understand, we are mostly confronted with a meshwork of fact and fiction, observation curiously precise beside traditions painfully absurd, a compound of sunlight and mist. Thus, in various writings, we come upon laws which compel phenomena to obey their prescription; plans and archetypal ideas which shape the course of events, and give forms and functions to organisms; forces playing about like sprites amid atoms that are at once contradictorily indivisible and infinitely divisible; bodies acting where they are not, and non-being (pure space) endowed with physical properties, among others that of resistance (since forces in spite of their alleged independence of matter are supposed to be diminished by the spaces they traverse). These and many analogous phantoms, more or less credited, too frequently hover amid phenomena, and convert speculation into what Hegel in another connection sarcastically calls a "true witches' circle."*

9. Why is this? Mainly because men of science are generally trained either to ignore all metaphysical questions, or to regard them as "mysteries which must be accepted." Some of the first have their confidence shaken by the steadfast faith of the metaphysician that the mysteries can be unveiled. Some of the second are found expressing decided opinions on those very mysteries declared to lie beyond human ken. Both argue from metaphysical assumptions and traditions as from acceptable data. Both resemble those theologians who solemnly affirm God to be unknowable, yet nevertheless have no hesitation in assigning attributes to his nature and purposes to his creations.

The continuance of metaphysical inquiry is, for the present at least, inevitable. The continuance of the metaphysical method is a serious evil, and is evitable. It sustains and fortifies those theological conceptions which would be seen to be preposterous, were it not for the dialectical dexterity which presents them in a light assuredly no less rational than that in which many metaphysical conceptions are presented. It is this which causes the adhesion of so many eminent men of science to theological dogmas flagrantly at variance with their positive knowledge. Renouncing all hope of a rational solution, yet unable to release their minds from the pressure of certain problems, they fly to faith for refuge. One of the sincerest of men and one of the most cautious of investigators, — Faraday, — when asked by a friend how he could believe the astounding propositions current in the religious sect to which he belonged, replied, "I prostrate my reason in this matter; for, if I applied the same process of reasoning which I use in matters of science, I should be an unbeliever." It was in a less philosophical spirit that Pascal wrote, "Je trouve bien qu'on n'approfondisse pas le système de Copernic." Pascal carried even into science his theological terror at the possible consequences of reasoning when a dogma seemed in peril. Faraday kept the two provinces and their two methods distinct. It is remarkable that both these great men were not reassured by the certainty that no truth in one direction can really contradict another; and Faraday might have been told that the legitimate application of those tests and sanctions which he regarded as sufficient in physical research might, if applied to metaphysical or theological questions, make him an unbeliever in the doctrines of his sect, but not an unbeliever in the truths which replaced them.

10. It may be noted that metaphysics, refusing to adopt the method of science, has received the protection of theology, but only such protection as is accorded to a vassal, and which is changed into hostility whenever their conclusions clash, or whenever argument threatens to disturb the secular slumber of dogma. Treated as a vassal by theology, it is treated by science as a visionary. Is there no escape from this equivocal position?

We have two cardinal facts to consider: first, that certain problems, though incessantly grappled with, have yielded no permanently accepted solutions; secondly, that in spite of constant failure they press on our attention with ever-renewed solicitation. Here, then, is ample justification for the attempt to create a doctrine capable of embracing all that metaphysics rationally may seek and all that science finds, by the reduction of both to common principles and common tests. One method, one logic, one canon of truth and demonstration, must be applied to both. Which must it be? Not the one hitherto employed in metaphysics: its incompetence is manifest in the unprogressive nature of its results. There is, therefore, only the alternative of prolonging this uncertainty, or of adopting the method which has been uniformly successful wherever rightly employed. . . .

* "In der That befindet man sich in einer Art von Hexenkreise worin Bestimmungen des Daseyns und Bestimmungen der Reflexion, Grund und Begründetes, Phänomene und Phantome in unausgeschiedener Gesellschaft durch einander laufen und gleichen Rang mit einander genießen." — Logik, II. 93.

The several sciences differ among each other by reason of the differences in their sensible data and the complexity of the phenomena they investigate. With these differences necessarily arise different means of investigation, different tests, and different degrees of certainty. Each science has thus its special logic. The means and tests which suffice in mathematics are no longer sufficiently comprehensive for physics; the logic of biology is, in special characters, unlike that of chemistry. Yet one method, one logic, rules throughout; and this general method may be applied to problems, social or metaphysical, which have hitherto been investigated in a quite different spirit and under different tests. When so applied, it will reach results having scientific certainty, because conforming to the conditions of science. More cannot lawfully be claimed. If, after all efforts, there still loom in the distance vast stretches of untrodden ground, and beyond these a region inaccessible to man, this is equally true of all research. I do not claim a wider reach nor a higher validity for metaphysical conceptions than for scientific conceptions; but I claim one equivalent reach and validity. To many minds, this holds out promise of but a meagre result. Impatient to pass beyond the limits of experience, they will reject a solution which confines them within the human horizon. That which fascinates them is the hope of passing beyond this horizon. It will therefore be incumbent on me to show that such a hope is futile, and per contra that every question which can be stated in terms of experience is capable of an answer on the experimental method.

For the Free Religious Index. THE CONFLICT OF AGES.

The longest conflict of the ages, if not the greatest as well, has been that between religion and knowledge. Knowledge has not always been truth. Religion has not always been error. But all progress has been, in its beginning, — speaking of psychical progress only, — speculation. Its motive power has been intellectual activity. The ascension of humanity has been wholly upon the wings of mind. No miraculous hand has ever lifted it up. No God ever came from the depthless realms "beyond the stars," to show our race the way from savagery to civilization. No "miraculous conception" ever brought it a Saviour. In all respects in which it stands, and in all the sublime height at which it stands above what we know to have been its condition when savagery and barbarism were universal, the change is due to intellectual activity and consequent growth.

Religion, on the other hand, — born of dreams, child of the night and off-spring of darkness, — has been by its nature positive, persistent, stubborn, unyielding, dogmatic, and bigoted. The religion of the past is an epitome of man's relation to an unseen, unknown, imaginary world of spiritual beings and powers.

Men slept and dreamed. In dreams, they saw strange or familiar forms, with which they held mysterious converse. In dreams, they travelled into strange lands and places. They learned, as it seemed to them, strange things. In dreams, they took part in the same phenomena with which we are familiar; but how different the interpretation they put upon them! To them, the things seen in dreams were not subjectivities of a half-awakened brain, but actually existing beings, who lived and moved and acted as did the bodily counterparts of them which they saw before them when awake. It could not well have been otherwise. Even yet, with all our elevation above the savage, there are people who still believe that the forms seen in dreams are actual beings. They keep alive by lingering survival the primitive simplicity of the race.

The savage reasoned, doubtless, some such way as this: "I did not see man, for my eyes were shut. Yet I am sure that I saw him, too. What was it? Man must be two beings." The second being was called his soul, or ghost. The forms seen were without question believed to be real, but ghostly or spiritual. Dreams were thus the origin of belief in spirits.

To the early man, not only all animal life, but every tree, mountain, river, sea, and sun, had its spirit, or ghost. This belief in ghosts grew until it became a wide-spread system of ghostly government, based upon such system of government as was recognized and practised in the actual life of the believers. The tribe had its chief. He died, but his ghost still lived. It became the guardian spirit of the tribe. He watched over his children as in life, and virtually continued to be their ruler. His successor was the "medium," through whom the old chief — the "big injun" of the modern "science" — made his "communications" for the guidance of his people.

The belief in spirits grew; and with it the spirits themselves grew in power, with the growing imagination of the slowly developing savage mind, until the early spirit-chiefs, watching over their tribes, became mighty gods, ruling vast departments of nature. The development continued until polytheism melted into monotheism; and, instead of many gods supreme over different departments of nature, there was but one supreme, — supreme over all gods and men and spirits and demons. As in the tribe there was but one chief, as in the confederation of tribes there must be the big chief, so the conception travels to the spirit-world, and constructs the relation of things there. The conception that the early savage formed of the vision seen in his dream became by slow process of evolution the supreme God of the world.

Why did this, to us, strange system of belief have this wonderful growth? Such a development could not be made among civilized people. The reason doubtless is that "civilized" peoples feel the control of intellect, and possess knowledge. When men began to dream dreams and see ghosts, as they supposed, there was no knowledge, and intellect was but little, if anything, more than the animal instinct of self-preservation. From his beginning, the animal man, has possessed a nervous system and an emotional nature. He possessed curiosity and wonder. Ignorance was the mother of fear; and fear was a progeny the most prolific that people the world of man for thousands of years before instinct had been developed into intellect and intellect had lifted man high enough to discover that his fears were groundless, — a work of development that is not quite finished. Spirits and ghosts of departed children, companions, and especially of dead chiefs, were a continual appeal to the marvellous and the emotional in human nature. Few there are who have not felt it in some way for some one gone. Suppress the mind of man in its development above savagery, and the race would soon become savages again under control of emotion, curiosity, and fear. What appeals to the emotions becomes fact to the undeveloped or but feebly active mind. Beliefs became fixed regarding spirit agencies long before intellect became capable of reflecting upon them. Religion of ghosts and gods had crystallized before doubt became a factor in life. Emotion was the parent of the religion of superstition. Hence, intellect has been forced to fight it at every step of its development; and hence, too, the long and often bitter and bloody conflict that has been waged between them.

But the world of man has arrived at time and place when the good of humanity requires that a new departure be made. Nothing less than a religion of knowledge and a science of moral culture will meet the wants of humanity, and hold it to a still upward development. The emotions must be lifted from the savagery and superstition of the long survivals of their primitive condition, and placed by the side of intellect and made to act in harmony with it, before it is possible to fulfil the sublime prophecy of this strange yet grand humanity.

Recognizing the fixity of beliefs founded upon the emotional nature of primitive mankind, such men as Buckle and Draper have asserted that there is no growth in morals. If we assume that morals are to be measured by those early emotional developments, those men are right. But they made the mistake of supposing that emotion and intellect are actually in a state of conflict. I believe they are not. I believe they will live and grow in harmony. I believe that, when emotion is divorced from its early and old superstitions, it will become the natural counsellor and bride of intellect, and inspire it to nobler heights than it has yet attained, than it can attain without such aid. I believe that the reason of the conflict between them is that emotion was old and long established, fixed, solidified in its instinctive beliefs regarding souls, spirits, ghosts, and gods, before intellect became keen enough to question feeling, and hence, as already said, the conflict. Because of the instinctive nature of those early beliefs, they have been vastly harder to change than are the more strictly intellectual beliefs of more modern times. No bigotry so bigoted as that which can't think! There is but one way to treat those lingering relics of barbarism, and that is to cut them away as outgrown and useless appendages to modern civilization as worthless survivals of conditions that belong only to the mental infancy of the human race, and could have been formed only when it was in a state of savagery. When that is done, it will be found that morals can be cultivated and increased not less than intelligence. I believe that the best possible thing to be done for the good of society in general is to make it understand that the only road to heaven is through intellectual development, and the only way to permanency of civilization is through making intellectual culture moral. The first step is out of the lingering beliefs about ghosts and gods of a future life,—leaving that until we get to it,—and into a "scientific method" of making the best of this. An intellectual religion has never existed, nor has it ever been attempted until now. The conditions have been slowly forming for it for hundreds of years, and are now ripening to perfection of opportunity. It is a movement in the direct line of evolution, and it has the benefit of ages of human experience. That it will be ultimately successful I have the utmost confidence. All nature is behind it with steel of logic and sweep of law.

THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF MORALITY.

I do not know any more idle talk than that about the influence of materialism on morality. Whatever metaphysical subtlety may be expounded on materialism against idealism, or on materialism against Spiritualism, there can be but one meaning attached to the relations of materialism and morality. A system of morality founded on materialism can only mean one which is deduced from the facts and laws of science and conditions of life. That these are quite sufficient for the purpose, that a system of rules for human guidance can be so constructed, far more definite and better adapted to further a perfect life than any supernatural system, has been abundantly proven. George Combe in the Constitution of Man, Herbert Spencer in Social Statics, Education, and Data of Ethics, and many others too numerous to mention, have labored in this field; and, every year, the possibility of constructing a system of morality without reference to any supernatural revelation is coming more and more to be recognized. Mr. H. Clay Neville recurs again and again to this subject in the columns of the Index. Judging by his latest utterance, he does not seem to be aware that any attempt has ever been made to place morality on a scientific basis. One would suppose, from the plentiful use he makes of the old, unmeaning phrases of "blind," "cold," "dark," "brutal" "forces of nature," that his reading on the subject had terminated fifty years ago. Otherwise, he would scarcely say that, according to materialistic morality, "a thing might be right in London and wrong in San Francisco, or wrong to-day and right to-morrow." Still less would he speak of "right resting on the changing fancy of each individual mind."

Mr. Neville is very fond of dwelling on the necessity of having an eternal standard of right, although he acknowledges that there is no such thing to be found anywhere. It is absurd to suppose that there can be anything eternal in human obligation, seeing that it is all implied in man's constitution and his relationships to other creatures. There could be no such virtues as temperance, chastity, or cleanliness, if the human organism had no existence. There could be no such virtues as truthfulness, honesty, or justice, if men did not live in social relations. The new philosophy of evolution has worked and is still working great changes in men's views on this subject, as well as in every other department of human thought. It teaches us that the human constitution, with all its endowments of physical organ and mental faculty, has been produced by action and interaction between the organism and the external world. We learn also, from the law of natural selection and survival of the fittest, that certain courses of conduct are better adapted than others for the continuance and completeness of life. All races of men in past ages have been bound by the law of nature to comply with these conditions or to perish; and the results of this process going on through so many ages are registered in every organ of the human frame. It has now become possible, and it will be the work of future moralists, to construct a code of human duties directly from the study of the organism and man's relations in social life. The necessity of temperance, exercise, cleanliness, and other individual virtues, even apart from experience, is written in the structure of the stomach, the muscles, the lungs, and other organs. The necessity of truthfulness, honesty, industry, and other social virtues, is written on the groundwork of social relations, and all these lessons are confirmed and verified by experience. It is instructive to compare a code of human duties, so constructed, with that deduced from the Bible or any other form of revelation. The writers of the Bible, being entirely ignorant of physiology, had no idea of the importance of those activities which minister to sound health and self-preservation. The main points which they inculcated were not the discharge of man's duties to himself, his family, and his fellow-men, but the discharge of his duty to God, and the preparation for a future life. The Scripture says: "Resist not evil." "Wives, be in subjection to your husbands." "The powers that be are ordained of God." "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers." The law of equal liberty says: Resist evil. Resist every form of oppression and injustice. Let no human being be in subjection to another. Resist every government that goes beyond its proper sphere. The one, in short, is adapted to man in a barbarous age, and is well fitted to keep him in it; the other is adapted to further progress in civilization.

CARLYLE AND THE SOCIAL QUESTION.

We wish to call attention to Carlyle's appreciation of the social question, as shown in Mr. Mead's thoughtful little volume on The Philosophy of Carlyle. Mr. Mead assures us that Carlyle's horror of democracy was not the horror of a monarchist or a Tory, and that "it will be the democrat, and not the despot, who will quote Carlyle, as the years show clearly the drift of his thought" (p. 112). To thought over the social question, we are told, he has given more attention in the last forty years than to almost any other subject. "To disagree with all reformers about reform was doubtless his mistake," says Mr. Mead; yet he quotes such sentiments as these, uttered as long ago as 1840. "To us individually, the condition of the working-classes appears, and has for many years appeared, to be the most ominous of all practical matters whatever,—matter in regard to which, if something be not done, something will do itself one day, and in a fashion that will please nobody. . . . According to the newspapers, the chimera of Chartism has been put down. It is indeed the 'chimera' of Chartism which has been put down; but the living essence of Chartism has not been put down. Chartism means the bitter discontent, grown fierce and mad, the wrong condition of the working-classes of England" (quoted p. 123). Emerson is quoted as saying, "He [i.e., Carlyle] thinks it the only question for wise men, instead of art and fine fancies and poetry, and such things, to address themselves to the problem of society" (p. 121). "The real poem for a man at present," Carlyle said to Cooper, "is to make a bit of cosmos out of the horrible practical chaos round us" (p. 124).

Our touchstone of a man's real political and social sympathies is his estimation of the French Revolution, which Mr. Phillips has recently pronounced so "unmixed a blessing" to mankind. M. Taine had remarked that Carlyle saw "nothing but evil" in it, to which Mr. Mead responds: "This is very far from the truth. The French Revolution was to Carlyle a truth, if indeed a truth clad in hell-fire" (p. 125 n). The following passage from Past and Present does not hint at the sacredness of the present system of land ownership in Great Britain: "Properly speaking, the land belongs to these two: to the almighty God; and to all his children of men that have ever worked well on it, or that shall ever work well on it"; and Mr. Mead even asserts (p. 127) that it was a part of his later view that private proprietorship in land should be abolished. Carlyle did not even fail to touch upon the puzzling economical problem of the organization of industry: "The question arises," he says (p. 126), "whether in some ulterior, perhaps not far-distant stage of this 'chivalry of labor,' your master-worker may not find it possible, and needful, to grant his workers permanent interest in his enterprise and theirs, so that it become in practical result what in essential fact and justice it ever is, a joint enterprise; all men, from the chief master down to the lowest overseer and operative, economically as well as loyally concerned for it. Which question I do not answer. The answer, near or else far, is perhaps, yes; and yet one knows the difficulties."

These closing pages of Mr. Mead's book quite atone for what we feared, at the time of reading, might be a disposition to slight present issues, in the following earlier passage (p. 42): "Our problems and duties remain the same at bottom as Socrates and Plato found or King Arthur's Knights, and history is greater and wiser than we." Surely, we thought at the time, there are "new occasions" and there are "new duties." History not seldom indicates the right road by actually taking the wrong one, and with equal truth we might say we are (or should be) greater and wiser than history. The undue glorification of history surely belongs to another school of thought than the Transcendental one, to which the idea in its value and transcendent truth is not measured by its historical triumphs, and is, in truth, a goal rather than an attainment.

Thus viewed, history has most significance as hint and prophecy. We are indeed to heed the past, to be instructed by it; but, after all, we are to heed deepest its ideas and aspirations, its fruitless prayers, to heed, indeed, what never became history, and, in the light of it, to judge history and find our link with the past not in retracing its path, but in marking out a better one. Mr. Mead's word was, perhaps, not uncalled for in view of some of our nineteenth century conceit and irreverence. To be chastened a little is no bad thing for any of us; but we are glad that these closing pages set him right before the eyes of the public, as one with eyes open to the needs of our time, and ready for remedies, as yet all untried. Courage and faith will be as necessary for the future as they ever were in the past; for the essence of courage is to stake one's life on a possibility, and the essence of faith is to believe that there is a possibility, despite all the contradictions of experience and the world's indifference or sure prophecy of failure. Mr. Mead says, "The heaven of the principle of neighborhood—Lessing's 'humanity,' Mazzini's 'association,' 'swarmery,' if you please—is what Carlyle's political philosophy chiefly lacks" (p. 125).

We will content ourselves now with simply thanking our author for this hint, and with wishing that he might himself at some time develop its varied and rich suggestions for us.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

No. V.

The most remarkable phenomenon of the religious or unreligious sort in Boston, of late, is the gathering which George Chainey draws to Paine Hall on Sunday. It is scarcely less of a surprise to the Infidel than the Christian. Up to the time that Mr. Chainey entered it, Paine Hall attracted but little attention from the general public. A debating society of twelve or fifteen persons, more or less, composed of pretty nearly the same disputants on each occasion, and ready to discuss all points of history, political economy, and the profoundest questions of the universe and beyond, should the discussion take that range, met once or twice on Sunday, but outside of the columns of the Investigator received little notice from the press. Moreover, the dilapidated social and moral status of some of these persons had a tendency to repel many from the place, who, but for this, would have been in sympathy with it. The situation, in view of these facts, did not appear promising at the time Mr. Chainey started upon his enterprise. Still further, there was a good deal of doubt among radicals, even of the ultra class, as to whether Mr. Chainey himself had the requisite qualities for the success of such a movement. Although much lauded by Col. Ingersoll, and advantage was taken of this in getting an introduction to the Boston public, it must be confessed, in frankness, that his realizations came short of expectation. His Music Hall lecture was a disappointment. We mention these things, because they go to show that the success Mr. Chainey has attained, and we think he has attained a large success of its kind, is all the more extraordinary. It is probably the first time so large and ultra a congregation in religion has been held together under the leadership of one man, so long, in this city.

It is certainly an exceptional thing that when so large a number of the people are away on their vacations, and the churches as thinned out as they are, Mr. Chainey's congregations continue with but little diminution. If, therefore, effecting what a person starts out to do is success, it must be conceded that Mr. Chainey has been successful. There are many radicals, as truly radical as Mr. Chainey according to every right use of the word, who would not covet the success he has gained, at least if won in his way. There are others who could not gain it, though they should covet it. The movement has now proceeded far enough to bear the outward appearance of permanence. What are the elements of its success? In the first place, Mr. Chainey, if not a good, is at least a fair speaker. His voice has considerable depth of tone, and his enunciation is, for the most part, clear and distinct; though a little elocutionary drill would do him no harm, even in these respects, if he made proper use of it. There is a tendency to a choked and hurried utterance, which he needs to correct in time, as it detracts from, rather than adds to, the effect of his speaking. Mr. Chainey's style of discourse, too, is lively. It is of the wide-awake description. There is little of the syllogistic form in its treatment of a subject. It does not impress one as a painfully wrought argument, but as specially prepared for the platform, after the manner a play is adapted to the stage. It is broken, somewhat desultory, a kind of mingled colloquy and declamation. There is now and then a show of humor, but it is of rather a languid sort. In this respect, the contrast is quite marked between him and his distinguished prototype, Col. Ingersoll. Indeed, the prevailing tone of Mr. Chainey's discourse is too grave and earnest to admit of very much play of the humorous element. It has some touches of poetic sensibility and expression, occasionally of sentiment, but is much more characterized by sharpness and severity. Even those who are partial to the kind of speaking that hits somebody are likely to feel the hits in this case are a little too frequent.

It seems to us that Mr. Chainey's success is largely due to the fact that his speaking is so directly upon the level of those he addresses. It was very evident, both from the discourse and the manner in which it was received when we heard him, that his hearers were not those who are accustomed to discriminating habits of thought or a judicial way of looking at things. There were many passages that we might quote as illustrations of this. "We want more Radicalism and less Liberalism," said Mr. Chainey, near the beginning of his discourse. Liberalism, as we understand it and as we think it is generally understood, means liberal modes of thought, with due respect for the intellectual rights of others. It says, Let me think as I may, and I will let you think as you may, only it is better that we should reason and compare notes in a friendly way in respect to each other's conclusions and opinions. But Liberalism, a discreet and thoughtful Liberalism, also holds that there are certain canons of conduct and thought which are essential to all well-ordered society, and to which all men and women should render allegiance. Now there is a Radicalism that is in the strictest accord with this kind of Liberalism, but it is not the kind Mr. Chainey advocates. On the other hand, he seemed to prefer that which pulls up by the roots everything it can lay its hands on that others hold sacred, that does not agree with its notions or theories, without regard to how extravagant or absurd those notions or theories may be. It would unloose unnumbered Guitaues to roam at large with infamous and rampant lawlessness, to assassinate moral and social order, reason and intelligence. Again said Mr. Chainey, "Every great wrong that is done in the world takes God into partnership." Is this true? Is there not much wrong in the world in which the thought of God and religion do not enter. The Bible and the Churches were severely denounced throughout the discourse. But is there not also something that may be said in their favor? Would it be advisable, even if it could be done, to entirely stop the reading of the Bible or put it out of existence? And, if so, ought not the Bibles of all the other religions to be extinguished? Is all the hypocrisy and scoundrelism in the Church, and all nobleness and virtue among Radicals? This would seem to be the implication of the Infidel Pulpit, when we listened to it. With all the merits of Mr. Chainey's sermon, it seemed to us too unqualified in its denunciations. Indeed there was altogether too much denunciation in it. There was too little recognition of what society, with all the fallacies of the creeds and the Churches, still owes, in every community, to their adherents for a very preponderating amount of support to its institutions of enlightenment, of humanity, and charity. Mr. Chainey is young. He has got a good start in the work he has undertaken, and a fair prospect of usefulness and influence before him. It is to be hoped that he may turn it to the best account, and thus, instead of a short-lived popularity or success, win that which shall be enduring and worthy of his opportunity and ability.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE INFIDEL PULPIT. Vol. I. Lectures by George Chainey. Published by the author: Roxbury, Mass.

From this first volume of Mr. Chainey's Infidel Pulpit, we learn that he, as a recent convert to Liberalism, has not yet

"Lost the dream of doing.
In the other dream of done;
The first spring in the pursuing,
The first pride in the begun."

And we hope that he may never, like too many in this pursuit of truth, feel the chill of the "First recoil from incompleteness

In the face of what is won."

Every page of this volume burns with the enthusiasm of the newly emancipated thinker, who as yet only feels the glad sense of mental liberty and revolt against limitation of thought, without taking into full consideration, perhaps, the dreary road of misconstruction and misunderstanding, that he must inevitably travel over before he reaches the goal of philosophic serenity. One of the chief charms of these lectures consists in their impassioned spirit and poetic diction. Thoughts which are old, and arguments with which intelligent Liberals are familiar, are here presented in an earnest and fervid manner. To show Mr. Chainey's literary style, we give a few sentences culled at random from the volume before us: "Each great and noble soul that has breathed forth sentiments of justice, truth, or liberty, has contributed to the moral atmosphere that goes to the making of our character, as truly as the physical atmosphere goes into the building of our bodies." "All prayer to God necessitates that the hands of superstition should be clasped over the eyes of reason." "Nature kneels at our feet, and acknowledges our sovereign power. The lesson of all history is that the redeemer of man is man." "There is no safeguard to either private or public virtue that is not based on absolute sincerity." "The Czar is dead, but the people live," said one of the prisoners suspected of throwing the bomb that killed the Emperor, 'and I am quite ready to die.' So theology and every institute founded thereon shall perish; but the people will live, growing grander and nobler every day beneath the sunlit skies of liberty and truth." "The rough feet of reformers must no more be allowed to trample on the pure modesty of nature than those of street loafers."

THE LIFE OF GEORGE IV. By Percy Fitzgerald.

This is a gossip history which throws considerable light upon the domestic life of the Hanoverian kings, as well as on the men and manners of England during the reigns of George III. and George IV., though the revelation is not "greatly to their credit." It is a book charming in style and interesting in matter. There is much which reads like romance, even in the inner history of the commonplace Georges of England. Not very edifying romance in the way of good morals or fair dealing, but, looked at in the light of historical "danger signals" to moral honesty, not without use and purpose.

SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY for September is as interesting and timely in its topics as usual, and with the usual quota of beautiful engravings that make it unrivalled in that department by any other American magazine. In regard to the literary topics treated of in this number, art is represented by articles from W. C. Brownell and Richard Whiting, history by Eugene Schuyler's continuation of his "Peter the Great" and A. C. Redwood's "Boy in Gray." Ernest Ingersoll and John Muir treat on subjects in Natural History, Albert Stickney on politics, C. H. Farnham on "Ice-Yacht-Building," J. B. Mathews on "Victor Hugo as a Dramatist," Miss Gordon-Cummings on "The Wheel as a Religious Symbol," H. H. Boyesen, Fanny R. Feudge, J. Vance Cheney, Nellie Cone, L. R. Fairfax, and the author of An Earnest Tripler contribute to the departments of romance and poetry.

THE Roman religion was essentially domestic, and it was a main object of the legislator to surround marriage with every circumstance of dignity and solemnity. Monogamy was, from the earliest times, strictly enjoined; and it was one of the great benefits that have resulted from the expansion of Roman power, that it made this type dominant in Europe. "For five hundred and twenty years," it was said, "there was no such thing as a divorce in Rome; and, even after this example, for many years the marriage tie was regarded as absolutely indissoluble. Manners were so severe that a senator was censured for indecency because he had kissed his wife in the presence of their daughter." The courtesan class, though probably numerous and certainly uncontrolled, were regarded with much contempt. The disgrace of publicly professing themselves members of it was believed to be a sufficient punishment; and an old law, which was probably intended to teach in symbol the duties of married life, enjoined that no such person should touch the altar of Juno. It was related of a certain aedile that he failed to obtain redress for an assault which had been made upon him, because it had occurred in a house of ill-fame, in which it was disgraceful for a Roman magistrate to be found. The sanctity of female purity was believed to be attested by all nature. On the whole, however, it is probable that the Roman matron was, from the earliest period, a name of honor; that the beautiful sentence of a jurisconsult of the empire, who defined marriage as a life-long fellowship of all divine and human rights, expressed most faithfully the feelings of the people, and that female virtue shone in every age conspicuously in Roman biographies.—Lecky's History of European Morals.

ON THE HEIGHTS.

Within this middle cycle of
The onward moving years,
On a pinnacle far Aidenward,
A glorious flame appears.

Which steadily henceforth shall shed
Athwart the psychic night
Celestial, pure, undying rays
Of soul-enthraling light

Across the dreary realms of mind,—
Mind mystical, sublime,—
That to the uttermost shall pierce
And down the steep of time

Obliquely dart where lightness
Never dared to dart before,
Dispelling silent shadows in
The great for evermore.

And gaudy tribes antipodal,
The daughters of the sea,
The children of the setting sun,
With all that are to be,

Laughing at death, shall discard strife,
And calmly drink away
The gladdening effulgence
Of each supernal ray,

Till all of mankind shall be blest
With peace, the spirit's youth.
The name of that flame is liberty;
The name of that mountain, truth.

Who will not see the light of one,
The other dares not climb,
Within this middle cycle of
The onward-moving time.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 1, 1881.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX: namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ARNOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

For two months from this date, during my temporary absence, Mr. B. F. Underwood will have the entire editorial charge of the Free Religious Index. All communications intended for the paper should be sent to him, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER.

July 22, 1881.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

MONEY due the Index is greatly needed at this season, and subscribers who are in arrears will confer a favor by sending at once the amounts they owe.

RADICAL means root. A radical is one that goes to the root of things, to bottom facts, to bed-rock principles. He is dissatisfied with error and exposes it; with evils, and works to remove them. But let nobody mistake rant, or violent denunciation, or Utopian theories, or Quixotic actions for radicalism.

THE Nation for August 11 contains an extended notice of Tisstot's Russes et Allemands, which gives, in the writer's opinion, "the pith of ponderous German works in a few amusing and well-written pages" on the subject of Nihilism. Those who associate Hegel with political conservatism may be surprised to learn of the "Fathers of Nihilism" (Hertzer, Bakunin, and Tchernysheoski) that they believed that in the doctrine of Hegel they had found a confirmation of their own views on government and society. "We spent whole nights," says Hertzer, "in discussing every paragraph of the three volumes of Hegel's Logic and the two volumes of his Aesthetics. A Nihilist Princess receives slight consideration from the Nation of a week earlier. The work is said to be "all at second-hand. The writer had no materials beyond the commonest newspaper reports." Danieleffsky's Ninth Wave (which is to be found in the cheap Universal-Bibliothek, under the somewhat misleading title of Die Nonnenklöster in Russland) is commended to readers seeking trustworthy information about Russia. In this connection, we may refer to an explanation given by John Baker (pseudonym), the Russian revolutionist and exile, and reported in Boston Herald of August 6, as to Hartmann. He is declared to be "one of the impatient terrorists connected with the smaller faction of the Nihilists," and has "manhood enough not to claim membership with the constitutional revolutionary party." This latter party means to bring about a change by fair means or, better still, by manly means, the same means that were used at Concord and Lexington,—that is, open warfare. A distinction is here suggested, that, if true, ought to be borne in mind by those who declaim against Nihilism.

THE PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

The return of the Jews into Spain under royal sanction, encouraged by King Alfonso, to repair as far as possible a great wrong done by his ancestors, brings to mind the treatment which this people received from the rulers and the people of Spain near the close of the fifteenth century. Previous to this time, they had been treated throughout Christendom with the greatest injustice. During the Middle Ages, they were objects of the most bitter and cruel persecution. They were separated from their fellow-men, compelled to live in certain quarters and to wear a peculiar dress. They could not eat with Christians. No Christian could employ them as physicians, nor purchase drugs of them. Inter-marriage with them was a terrible crime. Queen Joanna II., in 1317, in a statute regulating the houses of ill-fame in Avignon, after providing fully and with great particularity for the accommodation of Christians, enacted that no Jew should be admitted under severe penalties. When they were executed, they were separated from other criminals, and were hung between dogs, head downwards. Every ecclesiastical revival, every accession of a new sovereign, was an occasion for fresh restrictions and renewed cruelties. The theologians maintained that all they possessed could be lawfully taken from them, and incited the people to plunder and rob them. They were banished from England by Edward II., from France by Charles VI. They sought refuge in Spain, and contributed by their genius and learning to the greatness of that country. "But when, in an ill-omened hour," says Lecky, "the cross supplanted the crescent on the heights of Alhambra, this solitary refuge was destroyed, the last gleam of tolerance vanished from Spain, and the expulsion of the Jews was determined on." The clergy were tireless in their efforts to secure their expulsion; and, when Isabella issued the celebrated decree of banishment, she carried out the wishes of the priests and the people. Various estimates have been made of the number of Jews whom the Inquisition in that age drove from Spain, the lowest being one hundred and sixty thousand and the highest eight hundred thousand. Among the number were Lord Beaconsfield's ancestors, who fled to Venice. The sufferings of the Spanish Jews caused by these measures have been represented by an old historian as terrible as those of their ancestors during the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The decree required that all unconverted Jews should leave Spanish soil in three months. They were forbidden to carry gold or silver from Spain. "The wealth which they accumulated by trade," says Gibbon, "and the management of the finances, invited the pious avarice of their masters; and they might be oppressed without danger, as they had lost the use and remembrance of arms." The pirates that infested the coast robbed multitudes of their goods, and then made them slaves. Tens of thousands died of famine, pestilence, and at the hands of the Bedouins. Eighty thousand took refuge in Portugal, having received from the king promise of protection. But the Spanish priests stirred up the Portuguese, for which purpose a mission was organized, and the king soon issued a decree more cruel than that of the Spanish Queen. All adult Jews were banished from Portugal. All their children under fourteen years of age were taken from them to be educated in the Christian faith. "Then, indeed," says Lecky, "the cup of bitterness was filled to the brim. The serene fortitude with which the exiled people had borne so many and such grievous calamities gave way, and was replaced with the wildest paroxysms of despair. Piercing shrieks of anguish filled the land. Women were known to fling their children into deep wells or to tear them limb from limb, rather than resign them to the Christians. When at last, childless and broken-hearted, they found that the ships had been purposely detained, and the allotted time having expired, they were reduced to slavery and baptized by force. By the merciful intervention of Rome, most of them at last regained their liberty, but their children were separated from them forever. A great peal of rejoicing filled the Peninsula, and proclaimed that the triumph of the Spanish priests was complete. Certainly, the heroism of the defenders of every other creed fades into insignificance before this martyred people, who for thirteen centuries confronted all the evils that the fiercest fanaticism could devise, enduring obloquy and spoliation, and the violation of the dearest ties and the infliction of the most hideous sufferings, rather than abandon their faith."

From the time here referred to down to the present, the general treatment of the Jews by the people of Christian nations has steadily improved, although it has by no means been generous or just. In many of the European countries, civil disabilities have been removed; and in England but a few years ago, the world witnessed the elevation of a member of the despised race to the highest position to which a British subject can attain. But of late, in Russia, in Germany, and even in the United States, there have been manifestations of prejudice and hostility against the Jews, sadly at variance with the principles of justice, liberality, and religious liberty. It is not strange that they have received but little protection in Russia, for that is not a land of enlightened ideas or religious tolerance, and the Czar himself lives in daily fear of his life; but there is something anomalous and painful to contemplate in the unreasonable and persistent persecution of this people in a country like Germany, and the attempts which have been made to belittle and proscribe the Jews in this "land of the free and home of the brave."

Less than a week ago, at a conference of "The Orthodox Evangelical Clergy," held at Berlin, a prominent member said: "The rights already accorded to the Jews should be withdrawn; and he recommended the substitution of relative rights for the absolute rights giving the equality they now enjoy. These rights, moreover, should be firmly kept within prescribed limits by means of special measures, in order to break the Jewish autocracy. The conference adopted a resolution to this effect." Here we have a virtual confession that the Christians cannot accomplish the subordination and humiliation of the Jews by the force of superior intellect, or the virtue of nobler lives, and that they must therefore have recourse to legislative enactments, and avail themselves of the lingering religious bigotry and hatred which can yet be brought to bear against this race. In this most unjust treatment of the Jews in the closing quarter of the nineteenth century, we see, as Carl Vogt has remarked, a manifestation of that deep-seated hatred and that cruel spirit of persecution, exhibitions of which toward the Jews were once unrestrained and universal throughout Christendom. It is an important part of the work of Liberalism to discourage and condemn every effort to revive or strengthen prejudices and hatreds which had their origin in ages of fanatical superstition, on account of race or religion.

AGREEING TO DIFFER.

WHEN a person, after having revolved in his mind the pros and cons of any subject, as presented by the most careful thinkers on both sides of that subject, comes to some definite conclusion regarding it, I have never been able to understand by what process of that reason he has so proudly relied upon to indorse his own decision, he can make it seem right and just that he should feel anger toward any other individual who, undergoing a like process, has yet arrived at conclusions opposite to his own. When a man, after long "halting between two opinions," has come, and only by slow processes of ratiocination, to hold some decided opinion on any question, it seems odd, to say the least, that he can thereafter be so hard to convince of the purity of intention or moral honesty of conviction of those whose line of reasoning has led them to believe differently.

And yet we often see such result of definite expression of opinion in every department of thought, and, I am sorry to say, too frequently among even those who call themselves liberal in name, though they are assuredly not so in spirit. To protest against any such limitations of freethought as this is the purport of this article.

Not only against those who venture to differ wholly from them in religious matters, not alone against the purely orthodox,—which is in itself uncharitable and unreasonable enough,—is this senseless anger directed by these soi-disant "Liberals," but, with even more venom, against any who presume to differ in any unimportant iota from these self-elected infallible popes in the realm of freethought. Forgetting for how long they themselves poised in the balance of reason the arguments for and against the same question, and that it was only after long mental conflict that they came to a decision, they yet have the assurance to assume a judicial and sternly condemnatory air in speaking or writing of those who conscientiously differ from them.

To learn how best to "agree to differ" should be one of the primary lessons in the self-discipline of all students in pursuit of truth. He who, even by reason of superior progressiveness, is so far in advance of his fellows that he cannot be quite understood by them, has more than all others need of that gracious spirit of "charity for all, malice toward none," which must ever be the key-note of any true progress, that makes such progress possible or freethought secure. Yet, to the astonished bewilderment of the true freethinker, it not unfrequently happens that those who have fought most long and desperately the fight against unreasoning faith, who have known through hard experience what it costs to contest step by step for the right of free speech, of freethought, are yet, strangely enough, found among the strongest opponents of liberty of speech in those who doubt the correctness of their conclusions, or give to the world reasons against their pet ideas.

To the mind of one who is thoroughly secure in the ethical or logical foundation of his own belief, there can come no feelings of petty petulance against any of his fellows who, by reason of defect in their mental make-up or even by reason of their greater capacity for clairvoyance of the highest truth, have arrived at opinions, on one or many subjects, differing from his. If he has been a careful student of human nature, of minds, and of men, he will know that, however circumscribed or however enlarged his views may be, however honest he is, he is quite as liable to be mistaken in his premises and conclusions as his equally earnest and honest fellow-man; and, if he be a conscientious man,—and unless he is he is no sincere seeker after truth or a true lover of wisdom,—he will willingly accord to his sincere opponent all the respectful patience of hearing which he feels is due to his own earnest conviction and loyal love for truth. He will be doing a service, by such patient hearing, to himself and to humanity,—to himself in broadening his sphere of thought, and making himself thereby better able to judge between the true and the false, through giving, as a just judge, a patient and thoughtful hearing to what he thinks false as well as to what he hopes or believes to be true; to humanity in giving an example of careful consideration of and of tender respect for the honest ideas of others.

Strangest of all, these impatient bigots—for there is no other name for them, however much they dub themselves with names of Spiritualist, Liberal, Infidel, or Free Religionist—are the bigots who, having after much tribulation and mental martyrdom sought and found their way out of the sloughs of superstition, and have discarded, after much mental conflict, their early teaching, can yet turn, in a cross-grained and venomous manner, on those who have not yet been able to so battle their way out of the fogs and sloughs, but, in their weakness, are content to believe as they were taught to believe, not having strength enough to break away from the results of ages of inherited superstitious tendencies, and forget to remember that to such as these there is no escape from such inheritance save in the slow-growing new heritage of this age of doubt and discussion,—a heritage which can belong only to the men and women of several generations hence. "Come, let us reason together, saith the Lord," ought to be an inspired text. To reason together without bitterness and without prejudice is always an act of wisdom; but to condemn without listening to the opinion of those who differ from us is a hindrance to true progress.

S. A. U.

THE ground on which it is claimed that Hartmann, the Russian Nihilist, should be exempted from extradition, is that his offence is of a political nature, and that the policy and practice of nations are against their delivering to one another persons charged with offences of this character. But the crime alleged against him is participation in the Moscow railway explosion, which was designed to kill the late Czar, but which failed to accomplish this and caused the death of several other persons. Does such a crime belong to political offences? But the fact is there is no extradition treaty between the government of the United States and that of Russia; and it is extremely doubtful whether the President, in the absence of such a treaty, has the authority to deliver criminals to other governments, whatever be the offence with which they are charged. There is nothing in the Constitution or in the laws of Congress giving the President such authority. Attorney-General Cushing said, "It is the established rule of the United States neither to grant nor ask for the extradition of criminals as between us and any foreign government, unless in cases for which stipulation is made by express convention." In 1855, Judge Barbour, who at a later date became a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, said, "I am of the opinion that without a treaty stipulation this government is not under any obligation to surrender a fugitive from justice to another government for trial." There seems to be no constitutional or legal grounds whatever on which Hartmann can be delivered to the Russian government; and the following extract from the Independent seems to be entirely just:—

We have no sympathy with Mr. Hartmann or any of his plots; yet we protest in advance against any usurpation of power by the Executive of this government for the sake of bringing him to justice. The theory that any person, peacefully coming within the jurisdiction and protection of our laws and committing no offence against them, may, in the absence of any treaty or law of Congress authorizing his extradition on the charge of crime made by a foreign government, be denied the right of unmolested asylum, at the discretion of the President of the United States, assigns to his office the prerogatives of an absolute despot. No such power inheres in the office, and no such power can be exercised except by a gross usurpation. Hartmann cannot be arrested for the purpose of extradition, except by a legal warrant; and it so happens that Congress has given no authority to the President and none to any court of justice to issue a warrant for this purpose, except in cases provided for by treaty. If, then, Russia makes a request for the extradition of Hartmann, it will be the duty of the government to decline compliance therewith. The one sufficient reason for this course is the simple fact that the President of the United States has no authority to comply with the request. If Russia desires to extradite fugitive criminals from this country who are offenders against her laws, then she must provide for the result by the proper treaty stipulations.

WHEN the first President of the United States was compelled to provide official incumbents, his first questions about a candidate were these: "Is he honest? Is he capable? Has he the confidence of his fellow-citizens?" Items of political sympathy were held rigidly in the background, and mere personal friendship was equally ignored as a factor in his conclusion upon the fitness of an applicant. He asserted of a certain friend that he extended to him unfeigned cordiality in the way of personal hospitality, but he was "not a man of business"; that his political opponent, despite this hospitality, did possess the requisite business qualities, and was thence the more suitable man for the situation desired. As a man, he would render his friend any favor in his power, but, as President of the United States, he could do nothing for him. Washington's successors kept intact this high code of honor until the baleful administration of Andrew Jackson. One of them carried it to such an extreme as to deny office to any man, however meritorious, who was a family relative of his own. The dismissals, which were rare in these earlier administrations, were invariably for just and sufficient reasons. President Jackson was the first to abuse the power that had been vested in the chief officers of the nation with regard to the appointment and removal of employes in the civil service; and his reckless thrusting aside of the honorable conditions that had previously ruled the chief rulers inaugurated the system of spoils, that has grown to such alarming and disastrous proportions. The destructive tendency of his policy in this matter was recognized in the following extract from a letter addressed to him by a valued personal friend: "In relation to the principle of rotation, I embrace this occasion to enter my solemn protest against it,—not on account of my office, but because I hold it to be fraught with the greatest mischief to the country. If ever it should be carried out in extenso, the days of this Republic will, in my opinion, have been numbered; for, whenever the impression shall become general that the government is only valuable on account of its offices, the great and paramount interest of the country will be lost sight of, and the government itself ultimately destroyed." This long-ago prediction is palpably on the high road to fulfilment, in the light of such developments as those of recent affairs in New York City. If the citizens of the leading metropolis of this great nation, with its appointed head and the governor of the State, can be plunged into a tangled swamp of protracted litigation in the effort to secure plainest redress against a band of reckless public servants in their own midst, if constitutional grounds afford retreat for such foul beasts of prey, there is most emphatic call for constitutional repair.

Gov. ROBERTS recently gave to a representative of the St. Louis Globe Democrat his reasons for refusing to issue a proclamation for a day of fasting and prayer for the President's recovery. His remarks justify the opinion we had formed, that he is a man of intelligence, of broad views, and great moral courage. He said: "This union of Church and State is all wrong. It has taken a large and more arduous battle to divide the Church from the State than it did to achieve our national independence. You know how it was in England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Men of one faith fought for the right to uphold it as against another. When they couldn't achieve it in the old country, they came to the new. You had the Congregationalists in Massachusetts, the Quakers in Pennsylvania, the Lutherans in New York, the Baptists in Maryland, the Huguenots in the Carolinas. Each class had its faith; and that faith swayed the State, especially, as the books tell us, in New England. Only church-members voted, and in all essential matters the conventicle was supreme. But toward the middle of the eighteenth century came along the freethinking English artisan and Scotch Presbyterian who fled from the defeat of Culloden and Preston Pans. These were a thrifty, cultivated, logical class; and they gradually disseminated the leaven whose creation is the present outward separation of Church and State. I say outward, because, as you well know, it is only in name. The religious principle of New England and Ohio makes their politics. We have seen plenty of that in the war; and it is this unconscious, subtle union of the Church and State in the public mind that shows to the front in days of thanksgiving and fasts of solemn prayer. It is all right to fast and pray. I don't object, but I do not see the necessity for the Governor of a State directing its religious concerns; and hence I thought it was about time to inaugurate the contrary policy."

REFERRING to the "Concord School of Philosophers," the New York Sun says: "Some years ago there used to be a school of philosophers upon the Eighth Avenue, in this city. They called themselves Theosophists, and they were also after truth. A peculiarity of their method was that they sought to enlist the aid of spirits and devils in the investigation. The metaphysics of the Theosophists would probably excite the derision of the summer philosophers at Concord, the Hegelians and the followers of Kant, and the Transcendentalists and Orphic seers who have never been definitely classified in any synoptical view of philosophy. But the theosophical method cannot possibly appear more ridiculous to the metaphysicians than the metaphysical method, in its turn, appears to the prevalent school of the present day. How much further into the unknowable have the Concord philosophers penetrated than the Eighth Avenue philosophers? How much nearer to absolute truth have they attained? The world listens; but we fear, alas! that it will never get an answer."

COMMENTING on the statement of Dr. Dorchester, that the list of communicants in the evangelical churches of this country keeps pace with the population, the Boston Sunday Herald calls attention to the fact that these churches are among the best illustrations of the growing scepticism of the age. It says:—

The evangelical churches have unconsciously shifted their position. They hold to the old and invincible moralities, but the beliefs of half a century ago have been so softened and changed that they are hardly perceptible in their modern dress. These churches survive chiefly because, as Dr. Dorchester suggests, they "have been active factors in the modification of all forms of thought. . . . With the best adaptation to the changed positions which the people of New England have now reached, it is an open question whether these churches, as they now exist, are able to meet the strain which their modifications of belief are leading the way to. The time has come when the changes in beliefs raise the question as to their historical antecedents. Thinking people are going back to inquire whether there are any historical beliefs at all; and this inquiry, if pushed to logical conclusions, will lead the way to results which Dr. Dorchester makes no account of in his statistics. This is the other part of the story, and ought not to be untold.

To THE statement of Rev. W. C. Stiles in the Congregationalist, that "if any man should press me to say just what becomes of a lost man, I should tell him to answer the question himself, I do not know," a correspondent replies:—

Evangelical teachers do know, as believers in the divine authority of the New Testament, something respecting the fate of the finally impenitent. A return on the part of teachers and preachers "to the Pauline exhibition of doctrine" will prove, I believe, the sovereign and sufficient remedy for the disease of Christian liberalism and a limber-backed, sugar-coated theologic teaching. Let us say "we know" oftener, and "we know not" very seldom, when dealing publicly with those most momentous topics which relate to the future destiny and the instant, awful responsibilities and risks of frail and sinning men. The policy here recommended is plainly one of ignorance and dishonesty.

CARL SCHURZ thinks Senator Dawes' last letter on civil-service reform indicates that he has been "looking for a safe way how not to do it." Referring to the senator's criticisms on the Pendleton bill, he says that, "when a public man tries to push practical measures of legislation aside, and tells us that public 'sentiment' has to do it all, we are generally warranted in assuming that he is not particularly anxious to have anything done at all."

"ALL who reflect," says the Presbyterian, will sadly admit that the spiritual condition of the Church during the last year has not been encouraging. The year's net gain in numbers is only two thousand seven hundred and thirty. This leaves one-half of our churches apparently without a single addition on profession of faith. Is it not time to be agitated and to agitate?"

THE Massachusetts Greenbackers are right in declaring that "the holder of mortgaged property should only be taxed on the amount of his interest therein."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

It is easier to see that a great fair, like that of the Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Institute, now open in this city, represents science than religion. Hence, the theme just mentioned, at first thought, may not seem wholly appropriate to a department of the Index set apart for both of these spheres. But if the application of science to the promotion of civilization, to the rendering of labor more efficient, to the multiplication of the conveniences of life, and the elevation of taste, be religious in result, even though it be not so in motive and purpose, the subject of a Mechanics' Fair may here properly claim attention. The fact that there is to be this fall two great fairs in Boston, illustrative of the mechanical and manufacturing industry of New England, where the custom has been, up to this time, to have only one every three years, and on a considerably smaller scale, is in itself a remarkable event, and very impressively shows the growth that is being made in this direction. The fair of the Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Institute has succeeded in enlisting the coöperation and sympathy of many of the leading manufacturers and solid people of New England. It consists of a stock company, in which a sufficient amount of shares have been taken, to meet immediate exigencies.

The land selected has been leased for twenty years, with the privilege of purchasing or extending the lease for thirty years. The main building covers five acres, and yields, with its annexes, more than eight acres of floor space for exhibition purposes. It is a monitor-roofed, elongated structure of one hundred and fifty feet in length and four hundred in width, and abundantly supplied with windows on all sides and at the top. The material of the exterior is brick, with rough brown stone trimmings. Although there is no elaborate ornamentation, the effect is imposing and pleasing. The interior of the building is admirably planned in all respects. Some conception of the size of the building may be gained from the fact that it is estimated to possess the capacity to seat one hundred thousand people.

The central space of the main floor, on either side of the hall or broad thoroughfare, is occupied by a succession of show cases of imposing dimensions, arranged in the form of alcoves, in which a very interesting display is presented of all varieties of textile fabrics. Thirty-six manufacturing corporations of New England are here represented. In close and fitting proximity to this display, one comes upon an exhibit of textile machinery, through which is so largely produced the cottons, woollens, ginghams, and silks just referred to. Then will be found in this department stationary engines, iron working machinery, and various machines and devices of special interest to the machinist and the manufacturer. Here, too, are printing-presses of every size and capacity, from the "boy's printing-press" to the ponderous mechanism fit for a metropolitan journal. In a contiguous group of telegraphic and type-writing machines, a system of rapid telegraphy is shown, by which it is possible to transmit, it is claimed, a thousand words a minute. In this collection is displayed what is termed an "Arithmeter," which is said to give automatically the first four or five figures of a quotient of any multiplication or division.

The great centennial soda fount, weighing thirty-five tons and rising up to the height of forty-six feet, is one of the most striking objects on this floor.

A gorgeous and brilliant display of colors in the exhibit of silk fabrics and sewing-silk near by is pretty sure to arrest the attention of the visitor in this part of the building.

Another very interesting exhibit on this floor is a model shoe-shop, in which all the processes are shown in boot and shoe making until the work is completed, with the latest appliances of the art. A curious and vari-colored pavilion of paper and stationery goods, and a pagoda floral display, are very attractive and pleasing. Carriages of handsome and engaging patterns, and agricultural implements of much interest, are also conspicuous.

In the galleries, canned goods and groceries, furniture, sewing machines, musical instruments, fancy and ceramic articles, educational appliances, and the fine arts alike appeal to the attention.

The building will be lighted by electricity, but gas will also be used. Eight miles of pipe have been put into the building for this purpose.

THE FREETHINKERS' CONVENTION.

Editor Index:—

As has been announced in your columns, the Free-thinkers' Fourth Annual Convention will be held in Hornellsville, N.Y., commencing the last day of this month and continuing in session for five days. The prospects now are that it will be the largest liberal gathering ever held in this country. I have had the general supervision of these conventions, especially so far as the work of getting them together; and I have succeeded in one thing at least, in making them attract the attention of the public by the numbers that attend them. But I also desire them to attract the attention of the public on the ground of the very able and scholarly utterances of the speakers, and their high moral tone generally.

It was at my suggestion that the society took upon itself the name of "Freethinkers"; and it chose that name, because I thought it could be consistently made to include all classes of Liberals better than any other name. I desired to draw together under that name liberal Unitarians and Universalists, Free Religiousists, Materialists, and Spiritualists, and other liberal parties. As yet it has not been wholly successful in that respect. I regret to state that our Free Religious friends have not very generally met with us, although always cordially invited. But I hope in the future we may be more successful. And I now earnestly invite all the speakers of the Free Religious Association, or either of them, also the members of that Association, to meet with us at Hornellsville. It shall be their convention as well as ours. And it is just the educated and cultivated classes to be found in that Association that our convention needs, to make it the most successful Liberal convention ever held in America.

Yours truly,

H. L. GREEN.

SALAMANCA, N.Y.

HON. A. P. EDGERTON, ON SECULAR SCHOOLS.

DEFIANCE, O., Aug. 15, 1881.

Editor of Index:—

Herewith enclosed, I send you for publication in the Index an extract from the address delivered by the Hon. A. P. Edgerton, of the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana, to the scholars who graduated at the grammar school in that city, on the 23d of last June.

I need hardly say that Mr. Edgerton is a very eloquent and highly polished gentleman, who is not afraid of discussing "church taxation" and kindred subjects. The enclosed will, however, give you some idea of his abilities and moral courage. SENEX.

Section 3 of Article 8 of the Constitution, which I have quoted, declares that "all school funds shall be appropriated to the support of common schools, and to no other purpose whatever." And Section 3 of Article 1—which is the Bill of Rights—declares "that no law shall, in any case whatever, control the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinions, or interfere with the rights of conscience."

These provisions of the Constitution (and no law contravening them can be passed) exclude all religious creeds and sectarian teachings from our common schools.

The enemies of the school system, here as well as elsewhere, intend that either in or out of the schools a part of the common school fund shall be used so as to secure certain religious teachings within the schools, if sectarian teachers can be placed there, or outside, if they cannot.

Constitutionally, legally, there can be no teachings in the public schools in the forms of any particular church, of its history, its faith, its infallibility, its permanence. While this is true, still, as regards education, there is a distinction and a separation maintained between citizens of different religious faiths, offensive and repugnant to our Constitution. We do not want any divisions in this country—affecting our public school system—into clans, castes, or nationalities, upon religious or any other lines.

Then, what is our duty? For the time has come when some friends of our common-school system, here in this city, as elsewhere, have a duty to perform; and that duty is to see that there is no undermining or weakening of our school system by any effort to make it other than a secular system.

As a member of this school board, I am in favor of all religions in all their forms; but when religious fear would cover the world all over with temples, monasteries, abbeys, cathedrals, and churches, and pull down—not build up—free schools for a free people, I am not in favor of all religions in all their forms; but I call for schools, more schools, to shake down crumbling tyrannies, superstitions, and hypocrisies, and for light, more light, to show the way to crush out every form of tyranny over the mind of man. Religious teachings must be relegated absolutely to the sanctuary and the fireside. Elementary schools, free to the children of all races, classes, and religions, are essential to the safety of the State. Our secular education, while it gives free thought and makes free men, does not interfere with any rights of conscience or religious obligations. It is one of the things of this world; and, in the things of this world, men are not saved by faith, but by the want of it. Therefore, as a free public school is a creation of the Constitution and the laws of our country, we take them for our guide, and put no faith in the contending creeds which claim to possess higher authority than the Constitution and laws. We let our moral faculties take care of the schools, for "these faculties are given us for the direction of our conduct in this life."

We say, further, that all rights existing here between men arise from the political State, and that there is no authority except from that source, which can enter or have control of a free public school. Any exercise of power in it, not derived from the political State, is as repugnant to the natural liberty of man as it is to the law.

Where there are two co-existent obligations, one religious and the other of a perfectly legal character, we do not interfere with the religious obligations: we only ask parents to act in accord with their legal obligations, to send their children to the free public schools, for they are cheaper, better, than any parochial schools. It is an evidence of doubtful faith when a parent fears to trust the power of his own faith, and that of his church to preserve it, with his child in a free public school-room, where, if his own faith is not taught, there certainly is no other taught. He should have more confidence in the religious teachings of his own home and of his own church than to believe they could be corrupted in a public school. He certainly does not fear to have his children come in contact with the world as it is found in the play-ground, in the streets, in the homes of others, and in all the various avocations of life. Then, what dark angel of evil here, or of his dread hereafter, hovers around a free public school-room that he should fear it?

It is not really the associations of the school-room, nor any of the teachings therein, that he fears; but it is an ecclesiastical power outside of it, for there is none within it.

Our constitutional government implies that each individual is capable of thinking for himself, and ought to think for himself; but, if he combines with others for a religious purpose solely, he may cease to think for himself and surrender a part of his free-thought to others. Such a surrender would not, however, change or lessen his legal obligations.

The high purpose of a free public school education is to make all men think for themselves. Thinkers will govern the toilers. Intellectual superiority must and does rule every people, Christian and pagan; and therefore we seek, through a general system of education, to find and develop intellectual superiority, and to give it direction and power, so that all rulers may rule none but a free people, and that people be their own rulers. Freethought is everywhere the terror of despots; and ignorance everywhere furnishes an apology for despotism.

Wherever there is a monarchy, a dynasty, or a church, afraid of secular and free universal education, it is because they believe that there is in it an abridgment, and, perhaps, a total subversion of their authority. There is no delusive and refined subtilty which can make anything but fear of subversion of authority the ground of hostility to the principles of a free public school system and to a universal and free education.

If the authority were rightful, there would be no fear of an educated people. Hostility implies a doubt of rightful authority, and a belief that free and educated minds would successfully combat every other.

We have a constitution which guarantees religious freedom and all the rights of conscience. Its framers did not read history in vain. They knew that every ruined temple, monastery, abbey, cathedral, and castle was a monument to oppression; that in all tyrannies and oppressions, in all religious and political institutions and contests, man was the only actor; that he alone acts and suffers, and therefore for man and his freedom here was our Constitution established.

That Constitution wisely separated man from involuntary ecclesiastical control, for history proved that he seldom obtained justice at ecclesiastical tribunals. What system of free government or of free schools could now endure, if subject to the decisions of ecclesiastics?

Paul had a better court in Felix, the Roman governor, than in Ananias, the high priest.

We have no fear for the continued success of our free schools, if you watch vigilantly the insidious beginning of hostility to them, and watch also their own weakness and errors.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these, if at all, with great freedom. Leaves.

Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pp. 43-51.

Specimens: A Leaf with blade, footstalk and stipules complete; a Compound Leaf; and sheets covered with as large a variety of leaves as possible.

In what respects do all leaves seem to be much alike?

How many different kinds of leaves did you ever see?

What are the parts of a complete Leaf?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Do all leaves have all these parts?

What is a Simple Leaf?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

What is a Compound Leaf?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Of what two kinds of material are leaves composed?

Which is the woody part?

(Illustrate with specimens.)

Which is the cellular tissue?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

How is the whole protected?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

What are the Ribs of a Leaf?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

How do leaves differ as to Ribs?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

What are Veins and Veinlets?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

How do leaves differ as to these?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Do leaves differ much as to shape?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

How many different shapes did you ever see?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Do leaves differ as to length?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Do they differ as to breadth?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Are all leaves equally pointed?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

Does the point of leaves always come at the same end?

How do leaves differ as to their edges?

(Illustrate with specimen.)

What is the difference between a leaf and a leaflet?

Are all leaves flat?

Do Pine Trees have leaves?

Leaves differ, then, in what respects?

They are alike in what respects?

As to their most vital parts, do they differ most or agree most?

SELECTIONS.

Oh! what a glory doth this world put on,
For him who, with a fervent heart, goes forth

Under the bright and glorious sky, and looks
On duties well performed and days well spent!
For him the wind, aye, and the yellow leaves,
Shall have a voice, and give him eloquent teachings.
—Longfellow.

There's a dance of leaves in that aspen bower,
There's a titter of wind in that beechen tree,
There's a smile on the fruit and a smile on the flower,
And a laugh from the brook that runs to the sea.
—Bryant.

In the world of letters, a book is made up of many leaves; but in Nature each leaf is a book, wherein every rib is a chapter, and every little veinlet a sentence of unfathomed beauty.

Study the leaf of an orange-tree: what wisdom is displayed in its structure, how admirable its architecture, what nice framework, what exquisite finish, how the power of vegetation assimilates the particles of earth, air, water, whereby it grows into a plant!—
Parker.

What a function the leaf has to perform,—this little mason, building up the stem of the tree, and getting really the substance of its flower and fruit!—Parker.

Who shall venture to number the world's Bibles, when so many revelations of the Universal adorn every bush and tree.

Suggestions to Leader.—If possible, encourage the children to collect as many kinds of leaves as they can find, and to press and arrange the u on paper or card board for use in this study. In any event, do so yourself. The bright coloring of autumn will make this little work a pleasure.

Flowers.

Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pp. 65-76.

Specimens: A Complete, an Incomplete, a Symmetrical, an Unsymmetrical, a Regular, and an Irregular Flower; also a branch bearing flowers, and a flower without petals.

We have found what about Leaves?

Do Flowers look as much alike as Leaves do?

In what respects do we see at once that flowers vary?

Is it likely that they vary also in some respects not at first apparent to us?

To what other part of the plant does the flower correspond?

How is this seen?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

To what do the parts of the flower correspond?

How is this seen in the Calyx?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

How in the Corolla?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

How in the Stamens?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

How in the Pistils?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What is a complete flower?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What is an incomplete flower?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

May a flower be incomplete and still be perfect?

What are the Petals?

Do all flowers have these?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What other parts of the flower may be wanting?

Are all the parts necessary to the production of fruit and seed?

Hence what must happen with plants which produce incomplete flowers?

What is a symmetrical flower?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What is an unsymmetrical flower?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What is a regular flower?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

What is an irregular flower?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

Do all flowers have all their parts distinct?

[Illustrate with specimens.]

So that with an infinite variety of forms Nature does what?

And her flowers answer what purposes?

They teach us what?

SELECTIONS.

Spake full well in language quaint and olden

Suggestions to Leader.—Many technical terms occur in this study, which it will be well, so far as is possible, to avoid. Remember we are not aiming to teach botany, but to suggest the infinite wonders of creation and the thread of universal relation running through them all.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL JAMES is suffering from hay fever.

COLONEL HIGGINSON is writing the Life of Benjamin Franklin.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE was announced to preach at Old Orchard Beach last Sunday morning.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Presbyterian refers to Col.
Ingersoll as "that eminent philanthropist."

MR. GEORGE CHAINY will speak at the Hornells-ville Convention of Freethinkers next Sunday.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will speak at Paine Hall, at 2.45, Sunday afternoon. Subject, "Radicalism and Conservatism."

STANLEY, the African explorer, is reported at the mouth of the Congo, dangerously sick; and his whilom guide is in this city, "dead-broke."

LAWRENCE BARRETT, it is announced, will appear in thirty-four cities the coming season, going as far West as Des Moines and as far south as Galveston.

It is said that Mrs. James T. Fields has prepared a work in honor of her husband, entitled Biographical Notes and Personal Sketches of James T. Fields.

JOHN L. STODDARD begins his season September 26, with all dates filled to April 14, when he will sail for Europe to gather new material for the following year.

WALT WHITMAN is in Boston attending to the proofreading and "make-up" of a complete one-volume edition of his poems, which Osgood & Co. will soon publish.

A LETTER from Charles Darwin on Infant Development will be read at the meeting of the American Social Science Association at Saratoga, Tuesday evening, September 6.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN will lecture at Harwich, Mass.,
August 28. He spoke at Onset Bay July 19; Norway, Me., July 24; Brighton, Me., July 31. He is open to applications for lectures, and can be addressed at Lynn, Mass.

A LONDON critic says: "Mr. Oscar Wilde is no poet, but a cleverish man, who has an infinite contempt for his readers, and thinks he can take them in with a little mouthing verse. Perhaps he is right for the moment."

HON. WARREN CHASE, of California, who is now a member of the Senate of that State, is spending a few weeks in this city, and will speak at Paine Hall next Sunday evening on "What we know, and how we know it."

DR. S. F. SMITH mentions having seen two tables, each the very table on which Dr. Judson wrote his translation of the Burman Bible. Why should not the Protestant as well as the Catholic relics have the power of multiplying?

PROFESSOR VIRCHOW, who has just appeared at the medical congress in London, is on his way to three other scientific congresses; and in the winter he will conduct excavations on the slopes of Mount Ida in the Troas, with Dr. Schliemann.

REV. WILLIAM MARSHALL, colored, of Clark County, Ky., announces that he will pray for any desired object on receipt of seventy-five cents. This is cheap compared with the prayers of chaplains in some of the State legislatures, but still too much.

PROF. J. W. DAWSON, of Montreal, has been elected President of the American Association for the Advancement of Science; and William Saunders, of London, Ont., General Secretary. More than five hundred members attended the meeting at Cincinnati.

A REPRESENTATIVE of the St. Louis Globe Democrat describes Governor Roberts, of Texas, as "a well-built man of something over sixty years of age, with gray hair and full gray beard and moustache and eyebrows much darker than anything else about his features."

SIR JOHN LUNBOCK, the distinguished ethnologist and member of Parliament for the University of London, is described as forty-seven years old, "and a handsome member of a handsome race." He is a banker, and has a beautiful seat in Kent, where Darwin has been his neighbor.

MR. E. C. HEGELER, of La Salle, Ill., who is one of the proprietors of the largest zinc works in America, and who for several years has been, in an unostentatious way, a generous contributor to the liberal cause, has, with several members of his family, been spending a few days in Boston.

DR. AGNEW, the chief of the President's consulting surgeons, is a distinguished member of the profession in Philadelphia, and has been engaged for a number of years on a valuable treatise on operative surgery, two volumes of which have already been published. He has also written much on miscellaneous medical topics.

A COLORED postmaster in South Carolina recently sent to the Post-office Department a long petition, praying to be relieved from Sunday work, as he had religious scruples against making up and opening mails on Sunday. The department informed him that resignation was the only remedy. Nothing more has been heard from him.

GEN. WILLIAM BIRNEY, of Washington City, is preparing a work on the life and times of James G. Birney, or the rise, growth, and success of the anti-slavery movement in the United States. He requests all persons having in their possession letters from James G. Birney, or anti-slavery papers or pamphlets published between 1831 and 1845, to write him with details.

IN face of the storm of congratulation with which Dr. Schliemann has recently been welcomed to Berlin, it may be worth mentioning that his "discovery of Troy" has by no means won universal acquiescence from the scientific archaeologists of Germany. Dr. Brentano has just published a pamphlet of considerable size, in which he argues that the site of Homer's city is yet to be found.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Presbyterian speaks of Colonel Ingersoll as "a traitor to humanity, a traitor to civilization," asks, "What claim has such a man to a spark of true patriotism or a pulse of genuine humanity?" and adds, "I cannot but view Robert Ingersoll as a full-grown Nihilist, outstripping Guiteau or the assassin of the late Czar of Russia, who aims his strokes not at a nation's head, but at a nation's heart."

MR. TILDEN, although he has been frequently referred to as paralyzed and on the brink of the grave, it is hinted is giving both parties in New York some bother. One paper says he will endeavor to capture the Democratic Convention, conciliate all enemies except John Kelly, whom he will put an end to, politically speaking, and then defeat the Republicans in the State election, and run again for the Presidency.

THE Paris correspondent of the London Times once said to Thiers: "It is marvellous, M. le President, how you deliver long improvised speeches about which you have not had time to reflect." "You are not paying me a compliment," he replied: "it is criminal in a statesman to improvise speeches on public affairs.
The speeches you call improvised, why, for fifty years
I have been rising at five in the morning to prepare them."

REV. MR. MACKEY, the Methodist minister of Youngstown, Ohio, a bachelor, in reply to charges that he visited vile resorts and kissed those women in the congregation who would let him, said that "he went to those places to get information for sermons against them, and that he had confined his kissing to unmarried women, whom he thought he had a perfect right to kiss, if the exercise were mutually agreeable."

BROTHER SKAVER of the Investigator says he "don't want any more Spiritual stories," for his "head is full of them," but wants to "take hold of a spirit, and examine it gently but thoroughly." He adds: "It was Holmes who let Robert Dale Owen see a spirit; and when we asked Mr. Owen why he didn't grasp it, and find out what it was, he told us he was so overpowered with awe and solemnity at the sight that he thought it would be profanation to attempt any such thing. As we have not so much awe and solemnity, we are prepared to grasp a spirit—when we see one."

THE plan of charging a regular admission fee has not proved altogether successful at a negro camp-meeting near Marion, Ohio. Brother Hart had just made a fervent prayer, and was laboring zealously among the mourners, when the six members of the Finance Committee reminded him that he had climbed over the fence instead of entering by the gate. They demanded ten cents for himself and ten more for his wife; but he refused to pay, and they dragged him off the grounds. But he did not long stay expelled. He and his wife armed themselves with clubs, knocked the ticket-taker away from the gate, scattered the opposing committee of six financiers, thrashed the presiding minister himself, and resumed their work among the penitents.

WELL might the President give way, in some of the dragging hours that have seemed weeks, to reproaches of his fate,—that this should be the end and reward to his life of honest, high devotion to duty, to his forlorn but faithful labors as a poor boy in support of his mother, to his scarcely better rewarded toil as a teacher, to his offer of his life to his country on the field of battle, to his long and valuable services in Congress, where no mind engaged in the performance of the nation's business was better instructed, more helpful, or more sagacious than his; to the great work of creating good feeling, a real union, and progress in prosperity he had framed and entered upon in his administration; and now to the sorrow and horror that all this had brought into his home and upon his loved and loving ones! Truly, the measure of sympathy due to James A. Garfield, the man, is an unstinted one.—Boston Transcript.

FOREIGN.

THE Pall Mall Gazette says, "It is difficult to speak with respect of the grounds which Sir William Harcourt alleged for the rearrest of Mr. Davitt."

THE Killinane (County Limerick) branch of the Land League has emphatically pronounced in favor of the Land Bill. This district has been the centre of fierce agitation.

THE learned and venerable Dr. Dillinger comes forward in defence of the Jews of Germany against their bigoted persecutors. His noble words put to shame those younger German scholars who encourage a revival of mediæval intolerance in this nineteenth century.

THE returns of the elections throughout Portugal give a ministerial majority of over one hundred, and the opposition only about eighteen seats. The late liberal Prime Minister and several statesmen of note in both the liberal and republican parties were beaten by large majorities in Oporto, this city, and other great towns.

SINCE the Emperor of Germany has declared his great dislike to the anti-Jewish agitation, the conservative press has begun to discuss the question in a calmer spirit, and the authorities have taken all necessary measures to prevent the outbreak of new riots. It would seem that the movement has terminated for the present. The progressist press, which is mostly under the influence of Jews, is very triumphant.

THE English tenants are now complaining of their grievances, and various agencies are cooperating to bring the English land laws within the province of practical politics. Gladstone has recently stated that legislation on the subject is needed. Parnell has issued a violent manifesto, ignoring the land act, and declaring it impossible for the Irish party to enter into an alliance "with any section which allows itself to be used in support of the coercionist ministry, who banished personal liberty from Ireland, and reduced it to a worse condition than that of Russia, under the third section."

At the conference of the Orthodox Evangelical Clergy at Berlin on the 25th, Herr Plath, inspector of missions, said the Jewish community, which is hostile to Christianity, is not content with enjoying equal rights with Christians, but aims at absolute predominance. Christians, he said, must free themselves from the supremacy of the Jews. The rights already accorded to the Jews should be withdrawn, and he recommended the substitution of relative rights for the absolute civic equality they now enjoy. Those rights moreover should be firmly kept within prescribed limits by means of special measures, in order to break the Jewish autocracy. The conference adopted resolutions to this effect.

SOME of the papers of Rome are very plain and not spoken in regard to the Pope and the papacy. The Libertà says: "The papacy and the papists must be convinced that Europe is not in the least disposed to disturb itself on account of their lamentations or complaints, much less to take Italy to task in order to please them." The Capitale assures its readers that "Rome will never be quiet until the Vatican carries its tents elsewhere." The Lega della Democrazia announces that "in every district of Rome the Liberals are busily working to establish anti-clerical clubs for the purpose of reorganizing the liberal forces, and directing them toward obtaining the abolition of the guarantees and the departure forever of the papacy from Rome." The Italia, speaking for the Liberals, says: "The true Liberals, those who write on their banners the word 'Tolerance,' felt not the least hurt by the honors paid to the remains of the defunct Pontiff; and, though they might disapprove of the designs of the clericals, they would be cautious not to give, by their protests, an importance to the manifestation which it could only acquire from the behavior of the public. Above all, they would have avoided furnishing arms to the clericals, who now can and will not fail to say: 'You see plainly that the Pope is a prisoner, and cannot issue from the Vatican. If a dead Pope is exposed to such insults, what would happen to a living Pope who ventured to show himself in public?'"

JESTINGS.

A WITNESS was on the stand in an illegal liquor sale case. The counsel was trying to find out in what kind of a glass the liquor was handed to the witness, and at last exclaimed, "What kind of a looking glass was it?" "Begorra, sor, it was not a looking-glass at all: it was a tumbler."—Albany Evening Times.

THE FASHIONABLE WEDDING MARCH.—"I wonder," said a young hopeful of seven, who had been to a grand wedding in a stylish church, "I wonder why the organ played 'Lo-he-grins'?" "How stupid, Freddie!" was the prompt reply of his young sister: "it wasn't 'Lo-he-grins,' it was 'Lo-he's-green.'"

A DANBURY boot-black was in South Norwalk when the train went through there, on its way to Hartford, with the nation's military dignitaries. "Did you see General Sherman?" asked a citizen, this morning, while having a shine. "No. Was he looking for me?" was the response. The citizen was shocked.

A CLERGYMAN, in a discourse on charity, said that one of the best illustrations of avarice he ever heard of was that contained in an old caricature, which represents Old Nick carrying an old miser down to his regions; and, while on the way, the miser is making propositions to his majesty to supply him with coals.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. Freedom and Fellowship in Religion.

A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Watson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Arthur Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. H. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calhoun, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Kehut Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Watson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. H. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; address by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Broke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lakker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mr. Charles Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches hereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and brief addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

INDEX OF CONTENTS.

These Tracts, several of which are at-tract-d so great attention, are fur-nished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty and "Modern Principles." This has received great commendation from the most distinguished men for the clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the deluding character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests every body. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—In Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman, and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempt to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new concept on of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. Its ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aims. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LET not the authority of the writer, whether he be of high or low literary repute, influence you; but let the love of pure truth draw you to read. You should not inquire who wrote it, but consider attentively what is written.—Thomas à Kempis.

EVERY time that a people which has long crouched in slavery and ignorance is moved to its lowest depths there appear monsters and heroes, prodigies of crime and prodigies of virtue.—Lamartine.

NOTHING is so like insanity as that kind of ill-temper which puts itself in opposition to all the world; and the man who thinks no one in the right but himself is, for all the practical purposes of moral life, as insane as if he had crowned himself with straw, and called himself emperor or king in Bedlam.—*E. AH! we owe something to the men who have had the courage to disbelieve; and we should hold them in mind tenderly,—the men who bore hard names through life, and after death had harder names piled like stones over their memories; the men who wore themselves down with thought, the men who lived solitary and misunderstood, who were called infidels because they believed more than their neighbors!—*O. IT forms a strong presumption against all supernatural and miraculous relations that they are observed chiefly to abound among ignorant and barbarous nations; or, if a civilized nation has ever given admission to any of them, that people will be found to have received them from ignorant and barbarous ancestors, who transmitted them with that inviolable sanction and authority which always attends received opinions. . . . It is strange, a judicious reader is apt to say upon the perusal of these wonderful histories, that such prodigious events never happen in our day. But it is nothing strange, I hope, that men should lie in all ages.—David Hume.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Supreme Court of Kansas has sustained the constitutionality of the Prohibitory Liquor Law.

THE removal of the President to Long Branch will, it is generally thought, improve his prospects of recovery.

BONFIRES were lighted over a large portion of the north of Ireland on Saturday night, as a mark of gratitude to Mr. Gladstone for the Land Act.

THE telephone is used with great success by divers, in scientific explorations in the Bay of Naples, to communicate with those in the boat above.

IT is announced that the smallest engine in the world, just finished at Baltimore, can be covered with a thimble, and that three drops of water fill its boiler.

IT is stated that over a hundred thousand people were at Coney Island last Sunday. It is time for another sermon by ex-Chaplain Newman on "the European Sunday."

"THERE has been a great deal of praying for the President," says the New Haven Register, "but all sensible people put their trust in the physicians and in the courage of the patient."

"MANY of our eminent scientific men," says the Boston Globe, "who have earned the honorable title of professor, feel greatly chagrined at the degradation which has come to that appellation. Even boot-blacks claim it."

A WRITER in the London Secular Review says it is "assuredly incumbent on every honest Englishman to expedite the movement for the disestablishment of that nest of corruption and citadel of greedy indolence,—the State-supported, people-im-poverishing Church of England, the worst anachronism known."

A PIOUS father in Lynn, Iowa, who had ordered his pretty daughter to go to a prayer-meeting, and finding afterward that she had yielded, girl-like, to the natural impulses of youth and the persuasions of her lover, and attended a picnic with the latter made himself a second Jephtha by tying her to a post on her return, and whipping her until she was so injured that she died from the punishment.

OUT of the depths of their impoverished misery, some Russian peasants have evolved a fantastic religious belief, which, though it will not be realized, cheers them with its promise of better things. Portions of this new faith hinge on the expected appearance, soon after harvest this year, of a strange old man with a gray beard, whose coming is to be the signal of a happier epoch for Russia. His appearance is to be heralded by a tremendous earthquake.

AMONG the latest proclamations recommending the people to ask Almighty God to restore the President to health and "to his stricken wife and children, and the performance of his public duties," is one from Governor Farnham, of Vermont. In order to touch the heart of Almighty God, it is thought necessary that the appeals to him be general and simultaneous; and so the Governor appoints "Thursday, the eighth day of September, between the hours of ten in the forenoon and twelve at noon," as the time for this combined effort to influence Omniscent Wisdom. Other Governors, including Governor Long, have issued proclamations of a similar character.

IN the summing up of a carefully detailed account, in the Nation, of the land-bill struggle in the late British Parliament, an impression is clearly conveyed of weakened prestige in the House of Lords. It is gratifying to note the assertion that even the conservative members of the English press declined to stimulate or even to foster their haughty claims; and the practical fruit of the concessions in both yielding and demand bids fair to be greater gain for the popular cause than might have ensued from a less qualified and more immediate success. For it is worth much to the slowly maturing English judgment to get a deliberate and accurate view of the elements really existing in this quasi-exalted body of Peers.

THE uncomely features lately portrayed in Southern politics are represented by the Richmond correspondent of the Springfield Republican as due to other causes than purely political ones. It is claimed indeed that politics in the South are mainly subordinate to social and religious phases in the public mind. These prejudices respecting family distinction and theological status are so predominant as to hold at stake the eligibility of a candidate for office in the face of any and all other qualifications that may appear in his behalf. In a Baptist community, it is seemingly a decisive and permanent obstacle to the election of certain otherwise desirable men simply from the fact that they adhere to the Episcopalian creed; and, in a State largely composed of Methodists, any candidate outside of their peculiar pale of belief is equally disqualified. In portions of the South that retain the aristocratic element, the remaining halo of the original family name operates with force in commending the political aspirant, whether or not he possess in himself very marked capabilities; and, on the other hand, the States that have more plebeian antecedents are subjected to the triumph of the ruder species of Democratic elements, like that just exhibited in North Carolina. It is stated that the majority of the populace have a decided taste for whiskey,—not that all are habitual drunkards, but their idea of a holiday cannot be divested of association with the exhilaration of the cup. Then, a very large element of control exists in the numerous distillers with their dealers and patrons. Hence, the sweeping defeat of the advocates of prohibition when that issue came to the surface for popular handling.

ANTHROPOMORPHIC THEISM.

BY JOHN FISKE.

Though the mediæval conception of an arbitrary Providence overruling natural laws and occasionally setting them aside, influenced by human petitions to bring about special results by extraordinary means, and singling out nations or individuals as the objects of its favor or displeasure, has been partially abandoned for a more refined conception of theism, in which the Deity is represented as working through natural laws, yet the survival of the doctrine of final causes shows that a strong element of anthropomorphism is retained even in the latter conception. The doctrine of final causes ultimately reposes on the assumption that God entertains intentions and purposes closely resembling in kind, though greatly excelling in degree of sagacity, the purposes and intentions of man. In accordance with this view, we are told that it will not do to content ourselves with the discovery of Law, but that we must also look about for indications of Purpose, since Law is not, relatively to our human understanding, an ultimate fact, but may be recognized by us as the expression of the will of a Lawgiver. Everything that exists, it is said, has been created to subserve some design, and as a means to the accomplishment of some end; and the detection of this end, the penetration of this design, must assist us greatly in the scientific study of the universe. Not only must we inquire with Socrates into the divine purposes subserved by the structure of the eyes and the position of the alimentary canal,* but we shall also find it desirable to interpret the design exhibited in the inclinations of the planetary axes; and our knowledge of chemistry must be deemed incomplete until we have ascertained the creative plan in the arrangement of combining equivalents.† Not only will light thus be thrown upon many facts which would else have remained forever wrapped in impenetrable darkness, but the mere recognition of an anthropomorphic purpose or providence in the constitution of things is said to afford unfailing consolation amid perplexity and suffering. He who cherishes the belief in the conscious supervision of a personal Deity is held to possess the surest of safeguards against scepticism and despair.

A hypothesis which holds out such brilliant hopes may well be retained in our Cosmic Philosophy, if it can be shown to be in harmony with the demonstrated scientific truths upon which that philosophy rests. But, if this cannot be done, then the hypothesis must be discarded, even though it should carry with it all our hopes and wishes in indiscriminate ruin. It has been well said that "we must follow Truth, though she lead us to Hades." The noble quest in which Science engages is the quest not of faith or of consolation, but of truth; and, with the scientific philosopher, loyalty to truth is the first principle of religion. The disagreeableness of a well-supported conclusion furnishes no sort of justification for not accepting it, save to those minds which are irreligious as well as unscientific. He who is loyal to Truth will never harbor the misgiving that her paths may lead to Hades: he will fearlessly follow the guidance of Science, never doubting that consolation must come of knowing the truth. In the present case, we shall find reason to conclude that the hypothesis of a quasi-human God is likely to aggravate rather than to relieve the mental distress of scepticism.

The doctrine of final causes we may first contemplate, for a moment, under its logical aspect, and notice that, even if it were true, it could never have the value which is claimed for it as a means of investigation. Even admitting that all things have been created with forethought, and that the harmonious co-operation of phenomena is the fruit of contrivance, it is none the less undeniable that this forethought cannot be perceived, the threads of this contrivance cannot be unravelled by us, until the laws to which phenomena conform have already been discovered. Previous to Newton, for instance, all attempts to detect design in the structure of the solar system must have shared the fate of the quite different guesses of Descartes and others as to its physical conditions. Evidences of design, therefore, in order to be trustworthy, must be deduced from known laws, and cannot safely be employed as stepping-stones to the discovery of new truths. However plausible they may seem as corollaries, they can never be useful as lemmas or postulates. As M. Scherer well observes, God is the cause of all things, but the explanation of nothing.* Accordingly, unless we are so arrogant as to lay claim to the possession of some direct means of insight into the divine purposes,† what is left for us but to content ourselves with the humbler means of research lying everywhere at our disposal, with being "servants and interpreters of nature," as the great master of inductive inquiry so wisely and modestly said?

Not only does the teleological theory thus appear to be useless, from a scientific point of view, but its claim to philosophic validity is open to serious doubt. Looking at it historically, we observe that its career has been that of a perishable hypothesis born of primeval habits of thought, rather than that of a permanent doctrine obtained by the employment of scientific methods. From time to time, with the steady advance of knowledge, the search for final causes has been discarded in the simpler sciences, until it is now kept up only in the complex and difficult branches of biology and sociology. As Laplace observes, final causes disappear as soon as we obtain the data requisite for resolving problems scientifically. Even Dr. Whewell, the great champion of the teleological method in our day, admits that it must not be applied to the inorganic sciences; which amounts to the confession that, wherever we know enough, we can very well do without it.‡ Creative design, however, if manifested at all, is probably not confined to a limited department of nature; and therefore the rejection of teleology by the most advanced sciences augurs ill for its ultimate chances of survival in any field of inquiry. Previous to the researches of Kant and Laplace, such phenomena as the distribution of satellites and the inclinations of planetary axes were explained teleologically. These phenomena having been at last interpreted by a reference to universal laws of matter and motion, the teleological hypothesis took refuge in biology, where it held for a while a doubtful tenure, as a means of explaining the origination of specific forms of life. The discoveries of Mr. Darwin having gone far toward driving it from this stronghold, replacing the conception of miraculous interposition by the conception of natural selection, it is nevertheless still appealed to by such writers as Mr. Wallace and Mr. Mivart, as furnishing an explanation for sundry phenomena of organic evolution which natural selection, taken alone, seems at present incompetent to account for. In short, the teleological hypothesis derives its apparent confirmation never from the phenomena which were explained yesterday, but always from the phenomena which are awaiting

* "Dieu, comme on l'a très-bien dit, est la cause de tout, mais il n'est explication de rien."—Scherer, Nouvelles Etudes sur la Littérature Contemporaine, p. 408. See also Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, Anomalies de l'Organisation, tome iii., p. 608. The only objection which can be made to M. Scherer's statement is its disjunctive form. Obviously, that which is the cause of everything cannot be the explanation of anything. We cannot explain any particular group of phenomena by a reference to divine action, because such a reference is merely a reference to the source of all phenomena alike, and hence cannot give us specific information concerning any particular group. Laplace was therefore quite justified in saying, "Je n'ai pas besoin de cette hypothèse."

† As Descartes somewhere says, "Nous rejetterons entièrement de notre philosophie la recherche des causes finales; car nous ne devons pas tant présumer de nous-mêmes que de croire que Dieu nous ait voulu faire part de ses conseils."

‡ Laplace, Essai sur les Probabilités, p. 87; Whewell, History of the Inductive Sciences, vol. iii., p. 430. Even in biology, the principle does not always work well. "A final purpose is indeed readily perceived and admitted in regard to the multiplied points of ossification in the skull of the human foetus and their relation to safe parturition. But when we find that the same ossific centres are established, and in similar order, in the skull of the embryo kangaroo, which is born when an inch in length, and in that of the callow bird that breaks the brittle egg, we feel the truth of Bacon's comparison of final causes to the Vestal Virgins."—Owen, The Nature of Limbs, p. 39. Or, as Prof. Huxley very happily observes, they "might be more fitly termed the hetaire of philosophy, so constantly have they led men astray."—Lay Sermons, p. 255.

an explanation to-morrow. "I take up phenomenon A," says the theologian, "for that you have explained in terms of matter and motion; but phenomenon B you can never so explain, and upon that I therefore rest my teleological hypothesis." To-morrow, phenomenon B is interpreted in terms of matter and motion, and appeal is made to phenomenon C, and so on to the end of the alphabet. Now, the cosmic conception of Deity, as we shall hereafter see, being planted in the region of the Unknowable, which is coextensive with that of the Knowable, has no such precarious tenure, and all that the progress of discovery can do is to enlarge and strengthen it. But the anthropomorphic conception lodged in that ever-diminishing area of the Knowable which is to-day unknown is driven from outpost to outpost, and robbed of some part of its jurisdiction by every advance of science. Surely, that must be an unworthy conception of Deity which is confessedly based on those limitations alone of finite phenomenal knowledge, which each day's experience proves more and more clearly to be but temporary. Surely, the teleological hypothesis is built upon a rotten foundation, when it has to dread the shock of each advancing wave of knowledge. Surely, it is no less irreverent than unphilosophical to rest our faith in God's existence upon the alleged impossibility of interpreting in terms of matter and motion the beginnings of life, the cross-relations between marsupials and monodelphia, or the structure of the ears and eyes of a cephalopod.

Further to develop this argument would be premature, in the absence of explanations to be given in the next chapter. Contenting ourselves for the present with this brief indication, let us now approach the subject somewhat more closely, and examine certain metaphysical arguments upon which it has lately been sought to base an elaborate teleological theory. The Inquiry into the Theories of History, by Mr. William Adam, presents us with what is probably the last form of the attempt to carry on scientific research by theological methods; and two or three of its arguments may here be fitly noticed, as typical of the entire class to which they belong.

Mr. Adam accepts, with some qualifications, the doctrine of Descartes and Spinoza, that causes resemble their effects. He holds that physical, intellectual, and moral causes respectively resemble their physical, intellectual, and moral effects, and hence infers that the Deity, as a moral and intellectual cause, must resemble the effect man,—must therefore purpose, contrive, and exert volition. The conclusion would have more weight, were it not so manifestly begged in the premise. Next, even in this modified shape, the rule that causes resemble their effects is hampered by awkward exceptions, in dealing with which Mr. Adam has not been fortunate. Assuming, for example, that heat is the cause of steam, he maintains the likeness of the cause to its effect, on the ground that both are in a state of molecular agitation! The mental confusion which resulted in this extraordinary statement is still more explicitly revealed in the assertion that "heat is like steam, as being both physical objects." So, then, we get some conception of the kind of science with which anthropomorphism is practically compatible. Heat, it seems, is a physical object in a state of molecular agitation! The ordinary physicist will certainly object that heat, being the state of molecular agitation, can hardly be called, with propriety, the physical object. And the logician will add that, even if it could be so called, an argument would hardly be thought convincing which should rest upon the alleged resemblance of a billiard-table to a rhinoceros; yet these are both physical objects. Mr. Adam is equally unhappy in his answer to Mr. Mill's humorous criticism of Descartes. Parodying the celebrated maxim,—"Si enim ponamus aliquid in idea reperiri quod non fuerit in ejus causa, hoc igitur habet a nihilo,"—Mr. Mill observes that, "if there be pepper in the soup, there must be pepper in the cook who made it, since otherwise the pepper would be without a cause." Mr. Adam's reply savors strongly of mediæval realism. The cook, he says, is not indeed the efficient cause of the pepper; but the cook's intelligence is the efficient cause of the intelligence displayed in the mixture of the ingredients of the soup, so that even here the cause is like the effect. Comment is not needed. Human ingenuity is indeed pushed to the limit of its tether, when by a play upon words it tries to liken a physical combination of salt, pepper, and meat-juice to an intellectual coördination of experiences.

Apart from these ill-chosen and ill-managed exam-plea, the Cartesian argument, as modified by Mr. Adam, appears to stand as follows: When a physical event, such as the pulling of a trigger, is followed by another physical event, such as the firing of a pistol, the antecedent resembles the consequent, since both are physical events. When an intellectual event, such as the rising into consciousness of the idea of Hamlet, is followed by another intellectual event, such as the ideal representation of a crowded theatre, the antecedent resembles the consequent, since both are intellectual events. When a moral event, such as a fit of ungovernable passion, is followed by another moral event, such as a bitter sense of remorse, the antecedent is like the consequent, since both are moral events. Therefore, the primal cause, antecedent to the whole compound series of intellectual and moral events, must be intellectual and moral in its nature.

Underneath this whole argument there lies an ill-concealed petitio principii. Three parallel lines of causal sequence being set up, it is unwarrantably assumed that causal relations hold only between the successive members of each separate series, or, in other words, that there are no causal relations between the members of one series and the members of another. A single instance of causal relation between a material event and an intellectual or emotional event—such as the relation between certain atmospheric undulations communicated from violin-strings to the auditory nerve, and the consequent recognition of the triad of A-minor, with the accompanying pleasurable feeling—is fatal to the argument. Waiving this objection, however, and for the moment admitting that the universe, as containing intellectual and moral phenomena, requires an intellectual and moral cause, we may note that the argument proves altogether too much. Since the universe contains material as well as psychical phenomena, its first cause, according to Mr. Adam's argument, must partake of all the differential qualities of those phenomena. If it reasons and wills, like the higher animals, it must also, like minerals, plants, and the lowest animals, be unintelligent and unendowed with the power of volition,—which requires in the first cause a more than Hegelian capacity for uniting contradictory attributes. Else we must suppose its causal action to be confined to man, and those other animals which manifest intelligence and volition, while the rest of the universe either seeks another first cause, or goes without one. All these are alike conclusions which philosophy cannot for a moment tolerate, and which are as shocking to science as to religion.

A still more fatal criticism remains to be made. Considered as a modification of the Cartesian doctrine, Mr. Adam's theory is entirely illegitimate: it is the product of a gross misconception of the Cartesian doctrine. All these causes and effects, so carefully but unskillfully compared by Mr. Adam, are phenomenal antecedents and consequents; and, even supposing the universal resemblance of phenomenal causes to phenomenal effects to be fully made out, the anthropomorphic argument is not helped in the least. Until a phenomenal effect can be brought into juxtaposition and compared with its noumenal cause, the argument has no logical validity; but, because of the relativity of all knowledge, this can never be done. To call the First Cause a phenomenon is to make a statement that is self-contradictory; since phenomena exist only by virtue of their relation to human (or animal) consciousness. The First Cause, being absolute and infinite, is a noumenon; and no amount of resemblance, alleged or proved, between various orders of its phenomenal effects, can bear witness to any resemblance between a phenomenal effect and the noumenal cause. The phenomena of motion, for example, exist as phenomena only in so far as they are cognized; and the very constitution of the thinking process renders it impossible for us to assert similarity between the phenomenon and the thing in itself. Indeed, a comparison between the various phenomena of motion gives us good ground for believing that there can be no such thing as resemblance between the phenomena and their noumenal cause. At the beginning of this work, it was shown that the objective reality underlying the phenomena of heat, light, actinism, and mechanical vibration, cannot be held to resemble one of these sets of phenomena more than another, and accordingly cannot be held to resemble any of them. And this conclusion, thus forced upon us by concrete examples, is the only one consistent with what we know of knowledge. Obviously, the phenomena cannot be held to be like the objective reality, without ignoring the circumstance that the mind is itself a factor in the process of cognition. Now, the Cartesians, with more insight into the exigencies of the case than is shown by Mr. Adam, unflinchingly asserted that phenomenal effects are like noumenal causes, that whatever is in the subjective conception is also in the objective reality. As a proposition in psychology, this is a denial of the relativity of knowledge. As a canon of logic, this is the proclamation of the subjective method. Hence, though the metaphysician and the theologian may adopt an anthropomorphic hypothesis founded upon such an argument, it is impossible for a scientific philosopher to do so.

The attempt to establish the anthropomorphic hypothesis by means of the volitional theory of causation is, from the scientific point of view, equally futile. From first to last, as was fully demonstrated in the chapter on Causation, the argument of the volitionists is made up of pure assumptions. From the unwarranted ontological postulate that Will is a noumenal or efficient cause of muscular action in animals, it proceeds, by a flagrant non sequitur, to the equally unwarranted conclusion that Will is the noumenal or efficient cause of all the dynamic phenomena of the universe, and must therefore be the First Cause. Volition being asserted to be the only source whence motion can originate, it is affirmed that, save on the hypothesis of a Supreme Will, the activity of nature baffles comprehension. The reply of the scientific critic is that, in an ultimate analysis, the activity of nature does, and must ever, baffle comprehension; and that, upon any hypothesis framable by our intelligence, whether theistic or non-theistic, the origination of motion must remain not only incomprehensible, but inconceivable. Relatively to our finite power of apprehension, motion is to be regarded, like matter, as eternal.* The unthinkable of the creation or destruction of matter or motion is involved in the axiom that force is persistent, which is the fundamental axiom of all science and of Cosmic Philosophy. Whether motion, considered apart from our power of apprehension, ever had a beginning or not, is a question which cannot concern us as scientific thinkers. To assert that it had is to put into words a hypothesis that cannot be translated into thought, and to assume volition as its primal antecedent is to frame an additional hypothesis that is essentially unverifiable. Phenomenally, we know of Will only as the cause of certain limited and very peculiar kinds of activity displayed by the nerves and muscles of the higher animals. And to argue from this that all other kinds of activity are equally caused by Will, simply because the primal origination of motion is otherwise inexplicable, is as monstrous a stretch of assumption as can well be imagined. While to contend, as many have done, that, because human volitions are attended by a sensation of effort, there is, therefore, effort in each case of causation, is much like identifying gravitational force with the sensation of weight by which the attempt to overcome it is always accompanied.†

The last of the a priori arguments which it is necessary to notice in this connection is that which infers the existence of an intelligent Lawgiver from the omnipresence of Law. "The proofs of necessary law and of an intelligent will . . . remain undeniable," says Mr. Adam, "and no hardihood of assertion can annul them; and, when an attempt was made to bring both into logical connection, the mind, not only without violence to its powers, but on the contrary with a clear perception of necessary congruity, believes that law must proceed from a lawgiver, beneficent laws from a moral ruler. To disjoin an intelligent will from necessary law is to shake our confidence in the perpetuity and salutary operation of law itself. The conception of law without will is that of agency without an agent: the conception of will without law is that of an agent without agency. Necessary law is the constant expression of the divine will." Upon this point, Mr. Adam repeatedly insists in the course of his work,* asserting again and again that, without admitting "this great central conception of a Supreme Will," the laws of nature must forever remain unintelligible. Let us not fail to note that Mr. Adam's conception of theism, as here illustrated, is far more refined, and far less hostile to scientific inquiry, than the conception of theism embodied in the accepted creeds of theologians, and officially defended from the pulpit. Those who adopt Mr. Adam's conception will, if consistent, welcome, instead of opposing, every scientific interpretation of phenomena hitherto deemed supernatural; since, in the above passage, God is clearly regarded as manifesting himself in order and not in disorder, in method and not in caprice, in law and not in miracle. With this view, our Cosmic Philosophy thoroughly coincides; and, eliminating the anthropomorphism from Mr. Adam's statement, I, for one, will heartily join in the assertion that "necessary law is the constant expression of the divine working." But the connection asserted between universal law and a supreme quasi-human will is one which a scientific philosophy cannot admit, for it rests upon a mere verbal equivocation. The inference from community of name to community of nature, however appropriate it might have seemed to the realists of the twelfth century, is, in our day, hardly admissible. Because the word "law" is used to describe alike the generalizations of Kepler and the statutes enacted by a legislative body, we must not infer, with a naïveté worthy of the schoolmen, that whatever is true of the one will always be true of the other. That the laws of Justinian emanated from a lawgiver is no reason for believing the same to have been the case with the law of gravitation; for the former were edicts enjoining obedience, while the latter is but a generalized expression of the manner in which certain phenomena occur. A law of nature, as formulated in a scientific treatise, is a statement of facts, and nothing more. Expressed in the indicative mood, it has nothing whatever to do with the imperative. Science knows nothing of a celestial Ukase compelling the earth to gravitate toward the sun. We know that it does so gravitate with a certain intensity, and that is the whole story. Nevertheless, so strong is the realistic tendency that, in speaking of laws of nature, the most careful writers too seldom avoid "a tacit reference to the original sense of the word law, . . . the expression of the will of a superior."† Indeed, it is immediately after defining a law as "a general name for certain phenomena of the same kind, which regularly recur under the same circumstances," that Mr. Adam alludes to "the Supreme Will which subjects (!) all phenomena to law, and colligates all laws into a universe (!)." Upon such a confusion of ideas, and amid such a chaos of terminology, is this whole argument, so far as concerns theism, unsuspectingly reared. Strip the phrase "law of nature" of this inherent ambiguity, substitute for it the equivalent phrase, "order of sequence among certain phenomena," and the anthropomorphic inference so confidently drawn from it at once disappears.

* Or, to state the same thing in another form, the possibilities of thought are limited by experience; and experience furnishes no data for enabling us to conceive a time, either past or future, when the Unknowable would be objectively manifested to consciousness otherwise than in movements of matter. But this, it should be remembered, applies solely to our powers of conception. Thought is not the measure of things; and, where the region of experience is transcended, the test of inconceivability becomes inapplicable. See above, vol. I., p. 11.

Viewed in close connection with the doctrine of evolution, this scholastic argument from the Law to the Lawgiver lands us amid strange and terrible embarrassments. For what is a law, in the sense in which the word is used by legislators? It is a set of relations established by the community, or by some superior mind representing and guiding the community, in correspondence with certain envolving circumstances. Certain phenomena of crime, for example, tend to detract from the fulness of life of society; and to balance these phenomena a certain force of public opinion is embodied in an edict prescribing due punishments for the crimes in question. Or, slightly to vary the definition and make it more comprehensive, a law is the embodiment of a certain amount of psychical energy, directed toward the securing of the highest attainable fulness of social life. Now if, on the strength of an ambiguous terminology, we proceed to regard the "laws" of nature as edicts enjoined upon matter and motion by a personal ruler, shall we also, as we are logically bound to do, carry with us the conceptions of legislation with which the doctrine of evolution has supplied us? Shall we say that the infinite Deity adjusts inner relations to external contingencies?

Here we come upon the brink of the abyss into which the anthropomorphic hypothesis must precipitate us, if, instead of passively acquiescing in it as a vague authoritative formula, we analyze it with the scientific appliances at our command. To those who have acquired some mastery of the physical truths upon which our Cosmic Philosophy is based, the doctrine not only ceases to be intellectually consoling, but becomes a source of ungovernable disturbance. For to represent the Deity as a person who thinks, contrives, and legislates, is simply to represent him as a product of evolution. The definition of intelligence being "the continuous adjustment of specialized inner relations to specialized outer relations," it follows that to represent the Deity as intelligent is to surround Deity with an environment, and thus to destroy its infinity and its self-existence. The eternal Power, whereof the web of phenomena is but the visible garment, becomes degraded into a mere strand in the web of phenomena; and the Cosmos, in exchange for the loss of its infinite and inscrutable God, receives an anomalous sovereign of mythologic pedigree.

THE HEART'S LONGINGS.

Between the life that most of us live and the ideal one of which we sometimes get alluring glimpses, what an impassable chasm! Who has not gazed on the glories of that enchanted land "where the rainbow never fades," and felt with unspeakable bitterness the galling fetters of life's every-day realities? Though

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime," it is impossible to keep our hearts attuned to this inspired melody through all the trials and toils of the "common lot" of mortals. The poetic hues will often fade from life's labor and duty, and leave only the bare facts of pain and necessity. The beautiful and cheering mirage vanishes, and only the pitiless sun and burning desert sand remain.

In this vain effort to grasp the visions of hope and chain the ideal to the conditions of real life, how many have a common experience! In this deep sorrow of the heart that knows no utterance in human speech, how many are akin! For those unnumbered lives that have this "nameless longing and vague unrest," I have the deepest sympathy. For every tear that has fallen because life's morning visions would not stay, I have a tender respect. There is no sorrow so sacred as that which mourns over the hard, inexorable fact that life is not what the heart would have it be, that the ideal cannot be embodied in every-day conditions. I do not wish to encourage a morbid regret because the heart cannot always have its own, but I feel that this part of human experience receives too little sympathy. Life's defeats and disappointments would not be so hard to bear, if we could commune more freely with sympathetic hearts that have felt, in common with ourselves, the same unsatisfied hunger for the unattained. There is, in this refined human sympathy that can deal tenderly with the heart's wounded longings, a power to bless which words cannot measure. I am daily forced to think of the countless hungry souls in all conditions of life that have seen the golden visions of hope rise alluringly over their pathway, but to vanish in cruel mockery just when attainment seemed assured. Many persons feel that these sorrows of the heart are too sacred to be unveiled; and such bury their blighted hopes away from all human eyes, and visit their graves only by stealth. There is in this inclination to conceal from each other our finest feelings and noblest sorrows something strangely pathetic. Is there a realm of solitude in each life into which sympathy cannot enter? Does each heart feel at times that its own sorrows can never be known by another, and that it must bear its burden of disappointment in silence and alone?

It is the tendency of human progress, I believe, to make sympathy more perfect in binding man to man in all the relations of life; and the time may come when fellowship will embrace those retiring sentiments of the heart that now shun the contact of a cold and unfriendly world. We can never bridge that gulf which separates us from the dreamland of hope: the ideal will always elude our grasp, and disappointment continue to be an every-day visitor in real life; but a refined and tender sympathy for each other's unsatisfied aspirations would render the heart much stronger for its inevitable burden of failure. We cannot afford to cheapen the ideal because it is now beyond our reach. Though our longings for the perfect should never be satisfied, we must not make for ourselves any brazen image of the ideal, and try by this mock worship to quiet our hungry hearts. The ideal must be kept pure and lofty, though it should be sought in vain. But it is not sought in vain.

"It is better to have loved and lost Than never to have loved at all."

It is better to have a hungry heart through all life's changing scenes than to be satisfied with "the common lot" of humanity.

MAX MUELLER AND THE DERIVATION OF THE WORD "ADAM."

In the Index of July 7, I notice that "D. H. C." in summarizing a review of Gerald Massey's recent work in the New York Nation, makes this quotation from the reviewer: "He [Massey] is, however, right when he points out that such a Hebrew, not British, name as Adam is more likely to be derived from Tem or Atem, the Egyptian word for 'Creator' and 'created' being, than Sanskrit Adima, proposed by Max Müller." This was the first intimation I had received that Max Müller had proposed to derive Adam from the Sanskrit Adima. I have failed to find any such etymology in those works of Prof. Müller with which I am familiar,—Chips, 5 vols., Ancient Sanskrit Literature, Science of Religion, and Science of Language. It is true the Sanskrit adjective adima signifies "first"; but that this has any more connection with the name of the first man than the ordinal adjective signifying "first" in any other ancient language has with the name of the first man in that language, there has been, I think, no evidence adduced to sustain. Certain it is that in Sanskrit adima has no connection with the first human being, though, in two instances, forgeries based on such connection have been attempted to be palmed off upon the literary world. When Lieut. Wilford related to the Brahmans the stories in Genesis, with the request that they furnish him copies of their accounts of the same events, which he insisted they must have in their sacred writings, among the spurious narratives brought him, manufactured for the purpose, was the story of Adima and Heva. Adima meaning in Sanskrit "first," and Adam being the "first" man in Hebrew, there was no necessity to fabricate a word corresponding to Adam, as was done in the cases of the other proper names in the bogus extracts from the Shastras,—Heva, Sherma, Chama, Japeta, etc. The same Adima-Heva forgery has been revived of late years, with sundry embellishments, in that disgraceful production, Jacelliot's Bible in India.

So far from Max Müller indorsing these fables, in his essay in the Contemporary Review, April, 1870, subsequently renamed "On False Analogies in Comparative Theology," he most effectually disclosed their falsity. This essay forms a part of the London edition (but not the American) of the volume containing his Science of Religion. I was pleased to see, however, that the recently published (American) fifth volume of his Chips contains this very valuable paper. Treating of the supposed identity of Adam and adima, Müller says, "Comparative Philosophy has taught us again and again that, when we find a word exactly the same in Greek and Sanskrit, we may be certain that it cannot be the same word, and the same applies to Comparative Mythology."

"The same god or the same hero cannot have exactly the same name in Sanskrit and Greek, for the simple reason that Sanskrit and Greek have deviated from each other, have both followed their own way, have both suffered their own phonetic corruptions; and hence, if they do possess the same word, they can only possess it either in its Greek or in its Sanskrit disguise. And if that caution applies to Sanskrit and Greek, members of the same family of language, how much more strongly must it apply to Sanskrit and Hebrew! If the first man were called in Sanskrit Adima, and in Hebrew Adam, and if the two were really the same word, then Hebrew and Sanskrit could not be members of two different families of speech, or we should be driven to admit that Adam was borrowed by the Jews from the Hindus; for it is in Sanskrit only that Adima means the first, whereas in Hebrew it has no such meaning." (Science of Religion, p. 301; Chips, v., 109.) Surely, Müller is not here proposing seriously to derive Adam from Adima; rather does he write to show the absurdity of claiming the identity of the two words. Perhaps, the reviewer in the Nation, hurriedly reading the last sentence in the above paragraph, took it as signifying that the writer proposed deriving Adam from Adima. This is the only reference to the subject I am aware of in Müller's words.

It is certainly far more likely that Adam had an Egyptian origin than that it was borrowed from Sanskrit; but no good grounds exist for tracing it to either. The ancient Hebrews, most likely, derived it from their neighbors in Mesopotamia prior to their migration to Canaan and Egypt. In the Chaldean legends of the Creation and Fall of Man, the race of man, said to have fallen immediately after its creation, is called Admi or Adami (Smith's Chaldean Account of Creation, p. 86). This word is not used as a proper name, but as a general term for mankind. So in Genesis Adam is used as a generic term (verse 1); and in the second chapter, though translated Adam in our authorized version, in Hebrew the definite article ha precedes the word adam; i.e., the adam, the man. The Hebrew legends of creation are evidently a revised and simplified edition of the Babylonian legends, which latter are Akkadian in origin, and date back 2000 to 2200 B.C. Adami is probably an ancient Akkadian word, and no evidence exists of such an historical connection between Akkad and Egypt as would lead to the former borrowing their name for the first human beings from the Egyptian word Tem or Atem. This etymology I deem as fanciful as that of the Sanskrit Adima.

PRESIDIO OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

No. VI.

When one considers the systematic completeness of the teachings of Swedenborg, the attractive reconciliation which they offer for the austerities and oppositions of the creeds, their poetic adaptation to high spiritual imagination and feeling, it seems strange they have not made more rapid headway and won wider acceptance. Especially is this the case in view of the progress Spiritualism has made, to which Swedenborgianism, in a certain superficial and distinctive sense, bears a resemblance.

But Swedenborg was of a more gigantic order of mind, the greatest exponent of its theories that Spiritualism has produced. Far more is he entitled to the rank of a religious philosopher. He was one of those commanding and preponderating personalities that initiate new systems and schools of thought. At the same time, he belongs to that strange type of psychological phenomenon that is exemplified in Plotinus, Jacob Behmen, Joan of Arc, William Blake, and the clairvoyant and mediumistic class of the Spiritualistic movement.

It is generally supposed that scientific pursuits and habits of thought are an assurance of rationalism in religion or, at least, of protection from superstition. But there is much evidence that goes to show that we cannot wholly trust this supposition. Emanuel Swedenborg or Swedberg (as more probably was his name) was an eminent scholar and scientist up to the fifty-fourth year of his age, the time of what is called his spiritual illumination. The circumstances of this event are related in his own words as follows: "I was called," he says in a letter to a friend, "to a holy office by the Lord himself, who has most graciously manifested himself in person to me, his servant, in the year 1743, when he opened my sight to the view of the spiritual world, and granted me the privilege of conversing with spirits and angels, which I enjoy to this day." He describes very minutely the appearance of the Divine Presence, whom he declares to have seen "sitting in purple and in majestic splendor near his bed," and to have said, "I have chosen thee to unfold the spiritual sense of the Scriptures." "Thenceforth, the Lord daily opened the eyes of my spirit to see in perfect wakefulness what was going on in the other world." This continued, he says, for twenty-seven years. The heavens and hells were opened to him, and he beheld the conditions and employments of those who peopled them. Hitherto, Swedenborg had been distinguished for important results that he had attained in metallurgy, mining, chemistry, anatomy, and astronomy; but he now renounced these pursuits for the science of the divine, or more properly the revelation of spiritual laws and phenomena that were given him, as he believed, and through which the physical acquired its absolute and higher interpretation. But though Swedenborg thus exchanged science for theology, and became the author of numerous and elaborate works upon its themes, expository of his peculiar views and mode of thought, he still retained the existing system of Christian doctrines. He simply professed to have discovered a significance that belonged to them beyond what was usually apprehended. According to his view, the world of material things corresponded to a world of spiritual ones. The former are but symbols of the latter. The Bible has a double sense or typical meaning. The story of the fall of man is that of the race, its departure from innocence and purity at some far distant point of its primitive state. The redemption of mankind is not atonement for the sins of man, but conquest over the powers of evil, through Christ who first subdued these in his conflict with them. The trinity is a trinity of principles rather than persons. There are numerous heavens and hells; and each person at death, after a determining intermediate state, is drawn by his own elective affinity to the particular abode to which he belongs. The realization of Swedenborg's conceptions of religion on earth was to be the establishment of the New Jerusalem prefigured in the Apocalypse. Hence, its churches are distinguished as New Jerusalem Churches. Thus, it is seen that, although both Spiritualism and Swedenborgianism are analogous in the emphasis which they lay upon spiritual existences, they are, in other respects, much in contrast to each other. Spiritualism is iconoclastic, violent, pugnacious, Swedenborgianism conservative and unaggressive; and hence the marked difference in the character of the people they attract to themselves. Of the two, Swedenborgianism is obviously of very much the higher moral and intellectual grade. It might have been supposed that Spiritualism would have made greater inroad upon Swedenborgianism; but there is probably no sect that has been less affected by the table-tipping and seance mania. As a class, its representatives are distinguished for fine intelligence and character, suggesting the self-contained and unobtrusive temper of the Quaker on the one hand and the refined and conservative Unitarian on the other. It is doubtless due to the impress of Swedenborg's example, who made no effort to proselytize, or propagate his doctrines beyond the publication of his works, and which has continued the policy of his adherents, that his religion has spread so slowly.

The number of its churches in the United States is very small, the smallest perhaps of any of the sects. It has but two, we believe, in Boston. One of these we attended this morning. If one were in pursuit of it for the first time, very likely he would have some trouble to find it. Instead of having followed the churches up town, it occupies a sort of retreating position on Bowdoin Street, one of those parts of the city that still retains its old-time quiet and genteel character. The church is in the rear of buildings upon the street, which hide it from view, between which, however, sufficient space has been left for a narrow freestone front and pointed doorway, through which one finds a broad and extended entrance to the church. It is a very neat and tasteful edifice of Gothic design. The woodwork of the galleries and the pulpit and chancel are of dark walnut, and follow this order. The preliminary services were wholly liturgical and of considerable length, and a highly devotional character. The sermon was from the text, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." It was a practical exposition of the Decalogue. Taking up the commandments one by one, the preacher drew from each a spiritual meaning supplementary to the more obvious and literal one. Thus the command "Thou shalt not kill" referred, not only to the taking of the physical life, but also to the spiritual as well, to all acts or influences through us by which the higher nature of another became lost or destroyed; "Thou shalt not commit adultery" comprehended also all lascivious thoughts and desires; "Thou shalt not steal," the robbing of another of his spiritual treasures, his hopes and faith,—a warning here to the Freethinker.

The whole series were commented upon in a like manner. There were no reflections upon other sects in the discourse, not even the slightest reference to them. Neither did it evince any of the dogmatic or controversial temper. The old doctrines were implied, but not dwelt upon. A tone of unstudied genteness and sweetness ran through it from the beginning to the end, and had a tendency to this extent to blunt the arrows of radical criticism. ARTICULUS.

THE New York Tablet contains a statement in regard to the last days of Thomas Paine that is new to us, and will probably be new to the readers of the Index generally. It says the Jesuit Fathers "attended on his death-bed," but that "their visit inspired the wretch with no pious sentiments; for he was already abandoned by God and the victim of his own debauchery and crime. 'A fortnight before his death,' says his biographer, 'the "philosopher," seeing himself abandoned by his physicians, was plunged into a gloomy despair. Amid the silence of the night, he was heard crying, "Lord, help me! My God, what have I done to suffer so? But there is no God. Yet, if there is a God, what will become of me?" He could not bear to be left alone, and begged to have at least a child near the bed in which he wallowed in abject filth. Seeking new remedies in every direction, Paine saw a shaking Quakeress whom Father Fenwick had baptized some weeks before; and she told him that no one but a Catholic priest could do him any good. The wretched Freethinker, who cared only for his body, immediately believed that a priest might prolong for a few days his wretched existence; and he immediately sent for Father Fenwick. The latter was then only twenty-six years of age, dreaded his own experience, and begged his colleague, Father Kohlmann, to accompany him; and the two Jesuit Fathers proceeded to the house of the infidel. But as soon as Paine saw his error, as soon as he heard his pious visitors speak to him of his soul instead of prescribing a remedy for his physical evils, he imperiously silenced them, refused to listen, and ordered them out of the room. 'Paine was roused into fury,' wrote Father Fenwick, giving an account of this interview. 'He gritted his teeth, twisted and turned himself several times in his bed, uttering all the while the bitterest and foulest imprecations. I firmly believe, such was the rage he was in at this time, that, if he had had a pistol, he would have shot one of us; for he conducted himself more like a madman than a rational creature. "Begone!" said he, "and trouble me no more. I was in peace," he continued, "till you came. Away with you and your God too! Leave the room instantly. All that you have uttered are lies, filthy lies. If I had a little more time I would prove it, as I did about your impostor, Jesus Christ." "Let us go," said I then to Father Kohlmann: "we have nothing more to do here. He seems to be entirely abandoned by God." Thomas Paine soon expired in the anguish of despair, having repulsed the ministers of Protestantism as obstinately as he drove away the Catholic priests.' This statement, making allowance for errors it contains, increases our respect for Paine, who, although besieged in his last illness by Catholic and Protestant fanatics, maintained his principles and the dignity of his character to the last. It is very fitting now, when the advanced representatives of Protestantism are doing justice to Paine, that the Catholic journals should call him a wretch.

MR. THOMAS DAVIDSON, the Aristotelian scholar and recent interpreter of Rosmini, has been suspected of "Catholic" tendencies; but a recent letter to the Boston Advertiser (August 25) gives little ground for the suspicion. "Catholicism," he remarks, "has lost hold of the intelligence of the Italian people, as well as of their political sympathies; and the day cannot be far off, thanks to the Jesuits and their friends, when it will be held in contempt by all except the most ignorant." Still, he continues, the inner life and sympathies of the Italians are Catholic; and it is only in the line of Catholic feeling that they can show any artistic genius. When they attempt to follow out their new intellectual convictions, and become realistic, they cease to be artists, and "become mere hewers of stone and house decorators." Great Italian art had a supersensual inspiration, belonged "to a world not only ideal, but to a considerable extent inclined to spurn and disregard the real"; and, so far as the younger artists abandon the old view, they turn to nature in such a way as to see only the crust of it. Modern art must be Aristotelian rather than Platonic, must find the ideal not far away, but in the real, albeit imperfectly expressed, and so remove itself from literal "realism" on the one hand as much as from the "Catholic" view on the other. Not unsympathetically, we must believe, does Mr. Davidson write the following sentence which comes so near expressing the heart of modern religious aspiration as well as of modern art: "Like all distinctly modern tendencies, it [i.e., modern art] endeavors to show that the new heavens and the new earth are not waiting to be called out of the abysses of nothing by the creative fiat of an external power, but are and always have been present in the old heavens and the old earth, awaiting only the apprehensive feat of the artist to make them visible." Hence comes a caution to our American artists, with respect to going to Italy at an age before their own genius has sufficiently developed itself, and an expression of disappointment at Mr. French's "Endymion" as contrasted with his "Minute Man," which is said to be "worth all the sculpture in the Milan exhibition put together." One passage more must be quoted: "If ever we are to have an American art developed by the spirit which governs and ought to govern all our institutions, we must be careful how we borrow from Catholic art, whose spirit and purpose were so utterly opposed to all that we most prize and practically believe." We are not afraid of "Catholic" tendencies in a man who writes in this vein.

THE English Church Congress will hold its annual session this year at Newcastle. Bishop Lightfoot will preside, and give the opening address. It announces a programme which, for boldness and breadth, promises the freest discussion of the religious question that has ever taken place in this Church. Not to give all the subjects, which would take too much space, the following fairly indicate what the congress proposes to discuss: "The Duty of the Church in respect to the Prevalence of Secularism and Spiritualism," "The Limits within which Variations of Ritual may be permitted," "The Social Movements of the Age," "The Principles of the English Reformation as bearing on the Questions of the Present Day," "The Proper Attitude of the Church toward the Question of Sunday Observance," "The Claims of the Revised Version to General Acceptance," "The Principles on which the Ecclesiastical Courts should be constituted, and the Methods by which their Decisions can be made more effectual," and "The Connection between Church and State,—What we gain by it, what we lose by it."

THE CRY OF CONSCIENCE.

Oh, it is great, most great, to be
A master in the world of soul!
To bend it as a god the sea,
And hold each wave in thy control!

Now, here, who worship me I bless,
Nor yield him moneyed goods unsouled.
Oh, woe to him who worships less:
My gift*, come once, are ne'er retold!

I hover o'er thy heart: I reach
Thine ears, and plead as some sweet song
That holds such pathos in its speech
As makes thee sadden at the wrong.

Thou know'st me best, when thou hast felt Unwonted passion, or when doubt
Hath fallen, or love grown false hath dealt
The blow that drives all hope without.

Or when thy Satans tempt, and touch
That selfishness they count their prey;
Or thy keen sense hath dulled to much
Deemed right when a free soul hath play.

I know thee, gentle heart! I see
That pain, that joy. Who can evade
My presence? Look! I am that plea
Of which each gracious act is made.

In all, apart from all! I kiss
The virtue of each race and clime.
Oh, love me, for my blessing is Eternal, and my bliss sublime!

Dear ones! in your rough wilderness,
Seek me, for I am gentle-souled.
And woe to him who worships less:
My gifts, come once, are ne'er retold!

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 8, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

For two months from this date, during my temporary absence, Mr. B. F. Underwood will have the entire editorial charge of the Free Religious Index. All communications intended for the paper should be sent to him, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER.

July 22, 1881.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

MONEY due the Index is greatly needed at this season, and subscribers who are in arrears will confer a favor by sending at once the amounts they owe.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Chicago Times tells of a new religious sect, lately sprung up in Michigan. "They call themselves the living Church of God." Their religious ceremonies partake somewhat of the Episcopal form. New members are installed by exercises akin to those of secret societies. After initiation, they are called the "Chosen"; and some grave secrets in regard to the approaching end of the world are imparted. Twelve of the "Chosen" are now at work upon a Bible which they intend to present for the consideration of a delegation of members from various points, who will meet at Charlotte, Mich., in a short time. Their "Bible" will contain the articles of faith of the Society, and is not for distribution outside of its membership. They observe both Saturday and Sunday as rest days, but it is not obligatory on the members to observe more than one. They have a fund for the support of their preachers, who are given no regular salary. They are strict monogamists, and divorce is not allowed. Twelve elders adjust all their differences. They observe strictly numerous "holy" days, and do not make them holidays. The men are closely shaven and wear their hair short. The women wear the hair long, and unconfined by comb or pin. There is talk of gathering the scattered members of this sect into a colony, in some place far west.

THE TENDENCIES OF PROTESTANTISM.

The Catholic Review says that "faith is on the wane; and it is so because it has been pretty thoroughly demonstrated that Puritanism did not, nor does not, furnish any solid, stable ground for faith. No doubt there are a great many good things, and many very nice, respectable people embraced in the Puritan system. We cannot but admire the tenacity with which a remnant of the old stock still adhere to the forms, the language, and even the ideas of the fathers. But the disintegrating process which has made such terrible inroads upon the citadel of Protestantism, which for so many generations was deemed impregnable, furnishes most striking evidence of a radical defect somewhere in its very constitution. The general prevalence of scepticism, even among thinking men; the greediness with which the most blasphemous utterances of atheistic infidels are swallowed by the masses; the incoherent speculations and incongruous discussions of the philosophers,—so called,—as illustrated in the 'theatrical picnic' at Concord; the sad and weary groping after truth, of thoughtful, conservative men; and the longing for some more stable ground of faith by the religiously inclined,—all point in the same direction, and serve but to confirm the assertion, so often made by Catholic controversialists, that the great defect of the Puritan system is the want of authority."

Undoubtedly, the principle and spirit of Protestantism involve a "disintegrating process." If we once admit Luther's right to protest against the authority of the Pope and the Roman Catholic interpretation of the Scriptures, we cannot consistently deny the right of others to protest against the authority of Luther and all other representatives of Protestantism, and their interpretations of the Bible. Universalism, Unitarianism, Liberal Christianity, and all forms and phases of dissent from the doctrine and authority of the Church of Rome, are logical, legitimate results of the early Protestant movement. The prevalent scepticism and disbelief in regard to all forms of ecclesiasticism and all systems of supernaturalism are inevitable consequences of the principle and correspondent practice of protesting against what is believed to be false. And this is the fundamental principle of all progress, not only in the domain of theology, but in every province of thought and action. Protestantism implies progress, and Protestant nations are the most progressive nations of Christendom. At the same time, Catholicism is the only consistent form of Christianity on earth. It presents what it calls a system of divinely revealed truth, and a standard by which that system is to be interpreted and understood. The creed is fixed, and whoever questions its truth is a heretic and a blasphemer. Here we have a consistent system, but one that is opposed to intellectual activity and independence, and consequently to scientific and social progress. The Catholic Review is right in declaring, what orthodox Protestants are slow to admit, that "infidelity" is a natural result of discarding an external ecclesiastical authority in matters of faith and doctrine; but in the rejection of such an authority, however inconsistently, with the claim that it has an objective revelation from God, Protestantism has conferred an incalculable blessing upon mankind. Our indebtedness to Luther, and the other early Protestant reformers, is not for the theology they taught,—for it was little better, indeed in some respects it was worse, than that of the Romish Church,—but for asserting the right of protest respecting a despotic ecclesiastical authority, and giving an impetus to intellectual and moral progress.

HERO-WORSHIP.

Hero-worship is one of the distinguishing marks of humanity. It is one of the first steps in the ascending scale, from the lower grades of savagery to the highest civilization yet attained by man. Hero-worship is not an attribute of any animal below man. It must have been at first the outcome of the sentiment of fear in conquered savages on meeting with superior strength and power to subdue in their conquerors, a superiority which would naturally awaken envy and then admiration in the slowly developing intellect of the savage mind. In the ages of development which have passed since, the ages through which we begin to discern in the words of Tennyson that "One increasing purpose runs,

And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns," hero-worship has changed its form and meaning by imperceptible degrees. There were first envy and consequent admiration for the brute strength and courage which were able to kill more game and so assure continued life, more complete assuagement of hunger, and perhaps gain in other respects by barter with less successful hunters; the subjection of enemies, tending to ease the labor of the conqueror by giving him slaves, giving him also his first choice of women for wives by his power to capture them from weaker men or tribes; and, lastly, by his power to protect the weaker men who chose to conciliate him. But, as civilization advanced, the admiration of courageous acts gave place to admiration of the sentiments which prompted and made possible the acts. Men began to admire the courage of conviction even more than the courage of the deed following the conviction; for they had learned to reason better and to understand that, by education of themselves and their children, like deeds of courage were possible of achievement by all. When men fully perceived this truth, then hero-worship first began in good earnest. To make all equally brave and, later, equally moral and intelligent, the virtues of those who excelled in any or all of the attributes desirable for the furtherance of happiness were held up to admiration in song, legend, and story, in order to awaken anew ambition and emulation in others.

So hero-worship has in so far subserved a good purpose, and done a noble work in the education and elevation of humanity; but, like nearly every other means of moral and intellectual education, it is possible to make of it an evil, by allowing it to go beyond its rightful limits as an educator, by making of it, not a means alone, but an end and aim in itself. It seems to me—in so far as I understand them—the teachings of the Positivist school have a tendency in this the wrong direction. So far as I have been able to comprehend the Comtian idea on this point, it is that Positivism, recognizing all inherited tendencies in man, and remembering that for ages he has been a worshipper of deities of one sort or another, that these deities have been more or less a reflection of the best or strongest in man himself, and that now, when worship of such deities has become unmeaning to those who confess themselves unable to form a conception of any deity which will bear the inspection of logical reasoning, the worship hitherto bestowed on these dead gods should be continued, so as not too suddenly to shock inherited proclivities, but should be transferred to its true source, from anthropomorphic gods to man himself. That is, that we should all turn hero-worshippers, and glorify in certain well-known men, such as Shakespeare, Newton, Descartes, Goethe, the higher virtues or attributes of humanity. But since these heroes, when closely scanned in the light of historical truth, are found to be as faulty in some respects as they are exalted in others, it seems that in such hero-worship there will be danger of accepting even their glaring faults as virtues also, or, per contra, of turning our admiration of their virtues into disgust of the whole character of the men, virtues and all.

Our hero-worship, then, should merge itself into virtue-worship, if worship at all; and the lesson of to-day must be how to discriminate between the man and his different attributes of character, to bear in mind that human nature is so far from perfection that in no one man can we find the perfections of all men, and that the greater any man's intellect or moral virtues are the more likelihood is there of finding in his character equally glaring faults. Even in Dryden's time there had come to him the knowledge that "Great wits are sure to madness near allied,

And thin partitions do their bounds divide."

Because a man has faults, prominent faults perhaps, while those faults should tend to make us cease to be hero-worshippers, they should not be allowed to dim the lustre of his virtues or make us less emulative of them.

Since our imagination is liable to outrun facts, on discovering something to admire in one of our fellow-men, we are apt to proceed at once to idealize and idolize him beyond recognition. So it happens that for the hero-worshipper there is nothing so disenchanting as the longed-for intimate, and every-day acquaintance with his hero. Thence comes the proverb that "no man is a hero to his valet," and that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country and among his own people."

Today, biography, at the behest of the hero-worshipper, eager to know all about his particular idol, even to the smallest minutiae, gives full, complete (and hero-worshippers begin to think, cold-blooded) narratives of all the vices as well as virtues of these idealized men and women. But hero-worship is still so deeply ingrained in human nature that we are inclined to resent it when biography takes us too literally at our word, and reveals to us our hero in prosaic, undignified, and even humiliating aspects. Witness the angry hue and cry of remonstrance over Froude's honest editing of Carlyle's own revelations in regard to himself; how Rousseau's too candid Confessions militated against a high regard for him as a thinker; how hurt the most of us feel in reading autobiographies like those of Harriet Martineau and Carlyle, from the harsh judgments there pronounced against the personal character of many of our literary idols.

But, while all this ought to warn us against hero-worship, it should not keep us from admiration of the qualities which go to make heroes. Let us not forget that what De Cormenin says of orators holds equally true of all great men and women, that they "are like those statues placed on elevated niches, which must be hewn somewhat roughly to produce effect from a distance"; and, though we may fear that there is danger of this effect being largely due to such distance lending "enchantment to the view," we can console ourselves by reflecting that, after all,

"Pygmies perched on Alps are pygmies still,
And pyramids are pyramids in vales."

A MACHINE is on exhibit at Paris for ploughing by electricity. Judging by the sharp angles of original lightning furrows, it must be a hardship for that reckless agent to be forced to dig in parallel lines. Mayhap some skilled machine will one day succeed in harnessing the bandits and sensationalists of human society into regular and beneficent public traces.

INFORMATION ABOUT RUSSIA.

How much need there is of this may be judged from the fact that one of the ablest lecturers in the Concord School of Philosophy spoke of the Nihilists as products of materialism, and of Guiteau as one of their agents, the facts being that the founders of this secret society were all staunch transcendentalists, as is stated in Harper's Monthly for August, and that the wicked assassin belonged to that body which now opposes Nihilism most fiercely, the Orthodox Church. At all events there is much to be learned from books like that just published in Leipzig, and called Von Nicolaus I. to Alexander III.

The earlier portion of this period is covered partly by documents hitherto unpublished, and partly by interesting anecdotes about how Herzen, Bakunin, Kelssiew, Kossuth, Ruge, Ledru Rollin, and other political exiles, met in London, and were banqueted there by James Buchanan, then our ambassador. Nothing is more instructive than the fact that Herzen's journal, the Kolokol, which had flourished as long as it confined itself to stating facts and revealing governmental outrages, lost four-fifths of its subscribers as soon as it became a direct aid to conspirators and revolutionists under Bakunin's wild leadership. The closing chapters give a valuable list of the ministers and other high officials under Alexander II. and Alexander III., and a vigorous criticism of the perpetual inconsistency and sudden vacillations which have marred all the good that might have been effected by the philanthropic intentions with which both of these emperors began to rule. The warmth with which the private character of the younger Alexander is praised, and the extreme measures taken by some of the Nihilists denounced, give all the more weight to the accounts of the way that the Russian government has opposed popular education, checked agricultural prosperity, and violated justice.

The question, which party among the Russians best deserves our sympathy, is so important that we should seek for information from every source. I should myself be glad to have the names of friends willing to give or receive news about what is actually going on in Russia. My address is Box 61, Concord, Mass.

A NOTICEABLE feature of the Massachusetts Greenback State Convention, held at Worcester recently, was the implied admission that some of the positions heretofore defended by Greenbackers are "wild theories," and the great prominence given to a large number of issues other than those directly related to the Greenback movement. The Convention commended the action of Secretary Windom in refunding portions of the public debt with the option of their prompt payment, and affirmed simply that all money, whether gold, silver, or paper, should be issued and its volume controlled by the general government, and be a legal tender for all debts, public and private. Then resolutions were adopted in favor of the purchase and operation of telegraph lines by the government; of frequent elections of officials by the people, as the best solution of the problem of civil-service reform; of changing the law relating to the selection of jurors, so that at least one-half of the voters shall be on the jury list; of abolishing the prison contract-system, and the poll-tax as a prerequisite of voting; of prohibiting the employment of children under fourteen years of age in manufacturing and mechanical establishments; of extending the ten-hour law to all the States, of requiring that the holder of mortgaged property be taxed only on the amount of his interest therein; of requiring corporations to share their profits, in excess of six per cent. with their employes; and of extending suffrage to "all citizens, regardless of race, color, sex, or taxes." Resolutions were also adopted approving the objects of the Irish Land League, expressing sympathy with the Russian Nihilists, and congratulating "our brethren in California on the success of their heroic efforts to stem the advance of Chinese hordes which threaten to submerge in Asiatic darkness and degradation the higher civilization of our race upon the Pacific coast." A resolution in favor of the separation of Church and State was presented; but it aroused vigorous opposition and caused much excitement, and was indefinitely postponed. The action of the Convention is a virtual admission of the fact that the main questions pertaining to the financial policy of the country have been settled for a time at least by "the logic of events," and that a political platform, to command attention now, must include measures which have no necessary connection with the Greenback theories. There are few, if any, intelligent men and women to whom some of the propositions affirmed by the Convention will not commend themselves; but, taken as a whole, they will not find a very large number of defenders.

THE infamous doctrines first planted in American ground by Aaron Burr, and thenceforward spread with baneful activity by Van Buren and his retainers, have yielded their legitimate fruit. The string of propositions upon which that pestilent growth was fostered has threaded its way with remorseless energy through the broadening network of American affairs, till the rankness of the product threatens to stifle the nation. These maxims held among them such statements as follow: "Politics is a game, the prizes of which are offices and contracts." "Fidelity to party is the sole virtue of the politician." "No man must be allowed to suffer on account of his fidelity to his party, no matter how odious to the people he may make himself." "The end and aim of the professional politician is to keep great men down and put little men up. Little men, owing all to the wire-puller, will be governed by him. Great men, having ideas and convictions, are perilous even as tools." Martin Van Buren was one of the first to barter political services for public office, securing for himself, in 1808, the office of Surrogate of Columbia County as reward for his support of Tompkins for Governor of New York. A record of public affairs in that State declares: "Every man holding office was forced to take part in the strife during the struggle between Van Buren and Clinton. The Bench was dragged into the defiling pool of politics. Judges became as reckless partisans as the most active machine men." These audacious tenets, so early ingrafted upon public affairs, were so artfully handled as to elude recognition by honest citizens until their successful entanglement became well-nigh remediless. In 1820, the term of subordinates in the Executive Department of New York was reduced to four years; and, in the four years following, some of the most flagrant cases of unjust displacement on partisan grounds were carried. The scheme thus boldly inaugurated in the Empire State, finally involving the municipal tyranny which holds to this day in New York City, at length extended to the national Executive, which, through the adoption of Van Buren's tactics by President Jackson, laid its toils deep and strong for the subjection and defrauding of the entire country. Political intrigue and theft thence grew to such alarming proportions as at length to prompt the efforts at extrication on the part of advocates of national integrity, which commenced through an appeal to Congress by President Grant in 1870, and further agitated by himself and his successor, President Hayes, now promise determinate force. The material prosperity to which the nation has risen, notwithstanding the pressure of so mighty an incubus, discloses a basic vitality well worth the exertions demanded for its defence.

REPLYING to our statement that "the authority to define dogmas, to say what is and what is not true doctrine, implies the power to change, to take from or add to the creed of the Church, and therein is involved the power to create dogmas," the Catholic Review says:—

Wrong again! The authority to define dogmas, to say what is and what is not true doctrine, does not imply the power to change, far less to take from or add to the creed of the Church, and therein is not involved the power to create dogmas. The chemist who takes up a pound of Rocky Mountain dust, and is able to declare authoritatively that it contains gold or refuse, is not therefore able to make gold out of what has been refuse. The infallible Pope may take the coin of doctrine, and ringing it against the Rock of Peter, or testing it with the principle, Quod semper, quod ubique, et quod ab omnibus, may determine whether it is sound metal of the original deposit of faith; but he has no philosopher's stone, by which he can transmute the base metal, say of the Index, into the true coin that will pass current in all the ages and in all the lands where the Catholic faith is known.

If the chemist were able to declare authoritatively what is gold and what is refuse, he would not, it is true, be able therefore to "make gold out of what has been refuse," but he would be able to make all who recognize him as an authority believe the gold and refuse identical, if he so asserted. Quod bene notandum. The "infallible Pope" is unable to convert "base metal" into "coin,"—that is to say, truth into error; but with the authority to decide for millions what is "base metal" and what is "coin," what is error and what is truth, he has the power to determine what shall be accepted as doctrines within his recognized spiritual jurisdiction. As for the "Rock of Peter," it is but an imaginary existence; and the principle "Quod semper, quod ubique, et quod ab omnibus" is a principle by which the theological doctrines of the Catholic Church never have been tested, and cannot be tested.

THE New York Sun occasionally has a pious streak. It says the prayers for the President's recovery "became general and fervent in the darkest hour of his illness, when, lo! a light, as from heaven, began to illumine the darkness. . . . Logicians affect to ridicule this idea. They say that the universe is governed by general laws. But that may be, and still prayers may be efficacious; for it may be one of the mysterious principles of the general system that prayers shall exercise a certain influence, seen only in its effects, like the law of gravitation." The editor knows that such stuff as this will please common readers; but it is nonsense, never theless. If prayer is only a link in the chain of causation, only a part of a preordained plan, it may be defended as a necessary religious exercise, but not as an act determining or modifying the volition of Deity, or changing in any way the world of physical or mental phenomena. If there is a "general system" established by an omniscient and omnipotent Being, who notes the fall of a sparrow, and "doeth all things well," what an absurdity to suppose that the prayers of short-sighted creatures whom he has made, and whose very constitution and conditions he has created, can influence him to prolong or abbreviate the life of any human being!

GOVERNOR HOYT has addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, proposing that "he undertake to secure concurrent action in all the States" in regard to "public prayer for the restoration of the President to health, strength, and the discharge of his official duties." Secretary Blaine has replied that "proclamations are so essentially acts of supreme executive power that the cabinet has not felt authorized to assume its exercise even for the object which you propose, heartily as it sympathizes with it and earnestly as it desires it." It is just possible that Governor Hoyt was influenced in writing the letter from which we have quoted by a conviction that general prayer throughout the United States would induce Infinite Wisdom to restore our suffering President to health; but it is not likely that a politician of these times has been moved to a recommendation of this sort by such childlike faith and pious simplicity.

SAYS Mr. Bradlaugh in his paper, the National Reformer, "If I had not the right as member to try to enter the House, why not have arrested me? I, if reckless enough, could have easily called for force against force; but this, unless I had meant to make revolution, would only have involved possibility of loss of life and certainly of much physical injury both to the police and the people. To say, as a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette has said, that my expulsion is the enforcement of obedience to rules essential for the conduct of parliamentary business, is monstrously absurd. The right of a constituency is to have its duly returned member in the House, and the business of a member taking his seat takes precedence of all other business. I have broken no rule of the House. The House has, in my case, broken its own rules, has defied the law, and insulted the constituencies."

THE American Iron and Steel Association announces a meeting to be held in New York in November, to consider the revision of the tariff; and the Industrial League of America, propose a similar conference the same month at Chicago. That there is great need of an intelligent revision of the tariff is generally conceded; but conflicting interests make the work one of great difficulty. The New York Times justly observes:—

During the past fifteen years, various efforts have been made from time to time to change one or another of the more absurd and oppressive features of the tariff. They have invariably encountered the united and energetic opposition of the protectionists, who have acted on the avowed policy that there must be given no opportunity for the entrance of the thin end of the wedge of amendment.

THE New York Herald says: "The most practical step taken by the Newport Conference was the resolve to found a civil-service reform society in every congressional district. This can have only one intelligent meaning, an intention to influence the congressional elections. If it is carried into effect with earnestness, it may introduce an uncertainty with regard to the result in a great many close districts, which will have a wholesome relation to the partisan nominations. We shall watch with interest the progress the civil-service reformers make in executing this resolve, as a test of their practical ability."

THE third annual meeting of Kansas Liberals was held at Ottawa last week. The attendance was moderate. The addresses of Judge Hagarnan of the Concordia Blade, and Mrs. Mattie Krekel of the Kansas City Mirror, are mentioned in terms of praise by papers that have come to this office. Resolutions were adopted in favor of total separation of Church and State, of "a free and pure ballot," and "the formation of local societies for the teaching of natural science, pure morals, sociology, hygiene, the laws of heredity, and all that tends to lift the race to a higher plane of thought and action."

THE Coöperator is the title of a journal conducted with much ability in the interests of co-operation, which has assumed large proportions in England, and is now receiving considerable attention in this country. "The subject of coöperation is, in my judgment," says Lord Derby, "more important, as regards the future of England, than nine-tenths of those which are discussed in Parliament and around which political controversy gathers." This journal is published by Allen R. Foote, 7 Clinton Place, New York.

It appears that even Mr. Moody, with his world-wide reputation for religious power, is not yet quite equal to soothing all difficulties in the Lord's camp. According to the newspaper reports, during his late enthusiastic Northfield meetings, he was obliged to endure a "thorn in the flesh" in the petulant speech of a brother minister present, who said, "I came to pass my vacation; but I am so disappointed to find the Convocation running into this unhealthy, unscriptural, pre-millennial Convention, that I'm going home disgusted!"

WE learn from the Seymour Times that Neal Dow, the veteran prohibitionist, spoke in Seymour, Ind., August 30, and maintained that prohibition in Maine does prohibit. He said that jails and poor-houses are empty, and joy and gladness prevail where whiskey and wretchedness did once abound. But we are sorry to see by the Portland Argus that, of the seventy-one arrests in that city last week, sixty-one were for drunkenness.

THE following pious nonsense is from the Christian Statesman: "The death of the President, if he should die after eight weeks of incessant prayer to God in his behalf, will be a solemn and humbling revelation of the anger of Almighty God against a sinful people. . . . The cabinet ought to have called the nation to prayer before this time. If the President dies, the reasons for doing so will be still more urgent."

ONE of the great difficulties of missionary operations in the West, says the Christian Mirror, arises from the fact "that so many people are foreigners who have left their religion at home, if they ever had any, and that the Western man so delights in broad ideas that he regards the restraints of Christianity as a trespass upon his freedom."

REV. W. H. HUBBARD, in the Advance, says there are only 881 installed pastors in the 3,745 Congregational churches in this country. The reason for this discouraging state of things is, he affirms, inability or unwillingness of two-thirds of the churches to support ministers.

THE radical and the conservative spirits and dispositions are both necessary to the true reformer, who, while he works for the removal of the false and the bad, strives to strengthen and perpetuate the true and the good.

It is stated that the average attendance at the Spiritualists' camp-meeting at Lake Pleasant this season has been four thousand daily, and that some Sundays from ten thousand to twelve thousand have been on the camp-ground.

THE Free Lance is a monthly paper, published at Brownsville, Pa. It has verve, snap, and sparkle; is printed on good paper, and with excellent type; and is independent in politics and religion. It has just completed its first volume.

THE New Religion, a weekly published at Norway, Me., is among the most welcome of our exchanges. It is an organ of Universalism, but Universalism of a broad and rationalized type, not the Universalism of Rev. Dr. Miner. It is independent and able.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

REV. DR. HOWARD CROSBY discusses "Crime and Punishment in New York," in the August number of the North American Review. While admitting that New York is not a moral paradise, he maintains that it is not quite so bad as it is frequently represented. The difficulties in the way of its proper government are very much greater than they sometimes appear to its critics. "New York is not only a large city, but it is a seaport, and the principal gate of immigration for the United States. Men of every clime throng its streets, and nearly one-half its population has no personal or inherited interest in American institutions. The worst elements of European society are constantly brought into this civic caldron, in many cases the emptyings of almshouses and prisons." There is far more rowdiness and drunken rioting in Glasgow and Liverpool, Dr. Crosby thinks, than in New York; and its streets are the perfection of cleanness in comparison with those of some of the cities of Southern Europe. It is no less in advance of all others in its various educational and philanthropic agencies. The chief cause of its crime is the "unrestricted sale of distilled liquors." According to the law of New York, a hotel is the only place which has a legal right to sell spirituous liquors by the drink. But, in addition to the hotels which possess this immunity, there are eight thousand saloons in New York where liquor is sold. These carry on their traffic through an evasion of the laws. "The excise commissions have assumed the right to constitute any saloon a hotel." The non-enforcement of the laws is therefore the first obstacle in dealing with intemperance. The apathy of the public is next mentioned as largely accountable for the condition of things in this particular. The influence of partisan politics also contributes to the result, with which cause is closely connected "the dilatoriness of officials in performing the functions for which nominally they were elected." Dr. Crosby proposes the following remedies for the evil: First, "the separation of the politics of the city from those of the country." "This may be begun by a man boldly voting for the nominee of the opposite party, when he is manifestly the candidate of a higher moral character." "This will be the death of machines and all the corruption they manufacture." Second, the personal interest of every citizen in the welfare of the city; the organization in each community of a Society for the Prevention of Crime, "which shall use all diligence to see that the laws are enforced, and that the officers of the law who fail to do their duty are exposed."

THERE is conclusive evidence of an alarming increase of defective eyesight in this and other countries. The subject has been very thoroughly investigated by Prof. Hermann Cohn, and other eminent oculists. They have examined no less than forty thousand school children and attendants of higher institutions of learning, with the following results. It is found that myopia, or short-sightedness, hardly exists at all in the elementary schools, but increases in proportion to the demands that the schools make upon the eyes, and reaches the highest point in the gymnasias. The number of short-sighted scholars rises regularly from the lowest to the highest classes in all institutions. In the highest classes of some of the German universities, sixty per cent. of the students are myopic, at Erlangen eighty per cent., and at Heidelberg not less than one hundred per cent. Some nationalities were more affected than others. In New York twenty-seven per cent., and in Boston twenty-eight per cent. of the scholars in the higher institutions were myopic. Prof. Cohn regards as the chief causes of myopia badly constructed school benches, bad writing, and bad type. The latter evil, he says, deserves especial consideration.

THE September number of the Sanitarian announces that, according to the latest and most authentic reports, the six healthiest cities in the United States were in the order named: Lawrence, Worcester, San Francisco, Lynn, Providence, and Boston. The most unhealthy: Dayton, Wilmington, Indianapolis, Memphis, Cleveland, and Louisville, Cincinnati is not named in this category, because the mortality of the week was specially exceptional by sunstroke.

The healthiest foreign cities were Christiania, Edinburgh, Bristol, Clifton, Bucharest, Bremen and Belfast. The unhealthiest cities in the world were Dayton, St. Petersburg, Wilmington, Indianapolis, Malaga, and Cleveland.

WE find in the Herald of Health for September a paper translated from the Journal de la Société contre l'Abus du Tabac, Paris, by Dr. Coustan, in which are given the results of his investigations pertaining to the "Influence of Tobacco on the Functions of the Brain." Dr. Coustan's researches were confined to educational establishments. In the second rhetorical and philosophical classes in the grammar schools of Douai, the average rank of the pupils were as follows: non-smokers, 4.08; moderate smokers, 6.53; heavy smokers, 9.35. Tracing the progress of the pupil through the different classes, it was observed that, as his propensity for smoking becomes more marked, his place in the class becomes lower.

At the Polytechnique (Ecole Polytechnique), inquiries were made respecting the pupils promoted in 1878. The non-smokers have lost 21.2 places; the moderate smokers, 27 places; the great smokers, 28 places. At the mining school of Douai, out of eight pupils who do not smoke, five have gained places, one has kept his rank, and only two have lost them. Out of thirteen pupils who smoke, only three have obtained higher places, three have kept theirs, seven have lost them.

The volunteer recruits belonging to the fourteenth battalion of light infantry were grouped as follows, during their year of study (1878-79): Non-smokers, average rank, 15.42; moderate smokers, 20.04; great smokers, 23.40. At the military veterinary school at Samur, out of the pupils promoted in 1879-80, the non-smokers take the average rank of 4.6; the smokers, 16.7. A large number of other educational institutions of different grades were examined with like results. The report closes with these words: "The depressing action of tobacco on the intellectual development is, therefore, beyond question. Its influence clogs all the intellectual faculties, and especially the memory. It is greater in proportion to the youth of the individual and the facilities allowed him for smoking."

PROF. J. B. WALKER has just published his autobiography. The Eastern papers seem to know little about him. He is the author of The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation, which he says, with entire truth probably, "is now printed in most of the languages of Christendom, and has a wider circulation in the Christian world than any other American book." He was influential in carrying through the Ohio legislature a school-bill, which he thinks "the best common school law existing in any State." Joseph Barker, the infidel lecturer, ascribed his conversion to Christianity largely to the writings and influence of Professor Walker. About eight years ago, we had a public oral discussion with Professor Walker, at St. Charles, Ill. It is reviewed at length in one of his published works. He was then a professor in Wheaton College, and a genial, earnest, honest man, who commanded our respect, however wide the difference between us.

HERBERT SPENCER reaches an interesting point in his study of political institutions in the contribution made to the Popular Science Monthly for September, in which he treats of the development of representative bodies and the rise of popular government. The first follows upon the cessation of war and the decline of superstitious beliefs, the latter upon the growth of trading activities. "Progressing industrialism brings together masses of people who by their circumstances are enabled, and by their discipline prompted, to modify the political organization which militancy has bequeathed."

WHEN Alfonso was made King in 1875, Canovas' ascendancy over him was complete; and, prompted by Rome, he aimed to extirpate all liberal thought. The Catholic clergy and their supporters had their own way. But Feb. 6, 1881, the young king, after he had been constrained to suppress the celebration of the republic, saw that the demand for a change was imperative, and, dismissing Canovas, he called Sagasta to the head of the ministry. Sagasta, the liberal leader, dissolved the Cortes, went to the people, and has been victorious.

SOME of the papers mention that the Prince of Wales, when he was believed beyond recovery, ten years ago, the doctors having abandoned all hope, began to mend the very day selected as a day of prayer in the United Kingdom for his recovery. Some one brings up the fact that "Charles O'Connor, six years ago, was given up by his doctors, who left his bedside, and pronounced him past hope and recovery; but the old man of seventy-four rallied, even after the closing rites of the Church had been performed, and the consecrated wafer placed in his mouth, and called for what he had long been craving, a pear, ate it and is alive to-day."

A LETTER to the London Times gives an account of the work of a philanthropist, one M. Savorgnan de Brazza, who has purchased a large tract of land near the sources of the Ogowe River, erected a station, and left a white man in charge. He is said to have purchased villages as they stood, freed a great many slaves, and engaged them at monthly wages to cultivate the plantations and keep the ground in order. He seems to have been regarded as the apostle of freedom in the country. Troops of slaves came flocking to him to be freed, and his visit is regarded as having struck a blow at slavery in West Africa. This news is confirmed by a letter from a Roman Catholic missionary, who accompanied him up the Ogowe last December.

WHETHER Stanley lives or dies, the New York Times justly says, he deserves to be honored by all brave men, and above all by Americans. The American newspaper reporter has won for himself a name brighter than those of Livingstone, Burton, Cameron, Speke, or Baker. While other explorers have been welcomed home with enthusiasm and their stories accepted without hesitation, Stanley's countrymen treated him with coldness and incredulity, and were only too ready to call measures which were essential to his success and the preservation of the lives of his followers acts of wanton barbarity. We have not done our whole duty to this noble man; and, if he dies in the wilds of Africa, the recollection cannot be other than painful to us.

It has not escaped remark, says the Graphic, that during the whole of President Garfield's illness no clergyman or minister of religion has visited him; and it is understood that during all this time no one has been permitted to speak to him respecting his probable death and his preparation for that event. Certain rather harsh criticisms have been made on this fact. But it should be remembered that President Garfield is not only a religious man, but that he is a member of a sect which believes that every one is his own high priest, and that there is no necessity for the ministrations of another in spiritual affairs. Exactly how far this principle extends among the members of the sect to which Mr. Garfield belongs, and in which he formerly held a very prominent position, we do not know. But probably there is no ground for the sad suspicion that he has been deprived of any religious aid which he desired. He probably desired none from any one save himself—and perhaps from his wife.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

WE have received from Dunedin, New Zealand, The Lyceum Guide, a text-book for liberal societies and Sunday-schools, the receipt of which is cheering, as showing the progress freethought has made in that far-away land, when the publication of forms of service for liberal societies has become necessary. It is well printed, convenient in form, and its selections are of the best.

THE Popular Science Monthly for September is full of good things. The papers of Herbert Spencer on the "Development of Political Institutions" are very clear and valuable expositions of the application of evolution to differentiation and progress in this direction. The present chapter is upon "Representative Bodies." Dr. Felix Oswald continues his articles on "Physical Education," and under the title of "Remedial Education" touches on many popular fallacies in respect to bodily care and diseases with his usual force and piquancy. Prof. N. H. Winchell has a very interesting article on the "Ancient Copper Mines of Isle Royale," in which these traces of prehistoric man are identified with the aborigines of this country, who are also regarded as the mound-builders. "Writing Physiologically Considered," by Carl Vogt, is of curious psychological and ethnological interest. The science of the "Modern Basis of Life Insurance" is elaborately and precisely stated by Theodore Wehle. Those who are accustomed to regard cemeteries as special sources of disease will be surprised to find this view controverted by M. G. Robinet, in an article entitled "Are Cemeteries Unhealthy?" "State Education a Necessity," by Charles S. Bryant, opposes all the more limited educational agencies as its substitutes. I. Stahl Patterson presents conclusive figures in an article on the "Increase and Movement of the Colored Population" in the United States to show that this element is not dying out. There are several other articles in this number which will be read with special interest, and that make it one of great value.

THE Revue de Belgique for August opens with an article on the national primary schools, where the kindergarten finds some favor, and where more pains are taken to have the children know the names of Stephenson, Jenner, and Columbus than those of Leonidas, Xerxes, and Alexander. A long account is given of the atrocities committed in Liège by the Inquisition in the sixteenth century, and another of Ximènes Doudan, a liberal author recently deceased, who said of Lamartine's Joselyn that the author has two wings, that of a swan, which is his imagination, and that of a sparrow, which is his reason, the result being that the unfortunate genius cannot take any long flight. We have also a poem about a walk in a cemetery, an essay translated from the German on the fall of a poplar, and a series of book notices by one of the editors.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE health of the Prince of Wales is said to be broken by years of dissipation.

GAMBETTA has started a new paper, advocating a revision of the French Constitution.

GRACE GREENWOOD is in London, an invalid, suffering severely from acute attacks of bronchitis.

HON. CARL SCHURZ has agreed to lecture this season under the auspices of the Williams Lecture Bureau.

QUEEN VICTORIA is worth about eighty millions of dollars, and she saves about a million and a half yearly.

CAPT. BOYTON, the swimmer, will write an account of his adventures in the water, to be called Roughing it in Rubber.

"A STUDY OF THE PENTATEUCH," by Rev. Dr. Rufus P. Stebbins, is announced by George H. Ellis for early publication.

PROFESSOR SCARBOROUGH, of Wilberforce University, a full-blooded negro, is about to publish a text-book in Greek.

A LARGE force of emergency men have arrived at Mr. Boycott's house, at Lough Mask, to assist in gathering the crops.

GUITEAU told the Assistant District Attorney last week that he wanted a wife, "a Christian lady of wealth and good family."

FRED DOUGLASS is writing the reminiscences of his life since his escape from bondage. It can hardly fail to be a work of great interest.

GEORGE DOANE, a leading lawyer at Erie, Pa., became insane at a camp meeting, and believes he is the youngest of twenty-three sons of Jehovah.

It is announced that Dean Stanley's successor has been chosen, in the person of the Rev. George Granville Bradley, M.A., master of University College, Oxford.

ASA B. HUTCHINSON, of the old Hutchinson family, is living in Leadville. He and his wife keep a first-class private boarding-house. They have large mining interests near the city.

THE editor of the New Religion, a Maine paper, does not think much of the "Maine Law." "If what we see of the effectiveness of its workings," he says, "is a success, deliver us from a failure."

O'DONOVAN ROSSA says the Fenians do not intend to blow up English ships with passengers, but to destroy British property without destroying life. Men like O'Donovan are Ireland's worst foes.

M. GAMBETTA is not an agreeable speaker. His voice is guttural, it is said. He occasionally astonishes his audience by a tragic hiccup, and even a snort of defiance; and his gestures are incessant and without dignity.

MRS. GARFIELD, according to Brisbin's Life of the President, is traditionally believed by her family to be the grand-niece of Marshal Ney. This is doubtful, but the noble wife has shown qualities worthy of "the bravest of the brave."

It is reported that Hank Monk, the famous stage-driver, upset a stage-coach lately, and that among the passengers were a famous prize-fighter, a Virginia City parson and ex-Attorney-General Devens.

MAYOR KALLOCH, of San Francisco, the blackguard preacher and demagogue politician, whose conduct in Kansas, not to speak of his exploits elsewhere, ought to condemn him to infamy, wants to go to Congress.

THE Grand Duke of Baden, who is about to become a king, is said to be a very liberal man, in sympathy with the people, of unpretending character, and a great favorite with his republican neighbors on the Swiss frontier.

BEN. ISRAEL BUTLER, son of Gen. B. F. Butler, died at Gloucester, Mass., last week, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. He had abilities of a high order, a future of bright promise; and his early death is mourned by many friends by whom he was esteemed.

DR. E. P. MILLER, a prominent New York Greenbacker, says, "I have been trying for the last four years to make the Greenbackers of this State see that the true currency system for our government to adopt will be the legal tender treasury notes, convertible into or kept at par with coin; but I am forced to give it up as a bad job."

THE New York Herald, which printed the astonishing romances signed Leo Hartmann, has received a despatch from St. Petersburg, stating that "the Hartmann who visited you in America is a fraud"; while the London Standard learns at Copenhagen that the real Hartmann has offered to turn state evidence on condition of amnesty to himself.

MR. WILLIAM CLARKE, a young English Liberal, a Cambridge scholar and a vigorous thinker, a republican and one of the ablest, if not the ablest, lecturer of the Reform Union in England, comes to this country the present month to lecture the coming season under the auspices of the Williams Bureau on subjects pertaining to the English political world.

ESTHER RENAND, having been expelled from a convent in France which she had endowed with her entire fortune, not on account of insubordination, but owing to disease that disabled her from all work, is now an invalid pauper. She has appealed to the courts, but can neither recover the endowment she made nor compel the convent to receive her back.

AMONG the callers at the Index office the past week were Prof. Felix Adler on his way to New York from Gloucester, where he has been spending his vacation; E. W. Meddaugh, of Detroit; T. B. Skinner, of Battle Creek; J. S. Johnson, of Almont, Mich.; W. J. Potter, F. A. Hinckley, F. M. Holland, L. K. Washburn, G. W. Cooke, W. Wickersham, Cornelius Wellington.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New Castle (Ohio) Courant, who has visited President Garfield's mother, says she is "a jovial, fresh-faced lady of eighty years, who still walks as spry as a girl. Our gifted President must have inherited much of his marvellous energy from his little mother, whose kindly, resolute face is only a more delicate type of the rugged features of her statesman son."

THE German socialist Fritzsche, who came here as a member of the German diet, and probably also as an authorized delegate, has just opened a beer-shop in Philadelphia. Many a socialist, says the Advertiser, communist, nihilist, and revolutionist will become a quiet philistine, if he have but congenial employment, which must be easy, and an income, which may be moderate.

DR. JAMES MARTINEAU, the only living brother of Harriet Martineau, and a widely known and eloquent Unitarian preacher and writer, although seventy-five years of age, is said to be much younger in appearance. He is described by Mrs. Livermore as being "erect and elastic in figure, with abundant iron gray hair, possessing a full, musical voice," and as delivering a long and able address without exhibiting any signs of fatigue.

MR. SAVAGE will probably write no more books, nor venture into print again in the periodicals. The Methodist alludes to his paper in the current North American Review, as written by "a frivolous person described as 'M. J. Savage.'" This is really crushing. Whatever Brother Savage may do in the future, we trust he will heed the injunction of the pedagogue to the giddy girls under his charge,—"Don't frivel!"—Christian Register.

HELEN GLADSTONE, sister of England's Prime Minister, and once the petted belle of England's most aristocratic society, lately died in the convent at Coblenz, where she had retired from the frivolities of fashionable life. Once a woman of the world, she suddenly disappeared from the gay circles of London society, and gave up her religion, her wealth and pleasures, to become the inmate of a convent.

FOREIGN.

PRINCE KRAPOTKINE, the Nihilist, who has been denied an asylum in Switzerland, has decided to take refuge in London.

EDUCATION, such as it is, is more general in Japan than in any other country. Ninety out of every hundred can read and write. In America, eighty out of one hundred.

PRESIDENT GREY is said to be ready to offer M. Gambetta the Premiership, and to be only waiting until Premier Ferry meets a hostile vote in the new Chamber of Deputies.

THE uprising of the Arabs against the French in North Africa is reported to be spreading, and already covering all the country from the frontier of Morocco to the extremity of Tunis.

ONE of the German colonies in the district of Odessa has held a public meeting, and almost unanimously agreed to, and those present signed, a proposition for levying a fine of fifty roubles on anybody letting lodgings to a Jew.

THE Alsace-Lorraine Gazette says, "The governor has expelled from Strasburg two workmen suspected of being connected with the German Socialist leaders for the purpose of starting a Socialist propaganda in Alsace and Lorraine."

IN England, according to the London Times, almost daily rains are sadly interfering with the harvest; and, unless fine weather immediately sets in, irreparable injury will be caused to the wheat crop, much of which has been cut for some time.

LETTERS from Russia depict a sad condition of things as regards the Jews. It is no rare occurrence, especially in the South, for rich Jews to be falsely accused of some imaginary crime and their property confiscated. The victims are glad to escape with their lives.

THE London News says the international struggle for gold has now begun. The banks of England, France, Belgium, and Germany have raised the rates of discount. The bank of Holland is expected to follow. The American demand for gold thus meets with a resistance which may prove a powerful check.

The government of Liberia has given two hundred acres of land for the foundation of a seminary for the education of young girls. Miss Margaretta Scott has gone to Liberia to begin the work. She carries with her $5,000 for a commencement, and a charter from the State of Maryland, also an annual endowment of $5,000.

The salaries of women teachers in Germany are decidedly meagre. The lowest is $200, and the highest not over $450. They, however, receive pensions. Retirement at the end of ten years' active service entitles them to a pension of one-fourth of their annual salary, and for every additional year of service one-eighteenth is given.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.—News has been received at Berlin from St. Petersburg of recent arrests there, including an official of the general staff, who is accused of advising the revolutionists of the precautions which the government is taking. Although the prisons are filled with persons accused of political crimes, very few are brought to trial.

The Prussian universities conferred last year five hundred and sixty-six doctors' degrees, twenty-nine of these being honorary. There were twelve thousand two hundred and ten students in the eleven Prussian universities last year. Philosophy claimed the largest number. The total number of teachers was nine hundred and forty-eight.

The Italian government has in consideration a proposition to restore the dethroned king and queen of Naples some of their lost perquisites. In the mean time, the exiled couple spend their summers tranquilly and quietly at Hougate on the French coast, seemingly neither depressed by their misfortunes nor elated by the hopes newly aroused.

GUSTAVE RICHTER, the German painter, is dead. He was born in Berlin. He was a professor in the Berlin Academy of Arts, and a member of the academies of Munich and Vienna. One of his most remarkable paintings is "Jesus raising Jairus' Daughter from the Dead," painted for the King of Prussia, and exhibited in the Paris Salon of 1857. He exhibited portraits at the Universal Expositions of 1855 and 1867.

The latest accounts of the elections in France show that in the new Chamber there will be, leaving the results of second balloting out of the question, one hundred and seventy members who are in complete harmony with M. Gambetta, and as many more in the Pure Left group who, in a general way, share his political views, making a majority of at least one hundred and forty on a vote of the whole Chamber. Against this, the Extreme Left can muster but twenty-eight members.

In the district of Saratow, in Russia, a new religious sect, called "The Underground Sect," is said to be gaining followers. The peculiar name is derived from the habit, practised by the followers of this eccentric form of belief, of seeking out caves and other subterranean places of refuge as habitations. They live an ascetic life, taking only bread and water for food and drink, and tolerating no union of the sexes. Their dead are buried under cover of night, from which the notion has gained currency among the peasantry that they throw the bodies into the Volga.

The Chinese government, for some reason not stated, recently issued a decree commanding its subjects to abstain from shaving the head for a period of one hundred days. Detected in the act of disobeying this arbitrary regulation, between fifty and sixty persons, in the city of Foochow alone, were, on the 11th of June, sentenced to receive castigation with bamboo rods, and to pay each a fine of 3,000 cash (about $6). It is stated by the local journals that before liberation the heads of the offenders were, as a wholesome warning to others, carefully painted and varnished.

There is food for thought in the admission made by a writer in All The Year Round, that in England "confessedly the world of wage-earning men hold very much aloof from the efforts made to evangelize them. The artisan class has never been religious, perhaps never will be; and, as for the helpless, disorganized crowd of unclassed and irregular labor, from the rough-skilled labor of the docks to the delicate manipulations of the matchbox maker and seamstress, probably their rôle in the matter is chiefly as the passive subjects of the experiments and efforts of the various sects. They afford respectable people the means of practising the Christian virtues." The founder of the Christian religion, "the friend of publicans and sinners," the "meek and lowly," who "had not where to lay his head," would, we fear, find himself sadly out of place, should he venture to appear among his professed followers of to-day.

UNTIL the service begins, attendants at Spurgeon's London Tabernacle, unless they are regular pew-holders, are admitted only by pass. These passes, however, are freely given, on application to men stationed outside the entrance. Each pass consists of a small paper envelope, on which is printed a hint that the visitor's offering may be enclosed in the envelope and dropped into a box just inside the Tabernacle. Mr. Spurgeon is described, by a recent visitor, as having a "full, pallid face, with thick iron-gray hair, and a fringe of dark beard. His voice is worn with much service, even husky in the higher notes, but admirably managed and modulated so as to reach every corner of the wide arena. We feel at once that we are in the presence of a born orator. Without book or scrap of note, there is from the first a confident, easy flow of well-chosen words. A great deal of the charm of Mr. Spurgeon's discourse—and there is a powerful charm about it, causing time to flow on unperceived—is due to the ease and certainty of delivery and the good nervous English in which it is expressed."

JESTINGS.

LITTLE Eddie had had a naughty day, and both father and mother had found it out. At bed-time, he abbreviated his prayers, closing with the words: "God bless brother and sister, and grandma. Amen!" "You have forgotten part of your prayer," suggested the mother. The quick, sharp reply was, "You don't think I'm going to pray for folks that whip me, do you?"

THE Duke of Nemours once sent his steward to call upon an artist, on whom he wished to confer a snuff-box as a mark of his approbation, to ascertain if such a present would be acceptable. The offer was received with enthusiasm. "Where shall I send it?" inquired the envoy. "Oh! if you will be kind enough," replied the grateful artist, "to pawn it on the way, you can just let me have the money."

"OUT in Illinois," said Lincoln, "where I used to live, there was a good Presbyterian minister who was preaching in a town where there was only one church. Among the notices given him to read from the pulpit was one announcing that a Universalist would hold a meeting in the school-house. The good minister, after reading it, said, 'This man will preach on universal salvation; but, brethren, we believe in better things.'"

"How did you like the lecture?" "Oh, it was beautiful!" "What did he say?" "Oh, he said so many beautiful things!" "Tell us some." "Oh, he said—he said—but I can't tell it to you as he said them." "Tell them as you understand them." "Well, he said—he said—oh, I can't!" "Tell us one thing he said." "Well, he said that the æsthetics of existence enabled us to—to—oh, I can't!" "Tell us what you think he meant." "Oh, go along! Why didn't you go and hear him yourself?"

LESSONS

For Liberal Sunday Schools or for Home Use.

I. THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

A series of Twenty Lessons by Mr. LEWIS G. JAMES, of Brooklyn. Written entirely from the Rationalistic standpoint. Prepared originally for use in Mr. Chadwick's Sunday School. Each lesson printed in a separate slip. Twenty-five cents for the series, including postage.

II. FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP, AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

A series of Five very suggestive Lessons, by Mrs. KATE GANNETT WELLS. Each lesson contains enough material for several exercises. Seven cents for the series, in separate sheets, including postage.

III. THE WORLD WE LIVE IN. A Series of Elementary Lessons in Natural History, by Mr. FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

Adapted both to interest and profit a class of children. To be completed this autumn. One cent each lesson, exclusive of postage, at present.

Supplied by FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont place, Boston.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
AT
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,
WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion.
A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and C. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

WHATEVER has a tendency to promote the civil intercourse of nations by an exchange of benefits is a subject as worthy of philosophy as of politics.—Thomas Paine.

DID the Almighty, holding in his right hand truth, and in his left hand search after truth, deign to proffer me the one I might prefer, in all humility, but without hesitation, I should request search after truth.—Lessing.

I IMAGINE a man must have a good deal of vanity who believes, and a good deal of boldness who affirms, that all the doctrines he holds are true, and all he rejects are false.—Benjamin Franklin.

THE highest wisdom and the highest pleasure need not be costly or exclusive, but may be also as cheap and as free as air; and the greatness of a nation must be measured not by her wealth or apparent power, but by the degree in which all her people have learned together from the world of books, of art, of nature, a pure and ennobling joy.—Priest Leopold of England.

THE world's history is a divine poem, of which the history of every nation is a canto, and every man a word. Its strains have been peeling along down the centuries; and, though there have been mingled the discords of warring cannon and dying men, yet to the Christian, philosopher, and historian—the humble listener—there has been a divine melody running through the song which speaks of hope and halcyon days to come.—James A. Garfield.

LIKE a beautiful flower full of color, but without scent, are the fine but fruitless words of him who does not act accordingly.—Buddha.

THE life of a progressive nation cannot long go forward exclusively on the thinking of the past: its thoughtful men must not be all dead men, but living men who accompany it on his course.—Philip G. Hamerton.

THE laws of intellectual progress are to be read in history, not in the individual experience. We breathe the social air, since what we think greatly depends upon what others have thought. The paradox of to-day becomes the commonplace of to-morrow. The truths which required many years to discover and establish are now declared to be innate.—Leves.

TO SCEPTICISM, we owe that spirit of inquiry which, during the last two centuries, has gradually encroached on every possible subject, has reformed every department of practical and speculative knowledge, has weakened the authority of the privileged classes, and thus placed liberty on a surer foundation, has chastised the despotism of princes, has restrained the arrogance of the nobles, and has even diminished the prejudices of the clergy.—T. H. Buckle.

OUR civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions, more than our opinions in physics or geometry: therefore, the proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence, by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to offices of trust and emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injuriously of those privileges and advantages to which, in common with his fellow-citizens, he has a natural right: it tends also to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage,—by bribing with a monopoly of worldly honors and emoluments those who will externally profess and conform to it.—Thomas Jefferson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

OVER two thousand converts to Mormonism left Liverpool the past summer for Utah.

THE Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has decided that a woman cannot practise as an attorney in this State.

THE Two-Religion Magazine is the odd name of a new journal published in Japan to warn the Japanese against the Christian influences at work there.

A CHICAGO firm supplies ministers at thirty cents per copy, with patent sermons, which in thought and literary style are said to be superior to the average sermon. The firm has built up a large trade, which is evidence of appreciation and demand for its wares.

MAJOR E. C. BENNETT, in a recent lecture in this city, on the Hawaiian Islands, said that there are but two missionaries now on the islands who are not, directly or indirectly, connected with the coolie business, and that the missionaries and their sons own great houses and plantations, and form the bulk of the pro-slavery party in the Hawaiian Islands.

THE Free Thinkers' Convention at Hornellsville, N.Y., last week, adopted resolutions expressing sympathy with Bradlaugh, indorsing the action of Governor Roberts of Texas in refusing to call a day of fasting and prayer, and requesting the publishers of the North American Review to issue in pamphlet form the articles by Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Black for general circulation.

THE Macon Telegraph says that, "as the negro becomes a land-owner and identifies himself with the country, he seeks political affiliation with the white people of his section." Many negroes, it says, have been voting the Democratic ticket, regardless of party politics. This increasing tendency to harmony between the two races of the same communities is a hopeful and encouraging indication.

THE Boston Herald observes that "it does not follow that, because our Unitarian Governor issued a proclamation asking for prayers for the President, he is a believer in the efficacy of prayer." Nor does it follow that the other governors, who have proposed and issued proclamations, or even that the preachers who have encouraged them and done the public praying, are "believers in the efficacy of prayer." What does follow is very evident.

THE Christian Statesman descants with lively sympathy upon the efforts making in France for recovery of a rigid observance of the Sabbath. The tone of feeble disapproval of its distinctive papal features is quite overborne by the ringing accord of fellowship in the main principle at issue. The Protestant lamb seems to be inviting the lion of Popery to a peaceful millennial stroll. She must watch his jaws. He is fond of mutton.

ARCHBISHOP HEISS, of Milwaukee, has issued an order to the effect that Catholic children, whose parents desire them to receive their first communion and confirmation, must attend the parochial schools of their respective churches for one year at least before they will be received into the Church. It hardly need be said that this order is the subject of much comment and discussion. The fact that there are American citizens in this Republic who will allow a prelate to dictate to them where they shall send their children to school is evidence in itself that an American citizen may be not only a victim of superstition, but a trembling slave of ecclesiastical despotism.

THE "Social Science Association" convened at Saratoga on Monday, September 5. The Association, apparently wishing to reform the world radically, wisely opened its discussions with a paper from Mrs. Talbot on Infant Education, on which subject letters were read from Charles Darwin and Mr. Alcott. Not much definite knowledge was obtained as to the point under consideration; but it is always well to start right and to get down to the beginnings of education, as of other things, in order the better to make the way clear upward. Among the later subjects discussed by the Association were the treatment of the Insane, the proper instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, Journalism in America by Charles Dudley Warner, and Civil Service Reform by George W. Curtis.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1881, will probably be set down in the annals of New England as "Yellow Tuesday," as one of our city papers happily named it, and will become as famous as the equally unexplained "Dark Day" of 1780, of which it reminded us. No similar atmospheric phenomenon has ever before been witnessed in New England, and it will long be remembered by all who had opportunity of observing it. Outside of all previous experience and coming unheralded by any of our scientific weather prophets, it strongly appealed to all that remains in human nature of the early superstition of our progenitors; and it is decided and unmistakable testimony to the wide-spread faith in science which prevails among the masses that, in spite of the awe-inspiring mystery of this strange aspect of nature, the work of the day, when practicable, all over the area of semi-darkness, went on equably in the usual grooves. In a few places, it is said, groups of devout and expectant Adventists prepared themselves for the long-looked-for end of time and of the world; and here and there was found a more than usually superstitious person of some other faith, who, recalling the spurious prophecy of "Mother Shipton," tremblingly feared the "last day" was upon us, and waited with quivering nerves to hear the first notes of Gabriel's trumpet; but the majority went calmly about their usual avocations, and made blind guesses, based however on the teachings of science, as to the cause of this freak in the sun's usually reliable rays.

ANTHROPOMORPHIC THEISM.

BY JOHN FISKE.

(Concluded from last week.)

Nor can the theologian find a ready avenue of escape from these embarrassments in the assumption that there is such a thing as disembodied intelligence which is not definable as a correspondence between an organism and its environment, and which is therefore not a product of evolution. Experience does not afford the data for testing such a hypothesis, and to meet it with denial would accordingly be unphilosophic in the extreme. That there may be such a thing as disembodied or unembodied spirit will be denied by no one, save by those shallow materialists who fancy that the possibilities of existence are measured by the narrow limitations of their petty knowledge. But such an admission can be of no use to the theologian in establishing his teleological hypothesis. For, even granting the existence of such unembodied spirit, the moment we ascribe to it intelligence we are using words to which experience has assigned definite meanings, and we are not at liberty to play fast and loose with these meanings. When we speak of "intelligence," we either mean nothing at all, or we mean that which we know as intelligence. But that which we know as intelligence implies a circumscribed and limited form of Being adapting its internal processes to other processes going on beyond its limits. Save as describing such a correspondence between circumscribed Being and its environment, the word "intelligence" has no meaning whatever; and to employ it is simply to defy logic and insult common-sense. In ascribing intelligence to unembodied spirit, we are either using meaningless jargon, or we are implicitly surrounding unembodied spirit with an environment of some kind, and are thus declaring it to be both limited and dependent. The assumption of disembodied intelligence therefore leaves the fundamental difficulty quite untouched.

Thus, in default of all tenable a priori support for the anthropomorphic hypothesis, it must be left to rest, if it is to be entertained at all, upon its ancient inductive basis. In spite of the difficulties encompassing the conception, we may fairly admit that, if the structure of the universe presents unmistakable evidences of divine contrivance or forethought, these evidences may be received in verification of the hypothesis which ascribes to God a quasi-human nature. And thus the possible establishment of that hypothesis must depend upon the weight accorded to the so-called "evidences of design."

From the dawn of philosophic discussion, Pagan and Christian, Trinitarian and Deist, have appealed with equal confidence to the harmony pervading nature as the surest foundation of their faith in an intelligent and beneficent Ruler of the universe. We meet with the argument in the familiar writings of Xenophon and Cicero, and it is forcibly and eloquently maintained by Voltaire as well as by Paley, and, with various modifications, by Agassiz as well as by the authors of the Bridgewater Treatises. One and all, they challenge us to explain, on any other hypothesis than that of creative design, these manifold harmonies, these exquisite adaptations of means to ends, whereof the world is admitted to be full, and which are especially conspicuous among the phenomena of life. Until the establishment of the doctrine of evolution, the glove thus thrown, age after age, into the arena of philosophic controversy, was never triumphantly taken up. It was Mr. Darwin who first, by his discovery of natural selection, supplied the champions of science with the resistless weapon by which to vanquish, in this their chief stronghold, the champions of theology. And this is doubtless foremost among the causes of the intense hostility which all consistent theologians feel toward Mr. Darwin. This antagonism has been generated, not so much by the silly sentimentalism which regards the Darwinian theory as derogatory to human dignity, not so much by the knowledge that the theory is incompatible with that ancient Hebrew cosmogony which still fascinates the theological imagination, as by the perception, partly vague and partly definite, that in natural selection there has been assigned an adequate cause for the marvellous phenomena of adaptation, which had formerly been regarded as clear proofs of beneficent creative contrivance. It needs but to take into the account the other agencies in organic evolution besides the one so admirably illustrated by Mr. Darwin, it needs but to remember that life is essentially a process of equilibration, both direct and indirect, in order to be convinced that the doctrine of evolution has once for all deprived natural theology of the materials upon which until lately it subsisted.*

These apparent indications of creative forethought are just so many illustrations of the scientific theorem that life, whether physical or psychical, is the continuous adjustment of inner relations to outer relations. "On this fact," says Mr. Barratt, "depends the usual argument to prove the existence of God from design or final causes, the whole strength of which is produced by a mere verbal sleight of tongue,—by calling an effect a cause. Any combination of laws would produce its own proper results: hence, under any constitution of the universe, good or bad, possible or impossible, as it may seem to us, it would always be true that 'whatever is, is right.' To give an instance, the particular laws of our present universe bring about night, they also cause the phenomenon sleep in animated creatures: these two naturally suit each other, being different results of the same laws,—just as any two propositions in Euclid agree together. But to say that either is the final cause of the other is to transfer an idea derived from one part of ourselves, our motives to action, to an entirely different part of ourselves, our primary laws of sensation. The earth is suited to its inhabitants because it has produced them, and only such as suit it live."† This last statement, which I have italicized, is the triumphant answer with which science meets the challenge of natural theology. It is not that the environment has been adapted to the organism by an exercise of creative intelligence and beneficence, but it is that the organism is necessarily fitted to the environment because the fittest survive. In no way can the contrast between theology and science, between Anthropomorphism and Cosmism, be more clearly illustrated than in this antithesis. Let us now pursue the argument somewhat further into detail, but slightly changing for a moment the point of view, in order that we may not only show the superiority of the scientific explanation, but may also show how the anthropomorphic theory finds its apparent justification. A theory may be shattered by refutation; but, in order to demolish it utterly, it must be accounted for. We shall see that from the very constitution of the human mind, and by reason of the process whereby intelligence has arisen, we are likely everywhere to meet with apparent results of creative forethought, and that thus in the evolution of intelligence itself these phenomena find their own satisfactory explanation.

In the chapter on the Evolution of Mind, it was shown that the intelligence of any man consists partly of inner relations adjusted from moment to moment in conformity with the outer relations present in his own environment, and partly of organized and integrated inner relations bequeathed him by countless generations of ancestors, brute and human, and adjusted to the outer relations constantly presented in innumerable ancestral environments. Throughout all time, therefore, since intelligence first appeared upon the earth, the world of conceptions has been maintained in more or less complete correspondence with the world of phenomena. Just as in the mental evolution of each individual there is preserved a certain degree of harmony with the mental evolution of contemporary and surrounding individuals, so the total evolution of intelligence has kept pace more or less evenly with the changes of the environment with which it has interacted. Sense after sense has assumed distinct existence in response to stimuli from without. One set of experiences after another has been coördinated in harmony with combinations existing without. Emotion after emotion has been slowly generated in conformity with the necessities entailed by outward circumstances. And thus the contemplating mind and the world of phenomena contemplated are, if I may so express it, tuned in mysterious unison.

Let us now inquire into the bearing of this fact upon the origin and apparent justification of the teleological

* That Darwinism has given the death-blow to theology is admitted by Schleiden, an unwilling witness. See Büchner, Die Darwinsche Theorie, p. 159. Haeckel also says: "Wir erblicken darin [in Darwin's discovery] den definitiven Tod aller teleologischen und vitalistischen Baurtheile der Organismen."—Generelle Morphologie der Organismen, tom. I., p. 160.

† Physical Ethics, p. 33.

theory. We have seen that man has, from the earliest times, been wont to project ideally his personality into the external world, assimilating the forces of physical nature to the forces displayed in his own volitions, and with unrestrained fancy multiplying likenesses of his own intelligence as means whereby to render comprehensible the agencies ever at work around him. Stronger in the ages of primeval fetishism than at any subsequent time, this aboriginal tendency is, nevertheless, not yet quite fully overcome. Even as in the crying of an infant at sight of a stranger may be seen, still feebly surviving, the traces of feelings organized in the race at a time when the strange meant the dangerous, so likewise may we detect evanescent symptoms of a fetishistic style of reasoning in many highly subtilized ontological theories now in vogue, of which the volitional theory of causation, above dealt with, is a notable example. This archaic mode of reasoning, now become exceptional, was once universal. Now applied only to the most abstruse problems, it was at first equally employed in the solution of the simplest. Storm and sunshine, as well as defeat and victory, were regarded as the manifestations of superhuman volition and the achievements of superhuman intelligence. But scientific generalization, steadily arranging in correlated groups phenomena which had hitherto seemed isolated and lawless, was followed by the generalization of presiding divinities. And this went on until, in comparatively modern times, the habit of viewing nature as an organic whole has resulted in monotheism. As the most prominent result of this generalizing process, we have seen slowly going on an elimination, from the objects of men's worship, of the less noble qualities originally ascribed to them. One by one, the grosser sensual passions, the emotions least worthy of reverence, and intellectual shortcomings, such as the liability to make mistakes and to be overreached, have been omitted from the conception of Deity. And the culmination of this purifying process is to be seen in the Deity of the modern metaphysician, which is little more than an abstract embodiment of reason and volition. But, in spite of all this progressive change in the form of the conception, its substance still remains the same. It is still the human personality, however refined and etherialized, which is appealed to alike as the source and as the explanation of all phenomena. It is the primitive fetishistic habit of thought, however modified by conflict with scientific habits, which furtively leads us to regard volition as supplying the nexus between cause and effect, and to interpret the harmonious correspondences in nature as results of creative contrivance and indications of creative purpose.

Such being the origin of the teleological hypothesis, its apparent warrant is to be sought in the facts above recounted with respect to the evolution of intelligence. It is the complex and organized correspondence of the mind with its environment, which seems to furnish inductive justification to the thinker who is predisposed to see in nature the workings of a mind like his own. Arranging and combining various experiences received from without, adjusting new inner relations to outer relations established from time immemorial, man reacts upon the environment, and calls into being new aggregations of matter, new channels of motion, new reservoirs of energy. He does not perceive and reflect only, he also contrives and invents. As often as he builds an engine, launches a ship, paints a picture, moulds a statue, or composes a symphony, he creates in the environment new relations tallying with those present within himself. And then, by a natural but deceptive analogy, he infers that what has taken place in the tiny portion of the universe which owns himself as its designer must also have taken place throughout the whole. All the relations externally existing, he interprets as consequent upon primordial relations shaped in a mind similar to his own. By a subtle realism, he projects the idea of himself out upon the field of phenomena, and deals with it henceforth as an objective reality. Human intelligence made the watch, therefore superhuman intelligence made the flower. Human volitions bring to pass wars and revolutions: divine volitions, therefore, cause famine and pestilence. So when, in the pervading unity which, amid endless variety of detail, binds into a synthetic whole the classes and genera of the organic world, an earnest and reverent thinker, like Agassiz, beholds the work of omnipresent thought, he is but unawares contemplating his own personality reflected before him, and mistaking, Narcissus-like, a mirrored image for a substantial object of adoration. Thus is explained, even while it is refuted, the famous argument of the watch, with all its numerous kindred. In the anthropomorphic hypothesis, the bearings of the inner and the outer worlds are exactly reversed. It is not the intelligence which has made the environment, but it is the environment which has moulded the intelligence. In the mint of nature, the coin Mind has been stamped; and theology, perceiving the likeness of the die to its impression, has unwittingly inverted the causal relation of the two, making Mind, archetypal and self-existent, to be the die.

Therefore, to cite the language employed with slightly different but kindred intent by Mr. Barratt, "we protest against the reversal of the true order. . . . We must not fall down and worship, as the source of our life and virtue, the image which our own minds have set up. Why is such idolatry any better than that of the old wood and stone? If we worship the creations of our minds, why not also those of our hands? The one is, indeed, a more refined self-adoration than the other, but the radical error remains the same in both. The old idolaters were wrong, not because they worshipped themselves, but because they worshipped their creation as if it were their creator; and how can any [anthropomorphic theory] escape the same condemnation?"*

The origin of the teleological hypothesis is thus pointed out, and its plausibility accounted for. On the one hand, the primitive tendency in man to interpret nature anthropomorphically, and his proneness to lend to his own ideas objective embodiment, are facts admitting no dispute. All history teems with evidences of their wide-spread and deep-rooted influence. Has not fetishism been at one time the universal theology, and realism at another time the dominant philosophy? On the other hand, it is a corollary from the fundamental laws of life that psychological development has followed the course and been determined by the conditions above described. The view here defended may thus far claim, at least, equal weight with those which maintain the validity of the teleological hypothesis. But we have next to consider a class of phenomena, in the explanation of which that hypothesis appears at a signal disadvantage.

The perfect adjustment of inner to outer relations is that which constitutes perfect life. Were no chemical or mechanical relations to arise without the organism, too sudden, too intricate, or too unusual, to be met by internal adaptations, death from disease and accident would no longer occur. Were there no concurrence of phenomena defying interpretation and refusing to be classified, there would be perfect knowledge. Were no desires awakened, save such as might be legitimately gratified by the requisite actions, there would be perfect happiness. That the ultimate state of humanity will be characterized by a relatively close approach to such an equilibrium between external requirements and internal resources is a belief which, however paradoxical it may seem to a superficial observer, is justified by all that we know of history and of biology. It is with reason that the modern mind sees its Golden Age in the distant future, as the ancient mind saw it in the forgotten past. But, however bright and glorious may be the destination of mankind, its onward progress is marked by irksome toil and bitter sorrow. Though, like the crusading children in Arnold's beautiful simile, we may cry, from time to time, "Jerusalem is reached!" it is only to be rudely awakened from our delusion, to realize that the goal is yet far off, and that many a weary league must be traversed before we can attain it. Meanwhile, grinding misery is the lot of many, regret and disappointment the portion of all. The life of the wisest man is chiefly made up of lost opportunities, defeated hopes, half-finished projects, and frequent failure in the ever-renewed strife between good and evil inclinations. So penetrated are the noblest careers by the leaven of selfish folly that the conscientious biographer is too often constrained to adopt the tone of apology, mingling condemnation with approval. Side by side with deeds of heroism and sympathetic devotion, history is ever recording deeds of violence and selfish oppression. Undisciplined and conflicting desires are continually coming to fruition in hateful and iniquitous actions. The perennial recurrence of war and persecution, the obstinate vitality of such ugly things as despotism, superstition, fraud, robbery, treachery, and bigotry, show how chaotic as yet is the distribution of moral forces. While the prevalence, here and there, of ignorance and poverty, disease and famine, shows how imperfect as yet is our power to adapt ourselves to the changes going on around us.

That this state of things is temporarily necessitated by the physical constitution of the universe, and by the process of evolution itself, may readily be granted.* The physical ills with which humanity is afflicted are undoubtedly consequent upon the very movement of progress which is bearing it onward toward relative perfection of life, and moral evils likewise are the indispensable concomitants of its slow transition from the primeval state of savage isolation to the ultimate state of civilized interdependence. They are not obstacles to any scientific theory of evolution; nor do they provide an excuse for gloomy cynicism, but should rather be viewed with quiet resignation, relieved by philosophic hopefulness, and enlightened endeavors to ameliorate them. But, though crime and suffering may indeed be destined eventually to disappear, their prevalence throughout the recorded past has, none the less, been ever the stumbling-block and opprobrium of all anthropomorphic theories of the universe. Just so far as the correspondence between the organism and its environment is complete does the teleological hypothesis find apparent confirmation. Just so far as the correspondence is incomplete does it meet with patent contradiction. If harmony and fitness are to be cited as proofs of beneficent design, then discord and unfitness must equally be kept in view as evidences of less admirable contrivance. A scheme which permits thousands of generations to live and die in wretchedness cannot, merely by providing for the well-being of later ages, be absolved from the alternative charge of awkwardness or malevolence. If there exist a personal Creator of the universe who is infinitely intelligent and powerful, he cannot be infinitely good: if, on the other hand, he be infinite in goodness, then he must be lamentably finite in power or in intelligence. By this two-edged difficulty, Theology has ever been foiled. Vainly striving to elude the dilemma, she has at times sought refuge in optimism; alleging the beneficent results of suffering and the evanescent character of evil, as if to prove that suffering and evil do not really exist. Usually, however, she has taken the opposite course, postulating distinct supernatural sources for the evil and the good.† From the Jütuns and Vritras of early Aryan mythology, down to the multimorph Manichæism of later times, may be seen the innumerable vestiges of her fruitless attempts to reconcile the fact of the existence of evil with the hypothesis of the infinite power and benevolence of a personal Deity.

* In treating of the special-creation hypothesis (Principles of Biology, part iii.), Mr. Spencer calls attention to the numerous cases in which the higher life is sacrificed, without compensation, to the lower, as, for example, in the case of parasites. This is a formidable objection, not only to the doctrine of special creations, but to anthropomorphic theism in general. But, for my present purpose, it is quite enough to point out that the constitution of the world is such that even the genesis of higher life involves an enormous infliction of misery upon sentient creatures.

† "Οὐκ ἄρα πάντων γε αἰτίων τὸ ἀγαθόν, ἀλλὰ τῶν μὲν ἐν ἔχοντων αἰτίων, τῶν δὲ κακῶν ἀναίτιον. Οὐδ' ἄρα ὁ Θεός, ἐπειδὴ ἀγαθός, πάντων ἀν' εἰς αἰτίος, ὥς οἱ πολλοὶ λέγουσιν, ἀλλ' ὁλίγων μὲν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις αἰτίος, πολλῶν δὲ ἀναίτιος· πολλὴ γὰρ ἔλαττω τὰ γὰθὰ τῶν κακῶν ἡμῖν· καὶ τῶν μὲν ἀγαθῶν οὐδὲνα ἄλλον αἰτιατόν, τῶν δὲ κακῶν ἄλλ' ἅπτα δει ζῆττιν τὰ αἰτία, ἀλλ' οὐ τὸν Θεόν."—Plato, Republic, ii. 18 (Bekker). He goes on to refute the Homeric conception of the two jars, Iliad xxiv., 660. See also Aristotle, Metaphysics, A. p. 984, b. 17; and compare the views of James Mill, in J. S. Mill's Autobiography, p. 40. For those who may wish to revive the Manichæan doctrine, an excellent point of departure has been afforded by Mr. Martineau, in his suggestion that the primary qualities of matter constitute a "datum objective to God," who, "in shaping the orbits out of immensity, and determining seasons out of eternity, could but follow the laws of curvature, measure, and proportion." Essays Philosophical and Theological, pp. 163, 164. In this way, Mr. Martineau preserves the quasi-human character of God, in the only way in which (as I maintain) it can be preserved; namely, by sacrificing his Omnipotence. In seeking to escape from Mr. Spencer's doctrine of the Unknowable, Mr. Martineau succeeds only in positing, in his "objective datum," an ulterior Unknowable, by which God's power is limited, and which ex hypothesis is not divine. This brings us directly back to Ormuzd and Ahhriman. See Mr. Spencer's remarks, Fortnightly Review, December, 1873; vol. xiv., N.S. pp. 726-728.

It is not for the theologian to seek to stifle such objections by telling us that, in raising them, we are blasphemously judging of the character of the Deity by human standards. Nor is it for him to silence us by pointing to the wondrous process of evolution as itself the working out of a mighty teleology of which our finite understandings can fathom but the scantiest rudiments.* As we shall see in the fifth chapter, the process of evolution, when reverently treated with the aid of such scientific resources as we possess, and when disencumbered of anthropomorphic hypotheses, leads us in the way of no such fearful dilemma as the one by which we are now encountered. It is theology alone which drives us to the brink of this fathomless abyss, by insisting upon the representation of the Deity as a person endowed with anthropomorphic attributes. If goodness and intelligence are to be ascribed to the Deity, it must be the goodness and intelligence of which we have some rudimentary knowledge as manifested in humanity: otherwise, our hypothesis is resolved into unmeaning verbiage. "If," as Mr. Mill observes, "in ascribing goodness to God I do not mean what I mean by goodness; if I do not mean the goodness of which I have some knowledge, but an incomprehensible attribute of an incomprehensible substance, which for aught I know may be a totally different quality from that which I love and venerate,—what do I mean by calling it goodness? and what reason have I for venerating it? To say that God's goodness may be different in kind from man's goodness, what is it but saying, with a slight change of phraseology, that God may possibly not be good?" With Mr. Mill, therefore, "I will call no Being good, who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures." And, going a step further, I will add that it is impossible to call that Being good, who, existing prior to the phenomenal universe, and creating it out of the plenitude of infinite power and foreknowledge, endowed with such properties that its material and moral development must inevitably be attended by the misery of untold millions of sentient creatures for whose existence their Creator is ultimately alone responsible. In short, there can be no hypothesis of a "moral government" of the world, which does not implicitly assert an immoral government. As soon as we seek to go beyond the process of evolution disclosed by science, and posit an external agency which is in the slightest degree anthropomorphic, we are obliged either to supplement and limit this agency by a second one that is diabolic, or else to include elements of diabolism in the character of the first agency itself. And, in the latter case, the blasphemy—if we choose to call it so—lies at the door of those who, by urging upon us their anthropomorphic hypothesis, oblige us to judge the character of the Deity by human standards, and not at the door of those who simply reveal the true character of that anthropomorphic hypothesis by setting forth its hidden implications.

Thus, from every point of view, the doctrine of a quasi-human God appears equally unsatisfactory to the scientific thinker. It rests upon unsupported theories of causation, upon a mistaken conception of law, and upon a teleological hypothesis whose origin renders it suspicious, and whose evidence fails it in the hour of need. The inductive proof alleged in its support is founded upon the correspondence between the organism and the environment; and, where the correspondence fails, just there the doctrine is left helpless. The doctrine of evolution thus not only accounts for the origin and apparent justification of the anthropomorphic theory, but also reveals its limitations. And, when thus closely scrutinized, the hypothesis appears as imperfect morally as it is intellectually. It is shown to be as incompatible with the truest religion as it is with the truest science. Instead of enlightening, it only mystifies us; and, so far from consoling, it tends to drive us to cynical despair.

In spite of all the care observed in the wording of the foregoing argument,—a care directed toward the bringing out of my entire thought, and not toward the concealing of any portion of it,—the views here maintained will doubtless by many be pronounced "covertly atheistical." It must be reserved for the next three chapters to demonstrate that they are precisely the reverse, and that the intelligent acceptance of them must leave us in an attitude toward God more reverential than that which is assumed by those who still cling to the anthropomorphic hypothesis. At present, we must be content with noting that our choice is no longer between an intelligent Deity and none at all: it lies between a limited Deity and one that is without limit. For, as the foregoing discussion has plainly shown, and as must appear from every similar discussion of the subject in terms of the Doctrine of Evolution, an anthropomorphic God cannot be conceived as an infinite God. Personality and Infinity are terms expressive of ideas which are mutually incompatible. The pseud-idea "Infinite Person" is neither more nor less unthinkable than the pseud-idea "Circular Triangle." As Spinoza somewhere says, Determinatio negatio est,—to define God is to deny Him; and, such being the case, what can be more irrational than to insist upon thought and volition, phenomena only known to exist within quite narrow limitations, as the very nature and essence of the infinite Deity? What theory of physical or moral phenomena, built upon such an inadequate basis, can be other than unsound and misleading? What wonder if it continually land us in awkward and conflicting conclusions, painful to us alike as inquiring and as religious beings? As Goethe has profoundly said, "Since the great Being whom we name the Deity manifests himself not only in man, but in a rich and powerful nature, and in mighty world-events, a representation of him, framed from human qualities, cannot of course be adequate; and the thoughtful observer will soon come to imperfections and contradictions, which will drive him to doubt,—nay, even to despair,—unless he be either little enough to let himself be soothed by an artful evasion, or great enough to rise to a higher point of view."* To those whom the habits of thought which science nurtures have led to believe in the existence of an all-pervading and all-sustaining power, eternally and everywhere manifested in the phenomenal activity of the universe, alike the cause of all and the inscrutable essence of all, without whom the world would be as the shadow of a vision and thought itself would vanish,—to these, the conception of a presiding anthropomorphic will is a gross and painful conception. Even were it the highest phenomenal conception which can be framed, it would still be inadequate to represent the ineffable reality. But we do not and cannot know even that it is the highest. Hegel was rash when he said that humanity is the most perfect type of existence in the universe. Our knowledge of the Cosmos has been aptly compared by Carlyle to the knowledge which a minnow in its native creek has of the outlying ocean. Of the innumerable combinations of matter and incarnations of force which are going on within the bounds of space, we know, save a few of the simplest, those only which are confined to the surface of our little planet. And to assert that among them all there may not be forms of existence as far transcending humanity as humanity itself transcends the crystal or the sea-weed is certainly the height of unwarrantable assumption.

* For by taking such ground as this he would virtually abandon his anthropomorphic hypothesis, and concede all that is demanded by the Cosmist. For this conception of teleology implied in the process of evolution, see Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 306.

"Think you this mould of hopes and fears
Could find no statelier than his peers
In yonder hundred million spheres?"

Until our knowledge becomes coextensive with the entire world of phenomena, questions like these must remain unanswered. Meanwhile, we may rest assured that, could we solve them all, the state of the case would not be essentially altered. Our conception might be relatively far loftier, but from the absolute point of view it would be equally beneath the reality. We are therefore forced to conclude that the process of deanthropomorphization, which has from the first characterized the history of philosophic development, must still continue to go on, until the intelligent will postulated by the modern theologian shall have shared the fate of the earlier and still more imperfect symbols whereby finite man has vainly tried to realize that which must ever transcend his powers of conception.

As SPINOZA somewhere says, Determinatio negatio est,—To define God is to deny him; and, such being the case, what can be more irrational than to insist upon thought and volition, phenomena only known to exist within quite narrow limitations, as the very nature and essence of the infinite Deity?—John Fiske.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN KANSAS.

The third annual "encampment of Kansas Liberals" was held in Forest Park, Ottawa, beginning on the 25th of August and closing on the 29th. All the various shades and grades of "Liberalism" were represented among the speakers—Spiritualism, Materialism, Unitarianism, and Rational (or "Free") Religion. Bishop Samuel Watson, of Memphis, Tenn., for thirty-six years a Methodist minister, and now a Spiritualist, gave several addresses during the meeting, his range of subjects including the philosophy, phenomena, and practicality of Spiritualism. Mr. Watson is a very able expounder of the philosophy of Spiritualism; and the whole tendency of his teaching concerning its application to individual life and action was of a most wholesome character, his most especial emphasis being placed upon the inevitable results of obedience or disobedience of the laws of sobriety, purity, and truthfulness. Carrying over the realism of this life into the life beyond, his characterization of the dwarfed, crippled, and wretched condition of the remnants of evil-doers was sufficiently appalling to set a lazy individual to sighing for the good old doctrine of fire and brimstone, with the possibility of escaping through repentance and vicarious atonement.

Mr. J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kans., was the platform representative of Materialism. Mr. Remsburg so thoroughly demonstrates in character and presence the nobility, the dignity, and unselfishness of that philosophy (however incomplete it may be), which is content to "live again in other lives made better for his being," and to steadily do the right without fear or hope of loss or gain, that it was scarcely necessary for him to argue for his philosophy. Hence, one of his very excellent lectures was given to the work of rescuing four eminent Americans—Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and Lincoln—from the claims of Orthodoxy, and crediting their noble lives and deeds to Humanity's Church. Another lecture was a beautiful and stirring vindication and tribute to Thomas Paine. Mrs. Mattie Parry Krekle, of Kansas City, Mo., gave a lecture on the "Evolution of Thought and Progress of Ideas," in a style and manner unsurpassed for elegance and eloquence. Miss S. A. Brown, of Lawrence, Kans., Secretary of the State Unitarian Association, represented Neo-Unitarianism, giving a brief outline of the history of the denomination, with a survey of its present status and its hopes and methods for future work. Rev. C. G. Howland, pastor of the Unitarian Society of Lawrence, Kans., was one of the platform speakers. Mr. Howland represents that phase of Unitarianism whose mission is scarcely recognized by the "Liberalism" of to-day, and which clings to the observance of old customs and phraseology, the while sermonizing in a most radical and scholarly style. Mrs. Annie L. Diggs spoke for the rational philosophy of life known as "Free Religion," of its all-inclusive character, and its especial pressing need of getting at the details of organization, and wheeling into line for orderly, systematic, aggressive work, coöperating in local organizations with all shades of rationalism, and especially making use of the admirable tools, in the shape of club and Sunday-school lesson papers prepared and offered by Radical Unitarianism. Other speakers were heard from during the progress of the meeting. The conference meetings which preceded each address gave the most cordial hearing to a great diversity of views on various topics. The attendance for the two last days was very large, persons from all parts of the State and others from Michigan, Illinois, and Missouri being present. The degree of interest and satisfaction evident was a glowing and forcible argument in favor of the opinion held by the writer of this, in contradistinction to that of Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, concerning the advisability of Materialists and Spiritualists working in one organic body. Intending as I did and do to work to bring into harmonious working relations all earnest and aspiring persons who are out of sympathy with the dominant orthodox theology of to-day, it was with considerable dismay and regret that I read in the Index the advice to Spiritualists to keep to themselves. From a man so wise and so devoted as Mr. Stebbins, such counsel seems to me quite chilling and disheartening. I still believe that the greater wisdom points toward unity of effort on the common ground of agreement. Surely, this is more essential than the emphasis and pursuance of the points of difference. Both the "building up and tearing down processes" have their uses; and, if I should ever earn the right to speak with so authoritative a voice as Mr. Stebbins, I should say again and again: Spiritualists and Agnostics, work together. You need each other, and you can help each other. You can first grind out, in that hard mill of experience, the lesson of tolerance, mutual respect, and forbearance. Spiritualism needs agnosticism to keep it from credulity and superstition (I refer of course to a tendency seen among certain grades of Spiritualists), and Materialists need—oh, so much!—the cheerful and consoling special message which Spiritualism claims to offer. So, Mr. Stebbins, will you not please teach them how to help each other?

Another Index contributor, Mr. Charles Ellis, would have been subjected to a very considerable eye-opening could he have been present at this annual meeting. The writer of this was reminded several times of Mr. Ellis' comment upon the views of Mr. Stebbins and Mrs. Annie Diggs, as expressed at the meeting of the Free Religious Association, concerning the desire for organization among Liberals. Mr. Ellis would scarcely have pronounced them so "misled in judgment," could he have heard and seen how the temper and tone and key-note of the whole meeting were set toward the well-nigh universal interest and desire to get at some sort of constructive and local organic work. The wail in chorus over disembodied and chaotic Liberalism might reach even the ears of Mr. Ellis, if he would but emerge from under his blanket of fear lest somebody might be compromised by some other body's "article of faith." Why, nobody dreams of offering any sort or shape of creed, or expression of belief, as a basis of union. The only proposed "article of faith" is faith in the possibility of bringing about a better and happier state of society by working and studying together for that end. As one evidence of the estimate placed upon organization, this same annual meeting may be cited.

Three years ago, the State Liberal League was organized, and took upon itself the management of a great open-air meeting, where the utmost freedom of expression was accorded to the different phases of liberal thought, with a range of topics larger than those specified by the "League." More than a year ago, when the new officers were elected at the annual meeting, the management passed into the hands of those who were not even members of the State League; and there was a tacit though not expressed understanding that the State organization known as the "Liberal League" stood for a far broader and more comprehensive work than was expressed in the "demands of Liberalism." And later, when the National League took the stand which it did on the Comstock laws, some of the principal workers and officers of the Kansas League would have retired from the organization, except for the great necessity of holding on to that which we had until something more adequate could be provided. The lady who represented the Kansas League at Chicago last year (Mrs. Mattie Parry Krekle) retired from the National League at the same time and for the same reason which necessitated the withdrawal of Colonel Ingersoll; and Mrs. Parry's action received the approval and indorsement of the "League" in Kansas City and of members of the League in various parts of Kansas.

By the action taken at the Ottawa meeting on the 29th of August, the name of the organization was changed to "Kansas Liberal Union." So that, while Liberals everywhere believe most earnestly in the original secular objects of the League, they yet feel that the broad and many-sided Rationalism of to-day cannot be confined to the mere legal phases for which the League alone provided. Furthermore, our genuine Western Liberalism recognized the right of every Liberal to hold his own individual views concerning the Comstock laws, and refused to compel the dissenters to stand committed and compromised by the action of the handful of men and women at Chicago last year. For these reasons, the State League of Kansas is a thing of the dead past. But out of its ashes has arisen a "Union" which will carry forward the interests of the constantly increasing rational thought that is rapidly and enthusiastically taking on the "materialization" of organism, and determining to march on in systematic fashion and with united front against the "wavering ranks of folly, ignorance, and sin."

This already over-lengthy letter will not admit of the report I would like to make of the hopeful beginning at Ottawa under the leadership of the Rev. D.

Cheyney, a Universalist minister. Mr. Cheyney was one of the speakers at the grove meeting, and gave a wholesome and thoughtful address upon "Home Life." A report of the doings of the little company of workers in Mr. Cheyney's church would furnish another point for the enlightenment of Mr. Ellis concerning the desire for organization. So eager are some of the Ottawa friends for constructive work that the greatest extremes meet and mingle, and even so pronounced an agnostic as Mr. W. W. Fraser is one of the most zealous supporters and active workers in Mr. Cheyney's church, while Mr. Ober, whose name the Boston people of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society will recognize, join hands with Mr. Fraser; and each forgets, while working on a higher plane, that the one has as strong partisan feelings for the Free Religious Index as the other has for the Truth-Seeker. Of this latter point will Mr. Stebbins please take notice, whenever he is beset by the fear that extremists cannot work together.

Respectfully,
ANNIE L. DIGGS,
Secretary of "State Liberal Union" of Kansas.

PRAYER CURE.

Can it be possible that, in this the ninth decade of the nineteenth century, any considerable number of the more intelligent portion of those persons who responded to the call of Governor Long to meet at their respective places of worship, and unite in prayer to Almighty God for the recovery of President Garfield, had even the remotest idea that their supplications would induce him to vary to the millionth of a hair any law of his making, in order that the President might be restored to health? I should blush for the much vaunted intelligence of the age, if I thought such were the fact. That our beloved and altogether heroic President should recover and again be able to discharge the functions of his office is, no doubt, the almost universal desire of his countrymen, a wish in which the writer most cordially unites; but he does not lose sight of the fact that James A. Garfield is only a man, and that, under precisely similar conditions of physical capacity to resist disease, and with the same scientific and skilful adjuncts, a burglar, who had been shot while attempting to break and enter, would have presented a parallel case. If President Garfield survives, his recovery will be due to the operation of natural laws,—laws as old as the universe and as immutable as God himself. If all the pious gush that we see displayed on his account has the effect to make those who exhibit it better men and women than they otherwise would have been, I, for one, shall not regret it; but, if its only effect is to bolster up a superstitious dogma, already obsolete with the leading minds of the age, it will be hurtful.

As I heard the bells toll on the 8th inst., calling the people to prayer, this thought occurred to me: would it not be a mockery of justice, were the Almighty to exercise his divine power capriciously on behalf of Mr. Garfield, while thousands of his countrymen, whose lives are as precious to their friends as his, die daily, without providential interposition. As prayers for the President were ascending to heaven, the crackling of a hundred pines, in whose flames scores of human beings were perishing, were breaking the stillness of the forest air; and yet no angel hand was stretched forth to stay their mad fury. Now, if God should miraculously interpose to save the life of the President, while allowing his laws to take their natural course in reference to those other poor children of his, I should lose all faith in his infinite wisdom and supreme goodness, and tremble for the fate of the world.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.
No. VII.

A true radicalism requires the backward as well as the forward look. It calls for something more than contempt of the past. An intelligent and a sympathetic study of it is essential to a right interpretation of the present, as well as correct visions of the future. It was this feeling that led me to the Church of the Holy Cross this morning, the Roman Catholic cathedral. Roman Catholicism is mediæval. It is substantially now what it was five hundred years ago. Hence, wherever it becomes established, the characteristics of the ages to which it is most akin revive.

There is a striking analogy between the cathedrals and the faith from whence they sprung. They not only symbolize a heavenly sovereignty, but its earthly embodiment, through whose potent and commanding authority such achievements alone were possible. They suggest a vast system like that of which they are a part,—a mighty organization in which all individualities are merged in a spirit of undivided allegiance and devotion. They betoken also that feeling of permanence in respect to the religious conceptions of those who constructed them that is the concomitant of faith instead of the shifting uncertainties and temporary adaptations of scepticism.

The cathedral is possible only when the religious sentiments dominate practical interests. It is incompatible with those differentiations of thought and worship which are the inevitable results of religious and intellectual progress. And yet there is over and above the ignorance and spiritual degradation which the Roman Catholic Church represents, as it stands amid the din and whirl of our modern life, even in this new world, a power to affect the imagination and quicken emotions that seem for the time in some degree a solace and an inspiration and to which few are insensible. Who so radical that he has not felt amid such influences, in the presence of the massive solidity and grandeur of the building, its vastness and loftiness of space, of vaulted roof and arches and retreating recesses, of the "dim religious light" streaming through painted windows, and in the rich and impassioned music of the hour, as it rose, now tumultuous and overwhelming, like the swell and surge of the ocean, and now sank into low and plaintive tones, like that of a soul in the depths of solitude and woe, a feeling of restfulness and exaltation of spirit, which has, temporarily at least, seemed a response to a deep yearning within him? Is this the effect of inherited experience, which we are to entirely outgrow, or does it signalize a universal element of our nature which the religion of the future, if such there shall be, is to recognize and provide for?

The Catholic Church acts upon the motto of "Look after the cents, and the dollars will take care of themselves." It suffers no occasions to pass unimproved, when they may be swept into its treasury. We were, therefore, required to pay ten cents each before we were admitted to a seat in the service, the fee exacted of the heretical spectator. The contribution-box at the close, too, made very thorough work of it. Not a pew or a person escaped its appeal. The sermon was founded upon the New Testament miracle of the healing of the leper. The preacher was a person of solid frame, with a head and look that betokened more than ordinary mental power. The speaking was without manuscript or notes, the manner calm, devout, and impressive, and the voice so skilfully modulated that it might be heard by every one in the vast assembly. And yet the sermon, estimated by any other standard than the Roman Catholic one, amounted to little. It was in the spirit of the most unqualified supernaturalism. The preacher appeared like a special pleader in behalf of God, who was in great danger of suffering wrong from mankind. Sin was to be shunned chiefly, one would infer, because it injured God instead of man.

ATTICUS.

From a letter not intended for publication, we take the liberty to give the following extract: "Mr. — is neither Christian, Jew, nor Pagan. Neither is he a freethinker. He has an abhorrence of the words 'free' and 'freedom,' and would, if he could, blot them, root and branch, from our language. He loves liberty; but he condemns and utterly abhors everything of the name and nature of freedom. This may seem to you like an insane distinction without a difference; but I assure you the difference is very clear and distinct to him. I also confess that I can feel the difference, but cannot explain it. I ventured to ask him what 'Free Religion' is. He smiled good-naturedly, saying: 'Free Religious fiddlesticks! There is, there can be, no such thing as a Free Religion. We might as well speak of a free gravitation. The one holds all physical matter in the hollow of its hand, with a force as inexorable as fate and as relentless as the grave. The other holds all humanity an indivisible unit, whose foundation is as solid as the granite rocks and whose superstructure is as permanent as the eternal hills. How often have I told you that the links of love that bind us together, though invisible, are stronger than ocean cables or the anchor chains of mighty ships! The cable may snap, and become silent as death, and the ship like an anarchist become free to be dashed upon the rocks or swallowed by the waves. Give me liberty within the bonds of law, but freedom without the bonds never. The very word "religion" means to bind. The links of its chains are as iron, brass, or gold. The iron links maintain inexorable and invariable order. The brass links are polished bright in the service of love, binding heart to heart through infinite time among the dead, the living, and the unborn. The golden chain of progress is as ductile as liberty and as uncorrosive as time. It commands without being a despot, and obeys without being a slave. Religion embraces these three in one, inseparable now and forever.' These were nearly his very words, and they have been often repeated."

"ROOM FOR THE KING!"

"Room for the king!" Past folds of Orient splendor, Draped high in burning red and antique gold,
What homage new shall bearded vassals render,
What praise be rung, what flatteries freshly told?

Slow, with bowed head, an inner chamber entering,
His heart in tears, his diadem cast down,
All his dark thoughts on one pale pillow centring
Where lieth he whose head shall need no crown!

A later Absalom! A newer David!
And as he moaned who strayed by Galilee
(When round him fell, while the soul's peace he craved,
The shadows of his dear Gethsemane),

So, 'neath its royal roof, a spirit darkening
Moans, as the night creeps up the heavy skies,— Moans the sealed sense, which, past all speech and harkening,
In its frail casket, on the low couch lies!

"Room for the king!" 'Mid the world's weepers newly,
In robe of serge, with pale, grief-braided brow,
He moves, and thrills to sense of kinship duly,
To mourn with e'en his lowliest subject now!

IRELAND.

Over the waste of the restless
Tide of the turbulent sea
Cometh the voice of a restless
People in turbulent plea,
Artlessly, angrily, daily
For balm for the harms of their race;
Anciently frantical, daily
For change, and the right, and a place
For poverty's pitiful roof,—
For change, and the right, and a place
For poverty's pitiful proof
Of bearing a burden for nought.

Centuried forms of anointed
Grace of a kingly reply
Answer in forms of anointed
Statute to Ireland's cry,
Earnestly, carefully, ever
With thought for the lords of the land;
Anciently reasoning, ever,
For right of the Jewelled Land,
To hold of its measure of need,—
For right of the Jewelled Land,
To hold for its own indeed,
The wealth of the world and the years.

The harm of the centuries long,
The harm of the centuried wrong
Is heavy in Ireland's heart;
And over the turbulent sea
Soundeth her turbulent plea,
For change, and the right, and a place
For poverty's pitiful roof,
And poverty's pitiful proof
Of bearing a burden for nought.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 15, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER; Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABROT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

For two months from this date, during my temporary absence, Mr. B. F. Underwood will have the entire editorial charge of the Free Religious Index. All communications intended for the paper should be sent to him, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER.

July 22, 1881.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

MONEY due the Index is greatly needed at this season, and subscribers who are in arrears will confer a favor by sending at once the amounts they owe.

MR. POTTER's vacation having expired, he will, after the issue of this number, resume editorial charge of the Index.

In the Index next week will appear the first of a series of very able discourses delivered by Prof. Felix Adler before the Society for Ethical Culture in New York. Attention is invited to a preliminary statement published in another column. We wish also to call attention to the letter published this week from Mrs. Annie L. Diggs.

THE Channing Memorial Church at Newport, R.I., though not yet quite completed, is to be dedicated Wednesday, September 28, at 11 A.M. The occasion will doubtless be a very impressive one, as the best Unitarian talent of the country, comprising some of the best literary and oratorical ability as well, will participate in the ceremonies, which are to be continued through the day and evening. Dr. Bellows will deliver the dedicatory address. Other speakers announced are Rev. James Freeman Clarke, Rev. E. E. Hale, Rev. W. H. Furness, Rev. Geo. E. Ellis, Rev. H. P. Putnam, and Rev. F. A. Farley. Original hymns have been solicited from Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, Mrs. Howe, and others.

THE HORNELLSVILLE CONVENTION AND THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Mr. H. L. Green, Secretary of the New York Freethinkers' Association, who made arrangements for the Convention of this Association recently held at Hornellsville, N.Y., writes us that "the free-lovers were conspicuous by their absence this year, to the satisfaction of many of us." He also informs us that "the Convention voted to take out a charter as an Auxiliary League, provided the League at its coming Congress will adopt, as its platform, the resolutions passed by the New York Freethinkers' Association in August, 1878." These resolutions, he says, in substance, while declaring that all laws, National and State, which subject to arrest any citizen for an expression of opinion on religious, moral, or scientific subjects, should be repealed, and that "the State Comstock laws" should be "repealed or radically modified," unequivocally condemn those engaged in circulating through the mails or otherwise "literature of an obscene spirit or character," and approve "all such means as may be within the legitimate scope of the government to secure the repression both of the issue and circulation of such matter by the press."

Mr. Green says, "Of course, these resolutions are something of a compromise between the 'repealers' and the 'modifiers'"; but, as they do not demand "entire repeal," he thinks they can probably be made a basis on which all the Liberals of the country can unite, and join the National Liberal League. He adds, "The leaders of the Liberal League who were in attendance—namely, Messrs. Wakeman, Palmer, Leland, and others—gave assurance that they would do all in their power to make the League acceptable to all"; and "there appeared to be a desire manifested by all parties for concession by each, so far as it could be made consistently with honor."

Why Mr. Green takes the pains to write us that the free-lovers "were conspicuous by their absence," when they had a larger proportion of representatives among the speakers than at any previous Convention of the Association, he understands, doubtless, better than we can explain. We will only remark on this point that the platform of a Convention called for no specific purpose, designed only to afford an arena for the discussion of matters in general, should be as free to free-lovers as to any other class of agitators.

We infer from Mr. Green's letter that the Hornellsville Convention was managed by the leaders and in the special interests of the National Liberal League. The National Liberal League is clearly and distinctly committed to the policy that demands the total and unconditional repeal of all postal laws against the circulation of obscene literature. At two of its annual conventions, secessions have occurred in consequence of this policy, which was indicated at Syracuse by an election of officers that involved a "repeal" administration, and afterward unqualifiedly proclaimed at Chicago in those resolutions against which Colonel Ingersoll earnestly protested, and the adoption of which forced him to resign his position as vice-president and to leave the convention.

This year, according to the letter from which we have quoted, the New York Freethinkers' Association votes to become auxiliary to the latter, provided it will adopt some general resolutions that leave untouched the issue on which the League has taken a position objectionable to the great mass of Liberals, that ask for no change in the policy of the League, when it is known to be scattering broadcast its "repeal" tracts and pamphlets, that require as a condition of affiliation no rescission of the resolutions which caused Colonel Ingersoll and Mr

Green with others to withdraw from the convention at Chicago, and, indeed, that can be adopted by the National Liberal League, pledged, though it is, to the policy of repeal, without the slightest concession or any compromise whatever. No wonder that Messrs. Wakeman, Leland, and other leaders of the League, through whose influence the "repeal" policy was adopted, "gave assurance that they would do all in their power to make the League acceptable to all," when the New York Freethinkers' Association, in convention, had voted to apply for a charter which would make it an auxiliary body, on condition that the League would do what every intelligent person, acquainted with its position and prospects, must have known it would be very glad to do for a much smaller accession than the one promised. Although we have no information in regard to the means employed to secure such a vote, it is very evident that the impression prevailed that if the New York Freethinkers' Association would sustain and strengthen it by becoming an Auxiliary League, the National Liberal League would so broaden its platform and modify its policy regarding postal laws as to enable all who are in favor of State secularization to join it, without sacrifice of principle.

That the National Liberal League, under the leadership of Messrs. Wakeman and Leland, and others, will, at its next annual meeting, reconsider and rescind the repeal resolutions passed at Chicago, or that its leaders had or have any thought of attempting to secure such action, is extremely improbable; for, to the demand for the repeal of postal law against obscenity, everything else has been subordinated by those who have had control of this organization. Its organ, published in New York, has kept this subject constantly before its readers, and has treated as enemies those who, however devoted to the cause of State secularization, have favored the reform rather than the repeal of postal laws pertaining to the transmission of nastiness through the mails; while lecturers who divide their time between denouncing all postal laws against obscenity, and advocating wild social theories are recommended as representatives of the organization, worthy of support and of compensation from its treasury. It is not likely that the National Liberal League, although it is a wreck, nearly all its auxiliaries being dead, as Mr. Green, formerly chairman of its executive committee, very well knows, will change substantially the policy it has pursued since 1878, or that there is any intention on the part of the leaders of making such a change. We cannot resist the conviction therefore that Mr. Green, who writes us so gushingly, has been deceived, or—which we do not wish to believe—that, to regain the position that by the advice of Colonel Ingersoll he resigned a year ago, he is willing to encourage an alliance utterly inconsistent with his professions and protests, and involving a sacrifice of principle. If the National Liberal League shall at its next convention rescind all resolutions in favor of repeal, avow itself uncommitted on that subject, and vote to sustain no longer its present position by papers, pamphlets, and lectures, we will be greatly surprised and happily disappointed. Much can be said in favor of the organization of the Liberals of this country; but the National Liberal League will never serve as a nucleus for such an organization, so long as it demands, even in the name of liberty, the repeal of postal laws against obscenity.

VIRGINIA has doubled the number of her public schools and pupils, and nearly doubled the amount expended for their maintenance. Another generation may exhibit in her borders fields whitening to the harvest of rational self-government.

A STRICTER PURITY IN MORALS.

It seems a pertinent question whether in these days there is not as great danger to character from the too general tendency to sympathetic "gush" as there was once in the rigid Puritan strictness, of which this overflow of sympathy is the natural rebound. As a too literal rendering of what was intended for strict justice in past times led to cruel hardness in public laws as well as in private character, so it begins to appear as though there might be as great evil in a too merciful judgment of the crimes and errors of the sinners of to-day.

One begins to sympathize a little with the natural indignation of the faithful elder brother in the story of the Prodigal Son, over the lack of appreciation of his steadfast virtues, while the good-for-nothing Prodigal is feasted and flattered; in these days, when the story is virtually reenacted in the attentions paid to the most brutal murderers and criminals of all sorts in our prisons, who are made the centres of enthusiastic and misplaced pity, the recipients of numerous bouquets and the kindest attentions from those who would shudder to hold a moment's intercourse with any man of like education and instincts who had yet kept himself free from the sentence of a just law, and even from the men who through poverty and temptation as great as these criminals have weakly succumbed to have kept their honor and manhood intact. Remembering the many good and true women who are daily, with noble, unfaltering determination, fighting the face-to-face battle with the wolf Poverty¹ without one word or look of sympathy from any, we begin to grow tired of being constantly called upon to sympathize and to claim sisterhood with the wicked and weak women, whose livelihood is gained only through the sins of men and of themselves. We need to-day a return to greater purity in morals. Those of us who feel acceptance of vicarious atonement to be cowardly and unjust in principle should also feel it cowardly and weak to try to excite pity in ourselves or others, for our own wrong-doing; and, if we make mistakes or do wilful wrong, let us endeavor to develop strength of character by courageously avowing our mistakes, by open repentance of our wrong-doing, and brave acceptance of whatever penalty may thereby be entailed upon us. People having been harshly and unjustly treated in childhood by their parents are apt, when they themselves have children, to rush to the other extreme, and ruin the untrained minds by over-indulgence. So, in a nation of individuals who have witnessed the evils resulting from a too strict rendering of the letter rather than the spirit of a law, there is a tendency in the next generation to self-forgiveness of sins against the common weal. The common sentiment is one of merciful condonement toward all wrong-doing. "Circumstances," "the environments," "inherited tendencies," are all pleaded,—pleaded reasonably to a certain extent in extenuation of certain sins. Weak and short-sighted humanity gladly catches at these excuses, and, whenever the faintest shadow of temptation comes, fortifies itself in advance by reciting these arguments in favor of yielding, and so all the more easily becomes a prey to all immoral temptation, and the character of the individual tempted is thereby lowered and weakened. Stronger men and women are called upon to lower their own high standard of morals, and not only forgive but sympathize with the culprit, who, thus released from the due penalty of his sin, begins to look upon himself as a rather interesting sort of creature. But, being made a prominent object of attention and interest through his evil doings, other weak criminals grow envious; and the consequence is an increase of crime, and a lax estimate in the public mind of the unending evil which any sin against the general weal, once committed, entails. So to-day a great deal of crime goes unpunished. Dishonesty even in public life is not condemned as it should be, and goes on increasing day by day. Every unpunished, unfrowned upon, and uncondemned crime increases the number of criminals, and saps the foundation of all honesty. There is sure to be collapse and ruin in the future, if this method continues. There is safety only in a stricter, more rigid code of morals. It is time to retrace our steps to a more rigid morality, even if by so doing we grow to be less merciful to man's lower proclivities; for, as Shakespeare, the ever-wise, observes,—

"Nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy."

S. A. U.

THE SITUATION.

Nothing is so impressive in a nation's life as the cumulative energy of popular emotion. Let its causal point be never so slight or essentially insignificant, if once it takes hold of mental currents in the mass, its rapid ratio staggers computation. And when its fountain-head has genuine inherent pathos the topmost wave bears upon its crest transcendent majesty. A trifling whim may gain such headway as to compel attention, even from minds of gravest calibre; but let an occurrence of deep import appeal to the popular heart, and all are swept onward in the resistless tide of awakened sympathy that takes no heed of the barriers of caste. In the pressure of common weal, like the impending cloud on the nation's brow, all eyes seem forced to more lucid introspection, which begets uniform sincerity and warmth, and the honest light of conviction thus developed affords at least a temporary triumph for the proportions of truth and necessity. The high-handed scramblers for pelf are meantime held abashed. They dare not launch their pirate rafts upon such an awakened sea of public scrutiny. The dead calm of social ease and slumbering conscience suits them better. Thus it was that the stanch abettors of the reform now promising a flood-tide of interest had to plough the sluggish element with ineffective stroke so long. Men having eyes saw not and having ears heard not, until a sorrow akin to domestic grief showed its appalling mien and sounded its warning knell directly in the wake of the monster greed.

The occasion teems with advantage for pushing the claims of integrity, and affords an available channel for reaching popular conviction that cannot be too studiously and vigorously plied. Sophistry will try its hand to entangle and defeat practical issues; but the possibility, nay, certainty of bearing the standard of essential principle persistently in view, will make a clear pathway inevitable. Courage, industry, and patience in building up sentiment on the foundations of accurate knowledge of State vicissitudes and healthy demand will furnish means of parrying the most formidable opposition that has been or can be arrayed against justice in the apportionment of the nation's civil duties. Wide-spread enlightenment regarding the facts of legislative fraud will insure equally wide exertion for the abatement of the evil. J. P. T.

BITTER And tedious experience is an ungracious tutor, but a very effective one in bringing wavering judgment to a sticking-point for reform. The leading minds in the British government seem fully made up to lay out fresh tracks for another season, with arrangements for lessening the friction of parliamentary rolling stock. Means are under consideration for the adoption of such rules and methods of debate as shall cut off the chances for prolonged trickery in the obstruction of practical issues.

Even those who had special reverence for time-honored sessional usage are finally worried into emphatic resolve upon improvement of its working gear. The lavish expenditure of eight months of legislative time and opportunity upon the settlement of a single problem, to the absolute exclusion of many other pressing claims, indicates a drain upon governmental resource that would consume years in delay of future exigence. It is hoped that some plan will be devised by which various sections of the House may hold questions, fitted to their respective judicial means, in simultaneous review, thus facilitating their ultimate disposal. The discredit into which Parliament itself has fallen, by reason of its growing disorder, in the estimate of the people who are unable in the mass to discover its exact cause, calls for prompt and sound vindication, in the interest of not only English rule, but of representative government everywhere.

THE Independent says,—

The Northern Christian Advocate thinks that, in expressing our criticisms of books and events, we err by an "utterly utter style of utterance." It is possible. Nevertheless, we think it better, for one who has an opinion, to express it very clearly, and with as few qualifications as may be.

That is our conviction exactly. We admire the Independent's style of criticism. Its estimate of books may not always be just, indeed we are certain they are not; but they are clearly expressed, independent, and evidently honest. The literary department of the paper does not consult the counting-room before expressing an opinion of a book. Some of our Liberal papers admit of great improvement in this respect. An editor who from any personal or business consideration commends to the public a work which he knows is of no value is guilty of dishonesty and deception. No "cause" is in need of such editorial crookedness. Books should be reviewed with discrimination and impartiality. A large number of books and pamphlets that are now published in the name of Liberalism are trash; and Liberal editors, if they notice them at all, should have the courage and the independence to say so. This is due to their readers.

IN the trial of Dr. Thomas at Chicago, Mrs. Benjamin testified that the accused had said, "No sane man could believe the Bible as a whole." Mrs. Garrett said Dr. Thomas told her he "did not want a hobby in preaching Christ, there were enough hobbies now, that his life and example were enough, that the death of Christ was like the death of Stephen, that he did not believe the Bible was inspired or that Joshua's sun stood still or that Job ever lived, and that the idea of endless punishment was all bosh." If such are the views of Dr. Thomas, and he probably believes less than is here stated, why does he care to remain in the Methodist church and conference? When a man has discarded the creed of the church of which he is a member, why not leave the church? Why are thousands of men preaching in different denominations when they have no belief whatever in any form of supernaturalism? We are in sympathy with them in their advanced views, but not in their hypocritical conformity to what they do not believe in and their sacrifice of honesty at the shrine of expediency.

THE Christian Union, agreeing with the statement we made last week in regard to Christian treatment of the Jews, says:—

The Orthodox Evangelical Clergy of Germany appear to be doing all they can to make a substantial foundation for the opinion, already widely prevalent, of their bigotry and lack of sympathy with the higher and freer forms of Christian thought. During the past week, at a conference in Berlin, several leading clergymen made violent speeches against the Jews; their argument being that, as the latter are not satisfied with being put on an equality with Christians, but aim at absolute pre-eminence over them, their rights must be curtailed for the protection of Christians. When it is remembered how small an element the Jewish population constitutes in the German empire, such opinions are nothing but confessions of inability to compete with the Jews in the struggle of life. It is a discouraging and shameful thing that men pretending to represent the spirit of the Christian religion should thus publicly violate its fundamental principles. The intellectual infidelity of Germany could not be more fatal to the true interests of the Christian religion in that country than the spiritual infidelity of these bigoted ministers.

THE jubilee meeting of the British Association held at York was attended by three thousand members; and the President, Sir John Lubbock, delivered an address reviewing the achievements of science during the past fifty years. He said in conclusion:—

Summing up the principal results which have been attained in the last half-century, we may mention (over and above the accumulation of facts) the theory of evolution, the antiquity of man, and the far greater antiquity of the world itself; the correlation of physical forces and the conservation of energy; spectrum analysis and its application to celestial physics; the higher algebra and the modern geometry; lastly, the innumerable applications of science to practical life,—as, for instance, in photography, the locomotive engine, the electric telegraph, the spectroscope, and most recently the electric light and the telephone. To science, again, we owe the idea of progress. The ancients, says Bagehot, “had no conception of progress: they did not so much as reject the idea; they did not even entertain it.” It is not, I think, now going too far to say that the true test of the civilization of a nation must be measured by its progress in science.

AFTER Professor Huxley's lecture in regard to vivisection, the Science Congress passed the following resolution without a dissenting voice: “That this Congress records its conviction that experiments upon living animals have proved of the utmost service to medicine, and are indispensable for its farther progress; that, accordingly, while strongly deprecating the infliction of unnecessary pain, it is of opinion that, alike in the interest of man and of animals, it is not desirable to restrict competent persons in the performance of such experiments.” The London Times says that, where philosophers like Mr. Darwin and Dr. Virchow pronounce the practices essential to the advance of medical science, nations will hardly be induced to choose darkness. And the Nation adds: “This being, therefore, one of those uncommon cases where doctors do not disagree, the sentimental objectors to vivisection would do well to note the fact.”

SAYS the New York Tablet: “The Nihilists are divided into two parties, or factions; namely, the destructionists and the party of order. The former, like Crowe and Rossa, goes in for the free use of dynamite, in order to kill the Czar and to strike terror into the enemy, so as to compel them to grant the required reforms. The latter would employ argument and reason, and enlist public opinion on their side, in order to convince the government of the necessity of granting reforms and justice to the people. Even the Nihilist extremists are more just and merciful in their designs than their Irish imitators. The former would use dynamite for the destruction of the head of the government or his guilty subordinates, while the latter would blow up indiscriminately both the innocent and the guilty.”

BISMARCK has asserted that he is “not going to Canossa.” This phrase relates to the abject penance made by Emperor Henry IV. to Pope Gregory VII., at the small town of Canossa, in Italy, when the haughty monarch had failed in his schemes to control the Church, and the exacting pontiff, in the consciousness of his power, had demanded acts of humiliation from his foe as a condition of absolution. This occurred in the eleventh century. Prince Bismarck will not literally go to Canossa; but it looks very much now as though, in order to conciliate the ultramontane party in Germany, he were ready to acknowledge papal pretension which he has heretofore treated with arrogance and contempt. It is not surprising therefore that a Catholic writer says, “Bismarck has gone to Canossa.”

SAYS the Boston Sunday Herald:—

To all Americans—and to many Englishmen, no doubt—a speech from the British throne gives the impression of an anachronism. The idea of a fat and rather dull-witted old lady, with a red nose, speaking, in this age of the world, of “my government,” “my troops,” “my navy,” “my foreign relations,” and so on, is simply absurd. The style is handed down from the times when the reigning monarch believed himself to be, and was recognized as, “the State,” as Louis XIV. of France expressed it. This tradition of the kingly power, projected upon the prosaic and utilitarian age, simply raises a smile. Poor old Queen Victoria is hardly more useful than ornamental in the British government of to-day.

Very true. The English Queen does not write her address, and has no direct power. The British “throne” has scarcely more than a nominal existence, and is a sort of legal fiction; yet Englishmen have a great reverence for it, and are ready to defend and, if necessary, to fight for it.

THE Springfield Republican says, in a recent notice of the History of the Woman's Suffrage Movement, by Mrs. Stanton and others, that “Frances Wright's Free Inquirer, which she edited in New York in 1828, was ‘the first periodical established in the United States for the purpose of free and unbiassed inquiry on all subjects.’ Fanny Wright's remarkable presentation of the Epicurean philosophy, under the guise of fiction, entitled ‘A Few Days in Athens,’ had appeared as a serial in the Free Inquirer's predecessor, Robert Dale Owen's New Harmony Gazette. The book is worth reading now, and would not now awaken such denunciations of immorality against its author as it received then.”

THE Advertiser says “the French Republic has advanced more rapidly than has M. Gambetta's mind. Not that he is left behind; but the special objects of his statesmanship have all been realized . . . The people had a duty to perform, and they performed it with honor to themselves. On the whole, they chose the best man within reach, and constituted a chamber in the hands of which the honor and the progress of France will rest secure. They did better than the Spaniards did on the same day. They did far better in all respects than the Germans are expected to do in October. The old saying about Anglo Saxon sobriety and French levity, never true, is to-day a trite absurdity.”

A THEOLOGICAL assumption that has been stubbornly defended is that, back of all polytheism, are indications of a primeval belief in one God. Prof. Whitney, in the Princeton Review for May, says: “The whole tendency of modern scientific thought is opposed to the passing of such an assumption unchallenged.” “No trace of monotheism is to be found anywhere in the world except with a polytheism behind it. When the contrary of this is sought to be discovered,—as, for instance, by some authorities in the Vedic hymns,—it is only by an inversion of the true and obvious relation of things, and by other fruitless straining of facts to sustain an untenable theory.”

THE organist in an English cathedral recently flogged a choir boy for a mistake in singing, and defends himself by the plea that the practice is common in other cathedrals. “As the only thing,” the Nation remarks, “which distinguishes singing in a cathedral from singing in the theatre is the supposition that the former is an act of worship, dependent wholly for its value on the spirit in which it is performed, using a whip to make the worshippers sing in tune is one of those absurdities which are too absurd to be laughed at. They are food for reflection rather than for mirth.”

THE Seventh Episcopal Church Congress, to be held at Providence next month, will talk of such subjects as “Civil Service Reform,” “Methods of Charity Organization,” etc. The leaders of this denomination evidently see that, to retain their hold and influence upon the people, they must give attention to matters of present practical interest. Liberal secular thought is forcing the churches to abandon old methods and to subordinate theological creeds to the consideration of current questions affecting the interests of the people. And it is by so doing only that they get a new lease of life.

THE closing session of the Northfield Conference emulated the papal method by expressing a part of its devotion in a foreign tongue: not, however, with the temperate confinement to one, like the ancient Latin; for two modern novelties were employed to spice the familiar hymns for languid ears. A convert was also held up for notice, who once stumbled into the sacred fold by mistaking the posters of a religious meeting at the doors of a theatre for play-bills,—not the only instance (as Mr. Moody thought) of a man joining the church because he could not read.

REFERRING to the observance of the recent Fast Day in this city, the Boston Evening Transcript says: “Some banks and business houses which closed their doors had all the clerks as busy as ever inside. The truth is that the New Englander of the nineteenth century does not take naturally to the old Oriental rite of fasting. It is a hard struggle for moderns to sit still in pious meditation on a week-day.”

REV. MOSES WELCH maintains in the New Englander that what Moses really said was not that he was meek above all the sons of men, but that he was more plagued, afflicted, or cast down. He was at the time, Mr. Welch says, harassed indoors by a shrew of a wife and outdoors by the cantankerous Israelites. That may have been one of the causes of Moses' fits of ill-temper.

A WRITER in the Gardener's Monthly claims that the edelweiss, the Alpine blossom so often referred to in song and story, is a much overrated flower, that it is surpassed in beauty by many other mountain flowers, that it is easily grown in gardens, and many of our American florists keep the seed for sale. So perishes another of our idealisms.

THE Boston Herald says that “the weekly religious press of this country, with two or three exceptions, would be a discredit to amateur journalism. A minister who has not force enough to hold an intellectual congregation is only fit to empty editorial waste baskets. Certainly, he is not the man to wield the pen.”

A WRITER in the Nation justly says that “there are few operations performed on living animals in the interest of science which for unmitigated cruelty can be compared to hunting an animal to death.” And yet announcements of fox-hunts have brought together thousands this season at Newport and Martha's Vineyard.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

ALLUSION was made in the address of Prof. Barker, before the American Association for the Advancement of Science at its session in this city, a year ago this summer, to a remarkable invention of Dr. Mosso, of Turin, for testing the degree of cerebral circulation in performing different kinds of intellectual work. M. Gley, a French physiologist, has made some experiments on himself recently, which coincide with the testimony of the apparatus referred to. Some of the results of M. Gley's experiments are briefly stated in this note in Nature, of July 28: "He finds that the rhythm of the heart through intellectual work is slightly accelerated; and this increase seems in direct ratio of the intensity of the attention. Thus, the pulse was more frequent when the author studied geometry, with which he had little familiarity, than when he studied philosophy, of which he had a good knowledge. With the heart-rhythm is accelerated the carotid artery, is dilated during cerebral work, and the carotidian pulse becomes dicrotic. But the radical pulse becomes smaller and less ample. The phenomena of congestion observed in the brain persist a certain time after cerebral activity."

Sir Bartle Frere, who has had a good deal of experience in South Africa, recently gave a lecture before the Anthropological Institute in London, in which he sketched the condition of things in that part of the world, and stated the results of the contact of the civilized with its uncivilized races. The conclusions the lecturer presented are summarized in the following propositions: "(1) It is possible for the civilized to destroy by war the savage races, to expel or repel or turn them aside in their migrations. (2) Proximity of civilized and savage races has led or is leading to the decay and probable extinction of the Bushman race. But this result is doubtful in the case of the Hottentot races, and is certainly not taking place with regard to the Bantoes or Kaffir races. (3) The changes consequent on proximity of civilized and uncivilized races are an approximation to the European type of civilization. (4) The essentials to such approximation are (a) a pax Romana or Anglicana, bringing with it (b) protection of life and property, which involves equality before the law, individual property in land, abolition of slavery, abolition of private rights of making war, and of carrying arms without the authority of the supreme ruler, (c) power of local legislation on European principles, with a vigor to secure education in the arts of civilized life, taxation sufficient for State purposes, restrictions on the use of intoxicating substances, as measures essential to the full attainment of any one of the preceding objects." All this sounds well, and looks well on paper. But, unfortunately, English dealings with these African tribes have shown but little disposition to put into operation principles like those above.

At the Social Science Convention, held at Saratoga, Dr. Emily Pope stated that, of four hundred and seventy women graduates, three hundred and ninety are in practice, the larger proportion being in New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania.

At Savannah drug-stores, medical potions are not denied to colored purchasers, but they are not permitted to buy a harmless draught from the refreshing soda fountain. Possibly, a sly prop on the part of the white dealer for the cause of what he considers survival of the fittest.

The September Unitarian Review will contain a sermon by George MacDonald, the novelist, said to be the first and only one he has ever written.

ARE WE ATHEISTS?

A statement embodied in a discourse delivered by Prof. Felix Adler, before the Society for Ethical Culture, in Chickering Hall, New York.

There is a feeling on the part of many who are no longer Theists that causes them to reject the appellation Atheists. Perhaps the following thought will explain this feeling, and will set right the position of a large and constantly increasing class in the eyes of the religious world.

A vital distinction is to be drawn between the foundation of a belief and the belief itself. A structure is so connected with its foundation that without the foundation it cannot exist. But the foundation can exist very well without a particular structure, and others may be raised upon it when the ancient one has crumbled into ruins. I cling with all my soul to the foundation on which Theism has been built. I do not accept Theism. The foundation of Theism is twofold: first, the denial of chance, the conviction that there is order in the world; secondly, the conviction that this order is a good order,—in other words, that there is progress in the world.

Now there have been different ways of building upon, of accounting for, these two fundamental facts of religious conviction. Theism is one of those ways, Pantheism is another. Theism says, Before the world existed there was an Infinite, Almighty Being, who called it into existence and put order into it, hence the world's order; and gave it a purpose toward which to progress, hence the world's progress. Pantheism declares that God is not distinct from the Universe, that God and the Universe are one. There is a spirit, say the Pantheists, breathing through all things, the life of all life, the substance of all existence. The heavens are the starry robe of God, the earth the hem of his garment. The order which we perceive in the world is the manifestation of the present God, the progressive tendency which we observe in things is the struggling of God to utter his indwelling perfection.

But there is a third class—and of this, I, the speaker, am one—who content themselves with simply recognizing and admiring in all reverence the marvellous beauty, magnitude, harmony,—in brief, the order of the material world, content themselves with noting the glorious spectacle of the ascending myriads who rise ever higher and higher on the golden stairway of being, without yet attempting to explain, because no human mind can explain, how this order originated in the beginning, if there was a beginning, or how the goal will be reached in the end, if there will be an end. Enough for them, as the firm anchorage of their lives, the grand fact that there is order, that there is an evident progress toward the higher in the world.

This class may not be called Theists, because they know nothing of a captaincy of God, under whose guidance the world aims are to be achieved; nor yet may they be called Atheists, for they believe wholly in the aims themselves,—no matter how, in the unsearchable mystery of things these priceless aims are to be realized.

THREE CASES.

1. It is said that King Alphonso, of Castile, volunteered the suggestion that, if he had been present at the creation of the world, he could have given some useful hints.

2. On the 3d of September, Governor Hoyt, of Pennsylvania, issued an official proclamation, inviting all citizens of that State to unite, on the Tuesday next following, in prayer and supplication to God for the restoration to health of the President.

3. Let us suppose that, in a certain important case pending before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Governor Hoyt should issue a proclamation calling upon his people to assemble at a specified time, and notify the Chief Justice of the manner in which they wish the case decided.

The three cases above mentioned, two real and one supposititious, resemble each other in one particular; namely, that in each of them Wisdom, having a specified matter officially in charge, is requested to decide it in the manner suggested by Ignorance.

Everybody admits that King Alphonso was conceited and presumptuous. Everybody would agree that a popular assembly could not intelligently instruct the Chief Justice on a point of law. How comes it that so many people, profoundly serious and in many respects intelligent, assume that Ignorance may appropriately make suggestions to Wisdom in the second of the cases above mentioned? C. K. W.

Ecce Spiritus is the title of an anonymous book to be published soon by George H. Ellis. It is an earnest plea for spirituality,—as typified and exemplified in the life of Jesus of Nazareth. The author makes the attempt to distinguish the essential and permanent elements of Christianity from the extraneous and ephemeral elements which characterize the religious systems passing currently under that name. How far he has succeeded in discovering the vital germ, each reader must judge for himself. The work is fresh and original, vigorous and suggestive.

PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH is described by a writer in the Christian Union as looking not unlike Mr. Spurgeon in his younger days, but he goes on to say: "Professor Smith is a smaller man than the great London preacher, and far more slightly built. But the dark hair, eyes, and complexion, the large mouth, the firmly set jaw, and resolute chin make the resemblance between the two real and striking. . . . Though not far from thirty-six, the Professor looks scarcely twenty. But, if one's eyes pronounce the man a boy, one's ears soon rectify the error. He speaks with great rapidity, but with an accuracy and elegance rarely heard. . . . At twenty-four, he was appointed to his professorship in the Seminary at Aberdeen. In ten years, he has not only made it one of the most eminent in Europe, but he has also, a combination of accomplishments exceedingly rare, taken rank among the half-dozen most accomplished speakers in Scotland, and is counted one of the most erudite scholars of his years in Great Britain."

THE Independent says: "Professor Robertson Smith's volume of lectures on 'The Old Testament in the Jewish Church' may be almost called, for the English-speaking world, epoch-making. We say for the English-speaking world; for on the Continent of Europe the method of criticism and the results reached are perfectly familiar, while in England and America they are known to but few. It is one of the sad illustrations of the slavery in which religious thinking has been kept by the stringent creeds of our churches that it has been only with bated breath and with terror of ecclesiastical consequences that our theological scholars have dared to consider the conclusions—or speculations, as we have preferred to call them—of French, German, and Dutch scholars. The result has been to produce a large school of absolutely dishonest apologetics, while for fearless and honest criticism we have unfortunately been compelled to go to that which has not been restrained by evangelical faith. This is harsh language, but we fear it is true."

It does great credit to the heart and religious convictions of Governor Hoyt that he is anxious to have a day of general prayer for the recovery of the President designated. We do not know but this should be accepted as evidence of an important change in the Governor since the issue of his Thanksgiving proclamation last autumn, when he became the target of orthodoxy all over the State for a certain sin of verbal omission. It is to be hoped, as the Governor's movement is having its desired result, that a general and formal petition to Divine Providence may do the President great good. After this is done, and the days pass, and the President is recovered, it might not be amiss to have a day of special prayer for Governor Hoyt. We make this remark in all earnestness and solemnity.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

MR. FLOWER, an English gentleman who travelled in this country in 1816, and was a guest of President Jefferson, gives the following description of the great American statesman: "Mr. Jefferson's figure was rather majestic,—tall (over six feet), thin, and rather high-shouldered; manners simple, kind, and courteous. His dress, in form and color, was quaint and old-fashioned, plain and neat. A dark pepper-and-salt coat, cut in the old Quaker fashion, with a single row of large metal buttons, knee-breeches, gray worsted stockings, shoes fastened by large metal buckles,—such was the appearance of Jefferson when I first made his acquaintance, in 1816. His two granddaughters (the Misses Randolph), well educated and accomplished young ladies, were staying with him at the time. The chief charm of the visit was in the evening conversations with Mr. Jefferson, who gave me the inside history of events, before only known to me, as to the world generally, in the published record or outside history, which is all that the public is generally allowed to see."

PETER GANON, the suicide, who died recently in the Roosevelt Hospital, left a letter, in which he said: "I think my mind is well balanced, and I have no fear of death. What little fear I did possess has been dissipated by the facts of Spiritualism. The mere act of dying is nothing to me, if there is not physical pain; and I think I know somewhat of the country to which I am going." In conclusion, he wrote: "What a beautiful evening! Just the time to die. So by your leave, gods, I will make another assault on the affections of that coy damsel, Death,—a thorough coquette, who forces her favors on those that do not want them, but ever flies from the ardent, earnest wooer. But I will court you in so bold a fashion this time you must yield. How one hates to inflict physical pain on one's self! It did not bother me a particle to inject and swallow morphine, but I do hate to slash into my arteries. Well, bye-bye old world, I believe I have had enough of you!"

ELISABETH, the young Queen of Roumania, who, it is said, speaks six languages and is a handsome and womanly woman, keeps an album in which she jots down her stray thoughts, some of which have been copied by a continental journalist. Here are a few extracts: "Life is an art in which too many remain only dilettantes. To become a master, one must pour out one's life-blood." "White hairs are the crests of foam which cover the sea after the tempest." "Sleep is a generous thief: he gives to vigor what he takes from time." "If you could throw as an alms, to those who would use it well, the time that you fritter away, how many beggars would become rich!" "Duty only frowns when you flee from it. Follow it, and it smiles upon you." "The world never forgives our talents our successes, our friends, nor our pleasures. It only forgives our death. Nay, it does not always pardon that."

STEPHEN S. FOSTER, whose work as an anti-slavery agitator and as an advocate of temperance and woman's rights is well known, died at Worcester, the 8th inst. Mr. Foster was born at Canterbury, N.H., Nov. 17, 1809, graduated at Dartmouth College 1838; and, although he afterward commenced the study of theology, he abandoned it to engage with Garrison, Phillips, and such men, in the great anti-slavery struggle. With his wife, Abby Kelly, a noted anti-slavery and woman's rights lecturer, whom he married in 1845, he travelled through the Northern and Western States, defending with great earnestness and power the most radical wing of the anti-slavery party. He wrote a work, which has been read by but few persons of this generation, entitled The Brotherhood of Thieves, a True Picture of the American Church and Clergy. He was mobbed several times for his utterances, and it is stated that the coolness with which he could face a mob was remarkable. The following humorous description of Mr. Foster is from the pen of James Russell Lowell:—

"Hard by, as calm as summer even,
Smiles the reviled and pelted Stephen,
The unappeasable Boanerges
To all the churches and the clergies;
The grim savant, who, to complete
His own peculiar cabinet,
Contrived to label with his kicks
One from the followers of Elias Hicks;
Who studied mineralogy,
Not with soft book upon the knee,
But learned the properties of stones
By contact sharp of flesh and bones,
And made the experimentum crucis
With his own body's vital juices;
A man with caoutchouc endurance,
A perfect gem for life insurance;
A kind of maddened John the Baptist,
To whom the harshest word comes aptest,
Who, struck by stone or brick ill starred,
Hurls back an epithet as hard,
Which, deadlier than stone or brick,
Has a propensity to stick.
His oratory is like the scream
Of the iron horse's frenzied steam,
Which warns the world to leave a space
For the black engine's swerveless race."

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

EVOLUTION AND PROGRESS. An Exposition and Defence. By Rev. William I. Gill, A.M., of Newark Conference, N.J. The first volume of the International Prize Series. Third edition. New York: The Author's Publishing Co.

This work, originally published in 1875, is a remarkable production and well worth reading. Its author was arraigned before the Methodist Conference, some of whose members censured him severely, and were opposed to "sending forth a minister to preach a gospel which his book utterly destroys." Mr. Gill told his brethren "if they did not like the book they could reject it. He did not believe it was the business of the Conference to pass judgment as to what were the truths of science. His book was written according to new ideas which have been evolved, and he said that to-day the evolutionists have the advantage philosophically over the Church." He was still permitted to preach; but he has since learned that the Methodist Church has methods without expelling him to punish a minister for courageous, independent thinking and writing.

"The object of this volume," the author says, "is first to show to the orthodox that they stand on slippery places, that their philosophy and logic afford them no legitimate aid and comfort; second, to show to the quasi-evolutionists that there is no medium between a-theism and non-theism and the rejection of their own principles of science and philosophy; third, to show to the thorough naturalistic evolutionist that there is at least one man among the orthodox who thoroughly understands them,—knows them better even than they know themselves,—and who grants them all their principles, better expounded, and admits their legitimate principle; and, fourth, that therefore the author must accept not only these principles, but also these consequences, unless he can furnish a new philosophy which shall use these acknowledged principles in combination with others, and thus attain other or rather higher results. This the author believes to be possible, and that he is called to attempt it."

Some conception of the scope, aim, and views of the author may be formed from the following headings of chapters and sections:—

"No Bridge between Ego and non-Ego, nor between the Internal and External," "Matter known only as Force," "Motion and Succession refute Inertia," "Unity of Power precludes Duality of Matter and Spirit," "Miracles must be rejected," "Inference that Man is evolved from the Brute," "That Life had a Natural Origin only," "That Nature is Eternal and Self-existent," "A Personal God must be proved, not assumed," "Natural Phenomena cannot prove this," "So far as we can know, Miracles are Impossible," "The Senses cannot prove a Miracle," "Much less can the Testimonies of Others prove a Miracle," "No Proof that Nature had a Beginning," "No Proof of Design in Nature," "Futility of Teleology against Evolution," "Evolution makes nothing Fortuitous or Insignificant," "Evolution and Involution the widest of known Laws."

"Evolution," says Mr. Gill (page 131), "has swallowed up all the old and standard arguments of Theism, as the rod-serpent of Moses devoured those of the Egyptian magicians. We may attempt the overthrow of evolution either by assailing its fundamental principle, or by an attempt to prove facts which are incompatible with evolution. The fundamental principle of evolution is the law of natural causation. This law can no longer be disputed. . . . Evolution must therefore stand, unless we can rebut it by other principles and facts equally indisputable and of paramount authority."

Our author narrows down all the proofs of supernaturalism to the province of our moral powers, nor can one reasonably infer from the work that he is very confident they are to be found even there.

"If there is anything in our moral powers and judgments," he says, "which is supernatural, and if this supernatural is clearly incompatible with evolution, it will confute and supersede evolution so far as this incompatibility extends. But where is this supernatural moral element? The assertion of it is of no force against those who declare that they are unconscious of it; and these, to say the least, are vastly in the majority in the ranks of both philosophy and science, as well as in theology." (Page 132.)

Let it be shown that "the will is really a supernatural power, superior to all natural force, and in its action entirely independent of the law and the force of natural causation, then we shall have a basis on which to build a system of supernaturalism in opposition to naturalistic evolution."

But Mr. Gill sees clearly enough that while he has, to his own satisfaction at least, completely refuted all the ordinary orthodox arguments in favor of a Deity, men will be slow to accept or to be restricted to the arguments which he but barely suggests; for he says: "Those who proclaim most loudly the freedom of the will are by no means clear that the will is strictly and fully a supernatural power; and nothing less than this will save them. . . . A large proportion of the orthodox and some of the first-class in mental power and culture, like Dr. McCosh, not only admit, but earnestly maintain, as of very great importance, that the law of cause and effect holds in relation to the will as really and as certainly as in any other relation." "Evolutionists," Mr. Gill generously remarks, "may leave the latter [supernatural force] to take care of itself till the orthodox are agreed among themselves on the question," and by implication until that time there is no evidence that will bear examination fit to be presented in favor of supernaturalism.

The real strength and value of Evolution and Progress consist in the boldness and acuteness of its reasonings in defence of evolution. The common objections to the theory are met with much ingenuity, and the work is a strong defence of naturalism. The argument and tendency of the work are wholly against every form and phase of supernaturalism; and, but for a few paragraphs it contains, the reader would regard the author as thoroughly atheistic. The wonder is that he was not expelled from the Methodist Conference.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MANTON MARBLE talks of returning to journalism.

MR. TENNYSON has just passed his seventy-second birthday.

It is said that Mr. Froude is soon to be elevated to the Peerage.

THE King of Sweden has just finished a drama, The Castle of Kronborg.

PAUL DU CHAILLU, the noted traveller, is hunting in Kansas and the territories.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY's History of our Own Times has been translated into French.

PROF. HENRY DRAPER, the astronomer, is about to start on a hunting expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

MR. WATTERSON, of Louisville, says Dr. Loring "is inimical to the interests of agricultural communities."

MR. FREEMAN, the historian, will sail for this country on the 27th of September, and will deliver his first lecture in Boston.

LEE & SHEPARD have in press and will issue in November a book by Col. T. W. Higginson, entitled Common Sense about Woman.

MISS ABBY F. GOODSSELL has accepted the position of lady principal of Vassar College. She is the first graduate of the college who has reached a place in the faculty.

THE Army and Navy Journal says that General McDowell is so abstemious that he not only never drank a glass of spirituous liquor, but refrains from tea and coffee even.

ASKED what he thought of the Irish Land Bill, a cynical ministerialist replied, "It is like the Athanasian creed: we all believe in it, though we do not understand it."

IN a debate at the Social Science Convention at Saratoga, E. Emory Aldrich, of Worcester, advocated a prohibitory law, Rev. Leonard Bacon advocated a license law.

MEN like Senator Sessions, says the Atlanta Constitution, make religious convocations suspicious, not because of peculiar habits, but because of sandwiching poker-playing and bribery with Bible-reading and psalms.

"AMONG THE AMERICANS" is the title under which Mr. George Jacob Holyoake has put together an interesting volume of his experiences here, published by Belford, Clarke & Co., Chicago, in handsome form.

REV. C. A. BARTOL is reported as speaking of the late Father Taylor as "worthy of intellectual mention with Choate or Webster at the bar, or Emerson or Hawthorne in literature, or Allston or Hunt in art." This is wild talk.

REV. DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, has been convicted in a church tribunal of heresy, and now his case goes to the general conference for trial. It is believed the conference will sustain the judgment of Dr. Thomas' accusers. He belongs properly outside the Methodist Church.

THE present Marquis of Queensberry has apparently all his distinguished predecessor's fondness for a "mill," and subscribed $250 toward the Bradlaugh fund, whereupon the Prince of Wales has cut him. Yet, of the two, prince and republican, Bradlaugh has led the cleaner life, and does.—Springfield Republican.

THE author of Josiah Allen's Wife, My Opinions and Betsey Bobbit's, etc., is Miss Marietta Holly, a much younger lady than her writings would lead any one to believe. She is described as being of medium size, with dark brown hair which is combed low on her brow, beautiful and expressive black eyes, and a sweet and benevolent expression of face.

LOTTA, the charming actress who has given pleasure to so many thousands by her piquant and bewitching ways, has spent the summer at Lake George, in a cottage built by Robert Dale Owen for his own use. It is situated on a hillside sloping down to the edge of the lake, where there is a tiny pier from whence Lotta starts on her frequent rowing expeditions.

REV. SAMUEL SEABURY, father of the first Protestant Episcopal bishop of the United States, records in his diary for 1768 how "the ticket, number 5856, by the blessing of God, in the Light-house and Public Lottery of New York," netted him £425, "for which I now record to my posterity my thanks and praise to Almighty God the giver of all good gifts. Amen!"

THE London Standard has announced the death of Dr. Tanner at Amsterdam. Dr. Tanner writes the Pittsburgh Despatch from Corry, Pa.: "The London Standard is no doubt good authority for the statement of my decease. I, therefore, am forced to the conclusion that the Dr. Tanner now practising in Jamestown and Corry is the materialized spirit of the man who died in Amsterdam."

JOHN WISE, a laborer, while excavating for a tunnel at West Point, N.Y., was partly buried beneath a land slide. His fellow-laborers tried to save him; but, looking up and seeing more of the tunnel about to fall, the noble fellow shouted: "You can't save me, boys. Run to save yourselves." They fled, while he hid his face in his hands, and in a moment he was buried beneath the ruins.

NEWMAN HALL, referring to the visit of Moody and Sankey to London, says some of their meetings were held in his church; and yet out of a membership of thirteen hundred there are not three who are the fruit of that mission. He says it may not be wise sweepingly to say, "I don't believe in revivals," but adds, "It is perilous foolishness to trust to them as a means of increasing the membership of the church."

MANY a common laborer, says the Sun, living from hand to mouth on his daily earnings, possesses the priceless treasure of a wife just as devoted as Mrs. Garfield; while it is fortunate that the conspicuous example of a President's wife has brought these common but high qualities of American women so prominently before the world. The Philadelphia Record says: "Certainly, Mrs. Garfield is a good wife. The country is full of good wives, thank Heaven!"

A REV. MOSES KELLEY slapped the face of one Foster Harvey for using insulting language in regard to the President. A subscription of five dollars was raised, and sent to the minister to reimburse him for the amount he was fined. He sent a note in reply, saying he was deeply touched by the expression of the donors and cheerfully accepting the money. But immediately afterward he issued a card, saying of the man whose face he slapped that "on review I believe he did not use such language." What is to be done next?

HON. WARREN CHASE, of California, in a recent lecture at Paine Hall, maintained that there is but one substance, that what is called the soul or mind is matter in an attenuated condition, that the forms of mind-matter are subject to change the same as those of gross matter, and that, although man survives the ordeal of the physical death we witness, there is no assurance that he will be exempt from a succession of deaths in the future.

THIS is the way Miss Fanny Parnell pays her respects to Gladstone, Forster, Bright, and the Land Bill:—

Tear up the parchment Lie!

You, Gladstone, sunk supine to quivering slush,—

You, Forster, with the seal of Cain in breast and eye,—

You, Bright, whose slopping tongue can gloss and gush—

You, puppet-brood, the lesser legislative fry;—

A people's might your bungled work shall crush,

A people's wrath your grinning cozenage defy.

We will not yield, we will not starve, we will not fly,—

Tear up your parchment Lie!

This time, we'll neither crouch nor die.

FOREIGN.

CRIME in Italy is less frequent this year than last. In Germany, it is more frequent.

THE London Times demands the disbandment of the Egyptian army, and the military occupation of Egypt by France and England jointly.

MR. DICKSON, the ministerial candidate, has been elected in Tyrone. Mr. Dickson's election is an extraordinary triumph for the Government.

A TOTAL of fifty-six thousand spindles, out of two million one hundred thousand, have been stopped by the strike of cotton operatives in England.

THE London Economist says that the small German landholder is pushed almost to the wall, and hints that some day he will make a struggle as desperate as that in Ireland.

REPORTS seem to confirm the opinion that at the conference at Dantzig the Czar of Russia and the German Emperor were to make some mutual arrangement for combating socialism.

A CONFLICT between the police and people took place at Limerick last week, caused by soldiers making offensive remarks about the Pope. Fifteen were wounded, some seriously.

BRADLAUGH has issued a manifesto to the English people, announcing his intention to go to the House of Commons again at the next session of Parliament, and asks them to protect him against unlawful violence.

CHERIF KASHA, whom the mutinous troops at Cairo demanded should be made Prime Minister, absolutely refuses to take office as the nominee of the army, but is willing to act as intermediary between the Khedive and the malcontents.

IN proportion to their numbers, eight times more Jews than Christians attend the upper schools in Prussia. One-eighth of the university students in Austria are Jews, though their proportion to the general population is very much smaller.

THE "Jeannette," in the opinion of Mr. W. L. Howard, who was sent to Iceland on an exploring expedition by the United States Government last year, was caught in the ice; but it is possible that the crew took to quarters. Last winter was a very severe one in the polar regions.

THE demi-monde of Paris in the future will be excluded from the amphitheatre seats at the opera, where, by their manner and conversation, there has lately been grievous affliction to the American and English tourists, who at this season constitute the chief part of the audience.

THE Berlin correspondent of the Times says: "The issue of the Nihilist newspaper, Will of the People, is convincing proof that during the summer the Nihilists quietly carry on the propaganda in the interior, and only recommence their activity in winter. There seems, therefore, no doubt that the coming winter will bring more plots and panics in spite of the success of the authorities in arresting them and in unearthing secret presses."

A LONDON paper says: "The evictions on the Mitchelstown estate were resumed last week. The sheriff was assisted by a force of cavalry and infantry amounting to over three hundred and fifty men. Miss Anna Parnell was also on the scene, according to her own statement, to look after the interests of the tenants. What she did was to run to each house before the sheriff, and to warn the tenants to retire or barricade their doors. The part she took was so mischievous that the resident magistrate was compelled to order the police to exclude her from accompanying the expedition."

JESTINGS.

A LOVER of King James' English calls it the "reversed edition of the New Testament."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: "Annie, what must we do to be forgiven?" ANNIE: "We must sin."

"YOUNG man, is your father a believer in spirits?" asked a teacher of one of her scholars. The boy simply answered, "Gnome."

"JUDGE, what is the best substitute for wisdom?" asked a loquacious lawyer. "Suppose you try silence," responded the judge.

AMATEUR ARTIST, painting a bunch of apple-blossoms, to small boy, looking on: "Well, Tommy, do you know what they are?" Small boy, with absolute certainty in his tones: "Yes, marm. Hens."

A YOUNG LADY TO AN ORTHODOX OLD LADY: "I declare, you are a dreadful fanatic, Mrs. McCizzen. I do believe you think that no one but you and your minister will be saved!" Old lady: "Aweel, my dear, ah whiles hae my doots about the meenister."

SARATOGA is famous as a place for unexpected meetings of old friends. Two venerable clergymen came upon each other in Congress Park the other morning. "You old sinner!" cried the eccentric but excellent Dr. Magoon, of Philadelphia. "My dear brother," responded the affable Dr. Burchard, of New York.

MILDMAY has never been in the habit of punishing his children, leaving that disagreeable duty to his wife; but the other day one of his numerous progeny became very unruly, and he was obliged to say, "Flora, if you don't keep quiet, I shall have to whip you." "Pooh!" retorted little three-years-old, with a contemptuous toss of her dainty head, "you ain't the mother."

A LITTLE girl who saw a balloon for the first time on the Fourth of July was much astonished to find that it remained in the air, and plied her nurse with all kinds of questions. None of the answers, however, seemed to satisfy her; and the statement that it floated because it was filled with gas she treated with the utmost infantile disdain. "No, Anna," she said, with a sedate Sunday-school expression on her young brows, "it is kept up there by the poweration of God."

"ONE evening," says Wm. Howie Wylie, "at a small literary gathering, a lady, famous for her 'muslin theology,' was bewailing the wickedness of the Jews in not receiving our Saviour, and ended her diatribe by expressing regret that he had not appeared in our own time. "How delighted," said she, "we should all be to throw our doors open to him, and listen to his divine precepts. Don't you think so, Mr. Carlyle?" Thus appealed to, he replied: "No, madam, I don't. I think that, had he come very fashionably dressed, with plenty of money, and preaching doctrines palatable to the higher orders, I might have had the honor of receiving from you a card of invitation, on the back of which would be written, 'To meet our Saviour'; but if he had come uttering his sublime precepts, and denouncing the Pharisees, and associating with the Publicans and lower orders, as he did, you would have treated him much as the Jews did, and have cried out, 'Take him to Newgate and hang him.'"

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. Freedom and Fellowship in Religion.

A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keahub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion"; and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

HE who knows truth knows the Divinity, and this will enable him to slay all evil lusts.—Hindu.

A GOOD conscience fears no witnesses, but a guilty conscience is solicitous even in solitude. If we do nothing but what is honest, let all the world know it; but, if otherwise, what does it signify to have nobody else know it, so long as I know it myself? Miserable is he who slights that witness.—Seneca.

If reason justly contradicts an article, it is not of the household of faith.—Jeremy Taylor.

WHAT man, in his right mind, would conspire his own hurt? Men are beside themselves when they transgress against their convictions.—William Penn.

SINCERITY is the indispensable ground of all conscientiousness, and by consequence of all heartfelt religion.—Kant.

NECESSITY is cruel, but it is the only test of inward strength. Every fool may live according to his own likings.—Goethe.

THE basest thought possible concerning man is that he has no spiritual nature; and the foolishlest misunderstanding of him possible is that he has, or should have, no animal nature. For his nature is nobly animal, nobly spiritual,—coherently and irrevocably so: neither part of it may, but at its peril, expel, despise, or defy the other.—Ruskin.

TO-day is a king in disguise. To-day always looks mean to the thoughtless, in the face of a uniform experience that all good and great and happy actions are made up precisely of these blank to-days. Let us not be so deceived. Let us unmask the king as he passes. Let us not inhabit times of wonderful and various promise without divining their tendency. Let us not see the foundations of nations, and of a new and better order of things, laid with roving eyes and an attention preoccupied with trifles.—Emerson.

TO REDEEM a world sunk in dishonesty has not been given thee. Solely over one man therein thou hast quite absolute control. Him redeem, him make honest.—Carlyle.

GREAT deeds are great legacies, which work with wondrous usury.—Samuel Smiles.

HAPPINESS in this world, when it comes, comes incidentally. Make it the object of pursuit, and it leads us a wild-goose chase and is never attained.—Hawthorne.

NOTHING really succeeds which is not based on reality: sham, in a large sense, is never successful. In the life of the individual, as in the more comprehensive life of the State, pretension is nothing and power is everything.—E. P. Whipple.

WE must admit that although high intellect would lead us inevitably to high and pure morality, and to most scrupulously beautiful conduct in everything toward men, toward women, toward even the lower and lowest animals, still it does not lead us to that belief in the otherwise unbelievable, or to that detailed cultus which is meant by religion in the universally accepted sense.—P. G. Hamerton.

I, too, rest in faith
That man's perfection is the crowning flower,
Toward which the urgent sap in life's great tree
Is pressing,—seen in puny blossoms now,
But in the world's great morrow to expand
With broadest petal and with deepest glow.
—George Eliot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AN Ecumenical Council of all the branches of the Methodist Church is being held in London.

THE first number of the Free Trade Bulletin, published by the New York Free Trade Club, has just been issued.

HOW VAST is the politico-social problem which Great Britain has to solve is indicated by the fact that one in every nine of her population is a pauper.

SINCE the passage of the Land Bill by the British Parliament, Mr. Parnell and his followers have advanced to new demands. They now agitate for national self-government for Ireland and the abolition of landlordism.

WHEN religion becomes free, what is it to do? is a question which not a few people are now asking. If it is the genuine article, it will set to work in some way for human elevation and improvement. That it may do this more effectively is the object of its becoming free.

FRANCE does not find it so easy to keep her foothold in Tunis as it was to get it. The task is requiring more soldiers and money than was dreamed of, and the question is beginning to be asked in Paris whether the glory is going to be worth the cost. There appear some symptoms, moreover, of a general Mohammedan uprising in Northern Africa against farther Christian invasions.

THE Supreme Court of Minnesota has just given a decision in the interest of sound morality as well as sound law. It has decided that the constitutional amendment of that State under which the Railroad Debt of the State was repudiated is null and void, because in conflict with the United States Constitution, which forbids the passage of any State law impairing the obligation of contracts. This is a decision which should be applied in other States.

WHEN Dean Stanley left his professorship at Oxford to become Dean of Westminster Abbey, in his farewell address to the young men who had sat under his teachings, he gave them this charge: "Be as free, be as liberal, be as courageous as you will, but be religious because you are liberal; be pure because you are bold; cast away the works of darkness because you are the children of light; be humble and considerate and forbearing, because you are charged with hopes as grand as were ever committed to the rising generation of any church or of any country." These are noble words, which, with hardly a change, might well be taken to heart by the class of people specially called Liberals both in this country and England.

THE Unitarian Ministers' Institute to be held at Princeton, Mass., October 3 to 7, presents a programme liberal in breadth and attractive in variety; that is, judging by the names of the speakers, for we have yet seen no announcement of the topics. Dr. Bellows is to give an introductory discourse on Monday evening, the 3d. On the following days there are to be essays by Professor Henry James, Mr. John Fiske, Professor Crawford A. Toy, Professor Geo. L. Cary, Dr. Hedge, Dr. Rufus Ellis, Rev. J. H. Allen, Rev. R. Heber Newton, and Edward Atkinson, Esq. The Ministers' Institute may fairly be considered one of the effects of the Free Religious movement on Unitarianism. It seems to have been established to meet the demand of the spirit of freedom in the progressive portion of the denomination, which the National Conference denied.

ONE of the latest criticisms of the Free Religious Association coming to our notice is that it retains very few of the speakers, whom people were accustomed and delighted to hear at its early conventions. This may balance the criticism that was made after the Association had been in existence some half dozen years; namely, that the same old stagers were brought out on the platform every year. But, really, does not this latest critic set up a standard altogether too severe? We know of no society which holds the secret of a remedy against the ravages of age, disease, and death among its members and speakers. Fourteen years have brought their inevitable changes on the platform of the Free Religious Association. But one of the specially encouraging features in the present condition of the Association is that younger men and women, with fresh zeal and ability, are coming forward to take the places of the departed and the disabled.

FREE Religion is older than the Free Religious Association. It is easy to say when the Free Religious Association began. It is not so easy to say when Free Religion began. In Christendom, the seeds of Free Religion began to germinate when the Renaissance era appeared, followed closely by its most important result, the Protestant Reformation. The Renaissance was the awakening of the human intellect to a perception of its own rights and powers in the search for truth, and this awakening soon brought on an inevitable conflict between the human mind and the traditional authority of the Church. The Protestant Reformation, though itself the result of the principle of mental liberty, did not achieve the full triumph of that principle, nor indeed comprehend it. Hence the contest between mental liberty and some species of church authority has gone on from that day to this. The battles have been marked by successive protests and secessions, followed generally by new sectarian encampments, with new though looser bonds. At last, the Free Religious Association came, with a proclamation meant to be broad enough to cover all the mental demands, not merely of Christian or Jewish or Mohammedan or Buddhist liberty, but of universal human liberty.

For the Free Religious Index.

THE PERSONALITY OF GOD.

A Lecture delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture at Chickering Hall, N.Y., March 13, 1881.

BY FELIX ADLER, Ph.D.

In attempting a brief discussion of the question of the personality of Deity, it behooves us first to determine what we are to understand by the word personal. Individuality does not yet imply personality. A stone or a bar of iron may possess properties peculiar to itself and sufficient to distinguish it from any other object of the same class, yet because it is individual it is not therefore personal. Animals again are often endowed with elaborate instincts, armed with a certain degree of foresight, capable of feelings of pity and attachment, and the marks of individuality are thus both numerous and complex; and yet there is not one among the lower animals on whom the dignifying appellation of person can properly be bestowed. Even among human beings, not every one is as much a person as others are; and, though in general we attribute personality to all men and women, yet some are in a very limited sense persons, while others are very grandly persons. The slaves of passion and the parrots of opinion, the hooting mob on the streets, the "voting cattle" at the polls, are for the time being destitute of personality. The mark of personality, then, is to be found in the conscious guidance of actions according to law. All action, indeed, is according to law. It is impossible to act contrary to the laws of the world. The stone that strikes us as we walk along the streets, the brute that hunts its prey in the wood, the white ant that builds its palaces in the sand hill, the faithful dog that leaps into the water to clutch a drowning lad, all act according to law; but they act blindly. Man alone can attain consciousness of the law by which he acts; and only in so far as we rise to this consciousness, only in so far as we make the consciousness of the law the determining ground of our action, have we real personality, only in so far have we a right to claim admittance to the community of persons.

The question, therefore, whether there exists a personal God, is identical with the question whether there is a conscious intelligence at the heart of the universe. Now, in the first place, we might say as others have said: Let the brain of the world be pointed out to us before we will believe in a supreme intelligence of the world. For it must be conceded that consciousness never appears, so far as we know, save only in connection with material phenomena in a brain. The only instance of developed intelligence outside of ourselves whereof we have any knowledge is found in the case of human beings like ourselves. The only instance of incomplete intelligence of which we know is found in the case of animals, and these also have brains. And many persons are content to rest the case here, and say: We need inquire no further. Show us first the world-brain, search the stellar depths with a view to discovering its whereabouts, bring us back authentic reports of your discovery, and we may then begin to believe in the existence of a world-mind. Nor would this position be otherwise than simply impregnable, if it were true that mind is connected with matter as an effect with its cause. If mental action were a function of the brain in the same sense that the secretion of fluids is the function of certain glands, then should we be justified in asserting that mind and matter cannot even be conceived of as separable. But the relation between matter and mind is in no wise a causal relation. Some of the most eminent scientific investigators of our time, men wholly free from theological bias and free also from the suspicion of metaphysical prepossession, have distinctly affirmed that the proposition that mind is the effect of matter is not only not proved, but not provable. True the relation between matter and mind within the field of experience is one of concomitance; but it is not a causal relation, and upon this difference the whole argument hinges. The two things certain are: first, that matter does not explain mind; secondly, that mental action has never been discovered independent of its material parallel, so far as our knowledge extends.

We have at various times used the words "so far as we know"; and it now behooves us to remind our hearers of the essential significance of this important qualification. For, if we will only remember that our knowledge does not by any means cover the whole field of the knowable, the fact that, so far as we know, intelligence and brain always exist together, a causal relation between them being set aside, does not at all involve the conclusion that they must of necessity exist together. It follows that the existence of mind independently of a brain, if not conceivable, is at least thinkable. It follows that there may be intellectual beings on distant planets or stars, whose intellects act through material organs totally different from ours. It follows finally that there may be an intelligence at the heart of the universe of whose instrumentalities of action, it is true, we can form no conception, of whose conditions of existence we can render no definition, but whose bare possibility is none the less indisputable. But, in order that this merely negative possibility of the existence of a conscious intelligence of the universe should have any value whatsoever, it must be shown that there is some positive reason for assuming it. We now advance to a farther stage of our discussion, and will touch briefly upon the reason popularly alleged for converting this bare possibility into a moral certainty.*

The theologian lifts up his voice, and says: There is such a reason. The marks of design in nature allow of no other interpretation but that there is an intelligence at work which has caused these adaptations of means to ends. But the theory of Darwin has overthrown the argument from design in this familiar and ancient form. These successful adaptations, which we so much admire in nature, do not really resemble the purposeful action of intelligence, working directly and deliberately toward its ends, but appear to be rather the final fortunate outcome after countless tentative efforts, after countless miserable failures. Professor Lange, in his History of Materialism, has compared nature's method in evolution to that of a man who should go out upon a wide plain with the intention of hitting a certain mark, and behold he takes his gun and shoots up and down, right and left, millions of shots in every conceivable direction, and finally he hits also his aim. Or suppose that a man, wishing to enter a room which is locked, were to purchase ten thousand keys of all sizes, and were to try them all indiscriminately, hoping to come at last upon the right one, that would illustrate the method of nature in obtaining her ends. Or again, if a man desired to build him a house, and in order to get what he wanted would first build a whole city and then leave all the superfluous houses to go to rot and ruin under the action of the elements, in order to retain the one house which he desired, that would show the manner in which nature goes toward the achievement of her aims. For so we see that millions of seeds are sacrificed by nature, in order that one may take root and become a plant; that, for every one animal that lives, nature destroys countless others, for which she has no use; that she even sweeps away whole types of existence, in order to make way for the few that survive. Nay, the enormous annual slaughter of children, the sinking and perishing of multitudes who are unfit to maintain themselves in the struggle for existence, show that the same terribly clumsy process—as it must appear to us—obtains in the human world also as well as among the lower orders of existence. And thus it has come about that the purposefulness of nature is denied altogether; and it is said, There is naught but cause and effect in the material world, and, out of the multitude of possible existences which the flood of cause and effect casts up, those which are capable of adapting themselves to their environment live, the others are wiped out. And it is said, moreover, that it is better to suppose that there is no intelligence in the substance of things than to suppose that there is such an intelligence as the facts appear to exhibit to us. For twofold are the charges against the method of nature, the enormous waste which it involves and the unspeakable pain to sentient beings implied in that waste.

And yet, if we turn from the method itself and regard the results reached by it, we cannot help being impressed by the grandeur of these results. The form of the crystal itself is beautiful, no matter how many atoms were requisite to its production. The rose is beautiful, no matter how many seeds perished before this one flower found the conditions under which it could bloom. The sweet anemones, the white lilies,

* We pass by for the present the metaphysical arguments for existence of God, which we have discussed and rejected on a former occasion in the discourse on Atheism, and shall confine ourselves to the empirical argument.

the violet, stir the chords of pleasure within us, no matter on what substratum of destruction they may rise. The mystery of the growth of plants, the complicated mechanism of organic life in animals, not to speak of the mightier harmonies of law that are visible in the motion of the celestial bodies, carry us irresistibly along in a strain of admiration and praise. But most admirable of all things in nature, and most unfathomable too, are we unto ourselves. That such a being as man and his sweet partner, woman, should have been born out of the whirlpool of the universal atoms, that this intelligence, this spirituality of ours should have come out of things, must "give us pause." And so the more we dwell upon the results achieved in the course of evolution, the more do we become convinced that the category of cause and effect is insufficient to explain the universe, and that there must be, in the nature of things, something more than the blind movement of atoms, stirring hither and thither according to the winds of chance: that there must have been prearranged, before time was, the possibility that atoms should arrange themselves in the beautiful form of the crystal, the possibility that certain atoms, no matter after how many failures, should come together in the shape of a bird, the possibility that stars and suns should roll through the immensities, the possibility that at last the atoms should come together in a human brain and in a human heart, and that, as Venus was said of old to have arisen out of the deep, so out of the grim profounds of being the moral nature should arise, and the mystery of soul begin to unfold itself. The evolutionist of the dogmatic kind asserts that the casting up of a variety capable of adaptation explains everything, but he forgets that the appearance of a variety capable of adaptation requires to be explained; and not this only, but we perceive also that the victorious forms of life follow one another in an ascending scale, that higher forms succeed to lower, that there is a progressive development from the less perfect to the more perfect, that there is a growing, though never complete, congruity between the results brought about by adaptation to environment and the scheme of systematization laid down independently in the human reason.

Now, I grant that this fact of progress cannot, in the strict sense, be proved from experience. Whether the forward movement which we observe is more than temporary, who will prove? Whether the present world, taken as a whole, is an improvement, compared with others that may have preceded it, who will demonstrate? Whether, after the solar system shall have become extinct, a higher state of existence will follow in new systems that may rise from out the wreck of this present one, who will undertake to show? And yet the idea of progress involves for us a certainty. World progress is a moral demand, hence its certainty. It can never be wholly proved from experience; but, having imported its certainty from a totally different sphere,* we are now permitted to read the facts of experience in the light of that certainty, and to interpret them as parts of that progress whose universality we are sure of on other grounds. Thus, the forward movement, which we observe in nature and in history, is authoritatively pronounced more than temporary, and a significance is attributed to it far vaster than the meagre facts of induction would warrant.

The result of all our investigations seems, therefore, to be somewhat as follows: The method by which nature compasses her ends appears to be inferior to the best human methods; the results which she achieves are valuable in the extreme, and moreover exhibit a tendency to become more and more valuable as time proceeds. It is evident that the first of these results is out of accord with the second, and that clumsiness and hurtfulness of method are inconsistent with an intelligence capable of devising and, as must be supposed, of achieving the sublime ends of universal progress.

But here we are earnestly warned to give attention to a consideration which is designed to be decisive in settling our views in this most profound of all problems. We are to remember the constitutional deficiency of the human understanding, and give all the weight to that thought which belongs to it. We are to reflect with all seriousness that, if the world seems all wrong to our speculating minds, perhaps it is not the world that is at fault, but our own mind, in whose inadequacy the cause of the distorted image of things is to be found, just as an observer, who regards a landscape through an imperfect lens, may truly declare that the image which he sees is utterly out of proportion, while the cause of the defect is to be found, not in the landscape itself, but in the medium through which it is viewed.

And absolutely beyond dispute it is that our minds are incapable of grasping the ultimate truth, of seeing the relations of things as they really are. Even in studying the works of great human thinkers, we sometimes find that we are unable to follow the argument, not because it is unreasonable, but because it is too reasonable, as it were; because our intellects are too feeble to follow the sustained and complicated lines of the thought. Shall we not, then, assume that the great argument, which is being written out in the universe before our eyes, is also not fully understood by us, not because it is unreasonable, but because it contains a deeper reason than we wot of. Nay, this is not only a position which it is open for us to assume; but, if the dictates of morality have any meaning, it is a view which we are morally compelled to take. Plainly, what we call our experience of the world is only a fragment torn from an immense book, and the great world with all its infinite possibilities lies beyond. In that fragment which we know, we find much that is beautiful and noble, much also that seems to us incoherent and irrational. It is for us to remember that the text we have before us is torn out of its context, and to deepen in ourselves the conviction that much that is now unexplained and that seems against reason would find, not only an explanation, but a great explanation, if the connection were known in which it properly stands.

As to the power, which is behind all these appearances of things, the ultimate reality itself, out of which is growing the harmony of the world, it seems to me inadmissible to speak of it as conscious intelligence. The terms "consciousness," "intelligence," and "will," have a meaning only when used with reference to the discursive minds of men or of other sense-bound creatures like ourselves. Carried beyond that sphere, they are mere ideas of whose corresponding reality we know nothing. It has been said, indeed, that the underlying basis of all reality must, at least, embrace intelligence within itself, since intelligence has come out of it. But this is saying very little of it. Rather let us say that it must be so infinitely greater than anything which we understand by conscious intelligence that these words prove totally inadequate to describe it. Nor is it necessary that we should have a name and label for the highest. The name of the most awful and supreme sanctity is too much on men's lips. It has become a hollow form, a tinkling bell by which hypocrisy vends its wares. Let us agree to feel more what it implies, to speak of it less; to act it more, to parade it less. Let the courageous heart of man turn to the divine order that is working upward in the world, and see in this the token of an ulterior light, of which even intelligence and will are only the reflected rays, and not the light itself. Let us return to the practice of an older religion, which preserved the name of supreme sanctity unutterable, and which, when it spoke of the highest at all, named it by a name which simply means, "It is." It is! There is a highest! Let us do honor to that confession of faith in our deeds!

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF THE CONCORD SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

"A School of Philosophy at Concord," rather than 'The Concord School of Philosophy,' please remember," said Mr. Alcott, the dean of the school.

This is well. No particular system of philosophical doctrines is taught there. Probably, no two of the lecturers hold precisely the same scheme of the universe. There are certain general principles, no doubt, in which they would all agree. All would affirm, perhaps, a Supreme Mind as the ultimate principle, something transcendent in man, and immortality. The spirit of the school is indeed one, but intellectually it is many.

I attended all the lectures and conversations of the school for four consecutive weeks, and have since read the published abstracts of the remaining lectures. I should say that it seems to be the object of the school to stimulate philosophic thought and to proclaim no finalities. Said Mr. Alcott, in opening one of his lectures, "This School of Philosophy deems itself in sympathy with the best thought of all times." And, again, "We will hear the agnostic, if he will keep his temper." Said Dr. Jones: "The object of philosophy is not to give us rounded marbles or balls to be put in our pockets and carried away. Such philosophers will never appear in the world. He is the greatest thinker who moves to thought." And, again, "To find the logic of the universe is the problem of all philosophy." The school cannot be said to be in any sense dogmatic or exclusive. But, in its drift, it is positively, emphatically, anti-materialistic. In my judgment, the one feature lacking to make this School of Philosophy complete was some such lecturer or lecturers as John Fiske. And some such comprehensive School of Philosophy is needed in our time.

The Concord School of Philosophy is a tentative movement in the right direction. And why should not passing the weeks of vacation and rest in retreats of thought and culture, where one need only listen or participate in interesting conversations, be as recreative as rounds of fashionable pleasure or absolute idleness? Is not rest attained by change rather than by inaction? The horse relieved of the collar and turned into clover continues to exert himself, but he recuperates. At Concord, we were turned into clover.

If the lecturers at Concord ever studied elocution, no visible traces of the study have been left on their delivery. One had to screw his mind down to the most undivided attention to follow the readers, and had to elicit their meaning himself. But monotony of tone, acting like a constant opiate on the senses, was partly counteracted by mosquitoes and by the sensible "effigy" of an uneasy member of the faculty always going out and coming in during each lecture, whispering to one or more persons on the way, and occasionally distributing newspapers. Even the lofty Emerson when present, as he followed this "effigy" with his eye, was awakened a little, and recalled, I fancy, a fragment of Dr. Jones' philosophy,—"We only see a manifestation of the man with the corporeal eye: it is a hallucination that we see the man."

The art of presentation has not received sufficient attention at Concord. No doubt, if the philosophers should make everything perfectly clear to others and to themselves, it would use up the school in a single season. Nevertheless, in the lecture-room, the art of presentation is not only supremely important, but it becomes the duty of an instructor to study it. It is one thing to understand a subject well one's self: it is another and a very different thing to present it well to the understanding of others. Again, lectures which were two and a quarter hours long or more might have been cut down to half that length with positive gain to the sense. A Scotch minister once apologized for the length of a letter by saying that he had not time to write a short one. Webster once consented to deliver an address at a certain time and place, provided he might speak an hour or two; but, if he were limited to half an hour, he must decline for lack of time to prepare. Moreover, lectures too long cut off opportunity for conversation by the faculty and class, one of the most profitable features of the school.

Plato was preached, not lectured on, by Dr. Jones. Woe betide the luckless wight who presumed to question the findings of Plato! The sturdy old Roman was erect at once, and with an insinuation informed the objector that there were two kinds of mystics,—the name of the one kind was spelled with a y, and the name of the other kind was spelled with an i. And Mr. Alcott was ready instantly to add that, if the meaning of those two different words was not comprehended, they could be found in the dictionary. Which dictionary is mistic in, in his sense? Taken in all his connections, with all his antecedents and consequents, no one, it is true, illustrates so preeminently well the mental and speculative atmosphere of the age in which Christian theology was born as Plato; and he must have a place in every comprehensive School of Philosophy. But to preach Plato is to endanger one's hold on a modern class. A priori reasoning has its risks as well as its attractions. Lofty summits are sometimes turbaned with fog. A stubborn fact may, at any moment, rise up and confront the mystic, like Banquo's ghost. I once heard Dr. A. A. Hodge, of Princeton Theological Seminary, say, "If sin were not in the world, I could prove from the attributes of the Divine Nature the impossibility of its entering the world."

Professor Harris is a full man, and thoroughly deserves the name of philosopher. His mental processes seem to be at antipodes with those of the Platonists. He seems to prefer travelling exclusively by rail, and by balloon not at all. For does he not see that the solid road-bed also crosses the mountain-tops tipped with eternal light? His reading has been wide, his thought is deep, he has no hobby. He surveys the entire field of philosophic thought, as far as known to history, and shows what contributions have been made to it by different thinkers and nations. At whatsoever point you touch him, at that point he emits light.

The practical part of Mr. Alcott's philosophy finds so beautiful an exemplification in his own sweet, pure, vigorous life that one cannot doubt the truth of it. Not every philosopher offers to his audience both his practical doctrines and a demonstration of the truth of these in his own person at one and the same time.

The philosophers at Concord do not regard their doctrines as antagonizing Christianity as they define it. Nor do they conceal that their views antagonize the current theologies radically. Dr. Jones reads from the Bible concerning the Logos; but his is not the Church's Logos. Mr. Alcott accepts the Trinity; but his definition of it would utterly evacuate of all meaning any formula ever framed of this doctrine by a Trinitarian, and overwhelm with astonishment any theologian who should look beyond the word, and its jingle, into the sense. Seemingly, one might as well identify length, breadth, and thickness with the Trinity, because they are three.

Free Religious people need not fear, I think, that the Concord School is supporting the old theologies, or that it is in any sense organized in their interest; nor, on the other hand, need the Church fear that it is in any sense hostile to true and pure religion. Indeed, I have seldom been lifted to so high a spiritual plane, and into so clear and pure and ennobling a religious atmosphere as at this school. Its courtesies, temper, thoughts, inspirations, were as bracing and vitalizing as the air of a mountain peak. The school is spiritual, hopeful, helpful, suggestive, stimulating, informing. Its value to professional men and women is inestimable, and in the comparison all blemishes sink into insignificance. One must not attend it carrying a basket to be filled with bricks, but to be filled with seeds. A casual attendant is very liable to form a mistaken estimate of it; to hear phrases which provoke a smile, because not understood, and back of which, to be understood, must stand the entire work of the school or many lectures. Then, again, some things are said so conversationally that the speakers, I presume, do not propose that all their terms and phrases shall take a permanent place in the elegant and classical department of the English language.

The Church itself, at large, could not do better than wholly to lay aside its dry, dead, fixed formulas, and adopt in their place some such living, mobile philosophy as that taught at Concord. Sooner or later, too, all religious reformers will, I think, discover that the mass of men must have some hopeful as well as reasonable footing for their religion, and that we are never lightly to afflict with biting frost man's instinctive expectation of immortality, nor his instinctive conviction that this universe sprang from a first principle which is intelligent. And this latter conviction necessitates us to formulate no metaphysical idol whatever as an object of faith. We need only postulate what is felt to be the truth.

That we may know what man is, and is to be, we must know what man has been. The Concord lectures helped us much to understand what man has been as a thinker. And now will the Free Religious Association organize a similar school for a two or three weeks' course of lectures next season, to be given, say, at Cleveland, Ohio,—a point midway between the East and West, and fanned by the cool breezes of Lake Erie,—the aim of which shall be to exhibit the several systems of philosophy which have formed the basis of the great religions, the Brahmanic, the Buddhistic, the Zoroastrian, the Egyptian, the Greek and Roman, the Scandinavian, and the Christian? Such a school, manned by men competent to the work, would make a most valuable contribution to the science of religion, and to our stock of general knowledge.

WORKING BASIS OF THE NEW RELIGION.

Says Mr. John Fiske, "In the study of the moral sense, we contemplate the last and noblest product of evolution which we can ever know,—the latest attribute to be unfolded in the development of psychical life, and by the possession of which we have indeed become, as gods knowing the good and the evil."

The latest attribute to be unfolded, it is the fruit, and must ultimately be the perfection of the whole development of mankind. Hence, all progress must be one-sided and imperfect which does not recognize that the highest duty of society to the present and the future is to nurture and develop the moral sense. But the moral sense described by Mr. Fiske is not what is understood by the teachers of theology. To them there can be no moral sense in man. How is it possible for a being who is totally depraved to possess any faculty, or germ of faculty, by which it can become conscious of right and wrong? Logically, it is impossible. To such creatures, what has passed for "moral sense" can never have been anything more than a "revelation" of God's will, setting forth the duties required of mankind and portraying the consequences of obedience and disobedience. The only possible consciousness that man could feel in his obedience to such a "will" would be simply a sense of physical safety, or a sense of fear, in his disobedience. In no sense but nonsense could a duty performed under such restraint be said to be moral, or meritorious to any extent. Therefore, it is strictly correct to say that not only does theology not recognize a moral sense in man, but that it is impossible for man to become moral in the true sense of the term, so long as he is bound in fear and ignorance by the theological conception of man's relation to the universe.

This will be seen to be true, if we consider that, while the moral sense, as Mr. Fiske says, is the latest and noblest product of psychical evolution, theology, substantially as it exists to-day, was one of the very earliest products of such evolution. The two are separated by celestial distances. If I were to attempt to represent them objectively, I might say that "moral sense" is Professor Fiske, and theology is South Sea Islander. Therefore, I insist that the very first step toward a due recognition and culture of the moral sense is to wash our hands entirely of theology. Just so long as society attempts to guide itself by theological "revelation," "will of God," and what not, just so long must it develop the sin of hypocrisy faster than the sense of morality. Intellect will not be forced to believe that white is black, so long as it knows it to be white. Intelligent men and women cannot compel themselves to believe the thousand falsehoods and absurdities that underlie theology. If they accept it at all, they do so only in appearance, and for some personal consideration of popularity or social relationship, and not for any truth it may be said to contain. Thus, they place themselves before the world ostensibly as sincere observers of the moral requirements of the theological scheme of life, but in reality as the secret scorners and mockers of such scheme; and hence the only possible evolution their conduct encourages and allows is that of hypocrisy. Theology is, therefore, not only an obstacle in the way of moral culture, but is, unintentionally, I gladly admit, but nevertheless actually, an immoral agency in society. The attempt to control society by theology is, in point of fact, nothing more nor less than the attempt of the emotions of perhaps tens of thousands of years ago to control the intellect of to-day. It is the attempt of a system representing the mental infancy of the race to control its manhood. It is barbarism attempting to control civilization. The moral sense with which society is to be interested to-day is the latest product of human evolution, and therefore can be properly cultivated only when that is done in most complete harmony with the highest, broadest, and best intellectual development.

From what has been said, it will be seen that the moral sense is neither a gift from God, as has been maintained, or the result of ages of theological government. What, then, is its genesis? Darwin, Spencer, Fiske, and other modern students of the problem, have shown that the splendid powers of intellect that distinguish man from the highest life below him have all been acquired by long, slow variations and improvements under the law of natural selection. The moral sense is the latest acquisition under this process of evolution, and stands as the crown of human life. The intellect was developed in the interest of the individual. The moral sense grew out of the slowly evolving interest of the individual in others.

Pure intellect is selfish. Morality is unselfish. Intellectual development alone makes man skilful in getting the best of his neighbor. Morality, or the influence of the moral sense, makes him not only respect the rights of his neighbor, but willing, ready, and glad to show his neighbor wherein he can be benefited. The world of trade to-day largely represents man on the purely intellectual plane, and hence largely selfish and too ready to take advantage of his neighbor. There is but little moral sense in business. The rule is to get all you can out of the necessities of customers. It almost seems as if it had come to be accepted as morally correct to lie and cheat whenever a dollar or a dime could be obtained in that way.

This is the legitimate result of the long reign of the theological government of society. The highest moral duty was to be honest with God. Honesty to man was a secondary affair. But, when the intellect had scattered the fog that enveloped the conception of God, and men saw that the much-talked-of future torments were extremely improbable, their observance of duty to God became formality, and duty to man was forgotten. One of the most certain needs of society to-day is the introduction of a moral sense into business. The absence of it there makes all professions of morality in church and synagogue but a mockery of justice and right. This points to the work to be done by the religion of the future.

But, to go back to the genesis of the moral sense, it is undoubtedly true, as has been shown by the writers above named, and eminently so by Mr. Fiske, that the moral sense is due to the fact that man is not only a gregarious but more a social animal. Many animals below man are gregarious. Man is that by inheritance. By variation and psychical development in himself, he becomes a social animal. As Mr. Fiske says, "In the permanent family, we have the germ of society." Out of social relationship, through development of sympathy, affection, ties of blood, all linking the family in closer and more enduring relations, until family becomes tribe, and tribe becomes confederation, confederation becomes nation, and nations become brotherhoods shadowing forth have grown, little by little, through the long, long ages now sleeping, dust-covered, upon the silent bosom of the dead past, those feelings of regard for others that have given us right and wrong, justice and duty, honor and shame.

Here, then,—for elaboration of the thought cannot be made in the brief article here intended,—we come to the purpose with which we set out, in the series of articles published in the Index. Free Religion, or the movement, by whatever name known, that is to set on foot the New Reformation demanded by the intellectual and moral mind of the time, must take for its starting-point the fact that man is by nature a social animal, not a solitary individual; and that the true evolution of society can take place only under the most generous culture of those social feelings which stimulate sympathy, affection, care for each other, justice, honesty, and the disposition to turn away from every temptation to do whatever would wrong another. This will be to cultivate the moral sense. It will be to increase in the individual the sense of pleasure when he has done right, the sense of pain when he has done wrong. Carry this course of development into all departments and all relations of life, not only of man to man, but of man to all animal life; continue it from generation to generation, giving the law of natural and sexual selection points of variation upon which to seize,—and in time the old dream of heaven will have become a glorious reality on earth.

But what of the intellect? Nothing. It will take care of itself. If we but cut away the fungus of theology, bring emotion forward from its age-long imprisonment in the surviving savagery of primitive conceptions of life, and set it in harmony with the intellect of to-day, and then go to work as above indicated in the line of social evolution, we will have started on the grandest work of reformation that the world has ever seen, the one to which all others have pointed, and for which all others have done their part. But it will be greater than them all, because it will embody the good results of all. It will be strictly in the line of scientific development, thus falling at once into fullest harmony with intellectual growth; and it will have the whole force and upward pull of natural law through the science of heredity and selection, to plant its success permanently in the blood and brains of the growing world of man. Will Free Religion accept the opportunity?

IS LIFE REASONABLE?

To reduce human conduct to a rational system seems to be the hope of many good and intelligent people. But those same enthusiastic disciples of reason would stand appalled before the wreck of life's loves and hopes, could they see accomplished the actual results of their logic. How little of what we call the true life of an individual soul can be sustained at the bar of reason! Ask the mother who loves so tenderly her invalid or deformed child to give a satisfactory reason for this peculiar fondness, and what will she say? Reason would certainly dictate that the healthy and more promising children should receive more maternal care, as they are the future's hope and strength, while the unfortunate imbecile can never repay the love and labor wasted on its barren life. Who dares listen to the voice of reason here? Observe the expensive care bestowed on the dead, both before and after burial. Why this useless expenditure of labor and money? Reason would ask. Put away your dead in the cheapest possible way, and stop the superstitious custom of marking with costly marble the graves of your friends. Better plant some useful crop on the ground where your dead rest than foolishly venerate it as you do, for it is no more sacred than any other part of this vast tomb of life on which we live.

So reason would despoil many of our noblest sentiments, if we were to arraign them before this stern tribunal. We cannot give a reason for many things without which life would not be worth living. There is no reason in the stern nature of things, outside our mysterious selves, why the brook on whose grassy banks we played in childhood should be dearer to us than other streams. We can give no reason why the grave of a friend is to us sacred ground, and yet it is sacred. The human heart cannot explain itself, nor is it under any obligations to do so. Life will always be more than any formula of philosophy can compass. Reason will demand in vain that the inner life of man adjust itself to the logic of utility. The soul will not abdicate its throne of loves and hopes because it can furnish no reason for its emotions. Certain sentiments will continue to sway human conduct, though the most enlightened reason may pronounce these sentiments in the nature of things absurd. The heart will not suspend its loving and hating till reason has given assent to these states of feeling. Life has secrets which no philosophy has yet discovered, and what is called the "light of reason" shines but dimly into the deep recesses of human consciousness. We must live in many ways without knowing how or why. We will not cease to admire the beauties of nature and art, because we cannot tell why they are beautiful. The soul will claim and exercise sovereignty over a realm which reason cannot explore and define.

H. CLAY NEVILLE.

OZARK, Mo., Aug. 27, 1881.

THE American weakness for rocking-chairs gets humorous allusion by a Transcript correspondent, who recalls the effort of a Geneva landlord who sets out a wholerow of genuine American rocking-chairs on his terrace as a sure trap for American tourists. And also an American scene on a burlesque stage in Hungary, where "every chair, sofa, table, and ottoman was on rockers, while the occupants of the room were entirely hidden by huge newspapers." It seems the Hungarian dailies are printed on several sheets of a size scarcely above that of commercial note-paper, and the ample proportions of our sovereign educators awaken keen amusement there.

SPEAKING of competitive examinations for appointment to government office, the Nation says: "Notoriously, such examinations in our service soon degenerate into a hollow semblance of the thing, into an illustration of the art how not to do it. But that is exactly what the ordinary member of Congress desires; and, having reached that point, his right to nominate for examination will, in nine cases out of ten, be equivalent to a right to nominate for appointment. This will be the result: it will be reached by more or less slow approaches, but it will be inevitable. If we are to have civil-service reform with a little patronage in it, we shall soon have, as heretofore, a good deal of patronage with little or no civil-service reform in it."

It seemed to me that Phillips was unjust to Cambridge scholarship in remembering only its lapses and forgetting its examples of courage. He remembered Everett and forgot Sumner. He condemned John Pierpont for one action, and says nothing of his long career of courageous, self-sacrificing devotion to reform. Though he quoted Lowell, he did not mention him as an exception to his censure. He forgot to remember the combined scholarship and courage of Theodore Parker, equally eminent as a reformer and as a man of learning. When we recollect that Cambridge has given to the work of reform such scholars as Channing, Emerson, Horace Mann, Theodore Parker, Charles Sumner, Samuel J. May, James Russell Lowell, John Gorham Palfrey, John Quincy Adams, Josiah Quincy, we see that there is another side to the question.—James Freeman Clarke.

In a talk on the Bible at Northfield, Mass., last week, Mr. Moody, the revivalist, said: "If the word of God is true in one part, it's true in every part, in the whole. It's a great fashion here in this country for people to talk about the 'supernatural' in the Bible, in religion. You people here from Great Britain don't often hear this word. People nowadays cut and slash at the Bible till it's all gone. Some don't want anything to do with the Old Testament: the New is all right, but, oh dear, the Old is gone by. But Jesus and his apostles had no other scriptures. Then think of the hundreds of references in the New to the Old. For instance, Matthew has one hundred; and in Revelations there are two hundred and forty-five. Some want everything supernatural taken out of the Bible." Mr. Moody went on to cite the supernatural events recorded in the New and Old Testaments, saying, among other things, "Now there's Jonah and the whale. 'Pooh!' says the scientific man, 'a whale's mouth isn't big enough to swallow a man, anyway.' But couldn't God make a whale big enough to swallow a man? Why, he could make a man big enough to swallow a whale." Upon considerable laughter in the audience at this, Mr. Moody emphasized the assertion. "Yes, I haven't the least doubt he could, not the least."

THERE is a "reorganized church" among the Mormons, or a branch of that faith that abhors polygamy, and will have nothing to do with its practices. Its work was commenced in 1852; and an effort is being made to reclaim the Brigham Young "heretics." And this organization, which claims to be governed by the original Book of Mormon, has had missionaries operating in Utah since 1864; and it is said they are reforming a good many. A Chicago Times reporter recently interviewed Elder T. M. Smith, one of the leaders of the anti-Brigham Young sect. In speaking of polygamy, he said that Joseph Smith and that organization were in perfect accord on the marriage question, and said: "On page 116 of the 'Book of Mormon,' we read, 'Behold, David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord.' Again: 'Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord; for there shall not any man among you have save it be one wife, and concubines you shall have none.' You notice that the polygamous course of David and Solomon, whose history is found in the Bible and whose polygamous relations are not condemned there, is denounced by the 'Book of Mormon' as being 'abominable' before the Lord, and is expressly forbidden; but 'one wife,' and no 'concubines' or secondary wives, is allowed."—Rochester Chronicle.

ASTRONOMERS are frequently asked whether they believe the nebular theory. The question is logically preposterous. An hypothesis may be believed or disbelieved; but a theory is an organized system of observed phenomena, which may be accepted as good and complete or discarded on account of its defects, but of which belief or disbelief cannot properly be predicated. The nebular theory is preëminently a grand ideal organization of all the phenomena of the celestial universe, and embraces a complete ideal history of the inorganic world. The universe, according to that theory, commences with an all-pervading substance in which there is no apparent structure nor division into parts, but the same monotonous uniformity throughout. Passing through innumerable transformations, it terminates in a system whence disorganization has been wholly eliminated, and where vast multitudes of individuals, each a perfect organism in itself, are combined in indestructible harmony. In the beginning, it has the unity of monotony; in the end, it has the unity of complete organization. . . . It has proved a curious and unfailing guide amid the mazes of nature, and it seemingly stretches throughout the labyrinthine windings of intricate investigation. It must be liberated from needless hypothesis, which may unguardedly have been allowed to enter it, be closer fitted to fact, and become more and more the incorporation of ideality with strict and exact observation.—Prof. Peirce.

THE New York Tablet, a leading Catholic paper, says: "Despite all this opposition, Gladstone has triumphed and has carried to a successful issue his pet measure. True, there is much diversity of opinion as to whether the bill is of any account or not. The followers of Mr. Parnell denounce it as a mere makeshift measure; while the Archbishop of Cashel, who has shown himself to be both a brave and wise friend of the Irish people in all their troubles and struggles, declares that the bill is "a great boon and blessing, calculated to do immeasurable good to the tenant-farmers of Ireland." The statement of this learned and patriotic prelate will carry more conviction to the minds of impartial persons as to the efficiency of the measure than anything said or urged to the contrary by the Tory press, who aim at belittling anything done by Mr. Gladstone or by impracticable extremists. We are of opinion that the changes made by the Lords in the bill are not of much consequence, and were tolerated by Gladstone as a kind of salve to their wounded honor and pride. Mr. Gladstone said last spring to the Catholic bishops of Ireland that he would not submit to any alteration in the bill which would have the effect of changing its character. He is a man of firm will and purpose, and we feel confident that he would not stultify himself by suffering the bill to be emasculated after making such a promise. We cannot forget the fact that Gladstone has done more for Ireland than any other statesman in our day, and is therefore entitled to the gratitude of the Irish people. Let not partisan zeal or over-enthusiastic patriotism close our eyes to the fact that to him we owe the disestablishment of an alien church in Ireland, an institution which the people had to support so long that they came to look upon it as a part of the British Constitution and the bulwark of the crown. To him is due the destruction of the last sectarian statute which made collegiate education in Ireland a thing of bigotry. When to these we add the recollection of what he has done to extend the suffrage, to emancipate the people from the serfdom of the aristocracy, and the passage of his crowning measure,—namely, the Irish Land Bill,—we must feel that he has done much, not only for Ireland, but for the progress of universal liberty."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

HON. JAMES M. BUFFUM, of Lynn, is lying quite ill. In the Atlantic Monthly for October, Phillips Brooks has a very interesting and sympathetic article on Dean Stanley.

MISS MARGARET HICKS, a recent graduate of Cornell, is mentioned as the first woman who has adopted the profession of architecture.

GOLDWIN SMITH is mentioned as possible successor to Dr. Bradley, the new dean of Westminster, for the mastership of University College.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD is engaged to give one of the lectures in the course to be given the coming season before the Philosophical Society of Chicago.

THE Rev. William Marshall, a colored minister of Clark County, Ky., advertises that he will pray for any desired object on receipt of seventy-five cents.

MRS. ANTOINETTE BROWN BLACKWELL is said to have read one of the ablest papers at the recent meeting, in Cincinnati, of the Association for the Advancement of Science.

KING HUMBERT, of Italy, has paid off his father's debts and keeps out of debt himself. Such stock is a credit to any country, but especially deserves liberal ground for its culture.

DR. BLISS says he receives about one hundred and fifty letters per day, giving advice as to treatment, etc.

and nearly every one begins with, "Pardon the liberty I take in suggesting," etc.

JUDGE BLAKE, the newly elected mayor of San Francisco, is said to be a man of high character and eminently worthy of public confidence, thereby a strong contrast to his predecessor, Rev. Isaac Kallloch.

COL. J. C. BUNDY, of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, has been passing several weeks in Colorado, where he has regained health and strength. He will resume his editorial work about the first of October.

THE present Princess of Egypt, the Khedive's only wife, is a cultivated and liberal-minded woman. She received a European education, and her children are brought up by English governesses and in English ways.

MR. CHARLES ELLIS has returned from his vacation in Nova Scotia, and, as will be seen in another column, is ready to make engagements as a lecturer. We commend him to the attention of liberal communities.

MISS PIERCE, who favored the Old South Fair with hose knit from the fleece of "Mary's little lamb," is enjoying the new Mechanics' Fair. She expects to add twenty-five years to the seventy-five already attained.

JEAN INGKLOW's life is more beautiful than her poetry. Her face is well known among the wretched poor of London, and three times a week she gives a dinner to the sick poor and the discharged convalescents from hospitals, who either are unable to work or have not yet found employment. She once said, "I find it one of the great pleasures of writing, that it gives one more money for such purposes than falls to the lot of most women."—Boston Transcript.

MRS. A. B. HATHAWAY, of Chicago, says the Woman's Journal, is fast gaining a reputation as one of the ablest philosophical thinkers in America. Mr. Alcott, after hearing her speak once before the Chicago Philosophical Society, immediately invited her to appear before the Concord School of Philosophy, and says that she undoubtedly possesses the keenest mind in speculative philosophy in this country. Her address before the Concord School, August 12, was an admirable exposition of the system of Schopenhauer.

For the Free Religious Index.

GOOD-BY MORNINGS WITH THE SWALLOWS.

Wee, pensive birds
On the barn crest,
These parting words
My grief attest.

In silent row
Ye're gathered there,
I'd gladly know—
To hear my prayer?

Then hear me mourn
Your taking leave:
As one forlorn
I watch and grieve.

The vacant skies,
When you are gone,
With lonely guise
Will front the dawn.

The meads will fade,
The woods will sere,
And cast their shade,
With you not here.

No more you'll plash
The astonished pool,
With skimming dash
Your wing to cool.

At milking chores,
I'll miss your fit
Through the barn doors,
With cheery twit.

Good-by! arise,
I to my times,
You to far skies,
To welcoming rhymes.

R. L. HOWARD.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 22, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

MONEY due the Index is greatly needed at this season, and subscribers who are in arrears will confer a favor by sending at once the amounts they owe.

To ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send the Index on trial three months for fifty cents, or six months for one dollar. Will persons interested in extending the influence of this journal make a little exertion to obtain subscriptions at the above rates?

IN resuming our editorial duties, we must first of all congratulate our readers on the ability and general good judgment with which Mr. Underwood has edited the Index in our absence. With the help of his estimable wife, he has provided a paper full of various interest, and made us all hope that the Index columns will continue to receive frequent communications from both their pens.

PROF. FELIX ADLER is to speak at the Parker Memorial Hall on the next two Sundays, September 25 and October 2, at 10.30 A.M. Many people in Boston and vicinity will welcome this opportunity of hearing him. Mr. Adler has found his summer rest at Gloucester very beneficial to him. His wife also has been greatly benefitted, and is now nearly restored to health.

THE condition of President Garfield became again very critical toward the end of last week; and on Saturday, just as the twelfth week began since he was shot, he had a severe chill, lasting for a half-hour and attended with delirium. This was followed by extreme prostration, and every appearance of a collapse of his strong constitution under the ravages of the blood-poisoning, which is now admitted by the surgeons to exist. His hold on life is by so slender a tenure that before this reaches our readers they may already have been informed of his death. If so, a noble man and most capable President will have gone by an infamous crime, and the country's political prospects will not be so bright; but the Republic will live. —The above was put in type Monday, P.M. On Monday evening, at 10.35, the end of the long, brave struggle came. Against the sympathies and prayers of the nation and the world, death won the victory. The President is dead! Long live the President!

BULWARKS OF BELIEF.

No fact is more evident in the religious world than that the old outward props of faith are giving way. Foundations of belief which have hitherto been deemed impregnable by the great majority of the Christian Church are being largely undermined. The Church itself no longer speaks with the authority which once it did. It is asked to give a reason for its authority; and, when reasons are asked for, they may be accepted or not according as they appear reasonable to the questioner. The creeds are being modified or abandoned. Traditional ecclesiastical institutions and sacred ordinances are slipping from their places, and losing their hold upon the popular heart. Prophets and holy personages, who have been believed to be God-inspired and God-born, and wondrous workers of miracles, are having their histories written as if they were purely human. And now the book which pious Christians have clung to for centuries as either wholly and verbally or essentially infallible has been subjected to human revision and amendment; and, what is more, the whole process of its various and uncertain origin and of its certain historical manipulation by human agencies has been laid bare to the popular gaze.

Nor has this recent work of loosening and undermining these ecclesiastical supports of religious belief been done to any great extent by assaults from enemies of the Church on the outside. It is not done by the so-called infidels of the day, however wide may be the hearing of some of them. They voice a scepticism already outside of the churches, or meet and welcome a scepticism just ready to come out. Nor is it being done immediately by the teachers of science; for science does not get much direct hearing in the churches. The loosening of the old foundation stones is now going on very largely by reason of workers inside of the Church. The work is being done by men of theological scholarship and piety; by such men as Professor Robertson Smith of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, Bishop Colenso and Dean Stanley of the Church of England, Professors Kuenen and Oort of the Dutch Church, not to name others in Europe and America who, in like manner, are noted for theological heresy, for religious zeal, and for adherence to some branch of the Church. A revision of the English Bible coming forth from Colonel Ingersoll or Mr. Bradlaugh, even if they had the learning adequate for the task, which they have not, would fall dead upon the Christian world. A revision of the Bible coming out of the heart of the old Church of England, however much opposition it may encounter, is a blow at the central Protestant doctrine of an infallible book revelation, whose effects in this questioning age of the world will not cease until the bottommost stone of the faith of Protestant Christendom is shaken.

In this modern disturbance of the foundations of faith there are of course many people who still hold to the old supports, ignorant that anything has happened to them. There are others in the precincts of the Church who are well aware that something has happened, and who are made not a little anxious thereby concerning the faith of coming generations, but who yet, though perceiving clearly that old religious beliefs and usages are fast slipping away, are grateful that enough of them are likely to remain through their lifetime to supply their needs, and thank their fortune that they were born and religiously bred before this era of new theological discovery and questioning arrived. Others, again, and still within the Church, are readily adjusting themselves to the new order in religious things; and these are finding, often perhaps to their surprise, that, though the traditional props of their faith are shaking and falling and though they are letting go religious beliefs and usages which once seemed very precious to them, yet somehow their faith and hope and trust are not disturbed, but are rather thrust back upon some stronger position. In reading a few weeks since a discourse by Rufus Ellis, D.D., of the First Church (Unitarian) in Boston, on the Revised New Testament, our attention was arrested by the remark, so contrary to the usual conservative criticism on this point, that he was ready to welcome even those apparently needless changes in the text which do not alter the meaning at all, but only break old associations of sacred words and sounds. It was worth while, he argued, to break and even shock these associations, which fetter faith to the "outward letter," if thereby it could be driven to deeper reliance on "the spirit." The remark was the more striking as coming from one whose religious attitude is conservative. But, in these times, conservatives and radicals alike, if they are livingly thoughtful, if they have any deep and abiding sources of faith, any hopeful wide vision of the future, any consecrating impulse or earnest labor for human welfare, must find the main supports of their belief and trust and effort elsewhere than in any letter, creed, or usage, that has been traditionally vested with alleged divine authority.

But what is meant rationality by reliance on the spirit rather than the letter? There has been a good deal of mystical speculation in theology about the supernatural impartation of the Divine Spirit to certain special persons or natures or churches in the past; and a good deal of mystical speculation in certain schools of religious philosophy about each human soul coming into contact with the Infinite Spirit, and being guided by it as a personal entity apart from its own faculties and powers. But the same critical thought that has been delving under and loosening the outward authorities of religion has been casting discredit also upon these theories of supernatural union between the human and divine spirits. According to rational thought, "the spirit," on which we are to rely as supreme over the letter, is no mystical, disembodied, ghost-like being, personally separate from humanity, but the very power which has become progressively manifest as mental, moral, affectional, social intelligence in man himself. That is, we trust the human intelligence itself, in its highest reaches and capabilities, as the seat of a power behind the throne of every religion which ever set up its authority on the earth, and proclaimed a moral law for man.

With this view of "the spirit," we go back of the religions to their source. What matters it what old structures are falling, so long as the producing power remains? what authorities waver and fail, so long as the fountain-head of authority survives? what creeds and codes and sacred ceremonies may vanish, so long as in this central seat of human selfhood is declared the obligation to serve truth and keep rectitude? We are not disturbed if flaws are detected in past messages of alleged revelation; for the creator of those messages exists to correct them. We can well let our one Bible go, since we keep hold of the power that can make and amend Bibles; or our one revered person of divine incarnation, since we know our human natures to be rooted in that which is the producer of all personality. If the facts of some special fragment of history to which we have clung seem to fade away before investigation, we find that our faith does not depend upon them, but rests rather in the aims and tendencies that shine through all history and throw the light of their purpose even ahead of facts. In fine, though the Church, with all its appendages and supports of creed, tradition, sacred belief, and usage, is undergoing vital transformation, and were even utterly to change and vanish away, the humanity that has created it will still exist, with its roots in the eternal substance of things, with all its capacities, history, possibilities, intact, and will be adequate, we have reason to trust, for the emergency.

In two succeeding articles, something will be said of two principles, or corner-stones, pertaining to this natural basis of faith.

THE REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT IN RUSSIA.

This is the title of a pamphlet just published, and relating the interview held six weeks ago between a correspondent of the New York Herald and a leader of those who always call themselves the Revolutionists, and are called so by the Russian government. Scarcely any of these men and women can properly be styled Nihilists; and their general aim is not the destruction of law and order, but the establishment of these blessings in Russia on the basis of such an amount of individual liberty and self-government as is found in this country and Great Britain. The so-called Nihilists do not as a body ask for anything better than a constitutional monarchy, a restricted suffrage, popular education, a free press, a smaller army, religious tolerance, personal liberty, parliamentary representation, local self-government, and amnesty. Such are the statements made in this pamphlet by a gentleman who, as I am personally assured, speaks with authority and accuracy, and who certainly shows his right to be heard by clearly exposing the fraud and oppression which attended the destruction of serfdom, and also by denouncing the private vices and public crimes of Alexander II. with all the grandeur of our Declaration of Independence. He lays great stress on the fact that all the safeguards by which individuals are able to defend their life, liberty, and property in civilized countries are practically out of reach in Russia. Whether even this state of things justifies assassination is a question on which good people may differ; but that of the late Czar should not be judged by any rule more severe than that which we apply to the deeds of William Tell, Charlotte Corday, and Brutus. For myself I must say that I have for years considered that all such acts, though well meant, were in reality morally wrong. The death of Alexander II., in particular, has, I think, been an injury to the cause of liberty. I cannot look upon the patriots, who knowingly gave their lives to do what their leaders deliberately decided to be necessary for their country's good, as mere murderers without excuse, but yet I believe that they were sadly and culpably mistaken; and I am sure that there is not a shadow of excuse for initiating them in this country or any other governed by laws.

Such, I know, is the opinion of my friend, Ivan Panin, who has edited the pamphlet in question and added some notes of great value, and who has given, in the Boston Herald for Sunday, August 11, some thrilling stories, originally published in Russia by official permission, of merchants being confined for years merely in consequence of refusing to pay the money illegally demanded by policemen, of women having their breasts burnt by the agents of the government, of all the inmates of a prison being flogged collectively for the amusement of the warden and chaplain, and of other atrocities which certainly ought to be known and condemned everywhere. Both these publications may be obtained of Mr. Panin at 69 College House, Cambridge; and the pamphlet is for sale, price 20 cents, at the Index office as well as at the bookstores generally. Those who believe as I do, that Russian despotism should at present be attacked only through exposure of its iniquities, ought to help the circulation.

LET US BE FAIR.

That there is much hypocrisy among those who "profess religion," who join the churches and claim to believe in their creeds, is very certain. And, for this, Orthodoxy, which encourages hypocrisy by imposing legal disabilities upon Freethinkers, by subjecting them as far as possible to social ostracism, by condemning honest doubt and disbelief, is chiefly responsible. This kind of hypocrisy, this real hypocrisy, gives no offence whatever to the majority of orthodox Christians, who, indeed, practically sustain it, because they see it adds to the numerical strength of the churches and weakens opposition to their decaying faith, thereby retarding the progress of "avowed infidelity," than which nothing is more offensive to the zealous adherent of evangelical theology. The hypocrisy that calls out exposure and denunciation is of the imaginary sort,—the hypocrisy that has no existence, the hypocrisy that is imputed to sincere believers in Christianity when their character and lives show how powerless mere faith is to prevent the practice of vice or the commission of crime. If a Freethinker is guilty of a disgraceful act, the clergy and religious journals generally are quick to refer to it as an illustration of the bad influence of disbelief, and proof that faith in Christ is absolutely necessary as a support of and incentive to moral virtue. If a minister fails to exemplify in his life the precepts which he teaches, if a Sunday-school teacher defrauds a church or a bank, if a common Christian brings reproach upon the cause of Christ, it is assumed at once that he is a hypocrite, when in fact there may be not the slightest reason to doubt the sincerity of his faith in Christ and the "great scheme of redemption," by which only, according to Orthodoxy, sinners can be saved from "the wrath to come." Let us have honesty and fairness in this matter. Christianity is not responsible for all the follies and crimes of which its adherents are guilty. Liberalism is not responsible for all the vagaries and nonsense of its professed friends. A man may be a believer in Christianity, or he may be an adherent of Liberalism, and yet be very imperfect in character and conduct, although neither omits to enjoin the moral law. Systems must be judged by their principles and precepts, and by their legitimate results, as revealed in the experience of men and nations, and not by the acts of any individual adherent.

HOW IT HAPPENS.

"What is everybody's business is nobody's business." In ordinary times, the affairs of a nation are held in the consciousness of the people in general, or rather in their unconsciousness, as a matter that will look out for itself; and they go about their busy private concerns without a twinge of compunction as to the necessity of provisional effort of their own toward government regulation.

It is quite true that too many cooks spoil the mess; but it is equally true that the head cook, while needing protection from too many helpers in his immediate work, is also in need of wise lines of effort leading from the very outskirts to the centre, and occupying every inch of his domain. The materials reaching him for supervision cannot otherwise be wholesome; and the consumers of his viands far and near have themselves to thank, if their rations prove chaffy or unsavory or even make them absolutely ill. Indeed, it has to come to this latter point, making them sick even unto death, before they begin to realize that something has turned up somewhere to make them so uncomfortable and to put them in such dangerous plight.

Then they begin to fumble around clumsily for the cause, and try to patch up some crude measures for relief.

In our national housekeeping there have always been some far-seeing and penetrating eyes, some deeply concerned anxieties, and a few gravely counselling voices to warn the populace against the sure results of selfish apathy. But they disliked the trouble of stirring themselves to find out whether they were not haply mistaken in setting down the opinions of these critics as fussy and sentimental, if not covert measures for self-aggrandizement. Glimpses of serious mischief in the conduct of affairs were finally followed by desperate and widespread havoc. Still, they nursed their private schemes with the unreasoning conviction that such misfortunes outside were to be expected and probably inseparable from the necessary political network, and hid their eyes under the comfortable screen of personal pursuits from the glare of the approaching flames. Happily for the common good, the scorch has become so generally perceptible as to induce a fair proportion of the community to try the experiment of some genuine life-saving apparatus based on rational and scientific principles. It would be found much more convenient, in the long run, to use a little pains to discover what will reach the source of the evil now enfeebling national function than to succumb blindly to a supposed necessity for the sake of temporary quiet.

J. P. T.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Springfield Republican, writing in regard to the Lake Pleasant Camp Meeting, says:—

With a meeting so prolific of mediums as this, one can get accommodated according to his purse; for they will give you a glimpse of the past, lift the curtain of the future, or tell you more than you ever knew about your own business for from ten cents to five dollars. That some of these mediums are honest and conscientious is fair to presume, but that more of them are frauds there is good reason for presuming. And it seems to make little difference how often these persons are exposed, the more the better for them financially. Here are the Eddy Brothers, whose flimsy tricks any one "with half an eye" can see through; Mrs. Huntoon who represents the "big injun" by standing on a block, the little child by kneeling down, and the ordinary spirit by standing naturally; the slate writers who have confederates to work the sealed slate trick; the readers of the names of dead friends by getting the subject to look in one part of the room for "rapping," while the medium quickly glances over his shoulder and catches the name he has written. These and scores of others "scoop in" thousands of dollars each season, no matter how often the exposures are made. A warrant is held here for the arrest of some of the more prominent mediums on the ground of obtaining money under false pretences; but none of the local officers will serve it, and others do not care to, saying it is hardly fair to make one suffer when all the rest are just as bad. The real earnest, educated Spiritualists upon the grounds are as disgusted with all this chicanery as any one, and realize that it is having a demoralizing influence. There are too many of the catch-penny side-shows with their rag babies, which detract largely from the study of the philosophy of Spiritualism, for which these meetings were inaugurated. . . . It is singular, too, to witness the gullibility of many people who at home are credited with better judgment. Said a member of the association to me recently, "It is astonishing what a large number of church members pay their dollars to our mediums." They say it is "just for fun," but so long as the piper gets his pay he doesn't care who dances. The more ignorant appearing the medium, the larger trade he will draw. It is indeed remarkable what a lot of fallow, cadaverous-looking individuals a majority of these mediums are. It is a treat to go into one of the morning conference meetings, where each one is given a chance to talk, and improves it. Many do not hesitate to expose the tricks played upon the unwary. To his credit be it said the bona fide investigating Spiritualist will not hesitate to "go for" any fraudulent medium.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE annual session of the American Social Science Association, which occurred at Saratoga week before last, included as usual the consideration of a number of subjects of special interest and importance in the sphere of its studies.

The address of Charles Dudley Warner on "The American Newspaper" has naturally drawn to itself considerable attention. The newspaper sustains so intimate a relation to the every-day life of people in this generation, in all advanced countries, and especially our own, that an examination of its nature, mission, and influence by one as competent and distinguished for fresh and thoughtful views of things as Mr. Warner, gave it prominent interest among the themes presented. "The newspaper," said Mr. Warner, "is a private enterprise. Its object is to make money for its owner. The exceptional cases of newspapers devoted to 'causes,' without regard to profit, are so few as not to affect the rule." Mr. Warner corrected the notion that the newspaper is a sort of open channel for the public to use as it chooses, as well as the presumption that it is established for charitable purposes. The chief function of a newspaper is to collect and print the news. The American journals, in this particular, for a time led the world. But some of the wealthier of the English press soon surpassed them in the use of the telegraph and in the presentation of all sorts of local news, especially that of the law courts and the crimes and mishaps that come within police and legal supervision, though not in the news of casualties and neighborhood events.

The leading papers of the German press, though strong in correspondence and in discussion of affairs, are far less comprehensive in their news than the American or English. The French journals can hardly be called newspapers in the sense we use the word; yet, if they do not give the events and happenings of the day, they give the intellectual ferment of Paris, which is commonly more interesting.

The subject of insanity, which has of late engaged increasing public attention, was considered at the meeting in some of its aspects. Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi, of New York, read a paper upon "The Moral Treatment of the Insane." Dr. Jacobi selected for the discussion of her paper those forms of insanity which are recognized as curable, and yet very often remain uncured. The desired end, she thought, could be most effectively accomplished by concentrating the energies and interests of the mind upon practical activities. A new world must be built up around each patient out of his own awakened and directed attentions. The work must be accurately adapted to the taste of the patient. The individualizing treatment of the insane was favored. "There seems no good reason," said the essayist, "why the treatment of a mental as of a physical disease should not best be carried out by a private physician, seconded by an intelligent and specially trained nurse. Two exigencies necessitate special arrangement,—provision for states of excitement, and for the occasional association with a certain number of other persons undergoing the same moral treatment. This might be secured by groups of cottages in the country, where patients might be placed temporarily by their own physicians, who would continue the management of the case. This would provide for individual care, prevent routine, and obtain the moral discipline needed for employment, drill, gymnastics," etc.

Dr. Walter Channing thought there was the same need of putting the habitual drunkard under restraint that there is the insane. He advocated that he should be committed to a reformatory in the country. Dr. Channing thus described his idea of such an institution: "It should be attached to a very large farm, and there should be several detached cottages, these not be near one another, but should be under one general management. The treatment would principally consist of work, and connected with it should be schools, a chapel, bowling-alley, billiard-room, and recreation-room, also a teacher of music, a band, and a military company. The length of time required to make the treatment successful would probably be at least three years. We often lose sight of the fact that chronic inebriety so undermines the health that a period of years of abstinence is necessary before the nervous system may be said to be sufficiently strong to bear the strain.

Robert Treat Paine, Jr., of Boston, read an interesting paper on "Homes for the People," in which he advocated the effort of those in humble circumstances to own their own homes. Mr. Paine showed how this might be effected through a system of coöperative savings and loan association, like that which has been in successful operation in Massachusetts for the last five years, and existed for a greater length of time in Pennsylvania.

The address by George William Curtis on "Civil Service Reform" was one of the most notable of the occasion. Mr. Curtis cheerfully referred, in the opening of his paper, to the progress of the cause as follows: Twelve years ago, I read a paper before this Association upon reform in the civil service. The subject was of very little interest. A few newspapers, which were thought to be visionary, occasionally discussed it; but the press of both parties smiled with profound indifference. This was a dozen years ago. To-day, the demand for reform is imperative. The drop has become a deluge. Leading journals of both parties eagerly proclaim its urgent necessity. From New England to California, public opinion is organizing itself in reform associations. A bill carefully prepared and providing for gradual and thorough reform has been introduced, with an admirable report, in the Senate of the United States. Mr. Pendleton declares that the spoils system which has debauched the civil service of fifty millions of people must be destroyed. Mr. Dawes summons all good citizens to unite to suppress this gigantic evil which threatens the republic.

VACATION SUNDAYS IN TOWN.

No. VIII.

The vacation season is over. The summer days are drawing to a close. Their hot and languor-producing airs are dissolving into cooler temperatures. The tide of life, which the promptings of weary energies and various quests bore into the restful retreats of the country, the recreative haunts of mountains and seashore, is rapidly returning to its accustomed channels, and the worlds of business, society, religion, and politics adjusting themselves once more to their former ways and relations. These vacation notes must therefore bend to the general order, and hence I submit to-day the last of the series.

There is no preacher in Boston who has made reputation more rapidly and, on the whole, of a more solid quality than Rev. Minot J. Savage, the popular pastor of the Church of the Unity. It used to be observed that Unitarian preachers always had a certain undisguisable, uniform tone and manner. The impress of Harvard College was on them all. It could be detected in the pulpit, in their reading, prayers, and the composition and delivery of their sermons. But this has been growing less and less marked during the last twenty years. As the denomination has scattered itself over the country and its ministers have been educated at other centres and amid circumstances quite different from those of New England, and accessions have come to it from the Orthodox ranks, the distinctive characteristics referred to have gradually been lost in an increasing diversity.

Rev. Mr. Savage is a good illustration of this change. No one could be more unlike the old-time, typical Unitarian preacher. It is easy to see that, while of sufficient intellectual attainments and culture to entitle him to a foremost place in his profession, he is not enslaved by his rhetoric nor habitually mindful he is addressing a Boston audience. Although Mr. Savage would still be counted with young men, he was long enough an Orthodox minister to have made his mark in that fellowship before he passed to his present one. It is no doubt much due to this early training that he is conspicuous in a certain demonstrative earnestness, in which it has been alleged that Unitarians are lacking and recruits from the Orthodox connection generally bring with them.

Be that as it may, one is immediately struck in listening to Mr. Savage with the straightforwardness and directness of his thought and style of expression.

It is evident that he knows what he is about when he is preaching. You feel from the start that he means business, as the saying goes, and, whether you agree with him or not, that he sees clearly his mark and is making a straight line to it. As the natural association of these characteristics, Mr. Savage possesses the charm of a wholly unaffected manner both in public and private. There is in his speech and bearing a manly openness and frankness that is winning and impressive. It is rarely that a preacher appears on Sunday less got up for the occasion. It is rarely one carries into the pulpit less of a purely sanctimonious or pietistic air. Indeed, so obvious is the desire to avoid sham and pretension that something like a touch of scorn seems to betray itself in his ordinary address and accents; and many Christian people, no doubt, might conclude he is lacking in the adequate devotion and reverence for his vocation.

It will be seen, therefore, that in a very emphatic sense Mr. Savage is a preacher of the new time, and intends to be. Clearly, he believes that "Time makes ancient good uncouth,

They must up and onward who would keep abreast of truth."

In this respect, his position is quite unique. We know of no one in the pulpit in this country or elsewhere who has planted himself so squarely and unequivocally upon the principles of modern thought, and makes it so notably and largely subservient to the exposition of his views of religion. A persistent and very thorough student of evolution, he fearlessly accepts its conclusions with little less qualification than Darwin or Spencer; though, as it seems to us, with some inconsistency, resulting from his professional position and preëxisting religious convictions. It is evident that he recognizes fully that the old explanations of the phenomena and problems of life and the universe amount to nothing for those purposes, and hence there is no alternative for the honest student and thinker but to yield to the new solutions, whatever the issue may be. Of course, Mr. Savage, especially through his training as an Orthodox clergyman, is more or less familiar with the old religious and devotional literature; but there are few who show less indications of it, and apparently derive so little inspiration from its source. The literary illustrations and allusions of his discourses, on the other hand, are chiefly suggested by modern science and philosophy, and the discussions and modes of argument pursued more in the line of their principles. In other words, Mr. Savage, committing himself unreservedly to evolution, aims to substantiate by it the claims of morality and the worth and truth of religion. Indeed, he goes further than this, and seeks to make evolution compatible with Christianity, as a final religious conception and expression.

To this end, his discourses are distinguished by a special systematic purpose and relation to each other. This is particularly exemplified in his volumes the Religion of Evolution and the more recent issue, Belief in God, the freshest, most remarkable and scientific statements of religion that have proceeded from the modern pulpit. At the same time, it is not difficult to see that, with all of Mr. Savage's admiration of the evolution philosophy and enthusiastic devotion to its modes of thought, he is not a strictly consistent disciple of it. We doubt whether Herbert Spencer or any of its great expositors would indorse him as such. Indeed, the very title of his latest book is itself proof to this effect. The simple fact is, it must be confessed, lamentable as it may be, there is a relentless discordance between evolution and the office of a Christian minister, even though he be, like Mr. Savage, at the very end of that line. We know of no leading evolutionist who directly affirms the existence of God. Yet Mr. Savage does not hesitate to affirm the existence of God, but also to describe his qualities. As a Christian minister, Mr. Savage naturally prays in the pulpit on Sunday; but so little are his prayers like what usually go by that name in churches that they would hardly be recognized as such in most of them. For example, in referring to the President in his prayer to-day, he said: "We do not ask or expect of thee through our prayers anything that would not be effected otherwise"; also, "We recognize in the air of Long Branch, and in the skilful care of his physicians, and the vigor and enduring power of a constitution acquired through hardy ancestors and his own obedience to physical laws, the possibilities on which we rest our confidence and hopes; and these are to us divine agencies, Thy divine laws." The sermon was on "A New Church in a New Universe," and without a text. He described the ancient ideas, both of the physical and moral universe, and showed their circumscribed and insignificant character in comparison with those which growing knowledge and enlightenment revealed. The new church will see and proclaim that all truth is God's truth, whether the truth of Buddhism or Mohammedanism, or wherever or whenever spoken. The Bible is divine only so far as it is good and true. The atrocious things which it ascribes to God or as approved of him are slanders upon his character. Our children are as much his children as any mythological angels.

We should like to dwell at greater length upon the general excellence of the discourse, its unexampled breadth, its advanced thought, elevated and cheerful views of life and the universe, and free and independent spirit. There were some points we should like to have examined more closely, and perhaps have criticised as well as commended, but space forbids. For example, speaking of Christianity, Mr. Savage said, I look upon it but as a larger system among a number of systems. But Mr. Savage knows that, however convenient such a figure of speech may be, as a philosophical fact it is misleading. Since no one system, either of religion or anything else, belonging to the historic, moral, intellectual, or political order of man's development on this planet can be, according to the doctrines of evolution, thus discriminated or separated from others. They are each and all made up and the result of innumerable currents that have been poured into them from the varied life of the world, as the ocean gathers volume and power from myriad fountains and streams which are lost, one by one, in the onward swell and roll of its tides.

ATTICUS.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these, if at all, with great freedom.

Fruit and Seed.

Text-book, How Plants Grow, Gray, pages 77-84.

Specimens: At least one example of each of the three classes of fruit spoken of, varying of necessity according to the season.

The object of the flower is what?

What are fruits good for?

What is their use so far as the plant is concerned?

What are some of the differences between a cranberry, a peach, and a chestnut?

[Illustrate, if possible, with specimens.]

With which of these three would you class oranges and lemons.

With which plums and cherries?

With which peanuts and acorns?

Can you think of any other fruit which belongs with the berry class?

Any other with the peach class?

Any other with the chestnut class?

On this basis, fruits are divided into what three great classes?

To which of these classes do peas belong?

What is the condition of the pea when ripe?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

To which class does the squash belong?

What is the difference between a simple and compound or complex fruit?

[Illustrate, if possible, with specimens.]

Why is the raspberry a compound fruit?

Is the fruit always made of the same part of the flower?

What part of the flower do we eat in the strawberry?

What in apples and pears?

What in peaches and plums?

What in grapes and blueberries?

What part of the fruit contains the germ of the new plant?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

The parts of the seed are what?

[Illustrate, if possible, with specimen.]

What is the kernel for?

What are the coats for?

What are the downy hairs of the dandelion for?

Of what use is cotton to the cotton plant?

For what are many kinds of fruit used, besides containing the seed which produces the new plant?

Is it likely that in time all the fruit will be eaten up?

What would happen if it were?

That this does not happen shows what?

SELECTIONS.

The tree is known by its fruit.—Jesus.

A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.—Jesus.

True Bramin, in the morning meadows wet,
Expond the Vedas of the violet,
Or, hid in vines, peeping through many a loop,
See the plum redden and the beurre stoop.

—Emerson.

The stately maize, a fair and goodly sight,
With serried spear,—points bristling sharp and bright,— Shakes out his yellow tresses, for delight,

To all their tawny length,
Like Samson, glorying in his lusty strength.
—Phebe Cary.

As the plant lives to grow and bear fruit, so man lives to be and to do good.

The fruit of the vine is the grape; the fruit of the tree is the apple, the peach, the plum, or the pear; but the fruit of right thinking and loving is a pure, aspiring life.

Suggestions to Leader.—In classifying fruits, be particular to illustrate, with such specimens as you can obtain of the different classes, the points they have in common. These specimens will vary from one season of the year to another, but you can always find enough to answer the purpose.

Study 18.—The Vegetable Kingdom.

Flowerless Plants.

Text-books, Ferns in their Homes and Ours, Robinson, first three chapters, and Sea Mosses, Hervey, chap. 1.

Specimens: As great a variety of Ferns and Lichens as possible. Also, at least one example of each of the three classes of Sea Mosses, if possible.

Into what two great divisions have we found plants divided by botanists?

Which of these divisions have we already studied about?

What is the other division?

What do plants have in this division instead of flowers?

Can you mention some plants of this kind?

Where do Ferns grow?

How do they grow?

[Illustrate with specimens, if possible.]

How many kinds of Ferns do you know about?

How many species are known?

[About twenty-five hundred.]

How many of these are in that portion of North America north of Mexico?

[About one hundred and fifty.]

Have Ferns been on the earth a long time?

What did we find to show that in our study of the Mineral Kingdom?

Is it easy to see all plants growing?

Do you know of any plants which grow entirely out of sight?

What are these called?

Is it known how much plant life the ocean contains?

Is it probably more or less than the land produces?

Why should we think so?

How are Sea Mosses classified?

What is this?

[Show specimen, Bright Green Sea Moss.]

What is this?

[Show specimen, Olive Green Sea Moss.]

And this?

[Show specimen, Red Sea Moss.]

Is there a great variety in each of these classes?

When we look upon the ocean, then we may think of it how?

Are there any flowerless plants besides Ferns and Sea Mosses?

What are Lichens, and how do they grow?

[Illustrate with specimen.]

How much now may we say the Vegetable Kingdom includes?

Is this more or less than we at first thought it included?

SELECTIONS.

The woods and the sea are alike the garden of Nature.

"Dell and crag,
Hollow and lake, hillside and pine arcade,
Are touched with genius."

A sweetness which is nature's own
Breathes out from fern and brake.—Whittier.

"Far down in the green and glassy brine,
Where the floor is of sand, like the mountain drift,
And the pearl shells spangle the flinty snow,
There from coral rocks the sea plants lift
Their boughs where the tides and billows flow."

"Study Nature with reverence high, and she will give the key:

So shalt thou learn to comprehend the secret of the sea."

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,

There is a rapture on the lonely shore.—Byron.

Suggestions to Leader.—The specimen Ferns should be carefully pressed and the Sea Mosses mounted on card. The labor involved will be a great pleasure to any lover of nature. Should there be no opportunity for gathering the Sea Mosses, the cuts in the Text-book will answer. It hardly need be said that this study simply hints at two very large and intensely interesting fields of investigation, in which it is easy to awaken a lively and profitable interest.

LECTURES.

DEAR INDEX,—Allow me to refer your readers to my list of subjects published in another column. I am ready to respond to invitations to lecture on Sundays, afternoon or evening, at places that I can reach from Boston the same day, and will be pleased to hear from liberal societies and communities interested in radical thought. My address is either in care of the Free Religious Index, or 724 Washington Street, Boston.

Respectfully,

CHARLES ELLIS.

Sept. 18, 1881.

THE agony and crucifixion under Pontius Pilate, we, as before mentioned, have no desire to dispute, as not unlikely in itself, and having, moreover, the Roman historian's testimony in its support. All the more wonderful is that which now follows. The descent into hell is not attested by even one Evangelist. On the other hand, they all bear testimony to the resurrection, but not one of them was an eye-witness, and it is described in a different manner by all; in short, attested like any other event that we are compelled to regard as unhistorical. And what sort of an event? One so impossible, in such direct antagonism to every law of nature that it would require a testimony of tenfold reliability to be as much as discussed, not scouted, from the very first. Finally comes the ascension into heaven, where we know the heavenly bodies, but no longer the throne of God at whose right hand it would be possible to sit, then the return to judgment on the day of doom, a thing we can form no idea of, as we admit either no divine judgment or only such as fulfils itself hour by hour and day by day.—David Friedrich Strauss.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

THE New York Tablet contributes the following to this department:—

Flesh Saints: St. Catherine of Bologna.

A writer in the Ave Maria says: A correspondent asks me what I meant by a flesh saint, a term which I have used in my description of the saints of Bologna.

The term in Bologna and in other parts of Italy is so well understood that I did not see the peculiarity of it till the question was asked, so I hasten to explain that by a "flesh saint" is here meant a saint who, though dead, is in substance and form incorrupt. There are three of these in Bologna, who have been seen by thousands of people. They are incontrovertible witnesses of God's miracles for the edification of the weak in faith. For four hundred years and more, the Poor Clares have lived in this good city; and here, as elsewhere, they have spent their lives in prayer, fasting, and self-abnegation for the honor and glory of God, and for the salvation of their own souls and the souls of others. Many among them have been, in the eye of God, glorious saints, and yet died unknown to the world. The rules of their order are very severe. They are not allowed to see friends or to communicate with the outer world, except on very rare occasions or in case of extreme necessity. Within their convent, the utmost spirituality possible to weak human nature is aimed at. . . .

God, for his own wise purposes, sometimes allows a saint among them to become publicly known and honored; and one of these was St. Catherine of Bologna, a "flesh saint." She was of noble birth, a writer, an artist, and musician; beautiful in features and lovely and graceful in form. She looked like an angel only lent to earth. I have seen a portrait of her which was taken when she was quite young. That she was beloved in the order and elected superioress need not be a surprise: her influence was unbounded and her spirituality almost divine.

It is recorded that in her long meditations she often saw and conversed with angels, and a legend still exists to the effect that one Christmas eve the infant

Saviour came and rested in her arms on a cloth that lay in her lap. More than once voices were heard of unseen spirits who conversed with her and taught her spiritual wisdom. The proofs of these manifestations have been satisfactory to those in power to investigate, and they were well authenticated in her canonization. After her death, she was not buried, but was for thirty days laid in a vault, from which there issued such an inexplicably sweet odor that it attracted the attention of the Poor Clares, who were almost inconsolable at her departure. On visiting the place where she lay, it was found that, though thirty days had passed since her death, there was not the least sign of corruption. She was still in perfect form, incorrupt, and emitting a sweet perfume from her body. By order of the superior director, St. Catherine was brought to the little chapel of the convent, and while laying there was visited by many, who, day after day, saw no change apparent in the body. The wonder and veneration grew to such an extent that the new mother, in order to test the miracle, had the body placed in an erect position, and then addressing it said, "Mother Catherine, in the name of God, I command you to sit upon the chair placed for you." Immediately, Mother Catherine sat down; and there she has remained, in corrupt and in a sitting position, for four hundred years. Contrary to all the known laws of matter, the form has not crumbled nor changed to dust. Many miracles followed the death of this saint. To confirm the truth of this wonderful and perpetual miracle of God, once a year, on the anniversary of her death, the door of the chapel is opened to the public, who pass before her and ask her prayers. By special favor, a day or two after our arrival in Bologna, a holy priest allowed our party to go alone to the chapel and see St. Catherine. . . .

With strange feelings of awe, we entered to venerate the Blessed St. Catherine and to ask her intercession. It was radiantly beautiful, with canopy and throne of gold and silver, and rich decorations. On the throne chair, opposite the altar, sat the saint, dressed in robes of golden cloth, presented to her by St. Charles Borromeo, just as perfect in form as she was four hundred years ago; and there in that spot every year, on the anniversary of her death, thousands kneel before her and thank God for this perpetual miracle. There she sat before us, her jewelled hands clasped upon her lap and her feet upon a cushion of damask satin. Her face was dark from time, as paintings become in centuries; but around the mouth were places of the natural color of flesh. "Those are spots upon which the infant Saviour is said to have touched the saint one Christmas eve," whispered the superior. "The following morning, these remarkable signs were noticed on her face, and she with all humility confessed that a visit had been paid to her." The priest informed us that the cloth upon which the Divine Infant rested on her lap has since that time been religiously preserved by the holy Clares.

We each in turn knelt at the feet of St. Catherine and asked her intercession. The good father, to whom we are indebted for this favor, seeing our interest, and that the awe with which our hearts were filled moved us to tears, said, "Pope Pius IX. visited this saint, and had the limbs carefully examined to ascertain the state of them; and, when they were reported to be still flexible, the Holy Father raised his eyes to heaven and exclaimed, 'God is great in his saints!'"

On the right side of this throne-chair, outside the little railing that separates the saint from the crowd, is a precious case in which we saw the prayer-book used by St. Catherine, which was written in beautiful print; also her guitar, a curiously simple and primitive one, from which, no doubt, she drew angelic tones.

We were shown a gold case containing a glass bottle, in which was a clear liquid that looked like thin blood, or blood and water. We noticed that it was not quite full, and when the priest reversed it from top to bottom the liquid flowed. While we looked at it inquiringly, he said: "About a year after the death of St. Catherine there began to exude from her body a liquid so copiously that it was wiped off on fine linen cloths, and wrung out of them again to preserve it. This which you see in this bottle came from her body, and was saved nearly four hundred years ago; yet it is unchanged, as you see."

The canonization of this saintly woman brought to light numerous miraculous favors which God bestowed upon those who asked with faith the intercession of St. Catherine.

FOREIGN.

THE free conservatives of Berlin demand the introduction of laws against immigration.

FRANCE is about to settle compensation for the Spanish claim regarding the victims of the attack on Saida.

A YOUNG Bismarck is named as a possible appointee for the German ministry at Washington; and it awakens comment upon the question of appropriateness in such a step, should the rumor be sustained by fact.

THE International Congress of Americanists concerned in the investigation of American archaeology and antiquities celebrates its fourth session at Madrid on the 25th instant, with the King of Spain for its presiding officer. This society counts various sovereigns and chief rulers of states on its list of members. President Garfield is an honorary member. Its work is held in high repute in developing the history and resources of our continent.

THE London Spectator gives a glowing record of the triumph of girls and women on the university honors lists. These leading competitors among male rivals are named in abstruse and varied branches that demand unquestioned mental vigor and endurance. "Inability" will rapidly slip from the conservatives' batch of arguments against feminine scholarship under such convincing facts.

MISS MARGARET SOPHIA BRIGHT, the daughter of John Bright, was married to Dr. Theodore Cash after the Quaker fashion. A lady friend made a prayer, after which the bridegroom, taking the bride by the hand, repeated these words, "Friends, in the fear of the Lord and in the presence of this assembly, I take this my friend, Margaret Sophia Bright, to be my wife, promising through divine assistance to be unto her a loving and faithful husband until it shall please the Lord by death to separate us." Similar words were repeated by the bride, after which Mr. W. Robinson, of Scarborough, delivered a brief but impressive address to the newly married couple. The marriage certificate, which was artistically engrossed on vellum, was signed by about forty of those present.

JESTINGS.

AN Arkansas man had seven buckshot taken from his head, and remarked that quite a load was taken off his mind.

PROFESSOR of class in Butler's Analogy: "Mr. T—, you may pass on to the 'Future Life.'" Mr. T—: "Not prepared."

A LITTLE son of an evangelical clergyman "wished that he could die and go to heaven." "Why?" asks his grandmother, feeling that he is getting too good to live. "'Cause I want to get some of the pennies I've been giving to God."

A MAN who went West to "grow up with the country" has returned. He got there just in time to get acquainted with a tornado which was doing a little visiting in that section. The tornado took him up an exceedingly high distance, and showed him all the possessions of the earth, and then let him drop down again. He says he has grown enough in the last few days to satisfy him for all the rest of his natural life.

TEXAS SIFTINGS.—They were walking down Austin Avenue and talking about the camp-meeting. "I tells you I nebber seed de like. Dar was seben sisters what got ligeon last night all at wunst. Dey was lying down in de dust, a-rollin' around and a-kickin' like de berry debel was in 'em." "Did sister Malviney White get ligeon too?" "She was dar and displayed some ligeous feelin', but she didn't kick about in de dust like de rest. She had a new silk dress on, she did; and she didn't want ter spile it."

AS YOUNG Chesterfield was getting into a railway car the other evening, he turned around to bid a friend farewell. In doing so, he happened to press the foot of a young lady who was sitting next to the door. The damsel, compressing her pretty brow into an awe-inspiring frown, ejaculated, "You clumsy wretch!" Many men would have looked foolish and apologized; but Chesterfield was equal to the occasion. "My dear young lady," he exclaimed, "you should have feet large enough to be seen, and then they wouldn't be trodden upon." Her brow relaxed, her eyes sparkled, her lips smiled, and the injury was forgotten.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Saver, A. H. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keeshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

THE Old World and the New, from sea to sea,
Utter one voice of sympathy and shame!
Sore heart, so stopped when it at last beat high;
Sad life, cut short just as its triumph came.

A deed accursed! Strokes have been struck before
By the assassin's hand; whereof men doubt
If more of horror or disgrace they bore;
But thy foul crime, like Cain's, stands darkly out.
—London Punch, on Assassination of Lincoln.

O MATCHLESS perfidy! portentous lust
Of monstrous crime! that horror-striking blade,
Drawn in defiance of the gods, hath laid
The noble Syracusan low in dust!
—Wordsworth.

His life was gentle; and the elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"
—Shakespeare.

Who is the honest man?
He that doth still and strongly good pursue;
To God, his neighbor, and himself most true.
Whom neither force nor fawning can Unpin, or wrench from giving all their due.

Who, when great trials come,
Nor seeks nor shuns them, but doth calmly stay,
Till he the thing and the example weigh.
All being brought into a sum,
What place or person calls for, he doth pay.

Who never melts or thaws
At close temptations. When the day is done,
His goodness sets not, but in dark can run.
The sun to others writeth laws,
And is their virtue: virtue is his sun.
—George Herbert.

THAT regal soul I reverence, in whose eyes
Suffices not all worth the city knows
To pay that debt which his own heart he owes;
For less than level to his bosom rise
The low crowd's heaven and stars; above their skies
Runneth the road his daily feet have pressed;
A loftier heaven he beareth in his breast,
And o'er the summits of achieving hies,
With never a thought of merit or of meed;
Choosing divinest labors through a pride
Of soul, that holdeth appetite to feed Ever on angel herbage, nought beside;
Nor praises more himself for hero deed
Than stones for weight or open seas for tide.
—D. A. Wasson.

AS SOME divinely gifted man,
Whose life in low estate began,
And on a simple village green;

Who breaks his birth's invidious bar,
And grasps the skirts of happy chance,
And breasts the blows of circumstance,
And grapples with his evil star;

Who makes by force his merit known,
And lives to clutch the golden keys,
To mould a mighty State's decrees,
And shape the whisper of the throne;

And, moving up from high to higher,
Becomes, on Fortune's crowning slope,
The pillar of a people's hope,
The centre of a world's desire.

—Tennyson.

THE memorial of virtue is immortal; because it is known with God and with men. When it is present, men take example at it; and, when it is gone, they desire it: it weareth a crown, and triumpheth forever, having gotten the victory, striving for undefiled rewards.—Wisdom of Solomon.

INDIVIDUALS may wear for a time the glory of our institutions, but they carry it not to the grave with them. Like raindrops from heaven, they may pass through the circle of the shining bow and add to its lustre; but, when they have sunk in the earth again, the proud arch still spans the sky and shines gloriously on.—James A. Garfield.

CURRENT TOPICS.

LAST Sunday there were, probably, few churches, or religious gatherings of any kind, in this land, in which there were not memorial services or references to President Garfield. For once, pulpits and platforms of all sects and beliefs were united by one theme.

WITHIN four hours after President Garfield's death, Vice-President Arthur took the oath of office, as President, at his private residence in New York. He took the oath, however, again more publicly in Washington, and delivered a brief inaugural address, which was dignified, sensible, and sympathetic with the solemn surroundings.

It is quite evident that a good many editors in this country need to study the anatomy of the human body: else how account for the statement, made in so many editorial comments on the autopsy in President Garfield's case, that the ball was found behind the heart, when the surgeons' report said distinctly it was found behind the pancreas?

FOUR hundred Russian Jews passed through Germany on September 12, on their way to America. The rigors of Russian treatment are set forth by a reliable hand in Ivan Panin's statement in a late issue of the Herald, and makes it impossible for a candid mind to pronounce any verdict clearing the government of responsibility for the desperation of its subjects.

A FEW days after his election to the Presidency, General Garfield wrote to a friend in Cleveland, "I believe all my friends are more gratified in the personal part of my triumph than I am; and although I am proud of the noble support I have received, and the vindication it gives me against my assailants, yet there is a tone of sadness running through this triumph that I can hardly explain."

WE can shake hands with the Presbyterian in the following extract: "One of the secular journals suggests that a celebrated divorce case, about to enter upon a new stage, should be "disinfected" before the details are passed round the press of the country. This process of disinfection is one which is needed in several departments of our newspapers. And the only complete process of this kind, in many cases, is entire omission."

PRESIDENT GARFIELD's body was reduced by his sufferings to extreme emaciation. All that remained of it—hardly a semblance of his living self—was carried on Wednesday of last week from Long Branch to Washington, where it was placed for two days in the rotunda of the Capitol, and viewed by many thousands of people. On Friday, P.M., in presence of a great multitude of people, simple funeral services were held in the rotunda, and then the sad funeral train resumed its journey, taking the poor, worn-out body to Cleveland, Ohio, where on Monday it was committed to the rest of its mother earth, in a beautiful cemetery on Lake Erie. Impressive funeral services were not only held at Cleveland, but on the same day there were kindred services in almost every city and town throughout the country.

THE Boston Sunday Herald of September 18 had a noteworthy editorial article entitled "Harvard's Opportunity," in support of the proposition which has been broached of converting Harvard Divinity School into a broad theological department of the University, where "theology in all its branches shall be studied on a scientific basis, under the ablest men we have, no matter what may be their creed or personal convictions." So far, however, as we have seen, certainly so far as the scope of the discussion in the Herald extends, the broader plan only contemplates the making of the Divinity School unsectarian as concerns the denominational divisions of Christianity; that is, the selection of Professors according to their learning and general competency in any special branch of theology, irrespective of the question to what Christian sect they belong. But such a plan, while it might bring enlargement and fresh vigor to theological study at Cambridge, would by no means necessarily put the study on a "scientific basis." It might indeed lead further from that basis than is the present Divinity School. Merely to appoint a large number of learned Professors, representing all varieties of Christian doctrine, would not at all meet the requisite of a school for the scientific study of religion. The question would still remain, Do any of the Professors apply the scientific method in their department of inquiry? No theological school can be put on a scientific basis so long as its instructors begin with the presupposition that "Christian truth" is the limit of all truth. When Harvard shall abandon in theological study, as in its other departments, its narrow and now practically absurd motto, Christo et Ecclesiae, and return to its older and every way more appropriate one Veritas, then may the University establish a department for the study of theology on a scientific basis.

EVOLUTION AND IMMORTALITY.

A Paper read before the Brooklyn Philosophical Society,
May 6, 1880.*

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

After death, what?

"Ashes to ashes, and dust to dust." This, and nothing more. For conscious, personal existence hereafter, we cannot hope. Such is the answer often given in all sincerity by those who have broken the trammels of theological dogma and creed. Science, it is declared, has already solved this question; and its solution is the destruction of all rational hope for personal immortality.

It devolves upon liberal thinkers, believers in human reason as the ultimate arbiter in matters of faith and belief, to meet this question with the utmost frankness and fearlessness. As evolutionists, we have no right to ignore the teachings of the history of the rise and growth of the conception of a future life. As believers in the eternity, the uncreatability, and indestructibility of matter,—that within it, from the beginning of the world, lay the promise and potency of all forms of terrestrial life,—we are bound to accept honestly all that this belief implies, while we deny to matter no quality or capacity which may reasonably be deemed to hold a place among its possibilities.

I therefore ask your thoughtful attention to a brief sketch of the progress of this belief, its genesis and development, which I shall endeavor to deduce, according to the philosophy of evolution, from the facts of history and the life of man; and your careful consideration with me, if haply we may not thus discover some bearing of probability concerning the rationality of this great hope.

Time will forbid the consideration of more than a single illustration of the development of this belief during the historic period, but that, happily, furnishes the most continuous and complete example of the historic evolution of the doctrine of a future life which could possibly be afforded us; while it is of special interest to ourselves, since it pertains to that branch of the world's great religions whose doctrines and dogmas are our own inheritance. I refer to Judaism and Christianity, taken together, in their earlier and later developments.† Other religions—and, indeed, certain phases or branches of these religions—are interesting rather as instances of arrested development, enabling us to study at our leisure the phenomena peculiar to certain periods in religious evolution, but present only imperfect and fragmentary pictures of the process of growth, considered as a whole.

Origin of the Doctrine of a Future Life.

The phenomenon of death seems to have been the starting-point of all the religions of the world. The various offices of mutual helpfulness, growing out of the rude family life of primitive man, developed in his nature a new sense of the continuity of personal relationships and the germs of the altruistic tendency,—or, in popular phrase, a higher form of affection than that which exists among mere animals. Thus arose the first social tendencies, out of which have developed all government, religion, and morality among men.

When death entered the family circle of primitive man, this sense of continuity would not permit him to believe that the child or companion was annihilated. He thought that "death was but a sleep," and that the inanimate form would some time reawaken and resume the ordinary occupations of its earthly life. In this conception, in which was no thought of a soul or spirit separate from the body, we may apparently perceive man's first feeble attempt to answer this momentous question of all the ages.*

* Also read before the Manhattan Liberal Club, New York City, and the Newark Liberal League.

† The writer has also made a somewhat careful study of the doctrine of a future life as held in the other great religious systems of the world, and particularly of Buddhism, which is often classed as a system ignoring or denying this doctrine. All Buddhists, however, undeniably accept one form of this belief, metempsychosis; and whether the true conception of Nirvāna involves the extinction of conscious existence is, at least, extremely doubtful. There is considerable evidence that this was not the thought of Sakya Muni, the Buddha himself. (See many passages from the Dhammapada, Max Müller on Science of Religion, p. 179, Eugène Burnouf in article on the Buddhist Canon, William Knight, LL.D., on the Doctrine of Metempsychosis, Samuel Johnson in the Religions of India, etc.) Bishop Bigandet, a competent witness, declares that the popular conception of Nirvāna "suggests rather the idea of a Mohammedan paradise or blissful Elysian fields" (Science of Religion, p. 143).

The most Archaic Form of the Belief.

But, alas! this early hope was destined never to be realized. The dust returned to the dust, as it was; and the query forced itself anew upon his growing speculative faculties, What has become of the person, the departed life? The phenomena of sleep and dreams, of fainting, catalepsy, and trance, the perception of the shade or shadow accompanying the living person, helped to suggest the next solution. This "shade" or soul or other self had left the body, and was wandering somewhere about the earth. It needed comfort and sustenance, as when it dwelt in the flesh. Unless it were appeased by gifts, by sacrifices, and various rites suggested by these natural needs, it would become an evil demon, and torment those members of its family who owed it these duties and attentions. Hence arose the ceremonies of ancestor worship, the earliest form of religion.†

These beliefs in torpid bodies to be hereafter reanimated, or disembodied shades or ghosts possessed of malevolent purposes and powers, have existed at some time among all peoples except the very lowest, who have absolutely no religion. In their primitive form, these rude conceptions of a future existence present no moral distinctions, no division into good and evil spirits, no idea of an after life wherein good deeds are to be rewarded and evil deeds punished. They arose before the moral nature of man was sufficiently developed to be capable of making such distinctions. All bodies went to the same place. All, if appeased by suitable rites and rendered comfortable by sufficiently munificent presents, remained quiet in their earthly abode. Otherwise, they became wanderers up and down the earth, mischief-makers, vampires, or ghouls, whose business it was to torment, injure, or destroy the living.

Primitive Conception of the Underworld.

As man's intellect grew and his speculative faculties were developed, new inquiries began to be made concerning the abiding-place of departed souls. The first answer to these inquiries seems to have been the conception of a sort of underworld, or cavernous abode, where the good and bad alike maintained a torpid existence, destitute both of active pleasures and pains; whence they could sometimes be recalled, for brief periods, to earth, by the exercise of magic or enchantments or the miraculous intervention of more powerful spiritual agencies. Fetichism was likewise an outgrowth of this primitive spiritism, conceiving these wandering spirits as dwelling in physical objects, both animate and inanimate, to which worship was therefore offered,—a phase in the evolution of the religious sentiment of which there are yet survivals connected with almost all religions.

The Early Belief of the Hebrews.

The earliest belief of the Hebrews, as presented in the Old Testament, is an illustration of a very primitive conception of the condition of the soul after death, preserved by the natural and voluntary isolation of this people from contact and assimilation with more civilized nations during their earlier period, into the age of history and literature. A sketch of the nature and subsequent development and modification of this belief among the Hebrews, and of its later Christian phases, offers the most complete and continuous illustration of the historical evolution of the doctrine of a future life, and should throw valuable light upon our subject.

The word sheol—which, in our Bible, is sometimes translated "hell" and sometimes "the grave," and which literally means a cavern—was the designation of the place of the departed. Its meaning involves no idea whatever of punishment, eternal or otherwise, and can hardly be said to indicate a condition of positive consciousness or life. It was a place where the dead were supposed to be laid away, apart alike from the joys and sorrows of an active existence; but whence they might sometimes be called by the exercise of enchantments or by the permission of the Deity, as was Samuel by the woman of Endor, in which case they appeared as in life.

† The Ancient City, by Fustel de Coulanges. See also Spencer.

There are many expressions in the Old Testament, notably in Ecclesiastes, which can only be interpreted as a denial of any conscious future existence. The Pentateuch makes no mention of a future life. Isaiah says, "The grave cannot praise thee; they that go down into the grave cannot hope for thy truth." In the Psalms we read, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." This belief, rather than any conception of conscious existence, expresses the ancient doctrine of the Hebrews. Mr. Alger says,—

"In the canonic books of the old dispensation there is not a single genuine text, claiming to come from God, which teaches explicitly any doctrine whatever of a life beyond the grave."*

This conception of sheol as a place "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest," as well as the character of the Hebrew Sabbath, a day of complete cessation from labor, and the early legend of the resting of Elohim after the creation of the world, seem to have arisen naturally, in happy contrast with the restless life which the Hebrews, as a people, had led. These were the beliefs of their nomadic period, full of conflict and unrest. In their later history, other ideals were presented, and their views of the future existence were gradually changed.

Influence of the Persian Contact.

The ancient Chaldeans, Assyrians, and Persians, with whom the Hebrews were brought in contact, especially during the period of the Babylonian captivity, were profound believers in a future life and the resurrection of the body. After the captivity, more definite ideas of the existence after death entered into the literature of the Hebrews. From Babylon and Persia, they derived the story of the Garden of Eden, the serpent as tempter, the fall of man, and the conception of a hierarchy of archangels who acted as messengers of God. These, however, seem to have been regarded as an independent order of supernatural beings or dethroned gods; originating, no doubt, in the reverence paid to the spirits of the dead in the countries where these notions began, but representing to the Israelites something entirely different.

The ideas of a conscious future existence, possession by evil spirits, and dualistic conditions of life after death, were gradually evolved in the Hebrew mind, under the influence of the Persian contact. These views, however, were not universally accepted until the cessation of temple worship, after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. The Sadducees, or priestly party, inherited the ancient Hebrew faith, and believed neither in angels, spirits, bodily resurrection, nor personal continuity.† Their leaders taught that the doctrine of future rewards and punishments appealed to the selfish feelings of men, and that a righteous and just person ought not to expect any reward for his justice. Prof. Felix Adler, the accomplished leader of the new liberal movement among the Jews, seems to be, in this respect, the legitimate successor of the ancient Sadducees.‡

Doctrines of the Pharisees and Josephus.

The Pharisees, a sect which grew up in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era, and whose doctrines were adopted by the masses of the common people, accepted the Persian belief in a future life of happiness or misery. Sheol was transformed into a prison under the earth, wherein the souls of the wicked were supposed to be confined. The less wicked were sent into other bodies, afflicted with infirmities and disease, and into the bodies of animals, while the resurrection of the body and future happiness were promised only to good Jews. Other nations, both good and evil, would remain forever in their graves. It came to be a general belief that the souls of pious Israelites were transferred at death to a region called Paradise, there to remain until the Messiah should recall them to their bodies on the resurrection morning. The Valley of Jehoshaphat was to be the scene of this great reawakening, and pious Jews sought to be buried there.

Josephus, and the writers of the Talmud, accepted these Pharisaic or Persian doctrines. The historian says: "All have mortal bodies, formed of corruptible matter; but the soul is immortal, being a portion of the Divinity inhabiting our bodies. Pure and obedient souls remain about to receive a most holy place in heaven, from whence, after the revolution of ages, they shall be again appointed to inhabit new bodies. But the souls of those who shall have madly laid violent hands on themselves shall be consigned to the darkest pit.* And again he says: "What man of virtue is there who does not know that those souls which are severed from their fleshly bodies by the sword of battle are received by ether, the purest of elements, and joined to that company who are placed among the stars? that they become good demons and propitious heroes, and show themselves as such to their posterity afterwards? Those souls that wear away in and with their distempered bodies dissolve away to nothing in subterranean nights, and a deep oblivion takes away their memory, even if they be clean from all spots and defilements of this world. So that, in this case, the soul comes to the utmost bounds of its life, its body."†

It will be observed that the Pharisees and Josephus limit the promise of immortality to a very small portion of the human race.

The Doctrine of the Essenes.

The Jewish sect of the Essenes believed in pre-existence and a future state of rewards and punishments, but rejected the doctrine of a resurrection of the body. They suffered much persecution from the Romans, and bore it heroically, believing that they would live forever.† In the conception of the Essenes, the doctrine of immortality reaches its highest, clearest, and most rational development prior to the Christian era.

The Early Christian Belief.

The earliest Christian idea of the future life, as taught by Jesus and the apostles, and universally accepted by the first generation of believers, involved the resurrection, the second coming of Christ, and the establishment of his kingdom on earth in the "heavenly city, Jerusalem," during that immediate generation. The disciples were commanded to go forth and preach, saying, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. x., 7). And, again, they were told: "The Son of Man shall come in the glory of the Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here who shall not taste death until they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. xvi., 27, 28). Jesus also said to the apostles, "When the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix., 28). Again they are assured, "Verily, I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation" (Matt. xxiii., 36).

In the next chapter, Jesus again declares: "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it [my second coming] is near, even at the doors. Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt. xxiv., 33, 34). All these assurances, and more, are found in the First Gospel alone.

In the Second Gospel, we read again, "There be some that stand here which shall not taste death till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power" (Mark ix., 1). Many similar texts could be quoted. This is everywhere the teaching of the "triple tradition" of the Synoptics, our nearest approach to the thought and life of Jesus. There is no plainer teaching in the New Testament than this. The preservation of these assurances in the synoptical Gospels, and their harmony with fragments from another Gospel, in all probability more primitive, which are preserved in the writings of the early Christian Fathers,† together with the undoubted evidence of history, that these promises were wholly unfulfilled, are testimonies of the greatest weight and value, both to the reality of Jesus as a historic personage and to the fact that something of his actual teaching has been preserved to us in these earlier Gospels. For no writer of the second or third century, inventing the history of a person claimed to be a divine being or inspired teacher, could possibly have permitted such an anomaly as the introduction of these unfulfilled promises and prophetic utterances never by any possibility to be fulfilled. Much of the ethical teaching of Jesus, the doctrines of non-resistance and non-acquisition of property, are only comprehensible in connection with this primitive belief. Subsequent generations have by common consent set these doctrines aside, as wholly impracticable and impossible to realize in social life; and the fallacies of modern communism could obtain no support from the New Testament, if its teachings on these subjects were once clearly understood in their proper relation to this unfulfilled prophecy of the immediate coming of the heavenly kingdom, and the return of Jesus to the earth.

It was believed that at the second coming of Jesus those of the true faith who were still alive would never die, but become immortal at once; while the dead would rise from their graves, and join them in the heavenly city. In Corinthians, Paul declares: "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised, incorruptible, and we shall be changed" (I. Corinthians xv., 51). And in I. Thessalonians we read: "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep. . . . And the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air" (I. Thessalonians iv., 15).

The Book of Revelation, written possibly by the Apostle John himself,* describes prophetically the descending of the new city of Jerusalem, and its establishment upon the earth as the habitation of the saved. The exact dimensions of the city are given, the number of its gates and the materials of its structure. The walls are to be of jasper, "like unto clear glass," the foundations of jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, sardonyx, sardius, beryl, topaz, chrysoprasus, jacinth, and amethyst. The gates are to be twelve pearls. A very magnificent and uncomfortable place to live in evidently thinks Rev. Dr. Duryea, who said in a recent sermon that he "didn't care to sit in a great amphitheatre in a golden city, and sing psalms eternally. When he died, he expected to have a nice little cottage near a trout brook, where he could go trouting and gunning occasionally."† A very pleasant sort of a heaven for him, perhaps, if the poor trout and game were admitted to have "no rights that deceased clergymen are bound to respect."

Modifications of the Primitive Christian Doctrine.

As the earliest Christian generation passed away with disappointed hopes, and others grew up to fill their places, the expectation of the second coming of Christ and the establishment of the heavenly kingdom on the earth was gradually modified, and projected into the distant future. In the last chapter of the Fourth Gospel written probably midway of the second century after Christ, wherein Jesus is reported to have said of the "beloved disciple," "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" this expression, which would have needed no modification or explanation in the synoptic Gospels, is explained by the addition: "Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die." Subsequently, legends like that of the Wandering Jew grew up out of the attempt to fulfil some of these misunderstood sayings and promises of Jesus.

Various mystical and philosophical ideas were early adopted into the Christian faith from Persian, Egyptian, and Hellenic sources, which modified their conception of the future life. Chief among these modifying influences were the views of the Jewish philosophical sect of the Cabalists (Heb. Kabala, "tradition"), and the philosophy of the Alexandrian Jew, Philo. The former believed that all souls pre-existed in Adam, as everything in the universe pre-existed in the mind of God. When Adam sinned, all souls were thereby corrupted; but all, even the most wicked, would finally yield to the Divine Light which would appear among men in the person of the Messiah, and would ultimately be reunited with Ensoff, the Eternal Source of Being. Souls could reach this state of perfection by meditation, prayer, and virtue.

Philo taught that the Lord's chosen people would be gathered together from the four winds of heaven, under the guidance of a heavenly spirit; all nations would pay homage to the superiority of the Jews, and receive wisdom and virtue from them; the heavenly kingdom would be established on the earth, which would be ever fruitful and beautiful; ferocious animals would be subdued by the heavenly influence, and become the companions of man.*

The early Christian Fathers were not in complete agreement concerning the conditions of the future life. Origen and some others adopted the Oriental idea that the world was created for the purification of erring souls, and believed in the ultimate restoration of all men to happiness and union with the divine mind. The more common view was, however, that the earth would be restored and renovated for the elect, who would first be raised and live for a thousand years in this heavenly kingdom, when a second resurrection of the ungodly or non-elect would occur, together with the final judgment, when these would be condemned to eternal punishment in a lake of fire, which would burn, without destroying, both body and soul. The doctrine of two resurrections was taught in the Book of Revelation and also by Nachmanides, a Jewish rabbi of the first century. •

Doctrine of St. Augustine and the Catholic Church.

Augustine, an early Christian Father, whose influence was preëminent in establishing the doctrine of the Church, says that hell is located in the centre of the earth, and that God supplies its fires by a miracle. Some such conception appears to have been inherited by a majority of those who bear the Christian name to-day, including every member of the Roman Catholic Church. Vicar-General Preston, one of the ablest and purest among American Catholics, said in a recent sermon: "Catholics have no liberty on this subject. In order to be saved, they must believe. I never preach opinions of my own. What opinions I have, I confine to my own breast. I set forth to my congregation the doctrines of the Church. These declare that, at the second coming of Christ, the good will go to eternal life and the bad to eternal fire. . . . There was a very strong opinion among the Fathers that hell was in the centre of the earth. We must believe that it has a locality, and that it is a prison from which the souls of the damned cannot escape. . . . The fire will burn forever, but not consume. . . . It will burn the soul before the resurrection, and the soul and body after the resurrection. It will be a material and corporeal fire, a fire more powerful than that on earth."† These were the views of the entire Christian Church throughout the Middle Ages, and were inherited by the various Orthodox Protestant sects which arose subsequent to the Reformation. Any practical modification of this belief among any considerable number of professing Christians is of comparatively recent origin.

The Views of Swedenborg concerning the Future Life.

The materials for our discussion would be incomplete without some account of certain modern views of the future life. Two of the later sects, arising out of Christianity, assume to have received special revelations on this subject,—the Swedenborgians and the Spiritualists.

Emanuel Swedenborg, the Swedish seer, claims to have had his spiritual vision opened while yet in the body, to have visited heaven and hell and conversed with their inhabitants. Selections could be made from his writings which would convey, perhaps, as rational and intelligible a conception of the conditions of the future life as has been presented by any writer. Emerson pays him the high compliment of characterizing his work as "the most remarkable step in the religious history of recent ages." He also says: "Swedenborg described an intelligible heaven, by continuing the like employments in like circumstances as those we know,—men in societies, in houses, towns, trades, entertainments,—continuations of our earthly experience. We shall pass to the future existence, as we enter into an agreeable dream. All nature will accompany us there."

It is difficult to harmonize these ideas with other statements of Swedenborg which seem neither reasonable nor sane. He describes the universe as appearing before the Lord in the form of a Grand Man. The spirits of the dead, moved by their prevailing desires in earthly life, are drawn to some corresponding portion of the Grand Man, where they perform various functions like those of the human body. Some evil spirits enter the other life as food, and pass through all the processes of digestion, accompanied by nausea and dyspepsia. 'An adulterous spirit is described as inflicting heaviness of the stomach, and pain inside the teeth and sole of the left foot. Spirits who in this world act by artifices and lies correspond to spurious tubercles which grow on the pleura and soft membranes. Such spirits are severely punished. They are whirled around, from left to right, with great velocity, and are finally rejected to the left and back of the Grand Man, where they lie on their faces, with only a small portion of human life. Their final hell is in a deep place under the right foot, a little in front.*

This is, perhaps, sufficient for a sample of page upon page of minute description in Swedenborg's writings. If a church had not been founded upon it, and people of more than ordinary intelligence did not claim to perceive sense in it, it could hardly be taken for anything but the fanciful imaginings of epileptic insanity. It is evident from a comparison of Swedenborg's more rational teachings, as interpreted by Mr. Emerson, with these selections, that the material upon which he bases his high praise has been eliminated from the mass of verbiage and fanciful speculation in which it was buried, by a process of "natural selection," resulting in "the survival of the fittest."

Swedenborg teaches an eternal hell, but one in which the souls of the wicked are happier than they would be in heaven, because there they have free permission to derive all the satisfaction possible from the exercise of their evil propensities. He teaches also the existence of an intermediate state, called the world of spirits, which the soul enters at death, and out of which it will advance toward heaven or hell, according as its predominant desires at death were for good or evil.

Spiritualistic Conceptions of the Life after Death.

Modern Spiritualism, in its phenomenal phase, does not differ essentially from other alleged phenomena of which we have numerous relations all through the historic period. Its conceptions of the future life, however, differ materially from those of earlier times. On their more rational side, they conform largely to the views of Swedenborg, as interpreted by Mr. Emerson. Spiritualists, however, do not believe in an eternal hell, nor in the instant attainment of perfect happiness after death. Eternal progress toward a higher and better estate seems to be a universally accepted article of their creed.

In a recent work of Mr. Andrew Jackson Davis, Views of our Heavenly Home, we read that the "Summer Land," or second sphere of the spiritual world (the earth constituting the first sphere), has a definite location in the heavens, within the Milky Way.

The appearance of the Summer Land is thus described: "The flashing rivers of light flow out of the darkness of distance. They surge, with pulses of undying music. Far away they flow, over the flower-covered lands in our Heavenly Home. Over head, behold the ever-rolling suns, the ceaselessly turning planets. . . . Like a glorious dream arise the fragrances of millions of the loveliest flowers. A delightful, crystalline light, subdued by the shadows of overhanging trees, spreads everywhere from the bosom of the rivers. Broad and grand is the landscape on every side. Mountains, filled with immortal splendors; among them, the homes of unnumbered brotherhoods. . . . Beautiful birds, bright representatives of affections, pour their music through the soft summer air, making even the sweet-breathed roses tremulous, and sending musical throbbings through the fragrant hearts of the whitest lilies. Mounts and streams glow with the warmth of an overflowing love. And the laughing rivers shine with the deathless light of divine wisdom."†

In this Paradise, he describes homes, schools, universities, artistic and literary societies, and groups of "mental telegraphers," whose duty it is to communicate with the more interior universe. Mutual helpfulness, coöperation, self-culture, seem to be the chief occupations in this heaven. Particular islands, mountains, and lakes are minutely described and illustrated by maps and cuts. In certain valleys dwell the souls of those who were evil-doers on earth; but not eternally, for by slow degrees "they lift their eyes toward the soft light of the summery mountains, and then toward the starry skies," and thus begin to desire to walk in the pathways of purity.

* Arcana-Coelestia, by Emanuel Swedenborg.

† Views of our Heavenly Home, by Andrew Jackson Davis.

Absurd and materialistic as many of the notions of modern Spiritualism may appear to us, we have no right to forget that its alleged facts and philosophy are accepted by men of clear and honest intellects and unchallenged purity of life. A leading editorial in an American scientific journal of recent date declares: "In England, three representative men of the highest distinction—Wallace, the naturalist, Varley, the electrician, and Crookes, the chemist—have given the subject [of Spiritualism] thorough experimental examination. Crookes devoted four years to the labor, Varley seven, and Wallace ten; and they state in the most decided manner that the alleged phenomena are actual and real. All these scientists are Fellows of the Royal Society. . . . In Germany, five of the renowned professors of the Universities, with Zöllner at the head, have laboriously investigated the problem, and they also avow belief in the verity of the phenomena. In Russia, Wagner and Butleroff, professors in the University of St. Petersburg, after years of patient investigation, have reached similar conclusions. In addition to those named above, Dr. Franz Hoffman, of Wurzburg University, Camille Flammarion, and Hermann Goldschmidt, distinguished astronomers, and a large number of scientific men of Europe, noted for accuracy of research and great acquirements, render the same affirmative verdict."* The opinions of such men are worthy of respect and consideration, even if we cannot accept their conclusions; and every candid mind must pronounce the contemptuous and unfair treatment of this subject by men like Huxley and Tyndall to be as dogmatic and unscientific as the treatment of certain scientific theories by theologians has often been.

THE RIGHT TO CRITICISE THEOLOGY.

A man may be bad, worse, and worst, but still be tolerated by the Church (while it dislikes him), which will do the best it can to "save his soul." There are a great many gentlemen in heaven, or are believed to have secured admission there at "the last great day," who left home with their necks broken by the public executioner as a final adjustment of their relation to society. A vicious character, a bloody record, a life of crime, is no bar to the admission of such into the company of the best of the world, provided that, when they find they can defy society no longer, they profess "faith in Jesus."

On the other hand, a man may be good, better, and best. Through a long life there may have been no stain on his character; and in all that makes a man loved, trusted, and honored by his fellow-men, he may stand a conspicuous object before the world. But, if he does not belong to the Church, he is an object of suspicion to theological police. If he is known to entertain doubts in regard to prevailing theological dogmas, he is marked as a "dangerous man." If he should venture to proclaim his doubts in sincere desire to benefit his fellow-men, he is despised, hated, slandered, maligned. If he is not burned at the stake now, it is not because the theological spirit of hate is less, but because civil rights are more. While the murderer is coddled and coaxed into a belief that by professing to believe in Jesus he will become as good and pure as the best, the honest heretic is hurried to the gibbet of slander without one effort to save his soul, and vultures of hate tear him day and month and year, as a warning not against crime, but against heresy.

However much the statement may be denied, it is seen to be unquestionably true that the theological spirit is not concerned with the kind of character a man possesses, but with the creed that he professes. Now, therefore, while there are good institutions, good tendencies, and excellent men and women of unsurpassed intellectual and moral culture and character in the Church, and while the Christian religion inculcates the importance of morality, still the Church stands on theology, and is controlled by it in so much that belief in its dogmas is placed above moral conduct, and there is an antagonism between the natural development of humanity and the theological conception of man's place in the universe and the "chief end" of his existence. On one hand, man is seen to be the result of untold ages of variation, differentiation, and evolution in animal life (which we can run still further back into the development of planetary life), out of which the faculties of the mind itself have been acquired; and the moral sense, the crown of human life, has been the latest formed product of psychical development under the same general law of evolution. Our distinctions of right and wrong, of good and bad, of glory and shame, of just and unjust; our sentiments of love, of purity; our worship of the beautiful and the good,—are all acquired traits and susceptibilities, and contain the sole prophecy of continued race improvement. On the other hand, man is believed to be one in a series of "special creations" (the most stupendous of which was executed one day about six thousand years ago, out of nothing), that he was created perfectly pure, holy, wise, and immortal, in the image of his "maker and builder, God," and that sin, ignorance, savagery, and all that makes the difference between the actual condition of mankind to-day and that of Adam and Eve, as perfect creatures, is due to their temptation and unfortunate "fall." According to theology, man has been from the hour of that fall, is now and will forever be, totally depraved, is born dead in trespasses and sins, and totally incapable of being or doing anything good. It is therefore, according to this scheme, impossible that man should ever possess a moral sense. Logically, the prevailing theology is debarred by itself from an admission that man can be moral. Total depravity cannot be or become moral. Where, then, is the morality? In God. He is moral. He it is who knows what is right and good. All perfection centres in him. All besides him is imperfection. All imperfection deserves only the condemnation of perfection. The greater the imperfection, the greater the just condemnation. Total depravity on the one side calls for infinite wrath, condemnation and punishment on the other. It would therefore be perfectly just that the human race, offspring of fallen Adam, should be eternally damned to deepest woe and curse of offended Infinite Perfection.

So stands the cast of logic. But now behold the open door! The Almighty may do as pleaseth him, certainly. For the exhibition of his own "power and glory" he condescends to "reveal" to fallen man a way by which he can secure, not the moral nature which he possessed before the fall,—oh, no! not that,—but safety from the just wrath and curse of the All-perfect against total depravity. The conditions upon which exemption is to be extended and insurance placed are that the victims shall believe and accept such "revelation" as the All-perfect may choose to make as his "will" for "rule of faith and practice" unto his children. That is the theological scheme in a cocoanut. Any departure from it is destruction of the whole. Unitarian theology is an abortion. It throws away total depravity, and gives man a moral nature. It casts out fear, and substitutes moral sense as guide of life. It by this act destroyed the ancient God; and yet it simply puts a softer heart into the dead idol, and worships it as those had done from whom they dissented. Unitarianism is logically nowhere. Having cut away from the old theological conception, the only stopping-place is the solid science of evolution. Unitarianism is a sterile hybrid. Evolution is a new species. No theology will ever be worth a cent as a motive power that doesn't put mankind into a "tight place," and scare it thoroughly. But for this very reason all good theology is bad for mankind. Fear is a terrible master. It makes slaves of its victims. So I say of theology that, while there are grand men and women in the Church who have outgrown their own theology, and while I would hasten to recognize much that is excellent in the Christian religion, still its theology is bad. It restrains through fear, which keeps alive conditions of mind that should be found only among savages. That the bondage of the human mind among the advanced nations is so much less than it was a few centuries ago is due to the fact that intellectual development has lifted such people above the influence of theology. That this is true is seen, when we consider that all discovery, art, invention, and industry have been opposed by theology. That theology is less bigoted and cruel than it has been means, not as is claimed, that theology has civilized the world, but that advancing civilization has civilized theology. Thousands yet worship theology, not God, and are really good and true men and women, who foolishly believe that, if they are in themselves any improvement on original sin and total depravity, the fact is due to the saving grace of what they worship; while the one solid fact is that they are better than men and women were when savagery was universal, because the quiet but persistent natural law of evolution has been slowly but surely producing in them a moral sense which has become a guide of life to them; and in their elevation they have dragged theology, "dragon of the slime" of early life, up into modern times and conditions of thought, where it is used by priests as a horror to frighten people into subjection, just as foolish mothers yet frighten their children into obedience by threatening to call in "the bad one" and have him carry them off to "the bad place." Any attempt to teach a nobler conception of man's place, growth, and destiny necessitates a contrast with the erroneous teachings of theology on the same general topic. Hence, I have offered so much as an explanation of my hostile attitude toward theology. The few will say, "Let it alone." To the many, the battle between theology and freethought is but opening. Since the contest between Trinitarian and Unitarian there has been comparative peace for many years. The masses now living know little or nothing of that contest. The results of it they enjoy in their greater liberties. But theology is the same mountainous falsehood and misrepresentation that it was then. The battle must be fought from generation to generation, until the power of the surviving horror of early mythological ages has become so thoroughly understood that children will learn its true character at their mother's knee. Then, the race will be free from its bondage. To-day, the contest steadily rises. It will not be another Unitarian compromise. It begins where Unitarianism ended. That contest was tender emotion against ravenous demonism. It was Channing against Calvin. To-day, it is modern science against mediæval superstition. It is truth against myth, logic against guess, Spencer against the dreams of primitive humanity.

If, now, I have made it clear that one cannot treat some of the subjects touching humanity without criticising theology, and that it is right to do that when "the end justifies the means," I am ready to proceed in an effort to show the relation of theology to society and the dangers of "moral interregnum."

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect books to that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MARK RUTHERFORD, Dissenting Minister. Edited by his friend Reuben Shapcott. London: Trübner & Co. 1881.

This is apparently a romance, whose hero, an Orthodox clergyman of honest purpose, languid zeal, and moderate ability, is driven out of the ministry partly by disgust at the meanness, frivolity, and mental torpor prevalent among his fellow-religionists, and partly by his own inability to answer arguments like this: "Moreover, the commonplaces which even the most freethinking of Unitarians seem to consider as axiomatic are to me far from certain and even unthinkable. For example, they are always talking about the omnipotence of God. But power, even of the supremest kind, necessarily implies an object,—that is to say, resistance. Without an object which resists it, it would be a blank; and what, then, is the meaning of omnipotence? It is not that it is merely inconceivable: it is nonsense, and so are all these abstract, illimitable, self-annihilative attributes of which God is made up." Another specimen of the spirit of the book is what Rutherford says of public worship when he was a child: "In all the religion of that day, nothing was false than the long prayer. Direct appeal to God can only be justified when it is passionate. To come maundering into his presence when we have nothing particular to say is an insult, upon which we should never presume if we had a petition to offer to any earthly personage."

There are some powerful sketches of the dull, cold, dark homes of English Dissenters, even Unitarians, and also two portraits, which seem really drawn from life, of freethinking ladies with whom our hero falls in love. Marriage with either might have saved his life from ending in a gloom, to which the author calls attention from an evident desire to show how much the Church does to darken the lives of all who come within her shadow, no matter how faithfully they try to serve her, or how bravely they struggle to save themselves and their race from her blight.

We ought to have noticed earlier Our Little Ones for September, the second number of a beautifully illustrated and nicely printed monthly for children, edited by "Oliver Optic," and published by the Russell Publishing Co., 149 A, Tremont Street, Boston. The little ones of to-day are fortunate in having such literature as this offered to them; and the most fastidious of parents can without any fears give to their children such mental food as this offers, with the assurance that it will give the young mind an added bend in the direction of true moral and æsthetic culture.

THE Art Amateur for September.—The present rage for household decoration makes everything relating to it of interest to people generally. The Art Amateur, of which the September number is duly received, aims to supply information on this subject by furnishing designs for various kinds of work as well as reading matter. Some of the designs in this number are pretty and suggestive, but we think less space should be given to the accounts of mere trickery in picture-selling and more to real information in matters of taste.

"BABY-LAND," published by D. Lothrop & Co., 32 Franklin Street, Boston, is always "a thing of beauty" even to grown people, and "a joy forever" to those for whom it is published; and the September number is in no way behind its predecessors in beauty of illustration or in the interest of its reading matter.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. WILLIAM C. GANNETT returned to St. Paul, Minn., this week, and to his good work there.

MR. O. B. FROTHINGHAM has returned to this country, and is at present in Boston. We are glad to hear that his health is better.

MR. AND MRS. W. H. SPENCER have removed to Florence, Mass., and entered upon their work in the Free Congregational Society there.

HON. ANDREW D. WHITE, late Minister of the United States in Germany, has returned to this country, and will at once resume his duties as President of Cornell University.

"THE MAN JESUS" is the title of a new book which Mr. J. W. Chadwick has been preparing the past year, and which is to be published early in October. Many readers will be on the lookout for it.

MRS. ANNIE L. DIGGS writes from Indiana that, "if the railroads keep up their depravity and keep down their fares," she will soon return to the East with reference to certain matters pertaining to liberal organization, which is a subject very near her heart.

STEPHEN S. FOSTER, of Worcester, recently deceased, was one of the bravest combatants in the old Garrisonian anti-slavery struggle, and as sharp in logic as he was brave in principle. Mr. T. W. Higginson had an appreciative sketch of him in the Woman's Journal of September 15.

PROFESSOR JESSE, recommended for the position of dean of the collegiate department of the University of Virginia,—an institution founded by Jefferson in 1825, and now regarded as the leading educational force at the South,—is a resident of the house in which Mary Washington was born. The birthplace of George Washington is but a few miles distant from it.

TENDER, discreet, and fitting words doubtless came from myriad pulpits throughout the land, in the closing days of tribute to the martyred President; but none could have reached devoted hearers with sweeter pathos than those addressed to the parishioners of Mr. John H. Clifford, of North Andover, last Sunday. The marvellous beauty of the hills embosoming that little church is often matched by the alluring fervor and finish of its pastor's thought.

DR. G. STANLEY HALL is said to be preparing an Introduction to the Study of Philosophy, to consist of six sections; namely, Logic, History of Philosophy, Metaphysics, Æsthetics, Ethics, and Psychology. He proposes to adhere to the historic and objective method, and to give, without criticism and without detail concerning controverted points, a clear and concise conception of what mental philosophy is. Each section is to be introduced with an historical sketch; and, under the head of Psychology, it is to be hoped that Dr. Hall will indicate the methods and leading results of the recent German physiological mode of approaching the subject, which is, we believe, one of his own chosen lines of study. Dr. Hall's Aspects of German Culture leads us to look with interest to the appearance of this volume, which is to be issued by Ginn & Heath.

H. CABOT LODGE, of Nahant, urged the employment of policemen to cut off the entrance of Mrs. Livermore to the Republican Convention at Worcester, in case she should contest her right to admission as a duly appointed delegate. And Mr. Hoar, of Concord, thought "there would be as much sense in sending a trained monkey from Melrose as a cultivated woman." In coming years, these gentlemen will look proudly back upon their valorous record. P.S.—It is now said that Mr. Hoar was badly misreported,—that what he did say was, "What if Melrose send an alien—or a trained monkey?"—and that he said this in reply to an argument that every constituency had a right to send such delegates as it pleased and the Convention no right to exclude: which is certainly better for Mr. Hoar, even if not a conclusive reply. This Mr. Hoar belongs to the Hoar family, but is a young man.

A FEW months ago, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe was on crutches. We have seen no statement of her having abandoned them; but, from the dexterity with which her versatile genius has been manifesting itself during the summer weeks, we judge that she has certainly escaped from them. In July, she was reported in Vermont, speaking on educational matters in the American Institute of Instruction. Then, she appeared at the Concord School of Philosophy, giving a lecture on Kant. Next, we hear of her playing one of the leading rôles in private theatricals at Newport. A Sunday or two later, she was to preach in the Unitarian chapel at Tiverton. And now she is plaintiff in a lawsuit for the protection of her estate in Rhode Island against some infringement by the Newport water-works. As she succeeded in all the other characters, it is to be presumed that she will succeed in the lawsuit, especially if she is her own lawyer.

MR. WILEY BRITTON of the War Department at Washington, and the frequent contributor of valuable articles to the Index, is making his first visit to New England. Mr. Britton is a native of Kansas, and enlisted when a lad of seventeen in our late civil war, in which he served over three years, eventually as an officer of the non-commissioned staff of the Sixth Regiment, Kansas Cavalry. He is now taking measures for the publication of a book entitled Memoirs of the Rebellion on the Border, 1861. His experience of the rigors of warfare among the bush-whackers of that wild region, which included the Indian Territory, and the materials then busily gathered and afterward elaborated by his critical, scientific mode of thought, will commend this little volume to careful perusal. The series of papers, written for the Index, commenced a few years since, on "The Æsthetic Sense of Animals," including its development in primitive man. The topics of forthcoming numbers are "Harmony and Discord of Colors" and "Music in the Hierarchy of Æsthetic Pleasures." Mr. Britton is also the author of a set of essays that appeared, several years ago, in the Washington Sunday Chronicle, on the general subject of Evolution.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

INDIVIDUALITY.

Thou canst not judge for me,
Nor share my joy and pain:
The soul saith, "Thou art free
To own all loss and gain:
The sea may buffet thee,
But thou o'er thine must reign."

Thou canst not own him king,
And hold thyself the throne:
All souls must tribute bring,
Yet each must be alone,
And from each heart must spring
The good for all, or none.

Oh! it is sweet that those
One with themselves are true
To all,—each to disclose
Himself! Doth he undo
His human kin who show
He thus to kinship grew?

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 29, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Editor.

ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ARBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAYAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE DEAD PRESIDENT.

We were compelled by circumstances last week to put the Index in its "forms" a day earlier than usual, and hence were able to give only the most meagre notice concerning President Garfield's death. Our readers, however, all through the country and in foreign lands, know what has been happening since that night when the news came that death had released the patient sufferer. They have themselves been personal sharers in the common sorrow, active participants in some way in the national and even international funereal demonstrations with which the national grief that began three months ago has now culminated. Never was man attended to his grave by such a retinue of mourners. Never before has one man's sick-bed been watched so intently by a world's sympathy, one man's death hushed so many millions of people into reverent silence.

It is impossible that the expression of a sorrow which is so universal should not be sincere. Mourning may sometimes be feigned by a few people, whom mere nearness to the dead forces into the shows of decorum; but a whole people cannot feign a grief they do not feel. People in foreign lands will not stop to hold meetings and send messages of sympathy, to toll church bells, to gather in memorial services, unless inwardly moved by a genuine impulse of sorrow. The grief is as real as it is wide-spread.

The country is not shocked, it is true, by the suddenness of the calamity, as it would have been if the assassin had completed at once his atrocious crime. Time has prepared the nation to meet the disaster. But the sorrow has not thereby been made less, rather has it been deepened and intensified. The lapsing weeks, instead of gradually separating the suffering President from the people, had drawn him closer to their hearts, and made it harder for them to let him go. Before they had respected him as President, now they loved him as a man.

The nation mourns now, as it would have mourned if death had come three months ago when first expected, the loss of a magistrate from the presidential office who brought to the position exceptional qualifications for its high duties; a man who in intellectual gifts stood peer with the ablest in the line of our Presidents; who in some accomplishments, well befitting the requirements and dignity of the place, excelled them all; who came to the office with the advantage of an experience in public life such as none of our later Presidents has possessed; who had made statesmanship a study, and had ideals of public service much higher than the average standards exhibited among our public men; who had shown himself a wise, far-seeing legislator, a courageous leader on battle-fields and in parliamentary conflicts, a chivalrous, incorruptible patriot and defender of liberty. It is a rare fortune that the nation should have elected to its highest office a man so eminently equipped for it; and hence the nation mourns as deeply to-day as it would have mourned if he had died at once that one so exceptionally fitted for the presidential position should have been lost to it before his service had fairly begun.

But now the nation also mourns for something more than this. It mourns for the greater and better President that it is sure he would have been, if he could have been restored, after this experience of suffering, to the service of his country. While he was in the active administration of the presidential office, he was hampered and hindered by the quarrels of party factions; his time and talents were wasted by the importunate demands of office-seekers; and his own ideals of statesmanship drooped before the exigencies of partisan consideration. But these evils were such as this experience, with the wonderful national sympathy it has called for, and the lessons it has taught, would have enabled him easily to overcome, could he have been again raised to the task. Party faction would have been silenced. A strong-armed public sentiment would have barred his door against the selfish office-seeker's intrusion. He would have found no partisan exigencies dragging down his statesmanly convictions of what are the best methods for meeting the exigencies of the country's welfare. Instead of a faction or a party, he would have had a nation at his back, and an opportunity for putting all his high qualities to a patriotic service, such as perhaps has been given to no President since the days of Washington.

The nation mourns, then, to-day not only for its lost President, but for this lost opportunity. It mourns not merely for the President Garfield that was, in the four months of his active presidential service, but because it has been bereft of the President Garfield that was to be, in the three and a half or seven and a half years to come,—the country's President, chosen and anointed by the electric touch of a whole people's sympathy in a common calamity.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF RATIONAL RELIGION.

I.

Our article of last week, entitled "Bulwarks of Belief," closed with a promise of two more articles, for the purpose of stating certain fundamental principles of a rational religious faith. The first of these fundamental principles, and the only one we shall treat this week, is "Belief and Trust in the Universe." We stated this principle in a brief article in the Index of June 30, but did not then discuss its philosophy.

Such a statement, of course, may be challenged as an assumption. An objector may ask, What right have you to hold such a principle? Appearances, we know, are often deceptive. Why may not the universe, as a whole, be one grand deception, false at heart and untrustworthy? And, again, if the principle be not an assumption, and if you go behind it to give a reason for it, why may not some one else, with a wider knowledge and a keener logic, reason it away? To this, we reply, first, that the principle as stated refers not to any theory of the universe nor to any special phenomena of the universe illusive or otherwise, but to the actual universe itself in all its realities of fact and possibility, whatever they may be. The statement is, Belief and trust in the universe, not as this or that man sees or thinks it to be, but as it actually is in itself. And, secondly, we reply that the principle thus stated is grounded in the very existence of the relation between finite individual man and the universe of which he is a part. Any and every individual interpretation of this relation may be narrow and incorrect, but that does not alter the fact of the relation. The relation itself is actual, an inherent part of the nature of things; and, by the nature of things, the acceptance of the fact of relation is necessary, whether the right theory of it is conceived or not. We should affirm, then, that, primarily, the right to this fundamental principle of faith rests on a necessity of human consciousness, and that, secondarily, the principle is confirmed by human experience.

The most important point, evidently, is to explain how this principle is found to be, by logical necessity, an inherent element of human consciousness. Let us try to make this clear.

Everything that exists, whether a conscious being or an insensate object, exists, of course, in actual relationship with other things more or less immediately around it, and hence indirectly with the whole universe of things. Suppose, for illustration, some insensate object, a common stone that you pick up on the beach. It does not and cannot exist in and by itself alone. It is related to the earth, and held in its place by the law of gravitation. It is related to the tides of the sea that have washed and smoothed its surface. It is related to the atmosphere that may be changing its color. It is related to other stones lying around it, in that it is of the same kind and substance, and had, with most of them, the same parentage. And, if we knew the complete history of the stone, we might find that it was once part of a huge molten mass of matter that had its primal origin in the fiery furnace of the sun-substance. Now, if this stone could come to consciousness and be endowed with a knowledge of its own history, it must needs see itself existing in this actual relation of dependence on all sides. It must needs see that its very existence and nature are the result of this action and interaction of forces and atoms; that it is, itself, so necessarily part and parcel of the things and powers amid which it exists that it can have no possible existence outside of them. What could it do, then, but just accept and confide in all these facts as the necessary facts for explaining its own being? Together, they would make its system of truth, which it could no more think of denying or doubting than it could deny or doubt its own existence. It is itself a necessary, inherent, and harmoniously related part of the system. The conscious stone must needs be conscious of the actual fact of its dependence, of its leaning and reliance for its own being on surrounding things and forces; in other words, must needs be conscious of its own necessary trust in the facts of the universe.

Or take, for farther illustration, a growing, fruit-producing plant. The plant's relation to the surrounding system of things is just as actual, its dependence just as real, as is that of the stone, only the relation becomes more complicated because of the principle of vitality that is involved. The fact of trust in and acceptance of this system of relationships is just as much a fact as in the case of the stone; and, were the plant to become conscious of its history, it would necessarily have conscious recognition of this fact. But the plant, having the principle of vitality, would have an additional element of consciousness. Endowed with a complete knowledge of its own nature and history, it would also become conscious of the fact that the proper development of its vitality had depended on its keeping certain relations with surrounding things and forces, and shunning others; that, under certain conditions of soil, of temperature, of atmosphere, of light, it can grow more luxuriantly, and produce handsomer flowers and better fruit, and that, in the reverse of these conditions, it becomes stunted and sterile; that is, if a certain set of relations or a certain order of facts be established with its surroundings, it can trust that surrounding world, through those channels of relation, to pour into its being just the elements needed for increasing its vitality and enriching its productiveness. Here, therefore, the trust that comes from experience is added to that which must exist in the very nature of things where two or more things or beings are by fact dependent for existence one upon another. The reliance or trust, existing in fact, must needs appear in the consciousness as soon as there is consciousness enough to take cognizance of the fact. And experience, as it develops, confirms the evidence of consciousness as trustworthy.

Now, what we have here supposed of the stone and the plant represents the actual state of mankind. Man lives in a world of vastly more complicated relationships, but the conditions of relationship are essentially the same; and man has the added faculty of consciousness. He lives in an immense world of facts behind him and around him, to which he is organically related through his whole nature,—facts material and facts mental, facts from which he can no more get away than he can get away from himself. Without them, he never would have been; without him, they would not be what they are. He is part and parcel of them and with them, sharing indissolubly in the nature of the universe which has produced him. Inherently, therefore, must every sane mind accept and trust the universe in which it thus lives and moves and has its being,—trust its laws, its forces, its operations. Being conscious at all, it must needs be conscious of the tie by which it is vitally related to the universe of which it is a part. The newly born infant, in whom individual consciousness is barely developed and before it has the power of reflective consciousness, is at least cognizant of the fact of its relation to the motherly provision nature has made for its sustenance, and it trusts the provision without a question. This gives us a hint of the larger trust which the human mind must have in the universe from which it has come and on whose breast it reposes: it has inherent assurance that through the actual tie of vital relationship it is connected with genuine sources of supply. And, the wider and more exact grows its knowledge of this relationship of necessary dependency, the firmer and greater must grow the trust. The dependency, the leaning, the reliance,—that is, the actual relationship itself,—is the trust in fact; and, as soon as the knowledge, or consciousness, of the fact comes, it is consequently immediately translated into a sentiment of trust.

And more true, also, is it of man than we even supposed it to be of the plant, that his knowledge of his relationship to the universe includes the knowledge how he may so place himself as to increase and enrich his own vitality. He may select conditions to further his growth. If, instinctively and intuitively, before there was any reflective consciousness of his relations to the surrounding world, he yet trusted in those relations for maintaining his existence, so, after consciousness is fully developed, he knows by his own and the aggregated experience of the race into what attitude he must put himself for promoting and enriching his life in all its manifold activity. He knows that, to every man's effort to establish normal and harmonious relations with nature, she will respond by some increase of benefit. The effort is itself the cause that opens the gateway of supply. The testimony of experience is added to that of consciousness, that the vital channels by which man is connected with the surrounding universe may be trusted to bring to him needed good. On mental and moral fields as on material, let him sow the right seed, keep good the soil, tend the plant, and nature will produce the appropriate harvests. By this knowledge of vital relationship to the world's forces and facts, expressed in a co-operating deed, man stands with his hand on the treasury of the universe, with confidence that its bounty will be unlocked for him. He is so connected with its vital resources that he cannot fail to receive of its best life, if he places himself aright; in other words, he necessarily accepts and trusts the universe as true to him.

PROFESSOR ADLER UPON THE DEATH OF PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

The appreciation of Felix Adler in Boston does not fall far behind that in New York, as is always shown whenever the opportunity presents itself. But, unfortunately, this is not often. His comings and goings are rather tantalizing. Once a year, the annual meeting of the Association over which he presides draws him hither; and there is usually a floating report, two or three times during the interval, of his passing through the city, or tarrying here for a day, though scarcely any one knew it. These brief and infrequent visits comprise the sum of the favors of its kind bestowed on his friends in this locality. Apart from the circumstances of the occasion, therefore, it was but natural that he should have attracted a large congregation at the Parker Memorial Hall last Sunday. The mournful event of the week excluded here, as in all like gatherings, every other theme. The discourse was prefaced by appropriate reading and singing. We shall attempt, in what follows, a summary of its leading points, though without the pretence of a report of its eloquent and impressive verbal expression. It was Daniel Webster, we believe, who said that eloquence consisted in the man, the subject, and the occasion. Two of these conditions every preacher in the land possessed last Sunday, and it was impossible for even the most ordinary one to fail of eloquence. The discourse called into the fullest exercise Professor Adler's mental characteristics. Every word and sentence, from the beginning, seemed fitted into telling and harmonious accord with the emotion of the hour. They were solemn, earnest, thoughtful, now full of tenderness and pathos, now charged with fierce denunciation and withering scorn, conveying impressive warnings, or stirring with the inspirations and hopes of glowing delineations of lofty national and personal ideals.

It is a day, said Professor Adler, like that described in the old Hebrew scriptures, when the mourners went about the streets, because the beauty of Israel was slain and the mighty had fallen. It is not a day for prayer, but it is one for humiliation. Never has the utter inefficiency of prayer to bend the laws of nature to the desires of man been so conclusively demonstrated. The first thought that comes to the mind is the inadequacy of the motive which was the cause of this great sorrow. We had heard of the Emperor of Russia suddenly and secretly assailed, torn, bleeding, and dying in the public highway; of the Emperor of Germany carrying for months the visible effects of a similar attempt upon his life; of the threats and conspiracies of the Nihilists concerning their rulers and the officials of European States. But in all these instances there were principles of political oppression in action, which explained, even if they did not excuse, these acts. But in this country there are no dynastic connections that set the ruler apart from the people. A few months ago, we should have considered such a deed impossible. Our journals spoke with pity of European sovereigns. The crime was therefore as much one of amazement as horror. It has been attributed to the spoils system. The influence of this dangerous element of our politics is so great that it tends to impel the place-hunter on, until he does not shrink at last from murder, when foiled of his purpose. It may be that Guiteau was partially insane; but the question is, Are we not responsible for his insanity? There is a great lack of a becoming reverence for those who stand in the high places of the nation's honor and trust. There is an unchecked tendency to extravagant and even brutal criticism of them. We have not forgotten the coarse epithets that were hurled at the pure character of Lincoln. It may be said that the public interest demands free discussion; but are there not limits to the decency of such discussion? If our people had been educated in a rightful respect for their rulers, there would not have been found one person in all the land to raise his hand against him in whom the majesty of the law was embodied. Let the people heed the lesson which rises from the bier of the murdered President,—of a greater respect for those who fill its exalted stations. Even the sublime statement that all men are born free and equal is susceptible of gross misapprehension and perversion. It may stimulate a morbid and extreme ambition. There is a very active and prevalent disposition among our people to seek for notoriety. The wretch who compassed President Garfield's death was restless under the sense of his obscurity. He conceived he had a mission to fulfil, to set right the public condition. It is thus that overstimulated ambition begins with a farce and ends with a tragedy.

There has been associated with the central personage of these weary weeks of baffled hopes and suffering, one who has scarcely less enlisted the interest and sympathy of the people. There has been a lady in the White House, with her children, watching at the bedside of pain with a calm, self-repressed, and faithful endurance that has called forth profound admiration, and made her as an ideal of womanhood. The sympathy outside has been universal and real. There has been but one loathsome exception,—everywhere but in the stock market has the event appeared for the time to displace all thought of its relation to private interest. But here, so absorbing has been the power of greed and the love of gold that men, unmindful that yonder a woman's heart was breaking, could speculate upon how much money they might make by her husband's death. There has been much comment in regard to the effect of the event upon business; and the assurance has been complacently given that business is not likely to be disturbed, as though this were the chief thing to be thought of at such a time.

It is said of the new President that he is an honest man. To what a pass have we come, when honesty is mentioned in connection with the Presidency! What is demanded of a President is to preserve the status quo of prosperity! Is not his first duty, rather, to study how this country may be advanced to a more perfect civilization, and avoid the evils of the older civilizations?

It is our duty to give to the government our support. There are many questions to be considered. There is the question of education, North and South and in all the States; the question of the people's land, how it shall be kept safe to the people's use; how the great monopolies may be broken; we want the political conventions to give us for our votes statesmen in the place of politicians, those who will make the country's good their aims instead of their personal interests. We can only watch, and hope that the new President may be chastened by the general grief; that he who has been called to the chair of Washington, Adams, and Lincoln, may emulate their virtues.

But there are feelings of joy as well as humiliation to-day. I would dwell upon the spirit of President Garfield rather than his death, upon his noble and manly example. The gentleness, cheerfulness, and heroism he exemplified during his sickness, the elevation of will-power in aid of the physicians,—it will make many a death-bed lighter.

Professor Adler presented a series of mental pictures of the late President as he mounted from height to height of power, illustrative of the freedom of our political institutions. Where else in the whole world could the prophecy be ventured that the peasant's son should rise to be the magistrate of fifty millions of people. Does it not show that the people govern here in America, and need no man to govern them? Let the nations of the world take to heart the lesson that the people can be trusted. May our people find true leaders who shall be great beacon-lights of character and progress! Let every citizen seek to make noble men and measures triumph in American politics. Under the yew-tree, North and South, through the influence of this great sorrow, shall join hands as they never have before. May the country also be consecrated to the new ideal of working out a truer and better political and social liberty for all mankind.

ATTICUS.

HEALTHY PROPORTION.

Overgrown truth becomes falsehood; swollen beauty spreads out into deformity; and rankly aspiring virtue topples over into vice. Whatever the inherent qualities of a system of belief or action, it is liable to injury or defeat through over-stimulus, and needs all the prudence, oversight, and candor of judgment, in the comparison of side issues, that can be brought to bear upon it. No other course can secure true vigor and symmetrical growth. One-sided estimates are as sure of uprootal as the hold of a sapling in the loose sand of the ocean's edge. Mr. Holyoake says: "My experience teaches me that the ranters are precisely those who become reactionaries. The maddest, most violent, abusive, and intolerant Freethinkers, who have heretofore put themselves forward as the only bold advocates, have turned round when the enmity and disgust they have created have come home to them, and become defamers of the party they did their best to ruin. Bluster is not courage. Cowards make most noise in the dark. Manly, considerate, quiet perseverance indicates more real intrepidity, goes a thousand times further, and can be better depended upon. These are the qualities I have always honored, wherever manifested; for they alone carry a movement forward."

Mr. Underwood, in a recent discourse at Parker Memorial Hall, presented the truly rational bearings of liberal belief, by giving prominence to the basis of truth underlying even the extreme and repulsive features of rank Orthodoxy. The philosophy of Lewes was commended for its distinctive character in the reconciliation of the intuitional and experiential schools of thought, and a deliberate and searching estimate given to the worthy and admirable essence lying at the root of the discarded tenets, and capable of administering to noblest effort, if unexaggerated. Reasoning like this, which disarms caprice and begets amicable readjustment of useful elements in hostile creeds, betokens the sort of constructive efficiency for which the reflective world is waiting. J. P. T.

THE following is from a private letter from Mrs. Annie L. Diggs, of Kansas; but it is too good to keep private, and we trust to her forgiveness for printing it:—

Isn't it pitiful that we rational religionists are so desperately poor? Just think! We have absolutely nothing to set up church-keeping with. We have no buildings, no organs, no music, no song-books, not even a steeple to begin with. If the Orthodox church-mice are so very poor, I wonder how our church-mice manage to get along. When one is all aglow with the desire to give hospitable welcome to some fine accession to our ranks, it's slightly depressing to think what poor entertainment we can offer. We can grasp them warmly by the hand and bid them be as free as air, and the free air is about as substantial fare as we can give them until they go to work and earn their own way. If we only had something to start with! Why, I have known a company of Liberals to meet for purposes of "mutual improvement" and sing "Rescue the Perishing" from the Moody and Sankey book, just because there was nothing else familiar to all. Nevertheless, we need not be discouraged. The first few successes, which we will soon have, will make the rest easier; and I grow more and more certain that the tendency and the desire are set toward construction.

SOME of the politicians convened at Worcester last week, at a certain point of the deliberations, fell into a little panic, such as afflicts rural bovines at sight of a woman's apparel in their vicinity; and, with considerable effort on the part of braver members, the excitement was only sufficiently allayed for the necessary routine of pasturage by keeping the strangely garbed delegate very quiet in the corner. The earlier report of proceedings led one to fear a parody might be enacted of a familiar gospel scene, wherein by the entrance of an evil genius "the whole herd ran violently down the steep" and were choked.

THE International Congress of Astronomers held at Strasburg last week had, for one point of consideration, the establishment of a universal system, of communicating by telegraph all astronomical discoveries or data. Boston had a prominent interest in this matter; and the Science Observer Code was presented by Dr. Copeland, who has received and distributed the comet messages of the past few months, in its actual test.

THE History of the Christian Religion, by C. B. Waite, Esq., of Chicago, has passed to a third edition. A new preface of ten pages has been added.

OLIVE LOGAN says that English doctors are so scrupulous about "professional ethics" that she heard considerable comment in London, recently, because Dr. Austin Flint's baggage was marked conspicuously with his name and address, his English professional brethren deeming it an indirect advertisement.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Lord Derby on Co-operation.

THE inaugural address of Lord Derby at the late Co-operative Congress in Leeds, England, is given in the New York Co-operator for July, and along with the addresses by Thomas Hughes, Lord Houghton, and Hon. R. M. Milnes, gives valuable light on the subject of English co-operation. His Lordship values co-operation, in the first place, as opposed to the scheme of State aid for the working classes, which is in essence Socialism. "Voluntary associations," he says, "on a large scale, asking no help from the State, but only freedom and non-interference, are a marked and peculiar characteristic of our age; and it is to my mind not the least of the many merits of this co-operative movement that it is to be kept strictly within the limits of that principle." He then proceeds to enumerate the special benefits of co-operation: First, it allows no dishonest work or adulteration, and is effectual in this respect, since it puts duty and interest on the same side, makes the interest of the buyer and seller identical, and thus accomplishes "without fuss or parade or pretensions to superior virtue" what moralists have been in vain preaching for "from the earliest days of civilization." Lord Derby has little idealism or enthusiasm; he is rather, as Lord Houghton aptly characterized him, "a king of common-sense." "I should have no great faith," said he, "in the permanence and extension of a movement which required on the part of its promoters a standard of morality and character considerably higher than that which generally prevails. To frame a society perfectly unselfish, in which a man should consider his neighbor's interest as he does his own, is a pleasant dream." Though we may take exception to this, it is at least interesting to find that an ideal for industry, which many in this country are apt to regard as a fanciful scheme, can be defended purely on common-sense grounds. Second, co-operation abolishes the credit system. Third, it is the most promising scheme for closing the long-standing differences between labor and capital. Arbitration is declared to be an imperfect remedy. Trades unions with their strikes may be granted all possible freedom of action, and managed with the utmost skill and prudence; and yet, "to my thinking," says Lord Derby, "in the battle which they carry on, capital will win in the end. The reason is very obvious: the employer can afford to wait longer than the employed, having reserve funds to fall back upon, which the laborer has not. And yet, he continues, "if no remedy be found, if class differences widen instead of narrowing, the prospect is not cheerful. Given the condition that nearly all political power is virtually in one class,—as under a system of household suffrage it is,—whenever that class chooses to take it, and that nearly all the surplus wealth which men desire to possess is in the hands of another class, how long will you be able to avert an explosion? It is an awkward problem; and, like a nasty brook or fence to a hunting man, the longer you look at it, the bigger it seems. Yet in one way or another we have to face it; and it is my deliberate belief that you, the co-operators, if you have not solved the difficulty altogether, are at least moving in the direction which promises the most effectual and the most equitable solution."

He concludes this portion of his address by saying, "If you accomplish these [three] things, you will have done more for the world, or rather that portion of it which adopts your ideas, than has been done, or is likely to be done, by any other agency with which I am acquainted."

He then gives certain sensible cautions, replies to certain objections, advocates agricultural co-operation, remarking that land now in England is cheaper to rent or buy than it has been for the last twenty years, urges the investing of surplus capital in building houses for members, and concludes with these astounding figures: in 1861, "you had 48,000 members; in 1871, 249,000; and in 1879, 504,000." The capital in 1862 was £365,000; in 1871, £2,530,000; in 1879, £6,700,000 nearly. The net profits in 1863 were £166,000; in 1870, £670,000; in 1879, nearly £1,600,000.

The Co-operator well deserves the encouragement and support of all friends of reform, if it is able often to present such material as this notable address of Lord Derby's. The full time, the pressing necessity for co-operation, has, perhaps, not yet come in this country as it has in England. Men are not permanently settled into classes here as there; and most individuals, though their own chances may not be great, prefer to take them, rather than to sacrifice the possibility of exceptional individual success by linking their fortune with that of others. But, though the present economical motives are not so strong, tendencies toward an undesirable state of things may be seen clearly enough; and, rather than await the "nasty brook or fence," of which Lord Derby speaks, is it not the part of prudence, not to say religion, to anticipate and, if possible, ward off the event, by devising some other and juster system of industry than now prevails? W. M. S.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

MAJOR PINTO, in his work How I Crossed Africa, gives some account of the Mucassequeres, who occupy jointly with the Ambellas the territory lying between the Cubango and Cuando,—the latter dwelling on the rivers and the former in the forests. The Mucassequeres are styled the true savages of South Africa, and appear to be at about the lowest point of the human scale. "They construct no dwelling-houses or anything in the likeness of them. They are born under the shadow of a forest tree, and so they are content to die. They despise alike the rains which deluge the earth and the sun which burns it, and bear the rigors of the season with the same stoicism as the wild beasts. In some respects, they would seem to be even below the wild denizens of the jungle; for the lion and tiger have at least a cave or den in which they seek shelter, while the Mucassequeres have neither. As they never cultivate the ground, implements of agriculture are entirely unknown among them. Roots, honey, and the animals caught in the chase constitute their food; and each tribe devotes its entire time to hunting for roots, honey, and game. They rarely sleep to-day where they lay down yesterday. The arrow is their only weapon, but so dexterous are they in its use that an animal sighted is as good as bagged. Even the elephant falls a prey to these dexterous hunters, whose arrows find every vulnerable point in his otherwise impervious hide." These two tribes are described as very unlike in personal appearance. The Ambellas is a black, of the type of the Caucasian race; the Mucassequere a white, of the type of the Hottentot race in all its hideousness.

It is evident that the Popular Science Monthly holds in much less esteem the exposition of Zöllner of the phenomena of Spiritualism than the adherents of the movement, who betray, notwithstanding the frequent occurrence of science in their vocabulary, a striking inaptitude for the applications of its methods. In a recent number of the Monthly, Zöllner is touched off as follows: "It would seem that Professor Zöllner has got tired of being shut into the common field of natural law as a theatre of research, and was determined to break out and get into a larger and more promising field. Hence, he properly terms his new results 'Transcendental Physics'; that is, physics beyond the sphere of the senses. We doubt if the time has come for so ambitious an adventure. Old-fashioned physics is still in its infancy, though its growth is vigorous, its accomplishments already vast, and its legitimate promises boundless. After thousands of years of groping to find the true method of arriving at the truth of nature, that method has at last been found and abundantly verified as opening the right path of future inquiry. Yet the method has been really but just mastered; and we think it would be wise if our physicists could content themselves to pursue it humbly and faithfully for—say the next thousand years. . . . But Professor Zöllner has hardly yet learned the rudiments of his scientific lesson. Nature, as disclosed to the common intellect of man, is not sufficient for him. He scorns its limitations, and is bound to know what is outside. So, at the very opening of his book, he makes a grand transcendental somersault, and comes down—Heaven save us!—in the fourth dimension of space. Zöllner is free, but we poor worms of the dust cannot follow him. We have all we can possibly do in three dimensions of space, and it will be a considerable period before this is exhausted. Let those who are inclined buy the Transcendental Physics, and follow its author if they can. Yankee enterprise is proverbial, and there will no doubt be many who hold to the inspiring motto of the daring Sam Patch, that 'some things can be done as well as others.'"

INASMUCH as the brain is the organ of mind, all inquiries in respect to its nature and action become of great interest. Owing to exceeding subtilty of the research which such inquiries involve, progress in this department of science has been much slower than in some others. There are, however, signs of an increasing class of special students of its problems, and the subject is beginning to receive attention commensurate with its importance. We find in the July number of the American Naturalist an address by S. V. Clevenger, M.D., on "The Origin and Descent of the Human Brain," delivered before the Chicago Academy of Science, which may be referred to this connection. Touching the general conformation of the brain, Dr. Clevenger has this to say: "The most general interest centres in this large mass of nerve-fibres and cells called the 'cerebrum.' In the ornithorynchus, it is smooth and simple in form; but the beaver also has an involuted brain, which shows at once the folly of attaching psychological importance to the number and intricacy of folds in animal brains. With phrenology, which finds bibativeness in the mastoid process of the temporal bone, and amativeness in the occipital ridge, the convoluted controversies must die out, as has the old so-called science of palmistry, which read one's fate and fortune in the skin-folds of the hands. The most noticeable change in form, as we pass up the scale of mammalian life, occurs in the production of the fissure of Sylvius. In most quadrupeds, the olfactory lobe fills up largely the anterior part of the cranium. As the smelling sense diminishes, this lobe degenerates to a mere tract, and the frontal lobe of the brain increases in size, lifting the forehead into a vertical plane. The medulla is pushed forward to a less oblique angle with the front of the brain, from Lemuridae to chimpanzee and man, and the frontal lobe pressure covers the cerebellum with the backward progress of the occipital, till finally the occipital forms the temporal by curling under and forward, forming the Sylvian fissure. These stages of progress are evident in the horse, elephant, and human embryo. Often in idiots we find, through want of development of this frontal lobe, that ossification takes place in a plane inclined at an angle corresponding with that of lower animals, and the cerebellum is uncovered. This is an adaptation of the skull to its contents, which, however, does not always take place. There are other elements at work to cause the skull to develop normally, or even enlarge it abnormally; as, for example, an accumulation of water in the ventricles will change the relative position of the cranial bones to such an extent as to give to the hydrocephalic idiot the 'front of Jove.'"

D. H. C.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MILWAUKEE, Sept. 14, 1881.

On Sunday, August 28, an order was issued by Archbishop Heiss, associate and now successor of Archbishop Henni, since deceased, to the Catholic pastors of this city, to the effect that all Catholic children, whose parents desire them to receive their first communion and confirmation, must attend the parochial schools of their respective churches for at least one year before they will be received into the church. Parents were notified to send their children to the Catholic schools that were to be opened on September 5. The Catholic element, which is large in Milwaukee, claims that in contributing its proportion of the $200,000 for the working expenses of the public school system in the city, and supporting in addition the schools associated with the Catholic churches, it is unfairly handicapped. It urges that religious instruction is carefully eliminated from the public schools, and that the children of Catholic parents should be instructed in the Catholic faith.

The order of the archbishop has created quite a sensation in both religious and secular circles. It is certainly an inevitable and legitimate course on the part of Catholics, but also proves that this most important issue is rapidly receiving its due consideration. The question involves the entire system of public education, and will grow in national importance year by year. It is thought by some that it is to assume considerable importance, in a political sense, before the opening of the fall campaign. It is one of the vital questions which secularists hold imminent in their efforts at State secularization. There can be but one opinion in regard to the importance of the question, whether viewed from the religious or secular standpoint. This order of the Catholic priesthood shows, at least, how our common schools in Milwaukee are conducted,—namely, upon secular principles; and this reflects great credit upon the intelligence of our community.

The result of the order was made a special object of investigation by our newspaper reporters, who visited both the public and parochial schools on the opening day. An increased attendance was noted in the Catholic schools, but the public schools showed a much larger attendance than is usual at the beginning of the fall term.

While upon the subject of public schools, I will mention a circular which came to my hand to-day. It is entitled "Our Industries and our Public Schools," and sets forth the value of technical education, and the increase of schools of technology in Germany, France, and Switzerland, with the result of sending into the world a class of artisans and technical professionals of great intelligence and ability. It gives succinctly the status of studies pursued in the higher grades of our common schools, and deplors the fact that nothing is taught which has any direct bearing upon the trades and professions the pupils intend to follow; that natural philosophy, chemistry, and elementary works on physics, and such practical studies, do not enter the school course until a period when half or more of those who enter the high school have left it to go out into active life.

The circular concludes with the following forcible remarks: "The truth cannot be concealed that our public schools are not conducted upon the principle that public education is for the public good. Their real aim is made the promotion of literature, while the intelligence which makes skilled artisans, builds up factories and workshops, which spreads to the breeze the wings of commerce, and thus makes a people materially, morally, and intellectually prosperous, is frowned upon as commonplace and unrefined. There should be reform in this respect. Our schools should be for the people, and the lessons taught should be such as will benefit them both materially and intellectually. This done, refinement and literary culture of a higher order will be a natural sequence, and not, as now, a grievous burden of sickly growth and enduring immaturity upon our educational system."

There is no signature to this pertinent statement of facts and appeal for reform; but it is eminently sound, and is significant of the progress in Milwaukee of advanced ideas on the part of a few at least.

Sunday secularization in this city renders it a representative city in secular advance. The mass of Milwaukee people spend Sunday in recreation. A combined effort of the entire ministerial body, including the Unitarian, early in the season, endeavored to prevent the running of Sunday excursion trains on the different roads centering here. The effort was not wholly successful. The Chicago and Northwestern road complied with the request of the ministers, but the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul road has run through the summer regular Sunday trains at reduced rates to the various summer resorts for which Wisconsin is famous. These trains have been liberally patronized.

The open-air Sunday concerts are well attended by all classes of society. At the National Asylum for Disabled Soldiers, regular Sunday promenade concerts are given by the Home Band, that often are attended by several thousand people. The German gardens, of course, are crowded on Sundays.

The theatrical season opened the past week, and the management of the Academy of Music instituted a series of popular Sunday matinees at the low price of twenty-five cents for first-class entertainments. Last Sunday there was the biggest audience that ever assembled in that theatre. It was a light comedy company, which presented only a trifling performance; but it was well received and greatly enjoyed. I fancy Dr. Felix Oswald would have rejoiced to see that vast crowd of people, changing the current of their busy lives, taking "mirth for medicine" to relieve the strain of worry or routine, and "defying," as he advises, "Sabbath laws" and prejudices, and proving his assertion that "almost any diversion is better than the deadly monotony of the Sabbatarian machinery."

The first Industrial and Art Exposition that has ever been held in Milwaukee was formally opened in an exceedingly fine new building the past week. I note that at a meeting of the directors the subject of opening the Exposition on Sunday, or a part of Sunday, was broached. No decision was reached at that time, and I was hopeful that this would not prove the exceptional instance of prejudice rising above principle in Milwaukee. The decision, however, has not realized my hope. The only reasonable reason that can be given against thus opening the Exposition is that of the laborious efforts of the employes in the building, who should have the Sunday respite. This reason is urged as the primary one, seconded by the statement of the fact that the Exposition is kept open until half-past nine every evening, so that all can attend. But the evening attendance, though large, does not include the laboring classes, who would gladly avail themselves of the privilege of a Sunday visit for themselves and families. The laboring man and woman are altogether too weary at night to tax their energies still further. The night is their time to rest and recuperate for the coming day of labor. Sunday afternoon is devoted by them to recreation. The educational advantages of the Exposition would benefit a large number of working people. It is they who are specially interested in industries; and art in an attractive form would be enjoyed, if not critically appreciated, by them. I am obliged to confess that Milwaukee is behind other cities in this one particular. Probably, the pressure is too strong that is brought to bear upon the management by a class represented by one of our well-known citizens, who said "he hoped lightning would strike the exposition building, and burn it to the ground if it was opened on Sunday."

The picnic and procession of the Trades Assembly on Sunday afternoon, two weeks since, was an occasion pleasant enough to take away the bad flavor of that sweet Christian speech. This procession included bodies of men belonging to the different trades-unions; artisans, representing nearly all the various industries of the city, who marched through the principal streets, accompanied by several bands of music, and afterward repaired to Milwaukee Garden, where speeches and different exercises made an enjoyable afternoon. A finer-looking body of men could scarcely be seen on any occasion. This was commented upon by the press generally; and the intelligent faces, the manly but modest bearing of these working men were noted by all who saw them. Certainly, our public system of education should provide the best possible advantages for the rising class of artisans, who will continue, as now, to enrich the nation and enhance its material greatness.

It was a noticeable fact that the proclamation of our mayor, which supplemented the governor's proclamation for a day of prayer for the recovery of the President, was less offensively worded than others I have seen. He did not impose prayer upon the citizens, but said, virtually, that, the mid-day hours having been set apart by the governor of the State for religious services and prayer, he would suggest that places of business be closed during these hours, and the time be spent by individuals in expressing sympathy for the President as seemed to them best. MR. STEBBINS REPLIES TO MR. HUNT.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 17, 1881.

Editor Free Religious Index:—

My brief word in your columns in July last has done good: it has called out a reply from my esteemed friend, Seth Hunt. I do not wish to answer him at any length, and see no reason for changing the conclusions of my letter, which are based on considerable observation, here in the West especially, and on the thought such observation has called up. But I do wish to say that the Cosmian Society, at Florence, Mass., of which Mr. Hunt is a valuable supporter, has done, and is doing, a useful work. The success of such efforts depends much on the spirit and character of the persons engaged in them. Judgment, honor, a desire for the common good, and for truth, and especially mutual respect for honest opinions, like or unlike, are found at Florence in such persons as Messrs. Hunt, Lily, Hill, and others, to a degree seldom reached, and hence their success. Constructive thought, as well as action, has also a large expression there. Doubtless, they can see ways in which they may improve. I find men sometimes who make such poor use of good methods that I can't act with them. Sometimes, I find men making such good use of imperfect methods that it is a pleasure to act with them. There is much in the Cosmian methods to approve, some things not perfect of course; but the management is such that, when it is my privilege to speak for them, I feel entire ease and freedom, as do others who may not think quite as I do; and so it is a great enjoyment to go there,—an enjoyment heightened by meeting old and valued friends.

A word on another topic. I see in your Index a quotation from the New York Times to the effect that all efforts for a revision of our tariff system are met by the united opposition of the "protectionists," manufacturers, and others. Now, I happen to know personally that the so-called Eaton Tariff Commission Bill (its author a Democrat, and not a protectionist) has had the cordial support of the great manufacturers of different kinds all over the land, and that iron, steel, woollen, wool, and other industries have indorsed it as a measure for wise tariff revision, and approved its hoped-for passage by Congress at Washington. Other like matters from the Times I have noted in your paragraphs, which it is probably foreign from the scope of your journal to discuss at length; and so this one statement must suffice to show how poor an authority, from ignorance or worse, the Times is on that question.

Yours truly,

G. B. STEBBINS.

"CHRISTIANITY in common with Buddhism," says Strauss, "teaches a thorough cult of poverty and mendicity. The mendicant monks of the Middle Ages, as well as the still flourishing mendicancy at Rome, are genuinely Christian institutions, which have only been restricted in Protestant countries by a culture proceeding from quite another source. It (Christianity) only prolongs its existence among the enlightened and commercial nations of our time by the emendations which a cultivated but profane reason has made in it; and yet this reason is so magnanimous, or perhaps so weak and hypocritical, as to impute the good effects not to itself, but to Christianity, to whose spirit it is nevertheless entirely opposed."

FOREIGN.

KIND words in every direction from foreign lands, as to America's keen bereavement, are welding golden links of international confidence.

COMMERCIAL relations between France and England assume at present a most balmy aspect. It is conjectured dimly that the halo may extend to mutual affairs at the Mediterranean.

THE Khedive of Egypt, by recent quotation, announces strong approbation of American institutions, and a deep purpose to emulate their spirit in the regulation of his own national trusts. While recognizing the obstacles in his way, he declares faith in their ultimate removal.

RELEASE of the imprisoned Irish suspects is denied by England on the ground that as yet public peace would be thus endangered; that they are held in custody, not as means of punishment, but for the avoidance of farther outbreak before the new law has received its test, otherwise they would be at once set at liberty.

At the opening of the Spanish Cortes, Señor Sagasta, the prime minister, gave expression to several amiable promises, among them the point of religious toleration is included, but qualified with a warning to non-Catholics to beware of rash appeal against popular belief. It is proposed to establish the colonies on the footing of provinces; the schools are to receive consideration; and a modification of the tariff is suggested with especial reference to the United States.

JESTINGS.

"WHAT shall I tell people who ask whether you are engaged?" said a young lady at the dinner-table to a somewhat eccentric theological student. "Tell them that you don't know," was the reply.

THE Rev. Mr. Piper was once called upon to marry a man to his fourth wife. As he approached the couple, he said: "Please to rise." The man wriggled about in his chair a moment, and finally spoke: "We've usually sot!"

AN old-fashioned minister, passing a fashionable church on which a new spire was going up, was asked how much higher it was going to be. "Not much," he answered. "That congregation don't own much higher in that direction."

SAM the night watchman, when, about dusk, he was invited to drink a cup of coffee: "No, thank you. Coffee keeps me awake all night." And then he saw his blunder, and looked very embarrassed, and tried to explain it; but it was no use.

THE Archbishop of Cologne has had, says a Catholic paper, a curious experience in a recent examination of children. "Is the Sacrament of Confirmation necessary to salvation?" he inquired of a boy. "No, Monsignor," responded the lad; "but, when there is an opportunity of receiving it, we should not lose it." "Well said," replied the prelate. Then, turning to a girl, he asked if the Sacrament of Matrimony were necessary to salvation. "It is not," was the quaint reply; "but, when the occasion arises, it should not be lost."

LESSONS

For Liberal Sunday Schools or for Home Use.

I. THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY. A series of Twenty Lessons by Mr. LEWIS G. JAMES, of Brooklyn. Written entirely from the Rationalistic stand-point. Prepared originally for use in Mr. Chadwick's Sunday School. Each lesson printed in a separate slip. Twenty-five cents for the series, including postage.

II. FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP, AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION. A series of Five very suggestive Lessons, by Mrs. KATE GANNETT WELLS. Each lesson contains enough material for several exercises. Seven cents for the series, in separate sheets, including postage.

III. THE WORLD WE LIVE IN. A Series of Elementary Lessons in Natural History, by Mr. FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. Adapted both to interest and profit a class of children. To be completed this autumn. One cent each lesson, exclusive of postage, at present.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, A WEEKLY JOURNAL PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
AT
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.
EDITOR,
WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

MAN is the metre of all things: the hand is the instrument, and the mind is the form of forms.—Aristotle.

ALL philosophy lies in two words, "sustain" and "abstain."—Epictetus.

HE that does good for good's sake seeks neither praise nor reward, though sure of both at last.—William Penn.

I THINK it must somewhere be written that the virtues of mothers shall occasionally be visited on their children as well as the sins of fathers.—Dickens.

EVERY sect, as far as reason will help them, gladly use it: when it fails them, they cry out it is a matter of faith, and above reason.—Locke.

READ not books alone, but men, and among them chiefly thyself: if thou find anything questionable there, use the commentary of a severe friend rather than the gloss of a sweet-lipped flatterer. There is more profit in a distasteful truth than deceitful sweetness.—Quarles.

WHERE is the thief who cannot find bad when he hunts for it?—St. Augustine.

AVOID situations which put our duties in opposition with our interests, and which show us our good in the misfortune of others, sure that in such situations, whatever sincere love of virtue we have, we weaken sooner or later, without perceiving it, and we become unjust and deceitful in deed without having ceased to be just and good in the soul.—Rousseau.

THE first and last thing which is required of genius is the love of truth.—Goethe.

TRUE glory consists in doing what deserves to be written, in writing what deserves to be read, and in so living as to make the world happier and better for our living in it.—Pliny.

THE highest moral nature is nearest in accord with the truth of things. This is why we call those men inspired who have the most exalted moral natures, and those men wise who have exceptionally exalted moral natures as well as superior intellectual natures, and give the man with merely the superior intellectual nature and a mediocre moral nature the lower title of clever, and a man with a good intellectual nature and a low moral nature we call merely sharp or cunning.—Richard Maurice Bucke, M.D.

MAN is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one limb to another,
And all to all the world besides;
Each part may call the farthest, brother;
For head with foot hath private amity,
And both with moons and tides.

Nothing has got so far,
But man hath caught and kept it as his prey.
His eyes dismount the highest star;
He is, in little, all the sphere:
Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they Find their acquaintance there.

The stars have us to bed;
Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws.
Music and light attend our head.
All things unto our flesh are kind
In their descent and being, to our mind,
In their ascent and cause.

—George Herbert.

CURRENT TOPICS.

It does not look as if the Star route swindlers were to gain anything by the change of administrations. The investigation is being energetically pushed toward the courts.

THE office of preacher at Harvard College, vacated by Dr. Peabody, has not yet been filled. For the present, morning prayers are to be conducted by different clergymen from the vicinity. During October, Rev. E. E. Hale is to officiate; and during November, Rev. Phillips Brooks. Why not try for one month the experiment of a musical service, without any officiating clergyman?

THE Boston Sunday Herald thinks that Sunday-schools are in a great degree responsible for the prevailing religious scepticism. The ranks of "Infidelity" are being constantly recruited from the Church, and the reason is, the Herald thinks, because the Sunday-schools, by their indiscriminate use of the Bible, start questions among the pupils which the teachers are incompetent to answer. This is hard on the Sunday-schools, of which so great account is now made.

GENERAL MACVEAGH's form of speech, in tendering his resignation to the new President, calls out a good many protests. The press evidently appreciate the manly and independent tone, but regard its final clause as involving unsafe ground, and such as has shown disastrous results in former administrations. It is entirely proper and a matter of course that the members of the cabinet should be on terms of personal friendliness with the President; but it is not at all necessary that they should all be in the same close circle of "political sympathy," if that means, as it appears to, that they should be of one wing or faction of the Republican party.

NEW HAMPSHIRE is becoming one of the most progressive States in respect to legislation in behalf of religious liberty. For a long time, Catholics were debarred by the Constitution from holding office in the State. A few years since, this unjust discrimination was abolished. Then a law was passed, taxing all church property above the value of ten thousand dollars. The law was contested as unconstitutional, but the Supreme Court decided that it was constitutionally valid. The last legislature enacted a law recognizing the right to religious freedom among the inmates of prisons and State reformatory institutions. Thus, it is admitted that even criminals have rights which religious people are bound to respect.

AN Evangelical exchange gives this deplorable description of the Unitarian Church at Greeley, Colorado: "It contains such elements as the following,—Free-thinkers, Unitarians, Universalists, all shades of sceptics, Jews, infidels, and atheists. Two Jews are officers in the church. A man, who has repeatedly in private and public addresses used the most outrageous language in regard to Christ, is a teacher in the Sunday-school, using Arnold's Light of Asia for a text-book instead of the Bible." We remember having seen in former years the name of this society in the Unitarian Year Book. It is to be presumed that it is now removed. But as the Year Book, for some reason, no longer comes to us, we have no means of ascertaining whether its lists have been purged of this offending member.

A MOVEMENT is announced from Batavia, N.Y., named "The New Departure Association." It owns to the adoption of a "creed" styled "Man not Ruined, but Incomplete," and declares its object to be "the unfoldment and growth of every faculty of man," seeking the accomplishment of this by all the means which modern science may furnish. No action is contemplated that will strive to take the convictions of the people by violence, overturning cherished beliefs by methods repellent to the average mind; but, with charitable and considerate measures, the aim will be to loosen gradually but surely the chains of dogma and superstitious observance, enabling the mind of the honest searcher for truth to grasp the material best suited to his release. Arrangements are in prosecution by which libraries of well-selected matter, lecture courses, and judicious appeal through the secular press, will be brought to bear upon the project in hand. The circular, of which the above are some of the leading points, bears the signature of "C. Houghton, Secretary, Batavia, N.Y."

THE Christian Statesman loses no opportunity to try at least to make a point in favor of its theory that this nation would be a great deal safer, if only the word God were written in its Constitution. It says: "It is stated that President Arthur took the oath with uplifted hand and in the precise language prescribed in the Constitution. The oath is as follows: 'I DO SOLEMNLY SWEAR THAT I WILL FAITHFULLY EXECUTE THE OFFICE OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AND WILL, TO THE BEST OF MY ABILITY, PRESERVE, PROTECT, AND DEFEND THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.' The exclusion from this oath of the name of God, the appeal to whom gives to an oath its efficacy, seems especially noteworthy and lamentable at an hour so deeply pervaded with religious feeling as the present hour is. If the question could be put to the American people to-day whether the oath should be, 'I do solemnly swear by the living God, the searcher of all hearts, as I shall answer to him at the great day,' etc., hardly a voice would be heard voting in the negative." On the contrary, we think there are a good many people who even at this hour would venture to vote to keep the national Constitution free from all tests of religious belief. For our part, we would rather see our Presidents putting their religion in the shape of justice, temperance, purity, and a vigorous integrity into their deeds than swearing by "the living God" or "the great day." A live religion would be better than the strongest oath.

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

(Concluded from last week.)

Imaginary and Contradictory Nature of these Conceptions.

What, now, shall we say of these various pictures of the future life? One thing, at least, is certain. As evidences of any truthful conception of a definite, objective reality, they are mutually destructive. One and all, they are pictures of the imagination, traced in the colors of hope upon the canvas of the human consciousness. The varying conceptions held among different peoples and in different ages seem to have been evolved naturally out of the physical and social environments under which they originated, and to express the various ideals of happiness and misery held by their originators.

"Any one might know," said an irreverent friend to me, "that a Jew would imagine heaven as a golden city, with gates of pearl and foundations of precious stones." The dweller in the cold regions of the North pictures a hell of ice and snow, while the nomad of the scorching desert and the dweller in the tropical heat pictures the place of future punishment as a fiery lake. Not in any one of these visions, then, do we find a confirmation of our hope.

Illusory Nature of the Ordinary Christian Argument.

Neither is there any certainty whatever, or any argument appealing to our rational nature, in the common Christian foundation for this belief presented in the alleged bodily resurrection of Jesus. This argument asserts either too much or too little. Viewed rationally, the alleged fact rests upon a basis of evidence so poor and frail that it vanishes at the first breath of doubt. Viewed as a supernatural event, attested by divine and infallible revelation, it offers no foundation whatever for the superstructure of our hope; for, if Jesus was "very God" or in any sense a supernatural being, his conquest over death and decay presents no analogy to which finite and mortal man can safely cling. At best, it can be held to support only the crude conception of a resurrection of the physical body, while Paul himself declares that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God."[†]

The Rational Argument for Immortality.

Not without definite purpose, however, have we passed in review these manifold visions of the future life. Investigating them carefully, I think we shall be able to trace in them an orderly and progressive development toward a definite end. The conception of the future life has steadily grown clearer, more natural and rational, in accordance with that universal progressive tendency which is gradually establishing all our religious ideas on the basis of right reason and common-sense.

The old lazy and mechanical heaven, the city of golden streets, and the "great white throne," before which the saints forever play on golden harps and sing orthodox psalms, has pretty nearly passed out of the thought of the Christian believer. I asked a young friend of mine, the other day, a bright school-girl of the Baptist belief, "What do you expect to do after you die?" "Oh," said she, "I expect to do just the same things that I do here. I expect to live in a pleasant house, among my friends. I expect to study, and have something to do. It would be awful not to have anything to do, don't you think so? Of course there will be no sickness, or pain, or sorrow; but there will be plenty of people who want to learn something, and plenty who will be needed to teach and help them." And so the question which Milton asks, in Paradise Lost, is uppermost to-day,—

"What if earth
Be but the shadow of heaven, and things therein
Each to the other like, more than on earth is thought."

Tendencies manifested in the Evolution of the Doctrine.

It remains, then, to note the tendencies which are manifested in the progressive evolution of the conception of the future life. If we find that this notion commenced with the clearest and most perfect belief in an eternal, conscious existence after death, and has gradually grown dimmer and less rational with the growing intelligence of the race, until, in the loftiest religions, and among the most intelligent and liberal thinkers, it has, like other superstitions, well-nigh become extinct, then, indeed, will reason and intellectual honesty bid us forever abandon it as a delusive hope. There are those who would have us believe that this is indeed the result of profound thought and enlightened civilization. But the facts that we have passed rapidly in review, seem to reveal a totally different tendency. The beginnings of this doctrine were poor, indefinite, and paltry,—the dull and painful hope that some time the physical body would awaken from the torpor and silence of death. "To die?—to sleep," says the savage Bushman, in harmony with the conception of all the most primitive races. "To sleep?—perchance to dream!" says man in his next step of emergence out of barbarism. And the beliefs of succeeding ages and higher civilizations have recorded the various dreams which men have had of the life beyond the grave.

In the rude idea of primitive man, which founded the individual consciousness wholly with the visible, physical body,—a conception to which, though the most barbarous and archaic of all the notions which men have ever held, some of the disciples of modern positivism would have us return,—in the belief that the consciousness slept with the body in death, we find the germ of the doctrine of a future life. The growing conception of the continuity of personal relationships resulted in the idea that the buried person would some time reawaken and resume his earthly occupations. But here is no real thought even of enduring consciousness, much less of immortality. In the next stage, we have conceptions like that of the Hebrew sheol or underworld, where "the hardly conscious spirits, things of faint touch and hearing, jostle each other in a dull and aimless way." Here, also, is no definite conception of continued consciousness. Among all the earlier races, who in their more primitive stages could scarcely count the fingers on their two hands, it is certain that no notion of the infinite in any form was possible. They evidently had no thought of immortality.

Next comes that stage in the development of this idea, which was accompanied by the belief in bodily resurrection and an earthly paradise. In this stage, the future life, as among the Pharisaic Jews and other nations, was usually limited to a few believers. The rest of the world was consigned to sheol, the land of darkness.

• With the growth of man's moral nature came the development of dualistic notions. All were to be raised, but some to the resurrection of salvation, and others—the non-believers, or "non-elect"—to the resurrection of condemnation. This view we find exemplified, in more or less modified forms, in the religions of Zoroaster, the Egyptians, the Pharisaic Jews, the primitive Christians, and Mohammedans, and still surviving among the followers of some of these religions.

Subsequent developments of the doctrine have spiritualized it,—transferred the locality of heaven from an earthly paradise to an indefinite region of the universe,—and humanized it by the substitution of the doctrine of restoration and final happiness for all for the more barbarous and archaic notion of eternal punishment. In our generation, the conception of a future life is growing steadily more natural and rational and human; finding its highest development in the belief in an eternal future, from which all thought of the resurrection of the earthly, physical body is wholly eliminated; and for which is substituted the idea of a spiritual body, intangible to our sensuous perceptions, gradually evolving by wholly natural processes out of the person's environment and necessities, separable from the body at death, not subject to disintegration or decay, but enduring forever; as tangible and real to the spiritual perceptions as is the physical body to our touch and sight.* And, beyond the river of death, a "happy, homelike Paradise," where every noble faculty may find its complete exercise, and an eternity wherein to develop and unfold its highest possibilities. Thus, the idea of IMMORTALITY, as the inheritance of every human soul, appears as the culmination and completion of the doctrine of a future life.

Argument based upon the Steady Rationalizing of the Doctrine.

Not in any single dream of the ages, then, may we find a confirmation of our hope, but rather in this grand, underlying tendency, which, amid every variety of physical and social environment, and all vicissitudes of belief, has clung to the fundamental idea that man shall live after the death of the body. Rather, in this other historical fact that, from a dim, dull hope for the renewal of an earthly existence, hardly above that of a brute, it has grown into a clear and lofty conception of the triumph of the affectional, spiritual, and mental nature of man over the bondage of this earthly body, over the pangs of death, and the silence of the grave. As mankind has progressed in culture and civilization, so has this hope broadened and increased. In some form or other, Jesus, Buddha, Mohammed, Socrates, Plato, Shakspeare, Goethe, Emerson, the loftiest minds of all the ages, have cherished and rested in this belief.

We are told that this hope is fading from the world, that the more intelligent are ceasing to cherish it. But the truth seems to be, rather, that it is growing. An agnostic interregnum has indeed followed, naturally, the overthrow of supernaturalism, which in our generation, among thinking minds, is most signal and complete; but speedily we shall find all our high hopes and tender sentiments reorganizing themselves upon a rational foundation, and the wider universe of law shall lack no flower of beauty which satisfied heart or mind in that narrower region from which the intelligence of the age has made its exit.

Materialistic Objections Inconclusive.

But, we are told, reason forbids this expectation. Nothing exists which is not material. All material forms change and ultimately perish. Man can hope for nothing but this inevitable result.

Far be it from my intention to enter into a metaphysical argument to prove the existence of mind or spirit as a separate entity, essentially distinct and independent of matter. Scientific and philosophical research seems tending steadily, on the contrary, to the proof that this is indeed a universe. Unity is the great word of science, as well as the loftiest religious conception of modern times, that "all-pervading unity" which Confucius sought. The great law of the correlation and conservation of forces, the discovery of the comprehensive—and may we not say universal?—method of evolution, has knit together all the phenomena of the visible universe. As philosophers, cognizant of the tendencies and discoveries of modern science, we have a right, therefore, to proceed upon the assumption of the integrity and sanity of this universe. By the orderly process of its natural laws, it has evolved in the mind of man this conception of a life beyond the grave, growing clearer and more comprehensive from age to age. Is it reasonable to suppose that a conception, so evolved and so universal, is unrelated to any objective reality? Is it not, rather, like the quickening nerve-centre in the eyeless fish of the Mammoth Cave, prophetic of a reality which may become fully manifested in the expanded and altered environment which will follow the dissolution of this physical body?

Persistence of Consciousness through Material Dissolution and Change.

The universe has not yet been put into the crucible, that we may deny the possibility of eternal self-consciousness in man. Nay: science itself proves that this self-consciousness is not identical or coordinate with any fixed or definite arrangement of atoms, which are susceptible of investigation by our physical senses. Many times, during every human life, every particle in the body is changed and renewed, yet consciousness, memory, and personal identity endure. We are dying daily, hourly, yet we still live. The force stored in the living organism of man has never been correlated with the force distributable to earth and air in elementary minerals and gases after death. All that can be measured or weighed or put to the test of positive chemistry seems enormously disproportionate to the intellectual activities of a Shakspeare or a Napoleon.

Limitations of our Knowledge concerning the Nature and Properties of Matter.

Neither may we assume that we know matter in all its possible relations. We have only five avenues of sense whereby we come into conscious relation with the external universe; yet we may not assume that, to beings differently constituted, it might not present itself in manifold other aspects.* Moreover, our senses can apprehend but a narrow range of physical phenomena. Our ears take cognizance of atmospheric vibrations only within a certain definite and contracted range of rapidity. There are waves too rapid or too slow to affect our sense of hearing. The ether vibrations may be too frequent or too infrequent to convey an impression to the human retina. Here again we are limited. This is no speculative theory, but a scientific fact, as was demonstrated and illustrated by Professor Tyndall in his lectures upon light.† And so of all the other senses. A touch may be so faint as to be unfelt, or so powerful as to kill sensation by producing paralysis or death.

Individuals differ in their susceptibility to sensations,—in the acuteness of their sensuous perceptions. This fact utterly destroys the grounds of that speculative idealism, in which so-called positive materialism takes refuge, when it attempts to limit the possibilities of matter to our sensible relations to it. It is a simple matter of fact, of absolute scientific knowledge, that there exists a universe,—yes, a material universe,—which our human senses are unable to comprehend or investigate. That it is a dead universe, peopled by no responsive life, is an unwarrantable assumption. From the analogy of the known, we are better entitled to infer the contrary. We know only that it is, and that it eludes the investigation of our present faculties.

Science has not disproved Immortality.

If it is impossible to prove that within the husk of this sensible body there is being evolved a finer and more enduring habitation for our personality, it is equally impossible to disprove it. That is a very dogmatic and superficial materialism which claims to have demonstrated the impossibility of conscious life after the death of this body. We are told that there is no missing link in the chain of evolutionary cause and effect from inorganic matter up to the highest mental manifestation. We may perhaps assume with Haeckel the disputed fact of spontaneous generation, but I think we must also admit with Tyndall that "the passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable.... Were our minds and senses so expanded, strengthened, and illuminated as to enable us to see and feel the very molecules of the brain; were we capable of following all their motions, all their groupings, all their electrical discharges, if such there be; and, were we intimately acquainted with the corresponding states of thought and feeling,—we should be as far as ever from the solution of the problem, 'How are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness?' The chasm between the two classes of phenomena would still be intellectually impassable."‡

The materialistic positivism of to-day, with its too hasty generalizations and deductions, is the result of a natural and necessary though incomplete reaction from the theological contempt and contumely that for more than eighteen centuries have been heaped upon matter and the material body of man. But the conquests of science, prophetic of a cosmic unity opening to us a wider and more beautiful universe, should make the reaction complete, and consign these survivals of theological barbarism to an eternal oblivion.

Beautiful matter! It is the blush upon the rose, the glory of sun and stars, the manifold beauties of earth and sky, the warm grasp of the friendly hand, the assurance of eternal faithfulness in Nature! Who shall dare affirm that it has built up for us this great hope of immortality, only for our disappointment? Who dares assert that it does not hold the promise

*An able agnostic writer, Mr. B. F. Underwood, thus frankly recognizes this truth:—

"If we were destitute of sight, touch, taste, smell, and hearing, these qualities would cease to exist, although the external reality which causes these groups of sensations would still exist. To beings differently organized from ourselves, so differently that their mode of being could not be conceived by us, the objective reality might give rise to states of which the word 'matter' would convey no idea to our minds."—The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer, by B. F. Underwood, Free Religious Index, Nov. 11, 1880.

and potency, not only of all which now appeals to our bodily senses, but also of infinitely finer and more enduring possibilities?

Conflict between Positive Dogmatism and the Scientific Method.

To science, its great interpreter, and to reason, we submit even this, our highest hope; but we will not consent too hastily to the snap judgment of positivism. There is a dogmatism of denial as well as a dogmatism of credulity, a dogmatism which assumes the garb of science as well as a dogmatism which masquerades beneath the gown and mitre of religion; and both are equally divergent from the scientific method. The method of positivism, assuming to deny or ignore all that is not mathematically or positively demonstrated, is not the method of science. Science is clear-eyed, alert, patient, ready to wait. She does not jump at conclusions. She is not afraid to say, "I do not know." She does not scorn to use the imagination in originating theories for the explanation of the facts of nature and of life.* She weighs these theories carefully, and tests them thoroughly in the crucible of experience and right reason. She views them in all possible relations, and is not forward to declare that to be knowledge which is yet merely a tentative hypothesis. She adopts as her own the maxim of Confucius,—

"When a man knows a thing, to say that he knows it; and when he does not know a thing, to admit that he does not know it,—this is wisdom."

The dogmatic deniers of the future life have discarded the conclusions of scholastic theology, but retained its untrustworthy method. They have reformed in part, but the voice of science is ever calling to them in the words of Hamlet,—

"Oh, reform it altogether!"

Science, whose method is simply that of patient investigation, absolute freedom from preconceptions, and sincerity and singleness of purpose in seeking for the truth, is utterly removed from either sort of dogmatism. She cries, "A plague on both your houses, Messieurs Priests and Positivists!" She permits us to assert in her name that the great question of personal consciousness and immortality after death is not yet closed, and this without prejudice to the theories of either idealists or materialists regarding the ultimate constitution of the universe.
