A few Sundays since, Rev. Mr. Savage addressed his congregation upon the question, Is Death the End of Man? According to the report in the Daily Advertiser, he adduced, as one evidence or indication of a life after death, the very general and apparently spontaneous belief of mankind to that effect. Against this procedure, I, for one, have no protest to enter. But how often and how emphatically have we been told that belief is not evidence! And we must confess that in the courts of science it can indeed never be admitted as such. That is to say, it can never be admitted as evidence of its own truth, though it of course gives evidence of forces adequate to its production. What, then, let us ask, can science have to say concerning religious belief? As a criticism upon creeds, it may undoubtedly be of service. So far as any belief involves statements of natural or historical fact, it lies within the field of scientific investigation. If, for example, it be assumed or asserted in any religious creed that the sun revolves about the earth, that the world was made in six days, that the Pentateuch was written by Moses and was infallibly inspired, or that Jesus rose from the dead, such statement of religious belief lies so far within the scope of science or of historical and critical research conducted in the spirit of science. It is subject to correction accordingly, and may be so severely corrected as to elicit outcries of grief, indignation, and alarm from members who mistake the accidents of belief for its essence. Farther, science may do much to enlarge the moulds of religious thought, or, to speak with stricter accuracy, may create a demand for such enlargement. Thus, theism held in connection with the notion of special creation must be enlarged, and much enlarged, if it is to embrace the doctrine of evolution and be theism still. But, having made these acknowledgments, let us renew our question in a more precise form. What can science have to say concerning theistic or religious belief, considered in its essence? The answer must be that, while religious philosophy may accept such belief as a natural revelation or token of supersensual reality to science, on the contrary, the belief itself is the ultimate fact, beyond which it cannot even attempt to pass without self-destruction. The belief is an observed phenomenon, with respect to which science may propose any one or all of its three inquiries: first, What are the forces in man's phenomenal constitution and surroundings, from which this belief arises? or, secondly, According to what rule do its various stages succeed or its special movements take place? or, thirdly, In what observed relations of identity and difference do its varieties stand? To the first inquiry, it has been answered that theistic belief arises from man's propensity to see in the universe a reflection of his own personality; and this may serve as an example of scientific direction, though it is not, in my judgment, an example of strict and entire induction. Theodore Parker, in his "Discourse of Religion," sought to determine a rule of succession in the different stages of belief, and thus exemplified the second mode of scientific inquiry; though his discourse is penetrated and saturated with the faith of a believer, and thus, not confining itself to the limits of science, takes the freer and bolder flight of religious philosophy. An example of the third mode of inquiry may be seen in any well-prepared treatise upon comparative religion. By no result of such inquiries can theistic belief be authenticated in any degree, more or less. On the contrary, could the first inquiry be perfectly answered and the belief quite explained by reference to forces in man's phenomenal constitution and circumstances, such belief were at once accounted for and exploded, since we should no longer have occasion to assume its truth, or partial truth at least, as a reason for its existence. Yet science, in taking that direction, makes no wanton "attack upon religion," but is simply faithful to its own vocation. And, in pursuance of this vocation, it may render service even here. Though religious belief stand in relation with supersensual truth, and quite apart from such relation could not exist universally and permanently, yet there will be forces accessory to it in man's conditions and organic constitution; for it stands in a certain relation with these also. Thus, it is undoubtedly true that there is a propensity of naïve man to see in all things a reflection of his own personality; and undoubtedly true also that an effect of this tendency has been seen in the cast of religious belief. All such facts should have their full weight; and theism, if not suppressed, will be emancipated by its recognition of them. And, through the other modes of scientific research, religious belief may be taught to distinguish between its essence and its accidents, and may learn where to place its emphasis, while obtaining a happy release from its pinfolds of sectarianism. But it still remains true that to science the belief itself is the ultimate fact; while, to be verified, it must be taken as the voice or sign of another and higher fact.

Accordingly, I have, and have had, no share in the enthusiastic hope of so many that the deep and dark mystery of the universe would one day be flooded with light, and laid open to the view of all men, by the lantern of the "scientific method."

D. A. WASSON.

THE Congregationalist admits that, since the majority of men die in infancy, there is reason to believe the majority of men will go to heaven. Very consoling! "Smallest favors thankfully received."

WHY SOPHIE BARDINE WAS SENT TO SIBERIA.

The stenographic report of her trial was abstracted from the government records for clandestine publication, and is reprinted in Lavigne's Introduction à l'Histoire du Nihilisme. She was the daughter of a gentleman in the imperial service at Tambow, in South-eastern Russia, where she was born in 1854. After graduating at the city school, where she received a gold medal, and attending the university at Moscow, she went, at the age of eighteen, to Zürich, where she spent some months in the Polytechnic School. The proceedings of the International Congress in that city interested her deeply, and she came under a strong influence from Bakunin. After giving two years to reading all the books and pamphlets she could find that treated of the wrongs of the working-classes, and holding many conversations with the men and women employed in the Swiss and German factories, she went back to Russia at the close of 1874, in order to teach the peasants and operatives the truth which will finally set them free. She went to work herself under the name of the Widow Zaitseff, in one of those prison-like factories where strong men earn but thirty cents a day by seventeen hours of toil, and to which children ten years old come with bare feet through the snow to do a full day's work. There, Sophie Bardine drudged month after month, side by side with the other operatives, over whom, especially the women, she soon gained such influence that they almost completely gave up visiting the taverns, and set to work reading such books as were not prohibited. This change excited the suspicion of her employers; and in April, 1875, Sophie was arrested on a charge of distributing Socialist pamphlets, and uttering exciting speeches. The evidence against her seems to have been very slight, and her correspondence is said to have contained nothing treasonable. Yet she was kept for two years in solitary confinement; and then, after a trial at which her fellow-operatives, who all worshipped her, eagerly testified to her innocence, she was condemned, on March 10, 1877, to nine years of hard labor in the government workshops in Siberia. Similar sentences were passed at the same time on forty-nine other men and women merely for trying peaceably to teach the people. On being asked if she had anything to say, this girl of twenty-three arose, and in a firm voice made the speech from which I take these extracts:—

Gentlemen who are my judges: I shall not attempt to deny that I have labored as a propagandist in the factory; but I am bound to repel the charge that I belong to any secret society. From my own point of view, I can scarcely call myself guilty; for I have done no harm to the community, nor tried to do any. The prosecutor accused me of having wished to destroy the foundations of society,—namely, property, the family, and religion,—to stir up the masses, and to establish permanent anarchy. This would indeed be terrible, if it were true. For my part, I do not think it is; and, while doing full justice to the conservative feelings of my accuser, I think I can show that all this is a mistake. In the first place, neither I nor any one else on trial here has ever spoken of destroying property. On the contrary, we have defended it; for we have always and openly taught that each citizen has an exclusive right to enjoy the fruits of his labor. Who is it that disturbs the foundations of property, we, the revolutionary socialists, or those employers who pay the workman only one-tenth of what he earns, and keep nine-tenths themselves? Are those social relations moral which divide the citizens into two camps, in one of which is nothing but pleasure, while in the other the laborers are dying of hunger?

As for compulsory communism, neither I nor any other of the revolutionists have ever thought of establishing it; but we have unanimously maintained the right of each laborer to keep what he earns to himself or share it as he pleases with his fellows. And, as regards the family, we have never said that its ties were artificial; but neither have we said that they were obligatory, and that the power of its head ought to continue despotic. Is it we revolutionists who are undermining the family, or is it that state of society which forces the mother to go with her children into the moral degradation of factory life, and which drives a woman into the street to sell herself for daily bread, and then takes her and her trade under the protection of the laws? So, again, we are accused of atheism and desire to destroy religion. But what proof is there of this? Have we ever tried to blacken the founder of Christianity, or blamed his philosophy? My landlady, who denounced me, has testified that her lodgers recognized God in heaven, but never prayed to images. And this is true; for we never go to church nor believe in any of the forms authorized by the State. But why go on refuting accusations of which there is no proof? Nor can I acknowledge that I have committed any crime against public tranquillity; for I am deeply convinced that no individual efforts can overthrow any form of society which does not carry in its own bosom the germs of decomposition. And I know, too, that any government which exercises despotic power against the interests of the great mass of the people, oppresses the citizens, and takes the side of a few owners of the land and the capital, is marching to its own ruin. On the other hand, the state where people generally believe that there is regular improvement going on has nothing to fear from propagandists; for they will be all refuted by the mere fact of the rapidity of social progress. Moreover, I am accused of trying to stir up a revolt. This I deny, not only because there is no proof, but because I have never thought that a revolution could be produced artificially. It is only by peaceable propaganda that Russia can be prepared for the revolution which I have always known must come.

However this may be, I ask no pity of you, gentlemen. I do not need it, for my conscience does not accuse me. Keep on persecuting us, let loose your police on us and your soldiers also, so long as they obey you; but remember the lessons of history, which teach that the bloodiest repression is powerless against the regenerating current that sweeps away the government which is worn out. Individual revolutionists you can crush; but I warn you that the bloodshed which you call "pacification" cannot last, for our movement will spring up again with new life, and our ideas will at last triumph. I am sure that our nation, which has slept for ages, will in the end awake; and her waking will be terrible. She will look with indignation on the abyss into which she is plunged and the shame with which she is polluted. No longer will she suffer her rights to be trodden under foot, and her children to be buried alive in Siberia merely for having honestly said what they thought of their oppressors. Then, Russia will shake off her yoke and avenge us. Oh, that vengeance will be terrible! Well, then, ye judges and hangmen, persecute us and massacre us so long as you have the physical force on your side. It is moral force that we oppose to you, and that will end by conquering all violence. We have the force of progress and the ideas of liberty and equality working for us, and these ideas cannot be pierced by your bayonets.

EDUCATION IN FRANCE.

The Bureau of Education at Washington has issued a Circular of Information on "Education in France." This subject is of especial interest now, as the republican government is proposing such decided action in regard to the (so called) religious education of children. It is hard for us to reconcile with our principles of free religion such a clause as appeared in M. Jules Ferry's "Bill on the Liberty of Superior Instruction":—

ART. 7. No person belonging to a non-authorized religious congregation (priest, brother, or sister) is allowed to teach in a public or private school of any kind.

This clause was defeated in the Senate, in 1779.

This restriction reappears in M. Barodet's bill for the regulation even of primary schools:—

ART. 56. Any French citizen twenty-one years of age may open a private primary school, provided he does not belong to any religious order, institute, congregation, or community. He must, however, be in possession of a teacher's diploma.

ART. 22. Religious instruction shall be given, with the consent of the parents, by the ministers of the different denominations outside of the school buildings, and at an hour fixed by the departmental director.

While we may feel that, theoretically, this exclusion of a class from the function of teaching is inconsistent with the true principle of religious freedom, we must, before we wholly condemn the proposal of the Minister of Education, look at the question from his point of view, and see how great had been the evil which he thus proposed to guard against.

The lay teachers in France, in 1877, numbered sixty-four thousand and twenty-five. The religious teachers numbered forty-six thousand six hundred and eighty-four.

But the proportion of religious teachers was much greater among the female teachers and among the primary teachers than in the whole number.

Of the religious teachers, thirty-seven thousand two hundred and sixteen are women; and, of the thirty-three thousand six hundred and sixty-three public female teachers, nineteen thousand nine hundred and fifty-six are religious persons.

Another fact shows the comparative grade of education in the two classes. Of female religious teachers, only 19 per cent. are certificated, and of male religious teachers only 39 per cent. While, of the lay teachers, the corresponding numbers are 88 and 95 per cent.

The French method of direct action by the government leads the Minister of Education to advocate the exclusion of all these religious teachers from the schools; but would it not be wiser to adhere to the true principles of religious freedom, and turn the attention of government to the education of teachers who would take the places of these priests and sisters?

It is evident that the same problem is presented that met Horace Mann, and that it must be solved in the same way,—by the higher education of women. Men are needed in so many callings that enough of them cannot be spared for the educational work of the world: it is to the women that we must turn to fulfil this duty, and secular popular education is only possible in connection with the higher education of women. That the French are beginning fully to recognize this need is shown by the law of November, 1880, "to establish Secondary Schools for Girls, to which a course of pedagogy is to be attached for such pupils as desire to prepare themselves for the school service." An amendment offered in the Senate to make religious instruction a regular branch of instruction in these schools was rejected by a vote of one hundred and forty-two to one hundred and twenty-six.

By the ministerial decree of June 7, 1880, these excellent rules are made:—

ART. 19. It is strictly forbidden to inflict corporal punishment.

ART. 10. The children must come to school in clean clothes. The teacher shall examine the pupil in this respect at the beginning of the school.

ART. 13. The school-rooms must be whitewashed or cleaned every year, and must always be kept clean and in a healthy condition. They must be swept once a day. They must frequently be ventilated. During recess, the windows must be kept open.

ART. 3. As regards religious instruction, the wishes of the parents shall always be complied with, etc.

We hope some educated traveller in France will tell us how well these rules are carried out. Thursday is the additional holiday to Sunday in French schools instead of Saturday as with us; and Christmas is not included in the list of extra holidays, although New Year's is.

Many other points of great interest are touched upon in this admirable circular; but we will only add a touching extract from the address of M. Jules Simon, when, on the 14th of October, 1870, he decreed the foundation of an elementary normal school for both sexes. In his circular, he says:—

If you ask why we establish this school now, at a time when everybody is anxiously watching the fearful conflict raging in the very heart of our country, at a time when all other duties seem to be absorbed in the one of national defence, we answer that this question of reform in the field of education was matured long ago; that we have studied it for many years; that not a day is to be lost. . . . The unexampled misfortunes which have befallen the country during the last two weeks of the empire should teach us the lesson, never to be forgotten, that the only power which makes a nation invincible is intellectual and moral power. This we must restore, before we can hope for any victory on the battle-field.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

A WRITER in the Christian Statesman, in an article on "Guiteau's Defence," makes the novel argument that the assassin was "educated by the national Constitution to believe that he might murder the President, under the delusion that it was an act of religion which could not be punished," and that therefore the Constitution ought to be amended by repealing the clause which forbids Congress passing a law "preventing the free exercise of religion," and by inserting a section distinctively establishing Christianity as the legal religion of the country. The writer says:—

There is no doubt that he [Guiteau] has wrought himself up to believe that he is directly influenced by the Deity, as he expresses it, and is under the highest obligation to perform what is thus enjoined upon him. Whether this is an inspiration or a delusion, it is evidently his religion; and he has just as good a right to believe himself to be commissioned of God as had Mohammed or Joseph Smith. He was evidently as conscientious in shooting the President as is the Thug in strangling his victim, the Hindu mother in drowning her babe in the Ganges, or the Suttee wife in mounting the funeral pyre of her husband. This is not insanity. It is not a deranged intellect, but a misinformed, prejudiced, and excited belief. . . . There is, legally, but one plea for this fanatical assassin, and that is under the Constitution of the United States, first article of amendment, in which it is declared that "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or preventing the free exercise thereof." . . .

Until the Constitution defines what it means by religion, and distinguishes one religion from another, no law enacted by Congress restraining freedom in, or punishing for, the free exercise of that which a person considers his religion, can be, in the strict sense of the word, constitutional. It is manifest that Guiteau joined the Oneida Community as an act of religion, and practised their peculiarities as religious services. In the same spirit, impelled by the same evil influences, he shot the President, "believing that he did God service." . . . No government has a right to authorize a false religion or to guarantee to its subjects the right to dishonor God or violate his law under the name of religion. Government has no right to punish a man for his belief; but it has a right and it is its duty to restrain his acts, whenever they violate either the first or second table of the moral law of God. Until this government defines in its Constitution what is religion, in the understanding of this nation, the polygamy and the blood atonement of the Mormons, the licentiousness of the Oneida Community, and every other wild extravagance, even to the solemn murder of the best of Presidents, will be practised in its sacred name.

It is a curious commentary on this argument that Guiteau claims not to have been "educated" by the secular Constitution, but by the Bible as a "Christian," and that he holds a theory of personal inspiration which has been inculcated almost universally by the Christian Church from its beginning to the present day. In his contests with the witnesses whom the government produced for proving his sanity, his constantly reiterated demand was, "Tell us about Abraham." Evidently, his religious example is not "the Thug" nor "the Hindu mother" nor "the Sutte wife" in their acts of violence, but the Hebrew patriarch Abraham, who, for his readiness to kill his son at the supposed command of God, is held up in the New Testament, and by Christian theologians generally, as an illustration of the most perfect faith and obedience. It is difficult to see, therefore, how a "Christian" amendment to the Constitution is going to make it any easier to punish the Guiteaus than it is now, unless the Christian Church is ready to cut loose from Abraham and the Abrahamic theory of "inspiration." The truth is that the Mormons and the Oneida Community rest their claims on this same personal inspiration theory which Christianity has inculcated as a cardinal doctrine; and this Christian tenet is in no small degree responsible for them and their wild and immoral extravagances. The Gordian knot of Constitutional right for dealing with all such claims can best be cut under the Constitution as it is, by calling crime crime and treating it as such, no matter in what "sacred name" it may be committed.

In the Independent, Rev. George Washburn, who has been a resident at Constantinople for many years, writes an interesting account of the present excited expectations among Mohammedans of the speedy coming of a new Messiah. There is a tradition that he is to appear in 1882, and there is in Tripoli a man who answers the demands of the traditional predictions. A few weeks ago, it was announced that he had entered on his Messianic mission. But this was a false report. He has not yet declared himself the Messiah. Dr. Washburn writes:—

The Mohammedan world seems to be in a state of expectation, as was the Jewish world at the time of the coming of Christ. Its promised Messiah is to come like a true Moslem, sword in hand, and his kingdom is to be of this world. He is to rule as an autocrat and restore the primitive faith of Islam. All nations will be forced to submit to his rule, and the predicted time is at hand. So far as Mohammedans believe in this prediction, they must be excited by it. It is, of course, impossible to say how far it is believed; but it is certain that it is thought of and talked about in all parts of the Turkish dominions. As the prediction foretells the overthrow of the Turkish power, it excites very different feelings at Constantinople and among the Arabs. The latter would welcome such a leader and rally around him, while the Sultan would find him his most dangerous foe.

THE Catholic Review is sarcastic on M. Paul Bert's letter to the French bishops, asking them why, contrary to an old law, they left their dioceses to go to Rome for the recent ceremonies of canonization. It says:—

It will be already manifest to all the world that Gambetta is more than justified in his choice of a minister of public worship. None but a statesman of the highest rank would have thought of writing such a letter to the bishops of France immediately after his installation into office.

We agree with the Review that a bishop should have the same liberty as "a merchant or a peddler" to go where he pleases, and entirely sympathize with its zealous advocacy of religious freedom when it adds:—

Possibly some bishops may be found ready to comply with a mere matter of form and of antiquated official routine. But, should a bishop flatly refuse to notify the government of his intended journey outside the limits of his own diocese, what is Paul Bert going to do about it? There is only one way of keeping him within it, and that is by imprisoning him there. It is to be hoped some bishop will make a test case in his own person, and show to France and the world either the absurdity of such a law, or what the Republic in France means by civil and religious freedom.

IMPENDING MORAL CHANGES.

There have been changes over wide areas of the earth in religious belief, changes from one form of theological faith to another, from polytheism for instance to monotheism, but never so far in the history of the world has there been a radical change which had for its object the elimination of mysticism and supernaturalism altogether in favor of a rational view of man and nature. For such a revolution, human nature has only recently been fitted. Hitherto, it has been fed and beguiled with fancies rather than facts, with myths rather than truths. But now, in all the leading nations, there are hosts of people who no longer think in a merely traditional manner, but who, having attained to the full stature of rational men and women, exercise their intellectual prerogatives, without reference to or regard for authority and tradition. In fact, dismay and "fear of change" are perplexing and unnerving high priests as well as kings with a feeling that it is fast getting to be a day of doom for them. Mr. Gladstone in some one of his numerous contributions to periodical literature somewhat arrogantly asserts that Christian thought is still the imperial or ruling thought of civilization. Without troubling ourselves to deny this assertion in regard to current civilization, let us say that Christianity is rather a sentiment, an emotion, than a thought,—a sentiment of humility, brotherhood, sinfulness, and other-worldliness. As for thought in the strict sense of the word, Christianity was never its friend, any more than it has been the friend of science or a rational investigation of truth and the nature of things. Goethe defines Christianity as the reverence for that which is beneath us. As such, it has been a stage in the moral development of mankind. The stoical morality was instinct with pride and self-sufficiency, disdaining everybody incapable of its austere endurance and superiority to feeling. The morality of Christianity is the morality of kindness, humility, and forgiveness, whatever be said of its theology. The heart of the old ethnic world was hard, the heart of the modern world is tender. Humanity needed softening. But humanity has now entered upon the period of intellectual, rational development; and it finds in Christianity a mere abstraction. It would keep us forever in the sphere of the emotions. But man at this late stage of his development demands the robust diet of truth, which Christianity would forever deny him. Meantime, apropos of Mr. Gladstone's statement, the historic student can easily go back in imagination to a period in the past when pagan thought was the imperial or ruling thought in the utter absence of Christianity, because Christianity is a moral phenomenon, which began to be once on a time, and which will cease to be at some future date, except in the universal elements which it possesses in common with all systems of religion and philosophy. Everybody who is familiar with the early history of Christianity, when it was making its way in the world against the colossal, fascinating, and beautifully imaginative systems of Grecian and Roman polytheism, which systems entered into every act and formality of public and private, civil and military life, beginning at the very hearth or fireside with ancestor-worship, knows what a protracted and desperate struggle the then new religion had. It was working everywhere against the social grain, and the prejudices, usages, and beliefs of ages, and against the tenderest and most deeply seated affections and associations. For "the fair humanities of old religion," or of ancient polytheism, were exactly adapted to the exigencies and demands of human nature on the low moral plane which it then occupied. And, being so, they had wound themselves implicitly among its tendrils and fibres. So that the propagandism of Christianity at the start was regarded naturally as sacrilege and an impious movement conducted by enemies of the human race, and of all the race held dear, for the purpose of uprooting the established laws and civil order also, and reducing society to chaos. The early Christians were in fact regarded as Socialists. And the primitive Christians were really and truly the Socialists and communists of the ancient ethnic world. Primitive Christianity was a socialism and communism, until it was taken possession of by the principalities and powers of that old world and made a state religion. All forms of dogmatic faith, ecclesiastical Christianity among the rest, have been the chief obstacles to that solidarity and unity of mankind which our modern rational and scientific civilization is so rapidly bringing about. More than rivers, seas, and mountains has theology sundered and divided mankind, whereas a rational and scientific civilization, which is now getting control of the entire earth and all its dwellers, is, in its tolerance of all sorts of opinions and its loyalty to truth and right, the very principle of unity and concord, and fraught with a speedy federation of the world. High priests may elaborately curse current civilization as godless and wicked, but their curses are unavailing.

Mankind are coming together on a basis of a community of interests as well as of nature. Meantime, the great moral and rational revolution, which changes the immemorial, theological view of man and nature to a rational, truthful view of things, as they actually are, cannot be consummated at once, any more than the pagan world could instantaneously become a Christian world. It took Christianity four hundred years to become an established faith. In moral revolutions, the heart has to be consulted and appeased. The head is more easily won over, although this is only by a process of growth. The din of the conflict of faith and reason, of science and theology, is everywhere audible; but Europe is the chief seat of this battle.

In this conflict, we Americans, although part and parcel of Christendom, occupy the position of spectators and outsiders rather than that of combatants. The reason of our non-belligerency is not far to seek. Religion has with us always been a matter of private judgment and private opinion. It has not been dictated and imposed by authority. It has not been interwrought into the State and social and political organization. This is a strictly non-ecclesiastical country. Hence, the decay of a religious faith here will not be accompanied with any violence to or laceration of the body politic. Men will sooner or later adjust themselves gradually and quietly to the new developments of truth and the exigencies of progress. Meantime, our governmental system, being entirely and thoroughly modern, will go on unharmed, whatever may happen to the old-fashioned Church, with which our American State was never in partnership, or in vinculis matrimonii.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal says that the "convicts in the Ohio Penitentiary sent $100 to the Michigan sufferers. They raised this sum by denying themselves the luxury of tobacco, and by the sale of trinkets which they had made. How true it is that, inside of the dreary, desolate walls of our penitentiaries are those who possess noble hearts and generous impulses, but who, in an unguarded moment, have committed some offence that consigned them to their present unfortunate condition!"

DR. JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, who died last week in his seventy-first year, was the most distinguished man of science in America. His mind was vigorous and versatile, and he possessed the courage of his convictions. He made numerous discoveries in science, and added largely to the sum total of human knowledge. He wrote voluminously, and some of his works rank among the ablest scientific productions of the age, and have secured for him a wide reputation at home and abroad. His History of the Intellectual Development of Europe has been translated into nearly all the European languages, and his History of the Conflict of Science and Religion was placed in the Bibliothèque Scientifique Internationale. Dr. Draper has been severely criticised and denounced by Orthodox theologians whose pet theories he exposed; but his writings have been widely read, and their influence has been most salutary. In his death, science has lost one of her most patient and faithful votaries, and the world one of its greatest benefactors.

"I REPEAT my conviction," says Gov. Long, in his recent message, "of the right of woman suffrage. If the Commonwealth is not ready to give it in full by a constitutional amendment, I approve of testing it in municipal elections. The recent judicial decision that women cannot practise as attorneys-at-law has also raised the question whether they can serve, as some are now most usefully serving upon public statutory boards, except where expressly so provided by law. The decision necessitates legislation."

REFERRING to the Darwinian theory, Professor Huxley says: "Those whose memories carry them back to the time will remember that the infant was remarkably lively, and that there was a very pretty turmoil about its cradle. My own recollections of the period are particularly vivid; for, having conceived a tender affection for this child of remarkable promise, I acted for some time as a sort of under-nurse, and so came in for a share of the storms that threatened the very life of the young creature."

THE editor of the North American Review announces that the February number of that magazine, to be published January 15, will contain Part III. of its series of articles on "The Christian Religion," which will be from the pen of George P. Fisher, of the Yale Divinity School, one of the most scholarly representatives of Christianity in this country.

REFERRING to the fact that the murderer Guiteau was holding a public reception in prison on New Year's Day at the same hour that the President, in the room once occupied by the murderer's victim, was receiving American citizens and the representatives of foreign powers, the Boston Globe exclaims: "Hung be the heavens in black, to hide this ineffable infamy from the sight of the world."

MR. DAVID WASSON, one of the most powerful of American writers, whose essays are better worth collecting in a permanent form than the fugitive papers of most men, begins this month a series of thoughtful articles in The Index.—Boston Herald.

THE New York Observer thinks Mr. Chadwick and The Index are alarmed over the attitude of Mr. Frothingham. Not at all. They are "alarmed" only over the misrepresentations and falsehoods of journals like the Observer, which seem to have no regard whatever for the truth, while prating ostentatiously about morality and righteousness.

THE Presbyterian thinks Prof. Robertson Smith has taken "another step downward." Not that he has become an inebriate or a defaulter, but, mirabile dictu! "hints are dropped which show that the critic is about to apply his principles to what are known as the 'Messianic prophecies,' suggesting that these texts had an interpretation put upon them by writers in the New Testament which they were not intended to bear." Our pious contemporary seems not to know that what it "hints" Prof. Smith is about to suggest, has already been demonstrated by scores of the most profound Biblical scholars as clearly as anything outside of pure mathematics can be demonstrated.

THE Church Mirror offers among other premiums to new subscribers "three styles of revolvers, on exceptionally good terms. They are all reliable, and cannot be beaten for the money." Upon this, the Seymour, Ind., Times comments as follows:—

There is no use upon the earth for the revolver. There is no more use for it than there is for the tiger, or the venomous reptile, or tobacco. It is associated only with evil. The distribution of cheap revolvers is a sin against a community of the first magnitude. They find their way into the hands of boys. The touch of a revolver is demoralizing. Only men and boys with murderous intent carry revolvers. The plea of carrying revolvers for self-defence is a poor one. The very fact of a man being armed with a revolver invites violence. The fine for carrying a revolver should be ten thousand dollars or ten years' imprisonment, and the penalty for manufacture should be death. It is time that murderous weapons were outlawed. The age should repudiate those Christian instruments of murder. The shedding of blood is not the aim of life.

THE Memphis Presbytery recently ordained a colored man, and the Southern Presbyterian Church is in trouble over the matter. Rev. E. T. Baird, one of the foremost men in the organization, writes to the Christian Observer thus: "One of the conditions of ordination," he says, "is that a man shall be able to edify the Church. Now, I risk nothing in asserting that no negro man, in the present condition of the Church and the world, can attain unto this essential qualification for the position of a minister among us." Christianity seems not to have done much for Mr. Baird. He is evidently "a Bourbon in the world of thought."

BISMARCK'S popularity and power at home have been on the wane for some time; and he sees that his despotic policy must inevitably fail, unless he can induce the Catholics of Germany to stand by him. He needs now the support of the clerical party; and, to gain this, it looks as though he were willing to repeal the anti-Catholic legislation which a few years ago he carried through the Reichstag, and become the leading representative of the reactionary elements of Europe. This man of iron will and far-reaching mind is to-day the greatest obstacle to liberty and progress in Germany.

It is stated that Bismarck has sent a note to the Quirinal, saying that, in his opinion, the independence of the Pope cannot be regarded as a question for Italian home politics, but should be regarded as an international question, and favoring a congress of the powers to make more effective the guarantees of the Holy See. It is also stated that the Pope is in readiness to depart for Malta, if he finds it impossible to remain in Rome. It will be remembered that King Humbert in a recent speech announced that the question of the Pope's residence at the Vatican was merely a domestic one.

THE Springfield Republican says: "The fact is so patent that vaccination does arrest the spread of the disease, and the neglect of it opens the way for the disease, that the subject has passed the era of controversy. Dr. Dubois, of St. Paul, Minn., who was sent to Stearns County by the State Board of Health to check the ravages of the disease and has just returned, found in one township, inhabited by ignorant and prejudiced Germans, one hundred and sixty-three cases of small-pox and general opposition to vaccination. He insisted upon it, and at length converted the religious pastors and then won over the people, and stopped the farther spread of the disease. There were twenty-six deaths in that town, and only three in adjoining towns, where vaccination had been practised. Dr. Dubois slept in beds in which small-pox patients had died, and mingled with the sufferers freely for six weeks without taking the disease. We cannot recall a time for many years when the outbreaks of small-pox have been so numerous as this year; and we are safe in saying that the cost of the cases already brought to light, in adding to the burden of pauperism of the country, will not be less than $1,000,000."

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for 50 cents, or six months for $1.00.

WE are now sending out bills to the subscribers of The Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a favor if our friends will remit at once, and if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew.

THE Foreign Missionary says: "One of the most aggressive free thinkers of our time, second perhaps only to Colonel Ingersoll, is Professor Morse, for some time a professor in the National University in Tokio, Japan. A recent letter says of him: 'He exhibits almost the zeal of a ranter against the Christian religion.' Professor Morse has, in some instances, even when accepting the courtesy of Christian churches opened for public lecture courses, abused his opportunity by assailing the work of missions in Japan." In this city, where he is well known, the character and services of Professor Morse are appreciated. "He is," says the Boston Transcript, "one of the original scientific thinkers and investigators of the day, and has made additions to the data of the study of the origin of species which have brought him the esteem and admiration and personal thanks of Charles Darwin himself. He won his title of professor by earnest and brilliant work in the University of Tokio, Japan, and is at present curator of the museum at Salem." Professor Morse is the next lecturer at the Lowell Institute. The papers announce an invention by him of a new method of heating houses. The invention consists in a surface of blackened slate under glass, fixed on the sunny side of the building, with vents in the walls so arranged that the cold air is let out at the bottom of the slate and forced in again at the top by the ascending heated column between the slate and the glass. The professor has demonstrated the practicableness of the contrivance in heating his study in his cottage at Salem.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 12, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

For The Index.

CHANT OF THE LOCOMOTIVE.

Rocked in the eddies of space,
Enmeshed in the fluctuant fire,
Slumbered the plan of me,
Slumbered the flesh of me,
Biding the will of the sire;
Till waked by the voice of the master of life I appeared, swift-footed and winged with desire.

Huge was the hall of my birth,
Ample and shadowed and dry,
Through smoke of a delicate blue
Long slanting ribbons of light
Streamed through the dome from the sky
Over the laborers, over the cool moist earth in the foundry dim and high.

Simmers the glittering ore
From rough-crustad ladies out-rolled;
Forth leap the sparkles and stars
In high-curving sprangle and spray;
Then from the hot smoking mould
Thin purple tonguelets of flame, and, fiercely outbursting, a bright-colored umbus of gold.

Trip-hammers massy and huge Batter the gold wax ore.
Laborers swarthy and grim
Temper and polish and grind,
Hammer and rivet and bore,
Till finally finished I stand, the pride of the race, out-vying the wonders of yore.

Now proud is the beat of my hoofs
As I trample over the land.
Far streams my snowy mane,
Hoarse is my voice as the sea's,
At the touch of the master's hand,
While with earth-shaking thunder and roar I rush on, as a storm or a hurricane grand.

Panting deep like one pursued,
Glaring eye and twisted mane,
Cling clang through rocky gorge,
Through lightning, wind, and rain.

Out of darkness into dawn,
Out of daylight into night,
Onward o'er the continent
A thunderbolt of might.

Ringing out the reign of darkness,
And the war of clan with clan;
Ringing in the joyful tidings
Of the brotherhood of man.

ROCKS AHEAD.

BY ALBERT WARREN KELSEY.

The conversion of floating into fixed capital (principally by the construction of new railways) is proceeding so rapidly in the United States as to necessitate in the near future a diminution in the wages paid to the laboring class; and, as the immense European emigration of the past two seasons will also tend to the oversupply of the labor-market, the more cautious and prudent among our merchants and financiers are already hard at work taking in sail before the squall strikes. It might have been supposed that the terrible disasters consequent upon the hard times which succeeded to the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., culminating in 1877, and of which the recent "flush" of business prosperity is but the reaction, would have sufficed as a warning; but the gambling mania is become all but universal, and every heavy operator hopes and intends to be able to save himself, while quite ready to cry, "The devil take the hindmost!"

At such a time, people are perhaps more ready to review the stable and invariable laws which govern the course of trade, and to investigate the well-known and easily expounded causes which produce the effects that periodically afflict the entire civilized world. The reduction of the general rate of wages is but another name for wide-spread poverty, misery, and discontent, for political and even social revolutions, if the disaster be but sufficiently prolonged and severe; for the prices of those commodities most essential to existence do not immediately recede with the reduction in the cost of labor, and nowhere are the laboring classes more accustomed to free indulgence in the cheaper luxuries of life, or less patient under privation, than here in the United States. If, therefore, it can be demonstrated that the country stands upon the threshold of "hard-times," consequent upon the high rates of interest demanded for the largely diminished portion of "floating capital" devoted to the payment of labor, the serious nature of the national outlook will be conceded by even the most sanguine.

Industry is limited by capital. That is to say, there can be no more industry than is supplied with materials to work up, and with the food essential to the support of the laborers. Only that portion of the wealth of a country or people, destined to supply actual producers with the indispensable prerequisites of productive labor, food, shelter, protection, tools, and materials, can be properly considered as capital. Now, inasmuch as the millions of money at present applied to the construction of railways only suffice for the most part for the employment of the laborers for the single season in which the railroad is built, it is manifest that, so soon as the contraction of capital reaches the point at which no more new railways are undertaken, the laborers will find themselves out of employment; and this applies equally to the workers in the rolling-mills, iron-founderies, machine-shops, etc. The capital invested in one single season in a new railroad is only returned to the wage fund by the very slowest processes, and after a period of very many years, even where the construction of the road was really demanded, and a paying amount of business ready to reimburse its proprietors. But, in those frequent cases where railways are constructed in advance of population, it is evident the return may be delayed for an entire generation. Now, as the aggregate amount of capital in a country (that is, the amount of wealth destined to be applied to the tools and materials of production, together with the food and shelter of the laborers) fixes the wages of the laboring classes exactly in proportion to the number demanding employment, the increase of competition among the producers must end in the reduction of the average wages paid formerly. There is no possible escape from this result, and all the efforts of all the trades-unions and coöperative societies will avail nothing to postpone or delay this event.

Had the same amount of capital been invested in the production of grain or cattle or almost any article of universal consumption, the proceeds of the sale of the wheat or beef would have been available next year as a wage-fund for the same amount of labor employed this. But, as the total cost of the railway is not immediately returned to its owners, but literally "sunk" (in most cases for many years) in its depots, bridges, road-way, and rolling stock, the money expended in its construction cannot (as in the case of wheat or cattle raising) be made available for future seasons, in the employment of laborers other than the comparatively limited number requisite to keep it in order and perform its daily functions.

It is very much to be regretted that the neglect of Americans to cultivate the scientific study of political economy and sociology has resulted in leaving them far in the rear of European nations in these regards, as is evident in their unwise, unjust, and industry-destroying mode of taxation and their seventeenth century protective tariff system. It is not only that they have all but annihilated their once famous merchant marine, and that they have permitted the United States to be doubly taxed on nearly all that they import from other countries, by allowing the carrying trade to remain in the hands of the English, French, and Germans, but it is in the thorough demoralization of mercantile methods of doing business, the offering a premium to the dishonest importer, so that those who do not scruple to defraud the government are able to undersell and ruin the honorable merchant, that the truly pernicious consequences of the abominable and unnatural tariff are to be detected, as well as in the army of officials it requires to be supported at the expense of the people. Year by year, the proletarians, or actual producers of wealth, are required to support not only themselves and their poverty-stricken families, but a large and constantly increasing number of non-producers, men who live by obtaining "a government situation," and contribute next to nothing to the wealth of the nation, and worse than nothing to its prosperity, through their pestilent intrigues to shape the result of elections and their thoroughly wicked and selfish scheming to procure and retain office. All this is the result of the inequitable system of taxation and our protective tariff. No possible "reform" in our civil service can avail to prevent the prevalent abuses. The evil is far more radical and difficult to eradicate. Commercial morality has been debauched in the first instance. And, by direct governmental interference between the producers and the consumers, the natural laws of supply and demand have been perverted in the interest of monopolists and favored manufacturers. The peaceful prosperity of a quiet agricultural community has been scoffed at, and the more precarious methods of manufacturing avocations vaunted as the natural destiny of the working-men. The self-supporting farmer's life, as it exists in France or Germany or Switzerland, is become insupportable to the vast majority of native Americans; and this is why the population of the largest of the New England States continues to diminish, and the Irish to become the farm owners throughout Massachusetts.

The Americans are killing the goose which lays the golden eggs; and, while the rich have become richer, the poor are constantly becoming poorer, and the former well-to-do "middle class" bids fair to become ultimately completely extinct.

Our government puts a stop to the importation of certain commodities,—say salt or sugar or iron ships or cotton or woollen cloth,—and when it has thus caused the commodity to be produced in the United States, at double cost to the consumer, it plumes itself upon having enriched the country with "new branches of industry," and parades, in labored statistical tables, published at the government's expense, the amount of produce yielded and labor employed in these industries, and claims credit for all this as a gain to the country, obtained through the productive tariff. As if the labor would not have been directed to some other branch of productive industry and the capital invested in other ways, had there been no artificial inducement to undertake the "protected" manufacture! Industry being limited by the gross amount of capital in a country, there can be no increase of the one or the other by embarking in new industries.

And only by legislation for the purpose of making the people more laborious, abstemious, and law-abiding, by improving the mental, moral, and physical condition of the masses, can any government create either capital or industry, unless it be by laying on special taxes for this object, and importing slaves or coolies to do the work. Again, the ends inculcated, for the most part, in the tone of thought, the social ambition, and popular habits of the citizens of the United States, are absurdly erroneous, and indicate an utter lack of true discernment of the object of existence. Thus, the largest amount of individual liberty is generally looked upon as something to be desired,—as if liberty was not either good or bad according as its opportunities are used or abused! Personal pleasure is regarded as the chief end of man, and the idea of duty and responsibility is quite subordinate. Education is thoroughly superficial, and tends rather to the ornamental than the practical requirements of life. Bread-winning is coming to be regarded as irksome and ignominious. The unskilled laborers have been taught to think that the interest of their employer is separate and distinct from their own, even if it is really not opposed to it. Since the war, a "caste" spirit has grown up, which threatens the perpetuity of the democratic form of government. Ambitious, unscrupulous, and even illiterate men are elevated to the very highest offices, and elections are prostituted to the perpetuation of the power of the dominant faction. The poor are coming to believe that money can do anything, even override justice; that the laws are made for and applied in the interest of the wealthy classes only. They have seen a majority of votes fall to elect; a President seated who, under the Constitution, had been defeated. They have witnessed two assassinations of our national Executive within sixteen years, and they realize that an unholy policy of force is uppermost in our politics, our commercial affairs, and our civil institutions. History teaches how this tendency inevitably terminates. When distrust of their natural leaders has once thoroughly permeated a people, it is but a question of time when anarchy attacks and revolution concludes the era of popular government and democratic institutions. To this consummation, various tendencies are now converging; and it will require the utmost wisdom, prudence, and patriotic and disinterested leadership to avoid the same disasters that have befallen other governments in other eras of the world's history. The corruption of wealth has effeminized the upper classes, and demoralized their immediate dependants. Luxurious habits are fast destroying the hope of the country,—its young men and women. Extravagance in living is greater than ever before known. The consumption of alcohol and tobacco, of beer and brandy, wine and whiskey, is undermining the last vestiges of self-respect among the laborers. Votes are almost publicly bought and sold at our election places, and the "lobby" is a recognized power behind the throne at Washington. President Arthur caters to the very lowest and most ignoble passions in his inaugural address, and his concluding peroration, in which he promises to cooperate with Congress "in such measures as will promote the glory of the country," reminds one of the Napoleonic addresses which invariably preceded wars upon Mexico or attempts upon the liberty of the people similar to the coup d'état. His proposition to modify the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, in order that the United States may be better enabled to assert the selfish and "dog-in-the-manger" policy of dictating to the weaker States of Southern and Central America what it conceives to be for its own interest is positively unprecedented in its audacity. His recommendation for an increase in our army and navy is untimely and unwise. The United States are at peace with all the world; nor is there the slightest reason to believe our friendly relations can be changed, except through the inauguration of "imperial" methods of continental aggression. His palpable design is to create such extravagant expenditure in other directions as to prevent any reduction of the iniquitous tariff, and thus to win over the capitalists and manufacturers to the "stalwart" faction, and foist Grant upon the country in 1884. Rather than reduce the vast army of political office-holders, who have twice succeeded in carrying doubtful presidential campaigns by their contributions of money assessed upon them as the price of the positions they hold, President Arthur prefers to appropriate vast sums for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi; and his method for restoring our former commercial importance is to subsidize a merchant marine, "which might not have failed, had it been protected as we have protected our manufactures."

Herbert Spencer teaches that aggregations of individuals are governed by precisely the same laws as obtain among their component parts, and that in proportion to the rapidity of national growth is the fruition of their functions, their maturity and decay. The more than hot-house growth of the United States of North America promises to be succeeded by as rapid a culmination, decline, and fall.

"There is a moral to all human tales:

'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past,—

First Freedom and then Glory: when that fails,

Wealth, Vice, Corruption, Barbarism at last.

And History, with all her volumes vast,

Hath but one page."

Old Tom Benton, at the termination of his record of his life labors, Thirty Years in the United States Senate, remarks that "Republics are the shortest-lived in the entire family of nations," and points out that the most serious evils which beset them are the baneful spirit of faction and the corrupt election of their officials, either of which, he asserts, will inevitably terminate by transforming their character and form of government within a comparatively limited period. The United States to-day are afflicted with each of these terrible abuses; and the "Golden Age" of the Republic, which terminated with John Quincy Adams, succeeded by the "Silver Age," which ended with the outbreak of civil war, may perhaps indicate in an approximate degree the length of the present "Brazen Age," which, in the same proportion of time, would soon bring us to that "Iron Age" where the Republic may witness how history constantly repeats itself, by accepting the stern rule of a military dictatorship rather than permit society to relapse again into its primeval barbarism, through the multi-form tyranny of "the many-headed monster."

TWO AMERICAN POETS.

We have two thoroughly American poets, namely, Bryant and Whitman, to say nothing of Emerson, who, as a poet, is overshadowed by his own reputation as an essayist and thinker of the deepest spiritual insight. Later along, he will be better known as a poet, known in that capacity as he deserves to be, and as he is even now known by the few. Bryant and Whitman both are poets who reflect the environment into which they were born, whether physical, social, or political, in their effusions. Our own critics and literary people do not take so kindly to "Walt Whitman," as he is familiarly called, as do foreign critics and writers. Undoubtedly, he is one of the roughs, as he originally styled himself, both in matter and manner. He is as undisguised and frank as Nature herself; and, like the old Cynic philosophers, he seems to have emancipated himself from all conventionalities. Here and there he is charming, and then again he is hateful and repulsive. He disdains to clothe his ideas in a seductive apparel of melodious diction, but his diamonds are all rough. It is of course easy enough to denounce "Walt" in good, round terms, and he is thus denounced as brutish, Satyrish, and unclean; but he is more than that, as the admiration of some of the foremost writers of the age abroad shows. This he had long ago, when he was a mere offence and by-word of scorn at home. Prudishness and daintiness being the most notable qualities of our most popular writers, of course "Walt" is necessarily an offence to them, and they cannot consort with him. The shows of things are transparent to "Walt," and do not hide the reality and truth of which they are the mere symbols. He is thus, like all original seers and prophets, deep-sighted, and makes startling announcements. The chief allegation against "Walt's" Muse is that she is immodest, vulgar, and obscene. The best appreciation of him which ever fell under the writer's eye is that of Mr. Joseph B. Martin. On this subject, he says: "As to sexuality there is an instinct of silence, which it is said Whitman, in his group of poems entitled 'Children of Adam,' rudely ignores and overrides. But so do the physiologist and the true physician ignore this instinct and break the silence. And properly so. And this poet of democracy is a physician of both soul and body. He comes to diagnose the disease in the intellect, in the art, in the heart of America to-day. And what does his discriminating eye discern? He sees that there is a false sense of shame attaching in the modern mind (especially the American mind) to the sexual relation.

"There is tacit admission among men and women everywhere, in our time, that there is inherent vileness in this relation, in sex itself, and in the body. We come honestly enough by this belief. The tradition is very old. It began with Judaism, and Christianity has maintained it. The Church chants it in her litanies, and Puritanism has emphasized it and formulated it into an iron creed. The body's vileness is traced back in our traditions, even to the beginning of the human race. Nor is there any concession of the possibility of purification on the earth. The ancient Greek, untutored in these traditions, ignorant of the reported fall of the ancestor of mankind, had no such consciousness of the impurity of sex. The Greek sculptors, free from any sense of shame, carved their statues nude," etc. So far, Mr. Martin. And yet the ancient Greeks had the instinct of modesty as manifestly as did the ancient Hebrews. Greek and Roman human nature was morally and emotionally organized, as we are organized to-day. Things-to-be-ashamed-of is a literal translation of the Roman or Latin word descriptive of the sexual organization. But a morbid prudishness and false delicacy is one thing, and a healthy, natural modesty is quite another. The best feature of original Christianity was its inexorable warfare on lust and the carnal appetite, and its unqualified inculcation of personal purity and chastity. The dry-rot of the old ethnic civilization was its uncleanness and impurity. It finally died of its brutal carnality and unnatural fleshly appetites, which were comparatively unknown to the purer Northern races. While Christianity was thus at the start needed as an antidote and corrective, it long ago did its work in that direction, and went to an opposite extreme of ascetic chastity and outrageous repression of the natural instincts of human nature, marring the lives of myriads of human beings, of millions of men and women, both with its enforced celibacy and chastity. Mr. Martin asks: "Is ours the age of the neuter gender? It would seem so from our popular literature. Our Bryant has dared to translate the Iliad and Odyssey with their amorous narratives and descriptions; but turn to the original compositions of the translator, or to the rhymes of Longfellow and Whittier and Lowell, and what line out of them all reveals any amateness in the present? That is always with them a quality of the man of the past. But Walt Whitman has saved the nineteenth century from the reputation which was fast fixing upon it. Through him, what we are is at last revealed. Through his faithful realism, happily, the world learns that Puritanism has not wholly cooled the passions of the race; that men do still yearn for women, and women for men; that the old red blood still courses in human veins."

As for Bryant, he was all that was correct and faultless in manner and matter. He had at heart a contempt for literature and poetry as serious pursuits, and never made them such; and perhaps the life of the mere literary man and writer is not altogether undeserving of the contempt which practical, matter-of-fact people are apt to feel for it. Byron and Gray were prompt to repudiate any intimation that they were merely poets and literati. But this sensitiveness on that score was a weakness in them. Bryant says that

"Poetry, though heavenly born, Consorts with poverty and scorn."

And in the same piece he speaks of the poet's "idle lore." But he could not help responding, with all his thrift and strange coldness of temperament, to the vibrations of our beautiful New World nature in exquisitely descriptive verses; but he never consorted with poverty and scorn, or neglected business for poetry. He was wealthy, and one of Manahatta's most solid and socially respectable citizens. Like Shakspeare, he put money in his purse; and even his poetry indicates that he was ascetic in his nature, and did not answer at all to the ordinary idea of a poet. His poetic product was extremely limited. He evidently only at odd moments allowed himself to be seduced by the blandishments of the Muses. But, when he yielded to their solicitations, he was a true vates, or singer. In a notice of him which recently appeared in one of our pictorial monthlies, Bryant's Christianity is particularly insisted on. But this is scarcely a feature at all in Bryant's verses. He was characterized as a pantheist at the time of his decease by Henry Ward Beecher, and he was such rather than a believer in any of the theological creeds.

"He wandered with the Great Mother's train divine."

His poems are strictly New World effusions. "No Church or State is interpolated on the divine sky and immortal year" which he sings. All with him is fresh, virgin, unpolluted, New World nature. Nature and the Power which works behind her were his divinities. He loved the solemn, solemn past of our hemisphere, with its freedom from all repulsive historic associations. Our rivers, rivulets, mountains, lakes, and prairies, which were never defiled by having been the seats and scenes of colossal superstitions, are the themes of his verse. In his "Thanatopsis, or View of Death," not a Christian consideration or consolation is obtruded. He simply recommends the living of a life so in accordance with the dictates of our moral nature that we can at last lie down "In the silent halls of death," with an unflinching trust in the consciousness of duty performed. Bryant felt and celebrated a spiritus intus, or informing spirit, as everywhere at work in the universe, in every living soul and heart and in every point of space and time. He evidently felt that Nature has her system of ethics as well as conscious being, that every atom is unswervingly obedient to law. Oriental theology is something utterly foreign to our American life, a something imported from afar in space and time. Bryant evidently so regarded it, and dispensed with it in his poetry and stately, solemn moralizations, while under the peculiar influence of the grand aspects of nature by night or day. The thought of death seemed to be ever present with him in his deepest meditative moods. He did not seem to be altogether reconciled to the fact that "Death is the law of this so lovely world."

He would evidently have liked to encamp permanently on the bosom of the beautiful scenery in which his life began and was spent. He had no idea that his personality was to be annihilated or dispersed by death. He had glimpses in the twilight of this earthly existence

"Of mountains where immortal morn prevails."

But his heaven is not the scene of Oriental salacity, or courtier-like, abject servility with knee, harp, and voice. It is a region where the old man finds his youth waiting for him

"On the horizon of a brighter sky," a glorious, resplendent sphere, with meadows fanned by life-breathing winds, where we shall again be gladdened by the gentle presence of our loved and lost who have gone before:—

"Shall I not know thee in the sphere which keeps
The disembodied spirits of the dead,
When all of thee, that time can wither, sleeps,
And perishes amid the dust we tread?"

In fact, Bryant's heaven is naturally enough our glorious, lightsome, breezy, deep-skied, New World nature, transfigured and glorified. It is a scene of free activity, beautiful reunions, immortal love and youth, where "the glory of God" requires not a constant, wearisome, and obsequious celebration.

FREE PLATFORM.

A "free platform" offers a cheap source of relief for social cranks who ventilate their opinions as they eat their dinners, for physical satisfaction. The organization that keeps up such a platform is simply supporting a charitable institution which is more wisely and adequately supplied by the State under another name. Freedom is a very deceiving thing. I do not know of any more fruitful source of deception. Freedom to think needs no pleading for rights. It is a natural right that, in the nature of things, cannot be taken away from any one who possesses a capacity and ability to think. Freedom to talk should be limited by the rights of society in the same way that freedom of action is limited; that is, for the same reasons. Freedom of speech needs no special pleading in this country to-day. Its rights are not withheld, and its wrongs are tolerated to a wonderful extent. Free platforms, generally speaking, are to be found where the speakers dispense with ideas. If a platform supports a live truth that will be of use to society, and really stands before the world as the exponent of that truth, it at once limits itself by that truth, and so ceases to be free. That is to say, a free platform, instead of representing "freethought," represents no-thought or un-thought or absence of thought. It is a sort of mental "Old Man's Home," where arrested development warms itself in the sunshine of an equally undeveloped audience. Frantic yawn, tragic pose, and vehement denunciation of what the majority profess to believe are the most popular dishes on the free-platform counter. The less the apostle of the free platform knows, the more noisy he is apt to be; and the more noisy he is, the more he is accounted for by the average patrons of such institutions. Of course, this peculiarity is not confined exclusively to the so-called free platform, but is to be found in the Church as well. It may be very clearly recognized in any revival meeting, where sound passes for sense, and feeling dominates intellect. But, in the one place as in the other, the class of people represented are noted mostly for sterility of thought. Whether the noise be made in an effort to save the soul or to deny its existence, whether to placate an angry God or to vacate him, it is remarkable only for its valetudinary character, a survival of mediævalism in modern times.

Still, the noise in the Church, like the noise outside of and against it, is trumpeted in the deceitful name of freedom. "Salvation's free, thank God, salvation's free," shouts the savior of souls, though what that is nobody yet ever knew. So, too, most of what passes for freethought as the panacea for all the ills of the world is but a century-old rehash of words seasoned with stale thoughts of dead men who died from a hundred to several hundreds or thousands of years ago. The platform that has no higher object than to show teeth and snarl over and worry the dead dogmas of theology is as useless as the corpse it rends. The platform that does not sow the wheat of truth where it ploughs down the weeds of error has only manured the weeds, and leaves the world worse than it found it. Denial must be the basis of higher affirmation, or it becomes the assassin of liberty. To support free platforms of denial alone, is a waste of time and money. Below all success will be found to exist a positive idea, not always correct, it may be, but nevertheless an idea that is believed head and heart by at least somebody. If one person sees a fact, and in his head knows it to be a fact, and in his heart believes it, give your platform to that person, and in time others will see and know and believe it with him. In these days of wide-spread, intellectual development, costly churches, respectability, and what not, it has come to pass that people dare not rise above the mediocrity of public opinion. The maker of books, the preacher of old or new religion, and largely the philosopher and scientist as well, are blighted with the mildew of intellectual, which is the rankest of moral, cowardice; and the world of man stagnates from lack of inspiring declaration of positive thought. Revisions of old Bibles will not do. The living God was never put into type or bound in calf. His presence thrills every sense with consciousness to-day, and people are afraid to say they understand him because they know that the word of the living truth for this age, as in all great epochs of transition, is still a two-edged sword. Let us have done with the twaddle and cant of free platforms, until we have an actual, grand, and inspiring thought that is worthy of a platform and a hearing. Let us get a truth that will raise Liberalism above the possibility of cant and recant, and then, when men wear out and hang their harness on the wall, the work will feel no shock of loss, and superstition will enjoy no resuscitation.

FREE RELIGION AND EVOLUTION.

Editors of The Index:—

The philosophy of evolution is the key to many mental and social enigmas. That the various forms of religion are dependent upon mental development has been a long known fact; but the why and the wherefore have never been so clearly demonstrated as it is now by the evolution philosophy.

To the mind unacquainted with the facts of geology and astronomy, the Mosaic cosmogony may be readily credited, when taught by a venerated priesthood. To the partially developed reason, that craves only for logical sequence without daring to question the data from which it reasons, the belief in an inspired and infallible Bible is not to be wondered at. Let the datum be granted, that the Bible is the word of God, then human reason must not question it. To the partially cultivated mind that has never studied psychology and knows nothing of the causes of mental delusions, the belief in Spiritualism is quite likely.

A knowledge of the scientific facts of geology, astronomy, and psychology, is all that is necessary to free a logical mind from superstition. But many adults are wholly unprepared to understand such facts. What shall be done with such? Shall we continue to teach them their superstitions on the plea that they can't understand anything better? And here comes the question, What shall well-developed rationalists do? Must they remain in statu quo, if that be possible? Or shall they organize clubs for mutual advancement, leaving the less developed to minds nearer their own level. The "benevolent condescension" that prompts so many intelligent minds to ignore their own convictions for the sake of "society," for the sake of the many who are considered not ready for higher forms of faith, is one of the main obstacles to liberal organizations. It is a very serious matter to destroy a religious faith, however superstitious, unless he who undertakes it has time and means prepared to give a better one. Very few laymen in this working world have time to spare for such proselyting. But most rationalists, who have become fully emancipated from superstition, can spare their Sunday afternoons or evenings for liberal club meetings, where an interchange of views on the live questions of the day can be had. It is one thing to convert a community to rationalism, and quite another to help onward the farther advancement of those already free from superstition. Many failures of liberal societies may perhaps be attributed to the fact that their efforts have been directed toward making proselytes in Orthodox communities rather than to their own mutual advancement. Radical clubs, whose members are all capable of logical reasoning, and whose meetings are not to convert the world, but to benefit their own members, are much more likely to succeed. The believer in evolution and Free Religion would never be so foolish as to preach rationalism to the uneducated Roman Catholic. Nature "never makes such a leap." The alphabet and primary lessons must come first. Logical reasoning must wait until "soup, soap, and the spelling-book" have prepared the way.

Some advanced rationalists, men of culture and extensive reading, seem to think they have reached the ne plus ultra of mental development; yet it has long been a demonstrated fact that interchange of thought is one of the most essential means of progress and advancement, and there is no such thing as standing still: we must advance or recede.

The scientific method, requiring the consent or agreement of several competent minds before an individual conviction can be demonstrated to be a truth, seems to be the only effectual way of viewing a question on all sides. Hence, the necessity of club organizations to test individual convictions on any live question of the day. How many wild theories on finance, on labor and capital, and on Spiritualism, would never have been published, if they had first been discussed in the private club!

Transcendental intuitions and "inspirations," often leading to intense individual conviction, count for nothing with the scientist, until other competent minds have examined the question on all sides, and, if they agree, take it out of the region of fanaticism.

As believers in evolution, and in every form of Free Religion best adapted to individual development, would it not be better to organize clubs for mutual advancement rather than societies for converting the world? Fanatics and believers in "individualism" may dream of converting the world to one form of rational religion; but the evolutionist knows there are innumerable grades of mental development,—many even in this nineteenth century living in the mental slavery of the Dark Ages. REASONS FOR MATERIALISM.

Editors of The Index:—

In The Index of November 10, Mr. M. J. Savage declares that "he who stands by what is at present scientifically known cannot be a materialist." He bases this declaration directly upon the mere assertions of a few eminently scientific men, as Huxley, Spencer, Fiske, and others, whose opinions of course are the highest authority of the kind, and should be received with all due deference. But, after all that may be said, what better reason is this for a positive statement on such a question than a "thus saith." The validity of materialism, from what is at present scientifically known, demands altogether a higher authority than the ipse dixit of man or book, however learned or scientific, upon which to justify an assertion for or against it. This authority must be the scientifically established truths and their logical consequences. They, to my mind, attest the doctrine of materialism, and a portion of them I here present, with their logical bearing on the question:—

1. The equality of action and reaction. Physics teaches this law as subsisting in all concrete phenomena. Hence, an extra-concrete power could not exist to edge in, as it would destroy this equality.

2. The persistence of force. Physics, the physical sciences, and all the sciences, so far as developed, afford evidence of the existence of this law, which may also be logically deduced from the hypothesis of the first law. Hence, the equality of action and reaction obtains in all concrete phenomena that have been scientifically investigated; and a power aside from matter could not intervene except by the destruction of these laws. Matter only is on each side of the equation.

3. The identity in nature of mind and the physical forces. They agree in being extrinsic or relative, and hence have no extension. Love, thought, and consciousness are as yet only known in connection with matter. Alexander Bain, in his treatise on the "connection of body and mind," points out the characteristic difference between the two. The problem is a special one under the more general problem, the connection of matter and force. And what is here most worthy of remark is that all those characteristics of mind which he specifies, namely, no extension, no locality, as also the manner of union to body, union but not in place, are equally characteristic of gravity and magnetism, to which mind is more closely allied in its nature. It does seem, then, that mind is only a power of matter possessed of a peculiar form termed intelligent. If order is taken to be a sufficient mark of intelligence, then all matter is intelligent; for chaos, as opposed to order, does not exist. But intelligence, understood as characterized by all its various effects in addition to order, cannot exist in nature outside of man or animal organization, yet may be said to exist in nature potentially, as any other force may be said thus to exist. Force is relative, therefore known and knowable. As Mr. Savage truly remarks, "matter [the existence of] is only an inference." So also are the different forms of matter a mere inference from the experience of different forms of force,—of the different modes and kinds of actions and reactions. We know of matter, but not matter. Matter is the unknown and unknowable. Then, with what reason do the above-named scientists assert that scientific materialism has broken down; that love, thought, and consciousness are not of matter as other forces, when they, equally with the rest of us, know not matter nor its possibilities? The "gulf" between body and mind is not greater than that between matter and force.

4. The equality of utility and disutility [$u=d$]. All evil equals all good, if we will allow evil to be taken in as broad a sense as good. Goodness is impossible without its equivalent of evil. I do not present this law as a yet scientifically ascertained truth; but as one that may be logically derived from the first law, and hence quite as valid. Man, in so far as he is simply subverted, is wholly evil (disuseful). Evil in man, however, is generally restricted to his capacity of a subservient in his own economy, in which capacity he possesses both evil and good, the latter predominating much over the former, as is also the case with all kinds of wealth. Both utility and disutility are finite quantities, as man is finite. So are all good and all evil in man and in nature. The good in all activities, remote and recent, human or natural, is exactly double the evil, leave out man as simply subverted. These truths follow from the law just stated, and, if they can be scientifically proven to be true (of which I am confident), have an important bearing on the truth of scientific materialism. They show that matter itself contains the seed of all evil and all good. Evolution does not touch the question, as it treats only of secondary principles. Primary principles and primary laws are beyond its range. Mr. Savage is quite correct, in my opinion, in a former article (Index, October 27) touching on this question.

As much depends upon definitions, for a fair understanding of each other, the following terms are defined according to the use I make of them: Materialism is the doctrine that what we call matter is the only potent existence and contains all possibilities. Matter is any real thing that has extension. Force is action and reaction, actual or possible. Law signifies necessary relation, and can be expressed by an equation. Principle signifies causation and form or manner of causation.

IMMANUEL KANT.

Editors of The Index :—

For one, I was much pleased in finding that Felix Adler attached so high a value to the writings of Immanuel Kant, though he has given in The Index but a one-sided view of this great man's life and work. This is, however, the fashionable manner in this corrupt age with scientists and evolutionists in treating of nature and of life. They forget to mention the reverential side, because they are not born of reverence, and without which birth Goethe says a man is not truly a man.

Now, if Immanuel Kant was anything, he was a man of reverence; i.e., he comprehended the first beatitude, "poverty of spirit," or, in other words, was a spiritually modest man. And hence he exalts the "practical reason" (divine reason) as the highest spiritual power in man. This has "primacy," above all others, over pure reason, constituting his "categorical imperative." "This is that Light which lighteneth every man who cometh into the world," having a universal validity. By the theoretical reason we know concerning sensuous things, and by the practical reason we know of supersensuous things. This, Kant held, was the consensus competent given to all mankind to know concerning God, freedom, and immortality. This great man was of the same school as George Fox, the Friend. He vitalized the indwelling power of the Eternal. Those things he taught cannot be demonstrated by the "pure" reason, neither can they be denied. In this stage of being, a man can truly say, I do not know, I am an agnostic; but when he becomes inducted with spiritual modesty, when he becomes born of the universal reason, when he becomes free in the strictest, or transcendental, sense, then he has faith (fidelity) in that Power who will somehow, somewhere, make virtue and happiness coincide.

In respect to our esteemed friend and co-Free-Religionist, O. B. Frothingham, I think that I understand his position. Increasing years and thought have brought with them their legitimate fruit,—increasing reverence and faith in the Power Eternal. The idea of such a man going back to credulity and superstition is simply absurd. He is a Free Religionist, and never was a negationist; for between the lines of his most critical productions is to be found a reverential spirit.

A LETTER FROM CANADA.

Editors of The Index :—

Liberals across the line perhaps think that here in Canada we have a warm time with bigots. The recent book-seizure in Toronto would almost warrant such a conclusion; but several copies of Paine's Age of Reason have been received since through our custom-house in Napanee, and I can say that liberal thought is untrammelled, and the most pronounced controversial writings on religious subjects circulate freely through the Dominion. In Napanee, the book-stores always have on their tables the latest writings of this class. Mr. Allen Pringle is now engaged obtaining signatures to petition Parliament to enable Liberals to make an affirmation in lieu of taking the oath in our courts, and he meets with great success. The majority sign freely. The Ontario population is very liberal. The popular religion consists merely in church-going, the people seeming largely to have outgrown their superstition. A man can no longer get into position on the ground of mere piety, as formerly: he must now depend upon his merits. I send you pamphlet and clipping from the Canadian Spectator, in which you will find a notice of a workingman's reply to Father Graham's lecture on "Modern Infidelity." It is pretty sharp, as you will see by reading it. I wish you a Happy New Year.

Yours fraternally,

MAX. FOX.

NAPANEE, ONT., Jan. 1, 1882.

LETTER FROM NEW ZEALAND.

Editors of The Index :—

We have here what we call a Free thought Association. Atheists, Spiritualists, agnostics, theists, etc., belong to it, and each, as opportunity offers, advocates his special views, courtesy and toleration being pre-eminently essential. Up to two years ago, we met monthly, on Wednesdays, but with indifferent success. Since then, we have met every Sunday evening. We got up a choir, and a band of instrumentalists to accompany them. Members give original essays, and, in the absence of essays, readings from the most recent writers; and, to vary the proceedings, oral discussions are held occasionally.

From meetings of fifteen to twenty persons, we now muster from two hundred to four hundred, and sometimes seven hundred and more, when anything special is on. These meetings have become so popular that we have just laid the foundation stone of a hall for our own use, to cost about £3,500, nearly all of which has been subscribed. I send you newspapers with the ceremony.

We have also instituted—what I believe will be an important factor in the spread of liberal principle—a lyceum (or Sunday-school) for the physical, moral, and intellectual training of our children. This part of our work is well patronized. I sent you a copy of the text-book we compiled. All this has been done in a city of only thirty-two thousand inhabitants. Besides this, we have associations in nearly every other important city in New Zealand,—Christ Church, Wellington, Nelson, Auckland, and Thames. Australia too has several associations of a similar character. It is a mistake to think Liberals cannot or should not organize. Try it, friends, and you will be astonished at the result. But don't forget music. Materialists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, and those who form the invincible army of free thought in America, I appeal to you to unite. Sink minor differences. In essentials, you agree. Unite, then, and, consistent with the fullest individual freedom and intellectual and moral culture, you will thus be able to more effectively combat the common foe, ignorance and superstition.

I am, etc., JOSEPH BRAITHWAITE.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE STORY OF CHIEF JOSEPH. By Martha Perry Lowe. Illustrated. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

Mrs. Lowe has taken the story of the Indian Chief, as told by Bishop Hare in the North American Review, and put it into a pleasing metrical dress, without losing that severe simplicity which belongs to the subject. It is a pleasure to read anything so direct and free from inversions and ornaments. One feels that the language comes straight from the heart of a man who may not understand policy, but feels that he has been wronged, and cannot understand how those who excite his admiration by their superior power should debase themselves by what seems false and cowardly to his untutored soul. The following lines give a good idea of this:—

"My true name is Inmut too yah lat lat.
You'd like to know the meaning of my name?
My mother gave me birth on stormy night.
It means the thunder on the stormy height
Between the sudden flashes of the light.
My father did not leave a single spot
Upon my birthright, not a blot.
Our chieftains left us many a solemn law,
That we should give men what they bargained for,
That we should scorn to tell a lie.
They told us the Great Spirit lived on high,
And had a spirit home above the sky,
That he would give a good place to the good,
A bad place to the bad: we understood
This, I believe; and all my fathers do.
Do white men think so too?"

LE SOCIALISME CONTEMPORAIN, par Emile de Laveleye. Bruxelles: Librairie Européenne, C. Muquardt. 1881.

This superbly printed and carefully written book is mainly devoted to relating the aims and proceedings of Rodbertus, Karl Marx, Lassalle, and other German Socialists, the rise and fall of the International, the life and views of Bakounine, and the recent attempts to establish Socialism in this country, Denmark, Belgium, Austria, Hungary, Italy, and Spain. Thus we gain so strong a conviction of the dangerous position now taken by many champions of the workingmen that we welcome the wisdom with which the author speaks in his last two chapters of the real interests of society.

THE Art Amateur for January, 1882, opens the new year with a variety of designs for all sorts of fancy work, sufficient to supply its readers with work for the year. The eye is at once struck by the beauty of the drawings from panels in Italian churches. There is a suggestive article on artistic dress for women by Miss Mary Gay Humphreys, which is deserving the attention of those who are now sporting with the popular phrase "aesthetic costume." It might go into the question more deeply, and show more fully the relation of beauty to convenience and health; but we are grateful for the little it does say on these points. Another article on the same subject by Constance Cary Harrison is gossip and amusing. The article on Industrial Art for Women is interesting and instructive; but it strikes us as a little in what Miss Edgeworth calls "the Irish style" to say "in this country, where there are no practical schools of design," in the beginning of the article, and then describe the excellent Lowell Class in the Institute of Technology later. Would it not have been well to qualify her statement by telling us what she requires of a "practical school," if it is more than the Cooper Institute and Lowell Classes furnish? We wish the Art Amateur would do its part toward the cultivation of a pure English style. "Rarissimus tone and feeling" may do in a caricature in Punch, but is not becoming a serious critique of an exhibition; and the "maestria" of a splendidly sketched black silk costume may mean something to the writer, but conveys little idea to the reader.

THE REPLY OF SCIENCE TO SECTARIANISM.

The New York Observer says: "We with thousands hope sincerely that the commendable course taken by the eminent publishers, in kicking the Review out of their premises, will be followed in regard to the Monthly. Or, what would be better still, let us hope the Monthly will omit its atheistic teachings, and become such an organ of science as the great body of intelligent people will admit with confidence into their homes." To this, the editor of the Monthly replies, with his usual vigor and directness: "But the Observer scents atheism in everything scientific; and, if we began to expurgate in accordance with its notions, we should have to expunge the whole Monthly. For does not the Observer hold evolution to be atheistic? And what would the Popular Science Monthly be minus evolution? It is the new dispensation of scientific thought, cropping out everywhere, antiquating old views, affording new explanations, reorganizing knowledge, and guiding the researches of scientific men in every field of investigation. Those who do business on old opinions are in a great state of perturbation and distress about it. Some are for 'giving in,' some are for patching up compromises, and some for 'fighting it out.' Meanwhile, the tide is carrying everything before it, and the confusion of the unready waxes grotesque. The foreign periodicals arrive monthly, loaded with evolutionary discussions; and, in the last Contemporary Review, Calderwood, of Edinburgh, announces that even Hegelianism is but 'dialectical evolution.'"

"The Observer suggests that we make such a periodical 'as the great body of intelligent people will admit with confidence to their homes.' This sounds well, but what is it in a little plainer English? 'Divest your Monthly of every feature that can be objectionable to those who care a good deal more for the theological than for scientific teachings, and who have a horror of all science as tending to infidelity.' We should not be permitted to say a word of the progress of scientific thought, because hardly a step is taken anywhere that somebody with a dogma in that direction does not cry, 'Halt, you destroyer of religion.' We indulge in no exaggeration. The Observer is authority here; and, right above the article in which it recommends that the Monthly be kicked off the premises, we read 'SCIENCE FORGES WEAPONS CONSTANTLY TO DESTROY FAITH.' What kind of a scientific magazine would that be which should be suited to the state of mind of the dismal creatures who take such a view of science as this? We would rather take the Observer's alternative, and be kicked into the street, than to edit such a periodical. . . . We are afraid that, when the Observer invokes the publisher's boot as a censor of science, it betrays some want of confidence in its own foundation. What shall we say of the security of a religious edifice built upon the basis of literal Old Testament history? But, in the very next column to the article we are noticing, it is laid down: 'A denial of the literal verity of the Old Testament history is the first step in modern infidelity.'"

"If Guiteau's constant use of the epithet 'high-toned,'" says the New York Sun, "as expressive of elevation of character, shall drive it out of popular use, a good thing will be accomplished. Always a poor, weak metaphor, it will hereafter suggest a shrill squeak of egotism."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. GLADSTONE calls Cardinal Newman "the most fascinating writer of his age."

MATTHEW ARNOLD is to publish a poetic tribute to his friend, the late Dean Stanley, in the forthcoming number of the Nineteenth Century.

LEOPOLD VON RANKE, the German historian, although in his eighty-eighth year, has just published the third and fourth volume of his Universal History.

JENNY LIND is sixty, but is said not to look fifty, her hair being only slightly mixed with gray, while her eyes are bright as in youth and her figure still graceful in outline.

MR. JOHN ALBEE, one of the contributors to The Index, is lecturing very acceptably in New York City on "The Origin and Development of the English Language" and on "Faded Metaphors."

MISS SUSAN FENIMORE COOPER, daughter of the great American novelist, is living at Cooperstown, N.Y. She is seventy years of age, and takes great interest in all humanitarian movements.

THE new writer for the Atlantic, S. A. L. E. M., whose short stories have excited interested comment from their dramatic power and earnest tone, is said to be the wife of Mr. John C. Wyman, a gentleman well known in New York and Boston.

KING HUMBERT, of Italy, anxious to pay his father's extraordinary debts, practises an economy unparalleled by a crowned head. Besides reducing the royal stud to a minimum and diminishing the court officials, he has tried to sell several of the royal palaces.

REV. R. W. DALE, the distinguished representative of the Congregationalists in England, says the title "Rev." is "the last rag of sacerdotalism." Hereafter, he wants to be called plain "Mr." Dale. Why have not Unitarian ministers, long ere now, uttered some such protest as this?

MR. BLAKE, the new Mayor of San Francisco, seems to be a more sensible man than his predecessor. He cut his inaugural message down to the limits of a half-column, saying that it was his belief that "all inaugural talk and ceremony might be omitted without the slightest public detriment."

POSTMASTER-GENERAL JAMES owns that official life has been disappointing to him. His sort of disappointed officials are the kind of office-holders we are so greatly in need of, since in spite of his disappointment he made one of the most efficient, thorough, and progressive of cabinet officers.

MISS JENNIE COLLINS, who has been obliged through severe illness to give up her philanthropic labors for some weeks past, is, we are glad to learn, slowly recovering; and it is hoped will soon be able to resume her place at "Boffin's Bower" as the earnest and practical friend of all working-women.

NOW THAT all the funny newspapers have had their gibe because ex-President Hayes refused to subscribe to the Garfield monument fund because of poverty, it is found that he did not refuse. He gave $250, and offered to give more. The New York Sun will be very unhappy.—Springfield Republican.

IF Mr. Parnell does not get out of Kilmainham jail before the next meeting of Parliament, Justin McCarthy will be the leader of the liberal party in the house, with Mr. T. P. O'Connor to back him. There are about thirty-one members, all told, of the Liberal party in Parliament, exclusive of those in confinement.

RICHARD H. DANA, one of the best known American lawyers and litterateurs, died suddenly at Rome last Friday of pneumonia. He was born in Cambridge, Mass., in 1815. His first work, Two Years before the Mast, is the one by which he will probably be remembered, when his legal services shall have been forgotten.

MISS MARIA MITCHELL, the widely renowned lady Professor of Astronomy of Vassar College, was in this city very recently, and was tendered a reception by the New England Woman's Club of Boston. It is reported as having been a very interesting and enjoyable affair. About two hundred members and invited guests were present. Among those who took part in the speech-making on the occasion were Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, James Freeman Clarke, Lucy Stone, Dr. M. J. Safford, and others.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

GOVERNOR ST. JOHN, of Kansas, is appropriately named. His indeed is "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye, prepare ye the way!" since he is so sincere in his advocacy of the twin reforms of Temperance and Woman's Rights that he goes out lecturing on the one, and shows his belief in the other by appointing Mrs. Cora M. Downs one of the regents of the Kansas State University, the first position of the kind held by any woman.

THE Sabbath-keepers of this city have discovered a new and comparatively safe way of demonstrating their religious zeal. The Police Commissioners on their behalf have issued orders to be rigidly observed, that hereafter all the bake-shops must be closed at nine o'clock Sunday mornings. It remains to be seen whether the procrastinating citizen who fails to secure before that hour his brown bread and baked beans will coolly endure such infringement of his rights as a Bostonian.

SECRETARY McDONALD, of the New York Michigan Relief Fund, has just returned from a trip through the burned district in that State, and reports that more help is needed immediately by the impoverished farmers of that section, or great suffering must necessarily ensue, as they have no means of livelihood during the winter, nor anything to purchase seed with which to begin their spring-planting. The benevolent everywhere are urgently requested to consider the needs of these worthy and stricken people.

We felt quite sure that "Mother Shipton's prophecy" was too good a stock in trade for marvel-loving people to be given up as unfulfilled when the specified date for its fulfilment had passed, and now, in evidence of our prescience, comes a nameless "Hartford man," who says that "it is a mistake to limit the period of Dame Shipton's prophecy with the 31st of December, 1881." He holds that the time should be computed under the old style, which would extend the year 1881 to the 24th of March next. So there are some eighty odd days yet in which to fulfil the prophecy.

IF we were preachers who believed in an overruling Providence, we should insist that the lesson meant to be enforced by last Friday's sickening railroad disaster is that stoves are poor economy for any railroad corporation, and poorest of all for a rich company such as owns the Hudson River Railroad, and that the sooner such criminal economies were forced to be abandoned by the strong pressure of universal public condemnation vigorously expressed, the better it would be for humanity generally. But, since we are not such preachers, we can only hope that public indignation will soon shame all railroad companies into adopting some safer, if less saving, method of heating cars than that which cost so much cruel torture last Friday.

THE Massachusetts Woman's Suffrage Association held its annual meeting at the Meionaon in this city on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week, which was well attended. Among the speakers were Hon. Wm. I. Bowditch, Mrs. Margaret Campbell, Julia Ward Howe, Hon. Charles J. Noyes, Mr. H. B. Blackwell, Lucy Stone, ex-Gov. Claflin, Judge G. W. Warren, Mary F. Eastman, and others. Letters were read from Senator Hoar and John Bright in approbation and encouragement of the movement. The résumé of the year's work of the association showed decided progress, and gave a hopeful outlook for the future. The report of the late action of the United States Senate in appointing a committee to consider the question of Woman's Suffrage was considered especially encouraging.

THE Christian Union says: "Genuine and spurious religion were never set in more striking contrast than in the experiences of Garfield and Guiteau. On the one hand, a dying man, making no professions, saying nothing of God or inspiration, but bearing the prolonged agony of a four months' dying without a murmur; on the other hand, his assassin, talking of the Deity as glibly as though Jehovah were an acquaintance round the corner, and of inspiration as though God were a senior partner in the firm of which he was junior." Think of it! An evangelical journal declaring that "making no professions, saying nothing of God or inspiration," but enduring pain without complaint, is "a striking" indication of "genuine religion." Tempora mutantur, et nos mutantur in illis.

In his late message, Gov. Long said: "I renew my protest against the barbarism, inefficiency, and peril to innocence, of capital punishment. Failing its abolition, I earnestly urge you to leave to the jury—the best and safest of tribunals—the question of its infliction. This will make conviction surer, will meet more fully the circumstances of each case, and, while still preserving the terror of the death penalty, if there be any virtue in that will be more in harmony with the humane spirit of the age. The pretence of insanity will not then succeed, as it now too often does. Should you abolish the death penalty, you might substitute for it the severest form of imprisonment. Let me remind you, quoting the substance of another's summarization, first, that the present uncertainty of the death verdict lessens the deterrence of the death penalty; second, that with its abolition for smaller offences, their number, in proportion to the increase of population and the facilities for their commission, has diminished; and, third, that in civilized communities where it has been totally abolished murders have not become more frequent. Rhode Island is an instance. Statistics show also that the pardoning power is not abused in relation to sentences for murder in the first degree, when commuted from death to imprisonment for life."

THE French operations in Tunis and Algeria, especially the violation of sacred tombs and the march upon the holy city of Kairwan, have aroused the religious fanaticism of the Moslems; and there is exhibited a strong feeling, which finds expression through Mohammedan journals, in favor of a political union of all the Moslems under the Sultan of Turkey. One of these journals says: "The necessity for political union has been forced upon us by the experience of the last half-century, during which period repeated aggressions have been made upon the Moslems, and several provinces have been wrested from them by the Christian Powers. In 1830, France seized upon Algeria. In 1838 and again in 1879, the English invaded Afghanistan for their own selfish purposes. As a result of the late Russo-Turkish war, Kars and Batoum have been annexed by Russia; and the Danubian provinces, together with Bosnia, Montenegro, and a large slice of Greece, have been severed from the Turkish Empire. Tunis is rapidly being annexed by France, and Tripoli and Egypt are threatened. Thus, we find that those Moslem States which had acquired or had aimed at acquiring independence of the Khalifah have for the most part fallen a prey to the greed of the foreigner." Nothing but hostility, these journals say, can be expected from France; and the failure of England to act during the Russo-Turkish war, her occupation of Cyprus, and her joining France in sending iron-clads to Alexandria, are among the facts referred to in proof that she is not to be trusted. The British Government is urged to consider a question which has "an important bearing, not only on Egypt, but on Asia Minor, and on India with its millions of Moslem subjects." English statesmen are told not to rely upon the present attitude of British subjects in India as an indication of what it would probably be, should she participate in any "fresh aggressions upon the rights and dependencies of their recognized Khalifah," the successor of Mohammed and the Emperor and High Priest of Islam. Should such a union as is desired by the Moslems be effected, it would have an important bearing on the relations of the European nations to one another, and would do much to shape the history of the remaining portion of the nineteenth century.

OUR COUNTRY'S OUTLOOK.

It is to be presumed that the readers of The Index bear in mind the notice kept standing in its columns, that no writer for the paper involves any other person than himself nor any association in responsibility for his opinions. And, this being the case, The Index has not been held to account editorially for the extremely pessimistic view of the future of the United States, taken by our respected contributor, Mr. A. W. Kelsey, in his article entitled "Rocks Ahead," published last week. It seems well, however, to present certain other aspects of the subject, which Mr. Kelsey appears to have overlooked. He is a thoughtful observer, and there is not a little truth in the dark side of our national prospects which he portrays.

In our national prosperity and ease, in our very success as a nation,—a marvel to the world,—there are dangers, political and social, liable to be lost sight of. It cannot be affirmed as an axiom that there is in the present age any absolute security to prevent a republic like that of the United States from going to the same destruction which has befallen republics in former times. And the optimistic belief concerning this country, the "manifest destiny" theory shared by so large a part of its citizens, is positively mischievous in its results. It blinds people's eyes to actual perils that may be close at hand. There is really nothing that is going to save the Republic of the United States from collapse, except the practical wisdom and virtue of its citizens. If we can rely upon this wisdom and virtue, we are tolerably safe. If we cannot rely on these, there is nothing in the marvellous richness of our material resources, nor in our exceptional national success hitherto, nor in the glory of our Declaration of Independence, nor in the wisdom which our fathers put into the national Constitution, that will insure the nation's salvation.

But it is just here that we have a right to a well-grounded hope. The wisdom and virtue of the American people have thus far responded well, in every national emergency, to the demands made upon them. The sober common-sense of the people, when appealed to, rises to the exigency, and has carried the country safely through several critical periods. There is a vast deal of foolish boastfulness about our national power, that is only chaff. Yet, when this is blown off, there is left a pretty pure grain of good sound common-sense in the majority of American citizens, that can be trusted to do the right thing. Notwithstanding, therefore, the dark facts of financial and political corruption around us, to which it would be folly to shut our eyes, it were also folly to despair of a people that has shown hitherto so much capacity for meeting its perils and overcoming its own evils. It is well that the conditions of the grave politico-economical, educational, and social problems which Mr. Kelsey thinks are close upon us, should be looked in the face. Especially would it be wise for people in the midst of their present material prosperity to remember that "hard times" are pretty sure to follow such an era, and that somewhat less of speculation and somewhat less of extravagance now, might in a measure break the reaction and make those after times less "hard."

But, in respect to the evils of political and pecuniary corruption among us, bad as they are, we can but think that Mr. Kelsey has strained the facts to weightier conclusions than they will bear. The business, money-making world is not so sordidly given over to the accumulation of wealth as it might, at the first look, seem. In spite of much crookedness, there are more honor and virtue in the business world than it often gets credit for from moral censors who are looking on from the outside. When the financial crash of 1873 came, there was a period of several days in New York during which all great business transactions among speculators at the stock exchanges and brokers' boards, as well as at the banks and in commerce, were carried on by check certificates which had no legal validity whatever. Yet there was not a single instance where one of these certificates was repudiated or found to be fraudulent. Citizens of various degrees of virtue and engaged, it may be, in very questionable financial adventures as well as in legitimate enterprises, being put solely upon their honor with each other, stood by it to a man. Another still better illustration that even men who are bent on making money are not wholly given over to sordid greed is what happened at the outbreak of the war of the rebellion. During the winter and early spring of 1861, while State after State in the South was seceding and making preparations for war, it seemed as if the Northern commercial world was paralyzed with timidity, and would let the national government go to pieces rather than risk the fortunes of trade. Cotton was king, and conscience was its slave, and patriotism seemed to be in the sleep of death. But, as soon as the South struck its blow, what a change! Money bags flew to Washington, and were transmuted into an army. Rich men vied with each other in pouring out their wealth to sustain the government, as young men vied with each other to pour out their blood. So long as we can remember that "uprising of the people" which saved the country and destroyed slavery, we shall not despair of the capacity of the American republic to meet any peril, political or social, that may be approaching. The reserve forces of virtue and valor are at hand, and they will be forthcoming when the critical moment arrives.

Mr. Kelsey's marshalling of the dark, political facts seems to us particularly open to criticism. Especially is such language as he applies to the election of Mr. Hayes to the Presidency to be deprecated. He says, and says it in immediate connection with a remark on the corrupt use of money in legislation, that "the poor have seen a majority of votes fail to elect; a President seated who, under the Constitution, had been defeated." An assertion like this not only blackens the honor of the country, but it violates historical truth. For, even admitting that Mr. Hayes had been "defeated under the Constitution," the statement as made is one of those half-truths that have the effect of falsehoods. It leaves out the fact of legal instrumentality, devised by the compromise of the two hostile parties, through which Mr. Hayes was "seated" in the Presidency, and would give the impression to any one not knowing all the facts that one party "seated" him, either by corruption or violence, in spite of the other. But, in truth, one of the great political parties of the country never admitted that Mr. Hayes was "defeated under the Constitution." It was a disputed election, and a disputed election in which there were charges of fraud by each party against the other, and most probably actual fraud on both sides. But it was fraud of a kind most difficult to ferret out in the exasperated state of party feeling, and the Constitution provided no way for meeting the perilous emergency. It is safe to say that in any other republic on the globe,—except perhaps in Switzerland, where, owing to a different mode of election, a like contingency, however, could not have occurred,—such a dispute would have been settled only in blood. The strife here was verging toward violence. Then it was that the reserved power of the people's wisdom and virtue came to the rescue. It was the pressure of the sober common-sense of the people of both parties operating upon the legislators at Washington that produced the plan of the Electoral Commission,—a device of legislation which, though it may never be repeated, was one of the wisest and most statesmanlike acts for the crisis that can be found in the history of our or any country.

Mr. Kelsey discloses similar partisan bias, as it seems to us, in his remarks on President Arthur. We confess to have been among those citizens who had grave anxiety for the country when it seemed probable that the Vice-President was to become President. But we are now among those citizens who are ready to acknowledge that this anxiety has been mostly removed by the prudence, sagacity, and good sense which Mr. Arthur has thus far shown in his high office. He is not above criticism, and it is well that public opinion should show that it is ready to rebuke as well as to praise him. But the dangerous sentiments which Mr. Kelsey finds in his first message to Congress have, so far as we have seen, entirely escaped the detective eye of readers on this side of the Atlantic. Mr. Kelsey is 'abroad, and possibly does not see things in the true home perspective. In what part of the message he thinks the President "caters to the very lowest and most ignoble passions," we cannot imagine; and though the President adopts Gen. Sherman's recommendation, that the army be filled up to the complement of twenty-five thousand men, and Secretary Hunt's advice, that the navy be strengthened, and speaks in "Napoleonic" phrase of co-operating with Congress "in such measures as will promote the glory of the country," we do not believe he is seriously meditating a coup d'état. President Arthur, indeed, is illustrating anew that fact which has appeared again and again in our political history, that men who seemed, previous to their election to high office, to be ill-fitted for its duties, after the responsibilities of office have come upon them, have manifested an ability entirely adequate to the demand. And this fact, while it should not lead to carelessness in the selection of candidates for office, yet happens so repeatedly that it is one of the proper reliances of political hope. It is a truth that the names of a very large number of citizens, scattered all over the country, of reputable intellectual capacity and unquestioned moral integrity, might be thrown together, and the choice made among them by lot for all the highest offices in the land, and the administration of government be intrusted with perfect safety to the persons thus elected.

In conclusion let it be added that, though the burning infamy of "two assassinations of our national Executive within sixteen years" can never be erased from our country's record, yet history will write side by side with this black page the radiant fact that on both occasions the government went on without a jar or jostle,—a fact which illustrates not only the strength of our national governmental machinery, but that self-restraint and self-government of the people which are a greater security of good national government than either constitutions or administrations.

WM. J. POTTER.

"EMOTIONAL PRODIGALITY."

The above is the title of an essay read by Dr. C. Fayette Taylor, of New York, before a medical society of that city. Dr. Taylor is an authority on spinal and other nervous diseases, and is at the head of an institution for the treatment of such maladies among children and youth. His large special experience enables him to trace the causes of deformity and the more serious chronic disorders of childhood, as the ordinary physician cannot. In the essay referred to, Dr. Taylor takes the ground that curvature and inflammation of the spine, as well as other kindred diseases, are caused chiefly by nervous exhaustion, which is itself the result of mental overwork. So far, his is the common view. But Dr. Taylor goes further, and outlines the specific element in mental action which, in his opinion, produces the evil result. To his thinking, based on wide experience, those who feel the consequences of nervous exhaustion, and try to lessen the cause of their illness and loss of power, often increase the evil they seek to avoid, through ignorance of the specific kind of mental strain from which they suffer. To quote from the essay, that the doctor's thought may be fully stated: "In the first place, the mind, as a whole, may be said to be made up of several different parts or attributes. Some of these attributes may be active, while others are at rest; and they all have very different and independent and distinct relations to and influence over the bodily functions. For instance, one of the most common errors is the supposition that thinking, as distinguished from other mental activities, is the source of injury when one's health suffers from excessive mental strain; whereas, mere thinking, disassociated from other mental phenomena, is one of the least likely to be in excess of the individual capacity to bear, and the least exhausting in any degree. In fact, it is unquestionably true that an active, well-trained thinking capacity imparts positive strength to the bodily powers, increasing both health and longevity. It is not the thinking which breaks people down, but it is an excess—often an unnecessary excess—of other mental activities which works the bodily injury; and, by other mental activities, I would especially include the EMOTIONS as the most exhausting of all mental attributes." On this statement, Dr. Taylor bases a strong and earnest plea for the protection of the children from all emotional excitements. He would not have the little ones "shown off" in public, or coaxed, even in private, to repeat brilliant sayings, or even to receive and return frequent caresses. And, later on, he would forbid all those exciting emulations which generally accompany school life; and he would, of course, postpone all social stimulations as long as possible. In short, he would have parents and teachers studiously avoid everything which tends to increase emotional activity in the child, using every effort to calm and repress the naturally excitable feelings.

There are several sermons to be preached from the doctor's text, to parents and to teachers, respecting home habits, kinds of reading, school management, and other matters. And the special need of women, proverbially the more excitable sex, to be protected from the physical as well as the mental evils induced by false theories of sex in education (indicated by the "man of the brain and woman of the heart" proverbs) might well be enforced from the suggestions of this essay. But it is my present purpose to speak of one element in the education of children which Dr. Taylor does not include in his list of harmfully exciting causes of mental strain and consequent disease, but one which, in my opinion, has held in the past, if it does not now occupy, a conspicuous place in the list of those causal evils. I refer to what may be called "emotional prodigality" in religion.

Mrs. Beecher Stowe, whose pictures of early New England life are so truthful and suggestive, has referred more than once to the morbid and intense feelings excited by the old creeds. Men, by reason of their out-of-door activities and less sensitive organizations, might often escape the worst physical consequences of the gloomy fear and abnormal excitement occasioned by appeals to "fly from the wrath to come," which was so vividly portrayed by the great preachers of the old religion. But women, shut up to the emotion-stimulating life of domestic experience and devotion, felt, alike in the throb of the unborn child and the petty waywardness of the "unregenerate" little one playing about her knees, the horrible suspicion that she was nursing and rearing subjects for the divine vengeance. What wonder that such women not only suffered in mind, but developed tendencies to bodily disorder which have been transmitted to their descendants in the form of "predisposition to nervous disease"? And to these children, already suffering the evil results of their mother's unhealthful religious terror or exaltation, already dangerously precocious from pre-natal influences due to their parents' over-stimulation in the emotional life,—to these children the Church has come with its exciting warnings, tragic appeals, and dramatic pictures. The old "catechism" was too abstract and learned in its statements to be fully understood by the children of those generations of the past, doomed to recite its lengthy answers on pain of parental discipline. And hence the children trained in it were less injured in body and mind than those of later date, to whose comprehension similar dogmas have been "brought down" by simplified statement and the illustrative adornments of picture and story.

With the rise and enormous increase in numbers and influence of the "Sunday-school" has come the means of stimulating the childish imagination and exciting the childish feeling through religious instruction. And the result of this has been, in very many cases, the physical injury of the child through nervous exhaustion.

The present writer well understands the physical effect of long-continued religious excitement in her own case; and, no doubt, thousands of semi-invalids know themselves to be paying the life-long penalty of abnormal experiences in youth. No system of teaching could be devised more skilfully adapted to excite emotionally a sensitive child than the "plan of salvation." Moving pictures of "lost" sinners; of the tender Shepherd, come to seek and save, crucified on the cruel cross; of the terrible doom of unbelievers; of the need, the imperative need, of passing through some strange, mystical, half-understood "experience"; of the glories of a world above, awaiting the "converted" only; of the constant presence, for blessing, reproof, and judgment, of an unseen Being, of inexorable memory,—all these are capable of rousing in the thoughtful and precocious child perfect tumults of excitement. Fear, hope, love, directed toward a mysterious God, unreal presences, strained attempts to "experience religion," haunting desires for mystical communion with the beloved Saviour, are no less exhausting to the child because he cannot express his feeling in words, and no less pressing upon his consciousness, because, with the natural secretiveness of childhood respecting things about which it cannot talk clearly, he confides his feeling to no one. The more sensible among the Orthodox Christians of our day disapprove of such special efforts to excite and control the childish mind as some well-known "evangelists" make. I remember when a certain travelling preacher, visiting Providence, R.I., addressed himself especially to children in a coarsely realistic and terror-inciting manner, many of the most Orthodox opposed his measures. Upon which, I may add, this ardent teacher circulated little papers among the children, advising them that they would suffer in hell, if they "loved father and mother more than Jesus," and urging them to disobey their parents, if necessary, in order to attend his meetings and save their souls. I do not, however, have in mind the revivalist's methods with children,—methods which are questioned by wise parents of all faiths,—in the charge I make of "emotional prodigality" in religion. The delirium engendered by the coarser forms of appeal is only the extreme of that common form of nervous excitement from which children of the most decorous Sunday-schools suffer. The belief in the necessity of a "change of heart," a mystical, other-worldly "experience," compels all consistent teachers to use all means in their power to excite in their pupils a desire for "conversion" and a longing for vivid conceptions of God and Christ. And such experiences must be stimulating, in the last degree, to the emotional nature of a responsive child. All such experiences tend directly toward self-analysis, introversion of thought, anxious self-cultivation in the lines conscientiously chosen. And, in proportion to the child's mental and moral capacity to answer the demands made upon it in these unchildly directions, is the physical danger. We would not advocate carelessness as to the child's training in religious matters or sacrifice of moral gain to physical. Better the early consecration of the child to the ideal right and lessened bodily energy than a perfect external nature and the mind an easy prey to evil. But only the infidel to nature, the faithless and despairing, can think that such a choice is before the parent and teacher.

The new religion, "looking out, and not in," teaching practical every-day duties, burdening the childish mind with no vague mysteries, no abstract ideas, no spiritual realm of half-understood beliefs about the supernatural,—this new devotion to the here and now of duty, the real and proved of experience, offers a safe field of instruction. The wisest men and women, those abreast of the truths of time's later revealings, have given up all dogmatic statement in matters of speculative opinion. And the most dangerous elements, physically speaking, of the common religious teaching of children, are those connected with theological views now either discarded or relegated to doubtful and unpartisan discussion by the leaders of thought. The moral side of religion, strengthened more and more, clarified by ever-widening views of human relations, taught by growing study and experience, comes more and more into prominence. And this ethical training, toward which we as rational thinkers and religious persons inevitably tend, can be applied to children, directly by lesson as indirectly by example, without unnatural and harmful stimulus of the emotions. The simple incidents of everyday life, the gentle, soothing restraint, the calming influence of thought, the healthful strengthening of reason,—these are the lessons and the methods of our new religion of the real.

The diseased sentimentalism of "the blood," the exciting tragedy of unseen worlds, the morbid supernaturalism of mediæval faith all swept away, we shall take our children out from the heated atmosphere of abnormally developed imagination into the clear tonic air of the world of actual fact. The religion of balanced judgment of duty, founded not upon the mystic's vision of ecstatic union with the unseen, but rather upon open-eyed devotion to the known right in human relations,—this religion can be cultivated in the child, as in the adult, without producing unnatural excitement and consequent nervous exhaustion. "Emotional prodigality" in religion can only be cured by a rational and natural faith.

ANNA GARLIN SPENCER.

ONE Rev. Robert West, in a New Year's sermon in this city, warned the people against the "so-called Free Religious Movement," as an ignis fatuus which "would surely lead them toward the bottomless pit."

HYMNS TO ORDER.

There is a growing need and consequent demand among the rapidly increasing social organizations, based upon liberal and free thought principles, for something to take the place at their meetings of the Orthodox hymn-books, the words of which are mostly unsuited to the feelings, and do not truly express anything approximating to the real intellectual convictions of the members of such societies. So many of these, rather than give expression to what they consider false ideas even in song, prefer to dispense with singing altogether, even at the sacrifice of their love for and delight in music; while others, unwilling to deny themselves this æsthetic pleasure, make selections of the least objectionable of these hymns, and struggle along with this limited choice of words and music the best way they can, occasionally bidding defiance to their sense of incongruity by boldly giving utterance to sentiments with which they have no sympathy for the sake of the rich, sweet harmony to which those sentiments are wedded. So now comes, as we have lately seen in The Index, an almost imperative demand for hymn-books which shall be peculiarly the utterance of untrammelled souls; hymn-books which shall be the expressions of humanity's highest aspirations, which shall be filled with poems of hope, encouragement, and truth. But one of the first requirements of such hymn-books is that they shall be filled with true poems, and not with doggerel verses or vague rhymes without reason or poetic fire. And because nothing short of this high standard can satisfy the ethical culture of this age is just the reason that we cannot yet hope to have our own proper hymn-books, filled with hymns wedded to the music most appropriate to them. Free thought, and even undogmatic theology, is still too new a thing in the world of thought, and a still newer thing in the world of poetry, to give us anything in the way of a hymn-book varied enough for all seasons and moods of feeling, and such cannot be "made to order"; for they must be the spontaneous outpouring of souls full to repletion of the sentiments they express.

There has not, however, been lacking, even thus early, various attempts to furnish such hymn-books; but, so far as we have seen, the compilers of these have not been persons who possessed that fine sense of "the eternal fitness of things" to make a success of them. And the consequence has been that such collections are in the main a heterogeneous jumble of exquisite words wedded to execrable airs, or vice versa (unless indeed words and music were both in bad taste,) so that even the most commonplace of us could not fail to observe the incongruity, and most especially in those hymns "made to order" to fit the tune or the occasion.

When even the Christian Church, after all its careful winnowings from centuries of poetic expression given to the emotions evoked by religious and moral fervor, is still finding fault to-day with the unfitness and crudities of the hymns it has been forced to accept out of its vast store of material, we need not grumble that we have as yet no meet musical expression in which to give voice to our highest thought and feeling. But, though we cannot get and do not want a hymn-book fitted to our needs "made to order," still we can congratulate ourselves on the fact that the materials for such a work are rapidly accumulating on every hand. Even in the poetry of our noble corps of Index poets may be found here and there a gem so expressive of some phase of thought or feeling common to us all, couched in true poetic diction, that such should be garnered up and laid away to be put to appropriate music when our hymn-book shall at length be evolved, not "made to order."

THE NEWTON HOME.

The Newton Home for Orphan and Destitute Girls is well worthy the attention of thoughtful philanthropists, because it is successfully working out on a small scale some difficult problems in moral and industrial education. The report for 1881 shows how all sects and classes in Newton unite in caring tenderly for these twenty neglected children. Much good is done to those who give as well as to those who receive help. One especially valuable feature of the institution is that all the children go to the public schools. They there mix with other children on equal terms, and feel no stigma of charity children upon them. It is pleasant to note how the various churches have invited them to their Christmas and other festivities. A few extracts from the excellent report will give some idea of the work:—

From the report of the superintendent will be seen how numerous and kindly have been the gifts the past year, enabling us to feed, clothe, and care for the twenty inmates. The beautiful influence of Mrs. (Aunt) Pomroy is now seen in the maturing fruit developed under her wise and kindly training. Eight of our girls are working for wages in good homes, and we hear favorable accounts of them. Coming from homes of squalid poverty and shiftlessness, as most of our girls do, it is our endeavor to develop in them habits of well-ordered industry and thrift. With this in view, we encourage these girls as they earn to lay by a portion of the same. Each has a bank-book, under the care of the directors, and in the aggregate these eight have over four hundred dollars deposited in the Newton Savings Bank. As with mature persons, so with these girls, the fact of having something, however small in amount, in the bank, stimulates the desire to increase the same.

Our children attend the public school. Their teachers speak well of their deportment and scholarship. We continue the practice of each older girl having a younger child under her charge, to see that she obeys the rules, that her clothes are in order, that she is neat and clean for school,—a motherly supervision at all times. Young Master B., Newton Centre, was anxious to do something for the Home. The thought came into his mind that he would raise some beans, which proved a success; for he brought a basketful to the Home, announcing with a smiling face, "I raised them all myself." The same lad also brought us some dainty prints of butter, made from the first cream of his pet heifer. If we earnestly desire to do good, a way will open; but we must seize the opportunity.

THE CITY OF GOD.

Castelar says the human race forever dries its tears in the breeze of hope. It has been hope which has always kept on the moral horizon the mirage of some model commonwealth or Utopia or City of God or, in North American Indian phrase, happy hunting grounds with superabundant game. Toward some such region of beatitude, men once dreamed or imagined that they were moving. When, about the time of the commencement of our era, they had given up the idea of attaining to happiness here on this shoal and bank of time, they placed their City of God beyond the bounds of the waste of this world in the clouds or some celestial region; and there it would probably still be standing, with its jewelled minarets and golden streets, had it not been for science with its space-penetrating telescope. The ancient world was long content with its narrow habitat about the Midland Sea, as it was called, on whose shores, as Plato says, men swarmed like emmets, while the vast outside world lay mostly unknown and unexplored through fear and incuriosity combined. Citizenship in some renowned city state, such as Athens, Rome, or Jerusalem, was regarded as the height of mortal felicity. The distant in space and the future had no allurements for the ancient citizen. Travel was regarded as simply exile from the city which contained all that was dear and lovable and admirable. As for a future existence, there were no expectations of felicity after death, which was a shadowy state for the ancient Jew and Gentile both, there being in the opinion of each no knowledge or device in the grave whither they were going. There was but little sentiment or romantic feeling in the ancient world. Ancient life was too narrow, sensual, and realistic for sentiment. Christianity, with its supra-mundane City of God, drew men's eyes and hearts away from Rome and Athens and Jerusalem and the other great central city states to the thought of a purer and higher citizenship, somewhere in the heavens, as they vaguely phrased it. In the Middle Ages, when the area of ancient civilization and the land of the nativity had become nebulous to the ignorant people of Western Europe, a singular epidemic of religious enthusiasm and fanaticism pervaded the Western nations, the object of which was the rescue of the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of infidel or Mohammedan miscreants. For a long period, all the valor, enterprise, and piety of the West were moving toward the Holy Land, as Palestine was called. Knights, scarfed with the cross,

"Watched the miles of dust that wreathed their struggling files Down Lydian mountains."

Humbler pilgrims with staff and scallop shell and sandal shoon plodded their weary way or sauntered in immense numbers toward the scene of the nativity and crucifixion. Thus was all Europe moved by a common and mighty sentiment and impulse, until finally Tasso had the material or subject-matter of his great Christian epic. Thus for a long time was a tomb the goal of human journeying and the object of human valor. After the era of the Crusades came the era of terrestrial discovery in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, when the bounds of things were loosened. The human mind was then enlarged and liberalized by novel experiences and by the expansion of the geographical area of human activity. The mystery of the Atlantic Ocean began then to be dispelled. Wild hopes and dreams of discovering a terrestrial paradise began to be kindled in ardent and fearless souls,—a City of God not in the clouds, but somewhere on the bosom of mother earth, in the dim and gorgeous West, with its magnolian forests and fountains of youth. The fabled Eldorado began to be the objective point of enthusiasts and adventurers, and to take the place of the apocalyptic New Jerusalem. For it was supposed to be accessible to the hardy and dauntless adventurer in the flesh, and to have in its vicinity a stream or well-head of immortal youth. As alchemy finally led to a genuine science with its philosopher's stone and elixirs, namely, to chemistry, so the fabled Eldorado led to useful and thorough explorations of the lower part of our continent, thus enlarging geographical knowledge. Thus was the period of terrestrial discovery a period of boundless, glorious hopes and the noblest daring. It was the period of Shakespeare. There was a new spiritual day-dawn, as it were. Finally, terrestrial discovery became so thorough that the dream of Eldorado was dispelled; and the romance of the earth, so to speak, gave place to accurate knowledge. Finally, the age of reason and science began to dawn in the seventeenth century, and mankind had their venerable illusions, delusions, and faiths subjected to the terrible ordeal of rational knowledge.

Now came, with the Copernican, Galilean, and Newtonian astronomy, a knowledge of the comparative pettiness and insignificance of "the earth and man," to chasten the arrogance of theologians and of human nature, which had hitherto regarded itself as the central fact in the universe. If terrestrial discovery had robbed the earth of its mysticalness, and shown that it was small and quite limited, the new astronomy brought disillusioned man face to face with the infinitude of cosmical space or the "starry heavens" of modern science. "Two things there are," says Kant, "which, the oftener and more steadfastly we consider, fill the mind with an ever-new, an ever-rising admiration and reverence,—the starry heavens above and the moral law within." Thus do current science and rationalism, with their revelations of infinite space and duty, excite a depth of awe and cosmic emotion, a solar certainty of eternity, which casts the loftiest sentiments and so-called revelations of ancient theologians, enthusiastic prophets, saviours, and religious founders, entirely into the shade. Theology has been overshadowed by science and current psychology and reflective thought. Myths fade into insignificance before realities and actualities or the truth of things, as disclosed by scientific investigation and theory. The real marvels and miracles are those of truth and nature. The fictions of theology and mythology dwindle to insignificance, when matched with theory. Meantime, social and political amelioration is now the goal of human endeavor. The City of God, or Eldorado of living generations, is a social state or community, in which all men and women shall be lifted to a plane of intelligence and competence in which there shall be no longer a monopoly of land and means by the few, but in which the glaring social and political inequalities and injustices of the past shall be abolished by a truly human and humane commonwealth, in which finally "the State-House" shall be the hearth or domestic fireside, and "the Church" shall be "social worth." And we believe that such a righteous commonwealth will yet be realized as the glorious consummation of all the sighs and dreams and aspirations of the noblest souls of the past.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Jewish Watchman is the latest comer on our exchange list. It is a new paper, published in Boston and edited by Rabbis Lasker and Schindler. Half of it is printed in English and half in German, and we judge that there is represented in it the same happy union of Orthodox and Reformed Judaism. It is an eight-page paper (the page about the size of The Index page), and is neatly printed. Judging from the first number, it will worthily watch the interests of Judaism in Boston. Rabbi Lasker, the editor of the English half, says in his "Salutatory":—

In our endeavor to make the paper serve the spread of knowledge and the principles of Judaism, and to disseminate the cause of humanity and the cause of truth, it will yet principally be devoted to the interests of New England's Jewish community. Like a watchman, it will ever be found at its post, a "champion of the Most High," appointed to guard, protect, and promulgate Israel's cause and Israel's faith. Our work must be judged by its results week by week rather than by any programme that might be laid down in advance. We frankly declare that, at present, it is an experiment which, in order to succeed, will demand the generous aid and financial support of our friends.

It is news to us to find that there are seven Jewish congregations in Boston, though some of them are small ones. Twenty-five years ago there was but one synagogue, and that so weakly supported as to have only occasional services. It is estimated that the Jewish population of the city now numbers six thousand. It is a population that can well maintain a journal of its own.

THE Secular Review, London, believes in keeping Christmas. In its issue of December 24, it says:—

The special recommendations of this feast which we have inherited from our forefathers are that under its genial influence these ties which in civilized society bind and cement individuals in bonds of union, and strengthen the humanitarian feelings, are knit closer together. Though not in the theological sense, yet it is certainly true that every succeeding Christmas assists, at least for the time being, in promoting "peace on earth and good-will toward men." Surely, a festival that can effect so much deserves to be welcomed on all hands, and to be received with a determination to utilize its advantages. . . . We regard Christmas as an institution worthy to be perpetuated, because of its action in promoting benevolence. It unlocks the warmest corners of the human heart, and should make us all keenly alive to the welfare and sympathetic in the sufferings, of all our fellow-beings. It may be that by some its privileges are abused or not wisely utilized; but such cases are decidedly exceptional. So far as the vast majority of the people are concerned, Christmas works for good; and it is noteworthy that, as civilization advances, so does this festive season acquire strength and become more deeply rooted in public favor.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH heard some very radical doctrine from Mr. Beecher on Christmas day. According to the Christian Union's authorized report, speaking of the slowness with which genuine Christian sentiment had advanced in the world, he broke out as follows:—

Organized Christianity is a sham; and yet it is an indispensable sham. You cannot make steam without having an engine for it to work in. The power of the gospel has had to have an instrument; but men have had no notion of how to build that instrument, and the Church has represented very largely the selfishness of the human race organized into power. The selfishness of the human race has been taken as an instrument with which to organize the Church over which Christ's name has been written. The institutions of the Church have been essentially conservative; and, from beginning to end, they have done as much to prevent the development of true humanity in this world as they have done to promote it. The theologians that reign to-day lie a stumbling-block right across the intelligent construction of religion. And is it surprising that the work has been delayed? Christ has been crucified over again for two thousand years. He has suffered at the hands of his friends. We have not yet got at the true conception of Christ. He may be conceived of by the poet, by the essay writer, or by the preacher; but Christ will not be revealed in this world until millions and millions of men in the family, and in business and civil life, stand and pour out the Christlike dispositions which belong to them upon mankind. When the time comes in which one whole nation shall live as Christ lived, suffering for humanity, bearing, forbearing, making love the chief justice, touching no man with harm, and every man with love, pain and penalty being the nurse that love sends, then the millennium will indeed have begun, and will be near its consummation.

If the snow has not melted, if the summer of the gospel has not yet been ushered in, it is because there has not been enough sunshine,—because the church has not done its whole duty. I think that hell has had the management of most of the theology of this world. I do not mean that there is not a great deal in theology, in creeds, and in catechisms, which is true; but I declare that the essential representation of the divine nature and the divine feeling has been such that everything which has been most manly in men has been blighted, for man's own self-respect has come to revolt at and to be sceptical concerning any such view of God as that which, for the most part, has been presented by theologians.

THE Unitarian Year Book for 1882 is on our table. It has a familiar look. It seems to be about as unchangeable both internally and externally as "The Old Farmer's Almanac." But in the list of ministers there are some names that surprise us. Isn't it about time to send round the catechism again?

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THIS week's Index provides its readers with a good variety of mental food. Dr. Caird's address on David Hume and his philosophy, though long, will, we are sure, interest and profit all who read it. It is a noteworthy paper to come from a Scotch Presbyterian. Mrs. Spencer's article on "Emotional Prodigality" treats a timely theme in an able manner. The senior editor discusses "Our Country's Outlook," for a companion picture to Mr. Kelsey's essay on "Rocks Ahead" of last week. In "Hymns to Order," Mrs. Underwood talks wisely on a subject that has already had some discussion in our columns. Other matters find appropriate treatment.

We shall publish next week the third of Mr. D. A. Wasson's series of articles. It is entitled "The Alternative." We shall also have articles by Professor Gunning on "The Ancient Man," and by Mr. Chadwick on "Thomas Paine."

In a speech at Birmingham, on the 4th inst., John Bright said: "What I favor is such a degree of freedom as will give security to freedom, but not such a degree as would destroy it. Some who blame the government are ignorant of the principles on which alone democracy can be made tolerable. The principles they profess in regard to coercion might lead them, if at sea, to object to a mutiny being suppressed by putting the mutineers in irons. Irish-Americans have organized conspiracy committees with the miserable idea that they could influence the policy and safety of Great Britain by such means. Doubtless, many of this class who were at the Chicago convention were, through mistake, honest and patriotic; but they took their ideas of Ireland from tales of by-gone times."

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for 50 cents, or six months for $1.00.

WE are now sending out bills to the subscribers of The Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a favor if our friends will remit at once, and if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew. A number have sent us new subscribers, and we ask all who can to assist us in this way. Let us emulate our orthodox friends in their zeal, and do this much, if not on account of our personal interest in the paper, at least for the cause it represents. Remember also that the most effectual way of improving The Index is to give it the means which will enable those in charge of it to make the improvements desired, and which none desire more than themselves.

SPECIAL PREMIUMS.—Every new subscriber to The Index for one year at the regular price $3, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 19, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

For The Index.

Year of all years, that hath been to me
More bitter than the depths of Acheron,
I will not curse thee for the ill thou'st done,
But bow as best I may to thy decree.

With what a buoyancy of hope and trust
I gave thee generous welcome at thy birth,
Swelling the chorus of the general mirth;
And thou my greeting hast returned with—dust!

Two happy eyes that shone upon thy dawn
And beamed upon us from our chamber door
Are quenched, and closed to open nevermore,—
The face, the form, the loving voice is gone!

Go, savage and inexorable year,
Haste to the gloomy hades of the Past:
Not to thy memory are these moanings cast,
Not for thy exit falls the hasty tear.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

A MAN can bear a world's contempt when he has that within which says he's worthy. When he contemns himself, there burns the hell.—Alexander Smith.

THE industrious man seeks wealth, and finds it. Let not the intellectual man murmur at the ills of fortune; for he did not seek wealth. It was not the consequence of his pursuit; but he sought knowledge, and found it.—Emerson.

LIGHT itself is a great corrective. A thousand wrongs and abuses that are grown in darkness disappear like owls and bats before the light of day.—James A. Garfield.

IF thou workest at that which is before thee, following right reason seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee, but keeping thy divine part pure, as if thou shouldst be found to give it back immediately,—if thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to nature, and with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy.—Marcus Aurelius.

David Hume as Man and Philosopher.

An Address at the opening of Glasgow University, Nov. 5, 1881.

BY PRINCIPAL JOHN CAIRD, D.D.

[Reprinted from the Glasgow News.]

After introductory remarks at some length, setting forth the eminent services rendered both to philosophy and religion by any able and earnest sceptic, Dr. Caird proceeded as follows:—

I wish to bring before you to-day a brief account of the life and teaching of one of the greatest iconoclasts of modern times,—a thinker in some respects in advance of his own time, and whose influence, whether directly or indirectly, by the impulse which he gave to speculative thought, or by the new methods and points of view to which, in the reaction from his doctrines, later investigators have been led, has been probably greater and more lasting than that of any other modern philosophic writer. Whatever may be thought of his theological or anti-theological speculations,—and on these I shall not venture to touch,—no student of philosophy, unless he is content to overlook one of the most important stages in the progress of thought, and to neglect the writer who gave the death-blow to one school of philosophy and was directly the creator of another, can afford to be ignorant of the philosophic teaching of David Hume. In some cases, the outward life of a writer has for his readers a deeper than merely biographic interest. It is natural that we should wish to know something of the life and fortunes of one whose writings have interested or instructed us. But, beyond this general human interest which they possess for us, there are some writers whose life and thought are so closely interwoven, who so live their thoughts or think their lives, that each reflects light on the other; and neither can be thoroughly comprehended apart from the other. This is only partially true in the case before us. In science and philosophy, a man's contributions to knowledge have a value which is quite independent of his personality. Whoever invented the differential calculus or the binomial theorem, we shall not understand them any better by learning when or where the discoverer lived or what manner of man outwardly he was. Whether nominalism or realism is the truer philosophic stand-point, whether thought is a function of matter or matter has no existence except for thought,—these and the like are questions which are capable of investigation on their own merits; and it affords no help to their solution to know where the originator, defender, or impugner of any of them was born and how long he lived, whether his person was comely or homely, whether he was happy in his married life, or lived and died in single blessedness. But in the particular instance before us, this reciprocal independence of life and teaching is unusually marked. In Hume, indeed, there is in some respects a singular contrast between the literary and the personal life. Perhaps in this point of view, though in no other, the nearest approach to him was in the case of his not less famous contemporary, Dr. Johnson, who personally and in social life was one of the most undefefferential and incredulous of men, dearly loving an argument merely for the sake of the fight, indifferent which side he espoused, and almost brutally sceptical of unsifted assertions and facts outside of common experience, even when supported by credible witnesses; and yet whose main characteristic as an author is that of an intolerant stickler for authority, an absolutely uncritical acceptor of traditional dogmas, and a laborious expounder of intellectual commonplaces. In Hume, the contrast, though it runs in the opposite way, is not less remarkable. He was probably the worst-hated author and the best liked and most likable man of his day, the greatest of polemics and the most amiable and tolerant of human beings. He tells us in one of his letters that he "possessed the love of all men, except all the Tories, all the Whigs, and all the Christians,"—a pretty wide catalogue of eliminations. He seldom took up his pen save to expose the nakedness of some respectable tradition, to lacerate the dearest prejudices of some school or sect, or to rub some sensitive dogmatist against the grain. Yet in private life, by universal testimony, nobody could come near him without liking him. Not only did his intellectual resources, his wit, his playfulness, his power of repartee, make him a delightful conversationist and companion, but his sweetness of nature and evenness of temper, his tact, his avoidance of disagreeable or disputed topics, his almost feminine gentleness and courtesy of manner, disarmed opposition, and drew to him a circle of attached friends, including many who, by profession and conviction, were his avowed intellectual antagonists. As an author, he himself acknowledges that his leading passion was the love of fame; and his letters are full of the author's sensitiveness to public opinion, and of expressions of wounded sensibility when his appetite for distinction was not fed up to the full measure of his expectations. But, by the common consent of his contemporaries and intimates, he was in private life the most self-effacing of men,—modest, unobtrusive, never seeking to shine, and, whoever formed the company, ready to take and give as the talk went round. He carried his courtesy, indeed, to the verge of insincerity. At any rate, it needs a careful study of his idiosyncrasy to understand how the philosophic and religious sceptic could choose ministers of religion for his bosom friends and be a constant and decorous attender on the services of the Church. Though, however, as we have just seen, Hume's main contributions to literature have little direct relation to his personality and life, there are some of his writings which cannot be so well appreciated without knowing something of the career and character of the man; and for this and other reasons a brief glance at the leading incidents of his life may not be without its interest for the student of his works.

Hume was born in Edinburgh in 1711. His father was a Scotch laird, the proprietor of a small estate in Berwickshire; and his biographers have not neglected to tell us that the family were remotely connected with the ancient line of the Homes of Douglas. I suppose, however, that most sensible people will be disposed to think that the philosopher's fame owes little to his distant connection with a line of rude feudal barons, or rather that Hume's name reflects more glory on his tribe than all the aristocratic nobodies that ever belonged to it. [Applause.] Of his early years, we know nothing, save that he studied at the University of Edinburgh, and had finished his college education at an age earlier than even the too juvenile period of life at which most modern students commence it. Wherever he got his knowledge, he proved himself afterwards a widely read classical scholar; and, though his writings owe little in substance to Greek or Roman philosophy, yet in their graceful clearness and elegance of style we can discern no indistinct reflection of classical models. From the very outset of his intellectual life there are indications that the bent of his mind was toward that province of thought in which his brightest laurels were afterwards won. But the circumstances of his family were straitened; and philosophy was not in his day, any more than it is in our own, a paying trade. Certain abortive attempts were made to fix him to a profession. He tried for a short time, first law, and then mercantile business; and it was probably the impossibility of getting him to settle down to either, in preference to those unremunerative studies in which his true vocation lay, that drew forth his mother's often-quoted criticism of her son's character. Mothers are generally not disposed to err on the side of blindness to the precocity of their offspring, and Hume's mother is said to have been a sagacious woman. But her sagacity was certainly at fault when she pronounced that "Davie was a fine, good-natured crater, but uncommon wake-minded." [Laughter.] The maternal verdict was soon and sufficiently refuted by the fact that, after a year or two of hard reading and thought at home, and three years' residence in France (of the details of which we know little), he produced, at the age of twenty-four, the greater part of his Treatise on Human Nature, the work on which undoubtedly his philosophic fame rests, and which contains the essence of all his contributions to speculative thought. The imperfect success of this, his first work, induced him, as is well known, some years afterward, to recast and reproduce it in a form, as he supposed, better adapted to the public taste. But the fundamental principles of the early work remain unmodified in the "Philosophical Essays" (afterwards entitled Inquiries concerning the Human Understanding); and all competent critics are at one in the opinion that neither in substance nor in form is the revised work an improvement on the original.

[Dr. Caird then gives the probable reasons why Hume rewrote the book, and points out the princpal differences between the original and the revised works.]

Hume's outward life, or the greater part of it, was a very uneventful one. His equanimity of temper would probably have made the cares of life sit easy on him, and have enabled him to bear calmly even great hardships and trials. But his fortitude was never put to the proof. Good health, easy circumstances, literary labors in which he found never-failing enjoyment, which never overtaxed his powers, and which brought him gradually reputation and wealth,—these, combined with social qualities which brightened his hours of relaxation, and an utter absence of morbidness or inequality of temperament, made the current of Hume's life flow through long years with almost unruffled smoothness. "I must esteem myself," he tells us, "one of the happy and fortunate; and, so far from being willing to draw my ticket over again in the lottery of life, there are very few prizes with which I would make an exchange." In another of his letters, he gives us the following half-playful, half-serious summary of the constituents of human happiness which had fallen to his lot: "I shall exult and triumph to you a little that I have at last . . . arrived at the dignity of being a householder. About seven months ago, I got a house of my own, and completed a regular family, consisting of a head,—namely, myself,—and two inferior members, a maid and a cat. My sister has since joined me, and keeps me company. With frugality, I can reach, I find, cleanliness, warmth, light, plenty, and contentment. What would you have more? Independence? I have it in a supreme degree. Honor? That is not altogether wanting. Grace? That will come in time. A wife? That is none of the indispensable requisites of life. [Laughter.] Books? That is one of them, and I have more than I can use. In short, I cannot find any blessing of consequence which I am not possessed of in a greater or less degree; and without any great effort of philosophy I may be easy and satisfied." (Burton, i., 377.) For ten years after these words were written, this tranquil student-life suffered no interruption, unless we can so term his appointment to the unremunerative, but, for a literary man, very convenient post of librarian to the Advocates' Library, and his unsuccessful attempt to succeed his friend, Adam Smith, in the Logic Chair of this university. A Mr. Clow, unknown to fame by any other title, has been rescued from oblivion by the fact that the patrons of a Scotch university deemed his philosophical merits superior to those of David Hume. [Laughter.] The first serious break in the even tenor of his life was his acceptance, in 1763, of the appointment of Secretary to the French Embassy, at the urgent request of the Ambassador, Lord Hertford. Philosophers are perhaps not often good business men. The popular notion of a philosopher is probably that of a bemused, unpractical recluse, harmlessly busying himself with abstruse speculations, who can scarcely manage his own private affairs, and even sometimes needs to be closely looked after by his friends. [Laughter.] However inadequate this notion may be, it must be admitted that powers of analysis and generalization, and a tendency to recur on all occasions to wide theories and general principles, are often a hindrance rather than a help to practical politics and the transaction of business. On the other hand, much inferior powers—tact, ready-wittedness, intuitive insight, the dexterity produced by experience of affairs—may equip a man of ordinary ability for the conduct of business better than philosophic depth and large scientific acquirements. But whether this be so or not, Hume's biographers have furnished us with satisfactory evidence that, both in the duties of the Embassy and afterward in the post of Under-Secretary of State, his philosophy did not prevent him from proving himself a thoroughly capable man of business.

But Hume's most brilliant Parisian success was won in other fields than those of business or diplomacy. He seems to have been welcomed with what can only be described as an outburst of enthusiasm by the gay society of the French capital. His writings and his philosophic fame procured him admission, not merely to literary circles, but to the inmost penetralia of fashionable life. In this country, philosophy and fashion own very different standards of merit (languid imbecility being perhaps the quality held in highest account by the latter), and in the English society of Hume's day they were almost reciprocally exclusive. Grub Street associations still clung to the literary life, and a fine gentleman like Horace Walpole was half-ashamed of being known to dabble in literature, and tried hard to sink the author when he wished to maintain the character of a man of fashion. But in France, or rather in Paris, outside of which there was then no France, it was different. Rank might there second a man's claims to admission into good society, but it could not itself secure it. Aristocratic stolidity had there no chance. A coronet with nothing but arrogance and stupidity beneath it was of no account; and dulness, even in the person of a duchess, was inexorably tabooed. [Laughter and applause.] Even polished manners and a good address, if the owner of them had no other recommendation, could not remove the social ban. To those brilliant salons, presided over by rival dames who had won their way to social supremacy, the one indispensable passport was wit, intelligence, cleverness, the possession or reputation of intellectual ability of some sort. In that bright, smiling, sparkling, refined quintessence of godless felicity, that whipped-cream of a world in which courtiers, fine ladies, artists, wits, philosophers, men of letters, mingled and rustled and whispered and flashed their epigrams and bon-mots from ear to ear, a great intellectual celebrity was sure of a welcome. [Applause.] Nor, it must be added, would the welcome be less warm if his intellectual fame were spiced by a savor of infidelity. For never, as is well known, was there a society in Christendom from which the faintest tincture of religion was more completely banished, or which, combined with the highest refinement of this world a more heathenish disregard of any world beyond it. Such being the social atmosphere into which the Scotch philosopher was introduced, his popularity is not difficult to account for. Its artificiality, its idolatry of genius, its biased worldliness, its contempt for all enthusiasm and superstitions, disposed it to receive, open-armed, one who seemed to lend the sanction of philosophy to its ideal of life. Hume was, it is true, in some respects but ill-adapted for the part of an idol of fashionable society. His person was ungainly, an eager, questioning, critical soul showed no sign of itself on the round, good-natured face. His French vocabulary, moreover, was limited; and the words did not come trippingly from the Scotch tongue. A somewhat cynical fellow-countryman tells us how odd it was to see him at the opera, seated between two sprightly young ladies, good-naturedly trying to respond to their attentions like a huge pet dog to the caresses of its mistress. [Laughter.] Nevertheless, his genuine simplicity and good sense carried him safely through all this flutter of popularity; and, though it was not in human nature not to be pleased and flattered by it, he took it for what it was worth, and heartily enjoyed without being hurt by a social success that would have turned many a wise man's head.

It was in a society of a very different type that the latter and perhaps the happiest years of Hume's life were passed. Though as an author he tried hard to sink his nationality, and was nervously afraid of Scotticisms in style, and though there are sides of the Scottish nature and elements of the national life with which he had no sympathy, yet in some points of view he was a Scotchman to the backbone. He had left with reluctance that quiet retreat, up countless pairs of stairs, in the Lawnmarket which was associated with his literary labors and successes; and it was there, surrounded by his books and his friends,—the Robertsons and Fergussons and Adam Smiths and Elliots and Homes,—and not in the brilliant society of Paris, still less in that of London, that his heart lay. And there was everything in the conditions of the cultivated society of Edinburgh in the middle of the last century to make it a congenial environment for such a man as Hume. A century earlier, Edinburgh would have been no fitting, or even possible, home for a sceptical philosopher. A century later and the characteristic features of Scotch literary life would have all but vanished under the absorbing influence of the wider nationality. Amid the ecclesiastical ferment of the seventeenth century, Scotland would have been too hot to hold him. But, in the reaction from its civil and theological turmoils, a cold fit had come over society, and the prevailing social tepidity was precisely the temperature with which Hume's intellectual and emotional nature was en rapport. The fierce struggle with despotism which had hitherto absorbed the intellectual force of clergy and laity alike was now at an end, and the intellectual horizon had begun to broaden. The national life lost its almost exclusively theological character, and the clerical element ceased more and more to dominate society. Many causes contributed to this change. The passionate zeal which had lent dignity and elevation to a narrow creed, and made even intolerance and arrogant dogmatism seem respectable, no longer stimulated by the bracing air of persecution, began to die out. It became possible to separate the cause of political liberty from the cause of the Church. Other interests began to rival the ecclesiastical in the public mind. Literature and philosophy, long suppressed by the dessicating influences of social disorder, gradually revived; and a new order—that of men of science and letters—arose to modify the long-prevailing domination of the clergy, and to draw off to other objects that portion of the national intelligence which refused to linger among effete ecclesiastical squabbles and sectarian animosities. [Applause.]

The closing years of Hume's life were rich in all the constituents of happiness which he most prized. He had many friends and no enemies. His home was the resort of all that was most cultivated in Edinburgh society. His reputation as an original thinker had increased from year to year; and even those who were his keenest philosophical antagonists not only acknowledged his intellectual preëminence, but, however much they differed from the writer, could not help loving the man. Advancing years brought no diminution of his gayety of spirit, nor did even the approach of death overshadow that cheerful serenity for which he had all his life been remarkable. There are those who have thought it strange that the end should come thus to a man of David Hume's opinions. A more dismal closing scene would have been in better keeping with such a career. But timidity or fortitude in the face of the inevitable is but a poor test of the truth of a man's belief. [Applause.] Christianity is not imperilled because the shadow of physical depression may eclipse in the falling intelligence the light of Christian faith and hope; nor, on the other hand, is the sincerity of the sceptic any more than the rapture of the saint a sure criterion of what the one denies and the other affirms. [Applause.] Religion rests on a more impregnable basis than the moods and frames of those who receive or reject it. If it is to be tried by any outward test, that is surely to be found in the answer to the question, not how a man dies, but how he lives. [Applause.] It will be well for those who believe in Christianity to leave no advantage to the sceptic in that species of argument. [Applause.]

Hume's scepticism is the reductio ad absurdum of the sensational philosophy; and it is so because, in the first place, he carries out that philosophy to its logical results, and frees it from the inconsistent ontological elements which, by his predecessors of the same school, had been mixed up with it; and because, in the second place, he has demonstrably failed in his attempt to account for our conscious experience on a sensational basis. A philosophy which reduces all thought to chaos is condemned by its own showing. It may be true that much or all of what we deem knowledge is unreal and illusory; but, if it be so, philosophy is at least bound to account for the illusion. But the philosophical school of which Hume is the acutest and most thorough-going representative, while it undoubtedly proves that if our knowledge be of a purely sensational origin the greater part of what we so designate is sheer fiction. When it further attempts to explain how it is that we mistake fiction—subjective illusions—for objective facts, it only, as we shall see, betrays its own weakness. In other words, sensationalism pure and simple not merely fails to account for our knowledge, but it fails to account even for the spurious product which we mistake for knowledge. It professes to expose the trick by which we have long believed phantoms to be realities; but, when this attempted exposure breaks down, all it really exposes is only the shallowness of its own pretensions. There are no such things, said Locke, as innate ideas. The mind at the outset is a blank tablet, a sheet of white paper; and all our knowledge is simply what is impressed or written on this blank surface through the medium of the senses. But since, according to this view, all we are conscious of is our own sensations, we have no right to speak of anything beyond them; and a man can no more get out of his own consciousness than he can leap off his own shoulders. To start thus, with an outward world stamping impressions on his mind, is, as Berkeley, and after him Hume, said, a purely gratuitous assumption. A thorough-going sensationalism knows no distinction of outward and inward, and must, in giving account of our knowledge, dismiss all other materials than those which sense supplies.

The problem, therefore, which lay before Hume was to account for the whole content of our consciousness by what he called "impressions" and "ideas," which are merely fainter copies of impressions. Everything in our thoughts that cannot be traced back to some distinct sensitive impression must be regarded as a mere illusion or irrational assumption. Armed with this all-potent solvent, he finds a whole world of ideas, notions, beliefs, which at its touch dissolve away into unreality. Our supposed knowledge of an external world,—e.g., whether in the mere rude, common-sense conception of the popular mind, or in the systematized conceptions of science, rests on the notion of causality,—on the assumption, that is, of a necessary relation between cause and effect. But this assumption is a purely fictitious one. When we go back to the sole fountain-head of knowledge, we find nothing corresponding to it. All that sense gives us is simply one sensation or impression, and then another and another,—a series of isolated impressions with no intervening or connecting link between them. No doubt, in ordinary thought we do interpose such a link or bond of necessary connection between successive phenomena. But the sole reason for that is that custom or habit leads us in an explicable way to expect that phenomena which have often or always in our experience succeeded each other will and must in future succeed each other. The only relation between successive events of which we know anything is that of time; but, by a trick of imagination, we come to suppose an actual nexus between them. All that we really perceive is first the spark and then the explosion of the gunpowder. At one moment we see the flame, at the next we feel the heat,—now the impact of one billiard ball, and immediately afterwards the motion of the second. But, when we instinctively interpose a link of necessity between any two of the phenomena, and say that the one is the cause of the other, this is an assertion which Hume maintains, and, from a sensational point of view, rightly maintains, to be purely groundless.

But, if the notion of causality be thus annulled, it does not fall alone. Withdraw the link of necessity, and the whole fabric of our knowledge of an outward world crumbles away into arbitrariness and nonentity. Our belief in any permanent external object, our belief in the uniformity of nature, our belief in a First Cause, all of which are bound up with the notion of necessary causation, perish with it; and what is left, instead of a stable and ordered universe, is only the individual sensitive consciousness and the series of unconnected sensations that flit arbitrarily athwart it. But not even this remains to us. The inward world is as powerless as the outward to resist the disintegrating touch of sensationalism. "Bishop Berkeley," as in his smart way Sydney Smith puts it, "destroyed the world in one volume octavo, and nothing remained after his time but mind, which experienced a similar fate from Mr. Hume in 1739." [Laughter.] And the way in which this catastrophe came about may be anticipated. The notion of a permanent self is obviously as groundless on sensational principles as the notion of a permanent outward world. If all our knowledge consists of sensitive impressions, to what impression can we point as that which gives us the notion of personal identity? All we are conscious of is one feeling or sensation, and then another and another; but we have no impression or sensation of anything between them. If we are ever in a state in which we have no sensations or ideas of sensation, there is nothing left to fill up the gap of consciousness. The interval between successive feelings is a pure blank. And to intercalate between the isolated moments of feeling a something we call mind or self is only to sanction vulgar instinct by the creation of a philosophical figment. The only realities in our consciousness are particular sensations, or the series or collection of particular sensations: the general self or individual is a mere abstraction, a fictitious creation of the mind.

But even Hume, it may be added, in reducing the ego, or self, to a series or aggregate of fugitive feelings, stopped short of the logical results of his principles. Of the supposed series or stream of sensations we cannot possibly be conscious of any more than the particular sensation which at any one moment we feel. As each sensation is numerically distinct and absolutely isolated from all that went before and all that come after, and, as one sensation can never be conscious of another sensation, the so-called series or aggregate of sensations has for me no existence. My present momentary feeling is all that constitutes my conscious self. Nay, as to being conscious of even one feeling or sensation, I must relate it to or distinguish it from another feeling or sensation; and this, as we have just seen, is impossible,—even the last residuum of consciousness, the bare atomic sensation to which it was reduced, is evaporated, and my whole existence as a conscious personal being vanishes away into smoke. [Applause.] This sensational scepticism puts the final stroke to its work of negation or destruction. The external world is but one phantom conjured up by mind, which is itself but another phantom; and the only thing that with strange inconsistency seems to be left is the sensational philosopher himself, grinning with complacent cynicism at both.

Such, then, is the nihilistic conclusion to which this school of philosophy in its acutest exponent, by strictly logical development, led. But it is obvious that in the final inconsistency I have just noticed lies at once the proof of its suicidal character and the starting-point of a higher and truer philosophy. A scepticism which evaporates all thought evaporates at the same time the sceptical evaporator. If mind is an illusion, so of necessity are all the theories it forms of its own nature. You cannot destroy the conscious self for every other purpose, and retain it for the one purpose of destroying itself. The sceptic sits on the branch of the tree he is sawing off, and, when he has succeeded in severing it, topples down himself along with it. [Laughter and applause.] And it is this that indicates the direction in which the refutation of sensationalism and the beginning of a new philosophy is to be found. In other directions, it is true, that refutation has been often attempted. The beliefs which Hume explained away, Reid and his followers tried to rehabilitate by the simple method of reasserting them and taking no denial. As Dr. Johnson thought he disproved Berkeleyanism by kicking a stone and saying, "Thus I refute it," so the Scotch philosopher's way of answering Hume was by virtually the same appeal from philosophy to vulgar instinct. When a merciless logic has set reason at variance with popular, uncritical beliefs, it is but a poor defence merely to dress up the latter under the big names of "original and necessary principles of consciousness," "primitive intuitions," "fundamental beliefs," etc. [Applause.] Simply to insist that there is an irresistible and universal belief in the independent existence of an external world, or that we have a primary belief in the existence of substances behind qualities, or that it is contrary to common-sense to deny the notion of necessary causation,—this is not to answer the critical doubts of reason, but to try to silence them either by an appeal to numbers or by a mere dogmatic reiteration in more solemn tones of the notions impugned. Mere belief, whether individual or general, is a purely subjective thing; and, in order to be trusted, it must give a rational account of itself, it must prove its claims on objective grounds, it must justify itself before the judgment-seat of reason. [Applause.] No doubt, ordinary, uncritical beliefs may serve well enough as working hypotheses and for practical purposes. Philosophy and scientific criticism are not popular necessities. We can use and enjoy nature with the rudest and most wrong-headed ideas of our relation to it: we can see and walk about by the light of the sun and stars with conceptions that belie the most elementary principles of astronomy.

"These earthly godfathers of heaven's lights
Who give a name to every fixed star
Have no more comfort of their shining lights
Than those who walk, and wonder what they are."

But one thing is inevitable. If you begin with reason and criticism, you must go on with them. You cannot, when their first teachings disturb old notions, or seem to undermine cherished beliefs, hark back to what you call "common-sense," or shelter yourself from the smart of reason's arrows behind the old bulwark of authority, whether that of consciousness or any other. The wounds of reason can only be healed by reason. If the first draught of philosophy have confused and unsettled us, it is only by deeper draughts that we can overcome its intoxicating effects. "Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring." And it was virtually this principle which, unfolding his own philosophical experience to mankind, a great speculative thinker announced to the world as the sovereign cure for scepticism; and the world is only yet beginning to appreciate the full meaning and value of his lessons. "It was," says Kant, "the teaching of David Hume which first broke up my dogmatic slumbers, and gave a wholly new direction to my inquiries in the field of speculation." What that direction was,—how this great thinker surveyed the whole field of human experience, and, instead of blindly asserting a deeper element in it than that on which the shallow philosophy of sensationalism and empirical psychology was based, sought by a new and profounder method to prove it, and so began the noble work which others have since carried on, of rearing again the crumbling edifice of human knowledge,—how, if I may so express it, by their efforts, from the ruins of the former temple a new and more stately edifice gradually arose, and the second temple has been found to be more glorious than the first,—the account of this splendid and, as I believe, imperishable enterprise, I must leave to other and more competent hands. [Loud applause.]

CORRESPONDENCE.

COLLEGE-TRAINED vs. SELF-TRAINED SCHOLARS.

Editors of The Index:—

A reply to the article on "College-Trained Liberalism" in The Index for December 8 will not, I think, be out of place.

The limitation of the advantages of the "Fellowship," recently founded by the Free Religious Association, to college-trained students, is, it seems to me, an act of injustice to that class of scholars who have gained an education by their own exertions without the aid of a college course, and also an implication that it is impossible to obtain a liberal education without college instruction.

Self-trained scholars have certainly contributed enough to the learning of the world in literature, science, and the arts, in short in all the paths of useful knowledge, to merit some consideration. That many collegians have achieved distinction as learned scholars does not prove it impossible for non-collegians to do the same. Allowing that colleges do furnish a "broad foundation of elementary knowledge," does that supposed fact render this same knowledge impossible of attainment outside of colleges? I think not. The road to learning is not bounded by college walls.

No body of scholastic pedants have sole possession of the key to knowledge. No college faculty, no august assembly of learned men, hold the magic talisman by which alone the secrets of nature can be unfolded. The study of the universe is free. Intellect, energy, and industry can force open the gates of knowledge, or nothing else can. In spite of the fact that colleges and universities have tried to convince mankind that no education worthy of the name could be acquired without their aid, self-trained scholars have always existed, and have reason to be proud of their manifold contributions to the world's stock of knowledge.

Columbus actually had the temerity to discover the western hemisphere, notwithstanding the collegians of his day clearly proved its non-existence. Shakspeare's sheepskin is yet to be found. Benjamin Franklin attained to quite high rank in his day as a scholar and statesman without the aid of a college education. Sir Humphry Davy and Faraday contrived to reach quite prominent positions in the scientific world, independently of a university education.

Herbert Spencer, the greatest of all English-speaking philosophers, to say the least of him, has no college diploma, and no very exalted opinion of collegiate education. What college-bred philosopher is worthy to stand within sight even of this noble exemplar of rationalism and self-made scholarship? Professor Tyndall is another shining example of self-trained scholarship.

Many more examples of self-trained non-collegiate scholars could be adduced; but these few will suffice to prove that it is at least possible to acquire some knowledge, and even a "broad foundation of elementary knowledge," without the alleged advantages of a college course. The fact is that any person who can fulfil the requirements attached to the "Fellowship," other than that of being a college graduate, should have the benefit of it, whether he be a college graduate or not. Men should be taken for what they really know, no matter where they got their knowledge.

I admit that the collegian has some advantages not possessed by the self-trained scholar. He has easier access, as a rule, to books, museums, and the society of learned men, is encouraged by association with fellow-students, and carries with him the honor, such as it is, that belongs to a college graduate. At the same time, however, he cannot escape, unless he has more than ordinary firmness of character, the influence of the atmosphere of mediæval scholasticism and Judaized paganism that pervades all colleges more or less. He generally loses what individuality and originality he naturally had, and becomes a machine-man, turned out to order by the college faculty according to a certain formula, and warranted to keep—in the old ruts.

That "it is one of the curses of modern Liberalism that so many of its popular advocates are deficient in breadth of learning; that there are so many charlatans in the field as its spokesmen," is true; but, in mentioning these unlettered Liberals, it is not right to imply that all non-collegians are of this class.

All the wild theories and impracticable schemes that have been advanced by these men are as nothing compared to the false reasonings, whimsical notions, absurd beliefs, transparent sophistries, and ignorant or wilful misrepresentations of college graduates in the shape of clergymen, who inflict them upon the people in a never-ending flood from pulpit and press.

I have said nothing against education in itself. No one is more thoroughly convinced than I of the great value of true education, meaning thereby systematized, useful knowledge, sound judgment, and a refined, disciplined mind. The more we can get of the right education, the better. But not all that is called education is worthy of the name. False, superficial, and merely ornamental systems of education are almost worse than none at all.

W. H. L.

MILLBURY, Jan. 6, 1882.

[We hasten to assure our correspondent that the committee that established the conditions of the "Fellowship" in question intended no disrespect nor any other injustice to Columbus nor Shakspeare nor Benjamin Franklin nor even Herbert Spencer. Nor did their action imply that it is "impossible to obtain a liberal education without college instruction." They admit, of course, the fact that there has been a host of learned men who have been the world's benefactors without going to college. But they had before them the simple question of deciding which one among possibly several young men—not yet learned, but only just preparing for a life career—might most advantageously be helped by this single "Fellowship"; and on the general principle that the college, whatever its defects, is the best agency we have in this country for laying the basis for a career which requires learning, they decided so to apply the beneficiary aid as to encourage this preparatory collegiate training. But this is by no means the only condition required. The applicant is to show special aptitudes for becoming a public teacher of free and rational religion. Very likely, if the time should come when the Free Religious Association could establish a considerable number of such "Fellowships," a certain portion of them might be devoted to the exceptional cases of persons showing such eminent fitness for the work that the preparatory college course might be dispensed with.—Ed.]

ANOTHER CRITIC OF THE SAME TENOR.

Editors of The Index :—

Will you permit a word of criticism of Mr. Potter's assumption that only college graduates are fit to teach Free Religion or free thinking? I believe this is the position which has been taken by the Free Religious Association, and that Mr. Potter's recent article in The Index, which I have not now before me, was a defence of that position. If a man's liberty to teach free thought is to depend upon a college diploma, in his own estimation, I am afraid his freedom to think would be quite as dependent as his liberty to teach others. At any rate, such a restriction looks very much like a disposition, conscious or unconscious, to establish caste in the Free Religious Association,—a kind of West Point religio-military rank, which would doubtless be very nice for those who might wear the shoulder-straps.

If only college-trained minds are qualified to teach, why not, by and by, only Harvard-bred minds? And, finally, only "Hub" born and Harvard-bred minds? This would be no departure from the principle adopted and defended.

The Roman Church insists that a man cannot properly teach a religion which is not free until he has learned the trick in its theological school.

Mr. Potter thinks a man not fitted to teach a religion that is free, unless he has learned the trick in a secular college; that a teacher must be commissioned and anointed, and have his authorized diploma from some school. This is common ground with all the priests and bigots of the Church in all ages.

If Free Religion cannot get its neck out of this old halter, or if it prefers to keep it there, it had better never have been born. It might be said, in fact, that it has not yet been fairly born, or at least that it was prematurely born. He has a right to teach who can find ears or eyes to give him attention. Genius is itself the highest authority to teach; and genius comes from birth, not from college. Colleges curb and fetter genius oftentimes, and perhaps generally. Emerson's genius escaped the colleges unimpaired. They did not create it, or enable him to think. He is great, because the schools could not bind him and take away his strength. Genius breaks new ground, makes discoveries, widens the horizon of the intellect. Colleges are apt to keep the feet in the well-worn way, to teach the old, the older the truer, and narrow the horizon of genius to the limits of the textbooks and the professors' acquirements. Margaret Fuller, I believe, never encountered the dangers of a college. Will Mr. Potter say she was not qualified to teach free thought or free religion? Franklin, Stephenson, Edson, Horace Greeley, William Shakspeare, Garrison, Lincoln, Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Howe, Robert Collyer, Colonel Ingersoll, Mohammed, and Jesus, and a host of others, never went to college; yet some of these compare very favorably with even Boston-born and Harvard-bred minds.

Maudsley says, "It is not by virtue of education so much as by virtue of inheritance" that a man is what he is.

"If he has not got the basis of strong character in his inherited nature, he will never acquire it."

"It is vastly more important to know who a man's father was than who his schoolmaster was," says Dr. Carpenter, in his Physiology of Mind.

If the metal is bad or only commonplace, the college polish is of little account: if it is that of genius, the college is not the only means to bring it out. In such case, it is a debatable question whether college polish does not obscure and retard its development. It is safe to say that Colonel Ingersoll is quite a match, intellectually, for any mind Harvard has turned out since Emerson; although I am not sure that Ingersoll ever attended even a grammar school.

Some minds are doubtless helped in college,—such as need much grinding to sharpen them. But it is equally true that other minds, and especially genius, are often baffled, hindered, and narrowed by the treadmill methods of the schools.

But the question of the general benefits of a college education does not properly enter into the question under discussion, which is whether free thinkers should mark out a college channel and fix a color for free thought? Whether teachers of freedom of the mind ought to wear a chain, one end of which should be securely bolted to some college threshold? If the methods of training are restrictive and authoritative, colored and toned by the spirit of the past, narrowed by theological limitations, and biased by the moral coercion of the esprit du corps, the subject of such training is fortunate, if he escapes by exchanging his freedom for his discipline.

A. J. GROVER.

CHICAGO.

[A more careful reading of the article criticised must certainly convince Mr. Grover that we made no such assumption as that on which he grounds his complaint,—"that only college graduates are fit to teach free religion or free thinking." The distinct statement was made that, "other things being equal, the preparatory college training must give an advantage in mental balance and breadth," also that "sometimes the lack of it may be made up by diligent reading and study afterwards." As shown, too, in our comments on the previous letter, such an assumption is not to be charged against the committee of the Free Religious Association. It may be added that geniuses, when they come, are a law unto themselves, and, in college or out, shape their own careers. But geniuses are rare. Sometimes, even they might do better work, if they were better educated. But, at least for the benefit of us common mortals, we hope colleges will continue to exist.—Ed.]

MATTER AND SPIRIT.

Editors of The Index :—

Matter has weight, hardness, malleability, ductility, etc. It can also be felt, seen, cognized, etc. Spirit is something, as I understand, which has none of the above qualities except it can be cognized. Making this distinction, is there no such thing as spirit? Mind, as I think, belongs in the region of spirit; for to mind belongs thought, intention, purpose, etc., for all these can be cognized, yet have not the other qualities of matter. Thus, we see that mind-spirit handles matter. I don't understand that mind-spirit—is nothing. It is truly something which can be cognized. The ideal to me is as real as the material.

I once invented a machine; and, long before I put it in the material, its ideal existence was as plain and cognizable to my mind as when clothed in the material. I once had a very fine horse, perfect in almost everything except an inveterate kicker. I prayed to have him cured of that,—i.e., I desired it,—and this, you know, is prayer,—and the Lord in ideality gave me to see the cure. The ideal I saw I put into the material: it acted like a charm, it cured my horse. The ideal I saw, every time the horse kicked, was to so arrange it he would kick himself in the mouth. The material means were no more certain or more cognizable than the ideal ones. If any one has a kicking horse, do the same: a cure will be the result. All the machinery in the world existed in the ideal before existing in the material. Such to my mind is the fact, and how Mr. Ellis can get it the other end foremost I cannot understand. He has simply got the cart before the horse. If it is true of machinery that it all existed in the ideal before it existed in the material form, how is it of this much greater machinery,—the universe? E. L. CRANE.

BOOK NOTICES.

LIFE OF JOSEPH RAYNER STEPHENS, PREACHER AND POLITICAL ORATOR. By George Jacob Holyoake. With an Introductory Chapter by John Stephens Storr. London: Williams & Norgate, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, publishers.

Joseph Rayner Stephens is perhaps a name little known among the American reading public; but it is a name, nevertheless, which will still awaken blood-stirring reminiscences in many an English-born citizen of the United States, of the "Radical times" of Chartism in England, between 1837-46, which sent many an emigrant to America in consequence of the bold utterances against existing laws which put him in personal peril, or whose heart grew faint over the long delay of that justice for the poor working men and women of England, for which Joseph Rayner Stephens, with many more brave men contended, suffering imprisonment and contumely in order to bring about the much-needed and wished-for reform. Mr. Holyoake in writing this life has done a gracious act of justice to a somewhat overlooked and talented philanthropist; all the more gracious in that Mr. Holyoake, an avowed free thinker, has shown in this work how possible it is for a free thinker to feel a warm, personal friendship, and to duly honor the noble character of one who in religious matters had no opinion in common with him. The true free thinker must ever think with Pope,—

"For modes of faith, let graceless zealots fight:

He can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

Mr. Stephens as well as being the eloquent orator of the poor was also a Methodist minister, and the son of a minister, and, though deposed from the ministry for his radicalism, was always a consistent believer in the Christian faith. This biography furnishes a missing chapter in the history of the agitation of the poor laws and of Chartism, and as such will be welcomed by all who take a philanthropic or philosophic interest in these questions to-day, as well as by the many elderly men still living, both in England and America, who can say of the stirring times in which Stephens figured, "All of which I saw, and part of which I was."

THE WAY OF LIFE. By George S. Merriam. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

This is a series of thoughtful, earnest essays on the rational religious life, based on the character of Christ as the ideal man, not the ideal God. "I looked upon Jesus," says Mr. Merriam, in the introduction to his essays, "as a man only, with no superhuman nature or miraculous powers, but having in himself the elements of character which give to life its value and true significance. . . . I feel that a further word is due as to the relation which I believe that the person and character of Jesus bear to the practical business of living, as it presents itself to us to-day. In a word, I take it that the 'way of life' remains for us the same, whether he was or was not such a man as he is here supposed to have been. The truth that he taught would have been just 'as true, even if he had never taught it. The life of purity, holiness, and love, which we impute to him, is just as worthy our seeking, whether he attained it perfectly or not." Mr. Merriam's Way of Life, though not a perfectly Orthodox way, is yet akin to that described in the Orthodox Scriptures as being "ways of pleasantness" and all its "paths are peace." No one can arise from the perusal of this book without feeling encouraged to higher ideals and nobler methods of living.

COUNTRY PLEASURES. The Chronicle of a Year, chiefly in a Garden. By George Milner. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

This book is in reality a journal of the weather and the flowers and birds, kept by a man who has the gift of loving observation, and written with uncommon literary skill. The book is sure to provoke comparisons with the writings of our own Thoreau and Burroughs. Certain differences are at once apparent. Mr. Milner has not the humor which does so much to enliven the pages of Thoreau and Burroughs. The aspects of nature with which he deals are much tamer than those which engaged Thoreau in a greater, and have engaged Burroughs in a less, degree. His observations, as his title-page informs us, have been "chiefly in a garden." But the divinity of nature is so omnipresent that one does not have to seek it far and wide. The careful observer finds it sitting at his door. Mr. Milner has been equally an observer of natural phenomena and a student of their literature. His volume is enriched with hundreds of the choicest quotations from the poets,—quotations which he has not hunted up to grace his pages, but which have been suggested to him by the procession of the seasons.

FRANKLIN SQUARE SONG COLLECTION. Selected by J. P. McCaskey. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1881.

When such a happy thought as that embodied in this book is offered to the world, we all begin to wonder why it never occurred to any one before. We have here a book of songs for school and home, nursery and fireside. The principle of natural selection has been allowed controlling influence. The editor has subordinated his personal preferences throughout to the tests of time and popularity. We have here the songs that have endeared themselves to young and old by some intrinsic sweetness or some charm of old association. Some of them are very simple and slight; others have qualities that commend them to persons of the most cultivated musical taste. There are songs here of the simplest character that are more to some of us than the most famous songs of the great composers, because under the notes there runs a chord of old association, tender, sweet, or fond. The book is one to bind the present and the past together, to unlock the lips of parents and reveal the secrets of old days. It is an invaluable contribution to the happiness of the domestic circle.

A PICKWICKIAN PILGRIMAGE. By John R. G. Hassard. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co.

Mr. Hassard is the literary editor of the New York Tribune, a man whose religious sympathies are as narrow as Mr. Ripley's were expansive, but nevertheless a man of admirable literary skill. His reading of Dickens must have been of the most faithful character. It endeared Dickens to him so much that going to England he found nothing there to interest him so as those places in London which have some association with the scenes and characters of the great novelist. So he went prying about in courts and lanes for whatever had this charm, and his little book is the outcome of his observations. The contents of it appeared originally in the New York Tribune in the form of letters, but the interest in them has justified their publication in a more permanent shape. Lovers of Dickens will see to it that the book is well economized, for to them nothing is alien that can throw a ray of light upon the art of their delightful humorist.

INGERSOLL ON THE DEATH OF A CHILD.

Colonel Ingersoll made the following beautiful address at the funeral of a little boy who died in Washington a few days ago: "My friends, I know how vain it is to gild a grief with words, and yet I wish to take from every grave its fear. Here, in this world, where life and death are equal kings, all should be brave enough to meet what all the dead have met. The future has been filled with fear, stained and polluted by the heartless past. From the wondrous tree of life, the buds and blossoms fall with ripened fruit, and, in the common bed of earth, patriarchs and babes sleep side by side. Why should we fear that which will come to all that is? We cannot tell, we do not know, which is the greater blessing,—life or death. We cannot say that death is not a good. We do not know whether the grave is the end of this life or the door of another, or whether the night here is not somewhere else a dawn. Neither can we tell which is the more fortunate,—the child dying in its mother's arms, before its lips have learned to form a word, or he who journeys all the length of life's uneven road, painfully taking the last slow steps with staff and crutch. Every cradle asks us, 'Whence?' and every coffin, 'Whither?' The poor barbarian, weeping above his dead, can answer these questions as intelligently and satisfactorily as the robed priest of the most authentic creed. The tearful ignorance of the one is just as consoling as the learned and unmeaning words of the other. No man, standing where the horizon of a life has touched a grave, has any right to prophesy a future filled with pains and tears. It may be that death gives all there is of worth to life. If those who press and strain against our hearts could never die, perhaps that love would wither from the earth. Maybe this common fate treads from out the paths between our hearts the weeds of selfishness and hate; and I had rather live and love where death is king than have eternal life where love is not. Another life is naught, unless we know and love again the ones who love us here. They who stand with breaking hearts around this little grave need have no fear. The larger and the nobler faith in all that is, and is to be, tells us that death, even at its worst, is only perfect rest. We know that, through the common wants of life,—the needs and duties of each hour,—their grief will lessen day by day, until at last this grave will be to them a place of rest and peace, almost of joy. There is for them this consolation: the dead do not suffer. If they live again, their lives will surely be as good as ours. We have no fear. We are all children of the same mother, and the same fate awaits us all. We, too, have our religion, and it is this,—help for the living, hope for the dead."

CHRISTMAS AMONG THE POOR.

It was a beautiful afternoon when the day before Christmas a number of ladies and gentlemen, constituting the Committee of Visitors for Ward 7, in Boston, started out on the pleasant errand of carrying to their poor friends gifts and evergreen to make for each family a Christmas at home. They had agreed among themselves some time before that there were many objections to a large Christmas tree in public; yet, even were no objections to be found, the superior pleasure of having a Christmas tree all to one's self will easily be understood. The family life of the working man is his sheet-anchor; no club, no coffee-house, no meeting can ever take the place of that; and, failing this resource, life can be but a weight and a solitude to the sick or the poor.

For the poor man deprived of any comfort in the little chamber he calls his own, where loving care should await the tired workman by noon and by night, there are temptations on every side to lead him astray. He is easily persuaded from the dirty room, crying children, and badly cooked dinner to the comfortable drinking-house, hard by his work; and, alas! who can find heart to blame him altogether for this.

Therefore, more and more in our experience among the "homes of the poor" (the very word seems often a mockery), we recognize that any help we can give toward the development of family feeling, even if it be only once a year in the holy Christmas season, is a good which strikes deeper than the pleasure of the hour.

Numbers of little trees were carried into such homes as these to which we have referred, on Christmas eve. The larger number went unheralded save by the general sense of the coming holiday.

In one room, the visitors found a pretty picture which lingers with them. There was a clean room, and a young mother like a Madonna holding her sick baby; other children were playing about the room; the evening lamp was already lighted, and everything was made ready for the father's return, but the mother was a little tired, and sat quietly with her baby on her knees to watch us while we made the tree stand steadily and hung upon it presents for the children. Here was a joy for many days which belonged to each member of the household. Surely, no one was more pleased than the mother with these trifles, unless it were the father, who soon returned to find his home made beautiful for the time by the blessing of Christmas day found already resting upon it.

There were sharp contrasts of course. We were laden with gifts for one poor distracted family, the father and husband having lately been sent to the island for drunkenness. Unhappily, one of those short sentences, which are a constant reproach to those who consider this serious question, had allowed his return after an absence of ten days (it was a fourth commitment) to make still further disorder. The children were locked in the room, the mother was at work, the father "in good condition to be sent away again," the landlady assured us. There was no place for our little tree, nobody to protect the gifts, no chance for the encouragement we hoped to convey to the heart of the poor mother. So we sorrowfully brought our treasures away again, leaving behind with the good-hearted landlady a few trifles for the children, to be cared for till the proper time.

In considering "Christmas at home" among the eighty families who were remembered at this time, it is hard to refrain from further illustrations, but these will be sufficient to present the question to a thoughtful people who "consider the poor."

MISCELLANEOUS.

ONE of the witnesses, an expert, at the Guitau trial, was asked "if he knew what was meant by 'inspiration.'" "It is generally understood," he replied, "to mean a taking in."

STRANGE that the papers which made so much ado about Mr. Frothingham's changing his religion had nothing to say about General Grant's doing the same thing. No one had ever supposed that the former was "a bigger man than old Grant."—New Bedford Standard.

THE Register of Harvard shows the attendance of thirteen hundred and eighty-two students. The Divinity School has twenty-nine students, the Law School one hundred and fifty-one, the Medical School two hundred and forty-one. There is evidently more secularism than theology at Harvard.

THE Catholic Review deplors the fact that the recent ceremonial of the canonization of saints at the "Feast of the Immaculate Conception" at Rome, instead of as formerly being one of the most magnificent and imposing of spectacles, was obliged this year, owing to the peculiar position of the Pope in his own dominions, to be "relegated to an upper room, which, magnificent as it is, was not large enough to give room for those who by right were present. Bishops were displaced, and in the crush and heat many were overcome." And then the Review goes on sadly: "Facts of this kind ought to bring home and illustrate to every mind the moral compression to which the Holy See is subjected in Rome. No doubt, with the precautions taken in the Vatican, and under the strong pressure brought to bear upon the Piedmontese invaders by the European powers, there were no such organized outrages as disgraced the night of the 13th of July, but the entire world must recognize the humiliation to which the head of Christendom has been reduced. If any one, Protestant or pagan, can rejoice thereat, we do not envy him his feelings." Such "humiliations" are among the sad results of the diffusion of to-day's liberal thought.

SENATOR PENDLETON's speech in behalf of his civil service reform bill was a very able effort, and it has elicited general praise. The commission provided by the bill is to submit to the President the following rules: 1. For open, competitive examinations for testing the capacity of applicants for the public service now classified or to be classified hereunder; 2. That all the offices, places, and employments so arranged or to be arranged in classes shall be filled by selections from among those graded highest as the results of such competitive examinations; 3. That original entrance to the public service aforesaid shall be at the lowest grade; 4. That there shall be a period of probation before any absolute appointment or employment aforesaid; 5. That promotion shall be from the lower grades to the higher on the basis of merit and competition; 6. That no person in the public service is for that reason under any obligation to contribute to any political fund, or to render any political service, and that he will not be removed or otherwise prejudiced for refusing to do so; 7. That no person in said service has any right to use his official authority or influence to coerce the political action of any person or body; 8. There shall be non-competitive examinations in all proper cases before the commission, when competition may not be found practicable.

In a recent speech, Victor Hugo said: "You, Catholics, claim the liberty to instruct. For some centuries, you have held in your hands, at your discretion, at your school, under your ferrule, two great nations,—Italy and Spain, illustrious among the illustrious,—and what have you done with them? I am going to tell you. Thanks to you, Italy, of which no one can think nor even pronounce her name without inexpressible filial grief,—Italy, that mother of genius and of nations, which has diffused over the whole world the most astonishing productions of poetry and art,—Italy, which has taught our race to read, does not today know how to read herself! Yes, Italy has, of all the States of Europe, the smallest number of native inhabitants who are able to read. Spain, magnificently endowed Spain, which received from the Romans her first civilization, from the Arabians her second civilization, from Providence, and in spite of you, a world, America,—Spain has lost, thanks to you, thanks to your brutal yoke, which is a yoke of degradation,—Spain has lost the secret of her power which she received from the Romans, that genius in the arts which she received from the Arabs, that world which God gave her. And, in exchange for all that you have made her lose, what has she received? She has received the Inquisition, which has burned upon the funeral pyre five millions of men. Read history! The Inquisition, which exhumed the dead in order to burn them as heretics. The Inquisition, which declares children heretics even to the second generation. See what you have done with that focus of light which you call Italy! You have extinguished it. The colossus which you call Spain you have undermined. The one is in ruins, the other is in ashes. See what you have done for these two great nations!"

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. LAURA CUFFY SMITH KENDRICK, well known as a radical Spiritualist lecturer, died on Wednesday, the 11th inst., at her home in this city, after an illness of ten days. She was forty-nine years of age.

THE Springfield Republican reports of Professor Gunning's recent lecture on Darwinism in Thompsonville, Conn., that he had a large audience, and that "everybody who hears him once wants to hear him again."

PROF. GEORGE P. FISHER, of the Yale Divinity School, will reply to Colonel Ingersoll in the February number of the North American Review. He is said to be "as able a defender of the Christian faith as this country affords."

DELANO A. GODDARD, editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser, died in this city last week, after a few days illness from pneumonia. All those who knew him in life speak of him in terms of the highest esteem for his manifold sterling qualities as a man and an editor.

MR. W. M. SALTER, now of New York City, occupied the pulpit of Parker Memorial Hall last Sunday, his subject being "The Practical Meaning of Religion," which was treated in his usual able and earnest manner, and an abstract of which appeared in the next morning's Herald.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectured on "Experience and Intuition" before the Philosophical Society of Chicago, and the following evening spoke again in the city. He will be "in the field" about a month, during which time letters in regard to lectures may be addressed to him at 183 Dearborn Avenue, Chicago.

NORA PERRY says there were talk and hope of celebrating in some public and appropriate manner the recent birthday of Wendell Phillips; but he gained some inkling of the design, and sent notes to his friends protesting against anything of the sort, but that did not prevent them from filling his house with floral tokens of their appreciation of his life work.

JOHN M. UNGLAUB, engineer of the train bearing ex-President Hayes and family at the time of the accident on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, last March, and whose coolness and bravery in standing at his post, though badly injured, averted a worse catastrophe, has just been presented by Mr. and Mrs. Hayes with an elegant gold watch and chain, valued at five hundred dollars, as a token of their appreciation of his services on that occasion.

A good friend of liberal religion died at Worcester last week, Thomas W. Lamb. One of his neighbors writes to us of him: "Mr. Lamb was a subscriber to the 'Index Fund,' and at a time when that was no small credit, and continued to the last a good friend of The Index. He was one who possessed a large share of common-sense, was modest, unassuming, thoughtful, studious, inquiring, loved and respected by everybody who knew him. When a young man, he was indoctrinated into the Baptist mode of thought. He became interested and somewhat excited in the religious meetings of that sect, and took up the Bible expressly to equip himself with weapons to put down all opposition. The result was an open avowal of radical religious views." Mr. Harris, the Universalist preacher who attended his funeral, read a prayer which Mr. Lamb himself had written, and in his remarks said: "As a citizen, his record of business continued in one place for thirty years, and was without a blemish. Honest and conscientious in all his doings, he won much esteem among his fellow business men. In the affairs of the city, he was always interested, and especially so in educational circles. He had served with honor in some positions connected with the city." Mr. Lamb was only fifty-one years old. He leaves a wife and daughter, who have our sincere sympathy in their great bereavement.

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Sunday question is exciting considerable attention in California, and an effort is being made to close all places of public amusement and trade in Oakland and San Francisco. At a public meeting held in Oakland for this purpose, the mayor of the city presided.

THE project of a "World's Fair" to be held in this city, referred some time ago to a committee of thirteen, has fallen through, it is understood, from the inability of the committee to get subscriptions to the guarantee fund necessary to insure its success.

THE prevalence of small-pox in the West is really alarming, and it is spreading in every direction. It is feared that by spring it will become epidemic throughout the country. The almost universal opinion is that nothing but general vaccination can check this terrible disease.

A CORRESPONDENT from Indianola, Iowa, writes: "One Iowa Representative, Mr. Crew of Henry County, refused to take an oath, and was allowed to affirm. We are still ahead of England out here." May the day soon come when so simple an act of justice will not need to be chronicled—as we do now gladly chronicle this—as an extraordinary step forward in State law.

THERE is a strong anti-Mormon, or rather anti-polygamy, feeling extending over the country, which will need careful guidance to keep it within the bounds of true justice, lest it break into unrestrained violence. Mass meetings are to be held soon in various parts of the Eastern States, to consider the best practical means of overcoming the degrading evil of Mormon polygamy.

THE King and Queen of Spain, a few mornings since, went from mass to a bull fight. In the despatches, but little is said of the former, while the latter is described at length. The expense of the mass is not stated, but that of the bull fight was $27,000; and "young gentlemen of the highest society" appeared in the arena. Nobody was killed. Evidently, the young "gentlemen" of Lisbon did not fight such bulls as were brought into the ring by the Romans in olden time.

SECRETARY FRELINGHUYSEN is in receipt of despatches from St. Petersburg, which prove that the Russian government is taking an active interest in the search for the crew of the lost "Jeanette," and unusually vigorous methods have been put in operation to reach the sufferers as early as possible. James Gordon Bennett, who is in St. Petersburg for the furtherance of the same object, sends home expressions of satisfaction at the genuine interest manifested in the matter there.

NOTWITHSTANDING the rescript issued by the German emperor through his minister, it is certain that the Parliament will not surrender its privileges without a struggle. Bismarck having lately imprisoned Herr Deitz, a socialist and a member of the Reichstag from Stuttgart, for circulating objectionable political writings, the subject was brought to the attention of his fellow-members, who immediately ordered his release from imprisonment, the government members even voting for it.

THE press and people of the United States, disposed as they are under the peculiar circumstances of the case to be generous as well as just, unanimously condemn as exorbitant and outrageous the bills of Drs. Bliss, Agnew, and Hamilton, for their services during the eighty days of President Garfield's illness. Dr. Bliss, it is said, asks $50,000, and Drs. Agnew and Hamilton $25,000 each; this exclusive of Dr. Reyburn's claim of $8,000 and Drs. Boynton and Edison of $1,000 apiece, making a total of $110,000 for the tax-payers of the United States to pay. P.S.—Later, a denial has been made that any bill has been presented.

IT is seriously proposed to reach the North Pole by balloon, and several elaborate theories as to the feasibility of the plan have recently been submitted to the public by various enthusiastic balloonists. Before investing much public sympathy or cash in these schemes, would it not be well to insist upon a practical demonstration of the reliability of such balloons as a means of transit, by requiring them to make a number of stated trips daily between any two points, say of twenty miles distance apart, the trips to be regularly made "on time" in all weather, and without regard to "conditions." Then, when we are assured by repeated experiments of the manageableness of the balloon, which at present we are not, it will be quite time enough to consider the North Pole scheme.

A NEW Liberal Society, called "The Association of Moralists," has been started at Hannibal, Mo. As its prospectus states, its aims are to show to the world "that Liberalism does not mean lawlessness or immorality, . . . but that, on the contrary, it is conducive of the highest type of morality and the best interests of society." We copy from its constitution its form of admission to membership: "ART. 6. After organization, the following form shall be used in the reception of members, except those received by letter. The warden, or any other officer in his absence, shall say to the candidate: Your application for membership in this society implies that you have duly considered its character and purposes, and desire to unite with us in an earnest effort to promote the religion of humanity, to the end that sectarian prejudices may be overcome, and peace on earth and good-will among men prevail. Do you faithfully promise that, if received into this brotherhood, you will strive to live a just and honorable life, that no reproach may ever come upon our cause through any act or word of yours? If the candidate answers affirmatively, the vote on his reception is taken; and, if a majority of the members favor his reception, the warden shall say: You are now a member of this society, and as such I extend to you the hand of fellowship. May you honor the noble cause which you have espoused, and by letting your light shine induce others to follow your good example." A society organized on such a basis ought not to fail of success.

IF Daniel Webster had lived until Wednesday, the 18th inst., he would have been one hundred years old, no uncommon age in these days of increasing longevity. But if "we live in deeds, not years," he must have been near that age when he died thirty years ago; and at any rate he "still lives" in the hearts of his admiring countrymen, as the various celebrations of the recent anniversary of his one hundredth birthday in many places testify. In this city at the Hawthorne Rooms, Prof. H. N. Hudson gave a critical and eloquent address on Webster's mind and character; and in the evening "The Marshfield Club" celebrated the anniversary with speeches and a supper at the Parker House, ex-Mayor Prince presiding. Among the speakers were Governor Long, Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, Judge Devens, John Quincy Adams, Senator Jones of Florida, and other distinguished men; yet the fastidious Evening Transcript declared that, "except for the fine touches of Governor Long's carefully-thought-out address, there was no very remarkable eloquence,—none at all to compare with the ornate periods of Caleb Cushing and the fervid eulogy of Rufus Choate at the dinner in 1859." This is rather crushing, but the speakers so cruelly snubbed in this paragraph can console themselves by remembering that the Transcript finds fault even with Oscar Wilde, the cultured aesthete sent over by England to give us lessons in taste. Other celebrations of the day were held in Franklin, N.H., the birthplace of Webster, also in Concord, Exeter, and Portsmouth in the same State, in Washington, D.C., and in Chicago. A timely article in the February Atlantic, by Henry Cabot Lodge, while justly extolling Webster's magnificent intellect and his great services to his country, does not forget that, morally, he had also great faults; and that, at last, through his passion for the Presidency, he betrayed the cause of freedom which previously he had so well served.

THE ALTERNATIVE.

The result reached in the preceding paper was this: science proceeds upon sensible observation, and arrives at no facts higher in degree than those from which its inquiries set out, but only at more general facts of the same order. It may be said, however, that science is here restricted too narrowly, that it may proceed also upon psychical observation. Suppose this granted. Still, as strict science, it can never go beyond the mental facts observed, but can only inquire in what order they exist or occur. What they are science may partly determine: what they signify as beyond themselves cannot be learned by its methods. Religious belief, on the other hand, relates to objects of which we have no direct observation, sensible or psychical. It does not follow that there is any "opposition" between science and such belief. Man cannot fly, but his mode of locomotion is nowise opposed to the flight of birds. Science cannot fly; but, if belief or philosophy can do so, where is the opposition? Nevertheless, we are brought to this alternative: either there is room for intelligent belief beyond the proper scope of science or there is no room for theism. This remains true, though science be allowed to proceed upon observations purely psychical. But psychology belongs as much to philosophy as to science; and I shall continue to limit the latter term as before, since the final result is the same either way.

It is obvious that we are aware and quite sure of much concerning which science, as proceeding upon sensible observation, can say nothing to purpose. We are conscious and thinking beings. Of nothing are we more sure, nor is any physical object, not even the earth we stand upon, known to us in a manner so immediate. But, to science, consciousness and thought are impenetrable mysteries: the last fact it reaches in its attempted approach to them from the side of physical or organic nature is molecular motion; and this is no nearer—that is, goes no further toward explaining them—than the motion of tides in the Bay of Fundy. Now, it is in the sphere of consciousness that religious and moral beliefs germinate and grow. Here is the soil in which they take root, here the sky that overarches them; and here, if anywhere, their justification is to be found. I propose therefore to consider a little this fact of conscious being, though with no further purpose than to establish the alternative above stated, leaving every man to choose in view of it as he can or must. And, in order to a fair understanding between the writer and the reader, it will be well to see clearly at the outset what is meant by a term which there will be much occasion to use.

Consciousness, considered only as the sense of personal identity or self-consciousness, is narrowly limited. Its whole vocabulary is the monosyllable I or me. This, however, is rather the psychical condition, without which we could have no conscious experience, than the substance of such experience or the power that gives birth to it. Taken in the larger sense, consciousness embraces all the known or felt contents of the human spirit, comprising at once the principles at work and the effects produced. Thus, we may speak of the intellectual, the moral, the religious, the æsthetic consciousness; the intellectual consciousness embracing all that is known as thought or truth, the moral all that is felt concerning right and duty, and so on. The mind, however, is conscious only of its own contents, never of an external object, material or spiritual. Here the line is to be drawn. Mr. Buckle, by way of proving consciousness untrustworthy, instanced the case of one who is "conscious of a ghost." There is no ghost: consciousness therefore is false, he argued triumphantly. The argument proves only that he could use words incorrectly. One is conscious of perceiving an outward object; but his consciousness extends only to the mental act, not to the object itself. I perceive an apple, and am conscious of the perception. Therefore, if one is conscious of seeing a ghost, the consciousness is true, but the perception false. On the other hand, we are conscious of no spiritual being as an external object. The immediate object of worship is a thought of the mind, toward which its affections turn. This thought may be representative of spiritual reality, but it is representative only. When, therefore, it is said that man himself is the maker of the God he fears or adores, there is a certain rough truth in the words. It should be remembered, however, that man is in a like sense the maker of the sun which warms and the earth that sustains him, since these objects are known to us only through sensuous representation.

There are two modes of consciousness, the simple, or direct, and the reflective. We have an example of the former when one is simply and devotedly conscious of his duty, without thinking of himself; and an example of the latter when, by an act of reflection, he becomes conscious of being thus conscious,—conscious, that is, of being dutiful. So one may either be simply conscious of his thought,—that is, of the truth it presents,—or he may farther attend to the motions of his mind in the act of thinking, and become conscious of these. Now, when consciousness is spoken of, numbers think only of its secondary mode, and regard the absence of this as a state of unconsciousness. Thus, we speak of "unconscious religion," notwithstanding that religion exists only as an element or principle of consciousness. But, by an unconsciously religious man, we mean one who is occupied with the objects and obligations of religion without saying to herself, "I am religious," or without digging, as it were, into his own heart to find his religion, and feel it over. The distinction is important, and it concerns us the more here, since the reflective or introspective mode of consciousness is the one which I shall not have in mind in what follows. With these explanations, let us proceed. The contents of consciousness comprise, first, all the distinguishing sentiments of human nature, religious, ethical, social, political, etc.; secondly, all the ideas in which the import of those sentiments presents itself to the mind as thought; thirdly, that conscious power and freedom of will, by which practical effect is given to the foregoing; fourthly, all the human virtues that thence result; fifthly, all the motives which the soul itself makes, or considers and admits. It should be added that all truth, even though relating to outward objects, belongs to the sphere of consciousness, of which fact a farther word presently.

These contents of consciousness are of a purely ideal nature. Though as real as the sun and moon, they have no other than an ideal reality. In other words, they exist only as acts and affections of a soul, which, again, knows itself only through or, more strictly, only in those acts and affections; that is to say, it has no cognizance of itself as a thing apart from them. For even self-consciousness is but a persistent act, and the self of which it speaks is but this act. The fact, self, is ideal fact only; and so of all which belongs to the sphere of consciousness. I have not space to apply this statement in detail, but an example or two may be given. "Say what is honor?" asks Wordsworth. He answers,

" 'Tis the finest sense
Of justice which the human soul can frame,
Intent each lurking frailty to disclaim,
And guard the way of life from all offence."

The point of this lies for us in the words "which the human soul can frame." By an act of the soul it exists, and its whole being lies in this act. To the senses, it is nothing; to science as proceeding upon data supplied by the senses, it is nothing; to every creature that does not share the sentiment, it is nothing. In other words, it is of a purely ideal nature. The like may be said of truth, even when it relates to outward objects. Outside the sphere of conscious spirit there is in all the universe no such thing as truth. Gravitation as a force is external to us; but the truth that there is such a force, and that it has such a character and effect, exists only in and for the mind, only in and as an act of thought. Truth is ideal fact; and in the moving love of truth we have an ideal sentiment or passion turned toward an ideal possession.

The contents of consciousness are ideal facts, one and all; but it is, nevertheless, this order of fact which makes for us a human world, nay, which gives us a human being. Strike away only the one sentiment of justice, and where were civilization, where were man? This line of remark might profitably be followed at some length; but the thoughtful reader will easily pursue it for himself, and I leave him to do so. He will be sure to find that ideal principles are the being itself of man, that his great work in the world is to give these an outward representation and force, and that in this issue of ideal fact to reign over what is popularly distinguished as real, and to create its own image there, lie the making of civilization and the significance of history.

Now, if we examine those ideal sentiments with the virtues they engender, it will appear that most of them centre and unite in the one sentiment of ethical obligation. Honor, justice, good-faith, veracity of speech and of mind, duty, probity, humanity,—these and the like are variations upon one theme; and that theme is the sovereign ought. "Sovereign" I call this, and would draw attention to the word. It is not employed rhetorically, but simply to signify the precise nature and import of the psychical fact. The sentiment that says ought has always the import of command, authority, sovereignty. It speaks as from a throne, as a legitimate ruler, and a ruler not elected by vote. I do not intimate that it is outside the soul, for such is by no means my opinion. Nevertheless, it speaks sovereignly, as if it stood in representative relation with some mandatory law or superior order of the universe, much as our sentient being stands in relation with the objects and order of the outward world.

Duly noting this singular peculiarity of the ethical consciousness, let us turn to another ideal sentiment, that of religion. In its lowest form, religion may be no more than the sense of somewhat above man,—above as being not merely greater in force, but higher in rank. It should be added that this "somewhat" is conceived of as akin to our conscious nature. So much may be seen, I think, in the lowest fetishism. Thus taken, religion may be quite destitute of moral quality. And how separable from morals it may still be, even in late stages of historical development, is shown by shocking examples. It cannot be doubted that Philip II. of Spain was really and strongly religious. His devoutness was indeed closely bound up with pride and lust of dominion; but it was the true face of the man, not a mask assumed. Religion, however, served in his case only to make a bad man worse,—only to sanction perfidy, instigate murder, and stifle the small pity that might otherwise have breathed faintly in such a breast. The same fire that melts even iron hardens clay; and this soul of clay was turned to stone by those heats of religion which have softened so many an iron nature to the temper of charity and mercy.

The like hardening was apparent in the case of John Calvin, while there was in him a similar association of religion with self-consequence and the love of power; though it were a blind eye that should fail to discover in him elements not only of moral worth, but of moral greatness, totally wanting in Philip. Nevertheless, it lies in the nature of religion to become one with ethics. This is indicated by the sting we feel in seeing it notably at odds with ethics. When Protestant religion in the person of Calvin pursues with inappeasable rancor and foul slander such men as Bolsec and Castello, or when it horribly tortures and at last kills the poor wretch Gruet, and crowns its bad work by seizing and burning with green wood a man of genius, pure and honorable in character, who is but passing silently through Geneva on his way to a safer refuge from the popish inquisition, out of whose prison he has escaped; when Romish religion, in the person of Philip, puts innocent men and women to a cruel death by tens of thousands, and proves itself as mendacious and perfidious as bloody and pitiless, — when such things are seen, we not only view them with the feeling usually excited by dreadful misdeeds, but are sensible of a revolting incongruity between the principle in operation and the effects that proceed from it. Religion a liar and murderer! Religion that should be the spirit of charity, righteousness, and truth. On the other hand, when the religious unites with the ethical spirit, to form with it one essence, we feel that this is what should be, and that here the otherwise sour fruit becomes ripe and sweet. It was such a union in the person of Jesus which still charms men to whom Christian dogma has long since become but a dead tradition. What now do the uniting principles severally contribute? The ethical spirit affirms a sovereign law of right or righteousness; the religious spirit joins to this the affirmation and adoring sense of sovereign being; and the two together say, The highest reality is just and good. Ripe religion has been defined by Prof. J. H. Allen, with a penetration and pregnant brevity that may well be styled brilliant, as "ethical passion." I do not consciously depart from this definition in naming such religion the adoration of righteousness as the sovereign reality,—an adoration better expressed by practical loyalty and noble obedience, mostly silent, than by wordy effusion and emotional fervor.

I have had no purpose hitherto but to state psychical fact simply as it is, with no intrusion of theory. But the question now arises, What theoretical construction is to be put upon this order of fact? On the one hand, it may be contended that all the contents of consciousness are but sensation worked over and worked up, through enormous periods of time, into secondary, tertiary, and still remoter forms, somewhat as the material of the primary rocks has during the earth's history been worked up into different and more superficial formations. Thus, it would follow that, as the feet touch the solid earth, while the nobler head is turned away from it toward empty space, so we are in physical sensation, the lowest mode of apprehension, nearest pure reality, and in the high ideal sentiments and principles of our conscious nature are at the farthest remove from it. This theory, it is plain, does not consist with theism. The two may be illogically yoked together; but, since they are not logical yoke-fellows, the forced connection cannot last. But there is room for a construction of a quite different sort. It may be said that as we are through our sentient organization in contact and interrelation with an external reality, which appears to us as material, so we are through the higher principles of our conscious being in contact and interrelation with a superior and sovereign order of reality, which appears to us as spiritual. This theory accords with the direct import of the ideal principles in question, and is so far recommended. Thus we are in near relation with pure reality in an all-sided way, and not merely in a one-sided way; above, as well as below; at the highest point of our being no less, to say the least, than at its inferior extreme. One may urge, however, that, even upon the admission of this hypothesis, the limits of agnosticism are not escaped. The outward reality is unknown, and, following the analogy, the same must be true of the supposed higher. Granted; and so it has ever been said. So it was said thousands of years ago by intense Hebrew believers, who spoke only from the deep feeling of their hearts, untaught by science and untamed by the spirit of modern critical study. Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou know him unto perfection? His ways are unsearchable, and past finding out. Clouds and darkness are about his throne. Thus they spoke in their time, and it has been the confession of deep-hearted piety in all ages, never quite drowned by the big-voiced and cock-sure sciolism of dogmatists. But let us pursue the analogy a little farther. Though that reality with which the senses communicate is in its essence unknown, yet what the senses report of it may be perfectly trusted as a ground of action. The earth is phenomenal; but we tread it confidently, and with a reasonable confidence, nevertheless. The sun is phenomenal only, but we expect its rising and its influence, and are not deceived. The visible universe is an illusion, if you will: it is not, however, delusive and false. Look now the other way. That sovereign reality, of which the ethico-religious consciousness speaks, and which it names God, or reverently forbears to name, is in truth, be it supposed, a psychical image, framed, as Wordsworth said of honor, by the human soul. The analogy we follow says that this is a false image no more than the solar system; that it is perfectly trustworthy as a ground or guide of action; that the conscious spirit is indeed in contact and interrelation with a sovereign reality, apparently spiritual, as the sentient organization is in interrelation with reality apparently material; and that, though the absolutely and sovereignly real can be known to us only representatively, yet psychical representation is no more than that of the senses to be regarded as deceptive and misleading.

If what the analogy says be true, theism has a rational footing: if it be quite untrue, religious belief has no such footing, and, in the absence of any supernatural revelation, must be set down as groundless and chimerical opinion. Such, to my mind, is the alternative. D. A. WASSON.

THE ANCIENT MAN.

Mr. Conway has done good service in spiritualizing the worm-work of Darwin. The most conservative thing on or in the earth is our fellow-worm. Its Silurian ancestor burrowed in the face of a world almost naked, and to get a grain of nutrient vegetation had to grind in its gizzard a hundred grains of dirt. Now that the world is abundantly clad, the worm, to get the grain of nutriment, still grinds in its six gizzards the hundred grains of mud. If the worm had a religion, it would be the worship of ancestors.

"O Lord, what worthless worms are we!"

Those who have draped the religious sentiment in such vestment as this cannot, on theologic ground, controvert Haeckel for finding in the phylum of worms the remote ancestor of man. A writer in the Princeton Review says that it is impossible to reach through nature a just conception of God except by the law of evolution. It is equally impossible to attain to a just conception of man. Are we not triturating dirt for the same reason as the worm? When an attorney draws an indictment against Guiteau, and declares that the President died instantaneously and in Washington, the lawyer is burrowing through mediæval dirt. When a church reasserts the Westminster catechism or Plymouth platform, for the grain of spiritual nutriment, it is eating again the hundred grains of theologic sand.

De Coulanges has shown that our ancestor, the Aryan, conceived of the dead as living on under ground. He did not think of a separation of the spirit from the body. The whole man went down into the ground, and did not cease to be. It was the thought of man when he was a child-man. When a man went into the ground for his religion, he entailed on his posterity as heavy a burden as the worm that first burrowed in the earth for bits of vegetation entailed on all worms to be. See how from that primitive conception of death our branch of the race became enmeshed in superstition.

The man in the ground must be warmed and fed. It became the duty of the living son to feed the dead father. Over the grave, a stone was laid and on the stone a fire was kindled. The flame was the altar-fire, and it must burn day and night in service of the dead below. Bread and wine and victims were brought to slake the thirst or sate the hunger of the dead.

The altar was fixed, and it must be covered by a fixed roof. Coulanges has shown that the altar built the house. Tartar and Arab never thought of their dead as living on under ground, and to this day a roving tent covers the Arab and a wagon the Tartar. The abode of the Aryan dead was fixed, and the abode of the living must be fixed. Religion was service rendered to a dead ancestor. Each family had its own religion. No stranger could share the family worship. Religion was a barrier between family and family. It became a barrier between class and class. "I swear," said the primeval Greek who had an altar, "I swear to hate those who have no altars, and to hurt them all that I can."

It came about that service at the altar devolved on the eldest son. As property went with religion, only the first-born son could inherit. His neglect of the sacrifice destroyed the family and demonized the dead. For, if the dead are not served, they rise from the tomb, and roam the earth hungry and malignant. The Greeks called them dæmons. The Romans called them Lares. The untombed dead were increasing. Service of the entombed and rites to win the favor or avert the wrath of lar or demon absorbed more and more the thoughts of the living. Almost every act or thought of man was religious. It was in service of the dead or anticipation of the dead self. "I take this woman," said the ancient Hindoo or Greek in the marriage rite, "I take this woman to be my wife, that I may have a son to sacrifice to me when I am dead."

The ancient man became so enmeshed that he seemed no nearer akin to us in mind than the ape is akin to us in body. Try to think his thoughts or lead his life. As well attempt to project yourself into the mind and life of the gorilla. Yet let us make the trial.

Your fathers are as hungry moles in the ground. You fear them and feed them. Almost every act of yours is prompted by thoughts of the dead. You wake, and your first thought is that the sacred fire may have gone out. You rise, and your first act is to feed the sacred flame and bring to it a sacrifice. You take the morning meal, and go forth to the duties of the day. If you have gone from your house left foot foremost, you are seized with terror; for some wandering ghost is against you. You return, and seek peace through an expiatory rite. You walk out again, right foot first, and you are safe. You walk on, and happen to see a crow. Again, you are chilled with fear; for you have offended a ghost. You return, and sacrifice another victim. You start again. You walk with averted eyes that you may not see a bird. A bird you do not see, and so far you are safe. You walk on, and happen to see a tomb or a tree struck by lightning. Again, you are chilled with terror, for a hungry demon is after you. You go home, and you will not leave your altar till another day.

Your hair has been cut in the full of the moon: that was to please your dead grandfather. Your walls are covered with magical inscriptions: that is your insurance against fire. You repeat a meaningless jargon twenty-seven times, spitting in a different way at each repetition: that is your precaution against fever. Your body is bedecked with amulets: one is to save you from toothache, another from malaria. You go again into the street: with the magical lettering on your walls, with your expectorations and your amulets, your house and yourself are safe, unless you have gone left foot foremost, or unless you have seen a bird or a tomb or a lightning-struck tree, or unless you have heard the small cry of a mouse.

You are childless, or your only child is a girl. Terrors of the damned possess you; for no one will light the altar-fire for you or bring bread and wine to you, and you are doomed not "to lie in cold obstruction," but rather "to be blown howling by desert winds." You do not resolve to do or not to do from the voice of reason. You find your resolution in the flight of birds on in the entrails of pigs or goats. You are drawn up in line of battle: you will not fight, you will not run, you will take the enemy's lance in your breast, and you will not move till a priest, who is reading the will of a ghost in the gut of a goose, has spoken. Grant, encamped before Richmond, will not move on the enemy's works until he has captured a priest from Lee and learned the strategy of Lee's gods.

The dead of Chickamauga are buried on the battlefield, and the State of Tennessee binds itself once a year to feed them. Yellow fever smites Memphis. While pain grips the dying, terror chills the living. Some of the dead have not been fed, and they are now malignant demons. They bivouac in the air. They brew the tempest. They clutch the bodies of living men. Their breath is fever. Their clutch is convulsion.

Every now and then, on a clear but moonless night, judges of the Supreme Court sit in their robes of office and gaze into the heavens. If they see a meteor, they say that the President has committed an offence against a god, and they send a Guiteau to "remove" him.

The picture we have drawn is that of the ancient Hindu or Greek or Roman. Emancipation is not complete; but, such emancipation as we have, how did it come? Draper has shown that whatever upward steps the race has taken it has been on rounds of science. But the first step toward emancipation was taken on money. There came the almighty dollar. Here was something could pass from hand to hand without a religious rite.

Those who had no altars could not own a foot of land, but dollars they could own. Dollars they got; and the dollar, almighty, gave a commission to think. The old law forbade a man without an altar to have a different opinion from a man who had an altar. When the plebs of Rome got money, they got opinions and revolutionized the empire. Dollars brought a right to opinions. The mind was no longer level to the old belief. The ancient man worshipped the immortal powers he vaguely felt were in himself. This was the nutritive grain in the slime through which the vernacular minds of ancient men were wriggling.

W. D. GUNNING.

THOMAS PAINE.

Sunday, January 29, will be the one hundred and forty-fifth anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine. This and the following day have been set apart by the Paine Society of Boston for a succession of meetings suitable to the occasion; and it is not to be doubted that, at these meetings, much will be fitly said in honor of the man who has deserved so much and has received so little from the American people in token of their gratitude for his conspicuous services in "the times that tried men's souls." But the voices of sympathy and admiration will not be so many that any one need fear to make the chorus over-strong by joining in, however heartily. And, if one cannot sympathize and praise without some qualifications, such as the body-guard of Paine's admirers would not care to make, he may dare believe that these would still prefer entire sincerity to any wilful misinterpretation of the facts as they present themselves to his discrimination.

It has been the fate of Paine to be remembered less on account of his best work than on account of that which was the crudest and most superficial. Of notoriety, he has enough and to spare. The names of Adams and Franklin and Jefferson have not been on men's lips so frequently as his. Their writings have had no such persistent interest for men as Thomas Paine's, whose Age of Reason is always on sale because always in demand at the news-stands in our great cities, and finds its way into the remotest corners of our civilization, getting every year thousands of new readers. For every once their names are spoken by the Orthodox pulpiter, his has been spoken hundreds of times, and if not with perfect sweetness, still in a manner that has availed to keep the ball a-rolling and prevent his fame and influence from dying out. But Paine has not been remembered with these great ones as he should have been, as the sharer of their enthusiasm for independence, yea, as the herald of their ardor, going on a little in advance of them, his trumpet giving no uncertain sound. The injustice which has withheld from him this honor is increased immensely by the fact that Franklin and Jefferson and Adams hardly less shared with him those religious opinions on account of which his political merits have been overlooked. True, they did not declare their religious opinions with Paine's frankness and boldness. But the Spartan law which did not punish stealing, but punished failure to conceal the theft, is but a dubious model for the Christian moralist, that he should hold the expression of opinions honestly and earnestly held to be more criminal than their private entertainment. Orthodoxy would have played a much more manly part if, while withholding from Paine the honor due to him for his political services on account of his infidel opinions, it had treated Franklin and Jefferson and Adams in the same way. I am not unaware that Paine is said to have forfeited his political honors by his private vices. But evidently there is here no reason, only an excuse, for the line of conduct taken. Theological hatred has exaggerated the private vices of Paine. It has made mountains out of mole-hills, where it would have made mole-hills out of mountains, if he had been a defender of the faith. At the worst, he was not more intemperate than were many of his clerical contemporaries, who were not less esteemed for their almost miraculous gifts of imbibition. Then, too, had he been Orthodox, something would have been allowed to the terrible condition in which he found himself in France during the Terror,—a prisoner deserted by the young republic at whose birth he had assisted so efficiently, his life in jeopardy for the humanity of his opinions. The spirit which has tried to fasten upon Paine the stigma of licentiousness, and has completely failed of doing so, has had no anxiety to fasten this stigma upon Hamilton or Washington, where success might have rewarded industry. The reason is evident. Hamilton and Washington never flung themselves against the Orthodox tradition with destructive force. The mantle of Orthodoxy is a mantle of charity. It hides a multitude of sins that would else be published and paraded with unmitigable zeal.

But to say that Paine has not been remembered as he should have been, as one of those who were most active in establishing our independence, is not to elevate him to the rank of Franklin and Jefferson and the Adamses. It must be confessed that his admirers and defenders have often hurt his cause by claiming for him too much. I do not now refer to such silly claims as those which have been put forward for his authorship of the Junius Letters or the Declaration. These claims do not deserve a moment's serious consideration. Nevertheless, the most generous consideration has been accorded them, and they have dwindled "from the smallness of a gnat to air" under its searching light. But many who have no disposition to pluck his brightest laurel from the brow of Jefferson and set it on the brow of Paine have incautiously endeavored to rank the brilliant accidents of his career with such life-times of persistent service as Jefferson's and Franklin's and Washington's.

The effect of Paine's Common-Sense, published in January, 1776, cannot easily be overrated. Never was any publication more timely. Its matter and its manner were exactly suited to the crisis that was pressing on the colonists of North America. Only the ignorance of Paine's most Orthodox antagonists can excuse their failure to perceive the transcendent energy and influence of that pamphlet. In view of its astounding popularity and the multitudinous references to it in the newspapers and discussions of the time, it is certainly not too much to claim for it that it hastened the Declaration of Independence six or eight weeks. But, if the Declaration had been delayed eight weeks, it might have been delayed as many years, perhaps a century. Seven weeks after the Declaration came the battle of Long Island. It is safe to say that, if the Declaration had not been adopted before that terrible event, it would have been indefinitely postponed.

Hardly less happy in their conception than Common-Sense were the successive numbers of the Crisis that appeared from time to time, as the War of Independence dragged its slow length along. The first of these had the same electrical effect as its more famous predecessor. It had the purpose and the spirit of a Tyrtæan ode. It was read by every corporal's guard in the army, scattered through every town and village in the colonies. It was like a sovereign cordial to the dying. The deserting militia-men came trooping back. Trenton and Princeton kindled their glowing initiative here. The numbers of the Crisis were of unequal value; but every one answered a crying need, and among the forces that sustained the drooping spirits of the colonists in their protracted struggle they must always have an honorable place. But, still, these brief appeals to public reason and sentiment, fortunate as they were, do not, combined with Common-Sense, establish any such claim on our regard as the less brilliant, but more patient services of other men. They establish a claim which has been stupidly and hatefully despised. Orthodox fatuity could no further go than in denying to the marble bust of Paine a place among the heroes in Independence Hall. Its right to be there was unquestionable. His political services were immense. They will yet be recognized by the nation through its highest representative, and in bronze or marble the shrewd face of "the rebellious middle-man" will yet greet the visitor at our national capitol among the counterfeit presentments of those who in but few instances surpassed, and in many fell far short of, his demands upon our grateful recollection. By exaggerating these demands, men do but delay the day of their allowance. Paine's work was great and efficient enough, without being comparable with that of the best and greatest of that memorable time.

But the political work of Paine is not the secret of his notoriety. This might have been even more important, and, yet if his theological record had not been different, it must have been almost hopelessly obscured. For it was in his essence that he could not believe anything for himself only. Apparently, he held no beliefs by an uncertain tenure. He was as unsceptical as Voltaire, of all men the least sceptical. What he believed, he believed with his might, and published to the extent of his ability. And so it happened that having certain opinions on religious topics he proclaimed them on the house-tops. The nature of them was such that they raised up a host of zealous partisans, and do unto this day; but they obscured his merits as a political agitator and reformer. But for these writings, no helper of America from over seas, not even Lafayette, would now enjoy a more honorable fame; and, as it is, his political virtues are hardly known except to those who admire him principally for his iconoclasm in the sphere of theological opinion.

The circumstances under which the Age of Reason was produced were averse to triviality; and there is no triviality in the pamphlet, for it is hardly a book, except in certain matters of detail. It is profoundly serious. For Paine, it was no holiday affair. He wrote it as with his own ebbing blood. On his way to prison, and apparently to death, he left it with a friend for publication. Afterward, he wrote a second part devoted mainly to the prophecies of the Old Testament. His meagre acquaintance with the Bible led him into various mistakes, but the substance of his argument against its supernatural character was not easily impaired. The Bible was a closed book to him from Genesis to Revelation. He had only the slightest appreciation of its contents. Herein, he was not singular. All this was yet to come. He understood the Bible positively quite as well as the most Orthodox of his contemporaries and negatively a good deal better. But the methods of criticism that have since made the Bible largely comprehensible were then sadly inchoate, and of their beginnings Paine was wholly ignorant. So much has been discovered since his day that it is a great pity that any one should go to him now for instruction. For the student of opinions, he is still valuable. For the learner, he is partial and misleading.

That Paine is commonly esteemed an atheist is significant of the average ignorance of mankind. His belief in God was simple and sincere. Many of the modern Orthodox would give their right hand to be able to believe so easily. But Paine's theism was an opinion rather than a sentiment. He was not a man of profound religious sensibility. The marvel and the mystery of the world touched him but faintly. His God was a huge mechanism. That air of patronage infects his speech which was so common with the eighteenth century deists. The object of their reverence and worship was not so much the deity of the universe as their own little theories of these, so neat and portable. Since Paine spoke out, the aspect of the theistic problem has become much more complex than it appeared to him; and for thoughtful people he has, on this head, nothing to say to which they need attend.

It is a difficult matter to recover a distinct impression of Paine's personal manner and appearance. Romney's portrait of him is strong and purposeful, but without any fineness. It was probably true to the life. He was the victim of depressing circumstances in his youth and early manhood. Something of squalor seemed to cling to him throughout or to assert itself upon the first occasion. If his education had been equal to his natural powers and his circumstances favorable to his genius, few of his generation would have distanced him in the race for influence and fame. Jeffrey could not conceive where Macaulay "picked up that style." Where Paine got his is more incomprehensible. Enriched with various culture, it would have been an instrument of incomparable force. As it was, it did good service. It was admirably adapted to the average man.

If anything was more central to him than his love of truth, it was his passion for justice. He was no heartless doctrinaire, but a man of generous human sympathies, pleading for Louis' hapless head, much to the danger of his own. The saddest thing in his experience was the poverty of his domestic life. He was wounded in his most sensitive part, when he was denied the love of wife and children. His was a sad old age. The more the pity, when he had done and tried to do so much for the increase of human happiness.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

A "RECANTATION" FORWARD.

Less than two years ago, Orthodox Congregationalism in Brooklyn, N.Y., lost two of its younger ministers, Rev. George C. Miln and Rev. Thomas R. Slicer,—lost them not by death, but by progress. Both were men of culture, of excellent character, of attractive pulpit gifts, and were much liked by their parishioners. But both had progressed so far in their religious views that they no longer felt at home in the Orthodox fold, even though their congregations made no complaint against them for heretical teaching. They felt that they should at least be more true to their own convictions in another field; and they both accepted invitations to Unitarian pulpits. Mr. Miln went to the pulpit that had been vacated by Robert Collyer in Chicago, Mr. Slicer to that of the First Unitarian Society at Providence, R.I. Mr. Slicer appears to have been content to become a denominational Unitarian, and holds, we understand, a somewhat conservative type of Unitarian doctrine. But Mr. Miln, when he accepted the call to the Chicago pulpit and entered on his labors there, expressly wished it to be understood that he did not accept the position as a Unitarian; and we notice his name is not in the Unitarian Year-Book list of ministers. This was interpreted at the time to mean that he was not quite ready to go so far as to subscribe to Unitarian views,—an interpretation well borne out by views concerning the Trinity which he had printed at the time of his leaving his Brooklyn congregation. But, considering recent events, it seems more likely that it meant that he was not willing to prescribe any new denominational goal for his thought, which had begun to move so rapidly forward.

Mr. Miln has been settled as minister of Unity Church, Chicago, but little more than a year. Information has been coming to us, from time to time, not only of the general satisfaction he was giving, but of his advancing freedom of opinion.

In this short time, he has progressed so far in his religious philosophy that he began to doubt whether Unity Church would grant him all the freedom of utterance his earnest thought might demand. For this reason, and also because he felt that his nervous strength was somewhat undermined and that he needed rest, a few weeks ago, to the surprise of the public and of his congregation, he resigned his charge. But his society were not satisfied to let him go away so easily. A committee was appointed to confer with him, and request him to withdraw his resignation. On Sunday before last, as a result of this conference, Mr. Miln announced that he would accede to the wishes of the society, and, in so doing, made a statement which is alike creditable to the society and himself. The Chicago Times of the next morning reports him as saying, after referring to his need of rest as one reason of his resignation, that,—

Added to this desire, was a scruple lest, in the evolution of my thought upon religious subjects, I might be irresistibly led to forms of statement more radical than the general consensus of opinions here would approve. Do not suppose that any slightest hint of this kind has been given me by any one within this congregation. For it has not been suggested in the remotest way. The feeling, whether wise, or unwise, was self-begotten. I have been led to believe, however, both by the committee appointed and by the congregation at large,—which, with a unanimity as surprising to me as it is delightful, has resolved itself into a committee of the whole on this subject,—I say, I have been led to believe that the congregation does not entertain the fear I have felt, and that it is quite willing to have me utter the utmost truth to which my mind may reach. This conclusion, together with the very warm personal friendship existing between myself and the congregation at large, has made me resolve to watch my health more closely, to spare myself all unnecessary burdens of outside labor, and to remain among you so long as we are of one mind.

At the close of the statement there was an audible murmur of approbation in the congregation, which showed that the pastor's decision met with approval.

What is Mr. Miln's present theological position is well indicated by a reply which he has made to a sermon preached against him and his views in a Chicago pulpit by Rev. Dr. Gurney. The reply is printed in the Sunday Times of January 15, the day on which Mr. Miln made the above statement to his congregation; so that his parishioners had an opportunity to see that morning before coming to church what were their pastor's religious views on some very vital questions, if they had any doubt in the matter. In this letter, after speaking of himself as "a confessed rationalist," he says with reference to Mr. Gurney's attack:—

I cannot for the life of me see the ground of his censure. He must know that I have forever abandoned everything in the guise of Christian mythology. He must know, being a student of my sermons, that I do not believe in the exclusiveness of any religious system, be it Christian or Buddhist. He must know—at any rate, if he will again turn to the scrap-book in which he keeps the reports of the Unity Church sermons, he can at once see—that I believe in the gradual evolution of mankind into higher and finer conditions. And this, he will see, is a postulate which prevents my believing that the best thinking on religious subjects was done some eighteen hundred and odd years ago. This is not to discredit the thinking then done. No man will more willingly and enthusiastically praise the only great indorser of Jesus among the apostles than I. But I will not discredit the race so much as to suppose that he exhausted all the possibilities of doctrinal statement or religious development. No. The race keeps on its way, growing ever, with an occasional spasm of retrogression, toward truer conceptions of man and of nature; and all the ecclesiastical obstinacy in the world cannot impede its progress.

By this extract, it will be seen that Mr. Miln has "recanted" all his Orthodoxy, and, effectually avoiding the half-way house of Unitarianism, is out on the broad plains of free and rational religion. But it is hardly probable that such a recantation will receive nearly so much attention from the evangelical press as it would have received, if it had been a recantation backwards. Even the falsely alleged recantation of Mr. Frothingham is still made to do service, in evangelical journals and pulpits, for the old creeds in which he has not a particle of faith.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Independent says, "Give us more morality, whatever else must be diminished." To which we say, Amen. That is one of the seed-grains of Free Religion.

OF General Grant's recent noble letter, in which he frankly confesses that for nineteen years he has "been doing a gallant and efficient soldier [General Fitz-John Porter] a great injustice in thought and sometimes in speech," the Christian Union well says:—

To spend three full days of study for no other purpose than to ascertain whether one has not been in the wrong and does not owe to others an acknowledgment of the wrong, and then to make the acknowledgment fully, freely, frankly, and without reserve, in a form certain to go round the world,—for this letter will be read wherever General Grant is known,—is to set an example easier to admire than to follow. If you do not think so, try the experiment after reading this article: spend fifteen minutes in considering the question whether you are wholly right in the last quarrel or the last coolness between yourself and your friend, and pen or speak to him a confession of your error as frank and as open as this of General Grant. He has won no victory in the field more honorable than this victory over his own prepossessions. He has exhibited no leadership more worthy of courageous and conscientious following.

THE National Reform Association, whose object is to Christianize the United States Constitution, is increasing its activities by holding conventions, forming auxiliary local associations, and adding to the number of its members. The Christian Statesman, its organ, reports the work as progressing in an encouraging manner. The kind of resolutions adopted at these conventions is illustrated in the following, taken from the report of a meeting at Mansfield, Ohio:—

As all authority is vested in our Lord Jesus Christ, the King of kings, it is right that his authority should receive an explicit constitutional recognition by our nation.

The origin and history of this nation clearly demand that it should recognize God, his Word as the basis of morality, and his Son as head over all.

It seems incredible that any intelligent body of American citizens should believe it possible ever to put into the United States Constitution such a theological creed as the above and be seriously working for it. Yet judges of courts, bishops of the Episcopal and Methodist churches, a large number of leading clergymen, together with some college presidents and professors, are giving their countenance to this movement. In Massachusetts, President Seelye of Amherst College, Rev. Dr. Webb and Rev. Dr. Dorus Clarke and Rev. Dr. Miner of Boston, and Prof. Edmund H. Bennett, Dean of the Law Faculty of Boston University, are Vice-Presidents of this National Reform Association. Do these men actually approve of adding the above theological amendments to the national Constitution? Does Professor Bennett, who is noted as one of the finest law instructors in the country, and who is also one of the most upright of judges, teach the young men under his care that the Constitution needs this theological completion?

WE learn from the London Register, through the Catholic Review, certain interesting and instructive facts concerning Christian missions in China. Sir John Hennessy, Governor of Hong Kong (the centre of missionary operations in China), in his annual report to the English parliament, while admitting the good which missions have done, says:

I cannot confirm what has been more than once recorded in the Blue-Book reports that have been printed for the information of Parliament,—namely, that this colony is producing a beneficial effect on the heathen population of the great empire of China, and leaving the surrounding mass of ignorance and superstition. On the contrary, for many years past Christianity has been declining in China, and at this moment the total number of Christians is considerably less than the number that existed in the last century.

Upon this, the London Register remarks:—

Why? "Because," replies Sir John Hennessy, "missionaries proceed from Hong Kong into China, supported by treaties, consuls, and, if need be, gun-boats. The Chinese associate them with a system to which, whether rightly or wrongly, they object very much,—the system of foreign intervention." A Chinese statesman, who was recently visiting Sir John Hennessy, said to him: "The missionary enterprises that have their head-quarters under your government would be treated by us with the same friendly toleration that we accord to the Tamists and Buddhists, but for their constant appeals to what they call treaty rights; but these treaty rights, though framed by the late Emperor of the French and the illustrious Lord Palmerston in the interests of true Christianity only, and not for any political object whatever, do not appear to us Chinese to be as serenely elevated above worldly considerations as their religiously-minded authors doubtless intended, and the consequence is that Christianity is making no way, is indeed declining visibly."

In reference to the above remarks of the high Chinese functionary to Sir John Pope Hennessy, a correspondent, who has lived in China, writes to the London Echo that the Roman Catholic missionaries alone are looked upon, and with reason, by the Chinese as disinterested and sincere. The Protestant missionaries from England and America are generally married, with large families. They frequently inhabit well-built European houses in the best positions at the various foreign settlements, and they are usually in receipt of some hundreds of pounds per annum from the societies who send them out. The Catholics, on the contrary, are single, self-denying men, sent forth by their Church with no money allowance beyond what is necessary to support life. They identify themselves with the people of the country by adopting their dress, their frugal habits, and their manners and customs, and by living among them.

THE Secular Review, published in London and edited by Charles Watts and "Saladin," comes to us of late much improved in many ways, particularly by a new tone of breezy vigor in its contents.

THAT excellent, devout, and inspiring moral work, the Imitation of Christ, by Thomas à Kempis (whose real name, as declared by the Boston correspondent of the Springfield Republican, was Thomas Hammerkin of Kempen, a village near Cologne), was first published at Augsburg, in 1468–72, by Zainer. It was written and printed in slightly Germanized Latin. Since that time, it has been honored by more than six hundred different editions, including all the known languages of the civilized world.

WE desire to call the attention of our readers to the advertisement to be found on the outside page of this number of The Index, of C. E. Dallin's plaster bust of Voltaire, one of which is now on exhibition at The Index office, and which is admired by all who see it. Mr. Dallin is a talented young artist, and we would be glad to see his work made profitable to him.

THE lectures given before the Philosophical Society of Chicago this season are well attended, and much interest is manifested by the audiences in the advanced thought of the day. The reading of each paper is followed by criticism or comment, and the discussions are vigorous and generally full of thought. The society numbers about a hundred and thirty members, among whom are some of the most intellectual men and women of Chicago. This organization was formed about ten years ago; and the interest in its aims and objects has not only been sustained, but has steadily increased; and its reputation as a body of thinkers, and the publication of the papers read before it, have given it an extended influence throughout the West. It expects from its speakers thought, not mere declamation, resorts to no sensational methods to attract attention, and appeals therefore only to intelligent and earnest minds. The society is a credit to the great metropolis of the West.

IT is so rare that justice is done to the memory of Thomas Paine, except by Liberals, that we gladly print the following extract from the editorial weekly summary of last Saturday evening's Boston Traveller:—

Mr. Davidge, in his speech on the trial of Guiteau, referred to "the atheist, Tom Paine," which showed him to be either an ignorant man or a man indifferent to truth. Thomas Paine was exactly the reverse of an atheist. He was a deist; that is, he was a believer in one God. Deists are not uncommon, and they were even common in England in the last century; and Mr. Paine was an Englishman, and he was born in 1737, when deism was the creed of half the cultivated men in the British Empire. His splendid services to this country, some time before the French Alliance had made its independence a certainty, entitles him to be safe from American misrepresentation.

THERE is nothing like being an editor for dispelling any fallacies which one may have held concerning his character and capacity. The senior editor of The Index, for instance, has always supposed himself to be a peaceable man, retaining in good degree the Quaker characteristics with which he was born; and he has been led to believe—by too partial friends, it is now evident—that, if his style of composition had any merit, it was that of clearness. But, considering the number of fights, on paper, in which he has been recently engaged, and the strange sentiments which he never for a moment thought himself capable of entertaining, but which readers insist on having read in his writings, he begins to doubt whether he may not have been born a Modoc, and does not speak a dialect that is more Indian than English.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 26, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

A SOLILOQUY.

For The Index.

Too late in life! My spring is gone,
My summer never will return:
As in life's way I journey on,
New projects give me small concern.

Too late in life! For every joy
I tempered with an equal pain:
No pleasure but has its alloy,
No sky without its clouds and rain.

Too late in life! In what I've erred,
Each deed bears print till crack of doom:
I fear that self I've oft preferred,
For self by every means made room.

In early life, I dimly saw
What now to me is plain as day,—
That life is blessed which has no flaw,
That conscience that is sweet alway.

At end of life, where shall I look
For pity, pardon, peace, and love?
To him who sees where I mistook,
And who poor, grieving souls will soothe.

Too late in life! For autumn's leaves
Are fallen, and will be soon decayed
I must arise and bind my sheave,
And see them safe in garner laid.

Too late in life! The winter's come,
But still old age with me is green:
My thoughts now cluster round a home
Where only peace and joy are seen.

Another spring! what will it be?
Increase of knowledge, light, and love;
Life, good from all eternity,
In earth below, in heaven above.

RATIONAL (?) RELIGION.

BY W. H. BOUGHTON, Esq.

"If life and thought are the flower of matter, any definition of matter which omits life and thought must be inadequate, if not untrue."—TYNDALL.

The recent so-called recantation of that kindly and honest-minded gentleman, Mr. Octavius B. Frothingham (which was no recantation at all), seems to have suffused the evangelical countenance with a glow of complacent exultation, and to have surprised the startled Radicals in the act of reaching for their arms.

If any views of the situation, other than such as affect Orthodox and radical minds, can be entertained, it would seem that such other views must be held by one in sympathy with neither. And the object of this communication is to suggest that the shield may be black on one side and white on the other, and so to call the attention of the opposing knights to the fact that the question of color is merely ornamental, and by no means descriptive of character; but that character is implied in shield, and not in white or black. It will be remembered that Mr. Frothingham, finding in Italy a priesthood, which he describes as ignorant and superstitious, but wielding a power over their people which seems to be in harmony with their own blue skies and entirely beneficent, asks the question, What is that power? Now, it is possible that, if he had sought for an answer to his own question, he might have found that doubt of his doubts need not necessarily lead to any calamitous conclusion. And, as helps to enable us to answer his question, let us suggest that he found in the Italian priests and people the same things, although different in degree and manifestation, which every fair-minded man, evangelical or radical, finds in the clergymen and laity of the Catholic as well as the Protestant churches of the world; and these are all the graces which may be grouped under the term social, selecting from this group for especial emphasis all that includes helpfulness toward the weak, and makes for that lever which will ultimately lift the world, unselfishness. But beyond all these, and dominating them all, he found reverence. He does not say that he has observed that these good things are universal concomitants of ignorance and superstition in different degrees, and we cannot impute to him the conclusion that ignorance fertilized by superstition is the only soil which produces these golden fruits. But rather let us impute to him the conclusion that the religious element in different groups of people is temporarily adapted to their temporary needs; that there is a law of adaptability existing as a part of the laws of harmony; and that it is not the ignorance and the superstition which throw up and develop the flower, but that, where the soil is too rich, ignorance and superstition are thrown off as exhalations which poison the lungs of the mind just so long as they remain unacclimated. Following Mr. Frothingham in his meditations, we should begin to suspect that, if the sunshine of truth poured down upon this rich alluvial with too ardent rays, it might wither the blossoms. And, if the rain of truth fell in devastating floods upon rich land, it might drown it to such an extent that it would produce nothing except the marsh grass which we see springing up in so many radical quarters; and, if it fell upon a thin, poor soil, it might wash it out, and leave nothing except the sandy waste which some mistake for "dreary materialism." Pursuing this train of thought, we might lead up to an answer to Mr. Frothingham's question, and suspect that the power he speaks of is all the good things we have hinted at, but notably and all the time reverence; and that these exist and persist, not through ignorance and superstition, but in spite of them. And he probably referred Italian brigandage, treachery, laziness, and crime, not to the reverence, but to the ignorance and superstition.

But Mr. Frothingham hesitates to mention some other things which he saw in other latitudes, and he fails to ask two other questions.

Let us suppose that he has seen among certain classes calling themselves liberals, radicals, infidels, free thinkers, rationalists, atheists, etc., such things as cynicism, fatalism, hardness, conceit, pretension, gush, and arrogance, and all other forms of selfishness which proceed from irreverence; that these culminations apparently started with an earnest and enthusiastic search for truth, still held up as an excuse, but degenerated finally into the shabbiest pretence; that he found intolerance just as rampant in radical as in evangelical circles; and that all these things are found in connection with an apparently sincere, but, at any rate, loud demand for knowledge and truth, especially scientific and philosophic truth. Let us suppose that he sees the eloquent lecturer hewing at the roots of superstition with a battle-axe, speaking always for liberty and humanity with brave, strong words; loyal, gifted, learned, irresistible in his logic; operating as a mental surgeon upon the deformed, and doing his work best when he has no feeling; doing indispensable pioneer work among those classes which cannot be argued out, led out, charmed out, coaxed out, but can only be shocked and horrified out of festering superstitions, and out of the ingrained and inherited habit of letting others do their thinking for them. And then suppose that he sees, with all these great gifts and good works, not one particle of reverence nor of consideration for the feelings of any one, and so antagonizing, not only all men who have any claim to be called healthy or normal, but even such as eloquence subdued. Observing these things, Mr. Frothingham might be led to ask the first of the questions which he neglected to put; namely, What is that power which makes for evil, although accompanied, not by ignorance and superstition, but by intelligence, learning, ability, and earnestness, employed in an eager and honest search for truth? And, in searching for an answer, he would suspect that reverence does not cease to be beneficent, when relieved of the weight of ignorance and superstition.

This would lead him to ask that other question,—namely, Is there any theory which, if provisionally assumed by both Evangelical and Radical, bids fair, upon examination, to reveal a common ground upon which both can stand with both (so-called spiritual and material) feet? The full answer to this question involves an examination into the fundamental laws of thought and consciousness. It cannot be assumed, guessed at, or gambolled for. There is no royal road to this learning. It is the reward, like all other good things, of patient, intelligent, persevering, hopeful work. This work may be commenced at many points. It may start with an effort to solve such questions as, What is religion? What is reverence? Is reverence ultimate or is it derived? and, if derived, from what? What is immortality? And deeper than all these is the question, What is matter?

Not by way of examining this question, but as a possible inducement to others to do so, let us note two facts within our daily observation: (1) The Evangelicals say that free thought, however manifested or by what name soever called, leads inevitably to materialism; that materialism is an evil thing, while their beliefs or methods lead to spiritism, and that spiritism is a good thing. (2) Free thinkers of all kinds, except materialists, assert that their methods lead up to a spiritism of a character which is a great improvement upon the evangelical variety; and they wholly agree with the Orthodox that materialism is a gross, unspiritual, evil thing. Both contrast material with spiritual. In referring to the spiritual of the free thinkers, the Orthodox call it materialism. Free thinkers repudiate the term; but both free thinkers and Orthodox understandingly refer to the same thing, while calling it by different names. The thing to which both are pointing is the thing in which free thought ultimates. Orthodox brands it as material and vile, and Radical labels it spiritual and good. Both agree that spiritual, whatever it may be, is good, and that material is its contrast, opposite, and antithesis, and is consequently bad. Here, then, is an agreement between Orthodox and Radical that materialism is a bad thing; and it would seem to be reasonably certain that both will agree that the ascription of badness to materialism is a conclusion which both have drawn from the fact of materialism, and not the fact itself. They agree that badness is a quality of matter. And, in order that agreement shall be maintained as to the character of this quality, it is necessary to exclude from materialism so much as is reached by rational methods; and so that excluded variety of materialism, of which both predicate badness, is brought to the vanishing-point.

This clears the way for the really important matter, in which they both agree, that rational methods do lead up to something,—that is, something rational,—which, both will further agree, should not be characterized as good or bad without examination, for fear that it might prove to be the stone which the builders rejected. And the point for us to note right here is that the significance of the agreement between Orthodox and Radical is generally overlooked by both. What is that significance? To determine this question, both will agree that the indispensable prerequisite is the determination to examine; and, having agreed to make an examination, what is the first question which each will ask the other? Is it not, What is matter? As before stated, it is not intended in this paper to make such examination. But we may suggest that matter is indestructible; and, if spirit shares that quality, then both have the same thing in common. But are matter and spirit two things, and especially two antagonistic, different things, unlike in all respects except in indestructibility? Or is the one convertible into the other? Or is spirit unseen, unknowable matter? Without making the examination, let us suppose that our two friends have progressed so far in their examination that the question before them is, whether the materialist is justified in describing everything which exists as material; that matter and existence are convertible terms; and that spirit, being part of existences, is included in matter and constitutes its glory. Then how can we help along the argument? Possibly, we may assist by suggesting that this dispute, like most disputes among men, is a dispute about terms; that, while Orthodox agrees that existence includes matter and spirit, he does not like the word "matter." And now, if materialist will suggest the word "everything," then may they drop materialism and spiritism, and drink each other's health as Brother Everythingists.

Good feeling and fellowship having been thus established, agreement upon some of the following propositions may be reached: (1) That the Orthodox creeds, so called, are not the things which produce or induce either the reverence or the peacefulness or the kindness which the Orthodox exhibit. The modern Orthodox mind has grown out of the serious consideration of the question of whether the creeds contain anything which a sane mind can regard as rational truth. The creeds still survive, but simply as paleontological excuses for the exercise of the social qualities and of reverence. To the group of people called "a congregation," the creeds furnish the excuse for doing something in common; and community of action in any pursuit is found to be pleasurable. The parlor plays and pastimes at a summer boarding-house or for the entertainment of the company at an evening party in town are generally marked by mental imbecility; and, for the purpose of amusing and entertaining both the young and the old, the company are expected to indulge in enthusiastic inanity. The result is found to be entirely satisfactory; and, at the end of the performance in which all have taken part, even the most cynical are conscious that they have had "a good time." Convert the same company into a "congregation," where the object is not to excite the risibles, but to evoke the more dignified emotions, and an analogous result ensues. The more irrational the preacher waxes, the greater is the common effort to lift the heart to the luxury of reverence, which, it is tacitly assumed, transcends rationality. They want to be relieved from thinking, and intend to have a restful recreation before the bell rings for work. And it is evident that, if the pleasure experienced depended on the rationality of the creed which the preacher is expounding, no such community of effort could be sustained, and no such consequent pleasure ensue. (2) That it may be possible for rational methods to take on reverential emotions and for reverence to take on rationality. (3) That it may be possible that free thought is entirely out of place, unless appearing as the condition of clear thought. And that all such fashionable phrases as "dead materialism," "dreary materialism," "dogmatic materialism," "gospel of negation" (negation of what?), echoed by both Evangelical and Radical, and very much of the muddled, cold-blooded gush which passes under the name of Rational (?) Religion, can be safely relegated to that limbo of free thought which lies beyond the boundaries of clear thought. (4) That this is not the age of the rack and the stake, and that any assumption of mediæval martyr manners is liable to be translated into a truculent strut. (5) That it is possible that Mr. Frothingham did not favor the interviewer with all his thoughts on the subject of religion. (6) That, as matter shall be better and better understood, it is possible that poor, little, starved ideas of matter may die of inanition, and materialism ripen into the faith of the future.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED LETTER OF THOMAS PAINE.

Editors of The Index:—

The following letter was addressed to a gentleman who had been a friend of Paine's in Paris, and who was, at the time this letter was written, resident in the District of Columbia, and able to aid him at the seat of government.

CAROLINE H. DALL.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18, 1882.

NEW YORK, Broome Street, May 4, 1807.

OLD FRIEND,—I will first explain the direct occasion of my writing this letter, and reserve meums and teums to follow after.

I have a law-suit coming on in this State [New York] the 20th of this month, May. The occasion of it is as follows:—

Four or five men, who had lived within the British lines in the Revolutionary war, got in to be inspectors of the election at New Rochelle, where I lived on my farm. These men refused my vote, saying to me, "You are not an American citizen." Upon my beginning to remonstrate with them, the chief of them (Ward, supervisor, whose father and all his brothers had joined the British, but himself not being old enough to carry a musket stayed at home with his mother) got up and calling out for a constable, said to me, "I commit you to prison." He chose, however, to sit down and go no farther with it. I have prosecuted the board of inspectors for disparaging me.

I have written to Mr. Madison for copies of Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Randolph, in which Mr. Monroe informs government of his having reclaimed me, and of my liberation in consequence of it, and of Mr. Randolph's answer in which he says, "The President approves of what you have done in the case of Mr. Paine." These are necessary, in order to prove falsehood on the inspectors; for the ground they went upon was this: "Our minister at Paris, Governor Morris, would not reclaim you when you were imprisoned in the Luxemburg, and General Washington refused to do it." Morris did reclaim me; but his reclamation did me no good, and the probability is that he did not intend it should.

You and other Americans in Paris went in a body to the convention to reclaim me; and I want a certificate from you, properly attested, of this fact. If you consult with Governor Clinton, he will, in friendship, inform you whom to address it to.

Having now done with business, I come to meums and teums. What are you about? You sometimes hear of me, but I never hear of you. It seems as if I had got to be master of the feds and the priests. The former do not attack my political publications,—they rather try to keep them out of sight by silence; and, as to the priests, they act as if they would say, "Let us alone, and we will let you alone." My examination of the passages called prophecies is printed, and will be published next week. I have prefaced it with the essay on dreams. I do not believe the priests will attack it; for it is not a book of opinions, but of facts. Had the Christian religion done any good in the world, I would not have exposed it, however fabulous I might have believed it to be; but the delusive idea of having a friend at court whom they call a redeemer, who pays all their scores, is an encouragement to wickedness.

What is Fulton about? Is he "taming a whale" to draw his submarine boat?

I wish you would desire Mr. Smith to send me his country National Intelligencer. It is printed twice a week without advertisements. I am sometimes at a loss for the want of authentic information.

Yours in friendship,

THOMAS PAINE.

ELISHA L. HAMMOND.

Editors of The Index:—

Died at Brightwood, Mass., 12th inst., Elisha L. Hammond, late of Florence, Mass., aged eighty-two.

As one who has known Mr. Hammond intimately for nearly forty years, I can speak of him only in terms of the highest admiration. To the people of Florence, he needs no eulogy. When some one inquired of him if he were a Christian, he said, "Ask my neighbors." Yes, ask his neighbors as to his character, and they will bear witness to his goodness, his honesty, his hospitality, his kind-heartedness, and his glowing enthusiasm touching every good word and work.

He was one of the founders of the Free Congregational Society of Florence. A meeting of all interested, whether Catholic or Protestant, or of whatever sect, creed, or nationality, had been called, to be held in Florence on the third day of May, 1863, to organize arrangements for the promotion of good morals, general education, and liberal religious sentiments. As preparatory to this meeting, a few friends of the movement met, on the morning of the day for the meeting, at the house of S. L. Hill, to draft a declaration of sentiments for the consideration of the proposed meeting which was to be held in the afternoon. Charles C. Burleigh, Samuel L. Hill, E. L. Hammond, and the writer of this were present. I well remember Mr. Hammond's interest in the movement. After the suggestions of those present had been considered and a rough draft for the platform of a free society had been drawn up, Mr. Hammond's keen insight discovered that in the platform, while admitting the equality of human rights with reference to the conditions and rights of membership in the society, women were not specifically mentioned. Of course, at this suggestion, the declaration was at once and heartily amended by inserting the word sex, making the draft to read: "We make no distinction as to the conditions and rights of membership in this society, on account of sex or color or nationality." This gave the finishing touch to the famous platform of the Cosmian Society, which was unanimously adopted at the afternoon meeting.

During one of my recent visits to Mr. Hammond, but a short time before his death, and while he was quite feeble, he handed me a petition for woman suffrage, with the request that all present should sign it, as they all did. And while on his death-bed, when scarcely able to talk, I saw his countenance light up with joy at some information given him in regard to work which was being planned to promote the enfranchisement of woman.

It has been said by some that Liberalism awakens no zeal, no warmth of emotion. Who that has witnessed in Cosmian Hall meetings the frequent, spontaneous outbursts of fervid, heartfelt utterances from the lips of Mr. Hammond can deny that religious freedom can kindle the flame of genuine enthusiasm for the true and good. And why should not freedom stir up the feelings and awaken emotion. It is the caged bird that cannot soar; while the eagle, flying free through the unlimited heavens, is "kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam."

Mr. Hammond, it is well known, was associated with the abolitionists all through their long contest, sharing with them, in his allotted sphere, all the trials which they encountered, and living to rejoice with them in their final triumph,—in the downfall of slavery. He enjoyed the personal acquaintance and esteem of many of the prominent leaders in the anti-slavery conflict.

And now his worn-out body is embosomed in the soil of Florence, among the people he loved so well, and among whom his living presence was for many years a priceless benediction.

His liberal religious principles sustained him to the last. He contemplated and spoke of his own coming death with the utmost serenity. Death had no fictitious terrors for him. In his view, it was life, not death, that was the more serious thing; and in his noble life he has left us an example of rare self-consecration to the welfare of his fellow-men. S. H.

ADLER ON KANT.

Editors of The Index:—

The matter presented in Mr. Adler's discourse, printed in The Index December 8, is so abstruse it seems to require a good deal of careful handling in order to make it clearly understood and duly appreciated. Such an article soon goes into distant and dim regions of thought, if it is not recalled and curried, so as to show its true character clearly. And, in such recall, it matters but little whether remarks upon it be favorable or unfavorable. Generally, unfavorable remarks awaken the most interest in regard to the matter.

Opinions that exalt Kant frequently mislead. Kant, being deformed bodily, small in stature, with a handsome face, and a bright, lively, and pleasant countenance, with great wit, and a deep thinker, as Mr. Adler describes him, could hardly fail of being a general pet, to whom everybody would be inclined to give what he wanted. If praise or commendation, no one would withhold it from his productions. This consideration would sufficiently account for the long list of laudations given to Kant, mentioned by Mr. Adler. That Kant's works had a fair proportion of merit is doubtless true; and the peculiar circumstances would make the public, learned and unlearned, generous to him. What are they, and what are they good for?

Mr. Adler first calls attention to the fact that Kant fancied that the stars may have been consolidated from a nebulous mass. Nobody knows whether that is true or false, so we know it is a fancy; but a fancy now fortified by a variety of probable circumstances. Mr. Adler calls this a tremendous idea. Big things are now hitched on to it; but the fancy itself is no more than the fancy we remark in thousands of boys and girls of sixteen. Fancy runs high, wild, and very easily, gathers up all our ideas, and brings them home to the intellect to sort over and select. What are known to be true are dispensed to the sciences; and what are not known to be true, only plausible, are consigned to the department of faith or opinion, to be worked over by reason.

Mr. Adler informs us that Kant's great undertaking was the suggester of his great work, so-called Kritik of Pure Reason; and he informs us that the purpose of this work was to examine man's reasoning faculty "with a view to ascertain just what sort of and just how much knowledge it can give us." But whether he succeeded in ascertaining just how much knowledge and just what sort of knowledge reason gave to man is not stated. The purpose is so great, the presumption is that he never accomplished it. It implies a necessity of knowing just how much knowledge every person on earth obtains by reason; for, if he decided on any maximum amount, and a person was found who transcended that amount, his amount would not be the truth. Besides, it must have been impossible for Kant, or any one else, to measure just how much knowledge any one obtained by reason. So we see that his purpose at the outset was an absurdity. Kant and Adler seemingly forget that knowledge is a thing of degrees, and not a measurable quantity answering to the term "just how much."

Then, Mr. Adler gives us Kant's technicalities, disregarding the scholastic use of some terms. This is all well enough to serve his purpose. Every one may have his own technicalities; and Kant by his inferred that the judgment of man, as to logical inferences, is based on mathematics,—that is to say, logical inference is equal, as proof, with mathematical demonstration; as when we say, a tree must have had a maker; but, no maker of a tree being known, its maker must be unknown, and that unknown maker is called the living, intelligent God: therefore, the existence of such a God is demonstrated a priori.

This is the theological argument also; but the assumption that a tree must have had a maker is to be looked at. The scholastic understanding is that reason can prove nothing. We must have evidence by some observation, and not logic or argument, or the thing is not proven. Surely, we know that the five words of evidence, I saw him do it, would outweigh a lawyer's two hours' logical reasoning to the contrary.

The way Kant works this absurd theory is a real curiosity. He informs us that, although we know that seven and five make twelve, "It would never give us the right to say, as we do say, that the sum of seven and five must always, and of necessity, be twelve." Why not? Can Mr. Adler give us an instance where the sum of five and seven is any other sum than twelve? Kant gives us no evidence that we are not assured that the sum of five and seven always makes twelve. Then Kant says, "It is the same in geometry,"—that two parallel lines extending to infinity do not give us the right to say that, thus extended, they would not approach and cross each other,—thus insanely setting aside geometry, which instructs that they would not then be parallel lines. It would be interesting to see how "science kindled its torch at the light" of such absurdity. The geometrical circle is handled in the same absurd way by these gentlemen. They say we do not know a thing about the circle only by our idea of space, and that is a spontaneity of the mind, and not a reality outside of us, "but only what we lend from the storehouse of our mind." Let us be careful with this absurdity that we do not know anything of space outside of our mind. What is the scientific fact? Simply that we do get our idea of a circle from an archetype outside of our mind. Seeing a circle gives us the idea; and we get it in no other way, and it has no relation to space but to occupy it. The archetype is always the same; but the mind fluctuates, and is not reliable, like its archetypes of ideas. Then these philosophers say, "We have original ideas of space which we do not get from experience" or observations. Do they know this, or only guess at it? What is the known fact in the case, the archetype of the idea of space? Simply inch after inch or foot after foot perpetually. That is our archetype for the idea of space, and we do not have to guess at it. The proposition quoted assumes that there is no archetype for the idea of space. So they declare the idea of space is within us, wholly and originally within us, and they say, "What it may be outside of us we do not know." But we do know that it is inch after inch continually, the same as it is in idea within us, and that we get the idea wholly from the observation outside of us, which first suggests to the mind a measuring-stick, then a standard of inches. If nothing outside of us suggested this, would we have measuring-sticks?

Then they say, "Time is also an idea within us, and what it may be outside of us we do not know." But do we not know that our idea of time has a sure and never-varying archetype outside of us,—moment after moment continually,—the same outside of us as inside of us? But Kant and Adler press this absurdity to most ridiculous extent, and tell us, "In sleep, time is obliterated for us." What is the fact? Surely, we know there is a time for sleep, and no obliteration of time for us; and the clock tells us how long we sleep. Do these gentlemen really express what they mean? We can only take them at their words; and we know that in sleep only our faculty for recognizing time is in abeyance, and no obliteration of time for us or anything else. It is our mind that is at fault, and not time.

Still further do they press this absurdity, and say, "If the whole human race were obliterated from the face of the earth, there would be no time at all."

Kant and Adler were not playing upon words as to the name "time." They meant what it is, and failed to see the archetype for the idea of time. And on this failure they build their whole superstructure. If they saw the archetype for the idea of time, their statement, "no time at all," would mean that moment after moment would stop if the whole race of man were obliterated from the face of the earth. But surely, we know that, if our race were extinct, a dog might live a year longer, and a tree might grow fifty years longer. So we know their statement is an absurdity, and that time is not of our mind, and has no relations to it whatever.

Then they tell us, "Time is based upon human consciousness," and "what it is outside of us nobody can tell." What is known of this statement? Simply that time is based on nothing. It has no base, but is persistent, like space, matter, and moving,—the four persistent things of nature that have no base, says science, and are the same outside of our consciousness as inside of it. Scholars strangely forget science in their absurd rambles with metaphysics.

Then they tell us, "That all of the laws of nature are but particular ways of stating a primary law which has its origin in our own minds." Could there be anything more absurd than this statement? Can we perceive that the law of gravitation, which makes water run down hill, had its origin in the mind of man? Do they know what they say to be true? They specify the laws that make the change of seasons, and that make the wind blow, as having their origin in our minds. They do not mean words, but the way it is in nature; and Mr. Adler remarks upon it, "Hence, the tremendous assertion which Kant was led to put forth, that we prescribe to nature its laws." And he tells us science, concrete, practical, cautious science, substantiates this. There is such a thing as a person being learned about science without knowing science; and it is often amusing to hear gentlemen attempt to apply science from the stand-points of metaphysics and belles-lettres. Science tells us nature makes its own laws, just as we do ours.

Then, they take up the five senses and interpret them by the same metaphysics, and they say, "There is no other test of anything than the test of reason," or logic. Observation is therefore cut out, the whole universe is consigned to mind as its originator, thus making mind the cause of a snow-storm. And Mr. Adler says, "This was the striking, startling, fruitful thought that was born out of Kant's mind into the ages." And Mr. Adler tries to connect Kant's absurd system with morals, to make it appear useful; but seemingly it is a failure, like every other metaphysical scheme which thinkers, on the basis of ideality, have tried to foist upon the world. Still there is comfort in the maxim, "No one liveth who doeth not more good than harm." CARLOS TEWKSBURY.

A SPIRITUALIST'S VIEW.

Editors of The Index:—

Some of Mr. Potter's closing remarks in his article of January 5 I fully indorse. He says, in substance, that there is one basis on which people of all shades of belief can stand; namely, the admitted fact that a virtuous and useful life here is sufficient preparation for the hereafter.

While I am a firm believer in future life, I perfectly realize that no conception of immortal happiness or occupation can excuse us from the duties of the present time. Let us put our hand on the work of to-day: to-morrow will bring its own. Let us add our best effort to the great work of humanity, thus satisfying the demands of our own conscience and brightening the lives of others. Such a course, to the believer in immortal life, will add new lustre to the glories of the celestial world; and the unbeliever will have done his best, and be worthy of whatever of joy the future holds for him. Surely, every moral, conscientious, reasoning being can work on such a basis as this.

Very truly,
CAIRO, ILL. MRS. JACOB MARTIN.

FROM OREGON.

Mr. H. C. Leiser writes from Forest Grove, Ore.: "There is a good, commodious building in this place, erected from the proceeds of property willed to the Liberals of this community by Mr. William Vert, hence named 'Vert Liberal Hall.' It is a two-story and a half structure near the centre of the place, not far from the Congregational church, and is quite a prominent ornament to this village. It contains a hall that will accommodate from two to three hundred persons. A Masonic Lodge occupies the upper room. Festivals, sociables, and all those entertainments designed to promote human happiness are held here. On the platform, every one can give public expression to his thoughts, whether they be sectarian or liberal, there being no restraint on account of belief. Gratitude is due to Mr. Vert for his munificent gratuity, and thanks to the Liberals of Forest Grove for their good judgment in so applying the means to secure the benefits of the generous gift."

SPECIMEN GLEANINGS FROM OUR CORRESPONDENCE.

Judge E. P. Hurlbut writes: "I am well pleased with The Index, and I wish it long life. But I hope it will not indulge in negation as to the final cause, but only tear down myths and superstitions. I have lived long enough to distrust mere intellection, but summon the whole man rather, compounded of intellect, sentiments, and passions, and make the whole operate together. I have for some time thought that we can find truth from the sentiments as inlets to light. Some may feel a truth as well as perceive it through the reasoning faculties. When Hobbes declared, 'We know that God is,' but neither know nor can know anything more about him, he was under the influence, if I may say so, of a sentimental perception of the supernal Power. So I rather think that Frothingham does well, after getting rid of all the old religions, to pause and see if anything can be found out as to a Sovereign Power 'behind the screen of nature.' I observe that most of our scientists pause here, and do not deny the power."

Sidney Morse says: "Send me another copy of last week's Index. The one received got destroyed before I had hardly seen it. I had, though, read Wasson. Superb! He is a sculptor in words, and does magnificent work. But not the manner so much as the result he reaches interested me: he has an eye beyond the scientists, at the same time giving them a generous recognition on the way."

A lady writes as follows: "I had intended to discontinue at the end of my trial of three months; but it continued to come, and it became more and more interesting. Mr. Adler's sketch of Kant and his philosophy was of great interest. The synthesis of free thought and religion by Mr. Potter excited my attention so much that I desire to read more from his pen on that interesting topic."

J. Francis Ruggles, in renewing his subscription, remarks: "You are making a splendid journal of the immaterial angelic sheet. . . . The setting of the front page in invitingly beautiful large type is a great improvement." The editor of the Evening Item, Portland, Me., says, "I consider The Index the best of all radical journals."

M. Neale writes: "I prize The Index more and more. I think it has been much improved of late."

BOOK NOTICES.

HISTORY OF SPAIN. By James A. Harrison. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.'s "Library of Entertaining History."

This history of a romantic land and people is written in so lively a style, and with so much earnestness and vigor, that its reality reads more like a romance than many novels. While dates, facts, and figures are carefully given, the study of history is still not made a mere dry recapitulation of dates, facts, and figures, but rather an entertaining story, whose scene we grow eager to explore and in whose action we long to have borne a part. Mr. Harrison's glowing style causes event after event to pass in orderly sequence before us with such realistic effect that we feel, on closing the book, as if we had been gazing upon a living panorama of Spanish history. The volume, which comprises over seven hundred pages, is profusely illustrated, though not in the highest style of art; but the pictures will perhaps help to make the history still more interesting to the youthful student.

TENDER AND TRUE. Poems of Love. Selected by the Editor of Quiet Hours, Sunshine in the Soul, etc. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

This little book is a selection of nearly one hundred and fifty of the choicest love poems in our language, including some charming translations from German, French, and Italian sources. These poems are all, as the compiler states, "of a pure and elevated character, and those alone." The book is neatly printed and handsomely bound, and will make a very appropriate gift from a lover to his lady, from a husband to his wife, or vice versa.

AROUND THE HUB. By Samuel Adams Drake. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

This is "A Boy's Book about Boston." Mr. Drake's studies and writing have qualified him amply for making such a book, so far as knowledge of its subject-matter is concerned; and the book itself is convincing that he is able to present his knowledge in such a way as to make it pleasant reading for the boys for whom it is intended. Mr. Drake is a lover of old houses, old manners, old events. The principle of local association is very powerful in his mind. What he attempts in this book is to give a vivid impression of old-time Boston in connection with the most dramatic incidents of its history. The book should have a special interest for Boston boys, but the events reported were of general concern. Boston was America in a nut-shell in the Colonial and Revolutionary times. The illustrations help the interest and instruction very much, and in external appearance the book is all that could be desired.

THE North American Review for February contains five articles. The first, by Prof. Andrew D. White, deals with the political question suggested by recent events in Washington, "Do the Spoils belong to the Victor?" Isaac L. Rice offers "A Remedy for Railway Abuses." Senator John W. Johnson treats of "Repudiation in Virginia." Henry Bergh, with characteristic Don Quixote-ism, denounces vaccination in an article entitled "The Lancet and the Law"; while Prof. Geo. P. Fisher, of Yale, brings up the rear with a calm and elaborate statement of his views on "The Christian Religion." He is less denunciatory, though not much less dogmatic, than Judge Black, but brings forward no new arguments or strikingly original ideas. He concludes by saying, "Should any one be moved to contradict statements in the preceding article, I shall not . . . feel obliged to make reply. I have no fear that candid readers will infer from my silence that the propositions which have been stated above admit of no further defence."

THE Atlantic Monthly for February is received. Among its most timely topics are "Some Traits of Bismarck," by Herbert Tuttle, and an article on "Daniel Webster," by Henry Cabot Lodge. Critic E. P. Whipple criticises the critical Richard Grant White in an admirable essay. The third of the series on the "Origin of Crime in Society" is given. There is also a second interesting instalment of "Studies in the South," by the author of "Certain Dangerous Tendencies in American Life." Whittier has one of his characteristic story-poems, entitled "The Bay of the Seven Islands." Miss Jewett has a short story, and there are two continued stories of interest. The other contents of the magazine are of the usual standard quality.

Most of the articles in the Catholic World generally repay perusal. Its writers particularly excel in the historical and descriptive line. The number for February has a fine table of contents, among which we notice a thoughtful article on "Evolution" from a Catholic stand-point, by W. R. Thompson; an interesting description of the Indian village of Oka in Quebec; the "Discovery of the East Coast of the United States"; and "Some Scottish Superstitions" are described and commented on. In the notices of new publications, Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass is scathingly reviewed.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

EX-TREASURER SPINNER will be eighty years of age in a few days. He is spending the winter in Florida.

PROFESSOR ADLER has gone West for two weeks to fulfil lecture engagements. He has lectures at Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis.

On Sunday, the 22d inst., Mr. Henry Harland, a Cambridge student, spoke in Parker Memorial Hall with much ability and earnestness on "The Utility of Religion," treating his subject from a broad and liberal point of view.

MRS. JENKINS, a sister of N. P. Willis and of "Fanny Fern," died recently in this city. She is said to have "possessed her share of the brilliancy and the intellectual fascinations which characterized the Willis family."

THE one hundred and forty-fifth anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine is to be observed at Paine Memorial Hall in this city by meetings and speeches on Sunday, the 29th, an opera Monday afternoon, and a ball and supper on Monday evening.

DR. J. W. DRAPER leaves five children. Each of his three sons has made an enviable reputation in the walks of science,—Daniel Draper as a meteorologist, John Christopher Draper as a chemist and physiologist, and Henry Draper as an astronomer.

ALEXANDRA, Princess of Wales, is reported to be a model of maternal devotion, exhibiting that feeling in public so far that mother-love is getting to be quite "stylish" among English ladies; and pet poodles in consequence are beginning to feel neglected.

WILLIAM HARRISON AINSWORTH, an English sensational novel-writer, died recently in London at the age of seventy-six. His prosperous career of authorship extended over half a century. He was for a time editor of Bentley's Miscellany, also of Colburn's New Monthly, and contributed to various other magazines.

ANNA DICKINSON, on the evening of January 19, after much newspaper heralding, finally made her appearance on the stage at Rochester, N.Y., in the character of "Hamlet." Although she was enthusiastically applauded and called before the curtain at the end of every act, yet it is conceded that, on the whole, her "Hamlet" was a failure.

EX-GOVERNOR ALEXANDER H. BULLOCK dropped dead from apoplexy in the street at Worcester, on Tuesday, January 18, aged sixty-six. He was governor of this State for three years, from 1865 until 1868. He has not since that time taken much active part in politics. He was a good public speaker, and an active friend to all educational projects.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR is quite æsthetic in his tastes. He sent Alexander H. Stephens recently a basket of rare flowers in token of his remembrance of Mr. Stephens' seventieth birthday, albeit he sent it, by mistake, a month too soon. And he is said to keep the portrait of his dead wife constantly surrounded with fresh flowers renewed every day, which does not look like bringing a mistress to the White House as soon as reported.

THE Birthday Book of the Princess Beatrice, which has had such a rapid and profitable sale, has given of Great Britain on account of its alleged Catholic rise to some strictures by the chronic grumblers tendencies, as shown in the choice of authors quoted therein; but it seems odd, to say the least, to unsectarian thinkers to find George Herbert, Longfellow, Mrs. Hemans, and Adelaide Procter classified among those who are accredited with having Catholic predilections.

PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW writes the Mayor of Portland, Me., that he shall be forced to decline the reception on the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth. He says: "I hardly need assure you, my dear sir, that this mark of consideration from my native city is very gratifying to me, and regret extremely that, on account of ill-health, I am forced to decline the public reception offered me. My physician prescribed absolute rest; and I do not see any chance of my being able to go to Portland in February, so slow is recovery from nervous prostration."

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these, if at all, with great freedom. SELECTIONS.

"A collection of shells is a beautiful and surprising sight,—beautiful, since more exquisite samples of elegance of form and brilliancy of color cannot be found among natural objects; surprising, when we consider that all these durable relics were constructed by soft and fragile animals, among the most perishable of living creatures."

See, what a lovely shell,
Small and pure as pearl,
Lying close to my foot!
Frail, but a work divine;
Made so fairly well
With delicate spire and whorl.
How exquisitely minute!
A miracle of design.

What is it? A learned man
Could give it a clumsy name.
Let him name it who can,
The beauty will be the same.

The tiny cell is forlorn,
Void of the little, living will
That made it stir on the shore.
Did he stand at the diamond door
Of his home, in a rainbow frill?
Did he push, when he was uncurled,
A golden foot or a fairy horn
Through his dim water-world?

—Tennyson.

The soul of music slumbers in the shell,
Till waked and kindled by the master's spell;
And feeling hearts, touch them but rightly, pour
A thousand melodies unheard before.

—Rogers.

Suggestions to Leader.—Snail-shells can be found in abundance at the sea-side at low tide, and the live snails easily secured and kept alive in water. The illustrations in both the text-books used are so good that they will answer very well in place of such specimens as cannot be obtained. Help the members of the group to raise some young snails for themselves as proposed in Zoology, p. 20.

Study 24.—The Animal Kingdom. (Except Man.)
Fish.

The rest of the animal creation come under what class?

Why are they thus called?

So far as we know, what is the lowest order of animal having a back-bone?

In what respects are fishes lower in the scale of creation than birds?

How many kinds of fishes do you know about?

Do fishes have blood?

Are they like cows and horses in this respect?

Why?

Do fishes have lungs?

What do animals breathe for?

How do fishes purify the blood?

What fishes are found in ponds?
What in brooks?
What in salt water?
In what respects do fishes differ?
In what respects are they alike?
In what respects do they differ from other vertebrates?
In what respects are they like other vertebrates?

SELECTIONS.

How all the fishes are dressed out!—those glittering in plate-armor, these only arrayed in their varicolored jerkins, such as no Moorish artist could paint.
—Parker.

Each bay

With fry innumerable swarm, and shoals
Of fish, that with their fins and shining scales
Glide under the green waves.

—Milton.

Our plenteous streams a various race supply:
The bright-eyed perch, with fins of various dye;
The silver eel, in shining volumes rolled;
The yellow carp, in scales bedropt with gold;
Swift trouts, diversified with crimson stains;
And pikes, the tyrants of the watery planes.

—Pope.

The sea's a field of harvest,
Its scaly tribes the grain:
Men reap the teeming waters,
As at home they reap the plain.

—Whittier.

Suggestions to Leader.—Call attention in this study to the fact that we reach here, for the first time, the backbone, which hence forward we shall find as a sort of connecting link in all the higher forms of animal life. Opportunity for securing specimens of fish will depend much upon where one resides. The actual specimen is of course best, good colored representations next best, and the common printed illustrations in Wood's History much better than nothing.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE "Margaret Fuller Society" of Chicago, according to the Religio-Philosophical Journal, is doing honor to its name by the noble efforts of its members to effect some practical good in ameliorating the condition of the working girls in that city.

THE New York Tablet says there is talk among Catholic clericals of the appointment of a representative of the Pope in this country, as the ever-growing necessities of the Church in America seem to demand the residence among us of such a dignitary.

OUT of the thirty-six members composing the general assembly of Utah and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, twenty-eight are practical polygamists, and thirty-two high officials in the Mormon Church, bound by their oaths to obey that church in all things.

JUDGE ZANE, of the Sangamon County Court of the State of Illinois, has rendered a decision that pooling contracts between railroad companies are contrary to the public interests, violations of law, and are therefore null and void. This decision, which is one of great significance, will be contested in the higher courts.

THE Pope declined to comply with the law requiring him to fill up a census paper; but a monsignor filled up the return, showing that five hundred persons, one-third of whom are women, live at the Vatican. This is a large court for a ruler who has no temporal power, and who professes to represent the humble Nazarene who had not where to lay his head.

REV. A. L. BLACKFORD, a Presbyterian missionary at Bahia in Brazil, says of Dom Pedro: "The Emperor of Brazil is nominally a Roman Catholic for State reasons, but is generally understood to be an Infidel or Rationalist of an advanced type. When visiting the Presbyterian Mission School in St. Paulo a year or two ago, he declared very categorically that he was opposed to all religious instruction in schools."

It is reported that the feeling between Prince Bismarck and the Crown Prince, Frederic William, is by no means cordial. And it is further said that the Crown Prince, like a loyal husband of a British Princess, takes an English view of the imperial rescript. As he is not far from the throne, his attitude is of profound interest to Germany; and his views can hardly fail, even while King William lives, to modify the Bismarckian policy.

THE philosopher of the Boston Herald has been observing things recently, which prompts him to remark: "Herbert Spencer loses money, while Oscar Wilde gathers in the shekels by the peck. Emerson has to think twice before buying a rare book, while the successful pork-packer pays $5,000 for counterfeit Murillos. The great philosopher wears darned stockings, and the preacher of absurd superstition has bushels of fancy-worked slippers. Selah!"

THE Christian Statesman comments wisely and well on the fact that some ultra-temperance men of Cedarville, Ohio, recently broke into all the saloons of that place in the middle of the night and destroyed all the liquors they could find in them, the raiders meanwhile being masked to escape detection. The Statesman says, "Upon this good cause [of temperance] they inflicted a deep and lasting injury by the use of unlawful and wicked means. Such outbreaks of violence always establish a reaction in favor of the evil which is thus unlawfully assailed."

A "PROFESSOR" of history having claimed to be the author of the theory that civilization was man's primitive state, the Presbyterian Banner remarks, "We do not think that any man has a right to claim originality in this theory, for the fact is plainly taught in the Bible." The Presbyterian adds: "No one who receives Genesis as a true history can have any doubts about the matter." When freethinkers say this, they are often told by those who want to reconcile science and Scripture that they "don't understand the real meaning of the Mosaic record."

THE "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" is much needed in Montreal, Canada, where the "highly Christian" matron of a "benevolent" institution for orphans is in the habit of punishing the children under her charge, of from three to eighteen years of age, by applying mustard plasters for two hours or more to their chests or back, they meanwhile being tied hands and feet to a chair. Since she is indorsed by "high-toned Christian" ladies in this course, it would not be a bad idea to import some pagan woman with motherly feelings to give her a few lessons in tenderness.

A FINANCIAL crisis has been reached in France. Many of the solid and most conservative business firms have suspended, and wide-spread disaster prevails. For more than a year there has been a stock-gambling mania in France; and the rich with their millions, and the poorer classes with their small earnings, have been drawn into the maelstrom of speculation, and are equally involved in the inevitable results. Joint stock enterprises have floated their nominal capital stock amounting to hundreds of millions, and the most chimerical schemes have been seized upon with avidity by investors. Now, a number of the bubbles having burst and the reaction set in, much suffering and hardship must be experienced, especially by the working classes, before a return to a healthy financial condition can be effected. Germany and England must to some extent feel the effects of this panic.

THE Lord Mayor of London, in consequence of a request signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Manning, Charles Darwin, Matthew Arnold, and Samuel Morley, among others, has called a public meeting at the Mansion House, February 1, to make a protest against the persecution of the Jews in Russia. At a large meeting of Jews at Birmingham on the 22d, a resolution was passed, asking all Jews to unite in a petition to the Czar to grant protection and the rights of citizenship to his Jewish subjects. But the St. Petersburg papers condemn this agitation in England, declare that the government is considering measures for the relief of the Jews, and think the severe strictures of the foreign press only make more perplexing a question already bristling with difficulties.

THE Riforma, one of the most influential journals in Italy, argues that an international guarantee in favor of the Pope such as Bismarck has proposed would constitute a surrender of the Pontiff before the Powers; that, while he is now invulnerable, because he is surrounded materially and morally by Italy, without this protection, he would, under the threat of a removal of the guarantee, be obliged to do what first one and then another of the Powers might desire, and in this way his independence would entirely disappear. This view of the subject is not without force. Many of the Italian writers express the opinion that the Pope is using the proposed international guarantee, with no design of accepting it, only to obtain as much as he can from the government of Italy.

THE Chicago Sabbath Association has unanimously adopted a resolution requesting "the editors of newspapers in this city to use their influence to stop the noise made by newsboys on Sundays, and so favor the enforcement of existing laws upon that subject." Commenting upon this, the Chicago Times says that it is "most earnestly, unalterably, and ferociously opposed to everything in the nature of needless noises on Sunday"; but it does not think that the "musical notes" with which the newsboys arouse sluggards Sunday mornings should be called "noise." "They resemble rather, in their dulcet cadences and pious use, the Turkish muezzin's call to prayer. Let the committee remember how many pious but drowsy Christians would inevitably doze in bed through the hours of morning service in church every Sunday but for the newsboys' cheery summons, and they will applaud rather than condemn so important an aid to piety."

FREE RELIGION AND HERBERT SPENCER.

It was claimed as one of the best compliments ever paid to the Free Religious Association when an Andover theological student wrote to the Springfield Republican that he had attended one of its conventions, and had heard five different definitions of God from as many different speakers. The mere fact that there could be any unity in such variety was a sufficient justification of the society's existence. The theological student could only see the variety; but the fact that sensible men and women came together, year after year, to meet upon a platform so liberal, was a sufficient proof that the unity existed somewhere, and was apparent to the members themselves. And while the fact that they could thus differ without quarrelling was and is the great success of the Association.

Undoubtedly, as time has passed, new speakers and writers have come forward, as they should. The Association has felt the changes in the times. That "civil war in free religion" which Mr. Abbot, with his accustomed acuteness, early pointed out—between those who represented what has been called the transcendental and what has been called the scientific method—has always continued, but has never been sufficiently aggravated to justify the phrase, perhaps too emphatic, by which he described it. Speaking as one classed with the Transcendentalists, I am unable to see that our liberties have been invaded or even threatened; and if the apparent tendency of the Association has of late been rather away from us—away from the so-called "intuitive" habit and toward the so-called "scientific," it only represents the predominant phase of the times. For one, I am not afraid of this tendency, nor can I regard its existence as conclusive. I have already lived long enough to see the passing away of several successive stars, each one of which seemed in its season to enlighten the whole world,—in the days when Coleridge was in the zenith, for instance, or Cousin or Comte or Mill, or, if you please, Emerson. After all, these seeming triumphs are often temporary; and the real safety is to be found in free discussion and in giving the advocates of each school their say. Occupying this possibly inglorious middle ground, my chief desire is that all sides should be fairly represented; and, as perhaps the trouble is that the "Transcendentalists" have let their side go too much by default of late it may be well to say a word or two from that point of view.

I heard it said, the other day, that, whatever The Index might once have been, it is now simply "the gospel according to Herbert Spencer." It might be enough, in answer to this, to point to the papers of Mr. Wasson, and to the general tone of those by the senior editor. But Mr. Spencer furnishes so good a test of the real breadth and liberality of The Index and of the Free Religious Association itself, that the remark should not thus easily be passed by. On looking among the Vice-Presidents of the Association, one is struck by the fact that their list includes the name of a gentleman who has done more than any one else to extend the fame and influence of Mr. Spencer in this country, and indeed, by reaction, in his own. But we should also notice that the list contains the names of two writers who have been frankly criticised by this very gentleman for their non-appreciation of Mr. Spencer. As I am one of these last-named, it is certainly very fitting that I should point to these facts as well illustrating the "unity in variety" of our Association. Knowing the great and stimulating influence of Herbert Spencer's writings on a large class of minds, I am very willing to see him held up in almost every number of The Index as one of the greatest thinkers of the human race; nor is any wrong involved, so long as those of us who cannot concede to him this position are allowed an equal freedom. And this has certainly been the case thus far.

However, lest there should be any doubt as to this freedom, it may be well to exemplify it by exercising it every now and then. Why not, for instance, carry frankness a little farther, and own that not only does Mr. Spencer fail to impress me individually as a great thinker, but he seems, in spite of all his merits, to be a writer somewhat dangerous to a large class of minds? This is said with entire personal regard, from the point of view of one who agrees with some of his conclusions, has read many of his writings, has had one or two very pleasant personal interviews with him, and has seen him play billiards at the Athenæum Club in London,—“and to do him justice,” as the æsthetic maidens in the play say of Bunthorne's reading, “he did it very well.” In spite of all these propitiating circumstances, he still seems to me a dangerous writer, not so much from any conclusions he draws as from his settled habits of mind,—dangerous, not when read as one of many authors by those who have read a good many books, but when accepted, as he often is among us, for a main guiding influence, by young and untrained intellects. This view will seem very unjust to many readers of The Index, but the reasons for it can easily be given.

I was once talking about Mr. Spencer with an eminent English historian, a man of singular candor and courage, and he made this remark: “I will not say of him as Master Jowett of Balliol [the translator of Plato] once said, that his writings are rubbish; but I will say that he seems to me utterly destitute of the knowledge of what historical evidence means. He has a theory, and, if he finds anywhere a statement of fact which makes for that theory, he adopts it; and it makes no difference to him whether the fact has been laboriously established by the most competent authority or whether it is the stray observation of some anonymous and irresponsible man in a corner of a newspaper. No matter,—it goes in just the same, and is equally counted as a corner-stone. There could not possibly be a greater contrast than between the mental habits of Mr. Spencer, in this respect; and those of Mr. Darwin.”

This remark states, better than I could state it, what seems to me the besetting weakness of Mr. Spencer's method. Perhaps the best formula for it would be that his mental habits are primarily those of the literary man, but that he habitually assumes the attitude of a scientific man. It seems to me that what he calls arguments are often only re-statements. What he cites as proofs are only illustrations. In place of the magnificent patience of Darwin, pointing out for himself the gaps or lacunae of his argument,—experimentalizing or investigating with enormous pains, and verifying each fact as if his whole theory rested upon it,—we have a sort of ready and versatile self-confidence, plunging on through seas of details with perfect certainty that every problem is now to be easily solved, and that a few general theories are enough for everything. I myself am particularly struck with these characteristics when he deals with history and sociology, because my own studies have lain more in that direction; but I am told by good biologists that it is much the same in biology, and Dr. William James has certainly shown that he deals in much the same way with psychology. Now, whatever may be a man's services, whatever his wealth of information or his fertility of illustration, this habit of mind seems to me very dangerous as soon as he takes the attitude of a man of science. And it is because I see, or fancy that I see, this same habit very apparent in some of his most prominent American disciples, and most conspicuous, as is natural, among those who are youngest and have had least general training, that it seems worth while to make this criticism occasionally, even if it is only set down as a part of the “consensus of the incompetent.”

If it be said that, in spite of all this, Darwin himself has highly complimented Herbert Spencer, I should say, what I have more than once heard said in England,—that Darwin habitually carries his noble modesty almost to excess; and that, as used often to be said of our own Emerson, he is always liable to overrate those who take his own thoughts, and reproduce them in a more plausible and showy manner. At any rate, to end where I began, it is certain that “Free Religion” is something more than a “gospel according to Herbert Spencer,” since it includes among its adherents not merely his loving students and admirers, but others who perhaps underrate him as much as I do.

T. W. HIGGINSON.

[LONDON, New Year's Day, 1882.]

This morning the sun rose gloriously, and a great many people breathed freer than for a long time past. Some few years ago, an Englishman now living conceived the sorry notion of writing doggerel verses about the Crystal Palace, Disraeli, steam, and other modern matters, and pretending that they had been uttered by a woman of the fifteenth century, “Mother Shipton.” The only prediction in this nonsense was that falsified by this morning's dawn over the mental darkness in which the Shipton owl hooted to the last,—“In 1881, the world unto an end shall come.” In 1880, I was with some friends in Northampton, Mass., when some fanatic went about throwing in at door or window printed warnings of the end of the world, based upon Mother Shipton. The forgery, soon after it was printed, was detected by the literary weeklies of London, and confessed by the forger; but the masses do not read the literary journals: they do, however, read their Bibles and tracts, in which it is declared that the world is to be burnt up. On the edge of Glasgow there is a sunken common where the city filth has long accumulated, until it is some yards thick. About six months ago, it caught fire, and has been burning ever since. All efforts to extinguish this Glasgow Gehenna have failed, and there is an apprehension that the fire may communicate with the great formation of coal on which the city is built. It is a fair type of the way in which theology has imported the rubbish of the ancient Gehenna to be the substratum of Christian society, and the danger which follows when modern mental rubbish is ignited just above it. I read in an American paper that, during the forest fires in Michigan, some believed that Mother Shipton's prophecy had come true, and rushed into the flames. In this country, a mother cut her child's throat and her own after reading the Shipton doggerel; and last month a little girl, who could talk of nothing else, was found dead in her bed from sheer fright. The London Despatch said last year, on one of these tragedies, that the forger should be tried for murder; but what of the clergy who over every grave declare the approaching end of the world, and preserve the vast mass of combustible superstitions against which Charles Hindley scratched his miserable match?

While Christianity has imported some of the Jerusalem rubbish, it has still more turned good Jewish ideas into rubbish by taking them from their time and place. The ram's horn and the two silver trumpets, which ushered in the Jewish New Year, signified the annual judgment day in which Israel believed. The ram's horn denoted remembrance that bodily human sacrifices had passed away when a ram was accepted for Isaac. Christianity withdrew the ram, and substituted an "only son" once more. With what results one may know, if he will reflect how many human sacrifices (sacrifices of reason, health, charity) have gone to render possible the offering up of Edith Freeman and President Garfield. The annual judgment day in which the Jews believed is nearer the truth than the indefinite doomsday of Christian superstition. Every day is, indeed, a judgment day, wherein man reaps what he has sown, and new truth sentences old error; but there are eras in history, worlds of belief and feeling, that come to an end, others that come into existence. No clock strikes as they go or come. They come and go "without observation." But ought it to be so? Surely, men ought to be able to recognize the great eras as they arise: the ram's horn of the past and silver trumpet of the present, and one as silvery of the future, ought to be clearly heard; and men ought not to have to define ages of faith or renaissance or reformation only through the perspective of centuries.

One silver voice which had so long been audible even across the Atlantic, with its brave triumphal tones, has, it is reported, lately been uttering broken notes; and these have been confused with the blatant ram's horns of the Christian species. At this distance, however, the music can be heard above the noise; and, though it is in the minor key, it tells of a world of dogmas which has come to an end. There is no need of pulling it down any more: it is down. It is now in order to study it, as we study the myths and systems of Greece and India, with a certain sympathy, and kindly construction, such as one puts upon a life that is ended. Nay, more: one may well recognize that this past religious world attained in its day a power over mankind which has hardly yet been dreamed of by the baby religion of the new world, now in its manger. The world is practically without a religion which can curb human passions and selfishness as they were largely curbed by superstitious terrors. Those fears fled, laughed at, it is too soon to expect men to put faith in the power of the infant religion which has neither threat nor bribe. But this interval of scepticism will close, and the world presently be startled by the miracles of love incarnate in science.

Just what Mr. Frothingham said,—which his interviewer understood to be that "revealed religion, as we called it, is stronger here and in Europe than it was twenty years ago,"—I do not know. Assuredly, the statement must have been surrounded with well-weighed words, which the interviewer did not take into account. But I have observed in American quarters the prevalence of impressions on this subject which are certainly fallacious. My friend Dr. Crooks, President of Drew College, made an eloquent speech in the Methodist Ecumenical Conference in London of the same kind. He said that the believers in supernaturalism now belonged to the ascending party, and mentioned that, while rationalistic Tübingen is empty, the Orthodox theological schools of Germany are full. But the facts are misread. Tübingen is empty, because the rationalists have travelled much further than Tübingen. Other theological schools are full, because many of them have overtaken Tübingen. Strauss and Baur have abdicated in favor of Haeckel and Büchner. The scientific and philosophical departments of the German Universities are now doing the work of rationalistic divinity schools. The German Orthodox theological schools are well filled, because young men may in them obtain a special training in Hebrew and Biblical learning, which is useful to them in various branches of scholarly work; but there is a large proportion of students in them, who by no means carry their culture to the Church. Free thought has to avail itself of much of the old apparatus. I myself have several times advised young free thinkers to study in the Manchester New College of London, where they can secure a knowledge of Hebrew and other things important to their critical work without subscribing to any creeds. Throughout Europe, the churches have so far succumbed to the advance of science and criticism that the prosperity of their theological schools is evidence that anti-supernaturalism is substantially victorious in Europe. One need only observe the state of things in France to realize the immense progress of free thought in Europe. Gambetta, who in a recent speech proclaimed his belief that Auguste Comte was the greatest religious thinker of the century, is Premier of France; and Paul Bert, a man of science and thorough free thinker, is his Minister of Education and Public Worship. Renan and Reville are the chief instructors of youth. In England, it is notorious that heresy prevails in the universities. The works of Darwin, Huxley, and Herbert Spencer are in the obligatory course of them all. Professor Huxley was recently offered the Mastership of University College, Oxford, vacated by the appointment of Dr. Bradley to the Dean of Westminster. Cambridge not long ago conferred its LL.D. on Darwin amid demonstrations of honor never before known in an English university.

Not very long ago, an effort was made to form a sort of Free Religious Association in London. There was a large and influential conference of several days in South Place Chapel. As a result of it, a committee was formed under the Presidency of Professor Huxley. Among its members were John Morley, Leslie Stephen, A. J. Ellis, Professor Carpenter, Professor Drummond, Frederick Pollock, Rhys Davids, and G. J. Holyoake. The committee met at Professor Huxley's residence, and carefully considered whether they should attempt a large organization. The question was, What could we do? It then appeared that there was no reason to organize liberal lectures, for London was full of them; nor to publish a new journal or magazine, for there were plenty of such (Fortnightly, Nineteenth Century, Mind, Westminster, Contemporary, Modern Thought, National Reformer, Secular Review, etc.) anxious to print all that cultured free thinkers could write. There was literally no waiting work to supply a raison d'être for such an organization as was thought of, simply because London was itself already an association of liberal thinkers, so far as it was thinking at all. The committee thereupon dissolved (though we shall probably hold annual conferences of liberal thinkers).

The fact is, Americans, being happily without a State Church, are liable to be deceived in regard to the progress of free thought in Europe. They are apt to look to see it take the form of disestablishment of State Churches. But it does not take that form, and probably never will. It is steadily converting the established churches, secularizing them, humanizing them. Free thinkers do not intend that the magnificent endowment of Christianity in Europe shall be frittered away, but that it shall be preserved and transmitted as a bequest certain to fall into their own hands at last. In England, already more than half of the resources bequeathed by the past for masses and ceremonies are now bestowed on promotion of scholarship, science, and charity. The whole of it will surely be secularized. Whatever may be said of the type of religion steadily and swiftly forming in England, it is certainly not of any kind that can be called "Revealed Religion," except in a highly rationalized phraseology. Nor do I believe it to be otherwise in other countries. I lately conversed with Dr. Sterry Hunt (just made LL.D. at Cambridge) and Mr. Thomas Davidson (author of the remarkable paper on Rosmini in the Fortnightly Review for November), both of whom have been sojourning in Italy, where they are intimately acquainted with the most eminent men in the universities and in the State. They assure me that the phenomena of free thought in France are, if anything, surpassed by those of Italy. Biblical studies there as elsewhere are industriously pursued, but largely because of their relation to archæology, orientology, and mythology. It must not be forgotten that a certain theological training is as necessary for Renan, De Gubernatis, and Max Müller, as for Canon Lightfoot and Dörner. On the whole, while the popularity of error would be nothing in its favor, my impression is that the verdict of (unsurprised) thought in Europe has long ago been returned against "Revealed Religion," and that its symbols are, with few exceptions, maintained only by those retained for their defence or by those whose untaught prejudices unfit them to be jurors in the case.

The religious nature of man will doubtless continue, notwithstanding its explanation by psychological and ethical science. What if the deities vanish? They were but faltering names for facts that remain. The future will evolve a conception of deity better than any of them. I look to see the mighty forces and elements which Zeus and Yahweh brandished so pitilessly, wielded by man; the tamed thunderbolt held in the grasp of a heart; the remorseless laws made flesh and dwelling among us, full of love and truth.

M. D. CONWAY.

THE ASSASSIN'S TRIAL ENDED.

Guiteau will doubtless be hung. The long trial, which has been even more unprecedented in character than in length, has severely taxed the proverbial patience of the American people. But it has ended in a verdict that speaks the sentiment of the American people with hardly an exception. Whether capital punishment be believed in or not, it is hardly possible that any person of unprejudiced mind, who has followed the daily record of the tedious trial, should not accept the jury's verdict that the assassin was legally guilty of the murder of President Garfield. Many citizens may wish that the law were such that even a criminal like Guiteau could be punished in some other way than by hanging; but few, very few, will question that the verdict is in just accordance with the facts. The intelligence, gravity, and sense of moral responsibility evidently possessed by the jury have been remarked by all who have attended the trial. Whatever may have to be said of certain features of the case, official and otherwise, which have certainly been of a most humiliating character,—closing the great national tragedy with a farce,—the conduct of the jury throughout has been an honor to the court-room. They have listened patiently to the ranting of the prisoner as well as to the testimony of the witnesses and the arguments of counsel for over two months; have been themselves virtual though well treated prisoners during that period; have kept strictly to their oaths, and read not a newspaper nor had any communication with the outside world for all that time, except an occasional visit to their families in company with a bailiff; and, hence they have come, it may be said with certainty, to their unanimous conclusion strictly on the evidence of the case.

Of course with the jury, as with the outside public, the question what should be the verdict has turned entirely on the question whether Guiteau was insane or not. And, on this question of insanity, the trial has proved the soundness of the verdict beyond the possibility of a rational doubt. Nor on this question can it be said that the jury or the American people in general had any prejudice. If it could have been shown on the 2d of last July that President Garfield had been shot by a raving madman, who had broken loose from a lunatic asylum or must be at once placed in one to prevent his assaults on other persons, it would have been under the awful calamity the greatest relief possible to the country. Dreadful as was the deed, we should yet have all rejoiced that no one could be held morally or legally responsible for it, and that the only thing the law had to do was simply what humanity required, to put the unfortunate lunatic under physical restraint. There would then have been no question of guilt, only of safety; no question of ignominious shame to the republic, but only of means for repairing as well as possible the inevitable public disaster; no question of any political responsibility, direct or indirect, behind the assassin, but only of possible methods for insuring the safety of high officials against the frenzy of lunatics. But, unfortunately, no such happy solution of the problem was possible. Doubts were indeed raised as to whether the assassin might not be insane, hopes were entertained that he might prove so; but his own lucid statement of his deliberate purpose and plan in the monstrous deed, and his conduct immediately afterward, either at once dispelled these hopes and doubts, or left them on that uncertain border-line between sanity and insanity, which could only be determined by fuller evidence. That fuller evidence has been furnished by the trial, and is complete. It has been furnished more by Guiteau's own conduct than by the expert testimony against him, strong as some of this has been. The decision of the court and the District-Attorney to allow him that wide latitude of speech which, while it made wretched fun for coarse minds congregated in the court-room, disgusted the general public, and risked bringing the trial into general contempt, has accomplished the purpose designed: it has demonstrated to the jury as to the public the condition of Guiteau's mind. And the demonstration is that, though he is mentally and morally a badly balanced character,—more so morally than mentally,—impulsive, passionate, vituperative, arrogant, and inordinately self-conceited, he is yet entirely sane enough to be regarded as morally and legally accountable.

It is probable that the jury would have come to this conclusion, as the public so generally has done, even without the charge of the presiding judge. But Judge Cox's charge was so admirably lucid and strong, not only in summing up and setting in its proper legal light the evidence, but in stating the principles involved in the relation of insanity to moral and legal responsibility, that no doubt could have been left in any juror's mind that his own common-sense in the matter had pointed to the right decision. The ability of the charge, indeed, will go very far to atone for the previous weaknesses of the court.

It is a paper that ought to be read by every American citizen who has come to years of discretion. There is doctrine in it that is needed quite as much in books of ethics and in the teachings of pulpits as in treatises of law. With great clearness, Judge Cox draws the all-important line of "distinction between mental and moral obliquity; between the mental incapacity to distinguish between right and wrong and the moral insensibility to that distinction." He allows no room for the notion of "moral insanity,"—that mischievous phrase which has latterly been coming into vogue as a screen for wickedness. He declares that insanity is always a mental disease; that when total, or of such character that all exercise of reason is wanting and there is no recognition of persons and things in their normal relations, it then incapacitates its victims from distinguishing between right and wrong, and renders them irresponsible. But partial insanity may exist without destroying moral responsibility. "A man," he says, "does not take leave of his passions by becoming insane. He might retain as much control over them as in health." The charge also makes another valid distinction, specially applicable to the Guiteau case, between "an insane delusion, the coinage of a diseased brain, which defies reason," and a belief, however monstrously irrational, to which the mind might work itself by a process of reasoning, though on incomplete premises. With the former, moral responsibility for an act resulting from the delusion does not exist. But the latter is one of "those vagaries of opinion" which the law does not interfere with, so long as they remain in the region of speculation merely, but for which, when they lead to illegal action, "the law has no accommodation, and which furnish no excuse whatever for crime." "When men reason," says Judge Cox, "the law requires them to reason correctly, so far as their practical duties are concerned." These are noble statements of principles, which it is to be hoped may go into the permanent jurisprudence of the country. But their application reaches much farther than the courts of law. They cut under the foundation of a good many theological claims and of not a little of so-called liberal philosophy.

An appeal from the verdict which followed this charge is to be attempted, but there is no probability of reversing it. "Guilty as indicted" was the verdict; and "guilty as indicted," in due process of law, the assassin will be led to the gallows to pay with his life the legal penalty for the life he took. If any man ever deserved this punishment, he deserves it. And, so long as the law stands as it does, we could not conscientiously lift a finger to exempt him from it. None the less, the law inflicting capital punishment is a relic of barbarism, and a needless blot of inhumanity on any State that retains it. Even Guiteau might be put to better use than hanging. Let him be set to hard labor, away from the sight of mankind, for the rest of his life, that at last he may earn his own bread and something for others.

But a more serious question presses than how to dispose of this one wretched criminal. It is easy enough for this great nation to rid itself of him. But what of the causes of which he was the result? You cannot hang them on any gallows. Individually and solely responsible though he was for the crime for which he goes to death, yet such characters as he do not spring alone into being nor into crime. Black as is his guilt, he is yet one of the human race, a part of the organism of human society, a fellow-man. As such his fellow-men have had duties to him as well as he to them. When society shall have dismissed him from the life he has only dishonored, let it consider the question whether even he might not have been better trained; and, before people shall hasten to wash from their memories his shameful name, let them solemnly ask themselves what duties they owe to society to prevent the possible Guiteaus of the future.

WM. J. POTTER.

At a banquet given in honor of veteran soldiers at Rome, the Mayor of the city declared that the people of Rome would rather see the city laid in ashes than again subject to papal domination.

THE DANGER OF "EMOTIONAL PRODIGALITY."

I wish to say a word of response to Mrs. Spencer's valuable article on "Emotional Prodigality." She has presented truths of great importance. The demand which emotion makes upon the nervous system is little understood, and many a well-meaning mother is afraid her child will be hurt by study, but delights in the development of his or her sensibilities by music, poetry, passionate stories, or intense social enjoyments.

Women physicians have much opportunity of seeing the evil wrought on both children and adults by the excess of emotional development, and have uttered wise warnings in regard to it.

Free Religionists have a duty here in reference to the common forms of religious expression. The higher class of nurses and nursery girls are often sweet, refined women, of sincere and beautiful religious feeling. But they have been trained in superstitious forms of faith; and they express themselves to the children in their charge in language which, from custom, has often lost its intensity of meaning to them, but which comes to the child's imagination with all the vividness of a new impression.

The "blood of Christ" has ceased to have a sanguinary meaning to those who have heard the phrase at least every Sunday of their lives, but to the child it suggests untold physical agony and horror. The Liberal parent, fearing to deprive her child of the sweetness and beauty of religious feeling which she sees in the nurse, hesitates to forbid the use of such language; and an impression is made on the imagination, which may never be effaced. The Devil is a harmless personage to those who have used the word lightly all their lives, but what is a young child's first conception of this dreadful being? "The all-seeing eye of God" has become a perfect terror to a sensitive child, who could not enlarge the thought into the beneficence of ever-present love and law.

But, while I would lay the emphasis very strongly against over-exciting and over-stimulating the affectional and emotional side of children, which seems to me the dangerous tendency at present, it must not be forgotten that it is a part of human nature which needs healthy nourishment, training, and exercise, and that the child whose affections and imagination are not exercised upon proper objects will be especially liable to suffer at last from passionate and abnormal action. It is the part of religion to order and harmonize these varying faculties.

A REQUEST FOR INFORMATION.

Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, who is collecting facts relating to Free Religious interests in Massachusetts for use of the Free Religious Association, earnestly asks the co-operation of all Liberals in the State. The name, membership, bond of union, or purpose of organization, methods of work, schemes of instruction for adults or children, and any other information regarding every society or "committee" of Liberals in Massachusetts is solicited. Any radical Unitarian church, debating society, lecture committee, progressive Jewish congregation, Liberal "Friends," Spiritualist association, or any other type of liberal movement, is specially desired to report itself as freely as possible to Mrs. Spencer at Florence, Mass. An early reply is solicited, as the returns must be made by the third week of February. It is also desired that places where there is a strong liberal element, at present unorganized, may be heard from through some interested friend. Also, any facts of religious controversy in public schools or libraries, or any legal discriminations on religious grounds, or any other items of importance in making an accurate estimate of liberal or illiberal sentiment in Massachusetts, would be thankfully received.

CORRECTION FROM MR. CHADWICK.

Editors of The Index :—

Hardly anything else makes me so proud of my chirography as your success in printing from my manuscript with almost never a mistake. Therefore, it seems all the more queer that you should have converted (in my article on Thomas Paine) the well-known epithet of Carlyle, "the rebellious needle-man," an allusion to Paine's early trade of stay-making, to "the rebellious middle-man," and that where I wrote "his God was a huge mechanician" you printed "a huge mechanism."

Yours truly, JOHN W. CHADWICK.

[We have to apologize also, with regrets, for mystifying our readers as to what Professor Gunning meant, in the closing sentence of his sprightly article, by "vernacular" where he wrote "vermicular."—ED.]

EDITORIAL NOTES.

IN this week's Index, our readers will welcome with us Colonel Higginson back to its columns. We hope he will continue to exercise his rights in the same way, notwithstanding that, with his accustomed frankness, he acknowledges himself as no disciple of Herbert Spencer. Neither is The Index, except on the principle of hearing all and trying to hold fast that which is good. Mr. M. D. Conway's second article of his series of contributions will also find its ready readers. But, as having even more vital concern to the interests of the liberal religious movement than the able articles of these distinguished writers, we venture to commend to an attentive reading the addresses at the anniversary meeting of Professor Adler's Society in New York. We hope especially that persons of evangelical belief, who may chance to look at this number of our paper, will read these speeches, and that also all liberal thinkers, who may find their faith wavering and their zeal growing cold, will read them. We confess that our own enthusiasm for the cause we have tried these many years to serve has been rekindled and our conviction deepened by the words of these younger men. To those who deny that free and rational views of religion can arouse the spirit of enthusiastic consecration, we say, Read these addresses, if you can, without feeling your whole nature stirred into active sympathy with the loftiest aims and moved to do some nobler service. To those who ask for the affirmative, nutritive, practical side of the Free Religious movement at this time, we say, Find it in these addresses. Here, in the lifting of morality to be a religion, is the new contribution to moral progress which the critics of the movement sometimes call for; here, a definition of "the practical interests of pure religion," which may clear up to some inquiring minds that phrase in the constitution of the Free Religious Association. SPECIAL PREMIUMS.—Every new subscriber to The Index for one year at the regular price $3, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B.

Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

THE Chicago Times, referring to two of the experts who testified during the Guiteau trial, remarks: "Mr. Davidge noticed that both of these men denied the existence of the Deity, or rather neither of them believed in a God. If his mentioning this fact was intended as a commentary on the credibility of their testimony, it was without pertinence. That they did not believe in a God does not warrant the presumption that they would lie; and it is unfortunately true that there are believers not only in the Deity, but in literal hell-fire, whose word is not reliable."

MOSES HULL, once an advent preacher, now a spiritualist lecturer, but in bad repute among Spiritualists on account of his coarse defence of free-love and his avowed free-love practices, writes to the Investigator that there is to be a Paine celebration at Linesville, Pa., that he is among the speakers engaged, and that there is an invitation "to Liberals everywhere to be present, and to ministers in good standing in their own denomination to come and point out our errors." It is not exactly clear why the invitation to ministers is limited to those "in good standing," when no such limitation is applied to "liberal" speakers.

JASPER, the colored preacher, says: "One white man in Washington tried to catch me, but he didn't. He got up in the congregation, and said, 'I would like to ask you a question.' 'Ask it on,' said I. 'You say, the sun rises and the sun sets: now, where does it go?' I immediately referred him to the first chapter, fifth verse of Ecclesiastes, where it says that the sun ariseth and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to the place where he rose. Then, all the audience applauded me, and clapped their hands." This answer evidently satisfied the audience, silenced the inquirer, and increased the admiration felt for the eloquent expounder of the divine oracles. And there was as much reason for the demonstration which followed this reply as there is in the applause that sometimes greets the utterances of orators some hundreds of miles north of Washington.

WE clip the following from the Chicago Herald concerning Unity Church and Mr. Miln. The discourse alluded to we shall print in The Index next week. The editorial from which we take this extract is headed "A Free Church":—

The cause of rational religion and advanced thought is fortunate in the turn of affairs by which Unity Church is relieved of the prospect of losing its pastor, Mr. George C. Miln. The acceptance of his resignation would at once have left a large and important church organization without a head, and taken from the ministry in Chicago a man of whose sort it has none too many. At the same time there is reason to be glad that the resignation was offered. Without the free interchange of views which it occasioned, there would not have come about such an understanding between church and pastor as made the delivery of Sunday's sermon upon "The Past of the Church" a possible thing. The sermon in question sounded a most significant note of departure in religious discussion from the pulpit. Dating from yesterday, Chicago will have a church in which the highest and clearest freedom of speech will rule, in which questions of theological assent or dissent and questions of ism will be comparatively let alone, where the ethics of morality will form the staple of cultivation rather than the formalities of creed. . . . The congregation over which Mr. Miln presides is probably but little in advance of the thought and feeling of many other congregations here and elsewhere.

But it has had the courage to permit an expression of its mind which may be looked upon as marking a new departure in church life.

MISS CLARA BARTON last May organized a branch of the philanthropic society known in Europe as the "Red Cross of Geneva," the object of which is to take care of sick and wounded soldiers in time of war. Its members and nurses are women. For its usefulness during the Franco-Prussian war, it received the thanks of Emperor William. A large number of the European governments have signed a treaty, recognizing the neutrality of its flag and providing for the protection of its officers, ambulances, and stores. Miss Barton asks that this society receive from Congress the same kind of recognition it has received from governments on the other side of the Atlantic. Mrs. Money, wife of the Mississippi Congressman, and other ladies, have organized a society under the name of the "Blue Anchor," the object of which is thus stated: "In the yellow-fever districts of the South, the insect-infected part of the West, in cases of great fires, floods, or other calamities, we wish to be known as an active, energetic, organized body, recognized as competent and responsible women ready and waiting to render assistance of every kind. We desire to have auxiliary branches in each State, which, in time of need, will be the receiver and disbursing of whatever money or goods may be collected or donated for the benefit of the distressed section." The ladies of the "Blue Anchor" think their society entitled to precedence on the plea that it includes the mitigation of suffering under a great variety of circumstances, in peace and in war, and that it proposes to begin the work of charity at home. They intend to ask Congress to increase the pay of the members of the Life Saving Service. There seems to be a needless rivalry between the leaders of these praiseworthy movements. Congress certainly can guarantee the neutrality of the flag of the society in which Clara Barton is specially interested without disregarding the claims of the benevolent ladies of the "Blue Anchor."

THE aim of The Index has been, and will continue to be, to give in its columns a fair and impartial hearing to all sides of any question pertinent to its avowed objects, so long as its correspondents make their statements or objections in courteous language and with due regard to the limits of the paper. Necessarily then, in turn, most of our readers will be confronted in our pages with opinions adverse to, as well as coincident with, their own. The majority of thinkers understand, expect, and prefer that such should be the case; but there is also among our readers an occasional impatient spirit, who, having to his own satisfaction probed to the bottom of a question and fully made up his mind in regard to all its pros and cons, gets out of temper at what he considers stupidity, ignorance, or wilful misrepresentation on the part of some objector to his views, and thereupon straightway pens an angry or sarcastic protest to the supposed-to-be omniscient editors. Now, we wish to remind our friends that we also have our own pet opinions and predilections, and yet in the cause of justice we are often obliged to give a fair hearing and representation of the theories and facts offered by those who have arrived at conclusions diametrically opposed to our own. Should we refuse to do so, we would then, and with reason, give offence to all our justice-loving readers, and to our own conscience as well. So we ask these impulsive ones to "possess their souls in patience" when they stumble on anything in our columns from which they dissent, while we shall go on in the even tenor of our way, trying not to grow "weary in well-doing."

The Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 2, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

AS IN A DREAM.

Up through the cool and glooming air,
The huge, broad-shouldered mountain looms,
And o'er it burns the evening star.
The ponderous and granite blocks
Seem light and airy as the clouds
That softly dash against their sides,—
The thin and rich and nervous cloud
The shapeless and the troubled clouds,
That gliding by in noiseless flight
Look backward as they move,
And lift imploringly their ghostly hands.
Far up the side a laborer toils,—
The red fire burning thin and clear
Beside him in the evening air,
The puffs of white dust following
Each slow and weary hammer-stroke.
At once all shows as in a dream:
As in a dream the clouds sail by,
The laborer toils, the red fire burns,
And through the cool and glooming air
The huge, broad-shouldered mountain looms.
Now stands the uncouth laborer
A god confessed; dark Brahma's son,
Incorporated in space and masked in time,
Here grandly toils and sweetly sings,
And faint and far the cliffs among
I hear the echoes of his song:

Song of the Laborer.

Fathomless, mystical, deep
Is our home in the sky.
Of rock seems our Father's breast;
Is it fire that gleams through his eye?

We know not and care not to know.
If fire be fire, yet love is love;
Hard be the rock, yet soft is the heart,
And glows with a warmth from above.

Loose we the beautiful, terrible cord,
Untwist we the threads of anguish and joy,
Out of the crucible pour we the ore,
Pure and refined from its dross and alloy.

Long is the task, but sure the reward,
For backward the wheels roll never;
Forward with God, who goes with us
In ceaseless, courageous endeavor.

ADDRESSES

In honor of the Fourth Anniversary of the Founding of the Relief Works of the Society for Ethical Culture, delivered in Chickering Hall, New York, Sunday, January 8, 1882.

On the stage were seated Prof. Felix Adler; to his right, Mr. Wm. M. Salter; to his left, Mr. Henry Harland; and, in the seats around the organ, the members of the Ethical Class, who on that day joined with the regular choir in singing a song entitled "The City of Light," written by Prof. Adler, the music being composed for the occasion by Reinhold C. Herman.

PROFESSOR ADLER.—We celebrate to-day the fourth anniversary of the founding of our Relief Works. Whatever vitality the Society for Ethical Culture may have possessed before that time, however earnestly we may have planned from the very beginning of our existence as a society the work upon whose execution we have since entered, the founding of the Relief Works was the first practical token of the new direction in religious aspiration which we propose to follow, and from it therefore may be dated the second birth, as it were, of our society. It gives me great pleasure to introduce to you, on such an occasion, a friend for whose clear thought and penetrating judgment I entertain the most sincere respect, and whose name is destined, as I think, to become ere long widely known among those who are favorable to progress and liberty in religion. Born and educated in the faith of Orthodox Christianity, for four years a student in the theological seminaries of Yale and Harvard Colleges, then for well-nigh a year hard at work at the University at Göttingen, Mr. Wm. M. Salter gradually developed out of the limits of his early teachings, his mind reached out for larger and still larger truth, until to-day— But he himself will tell us where he stands to-day, and I need not assure him that we shall listen with eager, sympathetic interest to his words.

Address of Wm. M. Salter.

I am glad to be here on this anniversary occasion, and to partake in your rejoicings. I am glad of this opportunity to pay my tribute of honor to the Society for Ethical Culture, and to him who stands before the world as its leader and head.

Two thoughts press for utterance in view of the facts of your existence and activity; namely, that Liberalism has not before it only that career of increasing individualism and disintegration which its enemies have predicted for it, and, second, that the doctrines of the churches are not the indispensable support of the moral life. We might logically work out such conclusions, apart from our knowledge of the workings of this society; we might have a deep confidence that the moral forces residing in the human breast, whatever its intellectual outlook, would sooner or later assert themselves afresh. But we have not to-day to indulge in a process of reasoning or to cherish a confidence, but to own and take joy in a fact, which is that in you the moral forces inherent in liberal as in all other men have asserted themselves, that they already make a basis of union, and that before you lies a future, not in which each shall have his own and a different thought from his fellow, and each follow his own way, but in which there shall be, along with all legitimate and proper individual differences, a common hope, a common purpose, and a common joy.

The fountains of our being, the fountains of all true religion, are moral. This ordinary secular liberalism is apt to forget; and this the churches, so far as they teach the supreme importance of certain theological doctrines, are still more forgetting. The services of modern liberalism are indeed hardly to be overestimated. It has freed the human mind, it has removed from the ground the low growth of superstition, and made room for the larger and more commanding views of the world and human life, that are slowly but surely taking their place. It has removed other hindrances, industrial, political, to human progress. That whereby life has become grander to the thought, and richer in all outward ways, to us now than it was to those who lived two or three centuries ago, is no other than this eager, inquiring, self-affirmative spirit of modern times, that we vaguely though justly call Liberalism. Our dominant religious faith has not so much led as more or less retarded and opposed this free movement. The intellectual atmosphere, the social and political conditions of the Middle Age, were well-nigh as consistent with the demands and spirit of Christianity as those with which we are surrounded in this present time. The eye of Christian faith, since the time of St. Augustine, who taught that the "city of God" was not to be on earth, and that the discouragements and confusions of our present existence need therefore cause no alarm to believers, has been upon another world; and life, it has been believed, has properly consisted in preparing ourselves to meet the judgment of the Son of man. Let me not be suspected of having any wish to speak slightly of the faith in which I myself have been nurtured. I revere it still, I will rather be quick to defend it against those who wantonly attack it, and I have the slightest sympathy with those who affect no consciousness of their obligations to it. Yet for us now and in the light of our day to give ourselves to the Christian faith involves a kind of pessimism. Christianity puts the triumph of the good in another world, and expects its accomplishment by a supernatural intervention. Hence, the longing hopes of men that go out to that time; hence, the looking without and above rather than within for salvation; hence, the feeling that, though wrong and misery may infest, and long and deeply infest, this world, they are after all for a moment in comparison with the endless ages of triumphant righteousness and joy, that are to be ushered in and presided over by the once forsaken but now glory-crowned Son of man. To have the primitive Christian hope was, indeed, then no pessimism. In connection with what must be called primitive habits of thought, however they may survive among us to this day (we mean those that gather about the supernatural), it was a not unnatural and noble optimism. The ends of justice are not merely our own ends; they are those of the wide world. Shall the wide world then have no part in their accomplishment? Shall it not rather bring them most speedily to pass? Shall not the "Lord Jesus" come from without the clouds, and, as the apocalyptic seer so touchingly besought, "come quickly"? But the Christian hope now is not that primitive one: it has lost its freshness and its fire. It is that hope transformed by an old, a weary, and an unbelieving world. The wished-for result has been gradually put further and further away, till now it is only looked for at the end of time, and in the minds of most men is hardly the object of an earnest faith at all. And it is of the Christian hope now (the only form in which it is even possible to us, history itself having refuted its primitive form) that I speak, when I say that to give over to it involves a kind of pessimism. For our view of the world is changed. We recognize the abidingness of nature and of nature's laws. We have the sense of an indefinite future lying before the human race; and with this environment of ideas, to look to supernatural intervention, and postpone to another world, imply just that fundamental distrust of known powers and natural methods which is and deserves to be called pessimism. And so the true attitude toward the Christian Church is, to my mind, not to allow that it believes too much, but that it believes too little; that the soul of faith which burned in the master prophet of our race, who once trod the streets of Jerusalem, is not in the body of men who now call themselves by his name, since he dared say the kingdom of heaven was at hand, and that the meek should inherit the earth, while they, wise men, know that such confidences are too high and holy for this world, and put off the triumph of the good into I know not what impossible and unknown future.

Hence, the word of the prophet must go out again. It must be in absolute harmony with the changed view of the world that has come over us in modern times; and hence it cannot come from any one who holds in any strength the Christian traditions. It must not be a prayer or an invitation to prayer, it must be no kind of appeal to the heavens. For very seriousness, all that attitude must be abandoned. It must be an address to men, to the slumbering divinity in every man. It must be a call to men to awake and act on principles becoming them as men, to put away their works of darkness, to rise above their earthliness and selfishness, and usher in in their lives and under the sun of our own heavens the reign of the good and the just, that are still the dream, the ever-alluring dream of humanity.

It is with something of this spirit that Liberalism must be touched, if it is to complete its work and become to us an instrument not only of freedom and material progress, but of religion. The deepest needs of man are not those of the mind or of the body, but those of the conscience. The deepest cravings of the human spirit are not to know the world as it surrounds us and courses on by our side, nor to understand the mechanism and the growth of our inner life, much less are they for happiness, for the least suffering, the most favorable lot, as we go on in this strange stream of human existence. No: but deeper than all for an answer to the question, What, in connection or contrast with all that we know without or within, ought there to be? What is the goal, the possible meaning, of it all; and how do we in will and in the motives of our heart stand related to that goal?

Do I say that Liberalism must be touched with this spirit and give an answer to these deeper cravings? Rather, let me say, it is already in you so touched. Your very ends are those of moral reform, your very significance lies in the fact that you are suggesting larger ideas of what ought to be than ordinarily obtain in the world, even the religious world; that you are willing to hear not of a looser but of a stricter rule of duty for your lives; that morality is losing to your minds its limitations, and growing great, yes, measureless, in its idea and possible applications to you. Hence, I am not here to exhort, but to utter my joy, to declare that here I see promise and pledge of a new advance in religion, the hints of a new stage in human progress, the suggestions of a movement that with its organic life and institutions may grow and spread and bring new sanctity and joy into human existence.

And, in face of the facts of your existence, what shall be said of the assertion that the religious doctrines of the past are indispensable to the moral life? Here are few signs of the power of those doctrines. Here is no recognition of a personal Jehovah or of a Father in the heavens or of the immortality of our individual souls. Here is no prayer or beseeching, no confession of sins to human or heavenly priest, and no outstretched hand or lifted voice to give the answering absolution. Allowing that all this is not what is conventionally called "religion," does morality any wise suffer? Are there any signs of moral deterioration? Or is it the fact that, as you go from here, your resolves for the good are strengthened, that you have somehow gained new strength for all difficult and laborious tasks, that a grand meaning of life, of this human, struggling life, has been suggested to you? Or, if not this, that you are put to shame for your coldness and hardness of heart, and stirred to penitence that the good you might have done, the evil you might have hindered, you had been all indifferent to? Ah, all good and just actions, all human and tender and penitent thoughts, come not from the doctrines of any religion, but have their own source and fountain in the human heart and conscience. The best religions now in the world have had this directly moral origin. The noblest ideas of the divinity you can find were born of man's moral experience and are a reflection of his moral ideals. Carlyle said it was not belief in heaven that lent nobility to man, but man's native nobility that suggested such a belief. And so we will say of morality: it is thence that worth and sacredness come to religion, and not vice versa; that the additional intellectual conceptions connected with religion are its most uncertain and most changeable part; that new birth in religion must ever be preceded by and based upon new birth in moral conceptions. What the full-orbed religion of the future may be, I will not undertake to say. I have only a confidence that its view of the universe will not be less, but more inspiring than the old one. Meantime, we are not wandering nor straying into by-paths, but on the highway of religion, breathing its own air and feeling its own currents, when we are purifying and enlarging our ideals of duty and girding ourselves for new and higher consecration. Let come what may, the gains we make can never be lost; the larger ideals we win will go on influencing the lives of men, and not cease till there is need for still larger ideals. The task we perform now will not lose its uses or its worth till some grander task comes to summon human energies, and then our thought and our work will be lost only as the star is lost, that

"dies and melts into the light."

For you will have no personal considerations mixed with your morality. As the poor poet in The Span- ish Gypsy worshipped Fedalma without reward, nor hoped

... a heaven save in his worship,"

so you will ask no curious questions as to the sanctions of morality,—as if goodness could have a witness of its authority better than itself,—and you will in word and deed oppose the cant, so current in our day, that life has no worth or meaning save as we look for another life hereafter. It is impossible, then, to love goodness for its own sake, to heed the commands of morality because they are commands, and not because they will bring us eternal felicity! There is no nobleness in human nature, no heroism. This poor human self cannot be transcended, and the claims of a love and duty that would annihilate self are all impossible of satisfaction. What a pitiful account is this of our human nature! Who does not resent it, that has ever experienced an affection that puts the centre of his being in another, or felt a conviction of duty to which death would be preferable to dishonor! I will not hesitate to say that the possibility of religion and of an utterly unselfish consecration is one and the same thing. Religion is unselfish consecration: it is finding the centre of our being no longer in ourselves, but in the idea of the good that stands over us; and they, they it is, who take the meaning and the glory out of life, who deny the possibility of this purely ideal connection, who condemn man to the earthliness of a creature who cannot sacrifice his happiness at one moment save as he looks for a greater happiness in the next. This, friends, is not religion, but the very spirit of irreligion, the very cutting of the bond by which all ideal aims and enthusiasms are possible. It is the cant of those who have not moral soundness in their souls. Let me not be understood as prejudging the questions of a personal Deity and personal immortality. They are not at present matters of faith to me: they are not necessary to a supreme moral consecration, which is to my mind the soul of religion. But I do not assent to the confident denials with respect to them that I sometimes hear. The reasons sometimes urged against them are such as would destroy all ideal convictions; and, while they can by no means be foundations of religion to me, they may be none the less true and have a place in any final synthesis of thought. My utterances have been directed against the view simply that on them our moral convictions are anywise dependent, that morality may not be practised for its own sake, that, if we will undertake moral reform, we must go back to the creeds of the past. The questions of God and immortality—as those words are commonly understood—are not, I repeat, questions of prime moment to morality and religion: they are for philosophy and science to answer, if they can, in their own way and in their own time, though I equally demand that they be allowed to be still open questions, and shall only be sorry if a forward-looking movement should compromise or narrow itself by prematurely pronouncing upon them.

No: the task that lies before us is more pressing, more immediate and near at home to us, than any solving of ambition's intellectual problems. It is the task of the moral regeneration of ourselves and of human society. The heart of man is set on the perfect. The religions of the past have ordinarily committed the task of the realization of the perfect to the hands of the Divinity. He, sometime and somewhere, will do for us what we, burdened with our finiteness, are all incapable of accomplishing. There is a preciousness in these religions for the moral attachments and trusts which they contain. But the change that has come over us in these times is that we no longer look for the triumph of the good from without, but, with hearts still set upon it, feel that it is a task committed to ourselves. There is no use in prayer, there are no ears that will listen to the cries that humanity ought to hear and answer for itself. An impossible, an infinite task to assume to ourselves, is it said? Ah, but it is possible to hold that the limitations that ordinarily hedge the human soul about are no final barriers, but may be transcended, that there are strictly no final limits to the possibilities of our consecration and our achievement, that there is in truth an infinite side to our nature, and that only the prophet measures man as he really is. A divine task? Yes, but one that is to make the doers of it divine, that is to take away our earthliness, that is to lift us out of our finiteness into connection with a world-purpose, to bring in upon the descending streams of our lives

"Murmurs and scents of the infinite sea."

It is the consciousness of the task, I take it, that furnishes the reason for the existence of this society. You are not here to worship in the conventional sense, but to be told of a work, and to hear the summons to enter upon it. The perfect stretches out beyond our thought and our imagination: the road that leads to the perfect, the immediate duty, is plain before you. The first possibilities of something better for the struggling masses of men are in connection with a better training of the young of their number, and a training to a higher conception of life and the work of life, and to nobler methods of social action. And equally are the first possibilities of better things for the more favored classes in so feeling the bond that links them to their fellows, and the poorest and meanest of them, that they will make possible that training, and spare not to make it the best. The spirit of justice, the spirit that owns a value and respects the claims of every human being, is that which saves the rich as well as the poor, that which saves the community, saves the State. Nothing else will save them. Laws, power, privilege, custom, religion, are empty props, idle guarantees of social order or its permanence, if so be that justice is not there informing it.

But I am not here to suggest that work of training, that heightened sense of social responsibility. The task has been taken up by you: the festivals you celebrate mark the progress in a journey you have already begun. In all this, let me not be understood as forgetting or undervaluing the work that other religious bodies have done and are doing for the world; but it is not too much to say that it is mostly to help us "bear the ills we have" than develop the possibilities of positive and higher good. The State, indeed, punishes crime, religious agencies are ready to meet the wants of the sick and the unfortunate; but poverty, separation of classes, the industrial and social habits connected therewith, and the numberless ills and wrongs that follow in their train,—these are such immemorial factors in human society that they are thought to be normal and necessary, and rebellion against them wears the appearance of rebellion against the very nature of things. Over against this, you dare have a higher faith; you dare believe that the evils and wrongs of the social state are not necessary, that they come from want of opportunity, from want of education on the one side, and from the spirit of power and of injustice and selfish indifference on the other, neither of which causes arise from any inevitableness in the nature of things. I will not pause to remark which view does most honor to the nature of things. I hasten to note the higher aspect of your work; namely, that it is professedly inspired by other and higher than the purely natural motives of pity and human kindness. The work is not one in which you conceive yourselves as going beyond the demands of justice, as outstripping the limits of moral obligation. Humanity, you recognize, is only a higher form of, a more perfect justice. For, the ends of human existence being spiritual, the true ends of every man's life are spiritual; and your aim is, in a word, to make possible their attainment among those who, of themselves and unassisted, could not hope to win them. But it is no self-imposed task: it is one in which every capable human being ought to have a part, perhaps none more truly than those who care least for it. It is a task for the community, whatever may be its instruments of action. The strong are for the weak. The freedom of those who have no needfully depressing cares is a freedom to serve, not indeed by the bestowal of charity, but by the institution of such just social arrangements, by the giving of such means of education, as shall enable men themselves to win the higher goods of life. And the difference between you and others like you, and those who do not own the task, is simply that you recognize it, and they do not; but the task is there all the same. Justice calls, though no human soul heed it or no human voice utter it. It is indeed the word from out the unseen heavens that forever overarches us; and it calls and will call, till the ears of men are opened and its commands have sunk into their hearts, yes, and are obeyed and incorporated in every action and usage, every institution and law of human life and society.

been addressing my words to you; but there has hardly been absent for one moment from my mind the thought of him who is your leader and head. By him, I am not unwilling to acknowledge, I was turned from the plan, which not a few young men are consciously or unconsciously working upon in these days, of compromising with the beliefs and modes of thought of the past,—a plan which a mistaken sympathy no less than prudence may dictate, but which is none the less destructive of singleness of mind and of strength and absoluteness of conviction. From him, too, came the suggestion of another, a purely moral basis of union for the religious forces of the future,—a suggestion indeed which has not been unprofessed, but, so far as I know, never honestly carried out in any of the liberal churches. Further, he stirred in me the idea of a nobler social order than now prevails in the world, not as a sounding name or an abstraction, as it is too apt to be in the mouths of the leaders of the churches, but as a real plan for social life, as the assertion of the possibility of a community on the earth, that shall be animated by other principles than those now ruling in the world, in which the natural and in its place proper self-assertion and egotism of men shall be subordinated to, or rather crowned and ruled by a passion for the common good. But why should I detail the obligations to him, which you must all in varying measure own in common with me? Life is a different thing to me, since my knowledge of him. It is more serious, more weighted with responsibility: it is lit up, at the same time, with larger and more generous hopes. Religion is now all inadequately expressed to me in the idea of gratitude for actual benefits, of submission to and faith in this actual order of the world and human life. It is rather catching sight of what the order of human life might and ought to be, finding the ground of piety there, and in the light of the idea sparing not the ills and wrongs that are, and nourishing ever one purpose in the soul—to carry the ideal good on to triumph.

Your leader will have no idle compliments from me: he will have no unmanly discipleship, no assurances of agreement on all things in heaven and earth. But he has held up a moral ideal: he is the first, to my knowledge, among those who have broken with the theological traditions of the past, to declare it worthily and commandingly to the world. He will have followers of that ideal,—followers who not only hear it, but will publish it, and who will to that extent follow him in the work he is doing in this city now. Well, here is such a follower; one who owns his leadership among Liberals in the cause of moral reform; one who will join him in the work, and has no prouder wish than to hold up the ideas of the better as he is holding them up, and to labor for their accomplishment with something of that invincible spirit which he is manifesting among you to-day.

PROFESSOR ADLER.—I shall have a few words to say before our exercises come to a close in answer to this noble speech; but, before offering any remarks of my own, I should like to hear from a younger friend, whose course of preparation is not yet finished, but whose significant beginnings already give richest promise of the splendid things we may expect from him hereafter. The name and face of Mr. Harry Harland are familiar to many in this audience. For many Sundays, he has sat with you in this hall. I give him warm and cordial greeting to-day on our platform.

Address of Henry Harland.

When the Society for Ethical Culture was organized, it was an experiment, and a very doubtful experiment at that. To-day, after less than six years of existence, it is able to announce itself as an assured success. And, as such, it must be acknowledged by all fair-minded men, by enemies and friends alike. For the test of human theory lies in practice, of human principle in action, and by this test our society is eager to be tried. It professed the principle of philanthropy, and it has embodied its profession in substantial philanthropic institutions. It preached certain ideals, and it has made a sustained and concentrated effort to render its ideals real. It advocated a worship of work, and the fact that we are met together here this morning proves that it did not advocate a worship of work by any means in vain. The extent to which human endeavor reaches is a matter of mathematical calculation, and yet is frequently overlooked and occasionally even doubted. Some one says: "Ah, yes! You have founded a kindergarten, free to the children of the poor,—a great benefit to the children who dwell near enough to attend it. But how about the other children? The community at large is in no wise profited by what you have done." And this is precisely the most plausible and at the same time the shallowest criticism which we shall have to meet. It is utterly at variance with the truth. For mankind is a unity: you cannot move one part thereof but you will affect, for the better or the worse, the whole. And hence the seeds which our society has sown here in New York will bear fruit for the nations, and, if they are fine seeds, will blossom in gladness for every human being now alive or ever to be born. The evidence of this is as simple and as exact as though it were a proposition of Euclid. The boys and girls who are being trained in our schools up town will go out into the world better men and women for the education which they have received there. Once in the world, their actions will ramify without limit and in a hundred directions. They will be wiser parents, more capable employes, more intelligent citizens. They will vote with discrimination. They will put brain-stuff into their labor. The sum of their influence as social beings about their firesides, at their clubs, among their associates, in their businesses, wherever they may turn in short, will be sweeter and richer and more beneficent. Righteousness is like air: it expands infinitely, and penetrates every crevice. The permanence of what is excellent is no longer disputed. The crossing-sweeper who sweeps to the best of his ability serves humanity, and "makes drudgery divine." The cook and the scullion, as well as the statesman whose dinner they prepare, are engaged in thoroughly altruistic occupations, and, according to the merit or demerit of their performance, enhance or diminish the everlasting welfare of their race.

"A subtle chain of countless rings
The next unto the farthest brings,"

says Emerson. And with this the thought mounts higher still, and leads to the sublimest utterance of our religion. We have learned—the sciences have declared to us with unanimous voice—that this universe wherein we find ourselves embosomed, this vast array of space filled with heat and light, and radiant with stars and suns and Milky Way, is no dead mechanism, is no chance conglomeration of meaningless, unrelated lumps of matter, but is rather an organic whole, warm with life, throbbing with thought and beauty; a whole whereof each part is intimately connected with every other part, and whereof we human beings are not mere casual lookers-on, but are requisite and essential elements, exerting our share of influence over the universal destiny,—corpuscles, so to say, in the arteries of the Eternal, molecules in the brain-tissue of the God-head. Here, then, is an immortality, a heaven, a perdition, undreamed of by the old theologies. For it is demonstrated to us now that our seemingly little acts are of unmeasured, indeed of immeasurable consequence, having dominion throughout all time and space, and over the sphere music as over the hearts of men. And, therefore, if we of the new faith live on a higher and nobler plane because of the union which we have formed here, we shall cause the very atoms to vibrate in fuller harmony, we shall add to the glory of the worlds that are to be. Force persists. And, in this fact of physics, the laws of morality become merged in the transcendent laws of being.

The Society for Ethical Culture is an example of the practical workings of organized Liberalism, of what earnest people, in search of religious fellowship and exercise outside of the established churches, can do by way of forming a new and truer church for themselves. It is a standing proof that religionists need not be sectarians. For its members have hedged themselves in by no distinctive title or peculiar creed. They are neither Christians nor anti-Christians. They choose rather to call themselves by the name they were born to,—human beings; meaning thereby that they are heirs alike to human joy and to human suffering, sharers alike in human freedom and in human slavery. Their religion also they have called the religion of humanity, intending by this not exclusively Comtism, but simply their brotherhood with all mankind, their devotion to all that is manly. We who assume it believe in humanity, in humanity's inherent nobleness, in the possibility of her perfect development. We believe in living for humanity, in making humanity the goal of our aspiration. And it is through our absolute faith in humanity that we obtain our faith in divinity. It is because we see goodness here upon the earth that we dare to look for goodness in the heavens. And we are convinced that the finest worship which we can offer to divinity consists in the deepest and most steadfast loyalty to our human ideals, that if we are true to our own authentic selves the vision of God will be opened to our gaze. Our religion is thus one of fire and enthusiasm, capable of becoming the motive to the fullest and most generous consecration. It sees around it on every side the spectacle of human woe and despair and degradation; and it rises up in its self-conscious strength, determined that, by the toil of its devotees, human woe and despair and degradation shall cease to be. In the spirit of love and pity, it calls upon us to enter the ranks of the missionaries, to take the vows of sisters and brothers of mercy, to go about nursing the sick, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, offering the wine of sympathy to the desolate, encouraging the down-trodden, winning back those who have fallen, bearing light to the blind, liberty to the oppressed. Did I say a moment ago we were not Christians? At any rate, should Jesus come back to earth in the present century, it is certain he would be one of our number.

The Society for Ethical Culture has done the liberal movement an inestimable service in furnishing the type of what the liberal religious organization should be and do. It teaches us in the first place, however, emphatically what the liberal religious organization must never be or do. We know that it must never be a toy. And this is a lesson to be taken to heart and remembered. For it is the bane of unbelief that it is apt to become cynical, and to regard real earnestness in matters of religion as quite beneath the dignity of emancipated men. And this is the temper which we must assiduously avoid,—nay, we must do more than avoid it; we must prove by our acts that it is false and wicked and without a right to be. Men who band together in the name of religion must come prepared to devote their lives to religious purposes. They must assert the seriousness of their efforts by effecting grave and beautiful results. They must show that their religion is the means of salvation, by showing that it has saved themselves, saved them from sin, from debasement, from spiritual death. They must think religiously also, must make clear to the world that religion is the one elixir vitae, distilled of the best thoughts and richest passions of the mind,—distilled of hope and love, of compassion and forgiveness, of reverence and faith; that it is the very soul-blood indeed, without which the man is cold and weak and worthless, but with which he becomes warm and elastic, and filled with power. In a word, speaking the truth truthfully and doing the right rightfully, they must make of their whole outer being an expression of the utility of earnestness which the cynics gainsay.

And, another thing, the Liberal Religious Society must not be destructive simply, a critical element, bent upon flooring Orthodoxy, and nothing more. Orthodoxy will die its own natural death. Iconoclasm is the effect, not the cause, of unbelief. We need deny only as a preparation for affirming. This is the lesson of all history. It is by the everlasting yea that the world is moved; and so we must do battle not against the false alone, but for the true, not to crush out the wrong alone, but to assert the right. We must come to fulfil,—to fulfil the promises of a finer manhood and womanhood. Certainly, Liberalism must be negative, but it must be constructive too. It may well concern itself with breaking the idols; but, unless it has a basis for its existence quite independent of its antagonism to idolatry, when at last the idols have all fallen, it will find its occupation gone.

But it has such a basis for its existence, and what the basis is is revealed in the name of our society. We unite for the purpose of culture. Culture is the right training of the whole man, the discipline of the conscience, the instruction of the intellect, the healthful and symmetrical development of the body, the persistent effort after perfection. And all true culture is ethical culture, is directed to the accomplishment of an ethical purpose. Yet the notions regarding ethical culture which are current among even the intelligent masses are altogether too abstract and rarified to be in the least applicable to the actual emergencies of life. But we attach a very definite and measured meaning to this term. We take as the aim of our endeavors the education of the will. That is to say, we believe it to be of the highest possible importance that men shall learn to love the good in conduct just as they learn to love the beautiful in art, so that they will create the good in conduct as the artist creates the beautiful,—not from a sense of fear, nor yet from a sense of duty, but because the good is harmonious to their natures and the bad repulsive to them. We would see the day arrive when the morally vile will nauseate the soul, and when virtue shall have taken such firm hold upon the human heart that moral dilemmas and temptations can no longer exist, every one recognizing in the virtuous his own salvation and peace. But we know very well that a love of the good, and ability to create it, can be obtained only through an understanding of the good and the continued practice of goodness, just as taste and proficiency in art must be the fruit of study and painstaking trial. Wherefore, we have determined to make the science of the good the object of our closest thought, to contemplate the master-works of goodness also, and to attempt as best we may to imitate the methods of the loftiest spirits who have gone before us, and whose lives are open to us to read. It is with this idea of culture in view then that our services are conducted; and whatever may tend to exalt our conduct and to refine our thought, we believe, should have its place in them,—music, poetry, and beautiful surroundings to awaken our higher emotions, and a lecture by a trained teacher to answer the religious and moral perplexities of our minds. We wish here in this weekly meeting to renew our mutual covenant to seek the better things; to come into direct communion for a time with those sublime ideals which have the power of enlarging, of vivifying us, of rendering us more benignly human, and which, as it seems to us, are the very redemption of the universe itself, proving every particle of it, grain of dust and blade of grass and bird and insect, together with the planets whirling through the immensities, to be permeated with the breath of divinity, to be pregnant therefore with purpose and life. We wish to cast upon secular matters that more general light which the secular professors are compelled by technicalities to forswear. We wish to be æsthetic, to indulge in rare dreams of goods yet to be realized, to refresh and encourage our aspiring tendencies by visions of the possibilities of righteousness on earth. The value of this kind of idealism cannot be overrated. This is a densely practical age, and for that very reason the poet and the prophet are necessities. Without them, we should soon become sordid, should give ourselves over completely to the pleasures of the day, to eating and drinking and making merry. It is one of the religionist's offices to save us from this doom by reminding us constantly of the deficiencies in the present and by gladdening us with pictures of the future. He is to take note of every opportunity for growth and to persuade others to note it also. He is to quicken the restlessness of men. He should be a pioneer, marching ahead of his times, urging the rest to follow. He should be a truth-seeker, moreover, a student of the real humanities. He should unify knowledge, and purify it with his super-scientific sense, disclosing to men their largest relations and the largest relations of things.

And this culture of our own must be subservient to the chief good of our kind, must make for the welfare of the world around us, or otherwise it will be a matter of pure selfishness, a creature of the dust, born to-day to die to-morrow, worthless and of no human import. The servant who buried his money-piece became thereby a thief, and merited a thief's ignominy and chastisement. There is no room for you on this crowded earth, my friend, unless you can contribute your quota toward cleansing and rendering more habitable the corner of it whereon you have taken lodgement. The man who never acts is a mere parasite on the body of society, and nothing better. But such men, let us be thankful, are generally killed off early. Inactivity is the straight road to impotence and eventually to annihilation. The consequence is, we must exert ourselves. Our watchword must be "reform"; reform in person and in mass, individual reform and social reform. And according as we accomplish reform or not will our professed religiousness be a reality or a sham. For all through the past men have looked to religion for inspiration. They have expected to derive strength and incentive to sacrifice from a contemplation of the sublimities of their faith. The heroes were heroic, because they were religious; and, indeed, heroism itself is but one manifestation of the religious life. It is utter loyalty to the principle which constitutes the ideal; and the ideal is the God. Buddha was buoyed up by his religion, when he made the great renunciation. It was his religion which carried Socrates so bravely through his trial by the mob of Athens, and which finally caused him to drink the hemlock without a murmur, and to die at peace with the very Athenians who had murdered him. And Jesus, above all, was religious. Men despised and rejected him and spat upon him, and crowned him with a crown of thorns. But he rose far above the threats and temptations of the people, and suffered the death agony in the company of thieves, offering up his life, as he believed, in atonement for the sin of the whole human race. And so we, too, must be heroic, even as they of old were. And, if it is said that there is no call for heroism in these latter days, we must make answer—for we can do so truthfully—that there is more call for heroism now than there ever was before. Not perhaps for the heroism that dies, but for the greater and rarer heroism that lives and endures to assert its cause. And this heroism is the divinest capability of man.

And now, to sum up and show the final drift of these desultory thoughts, let me repeat to you the following little story:—

At midnight, a single traveller was wearily making his way across the desert. His goal was a distant oasis; and he had already been upon his journey for a week, resting by day, plodding along by night. He carried in his hand a lantern, and its dim flame lighted his path before him for a few yards only. He was footsore, covered with dust, thirsty, hungry, disheartened. He was about to give up his quest. He had said, "I must die." He had determined to die now. He looked ahead, there stretched the desert endlessly. He looked downward, there was the dry, cruel sand, and that alone. He was sinking to the earth, hope gone, courage exhausted, when, as his worn-out body gave way beneath him, for the first time his eyes were cast upward, and the world-sprinkled, starlit heavens burst upon him in all their splendor, radiant, steadfast. And he drank in deep draughts of their beauty. And he arose again, and again took up his staff and went on his way with a new elasticity in his footsteps, with a new light in his soul. And ever and anon as his spirit weakened within him he turned his gaze to the firmament above. And, finally, he reached the oasis, and sank upon his knees in silent thought. And then at last he cried aloud, "Oh, thank thee, Allah, for having made the stars!"

And so, friends, let us too look upward. Let us remember that the stars are our fellow-laborers, that the world-soul is our task-master! Let us make our religion the song which cheers us at our work.

Address of Professor Adler.

This is an hour of joy and honor indeed! The thought of this hour will long continue in our memories. The ethical movement has made a significant step forward to-day, the cause of deepest anxiety is being removed from our hearts. It has been said, and said again and again, that Liberal Religion is sterile, that it may cause a few here and there to rise as its teachers, but that it does not produce after its kind. To-day, we have heard that Liberal Religion is not sterile. New lips have sounded forth its praises, strong souls are consecrating themselves to its service. Indeed, we have been confident of this all along. It was absurd to suppose that young men would not enter this work: they are bound to enter it. For the nature of truth is like the nature of fire. As fire not only glows but kindles, as even in glowing it cannot help kindling, so great truths not only burn in the souls of their votaries, but they set hearts and souls aflame everywhere with new enthusiasms wherever their message penetrates.

I wish in closing the exercises to-day to touch only upon one question suggested by the thought of the previous speakers,—namely, the degree of dissent which is permissible among those who are to teach a religion in common. Frederick Schleiermacher, in his remarkable discourses on religion, describes the true religious society as one in which each member shall be at once priest and layman, teacher and learner. There shall be a point of agreement between all the members of this society,—namely, the common religious need which all alike feel; but each one shall be free to shape his definite religious ideas according to the idiosyncrasies of his own spiritual nature, and each one shall declare to his comrades that aspect of the infinite which he may see more clearly than others. The great theologian and philosopher believed that the spiritual insight of each would be supplemented by the spiritual insight of the others, and that in his ideal church the religious differences of men, far from separating, would only tend the more cordially to unite them. It is something of this kind to which we, too, look forward, only with this distinction,—that the point of agreement for us must not be, as for Schleiermacher, the religious need, but the religious deed.

I have been asked by some one recently, not here this day, whether I should recognize him as a fellow-worker, although he is inclined to accept the theistic theory of the world's government. He wished to know whether such a difference as this would stand between us as teachers of religion. I asked him what, apart from theory, he thought of the practical manifestations of religion in our day, what of the tendency of the churches to turn men's thoughts toward the other life to the detriment of the essential business of the earth. He answered that he was wholly opposed to such a tendency, that he believed in the earth and its prior claims upon our attention. I asked him what he thought of prayer,—that form in which so much moral force is wasted, in which the moral energy that should be pent up in the heart, making the pressure that drives men on to acts, is spent in empty words. He answered that for him, too, prayer had lost its helpful meaning. I asked him on what, then, he would lay the chief emphasis of his religion. He answered upon the work of moral reform; upon the regeneration of human society; on a plan of justice such as has nowhere yet existed; upon the making of better and finer men than have ever before lived on this globe. And I replied to him then, that surely nothing was left me but to tell him how fully we should regard him as a fellow-worker, that for us it matters not what a man's religious metaphysics may be. There may be those who think it necessary to assume the existence of a personal governor of the world to complete their world-picture, who may think a personal immortality of the soul essential to the rounding out of their lives. So long as they do not make morality itself dependent upon the holding of these beliefs, so long as they agree to regard the moral law as the foundation upon which human life is to be established, and these beliefs only as the finishing, as the crowning of the moral edifice, if you will, we do not, we cannot, object to these beliefs; and we join willingly in heartiest fellowship with those who hold them in this manner. Only upon the religious deed, i.e., upon the work of moral reform and all the grand things which that work implies, do we insist. But we do insist upon that as inexorably as ever Catholicism insisted upon the holding of its dogmas. We regard the teachers of religion as a company of travellers journeying on the same highroad; and, as they journey, some will be attracted by one aspect of the heavens, and some by another; and some will see the fields and hills of earth around them from one point of view, and some from another. But what we insist on is that they must all travel on the same highroad,—the highroad of moral purity and moral progress; and only those who diverge into the by-paths do we exclude.

But, if the task of moral reform is to be our all-in-all, we must not forget the greatness of the task and the difficulties implied in it. To-day, we remember the founding of our relief works. That meant the beginning of a work for the moral reform of others. But an Ethical Society that would be true to its name and mission must not only seek to reform others, but chiefly itself. Its own members must shine in the community, because of their superior integrity and their finer scrupulousness of conscience. The business men that belong to a society for ethical religion must be known as honest business men. The women that belong to such a society must be known as simpler in their habits than other women. The young men who belong to such a society must be known as purer in their lives, truer and manlier in deed than young men usually are. And to push this part of the task is the hardest part of the work. It is easy enough to gather a reform society for the reform of other people: it is difficult, indeed, to induce men to reform themselves, to look into their own lives and see the inconsistencies and the black spots there, to cleanse themselves, to chisel their own souls into that form which the high standard of morality demands of us. And yet this is the essential work that Liberal Religion must accomplish, if it would become a power and an influence in this country, and fulfil the indispensable requirements of a religion. In that path lies our glory, thitherward beckon us our stars.

But, if this work has seemed most difficult, it will seem lighter after to-day. To-day, we have heard voices that shall long ring and reverberate in our souls, prophetic voices that announce the dawn, that tell us of a long succession of teachers of the ethical religion; that assure us that this cause, so dear to us, whose promise we have but begun to see, is destined to grow and enlarge, as we may now believe, and to gladden distant generations.

And, as for you who are or will be my brothers in this work, I bid you be strong and take manliest hope for the labors that await you. The path is not yet cleared for you. You will have to hew your own way through jungles and thickets of superstition and indifference; but go on. Only utter the real truth, the whole truth that is in you, and you will find that new organizations will start into life responsive to your summons; that people whom you knew not will press around you and follow your lead,—yes, that men will follow to the ends of the earth the teacher of religion of whom they believe that he utters to their souls his soul's deepest truth.

The following is the song sung by the Ethical Class, and written by Professor Adler:—

The City of Light.

Have you heard the Golden City
Mentioned in the legends old?
Everlasting light shines o'er it,
Wondrous tales of it are told.

Only righteous men and women
Dwell within its gleaming wall;
Wrong is banished from its borders,
Justice reigns supreme o'er all.

Do you ask: Where is that city
Where the perfect Right doth reign?
I must answer, I must tell you
That you seek its site in vain.

You may roam o'er hill and valley,
You may pass o'er land and sea,
You may search the wide earth over,—
'Tis a city yet to be.

We are builders of that city:
All our joys and all our groans
Help to rear its shining ramparts;
All our lives are building-stones.

Some can do but humblest service,—
Hew rough stones or break the soil;
While the few alone may gather
Joy and honor from their toil;

While the few may plan the arches,
And the fluted columns fair,
And immortal thought embody,
And immortal beauty there.

But, if humble or exalted,
All are called to task divine,
All but aid alike to carry Forward one sublime design.

What that plan may be, we know not:
How the seat of Justice high,
How the city of our vision
Will appear to mortal eye,—

That no mortal eye can picture,
That no mortal tongue can tell.
We can barely dream the glories
Of the Future's citadel.

But for it we still must labor,
For its sake bear pain and grief,
In it find the end of living
And the anchor of belief.

But a few brief years we labor:
Soon our earthly day is o'er,
Other builders take our places,
And "our place knows us no more."

But the work that we have builded,
Oft with bleeding hands and tears,
And in error and in anguish,
Will not perish with our years.

It will be at last made perfect
In the universal plan;
It will help to crown the labors
Of the toiling hosts of man.

It will last and shine transfigured
In the final reign of Right;
It will merge into the splendors
Of the City of the Light.

VACCINATION.

Editors of The Index:—

The writer of the book notices in the last Index says, "Henry Bergh, with characteristic Don Quixotism, denounces vaccination." I imagine that Mr. Bergh will be able to cope with something more formidable than windmills, so long as he carries, as weapons, such facts as the two following against the efficacy of vaccination:—

"In the city of Berlin, during the year 1871, there were seventeen thousand and twenty cases of small-pox, whereof fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-seven were of vaccinated persons."

"According to Mr. William Jebb, of London, in his statement presented to the American Anti-Vaccination League, eighty per cent. of the mortality from small-pox comes from vaccinated cases."

SETH HUNT.

[We print the above out of regard to Mr. Hunt's earnest belief that vaccination does evil. Yet, though the question of vaccination may be regarded as an open one for further investigation, the scientific authority for it is so preponderating that we deprecate at this time, when the small-pox is threatening to become a national epidemic, the doing of aught to weaken the popular faith in the practice of vaccination as a preventive of the dread disease. The statistical facts as stated have little weight because not giving the time after vaccination when the small-pox occurred.—Ed.]

BOOK NOTICES.

ECCE SPIRITUS. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1881.

This is an earnest book. Whoever is its author (for it comes forth anonymously), it evidently wrote itself. The writer felt that he had a mission to the world, which he was constrained to fulfil. Nevertheless, we think if he had kept the book on the anvil awhile longer, though it might have lost somewhat in fervor, it would have gained both in strength and finish of thought. We say "he"; yet in reading we have more than once been impressed with a guess that the author is a woman. This we mean as no disparagement. For, though the book is not in all respects robust and virile, there are portions of it of great power and originality of thought. But frequently the element of womanly sentiment seems to dominate the inexorable logic of the author's own thought. We do not say that the sentiment may not be higher than the thought: we simply note the fact that the two do not always appear to be in harmony. Indeed, the author would probably accept Goethe's phrase, "The ever-womanly leadeth on," as a good characterization of that lofty spiritual condition which it is the aim of the book to depict as mankind's possibility. The theory of the character and power of Jesus which the book unfolds is given in the sentence, "The intense spiritual life—absorbing the entire realm of material things as a mere contingent and accessory of his present existence, closely and consciously related to the supreme source and centre of being, God, and alone bent on the higher welfare of a world grovelling in the literalism of sense—had become not the possession, but the very personality of Jesus." And in this respect Jesus is regarded as the highest possible exemplar, the headship of the human race. On this point occurs one of the contradictions in the book, hinted at above. The author accepts entirely the natural and human theory of Jesus, and apparently follows the modern scientific school of criticism with regard to the Gospels. Jesus is purely man, but the greatest and best of men. Yet the author is not content with this historical and comparative estimate of him, but goes on to say: "He is more; infinitely more, than this. He is in all respects the highest possibility of man, touching, nay, exhausting ranges of being that transcend even the moral." And, again, "Jesus stands representative of the sum total of man's highest possible attainment." Now such an estimate of Jesus is entirely consistent with a supernatural view of his origin and character. But the author distinctly argues that he came without any break in natural law, and was no other than man in his faculties. With regard to such an estimate of Jesus on this basis, therefore, there are two questions to be asked: 1st, How is it possible that in the natural order of evolution a human being should have appeared in Judea eighteen and a half centuries ago, who exhausted

"the sum total of man's highest possible attainment"? 2d, How can any finite mind, at this age of the world, have the capacity to measure or the audacity to declare what is "the highest possibility of man"?

Yet, in spite of such sentimental assumptions as this, there is much solid meat in the book that is good food for thought. As a sample of this stronger food, we may quote the following: "Life is all that there is. When everything has been sifted, it alone remains, the one thing that never lessens. . . . There bids fair in time to be a science deeper than all the sciences, one that shall do more than merely teach us how to subjugate the earth or to read the stars, important and inspiring as these undoubtedly are, in teaching us to live. Religion will not suffer except superficially and healthfully. It will lose much, as is well, and entirely shift its stand-point; but it will gain much in getting closer to the centre and all the realities of life. This science of life, made up of all, yet deeper, truer, more pervasive than all, will be the religion of the future."

WASHINGTON IRVING. By Charles Dudley Warner. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The success of the English Men of Letters in England and in our own country has naturally suggested an attempt to do something of the same sort for our American writers, and not now for the first time. But the attempt is now made under such auspices as insure that a second failure is not to be expected. The editor of the series was to have been James T. Fields. To the place made vacant by the death of Mr. Fields, Mr. Warner has succeeded. The labor will not suffer in his hands. He is himself the writer of the first volume of the series, and in it he has set a high standard of excellence. He has told the story of Irving's life in a simple and engaging manner, and set forth in terms of generous appreciation, though with due self-restraint, the value of Irving's contribution to American and general literature.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE.—The December number gives some lively "Scenes from English Life," the conclusion of "Les Froques de Majesté," a description of the Belgian savings bank, and notices of several new books, among which is an account of the origin of Unitarianism by Bonnet-Maury, published last year by Fischbocker in Paris. The most important article is a vivid portrayal of the principal preachers and writers during the Huguenot wars at the end of the sixteenth century. Especial praise is given to Agrippa d'Aubigné, the ancestor of the well-known historian, and the author of a satire called Les Traiques, where he shows such ability that he is called the Rousseau of that period, as Rabelais is styled its Voltaire. Among other attacks on the enemies of peace and liberty were Hotman's picture of the Cardinal of Lorraine, as The Tiger, the description of Catharine di Medici, entitled La Vie de Sainte Catherine, and that joint work of five or six different authors known as La Menippée. How much need there was of such books as well as of the swords of Coligny and Henry IV. we may judge from the fact that the priests at Paris declared from the pulpit, "He has no religion who will not kill the Huguenots"; that Pope Gregory XIII. showed his joy at the massacre of Saint Bartholomew by having public thanksgivings offered in the churches, and a medal struck, which is still extant, as is the picture in the Vatican painted by his orders, and stating that the pontiff approved of the murder of Coligny; and that Pius V., who was afterward made a saint, urged Alba, in the midst of the massacres in the Netherlands, to go on doing these noble deeds which would lead him to heaven. Such was the character of that Church which boasts that she is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

THE Popular Science Monthly for February gives us the following excellent and varied table of contents, and in the editorial department briefly discusses a still wider range of scientific topics: "The Seven World Problems," by Emil Du Bois-Reymond; "How Animals Breathe," H. L. Fairchild; "Dreams and the Making of Dreams," J. Mortimer Granville; "Sanitary Relations of the Soil," Dr. M. von Pettenkofer; "Longevity of the Oyster," Prof. S. Lockwood; "A Glimpse through the Corridors of Time," Robert S. Ball; "Epidemic Convulsions," David W. Yandell; "Extension of the Signal Service," Prof. Trowbridge; "The Fundamental Problems of Physiological Chemistry," Dr. Edmund Drechsel; "A Botanist of the Ninth Century," C. Hartwich; "Wild Animals as Man's Associates," Prof. E. S. Morse; "The Philadelphia Academy," J. S. Kingsley; "A Little Matter," A. E. Outerbridge; "Vibration of Rocks in Patapasco Valley," Frederick Garretson; "Sketch of M. Saint-Claire, Deville." Prof. Ball's "Glimpse through the Corridors of Time" is especially interesting.

EACH number of Wide-Awake is in itself a treasury of art and juvenile literature. It is a pleasure even to the elders of this generation to turn over the delightful pages of this magazine, and look upon the beautiful pictures and read the pure, instructive, thought-inspiring as well as amusing stories and poems. That pleasure comes almost as much from admiration of the intrinsic merit of these as from the knowledge that such literature for our children is laying a sure foundation for them of a refined, pure, and cultivated taste in later years. We have looked through the February number just come to hand, with its splendid prize frontispiece, "The king is dead. Long live the king!" and its many other lovely full-page illustrations, and have glanced over its numerous articles with a view to singling out a few of these for special mention; but, where all are so good, this seems impossible. Its publishers and editor have reason to congratulate themselves on the success of Wide-Awake. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

THE pension of the widow of Abraham Lincoln is to be increased from three to five thousand dollars per annum, with a present gratuity of $15,000. In view of the lavish generosity of the American people in the case of Mrs. Garfield, the justice of the reported appropriation to Mrs. Lincoln will not be questioned.

MRS. E. D. CHENEY, one of the most faithful friends of The Index since its first establishment, is about to make a trip to California. We are sure that all our readers will join with us in wishing her a pleasant journey and safe return. We are encouraged by Mrs. Cheney to hope that some of her experiences on the Pacific Coast may be jotted down for the benefit of our readers.

THE Sidney (New South Wales) Bulletin of November 19 contains a good portrait of Prof. William Denton, of whom it speaks in very complimentary terms. The Bulletin says: "In Victoria and in this colony, his lectures have been largely attended; and it is satisfactory to find that, from a financial as well as a scientific point of view, the professor's visit to Australia is not without good results."

ON his return to his little insular kingdom, Kalakaua was warmly welcomed by the populace, and carried in triumphal procession under arches with mottoes such as the following: "Return, O King," "Hawaii is the Best," "Great Love to Kalakaua," "Oh, the Blessed, the Chosen One," "We are All the King's Own," etc. The Chinese displayed a banner bearing the inscriptions, "Welcomed by the Children of the Flowery Land," "Hawaii and China have joined Hands."

ENOCH PRATT, of Baltimore, proposes to endow a free circulating library for the benefit of that city at the cost of a million dollars, provided the municipal corporation will create an annuity of $50,000 for the perpetual support and maintenance of the library and its branches. Mr. Pratt has already contracted for the erection of a fire-proof building, which will hold 200,000 volumes and cost $225,000. This building, together with the site, he will deed to the city, and make a cash donation of $833,000, subject to the condition above named, the institution to be known as the Pratt Free Library.

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

THE Osage Indians of Indian Territory are taking practical steps toward the advancement of their race. They will soon send twenty children of their tribe to be educated at Carlisle, Pa., paying all expenses themselves.

A PHOTOGRAPHER in this city has been fined for keeping his place of business open on Sunday. What is the good of lectures from Oscar Wilde and the adoption of the lily and sunflower as emblems of Harvard culture, if we are not to be allowed the study and pursuit of art except on week-days?

THE editor of Le Monde, a French newspaper published at Montreal in the interests of the Roman Catholic faith, has been obliged to suspend publication on account of incurring the displeasure of the Catholic bishop of Montreal by criticising a letter from Laval University over the signature of Cardinal Siemoni.

THE recent suspension of the great Catholic bank, the "Union Générale" of France, which has helped to precipitate the present business panic in Europe, ought to have the effect of weakening the faith of Catholics in the reliability of their religion as a guide in the practical affairs of life, especially when remembered in connection with the American experiences with the former publisher of the Pilot and Archbishop Purcell.

THE ecclesiastical bill to be presented in the Prussian Landtag permits the government to dispense with the oath of allegiance from bishops, readmits the deposed bishops to their benefices, allows foreign priests to assume ecclesiastical functions, and provides for the resumption of the monetary grants from the State. The bill is said to give satisfaction in no quarter. It does not go far enough to satisfy the Centre, and makes too many concessions to please the Liberals.

ALEXANDER III. of Russia has not yet been crowned. If he can muster up courage sufficient to run the gauntlet of the journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow, as arranged, in a private carriage between lines of troops, he will be crowned Czar of all the Russias as soon as all the arrangements for his safety are complete; but, as the Herald remarks, "A sovereign who thus rides to his coronation must be of a singularly hopeful disposition, if he supposes that his reign will be either a long or a happy one."

PUBLIC opinion is moving Congress to action in regard to polygamy in Utah. This institution, which, even though divested of its Asiatic features, implies a harem, is not in harmony with our institution, is an exotic on American soil, and the sooner it is uprooted the better. The Senate Judiciary Committee last week agreed on a bill for its suppression; and among its provisions are the prosecution of any individuals living together in bigamous relations, and the debarring all polygamists from the voting privilege, service on jury, or holding any office under government.

A SPIRITUAL medium in New York says, "Guitau is under the influence of a subtle spirit, an influence which is at war with right and justice; and he is not personally responsible." In order to rescue him from this malign influence, "we must bring a balance of tension of the polarities of vibration or the equilibrium of the system to bear upon the disturbed tension. If we keep an equipoise of the tension of the polarities of vibration or the equilibrium of the body, the soul will also gain its balance of the tension of the polarities of vibration, or its salvation." The remedy seems to be clear and simple.

THE Japanese are the Yankees of Asia. They assimilate rapidly the habits and ideas of this country, which, it is said on good authority, is doing more to mould the new national life of Japan than any of the nations of Europe. Yet the influence of England, France, and Germany is very marked. English is the chief language of the higher educational system. The University of Tokio is doing creditable work in science and literature. The institution has published a pretentious catalogue in English and Japanese, from which it appears that the entire expenses of each student, including tuition and board, need not exceed a sum equal to eighteen dollars of our money per term.

SINCE the Atlanta, Ga., exposition, the Southern people have been more than ever awake to the vast industrial resources at their command; and there has been a remarkable business "boom" started in what will really soon be the "New South." Among other projects, New Orleans intends starting a new weekly line of steamers direct to France and England, which will carry grain, cotton, and beef to Europe, and bring back the foreign merchandise consumed in the Mississippi Valley, and immigrants for the South and West. The South finds by examination that she has abundant water-power, which can be utilized in the establishment of manufacturing for her products. The Mississippi Legislature is to be asked to appropriate $20,000 for the improvement of Vicksburg harbor. All of which goes to show how much in earnest the South really is in its new departure.

It is time for Liberals to pause and think. Heretofore, the murderers have been mostly orthodox in their proclivities, and have dropped off at the end of the hempen cord with brilliant anticipations of "the sweet bye-and-bye," where their victims, being sent "unprepared into eternity," will not be likely to meet with their regenerated souls, and so cause them any twinges of latent remorse for the deeds done in the body. But now comes a New York murderer named Sindram, who declares himself a free thinking infidel, and hopes to die such. The news makes us uneasy. We are not proud of such company. We have no "plan of salvation" by which such as he can be "saved" from the gallows, and our sympathies are so thoroughly with the victim of any murderer that we have little to spare for so depraved a criminal. Sindram will be happier inside the orthodox fold.

OFFICIAL statistics of emigration from Germany during the past ten years have been published. After the United States, the chief country to which the Germans went in that period is Brazil. For 1872, the total for all countries was 125,650; for 1873, it was 103,638; for 1877, it had fallen to 21,964; but by 1880 it had risen to 206,190, while for 1881 there was a further enormous increase. Out of 105,639 emigrants, 4,568 were under twenty years of age, and 60,471 were over. The most of them had saved money and were from the agricultural districts or belonging to the artisan classes. The German Government is evidently not pleased to see so many of its young and moderately well-to-do subjects leaving their fatherland. In Berlin, the posting up of placards by emigrant agents and steamship captains has been prohibited; and the provincial authorities of Prussia have been directed to make investigation as to the extent and cause of the emigration of young men. One of the causes of this departure is clear. Prussia is a military government, and exacts from its male subjects in army service the best years of their lives.

THE late fire in Park Row, New York, as is usual after these severe lessons, is arousing public attention to the defective means of escape in many buildings where large numbers of people are employed. A stringent law in regard to this matter is needed, and one which every citizen, and especially every employé, should feel it a personal duty to see enforced. Perhaps the insurance companies could effectually aid in saving human life, if they would refuse to insure buildings where no sufficient fire-escapes are furnished by the owners. Apropos of this, the Transcript of this city remarks: "In the despatches describing the great fire in New York yesterday are two sentences in one paragraph which, when placed in juxtaposition, tell how the rich take care and the poor take chances. One sentence is, 'The building was insured for a large amount'; the other, 'There was only one way of escape, by rickety, crooked stairs.' The owners of the fire-trap had made themselves 'solid,' as the saying is: the work-people might look out for themselves. That was no concern of theirs."

THE PRACTICALITY OF THOUGHT.

Matthew Arnold, in order to illustrate the superiority of practical religion to theological creeds and speculations, said that conduct makes up three-fourths of life. The saying is not an overstatement. Not a few persons are ready, indeed, to say, Yes, and you may add the other fourth too. Give up the whole of life to right conduct, and all the speculative thought and beliefs may safely go.

And yet, however strongly the conduct-side of life ought to be urged, it may also be maintained, and with equal truth, that behind this conduct-side there must be a solid, substantial thought-side to give the conduct-side legitimacy. Conduct must have beneath it a logical basis of rationality, or else it has no validity. It may not be always necessary, and often it detracts from practical effectiveness, to point out the separate layers of this logical groundwork; and yet it is there, if the conduct be true. The rational thought may have become so inwrought into the mental temperament as intuition and instinct that it may be appealed to more effectually in many cases without the construction of a logical syllogism; and this kind of direct presentation of the conduct-side of life, leaving out the reasoning process on which it rests, is apt to be regarded as more practical, simply because it is more direct. But the thought-side is also practical. As an element in the progress of religion, even of what is called "practical religion," it is eminently the active agent that effects the progress. Mankind everywhere would now be bowing down to idols of wood and stone as an act of religion instead of doing righteousness, had not rational thought come in to clear away the superstitions on which idol-worship rested. And even at this day, and in civilized communities, there are many superstitious beliefs that, with vast multitudes of people, are standing in the way of their seeing that the purest practical religion is the doing of righteousness. Only the dispelling of ignorance, only the advancement of thought, can abolish the worship of beads and bibles, and bring in that higher worship which consists in the service of humanity and truth.

The practicality of thought is illustrated even in the secular affairs of this eminently secular, utilitarian age. We live in a period of the world distinguished for its gigantic material enterprises and for its intense devotion to the physical interests of the human race. It is an age of business, of wondrous industrial development and accumulation of wealth, of scientific discovery and invention, of marvellous progress in the useful arts, and of successful appliances of inventive skill to supply the material wants of mankind. It is preëminently an age of utilitarian activity and practicality. But where is the source and root of all this busy activity? It is in thought. It is in the busy, curious, inquiring, human mind. The activity does not come from blind, unguided impulse. If it did, it would not hit the mark of accomplishment so generally and exactly as it does. The things achieved have been thoughts in somebody's brains before they were even begun. The practicality in all its phases, from the sailing of a ship to the making of a telescope, is originated and directed by thought. Thought may be applying itself to different problems from what used to absorb the greatest thinkers, but it is none the less thought. Instead of bringing out a system of theology like Calvin's Institutes, it now brings out a steam-engine. Instead of inventing a dogma for reconciling heaven and earth that were never estranged, it now invents a locomotive, and makes a track for it around the earth to bind into amity estranged nations. It is thought that tunneled the Alps and brought the lines of excavation from the opposite sides aplumb with each other under the mighty mass of the mountain above. It is thought that is at the bottom of the world's enterprise; that guides, controls, foresees, marks out the pathway, invents the machine, manages it when made, devises the instrumentality and holds it to the purpose for which it was devised,—it is thought applied to practical problems.

If thought be so important and fundamental an element in the very domain of these practical affairs of life, much more must it hold this master position in those departments of human activity which may be more specially denominated mental and moral. The great thought producers of the world have been the inspirers of human history and sustainers of human action. Socrates, Plato, Kant, were mainly thinkers. They spent their lives in philosophy. Yet their thoughts have been, and still are, the sustenance of millions of minds. People who have never read a word that they ever said or wrote are yet mentally richer and have had their action shaped by the thoughts which such master-thinkers as these left behind them. It is even worth while for a master mind, that is sure of its gravitating hold on a basis of fact, to soar into the skies of theory and speculation; for thus the lines of great truths are often discerned before scientific observation can climb so far, and imagination at least is fed and poetry comes, even if science does not.

In morals, thought is quite as much at the foundation as sentiment. Beneath the moral law there is a sentiment of obligation, a feeling of oughtness. Before, however, this feeling can arise, there is a mental perception of something that kindles it. Behind the Golden Rule lies the perception of the reciprocity of action,—the perception that the conduct which I demand from another as my right I owe to him as his right. This perception of the equation of rights between man and man in their social relations is the very root of justice. Upon it has been built layer by layer, story by story, the whole practical system of law and jurisprudence and social ethics. It is but a thought; but it is a thought that sustains the moral government of the universe and all human governments, so far as they are stable and durable. And, in the moral problems that confront humanity to-day, nothing is more necessary than clear and wise thought for the practical solution of them. Humane sentiment is most necessary, but humane sentiment is not enough. Excessive amiability is sometimes a hindrance to moral reform, granting indulgence where nature demands retribution. Love must be balanced and guided by clear mental perception. Before such social evils as poverty, intemperance, licentiousness, crime, while pity and humanity may furnish the motive power for extending aid, the utmost wisdom of thought is required to supply the effectual instrumentality.

The history of religion, again, is full of illustrations of the practical power of thought as an agent of progress. Behind all great religious movements there have been great thoughts. And to-day it is thought that is moving the religious world. The new religious philosophy that is certainly coming in place of the old philosophy of supernaturalism is not yet definitely systematized. But it is in the air. Its power is everywhere felt, in the churches and out of them. It is rewriting the creeds. It is remoulding time-honored institutions. It appears in the secular journals and magazines as well as in the religious, in literature and poetry as well as in the new treatises of theology. It springs especially from the researches of science, and is shaping a broader and nobler science of society. It is in far-off India and Japan, and even in stable and stagnant China and in fatalistic Mohammedanism.

Everywhere, the new thought is at work, creating the religious belief of the future,—a belief which, when it shall come, will be the most practical of beliefs, lifting the human mind into a surer and serenest trust, laying upon the human conscience a more effective sense of responsibility for the world's welfare, summoning States to a finer justice, trade to a stricter honesty, and welding society into a more genuine brotherhood. WM. J. POTTER.

BELIEF IN ANOTHER WORLD: IS IT A MORAL ADVANTAGE TO THIS ONE?

When you find people of ordinary intelligence flatly contradicting each other concerning some matter equally accessible to both of them, you may pretty safely conclude that they are laboring under some misunderstanding. Either the point at issue is not made clear, or the attitude of one or both toward it is misconceived. Thus as to this matter of faith in a future life. Some of the noblest men of the time, like Mr. Frederic Harrison, declare it to be a selfish and immoral belief. For the sake of humanity, they labor to destroy it. On the other hand, it is asserted by others that this faith is the very foundation of all morality. Paul is quoted as supporting this view, and as declaring that a life of mere animalism is the logical outcome of denial,—“Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.”

Atheism is commonly supposed to carry with it a denial of any future life as one of its necessary consequences; though I must confess that I could never quite see why. For, if an atheistic nature has proved itself competent to produce man and give him the life he now possesses, it seems to me at least an open question as to whether it may not be equal to its reproduction or continuance in some other state. But, leaving that question one side, I care at present only to call attention to the attitude that is maintained toward it on the supposition that it is a denial both of God and immortality.

Ecclesiastics generally take it for granted that a theistic faith is the corner-stone of all morality, and that a general eclipse of faith in God and immortality would be the destruction of all morals, a political and social anarchy. But, on the other hand, it is not to be overlooked that some of the greatest thinkers have held widely divergent views. Lord Bacon was a most pronounced theist. Says he, “I had rather believe all the fables in . . . the Talmud and the Alcoran than that this universal frame is without a mind.” And, while holding that “a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism,” he also held that “depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion.” And yet of atheism he says, it “leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation, all which may be guides to an outward moral virtue, though religion were not. But superstition dismounts all these. . . . Therefore, atheism did never perturb states; for it makes men wary of themselves, as looking no further; and we see the times inclined to atheism (as the times of Augustus Caesar) were civil times; but superstition hath been the confusion of many states.”

These opposing attitudes appear to be hopelessly antagonistic. It would appear as though these opponents must be talking about different things, or at least that they must have misconceived each other's positions, or have left out of account some important element of the problem. Before attempting, however, to analyze the matter, let us glance at a few historical facts as bearing on the question.

Is it then true that those ages in which a belief in another life has been most firmly held have been more moral than others? If they have or have not, is it clear that the moral differences can be certainly traced to the presence or absence of this belief? One or two instances must do duty as illustrations.

So far as we can recover the creeds and social condition of ancient Egypt, we are led to believe that the faith in a future life was very general and very vivid. No doubt also, as in all ancient nations, the condition of the soul was made to depend very largely on considerations of ritual and ceremony. But the "Book of the Dead" makes it clear that a strong emphasis was laid on character, and that thus the future was thought to be determined by the life lived here. The significance of this will be noticed further on. All we care to note now is that the grand history of Egypt, its high grade of civilization, its enduring for so many centuries, all these indicate that its moral condition must have been exceptionally high. For morals in a nation are what health is in an individual. Nations, like individuals, either keep the laws of life or they die. Here, then, is apparently a case where moral fibre and a strong faith in a future life are found at least together. It is not asserted, however, that the one is the cause of the other.

Note next the history of Israel as illustrated in the Old Testament. Moses, "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," must have known of their doctrine of a future life. It is clear also that he tried to lead his followers to a higher, purer, nobler religion than they had theretofore known. It is just this which gives its great significance to Israel's life and history. But one of two things is clear,—either Moses disbelieved the doctrine of a future life or else he did not regard the faith as important. For he taught nothing of the kind. And it is even true—remarkable as it seems—that Israel had no belief in any general immortality until they came in contact with the Persians, and borrowed it from them. So that Felix Adler might now claim—if he chose—that his agnosticism on this subject is only a going back to the faith of his fathers. And, in spite of all criticism that can be justly made against the character of Israel or the Old Testament, it is doubtless true that the Hebrew people were, morally considered, above the level of most of the nations about them. And this high moral level was accompanied by a disbelief in, or at least a lack of care for, any future life. But here again, it seems to me, that it would be hazarding a good deal to assert the existence of any causal connection between these two facts.

One more historic illustration must suffice. When compared with its general state of civilization, it is undoubtedly true that Europe never reached a lower moral level than during some parts of the so-called "ages of faith." Referring to the moral condition of the court of France during the girlhood of Mary, Queen of Scots, Mr. Swinburne has recently said that it was impossible even to refer to its vices, but that "its virtues were murder and adultery." But in those times, when the State meant tyranny, robbery, and oppression; when the Church meant ambition, venality, license, and the Inquisition; when the monastery stood for corruption, and wandering friars were worse than modern tramps,—in those days there was no doubt on the subject of immortality. Yet no one, I suppose, will think of saying that it was the belief in immortality that caused the corruption.

Historic examples, then, will lend themselves to either side, if one can blink the facts sufficiently to assert that when two things are found in company one of them must be the cause of the other. But it seems to me that a little careful analysis will make the matter clear. And, when the true state of the case is made apparent, the historic illustrations will be seen to fall easily and naturally into their places. So much space has already been taken that the principles underlying the whole question must be stated as briefly as possible. For the sake of clearness and simplicity, let us number the few points we are to make:—

1. Men are governed by motives. And these motives must be made up of the supposed consequences of their actions, as these consequences touch the welfare and happiness of themselves or those—whether God or man—for whom they care. And, further, if men are free from external control or the internal control of overmastering passion, they will necessarily choose what they regard as, on the whole and in the long run, the best. In other words, men will seek what they consider to be worth while.

2. It is characteristic of civilized man to live not merely for to-day, but for the future. The sensible man, who expects to live for forty years, cannot possibly help taking those forty years into account. His life will not be the same as it would be if he knew he would die in one year. Particularly will this be the case, if he knows and realizes that his present course of conduct is determining the happiness or sorrow of the years that are coming.

3. But, however short his life is expected to be, still he will know that cause and effect are inevitably linked together, and that well-being (for ever so short a time) can only be attained by complying with the necessary conditions. If, then, the entire race of man were reduced to a company of twenty men and women on a sinking island, if they knew they could live no more than a month, and if they knew that any other life was only a dream, still morality would not be extinct. Certain conditions of conduct, by which the best possible results of welfare could be attained for the brief life left to them, would still exist. And these would still constitute, for them, a code of morals. It would not be the same code as would accompany a different expectation of life; but it would not cease to be. Neither would they cease to be men and women. Morality, then, does not depend, for its essence, on a time condition. For longer or shorter it exists, according to circumstances, and according to the nature of the beings capable of helping or hurting their fellows.

4. The expectation of a prolonged life on earth, or of another life beyond earth, could not then create morality nor could its absence destroy it. But such an expectation might seriously modify our conception of the "chief end" of life, and so change and intensify our controlling motives. A man will patiently bear much and labor hard for twenty years, if he can regard them as a process leading to something beyond that shall make it all worth his while. But who would willingly bear and labor and suffer, and have it all end in—nothing?

5. If, then, a man anticipates a long future here or an eternal future somewhere else, and if he thinks himself able to determine the character of that future for happiness or misery, he were insane indeed, did not that belief profoundly modify his conduct. But now comes a consideration of that fact which is the cause of all the confused thought on this subject, and which at the same time is able to make all clear. The way in which men have treated the law of cause and effect is the key to the whole problem. He who believes in a future life, and at the same time believes that making this life good is the way, and the only way, to make this life happy,—such a man cannot fail to find his faith his grandest inspiration and his strongest support. Knowing that "what a man sows that shall he also reap," he will naturally and necessarily seek to plant "good seed." But if, as has been true in the case of most religions, he believes he can escape the natural results of his actions if he trusts in a God who promises to save him on some other grounds than those of conduct and character; then his faith in another life may not affect his moral life at all, or it may affect it for the worse. And if, as has been too often true, the Being he thinks of as controlling his destiny be an immoral one, then of course his faith will lead directly to immorality.

The question then being as to whether a belief in another life is a moral advantage to this one, the answer appears to be simple. It all turns on what kind of another life a man believes in, and on what terms he expects to attain it.

M. J. SAVAGE.

SHALL THE INSTRUMENT OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE BE HUNG?

Orthodox clergymen very generally have spoken of President Garfield's death as an act of Divine Providence. It is not infrequent to hear from them the same phrase which the assassin is so fond of using,—that the Almighty "removed" the President,—"removed" him, sometimes it is alleged in "His inscrutable wisdom," and again it is plainly declared as a "visitation," or punishment, for the nation's sins. Now that the trial of Guiteau has ended in a verdict of guilty of murder, for which the penalty is hanging, it is to be wondered whether these Evangelical theologians will oppose, as consistency would certainly require, the application of this penalty to his case. If he was the agent of Divine Providence, will it not be a peculiarly impious sin to put him to death?

Yet these clergy will probably continue to bless their God and to curse the instrument that they say he used; to confuse crime and beneficence; to seek shelter for a pitiful theory under the uncertain wings of an inconsistency; to denounce a presumed blasphemy by being blasphemous; and to drivel over the hidden mercy of a barbarous deed. Is there ever a sadder sight than when human reason thus turns against itself? What suicide more awful and perilous?

I dare say Mr. Foster, the Cincinnati clergyman whose sermon I lately read, believes all he asserted. I am bound to acknowledge that he does. I dare say that, when he said, "Our President has been removed, God has visited our nation and taken away her head," he allowed no bitter thought of Guiteau to remain in his soul. I dare say that he perceived how his "report of the 'assassin's' pistol" touched the reputation of his Deity. I dare say he knew that the "prayer" for the patient's recovery, the "gloom" over his position, and the nation's "pressing" of "the throne of grace" with "earnestness and importunings" were all veriest blasphemies and impudent interruptions of the divine plan. I dare say he realized very satisfactorily that the nation had no right to be "put to grief," or the world to go "in mourning," because of this gentle visitation of his Deity's mercy. Unquestionably, he saw that the plan he applauded as from God he cursed as from Guiteau, that he transfigured human cruelty into divine tenderness.

It is one thing for Mr. Foster to say, "For the nation's sin, Garfield was slain: this is just, because God deals with the nation as a moral personality," and quite a different thing to prove his virtual arraignment of humanity. Why call Guiteau a lunatic or an impostor for claiming what you credit to reason in Foster? Why is Guiteau's assertion of inspiration blasphemy and villany, and Foster's religious? Who is the assassin, in Mr. Foster's view,—God or Guiteau?

Mr. Foster speaks of the "enormity" of "rebellion," as illustrated in that of the South, which was punished. The present rebellion is against God, consisting in the nation's refusal officially to recognize him. For this national recalcitrancy, God is pouring upon us his "wrath and displeasure." "We are as much in duty bound to recognize the Deity as the South was to acknowledge the national supremacy. Our refusal has entailed manifold miseries,—the Chicago, Boston, and Pittsburg fires, the "grasshopper plague," etc. Intemperance, political corruption, Mormonism, all extant immorality, is as nothing against the supreme sin of refusing to recognize the Deity. All the misery in history has come of this same sin.

One wonders from such a description whether it could be that a God were a tramp knocking vainly at the nation's door for admittance; wherein enters the "enormity" of the Southern Rebellion, if God prompted it; whether the nation were not wise in refusing recognition to such a God as Mr. Foster and his fellows create; whether we wish moral lectures from a God who "all through the Christian centuries" has "devoted" the Jewish nation to his "curse"; whether a God who does not discriminate can have any standard of noble excellence.

God waited eighty days to see whether the nation would repent, and, as it was obdurate, he let Garfield die. The course of nature suspended for nearly three months to bring an offending nation to its knees! Why, instead of this miracle, was not the sweeter miracle of conviction performed? When will men cease brooding so continually on the malevolence of nature? Not, we suppose, till they outgrow their own malevolent propensities. This tendency is the peculiar property of Mr. Foster's school.

God "will not recognize us, so long as we do not recognize him." Whence all these visitations, then? They are the Deity's work, it is said. Could Guiteau have knowingly shot Garfield without "recognizing" him? Mr. Foster's phrase is absurd. If he means that his God plays, like the children, at "tit for tat," his absurdity becomes libel. The benevolent man examples benevolence. The kind father does not murder his dear ones, if they disown him. Between his pathetic pity and his never-ended testimonies of love, he makes them loving. He gives justice for injustice: malevolence doubles the crime, and before it love retires. But Mr. Foster says, "No"; for his God is a Presbyterian and a "Church and State" zealot.

Mr. Foster is never tired of calling Garfield "our Christian President." Yet he never more than hobbles, when he speaks of Garfield's "removal." He does not explain why a devotee should thus be picked out to lesson the nation. He does not admit that a peculiar removal of a lot of "infidels" would really have contained a significance. If God had pointedly had Mr. John Fiske and Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Youmans and Mr. F. E. Abbot severally assassinated, Mr. Foster might have had a little justification to prate of lessons. But when all his instances operate against his theory, arguing his Deity whipped incontinently in a contest with a very small province of his kingdom, a little reticence would be becoming, and seem less like an extorted confession of ignorance.

All this is aside from Mr. Foster's fight with the commonest laws of nature. I do not believe that Mr. Foster would have respect for a man with such a character as that with which he invests his God. Not one of all who partake of his view of the late calamity but should curse the doctors, and not Guiteau and themselves for protesting in prayer rather than that miserable prisoner. In consonance with their views, the wail that rose at the awful deed was a reproach to the Almighty. In the light of their belief, Guiteau is justified. If this is "the divine method of preparing this nation for better days," Guiteau was inspired, and was acting on an impulse conveyed from without, for which he was in no wise responsible. If Guiteau's idea was "an insane delusion," so is Mr. Foster's. If Mr. Foster is right, there is an irreconcilable difference between God and man, the latter reproving and damning what the former does and encourages. If this class of believers are right, man has outstripped his Maker in goodness. If Mr. Foster is right, Guiteau is a relatively better man than he, since Guiteau more directly aids the Deity in important works.

Is it not sad that there is a class of Americans who feel thus called upon to stand sponsor for the murder of Garfield? Is it not demoralizing? Whence the impulse that would hang Guiteau and bless his act? We can thus see the danger of a lifeless creed that hangs spectrally over shadowed minds. Such morality is morality only in name. People achieve nobility only in the degree that they practically forget the damaged dogma. Let us be thankful that America has wandered so far from that "millennial" union of Church and State and demoralizing theory that Mr. Foster so persistently predicts. "Guiteau and God" is his battle-cry. We say, "Humanity."

HIERARCHIES.

The Catholic World of November last had an article under the caption "Church Livings in England and in Spain." It was such an article as one would look for in a liberal journal, but not in a magazine published under the sanction of a cardinal and the inspiration of the syllabus of the late pope. The burden of it was the scandalous nepotism and greed of the hierarchy of the Anglican Church and the enormous incomes which its high clergy receive. But avarice and nepotism, far from being peculiarities of the English hierarchy, are the invariable characteristics of all hierarchies, from the priests of Osiris, Isis, and Anubis, down to the present time. A perusal of Ranke's History of the Popes shows that priestly potentates have been rather ahead of all others in absorbing and appropriating the lands, goods, and hereditaments within their reach. The real estate of the city of Mexico is now largely held by the Catholic Church, which in other times, however, was in the habit of devoting to pious use almost the entire property, real and personal, of devout communities, so that wholesale acts of confiscation finally became the only remedy equal to the emergency of restoring an equilibrium between Church and State, between the lay and clerical elements of society.

The Catholic World gives a schedule of the enormous salaries or incomes enjoyed by the English high priests. Such incomes enjoyed by the professed followers of the poor Judean whose kingdom was not of this world, and who, while sojourning in it, had not where to lay his head, are undoubtedly scandalous. The World speaks of "The Comedy of High Churchism" which is going on in England among ecclesiastical Anglo-maniacs. Comedy is the proper word to describe these ritualistic and spectacular performances, whether of the English or any other hierarchic Church. An English army officer, who after the battle of Waterloo found his occupation gone, was, according to the writer in the World, ordained through the influence of his friend, the Duke of York, and for the purpose of enjoying a fat church-living. The Bishop of Cork did the ordaining, as the brief correspondence on the subject shows: "Dear Cork: Ordain Brown. Yours, York." "Dear York: Brown is ordained. Yours, Cork."

Great Britain is among the foremost nations in wealth, intelligence, commerce, and industrial pursuits. Naturally, its high priests live in clover, as did the Roman Catholic high priests of Spain in the sixteenth century, when that country had poured into its lap the wealth of the Indies. Then, the Spanish hierarchy rioted in riches. Mere boys, the illegitimate children of kings and princes, held rich archbishoprics. Then, the terror of the high priests of Toledo, Burgos, Saragossa, and Seville, pervaded both hemispheres, while the smoke of the torment of burning heretics went up as a sweet savor to their nostrils. Now, the Spanish prelates are, according to the Catholic World, living on short allowance, and the torture and destruction of heretics have fallen into disuse. The wheel and the rack are out of date; and Liberals, like the brilliant Castelar, utter words which must grieve the prelates in their humiliation and comparative poverty to the very heart. If for a moment we feel commiseration for them, it is soon checked; for our thoughts go back to Torquemada, Alva, Philip II., Cortez, and Pizarro, the hideous historical group which figured in Spain in her day of power and unequalled cruelty. But we rejoice that Spain is advancing, and that Castelar, the great exceptional Spaniard and truly modern man of genius, is impressing himself powerfully upon the people of his country.

We, too, in this country, have had a hierarchy furnished us from abroad. In our great cities and manufacturing towns, it seems to be flourishing like a bay tree, if its immense expenditure in churches, archiepiscopal palaces, etc., is to be taken as an index of prosperity. The financiering of some of its prelates has not differed materially from that of other officials of moneyed institutions and great manufacturing corporations.

The Catholic World is probably right in prophesying the speedy disestablishment of the English Church and the consequent abatement of its scandals. But the doom of the Anglican Church will be that of all other hierarchic churches in the future. The French hierarchy is determined not to live on amicable terms with the authorities of the French Republic, but to plot and wage perpetual war against it. This determination may hasten the separation of Church and State in France. Popular government is the order of the day in that country, while attachment to ecclesiasticism and regard for the authority of its representatives grow less every year. Ecclesiastical hierarchies are survivals, and no really modern community has use for them. But a portion of mankind is still unmodern, and is slow in accepting and assimilating new truths and adjusting itself to changes that involve the relinquishment of old habits and beliefs.

CONCERNING EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH.

We have received the official report of the public schools of Bibb County, Georgia, for the year ending Aug. 31, 1881.

The president of the board, Joseph Clisby, expresses pleasure in the improvements made during the year, especially in the school-houses, both for white and colored pupils. As Macon, which has been noted for its good schools, is in this county, it is probably a favorable specimen of the results of the school system in Georgia.

The appropriations are still insufficient for keeping the schools open throughout the year; but a spring and fall term works very well, especially in the country schools.

The statistics of attendance are interesting. The colored population in the county is larger than the white; but the percentage of white school population enrolled is 65, while that of the colored is only 31. The number of white pupils in city schools is 1,240; in country, 544; of colored pupils in the city, 641; in the country, 1,005.

This shows that the colored people in the country attend schools more than the whites,—an important fact, as the diffusion of intelligence throughout the working class of the State will have great influence on its destiny.

The average attendance of the whites, especially in the city, is rather better than of the colored being nearly six-sevenths in one case and six-eighths in the other; while the proportion of teachers in the white schools is 1 to 29 of the average attendance, and in the colored schools 1 to 34. These facts show that a great deal is being done in the regular legal management of the schools to give education to all classes at the South, but that the colored man is not yet placed on an entirely equal footing, and that his friends should still supplement the work of the States by encouragement and help.

We observe with pleasure in one report that corporal punishment is discouraged and restrained, and its application to girls forbidden. A slight sectional prejudice is observable in the examinations in history, as the pupil is bid to name "five unsuccessful Union generals who led armies against Richmond during the Civil War, and tell where they were met and defeated."

HENRY W. BELLWS.

As we were sending the last items to the printer for last week's Index, the intelligence came from New York that Dr. Bellows was dead. Though the disease of which he died threatened him several weeks ago, and kept him then housed for a short time, his final illness was of brief duration, and his death has come with a sudden shock to his many friends. His last public service appears to have been on January 17, when he took part in an ordination service at Harlem, and spoke, it is reported, with all his old force and impressiveness. On the 18th, he officiated at a wedding in Brooklyn. On the 19th, he was taken sick; but a physician was not deemed necessary until the 21st. On the 24th, a council of physicians was called, but gave little hope of his recovery. On the 30th, he died. His age was sixty-eight, and he had recently finished forty-three years of continuous service in the church of which he was minister in New York.

Dr. Bellows was a zealous denominational Unitarian, and devoted himself with all the large resources of his mind and heart and soul and strength to the building up of the Unitarian Church. He believed earnestly in the Unitarian faith, and believed it was a good faith for the world as well as for the few people who accepted it. Hence, he was first and foremost in all efforts for organizing and extending the Unitarian form of belief. If the principles and polity of Unitarianism could have allowed a bishop, he would have been the natural selection for the place. Though not a profound scholar nor a philosophical thinker, he had great qualities of leadership. He was an organizer and worker, many-sided, many-handed. Not thinking deeply, he yet thought largely; was capable of conceiving large schemes, and had the energy and wisdom and personal power to carry them through to successful accomplishment. As an orator, he held high rank, more especially in extemporaneous speech. The side which had his advocacy in a public meeting was pretty sure to win. It is safe to say that, while the Unitarian denomination has no one man as its head, there is yet no other man in it who will precisely fill the place which he has filled these many years.

But Dr. Bellows, though a zealous Unitarian, was very much more than that. In New York, he was among the few most eminent and useful citizens. By his long career there, he had become identified with the best interests of the city. He threw the weight of his great influence into every cause that had at heart the welfare of the community. And during the civil war, as President of the Sanitary Commission, he did a national work and won a national reputation. Through his addresses delivered in all the large cities of the North from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the enthusiasm of the people for this organization of mercy was kindled, branch societies were everywhere formed, and money poured by millions into the treasury.

Doctrinally, Dr. Bellows cared little for consistency. Having no very definite system of theology or philosophy other than the indefinite and changeable belief denominated Unitarianism, he was much swayed in his doctrinal attitude by his transient moods and sympathies. Once at least he astonished even conservative Unitarians by his ultra reactionary tendencies toward church creeds and forms. But more than once he has astonished radical Unitarians by the liberality of his utterances. In general, however, it may be said that his denominational influence has been conservative. In the famous conflicts over the Preamble to the Constitution of the National Unitarian Conference, out of which came the Free Religious Association, he fought the left-wing Unitarians with all his power. They doubtless would have been conquered in any event, yet he made the victory over them more complete. But, with all his conservatism, he was progressive. And now, for several years, he has manifested, both in public and private utterances, a most broad and hospitable sympathy toward the new rationalistic thought of the younger men of the denomination. He had the insight and foresight to see the inevitable trend of denominational belief, and he was prepared to accept it with composure. It should be added that personally he was among the kindest and most generous of men. Whether friend or foe, he was the same magnanimous, whole-souled man. If friend, you could have none better. If foe, he was an open and honest one; and, while he opposed your cause with all his might, his heart and hand were ever ready to do you a personal benefit. Such natures have a weight and power of character beyond any sum of their separate resources, however large.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

In the Sunday School Times, Rev. Dr. Robinson (President of Brown University) writes on the observance of Sunday, especially with reference to the training of children. In some important particulars, he departs widely from the old-fashioned argument for keeping Sunday. For instance, with regard to the Old Testament commandment, he says:—

It is not wise to base the entire Sabbath argument upon the fourth precept in the Decalogue. For it happens to be the only one of the ten which is not repeated nor reenacted in set terms in the New Testament. No laws are given by Christ or by his apostles concerning the forms of observance. We shall become perplexed if we attempt to rest our case upon simple legal enactment. Our safety in such discussions consists in our fastening attention upon the gracious and benevolent character of the divine institution. God gives us this one day of the week as his peculiar offering for our bodily and spiritual need: he does not order it nor claim it for any necessities of his own.

And again, with regard to the needs of children, he talks as if he remembered his own childhood, as follows:—

We must consider the Lord's day as a freedom rather than a restriction. So it will seem to us a gracious respite. It is sometimes said that one reason why our Sundays fail so often of their highest end is because the children in the family circles dread the coming of each one in turn as the most melancholy day of the week.

We have the explanatory testimony of the great Dr. Johnson on this point, from which it appears that he was loaded actually down with tedious occupations at the moment when, from deprivation of usual reliefs of entertainment, he was taken at serious disadvantage. "Sunday was a heavy day to me, when I was a boy," he says: "my mother confined me on that day, and made me read The Complete Duty of Man, from a great part of which I could derive no instruction. There was no accession of ideas."

We might as well bear in mind that children are only small men and women; and most grown-up people would rebel, if some of them were simply put under restriction in order that others of them might be rid of ministering to their comfort. It does not appear quite fair in a household that all the freedoms should be on one side and all the restraints on the other. If poor, tired parents demand on the Lord's day to be quit of their children, why should not poor, tired children be suffered to be quit of their parents? Is it not too bad to load them down with a study of Baxter's Saints' Rest, while other saints are resting?

Our young contemporary, the Jewish Watchman, commenting on a Book of Morals for Public Schools, which is in course of preparation under a committee in Massachusetts, utters no uncertain sound with regard to religious instruction and exercises in the public schools, but speaks well and wisely on the need of specific moral instruction in them:

We are for free and unsectarian education. The reading of Scriptural passages, with or without comment, the reciting of sectarian prayers, and the singing of religious hymns, do not belong in the public school. The Church and the Sunday-school are the proper places for that part of instruction. There should be no priest, no pastor, no sacrament, no Bible, in our schools. Our public educational institutions, stripped of all sectarianism, should be our national pride, our diadem of glory. Some book, however, should be used which may suggest, and by distinct and well-known examples illustrate, the lessons of morality, justice, virtue, goodness, love, charity, human dignity, truth, and liberty. Each lesson and each duty should be explained and illustrated by standard and effective examples from ancient and modern history and biography, but only from a natural stand-point. The School Board has not only the right, but the duty to provide for the moral training of the rising generation.

The committee that has this Book of Morals in charge represents a variety of religious denominations,—Methodist, Congregationalist, Baptist, Unitarian, Universalist, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, and Hebrew. Even Archbishop Williams is on the committee for the Roman Catholics. Such a committee should certainly have good detective qualities against any special denominational tenets getting into the book; but, whether it will be a book so entirely disconnecting morals from theology as the Jewish Watchman advocates, we should not like to prophesy. If the committee, as named, can prepare or approve such a book, it will be one of the most notable religious signs of the times that has yet appeared.

APPROPOS of the action taken by the cabinets of Germany, Austria, and England, concerning the Pope, the New York Tablet says:—

The statesmen of Europe admit that the present state of affairs in Rome is intolerable, and must be settled one way or another. A pamphlet has been published at Rome, evidently with official approval, with a view of preparing men's minds for some startling developments. . . . Russia, England, and Prussia unite the spiritual and temporal in their respective sovereigns; while the Liberals of Catholic France and Italy, having gained a temporary political ascendancy, are using all the agencies at their command to make the spiritual a merely tolerated adjunct of the State policy. The supporters of the pope, therefore, fight for spiritual liberty,—in fact, for spiritual life against infidelity, tyranny, and bigotry. It is a mistake to assert that the pope has ever been opposed to a united Italy. He has been simply opposed to a union which made Rome the capital of Italy and the pope a subject.

It is one of the freaks of history that Protestant countries, like Prussia and England, should have to be appealed to for protecting the pope. Italy is doubtless willing and able to give him all the protection that he needs, though not all that he thinks his spiritual dignity demands. When the Tablet talks of the papal supporters "fighting for spiritual liberty," it means of course that they are fighting for the right to remain spiritual slaves. We hope Italy will not be frightened by the Protestant alliances of Austria into giving up Rome to the pope, and making Florence its capital.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WE shall give in our next issue an ably written and interesting letter on "Liberalism in Australia," from the pen of Mr. Charles Bright, the Australian Liberal lecturer who is now in California. The San Francisco papers speak of him in terms of high praise. The Alta-Californian says, "He has a good voice and fine delivery, with all the ease and appearance of a cultivated scholar and practised public speaker." The Evening Post finds him "a man of culture and refinement," who treats his subject "in a broad philosophic spirit." The Sydney, N. S. W., correspondent of the Dumedin, New Zealand, Echo, writes of Mr. Bright's departure for America as follows: "We have lost Mr. Charles Bright, who gave up his Sunday evening lectures some time ago, and left for San Francisco by the 'Zealandia' a fortnight since. His powers have in no way decreased, and his last lectures were among the most successful he has given; while his illness seems, if anything, to have improved his wonderful voice. At his concluding lecture, at least fifteen hundred people were present, and the cheering was vociferous." Mr. Bright will visit and lecture in the East before his return to Australia.

THE small-pox scare which is extending all over the country is made the occasion of an anti-vaccination discussion, which may result in some light being thrown upon both sides of this disputed subject.

"WITH the danger always of an increase of idler hands as well as of higher education," says Gov. Long, "there is a growing interest felt in industrial schools. It would certainly be fortunate if the influence of such institutions as the Institute of Technology and the Free Industrial Institute could be extended to the common schools, and the educated faculties of the child be directed toward those industrial arts to which he must look for a livelihood.

THE view generally taken by horticulturists, that tree-planting tends to increase the rain-fall, finds confirmation in the fact that greater rain-falls have occurred in Utah during the past season than had occurred previously since the settlement of the Mormons at Salt Lake. During the past few years, large numbers of trees have been planted in the farming regions of the Territory; and the agriculturists are now beginning to reap the reward of their foresightedness.

A WRITER in Nature, after experimenting on the subject, comes to the conclusion that sea-foam, especially that which is persistent in remaining some time in the form of froth, is due to the combination of some kind of sea-weed with the ocean-water, on being shaken together violently by the waves. "Not of that," he says, "which is tossed about by every tide, but of the laminaria which is uprooted and torn by the waves only when the violent agitation of the sea reaches a sufficient depth."

ANOTHER colored clergyman, Mr. Johnson of Hamilton, Ontario, comes out publicly and piously in defence of the proposition that "the sun do move." "If," he says, "you take a telescope and look at the dark spots on the sun, you will see they move. That shows it has motion. The Bible offers satisfactory proof on this question. Let us turn to Malachi, and see what he says. Doesn't he speak of the sun rising and going down? How could it, I want to know, if it didn't have motion? Look at Joshua! Didn't he want the sun should stand still? If it was not moving, how could it stand still? Perhaps some of my scientific friends will answer that. Besides, if the world is round and revolves, we must be standing on our heads part of the time. I don't remember any such occasion, do you? They tell us the earth is round. I don't believe it. The earth is flat and has four corners, that's what I believe; for the Bible says the wind comes from the four corners." Mr. Johnson's knowledge of science is evidently rather limited, but his acquaintance with the Scriptures and faith in their teachings seem to be beyond question.

PROF. ROBERTSON SMITH, declaring that he has not denied the standards of the Church to which he belongs, says: "Ministers, indeed, who do not agree with the recognized standards which form the bond of union, should not remain. Honesty requires them not to wait to be thrust out." That is honest and sensible. When a man no longer believes in the creed of a society to which he belongs, he ought to leave it voluntarily, and not wait to be kicked out. If the thousands of ministers who have no sympathy with leading doctrines of their denomination would act in accordance with the above principle, they would have, at least, their own self-respect and be able to exert a much better influence than they possibly can in their present false position. Many ministers seem to think that, having prepared themselves for the pulpit, preaching is their only legitimate business, and that, if they cannot get a good salary for preaching what they believe, they are half-justified in pandering to what they do not believe, giving to those who are acquainted with their real views all sorts of explanations and excuses. A man who cannot command attention and sustain himself preaching what he believes true, ought to leave the pulpit and go into some business in which he can be straightforward, independent, and honest.

THE Chicago Times, commenting on the manner in which the church trial of a Methodist minister, at Bloomington, Ill., has been conducted, remarks: "Most clergymen have a singular idea of what scandal consists of; and, if charges are made against the moral character of one of their number, they are wild with fear lest it shall get into the papers, they are crazy to hush the thing up. If a trial results, it must at least be a secret trial, so that nothing will get out. This is, of course, a total misapprehension. If, when a minister is charged with immorality, all the other ministers of his conference or presbytery or association should demand a full and free investigation, and, when the accused is found guilty, should demand adequate punishment, the public would infer that these ministers disapproved of immorality, and would have none of it in their circle. There would be a scandal, but it would attach only to the guilty man. It would not attach to his clerical brethren who repudiated him, or his church which cast him out. But, when they all demand that the unfortunate matter shall be hushed up, and seem a great deal more sorry over publication in the papers than over the commission of the offence, and proceed, if a trial becomes necessary, to try the accused in secret, so that the evidence can be suppressed as to the public, it is not singular that some persons draw a very different inference."

A RUSSIAN correspondent of the London Times has compiled from authentic sources an account of the barbarous persecutions of the Jews in the south and west of Russia. The revelations are horrible. The following statement in general terms will give some idea of the extent of the persecution and the cruelties which have characterized it:—

During the past eight months, a tract of country equal in area to the British Isles, and France combined, stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea, has been the scene of horrors that have hitherto only been perpetrated in mediæval days during times of war. Men ruthlessly murdered, tender infants dashed to death or roasted alive in their own homes, married women the prey of a brutal lust that has often caused their death, and young girls violated in the sight of their relatives by soldiers who should have been the guardians of their honor,—these have been the deeds with which the population of Southern Russia has been stained since last April. In the face of these horrors, loss of property is of little moment; yet they have been accompanied by the razing of whole streets inhabited by Jews, by the systematic firing of the Jewish quarters of towns in Western Russia, and by the pillage of all the property on which thousands of Jewish families were dependent for existence.

The details of the carnage, outrage, and pillage, are frightful to contemplate. The persecution lasted at Elizabethgrad forty-eight hours; and during that time, in the Jewish quarter, five hundred houses and a hundred shops were demolished, thirty Jewesses outraged by soldiers, and property stolen and destroyed to the amount of two million rubles ($1,500,000). At Kief, two thousand Jews were left without shelter by the burning of their homes. Men were killed, and twenty-five women were violated. Similar atrocities have been perpetrated in almost every town in Southern and Western Russia. Meanwhile, the government has been apparently unconcerned. Sometimes, the soldiers have been called out to put down the riots; but all the reports show that they have been the most prominent actors in the outrages and brutalities that have occurred. Whatever is alleged against the Jews, there can be no justification of these horrible cruelties nor of the indifference of the Czar. No wonder that large public meetings are held in London and other cities to protest against the treatment of the Jews in Russia, which should indeed arouse the indignation of the whole civilized world.

The Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 9, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

TWO "GODLESS" KINGS.

King Cheops Egypt's temples shut and barred,
And calves and onions went unworshipped for
The space of fifty years. So long he reigned.
Altars were smokeless, priests to secular toll
By royal mandate stern were strictly kept.
So Egypt's gods a long vacation had.
Meantime, the sun and river made the land,
Though prayerless, with wonted plenty teem.
As morning's ray from the Arabian sands
Touched Memnon's lips with violet and gold,
Vibrated they with wonted melody,
And when, from far Saharan solitudes,
The sun with level splendor cities steeped
And fens and palms, their farewell sweet was heard.

Labor, not piety, the fashion was
In Egypt 'neath this so-called impious king.
Like emmets toiled the multitude, rearing
His pyramid, whose stones in cosmic order
Were laid and plumb'd by beams of planet, star.
So year by year the pile grew mountain-like,
O'erlooking Delta and divided Nile,
Henceforth to be, like river, palms, and fens,
And crocodiles, of rainless Egypt part.
'Tis hoar e'en now with forty centuries.
And Cheops' son was like his godless sire,
Foe unto superstition and its rites.
He, too, reigned half a century, and kept
The temples barred and prayerless all the time.
Thus, ancient Egypt had immunity
From priestcraft for a hundred godless years,
While Nilus swelled and annual harvests bloomed.

LIVE THOUGHTS OLD OR NEW.

LIFE itself

And the best too, like tunes in mechanism,

THE EVOLUTION OF THE CHURCH.

A Discourse delivered in Unity Church, Chicago, Jan. 22, 1882.

BY GEORGE C. MILN.

[Reprinted from the Chicago Times.]

I propose to glance at the past history of that social institution known as the Church, for the purpose of ascertaining through what forms and by what processes it has reached its present condition, and also that we may with approximate precision forecast what its future will be. To accomplish this purpose with thoroughness—that is, to enter into all the details of church history, to analyze closely and accurately the present status of the Church, and then to picture with anything approaching to particularity the future which lies before it—would be at ask calling for the space of many volumes, and requiring for its performance the learning of the historian, the passion of the scientist, and the imagination of a prophet. Let me, then, disallow at once any such ambitious and wearisome project. Instead of entering into all this infinite variety of detail, I would simply pass before you with panoramic swiftness the salient features which suggest themselves, as one thinks of the past, the present, and the future of the Church. My excuse for calling your thought to this theme, if any excuse is needed, is found in the fact that in the progress of thought upon so-called religious subjects the divine institution of the Church has been called in question, and its value as a constructive and formative instrumentality has been thrown into debate. It is a common thing to-day to hear the opinion advanced that the churches are of little value to society, that they impede its progress, that they retard rather than accelerate its evolution into higher and nobler conditions. Mr. Herbert Spencer, I think, has clearly shown that the advance of social science is hindered by those various intellectual preconceptions which he has spoken of as so many "biases" running athwart the straight lines of scientific exactitude. Those who have read his works—and those who have not are to be envied only in view of the great treat which lies before them—will recall his chapters on the "educational," the "political," and the "theological" biases, in which he shows how the incrusts of views of by-gone days rise up in the pathway of present progress, and how slow and painful, consequently, human development must ever be. And, although Mr. Spencer has not yet written out his views in regard to the Church, it is easy to prognosticate that he will apply the same logic to it that he has to other institutions, and show that in her obstinate adhesion to the forms and traditions of the past, in her supreme reverence for antiquity, and her ill-concealed distrust of the present, as well as in her reluctance to adapt her forms and her formularies to the advanced thought of humanity, the Church, too, may be classified as an obstructive bias in the path of social science. At any rate, whether our great teacher shall reach this conclusion or not, many of his disciples have already done so; and many more—not his disciples, I hope, and certainly lacking the calm and dispassionate spirit with which he approaches every theme—are heard to exclaim in our time against the Church as an antiquated, useless, and bigoted incubus upon society. So intense and frequent are these sneering exclamations that we who stand within the Church cannot afford to ignore them. If they are true, then I for one would fain exchange the old ark for a vessel of more modern build. If they are true, the sooner the churches are closed, the better for society. If they are false, then surely we should be prepared to show wherein they are false. And if, which is most likely, they are partly true and partly false, why, then, it is our office to discriminate between the true and the false; to profit by the former by modifying the existing forms and statements of the Church, to refute the latter by reasonable demonstration.

Perhaps the first inquiry suggested to the mind by the protests against the Church, of which I have just spoken, is in regard to its origin. Is the Church an institution organized for the defence and propagation of old traditions, of malignant views of the Deity, of derogatory and hypochondriac views of man? Was it originated for this work, and has it grown great in doing it? Or is it true that the germ from which the Church, as it now exists, has evolved, was wrapped up, and of necessity included in the nature of man himself? If the former by hypothesis be accepted, we may as well admit that the days of the Church are numbered, for men are tired of hearing themselves described as heirs of hell, weary of hearing the Deity described in repulsive terms, and disgusted with the arrogance of an institution which pretends to a monopoly of divine favor and guidance. But if the latter postulate be accepted, and it is acknowledged that the germ from which the Church has sprung is a constituent and inseparable element in the nature of man, then our only alternative is to so modify the Church, as well in ceremonial of worship as in method of work, as to bring it into line with the formative forces of the nineteenth century.

For myself, I need scarcely say to you that I accept and believe most thoroughly the latter hypothesis. The Church is because man is; and man could not have been what he is without erecting an institution analogous to the Church. If, now, we attempt to penetrate the veil of history and reach that distant period when the Church existed only in embryonic form, we shall, I think, find corroboration of this view. Of course, we cannot enter into particulars; for such an attempt brings us to the threshold of that impenetrable mystery, "the beginning of things," and, when we cross that threshold and enter that weird domain, we must be prepared to rely on a constructive imagination which will, out of a few fragments of a fact, create for us a theory in regard to the origin of the organization whose history affords such wealth of incident, such enthusiasm of endeavor. There is, I may say in passing, a rather doubtful cause of satisfaction to the student of the Church's beginning and growth, in the reflection that the Church is not alone in the mystery of its inception. All institutions, all sciences, all arts,—yes, even human speech itself,—have to confess to the presence of a cloud of mystery above their cradles. Nebulae and mists enshroud and make forever conjectural the beginning of all things.

Calling to our aid that faculty which has been termed the creative imagination, it seems eminently probable that the root from which the Church has developed was the religious impulse or instinct which all men possess in common. Schleiermacher attempts to describe this instinct, when he says: "With reference to the infinite, as the unity of the universe, man has a feeling of absolute dependence. In this feeling, religion has its root." That is, in a feeling of dependence. This estimate seems to me just and yet not exact. I should modify it by saying that primitive man, being thrown into contact with nature, observing its forces but not comprehending them, must have experienced the conviction that there was in the force which lay back of all phenomena, himself included, a power superior to any possessed by himself. This conviction constituted between himself and this unseen force the relation of superior and inferior. Prehistoric man felt, we may safely suppose, the presence of, though he could not clearly discern or describe it, a cause comprehending all causes; and, in his attempt to trace phenomena back to some known and appreciable source, I believe we have the germ of that mysterious feeling which I have termed the religious impulse. Man found himself alone in the world. He saw about him other and inferior forms of life; but in point of superiority of nature, in the possession of higher and more varied powers, he was relatively alone. And yet his own nature, its subjection to forces beyond his analysis, as well as the vast and ever-increasing marvels of life in the lower ranges, constantly impelled him to seek for that originating force which he has never found. Mark the assertion,—which he has never found, I say. For, while the theologian may fondly suppose he has solved the riddle by calling this inscrutable force "God," he has in fact but carried it one step further back, and in doing so made it more mysterious than ever. Nor has the prying philosopher succeeded better. Resolving all elements into an original element supposed to include all, he has had, according to the first grave-digger's advice to the second, when asked to account for the origin of this primal element. And the man of science, without attempted concealment, confesses himself as dazed by the same wonder. In truth, when we try to account for the origin of things, whether by the crucible of science, the hypothesis of philosophy, or the dogma of theology, we have to confess ourselves one and all as agnostics. We don't know; and, moreover, we do not find any one else that does. But this very mystery which enshrouds the beginning of things, involving the recognition of a force beyond our analysis, this it is that I take to be the germ of that religious impulse which is in turn the root from which the Church has developed.

So far, we have only accounted for the presence of the religious impulse in man, and have affirmed the belief that in it is found the germinal form of all subsequent religious organizations. The next step, manifestly, is to trace this germinal form till we find it blossomed forth into the institution to-day known as the Church. To do this and still adhere to the telegraphic brevity of the modern sermon is not easy. But let us at least essay the task. It can scarcely be needful that I forewarn you that this method of accounting for the Church is inimical to and destructive of that theory of the Church which regards it as an institution divinely originated and appointed,—as an institution, in a word, “let down from heaven,” like the New Jerusalem, “as a bride adorned for her husband.” To no such view as this can I subscribe. I see the Church, rather, new-born and naked in the nature of primitive man; and, as I watch it in its progress across the centuries, I see it gathering its garments, some grotesque, some repulsive, some beautiful, from the different lands and the various civilizations through which it has passed. In other words, the Church, in common with all other human institutions, has undergone a gradual transformation from its simple and primitive form into a more complex and differentiated form. If this is not true, then at least the Church is the one solitary exception to the universal law that heterogeneity of structure keeps pace with the evolution of the organism.

Suppose, then, for an instant, we place ourselves beside primitive man, as he experiences the conviction already referred to, that there is in the universe a mysterious force transcending and including all other forces: what are the steps we shall have to take in order to reach something analogous to the Church as it now is? They are, I am glad to say, few and simple, though stretching across vast reaches of time. First, we shall see an attempt on the part of primitive man to propitiate this mysterious power,—an attempt to court favor with it. Witnessing its malevolent as well as its beneficent manifestations, he would attempt to ingratiate himself into its favor and to avert from himself its injuries. This attempt would express itself either in self-humiliations, in self-inflicted tortures, in the offering of sacrifices, or in any other form which might suggest itself as acceptable to the untaught imagination of early man. I think the myth of Cain and Abel enshrines this idea in picturesque form. Abel, who was a shepherd, as the story runs, “brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof,” while Cain, “a tiller of the ground,” “brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord.” Thus would primitive man seek to propitiate the unseen power which he believed to exist; and in this germ form we may, I believe, trace back whatever of sacrifice or ceremony is still found in the Church.

A second step away from the simple and toward the complex church form will bring us to the Church of the family. This arose, we may suppose, out of the natural superiority of the father, which would make him the most appropriate person to approach and propitiate the unseen, and also out of the natural convenience of such an arrangement. This system we find in vogue in the early patriarchal days pictured in the Hebrew scriptures, the father being not only judge and general of his numerous progeny and following, but also the only priest they ever knew. Another step will carry us to the tribal priest, who for a single tribe would offer sacrifice and utter invocations. And at this point we see the origin of the priestly class, which has continued to this day, which has often pretended in the past, and in many cases still pretends, to possess certain prerogatives and powers directly bestowed upon it by the Deity. I will not stop to moralize; but, if I were to do so, I should express a regret that the priestly class was ever allowed to arrogate to itself the kind of go-between-ship which has proven, I am sure, more of a curse than a blessing to humanity. Supposing the mysterious force of which I have spoken to exist under the terms of personality, what right has one man to suppose that his approach to it will be more favorably received than his brother's? But this, of course, is the radical assumption upon which all the claims of priestly power and prerogative will be ultimately found to rest; and the sooner any such assumption is obliterated from human thought, the better will it be for the growth of rational religion and pure morality. I have not so far, as you have doubtless observed, made reference to the transformation of belief in regard to the unseen power, and the relation sustained toward it by man. This, of course, would immediately precede any radical change in religious ceremonial and practice, and would be also as susceptible to the influence of new phases of thought as the religious ceremony to novel forms of procedure. As man's knowledge of the forces of nature was enlarged, as he attained to more accurate information in regard to those forces, in all their varied manifestations, he would of necessity grow into wider and more intelligent views of the one great force behind all forces. And, if you will follow a single digression, it is in the fact of this unceasing enlargement of view upon natural phenomena and their causes that we have the explanation of the ever-changing theological conceptions of the ages, and the promise of still other and greater changes in the future. There can be no fixity of theological conception, because each generation, with its increasing knowledge, will formulate its conception of the primal cause, and, in formulating it, change or overturn the conceptions of past generations. “Ultimate fixity of opinion,” in regard to the whole range of philosophical and theological subjects, “is here unattainable.”

But we have now reached a point where the Church appears as something concrete and organic. The tribal, or race, Church has peculiarities of organism and spirit which place it well within the range of close examination. It was under this form that the Church existed among the Jews.

They were a “peculiar and a holy people,” were all included in the Church, on the ground of their birth or adoption into the theocracy. And of this national Church, that is, a Church which includes a man because of his birth, and not on the ground of any subjective change in the man himself, there are two striking and antithetical peculiarities. The first is its wide inclusiveness. It embraces all sorts and conditions of men, provided they are born within certain limitations. The meanest and the loftiest Jew, the noblest and the unworthiest, stood on a common plane in regard to the Church and its privileges. No test was imposed, no concession required. It was enough that they were the children of Abraham, the head of the Church and the “Father of the Faithful.”

The other peculiarity of this form of the Church is its absolute exclusiveness. Upon its altar was written, “Salvation is of the Jews”; and in the dispensation of its mercies and dignities it was as close a corporation as a nineteenth century railway company. Bishop Horne, speaking on this subject, says: “The Jews became proud of their titles, and of their ecclesiastical privileges, extending their charity only to those of their own faith; while toward the rest of mankind they cherished a sullen and inveterate hatred, accounting them to be profane persons and sinners.” Still, their exclusiveness did not prevent their admitting proselytes who would submit to the customary initial ceremonies of circumcision and baptism.

I have thus briefly, but I trust with some distinctness, traced the Church from its germinal form, in the attempt of a man to account for natural phenomena, down through the successive stages of individual, family, tribal, and national evolution. And I may at this point say that all the facts involved point to a similar origin for all churches. Trace back the religion of Egypt, of Greece, of India, of ancient Rome, or of the Jews, and you will find their source in the simple attempt to account for natural phenomena by detecting their cause. This attempt, blended with the reverence and awe felt toward that unknown cause, undergoing various modifications on its journey through the centuries, will be found in a last analysis to be the one thing in common between all religions.

I shall spend little time in a description of what the Church has been during the Christian era. Early Christianity gave a new form to the Church by wedding Jewish monotheism to pagan ceremonial. It maintained the old exclusiveness of the theocracy, but based it upon subjective grounds rather than upon mere considerations of birth. It excluded, and still excludes, all who have not been born again. Its privileges and immunities, together with its promised rewards, were withheld from all but those who had passed through the subjective changes prescribed by its dogmatists; and, speaking generally, these characteristics of exclusiveness as toward the alien, and inclusiveness as toward the saint, have clung to the Church throughout its history. Heaven, glittering with ten thousand indescribable glories, peace of heart in the sense of forgiven sin, the security and defence of ecclesiastical ceremonial, it has ever held before the eyes of its devotees. The soul once within the charmed circle, no power could interpose between it and salvation. On the other hand, for all who have rejected her overtures and conditions, the Church has reserved indescribable tortures in the future, a guarantee and foretaste of which she has sometimes disbursed in its present. Hell, dark and deep, for all without her lines; heaven, holy and glorious, for all encircled by her arms.

I will only add a single concluding remark in drawing this sketch of the Church's past to a close. It is this: there has always been, and still is, a division of opinion within the Church as to the relative authority of the Church and the Bible. Romanists practically have maintained the superiority of the Church. The Church only can interpret the Scriptures. Protestants, on the other hand, have maintained the superiority of the Scriptures. Chillingworth's famous axiom, “The Bible, and the Bible alone, is the religion of Protestants,” has received almost universal indorsement among Protestants. This distinction gives rise to an infinite variety of differences in ceremonial, in dogma, and in the polity of the Church, in regard to which I have not time to speak to-day. I will only say at last that, while Protestantism threw off the yoke of the Church,—a grievous and burdensome yoke,—she bowed her neck to the yoke of an infallible book, which it will take a gradual evolution or another Reformation to release her from. The Church of the past, then, is an institution growing out of the religious impulse in man's nature, gathering to itself certain forms and ceremonies for the expression of its supplications and devotions, arrogating to itself certain prerogatives and monopolies, and exercising a more than autocratic sway over human thought and human conduct. Inasmuch as it has disseminated elevating moral views, it has been of value as a constructive force in society. Inasmuch as it has propagated repulsive views of Deity, degrading views of the nature of man, narrow and erroneous conceptions of the universe, it has been destructive to human happiness and an impediment to human welfare.

NOTES FROM WASHINGTON.

Editors of The Index:—

Since my last letter, Washington has been honored with the presence of various literary individuals: Professor Thomas, the State entomologist of Indiana, who came with the famous Maya Calendar in manuscripts purchased by him at the sale in Paris of the effects of a distinguished ethnologist; Mr. Freeman, the historian; and Mr. Oscar Wilde, who brought only himself,—a possession which he evidently considered so precious that it needed no addition.

I confess that my estimate of the virility and common-sense of Washington society, en masse, rose several degrees on account of the manner in which this last individual was received. When we consider that his absurdities have given rise to the prettiest of modern operas, that we have been laughing at the caricatures of him in Punch for two years, and that he has come to this country to set off Bunthorne and convert our whole nation to the worship of beauty, we see that we really have some reason to look at him well. But, alas! where shall we find the beauty that has no relation to manners or morals, which has no type beyond the things of sense, no reverence woven into its very being for what is spiritual? If a woman's face is fair, it is because it suggests qualities and fulfils of the soul within that shall be fairer still. If lilies charm us with their fragrance or silence us with their color, it is because the first suggests serene harmonies of delight or the last brings down the blue of heaven or shimmers in the sunshine till it suggests an angel's wing. Only a few nights ago, I saw Mr. Wilde stretched at length upon a sort of settee, with his arms over his head. Near him stood his hostess; but the guests who came to bid her good-night paid no more attention to the lounging aesthete than to the colored waiter who went back and forth with salad and cream.

The want of manners, however, as exhibited by our transatlantic guest, is not confined to the aesthete. Very lately, a man who would not have been received if he had not proved himself to possess brains, was courteously asked, by one of our most exclusive hosts, if he would help himself to the canvass-back before him. High art requires that duck, like mutton, should be served rare; and this Englishman, just emerged from the shadows of a prebendal close, answered curtly, "I do not eat my meat raw!" What would have befallen the unhappy American who should have been guilty of this at the table of Macaulay or Lord Brougham?

The Maya Calendar excites all the more interest on account of the as yet unaccepted labors of Le Plongeon at Uxmal, where the Maya is still as much a living tongue as the Greek is in Athens. Professor Thomas claims that he has thoroughly penetrated the mysteries of his manuscript, but is wise enough to offer no details of his method. This is what every scientist must do, if he would not have his honors snatched from him before they are confirmed. But still in the dark as to his method, and full of interest in the parallelisms of ancient life in Yucatan and Egypt, which seem to have been discovered by Le Plongeon, I cannot help wondering that any student should be willing to show work done only in the closet, when the field is accessible, and it would be so easy to prove on the spot what relation the old symbols still bear to the modern life. Any one who has seen the traces of Egyptian features and customs on the Peruvian pottery in the private collection of Mr. Walton Evans, of New Rochelle, finds it difficult to wait for the solution of the mystery.

This week comes Mr. Phillips, of the New York Times, to assist in the classification of the potteries and porcelains of our National Museum. This building, into which the returning surveys are pouring their treasures, is still the scene of apparent confusion; but Professor Goode and his assistants are working steadily toward order, and next month I shall be able to give you an account of its methods, authorized by himself. James Stevenson, attached to Major Powell's Ethnological Bureau, and his wife, who went with him to the Pueblos, and published last April an account of the Zuñi towns, illustrated by plates furnished by the Smithsonian, have just returned from their latest trip. Mrs. Stevenson is a capital collector. A refined and charming woman, she is still sturdy enough to sleep on the ground, rolled in her blankets, and candid enough to win the complete confidence of the women of the tribes. Mr. Lewis Morgan, of Rochester, lately deceased, whose clear-headed work has removed many obstacles from the path of the American ethnologist, has quoted Mrs. Stevenson's work with approbation; while a late number of the Naturalist asserts that it contributes three hitherto unknown facts to the discussion.

We are told that we may shortly expect a visit from two of the children of Sir John Herschel, who are probably lingering in or near Cambridge. Major William Herschel comes, it is said, to try some experiments concerning the vibration of pendulums. It may amuse you to learn how difficult residents at headquarters often find it to get at the information they need. Letters from an eminent source asserted that these experiments would be tried at the Naval Observatory, but the Observatory disowns the honorable impeachment. It says the experiments are in progress at the Coast Survey. The Coast Survey has heard nothing of the Herschels, and asserts that all the instruments employed were sent some time ago to the scientists at Johns Hopkins University. Meanwhile, we wait, and are glad to welcome home the younger Henry James, who, however little we may like his Daisy Millers and newspaper correspondence, gives us the highest pleasure in his own person, seeming as straightforward and candid and as thoroughly manly as if he had not wandered for seven years in foreign parts. It is small credit to us that we like this fellow-countryman better than the whole diplomatic circle.

Some of your readers have perhaps observed that Henry W. Elliott of the Smithsonian has come to my support in the columns of the Nation, in regard to the character of the fruits of the Pacific Coast. He is himself a fruit-grower here, and very familiar with California. His statement indorses mine, but is more carefully made. We have here many scientists who have spent years in California, and I find that they all indorse Mr. Elliott. Mr. Elliott says, however, "All California grapes ripen, and they ripen every year; and it is just the reverse with us." As this is a matter of practical interest, I ask permission to say a few words about it, exactly as if another person's book and opinion were under discussion. This last statement, however true in general, was certainly not true in 1880. Often, when I was in the vineyards, my companion would lift the leaves, bite a very sour grape, and say, "Do you expect to ripen these before the frost comes?" and the proprietor would answer, "No; but the yield is enormous, and we can afford to lose them." If I had known how wide-spread the interest in this subject would be, I would have written more at length, and have prepared myself better, for the "common people hear me gladly," and know very well that no "blue spectacles" have anything to do with my plain statement of facts. As to the flavor of the products, it must be remembered that it is not so much my own testimony I offer as that of the residents who ornamented their tables with the beautiful fruit, but did not pretend to eat it. Mr. Hilgard finds a flaw in Mr. Elliott's argument, because, writing from the College of Agriculture at Berkeley, he asserts that no comparison is possible between Eastern and Western grapes, as the kinds are different. On the contrary, I found the American grapes in all the Southern vineyards, the Catawba doing better than any European grape; and I judged of the Muscats and Hamburgs of California by comparing them with those I used to eat in my father's hot-houses. I did not think that unfair, for in their native climate I supposed they did far better.

Mr. Hilgard predicts that the quality of California fruit will improve, but the intelligent reader of my letters cannot have failed to see that the contrary is probable. I have carefully described the causes of deterioration already at work, and shown how my friends had suffered from them in the very heart of the fruit district at San José. Mr. Elliott replies to Mr. Hilgard in the Nation of January 26, denying the probability of improvement; and he adds: "This is not a question of climate. The fruit-growers of California, will have to suffer sooner or later just as we do here;" and the orange trees cut down already on account of the scale, the plum trees killed by the ground rat, and the apples stung to their hearts echo his words. Before I wrote my letters from California, I had no reason to suppose that critics were speculators in land or mines or proprietors of Pullman cars. I thought it reasonable that a population which could remember the discomforts of a mining gulch, which had carried its ore on the backs of asses, and which was glad to pay five dollars for an apple, should exaggerate its travelling facilities and overpraise its own fruit and vegetables. Its wheat is an article that the whole world knows how to value. While I was in California, I was frequently told that I must say this or that; but I opened a pair of honest eyes, and without making any pretence to extreme accuracy or claiming authority, I described what they saw. Personally, the whole matter was indifferent to me; but I saw the same ruin in California that I had previously seen in Canada, when the rose-colored descriptions, paid for by the Canada company, beguiled unwary emigrants to their doom. I was shown book after book in California, intended for travellers or invalids; and no one ever pretended that they were not paid for by proprietors of land.

Now, I know that it is easy for a man to borrow money for a farm or ranch near Los Angeles, and hard for him to raise the same sum to put into Massachusetts meadows; but I want to help to create a public sentiment which will make this last task easier. I shall never tire of asserting that, if the same sum of money could be had for the Massachusetts farm, it would insure superior results.

I wrote for the farmers; and the farmers have thanked me, although not in the columns of the newspaper. As the discussion goes on, much becomes plain to me, among other things that I have pierced some vital point. But there is one mystery not likely to be solved.

Why should critics in leading newspapers print sharp reviews of My First Holiday in the columns they are expected to fill, complaining perhaps of my "microscopes" or my "blue spectacles," two articles that a wise traveller will be sure to include in his outfit, and then write to me on the same day private letters thanking me for the exposures I have made?

Why, if these same critics did not once travel with free passes?

To not a few such letters have I replied by a few curt words; and if, in the lifetime of these same writers I should have occasion to print another book, I think I can guess what sort of a reception it will have.

CAROLINE H. DALL.

SUNDAY-EVENING LYCEUMS.

Editors of The Index:—

I am sometimes amused and always interested in the explanations given for the lessening attendance on church services. For, although my greed does not run in that direction with a swift and overmastering current, I consider myself, on the whole, as a friend of churches, and would like to see them better attended. It seems to me we have been hunting all round Robin Hood's barn for a reason, while it stares us in the face at the church door. People do not go to meeting, because they do not get enough there to pay them for the trouble. The great majority of pulpit discourses are neither instructive nor funny. We have heard the same old story drawled out so often that we are tired of hearing it; and most folks prefer to stay at home to read the Sunday Trumpeter or something better in winter, or to stroll through the fields in summer, visit friends, write letters, and enjoy a whole day's leisure.

I cheerfully admit that there are a good many exceptions to this general rule,—men like Minot J. Savage or Phillips Brooks, who work hard to provide a satisfactory intellectual meal for their hearers, and succeed; but here, as elsewhere, the exception proves the rule.

In the little town I live in, we have made a new departure, and tried to bring out the people by providing something worth listening to. For four years, we have enjoyed a Sunday-Evening Lyceum in our church, which has not only paid all expenses, but each year has left a surplus toward the general expenses of the church. We have had Wendell Phillips, William Parsons, James T. Fields, Governor Long, Carroll D. Wright, John Fiske, J. K. Applebee, Mary A. Livermore, Laura Dainty, and many others. This year and last, the regular course comprised twelve lectures and concerts, for which the admission ticket was $1, single admission 15 cents. We have always well-filled houses, sometimes crowded ones.

There are several reasons why such a plan should be embraced by liberal organizations. The ordinary week-day lyceum, from the very nature of things, does not allow the handling of religious subjects, nor, in fact, of any live subject the community are divided on. That is the chief reason why village lyceums are so fast fading out. The same objection does not apply to Sunday-evening lyceums. The more radical and searching, the better; but there is no harm in mixing in the ordinary subjects by way of variety.

Sunday is the day a workingman, a trader, a lawyer, or a physician can best spare the time to enjoy a lecture. Folks, in general, get up later on Sunday mornings. Some few go to church in the forenoon, to walk or ride in the afternoon, and at night they are at a loss for something to do. A good lyceum is just the thing to profitably fill up the void. A workingman can attend a lecture on Sunday better than on any other evening. He is already dressed for company. On a week-day, after work, he has to fly round pretty smart to get ready to go out, and often feels so tired that it would take "a forty-parson power" to draw him from his fireside after supper.

One point I would respectfully suggest to those who feel disposed to try this experiment. Do not make the admission free. "Free" lectures are apt to be tinctured with gammon or savor of charity (not the Scriptural, but the workhouse sort). A man or woman, however poor, does not want to be patronized or humbugged. Make the charge for admission as low as possible, but make a definite charge, and eschew "offertories." On the same principle, the lecturers, singers, and readers should be paid for their services. Most of these are willing to come on a Sunday evening at a lower rate, because they are not otherwise employed, and like to have their time filled up. The sums asked by men like B. or G. are unreasonably high, and their lectures (sensational) are far inferior to many of those who are willing to speak for a fair compensation. We can well afford to get along without them.

Scores of men who have not been inside of a church for many years attend our lyceum. Some of the hearers even come from neighboring towns, and brave all weathers because they always get something worth coming for. Why cannot a similar plan be adopted in every New England town?

It would give me great pleasure to assist any parties who may be disposed to try this new method of increasing church attendance. W. S. BROWN.

STATE LAWS IN REGARD TO THE AFFIRMATION OF ATHEISTS.

Editors of The Index:—

I observe that the fact that an Iowa Representative was permitted to affirm instead of taking the usual oath is mentioned in The Index of the 26th inst. (Current Topics) as "an extraordinary step forward in State law." I had supposed State statutes generally provided for affirmation when persons, from conscientious motives, declined to take the oath in the usual form.

The Connecticut law (passed in 1855) on this point is as follows:—

TIT. XXI., SEC. 2.—When any person required to take an oath shall, from scruples of conscience, decline to take it in the usual form, a solemn affirmation may be administered to him in the form of the oath prescribed, except that instead of the word "swear" the words "solemnly and sincerely affirm and declare" shall be used; and instead of the words "so help you God," the words "upon the pains and penalties of perjury," shall be used.

EMILY J. LEONARD.

[Can any of our readers inform us with certainty in which States atheists are allowed to testify by affirmation, and in which, if any, they are not so permitted? We are under the impression that in Pennsylvania such affirmation would be refused. In a daily paper of the current week, we find among the items of news the following: "In the Court of Appeals, Missouri, it has been ruled that atheists may testify."—ED.]

BOOK NOTICES.

PROBLEMS OF LIFE AND MIND. By George Henry Lewes. Third Series (continued). Problem the Second, Mind as a Function of the Organism. Problem the Third, The Sphere of Sense and Logic of Feeling. Problem the Fourth, The Sphere and Logic of Signs. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

This is the last volume of Problems of Life and Mind, and represents all the manuscript left by the author at his death in a condition fit for publication. The statement of the problems above is sufficient to suggest a general idea of the aim of this work to one who has read the other volumes. Lewes, although he repudiated as wholly unfounded the hypothesis of a "spirit" or a "vital agent," yet opposed the claim that the mind is the function of the brain; and, in this volume, we have his effort to prove that mind is the function of the organism, of which the brain is but a part, albeit an important part. Lewes had made the brain and nervous system a subject of careful and prolonged thought and investigation, and the presentation of his views in this volume is marked by unusual fulness of information and rare analytical power and logical acumen. Much of the work is of a psychological character, and is profoundly interesting to those who are looking deeply into problems which to-day confront our best thinkers. Lewes was one of the acutest thinkers of the age, and he made valuable contributions to science and philosophy, not to mention his brilliant literary productions. His mind did not become rigid and unprogressive with years: he kept up with the best thought, and was able to add to the discoveries of Darwin and Spencer by disclosing confirmatory evidences, while in some cases pointing out errors of observation or inference, even in their own special provinces. We have never met a person who had read Problems of Life and Mind, who was not free to admit that it had removed difficulties from his mind or added to the clearness of his vision in the higher field of thought.

PRAYERS. By Theodore Parker. A new edition. With a Preface by Louisa M. Alcott and a Memoir by F. B. Sanborn. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

No single volume of Mr. Parker's works could give a fuller idea of the innermost heart of this well-beloved man than this record of his prayers. No one who heard them can ever forget the depth and earnestness of his utterance and the strength and comfort they brought to those whose trials and sorrows he thus expressed in words. Like the musician, he seemed at once to voice his own heart-struggles and to convey sympathy and help to others who had felt and suffered also. Thanksgiving and petition are so blended together that we are enriched already in the asking.

We are grateful indeed to the first compilers who preserved for us the record of these prayers, which have been a joy and help to many who never heard them from his lips; and we heartily thank Mr. Sanborn for giving them anew to the public in such neat and pleasing form.

Miss Alcott's words vividly express the influence which Mr. Parker exercised over young and hungry souls,—an influence which has not died out, but which is still potent for good over many who are struggling with the same problems and trials which he wrestled with so bravely and so sweetly.

The Memoir gives a brief account of the principal facts of his life, and some very interesting extracts from his diary, especially one in which he gives a conversation with the wonderful child Bettine, showing how he recognized the depth and truth of her religious nature.

We rejoice to think on what a mission of blessing this book is going, and hope it will help many to pray as he prayed and live as he lived. E. D. C.

"BABYLAND" for February, it seems to us, has even more than its usual complement of attractions for the little ones. Its frontispiece, "Daisy's Kittens and their Christmas Gifts," is a gem which ought to delight every child's eyes and heart. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

WM. J. POTTER, of New Bedford, will address the Parker Memorial Society next Sunday. Subject, "Liberty, but Religion also."

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, who was a personal friend and correspondent of George Eliot, will give several original extracts from her letters in her forthcoming article on the great novelist to appear in the next number of Harper's Magazine.

AN Orthodox preacher, referring to a lecture given recently at La Salle, Ill., by the junior editor of this paper, says: "The lecture was a defence of the doctrines of devils, presented with the adroitness and cunning of a Jesuit, and in the high-sounding phrases of what this apostle of Satan called 'Modern Science.' Against such teachers, the Saviour has distinctly warned us."

MR. D. R. LOCKE (Petroleum V. Nasby) addressed a large and enthusiastic audience in Boston Theatre on Sunday evening, January 29, his subject being the Irish Question. Since his recent visit to Ireland, where he saw much misery, Mr. Locke has been an earnest advocate of the cause of Ireland. In his lecture, he declared that "freedom and equality made up a large part of his religion, and Ireland, deprived of both, had all his sympathies."

THE combined attractions of Oscar Wilde and the sixty Harvard students, who attended his lecture in a body, dressed in grotesque "aesthetic" costumes, each carrying conspicuously a sunflower or lily in his hand, filled Music Hall to overflowing on Tuesday evening of last week, in spite of the heavy snow-storm that prevailed. Mr. Wilde took the intended joke of the collegians in excellent part, making it the occasion of giving the young fellows a good-natured lesson in courtesy and good taste.

ELLEN CRAFTS, the fugitive slave, who with her husband William Crafts created such an excitement in Boston during the days of the Fugitive Slave Law, and who was protected and saved from a return to slavery by Theodore Parker and others, has been recently visiting in Philadelphia, where she first found shelter and friends some thirty-three years ago. William and Ellen returned from England in 1870, and are now engaged in teaching a freedman's school in Bryan Co., Georgia. They are in good circumstances, and have five children to whom they are giving good educations.

MANY to whom the name of Frederic May Holland is familiar as the author of The Reign of the Stoics, and through his contributions to The Index, will be pleased to learn that he is now engaged on a new work which is intended to be complete as possible in all its details, the comprehensive title of which will be The History of Free Thought from the Beginning until the Present Day. Mr. Holland has also prepared a new lecture on "The Millennium, or how the Saints ruled the Earth from 400 to 1400 A.D." This lecture Mr. Holland is now ready to deliver before any society which may wish to engage his services.

FELIX ADLER delivered two lectures in this city recently, which left a marked impression. That delivered on Friday evening, January 20, in the Methodist Central Church, was upon "The Future of the Jewish Race," in which he strongly advocated the destruction of racial distinction and the obliteration of all theological lines. On Sunday evening, the 22d, he spoke in Unity Church, by invitation of Mr. Miln. A large audience was moved and delighted by his earnest and eloquent presentation of his religious views. Mr. Adler made some preliminary inquiries as to the feasibility of holding a convention in this city under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, of which he is President. We hope that he will be able to carry out the plan; for we are sure that, wherever his words and those of his associate (W. J. Potter, the Secretary of the Free Religious Association) fall, they are contributions to the spiritual life of that place.—Chicago Unity.

MR. JOSEPH EVEN, the discoverer of the Mazon Creek fossil bed, near Morris, Ill., and whose name has been given to several species which he has found, lives at Peru, Ill. He is a very unassuming gentleman; and although his name is known to those acquainted with geology and palæontology, and he is a member of European Scientific Associations, he is better known by the majority of the people in Peru and vicinity as a first-class photographer than as a scientific discoverer. Prof. Pike, writing of Mr. Even, says: "Some people who knew him in Morris, when he made the discovery nearly a quarter of a century ago, wondered at his enthusiasm, and the sacrifice of ease and comfort he made in his long and toilsome rambles in search of 'those stones.' But now the fame of that wonderful locality has gone into all lands where geology is studied, and his name will go down in the annals of science identified with that of the most marvellous record of the insect and plant life of the coal period that has yet been found on our planet." Mr. Even is a radical and earnest Liberal; and by his invitation, and under arrangements made by him, the junior editor of The Index has recently given a course of lectures at Peru.

MISCELLANEOUS.

REV. DR. ELLIS, who is an accomplished and careful writer, says, "Notwithstanding all there is of grace and beauty, of dignity and devoutness, of adaptation and comprehensiveness in the present Episcopal Church, the soil of Massachusetts and the qualities and habits of its native population have proved so utterly uncongenial with it that there are at this time scarcely more than a score of flourishing parishes of that communion, free of debt and hard struggles, now in the limits of the State; while the majority of the rest, served by most devout and earnest ministers, are missionary efforts."

THE Sunday School Times, in its book review for January 7, shows strongly what warped, distorted, and unfair criticisms orthodox reviewers are capable of. We quote the following from among the notices of new books in that number as evidence of this: "The extreme radicalism of the Leyden theologians, without their ability and scholarship, is illustrated in the Rev. John W. Chadwick's lectures on The Man Jesus. . . . Still another book composed of a clergyman's lectures to his people is the Rev. Dr. George C. Lorimer's Ism, Old and New (S. C. Griggs & Co.), which, like the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke's Lowell Lectures on Events and Epochs in Religious History (James R. Osgood & Co.), is popular rather than scholarly. . . . By far the most important of recent scientific books is Mr. Charles Darwin's Vegetable Mould and Earth Worms (D. Appleton & Co.), which, without definite theological purpose, will supply not a few arguments to the theist as against the materialist. Mr. Darwin seems to be moving from, rather than toward, the school of Huxley. . . . The three latest volumes in D. Appleton & Co.'s "International Scientific Series" are: Volcanoes, What they Are and What they Teach, by Professor John W. Judd; Suicide, an essay in Comparative Statistics, by Henri Morselli, M.D.; and Illusions, by James Sully. The merit of the three is in the order of mention. The infidel bias of many previous volumes of the series is less evident in these. Dr. Morselli follows in the path of H. T. Buckle."

In a lecture on "The Future of Judaism," delivered in Chicago on January 21, Prof. Felix Adler said in substance that the Jews henceforth must refrain from looking back; the belief in the coming of the Messiah must be eradicated; the Talmud must be fought with the Bible; the Bible itself must be abandoned, and the spirit, not the letter, be taken as the guide. Jews now need new laws, better laws, purer morals, more fairness, and brotherly love. These should be the incentives to leading a purer life instead of expecting salvation because their fathers have been the body-guard of the great Jehovah, or from a fear of hell fire by the more modern Christian. Neither liberal Judaism nor liberal Christianity has provided any way for the liberal Jew out of the dilemma. The thesis of the Jew is no better than that of Theodore Parker, Channing, or Schiller. All that reformed Judaism amounts to without laws is to repeat, "There is a God, there is a God." Let all the old barriers fall. Let Jews marry Christians and Christians marry Jews. Or, no, rather let those who are no longer Jews and those who are no longer Christians marry. It is impossible to keep up the old lines of raceage. It is science that banished superstition, not Judaism. Reminiscences of the past will not suffice for the people who are starving for food and asking for light. The mission for the Jews is to cease hugging their pride, listen to their teachers, and make the name of Jew a passport for honesty, the name of a Jewess a certificate for modesty in deportment. Let universal happiness hereafter be the promised land. In Russia, Poland, and Asia, the Jewish race will likely be a distinct people, persecuted as of old for generations to come; but in Western Europe and in America the time is not far distant when they will be Jews in faith no longer. They will leave Judaism, the mother of religion for three thousand years, not with bitterness and curses, but with reverence, venerating her ever, only leaving her because the call of duty is stronger than filial affection; not faithlessly, but as a son reaching his maturity.

Wonderful cures, through the intercession of our Lady of Lourdes, are reported from Constantinople. The Georgian Fathers of the Immaculate Conception, who are monks of the Armenian rite, had founded at Montauban in France a noviciate for the education of their young postulants. Expelled from France by the Republican persecutors, they brought away from France a strong devotion to our Lady of Lourdes. At Pera, they erected a chapel in her honor and placed in it her statue. Numberless cures, graces, and conversions have been reported, as the result of the intercession of the Blessed Virgin, leading many of the schismatic Greeks to leave their churches and attend the mass celebrated according to the Greek rite by the Georgian Fathers. In the early part of August, the number of pilgrims was very great, not less than six thousand daily. The number of candles lit before the shrine on Sunday, August 21, was eight thousand seven hundred and fifty. The list of cures is very wonderful, and the Apostolic Delegate Mgr. Vanutelli has appointed a commission to inquire into their authenticity. A Mussulman is the subject of one interesting account. When he came seeking a cure, the Georgian Fathers said to him, "This is a Catholic Church, where Issa (Jesus) is adored and the Immaculate Virgin, His Mother, is venerated." "I know it," he replied, "I venerate profoundly Issa and His Mother." Thereupon, he recited the verses of the Koran, relative to our Lord and the Blessed Virgin. "I wish to pray here, I have faith that my prayers here will be heard, and that I shall be cured by Issa and His Mother." He asked the Georgian Fathers to repeat in Turkish the prayers he should say to our Lady of Lourdes. He returned again and again, and finally, after taking some drops of the water of Lourdes, he declared himself cured. Not satisfied with his own cure, he brought another Mussulman to pray before the Shrine of Her who has shattered the Moslem power.—Catholic Review.

The Swiss are curious in statistics, and they have made a set of calculations on the connection between drink and divorce which are worth mentioning. In certain cantons there are sixteen drinking-houses to every thousand adult inhabitants, in others twenty-five drinking-houses to every thousand adults, and, finally, there are cantons where the number of drinking-houses rises to the astonishing proportion of thirty-seven to each thousand full-grown people. If the last-named rate were to exist in Springfield, we should have more than five hundred drinking-places in the city, while Boston would have at least seven thousand grog-shops. Now, it has been calculated by some Swiss statistician that, in the cantons where there are thirty-seven drinking-places to one thousand grown people, there are also seventy-eight divorces to every one thousand marriages, or nearly eight per cent.; while, in those cantons which have but sixteen public-houses to every thousand full-grown people, there are but thirty-six divorces in every thousand marriages, or little more than three and one-half per cent. In the intermediate cantons, where twenty-five public-houses supply the stimulants for each thousand adults, there is an intermediate number of divorces,—namely, fifty-seven to every thousand marriages,—or five and three-fourths per cent. We do not vouch for these figures which we find in the Geneva Continental Times of September 10, but we give them as they stand. The proportion of divorces above-named for the most temperate districts of Switzerland would give us in Massachusetts about five hundred and four divorces in a year; while the highest rate mentioned would give us nearly eleven hundred divorces in a year. In 1878, the reported divorces in Massachusetts had risen to six hundred, from two hundred and forty-three in 1860, three hundred and seventy-nine in 1870, and five hundred and fifty-three in 1877,—the largest number, however, having been six hundred and forty-seven in 1874, when there were fifteen thousand five hundred and sixty-four marriages. At present, the annual number of marriages in Massachusetts exceeds fourteen thousand, and, in this prosperous year, 1881, will perhaps rise to sixteen thousand. No doubt, the divorces also will increase beyond the total of 1878, and perhaps beyond that of 1874; but they will not reach the total indicated by the highest Swiss figures given above. In Connecticut, at some periods, there have been as many as ninety divorces to every thousand marriages; but some allowance must be made there for the peculiar industry of the much-marrying Marvins.—Springfield Republican.

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE German citizens of Meriden, Conn., recently held a mass meeting to protest against the Connecticut Sunday laws.

THE anti-vaccinationists of this State are to have a hearing soon before the legislative committee, which has the consideration of that subject on hand. It is said that few physicians, and none of any note in their profession, have signed the anti-compulsion petition.

THE Catholic Bishop of the Diocese of Cleveland, Ohio, in a recent public lecture, denounced the Irish Land League, and declared the "no-rent" doctrine to be "clear, unqualified theft." It is said that only respect for his position kept many of his hearers from exhibiting unmistakably their disapproval.

A FRIEND of The Index, himself a professor in a Western University, writes us that "Prof. George E. French and two other professors have been expelled from Nebraska State University for Radicalism." So much the worse for the University, which thus offers a premium for dishonesty; for there are doubtless other professors there as unbelieving as these three, while perhaps not so frank in utterance. Men who make the facts of science a life study are not much longer to be hoodwinked into indorsement of a theology at variance with those facts.

THAT a great advance has been made in religious liberty, and a corresponding change in theological opinions, within the last quarter of a century, is evidenced by the reports that come to us of the numerous and wide-spread celebrations of the recent anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine. Besides that in this city at Paine Hall, which was largely attended, there were celebrations on quite a large scale at New York, Washington, Chicago, Pittsburg, and Linesville, Pa., in addition to many held in smaller places. Thirty years ago, gatherings commemorative of Thomas Paine, even if possible, would have been made the occasion of much virulent talk, if not of something more severe.

THE indignation meetings held in this and other countries over the shameful treatment of the Jews in Russia have not been without their effect on that government, and it has at last condescended to explain, though somewhat haughtily, that the Czar and government have not in any way given countenance to this persecution, and are in no way to blame for it, and that they are doing what they can to put a stop to it and punish its leaders. In Warsaw alone, it is stated, two thousand three hundred and two persons have been arrested for being concerned in the riots there. Let us hope that such vigorous measures will result in ending a persecution so disgraceful to the civilization of the nineteenth century.

MRS. JULIA NOYES STICKNEY, of Groveland, Mass., closed the second hearing upon the Woman's Suffrage question in the Green-Room of the State House on Tuesday last by the recitation of an original poem, entitled "An Ode to Justice," which prompts the Boston Globe to remark: "The incident itself is suggestive of what might be the result of placing women on an equal political footing with men. It would infuse into the dry science of political economy an element of sentiment that is now lacking, and exert a pure and ennobling influence upon the country. . . . The poet's art would be summoned to sway the hearts of men; and, instead of the dreary commonplace of legal lore, the halls of legislation would resound with the rhythmic measures of Tennyson, the barbaric yawp of Walt Whitman, or sweetly echo the tender lines of Hood and Moore." The Globe speaks as if poetry was an innovation in legislative affairs, introduced for the first time by a woman; but we have a faint remembrance of the excitement caused in Washington circles not many years ago by several columns of poetry published in the Congressional Globe by a member of the House of Representatives.

AS EARLY as possible after the reassembling of the British Parliament, Mr. Bradlaugh, the member from Northampton, renewed his application to be allowed to take the oath. Thereupon, Sir Stafford Northcote moved that he be not allowed to swear, a motion which after a somewhat stormy discussion was passed by a vote of 286 to 227. Mr. Bradlaugh then withdrew quietly. It is not stated what his next step will be, but the opinion is almost unanimous that Mr. Bradlaugh's case will be the means of doing away with the senseless and obnoxious law by which he is defrauded of his seat in the House of Commons, and Northampton of its representative, and that this will be the last case of the kind known in English history. The New York Times, commenting on this affair, says: "History must record the fact that as late as the year 1882 the test of admission to the House of Commons was one of personal belief, and that English electors were arbitrarily disfranchised for no other crime than the neglect to consult the House in advance as to the personality and orthodoxy of their candidate. The government has played a cowardly part in meekly submitting to this invasion of the rights of a member of its parliamentary majority. The vote shows that only the influential voice of the ministry was needed to prevent the outrage."

OF the recent disgraceful and disgusting prize fight, and still more disgraceful general interest in it by people of apparent intelligence, the Springfield Republican speaks in the following sensible manner: "Well, what does it all amount to? Chiefly, noise. There has nothing of real importance happened, and there will be no serious direct consequences. It may be that the fighters and their immediate associates, especially those on the winning side, are further from a chance of rising to respectability and usefulness as hod-carriers than before. There will be a new bragging industry developed at the Athens of America, and possibly an increased confidence in baked beans as an article of diet; but the great result of the fight from first to last is noise, and this, again, made the fight possible, and gave power for mischief. The newspapers, in their map of busy life, must print the revolting news of such an encounter; but they are responsible for the way in which it is done. When the ring is elevated to great newspaper consequence, and the departure of this crowd of roughs, and the coming of that lot of pimps, takes rank with the most important public events, then a great public educator is prostituted, and people forget that all this gossip relates to a gross offence against decency. Certain journals have been dulling the public conscience in this way for weeks, and we have seen that Mississippi has not developed self-respect enough and law enough to stop the business."

THE items of expenditure of the contingent fund of the forty-sixth Congress, recently published, reveal some singular idiosyncrasies, to say the least, on the part of our law-makers. We are anxious to know if it was the development of second childhood in some aged Congressman which demanded such mental food as Alice in Wonderland, the "Bodley" books, and We are Seven. Some of the items would delight the soul of Oscar Wilde, showing, as they do, the aesthetic tastes of many members of Congress. How "utterly utter" for instance must he have been who demanded and received "six tooth-picks, at $56 per dozen," and that other whose opera glass—paid for with the public money—cost $40! Those who were supplied with Bibles from the same source probably had never before had any opportunity to study that work, so nobody could object to that outlay. But from what section of the country was the ferocious member who got seven knives, at a cost of "$109.67"? As for the numerous calls for fans, we can understand that the debates may have sometimes grown so warm that they were imperatively needed to cool the Congressional atmosphere, though we should advise laying in a stock of the palm-leaf variety, as being more effectual for cooling purposes, and costing only about as many pennies as those heretofore supplied cost dollars. The perfumery at ten and twenty dollars per case was doubtless needed to purify the moral atmosphere of the legislative halls, but would not some less costly disinfectant do the work as effectually, while by these little economies in such necessary (?) articles something would be saved the tax-payers of the country?

CAN AGNOSTICISM BE A FORM OF RELIGION?

In the department of correspondence in this number of The Index will be found a communication which suggests the present article. The opportunity may be taken to premise at the outset that the former article, "The Synthesis of Free Thought and Religion," to which our correspondent kindly refers, was not intended to state the writer's own special belief on the doctrine of Theism. The object of that article was twofold: first, to point out for individual minds that may have been troubled with what have seemed to be conflicting claims of reason and religion a possible rational ground of reconciliation; and, second, to indicate a basis on which persons of various religious beliefs or non-beliefs, who subordinate all beliefs or non-beliefs to the demands of the freest thought, may unite for certain practical ends of religion. Of this synthesis (both philosophical and practical), agnosticism, which in its general sense appears in normal connection with religion no less than in scientific philosophy, was considered as one of the important elements. But the writer did not thereby class himself as an agnostic in the technical sense in which that word is now frequently used.

If, however, it be important to any one to know his opinion on the theistic problem, it may be stated thus: The powers usually ascribed to a personal Deity as external creator and ruler of the universe are, in his view, involved in the eternal life-forces of the entire universe itself, these life-forces (inclusive of the consciousness to which they have come in man) clearly showing the marks of intelligence and of moral aim. And man's consciousness being itself vital product, and hence kith and kin of these life-forces, has in itself some knowledge concerning them; and it is only rational to suppose that, with man's capacity for progress, this knowledge may be increased. On the deepest problem of being, therefore, man cannot be said to be wholly and necessarily agnostic. On the other hand, since his consciousness and all his faculties for acquiring knowledge are finite, it cannot be said that man is ever likely to exhaust the mystery of absolute and infinite being; and therefore, to an extent, he must be agnostic.

But, in seeking a general definition or statement of religion, one's own solution of the religious problems is of comparatively little account. The important point is then to find some statement succinct enough to define, and yet broad enough to embrace all the known forms of religion that have appeared among mankind, both those called supernatural and those called natural and rational. Suppose we try the definition designated in the article above referred to. Religion is man's threefold expression, in thought, in sentiment, in action, of his relation to the universe and its vital forces. This definition starts with the fundamental fact which science recognizes, that man is in actual relation to the universe and its vital forces; that he is dependent for his very being and sustenance upon this relation. But the large and comprehensive phrase, "universe and its vital forces," admits of the widely various theories which have been put forth by different religious believers and under different religious systems for explaining this relation of dependence. By the great majority of religious believers, the "vital forces" of the universe are regarded as either directly or ultimately the will-power of a personal Deity or deities. The definition, therefore, covers every form of theistic belief, whether monotheism or polytheism. Others again think it more conceivable to consider, as above stated, the intelligence and moral aim which theism implies to be in some way involved as part and parcel with the life-forces of the universe itself. The definition, therefore, covers the different shades of pantheistic belief. Others, still, regard it as impossible to determine or to entertain any rational theory of the ultimate source, cause, or power whence these "vital forces" of the universe have come, and are content simply to acknowledge the fact of man's dependent relation upon them and of his obligation to learn and keep the normal character of this relation. The definition, therefore, covers agnostic belief. It may even cover that type of atheism which abjures all conceptions of Deity, theistic or pantheistic, but holds nevertheless that man is under obligation to observe and obey the laws of the universe of which he is a part, and to do his utmost for the highest welfare of himself and his fellow-men.

Keeping these statements in mind, and tracing their practical bearing, our correspondent will perhaps find his several questions answered. He will see that there are likely to be in the future, as in the past, different forms "de facto" for the expression of religion, according to the different theories of interpreting the fundamental religious fact, and yet the inner significance of that religious fact may be essentially the same. Certainly there can be no form of petitionary prayer, no importuning of heaven for personal blessings, unless one believes in a Deity there hearing and ready to answer. But there may be a voicing of desire and aspiration for a clearer knowledge of, and a more practical union with, those great world-forces and laws, whatever they are in essence, which are working for man's redemption from wrong and suffering, and endowing him with increased capacities for discerning the truth and doing the right. The forms of worship must indeed vary where the creeds are widely different. A radical Unitarian, though believing in some form of worship, can hardly join with sincerity in the Roman Catholic ceremony of the Eucharist; nor the Jew find in the Buddhist joss-house precisely what satisfies him in his synagogue. The forms differ because the thoughts that originated them differ. But, among enlightened people at the present day, very much less stress is laid upon differences of creed than formerly. The underlying unities of thought and aim are beginning to be perceived amidst the differences of belief; and the beliefs themselves are improving, and hence there is a tendency to make less account of differences in forms of worship and to adopt changes of form in harmony with the more enlightened beliefs.

The theological ideas to which our correspondent alludes have doubtless been the staple beliefs that have determined the ceremonials of worship in Christian churches. But is it not possible that, when these theological beliefs shall have been displaced by more rational conceptions of man's relation to the universe, or, though still held, shall be subordinated to practical objects of righteousness, people will still find it to their profit to come together for mutual incitement in the pursuit of truth and the practice of right, thereby consecrating themselves to worthier ideals of living and to more effective services for humanity? What loftier aim can there be in life than to live, and to wish to live, for the sake of helping on a universe which is in struggle to inaugurate a society of conscious souls in harmony with the laws of truth and right and moral beauty? What joy can be finer, purer, than that of participating in such a work? What cause for gratitude more profound than that of having the opportunity to live for such an end? And it is not too much to expect that at some time these sentiments and motives will find a fit embodiment in a common social service as an expression of human adoration of the highest and best; a service wherein, even more than the words of wisdom from wise speakers, poetry, and song, and a nobler music than has yet been composed shall add their instrumentality to utter the reverence, the gladness, the aspiration, the fraternal fellowship, the consecrated enthusiasm of the participants, and urge them upward to a higher level of moral action. Shall not the actual knowledge, which even science discloses of this wondrous world in which we bear so responsible a part, be as good a basis for such a service as has been the blind "faith" of superstitious religions? Shall not manhood's disciplined serenity and courage and joyous love in serving furnish as good material for worshipful utterance as the "childish, infantile trust" or fears that were begotten of weakness and want and ignorance in the more youthful ages of mankind?

Now there is nothing in agnostic systems of thought to prevent such emotions, motives, practical consecration and devotion as are here delineated, nor to prevent the expression and incitement of them by some special forms of service. And have we not here all the essentials of religion? If so, must we not answer our correspondent's central question, "Can Agnosticism be a form of religion?" in the affirmative? Thus we might answer, taking into account only a priori considerations. But there are historical facts that confirm this answer. Not to speak of certain agnostic elements which are among the most profound and prized utterances of all the religions, and passing by the modern attempts to combine religion with agnostic philosophy, as in the so-called "Religion of Humanity," it must be remembered that the great Buddhist religion was in its original doctrine, as it is still among its most enlightened followers, a thoroughly agnostic system of belief. It disclaimed all knowledge or possibility of knowledge of absolute being; and on this principle, as a humane and moral faith simply, in opposition to the clairvoyant claims in regard to knowledge of Deity made by Brahmanism, it won its early successes and established itself as the religion of many millions of people.

One other question put by our correspondent leads us to think that he may not draw clearly the distinction that exists between "Materialism" and "Agnosticism." He asks, referring to an expression used in the article of which he writes, "Does Agnosticism admit a power behind phenomena, apart from them, working as a cause in them?" Certainly, agnosticism admits the existence of such a power, though affirming man's inability to attain to any knowledge of it beyond its existence,—a power "behind" phenomena in the sense of being inscrutably veiled by them, not perhaps necessarily "apart from them,"—that phrase was not used in the article considered,—but certainly working as a hidden cause in and through them. Herbert Spencer is commonly regarded as the chief of living apostles of agnosticism. He says in First Principles, chapter fifth: "The consciousness of an Inscrutable Power, manifested to us through all phenomena, has been growing ever clearer. The certainty on the one hand that such a Power exists, while on the other hand its nature transcends intuition and is beyond imagination, is the certainty toward which intelligence has from the first been progressing." He speaks of this Power, of which his favorite name is "the Unknowable," also as "the Ultimate Cause," "the Ultimate Existence," "the Unseen Reality," as "that through which all things exist." He says of individual man that he is "one of the myriad agencies through whom works the Unknown Cause," and talks of "those good and bad consequences which conduct brings round through the established order of the Unknowable." And, to conclude, he is emphatic in his testimony that agnosticism is entirely compatible with religion. "We are obliged," he says, "to regard every phenomenon as a manifestation of some power by which we are acted upon: phenomena being, so far as we can ascertain, unlimited in their diffusion, we are obliged to regard this Power as omnipresent, and criticism teaches us that this Power is wholly incomprehensible. In this consciousness of an incomprehensible, omnipresent Power, we have just that consciousness on which religion dwells. And so we arrive at the point where religion and science coalesce." WM. J. POTTER.

THE IMMEDIATE REFORMS NEEDED IN ENGLISH LAND LAWS.

I have already stated that, in my opinion, the greatest reform, with respect to English land tenure, both as regards theory and practice, will be the resumption by the State of that right of taxation of landed property which has always been inherent, but which practically has lain all but dormant for many generations. But certain pressing and immediate reforms are necessary in the mean while. These reforms may perhaps be summed up in one sentence,—the abolition of the feudal and semi-feudal privileges which English landholders have hitherto enjoyed. These may now be briefly enumerated.

In the first place, primogeniture must be abolished. As a matter of fact, this will not make much practical difference, because the number of English landholders who die intestate must be very small indeed. But it will cut at the root of the old aristocratic idea, and will accustom England to the modern principles of equality. In the next place, the present methods of entailing landed property must come to an end, so that the nominal holder of an estate may become the real holder, and not be simply the trustee for some child yet unborn. Still more important than these two reforms will be the change that is certain to be shortly made in the relations of landlord and tenant. At present, England is alone among the foremost nations of the world in permitting those who cultivate the soil to reap little or no profit from their labor and enterprise. It is true that, just at the present time, owing to natural causes and to the vast influx of American grain, English farmers are not practically so entirely at the mercy of their landlords as they have been in former times. But this is accidental, arising from external causes, and not from any beneficent change in English law. Were the old conditions to obtain again, the old result would follow,—namely, the complete servitude of the English agriculturists. Not only is the land which they till the property of their landlord, but the improvements they make belong to him also; and if they should fail in business, as so many have of late, the landlord has the first claim on their estate, prior to all claims of tradesmen and manufacturers. The farmer, too, is, in many cases, bound to adopt the religion and politics of his landlord, or at any rate to suppress any indications of dissent therefrom. It is true that the hard experience of recent years has modified this a good deal; but this again is accidental. Given the old conditions, the old political and religious servitude would follow. Even at the present time there are numbers of estates in England where the tenants are supposed to support the Tory candidate at an election. And in many cases they do this, even although they are life-long non-conformists. All this is so foreign to American life that it is difficult for Americans thoroughly to understand in what a strange intellectual condition the beautiful rural districts are at the present day.

The English farmers must have a substantial tenant right, such as the recent Irish Land Act has recognized and enforced in Ireland. It might not, indeed, be well, it probably would not be necessary, that all the complicated machinery set up in Ireland should be established in England also. The relations of landlord and tenant have never been so bitter, so hostile, in England as in Ireland; and the interference of an outside court of arbitration would probably be distasteful to both English landlords and tenants. But the practical object to be arrived at is substantially the same in both countries,—namely, the gradual abolition of the old system of landlordism, and the gradual transfer of the land to those whose energy and capital render it productive. In short, possession and cultivation must go hand in hand, as they do in France, and as they do in every English-speaking community excepting England herself. Until this is done, the land question cannot be regarded as settled. But the reforms which I have indicated will, in my opinion, accomplish this desirable end without recurrence to those violent methods advocated by the Irish Land League, or to those which find favor with the persons who urge the immediate "nationalization of the land."

One more relic of feudal barbarism remains to be mentioned; namely, the game laws, so intimately associated with the land question. England is the only country of the civilized world which maintains such laws upon her statute-book. In France, similar laws were abolished on the famous night of the 4th of August, 1789: in Germany, they were put an end to by the revolutionary movement of 1848. The determination of the Hungarian people has secured their abolition in that country. But, in Great Britain, they still constitute a monstrous injustice, since no other laws exist so palpably for the benefit of the few, for the sake of their idle and, in the opinion of many, demoralizing sport. The farmers, it is said, are not unfriendly to these laws; for they like to ape the sporting manners of their aristocratic patrons. But, when the rural laborers of England are enfranchised, we may expect to see a blow dealt at a system which gratifies the tastes of the few at the expense of the rights of the many, which depopulates whole tracts of country,—turning out worthy and honest peasants to make room for deer-forests and game-preserves,—which diminishes the national resources by restricting the area of cultivated land, and which produces that worst of effects, the creation of artificial crime,—offences against an unjust law, which the common-sense of common people will never admit to be real offences, and yet which relegates those who commit them to the ranks of the criminal class, and so contaminates the moral sense of the community.

These are the reforms immediately necessary for the establishment of something like a rational modern land system in England. Will the liberal party accept them and endeavor to realize them in the institutions of the country? The so-called leaders of that party do not certainly long to see such a radical change in English institutions; but it may be predicted with certainty that they will be compelled, sooner or later, to accomplish much which may be personally distasteful to them, but which the urgent necessities of the social and political situation will inexorably demand. The English aristocratic system is doomed, and no efforts can save it. Popular opinion and the course of events are both making for a new order.

My next paper will deal with the question of the Established Church, that other bulwark of the old social order.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

NOTES FROM KANSAS.

Liberals in Kansas this year, who celebrated on the 29th of January the one hundred and forty-fifth anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine, were able at the same time to observe publicly the twenty-first anniversary of the admission of Kansas to the sisterhood of States. Kansas became "of age" this year. She was born amid the expiring throes of slavery. Bourbonism in Congress, with heartless ambition and lust for power, plotted against her; and Border Ruffianism on the plains shot and stabbed her, inflicting wounds the scars of which yet remain to remind us of the fierceness of the conflict that preceded her birth and raged about her infant cradle. The following toasts drank at a pro-slavery meeting held in Atchison, before the admission of Kansas into the Union, read strangely to-day: "Kansas our chosen home,—stand by her. Ye sons of the South, make her a slave State, or die in the attempt" ("This was received with loud and long-continued applause"). "Kansas,—we will make her a slave State or form a chain of locked arms and hearts together, and die in the attempt." "The distribution of public lands,—one hundred and sixty acres to every pro-slavery man, and to every abolitionist six feet by two." "Kansas,—it has risen like the ghost of Banquo to scare the eyeballs of rampant fanaticism, but ere they clutch it they must cross many brooks whose caney growth will resist them." "Kansas,—the battle-ground upon which is to be decided the fate of Southern rights under the Union." These are given as they were reported among the proceedings, in a pro-slavery paper, then published at Atchison. Although the soil of Kansas was stained with the blood of "Free State men," its people now enjoy the rights for which those early settlers fought; while from the limbs of the oppressed throughout our wide domain the manacles have fallen, and the monster that tried to strangle liberty in its anaconda-like coils on these fertile plains, now dotted with the homes of freemen, is dead, and the auction block, the slave market, the fugitive slave law, with their concomitant infamies, are buried with the monster in a common grave. As Whittier wrote in 1858:—

"Not in vain on the dial
The shade moves along
To point the great contrasts
Of right and of wrong:
Free homes and free altars,
And field- of ripe food;
The reeds of the swan's marsh,
Whose bloom is of blood.
On the lintels of Kansas,
That blood shall not dry.
Henceforth the Bad Angel Shall harmless go by;
Henceforth to the sunset,
Unchecked on her way,
Shall liberty follow
The march of the day."

It is a noteworthy fact that in the War of the Rebellion the battle mortality of Kansas was higher than that of any other State. Her loss in killed was 61.01 in every thousand. The mortality of Vermont, which comes next, was 58.22: that of Massachusetts was 47.76. I quote the following sentence referring to Kansas from Provost-Marshal-General Fry's report, "The same singularly martial disposition which induced above half of the able-bodied men of the State to enter the army without bounty may be supposed to have increased their exposure to the casualties of battle after they were in the service."

The average intelligence of the people of Kansas is high, equal in my opinion to that of any State in the Union; and there is no State in which, in proportion to the population, there is a larger number of outspoken Free thinkers. The ministers in the smaller cities and towns of this State, as in the West generally, are inferior in ability and intelligence to the ministers in places of the same population in the Eastern States. The interest in preaching in the West is less than it is in the East. The pay for preaching in the smaller places is not so large; and it seems that the ablest ministers, like men in other professions, are "called" the most irresistibly to localities which offer the largest salaries. Many preachers in the West, in consequence of the meagreness of their support, abandon the pulpit in disgust; but, unfitted by their previous habits for the competition of business, they rarely succeed in any secular pursuit. The fact that a man has been a minister is rather to his disadvantage in business circles. I know worthy men who, having left the pulpit and removed to distant cities to engage in business, took special pains, for the very reasons stated, to conceal the fact that they were formerly in the ministry.

Occasionally, I find an ex-clergyman in the insurance business doing very well, finding men more willing to pay for being insured against fire in this world than for being threatened with it in "the other world," and more interested in making provision for their families here than in making theological preparation for a hereafter. Not unfrequently, I find ex-ministers teaching in the West; and in this vocation, when they have the necessary education, they succeed better than in other pursuits. Almost everywhere in the West, the schools are good, the interest in education is great, and there is a demand for the services of good teachers, who are better paid than they are East. To indicate the interest in education in Kansas, I give the following figures: In 1861 there were but a few rude school-houses, and the number of pupils enrolled was 4,900. In 1880, the State had 5,315 school-houses, valued at $5,000,000, and 340,647 school children. The common school fund of the State amounts to $2,227,602, and Kansas has 2,000,000 acres of school lands for sale. The State University at Lawrence, the State Normal School at Emporia, and the State Agricultural College at Manhattan are liberally endowed, well sustained, and rank high, I am informed, among the educational institutions of the country.

Contradictory statements appear daily in Eastern papers regarding the workings of the Kansas prohibitory law. The friends of the law claim the results are encouraging; while its opponents, or many of them, declare that more liquor is sold and more drunkenness prevails now than before the law was passed. There are no statistics by which the dispute can be settled, and it is difficult to ascertain to what extent the law has accomplished the object for which it was framed. It is certain that, in all the larger cities and in many of the smaller places, drinks are sold openly; and there is little fear of arrest, or of conviction in case of arrest. In many of the smaller places, the saloons have been closed; and what liquors are used are sold secretly, as was the case in the small towns of Massachusetts and Connecticut in the early days of prohibitory legislation in those States. In many towns in Kansas where saloons have been closed, their business has been transferred to drug-stores, whose proprietors seek protection in the doctor's certificate, which, notwithstanding the precaution the framers of the law took against the liability of evil from this source, is given by unscrupulous physicians without fear of prosecution. The fact is pretty evident that Kansas is not so far advanced in practical temperance beyond other States that she can escape the difficulties they have encountered in their attempts to prohibit the sale and the use of intoxicating drinks.

I have been speaking to the largest audiences I ever addressed in Kansas the past ten days, and have seen in every city I have visited unmistakable indications and evidences of the growth of liberal thought. Some days ago, I wrote for The Index an account of my travels and observations in the States in which I was lecturing before I came to Kansas; but a very painstaking and order-loving chambermaid picked up the scattered leaves of my manuscript which she found upon a table, and thinking they were "nothing but scribbles," as she said, threw them into a coal-hod, from which they were taken to kindle a fire. By this use of my letter, more light probably was shed on the subjects treated than would have appeared, had it been published; but I was not quite satisfied, and may rewrite the notes.

B. F. U.

FORT SCOTT, KAN., Feb. 10, 1882.

THE EMOTIONAL QUESTION.

Mrs. Spencer's timely article has doubtless elicited very general notice and approbation, as it richly deserved, from Index readers; and the rejoinder from Mrs. Cheney contains also good food for reflection. Great injustice is often visited upon the sensitive nature of the child by undue stimulation on the one hand and by rigid repression on the other. A very large proportion of children as well as adults are ambitious for notice from those whose opinions they respect, and the grounds of that respect are not always so carefully discriminated as in maturer years. The fact of wider experience, however, that they observe in older associates, naturally awakens confidence; and the tone of admiration for childish achievement that comes so spontaneously from the mass of older observers is very sweet and flattering to the young mind. Hence, the danger of fastening upon the character for after years the curse of vanity. If the adult ever awakens to the priceless knowledge of his exact individual status in the moral scale, his vehement prayer is, "Deliver me from my friends! From my enemies, I can protect myself!"

If social science can ever develop a fair and wholesome mode of mutually honest regard between fellow-beings of moral impulses, there will be a grand uplifting of the world's standard.

A world of sorrow underlies the rude exercise of selfish cruelty among mankind, whether more or less deliberately applied; but the subtler wrongs that are inflicted through indifference and mistaken efforts to please need to be vigorously fought. In adult society, and even among persons of high character and general ripeness of judgment, these petty temptations to make the present hour and intercourse smooth and pleasant are often injuriously yielded to.

But, in dealing with so volatile a thing as the emotional nature, great skill and discernment are needed to insure lasting and healthful results. Persons in charge of the young must have, in addition to the groundwork of absolute sincerity, the transparent integrity of purpose that children are so sure to angle for among their managers, a carefully cultured knowledge of the material under their charge, and patient adaptation of their own highest wisdom to its necessities. Still, cases are by no means rare in which, after calculations of great apparent certitude, disturbing forces unexpectedly arise with disappointing effect; and, on the other hand from beneath circumstances of undeniable neglect, ornaments to society have arisen of both moral and mental brilliancy. Of course, this does not change the general need of deliberate mastery of ends by appropriate means; but, as similar difficulties in the pursuit of exact science in the physical universe tend to make the searcher for truth in that realm noted for his modest self-poise, so should the caprices yet out of reach in this still more difficult department of labor take the starch of self-righteousness out of the human heart.

Over-estimates are apt to be made of the capacity of youth. It is true they often show great excitability, but it is shallower and more short-lived than that of mature persons. With what curious calmness a band of young observers can stand and watch, to say nothing of active participation in, scenes that make mature sensibilities shrink with unfeigned torture. These same children look back in after years, and wonder how they could have been so callous. The exceptions are youths of unusual intelligence and precocious power of judgment. To promote just consideration of merciful conduct among fellow-beings, whether brute or human, the child can hardly be too diligently plied with exciting influence; for even the mass of adult and also experienced persons are grossly undeveloped in this discriminating sensibility.

If there is any significance or truth in the moral universe, this question emphatically pertains to it. And the many-headed monster of social turpitude will have abundant forage, so long as the subject is neglected. False emotion or sickly sentimentalism is no true outgrowth of the vital root of genuine sensibility, whose juices send forth the sturdiest stems of enduring courage.

Before winding up this little sermon, I wish to state an item that gave me a sense of cordial gratification, which I think will be shared by many an Index friend; for it reveals unmistakably that the title of the paper is not misapplied in pointing to some of the noblest purposes of human life. The item relates to a subscriber to The Index for four years past, whose history accidentally came to my notice quite recently. He came to this country from Germany twelve years ago, being then but twelve years of age. After only nine months' schooling, his lot was cast into the ordinary routine of earning an income by assisting in a store in one of the Middle States, and finally by adopting a mechanic's trade in a New England manufactory. At the time first mentioned, his attention chanced to be called to two liberal papers, The Index being one of them; and, as he states, his choice luckily fell on that, and he ascribes to it the sole impetus to a higher culture that has ruled him in all succeeding available hours, and awakened an earnest longing for the prospering of liberal principles as thus represented. A stranger to the English language on arriving in this country, and thus debarred, as above narrated, from any adequate help in its mastery, he has, nevertheless, in his limited leisure acquired a method of thought and expression that would do credit to a college graduate. Moreover, some incidental facts have come to light that prove him possessed of the noble passion for the relief of human suffering. Although it is quite evident that there was in this case an unusually good soil on which the seed was cast, I, for one, am glad that we had the seed to sow, and proud of the growth from it. But those of us who have an abundant weight of years and advantages beyond those of this earnest, young mechanic may well blush at the contrast of improved opportunities.

J. P. TITCOMB.

"ANYTHING worth reading is worth reading twice," says the London Academy. That may be so in England; but in this country we not only have no time to read the same thing over twice, but we like our reading "boiled down" into the smallest understandable "points," so, though we may not make a life business of everything we care to know something about, yet our knowledge by this means can take a wider range, and we can the more easily choose the one thing which for us is worth "reading twice."

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

WE recently quoted the remark of President McCosh, of Princeton College, that even from that special seminary of Orthodoxy, as from other colleges, there are fewer graduates that enter the ministerial profession than was formerly the case. This remark is confirmed by an editorial in the Congregationalist, entitled "Where are the Men?" and written in a tone of pathetic appeal for supernatural help. The writer begins thus:—

"Unless God help us speedily, what are our churches to do for pastors?" So writes an eminent Congregational minister and teacher at the West, and he has abundant reason for his question. That there are not a few unemployed ministers both at the East and the West is true. But it also is true that for any one of half a dozen good reasons they cannot fill the vacancies which are so important, and which ought to be filled at once.

The article goes on to say that there is an immediate demand in the West for sixty Orthodox Congregational preachers, but no supply. Inquiry has been made at all the theological schools of the denomination, and the fact ascertained that only thirty-four of next summer's graduates will go to the West. The Congregationalist adds that, if every one of the graduates were to do so, "they will not be numerous enough to meet the demand that will exist long before they will be able to set out." And it continues:—

There is no mistake about the fact that there is danger of "a famine of ministers," and that, too, in the very portion of our country where it is most important that the Christian religion should be preached and lived, for the sake of our nation's future as well as for that of thousands of needy souls. There is no lack of merchants, miners, farmers, doctors, lawyers, etc., at the West. There ought to be none of Christian ministers. Pray God, therefore, to incline the right men to go thither as His laborers.

Liberalism, it seems therefore, is not alone in the demand for "trained leaders."

From the Radical Review of Madison, Wis., we extract the following, and should be glad to learn more of the facts concerning the dismissal of the free-thinking professors from the Nebraska State University:—

Professors ought to be masters of the science and the art of education. Their religious opinions are a secondary matter, if not entirely irrelevant. Unfortunately, this is not yet the generally accepted rule of action. We have known able and liberal-minded professors forced to resign by a bigoted board of regents in a university famous for its radicalism. Now, such a state of things is utterly wrong. It invites to energetic action on the part of Liberals, and they must not rest until the complete secularization of our universities is an accomplished fact. Only last week, three free-thinking professors of the State university of Nebraska were dismissed. There was a religious quarrel in that institution for years, which, for the present at least, culminated as stated. The board of regents met the other day, and one of its members being ill left the Orthodox element in the majority, of which circumstance it availed itself at once.

With regard to the horrible loss of life at the burning of the building in Park Row, New York, when the wretched victims had to choose between being roasted alive and being battered to death by jumping from the windows upon the pavement, we share the indignation of the Irish World. It says:—

For years, the building had been regarded as unsafe. But its millionaire owner received a rental of $70,000 a year, or over $1,300 a week for it; and in a politician-ridden and boss-governed community it is next to impossible to compel a man with this sum figuring as but one item of his income to have any regard for human life, or even to observe the law. In fact, the owner wanted to put three stories more on the huge tinder-box some time ago. . . . And yet "nobody to blame" will be the end of the matter, although the Building Law provides that "any factory, mill, offices, manufactory, or workshop, in which operatives are employed on any of the stories above the first story, . . . shall be provided with such fire-escapes, alarm, and doors as shall be directed by the Superintendent of Buildings." Now, in this case, either the Superintendent of Buildings did not direct anything whatever, or, if he did, the millionaire owner ignored the law. Surely, therefore, some one is to blame in the premises. That such disasters can occur at intervals, and that the death-roll resulting from them is augmented by our millionaire house-owners openly violating an explicit law in regard to fire-escapes, is a disgrace to this Republic.

CARDINAL MANNING has recently delivered in London a noteworthy discourse on "Knowledge by Faith." The close of it is thus reported in the London Universe, as reprinted in the New York Tablet:—

While those who have the doctrines of fragmentary Christianities [the Protestant sects] are throwing all things open, destroying all the boundaries of truth, what has the Catholic Church done? With the intensity of dogmatism, it has put out into the storm of the world's public opinion, going against wind and tide, against all the prejudice and the scorn of this intellectual age; and wherever there has been an indefinite statement of the truth it has defined it, and wherever there is doubt it has determined it, and wherever there have been deviations from the truth the Church has determined them, wherever men did not know whether a doctrine was exactly expressed the Church has fixed it. It has become more dogmatic in all its teachings at the very moment when the world has been acting upon the contrary principle of becoming indefinite in all things. He asked which of these two looked most like definite faith? Was it like definite faith to be continually breaking down the barriers between truth and falsehood, and rendering the doctrines of Christianity indefinite, and therefore uncertain? Or is it that teaching which never swerves, never falters, and, if there be found the slightest ambiguity, equivocation, or uncertainty in any of its teaching, immediately makes that uncertainty certain, that ambiguity sure? Just as men on board some bark who found the slightest leak would, as an act of vital prudence, close it, so the Catholic Church, whensoever a doubt is raised in council, puts an end to all doubts and controversies.

If only the "doubts and controversies" would stay ended! But they no more will than a "leak" in a vessel will forever stay closed. Both vessels and creeds wear out.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

TO ANY person whose name is not now on our subscription list, we will send The Index on trial three months for 50 cents, or six months for $1.00.

THE assassin of President Garfield having been sentenced to be hung on June 30, let us hope that we shall hear no more of him or his sayings until that time.

THE junior editor of The Index, who has been speaking nearly every evening the past month in Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas, can make no more engagements in the West this season. He has now applications for more lectures than the limited time he can be absent from this city will permit him to give. His appointments extend to March 1.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Chicago Tribune says that the Mormon Church has for several years kept a record of the private life, especially at Washington, of every senator and representative; and it is this record, he declares, "which has given the Mormons such tremendous and fatal power at Washington for a quarter of a century." The correctness of this statement may be justly questioned.

MRS. KREKLE, editress of the Kansas City Mirror of Progress, informs us that the publication of her paper, which on account of sickness she was compelled to suspend a few weeks ago, will be resumed soon, and that the paper will be changed from a weekly to a monthly. Mrs. Krekle says that by making this change she will be enabled not only to reduce expenses so that they will more nearly correspond with receipts, but to improve greatly the character of the journal. The Mirror has been a well-conducted and readable paper under Mrs. Krekle's editorial management, and we hope she will be encouraged and sustained in her journalistic efforts.

MANY of the leading papers in the country on Monday of last week published the following item of news, apparently telegraphed from Chicago: "Rev. George C. Miln, pastor of Unity Church, Chicago, at which Robert Collyer formerly officiated, in his sermon yesterday abandoned his belief in a personal deity and in the immortality of man. There is intense commotion among his congregation." The Index of last week, it will be remembered, published one of Mr. Miln's radical discourses, entitled "The Evolution of the Church." If the above item be true in all respects, it would seem that he has found the evolution of the individual a more rapid process than that of the Church. In our next number will be given the discourse upon which this report was founded.

IN Nature, of Jan. 12, 1882, Prof. Huxley writes as follows: "In a letter which appeared in last week's Nature (p. 217), Dr. Dupré refers to a 'too much forgotten paper by Immanuel Kant,' and speaks of Kant's contributions to natural science as being, at present, 'almost universally overlooked.' Whatever may be the case elsewhere, I do not think that, in England, we are open to this reproach, inasmuch as in the year 1869, when I had the honor to be President of the Geological Society, a very considerable portion of my anniversary address 'On Geological Reform' was devoted to an attempt to do justice to Kant's work, and to indicate the high place which it occupies in the history of scientific geology. The address is reprinted in my Lay Sermons, and therefore I have reason to know that a considerable proportion of the reading, or at any rate book-buying, public has no excuse for 'overlooking Kant's work.'"

THE Toronto Secular Society publishes the following principles as its basis of union: "1. That the present life being the only one of which we have certain knowledge, its concerns claim our primary attention. 2. That the promotion of the general and of our individual well-being in this world is at once our highest wisdom and duty. 3. That the only means upon which we can rely for the accomplishment of this object is human effort based upon knowledge and experience. 4. We judge conduct by its issues in this world only: what conduces to the general well-being is right; what has the opposite tendency is wrong." The society holds meetings every Sunday evening. It announces a course of nineteen lectures (several of which have been already given) by its own members. Among them are the following: "Secularism and our Society," by the President, A. Piddergton; "The Nature of Belief," by the Secretary, J. A. Risser; "What I saw on my late Trip to England," by A. F. Jury; "Social Life," by Phillips Thompson; "The Church and Heresy," by W. B. Cooke; "Nervous Force and Modern Life," by D. K. Brown; "Religious Teaching in the Public Schools," by L. P. Kribs; "Pantheism and Buddhism," by R. B. Butland; "The Life and Philosophy of Harriet Martineau," by R. W. Douglas. The secretary writes us: "Our society will hold its first annual soirée on Thursday evening, February 23; and, if you can make it convenient to be here at that time, we will be much pleased. Our entertainment will consist of concert, literary entertainment, dance, and supper."

DR. G. STANLEY HALL contributes an article on "The Moral and Religious Training of Children" to the January Princeton Review. He addresses Christian teachers of the young, and proceeds, at least in name, upon the basis of ordinary Christian conceptions. It is the pedagogic value of the latter, however, that he alone emphasizes; and the rationalistic reader can understand him without much difficulty. If Orthodoxy would take his suggestions to heart, there would be an indefinite step forward in its methods of religious instruction. We trust the audience to whom Dr. Hall seems to prefer to address himself will repay him with the attention he merits. He says, "No religious truth must be taught as fundamental, especially as fundamental to morality, which can be seriously doubted or even misunderstood." And again, "Much moral truth is taught in common by Jews, Catholics, and Protestants, by unpedagogic methods, which would be greatly improved if the same common matter were to be admitted by the consent of all into the public schools." His definition of religion and distinction of it from the various formulations which varying intellectual stand-points put upon it (e.g., unity with nature, harmony with self, reunion with God) are admirable. He designates the Holy Spirit as "the highest of all muses." The article should not fail to be read by every one engaged in teaching.

SOLOMON declared a long time ago that "there is no new thing under the sun." But Solomon didn't live in the nineteenth century, or he might have revoked that declaration. For instance, is it not a decidedly new thing for the organ of one of the most orthodox sects to come to the defence of an Agnostic against the attack of a less pronounced Free thinker? Yet here is the staid Presbyterian defending, after its own peculiar fashion, Herbert Spencer from the criticisms of Colonel Higginson published in these columns a week or two since. The Presbyterian says: "It seems to us that, when a great master in modern philosophy is described as ignorant of history, biology, and psychology, the time of his dethronement is at hand. Lest he should be accused of total blindness to Mr. Spencer's merits, Mr. Higginson records that he 'had one or two very pleasant personal interviews with him, and had seen him play billiards at the Athenæum Club in London, 'and, to do him justice,' as the æsthetic maidens in the play say of Bunthorne's reading, 'he did it very well.'" All of which proves that Mr. Higginson has learned, in part, the lesson prescribed in Pope's satires:—

'Damn with faint praise, assent with civil sneer,
And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer.'

All this is surely 'snubbing' an oracle very severely. Mr. Spencer gets scant justice, gets real injustice, we think, from this coterie of Transcendentalists, Biologists, and Rationalistic critics, and all to get to the conclusion—of very little worth—that 'Free Religion' is more than 'a gospel according to Herbert Spencer.' Who ever said it was a 'gospel' of any kind?"

THE Chicago Unity of February 1, in its review of the Unitarian Year-Book for 1882, says: "The well-known names of Dr. C. A. Bartol, of Boston; John H. Clifford, of Andover; W. C. Gannett, of St. Paul; Samuel Longfellow, of Germantown; George C. Miln, of Chicago; and W. J. Potter, of New Bedford,—are missed from this list, for theological and ecclesiastical reasons, against which we wish here, and on all other proper occasions, to enter our earnest protest. Any principle that includes Dr. Hedge and excludes Dr. Bartol, that counts in Connor and counts out Gannett, that has a place for C. G. Ames and none for his congenial neighbor, Samuel Longfellow; that has use for Savage, but none for Potter; that recognizes Slicer, but not his friend Miln,—is, on the face of it, arbitrary and unjust. To our mind, any attempt to go back of the principle of Independent Congregationalism, upon which is based the entire Unitarian movement in America,—to inquire, either directly or indirectly, into the theology of a minister which any society belonging to the Unitarian fellowship has seen fit to employ, before registering his name,—is to assume an ecclesiastical authority foreign to the spirit and the letter of Unitarianism. Some of these brethren may prefer to have their names omitted from a list compiled on a partial basis, as we would; but so some men might wish to have their names left off the city directory, or their farms left out of the county map, but it is the province of the statistician simply to take the census as it is. This is the only rule that should guide the compiler of a Unitarian Year-Book; and, until the American Unitarian Association recognize their limitation in this direction in the compilation of their annual, said annual will so far misrepresent the Unitarian movement. Unity extends its right hand of fellowship to the excluded six. Your names are promptly entered upon our Year-Book; and, on behalf of the recorded four hundred and three, we respectfully ask you not to exclude us from more truly Unitarian fellowship."

WE are glad to see the importance of legislation and action in regard to polygamy in this country forced upon the attention of Congress by public meetings and by the press; but the spirit exhibited, and the policy recommended by some of the speakers and papers, partake more of that barbarism of which polygamy is a twin relic than of that enlightenment and philanthropy which should inspire the reformer of to-day. At the meetings held in New York, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Chicago, and other cities, clergymen, especially, have demanded that the government proceed at once to suppress polygamy at the point of the bayonet. Some of the speakers declare that Mormonism and polygamy are inseparable, and that nothing should be left of either. A war of extermination is the only thing that will satisfy these gentlemen. They forget that the Mormons are generally ignorant people; that they find authority for their institution in the book which these clergymen profess to believe is a revelation from God; that polygamy in Utah is an evil which has been encouraged by the neglect of the government until it has grown strong and knit itself into the social life of the Mormons; that the common sentiments of humanity and a wise statesmanship equally require that all peaceable means of suppressing the evil be exhausted before appealing to fire and sword; that the government should, by all means, proceed according to law; that the Supreme Court of the United States was compelled recently to reverse a decision of the Territorial Court in Utah, which had convicted a Mormon of bigamy, in consequence of the inadequacy of existing laws to suppress polygamy; and that, therefore, the enactment of laws by Congress, which will make it possible to prevent men living in polygamous relations, and which will provide for the rights of those who were born in polygamy or are its innocent victims, rather than a resort to the bullet and the bayonet, is demanded to-day by an enlightened public sentiment. Heroic treatment is indeed needed; but the knife of the surgeon, directed with skill and kindness, and not the tomahawk of the savage wielded in hatred and revenge, is what is needed.

The Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 16, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, } Editors.

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

For The Index.

APPOINTED.

Great are the ways of the great,
High in resolve for high need,
In promised human plenty
To throttle the person's greed!

Who can mock the voice that calls?
Who forget the mandate laid?
Hark! the mystic whisper falls,
And not one soul can evade.

When Right summons, who dare stay?
For its gift, Life made thee slave:
On! though nature makes the play
Of sweet good and ill thy grave.

None are free but those who shirk,
Thou art for the battle's strain:
Duty calls to hardy work,
Woe to him who shrinks the pain.

Hand in hand, we march with Fate,
Answering Nature back in deeds:
Eye of prophet doth create
Duties in the race's needs.

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

THE DYING BUDDHIST'S HYMN.

I go to him who all is,
The self-existent Perfectness;
Who knows not of finality,
The only Being that can be;
Who without motion can create,
Or, motionless, annihilate
A world whose cup is brimming high
With will and self and blasphemy.

Unto the All be honor given,—
I shall not see him, even in heaven:
The outline of Infinity,
The substance of Divinity,
Created spirit may not grasp;
Only by faith his knees I clasp.
My little rill draws near the sea.
Source of my soul, I come to thee.

THESE forms of asceticism have existed in this world: religious asceticism, being the refusal of pleasure and knowledge for the sake of power, seen chiefly in the early days of Sparta and of Rome; and monetary asceticism, consisting in the refusal of pleasure and knowledge for the sake of money, seen in the present days of London and Manchester.—John Ruskin.

LAUREATE DESPAIR.

A Discourse given at South Place Chapel, London.

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY.

[Reprinted from the author's proof sheets.]

Let me say at once that I am glad the Poet Laureate has written the poem called "Despair," which I propose to criticise. It is a cry out of the heart of an earnest man: it utters the sorrow with which many people in our time see their old dreams fading, and no new ones rising in their place; and it reminds free thinkers that theirs is a heavy responsibility and duty. They have to meet and respond to that need and pain which thousands feel where one can give it expression. Men of science and philosophers do not always understand this. The most eminent of them are pursuing ideals far more beautiful to them than those that have set. They have special knowledge or special aims, which kindle into pillars of fire before their enthusiasm, and cannot see how to those of other studies and pursuits their guiding splendor is a pillar of smoke rising from a fair world slowly consumed. The man of science, hourly occupied with discoveries which blaze upon him, star by star, till his reason is as a vault sown with eternal lights, feels that he is in the presence of conceptions beside which the visions of Dante and Milton are frescos of a time-darkened dome. The enthusiast of Humanity holds in his eye a latter-day glory of which history is the prophecy and developed man the fulfilment. Such enthusiasms imply continual studies, occupations, duties, which leave little room for attention to the shadows these lights cast upon the old world of dreams,—each shadow a dogma or its phantom. Nevertheless, that world of dreams, shades, phantoms, is still real to many. It is real not only to the ignorant, whom it terrifies, and to the selfish, whose power rests on it, but to spiritual invalids, who need sympathy. And, beyond this reality, the phantasms on which religion and society were founded possess a quasi-reality even for robust minds. You may recall the saying of Madame de Staël, that "she did not believe in ghosts, but was afraid of them." After dogmas are dead, their ghosts walk the earth; and even some who no longer believe in the ghosts are still afraid of them. When their intellects are no longer haunted, their nerves are.

There are others, again, for whose vision or nerves the pleasant dogmas alone survive in this attenuated, ghostly form. They no longer believe in the ghosts, but still love them. Of this class is the literary artist. To the pictorial artist, a ruin is more picturesque than the most comfortable dwelling. 'Tis said of an eminent art-critic that, being invited to visit America, he replied that he could not think of visiting a country where there were no ruins. Alfred Tennyson is the consummate artist in poetry. We all know with what tender sentiment Tennyson has painted the scenery of Arthur's time, with what felicity described many other reliques of human antiquity. "His eye will not look upon a bad color." He sees the moulding ruins in their picturesque aspects, leaving out of sight the noxious weeds and vermin that infest them. Where these loathsome things appear, no man more recoils from them. If the White Ladies of Superstition haunt them, these he admires; but he impales the gnomes and vampires.

In this, his latest poem, "Despair," he shows a childlike simplicity of desire to retain all the pleasant and reject all the unpleasant consequences of the same principles. His attitude is indeed kindlier to the agnostic than to the orthodox: for the first he has lamentation, for the other anathema. His denunciation of Orthodoxy is bitter. The poem is the supposed utterance of a man to his former minister. "A man and his wife, having lost faith in God and hope of a life to come, and being utterly miserable in this, resolve to end themselves by drowning. The woman is drowned, but the man is saved by the minister of the sect he had attended." He has no gratitude for the minister who rescued him, only a curse, attributing to him the first cause of the hopeless horrors amid which the two found themselves. He tells the minister they broke away from Christ because Christ seemed to speak of hell; and so they passed from a cheerless night to a drearier day, from horrible belief to total unbelief.

"Where you baw'd the dark side of your faith, and a God of eternal rage, Till you flung us back on ourselves, and the human heart, and the Age.

But pity—that Pagan held it a vice—was in her and in me, Helpless, taking the place of the pitying God that should be:

Pity for all that aches in the grasp of an idiot power, And pity for our own selves on an earth that bore not a flower."

Again he says:—

"Were there a God, as you say, His love would have power over Hell till it utterly vanish'd away.

Ah, yet—I have had some glimmer at times, in my gloomiest woe,

Of a God behind all—after all—the Great God, for aught that I know;

But the God of Love and of Hell together—they cannot be thought:

If there be such a God, may the Great God curse him and bring him to nought."

This is what the Poet Laureate thinks of the God of every creed in Christendom, for every creed maintains an eternal hell.

But the agnostic, the know-nothing sceptic, is summoned to bear his share in this tragedy of hopelessness and suicide. The poet does not suggest that disbelief in a future life or in a Deity would alone lead to suicide. In his imaginary case, unbelief is only a factor. The man and wife were in terrible trouble. One of their two sons had died: the eldest had fled after committing forgery on his own father, bringing him to ruin. It is under such fearful circumstances that, without faith or hope, they sink into despair. The man says:—

"Why should we bear with an hour of torture, a moment of pain,

If every man die for ever, if all his griefs are vain, And the homeless planet at length will be wheeled through the silence of space,

Motherless evermore of an ever-vanishing race?"

For these are the new dark ages, you see, of the popular press,

When the bat comes out of his cave, and the owls are whooping at noon,

And doubt is the lord of this dunghill, and crows to the sun and moon,

Till the sun and moon of our science are both of them turned to blood,

And Hope will have broken her heart, running after a shadow of good."

It is a striking fact, in our sceptical age, that such lamentations as these are not heard from among the poor and the drudges of society. They who are asking whether life be worth living without the old faith in immortality, and they who say it is not, are persons of position and wealth. Any one who has taken the pains to observe the crowds of working people who attend the lectures of secularists, or to read their journals, will know they are cheery enough. We never hear any of them bemoaning the vanished faith. In truth, the more important fact is not that the belief in immortality is gone, or the belief in Deity, but that belief in a desirable immortality and a desirable Deity has gone out of the hearts of many. In one of his humorous pieces, Lucian, describing his imaginary journey through Hades, says he could recognize those who had been kings or rich people on earth by their loud lamentations. They had parted with so much. Those who on earth had been poor and wretched were quiet enough. We may observe similar phenomena in this psychological Hades, or realm of the Unseen and Unknown, into which modern thought has entered. Those to whom God has allotted palaces, plenty, culture, beauty, can easily believe him a God of Love; and it were to them heaven enough to wake from the grave to a continuance of the same. But they who have known hunger, cold, drudgery, ignorance, have no such reason to say God is Love. Such may naturally say, "If we have waked up in this world in dens of misery, why, under the same providence, may we not wake up to a future of misery?" The old creeds met that difficulty. They showed a miraculous revelation on the subject, by which God had established an insurance against future misery, an assurance of future luxury. It was all to be supernatural. By miraculous might, poverty was to be changed to wealth, the hovel to a palace, rags to fine raiment, ignorance to knowledge, folly to wisdom, and scarlet sin to snow-pure virtue. Without such tremendous transformations, the masses of the miserable could have no interest in immortality. But gradually the comfortable scholarship and theology of our time, in trying to prove a God of nature, have done away with the God of super-nature. Their deity of design is loaded with all the bad designs under which men suffer. Fifty years ago, Carlyle groaned because he could not believe in a devil any more. Philosophy had reasoned a devil out of existence. The result was to make the remaining power responsible for all the evils in the world, and ultimately bring him into doubt and disgrace too. Dismissing the Devil out of faith has not dismissed evil, the mad work of earthquake, hurricane, and fire. As we think of the shores with their wrecks, as we think of those people in Vienna gathered around the charred remains of their families and friends, must we not ask, If this is providential work, what would be diabolical work? Reason says to theology, "At least, you can be silent, and not malign the spirit of good within us by asking us to call that without good which we know to be bad!"

Similarly, theologians, in trying to rationalize the idea of immortality, have naturalized it. They have tacked it on to evolution. But what the miserable suffer by is evolution: unless they can be assured of a supernatural change, of a heaven, they do not want to be evolved any more. Only a miraculous revelation could promise them that miraculous heaven; and the only alleged revelation is rejected by the culture and charity of our age. It is denied by culture, because it reveals some impossibilities; by charity, because it reveals a God capable of torturing people more than they are tortured here. What are eight hundred people burned swiftly in a theatre compared to millions burning in hell for ages, if not forever, as Revelation declares? Our Poet Laureate is a man of both culture and charity: he cannot sing of a revelation which includes hell, however he may cling to hopes that came by the same revelation, or mourn at thought of parting from a world so fair.

Candor compels us to admit that there is as yet no certainty of a future life for the individual consciousness. The surviving seed of the human organism, if it exist, has not been discovered. There is nothing unnatural in the theory. It would not be more miraculous to find ourselves in another world than to find ourselves in this. If two atoms of the primeval nebula, thrown together, had been for one instant capable of speculation, how little could they have imagined a company of men and women gathered to meditate on life and eternity! All this is very marvellous, if we conceive it contemplated from a point of non-existence. For all we know there are more marvels beyond.

But suppose there are none. Suppose death be the end of us: is there any reason for despair? Even for the man and woman on whom life had brought dire calamities, was there any reason for suicide? Just the reverse, I should say. Belief that this life was all were reason for making the most of it. Belief that their ruin would not be repaired hereafter were reason for trying to repair it here as well as they could. Has Tennyson evolved his man and woman out of his inner consciousness? It is doubtful if in the annals of free thought such a case can be pointed out, though many instances may be shown where believers in a future world slew themselves to get there. Suicide was a mania in some old convents until the Church fixed its "canon 'gainst self-slaughter."

However, it may be that instances of the kind Tennyson describes may occur. We are but on the threshold of the age when men are to live and work without certainty of future rewards and payments. The doubts now in the head must presently reach the heart, then influence the hand. If people have built their houses on the sand of mythology, and they fall, it may be that some will not have the heart to begin new buildings on the rock. What then? It will be only the continuation of the old law,—survival of the fittest. Suicides at least do not live to increase their race. Only those tend to prevail in nature who can adapt themselves to the conditions of nature. If nature has arrived at a period of culture when supernaturalism passes out of the human faith, then they who sink into despair or death, on that account, show themselves no longer adapted to nature. There will be a survival of those more adapted to the new ideas, who prefer them, who do not aspire to live forever, but have a heart for any fate, and a religion whose forces and joys are concentrated in the life that now is. If nature and humanity need such a race for their furtherance, such a race will be produced; and they will read poems like this "Despair," with a curiosity mixed with compassion, wondering how their ancestors could have been troubled about such a matter.

Something like this has occurred in the past in several instances. While Christians find fullest expression of their joyful emotions in the psalmody and prophecy of the Hebrews, they often forget that those glowing hymns say no word about a future life. There is no clear affirmation of immortality in the Old Testament, but much to the contrary. Buddhism also, which has awakened the enthusiasm of a third of a human race, arose as a protest against theism and immortality. In such instances there would appear to have been reactions against previous theories, which had so absorbed mankind in metaphysics and speculations about the future as to belittle this life and cause neglect of this world. Despised and degraded nature avenged this wrong by making asceticism its own destruction and worldliness a source of strength and survival.* Some such Nemesis seems to be following the extreme other-worldliness which, for so many Christian centuries, has bestowed the fruits of human toil upon supposed supernatural interests. This earthward swing of the slow pendulum of faith is not likely to be arrested until religion has been thoroughly humanized. As a brave clergyman (Rev. Harry Jones) warned the Church Congress at York, the Church will never conquer secularism, except by doing more for mankind than secularism does.

We must also remember that no oscillations of the pendulum between theology and humanity, no reactions, determine the question. As Old Testament secularism followed Egyptian mysticism, Talmudic visions of heaven succeeded. Every ebb alternates a flow in the tides of human feeling; and these tides are the generations which nature successively creates to fulfil successive conditions, and to find their joy in such fulfilment, whatever be the despair at the ebbing of the faith of the flowing tide.

But, no doubt, these rising and falling ages of speculation and religion will show calmer and happier phenomena in the future than in the past. There are traces in the earth of tremendous operations in the past, which geology was unable to account for by any forces now acting, until astronomy discovered that the moon had been steadily receding from the earth, its mother. The moon is now two hundred and forty thousand miles away, but is proved to have been once only forty thousand miles distant. At that period, the tides were to the tides of our time as 216 to 1. This country and many others must have been flooded with every tide, and the enormous geologic results are now understood. There would appear to be some correspondence in all this with mental and moral phenomena. In religious geology also there are traces of convulsions and huge formations which it has been difficult to account for,—mighty religious wars, massacres, whole races committing slow suicide for the sake of their gods. Comparative studies now show that the lunar theology was much nearer to mankind than now, and the tides more furious. The extraneous influence is withdrawing more and more. Where theologians used to burn each other, they now fight combats with pens. Where heretics were massacred, they are now only visited with dislike. Instead of crusades with Richard and Saladin, we have young poets singing on the crest of a sparkling tide, and their elder, from reflux waves, murmuring rhythmic Despair. There is a vast difference between the emotions awakened by belief in a deity near at hand, pressing down upon the life, and those awakened by a hypothetical deity of philosophy or ethics. When men attributed their every hourly hap, good or bad, to the personal favor or to the anger of their deity, their feeling at any supposed affront to their deity, mingled with selfishness and terror, rose to a pitch very different from any now known, when few men refer any event to supernatural intervention. Yet do the great movements of the universe go on, the cycles and the periods fulfil themselves, the planets roll on new orbits with changed revolutions: and, whatever be the corresponding changes in human opinion, they cannot alter the eternal fact.

If immortality be the law of the universe, it will be reached by believers and disbelievers alike. But, could the world be made absolutely certain of it beforehand, by the only means of certainty,—scientific proof,—what were the advantage? It would no longer be a miraculous thing, promising all a leap from earthly sorrow to heavenly bliss, but merely a law of nature, mere continuance, the millions rising from their graves to go on with existence, just as they will rise from their beds to-morrow. There would be no further note of despair from the Laureates. But how would it be with the general world? One of the most powerful poems of our time has been written by a French lady, Louise Ackermann. It is entitled Les Malheureux,—the unhappy. The last day has come. The trumpet has sounded. A great angel descends, uncovers all the graves of the dead, and bids them come forth for everlasting life. Some eagerly come forth, but a large number refuse. To the divine command that they shall emerge, their voice is heard in one utterance. They tell him they have had enough of life in his creation; they have passed through thorns and over flinty paths, from agony to agony. To such an existence he called them, they suffered it; and now they will forgive him only if he will let them rest and forget that they have lived. Such is the despair with which one-half of the world might answer the joy of the other, should a mere natural immortality be proved.

A great deal of the poetry of the world has invested with glory man's visions of heaven and heavenly beings. The very greatest poets have invested nature and the earth with glory, and set the pulses of the human heart to music. This has been the greatness of Homer, Shakspeare, Goethe. But the majority have given the world visions of heaven, divine dramas, the hymns of immortality; and it is these that have been taught to earth's millions in their infancy. These happy hymns have for ages soothed sorrowing hearts, and helped the masses of mankind to bear the burdens of life,—this not only in Christendom, but in so-called pagan lands and ages. These have been as the songs of Israfel in Eastern faith. They said a sweet singer among the angels left heaven to go forth over the suffering world and soothe the mortals with his heavenly lyre and his hymns, until all were able to bear the griefs of life, because of the joys beyond rehearsed by Israfel. But once, while this angel was singing with his celestial, seven-stringed lyre, one string of it snapped. No one could be found to mend the string or supply its place; and every time Israfel tried to make music it was all jangling discords, through that broken string. So Israfel took his flight, and never returned to the world. The tale sounds like a foreboding of what has in these last days befallen the sacred poetry which so long made the world forget its griefs. The lyre of Israfel is the human heart, and the snapped string is its faith in a supernatural heaven. It has been snapped by the development of nature: it therefore cannot be restored, unless by a further development. And so sacred poetry has taken its flight from the world, its last great song being a Paradise Lost. In other words, the hope of immortality has ceased to have power to soothe and uplift those who most needed it, because the recognized reign of law forbids belief that such life, should it come, would be very different from the life that now is.

But there is another story of a broken string, with a different ending. It comes from Greece (Browning has finely told it in "The Two Poets of Croisic"), the land of art and of the beauty that adorns the earth. It is of a bard who came with his lyre to sing for a prize. He came with other competitors before the solemn judges. The others had all sung their poems. Now came our youth with his. His theme rose high and higher, till at length he came to the great theme of his song,—love. Just then, he felt beneath his finger that one string of his lyre had snapped, a string that presently must do its part or else his song be put to shame. On, on, his strain went, as if to its death; but, just as he drew near his note of despair, lo! a cricket chirped loud, chimed in with just that needed note. Saved, he went on, and ever as he returned to this broken string the cricket duly made good the snapped string, and thus the judges missed no note of the music, which won the crown. On the poet's statue was carved the cricket which contributed from the lowly hearth the needed note in that hymn of love, when the old string had broken. That tale, too, I doubt not, came out of that truest of all poets, the human heart. For the heart of our race is aged in such experiences as those which elicit rhymes of despair. It has seen beautiful symbols fade in myriads,—symbols of heavens innumerable, every one clung to by suffering Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, as much as any Christian clings to their successors. It has seen troops of bright gods and goddesses perish, nymphs and fairies leaving wood and vale desolate; and yet, just as its gladder heart-string has snapped, its faith in heaven given way, some cheery note from the earth has come to remind it of the love near at hand, of the divine joy vanished from its ancient heavens, only to be revealed at the hearth.

A cricket-chirp! That is all. While our great Laureate is employing his art to sing of despair, and other poets aspire to ambitious themes, the notes are as yet but few and humble which cheer man with a trust in the love that is near him. But there are such notes, making up for the creed's snapped string. Nor are they near only the happy. The cricket sings from many an overshadowed hearth. It tells the heart to be brave, and never count life lost so long as courage remain. It bids man cease thinking so much about himself,—whether he be likely to die next year or die forever,—and go fall in love with something, an outself, to dispel morbid meditations. It warns us not to worry over what may never happen, or, if it happen, may be for the best, but turn to make what paradise we can on earth; nor admit into it the destroyer of every paradise, care about the morrow or about the far future. All these spiritual despairs are diseases of the imagination. In a sense, it is hereditary disease. For many generations, our ancestors employed their imaginations for little else than to realize the charnel-house and picture happiness or horrors beyond it. So their children have inherited a morbid tendency of imagination, whereby they may turn from the happiness they have and make themselves miserable with dreams about its vanishing. Such work of the imagination is illegitimate. Imagination is the brightest angel of the head, as love is of the heart. They are twin angels, and their office is to make life rich and beautiful. And they can so enrich and adorn life, though passed in a hovel, though amid pain, though destined to end forever, provided they be not dismissed from their post of present duty and sent wandering through clouds to find love's objects, or digging into graves to find life's fountain. I love and admire our Laureate for his great heart and his beautiful art, but will not follow his muse, singing of despair, except with a hope that it is his way of writing its epitaph. I will follow the happy minstrel. That poet who shows life to be environed with beauty, makes deserts blossom in his song, whose poem is a fountain of joy for all the living, bringing forgetfulness to pain and a sweet lullaby for the dying,—that shall be my poet. And if, among the minstrels of our time, such happy ones cannot be found, because some string of faith or heart is snapped, then let us listen to the cheery cricket, to the voices of children, to the gentle words of affection, to the unbroken song of the merry hearts in nature that remember only its loveliness. We will listen to these until the new poetry shall arise—as arise it will—with fresh songs, to bid all spirits rejoice in that which to the old brought despair. That is the task of poetry and art. Every new thing destroying the old brings despair. None brought more than Christianity—shattering the fair gods—and Protestantism, over whose havoc of prayers and pieties Luther's poor wife wept; but poetry and art did their work, and none now long for restoration of Aphrodite or Madonna. So also shall our age of science find its poets and artists, and our children shall no more long for a buried faith than we do for the holy dolls of crumbled altars, whose power to charm has fled.

THE Scientific American came out of the late fire in New York, like the fabled Phoenix, with renewed life. The subscription lists, account books, patent records, patent drawings, and correspondence were preserved in massive fire-proof safes. The printing of the Scientific American and Supplement was done in another building: consequently, the types, plates, presses, paper, etc., were unharmed, and no interruption of business was occasioned. The new Scientific American offices are located at 261 Broadway, corner of Warren Street. If any of our readers should happen to make a new discovery, they have only to drop a line to Munn & Co., 261 Broadway, New York, who will reply at once, without charge, stating whether the invention is probably novel and patentable. A handbook of instructions, with full particulars, will also be sent free. Messrs. Munn & Co. have had over thirty-five years' experience in the business.

LIBERALISM IN AUSTRALIA.

Editors of The Index:—

I am gratified at the intimation I have received through a San Francisco friend that an article descriptive of the growth of Liberalism in Australia would be deemed acceptable by you, as it is a sign that free thought exerts a uniting as well as a disintegrating influence on social organization. While necessarily destructive of the old order based on priestly interpretation of what is termed divine revelation, it presents, when rightly understood, a firmer because broader foundation of fraternal union than any dogmatic assumption can offer. Hence, you are doubtless right in conceiving that the struggles and triumphs of the remotest section of free thinkers cannot fail to be of some interest to Liberals in all parts of the world.

Perhaps it will be necessary, as far as the majority of your readers are concerned, to remind them of the provincial divisions of Australian settlement, so as to make my subsequent statements more readily comprehensible. Australia, exclusive of New Zealand and Tasmania (formerly Van Diemen's Land), comprises five colonies, each, for all practical purposes, as completely separated from the others, politically, as is Canada from the United States. To the average denizen of any one of the colonies, the names of the leading politicians of other colonies are almost unknown, and the doings in other parliaments only thought of when some more startling fact than usual receives telegraphic and possibly editorial recognition in the local papers. Thus, in each colony there have been independent conflicts more or less fierce, prolonged, and decisive between Liberalism and Dogmatism, over educational and other questions, with differing results.

One of these colonies—namely, Western Australia—I may promptly dismiss from our consideration. Although I visited it once for a few days in 1864, on a journalistic mission, I know little about it; and, spite of the fact that it owns, in extent of acres, a full third of the island continent, it is so remote from the rest and so scantily populated as to call for slight attention. We have left, then, Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, and Queensland, which I have mentioned according to their relative populations, it being understood that the two first are rapidly approximating and have between them nearly two million souls. With regard to South Australia and Queensland, each of them is visited occasionally by liberal lecturers but can boast no permanent organization of importance. In Adelaide and Brisbane, their respective capitals, are of course numerous free thinkers, of either spiritualistic or materialistic tendencies, who from time to time make brave efforts to forward the cause of Liberalism by combination, but the super-incumbent pressure of a time-cemented Orthodoxy has proved hitherto banefully crushing. Still, every failure adds a new layer to the foundations of a future structure. In both these colonies, however, I believe, the State Education is completely secular, a fact due rather, I think, to the mutual jealousies of the sects than to the influence of unsectarian Liberals.

Victoria.

As fully a third of the population of this colony is centred in Melbourne and its suburbs, it will be readily understood that the liberal movement has chiefly manifested itself in the capital, Ballarat and Sandhurst, which each comprise about thirty thousand citizens, and have their respective spiritualistic organizations, limited in number, but ever ready to lend a helping hand to the cause of free thought. It is to Melbourne, however, that we have to look, if we would trace the progress of liberal ideas during the last quarter of a century. In order that it may be understood I speak of that of which I have knowledge, I would here premise that I lived in Melbourne from the year 1853 to the end of 1875, brief intermissions of visits to the other colonies excepted; that during those years I took an active part in its journalistic, political, and commercial life; and that the later portion of this time I devoted myself with all the energy I could command to the cause of Liberalism, the advocacy of which can now only cease with my life.

In Melbourne, as elsewhere, Unitarianism has proved itself the nursery of free thought. Unitarianism, as a finality, seems to me utterly contemptible. In Mon-cure Conway's recently published, most interesting volume on "Thomas Carlyle" occurs this passage: "Carlyle never liked Unitarianism, regarding it as a competitive variety of that Coleridgean 'moonshine' devised by and for those who had not the courage of their principles. 'If so far, why not farther?'" I sympathize completely with this view. Still, I must recognize the vast service Unitarianism has everywhere performed as a stepping-stone from Orthodoxy up to free thought. Early in the sixties, the little Unitarian chapel in East Melbourne was almost the only place where anything like Sunday Rationalism had a show. On the week days, portions of the press every now and then took a passing glance at theology, and dissipated for a moment the clouds of traditional superstition which everywhere enshrouded it; but on Sunday the light of the press was put out, and the grim pulpites had it all their own way. The Unitarian minister, Rev. Henry Higginson, was not a very broad-minded man. From the nature of his position, however, he had to fight the Orthodox hell-upholders, and hence could not fail from helping many into the light of freedom.

But it is to H. K. Rusden, a gentleman occupying a subordinate position in the government service, that Melbourne, in my judgment, is more indebted for its growing free thought than to any one else. This gentleman is a staunch materialist, but is at the same time—what so many materialists as well as Spiritualists are not—a thorough free thinker, believing in the utility, nay, absolute necessity, of open, unrestrained discussion of every subject. He was the moving spirit in the formation of the first completely free debating society in Victoria; and, through its early years of opprobrium and struggle, he, by his dogged persistency, kept it from dissolution. Since 1867, it has been known as the Eclectic Association. I had the honor of officiating as its president for two years, and can vouch that more complete freedom of discussion could not be enjoyed by any society. All that is asked of its members is that they debate with courtesy. No phase of opinion, when courteously expressed, is tabooed. Curiously enough, this institution, whose liberalizing influence has already been felt far and wide, owed its genesis to an evangelical missionary. An old gentleman, named Servise (father of Hon. James Servise, for some time Premier and Treasurer of the colony, and one of its ablest politicians), feeling a call toward preaching, and having sufficient faith in his dogmas to trust them to discussion, used to take a small hall for each Sunday evening, and invite infidels especially to come and hear him, offering them the (to him) perilous opportunity of questioning his assertions. Mr. Rusden, ever on the qui vive where theological debate presented itself, was among those who responded. The discussion soon expanded beyond the limits Mr. Servise intended, and he had to follow the ordinary Orthodox lead in excluding it from his meetings. But the questioning spirit was aroused. Doubt is, as Buckle says, the parent of progress. Numbers who were previously satisfied, or at least indifferent, had begun to doubt; and Mr. Rusden took advantage of the fact to form a small organization, which shortly afterward, as I have said, became the Eclectic Association. Its discussions are not confined to theology, but are all of them of a more or less liberalizing character. Its meetings are held once a month in the Royal Society's Hall, and it has published and distributed thousands of important pamphlets. From it, other similar organizations have sprung, notably the Sunday Free Discussion Society, whose weekly gatherings are largely attended.

Toward the close of the year 1871, a change of some importance to the cause of free thought occurred in the Melbourne Unitarian Church. Mr. Higginson became too ill to continue his labors; and, as there was no one at hand to take his place, there were fears that the building would have to be closed. At this juncture, four gentlemen, who had been for some time intimately connected with its management, volunteered to deliver the needful lectures for the approaching twelve months. These were Mr. H. G. Turner, manager of one of the local banks, Mr. James Smith, journalist, Mr. John Ross, merchant, and myself. The pulpit, as altogether too Orthodox a symbol, was removed, and a platform substituted, airy and broad of aspect, but not more so than the nature of the subjects to be discussed on it. From this platform, on the opening Sunday of the year 1872, I delivered the first lecture, my subject being "Evolution"; and James Smith held forth in the evening, the "Religious Ideas of Shakspeare" being his theme. Curiously enough, both of us had in previous years figured as well-known editors of the local Punch, a paper established in the remote antiquity of 1854, and still flourishing. Naturally, this lively publication came out with a cartoon, entitled "What may happen to Punch's old editors in Victoria," and representing us as preachers of the most pronounced type. This year was a lively one for the Unitarian Church, which has now subsided into sedate ways; and, of the four who headed this outbreak, I seem to be the only one whose call to the liberal platform has been a permanent one.

In Melbourne, as elsewhere, Spiritualism has proved itself one of the mightiest of modern agents on behalf of Liberalism. The discussions it induced, and to which the press occasionally opened its columns, all had a liberalizing tendency; while throughout Australia and New Zealand no other lecturers than believers in Spiritualism have as yet been enabled to attract and hold audiences numbered by the thousand. The list of such lecturers comprehends the names of John Tyerman, Dr. Peebles, Mrs. Hardinge-Britten, Thomas Walker, and myself. I mention this fact not by way of boast, but in hopes of inducing materialists and agnostics to recognize the importance of this agency in freeing the mind of the world. Appealing not to faith, but to reason; ready to fall, if not upheld by science, basing all future good on present advancement, it is bound to prove the noblest helpmate to rationalism that mankind has known.

The history of the education question in Victoria, as in the other colonies, represents one of the most interesting phases of the conflict everywhere waging between ancient dogma and modern enlightenment; and happily, in Victoria thus far, the triumph of the advocates of the latter has been complete. Some ten years ago, the system now in force was inaugurated by the legislature. There had been for years general out-of-door agitation and organization, with the view of putting an end to the evils of denominationalism in the State schools, until at length a ministry was impelled to bring in an education act, making the public education compulsory, secular, and free. The opposition to the measure from Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, and others, was of course extreme; but the statesman who had charge of it—Wilberforce Stephen, subsequently a judge of the Supreme Court, and now passed to the majority—never swerved from his point. His conduct was characterized by a brother barrister and Mr. Stephen's successor on the bench, one whom I may safely term Victoria's most honored public man, George Higinbotham, as furnishing a rare instance of "magnificent fidelity." By the act thus passed, the ordinary school hours are devoted entirely to secular teaching, and nothing but secular teaching is permitted to be given at any time by State officials. After school hours, the buildings are allowed to be used, under definite regulations, by ministers of religion for the youth of their various sects. But I need hardly say that this privilege is in most places almost a dead letter. At all events, the State has nothing whatever to do with the propagation of religious teaching, using the word "religious" in its ordinary Christian sense. The best of all religions—the religion of doing good in this world—of course forms a part of all satisfactory secular training, and no true-hearted schoolmaster can help inculcating it. Large sums of money have been expended over this State education scheme in Victoria, in some years overtopping half a million of pounds, and in no part of the world is there one to be found more admirable and complete. The bishops, Roman Catholic and Anglican, rail at and revile it, as well they may; but the mass of the people appreciate it, and I do not believe that any government that ventured to tamper with it would last a day.

While such a system of education as this is maintained, there can be no rational fears for the future of Liberalism in Victoria. There may be outbreaks of bigotry occasionally,—as, for instance, some three years ago, when the government interposed to prevent the use of the theatres on Sunday evenings for gatherings which paid for admission to hear liberal lectures,—but the drift of public opinion, as the generations advance, will necessarily be toward freedom. With the schools, and, as a rule, the press working in the direction of liberty, what chance has the pulpit, however hot and eager, to make headway against it?

CHARLES BRIGHT.

"THE SYNTHESIS OF FREE THOUGHT AND RELIGION."

Editors of The Index :—

I sympathize most cordially with the aim and spirit of the editorial article on the above subject in The Index for January 5. It is undoubtedly true that there is to-day a tendency from opposite directions toward agnosticism. You say truly and well that man feels himself under obligation for what he has received from nature, and wishes to put himself in right relations with the universe.

As I understand you, you deem this sentiment or feeling essentially religious: it may or may not have relation to a personal Deity or deities. I am aware that forms of religion are claimed to exist which do not involve the factor of a personal Deity. But how is this, that you make it the same thing when you have a personal Deity and when you do not? Is it not de facto different in the one case from what it is in the other? How can one pray, if there is no personal God? You speak of a "power," or "powers behind phenomena," as admitted even by agnosticism and as an element in the possible synthesis of free thought and religion. But does agnosticism admit a power behind phenomena, apart from them, working as a cause in them? "The various religions" of mankind have admitted and claimed this. Is agnosticism a form of religion? You seem to assert or imply it, and your reasoning throughout seems to come from a theistic basis, or at least to be so near to theism that I cannot help asking whether the theist has not the advantage of you.

The theist's faith legitimates his religion; and it is easy to understand why he should worship, regarding his relation to the personal God who moves and arranges the affairs of the universe of far higher concern than any moral relation or action toward his fellow-men. But it is not so easy to see that religion, in the common acceptance of the term, has any place or meaning, if God is not a person who intervenes and acts for human weal. Is it not possible that the impersonal forces of matter are "personified" for the purposes of worship, and that the assertion of a definite ideal object of worship, of a personal benefactor and saviour, in the absence of any possible scientific basis of religion, answers most satisfactorily the ordinary feelings of humankind which ages of religious ceremonialism have engendered and rendered the chief ground of argument for religion? In fact, is not the logical outcome of any and all argument for a religion an inexplicable faith, not appreciable by the logical understanding or knowing faculties,—a childish, infantile trust of the heart in superior strength, superior wisdom and love, in some motherhood and fatherhood above and beyond us, a faith and trust born of weakness and want, and lasting only so long as the mind remains in ignorance and darkness?

I do not dogmatize. I only ask for truth and light.

CONGRATULATORY.

Editors of The Index :—

I enclose herewith a little gem on "Growing Old," that I copied from a recent number of the San Francisco Sunday Chronicle. For aught I know, it may be very old. It is certainly very beautiful. As "a thing of beauty is a joy forever," perhaps you will think it worth resetting in one of the golden columns of The Index.

While I have my pen in hand, I will embrace the occasion to offer to the senior editor of The Index my hearty congratulations upon his good fortune in securing the services of Mr. B. F. Underwood as assistant editor. That gentleman not only wields an able and facile pen; but his long experience as a free-thought lecturer, and his extensive personal acquaintance with "Liberals" in the West and South, will enable him to make many valuable suggestions. The readers of The Index are likewise to be congratulated upon the accession to its former list of admirable correspondents of a fresh galaxy of literary stars, among whom it may not be invidious to mention such names as Adler, Chadwick, Wasson, Savage, Conway, and Holyoake. To these lights, I wish I could add that "bright particular star," Francis E. Abbot, with the assurance that he would make himself visible with a more satisfying frequency than he has hitherto done. However, The Index can now boast of a corps of regular and occasional contributors that is not surpassed, if equalled, by the staff of any of its religious contemporaries.

Indeed, it would be difficult to find anywhere a corresponding number of more critical experts. They are bright-minded, quick-witted men and women, who, as Emerson phrases it, "carry knives in their heads," and are nothing loath to use them. If anyone, be he Buddhist or Mohammedan, Zoroastrian or Confucian, Platonist or Socratean, Jew or Christian, Orthodox or Heterodox, Pantheist or Theist, Agnostic or Atheist, has a pet theory concerning the Unknown that he would like to have examined anatomically, he is advised to take his subject to the dissecting rooms of The Index, where he may be sure it will be promptly operated upon in the most skillful manner known to polemical surgery. But enough of this.

That the present year may be a more prosperous one for The Index than any which has preceded it, and that each succeeding year will see its patronage increased and its influence augmented, is the earnest desire of the subscriber, whose isolation from the outward delights of life makes its weekly visit to his fireside a constantly recurring joy. DANIEL CONY.
WOBURN, Jan. 30, 1882.

[The extract sent by Mr. Cony is as follows :—Ed.]

"GROWING OLD."—A beautiful thought in connection with growing old was called out by a discussion as to which is the happiest season in the human life. The decision was left to an old man of eighty. Pointing to a neighboring grove, he said: "When vernal airs call forth the first birds, and yonder trees are filled with blossoms, I think how beautiful spring is; when summer clothes them with rich foliage, and the birds sing in the branches, I say, How beautiful summer is! when they are loaded with fruit or bright with hues of early frost, I think how beautiful is the autumn; but in sere winter, when there is neither verdure nor fruit, I look through the leafless boughs as I could never before, and I see the stars shine."

BOOK NOTICES.

HISTORY OF MATERIALISM AND CRITICISM OF ITS PRESENT IMPORTANCE. By Frederick Albert Lange, late Professor in the Universities of Zürich and Marburg. Authorized translation by Earnest Chester Thomas, late scholar of Trinity College, Oxford. In 3 vols. Vol. III. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The first two volumes of this work have already been noticed in these columns. This volume gives the history of materialism since Kant. The "Scientific Cosmogony," "Darwinism and Teleology," "The Relation of Man to the Animal World," "The Brain and the Soul," and "Scientific Psychology" are considered in the former part of the volume under the head of "The Natural Sciences." Under the title of "Ethical Materialism and Religion," the author examines historically and philosophically "Political Economy" and "Dogmatic Egoism," "Christianity and Enlightenment," "Theoretical Materialism in its Relation to Ethical Materialism," and "The Standpoint of the Ideal." This is the most interesting volume of the work, and indeed the other two are but a preparation for the generalizations presented in this volume. The author is a broad and profound thinker, learned, familiar with all systems of philosophy, versed not only in their controversies, but in the characters of their exponents and the characteristics of their adherents, with that full historical knowledge, fine discrimination and judicial spirit which enable him to trace the effects of theories and beliefs through the intricate web of human events, even when the theories and beliefs have been greatly changed or entirely outgrown. No other writer has given the facts bearing on philosophic materialism with such impartiality, or made such a well-sustained effort to keep track of the main principles and methods of materialism through all the mazes of speculation, all the changes in terminology, and all the modifications of opinions in the different schools of thought. The author has recorded the victories of materialism with fidelity and power, and at the same time he has pointed out its defects and indicated with clearness that true philosophy is eclectic, and must consist in a profound synthesis, combining the excellences of many systems, rather than in one-sided and incomplete statements which emphasize one side of life or one aspect of nature while ignoring others.

KITH AND KIN. A Novel. By Jessie Fothergill, author of The First Violin, The Wellfields, etc. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1881.

This recent number of the "Leisure Hour Series" tells how a high-spirited and excessively conscientious English girl, who is afraid of nothing except appearing to wish to get a husband, and works three years as a nurse in the hospital rather than accept any favors from a man whom she loves, but whom her mother has wronged, is won by a man as pure and stern as herself, who unwittingly confirms her in her refusal by saying that he knows of no such thing as forgiveness. This, indeed, is the most positive part of his creed; for he is, as he says, "What it is now fashionable to call an Agnostic,—a modish name for a very old thing. . . . It means that I acknowledge and confess my utter ignorance of all things outside experience, beyond the grave, beyond what science can tell me. . . . I don't presume or pretend to say that those things which believers preach do not exist. . . . I merely say that, for me, such things are veiled in a mystery which I cannot penetrate, and which I do not believe that any other man has the power to penetrate. My concern is with this life, and with this life alone. I have a moral law quite outside these questions."

Judith asks him if that would be sufficient to keep people from doing wrong, and he replies: "I do not know. I am an Agnostic there, too. It is to be hoped that, if it were not efficacious now,—which it hardly would be, I dare say,—it may become so in the course of time, as the world grows what I call wiser." She asks him what is the reward; and he says he knows of none, except the conviction that you have done right. Then, to the question whether he would recommend this creed to others, he answers, "I recommend it simply as I would recommend a man setting out on a journey to fill his wallet with dry bread, or even dry crusts, rather than with macaroons and cream-cakes." It is pleasant to be able to add that the lovers finally become as happy as they deserve to be.

THE Art Amateur steadily improves from month to month, and the February number is full of varied suggestion to the decorator. An article called "The Summer Home of two Bohemian Artists in Rural France" gives a very pleasant account of the work of two American girls who changed a rough, dismantled shanty into a beautiful home. Miss Humphreys gives some very sensible hints on dress. The account of the new material for wall-hangings, the Lincrusta Walton, will interest housekeepers whose souls have been tried by spots on a costly wall paper, or who have lamented that the paper removed from a large room could not be made over like a carpet for a small room. The Lincrusta Walton can be cleansed on the wall, or removed and used again on another room. The critic is severe upon the eccentric Englishman, Oscar Wilde, whom he regards as a shallow pretender who shrewdly turns the comic notoriety which Punch has given him into a means of making money. A little severe "letting alone" is the best discipline for him.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A NEW edition of At Eventide, with biographical sketch of Dr. Nehemiah Adams, written by his son, is to be issued this spring by D. Lothrop & Co.

BERTHOLD AUERBACH, the well-known German novelist, author of On the Heights, Edelweiss, and other popular works, died at Cannes on the Mediterranean coast, last week. He was nearly seventy years of age.

MR. WM. J. POTTER was greeted with a full house and an appreciative audience at Parker Memorial last Sunday, which listened with much interest to an admirable and thought-inspiring discourse on "Liberty, but Religion also."

LOUISA M. ALCOTT recently visited New York, where she was given receptions by Mrs. Jennie June Croly, and Miss Mary L. Booth, editor of Harper's Bazar, on which occasions she met many of the literary and artistic lions of the metropolis.

PROF. W. D. GUNNING is to speak in the Sunday afternoon course of lectures at Pike's Opera House in Cincinnati, Ohio, February 19; on February 22, in the Ohio Mechanics' Institute Course, one of the oldest in the country. His subject in this lecture will be "Darwin."

MRS. ANNIE L. DIGGS on last Sunday afternoon gave an address at the rooms of the Women's Educational and Industrial Union, 157 Tremont Street, on "The Real Estheticism." Mrs. Diggs has spoken twice recently for Providence, R.I., societies with much success.

DR. THEODORE SCHWANN, the Belgian physiologist, is dead. He was born Dec. 7, 1810, received his degree as M.D. at Berlin, and attained a high rank among European scientists. His researches have been of great value, and he was the author of a number of important works.

REV. E. D. TOWLE, of the County Street Methodist Church of New Bedford, has announced his decision to dissolve his connection with that church at the close of the conference year in April, on account of a change in his views on certain doctrinal points. His conscientious honesty is commendable.

HENRY JAMES, JR., the writer who has been characterized as "the man without a country,"—though not in the sense of E. E. Hale's hero,—is about forty years of age, of medium height, fine figure, with full face, dark hair and eyes, high forehead, dark full beard closely cropped, and is said to greatly resemble the Prince of Wales.

THE course of lectures on Darwinism by Rev. Rowland Connor, now being delivered at the Academy of Music in East Saginaw, Mich., is drawing large audiences and attracting much interest. The local papers report these lectures very fully. Mr. Connor, as is well known, is a thorough believer in evolution, and is well fitted to popularize that theory.

MR. ROGAN, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, formerly an orthodox minister, but now an advocate of liberal religious views, and an able and earnest man, speaks in that city every Sunday to good-sized and interested audiences. He is doing excellent work in favor of free and rational thought; and, in consideration of this fact, the Liberals of the community are encouraging him by their attendance and with generous financial support.

THE editor of the Danville (Iowa) News, commenting on B. F. Underwood's recent lectures in that place, closes his criticism as follows: "We concede to the gentleman the qualities that mark the man of thought, and find him argumentative, scientific, eloquent, and courteous in appearance and address, but must dissent from the strange theories of which he is an able advocate. We may have occasion again to refer to those lectures, for we are conscious there is much to be said in order to successfully answer his pet dogma."

PROF. GOLDWIN SMITH has enrolled himself among the opponents of the Woman's Suffrage cause. He comes out strongly against it, in an incidental way, in a recent article in the Nineteenth Century, basing his objections to it first on the unfitness of women for soldier life, secondly on his fear that one of the results of women's voting, especially in the United States, will be the refusal of the sex to enter "the bondage of matrimony" or to accept the "burdens of maternity." The Professor needs to study human nature a little more thoroughly: if he understood that better, he would have no fear of any such calamitous result. As he has recently been rejected, for the second time, as an honorary member of the St. George's Society of Toronto on account of his supposed favoring of the annexation of Canada to the United States, he might have been expected to show more sympathy toward the women who are so far rejected as voters.

MR. HUDSON TUTTLE, of Berlin Heights, Ohio, recently lectured in Chicago; and, although Mr. Tuttle is known chiefly as a writer, his lectures are spoken of in high terms of praise, not only by Spiritualists, of whom he is one of the leading representative men, but by all classes of thinkers. This reminds us that Mr. Tuttle's first work, The Arcana of Nature, written more than twenty years ago, was a very remarkable production to appear at that date and from a young man. Dr. Büchner quotes from this work in his Force and Matter, and, when he came to this country a few years ago, was desirous of seeing Mr. Tuttle, whom he thought a professor in some American College. Judge of the surprise of the German materialist when he learned that Mr. Tuttle was a Spiritualist, and that he ascribed the book from which quotations had been made so approvingly not to himself, but to his "spirit guides." Dr. Büchner immediately requested permission to measure Mr. Tuttle's head; and, finding it somewhat larger than his own, the materialistic doctor remarked in a judicial tone that, although The Arcana of Nature was a very able work for a young man to produce, yet a person with a head like that was evidently adequate to the task without the help of "spirit guides." Mr. Tuttle's works are among the best in the literature of Spiritualism, and the author is personally a man of high character. He lives on his farm near Berlin Heights, and divides his time between tilling the soil and cultivating his mind and giving his thoughts to the world. He has been many years a contributor to the Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THE religious papers are beginning to advocate and adopt decidedly secular and sensible methods even on religious matters. The editor of the Sunday School Times, it seems, has been advising some sort of intelligent preparation on the part of those who pray in public; and his suggestions are met by considerable criticism from the believers in inspirational prayer. One writes as follows: "Will the editor of the Sunday School Times tell his readers what he means by specific preparation for public prayer,—studying the needs of the public, or studying the conditions on which God hears prayers for the public, or studying the words and sentences for the voicing of the prayer? Is the leader to study the people, God, or his dictionary?" To which the editor replies: "By all means let the leader study all three of these sources of information, especially his dictionary. A fair knowledge of God and a more than fair knowledge of human nature will never enable a man to preach a sermon, or to phrase a fitting prayer as the representative prayer of a multitude, without at least a fair knowledge of the dictionary and a similar acquaintance with an English grammar, if it's an English-speaking audience he is to lead in prayer." Another, who seems a little "cranky," writes: "Dear Sir I do not wish to take the Sunday School Times there is too much man's wisdom in it on the subject of Prayer I believe in being led by the Spirit of god May the Lord bless you and give you light."

"Yours in Christ T. M. HODGKINSON.
"Saved and Sanctified and kept by the power of god." On which the editor queries: "Would it really endanger that man's spirituality to study a dictionary—even though it led him to spell 'Man' with a small 'm,' and 'god' with a big 'G'? 'Be not rash with thy mouth,' says the inspired preacher, in commenting on public worship, 'and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any word before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth.' Considering one's speech beforehand is one way—and a very good way—of avoiding hasty and rash speech. Can there be any fair question on that point?"

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

THE proposed Spanish pilgrimage to Rome, about which much talk has been made, is said to be given up, as tending to make trouble in political matters.

THE Indian Mirror, a native newspaper, says: "Foreigners can hardly realize the extent to which the English language is spoken and written among the educated classes in India. When educated Hindus meet, they talk English; and, when they write to each other, they show a preference for English."

THE trustees of the public schools in Hamilton, Ont., have made a rule strictly enforced, by which the teachers are forbidden to receive gifts from their pupils. If some such rule could be made a law in the United States in regard to public functionaries of whatsoever grade, it would be a civil service reform which would work wonders in purifying our politics.

BISHOP MULLEN, of Erie, Pa., in his Lenten pastoral, declared that "God ordained that the Pope, whoever he may be, shall be not only the sole supreme and infallible pastor of his Church, but Bishop of Rome, and of Rome only. He may be a prisoner in his palace, like Leo XIII., or prisoner and ruler at the same time, like several of Leo's predecessors; but he always is and must ever remain Bishop of Rome. This has been in the past, is now, and always will be the belief of Catholics throughout the world."

THE funds of the University of Vincennes, Indiana, are to be increased by means of a lottery, of the profits of which the University is to receive $20,000. The charter permitting the University to adopt such a method of replenishing its treasury was granted before the adoption of the present State constitution; and the Supreme Court has ruled that the privilege cannot be taken away, as for the credit of the State and institution it should be. We cannot help wondering what sort of ethics are taught in a university run by a lottery. But, then, the churches first set the example, and so indorsed the principle, or rather lack of principle, involved in lotteries.

THE exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh from his seat by the British House of Commons at the beginning of its new session does not indicate much regard for the rights of conscience or love of fair play by that body. The part taken by Mr. Gladstone in deserting his position, after deciding that the House could not inquire into the opinion of the member from Northampton,—for Mr. Gladstone offered no opposition to the motion ordering Mr. Bradlaugh to withdraw and expelling him from his seat, but let the Government go upon record as timidly consenting to the removal of a member and disfranchising his constituents on account of his religious opinions,—was entirely unworthy of the great Premier.

CHINA is making a fresh start in the race of civilization. The example of her sister nation Japan is not going to be entirely lost upon her. At London arrived a few days ago, by way of the Suez Canal, a Chinese merchant ship, laden with tea, the first, it is said, that ever reached that port. On board of her was a party of Chinese merchants who intend establishing in London a house for the conduct of a general Chinese trade. Recently, telegraph communication has for the first time been opened between Shanghai and Tientsin. It is thought that railways will soon be established, as there are decided signs of the opposition to them on the part of the government being less determined, since the need of them for transportation is daily becoming more apparent to intelligent Chinamen.

A PROMINENT topic of conversation in Nebraska just now is the dismissal of the three free-thinking professors of the Nebraska University by the Board of Regents, referred to in our last number. The professors complain that they have been dismissed without a trial or even a hearing, and that the Board acted without authority, since the law specifies that no professor of the institution shall be discharged without a fair hearing and proof against him of incompetency or misconduct. The Regents say in defence that the liberal portion of the faculty have kept the University in a turmoil for a number of years, and that the action taken was purely in the interests of the institution. But it is known that the Orthodox element has been scheming some time to get entire control of the University; and there are a great many Liberals in the State, including men of position and influence, who will sustain the dismissed professors in a suit to test the legality of the Board's action in the courts of the State.

UNITY CHURCH, Chicago, has been troubled in regard to the attitude of Rev. George C. Miln, since his expressions of doubt as to the immortality of the soul and of unbelief in the existence of a personal God; and on the 13th inst., by a vote of one hundred and eighteen to thirty-eight, the Church instructed the trustees to inform Mr. Miln that his connection with the church as pastor would cease within three months, the time specified for the termination of the contract, if the church should be dissatisfied with their new pastor. Mr. Miln will perhaps have to join the unchurched Liberals, and work outside of ecclesiastical organizations. Even the Unitarians of the West have no use for a pastor who frankly expresses, in plain and vigorous language, unbelief in the fundamental theological doctrines of all systems of worship. However little he believes, if he can accommodate his language to the theological beliefs and prejudices of his congregation, he may retain his position. And, if the Unitarians have a theological creed, they have a right to expect conformity in their ministers to that creed; but, if their creed excludes men who doubt the existence of a Deity and a future life, they should make a declaration to this effect, so that men like Mr. Miln will receive no encouragement to speak for them. Possibly, the Unitarians wish to retain a certain amount of theology, and yet appear broad enough to satisfy all classes of liberal thinkers, even the untheological class.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Independent, travelling in Egypt, had recently an interview with the Khedive, who impressed him very favorably. He found him very cordial and communicative, and describes him as a "fine-looking man, with a face full of expression and kindness, and a commanding and portly figure." He is quite a different man from his predecessor (his father), being progressive in his views and ambitious for the future of his country. To this end, he is aiming at reforms in religious, political, and educational usages, and most especially in the latter. "While the people," he said, "remain ignorant, reform in any direction is impossible. . . . Out of my own purse, I have given fifteen thousand pounds a year to the schools since I came to the throne. Often, I go to the schools myself; and, if I say anything, I point to the United States for an example. I say that its greatness is due to the education of the people, to their enterprise, to their liberty of speech and freedom of thought; and I urge my people to become likewise educated, free, and great. Another reform I am about to introduce is the education of women. The women of enlightened countries are on an equal footing with the men, and they must be here also: therefore, they must be educated." The Khedive is opposed to polygamy, and has but one wife himself, while his father had many. He is a strict Mussulman, and lives up to the outward requirements of his faith, but is very liberal toward all other religions, and endeavors to make his people the same. During the interview, he remarked: "I make my own personal desire second to the welfare of Egypt and my people. I have great hopes for Egypt, and shall live and work for her prosperity. . . . But it is difficult," he went on, with a perceptible sadness in his voice, "for me to do all I would like, or give my people all that I desire, while other Powers have their hands in my pockets."

A STUDY OF MORMONISM.

A French savan esteemed Mormonism as phenomenal in this: that it is a new religion born right under our eyes. Rémy was so impressed by this thought that he journeyed from the Sandwich Islands, where he had studied Vulcanism, to Utah, where he might study Mormonism. He had seen the ancient fires of Kea break up through the scant verdure which a few years of peace had spread over the mountain. Could he not see in Mormonism an eruption of Judaism which had slumbered under Christianity? He had taken Christian Kanakas as guides into Kirauea; and, when they were scorched, he had seen them forget the better teachings of Christianity, and sacrifice a cock, according to the rite of their fathers, to Pèle. Could he not see in the Mormons another case of atavism? Science has no difficulty in interpreting a two-toed horse. Mormonism is atavism in religion, as a biped equine hoof is atavism in biology.

In The Index of January 26, we tried to show how the Ancient Man became enmeshed in superstitions from his conception of death. See now how this modern man, the Mormon, has become enmeshed from the conception of God, which he took from the Hebrew. Here is a portion of his catechism:—

Question.—What is God?

Ans.—He is the body and the mind of a man.

Ques.—Proof?

Ans.—The Old Testament.

Ques.—What parts has he?

Ans.—Feet, hands, face,—all the parts of a man.

Ques.—Has he passions?

Ans.—He has. He loved Jacob and hated Esau.

Ques.—Has he wives?

Ans.—He has. The sons of God married the daughters of men.

Ques.—Do Christians who define God as a being without body, parts, or passions, know him?

Ans.—They do not.

Canon Farrar has said that the Hebrew was not a thinker. He never pushed his conceptions of God to their logical issue in a scheme of theology. Mormonism has had logicians who built an immense fabric on the raw material furnished by the Hebrews. Orson Pratt was the Jonathan Edwards of Mormonism. From his theological writings, I glean such declarations as these: The Christian world has been and is atheistic. When the Westminster divines defined God as a spirit without body, parts, or passions, they denied his existence and reviled his holy word. He had declared himself as having the form of a man and the loves and hates of a man. He walked in the garden. He came down to see about Sodom. He met Moses in a hotel, and tried to kill him. He had sons who married the daughters of men. He commanded slavery. He established polygamy. Pratt reverses the apothegm of Coleridge, and says that a God not understood is no God at all. He uses an illustration like this: Suppose that Victoria is omnipotent over her subjects. The royal granaries are full, and the royal storehouses are replete with the product of looms. The English people are naked and starving. They cry out to their sovereign, "O thou with auburn hair!" She sits unmoved. "My hair," she says, "is not auburn. When they address me properly, recognizing my bodily features, I will help them." So God sits on his throne, which is a Urim and Thummim. For eighteen hundred years, his subjects have called out to him in sore distress, "O thou Infinite Spirit, without parts or passions!" He sits unmoved. He says, "They are speaking to an abstraction, not to me."

"God was once a man like one of us." This was Brigham Young's declaration to the October conference of 1859. Brigham went on to say that some time he would be as great a god as God. "The gods said, 'Behold the man has become as one of us.'" The Mormons say that after death he becomes really "one of us," that is, one of the gods. "The only God with whom we have to do," said Brigham, "is Adam." A god is great only as he "bears rule" over a great empire. The nucleus of a god's empire in heaven is the children he had while he was a man on earth. Our God was a man who had a great many wives, and whose empire has been extended by the offspring of a great many wives "sealed" to him since he died. In the Jewish economy, if a man died childless, his brother took the widow and raised up children to the dead. Here was the germ of the Mormons' "spiritual marriage." A man who aspires to be a god must have many children for subjects. Mrs. Green wished to be married to Jesus Christ. Brigham did not want to marry the lady to so high a husband, and advised her to "seal" to Joseph Smith, who, having been dead but a few years, had only a small empire over which he was "bearing rule." A proxy was found for Smith. The children would belong to Smith and be his "subjects" in heaven. Smith is already a very influential god. "No man," said Brigham, "can enter the kingdom of heaven without a ticket from Joseph Smith, Jr." In the Mormon hierarchy, he is a more important personage than Jesus, who, the prophet tells us, "spends his time in riding through heaven with four wives in a chariot drawn by four white horses."

The Mormon cosmogony is a "free rendering of the first chapter of Genesis." Adam came into Eden with one of his wives and "assisted" at the creation. "Man was made out of earth in the same way that a brick is moulded." But the story of the rib was too much even for a Mormon. "The woman," said Orson Pratt, "was not made out of a rib; and Moses, in making this statement, was forced to lie." The fall of Satan and of man in Mormon theology is a travesty of Revelations and Paradise Lost. "There was war in heaven,"—a little "unpleasantness." The head of the gods called a council to consider the state of man. Jesus was there, and Lucifer, commander-in-chief of the celestial armies. Christ rose and made a speech. "Some men," he said, "will be born who cannot be saved." Then Lucifer made a speech. "I think," he said, "that all men can be saved, and I will try to save them." A vote was taken, and a majority of gods voted with Christ. Lucifer took offence, and withdrew. From that day, he was called the Devil. Orson Pratt goes on to say that in view of this transaction we are wrong in abusing the Devil, who is a gentleman! The policy of heaven was too narrow, and he rebelled. From that day, rebellion has been the blackest of crimes. "Behold," says God in the Book of Mormon, "behold they did rebel against Ham and I." All Christendom had rebelled against him in throwing off polygamy. Hear him speak to Joseph Smith, Jr. This is part of a revelation published in the Deseret News in 1857: "Behold, I am the Lord thy God. My servant Abraham received wives and concubines, and it was accounted unto him for righteousness. Behold, I am the Lord. I command my servant Joseph Smith to take unto him other wives. If my hand-maiden Emma Smith does not receive these wives of Joseph and cleave unto my servant Joseph, she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord. Behold I am Alpha and Omega. Amen." Here is a command to a man to practise polygamy, and to murder his legal wife if she rebels "against Joseph and I." Does Mormon polygamy rest on that revelation? Not at all. Mormons and Gentiles told me that the best buttressing polygamy ever had in Utah was the debate between Dr. Newman and Apostle Pratt. The question was, "Does the Bible sanction polygamy?" The debate was held in the presence of many thousands. There were the Wasatch Mountains. Their shadow had fallen on reptiles of the prime, but never on a slimmer brood than the superstitious which had wriggled up from the Saurian age of humanity. Never had religious teacher such an opportunity as Newman. What did he say? Goethe had said that, whatever triumph civilization has won over savagery, it behooves us to guard as the apple of the eye. Did Newman say: "In the union of one man and woman is a triumph civilization has won over barbarism. By the voice of God speaking in laws of physiology and laws of sociology, speaking in these living scriptures, the hearts of men and women, I conjure you, under the shadow of these mountains, to guard it as the apple of the eye?" No: he wriggled in the slime of Hebrew savagery, and never for one moment had the courage to say that God does not smile out of a Hebrew text on polygamy or murder. To such a debate there could be but one issue. Newman was overthrown by his own oracles. Here is the cry of a woman whose mind has been overthrown and debauched by the same "oracles." I give her argument very much abridged: "We stand on the Bible. The state imposed by God upon woman I accept. Now, God said to David that he had given Saul's wives to him to be his wives. And he told David, through Nathan the prophet, that he would take away his wives and give them to another man. The wives were passive. God transfers them from man to man as if they were sheep, and their desires are not consulted. . . . Abraham was a polygamist, and God calls him the father of the faithful. Christ says, 'If you were the seed of Abraham, you would do the works of Abraham.' The sixteenth chapter of Genesis tells us what works Abraham did. The only way to be saved is to be adopted into the great family of the polygamist and to follow his example."

From this root of polygamy, certain growths were inevitable,—growths which would overshadow all other branches of the Mormon tree. "To marry," "to have married a mother," "to marry her daughter," "to marry spiritually," "to marry carnally," "to marry direct," "to marry by proxy,"—Mormonism becomes one ceaseless conjugation of the verb to marry. Women must be married. "Let me see no more unmarried girls over fourteen," said Brigham. "Bring in many ewe lambs," said Bishop Kimball in a charge to missionaries, "and see that you do not lay your hands on them till they are in the fold." The outcome is, to woman, salvation by marriage. If a marriageable woman dies unmarried, no one can call her up in the resurrection. Woman would seem to be mortal or immortal according to the whim of a man. On the day of resurrection, the Mormon is to stand over the graves of his wives and call the roll. At his command, they will "come up." But the woman who is not called will not come. When the writer was among these saints, he heard of a young woman who was sick unto death. She was seized with terror; for she was not wed, and there would be no one to call her up. A bishop persuaded a young "professor" in the "Deseret University" that it was his duty to marry her. He had no objection, if he could be assured that she would die. The attending physician gave him the assurance, and they were married. With consternation, the young man learned the next day that his wife was getting well. "It is horrible," he said. "I intended to call her up only once, and now to think of calling her up every morning!" For ten dollars, Brigham divorced them.

The "Deseret University" is suggestive of Mormon culture. What the state of education has been, we may infer from this handbill which I take from one of the rural settlements. "I, schoolmaster, to all brethren, greeting. Monday, the 19th day of November, the anniversary of the massacre of one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians by the angel of the Lord, having been fixed upon for the reopening of my school for the divine sciences and spelling and reading, and whereas we are in a state of starvation in consequence of it, seven years after our establishment, the charge will be for one scholar, for a month, a bushel of corn or maize, or two bushels of potatoes. And, whereas those who cannot pay in grain may be able to do it some other way, bear's flesh or squirrels or dried pumpkins will be received. And, whereas I have nothing whatever to eat, I must have a month's pay in advance. Each scholar must bring a cedar log every two weeks to keep the fire going."

The opening paragraph suggests the bondage of these people to the Old Testament. The "anniversary" of the slaughter of a hundred and eighty-five thousand men by the angel of the Lord is fixed upon for the opening of a school of "divine science."

What will be the outcome of such a system on character? The sentiment of reverence will abort. It is not in human nature to revere a cruel, unjust man-God. Conjugal and paternal love will fade out. Man will neither revere God nor love woman. Young was often profane in the pulpit. Kimball called his wives his "cows." If the Mormon home is not the home of love, neither is it the house of mourning. A young mother and babe, enclosed in the same pine box, were buried, and husband and friends stood by more indifferent spectators than myself. The whole outcome is, "Toil, and pay tithes and perform ceremonies."

Mormonism as finally evolved is a sort of reversible engine. What has become of all those who died before God spoke to Joseph Smith, Jr.? Except the Hebrew polygamists, they are all consigned to hell. Of this there can be no doubt, as salvation is impossible outside of Mormonism. Is there no help for those who died in ignorance of this blessed revelation? A text from Paul comes into play, and gives Mormonism a retroactive force. Paul speaks of those who are baptized for the dead. Baptism for the dead becomes a part of Mormonism. The engine, by this touch from Paul, becomes reversible. Any dead man can be made a Mormon and saved, if some living Mormon will stand proxy and be baptized for him. Through this reversible action, Washington has been made a Mormon; and I was told that a far-reaching philanthropist had been baptized for Plato.

How is Mormonism to be cured? We must not fight superstition by persecution. To cure Mormonism, have we nothing to cure in ourselves? By what right does Talmage denounce the Mormons? A few Sundays ago, he admitted that God did sanction polygamy among the Jews; and he declared that "God did this because he couldn't help himself!"

I call attention to the following statistics, which I take from the tables of 1860:—

Converts to Mormonism.

From New York	10,000
From New England	20,000
From England and Scotland	32,000
From Pacific Islands	8,000
From Ireland	1,000
From France	500
From Italy	50

These tables are instructive. Why do England and Scotland furnish thirty-two thousand and Ireland only one thousand? Is there not more ignorance in Ireland than in England? Is there not more in Italy than in either? Why, then, has Italy furnished only fifty? It is evident that soil for the growth of Mormonism must have some other ingredient than ignorance and superstition. It is evident that Protestantism furnishes that ingredient. What is it? Acceptance of the Old and New Testament as the rule of faith and life. To the Catholic, the Church is the supreme authority; to the Protestant, the Bible is supreme.

We will begin the cure of Mormonism by expunging cryptogamic Mormonism from our own creeds.

ITALY.

An Italian who is possessed by the modern spirit and by modern ideas finds his country an old curiosity shop, and its glorious nature barnacled all over with the debris of ruin and the rubbish of superstition. Italy is the land of art, to be sure; but what was art for ages? The handmaid of superstition and of a theology and piety full of cringing servility to despots of all sorts, celestial and terrestrial, and of contempt of human rights and human nature. It has always been art from the days of Polygnotos to those of Raphael and Michel Angelo, that has bodied forth to the eye and given shape to the airy nothings called gods, angels, and demons. To the Italian, who is thoroughly awakened from the lethargy of superstition and the complacency engendered by the glories of the past falsely so called to the exigencies of the present and to the unparalleled opportunities of current civilization, his country would be more palatable if it was back in the state of nature in which Virgil represents Æneas to have found it when his tempest-tossed fleet entered the then forest-shaded Tiber amid the morning carols of birds, and the site of the Eternal City was a haunted thicket, and its forum a pasture for herds. Then, Italy would be a splendid tabula rasa, wherein to inaugurate a truly modern, human civilization in an unequalled environment of air, earth, and sea. Now, progress and liberty in Italy are embarrassed on all hands by rubbish and the impedimenta of a warlike, ecclesiastical past. The Italian soil is loaded with a ponderous and magnificent architecture suggestive of anything but our current, free, popular life. To the idle tourist, dilettante, and moneyed do-nothing, an enduring architecture may be splendid in a spectacle; but it is an obstruction to progress, keeping the past uppermost to the eye and mind. Every generation almost should build its own dwellings and public edifices, so that they may be in keeping with current ideas and free from mould and the foulness of antiquity. Such was the conclusion of Hawthorne, after a thorough experience of the dwellings and cities of Italy.

When one turns from such enormities of architectural splendor as Milan cathedral to the wretched, mendicant humanity that creeps under their shadow in Italy, one sees that such structures are magnificent mockeries of human degradation. Then there is the vast pictured and sculptured populace in Italy of Holy Families, Madonnas, saints, and angels, and other absurd and impossible personalities of the supernatural sort. The sight of such alleged supernatural persons in the shape of pictures and sculpture demoralizes an ignorant populace, and destroys their independence and self-helpfulness by encouraging the notion that higher than human aid is within their reach. Better the old Jewish and current Mohammedan horror of anthropomorphic sculpture and painting than an excessive cultivation of them with idolatrous results for the stupid masses. But such liberators as Cavour, Victor Emanuel, Mazzini, and Garibaldi have given to Italy a new and modern departure. The best part of her population are intent upon Transalpine rather than Ultramontane ideas. Italian banditti continue to be pious after the old fashion, and to worship the saints. But the truly modern Italian has ceased to believe in saints, holy families, fasting, vows, and prayer. He looks to science and industrialism and popular education and popular freedom to regenerate his country. He has had a surfeit of art and piety. Apropos of Italy, curiously enough during the first half of the present century which has witnessed her deliverance from alien and priestly tyranny and her unification, Italy could show a distinguished devotee and founder of a religious order of the old-fashioned sort; namely, Antonio Rosmini, who combined with the abject self-abasement of a St. Francis the metaphysical and psychological acuteness of a Locke, Hume, and Kant.

In the present practical mood of the Italian mind, it has no admiration to bestow upon such a freak of Ultramontane, monastic piety and intellectual power as Rosmini, who was born in 1797 and died in 1855. He was born many centuries too late. Perhaps early contact with the social, moral, and political ferment of the world beyond the Alps might have opened his eyes, which were naturally acute, and made him aware that the nineteenth century is not the century of St. Thomas Aquinas. But, as it was, Rosmini, with his immense brain, was totally unaware of the time of day. He mastered the revolutionary philosophy of Kant even without becoming a modern man. He was the adviser of Pius IX. in 1848, the last period of active revolution in Europe, and his advice was reactionary and fatal. But he was a sincere, true man, and, in his way, a lover of his country. Hence, he was hated and persecuted by the Jesuits, who were jealous of his influence with Pío Nono. But that pope would not "go back" on Rosmini. He was the founder of the monastic order, or "Institute of the Brethren of Charity." This order survives, and is confined to Italy and England; and its members are highly spoken of as really human-hearted men, as was their founder, who was a nobleman by birth, which explains perhaps his ultra conservatism in the midst of a period of revolution. I cannot forbear quoting a few reflections upon Rosmini, which are found in Thomas Davidson's account of him in the November Fortnightly Review: "There is something inexpressibly touching," says Davidson, "in the thought of this simple, tender, gifted, noble, profoundly religious soul, laboring under mountains of leaden tradition and official formalism. . . . Light, supernatural light, that is what he strove for, the thing for the sake of which he neglected much of the natural light. The hasty, vague metaphors of ancient dyspeptic mystics, metaphors now embodied in creeds, catechisms, and prayers, have become to him realities, and indeed the only true realities. According to Rosmini's mediæval notion, 'the whole duty of man is to prepare himself to be a passive instrument in the hands of God.' This is surely taking Christianity in earnest,—God all in all, man but a poor, foully constructed, useless instrument, which, by painfully cleansing itself from the concretion of rust and filth with which omnipotent, divine Providence in his 'inscrutable wisdom,' has seen fit to disfigure it, may possibly induce this same divine Providence graciously to stoop down and use it, mayhap, in stirring up some other equally filthy and worthless implement to prepare itself for similar service. Man, with his boundless capacity for suffering, has no rights which God is bound to respect. Whatever befalls him we must coweringly accept, as coming from infinite Wisdom, which, being inscrutable, may, for aught he knows, be infinite folly or absolute stupidity. Stated in plain terms, such is the doctrine, foolish enough and hideous enough, surely,—a base survival of notions current in times before tyranny and tyrants, having incurred the righteous indignation of this world, were constrained to take refuge in heaven, whose still unexplored wastes harbor a good many such fell monsters. But heaven is so far off that it has had no direct communication with us for nearly nineteen centuries now! Need we wonder if it has fallen behind in the race of civilization?"

A SHORT-LIVED FREEDOM.

A month ago, we gave an account of Mr. George C. Miln's avowal of more radical religious views than he had hitherto held, and of his new relation to his church in Chicago in consequence. Our readers will remember that Mr. Miln, partly on account of broken health and partly because of this change of views, which he supposed would throw him out of harmony with his society, had resigned his charge of the pulpit. But the society was very reluctant to let him go. A committee was appointed to confer with him, and urge him to withdraw his resignation. Two committees, in fact, were appointed for this purpose, since the first did not succeed; and finally, after a free interchange of views, he was persuaded by them and by individual solicitation on the part of many members to accede to their request, with the understanding that the society wished to put no fetters upon his utterance, but was "willing to have him utter the utmost truth to which his mind might reach." On the following Sunday, he announced to the congregation his decision to withdraw his resignation, and the terms on which he had been induced to do it. To all of which, as the Chicago Times reported the next morning according to the quotation we then made, there was joyous acquiescence and "an audible murmur of approbation in the congregation, which showed that the pastor's decision met with approval." In other words, "Unity Church" resolved on giving a free pulpit,—a pulpit not simply for the utterance of Unitarian views, but for the free expression of whatever convictions Mr. Miln might feel impelled to declare.

But this reign of freedom has been very short-lived. Scarcely a full month passed when Mr. Miln was notified by a vote of the society—one hundred and eighteen to thirty-eight—that his services as pastor would not be wanted after the expiration of three months, the terms of his settlement requiring a three months' notice on either side to terminate it. What has led the society to make this hasty and ignominious retreat from the position of liberty which it had been so ready and apparently proud to take? Simply that Mr. Miln has been using the liberty granted him to express his convictions. Taking the society at its word, he proceeded at once, in a series of three sermons, to embody the views to which his recent studies have been leading him. These sermons were on the Past, Present, and Future of the Church. The first, which we printed two weeks ago, took the rational ground of the entirely natural origin and evolution of the Church. Both this, however, and the second discourse, on the "Present Condition of the Church," appear to have passed without arousing any marked dissent. But the third discourse, on the Future of the Church,—which we present to our readers in this paper,—created at once great excitement in the parish, and, judging from the daily press, throughout Chicago. The journals immediately put Mr. Miln on trial. Statements from the sermon apart from the context were telegraphed through the country. The accused heresiarch was "interviewed," and the trustees and prominent members of his church were "interviewed." Rev. Robert Collyer, Mr. Miln's predecessor in the pulpit of Unity Church, was asked to give sentence; and his judgment was telegraphed by an "interviewer" from New York. Under all this excitement, the society was called together to act, with the result as above announced. Mr. Miln asked the privilege of making a statement, and was allowed to do so. But his request for an enumeration of the reasons for his dismissal was not granted. The society found it easier to follow the example of the committee in the Leicester case a year ago, and to act without giving reasons, than to define the standard Unitarianism from which Mr. Miln had departed. Nevertheless, his request was a fair one, and should have been more courteously treated.

The ground taken by Mr. Miln in this third discourse is that the Church of the Future is to be based, not on any speculative doctrines, but on unity of aim in moral, philanthropic, and social work for the uplifting of mankind,—a large and grand aim, certainly, for a church. Some of the more recently formed Unitarian societies in the West are organized, if we remember aright, on this basis. In the development of this position, he speaks of belief in a personal Deity as one of the unprovable doctrines not to be required, and intimates his own doubt of it. Of belief in personal immortality, he speaks in the same way, but intimates more than a doubt concerning this belief. Yet he also distinctly says that belief in these and other doctrines he refers to should not debar from the undogmatic church which is his ideal. And, judging from this and other discourses of Mr. Miln, he is not at all a preacher who would be likely to make a mission of denying and decrying these doctrines. He is no mere iconoclast. He believes in religion as well as in freedom. He is earnest, frank, manly. If Unity Church had been trained to a little more independence and robustness of thinking, it surely would not have been thrown into such consternation by any sentiments, however averse to its own, which are expressed in this reverent and sincere discourse. But, though Unity Church thus early rescinds its vote for a free pulpit, we trust that Mr. Miln may find elsewhere in Chicago the opportunity for organizing a society in accordance with his ideas. W. J. POTTER.

REVIVALS.

In several cities and towns in Kansas, desperate efforts are being made this season to "get up" religious revivals. It seems to be pretty well understood by the preacher that argumentative sermons addressed to the intellect, with the usual devotional exercises, fail to convince unbelievers, or to remove doubts from the minds of the sceptical, or to convert "sinners," or even to infuse life into lukewarm Christians. But a rousing, religious revival, although it does not add to the average intelligence of the churches, increases their numerical strength by bringing accessions from that large class who are reached only by appeals to their emotional nature. Rich and fashionable churches in large cities, liberally sustained in part by those who join them from business considerations, or for the social advantages they afford, or for the conventional respectability they reflect upon their members, need not resort to the uncultured and undignified methods of the revivalist; but, when churches are languishing and dwindling in numbers, culture and dignity must be sacrificed, and, since the intellectual class cannot be reached by the arguments of theology, the ignorant class must be influenced by such methods as will gain their attention and bring numbers and support from their ranks. That there is no sincere, unselfish interest in the "eternal welfare" of those addressed, underneath these efforts, it would be ungenerous and unjust to affirm; but that church rivalry and the ambition and personal and professional interests of the Orthodox clergy enter to a considerable extent into the causes that start and sustain revivals in these days is indicated by the jealousies, animosities, and contentions which are so often seen at the close of "protracted union meetings," when the excitement having exhausted itself is followed by a "division of spoils" among the different denominations.

In the cities and towns we have visited in Kansas this season, the revivals are very feeble. They revive nothing, not even the superstition and animalism out of which they grow; for the excitement is simulated, not real. Scepticism and unbelief have undermined the creeds, and the zeal and fanaticism of former days are now impossible. Even the young and susceptible are unmoved by the preacher's appeals to "flee from the wrath to come" and "make their peace with God" before it is everlastingly too late. In one town, after three weeks of praying and exhorting, one individual, a negro, who came from the South two years ago, was the only attendant interested enough to "come forward," and seeing no other persons similarly affected, after two or three trials, he said, "If de white folks ain't scared, why de debbil should dis nigger be afraid?" and he went to the "anxious seat" and asked for prayers no more.

Doubtless, revivals will prevail in various localities many years to come, for ignorance and superstition give way to knowledge and science but slowly; and while these mental conditions continue, and so long as there is influence in numbers, many religious leaders will yield to the temptation and inducements offered to encourage these coarse manifestations of the uncultivated religious sentiment. But, with the diffusion of intelligence, revivals become less epidemic and more sporadic, as the physicians say, and infused more with the higher sentiments and emotions of man's nature.

A disposition is noticeable among some of the liberal workers to favor methods which are, strangely enough, more in keeping with that faith against which they are directed than with the rational thought and philosophy they are employed to advance. The workers evidently represent the condition and express the thought and feeling of large numbers who, although they have discarded their creeds, are yet more easily influenced by appeals to their feelings than by arguments addressed to their understanding. During the past few years, the rapid decay of theological belief has added to the ranks of sceptics and free thinkers multitudes, many of whom were but recently in the churches or in a condition to be affected during religious revivals. Unaccustomed to dispassionate reasoning, and without acquaintance with the principles of Liberalism, they are more interested in a violent harangue, marked by loose, superficial thought, expressed in the style of a revivalist, than they can be in a well-reasoned discourse by a thinker. A liberal lecturer, who was formerly a Methodist preacher and who still has much of the fervor of the old-fashioned Methodist, with all the unreasoning impatience and enthusiasm of a new convert, with little regard or taste for the methods of science or the reasonings of philosophy, or the positive and constructive side of liberal thought, remarked to us recently that the masses could not be reached by argument, and that his method was to make converts to "infidelity" by appealing to the emotions of men and women. This is the very method against which free thinkers have always protested, and yet we see it now used and defended in the name and in the supposed interests of free thought. Such are the inconsistencies which mark rapid transitions in belief. We hardly need remark that men who join the ranks of Liberals under mere emotional influences must be persons of small calibre, very limited knowledge, and of but little firmness of character; and their "conversion," under a liberal revivalist, involving the giving up of doctrines with which they have been in the habit of connecting the motives and obligations of morality, without growing into or understanding any school of thought or well-grounded philosophy of life, can be of no value to themselves, nor to a movement with which they become associated. When even many of the Orthodox churches, taught by experience, are beginning to discourage these methods which substitute declamation for argument, feeling for reflection, and emotional excitement for education and growth, let these methods find no encouragement among the teachers and advocates of rational thought. We do not want any Moodys and Sankeys; and, although we must be patient with those "Liberals" who have discarded some of the doctrines of theology, but who are yet dominated by its spirit and methods, relying on time, education, and growth to do their legitimate work, we should encourage rational methods only in advancing rational thought.

RECENT ITALIAN LITERATURE.

I wish to call the attention of the readers of The Index—of whom I hope there are many who read and love the Italian language, and who are interested in the present hopeful condition of education in Italy—to some historical books published in Italy within a few years.

Signor Savina Fabricius prepared for the Normal Schools of Italy an excellent compendium called Biografie ad Uso delle Scuole Magistrali e Normale, and supplemented by Lesioni di Storia Moderna, which is published by Felice Paggi, in the Via del Proconsolo, Florence. She has also sent me a new book called Scritti Storici, by C. Belviglieri, Professor of History in the University of Rome, and published by Drucker and Tedeschi at Mantua and Verona.

This latter book is a collection of lectures and papers read before Italian lyceums and societies, and shows very clearly the broad, liberal tendency of modern thought in Italy, and the strong belief cherished there that education and right thinking are the true safeguards of the State. It will repay the most careful reading of those interested in these subjects.

DEATH OF SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Our readers will mourn with us at the announcement of the death of Samuel Johnson, of which the intelligence just comes to us from his North Andover home. A brief, painful sickness has thus ended a most brave, beautiful, and useful life. For years, Mr. Johnson has stood in the front ranks of religious reform. Foremost among American liberal scholars, he has served the cause of free and rational religion in exceptional ways. The loss of such a man is irretrievable. We know of no one in America who is prepared to take up and carry on to completion his unfinished series of books on the "Oriental Religions." The third volume was to be on the Religions of Persia. But relentless death has snatched him from the loved work in the midst of it, and robbed, too, a loved and loving circle of friends, to whom his strong, fine presence and rich conversation were inspiration and life. We must defer any fuller notice of his character until next week.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Christian at Work tells a good story of Dr. Nott, for many years President of Union College, which, though intended as a hit against the present laxity of belief on the doctrine of eternal punishment, may be enjoyed even by those who think the bottom has been knocked out of that doctrine. The story is as follows:—

Once, a union meeting for prayer was held in an interior city in this State,—we may as well say it was Schenectady,—and the chapel was crowded. Finally, in response to a call for five-minute addresses, a good brother arose,—such brethren somehow always are excessively good,—and "went" for Orthodox doctrine on everlasting punishment. There was a future punishment,—he admitted that,—and would even call it by the old name, hell. But there was a door to it that could be opened; there was time and opportunity for repentance; there was restoration to happiness for all the citizens of Inferno. Then, he cited chapter and verse, and wound up by a challenge to any brother to disprove what he had said, or to prove the correctness of the Orthodox position. Then followed a period of silence. Finally, old Dr. Nott, then past fourscore, bent with age, and his hair as white as the snow, rose and slowly and deliberately said: "The brother who last spoke told us of a way to heaven that leads through hell. Those who want to try the road to heaven via hell may take it, if they choose; but, as for me, I am going to heaven by the direct road, and I advise others to take that road too. Let us pray."

It may be added that the point of this story holds good with a more liberal theology than that preached by the venerable Doctor. Even though evil may finally be wholly overcome and converted into good, it is folly not to come at the good by "the direct road" instead of going round by the hard and longer way of evil. The sort of philosophy of life sometimes heard among young men, and not unfrequently, too, among those not so young, that it may be better for the after-crop to sow first a few wild oats, has no ground either in reason or in experience.

THAT more liberal and rational views of religion are surely gaining ground in the churches, and even among those that have been regarded least progressive, is shown by the recent action of the Baptist ministers at Chicago, who, according to one of our "exchanges,"

Have declared themselves against professional revivalists of the usual kind, and for the following reasons: "They cultivate a distracted, one-sided religious life. They give undue prominence to noisy and public efforts for saving souls. They produce the impression that religion is largely a matter of feeling. They savor too much of the burlesque and buffoonery. They lower the dignity of the most solemn subject which can engage men's attention. They put a premium upon ignorant and crude presentations of gospel truth. They insult the intelligence of the age by making the unlearned and the unwise its religious teachers."

In the February number of the Unitarian Review and Religious Magazine, Rev. James T. Bixby, professor in the Meadville Theological School, has an article on "The Study of the Non-Christian Religions," which to many readers will doubtless seem dry, but which is really a valuable summary of the present condition of learning on this important theme. The article closes with excellent "Free Religious" doctrine as follows:—

The science or the faith, which shuts itself in its own petty circle, makes itself pretty surely the breeding-place of pride, conceit, and selfishness, and closes its doors to many of the best messengers of love and wisdom. True religion is all-embracing in its sympathies. The theologian's distinctions may split the worshippers of God into a thousand sectarian fragments, but the native impulse of that love which is the living heart of faith is to unite them again into a single brotherhood. To lend a hand in this blessed work is the service to which the study of the non-Christian religions among us is especially called.

THAT increasing Liberalism does not diminish the interest in religious subjects is shown by the statistics of the book-trade. Neither the daily newspaper nor the novel has yet absorbed all the readers. The Sunday School Times says:—

From the figures of the English book-trade for last year, it appears that, "as usual, theology heads the list with nine hundred and forty-five works: educational and classical publications are second, with six hundred and eighty-two," etc. Publishers issue books to sell; and they are not accustomed to put forth, year by year, that which nobody buys. So that the regular publication and sale of religious books is a perfectly fair test of the general demand.

THE New York Tablet has a very thoughtful and sensible article on the solution of the Irish question. Its thesis is that "self-government is the only salvation for Ireland." By this, it means not an independent Irish Republic, which against the present power of Great Britain is not possible, but an independent legislature and government for all its own local affairs, and a union with Great Britain, like that existing between the States and the national government in this country, for the regulation of their common interests. This is statesmanlike, because it is a reform in the interest of justice and liberty which is feasible. The Tablet says:—

With her own parliament, the vast resources of Ireland would soon be developed, her manufactures and deep-sea fisheries would soon revive, her mines would be worked, her immense water-power would be turned to account. Dublin would soon become the residence of absentee noblemen. Irish ports would teem with the shipping of foreign nations. Galway would become a port of entry for America, and Ireland the highway for her trade with all Europe. The hardy peasant would no longer have to depend on the soil for a living, and the rising generations would embark in trade, commerce, and business. This is an attractive programme, if it only could be realized. We honestly believe that it could; for we find the radical element in England in favor of it, and such men as Joseph Cowen, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and Labouchere are among its strongest advocates, and we feel certain that it would find favor with such men as Dilkes and Chamberlain. Indeed, we are inclined to think that Gladstone would be in favor of such a solution of the Irish difficulty, and the people of England in general are so heartily sick of the Irish agitation that they would hail with satisfaction any solution of the question which would not impair the dignity or stability of the crown.

As it is impossible to estimate correctly the value of a good man to society, so it is beyond the power of the mind to compute with accuracy all the evil that results from a vicious and criminal life. One single act of the life of Guiteau will, according to statements which are published, cost the government $300,000. But this amount represents merely the direct money cost. The loss of a valuable life, with all it would have accomplished but for this act; the suffering of the victim through weeks; the grief and bereavement of his family; the anxiety, sorrow, and loss brought upon millions of people,—these can never be measured by dollars and cents; and, in comparison with them, the expense in money, great as it is, which has been caused by the assassin's crime, is so insignificant as to be unworthy of mention. Society has in Guiteau a striking illustration of the cost of crime, which at the same time suggests the economy and emphasizes the importance of such education as will tend to prevent crime while preparing youth for the duties of life. To such education, so intimately related is it to the well-being of the people and so wide and far-reaching is it in its results, society cannot wisely be indifferent.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

In this week's number of The Index, the article most likely to attract attention is Professor Gunning's "Study of Mormonism." No one will enter on its crisp sentences without being carried through to the end by the very picturesqueness of the style, even if the value of the facts presented did not attract him. Professor Gunning has had unusual facilities for studying Mormonism on the spot, and he has investigated the system with the trained faculties for observation possessed by a scientific man. The statistics at the close of his article furnish much food for reflection. The fact that the Mormons get few converts from Catholic countries starts the inquiry whether, for an ignorant population, Catholicism, with its claim of the Church as well as the Bible for the standard of faith and practice, is not better than Protestantism, with its claim of the Bible alone as an infallible rule? The Catholic Church at least has learned men at its head, who will not permit its ignorant members to be duped by such an interpretation of Old Testament beliefs as leads to Mormon polygamy and Abrahamic sacrifice of children. The discourse of George C. Miln, which has received so much attention throughout the country, and which we reprint from the authorized report of the Chicago Times, will also find many eager readers. Among other contributions of special value, Mr. Ball gives a timely article on "Italy," and Mr. Underwood sends one from the West on "Revivals." W. J. P.

WE cannot help saying, though perhaps it is not for us to say it, that the course of our neighbor the Christian Register toward the heretical Mr. Miln, as illustrated in its last issue, does not shine with the quality of Christian charity. It has been several years since we have seen the Register treating an opponent with so much spleen and so little generosity.

SPEAKING of some things connected with funerals that ought to be reformed, Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, says, "I think the exhibition of the worn and pallid features of the dead to the gaze of the curious and unsympathizing crowd is another custom that is decidedly out of place."

A QUESTION in evolution: How many thousand such tragedies as the recent shooting of one classmate by another at Amherst must be enacted before the average human mind will learn the simple precaution of ascertaining whether a gun is loaded before pulling the trigger? Was not the old woman wiser in her caution that "even that hollow thing, the barrel, may shoot," than many in the world who go on "supposing it isn't loaded"?

IT is stated that the Campbellite church at Washington, which President Garfield attended, will soon begin the erection of an edifice at the cost of $300,000. Of this amount, $20,000 were raised during the attendance of the President. The chief inducement for liberal contributions having been removed, it is probable that, if the building project is persisted in, a heavy mortgage will be among the first contracts made.

THE Independent with its usual directness thus states its opinion on the Bradlaugh case: "The best, indeed the only sensible, course, for the English House of Commons to pursue in respect to Mr. Bradlaugh is to permit him to take the oath of office, and thus concede to his constituents the right to choose their own representative, without regard to his religious opinions. They are determined to maintain this right, and are to be honored for so doing."

A RELIGIOUS revival prevails at Louisville, and considerable space is given in the city journals to reports of the meetings, surmounted with headlines like the following: "Remember that Jesus is your Captain," "Over Jordan to the Land that is Fairer than this," "Go Ahead," "Burn the Bridges," "Sink the Boats behind, so there will be no Way of Retreat," "David's Psalm of Thanksgiving for God's Great and Manifold Blessings," "Mind you, no Faith, no Cure." Reporters refer to this revival, in all seriousness apparently, as a "great religious boom."

FATHER McCOSKEY, a Catholic priest of Rahway, N.J., who recently declared that the public schools were better than the parochial, and that little besides the catechism was taught in the latter, has apparently been interviewed by his superiors in the Church, and as a natural consequence, in a good Catholic, has been brought to see the "error of his ways," and has reconsidered that declaration and taken back his words in terms of due submission to the authority of his bishop. But the effect of his ill-considered but independent words will still remain in the minds of some of his parishioners, and set them to thinking for themselves on the subject, and so perhaps lead to independent action.

A COLORED member of the Legislature of Virginia has introduced a bill in the House of Delegates, aimed at the practice of keeping mulatto mistresses by white men, a survival from slaveholding days. The bill provides that, when a man lives in cohabitation with an unmarried woman for the period of two months, the issue of such cohabitation, if such there be, shall be considered the heir-at-law, with the name and heritage of the father. The bill also provides that, when a single man lives with an unmarried woman, as above stated, for three months, such cohabitation, substantiated by the woman and one witness, shall constitute legal marriage in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and any person marrying contrary to the provisions of this act shall be declared guilty of bigamy. The introduction of this bill, it is said, has produced considerable flutter among men of the class against whom it is directed.

OF the Woman's Suffrage Convention held in Washington, D.C., in January, Mrs. Mary Clemmer writes to the Independent thus: "The women suffragists, who held their fourteenth convention here last week and closed their actual labors before congressional committees last Monday, had, when they left Washington, one cause for gratitude greater than that they had secured a new committee of the Senate specially to consider in all its multiform demands the rights of women; and the greater cause for gratitude was that they had for once been so fortunate as not to be misrepresented or disgraced by the folly or want of tact of any one of their own number. . . . In summing up the long-drawn-out crucifixion of taste and fine sensibility endured by a woman of the fibre of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, one must not forget that she has suffered as much from the injudiciousness and folly of well-meaning women who cared for her cause as from the contumely and contempt of men who hated it. When she left Washington last Monday, she had cause to thank God that this year no woman's lack of the sense of fitness had forced her in any convocation to make herself or 'their cause' ridiculous. Hysterical speeches on the stage and hysterical prayer-meetings at the capital were omitted." Yet Mrs. Clemmer and others ought not to forget that it was probably the efforts and sacrifices of these same injudicious and foolish women, whose very absurdities combined with their extreme earnestness caused the movement to be noticed, and so led to investigation on the part of calmer thinkers, which made so orderly and respectable a convention as that held in Washington possible.

The Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 23, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, : : : : : } Editors.

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

SESAME. For The Index.

He shall not wholly starve
Whom twin faiths nurture,—trust in his own race
And his own will,—to carve
Success from untoward elements, and trace
The angel in the block
Of roadside marble. Guerdons wait for him.
For him, rare keys unlock
Strange portals to vast corridors and dim,
Leading to fates unguessed.
Though ever at his side threat ghostly Want,
He trusts each day's bequest
To serve his simple need. Sin-spectres haunt
His healthful slumbers not.
Hope, that turns pointless every thrust of Time,
Wrests jewels from his lot.
Endurance makes his poverty sublime. H. T. C.

FROM GOETHE.

"Goats, to the left of me!" the judge in the future will say.
"And you, my darling lambs, at my right hand shall stay!"
Good. Yet we trust that the judge will utter one more command:
"Reasoning beings, step forward, and facing me take your stand!" C. A. EGGERT.

LIVE THOUGHTS.

THE only thought in the world that is worth anything is freethought. To freethought, we owe all past progress and all hope for the future. Since when has any one made it appear that shackled thought could get on better than that which is free? Brains are a great misfortune, if one is never to use them.—M. J. Savage.

HAPPY is the man who renounces everything which may bring a stain or burden upon his conscience.—Thomas à Kempis.

THERE is somewhat in all life untranslatable into language. He who keeps his eye on that will write better than others and think less of his writings and of all writing.—Emerson.

REMEMBER you have sold yourselves to mean pedlers, when you have given yourselves to any meanness whatever. For the life of the soul is this,—to love life at its fairest and noblest; to prefer wisdom to wealth; to be men in the sight of God, never mind what you are in the eyes of the world. If this has to be sacrificed for anything the pedler can offer you, then let him go!—George Dawson.

THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE.

A Discourse delivered in Unity Church, Chicago, Feb. 5, 1882.

BY GEORGE C. MILN.

[Reprinted from the Chicago Times.]

Some centuries since, the Christian Church arraigned a notable scholar for daring to announce the monstrous doctrine of the earth's rotundity. He had reached this conclusion as the result of painstaking and persistent study, and naturally held fast to it with something akin to tenacity. The church authorities attempted to extort a recantation; but Cecco d'Ascoli had in him that mysterious something which is popularly known as the "courage of one's opinions," and he refused to renounce his well-earned conviction, though heaven itself should fall. In those days, the Church had a rather summary way of dealing with heretics. It believed in cremation, and practised it, unlike ourselves, upon the living instead of the dead. The progressive scientist who denied the flatness of the earth was led forth to the stake and burned. And, be it said to his eternal credit, he went out of the world illustrating a serenity and beauty of spirit in wide contrast with that of his devout executioners. Some time after this slight ecclesiastical amenity, it was accidentally discovered that the earth in good truth was round, and that the old theory of its flatness must be abandoned. But poor D'Ascoli was already burned: the winds of heaven had already gathered his sacred ashes on their wings that they might carry them to distant lands,—a legacy and an inspiration to all succeeding heretics. I do not mention this incident because it impresses me as a peculiarly pleasant reminiscence of Christian history, but for the purpose of deducting from it the moral that the Church sometimes strikes its match of bigotry too quickly, and kindles, under the impulse of fanatical ardor, flames of persecution, whose light in the future serves only to reveal its own ignorance and guilt. The Church of to-day may at least learn from this and similar incidents, with which, by the way, the pages of history are stained a bloody hue, to be exceedingly careful in reaching conclusions in regard to new statements of religious truth. It might burn another D'Ascoli, and then how sorry (!) it would afterward be.

The addresses which I have already delivered upon the past and present of the Church have evoked, as I am well aware, some criticism. This criticism has, in many cases, been very wide of the mark. Much of it has grown out of a misunderstanding of language which I heroically strove to render entirely lucid and level to the ordinary intellect. But such is the common fate of one foolish enough to indulge in discriminations, and I must not complain. Most of these criticisms I shall at present pass by; but one of them seems to me to deserve correction. It is said that the views presented in my previous discourses logically result in the destruction of the Church. "If this goes on, we shall have no Church," exclaims a devout religionist. And yet, if my critic's memory were as acute as his scent for heresy, he would have recalled these sentences in the sermon under criticism: "We may now, therefore, safely go on to say that some form of religion and some form of church will continue to be so long as man continues to be." Again: "The Church is," I said a week ago, "because man is. Let me now add the affirmation that, so long as man is, the Church will also be." How it is possible for a critic with these sentences beneath his eye to raise the cry that we shall soon have no Church, if this keeps on, is altogether beyond the analysis which I am able to extend to it. It presents a riddle in psychology, the disentangling of which I shall reserve for the retirement of some future vacation.

This criticism however really receives its best reply in the announcement of the topic for this morning's discourse, "The Church of the Future." For surely no prophet would undertake to draw an outline of an institution the possibility of which he had, at first, denied. The fancy of a romancer might choose such a task, but for the earnest and serious public teacher there is better work at hand.

Mr. Leslie Stephen said, not long ago, in a magazine article, in speaking of the religious outlook, "In the first place, let us admit freely and frankly that the problem about the religion of the future is simply insoluble"; and a few sentences further on he says, "To predict history is to make a guess with an indefinite chance of error." Now there is in both of these statements, as it seems to me, a modicum of truth and a quantity of error. If one should attempt to picture in detail either the religion or the Church of the Future, he would probably land in as many incongruities as did our old friend Mr. Pickwick on his midsummer excursion. It would be like attempting to describe all the minute practices of an individual not yet born: it would result in absurdity. But it is equally absurd to assert, with all the history of race evolution in the past, as a prophecy of what it will be in the future, that no prediction can be safely made as to the possible future of religious dogma and form. I, for one, therefore, will not "frankly and fully admit the future of religion to be insoluble." Its exact conditions few would care to predict, but the general tendency of religious thought and church form may be very well inferred from the signs of the times in which we live. I take it for granted, for example, that from the very evident lessened authority of creedal statements one may safely infer that the Church of the Future will be marked by an entire absence of speculative dogma as a basis of agreement. Is it necessary that I attempt to show that even now the creeds are not insisted on as they once were? They are still said in the churches, indeed; but they fall from the lips as an idle tale, and exert little or no influence upon the life. Here and there, a priest may, by a kind of ecclesiastical gymnastics, wriggle his way through the Athanasian Creed; but who for an instant supposes that these well-conditioned nineteenth-century men, who go to church to please their wives or keep up social connections, believe the effete mumblings which they make a show of indorsing? Why, even our friends of the Presbyterian Church—whose mild and beautiful creed still evokes the admiration of Christendom (!)—assure us that only ministers are required to swear by the creed, but that laymen slip into the Church on a simpler and less extended statement. I do not wish, however, to enlarge upon this phase of the subject now: my purpose is rather to expand the inference which I have already uttered, and attempt to show its reasonableness.

I say the Church of the Future will be marked by an absence of speculative beliefs as a basis of agreement. But what is meant, you will at once ask, by speculative beliefs? I must define the term to mean all beliefs insusceptible of sensible demonstration. Uncertain as phenomenal demonstration is, it is at least a vast advance upon the speculations developed from observation of phenomena, or wrought out through the over-active and often diseased imagination of the psychologist or partisan theologian. But let me specify some of the speculative beliefs which I believe will be discarded, at least as articles of agreement, in the future Church. The belief in hell is one; the belief in the old theory of inspiration is another; the belief in a personal Deity and the belief in individual immortality are two others.

Hell has already been thrown over by all thoughtful men. That is, the old conception of hell. Consience, it is true, has made another hell out of remorse for unrighteous conduct; but the old hell, in which souls were to be shut up through eternity by an infinitely merciful God (!), has been very generally relegated to the category of Oriental nightmares. This loss has occasioned but slight regret, even to the conservative,—a fact for which we may at least in part account by the relief from all fear which it affords them in regard to their own future. Yet defenders of conservative theology would do well to guard strongly the gates of hell, for when they fall the chief scourge in the hands of the Church has lost its lash. Nay, the system then already totters to its fall; for the foundations of Orthodoxy are laid in the bed of hell. It needs no prophet to foretell that men will not be required in the Church of the Future to accept this horrible dogma. Nor will they be asked to accept the Bible as the infallible word of God. My idea is that the Church of the Future will no longer tolerate the idea that the Almighty commanded Abraham to cut the throat of an innocent boy. We won't take that defence in the nineteenth century. If we did, the poor fanatic of Pocasset would be an illustrious saint, and Guiteau would rank among the world's heroes. The belief in infallible inspiration is purely speculative. It cannot be demonstrated. It baffles the analysis of reason, and the future Church will no longer require men to accept it. Instead of this, if I may venture a specific prediction, the Church will say in regard to the Bible, Whatever poetic impulse, whatever moral stimulus you can find in the Bible, use it as you would use it, if found in any other book. In other words, the future Church will catalogue the Bible as an ancient book, often crude in its composition, but containing many interesting though not altogether reliable snatches of history, as well as some most beautiful axioms of morality and tender strains of poetry.

But I must go on to say, in order to be true to myself, that the churchman of the future will not necessarily be atheist. You understand I am simply excluding these ideas as a basis of agreement; and I repeat that, while the individual will be permitted to cherish belief in a personal deity, he will not be compelled to do so, in order to hold his place in the Church of the Future. This is so simply because that Church will not insist upon speculative belief as a condition of membership. And the belief in a personal deity, I need not say, is "insusceptible of sensible demonstration." It is an inference satisfactory to one man, but unsatisfactory to his neighbor. In the future, as in the past, men will doubtless still speculate over the beginning of things. Many will adhere to the idea of a great world-soul as the energizing cause of the phenomenal universe. Others will say, as some now say, that if there be a personal God, so called, he discovers a most amazing indifference to the incessant agony with which this world of ours fairly writhes. But neither the one speculation or the other will be insisted upon as a basis of agreement.

So also we may safely infer in regard to the immortality of man: it will not be regarded as a belief essential to membership in the Church of the Future. Friends, may I ask you to acquit me of speaking without feeling on this subject? I am no stranger to the coffin and the grave. I have stood in many homes of darkness. I have wept with mothers over the babes, snatched untimely from their arms. Nay, I have closed forever those eyes out of whose dark and beauteous depths I drank in, as a child, my first lessons of love, and so I may not be charged with approaching this theme destitute of feeling. If I could believe there were a future life, how gladly would I let loose my imagination to picture its possible glories! Not the gentle John himself should beat the air with more eager pinion to reach the gate which I would fain believe opens upon the fields of Paradise than I. But, friends, I cannot afford to deceive you; and so I say that, however beautiful the dream may be, the chance of its fulfilment seems to me remote and improbable. Science declares at least that for every thought which stirs the brain there is a corresponding molecular change, showing the dependence of thought on matter. Even the boldest defenders of Orthodoxy do not attempt to demonstrate the separability of mind and body; and the question of questions for us to decide is, If brain is the organ of mind, nay, if mind depends for its activity on brain action, how will thought go on, how will brain activity continue, when the brain, weary of its ceaseless toil, is laid at last to rest? "The undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveller returns" still piques our curiosity, still defies our analysis, and still "puzzles our will." So I say of this, as of the other speculative beliefs enumerated, that they will not be insisted upon as a basis of agreement in the future. Mark the language,—as a basis of agreement. I mean by that that the Church of the Future will include men within its circle, whether they profess these beliefs or not. The test of membership will not be speculative philosophy, but practical and natural ethics. And this gives me the opportunity to congratulate this church upon the fact that it has so far anticipated the future as to discard entirely all speculative beliefs as a basis of agreement. No confession of theological correctness has been extorted from the membership of this church. If it had been, some of us could not have entered: if it should be now, many of us would be compelled to leave. Instead of this, we ask of a candidate: Has he good character? Is he seeking to promote the best interests of humanity? Can he gain inspiration here to aid him in his daily life? And, if these queries receive affirmative replies, the Church opens wide its arms to receive him. And so it comes to pass that we have here folks of all theologies and of none, dwelling together, and, as I hope, expecting still to dwell together, in concord and happiness.

Another feature of the future Church will be the presence of forms corresponding to the change already described. If the Church abandons, as I think it some day will, supernatural theology, it must also abandon supernatural forms; for, if it discards the spirit and clings to the form, it will be guilty of a paltry sham. For example, the old idea of prayer is that it can avail to change the course of nature. Through it, God is moved to arrest the action of certain laws on one side, and to resort to extraordinary measures on the other. Now, as the idea gains ground that effect follows cause in natural sequence, that the action of natural law is marked by an inevitability and invariability which knows no deflection, so the attempt to upset the course of events by individual petition will be abandoned. Believing this most thoroughly myself, I have abandoned petitionary prayer. I do not believe it avails aught, and I have never been more happy in my life than since I surrendered any semblance of petition, and, instead, simply close my eyes to commune with my own best and tenderest thoughts. And, moreover, there will grow up in the Church of the Future other and widely different forms of expression. The old phrases—no longer meaningful, whether in sermon, in hymn-book, or in scripture—will be eschewed, and others, corresponding to the exact thought of the age, will be used. This change will be slow, but it will be as sure as the evolution of the race into nobler conditions and more accurate conceptions is inevitable. To doubt this is worse than cowardice. It is scepticism of the worst and rankest kind. It simply means that we question the ability of future generations to do that which past generations have done; namely, express their own best thought about the universe in its origin and continuance; about man, his nature and possibilities, in their own language: in other words, it is to despair of the honesty and acuteness of our own posterity,—the worst form of pessimism in which one can possibly indulge.

I wish now to go forward in the direction of some other characteristics which I believe the future Church will surely possess. In doing this, I shall attempt nothing more than outline drawing: the filling in of the picture will be the task of other minds. You remember how glowingly Sir Thomas More pictures the ideal condition of society under the name of Utopia. He called it Utopia, from the Greek words ou and topos, which mean nowhere; and yet many of the conditions which he described as elements in his ideal society have already become parts of our civilization. One ideal condition which he pictured was an entire absence from his city of all lawyers,—a point in race evolution, alas! to which we have not yet attained. But the remarkable thing about More's Utopia as compared with modern society is that in many respects the actual outshines the imagined, and the realities of to-day are more gorgeous than the sanguine conceptions of the old romancer. So I am sure that whatever I may say of the future of the Church will fall short of the glorious future which is in fact before it.

First of all, its ideal and motive will be goodness. I mean by goodness the conduct which builds up and makes happy the individual, as over against the conduct which deteriorates and eventually makes miserable the individual; the conduct which results in the best social aggregate as compared with the conduct which rends society apart, sows the seeds of distrust, of anarchy, and of crime. The Church of the Future will aim to inspire men with admiration for this style of life. It will not go to hell for a motive nor to heaven: it will neither bribe with a sugar-plum nor drive with a whip, but it will simply hold up two motives. One, the motive of experience. It will show the men of that day that in so far as men of the past have held to the right, to the good, to the true, and the beautiful, they have been happy, unless some external cause indeed has arisen to disturb and overthrow their happiness. It will show that, in so far as men have been base and unworthy, they have been miserable at heart, though apparently happy. It will by experience prove that the latter conduct destroys, while the former develops and builds up society; and so its second motive will be the future of the race. Unworthy counsellors will tell you that this is but a worthless motive, but listen to this voice:—

"Oh, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence,—live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
Of miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge men's minds
To vaster issues.
So to live is heaven."

And, listening to that voice, tell me is it no glory to you worth striving for that your efforts to-day and to-morrow after essential goodness, besides adding to your own peace, will contribute something toward the glory of the future? Let me but think I am helping to make this world more habitable for future generations, and the thought will inspire me in life and sustain my spirit when my last hour draws near. Such, then, will be the ideal and the motive of the future Church; but besides this, or rather as the natural outgrowth of this, the future Church will assume other conditions, which, if it has at all now, are at best only in embryonic form. It will be the central philanthropic force of society. I like that word "philanthropic." How much it means,—the love of man,—and this indeed will be the attitude of the future Church! I do not discount what the Church has done, what it is doing; but I do say that, as it lays less stress upon speculation and dogmatic controversy, it will have both more time and energy to devote to practical philanthropy. It will help men then because they need help, and not because they are sectaries of this stripe or of that. If I may again, with propriety, refer to this Church, it has set the pattern for the future Church in its work among the poor children of this city, whom it washes and combs and dresses and teaches, without so much as lisping religion or Church. Such a course is a forerunner of the practical philanthropy of the future Church.

The Church of the Future, too, I think, will be a social centre in society. It will draw men together in pleasant, helpful, loving relations. Their association will not depend on theological agreement, but upon human sympathy. Based on the great fact of human dependence, they will be drawn together by community of purpose, of aspiration, and of sentiment. The Church then will not decri social enjoyments from the pulpit, and practise them in the parlor. No! It will say to the young, "Be happy, be innocent, be gay, be moderate, and above all be true!" And, beyond all, the Church of the Future will be a great educative and formative force in society. It will teach men to think,—to think not for purposes of acute criticism, but that they may be builders in society. It will gather its young together for comparison of views, it will group them in helpful association, provide for them healthful amusements, and so seek to ennoble and glorify their best life. The minister of the future, though called by some other name, perhaps, will be one to whom every lad and lass will come with his or her tale of woe, to seek here a word of comfort and there a word of guidance and advice. Such, I think, will be some of the conditions of my ecclesiastical Utopia. Such is the vision which I dimly see, and to which I would direct your eyes. Do you smile at my credulity? Do you say such social conditions could not exist without a dogmatic basis?

"Do you ask, Where is that city
Where the perfect right doth reign?
I must answer, I must tell you,
That you seek its site in vain.
You may roam o'er hill and valley,
You may pass o'er land and sea,
You may search the wide earth over,
'Tis a city yet to be."

But when it comes,—when the vision beautiful of a perfected society, freed from superstition, from priestcraft, from the horrible spell of false philosophy, breaks upon the world,—then methinks at least that prophecy of the Apocalypse will be true which pictures a condition of society in which "there shall be no more death" (because death shall have lost its terror), "neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain"; for the former things are passed away.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY is writing a book upon Bishop Berkeley and his contributions to mental and medical science. It is to be very thorough and critical in its analysis of that great writer's character.

MR. RUSKIN has changed his plans with respect to the museum he has founded at Sheffield, England; and it is his intention to devote the remainder of his life to making it about the most complete institution of the kind in the world. He has decided to send there his unique and almost priceless library from Brentwood, and a portion of the books and plates have already arrived. Plans for the extension of the buildings have been prepared; and a public subscription, which Prince Leopold has promised to head, will shortly be opened to defray the cost of the enlargement.

NOTES FROM OREGON.

Editors of The Index:—

It is but seldom that any information concerning the liberal sentiments of this great North-west is published only as a few words may appear in some of the Eastern liberal papers occasionally. Therefore, you may pardon me, if I trespass upon your time by giving a brief description of the liberal progress in this State and the adjoining Territory of Washington. This progress has been slow, especially in the large cities, as Portland, Salem, and others, while some of the smaller towns contribute to the support of various denominations of churches; but, for all this, there is a healthy growth of liberal sentiment, and many of the active members candidly examine the scientific methods advanced by master minds. To the thoughtful, it is gratifying to see the churches modifying their asperities and dropping the crude forms and, obsolete ceremony of creeds and embracing more philosophical ideas concerning the profound facts pertaining to life and being.

The effect of scientific and critical writers upon them has been immense, as well as upon the general reader. The people are becoming more familiar with those rational ideas of cosmogony which science demonstrates, and which relieves from the necessity of an anthropomorphic deity, and establishes natural law with all its effects as the governor of the universe. This may to some seem atheistical; but it is enthroning Deity in sense, with universal and inexorable law as the instrument in his hands, potent for all things. Thus, we can recognize that these same laws have power over mind as well as over matter, and that there is not one spot which is not under the empire of all-pervading law. Everywhere one may travel in this State, he will meet persons familiar with the best intellects in the liberal and scientific world. In every county, town, or village, he will meet with liberal papers and scientific works that are exerting a silent but powerful influence in aiding the perception of truth.

Being familiar with many of the students of the college in my own town, I find them possessed of more comprehensive views than those of former years. More now strive for other professional honors than the pulpit affords. The people of this community are largely liberal in sentiment. They have a large, commodious building of two stories, named "Vert's Liberal Hall," that has a free platform for minister, liberal or political speaker. Some are talking of securing a regular lecturer to speak here throughout the year, monthly or oftener, if possible. The church members have sociables, entertainments, and other exercises in this hall; while others have dances, dramatic plays, and whatever contributes to the sum of human happiness. Every time a church member passes under that name, "Vert's Liberal Hall," I think he is made more liberal, more humanitarian, more filled with the spirit of universal brotherhood, and universal, mental liberty.

This year, the "First Philosophical Society" of Portland will endeavor to build a splendid hall in that city, after the Steinway style. They intend to incorporate and issue sufficient stock to insure a hall worthy of that important city. The Liberals are gaining rapidly, and sustain a Sunday discussion, which is attended by professional men of all kinds.

I am informed that in Southern and Eastern Oregon Liberalism is steadily increasing. Vancouver, a place intensely Orthodox a few years ago, is now very much modified in religious enthusiasm. In their county and municipal elections, prominent Liberals are selected for positions of trust and importance. On the Puget Sound country—a large and valuable section—are many influential infidels, solid men and women, the sinew, beauty, and intelligence of the land.

There are hopeful signs of a more dignified conception of those profound subjects that are stirring the world's thought, an increasing desire to know the truth of grand conceptions, irrespective of how it may affect the cherished theories of the past. There is the hope that the dawn of a brighter, a more intellectual day, is substantial and to be realized. While I have thus attempted to note the present condition of religious or liberal affairs, it may not be inappropriate to give a brief mention of our physical prospects: indeed, our moral and physical improvements are coextensive and mutually dependent. Owing to the labors of the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Oregon Railway and Navigation Companies in building railroads, thus increasing the prospect of communication with the East and conveying facilities for Eastern Oregon and Washington, property has risen from fifty to one hundred per cent. in many places, and our population largely augmented. Portland is carrying a large commercial business; Vancouver, sphinx like, is rising from its "masterly inactivity"; while the Sound country, eventually to be the terminus of great railroads, will contain the queen city of the Pacific Coast. This is no painted story, unsubstantial as the "stuff dreams are made of," but realities proved by the great activity everywhere manifested, also proved by the fact that the Territory of Washington is knocking at the door of Congress, and will doubtless soon be admitted into the glorious sisterhood of States.

Nor are educational matters neglected, but receive good attention; and solid improvement is being rapidly made. Thus, we have reasonable hope for considerable material and intellectual progress with an honored and praiseworthy career.

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Editors of The Index:—

What do we mean by the "scientific method," and what is the difference between science and philosophy? Very frequently, the term science is used when philosophy is intended; and indeed they are now so intimately connected that there can be no true philosophy without a scientific basis. The data furnished by the sciences are the only foundation upon which modern philosophy builds since Bacon, and more especially Herbert Spencer, have cleared away the debris of the old metaphysicians and built upon the solid rock of established fact.

The special philosophy of religion must be subjected to the same ordeal, if we would get at the truth. If it is true, as Mr. Potter states, that religious philosophy treats of man's relation to the universe,—to the vital forces of nature, to the social and physical forces that influence his life,—how shall such philosopher proceed to investigate such religion? Must he not know the facts of man's nature, established certainties made known by the science of mind and of physiology? How his bodily and mental development are dependent upon ancestral qualities, upon social surroundings, etc.? The religious philosopher must remember that the science of psychology has demonstrated that all man's knowledge is relative, that he cannot know the absolute. Again, if the various sciences demonstrate that all the laws of nature are uniform, certain, and never interfered with by a superintending Deity, then religious philosophy indicates from such facts that practical religion has nothing to do with the unknown Power, but has all to do with these laws of nature. It might here be asked whether this "rational religion" is not better termed "rational morality"? If "religion, as thought, refers to man's relation to the universe and its vital forces, as feeling refers to the obligation imposed on man by this tie of vital relation, and as practice refers to man's effort to meet such obligation," may it not be said that "morality" covers all the ground?

The facts of geology, astronomy, biology, and psychology, demonstrate that there is and has been a constant development from an inferior to a superior state, whenever there is a "fitting environment." The acorn would never become a grand old oak without such environment,—soil, sunlight, and moisture,—neither would the human embryo ever become a rational philosopher without fitting education, social surroundings, and bodily health. Evolution is like "getting a Plato born from an alligator," says a critic of Herbert Spencer. But if the infant Plato had been taken from his mother's breast, and, instead of having the Greek culture and social surroundings, had been brought up among the Comanche Indians, where would have been Plato's philosophy? Instead of looking up to the noble Grecian Plato, and exclaiming, "Plato, thou reasonest well! else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire, this longing after immortality," we should have looked down on the Comanche Plato, and said, "Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutored mind sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind." The summit of his ambition would have been a happy hunting-ground in the future world instead of a celestial academical grove for discussing the problems of philosophy.

Hence, philosophy sees that such scientific facts logically and inevitably demonstrate the truth of evolution.

Spencer also shows that progress is accompanied by a development from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. Yet he is represented as saying that evolution does not mean progress, but merely a development from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous!

"Heterogeneity may not be especially dear to the human heart," when applied to a heap of miscellaneous rubbish, such as the old metaphysicians piled up. But when a Plato is developed from a homogeneous cell,—on through the embryo stage, on through infancy till his little limbs, gradually developing, perform their diversified duties, his infantile brain at first seeking only to gratify his animal wants, but gradually, as manhood is reached and Grecian social forces have had their influence, his mental qualities becoming developed and ennobled,—then indeed such heterogeneity is "especially dear to the human heart," as showing what man may become by favorable surroundings, favorable ancestry, and favorable interchange of thought with his fellow-men.

The "scientific method," as applied to philosophy, is this building upon established facts instead of on the metaphysical vagaries and individual reasonings of mere scholasticism.

Instead of denying progress, Herbert Spencer has actually written a large octavo volume of 430 pages on Illustrations of Universal Progress.

C. D. B. MILLS' LECTURES IN CLEVELAND, O.

Editors of The Index:—

At the close of Mr. C. D. B. Mills' lecture course in this city, at the parlors of Mr. Kilpatrick, the following resolutions of thanks were adopted, which it will gratify his many friends and admirers here to see published in The Index:—

Resolved, That we who have listened to Mr. Mills' lectures and conversations, not content with a formal vote of thanks for the rich feast he has spread before us, desire to express our appreciation of the exceptionally high quality of his discourse; his reverent, catholic, and hospitable spirit toward all forms of sincere thought and belief; his sympathetic study and mastery of the surprisingly affluent wisdom of far-away peoples and times; his rare insight into contemporary genius; and, most of all, his profound and prophetic sympathy with the higher currents of thought of our own time.

We bid him God-speed in his chosen work.

ATHEIST'S RIGHTS IN KANSAS.

Editors of The Index:—

In answer to your query, on page 382 of The Index, regarding the right of atheists to testify in the different States, I would say that in Kansas atheists are qualified to testify by section 7 of the Bill of Rights, as enumerated in our constitution. It reads as follows:—

SEC. 7. The right to worship God, according to the dictates of conscience, shall never be infringed; nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship; nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted, nor any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. No religious test or property qualification shall be required for any office of public trust, nor for any vote at any election, nor shall any person be incompetent to testify on account of religious belief.

The statute respecting oaths, section 3, reads, "Any person having conscientious scruples against taking an oath may affirm with like effect." Section 4 reads, "Affirmation shall commence and conclude as follows: You do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm, etc., and this you do under the pains and penalties of perjury." Yours,

WETMORE, KAN.

GLEANINGS FROM OUR CORRESPONDENCE.

Personally, I was very much gratified to become acquainted with The Index through the "Ethical Culture Society" in New York; for I then recognized for the first time that the religion to which I, through outward circumstances and innate tendencies, had been converted years ago, had already taken some form among men clearer than I was aware of, and this made me glad. I deplore that a branch of the Ethical Culture Society, or a similar institution, does not exist here, but hope that it will come some day.

For The Index, I shall do what is in my power: for its editors, I acknowledge my admiration.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

I can do without tobacco and a great many other cheap luxuries; but I cannot live and be happy without The Index. Now that I am here in the woods in a corner by myself, the reading of The Index is a luxury I enjoy; and I reckon Mr. Underwood and Mr. Potter as my personal friends.

G. E. E.

ARTHURETTE, N.B.

The Index has been invaluable to me. Contact with its noble, fearless, exalted, and exalting thought has often and again carried me to a realm where I could forget for a time the misery involved in continual defeat.

W. L. C.

Though I am far from indorsing the religious principles of The Index, I like it for its fearless honesty in dealing with the questions of the day, and because I believe Christianity is made better and kept purer by its clear and able criticisms.

SOUTH OIL CITY, PA.

For myself, in the short acquaintance I have had with The Index, it has grown to be an indispensable. It is the thing "I long have sought, and mourned because I found it not."

KANSAS CITY, MO.

The Index gives us great pleasure, and we would gladly see its healthy influence more widely diffused.

C. O.

I think The Index the best free thought paper published. Have just read Chadwick's article on Paine, which I like well. Savage's essay on "Evolution and Theism" was the subject of discussion in our Herbert Spencer Class one evening.

BOOK NOTICES.

A STUDY OF THE PENTATEUCH, FOR POPULAR READING. Being an inquiry into the age of the so-called Books of Moses, with an introductory examination of recent Dutch theories as represented by Dr. Kuenen's Religion of Israel. By Rufus P. Stebbins, D.D., formerly President, Lecturer on Hebrew Literature, and Professor of Theology in the Meadville Theological School. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street. 1881.

Dr. Stebbins has written a book which is the counterfeit presentment of his striking personality,—a book that is loud and vehement, belligerent, bellicose, bursting with sacred rage. The thesis which he endeavors to maintain is that "the Pentateuch is a work of the Mosaic age, and largely of Moses himself; that it has come down to us with few, very few dislocations, interpolations, and corruptions." Naturally enough, the book has been received with "tumult of acclaim" by Orthodox critics generally, and its scholarship has been especially commended by those who are least qualified to judge of it, its Hebrew learning by those who do not know a word of Hebrew, and its demolition of the Dutchmen by those who have not read a word of Kuenen. Dr. Stebbins is exceedingly fortunate in having for his objective a book which is not in the possession of his readers, and cannot easily be obtained. Kuenen's Religion of Israel is a three-volume work, costing some fifteen dollars, of which there are perhaps fifty or sixty copies in the United States. The price of Dr. Stebbins' volume, if nothing else about it, is so modest that it is easily procured. Hundreds will read it who have never so much as seen the outside of Kuenen's volumes. They will think Kuenen has been easily demolished. But, if those who have judgment and candor could go to Kuenen himself, they would wonder how it was possible for Dr. Stebbins to pack so much of misrepresentation and irrelevancy within the limits of so small a book as his Study of the Pentateuch. Our advice to those who cannot avail themselves of Kuenen's work is to procure Prof. Robertson Smith's Old Testament in the Jewish Church. It covers the entire ground of Dr. Stebbins' Study. It proves that whatever difficulties inhere in his own theory, which is substantially the same as Kuenen's, they are nothing in comparison with the difficulties inhering in the traditional theory, which is that of Dr. Stebbins. One of the most charming incidents connected with the publication of Dr. Stebbins' volume is the review of it by Prof. Toy of the Cambridge Divinity School. The incident is one of many illustrations of the extent to which sectarian limits are traversed by critical studies. Prof. Toy is still, we hear, in good and regular standing as a member of the Baptist Church. But, while his views of the Pentateuch are those of the most radical Unitarians, Dr. Stebbins' views are those of the most antiquated Baptists, though he is himself a stalwart Unitarian. Prof. Toy's review of Dr. Stebbins' Study was an exquisite piece of work. It took off the doctor's head so quietly that his mouth is talking still in absolute unconsciousness of the professor's deadly stroke.

Dr. Stebbins' Study is divided into two parts. The first part is a review of Kuenen's Religion of Israel. The second part is an attempt to establish the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch on grounds of external and internal evidence. In the first part, nothing is more striking than the implication everywhere present, which amounts in the long run to a suppressio veri of unlimited extent, that nothing has been said upon these matters by Dr. Kuenen or any other critic that is not written in his Religion of Israel. Yet Dr. Stebbins must be aware that Kuenen's Religion of Israel is based upon his Historico-Critical Introduction to the Old Testament, and that it was impossible for him to treat every particular ab ovo in the later work. Moreover, many of the data on which he proceeds are the common property of all modern critics who do not hold a brief for the traditional opinions. Dr. Stebbins endeavors throughout to give the impression that Kuenen is singular in almost everything, or that he has only a few ignorant Dutchmen with him. Of the confirmation of his results by Reuss and Welschhausen and others, no mention is made, and as little of the anticipation by the majority of modern critics of much that is labelled "Dutch criticism." The case of Chronicles is the most pointed here. The uninstructed reader will imagine that Dr. Kuenen's view of Chronicles is as novel as his theory of the Pentateuch. Indeed, Dr. Stebbins insists that it is merely the outcome of this theory. The Pentateuch must be proved un-Mosaic, and therefore Chronicles must be a priestly redaction of Israel's history. For shame! As if Dr. Noyes did not teach his divinity school boys for twenty years exactly Kuenen's view of Chronicles! And he had never dreamed of Kuenen's theory of the Pentateuch. "Why, that is spurious," said the Unitarian against whom an Orthodox friend quoted the text of the three heavenly witnesses. "Yes," said the other, "I know it; but I thought perhaps you didn't." Dr. Stebbins knew that Chronicles had long since been discredited; but he thought perhaps his readers didn't, as he was writing for "popular reading." See the title-page of his book.

About equal justice is done to Dr. Kuenen throughout. Thus, page 11, he is fearfully belabored for saying that the Chronicler's "materials were supplied by tradition." By tradition, Dr. Stebbins understands "oral tradition," and wins an easy victory. But the context makes it evident that oral tradition was not intended, as does also the original Dutch, which literally reads "the matter handed down."

But this is a comparatively little matter. * It only shows the doctor's animus, his conviction that all is fair in war. What is not a little matter is his continual misunderstanding or perversion of Kuenen's theory of the Pentateuch. With wearisome iteration, he charges him with discrediting the entire historical contents of the Pentateuch. In the most unambiguous terms, Kuenen asserts that the Jehovistic and older Elohist portions of the Pentateuch existed in the eighth century B.C.; and he makes these the basis of his account of the view which the eighth century Israelites held of their ancient history. To all of this, it suits Dr. Stebbins' method to be absolutely indifferent. Not to have been would have complicated matters too much. If a Hebrew scholar is going to write a book "for popular reading," he must avoid all nice distinctions. He must neglect the actual theory of his opponent and set up a man of straw, which he can easily demolish. This Dr. Stebbins does throughout. There is something comical in the amount of virtuous indignation that he wreaks upon theories that no critic ever held, and Kuenen least of all. Thus, his representation of Ezra's relation to the priestly legislation of the Book of Origins is persistently different from Kuenen's. But he charges Kuenen with it all the same. The reader is continually assured that Ezra, or some one of his time, made the Pentateuch ritual out of the whole cloth, when Kuenen is exceedingly careful to show that the reform of Ezra did but publish a code many details of which had long been in general use. Other particulars in which Dr. Stebbins is equally unjust are those relating to Manasseh,—where he introduces in brackets, into a sentence of Kuenen's, words that completely misinterpret him,—and to the authorship of the Ten Commandments. Speaking of Moses' authorship of these, he cries, "Where is the proof of it? None is given,—not a line, not a letter." On the contrary, Vol. I., pp. 280-290, deal with these matters exclusively. Either Dr. Stebbins has never read to the end of Kuenen's first volume, or he has a memory that he cannot safely trust.

But Dr. Stebbins keeps his best wine till the last. He reserves what he considers his most crushing blow for the conclusion of his argument. On pages 70, 71, he considers the theory of the Elohist and Jehovistic documents in the Pentateuch. This theory is not peculiar to Kuenen; but he accepts it with the majority of modern critics, who are not retained for the traditional view. Dr. Stebbins imagines that he has convicted him of glaring absurdity. For example, in one passage that Kuenen considers Elohist, "Jehovah is used fifteen times, and Elohim not once." The italics are Dr. Stebbins's. In another passage, "Jehovah is used forty times, and Elohim but three times." In another, "Jehovah is used thirty-three times, and Elohim not once." In another, "Jehovah is used fifty-seven times, and Elohim twice." Other passages are instanced where the same disparity of the two names exists. Behold, says Dr. Stebbins, "the 'chief characteristic' of the Elohim document almost entirely disappears in the passages attributed to the Elohist document by Dr. Kuenen, and the 'chief characteristic' of the Jehovistic writer is found in them." But alas for this overwhelming refutation! Every passage mentioned is beyond Exodus vi., 2, and it is the doctrine of Kuenen and all other scholars who accept the documentary theory that beyond Exodus vi. 2, "Jehovah" is used almost exclusively. Therefore, what Dr. Stebbins has discovered is exactly what Kuenen and the rest have all along affirmed! His investigations have confirmed their theories. He has ground in their mill. He is "hoist with his own petard." He has proved nothing that was not known before, except that he has himself attempted to criticise the documentary theory of the Pentateuch without so much as knowing its A, B, C. For nothing is more fundamental to this theory than the idea that after Exodus vi., 2, we ought to expect the almost exclusive use of "Jehovah." It would be hard to find in all the catalogue of pretended scholarship a more stupendous and ridiculous blunder than this.

With such an ending to the first part of Dr. Stebbins' book, we are much disheartened, and enter on the second part with but little hope of any serious enlightenment. We experience no bitter disappointment when we find that the arguments from external and internal evidence for the Mosaic authorship are about equally inconclusive. The former is confined almost entirely to a recapitulation of the mentions of "the Law" in the Prophets, the Psalms, and the other books of the Old Testament outside the Pentateuch. Wherever the word "Law" occurs in our English version, Dr. Stebbins assumes, almost without exception, that the entire Pentateuch was intended by the original writer. Apparently, he has never made the least attempt to discover the meaning of the word "Torah" in the Old Testament, which is translated Law. The studies of Smith and Kuenen and others prove that it has a considerable range of meaning, that it is used many times where there can be no reference to anything written, that later it indicates the Book of Deuteronomy, and never the whole Pentateuch until after the time of Ezra. There is not a single use of the word which is not entirely consistent with the growth of the Pentateuch throughout five centuries. We have been speaking of "the United States" a hundred years. The argument of Dr. Stebbins should be convincing that there have always been just as many of these States as there are now, their territory of the same extent, their population invariable. In fact, the number of States has trebled, their territory has been vastly increased, their population has been multiplied by sixteen. Changes as great as these and greater took place in "the Law" of Israel throughout a period during the whole of which this designation, Torah, was applied to each new enlargement of the increasing bulk. Those who have been impressed by Dr. Stebbins' argument in this line would do well to read the lectures of Robertson Smith which we have named above.

Dr. Stebbins' next great argument is from the archaisms that exist in the Pentateuch. The language of the Pentateuch, he says, is different from that of the other books, different and older. Doubtless, it is; but this question is too delicate to be adequately discussed in a book intended "for popular reading." We have every reason to believe that the text of the Old Testament reflected the changes in the Hebrew language from century to century. We have reason to believe that the text of the Pentateuch was the first to crystallize. Its archaisms would be sufficiently accounted for by these two facts, taken in their logical connection. Hardly can Dr. Stebbins show anything in the Pentateuch more archaic than Chaucer's English was to Shakspeare, but Shakspeare was only two hundred years from Chaucer, and Ezra was eight hundred years from Moses. This fable teaches that there might be hundreds of archaisms in the Pentateuch without its having been written by Moses or for hundreds of years after his death.

Sadder than any particular defect in Dr. Stebbins' book is his appeal to popular prejudice, his calling names, his flinging about of such words as "forgers" and "forgery," as if the literary ethics of the time of Ezra or Josiah were the same as those of Herbert Spencer and John Stuart Mill. Those who have read Kuenen's Prophets and Prophecy in Israel and his Religion of Israel and Prof. Smith's Old Testament in the Jewish Church will smile, yet somewhat sadly, to think what a false impression of these calm and earnest books the readers of Dr. Stebbins, who have not read the books that he maligns, will receive from his tirade. If Smith and Kuenen could be induced to pause from their great studies long enough to give Dr. Stebbins a few hours' attention, it would be interesting to see the shapeless ruin they would make of his vociferous defence of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Meantime, we advise as many of our readers as can do so to compare Dr. Stebbins's "modesty" with their "dogmatic certainty," and see which they prefer.

GASPARA STAMPA. By Eugene Benson. With a selection from her sonnets, translated by George Fleming, author of Kismet, etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

A daintier book than this has never been published in the United States. And its "exterior semblance" agrees well with its contents. Gaspara Stampa was born in Venice in 1523, and died in 1553, probably self-destroyed that she might end the misery of hopeless love. She was one of the most beautiful and gifted of Venetian women. Mr. Benson has written an exquisite account of her life, her love, her sorrow, and her death, together with such account of the place and time as was necessary for the better understanding of her character and fate. The translations of her sonnets, by George Fleming (Miss Fletcher), convey but little more than the idea of the originals; and they hardly justify the claim of Mr. Benson for them, that they were remarkable for simplicity and spontaneity. Rather, like the love poetry of her period in general, they are exceedingly self-conscious. Her love seems more to her as the raw material of sonnets than for its own sweet sake.

YORKTOWN. By James H. Patton. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert.

This is a compendious account of the campaign which made Yorktown, Va., famous. It gives also a full account of the recent centennial celebration of that event, with full-page engraved portraits of Washington, Lafayette, Rochambeau, De Grasse, and Steuben. It will be of interest, and find its readers mainly among those who attended the Yorktown ceremonies, or who had friends who took part therein. For these, it will be a pleasant souvenir and interesting reminder of a great historical event.

THE Unitarian Review for February is received. In its first article, "The Witness of the Psalms to Christ and Christianity," Rev. John Page Hopps reviews the volume of lectures on that subject written by William Alexander, Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, arriving apparently at very different conclusions from the author of that work. Rev. George Batchelor has an interesting article on "The Secular Origin of Unitarianism in Salem." "The Study of the Non-Christian Religions" gives us the result of much careful research and enlarged thought on the part of the writer, Rev. James T. Bixby, and will well repay perusal by all investigators and students, of whatever shade of opinion or belief. The remaining articles are "Mr. Heber Newton's Communism," by Wm. B. Weedon, and "In Memoriam,—Mr. Lowell," by Rev. H. W. Foote, with interesting editorial notes and reviews.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

B. F. UNDERWOOD on his way East will speak for the Toronto, Ont., Secular Society, February 26 and 27.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P., is writing for Longman's series of "Epochs of Modern History" a volume to be entitled Epochs of Reform, 1830-1850.

THE one hundred and fourth anniversary of the birthday of Robert Emmet is to be observed on the 4th of March in some appropriate manner by the patriotic Irishmen of this city.

MR. FORBES, pastor of the Universalist church at Seneca, Kan., recently changed the hour of his Sunday service to attend, and to enable his congregation to attend, a lecture by B. F. Underwood.

THE poet Longfellow will be seventy-five years old on the 27th inst. In the city of Portland, Me., the birthplace of the poet, the day is to be observed by speeches, poems, etc., from distinguished citizens.

EX-PRESIDENT WOOLSEY, of Yale, was presented with a gold medal, commemorative of his fifty years of service in that college, by the professors one day last week, Professor Thatcher making the presentation address.

THE sympathy of the whole country as well as of this State is extended to our Governor Long in his present severe affliction in the death of his wife, Mrs. Mary W. Long. She died on Friday last, after a lingering illness, from consumption.

YESTERDAY was the birthday of "the Father of his Country." As it is a legal holiday, of course all our readers were reminded of the fact, and we hope improved the occasion to brighten up their patriotism and their memory of the "little hatchet" story with its accompanying moral.

MR. W. M. SALTER, of New York city, occupied the pulpit of Parker Memorial Hall on Sunday, the 19th inst., his subject being "The Ethics of the Sermon on the Mount." Mr. Salter speaks once a month before the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, and always to its satisfaction and edification.

PETER COOPER's ninety-first birthday was celebrated by a dinner at his home on Lexington Avenue, New York, on Saturday eve, February 11, at which were present some very distinguished guests. He declares his health is better now at the beginning of his ninety-second year than for some years previous.

KO KUN-HUA, Professor of Chinese in Harvard, died in Cambridge, Tuesday, the 14th inst. He came to the country in 1879, and was a Mandarin in high position in China, and was intending to return to that country at the close of the three years for which he was engaged. He leaves a widow and six children, the eldest being about fifteen years old. His body will be sent to China for burial.

BEFORE a vote was taken on the resolution instructing the trustees of Unity Church of Chicago to notify Mr. Miln that he was not wanted as pastor of that church, Mr. Miln said he wished the society to state, in black and white, the reasons of this action, so that when his children, later in life, asked him why he was expelled from Unity pulpit, he might show them that it was because he did not believe in the personality of Deity and in the immortality of the soul. This would seem to be a very reasonable request.

MRS. CRINDLE-REYNOLDS, a well-known "materializing" medium, was exposed in her fraud at a private séance the other evening in New York by the gas being suddenly turned on, which revealed Mrs. Crindle-Reynolds with a mask on and in a sort of undress playing the part of one ghost, while another mask, held in her hand at arm's length with some thin drapery, did duty as a "little fraud." It is to the credit of the Spiritualists present that they at once denounced her, and have since publicly declared her a fraud.

THE Chicago Times says: "The action of the Unity Church Society in notifying a discontinuance of the ministry of Mr. Miln plainly carries the implication of a standard of Unitarian religious doctrine from which that religious minister is judged to have departed. What is that standard of religious doctrine? In what language is it formulated? Where is it to be found? How is a Unitarian minister, or one who seeks to know whether he has the requisite qualifications to become a Unitarian minister, or yet one who is seeking the door of entrance to that which goes by the name of Unitarian Church, to know it when he finds it? . . . What is that truth? What is that bond of a common faith in which Unitarians are constituted a religious body? Certainly it is a warranted inference that the gentlemen who have notified a discontinuance of the religious ministrations of Mr. Miln know and can state what it is, else they could not have known, nor have imagined, that the shepherd was not leading his sheep in the right path. Nevertheless, though pressed by the accused to be specifically informed of the indictment upon which judgment was about to be rendered against him, they refused to exhibit the indictment. The accused was graciously permitted to plead, but without being furnished with the terms of the accusation or the pleadings of the accusers. . . . Without espousing the cause either of the prosecution or of the defence (for the Times is so unfortunate as not to know what Unitarianism is, what its standard or test of religious doctrine is, nor whether the defendant was or was not within the Unitarian definition of a heretic), the proceedings seem to warrant the criticism that the accused has not been dealt with liberally or fairly. The mere question of terminating the contract between minister and congregation according to its strict terms was not the question which chiefly concerned him. It was a notorious fact, which none of his judges and accusers could deny, that the proposition to terminate the contract involved an implication of religious opinions which, in the judgment of the society upon some unformulated standard of Unitarian doctrine, were heretical opinions. Under such a state of facts, the summary termination of the contract was tantamount to the entry of a judgment of conviction for heresy against the accused without an exhibition of the accusation, without a hearing, without a trial, without any form of judicial proceeding whatever. In what situation is the accused left by such a proceeding? Is it one in which any of his judges would wish to be left? Is it one to which the principle of the golden rule of equity can be approvingly applied? Is it one which can be justified by any doctrinal standard of the most advanced and liberal religious sect of the age? The members of that sect can answer these conundrums for themselves.

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to cooperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Egyptian ministry have decided upon the total abolition of slavery. Kader Pasha has been appointed Governor of the Soudan, and will adopt measures to suppress the slave-trade in that province.

THE Pope is evidently alarmed by the dangers that surround the Church. He has addressed a letter to the Italian bishops, instructing them to encourage the formation of Catholic societies among the laity, to sustain and strengthen the Catholic press and to advocate boldly the temporal independence of the Holy See.

THE capital of the nation needs missionaries. The Fisk Jubilee Singers, on the night of February 15, wandered the streets of Washington nearly all night in search of a hotel. They made application for admittance at eighteen hotels in the city, fifteen of which professed to be too crowded to receive them; but the proprietors of the Lafayette, the Metropolitan, and the Hielman, frankly said they had room, but would not receive colored guests. And this in a Christian city, where the Civil Rights Bill was made a law!

THE speech of General Skobelev to the Servian students, affirming in substance that a struggle between the Slav and the Teuton is inevitable, since Russia will no longer consent to be held in check by the influence of Germany, and that the struggle when it comes will be a long and sanguinary one, but the Slav will triumph in the end, seems to be taken by Bismarck and Emperor William as some indication of the intentions of Russia. The disturbance produced among European statesmen by the unofficial utterances of a soldier much addicted to his cups and to saying reckless things shows that the relations of the Powers are too precarious to afford any guarantee of lasting peace in Europe.

LIBERALISM in Spain seems to be gaining ground. It will be remembered that the Sagasta Cabinet, some months ago, reinstated certain professors, among them Castelar, who had been removed from the universities on account of their liberal views. Against this, the Papal Nuncio protested. The Cabinet replied that it could not permit any interference with its acts in civil matters. The Papal Nuncio, sustained by some members of the court, by the Spanish nobility, and by the rural population, is craftily working against the ministry; but the House of Deputies give Sagasta warm support, and even the king has informed him that he will faithfully give the liberal policy a fair trial, even in religious and educational matters.

HENRY B. BLACKWELL in the Woman's Journal says that, when woman's suffrage becomes an established fact, then "the Advance and the Congregationalist will quote from the Independent and the Christian Mirror to prove that orthodox Christianity, of the Congregational type, was the author of the woman suffrage movement. In that day, not far distant, some Robert Ingersoll will be denounced as a slanderer when he says that, in 1882, Andover and Lane and Princeton opposed the equal rights of women, as in 1840 they opposed the equal rights of negroes and the abolition of chattel slavery. Why is it, we wonder, that in every age the so-called champions of religion are arrayed against liberty and justice, in opposition alike to reason and revelation?"

It is one of the topics of political society circles in England that the Queen misses in the present Premier that courteous deference to her wishes as a woman and a queen which characterized the attitude of her favorite, Beaconsfield. In fact, it is strongly hinted that Gladstone takes pains to publicly "snub" the Queen by his non-attendance on occasions of mere ceremony, where court etiquette demands the presence of the Prime Minister as a special mark of duty and deference toward his sovereign. But Gladstone, it is said, is in no mood to submit to the slightest remonstrance or check. He believes that the people are at his back, and he is supported in that view by the immense strength and efficiency of the Radical organizations throughout the country.

CHARLES READE, the novelist, has been reading up on the prophecies since his conversion, and it is as clear as daylight to him that the Jewish people are soon to repossess Palestine, ruling "from Lebanon to Euphrates"; and he thinks that it is the duty of all Christian nations to go to the rescue of the Jews of Russia with all the ships, men, and money needed to get them out of that land, colonize them in the land to which the Lord has promised he will restore his chosen people. There is no probability of the repossession of Palestine by the Jews; and the more liberal and progressive among them have no desire to go there. Zealous Christians, who are anxious about the fulfilment of prophecy, are more interested in the return of the Hebrews to the Holy Land than the Jews themselves are.

THE sect of Mormons, sometimes called the "Josephites," who claim that polygamy is not only unauthorized, but expressly prohibited in the original "Book of Mormon," are engaged in converting the Utah Mormons to monogamy, and claim to have secured many converts in the Territory. The position of these Mormons, of whom Joseph Smith, son of the Prophet, is president, is opposed by the Utah Mormons, with the claim that plural marriage among them has for its authority "later revelations." Here, the polygamists seem to have the advantage; for their opponents are unable to show that the "later revelations" are not as reliable as the former ones. The adherents of Smith cannot scrutinize very closely these claims of "later revelations" without inviting attention to and disclosing the weakness of the entire foundation of the Mormon structure. Fortunately, the time has come when "inspiration" and "revelations" must conform to common-sense and adapt themselves to the intellectual and moral progress of the race, or be disregarded without any particular inquiry as to their source, which is simply saying that human reason is now practically recognized by enlightened people as man's highest and best guide. "Inspiration" will not justify an atrocity to-day; nor will the authority of "revelations," old or new, serve to protect very long an institution which is in conflict with the sentiments and practices of civilization.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S case has assumed another phase. When first elected, it will be remembered, he declined to take the prescribed oath on the ground that he did not recognize the being appealed to in that form. The courts decided that the House could not in his case substitute an affirmation for the oath. Then, Bradlaugh announced his willingness to take the oath, declaring that it would be binding on his conscience. This announcement did not placate his enemies, while it displeased some of his friends. The majority of the members combined to prevent him from doing what a few months previously they had insisted he should do. Then, he was sued for the penalties imposed by law on a man who tries to take his seat in the House without the proper legal qualifications. He lost his case, and appealed. He tried to resume his seat several times, and was finally unceremoniously hustled out by policemen. On the 21st, a motion was made that a writ be issued for a new election; and to this was offered an amendment, to the effect that Bradlaugh be legally disqualified. The attorney-general advised the House not to support these propositions, and both were voted down. Whereupon, Bradlaugh, the despatches state, passed the bar and took a seat. Lord Northcote then moved that Bradlaugh, having disobeyed the chair, and being in contempt of the House, be expelled. The motion was passed by a vote of 291 to 83. Gladstone reiterated that the House had acted beyond its powers in preventing Bradlaugh from taking the oath, but declared that the conduct which furnished the pretext for expulsion was an act of flagrant disobedience. A writ for a new election has been issued, and Bradlaugh will enter the contest for the seat made vacant by his expulsion to-day. He will probably be reelected, and the House of Commons will be likely to hear from him again in the near future. However offensive Bradlaugh is to British respectability, he is illegally and unjustly excluded from his seat as a representative of Northampton, and in this contest our sympathies and wishes are wholly with him.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

The loss of Samuel Johnson will be deeply, if not widely, felt. Those who knew him well, were few, and they wished they knew him better. They who knew him best loved him most. He was a retiring, secluded man, yet social, joyous, mirthful, with a never-failing spring of lively sympathy in him; simple, unambitious, undemonstrative, yet warm, glowing, enthusiastic; celibate, yet brimful of affection. He was poor, and consequently unable to show in the usual way how much charity there was in him. He was inconspicuous in station, and therefore unrecognized by those whose glance takes in only the surface of society. He was delicate in constitution, compelled by apprehensions of ill-health to avoid the strain and excitement of public life, and for that reason, mainly, constrained to keep aloof from cities. He was a devoted servant of truth, and felt that for him the most serviceable field was the quietest. He was a man of genius, impassioned, eloquent; but his genius drove him into seclusion and forced him into the retirement of thought.

Johnson was a man of profound convictions, and the root of all his convictions was faith in the spiritual nature and capacities of man. As unlike Channing as one man can be unlike another, he nevertheless took up, carried out, interpreted, legitimated, applied the ideas which distinguished Channing in the discerning eyes of his generation. He was an abolitionist in the grain, a Transcendentalist of an ideal type, a humanitarian of a pronounced description; not theological or polemic like Parker, not ethereal like Emerson, but with a depth of feeling, a keenness of penetration, and a serene confidence of heart which neither Emerson nor Parker surpassed. He called himself a "fideist," or believer in faith; and to be long in his company was to see that no other phrase described him.

But his belief in individuality was no less absolute than his belief in ideas. He had faith in personal power. All power was personal at last, he thought: what, then, was the use of disguising it under the shows of organization? He distrusted all efforts at combined action, even for the furtherance of causes he had most at heart. Hence, though a fervent abolitionist, he would not fight slavery under that banner; though a Northern man to the core, an eloquent preacher of New England ethics, he made no war speeches; a Free Religionist of the noblest style, he never joined the Free Religious Association; a Unitarian by persuasion, he would preach in no sectarian church; a theist, he made his own definition; an idealist, he stood by his own statement; even as a scholar, he put an impress of his own on the facts of literature. His one stubbornness was in his refusal to be classified. To no sect, school, party, would he consent to belong. He might not stand for much in his own estimation, but such individuality as he possessed was his own; it was sacred; it must not be compromised. On this point, he was earnest and eloquent as well in speech as in writing: he maintained his position against some of his oldest and dearest friends, and with that most unanswerable of arguments, a consistent, laborious, consecrated life, dedicated to the fullest expression of his personal character.

They whose privilege it was to enjoy Mr. Johnson's ministry in Lynn will never forget the rapt fervor of his prayers, the passionate glow of his eloquence, the noble beauty of his countenance, the magnificent sweep of his thought, the friendly warmth of his sympathy in hours of affliction, the hopefulness of all his ministrations, private as well as public.

They whose greater privilege it was to know him in the familiar intercourse of daily life will cherish the memory of him as one of those constant, gentle, immutable spirits whose influence is as lasting as it is gracious. His scholarship, at once profound and accurate, distinguished as it was and recognized as it will be, was, after all, his least contribution to the faith in which and for which he lived. The cause of human emancipation from dogmatic trammels of every kind, the cause of spiritual freedom, by whatever name designated, had no more faithful friend than he.

Mr. Johnson more than once visited Europe, but each time, unless my memory deceives me, in search of health. The Old World had few charms for so hearty an American, so thorough-going an idealist. He had little delight in travel; and, so long as books supplied him with all he wanted to know, he preferred staying at home and reading them. To what purpose he read them, and what noble use he made of them, we all know. He was a lover of nature, for there was much of the poet in his temperament; and the travel he liked best was a foot journey among the Berkshire hills or the Vermont mountains. He enjoyed his life as few men do. Very few indeed add so much as he did to the life of others.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

STATE SECULARIZATION.

In reply to certain recent comments of The Index on the aims and work of the "National Reform Association," the Christian Statesman says: "This movement seeks such an amendment of the National Constitution as 'shall indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all the Christian laws, institutions, and usages of the government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.' In its authorized form of memorial to Congress, it suggests that this end would be reached by an amendment of the preamble 'acknowledging Almighty God as the source of power and authority of civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority.' We presume all these statements are equally offensive to The Index. But we affirm that they are all first principles in political science, when regarded from a Christian point of view."

To this, we have to say, first, that even from "a Christian point of view" the propositions contained in the proposed constitutional amendment will not be universally accepted. The "Christian point of view," when it comes to enacting theology into the supreme law of the land, will not be found a unit, as the Christian Statesman appears naively to imagine. Properly speaking, only Trinitarian Christians or Arian Unitarians (a type of Unitarians not now numerous), can consistently accept the second clause of this amendment,—the recognizing of "the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations." Now, the Unitarians may be a small body compared with the great evangelical denominations of the country; but they are too important a body, and by their culture, moral standing, wealth, public spirit, and philanthropy, have contributed too much to the country's welfare to be thrust aside and prevented from holding any office which requires an oath to support the Constitution. We do not believe that this country can ever be brought to see it as one of the "first principles in political science" to put into the Constitution a theological clause which, if conscientiously heeded, would have prevented Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams and Abraham Lincoln and probably James A. Garfield from occupying the presidential office, have kept Charles Sumner out of the United States Senate, and removed from Congress a number of the most useful members now in it. Nor would the amending third clause pass the catechism of the different Christian sects any better, if as well. There would at first be a pretty general inquiry as to what it means. And when the "National Reform Association" should give its answer, as it does, that by "His revealed will as supreme authority" is meant "the Bible," not to speak of demurrers to this doctrine from certain liberal Christian bodies, the whole membership of the Catholic Church would at once unite in saying: "We cannot accept that. To us, 'His revealed will' is not the Bible alone, but the Bible and tradition; the 'tradition' being interpreted by the present supreme authority of the Church as represented in the Pope." It is therefore not going to be so easy to settle practically "the first principles in political science, when regarded from a Christian point of view," as the Christian Statesman seems to think. "The Christian point of view" is a shifting one, according to the sect from which one looks.

But, secondly, we have to reply to the Christian Statesman that, from our point of view, one of "the first principles in political science" is justice. This is especially one of the chief principles of the political science which it has been attempted to apply to practical government in this country. The amendment to the Constitution which the "National Reform Association" is working for is a gross injustice to a very large portion of the citizenship of the country. Not only does it go counter to the religious convictions of many Christian believers, but it directly violates the equally conscientious convictions on religious matters of the still larger body of non-Christian citizens. By what right could any majority of citizens of this country—could they agree upon the phrases—put their theological beliefs into the national Constitution, against the protests of the minority, seeing that all citizens have an equal interest in the Constitution and are equally called upon to support and defend it? What would become of the boasted equality of our government with regard to freedom of religious belief, were such a retrograde amendment to be effected? It has been the pride of our nation that it has offered here a free asylum to the oppressed of all lands. It has asked no questions concerning their religious faith. Whether they were Catholics or Protestant Huguenots or Jews, they have been welcomed to the broad acres of the country, received the equal protection of the Constitution, and only been asked to live at peace with each other. Shall the nation now turn about and put into its Constitution a creed that will be an insult to every Jew in the land and a practical abridgment of their rights as citizens? Here, too, is a large section of citizens who have been born and bred in this land, born and bred under the Christian creed, but to whom that creed is true no longer. They are law-abiding, intelligent, patriotic, virtuous citizens. They have an inheritance in the national traditions and institutions which they honor and cherish. Perhaps the blood of the country's first settlers is in their veins, and they and their ancestors have been found on the side of the country's defenders in all its struggles. But, because in the exercise of the right of free thought which the national institutions guaranteed to them they have been compelled to abandon the creed of their forefathers, it is now seriously proposed by those working for this theological constitutional amendment to denationalize them; to make the Constitution such that they can no longer conscientiously support or defend it or hold office under it. We are confident that the people of this country will not follow the teachers of this new "political science" in very large numbers, but will see to it that common justice be made arbitrator on all conflicting claims to political recognition among religious beliefs, and that the party of this so-called National Reform be kept healthfully small.

In the third place, we have no fears that the nation will become what the Christian Statesman calls "godless" and "irreligious," if this amendment is not made and the national Constitution consequently remains what it has thus far been,—a purely secular instrument,—or even if the administration of the government become entirely secular by the abolition of those scanty traditional formalities of religious service that still survive in the domain of the State. If this nation is in danger of becoming "irreligious," it will not be saved from such a doom by putting a few phrases of evangelical theology, or all the "five points" of Calvin, into its Constitution. Nor, on the other hand, though its government be secular, is a people necessarily irreligious. According to the theory of this nation, the home and the Church can be trusted to take care of religion; and, if they do not take care of it, any fostering that the government can give it is in vain. The kind of religion that this country would be the better for having in its governmental affairs is not that which takes the form of theological profession nor of official prayers and Bible-readings, but that which has already crystallized into integrity and purity and nobility of character. We want men in the legislative halls and in the executive offices who will be servants of their country rather than of self; who will be impervious to any bribes addressed either to their avarice or their ambition; who care more for truth and justice than for any partisan advantage; who, besides being intellectually competent, are of clean reputation in both public and private life. The Index will join a "Reform Association" for putting religion into government by electing only such men to office.

THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH IN RELATION TO REFORM IN ENGLAND.

Closely allied to the English land question is the question of the Established Church. The ancient political order of England rests mainly on the two pillars of the land and the Church. Both systems are peculiar to England, just as constitutional monarchy is. It would be as impossible to acclimatize the English land system or the Established Church in any other country as it has been found to acclimatize the curious fiction of constitutional monarchy. All three are special English products, the outcome of a singular and unique political and social development. Monarchy and aristocracy are both intimately related to the Anglican Church, depending largely upon it for their own existence. The Anglican Church is really in no real sense a religious organization. It is not religious or Christian incidentally: its main characteristic is that it is a social institution, pledged to maintain the monarchical and aristocratic traditions of England. As such, it holds an enormous amount of public property, absorbs no small quantity of the cultivated land of the country, has its representatives in the ancient hereditary chamber, and associates itself with the person and office of the sovereign. The majority of its clergy have generally been taken from the upper classes of English society, and have used their office in order to promote the interests of these classes. They have, as a body, opposed, and they still oppose, every onward step in the direction of emancipation, and the substitution of the republic for the class government which, spite of all her progress, still obtains in England. The Established Church, therefore, trains the people in habits which would be considered by Americans as servile and as inconsistent with self-respect and human dignity. Accordingly, we find in the Anglican Catechism that young people are enjoined to be obedient to their "spiritual pastors and masters," and to "labor faithfully to do their duty in that station of life to which it has pleased God to call them." The constant, underlying assumption of the teaching of the Anglican clergy is that there is not only a divine order of society (which others besides themselves would be willing to admit), but that that order is identical with the peculiar social structure which happens to exist in England. I do not know that this Anglican teaching has ever been better summarized than in the satirical lines of Charles Dickens:—

"Oh! let us love our occupations,
Bless the squire and his relations,
Live upon our daily rations,
And always know our proper stations."

This is the kind of teaching which, coming for generations from the Anglican pulpits, has produced the dull, animal, boorish existence of the English rural districts. The squire and the parson have united to rule the parish, and the humbler denizens have been supposed to be perfectly contented and happy under such a "mild, paternal sway." The towns of England have been saved from this slough of mental and material stagnation, partly by the inherent vitality of town life, partly by the growth of dissent from the Established Church, and partly by the immense development of modern industry. The Established Church, therefore, has long since lost its hold over the majority of English towns, and in most of the manufacturing districts is in a dismal minority. But now it is slowly but surely losing ground in the rural districts also, and this is the beginning of the end. Of course, the fate of the old aristocratic régime in the rural districts was practically sealed, when the railway-train came to break in on the slumbers of generations. An aristocratic society cannot hold its own in the face of these great inventions of modern science which bring men together, enable them to see the world, distribute more freely among them the resources and products of civilization, and break down the already yielding traditions of the past. The English aristocracy, guided by that sure instinct which rarely deserts them, opposed the introduction of railways, foreseeing the work they were destined to accomplish. Since that great revolution in society, even English laborers have been enabled to travel, to see something of the world, to seek new employments, and to emerge from the little sphere controlled by the local deities, squire and parson. Then, emigration came to assist the work of the railways, and dull clowns in distant villages heard of great, new lands beyond the seas, which offered unbounded opportunities to those whose horizon had been so narrow before.

Then, still more recently, rose the movement among the agricultural laborers for their own emancipation. Begun ten years ago, this movement has encountered great obstacles both from without and from within,—the hostility of other classes and the petty jealousies and bickerings always found among ignorant people just awakened from serfdom. The outcome of the movement, however, is that a spirit of discontent, the sure prelude to higher things, has spread among the laborers. They are no longer satisfied with their "divinely appointed" lot. Now, this movement was resisted most energetically by the "spiritual pastors and masters" of the aforesaid laborers. Bishops, priests, and deacons all fulminated against the "presumption" and the "insolence" of the agitating upstarts. The consequence of this has been that the Established Church, which might have guided the new emancipating movement, has arrayed against her the great bulk of the rural laborers of England. These persons will soon obtain the suffrage, and then the Established Church will be attacked in her rural strongholds with such force and vigor as have not been known heretofore. The rural laborers will unite with the working men in the towns in hostility to the Established Church. In my next paper, I shall treat of other forces operating in the same direction.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTIONISTS.

It is not generally clearly understood what the Russian revolutionists demand. Their enemies find it advantageous to ascribe to them the most ridiculous programme: destruction, destruction of everything, of the State, of the Church, of the family, of property, of morality. But people seldom stake their all, their liberty, their life, for the sake of pure destruction. Nothing but the power of positive ideas could cope so successfully with the terrible power of Russian autocracy. I say successfully, for no milder name than defeat can I find for the manner in which Alexander III. is conducting the struggle with his foes. At the head of an army of one million men, with billions of roubles behind him, he has to hide himself like a little boy chased by a dog. So scandalous is this side of the mighty emperor's life that the clergy, through one of their metropolitan representatives, felt called upon to remind him that the anointed of the Lord, the "father of his people," is conducting himself, in playing hide and seek with his "dear children," in a manner more consistent with the character of Falstaff than with that of a Russian Emperor. That the metropolitan in question was sent to the Monastery of Solovetsk "for repentance" does not in the least lessen the effect of the victory which the revolutionists have scored. What the ideas are by which they accomplished this miracle will be found in the following proclamation which the Executive Committee issued soon after the assassination of his father to Alexander III. It is translated from the Russian text in my possession. I am not aware that it has ever appeared in any American paper in full. The New York Herald reprinted passages from it, giving it, however, as entire,—a proceeding unjustifiable, not only from a moral point of view, but also from a business point of view, since it was not accurate "news." Moreover, the stitching together of several unconnected passages, without stating that this was not the entire document, did the Russian revolutionists great injustice, since, of necessity, a different impression was produced from what was intended.

The document itself, given as it is here in full, is worth studying, both for its dignity in tone as well as its eloquence. "You have lost a father," the committee exclaims to the emperor, "but we have lost not only fathers, but also brothers, wives, children, and dear friends!" But let the committee speak for itself.

JOHN NICHOLSON MASTERS.

The Executive Committee to Alexander the Third.

YOUR MAJESTY,—Fully aware of the grief by which you are at present weighed down, the Executive Committee, nevertheless, does not feel at liberty to yield to a feeling of natural delicacy, which would perhaps dictate that it choose a more opportune moment for the following statement. There is something higher than the most appropriate feelings of man,—the duty toward one's country, a duty to which a citizen must sacrifice himself, his feelings, and even the feelings of others. In obedience to this duty, we have decided to address you forthwith, without delay, since but little delay is to be found in that political process which threatens us in the new future with floods of blood and earthquake-like shocks.

The bloody tragedy enacted on the Yekaterininsky Canal* was not an accident, and took no one by surprise. After all that has passed during the last ten years, it appeared inevitable; and herein consists its deep significance, which should be properly recognized by the man whom fate has placed at the head of the State. Only men incapable of analyzing the life of nations can characterize similar facts as crimes committed by individuals or by a "gang." Notwithstanding the most severe persecution; notwithstanding that the government of the late emperor sacrificed everything, the liberty and interests of all classes, of trade, and even the interests of its own dignity, in order to stamp out the spirit of revolution,—notwithstanding all this, we have witnessed in Russia, during the last ten years, that movement spreading, attracting to itself the best elements of society, the most energetic and self-sacrificing men of the country; and we see it engaged for the last three years in desperate partisan warfare with the government. Your Majesty knows that the government of the late emperor cannot be accused of want of energy. Both innocent and guilty were hanged. Our prisons and distant provinces teemed with exiles. Scores of so-called ring-leaders were caught and hanged. They perished with the stoicism and resignation of martyrs, but the movement did not cease. Without intermission, it grew and thrived. Yes, Your Majesty, the revolutionary movement is not such as to depend on the exertion of any one individual. It is a process of the national organism, and the gibbet erected for the most energetic exponents of this process is as powerless to save the old order of things as the crucifixion of our Saviour was powerless to save a corrupt world of the ancients from the triumph of reforming Christianity.

The government may, of course, yet seize and hang many a single individual. It may break up a large number of separate revolutionary groups. We grant even that it may break up the most powerful of the present revolutionary organizations. All this, however, does not change in the least the true state of affairs. Revolutionists are created by the circumstances of Russia, by the universal discontent of the people, by the longing of our country for new forms of public life. The whole nation you cannot uproot any more than its discontent can be uprooted by repressive measures. On the contrary, through repression discontent only grows. Hence, it comes that the gaps left by those made harmless are constantly filled up by new workers, coming forth from the midst of the people in ever greater numbers, ever more embittered, ever more energetic. These new workers for the interest of the cause will of course organize, richer now, however, by the experience of their predecessors. Hence, the revolutionary organization must in time gain strength, not only of members, but also of character,—a supposition verified, alas! but too strikingly by the experience of the last ten years. What has the government gained by the execution of the followers of Dolgashin and Tshaikof, the leading spirits of the movement of 1874? They were replaced by popular champions of a still more determined type. The terrible reprisals of the government called forth the terrorists of 1878-79. In vain the government executed Kovalsky, Dubrovin, Ossinsky, Lizogub. Fruitless also was the extirpation of scores of revolutionary societies. Out of these imperfect organizations sprang into existence more vigorous political bodies, by the process of natural selection. At last, the Executive Committee made its appearance,—a body with which the government has not yet to this day been able to cope with any success.

From an impartial survey of the last ten years, with its memories of oppression, the farther progress of the movement may be accurately foretold, unless the policy of the government undergoes a change. The movement must grow, its followers must increase, deeds stamped with the character of terrorism must repeat themselves more strikingly. In place of the dispersed fractions, the revolutionary organization must bring into the field new groups under forms growing ever more perfect. The general number of the disaffected throughout the country shows constant increase. Popular confidence in the government must diminish more and more. The idea of revolution, of its possibility and certain advent, will become more and more developed in Russia. A terrible outburst of a sanguinary conflict and a revolutionary convulsion of the whole of Russia will complete the process of the destruction of the old edifice.

Whence this dreadful perspective? Yes, Your Majesty, sad and gloomy is the outlook. Deem it not an empty phrase! Better than any one else we can understand how sad is the ruin of so much talent, the waste of so much energy bent upon destruction, engaged in bloody struggle, when these blessings, under other conditions, could have been devoted to the task of building up rather than pulling down, to the task of educating the people, increasing its welfare, developing its social life. Whence this melancholy necessity of such a bloody contest? From this, Your Majesty, because at present we have no government in the true sense of the word. A true government should represent only the aspirations of the people and only realize the national will. In Russia, however,—forgive the expression,—the government has degenerated into a pure camarilla, and deserves the name of a usurping gang, much more than does the Executive Committee. Be the intentions of the emperor what they may, the acts of the government have nothing in common with the requirements and aspirations of the people. The imperial government subjected the people to serfage, and handed them over to the mercy of the nobles. At present, it openly encourages the growth of a most dangerous class of speculators and extortioners. All its reforms tend solely to the further enslavement and spoliation of the people. It has reduced the masses of the Russian people to complete beggary and ruin. The eye of the spy follows every one even to his domestic hearth, nor is any man allowed to discuss even local communal wants. The spoiler and social vampire alone enjoy the protection of the law and of the government. The most flagrant frauds remain unpunished. On the other hand, what a dreadful fate awaits the man who has the public weal at heart! Your Majesty knows very well that it is not socialists alone who are persecuted and exiled. What, then, is a government that protects such an "order of things"? Is it not a gang? Surely, is it not a manifestation of complete usurpation?

Hence, it comes that the Russian government has no moral influence over the people, and finds no popular support. This is why Russia produces so many revolutionists, this is why even such a deed as regicide is hailed with no other feelings than those of joy and sympathy by an enormous portion of the population! Yes, Your Majesty, do not deceive yourself by the reports of flatterers and minions. Regicide in Russia is very popular.

There are only two ways out of such a state of things,—either revolution, utterly unavoidable, which cannot be averted by executions, however frequent, or the voluntary giving up of the supreme power to the people. For the sake of our country, for the sake of preventing the loss of so much valuable force, for the sake of sparing Russia those terrible misfortunes which always accompany revolution, the Executive Committee addresses itself to Your Majesty with the advice of choosing the second way. Be assured that as soon as the supreme power ceases to be arbitrary, as soon as it firmly decides to realize only the demands of national will and conscience, you can boldly drive away the pack of spies which are a disgrace to the government. You can boldly send away your body-guards to their barracks, and burn the gibbets which demoralize the nation. The Executive Committee itself will stop its work; and the forces organized about it will disperse, in order to devote themselves to the education of the people. A peaceful, intellectual contest will then take the place of violence, which is no less distasteful to us than it is to your myrmidons, and to which we have recourse only from sad necessity.

We appeal to Your Majesty, divesting ourselves of all prejudice and suppressing all mistrust which the policy of the government from past ages has generated. We forget that you are the representative of that power which has so long deceived the people and caused it so much injury. We address ourselves to you as to a citizen and an honest man. We hope that the feeling of personal enmity will not deaden in you the consciousness of your duties and a desire to learn the truth. We also have cause for animosity. You have lost a father, but we have lost not only fathers, but also brothers, wives, children, and dear friends. Still, we are ready to stifle our personal feelings for the welfare of Russia. We expect the same from you.

We do not bind you to any conditions. Let our proposal not shock you. The conditions necessary for replacing the revolutionary movement by peaceful efforts have not been created by ourselves, but by history. We do not propound them, but only remind you of them.

These conditions, in our opinion, are two:—

1. General amnesty for all political offenders of the past, inasmuch as they were not guilty of any crime, but only fulfilled the duty of citizens.

2. The convocation of representatives of the whole Russian people for the revision of existing forms of government and social life, and their reconstruction in accordance with the desires of the people.

We consider it necessary, however, to remind you that the legalization of the supreme authority by the popular representatives can only be effected when the elections are entirely unhampered. The elections therefore must be made under the following conditions:—

1. Deputations should be summoned from all classes of the people without distinction, and in proportion to the number of inhabitants.

2. No limitations should be made as regards the rights of electors or of deputies.

3. Elections, and the contest for them, must be carried on entirely unhampered; and therefore the government should grant as a temporary measure, and until a decision of the National Assembly can be obtained, the following:—

a. Complete liberty of the press.

b. Complete liberty of speech.

c. Complete liberty of public meeting.

d. Complete liberty of electoral programmes.

These are the only means for directing Russia in the path of peaceful and regular development. We solemnly declare, in the face of our country and of the whole world, that our party will, so far as it is concerned, unconditionally conform to the decision of the National Assembly, elected with the observance of the above conditions, and will have no recourse in the future to any violent proceedings against the government sanctioned by the National Assembly.

And so, Your Majesty, decide. Two roads are before you. On you depends the choice. We can only pray the Fates that your reason and conscience should dictate to you the only decision which is consistent with the welfare of Russia and with your own dignity and duty toward our fatherland.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, 10th March, 1881.
[Press of "The Will of the People," 12th March, 1881.]

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

WE have heard the remark, and our own experience would confirm it, that the society of Quakers is an excellent denomination to graduate from. Certainly, Quakerism has furnished valuable members for other denominations, and especially for those of liberal and humanitarian tendencies. But Methodism appears now to be educating classes for graduation with a good deal of regularity. The Methodist, a New York journal of the denomination, counts up nine prominent ministers of other sects in that city who were formerly Methodist preachers. And it adds:—

The number could be much more than duplicated by extending our inquiry to other cities. For some cause, our sister denominations have a liking for ministers who have served their novitiates in our ranks; and, somehow, they succeed, in not a few cases, in getting what they desire.

Apropos of this, we may add that a Methodist minister, Rev. Mr. Cowl, a friend of Mr. George C. Miln, has just gone by solicitation of Mr. Miln, from a Methodist pulpit in Pennsylvania to the pulpit of the Third Unitarian Church in Chicago.

THE Jews who have been so cruelly treated in Russia are beginning to arrive in this country. Three hundred and twenty-five landed from one steamer in Philadelphia last week. Every effort was made by the citizens through committees to minister to their comfort. Of course, however, the "National Reform Association," which has its head-quarters in that city, will take an early opportunity to disabuse these unfortunate refugees of any idea they may entertain of having equal political rights in this country with Christians. Of the inhuman treatment to which the Jews have been subjected in Russia, the Christian Union well says:—

tised upon the Russian Jews, of which a synopsis was given in the Christian Union last week, with a feeling of uncertainty whether we are living in the nineteenth century or the fifteenth. The spectacle of one hundred thousand families driven from their homes, pillaged, beaten, outraged, killed, for no cause but that they have been successful in business where their neighbors have not, finds a parallel only in the history of what we have been pleased to call the dark ages. In the gloomy picture there is but a single ray of light: that, whereas four hundred years ago the world looked on and laughed at the bating of a Jew, now it frowns its angry disapproval. The notion that Christians are appointed to execute divine vengeance on the Jew is less prevalent than it was. People are ridding themselves of the superstition that what he has suffered is only a just penalty for his sins, and that in point of fact his cup of retribution still remains to be filled. The indignation meetings recently held in London and New York are even more significant signs of the times than the persecution itself. If Russia remains in mediæval barbarism, England and America have at least moved forward.

REFERRING to a notice of the book Ecce Spiritus in our columns, the Two Worlds says:—

"Whoever its author, evidently it wrote itself!" This is the statement of The Index in regard to a book it recently reviewed. It has thus, in the last three words, made a simple statement of the great fact of inspiration. All true poems, books, orations, pictures, and statues make themselves, in the sense that they originate from a source beyond their ostensible authors. And we thank The Index for this recognition of the fact we would teach, line upon line, that inspiration is universal,—it is life.

This is a specimen of a kind of argument we frequently see in spiritualistic papers, by which they seek to turn statements of general truths made by others into an indorsement of their special belief. Of course, a person may be so possessed by a thought, whether it be the idea of a poem, a picture, or a philosophy,—may be so thoroughly imbued with it,—that it will seem to work through and use his brain rather than that his brain works to find it, and then to give expression to it. But this is a very different thing from saying that the brain in such a case is a mere passive, will-less organism, which external spirits from some other sphere take possession of and use for the utterance of their own thoughts. Why not allow these mundane workers, poets, artists, great preachers and writers, to be as original as the supermundane spirits? Or, to push the question further back, whence have the alleged inspiring spirits their inspiration? With the general statement that "inspiration is life," we should not be disposed to quarrel; but we recognize the "life" all along the line wherever there is organism.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

MEMBERS of the Free Religious Association, who recollect that the last annual meeting voted that there should be a "midwinter conference" of the Association, are perhaps wondering by what almanac said conference is to be held. The meeting was to be dependent on the receipt of certain reports, and for that and other reasons has been necessarily delayed. But it will probably occur toward the middle of the present month, and due notice will be given of it in Boston daily papers.

W. J. P.

At the Unitarian church in Lynn last Sunday, of which Rev. S. B. Stewart is minister, the service was made specially memorial of Samuel Johnson. A good many of the members of the society in Lynn, of which Mr. Johnson was minister for seventeen years, now attend Mr. Stewart's church. We shall print next week the discourse which Mr. Stewart gave at the service last Sunday, and which greatly satisfied Mr. Johnson's friends.

PETITIONS to the British Parliament in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh's taking his seat are pouring into London from all parts of the kingdom. To the petitions now sent in, nearly one hundred and fifty thousand signatures are already appended.

ALASKA, with only three hundred and sixty white settlers in the territory, is asking for a governor and legislature; but, as this would be too expensive a plan for so thinly settled a country, the government proposes instead to establish in Alaska a small branch of the Oregon courts, which shall sit each year a sufficient length of time to attend to the criminal and civil business of the territory, and over which the Supreme Court of Oregon shall have appellate jurisdiction.

It is declared that since the abolition of the death penalty as a punishment for murder in the first degree in Maine, the number of murders in that State has largely increased. The Attorney-General of Maine has made a report, in which he says the number of convictions for murder the last year exceeds the number of convictions during the three years preceding the abolition of the death penalty. He recommends that the old form of punishment be restored. Whether murders are less numerous in those States where hanging follows conviction is a matter of dispute. The frequency of atrocious crimes and their increase in some States render the treatment of criminals and the different measures for preventing crime a subject of the greatest importance, and it ought to receive the serious consideration of Philanthropists and Legislatures.

PROF. DAVID SWING says: "The 'revised Testament' is an unimportant event, compared with the revised creeds which have been appearing far in advance of the improved version of the Bible. These have come as rapidly in the Protestant Church as the world has itself advanced toward a new need. While sorry that the Church has been unable to lead in reform, and to discover first the rights of man, woman, and child, and of dumb brutes, and to find the weak points in its own arguments, we are thankful that it differs from the Roman Church in its willingness to accept all the new worlds which others discover. Unable to originate a telescope, it soon becomes willing to look through one and see into the great star-depths. Unable to produce a Galileo, the modern Church will study well his theories, and not dream of putting the man to death."

"It is only four or five years," writes John Fiske in the North American, "since a learned English bishop completed his voluminous commentary on the Pentateuch, in which the sacred text is handled with as much freedom as Mr. Paley shows in dealing with the Homeric poems or Mr. Grote in expounding the dialogues of Plato. And the history of this, as of other less conspicuous acts of heresy, seems to show that practically an Anglican divine may preach whatever doctrine he likes, provided, doubtless, that he avoid certain obnoxious catch-words. Among Unitarians, this doctrinal latitude is too well known to require any illustration. Yet it is well not to forget that, forty years ago, Theodore Parker was virtually driven out of the Unitarian Church for saying the same sort of things which may be heard to-day from half the Unitarian pulpits in New England."

A NUMBER of Orthodox ministers, in a conference at Chicago last week, indorsed Rev. Herrick Johnson in his attack on the theatres of that city, and appointed a committee to secure the abolition of the Sunday theatre, which was declared to be an "outrage upon Christianity." The view of the conference seemed to be that theatres generally are opposed to religion and morality, and should be opposed. Dr. J. G. Holland, held in high esteem by the religious class, thought differently. In his posthumous work, Every-day Topics, just published, he says:—

It seems to us that the theatre is improving, and that there is much less objectionable in their conduct and influence than formerly. We have been witnesses to the fact that the cleanest and best plays have been most successful. There is undoubtedly an increasing attendance upon the theatre among refined and religious people; and we rejoice in the fact, for it is full of promise for the theatre itself, and for the bodily and mental health of those who are attracted to it. The indiscriminating abuse of the theatres, the attempt to drive good people away from them, is a damage to the cause of morality in any community. The indiscriminating condemnation of actors is a gross and inexcusable injustice; and, where this condemnation comes from a minister of the gospel of charity, what can it do but drive the whole fraternity away from all religious influence and all sense of religious obligations? Life has become so active and overburdened and so full that men go to the theatre to laugh. The one thing they most need is forgetfulness of care in innocent pleasure.

In the installation charge to Mr. Miln, Rev. Brooke Herford said that "these churches of ours have grown up with certain ideas pervading them: they grew up indeed out of the desire to uphold these ideas, believing them to be true. From the main lines of these, which have got us the general name of 'Unitarian,' I do not think there is any likelihood of our going back. That God is one Infinite Life, our Heavenly Father; that Christ, however divine we may hold his mission, is not a God to be worshipped, but a Saviour to be loved and followed; that man is not so much fallen as imperfect; that salvation is not a mere policy of insurance, but actual present growth in righteousness; and that universal salvation, if not a provable dogma, is a legitimate and irresistible hope,—we are not likely to go back from these great thoughts, for the thoughtful men of all churches are tending to them. So that our churches stand for them without hesitation or misgiving. And yet they do not bind themselves or one another to do so. Here comes in our freedom: even to these great thoughts, we give no definite, binding shape. We do not put them in our trust-deeds. We do not ask any member if he believes them, nor make any minister promise to preach them. As a matter of fact, here is about where we are; and we are here pretty strongly and unmistakably." "Here comes in our freedom." Mr. Miln in the honesty of his heart attempted to exercise this "freedom" and the result is known. Mr. Herford's words, fairly construed, seem to mean about this, "pretty strongly and unmistakably": We, the conservative Unitarians, have certain theological views. Our Church stands for these views. We preach them, and expect our ministers will uphold them. But there are thousands of thoughtful, earnest people who do not share these views with us. Many of our ministers, and a large proportion of the members and supporters of our churches, are doubtful regarding some of these doctrines. We wish to retain this heterodox element. We will not therefore formulate our views into a creed, nor will we ask any member to believe or any minister to preach them. "Here comes in our freedom"; but if any man comes among us, attracted by this promise of liberty, and ventures to express, in clear and unambiguous language, his doubts in regard to the soundness of our views, he will soon find out where the Unitarians, as an organization, stand, and he will learn that he cannot be one of our ministers. Meantime, we shall continue to preach old-fashioned Unitarianism "pretty strongly and unmistakably." But understand we have no creed. We ask no questions of minister or member as to his belief. "Here comes in our freedom."

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 2, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

POETRY.

PHILOSOPHY'S ASPIRATION.

We think, we feel, we are;
And light, as of a star,
Groups through the mist,—a little light is given;
And aye from life and death
We strive, with indrawn breath,
To somehow wrest the truth, and long have striven,
Nor pause, though book and star and clod
Reply, "Canst thou by searching find out God?"

As from the hollow deep
The soul's strong tide must keep
Its purpose still. We rest not, though we hear
No voice from heaven let fall,
Or chant antiphonal
Sounding through sunlit clefts that open near;
We look not outward, but within,
And think not quite to end as we begin.

For now the questioning age
Cries to each hermitage,
Cease not to ask,—or bring again the time
When the young world's belief
Made light the mourner's grief
And strong the sage's word, the poet's rhyme,
Ere knowledge thrust a spear-head through
The temple's veil that priests so closely drew.

From what our fate inurns
Save that which music yearns
To speak, in ecstasy none understand,
And (oh, how like to it!)
The half-formed rays that flit,
Like memories vague, above the further land,
Cry, as the star-led Magi cried,
"We seek, we seek, we will not be denied!"

Let the blind throng await
A healer at the gate:
Our hearts press on to see what yonder lies,
Knowing that arch on arch
Shall loom across the march
And over portals gained new strongholds rise.
The search itself a glory brings,
Though foiled so oft, that seeks the soul of things.

Some grave discovery,
Howbeit in vain we try
To clutch the shape that lures us evermore,
It shall be ours to make,—
As, when the waters break
Upon the margin of a pathless shore,
They find, who sought for gold alone,
The sudden wonders of a clime unknown.

Such treasure by the way
Your errantry shall pay.
For shall it aught against your hope prevail
That not to waking eyes
The golden clouds arise
Wherewith our visions clothe the mystic grail,
When in blithe halts upon the road
We sleep where pilgrims earlier gone abode.

BIRTH AND BREEDING.

BY F. M. HOLLAND.

Several years of special study of the parentage, education, and habits of men and women noted for genius, virtue, or vice, have led me to results which I present as approximations to the truth.

These I gained partly by investigating the lives of nearly seven hundred men and women, most of whom I found mentioned in order in the biographical section of the subject-catalogue of the Harvard College Library, and almost all of whom were born after 1700, and partly from collecting the facts given in Dugdale's Jukes, Galton's Hereditary Genius, the Newgate Calendar, Duyckinck's Cyclopaedia, Brown's History of the American Stage, Mrs. Hale's Woman's Record, Regli's Dizionario Biografico dei Poeti et Artisti, Feuerbach's Merkwürdige Criminal-Rechtsfälle, North's History of Augusta, Me., and a number of smaller works.

I. The point I examined most carefully was the comparative influence of fathers and mothers. I found nearly fifteen hundred cases in which peculiarities of character or ability seemed to be inherited from one parent rather than the other. Among these there were eight hundred and thirty-two instances of the son's genius coming from the father rather than the mother, and only sixty-five of its coming from the mother rather than the father,—a difference of about thirteen to one. This disproportion is partly due to omissions of cases of female influence, but I do not think that it is wholly caused thus; for all the collections of biographies give similar results, even in those books in which women receive most attention. This is particularly true of Regli's Dizionario Biografico, which mentions forty-three cases in which genius seems to be transmitted mainly through the fathers, and but one of apparent derivation from the mother. Brown, too, in his History of the Stage, gives the parentage of three times as many actresses as actors, but only one instance of mainly maternal influence to fourteen where it seemed principally paternal. And Mrs. Hale, who is so anxious to have women receive all due honor that she gives the same author two separate articles, in which her name and the titles of her books are spelled with slight variations, records but six cases of gifted mothers who were the sole transmitters of ability to their sons. Among other great men who had distinguished fathers and obscure mothers may be mentioned Charlemagne, Dante, Raphael, Galileo, Milton, Mozart, Pitt, and John Stuart Mill. Examining cases in which the children and both parents are known to me personally, I found fourteen boys who are more like their fathers than their mothers mentally, and ten instances of the reverse. Among men remarkable for goodness, seventy-four appeared to be influenced mainly by their fathers and thirty-two by their mothers, the disproportion exceeding two to one. Forty of these men were ministers, giving thirty-two cases of paternal and eight of maternal influence, four to one. I also found eighteen instances in which it was the father and son who were notoriously wicked, and fourteen in which it was mother and son. In all there are nine hundred and thirty-eight cases of the sons being influenced in either character or ability by the father rather than the mother, and one hundred and twenty-one in which the influence is mainly maternal. If more was known about the mothers, this disproportion would not appear so great: still, it would, I think, be great enough to show that the gifted and saintly mother theory rests mainly on courtesy.

The women seemed, in three hundred and forty cases, to have inherited ability mainly from the father, and in fifty-six from the mother, a ratio of six to one, though half of the instances were from books written in praise of female genius. Moreover, I found that, of thirty-one girls whose parents were personally known to me, nineteen took after the father rather than the mother, while but twelve showed the preponderance of maternal influence. The books also give forty cases in which moral influence seemed to come from the father, and thirty-five in which it was rather from the mother. Of the father's superior influence, either mental or moral, over the daughter, there are thus three hundred and ninety-nine cases, and of the mother's one hundred and three.

of the son or daughter is thus thirteen hundred and thirty-seven, and of maternal two hundred and twenty-four. The latter is probably incompletely recorded, so that in reality the father's influence is not on the average six times as strong as the mother's. Still, we can easily believe it to be somewhat greater, when we remember how sadly women have been repressed through denial of thorough education, exclusion from learned professions and public office, social pressure against their thinking, and speaking even as freely as men have done, and other forms of oppression. This restraint has been much greater intellectually than morally; and hence the greater power of the mother to influence the child's morals than its mind, as indicated by my statistics. The fact of such repression, as well as of the superior authority given to the father by law and public opinion, together with the comparative failure—mentioned by Galton and confirmed by my own investigations—of women of genius to marry, justifies the belief that the mother's influence really is, on the average, inferior to the father's, especially over the boys.

II. No account has been taken in the previous section of cases of inheritance of genius from both parents; for instance, Alexander, Bacon, Goethe, and Napoleon Bonaparte. Sons of clergymen and church members are peculiarly likely to enter the ministry. There are also particularly strong tendencies to inherit idiocy, pauperism, and crime, especially licentiousness and intemperance. In examining the pedigrees of nearly one thousand paupers and criminals in Dugdale's Jukes, I found that when both parents were vicious four-fifths of the children were known to be like them, and scarcely any appear to be much better. One-half of the women were licentious. And Mr. Dugdale says that "hereditary pauperism seemed to be even more firmly fixed than hereditary crime." Dr. Thomson, for many years resident surgeon in a Scottish prison, holds that, "in by far the greatest proportion of offences, crime is hereditary," and therefore "it is intractable in the highest degree." (Journal of Mental Science, January, 1870, vol. xv., pp. 487-498.) It is of course difficult to distinguish the effects of education from those of parental influence after birth. The most instructive cases are those of children who were removed early from vicious parents and brought up in virtuous and enlightened families. Such children almost invariably turn out better than their parents. At first, they usually show no particularly bad traits; but, as growth matures, the parental character frequently shows itself, though in a much mitigated form.

The tendency of the child to resemble the parents does not, however, seem sufficiently constant to be called a law. Less than one hundred and forty of the thousand men and women of ability mentioned in Galton's Inherited Genius had gifted parents, and less than four hundred had any relatives with much mental power; so that about two-thirds showed no signs of inheritance of intellect. I found, in comparing two hundred and nineteen men and women of high ability with two hundred and ninety-two who did not rise above mediocrity, that five times as large a part of the former as of the latter had both fathers and mothers with intellectual gifts and tastes; but I found also that at least forty per cent. of these able people were not of remarkable parentage. Among instances of genius which does not appear to have been inherited are Julius Caesar, Shakespeare, Peter the Great, Frederick the Great, Maria Theresa, George Sand, Jackson, Cavour, Garibaldi, and Lincoln. Brothers and sisters, even twins, are often found to differ so widely as to show great irregularity of parental influence.

III. Among wholly unexpected discoveries was that the larger the number of brothers and sisters, the greater seems to be the probability that some will become highly virtuous. Dividing four hundred and seven of the people whom I studied most carefully into four groups, according to differences in ability as well as in character, I found that the virtuous men and women had, on the average, fifty per cent. more brothers and sisters than the vicious of corresponding ability. North's History of Augusta, Me., gives all the children in three hundred and twelve families, twenty of which contained a son noted for moral worth, and these twenty families averaged almost exactly eight brothers and sisters, the number in more than one-half exceeding nine; while the other two hundred and ninety-two averaged less than six, the number in less than one-fifth exceeding nine. Among the people of low ability and character, whom Dugdale calls the Jukes, I found that the comparatively virtuous families averaged six and two-thirds children, while the more vicious averaged five and two-thirds. I presume that the intercourse of brothers and sisters has a tendency to develop sympathy, and thus promote the growth of conscience.

IV. Similar results might be expected from the meeting together of children in our schools; but the moral value of these institutions has been so decried by Herbert Spencer in Social Statics, and also by Richard Grant White in the North American Review for December, 1880, that the question needs careful study.

Spencer relies mainly on Joseph Fletcher, an eminent British specialist, who, more than thirty years ago, contributed to the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth volumes of the Journal of the London Statistical Society three lengthy papers, the last of which is illustrated by thirty elaborate tables and twelve shaded maps. In these papers, he divides England and Wales into industrial districts and groups of counties, and shows that the best educated of these—that is, those in which ability to sign the marriage register was least rare—were most free from paupers, commitments for crime, and illegitimate births. Again and again, he speaks of “the generally good influence exerted by the schools,” and declares that “The excess of the more heinous and brutal” offences is “always on the side of the greater ignorance.” Herbert Spencer takes no notice of frequent statements like these, and simply quotes from Fletcher’s conclusion a few introductory sentences, admitting that in some cases, when we take all the commitments of crime together indiscriminately, we can find “a superficial evidence against instruction.” What Spencer quotes, however, was simply designed to introduce what he wholly omits; namely, that Fletcher, by separating these commitments into three classes, according to enormity of crime, and placing the more serious offences against the person with the malicious offences against property, especially those accompanied by violence, is able to prove that the worst crimes are most frequent in the most ignorant districts, so that we have “a testimony in favor of the educational influences generally associated with instruction far more powerful than any that has yet been supplied,” and “The conclusion is therefore irresistible that education is essential to the security of modern society.” Thus, Fletcher brings up a long array of arguments in behalf of the moral value of schools, and admits incidentally that some of the statistics appear to disparage this value, but shows that even these, when thoroughly examined, sustain the main conclusion; namely, that public school education promotes moral progress. Herbert Spencer, probably misled by some assistant or reviewer, quotes the admission without its context, and on the strength of it refers to Fletcher as a witness against the truth which his laborious investigations have fully proved. That Herbert Spencer had not himself read Fletcher’s papers is all the more likely from the curious circumstance that they furnish good reasons for setting aside almost all the other testimony relied upon in Social Statics. I do not wish to say too much about a book published thirty years ago, but so great has been and will be its authority, that it is high time for this mistake to be pointed out.

The adverse influence of Social Statics is noticed in the recent pamphlet on Education and Crime, published by the Department of the Interior and written by J. P. Wickersham, who completely refutes the charge that the higher grades of education favor crime, and also gives many encouraging facts: such as that one-sixth of the crime in Pennsylvania is committed by the illiterate one-thirtieth part of the population; that in New York city “the chances for crime among those who cannot read and write are nine times as great as among the rest of the population; that in Massachusetts, in 1871, “among the ignorant population, one in twenty committed crime, while among those who had a greater or less degree of education there was one felon to about a hundred and twenty-six persons,” that, out of one hundred and forty-seven thousand people committed to prison by magistrates and juries in the British Islands in 1872, nearly fifty thousand were unable to read or write, and but two hundred and thirty-three had received a superior education; and that but six of the two thousand women and girls arrested in London in 1877 could do more than read and write well. That educated females really are almost entirely free from temptation to crime was proved by able English investigators more than thirty years ago, as will be seen in the Statistical Journal. And it may also be remarked that one of the recent volumes of the Encyclopædia Britannica shows that during the thirty-five years from 1841 to 1876, while the population of England and Wales increased from sixteen millions to twenty-four and a quarter, the number of criminals convicted by juries sank from twenty thousand three hundred to twelve thousand two hundred, or from one in seven hundred and eighty to one in two thousand, making about one-third as much crime at the end as at the beginning of this period, during which the percentage of illiteracy was reduced to one-half. In the rate of decrease of crime there are some fluctuations, owing in one instance to the demoralization caused by the potato-rot; but during the ten years from 1866 to 1876, when the system of records had become thoroughly established, there was a reduction of the number of criminals from seven to five in ten thousand, a change which may reasonably be attributed to the establishment in 1862 of a new system of education, under which the number of children in the schools doubled during these ten years. (Vol. viii., pp. 221 and 249-251.)

From these and many similar facts, I feel justified in accepting fully the results of my investigation of six hundred and twenty-three cases, and in believing education highly favorable to morality. And when we further remember how much our schools and colleges do to raise people in social station, to train them to obey laws and to respect each other’s rights, and to give them such cultivated tastes as are the strongest safeguards against base indulgences, we may well say, with the Talmud, that the world is saved by the breath of school-children.

V. Fondness for books, especially scientific ones, I found more common among virtuous than vicious people, though the latter show some interest in novels. It is certainly remarkable that of three hundred and twenty criminals in the Newgate Calendar, fifty-seven of whom are said to be well educated, but four appear to have cared for reading. The higher the ability, the stronger seems to be this taste, great authors and artists being remarkable for liking poetry and novels, while statesmen, soldiers, and other practical people preferred science.

VI. Early piety and devout parentage seemed much more common among virtuous than vicious people, and the latter were decidedly the more sceptical. Only two devotees appear in the Newgate Calendar. Thus there seems to be a strong connection between piety and morality, though it is hard to tell which is the cause and which is the effect. It is simply just, however, to remember that during the last five centuries the power of the Church has steadily declined, but tolerance, philanthropy, chastity, temperance, and respect for laws have greatly advanced. I mentioned that the ratio of crime to population in England is but little more than one-third as great now as forty years ago; but, during that time, church and chapel accommodation has not increased so fast as the number of inhabitants, there has been much legislation hostile to sectarian interests, and secular and rationalistic opinions have spread widely, as will be easily seen by comparing the earliest and latest volumes of Punch.

I feel the more bound to call attention to these facts, because my own figures made the mental influence of the Church appear much less beneficial than the moral. Devout parentage I found to be four times as common among professors of ordinary as of extraordinary mental powers, making all due allowance for moral differences; while early scepticism was twenty-seven times as frequent among people of genius as among those of mediocrity. The ablest men also seem to have been those who most rarely were devotees. No one will be surprised at such indications of the failure of the Church to encourage mental growth, when he remembers that she has preferred faith to free inquiry, emotional to intellectual culture, and aspiration toward a future world to knowledge of the present one, especially in the form of science.

What we think of the Church must however depend mainly on whether we hold that life should be guided by religious enthusiasm or by thoughtful fidelity to the laws of earthly duty.

VII. I must therefore lay stress on the fact that more than twice as large a part of the good people in my lists, as of the bad, exhibited unusual love for business details before the age of thirty, and had great success in making money and gaining promotion;

while reckless prodigality and remarkable incapacity for business are characteristic of the vicious. Instances of the murder of creditors by embarrassed debtors abound. One half of the villains in the Newgate Calendar had been notoriously idle and extravagant and singularly destitute of ability to make money, so that they had begun to suffer the consequences before they were tempted into crime. Precisely the same is true of the great criminals whose antecedents are minutely recorded by Feuerbach. Juvenile offenders, both in this country and in England, are said to show remarkable incapacity for arithmetic. Dugdale states that: “After disease, the most uniformly noticeable trait of the true criminal is that he lacks the element of continuity of effort. Steady, plodding work is deficient in him.” Of six hundred and twenty-five adults in the Bath jail, England, 1848, four-fifths were out of work at the time of committing the offence. And so were most of the one hundred and seventy-one discharged soldiers and man-of-war’s men who in 1865 were sent to the Massachusetts State’s Prison, where only fifteen of them had ever been before. Fletcher, in his laborious study of English statistics, found that where there was the least crime there was not only the most schooling, but the largest number of rich men and the smallest of paupers. Look abroad over the earth’s surface, and we find that the most wealthy and industrious countries are those in which liberty is most respected and life and property are most secure. Throughout history, we see commerce, manufactures, just laws, democratic institutions, refinement, temperance, and philanthropy advancing side by side.

These facts lead me to believe that the moral advantages of business habits are much greater than they are usually represented to be, either in popular literature or in the pulpit. For instance, I suspect that for one Ralph Nickleby, Uriah Heep, or James Carker, who becomes a felon, there are ten Dick Swivellers, Bob Sawyers, and Wilkins Micawbers. And I am glad that so few accept literally some well-known texts, which have their value in reminding us that money is not worth so much as virtue, truth, and liberty, but which should not prevent our seeing that these great gifts come to the cool, self-restrained, far-sighted, cautious, yet energetic man of business more readily than to the hot-headed enthusiast.

I am the more bound to insist on the value of business skill, because I find that it has been possessed in the highest degree by about three members out of four in a group of men distinguished as generals, legislators, naturalists, physicians, engineers, inventors, travellers, merchants, or for other forms of practical genius. Of the famous authors and artists not in this group, only one in six had much talent for making money. What is particularly remarkable is that, of the mediocre artists and authors in my lists, twice as large a portion as of the gifted ones showed the highest business ability. Of course, this deficiency is not to be considered as a promoter, but simply as a penalty of genius. Among exceptional cases, the best known are those of Shakespeare and Goethe.

VIII. There was no habit in which I found the best people in various countries differ from the worst so widely and uniformly as in their use of alcohol and tobacco. Excessive indulgence seemed to be eight times as common among the vicious people as among the virtuous; while noticeable, though of course not in all countries complete, abstinence was to the same degree most frequent among the latter. The proportion of drunkards among felons is variously estimated at from thirty-nine to eighty-one per cent., the highest figures being found among juvenile and other petty offenders. The London Statistical Journal declares that, with the educated, intoxication is a main cause of crime, increasing in potency as the scale of education rises. Nearly forty per cent. of the murders committed in France during a period of four years are ascribed by Quételet to drunken quarrels. The strictest moralists, even in wine countries, have prohibited the use of alcoholic beverages. Among the people whom I found, without special research, to have abstained much more strictly than their friends and neighbors, are the following eminent Europeans: Harriet Martineau, Oberlin, J. J. Gurney, Garibaldi, Robert Owen, Howard, Pestalozzi, J. S. Mill, Comte, Hugh Miller, and D’Alembert. Comparison of mediocre and gifted people showed that early intemperance hinders mental development, especially that of practical genius. Temperate habits may certainly be considered both mentally and morally beneficial.

IX. Fletcher's laborious investigations led him to believe that those parts of England and Wales where the largest proportion of bridegrooms were under twenty-one were the most deeply cursed by ignorance, pauperism, improvidence, licentiousness, and other crime. Dugdale found that his paupers and criminals were remarkable for "precocious sexual excitability," and that the use of ardent spirits was usually preceded and promoted by licentiousness. Nearly one-half of the criminals in the Newgate Calendar and two-thirds of those in Feuerbach's Trials had become profligate or jealous before they were thus led into crime. One-seventh part of the murders in France are ascribed to these causes. A leading German authority, Oettingen, says that the robber's career usually begins in the house of ill-fame. My own investigations showed that good people are much more apt than bad ones to delay marriage until thirty; and so are the possessors of literary and artistic genius, especially authoresses. Considering these facts, and also the poverty and ignorance likely to beset the children of improvident marriages, I must say that popular opinion seems to me dangerously to overvalue not only early matrimony, but the goodness of human nature, which appears to me to show traits fully answering to Darwin's theory of its origin. The future of our race demands not only that its healthy, prosperous, virtuous, and intelligent members should marry as soon as they are able to take proper care of their families, but that even they should not do so prematurely, and that the rest should stay as they are.

Passing from these special conclusions to more general ones, the five principal causes of crime appear to be vicious parentage, lack of education from schools and books, inefficiency in business, intemperance, and excessive amorosity. The typical criminal may be described as unsympathetic, obstinate, reckless, fickle, strongly prone to base indulgences, and destitute of taste for books or religious observances. His parentage will be disreputable; his schooling scanty or wholly wanting, his dislike of business great, his behavior ruled by impulses, and all his desires turned toward excitement. His brain will show its strength, if it has any, in fitful flashes, not steady light, and ultimately prove its weakness by sinking into insanity or imbecility.

On the other hand, the moral antecedents of an ideal man seem to be these. His parents will certainly have high character and literary culture, and probably also be both devout and business-like in their habits. His own disposition will be prudent, and at the same time sympathetic. He will gladly learn from others, and yet be able to judge for himself what is right. His lower passions will readily yield to the sway of reason and conscience, and he will be eager to obey the moral laws. His brothers and sisters will have been numerous, his schooling thorough, and his attendance at church in early years constant. He will love books, especially scientific ones, shun stimulants and all other low means of excitement, follow his business steadily and successfully, and not marry prematurely. Hitherto, the highest type of character has almost always been inspired by religious enthusiasm; but thoughtful and calm adherence to principle seems likely to show that it has even greater power.

And so a great thinker will, I believe, usually be found to have had cultivated parents, æsthetic taste, and thorough education from books, schools, and foreign travel. Though mental ability seems due to peculiarities of brain, which often originate and develop independently of parentage, or instruction literary and artistic genius appears to depend more closely on education, especially through poetry and other forms of art, than practical ability does, this latter seeming to be but little promoted by instruction, except in the form of scientific or business training, and to be mainly due to natural advantages, in part inherited, but to a great extent spontaneous. Prominent among such advantages is a powerful brain which works steadily and regularly and is not excited easily, great susceptibility and excitability being the peculiar accompaniments of literary and artistic genius.

And, finally, nothing seems to me clearer than that greatness, whether mental or moral, depends mainly on innate powers and impulses which are in part inherited, but by no means wholly so. There is only this difference, that the highest goodness may ultimately be reached by whoever will seek it steadily and passionately; but no strength or persistency of desire for intellectual distinction can possibly achieve it, unless the brain is favorably formed. It depends mainly on natural disposition whether we choose to be saintly; but, if we do choose, then saints we shall become. We must be born kings of thought, or we shall never wear that crown.

REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON:

Preacher, Reformer, and Author.

BY JOHN H. CLIFFORD.

The death of Mr. Johnson ends a faithful and noble career. He died at his home at North Andover, on Sunday night, February 19, at the age of fifty-nine years. The date of his birth was Oct. 10, 1822. He was born at Salem. His father was an eminent physician of that town, and died there about six years ago. Mr. Johnson was graduated at Harvard College in 1842, and at the Divinity School in 1846. From his youth, he was an earnest anti-slavery worker, as well as what is known as a radical in religion. In consequence of his firm convictions and frank and fearless utterance upon these matters, he found no congenial home among any of the sectarian churches, and was never a settled preacher until 1853, when he became minister of the Free Church at Lynn, where he remained for seventeen years. He had never been connected as a preacher with any religious denomination. At Lynn, he gathered about him a band of earnest people in sympathy with his ideas and spirit, whom he led into wide fields of thought and inspired to practical works of philanthropy. He has had no successor in the Free Church, but has retained to the last the affection and admiration of its surviving members, among whom are some of his sincerest mourners. All his friendships were of this enduring character. After leaving Lynn in 1870, he lived at Salem until his father's death, in 1876. Soon after this event, Mr. Johnson moved to North Andover, and occupied an ancient homestead of his family. Here, he devoted himself to literary work, preaching occasionally in the Unitarian church of the town, and also speaking on liberal platforms in other places. He was much in sympathy with the Free Religious Association in its earlier years, and sometimes a speaker at its conventions. Of his anti-slavery work, a full account could be given only by his associates in that movement or by his life-long friends. But it is well known to others that he gave full measure of devotion to that cause, throwing into it his whole moral energy, using voice and pen, mind and heart, to advance its noble aims. In learning and intellectual power, he was surpassed by none of the men of that holy war, and among them was no conscience more true and unfaltering than his. What he said of Garrison, at the funeral of the great liberator, might with equal truth be applied to himself: "Here is a conscience that never from the start would palter with the fickle conditions of success, nor trade away one iota of that integrity which made all sacrifices gain, and knew every compromise to be a loss of power." And not only through those trying times, but ever after, did he preserve that firm virtue, high above all temptation, that moral dignity, which no vulgar thing could touch. Throughout his career, he illustrated the precept of the Chinese sage: "A man should say, I am not concerned that I have no place: I am concerned how I may become fit for one. I am not concerned that I am not known: I seek to become worthy to be known." And because he was worthy he was known. His light rose in obscurity, and was sweet to many eyes. His immediate audience, if few, were always fit,—fit to appreciate the teacher and to spread the influence of his teaching.

But it is by his literary work that Mr. Johnson is most widely known, and will be longest remembered. Besides his earlier published writings in the anti-slavery press, and many uncollected magazine papers, discourses, essays, and pamphlets, especially those printed in the Radical, which he loved so well, most of which have a permanent value, he has left behind him somewhat which belongs to literature of a high class.

No attempt will be made here to estimate the value of his special studies. But he has written hymns as good, perhaps, as any that our time has produced,—hymns profound, sweet, tender, and lyrical, some of which have already found place in many collections. In 1846, "he compiled, in connection with Rev. Samuel Longfellow, a Book of Hymns, some of the finest of which were his own." This book was afterward revised and reprinted, under the title of Hymns of the Spirit, and is still used in some liberal churches, besides having furnished much excellent material for other compilations. It is still perhaps, upon the whole, the best liberal hymn-book in existence. In 1868, Mr. Johnson published The Worship of Jesus, at the request of the Free Religious Association. "This little treatise," as the author modestly calls it, is a critical essay of much learning and acuteness, of the destructive order, in that it aims to make an end of man-worship in all its forms, but grandly constructive, inasmuch as it endeavors to show the universal basis of religion in the spiritual nature of man himself. Perhaps no work of Mr. Johnson's was more satisfactory than this to people who shared his views, or to his own mind.

But his greatest writing is the series of books entitled Oriental Religions and their Relation to Universal Religion. Of this work, the first volume, India, was published in 1872, by J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston, and the second, China, by the same house, in 1877. Both are large octavo volumes, and treat their subjects in a very scholarly and exhaustive manner. Their thoroughly independent and non-Christian stand-point makes them obnoxious to partial criticism; but, to the more liberal students of religious ideas and history, they are a rich and delightful treasury of knowledge, of philosophical thought and fine poetic interpretation. The time has not yet come for such books to take their proper rank. But it may be surmised that their place is kept, and that they will one day occupy it. While some orthodox critics have railed at Oriental Religion, and while even many Unitarians have ignored the work, so far as they could, it is reassuring to Mr. Johnson's fellow-believers in the soundness of his principles and the justness of his method to remember that such men as Mr. D. A. Wasson and the late Dr. George Ripley placed upon it a very high critical estimate. And Mr. C. D. B. Mills, a well-known writer and lecturer upon kindred subjects, remarks in the preface to his volume on Buddha and Buddhism, which was favorably received in all liberal circles, that, among works of its class, that of Mr. Johnson deserves particular mention. "Impressed," says Mr. Mills, "with so broad and catholic a spirit, so kindly, so generous even, in its hospitality to Eastern thought, so careful in research and affluent in learning, so superior in insight and discrimination, so richly and deeply suggestive, it certainly marks, if it does not make, an epoch in these studies. It would seem to leave little to be desired further upon the themes it treats." As not less strong evidence of the merits of Oriental Religions, and as indicative of its ultimate and just rank among books, it may be said that India and China have both been republished in a philosophical series, by the house of Trübner, in London.

The third volume of this remarkable series, Mr. Johnson had not quite finished when the tired hand dropped the pen, to take it up no more. How sad to him was the inevitable breaking-off from this work of his life and his love! It is not known how or when this volume will be published; but it is to be earnestly hoped that it may take its place, even if in an incomplete form, by the side of the other two. Its subject is Persia, and it opens up one of the most interesting fields to the student of religious philosophy. Whatever may be the final fate of these books, they certainly stand now as a monument of long and careful labor, as thorough, as intelligent, and as conscientious as everything that Mr. Johnson was and all that he did.

Here this imperfect sketch might stop; but bereaved affection and esteem, which the more they grew, the more they found in him to make them grow, crave a few words of comforting remembrance. During his six years' residence on the North Andover farm, Mr. Johnson did much with his own hands—too frail for such laborious work, though he would not think so—to improve and beautify the place. His brave Revolutionary ancestor and namesake was not a more heroic toiler in any field than this self-forgetting, delicate-framed, but stout-hearted descendant. The life-long sufferer from disease was ever the patient and hopeful worker at his task, the teacher and diverter, the strengthener and consoler of his friends. And scholar as he was, so intellectually alive and alert always that people wondered if he ever slept, and, while enchanted with his speech, were fain to rest their minds, while his worked incessantly.

santly at high pressure, this man could withdraw into a remote and quiet rural town and mingle in all simplicity in country life, both of labor and of play,—the most suggestive and entertaining talker on serious subjects, the most lively in all innocent mirth. How he drew to himself the townspeople, to whom he never seemed a stranger! This Oriental student, this Transcendentalist of the transcendentalists, this mystic philosopher, could as easily hold mutual converse, with pleasure and profit, with the most unlettered countryman as with the cultivated thinker. And did ever professional and paid minister go so far or so often, or be so generous and whole-hearted with the genuine help and cheer and consolation of his presence and words, as did he, all the time? No recluse, but a man who loved men, and craved their love in return. The sorrow of his sudden death has given full proof that among his good-hearted neighbors and fellow-townsmen this true gentleman and loving soul was valued at his real worth. Long must it be ere these quiet places welcome another guest like him.

Who that ever really saw that inspiring presence could forget it? The figure, rather tall, was, oh, how slight in those last years! It seemed as though the body were always trying to become the spirit. The grand head, crowned with the glory of thought, was poised between native dignity and self-forgetting humility. The noble features were equally alive with intelligence and kindness. Above all, the wonderful "loving eyes, flowed with naphtha fiery sweet," revealed the deep, earnest play of a soul whose very repose was enthusiasm, whose passive states, not less than its active, were conditions of fullest and strongest life.

LIBERALISM IN AUSTRALIA.

II.

New South Wales.

In this colony, with the exception of the capital, there are no towns of sufficient magnitude to merit the title of cities: and as it is only in large centres of population that the free thought movement can, as yet, boast public advocacy, my record will be confined exclusively to Sydney.

Here, as in Melbourne, the earliest prominent utterances in the direction of freedom were spoken in the name of Unitarianism. In the Sydney speaker, however, Rev. James Pillars, we met with a very different stamp of man from the one we encountered in Victoria; and the difference between the two will be readily comprehended by your readers when I say that, while Mr. Higginson clung tenaciously to the skirts of Channing, Mr. Pillars accepted Theodore Parker, with all that his teachings implied. Thus, while the one remained bogged in the slough of supernaturalism, the other based his religion and morality on nature, and cheerfully looked to science to unfold the divine workings therein.

Mr. Pillars arrived in Sydney from England, and took charge of the Unitarian congregation in 1864; and his labors extended over nearly eleven years. Their palpable outcome was the erection of a beautiful Unitarian church, which is now almost untenanted. Their mental and spiritual results cannot so readily be stated, branching out as they do in such wide-spread and unexpected directions. The multitude of those to whom he ministered have now passed far beyond the reach of Unitarianism or any formal mode of worship; and, where this large-minded minister sowed, free thought is now reaping. Not content with his pulpit and Sunday-school work, Pillars published a monthly periodical styled the Free Religious Press, having for its motto Goethe's closing words, "Light! more light!" and took an active part in every reformatory effort. When one, Lorando Jones by name, was stupidly prosecuted for blasphemy, because of some outspoken speech regarding the Christian fetic, —the Bible,—the Unitarian minister rushed to his assistance, of course making enemies of all timid souls by his act. It was in Melbourne that I made Mr. Pillars' acquaintance when he paid us a visit there, and for some four Sundays woke up the echoes of our church with his strong voice and equally strong liberal teachings. And in Melbourne as well as Sydney there was deep sorrow when, in the middle of 1875, he reached the sad and sudden end of his work on earth. His death was a sensational one. Taking a holiday ramble with two of his pupils on the romantic cliffs which front the ocean near the Sydney Heads, his foot slipped, he fell three hundred feet on to the rocks below; and, ere it could be recovered, his body was washed out to sea and beheld no more. A stone obelisk, erected by his widow, marks the beautiful but treacherous spot.

Mr. Peebles, of America, visited Sydney in 1873, delivering lectures to large audiences, and helping to broaden the minds of many, while a year or so later John Tyerman took up the work. Tyerman had charge of an Anglican congregation at Sandhurst, Victoria, when Spiritualism found him and soon drove him out into a wider field. After a few years' lecturing and press work in Melbourne, he removed to Sydney, where he performed yeoman's service in establishing the liberal platform. For some time, he had possession there of one of the largest theatres every Sunday evening, and both viva voce and with his pen fought the good battle against the legions of dogma. Liberalizing organizations gradually came into existence, and Sydney can now boast of a spiritualistic lyceum, a secular society, a psychological ditto, and, more than all, a broadly based liberal association of which an able and prolific pamphleteer, George Lacy, is the honorary secretary. The press, too, has from time to time accomplished excellent work. After the cessation of Mr. Pillars' periodical, a thoroughly radical, outspoken weekly paper, called The Stock-whip, was started and kept going for a long time, thanks to the expenditure of £2,000 upon it by its proprietor, a liberal gentleman named Kelly. Other efforts have been made to maintain an open press in Sydney with indifferent success, The Living Age, Life, and Free-thought following in the train of The Stock-whip. I also had issued a prospectus, and contemplated starting a liberal weekly, when illness compelled me to desist.

And this reminds me that much as I may dislike drawing attention to my own labors, no narrative of the free-thought movement in Sydney can be truthfully told without prominent reference to them. I visited Sydney toward the close of 1876, and delivered addresses in exposition of the gospel of freedom in its largest theatre, again at the end of 1877, and in April, 1879, took a lease of the Theatre Royal, and maintained possession of it for every Sunday evening—with one exception, to be presently noted—until a few months back, when I was compelled by ill health to transfer my lease to Mr. James Greenwood, who now occupies the platform. Mr. Greenwood was formerly a Baptist minister, but has broadened out into or near the realm of free thought.

As may be supposed, large and increasing crowds of people could not flock to hear these radical Sunday lectures without the churches feeling the effects of what was to them—unpleasantly and literally—a new departure. A policy of silence proving unavailing, some of them attempted argumentative resistance with yet worse results. Then, characteristically enough, they had underhand recourse to their ancient and long-tried champion, the State authority. A number of clergymen, following the example of their fellows in Melbourne, earwigged the Premier of New South Wales, and besought him to put a stop to these popular Sunday gatherings by prohibiting the taking of money at the doors. They knew right well that, inasmuch as free thought loves to appeal directly from the speaker to the hearer and is distrustful of organization, which must almost of necessity be sectarian in its development, to deal a blow at the open lecture platform was to seriously cripple the liberal movement itself. In Melbourne, this underhand attack has been temporarily successful. In spite of the law which, whenever tested, will be found to be on the side of freedom, a Roman Catholic Premier managed so to frighten the theatre and hall proprietors by threatening to cancel their licenses that they will not let their capacious buildings for Sunday lectures, at which a charge is directly made. It was in 1879 that this unjust pressure was first put in force, and thus far the Liberals have not attempted to meet it with any well-maintained and open contest. In Sydney, happily, the result has been different. The Premier, Sir Henry Parkes, was anxious to oblige his clerical (Protestant) friends, from whom he receives political support, while at the same time avoiding, if possible, outraging a pseudo-liberal reputation. In May, 1880, accordingly, he introduced into Parliament a voluminous bill dealing with the licensing system of the colony, in an out-of-the-way corner of which was a clause, or rather a line of a clause, which rendered a theatrical license liable to cancellation if the theatre was let to a Sunday lecturer without the Premier's consent. Thus, the whole free-thought platform, of which I was at the time the most prominent upholder, was to be placed under the tricky thumb of this wily politician. The matter was at once brought before the public at a mass-meeting held at the Temperance Hall, Sydney, presided over by one of the most venerable and staunch Liberals in Australia, the Hon. J. Bowie Wilson. In the proceedings of this gathering, which were enthusiastic and unanimous, two independent members of Parliament, David Buchanan and John Hurley, took part. The press, to its honor be it said,—the sectarian papers of course excepted,—backed up the meeting. Within Parliament itself, too, by some of the foremost men, the subtle attempt to throttle free utterance was denounced; and eventually the whole Licensing Bill was retired, and when reintroduced the following year was shorn of this obnoxious provision.

COL. HIGGINSON vs. HERBERT SPENCER.

Editors of The Index :—

It is to be regretted that Mr. Higginson, in exercising his right of liberty of opinion through The Index, should make such an unprovoked onslaught on the literary and scientific reputation of Herbert Spencer, instead of discovering to us the "dangerous" tendencies of his doctrines. I have yet to learn that any one has occupied valuable space in your thought-plethoric columns for the exclusive purpose of extolling Mr. Spencer. It is true, and a meritorious truth it is, that The Index has indeed greatly aided in the dissemination of the "Gospel according to Herbert Spencer"; but this "gospel" is presented as being sanctified by its truth, and not by its author. If mentioned at all, the author has only been recognized incidentally.

Mr. Higginson, as a "transcendentalist," feels that his side has, as he expresses it, "gone by default," and he would fain make amends. But, if what he has given is the best that can be done in that way, it seems to me silence were more wise. The mere opinions of nameless historians, who speak only to create a prejudice against a man whom they cannot answer, is no argument, and is repulsive to every lover of justice. If they do not go the length of "Master Jowett," who pronounced Mr. Spencer's writings "rubbish," it is because the eyes of their judgment are gradually being opened. Their present opinion is an evanescent form of the first.

If ever a man's laurels have been justly won,—won in the face of the most relentless criticism, won when all his failures are admitted,—Mr. Spencer is certainly entitled to his. He has "assumed" no "attitude" that he has not admirably supported his title to. And, if all men's assumptions of knowledge so successfully mimicked the thing itself, we might cheerfully permit the shadow to pass unchallenged.

No one pretends, Mr. Spencer himself disavows, that in the minutiae of detail all his facts are indubitable. But "stray observations of anonymous and irresponsible" writers are never made "corner-stones" in his philosophy,—a nameless historian and Mr. Higginson to the contrary notwithstanding. These observations, which short-sighted specialists overlook, Mr. Spencer finds a ready place for in his comprehensive theory, which is built upon a foundation that can never be razed, because co-extensive with mental law and external phenomena. There is less "danger" in following an all but demonstrated universal theory, such as Spencer works with, than discarding theory altogether or taking up with a false one. A true theory is the mental magnet that enables us to polarize desultory facts. Without theory, the facts of nature would speak no more enlightenment to our minds than to that of an ox. Without theory, phenomena would be chaos. I have known men, so-called scientific specialists, who, scorning what they were pleased to call "mere theory," could not interpret the plain facts before their eyes. This class are forever declaiming against theory, though, as Huxley says, with "their mouths full of the buttered toast they affect to despise." When a theory has to improvise imaginary facts as a basis of its existence, it then becomes "dangerous."

It would be absurd to defend Spencer on the ground of his omniscience. That he may err in detail at times is probable, covering as his investigations do such an immense scientific and historic field. But I would rather trust the selective judgment of Herbert Spencer, aided by his all-crystallizing theory and extensive knowledge, than the opinion of a specialist, when it comes to building up a philosophy. And here, let me say, the disparity sought to be established between the methods of Herbert Spencer and those of Darwin are imaginary, and arise from attempting to compare unlike things. Spencer is not an experimentalist. He makes himself familiar with discovered fact, as far as may be, by repetition; but his function is the coördination of facts already discovered. His field of thought takes him even beyond the "boundaries of experimental evidence." He is a philosopher, and comprises within himself both the "habits of the literary man" and those of the scientist. His application in his department is as painstaking as Darwin's, and a great deal more arduous, since not enlivened by the recreative experiments of the naturalist. His failures—which more frequently exist in the minds of his critics than anywhere else—find extenuation in the stupendous magnitude of his labors.

If anything I have said appears needlessly warm, I would submit that to one who passionately sympathizes with Spencer in his struggle to engraft on the minds of men a scientific method in thought, in his battle with ignorance on the one hand and cunning perversity on the other, in his unrequited labor and thorough devotion to his task, the provocation is exceedingly intense. Every word of disparagement against his writings is like taking a needed book from the hands of the ignorant on the one hand and needed money from the pocket of the philosopher on the other.

I can heartily unite with Professor Adler in his enthusiastic panegyric to the transcendent genius of Kant, and with Mr. Higginson in his tribute to the patient, plodding, cautious Darwin, but will say, as a student who knows somewhat of the writings of both of these magnificent men, that in my humble judgment neither of them or any other I have read ever had that tremendous, far-reaching grasp of scientific fact that would enable them to construct the "Synthetic Philosophy." If humanity has developed a philosopher greater than Spencer, of one thing I feel assured, such a one has drawn his energy from the mighty scientific synthesis this man has bequeathed the world.

A FRIEND'S TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Editors of The Index:—

In the death of Samuel Johnson, many a heart is filled with sorrow for the loss of a friend whose like we can never find again. By nature, he seemed endowed with a singleness of purpose, which, brushing aside all motives of selfish expediency, took a straight course to the right, as revealed to his conscience. His fine imagination and vigor of thought (always on the plane of Transcendentalism) were held in equipoise by unyielding moral earnestness. From the first youthful years of his ministry until slavery ceased in the land, he spoke brave, strong words in behalf of freedom, to whose champions his pulpit was always open. His sermons and lectures, never sensational, were teeming with thought, and to the eloquent words in which this was clothed an added charm was lent by a voice of soulful melody and richness, which also made his reading of hymns a part of the service to which all his hearers looked forward with especial pleasure. Of late years, his wide scholarship, as is well known, has been devoted to unfolding the principles of universal religion in his India, China, and unfinished Persia. His many-sidedness was the wonder of his friends. On political and financial questions, he was thoroughly informed, clear-headed and practical, and of poetry his rich fancy and voice of such depth and melody made him a rare interpreter. Nor should his appreciation of humor be forgotten, for it was of the keenest. With such gifts, his brilliant conversation was something never to be forgotten by those whose lives have been enriched by it. It was always forthcoming for the delight of his humblest friends, to whom he listened in turn with no apparent sense of superiority. In travelling with him, we have enjoyed the spell-bound attention in which he held stage-drivers, farmers, and fishermen, drawing from them, too, their quaintest and best. To those who have known the power of sympathy of our friend, it is hard to believe they can go on through life without its help, greatening every joy, softening every sorrow. All his own trials were bravely borne with unflinching trust in Infinite Wisdom.

"So to live is heaven.
So" has he "joined the choir invisible,
Whose music is the gladness of the world."

BRITISH CONSISTENCY.

Editors of The Index:—

After all that we have heard relating to the exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh as a member-elect of Parliament, it was a surprise to me to find lately a statute, enacted by that body in the year 1869, chapter 68, section 4, which seems to be now in force in their courts of law as follows:—

If any person called to give evidence in any court of justice, whether in a civil or criminal proceeding, shall object to take an oath, or shall be objected to as incompetent to take an oath, such person shall, if the presiding judge is satisfied that the taking of an oath would have no binding effect on his conscience, make the following promise and declaration:—

"I solemnly promise and declare that the evidence given by me to the court shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

And any person who, having made such promise and declaration, shall wilfully and corruptly give false evidence, shall be liable to be indicted, tried, and convicted for perjury as if he had taken an oath.

This statute goes further than any other known to me in rejecting a form repugnant to the witness and placing the matter upon grounds of humanity and common-sense, by dispensing with the oath where useless, and by omitting the distasteful words at the end of the common affirmation, "under the pains and penalties of perjury."

AN APPEAL FOR MUNICIPAL SUFFRAGE.

Editors of The Index:—

The undersigned, in behalf of many thousand women of this State, desire to ask the aid of editors who are not unfriendly to the question of Municipal Suffrage for women which is now before the Legislature. Women had no choice in the election of the Senators and Representatives who will decide whether this right shall be conceded or not, and they have no opportunity to state their claim in either branch of the Legislature. It is because women are at this disadvantage, and limited as no other class of citizens are, that we ask the courtesy and aid of the press in favor of our petition for fair dealing, in the matter of Municipal Suffrage.

Women are members of the corporation of the city or town in which they reside, with the same interest in it that other citizens have. As stockholders in any other kind of corporation, they have a vote. Why should they not have it in the city and town?

Women pay their full share of taxes. Statistics prepared by Wm. I. Bowditch in 1875 show that in the cities of Boston, Chelsea, and Newton, and the town of Brookline, the women paid in a single year $1,448,479. This large sum is taken from women without their consent. They are not allowed any expression in regard to the use or expenditure of the money. In Revolutionary times, it was considered a high-handed proceeding to tax the colonies in this way. Is it any less a wrong to-day, because the victims are women? If it was a noble thing for our fathers to resist it, even unto death, will it not be nobler to help secure this measure of justice for the women of Massachusetts?

If it is said that male minors are taxed, it must be remembered that, when they come of age, they find their right to vote ready and secure. But women are always minors, so far as their political rights are concerned. To continue this discrimination against women is foreign to the spirit of the age and unworthy of it. We know it has been the custom; but mere custom is not a good or adequate reason for anything. The railroad has superseded the old stage coach, and machinery the hand loom, to the common gain.

Women have been granted Municipal Suffrage in Scotland this year for the first time. In England, they have exercised Municipal Suffrage since 1869, and it has proved a continued benefit. In Wyoming, by the testimony of every Governor of the Territory, and of its clergymen, its judges, and its editors, full suffrage for women has been an unmixed good during the past twelve years.

Governor Long in his message this year has recommended Municipal Suffrage for women and expressed a desire to see it tried. We therefore earnestly request all editors who recognize the justice of this measure to aid its passage by friendly support of it in their columns. All the more earnestly do we ask this co-operation, because women have no votes and no power to carry the measure themselves.

We also call upon clergymen, laymen, and influential persons, men and women, in all parts of the State, who approve this measure, to aid it by speech and pen, now, before it comes up in the Legislature, that this body may feel the support of their constituents behind their own action.

We extend our thanks to editors who publish our letter.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE March number of the Popular Science Monthly is palpably misogynistic in tone. Of its fifteen contributors, one only is a woman, Miss M. A. Hardaker of this city; and her article, "Science and the Woman Question," is intended to demonstrate by scientific methods the hopeless intellectual inferiority of woman as compared with man. This article is decidedly discouraging to those hopeful ones of both sexes who have been indulging in Utopian dreams of a coming millennium, when the mothers of the race, having achieved through earnest effort equal intellectual powers with the fathers, could rightfully claim equal privileges and be considered equally deserving of the grateful reverence of the rising generation of gifted sons and daughters. But now comes Miss Hardaker, and scientifically demonstrates—to her own satisfaction, at least—the impossibility of the arrival of such an epoch in any future, near or remote, since the result of her scientific investigations has been to convince her, in her own words, that "the necessary outcome of an absolute intellectual equality of the sexes would be the extinction of the human race." We italicize this sentence, in order to impress it the more indelibly upon the minds of our lady readers. Another of Miss Hardaker's discouraging discoveries is that "the probabilities of marriage, or at least of early marriages, are lessened in the cases of intellectual women: so that the chances are not only that intellectual women will have few daughters, and so be unable to add to the general average of female intellect by sex-transmission, but also that they will be unable to add anything whatever to the sum of hereditary intellect in either sex." Prof. Grant Allen, in the same number, gives us an interesting biographical sketch of Sir Charles Lyell, in which he seems to agree with Miss Hardaker's conclusions, although as evidently the great geologist did not. As witness the following paragraph from the sketch: "His wife was a daughter of Leonard Horner, and a lady of tastes very similar to his own. Perhaps one may hint that all the ladies of Lyell's family were a trifle more learned than all the world would care for. It must have been rather a strain to live up to such a constant stimulation in the home circle; and most men would hardly wish to fill their letters to their wives with highly interesting details of dip, strike, and horizon. But this is a matter of personal taste. Lyell seems to have been one of the giants who can stand such incessant high pressure; and he was probably all the happier for his well-assorted marriage. He himself seems strongly to have believed that bachelorhood was not good for the cause of science." In another article, "The Machinery of Elective Government," Prof. Goldwin Smith manages to bring in his well-known arguments against woman's suffrage, devoting a couple of pages to the woman question. The table of contents of this number is rich as usual in contributions to scientific knowledge. W. D. Le Sueur of Canada, whose name, like that of Miss Hardaker, is familiar to our readers, has an article on "Materialism and Positivism" which will repay perusal.

THE Atlantic Monthly for March contains its usual amount of readable articles from first-class contributors, but none of exceptional interest. The poems—"At Last," by Whittier, and "Before the Curfew, 1829-1882," by O. W. Holmes—are, however, particularly noteworthy, because, appearing in the same number of the Atlantic, they seem to be inspired by the same thought, "a looking toward the sunset" in these two, among the best of our American poets. In the hands of N. H. Egleston, "The Story of the Hoosac Tunnel" is not of itself a "bore." Elizabeth Robins deals with an interesting phase of mythology in "Loki." A. P. Hitchcock makes complaint of certain "Hymns and Hymn-Tinkers." Mrs. Mary Treat gives us one of her interesting studies in natural history in "Our Winter Birds." E. E. Hale tells of "A Visit to Jerusalem." The serial stories continue in interest. "H. H." gives a bit of her Colorado experience in "Among the Sky-Lines." The other articles are of average interest.

THE North American Review for March contains interesting articles from distinguished writers on the following subjects: "The Conduct of the Giteau Trial," by Senator George F. Edmunds; "The Progress of the French Republic," in which ex-Minister Edward F. Noyes gives the result of his observations of political affairs in France; "The Trial by Jury," by Judge Edward A. Thomas; "The True Lesson of Protestantism," by Prof. John Fiske; "Law for the Indians," by Rev. W. J. Harsha; "The Fallacies of Homoeopathy," by Prof. A. B. Palmer; and "The Results of Prohibitory Legislation," a characteristic article by Hon. Neal Dow. Of these, Prof. John Fiske's article, in which he makes an able analysis of that great intellectual movement, the Reformation, will be probably of the greatest interest to our readers.

THE æsthetic craze has even crept into our young people's literature, as witness Wide-Awake for this month in the poem, "A Girl of the Period," with its accompanying illustration. We should be inclined to scold about this, if the poem were not so enjoyably sarcastic, so healthy in tone, and the full-page picture opposite of two different "girls of the period" so charming, even if one is so evidently an æsthete. Even the enormous sunflower at her waist-belt has been given by the artist an attractive look, which is more than most of the real sunflowers which we have seen could be coaxed into. And this poem with its illustration is only a very small part of the feast of good things in the March Wide-Awake. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

OUR LITTLE ONES from the Russell Publishing House, 149 A, Tremont Street, Boston, is another of those delightful magazines provided for the pleasure and instruction of the young people of the present generation. The number for March is filled with beautiful pictures and interesting reading.

LET your nursery pets "see themselves as others see them" by subscribing for Baby-Land, the March number of which is full of the pictures of just such naughty as well as good and charming darlings as your own. D. Lothrop & Co.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. JAMES KAY APPLEBEE's discourse in Parker Memorial Hall, last Sunday morning, was upon the ever new subject of "Truth," which he treated in his usual earnest manner.

WM. E. ROSE, husband of the well-known and eloquent liberal and Woman's Rights lecturer, Ernestine L. Rose, died suddenly in London, Eng., of heart disease, on the 25th of January.

News is received of the death of Christine Nilsson's husband, M. Auguste Rouzaud, whose sad financial troubles brought on an attack of hereditary insanity, which ultimately caused his death.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Chicago Religio-Philosophical Journal, writing from Sydney, N. S. Wales, says of Sir Henry Parkes, who is at present on a visit to this country, that "our leading statesman, Sir Henry Parkes, is credited with being a free thinker."

COLONEL INGERSOLL does not mean that it shall be said after his death that he turned from infidelity on his dying-bed. His secretary, who writes short hand, is instructed to take down accurately whatever he may say on that occasion. "There will then be no opportunity," he says, "for any one to put in my mouth utterances contradicting the expressions of my entire life."

THE Germans of this city on the 22d ult. celebrated the birthday of Karl Heinzen as well as that of "the Father of his Country" by appropriate speeches, music, and tableaux at Turn-Halle. Geo. Chainey of this city gave an address in English, and Mrs. Clara Neymann of New York gave another in German, both speeches apparently giving much satisfaction to the large and enthusiastic audience present.

Our friend Photius Fisk has received the following well-merited letter of gratitude from Iowa College for a valuable donation of books to the College Library:—

GRINNELL, IOWA, Feb. 14, 1882.

REV. PHOTIUS FISK:

Dear Sir,—In behalf of the Trustees, Faculty, and students of Iowa College, I tender to you our sincere thanks for your valuable gift of the "Greek Authors"—one hundred and twenty-two volumes in all—which you have been pleased to make to our Library. May the consciousness of doing this very acceptable favor to us ever be as pleasant to you as it is to us. We thank you also for the photographs, which are suspended at the end of the shelves that contain the books.

With respect, yours,

R. W. SWAN, Librarian.

Mr. Fisk having heard it intimated, from the fact that orthodox institutions are not infrequently recipients of his generosity, that he is inclined to recant his liberal views, wishes it distinctly understood that he gives to causes that commend themselves to his judgment, irrespective of nation, color, clime, or creed, because he is a "Free Religionist."

If, as is probable, the majority of the immense crowd of people which filled Parker Memorial Hall to overflowing on last Sunday evening, on the occasion of the address given by Geo. C. Miln of Chicago, came expecting anything of the merely sensational in his lecture, they must have felt considerably disappointed. Mr. M. J. Savage introduced Mr. Miln to the Boston audience in a few felicitous and appropriate words. Mr. Miln's address on "The Church, in the Past, Present, and Future," has already been given at some length in these columns, and was delivered in an earnest, impressive manner, free from rant, frivolity, or sensationalism. Mr. Miln in personal appearance reminds one somewhat of Beecher in height, form, beardless face, and manner of wearing his hair, which however is darker than that of the Brooklyn preacher; while the lower part of Mr. Miln's face gives the impression of more steadfastness and firmness of will. He has few of the graces of oratory; but his voice is strong, sonorous, and clear, while his enunciation left nothing to be desired in the way of distinctness.

THE Echo is an interesting and lively paper, which comes to us from Dunedin, New Zealand, mainly devoted to free thought. In a recent number, it gives in full the report of the Dunedin Free Thought Association, from which we make one or two extracts: "The attendance at our Sunday night meetings has steadily improved, not alone owing to the increase of membership, seventy new members having been added to the roll, but also from the increased interest displayed in our movement by the general public. . . . I would call your attention to the wonderful progress made by our Children's Lyceum. It has been in existence only eight months, and has now an average attendance of seventy children. The inauguration and carrying out of this institution is of itself sufficient to mark the past twelve months as a successful session. . . . The Lyceum Hall, which is now in course of erection, is another great undertaking of the Association, well worthy of note, not only from its utility, but it displays the liberality of free thinkers in New Zealand and how ready they are to act when required. No doubt, most of you know how this enterprise has been financially arranged. I might, however, repeat that we have received voluntary contributions amounting to £700. These have come from friends in Dunedin and in various other places in New Zealand. Again, several gentlemen have come forward and offered money to the amount of $2,000 on the most liberal terms: therefore, we may fairly expect to have no difficulty in pushing onward, providing that we all work together in harmony." From the Echo, we learn that a town not far from Dunedin is oddly named Christchurch, and that it also supports a free thought association. The Echo quotes from one of its evening papers a report of a recent meeting of that association as follows: "Mr. W. Pratt occupied the chair, and a special vote of thanks was unanimously accorded Mr. Stout for his able lecture last Thursday evening. A most amusing translation of a letter, purporting to be from Ah Chaw to Ah Yung, with reference to the simultaneous opening of the Cathedral, the Synagogue, and the Free Thought Hall, was read by the president, and highly appreciated."

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

A GEORGE ELIOT memorial service will be held at Parker Memorial Hall next Sunday morning.

THE bill brought in by the government of the Province of Ontario to enable persons who, on account of their lack of theological belief, are unable to take an oath, to give evidence in courts of justice by simple affirmation, has become a law.

THE Chinese authorities, in order to accustom the people to the use of telegraphic communication and to impress upon them the advantages of the system, have decided to permit messages to be sent free one month by the lines that have lately been established for business.

UNITY says that "England, pronounced the most enlightened country in the world, is said to patronize the pseudo-science of astrology to the extent of requiring one hundred and fifty thousand copies of Zadkiel's Almanac, besides large editions of other similar publications."

It is reported that Mr. Parnell has been compelled to undergo a week's solitary confinement in prison, because of a charge preferred against him by one of his wardens of offering to said warden a bribe to smuggle outside a letter, which was against prison rules. This charge Parnell denies.

THE prominence of the Rothschilds in the public protest against the cruelties perpetrated upon the Jews in Russia will have some influence in preventing their recurrence, since it is within the power of the banking-houses of Europe to make it embarrassing for the Czar, when he wants to borrow money again.

THE Scientific American calls for the invention of a car which, in a railroad collision, will not telescope, of so solid construction that it will repel any possible amount of force. It recommends also that cars be made of non-combustible materials, or at any rate be provided with self-operating extinguishing apparatus.

ENGLAND can no longer accuse this country of a monopoly of the cranks. Another but, fortunately, less successful Guiteau has been discovered there in the person of an impecunious adventurer named Maclean, who on the 2d inst. fired at the carriage which contained the Queen and Princess Beatrice, but with no evil result. The Queen has been singularly fortunate in escaping unhurt the various attacks made upon her life during her long reign.

MR. BRADLAUGH was reelected from Northampton last Thursday, and it now remains to be seen whether he will be permitted to take his seat in the House of Commons. The day after Mr. Bradlaugh's reelection, Sir Stafford Northcote presented a resolution for a new writ for another election. The resolution was tabled, and on the 6th inst. a motion was carried reaffirming the resolution that Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the oath.

THERE is talk of arrangements being made soon, by which a uniform standard of time will be adopted for the whole of the United States. It is not yet decided, but it is thought that the standard time will be that of Washington, since that city possesses the only National Observatory in the country. The Signal Service Bureau, in this connection, proposes to utilize its system of telegraphic communication for distributing accurate time signals to all important points.

THE Indian Mirror reports that the marriage of widows is becoming quite common in India, and that the number of such marriages is yearly increasing, especially in Bombay, Bengal, and the Punjab. This marks a decided step forward in civilization, when we remember by what slow degrees the usages of nations and particularly those founded on religious prejudices are outgrown; for, though the burning of widows with the bodies of their dead husbands has for some time been against the law in India, yet the entire seclusion for life of widows, no matter how young they might be at the time of their widowhood, was expected as part of the unwritten law of Indian society.

IN the House of Commons last Friday, Baron Harry De Worms said that in Russia, during the recent persecutions, fifty-six Jews had been killed, seventy wounded, two hundred and one women subjected to outrage, twenty thousand persons rendered homeless, and property to the value of £16,000,000 destroyed. He moved that the government use its influence with the Czar to prevent a repetition of these wrongs. But Mr. Gladstone declared that the intervention of a foreign government would be sure to cause a strong reaction among the perpetrators of the outrages, and be construed by the Russians as something like an invasion of their national independence. The speech of Mr. Gladstone is likely to excite severe criticism, although it cannot fairly be said that he is influenced by any lack of sympathy with the victims of persecution.

THE Secular Society of Toronto has grown to be a large and flourishing organization, and its meetings are well attended. For mere discussion, in which the exercises formerly consisted, have been substituted lectures and essays by the members, music and social entertainments. Mr. Piddington, the President, is a very active and efficient officer. Until within a year or two, the society was treated very unhandsomely by the city press, some of the papers refusing even to publish its notices as paid advertisements. But the temper and tone of the press have changed, all the journals now being willing to insert notices, and some of them publishing fair reports of the meetings. The Toronto World, speaking of recent lectures before this society by the junior editor of The Index says, "The hall was crowded, a large number being unable to obtain admittance," and gives very fair abstracts of the discourses.

THE proprietors of several large retail stores in New York city have been arrested for non-compliance with the law of that State, which requires that girls employed in stores shall be provided with seats. If Massachusetts has so merciful a law, its provisions are apparently a dead letter; for we observe in many Boston stores that no seats are provided for the clerks,—an omission which is evidently against the best interests of the proprietors, since the moments of rest afforded the employees by this means serve to prevent that feeling of tired nervousness, which sometimes prevents patience in waiting on customers. In England, a society of wealthy ladies have made it a rule to withdraw their custom from all firms which fail to provide seats for their lady clerks. Perhaps there is room in Boston, among its many philanthropic associations, for a society for the prevention of cruelty to working people.

THE French clerical journals insist that M. Bontoux, the president of the Union Générale, the great clerical and Legitimist financing establishment, must be an innocent and good man, because he was a devout Christian who always had family prayers at home. But praying men are not always the most careful or the most honest financiers. The Union Générale, it is certain, was not managed on honest business principles, and the odor of sanctity could not save it. Upon this concern, Pius IX. bestowed his blessing; and the countenance it thus received from his spiritual office caused many of the more pious Catholics to subscribe confidently and liberally to a stock which they believed would make handsome returns. Among the victims who now lament their folly are such sons of the Church as the Emperor of Austria and the Comte de Chambord. They have seen that something more than the grace of the Vatican is needed to save from bankruptcy an institution conducted without "worldly" ability and honesty.

CONCERNING THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

In the department of correspondence appears a criticism of the Free Religious Association by Mr. T. W. Curtis, which calls for some notice. If we did not personally know Mr. Curtis to be a young man who is sincerely searching for truth and who earnestly wishes to do honest work in the liberal cause, we should be inclined to pass by his communication as on its face too hypercritical, not to say captious, to require attention; for, with such a fatal disposition to see things awry as his criticism seems to indicate, the attempt to bring about a common understanding by throwing light on the matters he discusses would not appear very promising. But these, we are satisfied, are only surface appearances; and so we pass them over without prejudice to Mr. Curtis' argument, while we endeavor from an inside view to look at the same points which he has criticised from his "outside view."

1. In the first place, we feel very sure that, if Mr. Curtis had been present at those original meetings in 1866 and 1867 out of which the Free Religious Association grew, it could not possibly occur to him to speak of the introduction of the words "religious" and "religion" in the constitution of the Association as being done "surreptitiously or in an apologetic manner"; nor could he have used any such language as "equivocation" and "fraud," as referring even by indirect implication to the chosen phraseology of the constitution. He seems to have started in his criticism with the idea that the constitution was framed, on the one hand, as a trap to catch somebody, and, on the other, as a fence to keep somebody out. Had he been present at those early conferences, he would have seen that everything was frank, open, free; that candor ruled the hour; and that there was no other disposition than to make a platform the broadest, simplest, plainest, and most inclusive possible. That was fifteen years ago. It is quite likely, if the constitution were to be framed to-day, it might be worded somewhat differently. It has already been two or three times amended. But it certainly could not be framed with a larger, more sympathetic, or more frankly avowed purpose than animated the hearts and minds of those who first proposed and those who adopted it.

2. But it is objected that the words "religious" and "religion" either should not have been put into the constitution at all or should not have been put in without being defined. Mr. Curtis does not certainly intimate which of these alternatives he would himself favor; but he berates the Association for not taking one of them, and more especially for not defining what it means by "religion." Now, it is barely possible that a majority of the Free Religious Association might be able to unite on some one definition of religion, and insert such definition in the constitution. But the definition, if intended to be philosophically complete, would inevitably become a test of belief, and would exclude from the Association all not accepting it. Possibly, the Association thus organized on a definition of religion would be in some respects more effective than is the present Association. But it would not be the same. It would rest on a basis almost diametrically opposite. It would have a creed, albeit it might be a very rationalistic one. Starting, as the Association did, in a protest against making any forms of theological belief tests of religious fellowship, it took pains to fortify this point first of all,—that the individual opinion or belief of members should be free. It therefore organized not on unity of belief, not even on a common definition of religion, but on certain practical objects. These objects, which Mr. Curtis quotes, are expressed in the first article of its constitution.

or there would be no interest in promoting them. But this is not what is commonly meant by "belief" or "creed" in the domain of religion. There is a clear, well-understood distinction between beliefs in certain practical aims and beliefs of a speculative kind. People must have a common belief in the importance and practicability of any object whatever which they propose to accomplish together, whether it be the building of a road, the management of a bank, or the promotion of science and philanthropy. The Free Religious Association, in its corner-stone, recognized this distinction between beliefs practical and beliefs speculative. It based itself solely on certain stated practical aims, and refused to debar any persons who wished to join in working for these aims by any tests of speculative opinion or belief. All matters indeed pertaining to speculative opinion or belief it committed, under the statement of its third object, to the arena of free inquiry and discussion. If persons do not believe in these objects or do not wish to work for them in this way, of course such persons will not join the Association. But it cannot be said that they are excluded by any tests of creed which the Association has set up. There is no organization known, nor is any possible, which does not have or must not have at least the limitation of some defined practical object. But so careful has the Free Religious Association been that its limitations should be only such as necessarily inhere in all specified practical aims that it expressly states in its constitution that nothing in the phraseology of its name or constitution shall be interpreted as a creedal test of membership. It may be here said that this latter clause was added by amendment to the constitution five years after the Association was first organized, and added with the specific purpose of making it clearer than before that the use of the words "religious" and "religion" was not intended as implying theism or any other form of theological belief or as denying membership to an agnostic or an atheist who might wish to join in the practical aims of the Association. The report of the annual meeting for 1872, when this amendment was fully explained, discussed, and adopted without any dissent, gives explicit evidence on this point.

4. Now, when it is remembered that the force of this clause of the constitution was meant to bear directly back upon the statement of objects in the first article, it would seem as if it were made as plain as language could make it that the phrase, "the practical interests of pure religion,"—the portion of the statement which Mr. Curtis especially criticises as vague and equivocal,—refers to that part of religion which is concerned with conduct. The words themselves would seem to indicate this with tolerable clearness; but when from them any possible element of speculative belief, which might be supposed to be associated with the word "religion," has been expressly eliminated, what else can they mean? Historically, religion has included the two elements of belief and practical duty. In sectarian religious organizations, the united acceptance of certain creeds has been regarded as a necessary condition of promoting practical duty. The Free Religious Association has placed the practical duty, or the conduct part of religion, first, and declared that there may be unity in promoting it without the requirement of unity in creed. It may or may not have been necessary to put the adjective "pure" before the word "religion" to convey this idea. But the adjective certainly strengthens this idea, since it portrays religion as freed from the corrupting domination of theologies, and suggests the excellent illustrative definition of practical religion found in the Epistle of James in the New Testament, from which perhaps the term "pure religion" was consciously or unconsciously borrowed.

5. But the Association is criticised also for "assuming in its constitution the existence of religion." To this charge, it must doubtless plead guilty. It has assumed the existence of religion as a fact in the history of mankind, just as the geologist assumes the existence of the earth, or the astronomer the existence of the heavens, in the history of the physical universe. But it does not follow that it has, nor has it in fact, assumed any particular theory or philosophy of religion. And its platform is free even for the argument of those who think that religion rests entirely upon superstition and is to be ultimately extinguished.

6. The second part of Mr. Curtis' communication, where he comes to deal with "the scope" of the Association, requires less attention because he there confines himself chiefly to an editorial article in The Index, which he uses as if it were a semi-official statement of the position of the Association. It is only necessary to say, therefore, so far as concerns the Free Religious Association, that, though the senior editor of this paper is Secretary of that Association, his articles here, as every issue of the paper states, are to be regarded only as expressions of his own opinions. There are two points, however, under this second head to which we may briefly allude. First, Mr. Curtis objects to the title of the article he criticises, "The Synthesis of Free Thought and Religion" (which he styles "a commentary on the constitution of the Association"), because it conveys "the idea that religion is not free, or that free thought is not religious." Well, is not this a true idea with regard to a vast deal of existing religion and to not a little of existing free thought? If religion is always and necessarily free, what, pray, has the liberal party in religion been complaining of and working for the last two generations? Or, if free thought is always and necessarily religious, why do so many free thinkers object to the word "religious," as Mr. Curtis admits they do? We are talking not of what may be the case when religion shall have become perfectly developed, and free thought shall have come to its ultimate conclusions, but of things as they are to-day; and the proposition that at this present time religion and free thought are much estranged is one that hardly needs to be backed by evidence. It may here be added, as showing the unstable gait of Mr. Curtis' argument, that, whereas under the former head he called vigorously for a definition of the vague word "religion," he now exclaims: "Is it not time to ask why religion cannot stand alone? Why must it be prefaced by some vicarious epithet, such as pure, free, or ethical, nobody knows which?" The second point of criticism made against the article is that it dismisses rather cavalierly, as Mr. Curtis seems to think, two classes as having no part in the proposed reconciliation between free thought and religion. But it will require no very close re-reading of the article to see that none were dismissed except such as would regard themselves as self-dismissed,—those who on both sides had come to the fixed conclusion that no reconciliation is possible, and that there is no problem even to be entertained. For any on either side whose "judgment is yet in suspense," for any who are still willing to bring their cause before the tribunal of reason, there was no "dismissal," but it was for such that that article was specially written; and how Mr. Curtis could read into it his fancy of an arbitrary exclusion is beyond our comprehension. It may be added, too, that there is always "room for such on the Free Religious platform."

We should do injustice to our editorial colleague, were we to close without noticing the paragraph in which Mr. Curtis refers to an article of his which was printed in The Index of November 3, on "Liberalism." No candid, unprejudiced reader, we are sure, can draw from that article the inferences criticised. The paragraph is as pure a piece of misrepresentation of the article as could well be conceived, none the less so because unconsciously misrepresenting. Misrepresentation, for instance, cannot go much further than it does when Mr. Curtis, partially quoting from the article a sentence containing the terms "antichristian" and "extrachristian," throws in parenthetically "the former being put under the ban," and then goes on to the crushing climax that "it is forgotten perhaps that the name of Francis E. Abbot was forever embalmed in this antichristian strata," said strata being also designated, as if on authority of Mr. Underwood's article, as a "lower order of Liberalism"! Now, somewhat startled by the charge that The Index had been subjecting its former editor and his position to such unhandsome treatment, we have carefully looked through the article in question, and more than once, from beginning to end, but have been unable to find a word or syllable that could by any twist or turn be interpreted as drawing a distinction between "antichristian" and "extrachristian," and putting antichristian "under the ban" and consigning it to a "lower order of Liberalism." Mr. Curtis' communication throughout is, in fact, a critique, not of the Free Religious Association and of The Index editors, but of his own misconceptions of them.

W. J. POTTER.

THE DECAY OF THE OLD FAITH.

The decay of theological belief in this country the past dozen years has been very rapid. Immense numbers have been reached and sensibly influenced by lectures and writings directed against the popular faith, and a multitude of causes have combined to destroy or diminish confidence in the creeds and to diffuse unbelief far and wide.

Many who have been affected by these influences, without a scientific education, unschooled in systems of thought, and unaccustomed to much, if any, reflection on the foundation of morals, have no well-defined or well-grounded ethical philosophy; while nearly all have been taught from infancy to regard theology and morality as inseparable, the latter indeed as dependent upon and secondary to the former.

It is therefore a matter of regret that the decay of faith has not been accompanied by an equally marked acquaintance with and acceptance of that positive thought upon which modern thinkers rely to furnish the needed guarantees of a moral life and the incentives to a lofty moral character. It is unquestionable that thousands have discarded the faith with which they were taught to associate all their best conceptions of character and conduct, without understanding a philosophy divested of supernatural features and capable of supplying the motives and the basis of moral rectitude and social order. Many are in the ranks of the sceptics and free thinkers, not because of any deep or earnest thought they have given to the subject of religion, but because they have been drawn into a strong current of thought and borne along like so much driftwood on its surface. A large proportion of them are still very strongly under the influence of their early theological teachings, and are full of inherited superstitious tendencies, which are far deeper than the disbelief or doubt which they now proclaim. Hence, the inconsistency, credulity, intolerance, indifference to science, and practical disregard and dislike of scientific methods, desire for "leaders" and readiness to be led in the name of liberty and reform by demagogues, exhibited by so many professed Liberals.

It is fortunate that the average man cannot suddenly relieve himself of the influences of early belief; for, however erroneous, since it is intimately associated in his mind with moral ideas and feelings of obligation, its total destruction, before correct beliefs could be accepted and their influence could be woven into the mental structure, would leave him in an undesirable and unsafe condition. For, even in spite of the resistance offered by old beliefs and inherited tendencies, transitions have been so rapid as to involve a temporary loosening of moral restraints. In such times, the old standards are destroyed faster than the new ones can be evolved out of the confusion resulting from the mental break-up. That which has been considered the foundation of every virtue is disbelieved or doubted ere the mind has come to understand the more rational views, and especially before it has acquired the habit and the aptitude practically to connect motive and conduct with these but partially assimilated views.

In this country, the past few years, the work of destructive criticism among the pronounced Liberals has been more extensive and more felt than the labors of the comparatively few who have devoted their efforts to constructive work in the domain of thought. It is true that, in the field of science, Darwin, Haeckel, Huxley, Tyndall, and others, have, by their discoveries and reasonings, profoundly influenced thinkers and modified popular belief. Mill, Spencer, and other profound philosophic minds have given to the world positive thought, which has been received by thousands, and is percolating down through the intellectual strata of enlightened lands. A number of the best representatives of Liberalism have emphasized the positive side of liberal thought, and now and then has appeared a journal or periodical that has endeavored to gain attention and get support as an organ of positive Liberalism. Among these, The Index may be fairly classed; for there has never been a time since it first appeared when criticism has not been subordinate to the main objects of the paper. But a large class, to which we have alluded in this article, are not in a condition to be reached by these authors and publications, except indirectly and slowly, as all classes are ultimately made to feel the influence of great discoveries and reforms. The demand among such is for cheap pamphlets criticising the Bible, not for works like Spencer's Data of Ethics, Darwin's Origin of Species, Lubbock's History of Civilization, Mill's Liberty, or Lecky's History of Morals. While there has been the past dozen years a steady and enormous increase in the number of intelligent and educated free thinkers, it is also true that the number of superficial, ignorant people—who are in an anarchical condition of thought, whose Liberalism goes no further than disbelief of the Orthodox doctrines in which they were educated—has likewise increased. Many of this latter class have lately come out of the Churches or from under theological influences. And it is a noteworthy fact that the most recent devotees, the most suddenly converted Liberals, are the most unreasonable, extravagant, fanatical Liberals one meets. Some of them would like to see inaugurated, as we indicated in a previous article, a revival similar in its emotional characteristics to ordinary religious revivals; and this class has representatives who a few years ago were preachers and exhorters, and who are now utterly devoid of the scientific spirit and strangers to a philosophic mood, while they are as uncharitable and intolerant as they could have been when they denounced "infidels" from Orthodox pulpits.

That there is anything in modern liberal thought which, when fully understood, tends to encourage immorality or to sap the foundations of character, has never been shown, although this is constantly affirmed by theological writers. Even if the transition of thought in this country has been accompanied by moral disturbance along the line of the least resistance, where the old restraints are the most weakened and where the violence of passion is quick to manifest itself, we have here only what occurred in France during the early years of the Reformation. And it would be as unjust to ascribe the increased licentiousness and immorality in France during that period to the great principles of the Reformation as to ascribe similar evils to the liberal thought of to-day. In both cases, the irregularities may be due to the unsettled mental condition resulting from the rapid change from the old faith to the new.

Let no one be disheartened by the repulsive characteristics of some self-styled reformers, or the superficiality and demagogism of some self-constituted leaders, or the erratic conduct of cranks who are attracted to free platforms, or the loose theories and moral deformities of some men and women found in the ranks of Liberalism. Human nature is not perfect. The average man has but a thin coating of intellectual and moral culture, beneath which is solid savagery. The progress of the race has been marked in every age by changes which seemed to many to involve the most ruinous consequences, but which are now seen to have been but necessary incidents in great intellectual and moral movements. We must not expect that progress will continue without any exhibition of weakness and selfishness during transitional periods, when changes occur more rapidly than some minds can adjust themselves to the new conditions. These reflections suggest, however, the need of giving more prominence, during this decay of faith, to the education of the liberal public in those important principles which constitute the basis of true ethics and the foundation of character.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Established Church of England finds herself also confronted with the indifference and often with the absolute hostility of the great majority of the people dwelling in the towns of England, and who are becoming, to a greater and greater extent, the real rulers of the nation. The recent statistics as to attendance at places of worship reveal two important facts: first, that the Established Church has lost ground in England, as compared with the non-conformist bodies; and, second, and still more important, that the vast majority of the people of England have no relations with churches whatsoever. I had long been convinced, from my experience in London and in the large towns of the north of England, that this was the case; and now those who prate about a great revival of Orthodox Protestant Christianity in England must perceive under what a delusion they have been laboring. For these statistics, if they prove anything, prove that England is ceasing to be a church-going nation, in the old sense of the word. I give a few of the numerous instances recently published, showing how utterly the majority of the English people are divorced from any religious rites or ceremonies.

The most striking instance perhaps is that of Liverpool, where there is a large decrease in the attendance at Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Methodist churches. In 1853, Liverpool contained 400,000 people, and reported a church attendance of 101,982. In 1881, Liverpool had a population of 552,000; and on Sunday, October 16, the church attendance was found to be only 63,576. Thus, in the former year, one-fourth of the people were in church, in the latter less than one-eighth. The decrease in the numbers of attendants in the Anglican church was nearly 12,000, in spite of the recent endowment of a new bishopric in Liverpool. Take again the case of Newcastle. In 1851, Newcastle had a population of 87,784, and her church attendance was 18,710. In 1881, Newcastle's population was 149,000, while her church attendance had only increased to 22,534; the increase of church attendance being only 20.43 per cent., that of population over 70 per cent. Bolton has a population of 108,000, with eighty-five places of worship; but her largest church attendance on December 11 last was only 18,534, being only one-sixth of her population. On the same Sunday, there were found about 10,000 persons in the churches of Southampton, which contains a population of 60,000. Barrow, a seaport town which has grown up with remarkable rapidity, could only collect into her churches, on November 12, 8,381 persons out of a population of 47,000. Nottingham contains 188,000 inhabitants. On December 11, her largest church attendance was 37,213. Bradford, out of 194,000 persons, counted only 34,000 church-goers on December 11; Burnley, 10,800 out of a population of 63,000; Hanley, 6,621 out of 54,000; and Derby, 16,800 out of 81,000. Such figures as these speak volumes as to the attitude of the English working-classes toward the dogmas, ritual, and spirit of the churches. When every allowance is made for mitigating circumstances, an honest mind can scarcely fail to arrive at the conclusion that the old religious beliefs are largely undermined in England. The people stand outside the churches, which are given up to the bourgeois class. But, if these statistics show that the bulk of the English people are hostile or indifferent to the churches, they also show that that hostility or indifference has especially affected the Church of England. In nearly every case, the Church of England has to report a loss, both absolute and relative. She may still attract thousands to listen to the rhetoric of a Liddon or a Farrar, but the thousands of her ordinary clergy scattered over the country exercise no control or influence whatever upon the swarming masses of the ever-increasing population of England.

Now, such a curious anomaly as the Established Church of England can only exist by reason of its support in the sentiments and affections of the people; and it is just this support which it has lost. The creed of the Church, the arrogance and bigotry of her priesthood, their opposition to every reform calculated to raise the people, and the utter absurdity and incongruity of a State Church in a country like England,—all these things operate against the Established Church, and it is difficult therefore to see how its existence can be much longer maintained. As a matter of fact, it is being slowly disestablished, and the process has been going on for some years. The abolition of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828, Catholic emancipation in 1829, the establishment of civil marriage, the abolition of church rates, the opening of Universities to dissenters of all creeds, the provision of a national system of education, the Burials Act of 1880,—all these have been steps in the direction of disestablishment,—nay, have been actually parts of the process. Another important step may soon be taken; namely, in the opening of Parliament to an avowed atheist in the person of Mr. Bradlaugh. When he once takes his seat in Parliament, the old theory of a specially "Christian State," which such men as Dr. Arnold and Coleridge claimed England to be, will be given up. It is significant that such an ultra-religious man as Mr. Gladstone has admitted that the House of Commons cannot take its stand upon the "narrow ledge of theism," but must admit the equal rights of believers and unbelievers. When this is done, Mr. Bradlaugh, as a member of Parliament, will be one of the legally appointed legislators for the Anglican Church; and the spectacle of an atheist governing a professedly Christian community, regulating its creeds, ceremonies, and clergy, may perhaps open the eyes of the whole nation to the absurdity of such a proceeding. Any way, England is fairly launched on the broad ocean of popular sovereignty and human equality, and will be compelled to cast overboard her mediæval lumber, piece by piece.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

"THE RIGHTS OF THE PEWS."

Our friend, Mr. Robert Hassall of Iowa, sends us a communication with reference to the case of Mr. Miln and Unity Church, in defence of the rights of the pews. He thinks that Liberals, because of their natural sympathy with Mr. Miln as a recent convert to liberal views, are in danger of doing injustice to Unity Church for its action in terminating his ministry. After relating, with comments, the circumstances of the case, now so familiar to the public, Mr. Hassall presents the pith of his opinion as follows:—

Whether Mr. Miln has arrived at sound conclusions or not, or whether such views should be preached in Chicago or not, is not the question. It is simply one of fair dealing, of doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us in like circumstances.

If we had given our money and influence to build a "Free Religious" church, and the minister we had hired should tell us that he had become a Calvinist or a Catholic, it is more than probable, notwithstanding the inconsistency, that we should politely invite him to resign. People do not organize and give their money and build costly churches to hear what they do not believe, nay, what they regard as false.

Nor are Unitarians or Free Religionists exceptions. They may boast of their freedom and their love of truth, but they are still human. Let us be just then to Unity Church in Chicago. The people have done just what we should do in the same situation.

But this case affords another sad illustration of the false position of the pulpit. So long as the pulpit stands on theology, on old ideas, and old forms which have ceased to have any significance or value, just so long will it impose insincerity upon ministers. Perfect honesty, plain outspoken declarations of belief, would empty hundreds of pulpits, Orthodox and Unitarian. Preach, if you must, but let no man be hired permanently to preach another's creed and enact another's ceremonial and worship.

Our own criticism of Unity Church is not so much for its terminating Mr. Miln's ministry to it as for its summary dismissal of him after so short an experience of his changed views and methods. The society, after a free conference with him, having persuaded him to withdraw his resignation and remain among them with the understanding that he was to be free to preach his whole mind, was then bound to give him a fair opportunity to develop fully his new thought and practical plans for church life. In his three sermons, he had only given his philosophy of religion. The more important question remained, with what spirit and methods he would go to work to help people's lives practically; and, to show this, the society gave him no chance. If, after six months or a year, the society had discovered that Mr. Miln was not getting down below the shells of his own new doctrines to the deep realities that pertain to the upbuilding of character, but was continually preaching beliefs or non-beliefs that were antagonistic to the views of the members of the society and which they honestly believed to be a moral and spiritual detriment to them, then the society certainly could not be blamed for not retaining him in their pulpit. "Free speech" does not require that a body of people shall permanently engage to hear and pay for the preaching of doctrines which they do not believe to be true. It might be an excellent thing if George Chainey and Dr. Withrow, in Boston, could occasionally exchange places on Sunday,—good for them and for their hearers. But Mr. Chainey's society can, with justice, no more be expected permanently to hire Dr. Withrow to preach to them than the Park Street Church can be expected to settle Mr. Chainey as its pastor. Ears have rights of liberty as well as tongues. But, with a society that is really free from the sway of dogma, the test question will be, Does a preacher subordinate both beliefs and non-beliefs to a method of speech and work that aims at improving character? The mistake of Unity Church is that it has not allowed itself the opportunity nor done Mr. Miln the justice to permit this test to be applied to him.

THEORIES AND THEOLOGIES.

The explanations of man and nature are many, if we count all that have been offered from Mosaism to Darwinism. Some of these theories of men and things have had a great run and currency in the world, and perhaps they deserved to have. Mosaism even is still satisfactory to immense multitudes, who live according to tradition rather than reason, who believe rather than think. But, in reading any theory or theology which undertakes to explain the universe, one is inclined to quote the famous passage in Faust, namely:—

"Gray, worthy friend, is all your theory,
And green the golden tree of life."

Life, like Proteus of old, is apt to elude the theorists and theologians, and refuse to be defined in terms of neat propositions and articles of faith. Life is volatile and incomprehensible, or, in English, ungraspable. Meantime, there is no pressing need of a theory or theology explanatory of nature. It is easy enough to say with the theologian, "Deus fecit," that is, x made the world. But what or who is x? It is an unknown quantity which simply darkens the riddle and adds to its complexity. "For," in the words of another, "it is always possible to give a hypothetical explanation of any phenomenon whatsoever, by referring it immediately to the intelligence of some supernatural agent." The great beauty of Darwinism is that it does not go outside of nature to find an explanation of it. It does not lug in or import any outsider, and does not pretend to be on terms of intimacy with any unnatural or supernatural creative agent or agency. In general, it says that any given current state of the world is a result of all past states. All past conditions led up to the present condition of things. Each of us mortals has a vista of innumerable generations behind him, of which he is the living, breathing outcome. Each of us was sure to make his appearance at this particular era of the nature of things, with just such features and mental, moral, and bodily characteristics as we exhibit. No blame attaches to us for being exactly what we are. If there is any blame, it is to be distributed along the line of our innumerable ancestry. If we are "a bad lot," to use a slang phrase, our countless progenitors "did it." It would not be fair to say that all theories and theologies are rubbish with which one had better not encumber his mind. It is an old saw that there is no absurdity of thought or belief which has not been formulated into some philosophic system or theology. Nevertheless, there are philosophies and theories, the study of which afford a good discipline to the mind, and brighten it with gleams of truth. There are now admirable digests of the history of reflective thought, which put one compendiously and summarily in possession of a knowledge of it, so that we can learn readily how each historic generation has looked at men and things, and what their theories and beliefs have been.

For a long time, they were sufficiently absurd, necessarily so. Master minds have not been wanting from time to time, who have shed light on the problem of man and nature. These have been the beacons which are seen flaming here and there on the dark backward and abysm of time. It was a groping hither and thither in the dark for ages. At last, we have emerged from the twilight of the past, and stand on a mount of clear vision. Really modern, live people are remarkable for their reasonableness, openness to truth, tolerance, and fairness. It is an excellent mood, and indicative of better and better times ahead. Men have concluded to go to work and "save themselves" right here and now by the aid of their own intelligence and reason. Knowing exactly what the dead past amounted to, we respectfully but firmly decline to be any longer guided by its farthing candles, with the electric light of truth available to guide us. Some people profess to feel very sad that mankind are fast leaving, en masse, the old glimmering, dimly lighted theories of the past and stepping out into the daylight; but it is not a questionable or lamentable procedure at all. We Americans, being a thoroughly modern people, are not sufficiently thankful for the enviable conditions of life here. Goethe long ago expressed in one of his minor poems an envy of America for its freedom from ruined castles, useless remembrances, and vain disputes, which entangle old nations and trouble their hearts when they ought to be strong for present action. Our soil is not encumbered with picturesque rubbish, neither is it entailed or monopolized yet by the few. The present here is in the ascendant.

CAUSES OF DEAFNESS.

The Bureau of Education has published a valuable circular on the causes of deafness among school children and its influences on education, by Samuel Sexton, M.D.

Many people recognize the importance of taking care of children's eyes who do not consider the injury that may easily be done to their hearing. Yet Dr. Sexton detected thirteen per cent. of cases of defective hearing among the school children whom he examined, and estimates that five per cent. of the whole population have impaired hearing.

The principal causes of deafness among children he considers to be blows or violence producing inflammation, the presence of foreign bodies in the ear, or the collection of wax, cold in the head, dental irritation from diseased teeth, the admission of water into the ears, in diving, bathing, etc., the use of the nasal douche, the habit of sniffing water up the nose, many of the common diseases of childhood, and the pernicious habit of clipping the hair short, especially around the ears.

The whole circular is worthy the careful attention of parents and teachers.

E. D. C.

The Presbyterian says: "We conclude that there are no duties owed by God to man, no responsibility on the part of God to man." That is to say, sentient creatures capable of enjoyment and suffering, having been brought into existence without their knowledge or consent by a being of infinite power and knowledge, have no rights which such a being is morally bound to respect. The Creator is supreme, yet exempt from duty and responsibility: the creature is ignorant and weak, yet duty and responsibility belong exclusively to him. This may be sound theology, but it is not justice.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Christian Union is grateful to Dr. Stebbins for his Study of the Pentateuch, and even extravagantly rates it as a book "to be put on the same shelf with Professor Norton's Genuineness of the Gospels, and Prof. Ezra Abbot's recent monograph on the Authorship of the Fourth Gospel—strong defences all of important orthodox positions by Unitarian scholars." But it abates much from its praise, and also shows itself more affected by modern Biblical criticism than Dr. Stebbins has been, when it adds:—

But there are large questions raised by the new criticism, which he does not answer. How came it that for one nation its whole civil as well as moral and religious code grew for forty years, and then ceased to grow while the nation had afterward centuries of active municipal and religious life? This is contrary to all the analogies of history. Where was this code preserved and by whom in the long periods in which, so far as we can learn, its most important provisions were disregarded, even by holy men like Samuel and Elijah? If the whole Pentateuch came from the hand of one man, whence the strange and disordered mingling of subjects, the many repetitions, and the frequent occurrence of laws that it is most difficult to reconcile with one another? If forty years made so many modifications necessary, how could hundreds of years pass away, and no occasion arise for further modifications? Professor Stebbins suggests no way of meeting these and many kindred difficulties.

THE contradictory accounts that come from Kansas as to the working of the constitutional provision in that State against the sale of spirituous liquors as a beverage, and the difficulty of getting authentic testimony in the matter, are perhaps partially explained by the following story which we find in the Christian Statesman:—

A long letter from Kansas, claiming that prohibition is a failure, appeared not long since in the St. Louis Republican. Mr. Hoofstittler, who had stumped the State of Kansas for prohibition with Governor St. John, and who was familiar with the facts in the case, wrote an answer, claiming for the new law a fair degree of success. As it did not appear, he wrote again, inquiring why it was refused. The reply was: "If you will pay fifty dollars ($50), we will insert it. The whiskey men paid that for the other."

In the long struggle against slavery, the power of commerce was against the abolitionists. The cry was, "If you touch slavery, you destroy millions of dollars worth of Northern trade with the South." There are some indications that, in the struggle to overthrow that "twin relic of barbarism," polygamy, the same power may be found in opposition. According to the Chicago Advance, it has come to the knowledge of the anti-polygamy committee in that city that certain New York merchants have telegraphed to members of Congress: "New York sold $13,000,000 worth of goods to Utah last year. Hands off!"

THE Independent has an editorial article on the Sunday opening of libraries and museums,—a question which is being agitated in New York. Among the leading clergymen of the city, six favor the opening, where twelve oppose. According to the Independent,—

Among those who oppose are such weighty men as Dr. William M. Taylor, Dr. John Hall, Dr. Howard Crosby, Dr. Talbot W. Chambers, Dr. William F. Morgan, and Father Preston (Roman Catholic); while the six who favor it are the three Episcopalians, R. H. Newton, J. H. Rylance, and F. C. Ewer; the Universalist, J. M. Pullman; the Unitarian, Robert Collyer; and the Methogational, Dr. Newman.

We advise the twelve "weighty" opponents to visit the Boston Public Library and Art Museum on Sunday, and learn how admirably the Sunday opening of these institutions is working. The Independent, at the outset of its article, confesses that its own sympathies and prejudgments are all against the proposed change. But, after weighing the arguments, it closes by saying:—

As we forecast the future, it is only a question of time when the libraries and museums shall be opened. It has got to come, whatever the opposition of the Church, because it affords a simple and innocent and helpful way of spending the day of rest for those who are occupied with long, hard toil during the week. It has got to come, because it gives the poor what the rich have in their homes. After all, Plato Johnson [a colored correspondent who goes for opening] is right in saying that the rich man in his private study takes a book from his shelves on Sunday afternoon and reads it, and no fault is found. It is hard to make it seem right to forbid the poor man to do the same thing, on the ground that it is a sin. If such respect of persons is Christian, we must not be surprised that "the masses" are becoming hostile to the Church.

THE Chicago correspondent of the Boston Congregationalist writes of Unity Church and Mr. Miln rather suggestively in this fashion:—

It is a curious psychological study to witness the treatment of a heretic at the hands of a sect who claim a monopoly of the principle of religious toleration, and who are rather free in charging the orthodox sects with illiberality and narrowness. On Monday night, the friends of Unity Church met to consider the case. It was an excited meeting. At first, they gave Mr. Miln twenty minutes to make his defence, and afterward reluctantly extended it to forty. They seemed to be in no mood for candid discussion, nor did they care to spend time defining their standards of faith, in order to judge whether their pastor's "latest thought" was good Unitarianism. By a large majority, they voted to dispense with his services as pastor. He had hardly as good a chance as Paul had before Agrippa. Mr. Miln thinks they have struck a blow at Unitarianism, by their hasty action, which they could ill afford to do. I fancy that, when he recalls the pleasant words and remembering prayers of the council in Brooklyn, which dismissed him when he parted company with us, he will think that the denomination that makes a specialty of liberality and toleration can treat a man almost as badly as the bigoted, narrow orthodox bodies do.

THE Jewish Watchman says:—

Mr. Moritz Ellinger, the representative of the Hebrew Emigrant Aid Society of New York, writes very encouraging letters from London. The reception tendered him by the most prominent Israelites of London was warm and hearty, and they manifested a great interest to advance the success of his mission. Thus far, £50,000 have been raised. Mr. F. D. Mocatta, a prominent and wealthy Israelite, obligated himself to contribute one per cent. on any sum, not exceeding £1,000,000, collected within two years. The Aid Society of New York is shortly to receive $30,000 of this money.

In what terms will the historian of fifty years hence describe the civilization of this generation, when in his search for facts concerning it he comes across such true items as these, which we clip from a recent number of one of our exchanges? "At Falmouth, in England, some three months ago, the goods and chattels of a Quaker were sold by auction to meet his proportion of the rectors' rates, and, as the sum realized was insufficient, another sale was announced to follow in a day or two. At the same time, in the mart at Tokenhouse-yard, London, was going on another sale equally scandalous to religion. It was the power of appointment to the sacred office with all the temporal benefits annexed to it, and the sale took place along with other freehold and leasehold property. There was made a protest against this sale by a Churchman, who denounced it as a scandal. Although one was also made at the sale of the Quaker's goods, it was not made by a Churchman, but by a Quaker."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"THE Holy Thorn" is the subject of a contribution from the pen of Moncure D. Conway, which will appear in The Index next week.

WE are indebted to Mrs. S. A. Underwood for valuable office and editorial work the past seven weeks, during the absence of the junior editor.

THE Salvation Army in England has recruited its ranks to some purpose, and has at the same time made the financial salvation of its five hundred and eighty-five paid officers secure; for the organization has now an income of $285,000, and is about to erect for its head-quarters a building to cost $100,000, one-half of which sum has been already subscribed.

AS ANNOUNCED last week, we expected to print in this issue the sermon which Rev. Mr. Stewart of Lynn preached to his society in memory of Samuel Johnson. But Mr. Johnson's many friends naturally desired to have the sermon in more permanent form, and it has been put accordingly into a neat pamphlet. We readily yielded our purpose to their desire. The discourse is a fine but deserved tribute to Mr. Johnson's character.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal, in an editorial entitled "Outgrowing the Pulpit," remarking on the prevalent non-attendance at Orthodox churches, says: "It would be easy to answer the question, 'What ails the preachers?' The church authorities will not allow vigorous thought; . . . and, when a preacher insists on being something more than a theological mummy, gibbering the set forms of antiquity, he is at once cut off from the fellowship of the Church."

MR. POTTER is quite correct in pronouncing the reference of Mr. T. W. Curtis, in another column, to an editorial which appeared in The Index of November 3, "as pure a piece of misrepresentation of the article as could well be conceived, none the less so because unconsciously misrepresenting." It is only necessary for Mr. Curtis to read the article to which he refers to become convinced of his inexcusable carelessness. We forgive him this time on condition that he does not repeat the offence.

"THE crowning characteristic of General Garfield's religious opinions," says Mr. Blaine, "as, indeed, of all his opinions, was his liberality. In all things, he had charity. Tolerance was of his nature. He respected in others the qualities which he possessed himself,—sincerity of conviction and frankness of expression. With him, the inquiry was not so much what a man believes, but does he believe it? The lines of his friendship and his confidence encircled men of every creed, and men of no creed; and, to the end of his life, on his ever-lengthening list of friends were to be found the names of a pious Catholic priest and of an honest-minded and generous-hearted free-thinker." In this passage, the Christian Statesman thinks Mr. Blaine "lays needless stress on what he claims as a liberal quality" in President Garfield's faith.

OBJECTING to the ruling by which some names were omitted from the Unitarian Year-Book for 1882, Unity says:—

The Unitarian Association, a corporation of individuals, has undertaken to circumscribe the Unitarian fellowship within certain theological limits represented by the word "Christian," and have proceeded to compile their list of Unitarian ministers on this basis, while a large number of those who represent the Unitarian ministry and laity are profoundly interested in the effort of making the word and the movement co-extensive with all noble, constructive, and non-creedal workers in the domain of religion. We maintain that the word "Unitarian" is broader than the word "Christian," dogmatically interpreted; for it existed before Jesus was born, and now has representatives among those who are not within the stream of Christian inheritance, and it represents a phase of religion whose foundations lie deeper than any one historic or personal leader.

THE New Religion (Universalist) says that there are several Mormon churches in Maine, "under the leadership of Joseph Smith, who frequently visits them, and is revered by the members as a prophet." This paper adds:—

Very singularly, as it may appear, many of these Maine Mormons were once Universalists, who had listened to the preaching of the late Dr. Fisher, and were received by him into the Universalist Church. Some of these people followed Adams to the Holy Land, and, after the disaster that befell their colony at Joppa, returned to listen to the Mormon preachers. We had occasion to ask numbers of these people, some months ago, why they should change Universalism, first for Adventism and then for Mormonism, to be as often told that they had seen new light in the Scriptures. And never have we seen more devout and earnest people. They seemed to have the whole Bible at tongue's end, and, for every question asked, numberless quotations of Bible texts.

ONE of Mr. Rowland Connor's latest Sunday evening lectures at East Saginaw, Mich., was on "The Origin of Language," and it was evidently an able effort. A report was published in the East Saginaw Express, which speaks of the lecture in the highest terms. The lecturer's conclusions in regard to the origin of language were as follows: 1. We can undoubtedly account for the origin of a large part of existing language. 2. Man has not lost the power of creating new root forms, although not called upon to exercise it very often, because existing forms suffice for his use. 3. The origin of many root forms is hidden in the obscurity of the past. 4. But the conclusion is irresistible that the origin of all language must be explained by methods analogous to those which have already explained so large a part of it. 5. The great and rapid fluctuations in savage languages show that thousands of early languages must have originated and died long before anything resembling our great existing languages appeared. 6. There never was, therefore, anything worthy the name of a primitive language from which all other languages have descended. 7. No existing language has anything near the same age as the human race.

In a lecture before the Toronto Secular Society, Mr. Stout, one of its members, said, as reported in a paper of that city:—

To judge of Christ's work by ignoring the parties in the Jewish Church, by overlooking what advance in many centuries the Jewish religion had made, would be as wise as if we were to assume that Shakspeare was the first dramatist, and to ignore all that his predecessors had done. It does not lessen our reverence for the genius of our greatest dramatist to know that he did not coin his plots, and that many of his plays are old plays refurbished. Nor should it lessen our reverence for Christ's work to know what those who had been in Palestine had done before him. Will it lessen our reverence for his genius, for his moral excellence to learn that the doctrine of immortality had been preached by the Essenes, that enlightened Pharisees, like Rabbi Hillel, had said, "Judge not thy friend until thou comest into his place"; or again, "What is hateful to thyself do not to thy neighbors"; or again, "Be a follower of Aaron, who sought peace, loved men, and led them to the Law"; "Much righteousness, much peace." Yes, the synagogues were schools, of morality, schools of intellectuality and of religion, and do not let us imagine that when Christianity arose there was no morality, no faith, no lofty aspirations among the Jewish people. If there had been none such, Christ could not have been there, nor could Christianity have been founded.

In an article in the March number of the North American Review, John Fiske says: "The immediate consequence of Luther's successful revolt was the formation of a great number of little churches, each with its creed as clean cut and as thoroughly dried as the creed of the great church from which they had separated, each making practically the same assumption of absolute infallibility, each laying down an intellectual assent to sundry transcendental dogmas as an exclusive condition of salvation. This formation of new sects has gone on down to the present time, and there is no reason why it should not continue in future; but the period when educated men, of great and original powers, could take part in work of this sort has gone by forever. The foremost men are no longer heresiarchs: they are free thinkers, each on his own account; and the formation of new sects is something which in the future is likely to be more and more confined to ignorant or half-educated classes of people. At the present day, it is not the formation of new sects, but the decomposition of the old ones, that is the conspicuous phenomenon inviting our attention. The latter half of the nineteenth century will be known to the future historian as especially the era of the decomposition of orthodoxies. People as a rule do not now pass over from one church into another; but they remain in their own churches while modifying their theological opinions, and in this way the orthodoxy of every church is gradually but surely losing its consistency."

REV. A. BRAY, a sensational preacher at Montreal, who talks on subjects he knows nothing about, recently stated that agnostics say, "Behold we know not anything," and affirmed that agnostics are all young men, and their profession of ignorance is the result of "juvenile conceit." To this, "Agnostic" replies in the Spectator as follows: "This is certainly an original conception of juvenile conceit, and Mr. Bray is to be congratulated on the great discovery of such a complete revulsion of feeling in the rising generation. Modesty is at last asserting herself, and our young men are giving up the old habits of brag and bluster about what they know, and are willing to acknowledge that there are at least some things which they don't know. In my simplicity, I imagined that there was something praiseworthy in such conduct; but, as Mr. Bray distinctly says otherwise, I suppose I must be mistaken. In regard to his statement that they are all young, very young men, however, I think I may say with some degree of confidence that he is wrong." "Agnostic" next shows the incorrectness of the statement that agnostics are all young men. The mention of Herbert Spencer as the foremost representative of agnosticism furnishes the occasion for Rev. Mr. Bray to make further exposure of his ignorance. He replies in this fashion: "I must take exception to 'Agnostic' statement that Herbert Spencer is to be counted among the avowed agnostics. It would be difficult to say where he is in a theological sense, and I hardly think he would be able to define it himself satisfactorily."

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

POETRY.

CHARGE OF A BLACK CAVALRY REGIMENT.

A flash of granite faces black,
A glint of steel against the sky,
The thunder of a thousand hoofs,
A thousand hearts with purpose high.

Blow, glory-breathing bugles, blow!
Shatter the bitter-brazen air!
Peal out the slaves' defiance wild!
Rouse red-eyed Slaughter from her lair!

Hark to the loud exultant cheers
That mingle with the cannon's crash!
Heard you the shock of the avalanche?
Saw you the gleaming sabres flash?

The red fire leaps, the red blood flows;
Oh, well they know to stand their ground.
Darkness and death are in their blows;
At last their day of wrath is found.

LAND, LIGHT, WATER, AIR.

Thus far Natura Rerum has been foiled
And made a partial foster-mother hard.
Whereas for all was meant her kind regard,
The few have won it, while the many toiled,
And on an acreage they owned not moiled.
Light, water, air, could not be fenced, but vain
Are these to him who footing cannot gain
Upon the bosom of his mother earth,
Whither at last all go, whence all have birth.
To be a man is a distinction high,
A title to the soil as well as air.
'Twill be for Reason, Science, to take care
This title is made good, that usury
And fraud and force no longer breed despair.

AIM AND SCOPE OF FREE RELIGION.

BY T. W. CURTIS.

The root of justice is fair play. Every day's events are fraught with the lesson. Nothing is of more evil omen in life than the disposition to conceal or distort a truth or a fact. Facts syllable to us the knowledge of the Infinite. The crow and laugh of triumphant falsehood (partialism in thought or action) is the great dissonance in history. The Index I love and revere as the gospel of candor and impartiality, which is the essence of every creed that has advantaged the human race. I propose to take an outside view of Free Religion, which assumes to be the vital organic product of all past religious beliefs, affirming a universal element or principle, amid the special characteristics of each. It assumes not only to run parallel with the liberalistic tendencies of the times, but to represent and embody them, being the fountain of their life. The Free Religious Association is the representative of this new faith. After some fourteen years of experiment, it feels the necessity of a readjustment of its relations to the world in general, but to the liberal movement especially, which has become so very diffused, self-conscious, aggressive. The view I offer will be from the stand-point of the Liberal, a part of the plea of the unchurched.

Error defends and perpetuates itself by force, mystery and fraud, which are often disguised under the form of Ostracism, Sentimentalism, and Equivocation. Reason's catechism takes the form of aim, scope, and tendency, the triple test to which all isms, Liberalism included, must be subjected. I shall consider the first two.

1. Its Aim.—The objects of the Free Religious Association are "to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership." And it is further declared that "nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall be so construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief." But "the end" and "the objects" of the Association are supposed to be definitely set forth. Now, religion is the pivotal thought of the chief article of the Constitution, and yet this thought is introduced surreptitiously or in an apologetic manner. Where first used ("pure religion"), it is wedded to an adjective that does not define, and in the next instance ("man's religious nature and history") it is used adjectively without having been defined. Considering that the word "religion" is one of the most misleading in the language, that obscurity tends to confusion of thought, and this to error of conduct, is such a use of the word befitting the occasion, — in other words, is it either religious or scientific? Religion is no equivocal, a mere makeshift of the hour; for that is worse than nescience, which is open and avowed. Constitutions are valueless or subversive of their own ends, when burdened with words or phrases of a vague or doubtful signification; for this is indicative of uncertainty or compromise, which stamps its character on the final result. A muddy fountain sends forth turbid waters. The now acting President of the Association very properly urged Free Religious teachers to "the use of words of a clear, lucid, and transparent meaning, in order that the common mind might understand." But this advice is a two-edged sword. The Constitution of the United States is perhaps as perfect an instrument in respect to comprehensiveness and simplicity as the human mind ever framed; but it contains two words, at least, whose indefiniteness has threatened a nation's life,—citizen and religion,—"citizen" leaving the status of the colored race and of woman undefined, and "religion" leaving everything undefined. To say that "Congress shall not prohibit the free exercise of religion" depends on whether it antagonizes the public good or the spirit of democracy. Such religions are scarce. The Liberal League, it would seem, makes a rather unwarrantable use of the word "religion," seeming to identify it with the Church, in separating which from the State would be divorcing religion and law. This assumes that the contents of law and of religion have been proven to be disparate, whereas no such thing has been done. This appears to be a kindred error to that of the Free Religious Association, in assuming in its Constitution the existence of religion; and this is a feature these organizations appear to possess in common with Unitarianism, which by its surreptitious use of the word "Christ" or "Christianity" kidnaps the understanding. "No test of speculative opinion or belief!" Why, the Association does assume to draw the line between the speculative and non-speculative by the repeated use of the word "religion" in its Constitution. Its creed in fact excludes the orthodox believer by the use of the word "scientific," and it excludes the rationalist by the arbitrary use of the word "religious." This brings us to the question of the scope of Free Religion.

2. Its Scope.—Mr. W. J. Potter's deeply interesting editorial, in The Index of January 5, on "The Synthesis of Free Thought and Religion," gives an elaborate definition of religion, with a view to defining the position of Free Religion. Religion possesses the three phases of thought, feeling, and practice, each having relation to the universe and its vital powers. But this definition is ex-cathedra, and may or may not represent the average belief of the Association, and may or may not partake of the nature of "speculative opinion or belief." Still, Mr. Potter may be regarded as good authority. His views will undoubtedly be accepted as such. So I would say that the very title of his article, "The Synthesis of Free Thought and Religion," is itself a commentary on the Constitution of the Association. These words convey the idea that religion is not free, or that free thought is not religious. Is it not time to ask why religion cannot stand alone? Why must it be prefaced by some vicarious epithet, such as pure, free, or ethical, nobody knows which? Thought is free in its very essence. Is religion to undergo a synthesis with something else, before presenting to us the spherical idea of right and duty, responsibility and freedom. If so, what is that thing in which these twin essences are made transparent to the light of the universe? It is then confessed that, to give perfect scope to religion, it must unite itself with other elements, which "the essential idea of religion" or "pure religion" does not embrace. Is it possible to ascertain the relative value or proportionate amounts of this synthetic compound? This is no hypercritical question, for Unitarianism assumes to take in all that is good and true in its "circle of Christianity," and the liberal mind is more weary than it once was of this double twist of ecclesiastical chicanery.

There are two classes Mr. Potter dismisses from his colloquy on this interesting theme,—the theologian who takes the stand that religion rests on a ground peculiarly its own, and is not to be brought into the court of reason at all, and "those Liberals who regard the question as decided in the negative," since rational criticism has "left nothing which can be called religion." The latter stand on one extreme corresponding to the other extreme occupied by the theologian. "The one dogmatizes in affirmations, the other in negations." Is this true? That there are those who dogmatize in negations is certainly true, but it is no less true that there are those who have reached their conclusions by laborious and conscientious research. Neither do they treat opposite views with sneers or lofty disdain, but stand prepared to meet them with such weapons as reason gives. Does their position "correspond with that of the dogmatic theologian"? May it not even be said that the free religionist and theologian belong to the same category, inasmuch as the faith of both is founded on assumptions or on belief? And the only class left to arbitrate on this "problem of problems that confronts the philosophical religious thinker of to-day" is the one that "believes that religion may yield again to the transforming power of the freest thought, to survive in some more rational form for better service." But what of yet another class whose judgment on this "problem of problems" is yet in suspense, because they think the verdict not yet given, and who attach different degrees of probability to the doubtfulness or certainty of the issue, but whose strongest desire is to hear all sides and see fair play? Is there no room for them on the Free Religious platform? Are the two classes I have mentioned to be debarred the society of "philosophical religious thinkers," and have no part in "promoting the practical interests of pure religion"? May not the disbelief or suspense of judgment belonging to these two classes be the accompaniment of a pure and large-minded Liberalism?

One of the present editors of The Index (the organ of the Free Religious Association), in a recent article on Liberalism, while seeming to wish for a platform so worded as to make clear the distinction between antichristian and extrachristian (the former being put under the ban), says, "Meanwhile, organization on the broad plan of the Free Religious Association, which invites to its membership earnest men and women of every belief," etc., "is worthy of all encouragement." But, as already shown, the Association does not "invite to its membership earnest men and women of every belief." But "meanwhile" is a suggestive word. It is the "meanwhile" that is written to-day in secret characters over the portals of superstition, to which those hold the key who enter with scepticism in their hearts and a smile of complacency on their lips. They cannot surely be of the class to whom Mr. Potter refers as believing that "religion will yield to the transforming power of the freest thought, and survive in some more rational form for better service," though, he says, "a large section of this class is inside of the Churches, and even in those of the Evangelical order"! Liberals, I am inclined to think, are not disposed to trust the shaping of their spiritual destiny to such a class, and not even to the class that puts its main emphasis on the distinction of antichristian and extrachristian, as indicating the lower and higher order of Liberalism. It is forgotten perhaps that the name of Francis E. Abbot, and of others that are a synonyme for intellectual virility and moral purity, was forever embalmed in this antichristian strata, when in its hot molten state it poured volcano-like over the land. And the crater still smokes.

In another sense is the scope of Free Religion made narrow. Its teachers are to be college-trained and university-bred. No qualities acquired in life's school of manifold experience, by triumphs over difficulties and temptations, though linked with studious habits of mind, can constitute one a preacher of this modern gospel. Is it the most learned and intellectually gifted that have shaped and swayed the fortunes of the race? Have not those done at least equally as much whose natures were energized and whose ideals were purified in struggles with an untoward fate? The reality at the heart of things is most likely to be reached by him whose head, heart, and hand are accustomed to act in unison. No curse of our time equals that of the slight esteem in which manual labor is held. In theory it is praised, in practice scorned. The "culture" of the times has little or no relation to industrial pursuits or physical development; and the occupants of pulpits are not aware how large a proportion of their number seek it at the cost of manhood.

It is semi-officially declared, or intimated, that the creed of Free Religion is righteousness, brotherhood, and truth, or, which is the same, freedom, fellowship, and character. But the Constitution of the Association does not so read. This being the case, it cannot claim to embrace all that is good or true in Liberalism. The truth is, it must repel some as good and noble souls as it attracts. A host of spirits loyal to truth and to humanity will remain outside; and in their ranks will be men and women of fine and heroic mould, who may or may not be able to answer all questions in history or philosophy, who may or may not be conversant with all the forms of ethnic religion, but whose culture will be of both strong and delicate fibre, rising above "fine fancies" and "clever sayings" and "commonplace aphorisms," because it will be rooted in the subsoil of our common humanity, and made to pulsate with the life-giving energies of the world of toil, sorrow, joy, and hope.

"He who sneers at any living hope
Or aspiration of a human heart
Is just so many stages less than God,
That universal and all-sided love."

CURRENT SCIENCE NOTES.

CHARLES CROCKER, of railroad fame, has just given $20,000 to the California Academy of Sciences, "the income to assist such members as have by their devotion to scientific investigation necessarily excluded themselves from acquiring support through the ordinary vocations." This will give life to men like the veteran botanist Kellogg, uncle of Clara Louise. Though an old Californian, he had never means to visit and study the Big Trees, until it came into the heart of a charitable friend to defray his expenses there.

THE most important out of forty-five important botanical works issued the past year is Volume II. of the Botany of California, edited by Sereno Watson, of the Herbarium at Cambridge. A valuable list of persons who have made botanical collections in California is appended. This list contains the names of several women. The two volumes now in print, comprising twelve hundred pages, are a monument to the ability of the authors, and to the generosity of California business men, who defray all expense attending.

W. R. GERALD, of the Torrey Bulletin, is collecting and arranging the common names of plants of the United States. A list of the Indian names ought to be added. The editors of the first volume of California Botany added, in fine type, at the expense of compactness, much of the popular lore of plants to the scientific descriptions, thereby winning the thanks of amateurs. Professor Gray opposed this, his own books being severely scientific; but Professors Hildgard and Brewer were for a little flesh and color upon the bare bones of science.

HENCEFORTH, worm is to be written with a big letter. Darwin forces us to confess, "All are but parts of one stupendous whole." To clothe a naked globe in a garment of soil, the great glacier must crush the granite, the sea must fret the fragments into dust, to be triturated finally in the gizzard of an earthworm. Lately, a worm less innocent has been caught destroying the iron wire of a submarine cable off Singapore; and the scientific fellows have drawn his picture to an "annulet," so that we may know the rogue when he bores his way into the Atlantic.

MICHIGAN has been sending abroad for new species of bees. Two species found in Ceylon build, the one an immense comb on the under side of the branches, the other delicate and beautiful combs in the hollows of trees and rocks. The apiaries of the Michigan Agricultural College are Syrianized, the Syrian bee being an indefatigable worker without regard to climate or season.

THE same State hives her human waifs with no less care than her bees. She keeps records of their pedigrees and previous environment as carefully as may be. Professor Gunning has been searching these records for facts bearing on some questions of heredity. He finds that healthy environment of the offspring will not very much modify a bequest of mental or moral disorder from the parent. The Michigan records go far to sustain the words of Ribot, that education has little influence except on mediocre natures. If we imagine human minds arranged in a linear series, idiosyncrasy would be at one end of the scale and genius at the other. The influence of education would be maximum at the middle and minimum at each end. For the lowest and most vicious in the Michigan hive, little or nothing can be done. Some of the boys have to be watched at night to prevent them from escaping to sleep with the pigs. One boy eats potato bugs and earthworms.

DELAUNAY, in the Popular Science Monthly of last December, asserts that woman marches about a century behind man,—that she is now going through the phases that men have passed, in arts, letters, science, and philosophy, and that it is not yet clear whether she is an imitator or an originalist, that the two sexes tend to diverge from each other as we proceed from the lower to the higher classes. Hence, the sexes among peasants and working people have nearly the same moral and intellectual facilities, sympathize more fully with one another, and are not easily estranged. Among the intelligent classes, the difference is widened by the preëminence (!) of the man, which results in the forming of separate coteries. This seems to be increasing, as some judge, from evidence given in families and in gatherings of men and women. The editor speaks with dread of the deluge of letters written "in pale ink and hair strokes" that would come on him from the printing of this article; but it must have been strictly local, as we have not heard of any tidal wave from it.

DR. HAHN supports his claim to have found fossil organisms in meteoric stone by photo-lithographic plates of transparent sections of the rock, showing fifty species of polyps, crinoids, and algae. Such remnants of aquatic life duplicated in silicious casts would prove the shattered planet to have had a tolerably long existence.

A DISCUSSION has been going on in the Anthropological Institute, London, on the alleged diminution in size of men's heads. Professor Flower calls for more evidence from the batters. It is suggested that this decrease appears with other degenerate features, since sanitary discoveries have resulted in the survival of weaklings.

IS THE world drying up? In spite of experience, men still hold that the cutting down of trees diminishes the rain-fall. The portion of the north-west which has suffered most from drought is the most heavily timbered. The forest belt of Michigan was so parched that the fires burned to a crisp a strip fifty miles long by thirty wide. Three-fourths of all the water that falls on the earth goes down into the soil. Only one drop out of four finds its way into the surface circulation. A portion of that which sinks may come up in springs, or find its way to the ocean by underground circulation. In every rain-fall, a portion is permanently withdrawn. The rivers of America are shrivelled remnants of their former selves. California is laced by a net-work of fossil river-beds. Humboldt foresaw that in the course of nature California would become entirely, as she is in part, a desert state. The interference of man with the course of nature will alone save her from Humboldt's prediction. Von Richtofen has seen that the watercourses of Japan and China are shrunken. The hydrographic surveys made in India prove that the rain-fall there has greatly diminished.

PROFESSOR LOCKWOOD has found two specimens of the paper or pearly nautilus, with traces of recent habitation, off Long Branch. As it is a tropic species, the professor wants to know, "What's up with the Gulf Stream?"

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FUNERAL OF SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Editors of The Index.—

We hear so often from friends in Orthodox folds that all which concerns death must be especially gloomy, if one does not believe in the ordinary forms of faith, that it seems worth while to comment on the services lately held over Mr. Johnson, apart from the personal interest attaching to them in the minds of many of your subscribers.

Entering the train on its way to North Andover, one was struck with the lack of all outward forms and shows of grief, though the trembling lip that smiled a cheerful welcome told all too plainly the depth of feeling. Conventional mourning there was none. Friends greeted each other with a warmth that showed the heartfelt sympathy; but there were no long faces or perfunctory tributes to the departed. The sun shone, the snow glittered, the landscape stretched away with a spotless purity that spoke to all hearts of the soul about us, whose earthly tabernacle, so suddenly overthrown, we were to bear reverently back to the bosom of the Great Mother he had loved so well.

Here was no ghastly array of funeral carriages, no mummery of paid official woe to blot the beauty of the wondrous day. Friends and neighbors, the richer and the poorer, were gathered about the little wayside station with their sleighs, ready to welcome all comers, and care for them as personal acquaintances, or rather as brothers and sisters in one common loss. The generous spirit of the man we mourned appeared to pervade it all.

The kindly preparation for personal comfort, the friendly gathering in the ladies' public parlors, the hospitality, the universal good feeling, seemed a reflection of his own abounding friendliness.

Seldom are services so simple and so sincere. No emblems and symbols are there, except an unassuming, graceful drapery of black and white around the pulpit, a single wreath of flowers, and one of wheat and ivy. But, as we look into the faces of the large audience gathered within the meeting-house, we read one story in them all.

The wealthy man of business, the elegant littérateur, the old reformer, the intelligent gentlewoman, the honest farmer, or the laborer who has known Mr. Johnson in his fields,—it is a common tribute of reverence and of love.

The young clergyman rises in his pulpit, and reads from saints and sages noble sentences which speak the faith of the man who lies before us. Then, "Let us comfort and lift up our hearts," says the preacher, "with inspiring words our friend has left us"; and one of Mr. Johnson's fine hymns is sung by the congregation. "Since he came among us five years ago," proceeds the settled pastor of the parish, "we have felt that Mr. Johnson was in truth the minister to us all. . . . We should be recreant to him and to the faith he has taught us, if we could not rise above our grief." And the eulogy proceeds in a clear, firm voice to the end. Manly, straightforward, he simply tells the story of Mr. Johnson's life as he has known it,—his reverent spirit, his love of nature, his worship of the eternal principles of goodness and truth, his fearlessness in the cause of right, his large-hearted, generous sympathy, his kindness to all men, and the delicate humor which played around and lightened the stern earnestness of the reformer and champion of freedom. It is the man himself who speaks to us from a heart that knew and loved him. Then, when we have listened to the latest friend, the companion of his early labors and hopes ascends the pulpit, and tells us of his youth, of the beauty which Holman Hunt might have painted as the young Carpenter in the workshop. "And it always seemed to me," adds Mr. Higginson, "that the shadow of the cross very early fell on Johnson." The key-note of his life, self-abnegation, is sounded,— "the nobility of attitude, in the presence of which all earthly success is made to seem almost vulgar." "The famous archer shoots his arrow to the horizon; but the other comes, and at a single step stands where the arrow of the first has fallen."

Eloquent, graceful, and tender, the tribute flows on to its close; and another rises to testify to the real success of Mr. Johnson's life, his spotless purity of motive, and the just recognition which has been accorded to his valuable labors in the fields of philosophy and universal religion by the most competent foreign authority.

Mrs. Adams' inspiring hymn is sung; and, with a benediction from the pastor, the simple services are over. The guests from out of town gather again at the rooms made ready for them, to wait till the hour comes when the bodily presence of our common friend must be taken from among the people who, in five short years, had learned to love him so devotedly.

His neighbors bear their precious burden forth from the meeting-house, and the informal procession slowly winds down the hill as afternoon shadows begin to lengthen, and the silver whiteness of gleaming uplands turns to a golden radiance,—fitting symbol of his purity and the sublimity of his exalted faith. Tender hands place the outward form of their friend upon the train, the guests bid a grateful good-by to these thoughtful hosts, and we are speeding away toward the quiet city of his birth.

There, as the glowing twilight deepens into the mystic beauty of the cloudless night, all that is mortal of Samuel Johnson is laid to rest. Above him, tall fir-trees stretch their protecting arms; and, as the glorious day fades softly, the first crescent moon of spring time and friendly stars look calmly down upon his new-made grave.

The spirit of the man has been with us, his abiding faith, his pervading cheerfulness, his sublime constancy. It is a benediction. He has spoken it. It abides in all our hearts and minds forever. W. F. A.

SALEM, MASS., March 1, 1882.

A LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27, 1882.

Since I wrote you last, the discolored æsthetic mists have retreated to the Gehenna which seems necessary for their purification, and we have been on fairer souls intent. The Washington papers distinguished themselves by announcing that Mayor Herschel of London, England, had arrived at the Arlington with his daughter; but, in a few hours, the cards sent out for Mrs. Baird's reception of welcome relieved the distraught public mind, and, instead of a Lord Mayor, we prepared to receive a distinguished scientist with his sister, children of Sir John Herschel and grandchildren of the better known astronomer, William. Mrs. Baird's receptions are preëminent in attraction; for she makes no effort to gather in all the world, and every person to whom her guests are introduced is of some significance in the progress of the race. Alexander Agassiz was caught at noon running north from Mexico, and loosed in season to depart the next morning for Cambridge. The "Mining Engineers" had been holding an entertaining conference in the Record Room of the National Museum; and several of the most distinguished, including Sterry Hunt with his red button, remained to do the strangers honor. George Bancroft, the aged historian, somewhat changed from the dainty young man who shook the dust of Boston from his feet some forty years ago, found Mrs. Baird's hours early enough to please him, and came out of the retirement which he usually prefers.

Major Herschel has spent the greater part of his life in India, but his fresh complexion and hair of Saxon gold bear no bilious witness to the fact. His slender, dark-haired sister gives a stronger hint of her German blood. The Mayor has dropped his pendulum in the heart of the Himalas and at Greenwich. With the consent of the British Government, he has brought the same instrument hither, hoping to find how far the eccentric surface of our earth departs from the perfect spherical curves, and so perhaps to predict or explain some extraordinary variations in climate. Lent still exercises a good deal of restraint over Washington gayeties, and welcome be the tradition, whatever its origin, that brings the reign of absurdity to a temporary pause, and allows the young resident housekeepers to remember that they are wives and mothers. A sister of Arthur Gilman and the eldest daughter of the poet Longfellow have just made us a brief visit. Miss Longfellow has just been elected one of the regents of Mount Vernon, and we hope a good deal from the cleanly Yankee ways and serious good sense which she will wish to see in the ascendant. The Rev. E. E. Hale, as much at home in the saloon as the pulpit, leaves us to-day; and these last visitors have been the occasion of a number of pleasant entertainments.

At a little party made at the National Museum for Miss Longfellow, with the kind assistance of Prof. Goode, the Curator, and Mr. and Mrs. Stevenson, the eminent collectors, a curious incident occurred. We paused for a moment opposite a huge stalactite from Luray, which was not labelled; and a young Northern lady who had been invited to join us came forward and said: "You can't think how disappointed I was when I got to Washington to find that there was no such place as the Luray caves! I think it a shame they should tell such stories. I meant to go, and I had all my plans made."

"But, my dear young lady," I said, "there is no reason why you should not carry out your plans. There is a stalactite from Luray, a very poor hint of what you will find if you choose to go."

"But they assured me at the hotel that there was no such place," she persisted. This is only one of the many proofs of the little reliance now placed on newspaper statements. To the files of a hundred years ago, we resort with a good deal of confidence, when we want secondary proof of small historical details; but posterity will never make use of the files of 1882 in the same way. I am not surprised to find that at many offices no files are kept beyond those of the current year. Few editors in these days can take honest pride in their own columns; and, as the old Scotch peasant once said, These "would be a fearful rise at the day o' judgement!"

The arrangement of the great National Museum, which will show the richest collection of ethnological materials in the whole world, goes on very slowly. To us who watch it from day to day, a great deal seems to be accomplished; but a stranger coming in without a guide would still find nothing but "confusion worse confounded." In deploying the contents of forgotten boxes, it must happen that many articles will change places three or four times before they reach their final abode. I will try to explain the plan, so that you may understand this. This great building, made historical by the brilliant assemblage which gathered there just a year ago to celebrate the peaceful triumph of the national election, consists of a square, towered at each corner. In the centre of each of the four walls is one of the main entrances. The stairways and offices are to be found in the corner towers; and the walls, including these towers, are about three hundred feet long. In the centre is a circular hall with a dome, where the statue of Liberty stood on that eventful night, grasping a ball of electric light and looking down on a wilderness of palms and ferns. From this rotunda, the four arms of the cross dart out to the four entrances, making four halls, one hundred feet long by sixty wide. The spaces left between these arms and the exterior "ranges" of the whole space are subdivided once, and on the north-west side one subdivision is to be reserved as a lecture-room. These subdivisions are called "courts." We have, then, the rotunda, sixty feet in diameter; four halls, one hundred feet by sixty; eight courts, covering as much space as the four halls; and beyond these, against the northern and southern walls, four "ranges," eighty feet by forty, if the proportions of the printed diagrams are correct.

The Smithsonian was from 1846 to 1857 merely an organization for research and distribution. From 1857 to 1876, having assumed the charge of the national cabinet of curiosities, it found itself embarrassed by its immense amount of material and the impossibility of exhibiting what had been gathered. At the Centennial, the final impulse was given to the movement, of which this building is the culmination. Foreign governments gave to ours the masses of ore, collections of pottery, specimens of wood and fruit, which it served no purpose to return to the countries where they had originated; and the Smithsonian found its attics and its cellars powerless to contain its treasures. In making his appeal to Congress, Prof. Baird desired to attain that degree of economy in construction which a democratic government has a right to demand, and probably so much exhibiting space was never furnished at so low a cost. The Museum is said to have cost only $1.50 the square foot, when a well-known museum in New York cost $35 for the same space. The appropriation has been husbanded with the greatest care; and, although the exhibition is not yet arranged, all the offices are occupied and in perfect order, while the work of the various bureaus goes steadily on. At South Kensington, the cases are lined with wine-colored terry, at a cost of $10 a case. Here, a wine-colored paint, which will not fade nor gather dust nor decay, has been substituted, at a cost of $1.50 the case. Everybody who recollects the main building at the Centennial can imagine for himself in what manner this permanent museum is to be lighted. It is without doubt the cheapest museum in the world, and it is practically fire-proof.

One-half of the entire space will be devoted to American ethnology; and every article is to have a descriptive label, which shall have the character of a monograph. When it is once arranged, the visitor who can read and write will find no drawback to his studies, and no guides will be either permitted or required. The Curator told me, the other day, that it was his intention to exhibit and label every article in so perfect a manner that every private collector would prefer to see his treasures on the museum shelves!

So managed, this Museum will become the most instructive of encyclopædias. This description of the building has taken up so much room that I must not enter at this time into any discussion of the method of distributing the material. Although scientifically speaking, still in great disorder, the Museum is not without many attractions for the casual visitor. There is Mr. Stevenson's fine collection of Zuni and Moqui pottery. The court which holds the building-stones of the whole world, illustrated by three thousand American quarries, is in very good order; and connected with it is an apartment where all these specimens are ground down for the microscope, and, when polarized, reveal their constituents as faithfully as the stars of heaven. The department of costumes is already illustrated by some of Mr. Capron's superb Japanese figures, and another of "masks" has been begun, stretching from Zuni to the farthest Ind, taking in the wild fancies of Alaska and the classic whims of Greece. At many points, superb minerals can be found; and the stalactites of Luray may be compared with the alabaster from the Michigan quarries and the Mexican onyx, which is also a stalactite.

Luray, which is in Page County, Virginia, furnishes, like Michigan, a salmon-tinted alabaster, which is almost identical with that used in Egypt to line the Pharaonic tombs, or in India as a "dado" to the Kootub Minar near Delhi.

He who thirsts for knowledge may well come to Washington, where every day of the three hundred and sixty-five can furnish fresh delight. And this, although on this day of historic eulogy the people are shut out of their capitol, and office-holders, for the most part indifferent to the occasion, are occupying the seats.

CAROLINE H. DALL.

LIBERALISM IN AUSTRALIA.

II.

New South Wales.

(Concluded from last week.)

Some three months later, the liberal platform had to weather another breeze. Professor Proctor, the distinguished astronomer, had given a course of his popular lectures in Sydney, when I proposed to let him have the Theatre Royal for a concluding Sunday evening deliverance. He was to lecture on "The Wonders of the Heavens,"—certainly not an inappropriate subject to dilate on even on the Lord's day. While the authorship of the Bible was open to dispute, there could be little doubt among deists of all shades of opinion as to the authorship of the broad-leaved, superbly illustrated celestial volume. But the ministers of "religion" were up in arms. A caucus of them waited on Sir Henry Parkes and pointed out to him that God would be offended, and that it was hard to say what the churches would do if they were to be subjected to this open competition. Sir Henry forthwith sent his agent of police to inform Mr. Proctor that the lecture could not take place. Mr. Proctor took legal advice, and finding that there was no law to prevent it maintained his ground, and the preliminary sale of tickets went merrily on. His agent, in replying by letter to the Premier's secretary, pointed out that Mr. Bright had been lecturing on Sunday evenings, and charging for admission without interference. The answer was that thereafter the police would have instructions to attend to Mr. Bright. Finding that Mr. Proctor was not to be bullied into retreat, and it had leaked out by this time that Sir Henry's own attorney-general had declared the law to be on the side of the lecturer, the Premier sent his police agent to frighten Mr. Lazar, the lessee of the theatre, by telling him that if the lecture were delivered his license would be cancelled on the Monday morning, so that he could not continue his dramatic entertainments. Terrified at this Russian-like proceeding, Lazar made an ad misericordiam appeal to Proctor. Moreover, it was arranged between them and Mr. Garner, the partner in the management, that there should be two week-night astronomical lectures at the theatre in place of the Sunday one. This was on Sunday afternoon. I had given Mr. Proctor's agent possession of the theatre, and there was now no time nor opportunity for notifying the public of the surrender. Accordingly, a large and, fortunately, well-conducted crowd assembled in the evening outside the place of amusement to find it barred against them. After nearly an hour, they were told that Mr. Proctor would address them from the balcony of his hotel, some fifty yards distant. There, the vast concourse, numbering some thousands, proceeded, and were informed by the astronomer of the Premier's tactics, and that to prevent trouble to the theatre people he had yielded. We besought them to disperse peaceably, a request with which, after giving three lusty groans for Sir Henry, they amicably complied. Thus, the churches were saved for a time from the competition of the astronomer, but not from that of the free thinker. The following Sunday, I lectured to a crowded theatre, my subject being "The Gospel of, not Peace, but Police." The main difference between my lectures and those of Mr. Proctor was that I charged less for admission and had no lantern views. But this seemed to be ample. The police came and looked on, but attempted no interference. And the rights of the free thought Sunday platform are, I think, sullenly and unwillingly conceded in New South Wales.

While in this direction, then, this colony has gained an advantage, and a most important one, in comparison with the sister colony of Victoria, in its system of public education it is hundreds of leagues behind. This is entirely owing to the crooked tactics of the politician whose name I have so frequently had occasion to mention. In the education acts he has framed, one in 1866 and an amended statute in 1880, he has, while professing to give the community the benefits of a secular system, in reality saddled it with a State religion,—a religion paid for by the State, and compelled to be taught by State officials in State-owned buildings. Every one who contributes a farthing to the revenues of New South Wales helps to propagate this established faith, however earnestly he may disbelieve in it. And yet Sir Henry Parkes poses before the world as a hero of secular education. When he passed through San Francisco a few days ago, en route for Europe, he was, from his own showing, described as such in the local papers. Never was there a sadder instance of what Carlyle denounces as "Jesuitism" in his Latter Day Pamphlets. Sir Henry, whenever opportunity serves, is quick at gaining cheap popularity by attacking the Roman Catholics. They are in a marked minority in the colony, and he thus easily achieves political prestige. Moreover, he professes to hold Carlyle's teachings in high esteem, and to be a hater of shams. Were he really and truly a hater of shams, he would perish of self-contempt.

The way in which he has contrived to play into the hands of his supporters, the dominant Protestant sects, is a very notable one; and I venture to conceive that even American politicians of the trickiest inclinations may learn a lesson from it. Both his education enactments profess to give "secular" education to the colony, but "secular" is interpreted to include "unsectarian religion." White is the color to be employed in painting the schools, but "white" is to include "neutral black." Under this precious interpretation of the word "secular," the books employed in the State schools are those of the Irish National Board, which teach in every other page the stories of the Bible as infallible truth, the Godhead of Jesus, salvation through his atoning blood, hell-fire, and the rest of the hideous nightmare from which mankind is painfully awakening. In Victoria and New Zealand, the public education is really secular. Secular is said, and secular is meant. Those colonies, fortunately for themselves, possessed statesmen of a different type from the man who has weighted New South Wales with this heritage of evil. Had this State religion been openly espoused, Liberals would have protested against the impolicy of the scheme, but they could not have denounced its falsehood and wickedness. But for such a wretched system to be established under the cloak of an interpretation, and as the beneficent gift of a liberty-eulogizing Pecksniff, who every now and again fascinates the thoughtless by his loud denunciations of papistry, is a piece of modern Macchiavelism not easily paralleled. And perhaps the mournfullest feature in connection with it is that it is accepted and upheld by dissenters and nonconformists whose fathers made the heavens ring with their outcries against an English State-supported religion. Alas for poor human nature when it discerns an opening for enforcing priestly theological dogmas! For you to take money from me to support a religion which I condemn is infamous. For me to mulct money from you to propagate a religion which you despise is doing God's work and helping to execute his august and beneficent will. And thus must it be everywhere so long as there is a shred of connection between State and Church, between those who govern by consent of humanity and those who seek to rule by an alleged fiat from God.

CHARLES BRIGHT.

RADICALISM IN AUSTRALIA.

Editors of The Index:—

In the last issue of The Index (February 16), you publish a letter from Mr. Charles Bright on "Liberalism in Australia." This gentleman gives some interesting information respecting the early struggles of Unitarianism in Victoria, where he lived for many years.

Mr. Bright, though so long resident in Melbourne, begins his account with the pastorate of Mr. Higginson in the Unitarian church "early in the sixties," appearing to be ignorant of the fact that in 1853 services were held in the Mechanics' Institute, Collins Street, before that church was built or even conceived. Those services were conducted by Rev. Maxwell Davidson, a North of Ireland Unitarian, who afterward preached in the above-mentioned church for two or three years.

He was succeeded by Rev. Henry Higginson, who remained until 1871, as stated by Mr. Bright, after which the short lecture period supervened.

About 1873, Miss Martha Turner, sister of Henry G. Turner, was asked to lecture. This lady, whom my husband and I had the pleasure of knowing in London, soon became paid pastor of the church, and preached there until the time of her marriage. Miss Turner's devotedness to liberal religious teaching and broad humanitarianism, as well as her very exceptional talents and literary knowledge, gained for her cordial recognition, which certainly extended beyond the people she held together for years in the church on the Eastern Hill. And it strikes me that, in a history of Radicalism in Victoria, a fact so important should hardly have been passed over in silence; for neither in Melbourne nor elsewhere is a success of this kind an every-day occurrence.

In 1877 or 1878, Miss Turner resigned, and Mr. Mel-lone (from Chicago, I believe) filled her place; but on account of ill-health he did not remain long. Since then, Miss Turner (or Mrs. Webster, as she now is) returned to her position, which she still fills.

In these additions to your correspondent's letter, the facts of most interest to the readers of The Index appear to be that a woman in a difficult position has acquitted herself courageously and well, and that a body of Unitarians have been sensible and liberal enough to support her and profit by her teachings.

COMPULSORY VACCINATION.

Editors of The Index:—

An item in the last Index, under the head of "Current Topics," has these words:—

"It is said that few physicians, and none of any note in their profession, have signed the anti-compulsion petition."

Now, the fact that the person who suggested to Dr. Jenner the notion that vaccine matter would prevent small-pox was not only not a physician, but an ignorant milkmaid, does not, I conclude, prove that vaccination is or is not a preventive of small-pox. Neither does the fact that such noted men as Herbert Spencer, John Bright, Theodore D. Weld, and others, are opposed to compulsory vaccination, prove that it is or is not wrong to compel parents to intrude a foul disease into the healthy life-blood of their children. However it may be in other places, I know that the names of a number of educated practising physicians are appended to the petitions from this city, and that all the persons who signed, whether medical men or not, are competent to understand what laws conflict with their personal rights.

It was said in The Index that the facts which I recently quoted, showing that eight out of ten of the cases of small-pox were of vaccinated persons, "were not entitled to much weight, because it was not stated how long the victims had been vaccinated." In reply, I beg leave to say that when it was found, as it soon was, that vaccination was not a protection against small-pox, some defenders of the revolting practice put forth the plausible—shall I say, cunning?—notion that the virtues of vaccine virus would, in time, run out, and it was therefore necessary to revaccinate; and so the people are forced by a monstrous law to repeat the awful hazards of vaccination. How often it is necessary to vaccinate, nobody knows; and yet, with this uncertainty, we are expected from time to time to corrupt our healthy systems with diseased matter.

A DEBATE.

Editors of The Index:—

In the Doylestown, Pa., Democrat some weeks ago was published the following:—

WANTED!

SOME Clergyman to take the Negative in a three nights' debate, in Lenape Hall, on the following propositions:—
1st. The Bible is false in its scientific teachings.
2d. That it is false in many of its historic teachings.
3d. That it is erroneous and pernicious in many of its moral teachings.

4th. That the leading religious and moral doctrines of the Bible were accepted before the book was written.
5th. That intellectual, moral, and physical progress, the past four hundred years, has corresponded with the decline of belief in doctrines taught in the Bible. Address,
COMMITTEE ON RELIGIOUS DEBATE, Care DEMOCRAT Office.

Jan. 17-4t

Rev. A. R. Hower, a Lutheran minister, addressed the committee a letter, expressing his willingness to discuss the above propositions. Whereupon, Mr. B. F.

Underwood was selected as the man to affirm these propositions; and, his services having been secured, the debate will take place the 11th, 17th, and 18th of this month. The reverend gentleman was unwilling to debate successive evenings. A lively time is anticipated. H. E.

DOYLESTOWN, PA., March 2, 1882.

EMILY J. LEONARD writes from Meriden, Conn., March 1, as follows: "A bill repealing so much of the Connecticut 'Sunday Laws' as prohibits travel on Sunday under penalty of a fine has passed both the Senate and the House, and only awaits the signature of the governor to take effect."

JOSEPH SMITH, son of the founder of Mormonism, and President of what he claims is the only true Mormon Church, writes us from Lamoni, Iowa, as follows: "The church which I have the pleasure and honor to represent numbers a little rising of twelve thousand, enrolled in about four hundred branches or congregations, all except about thirty of these being in the United States. Very many are but small of course, one of the largest, that where I now reside, numbering three hundred and thirty-five, thence ranging all the way down to six in number. In addition to those enrolled in congregations, there are fifteen hundred to two thousand registered and quoted as 'scattered members.' There are twenty to twenty-five branches in England and Wales, a few in Australia, and two or three in Switzerland, Denmark, etc. Besides these there are many who once had a standing in the church in my father's lifetime, who still believe but hold no connection with us, nor yet with those in Utah."

BOOK NOTICES.

MARRIAGE AND PARENTAGE; and the Sanitary and Physiological Laws for the Production of Children of Finer Health and Greater Ability. By a Physician and Sanitarian. New York: M. L. Holbrook & Co. 1882.

This book treats of a subject as momentous as it is delicate, yet treats it in a delicate and dignified way. It is a book of only one hundred and seventy pages, and is intended for popular reading; but its basis and method are scientific, and its language unexceptionable. There is nothing sensational in it except the deep importance of its facts. These, if not a sensation, should at least make a profound impression upon the reader. The purpose of the book is well set forth in its title; and its argument consists in unfolding the laws of heredity relating to the physical, mental, and moral health of human beings. It should be said, however, that the argument shows no favor to any revolutionary action against the marriage institution. Popular enlightenment, in order that the high and sacred objects of marriage may be better understood, is its aim. The preface declares truly that the doctrine of the book is not "unfavorable to the marriage relation as it now exists," but seeks improvement of the relation "in accordance with scientific knowledge." It is a book that ought to be read by all married people, and especially by young married people or those about to be married. Yet it treats subjects of which no one who is interested in social science and philanthropy can afford to be ignorant.

The book is sent to us by A. Williams & Co., of this city. Its price is $1.00.

WE have received a fifty-page pamphlet, entitled "Anatomy of the Mouth-parts of some Diptera," from the pen of George Dimmock, of Cambridge. It was entered as a theme for a philosophical degree at the University of Leipzig. So far as the critical reader can judge, it is a most painstaking microscopic study of the mouth-structure of four of our dipterous insects,—the house-fly, gnat, eristalis, and silk-worm fly. The four sets of plates at the end of the paper are beautifully executed.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE for January, 1882.—Here, we have a very interesting account of Malibran's ovation in Venice, and two animated sketches of English life, at the cricket-match and at the seaside, the society in the latter case being much less fashionable than on this side of the ocean. A charming picture of artisan life abroad is also given in this unusually readable number. The opening article is a review of the History of Agriculture in Italy, recently written by the Minister of the Interior, C. Bertognolli, who cites a hundred passages in mediæval authors to prove that the so-called Indian corn was known in Southern Europe centuries before the discovery of America. The chief contribution of this number to our cause is the full analysis of that great satire, in vengeance for Saint Bartholomew, Les Tragiques, by Agrippa d'Aubigné. The seven books are entitled "Miserics," "Princes," "The Gilded Chamber" (where sat the parliament that upheld persecution and despotism), "The Fires," "The Sword," "Vengeance," "Judgment." Among the powerful passages quoted by the reviewer are the comparison of France to the bleeding mother, driven by hunger to devour her infant; and the representation of the Papacy boasting of its power to dispense with all rights, authorize vice, make facts cease to be facts, save the damned, form kings out of mud, bring hell into heaven, and turn heaven into hell. As the poem is so long and so narrowly Calvinistic that it is not likely to be read except in extracts, we owe much to the student who has brought them within such comparatively easy reach.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JUDGE STALLO has written what "they say" is one of the best volumes in the "International Scientific Series." Its title is Concepts and Theories of Modern Physics.

J. T. TROWBRIDGE has had a successful literary career of over thirty years, and has so far kept abreast of the literary taste of the times that his writings are as eagerly read now as in his first days of authorship.

WESTWARD HO, the Devonshire town which gave Kingsley a title for one of his most powerful and fascinating stories, is to have a memorial to the great novelist in the form of a school, to be called Kingsley's College.

MR. SPURGEON is not yet forty-six years old, and has been preaching for thirty years. He went to London when nineteen years old, after a three years' pastorate in a small Baptist Church near Cambridge, England, at a salary of fifty pounds a year.

MRS. EDNAH D. CHENEY prepared the chapter on "The Women of Boston" in Mr. Winsor's Memorial History of Boston, which is just complete. The Boston Herald says she has furnished "one of the freshest and cleverest chapters in this great history."

PROF. JOHN FISKE does not agree with Colonel Higginson in his estimate of Herbert Spencer as a thinker. He refers to him in the North American Review as one who has "made greater additions to the sum total of human knowledge than have ever been made by any other man since the beginning of the world."

REV. JASPER, the colored divine of Richmond, has availed himself of a little leisure afforded him, to re-examine the Scriptures on the question whether "the sun do move"; and he declares that the passages are so numerous and conclusive in favor of his position that they amount to a demonstration, and that there is "no sense in trying to buck against these passages."

DICKENS and Douglass Jerrold had at one time a falling out, which prevented them from speaking to each other for several weeks. It chanced one day that they met in an eating-house, where they moodily sat down back to back. Suddenly, Jerrold wheeled around, crying out: "For God's sake, Charles, shake hands! A life's not long enough for this." Dickens turned as quick, and gripped his old friend's hand with: "God bless you, Jerrold! If you hadn't spoken, I must!"

DR. INGERSOLL, of Wisconsin, brother of Colonel Ingersoll, has addressed an open letter to Talmage, denying certain disparaging statements made by the latter concerning Rev. John Ingersoll, as well as the son Robert. He writes: "Now, Rev. Sir, will you be kind enough to tell your informant for me that he or she is a malignantly cruel, heartless, and infamous liar. . . . Now, is it not possible to combat his (Colonel Ingersoll's) errors without opening the tomb and spattering with calumny our loved and honored dead. Speaking of your father and mother, you say, 'Would it not have been debasing in me to hook the horses to the ploughshare of contempt to turn up the mound of their graves?' True. Now let me ask you if you don't think that the Golden Rule requires you to unhook your horses before you ruthlessly turn up the sacred dust that hides from the light of day our father's snow-white hair. But 'Ingersoll assails the belief of his father.' Well, sir, had your father been an infidel, would you not, entertaining the views you do, combat his opinions?"

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

SPECIAL NOTICE!

A conference of members of the Free Religious Association, for purposes named in the resolutions adopted at the last annual meeting, will be held in Fraternity Hall, Parker Memorial Building, Boston, on Tuesday, March 28, with sessions at 10.30 A.M. and 2.30 P.M., and probably in the evening. The resolutions referred to are reprinted in this paper under Editorial Notes, that members may see at once the objects and the importance of this conference; and it is hoped that they will attend it in full numbers. The responses received from a large number of State correspondents will furnish ample material for consideration; and the committee on plans for further organization, of which Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer is chairman, will be ready to report.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

CURRENT TOPICS.

SOME friend of Marquette College, Milwaukee, Wis., offers a prize of a twenty-five dollar gold medal to the "foremost student in manly piety." Is this a new name for muscular Christianity?

REV. HENRY BLANCHARD, a Universalist preacher of this city, in a recent sermon on "The Foolishness of Atheism," from the text, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God," advised his hearers not to attempt to argue with atheists, but to let them go on their way unanswered. And yet he devoted an entire sermon to replying to the arguments of atheism. Why does the pulpit notice what is beneath the consideration of the pews? A wise man, in our opinion, will not say, "There is no God"; but it is equally true that many who say there is a God are not remarkable for their wisdom or their charity, and the offensiveness of dogmatic assertion is as great as that of dogmatic denial.

A MEETING was held in Paris some days ago to arrange some plan for a social revolution, at which one of the speakers said, "I hate the republic worse than the empire, for under it socialism has made no headway; and, while one could frighten an emperor into doing something by the threat of assassination, what can be gained by killing any number of persons short of a majority in a republic?" "This," observes the Boston Herald, "is evidence wrung from a disappointed heart; but it shows why it is safe for the French government to permit socialist meetings to be openly held at Paris, while in the rest of continental Europe a gathering of this kind could only be held with profound secrecy."

THE Germans have largely outgrown their old religious beliefs; and their theological sense, as Karl Hillebrand phrases it, is atrophied. This writer says that the middle and lower classes of Germany, following the line of the intellectual classes, have become quite indifferent to religious forms. They neither accept nor reject theological creeds. They simply pay no attention to such things. They have no unkindness for the old religions, whether Protestant or Catholic, and recognize them as a part of the machinery of their government. Cologne cathedral has been finished, not because it is a church, but because it is a hal- lowed, many-centuried relic of the Teutonic past, and a specimen of architectural skill and grandeur of conception.

THE Virgin Mary is said to have appeared recently in Troy, N.Y., to a very poor, bedridden, but pious Catholic, named Jones. If this could be proven by any beneficent acts on the part of the "Holy Mother" of the Catholic Church toward this poor man and his family or neighbors, we would begin to entertain a higher opinion than we now do of the apparition of the Virgin, and for her sake of all other apparitions who would join in the good work of giving tangible aid and comfort to the poor and distressed. But, so far as we can learn, the mission of these ghosts has hitherto been to first frighten and terrify, then, by means of this terror, to draw from the depleted purses of the poor the last few pennies, to help build grand and useless churches in the places where they (the ghosts) were said to appear. If we are to have apparitions, let us patronize only the benevolent ones.

A WRITER in Light for All declares there is "no conflict between materialism and spiritualism." He continues: "Materialism proves the evolution of matter. Spiritualism proves the evolution of mind or spirit. I am as much a materialist as I am a spiritualist. If one is true, the other is true: if one is false, the other is false also. If matter always existed, or, in materialistic parlance, if matter and force are co-existent and perpetual, mind and spirit must have always existed. For what is meant by spirit? Answer: matter refined, mind, force." This writer's desire for reconciliation is evidently greater than his logical acumen or his acquaintance with the two antagonistic schools of thought which he mentions. The conflict between Materialism and Spiritualism ceases to exist only when the distinctive claims of each are abandoned. A large liberality is shown in a just statement and consideration of an opponent's position rather than in an attempt to conceal actual differences of opinion by a distortion of the truth.

THE passage last week of the anti-Chinese bill by the Senate of the United States will to the future historian seem an anachronism; and he will hesitate to record it as a real occurrence of the year 1882, an act sanctioned by the chosen representatives of the best thought of a nation claiming to be a leader in civilization, until he has thoroughly sifted the evidence which will go to show its possibility, since it is so entirely out of harmony with the liberal spirit of the age. The Independent curtly says of it: "The two facts upon which this proposed exclusion is founded are these: first, the fact that the man is a Chinaman; secondly, the fact that he is a laborer. The bill, therefore, is fraught with the double iniquity of being a pro- scription on the ground of race, and a proscription on the ground of labor as an employment. In both aspects, it is anti-American, mean, contempt- ible, and to the last degree intolerable." We sin- cerely hope the veto of the President will save the nation the shame of its becoming a law.

MR. FORSTER, the chief Secretary for Ireland, visited Fulamore on the 6th, and addressed a crowd from a hotel window. He said that he had under- taken a personal tour to see for himself whether the stories that had come to him were exaggerated. The result of this inspection on his mind was that the people had it in their own power to stop the outrages which disgrace the name of Ireland. "There are," he said, "no more courageous men in the world in battle than the Irish; but there is one want among the Irish people, namely, the de- termination to stand against the majority around them or even against the noisy and violent minor- ity. Those who commit the outrages are broken- down men and violent, reckless boys. Whether you stop them or not, it is the duty of the govern- ment to do so. It is especially my duty to stop them. We will. The instigators of outrages have several powers to contend with,—namely, the Irish Government,—though perhaps they think they can defy that, also the Imperial Government and the people of Great Britain. There may be bad landlords; but that does not excuse the burning of houses, the torturing of animals, the killing of men. . . . There is no ill-feeling in England toward Ireland. We know that you have been a miserably and badly governed country, that the English Gov- ernment of past days has done many cruel and very unjust things to Ireland, and has allowed many to be done. We wish to undo that, make you prosperous, rich, and powerful as ourselves; but we view these terrible outrages, and hardly know how to do so. I will conclude with the words I have often read, 'God save Ireland,'—words which sometimes end letters telling me that I must have a bullet through my head or go to a place warmer than we are in now. I say, God save Ireland, too, but from the man that makes that threat. God save Ireland from cruel men, grasping landlords, rack-renting landlords, dishonest tenants, and mid- night marauders."

THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD IN RELIGION.

To whatever Mr. Wasson may choose to say, he will always have a body of respectful and interested listeners. And he has fairly earned for himself the right to such a hearing: first, by speaking always on subjects of importance; and, secondly, by taking careful pains to have something worth saying. Whether therefore he agrees with him or not, one never turns away without feeling that something has been said that challenges his serious attention. As the millennium is not yet in sight, Mr. Wasson will hardly expect his hearers to be all of one mind. And, so it be serious, not captious but an earnest endeavor after truth, he will listen without impatience or blame to a voice of dissent.

In The Index for January 26, he presents to us, "The Alternative,"—an alternative that he considers necessary in the present state of human knowledge. I will put this in his own words: "We are brought to this alternative: either there is room for intelligent belief beyond the proper scope of science or there is no room for theism." I, for one, must demur at this; for I can not see we are shut up to any such alternative.

But—and let me make this point clear—my present purpose is not to defend theism, whether by the scientific method or any other. Whatever my belief on that subject, this is not the time to ventilate it. I have in view quite another object, and one that logically precedes all discussion of special dogmas; namely, a discussion of method itself. Mr. Wasson intimates that theism may be true, and indeed he appears himself to be a theist; but he emphatically declares that, though it be true, it can never be known by the scientific method.

We are brought then face to face with a question of the very first importance; indeed, nothing can be of more importance; and we are all equally interested in knowing the truth about it. This question is,—Is there one and only one method of knowledge, or are there two or more methods?

Where so little is known and where there is so much to be known, we shall all be heartily glad to use not two only, but a dozen methods, if only they give fair promise of leading us anywhere. But, since "art is long, and time is fleeting"; since there is so much to be known and so little time to know it in; we cannot afford—if we can help it—to waste any time in fruitless endeavor. And since the scientific method has led to such rich results in so many directions, and since other methods have settled no few discussions,—if indeed they have settled any,—some of us at any rate have come to feel that the largest promise for the future is along that path which has actually led to the most thus far. And, if any one would persuade us to leave it for any other way, he must at least give us very strong reasons for so doing. For one, in all honesty, I must say that I have not yet been able to see the validity of any reasons that any one has offered for such a course. Indeed, I do not believe that the world as yet knows anything whatever that it did not find out by the scientific method. When some well-established truth can be pointed out that the human mind has made conquest of in some other way, then that other way will stand some chance of coming into general use. That truths were discovered and generally recognized before the scientific method was formulated is no objection to what is said above. People saw before they formulated the science of vision, or even thought of asking how; but they saw then and always by the same method as to-day. Neither is it anything against the scientific method that there are many questions it has not answered, and perhaps never can answer. The important point is to find out whether there is some other method that can begin where that leaves off, and lead us to sure results beyond its reach, or whether where that stops—if it stops at all—is the limit of what is attainable by the human mind.

To make this matter as clear as may be, we need to ask and answer two questions,—What do we mean by knowing? and How do we come to know?

I. What do we mean by knowing?

The only things of which we have any direct knowledge are facts of consciousness. All things else are known only by inference. But these inferences may be based on so many and such uniform experiences as to become to us practical certainties. Consciousness can never transcend its own limits; and so we can never be conscious of any external fact or object. We are conscious only of some impression made upon us by the external fact or object. But we cannot go outside of consciousness to see what this external thing may be. And thus we can never be sure that we know it exhaustively; for we can never know that the whole of it was concerned in the impression made upon us.

Neither can we hope to know things in themselves. Every act of consciousness is made up of two elements, one contributed by the thinking subject and one by the impressing object. We can know things then only as related to us. This only is the anthropomorphic element in all knowledge, physical as well as religious. But this need not trouble us any; for truths that are true to us are no less true because they might be something else to a differently constituted being. The only truth that is worth our care is that which is true to us. If they are true in some other way to some other being, that is a matter for the supposititious other being to concern himself about. It is only wasted ingenuity for us to speculate on such matters.

But in another sense also it is true that we can never expect to know things in themselves. Things exist for us, only as related, both to us and to each other. What we call their attributes or properties are only our names for those perceived relations. Indeed, whether they are anything outside of their relations we do not know; and it would be absurd for us to inquire. It would be asking whether, after all attributes and qualities were taken away, after the possibility of making an impression on us was gone, anything was still left. What we call a knowledge of things or objects, then, is only a mental classification of impressions made upon us and reported in consciousness. Knowledge of the existence of a self is only a consciousness of the fact that we are conscious.

Every item of knowledge, then, outside the facts of consciousness, comes to us by way of inference. This is just as true of physical knowledge as it is of mental, moral, or religious. What we call principles and laws are only our names for orders and sequences in the relations of the various impressions made upon our consciousness by either internal or external facts. But this does not at all invalidate the certainty of those principles and laws, if experience has sufficiently certified to their reality. They are as real and certain to us as anything can possibly be.

If, then, any sensible man feels more certain of what he calls physical facts than he does of moral or religious ones, it cannot be because of the way by which he comes at what he regards as his knowledge of them. For the way is, and must be, precisely the same in both cases. The relative certainty, therefore, can only be concerned with the grounds of the inference. Impressions are produced upon us. When, by observation and experiment, we have determined that all pseudo-antecedents or causes have been excluded, and the true ones discovered, then the inference becomes to us as practically certain as the original impression.

The only immediate knowledge, then, that is possible to us is a knowledge of facts of consciousness. We know external facts or things or persons only as inferences from facts of consciousness. And we may correctly say we know them, when we have accurately observed them as related to ourselves and to each other, when we have carefully verified our observations, and when we have classified them. We may not know them exhaustively, or as they are in themselves, but we have true and accurate knowledge for our practical use and guidance; for knowing them as related to ourselves and to each other is all the knowledge that can be real or serviceable to us.

Opinions, notions, beliefs, intuitions,—as distinguished from knowledge,—are only unverified inferences. They may or may not be true, but they are not known to be true until they are verified. The fundamental error of metaphysics is that they are an attempt to deduce the true nature of things in themselves from our conceptions of them. But since things in themselves are, to us, practically nothing,—for we can never transcend or get beyond our relations to them,—this attempt is futile. Metaphysics, therefore, can only build "castles in Spain," and people them with figments of the imagination.

It is time now to turn to our second question:—

II. By what process or method do we come to know? Are there more methods than one?

The answer to our second question has already been more than intimated in replying to the first. And yet we need to look at it by itself, and clearly separate it from whatever might confuse or blur its outlines.

Mr. Wasson recognizes two classes of facts and inferences, one of which he thinks may be satisfactorily dealt with by the scientific method, and the other not. One class is made up of physical facts, and the other of psychical. And yet he seems to believe—as I most certainly do—that the one class of facts is equally real with the other. And he recognizes the further fact—which is central to the whole discussion—that all we know of either class is by the report which it makes of itself in consciousness. This is the common ground on which all classes of realities present themselves for observation. A bar of iron is a fact known only in consciousness as truly as is the sentiment of justice. And both, if they be true, are the reports in consciousness of some reality that makes thus its appropriate impression.

But, after clearly recognizing that all we know of physical facts is by the report they make of themselves in consciousness, and after recognizing the same of psychical facts, Mr. Wasson proceeds—unwarrantably I can but think—to put the psychical facts one side in a class by themselves, and say of them that they must be dealt with in some peculiar way, and not by the method which is competent to deal with the other class. The only reason I can find for his doing this is his saying, "But, to science, consciousness and thought are impenetrable mysteries." Granted. But is there anything besides science to which they are not "impenetrable mysteries"? "Consciousness and thought" are the common ground of all we know of either matter or mind. But "consciousness and thought" are known to science as facts. And matter is known in no other way. We know nothing of the essence of either of them. Religious and moral realities are just as much facts of experience as are fossils and mountains. Wherein then lies the reason for treating one class of realities after one method, and the other after another?

But Mr. Wasson intimates that "belief or philosophy" can "fly," while science cannot. Birds—his own illustration—fly within the realm of realities, where the scientific method can follow them. If "belief or philosophy" does the same,—keeps to what is real, though the real may not be physical,—then science can also follow them; for science is coextensive with the realm of the real. But, if either belief or philosophy soars beyond the real, then it soars beyond the knowable, and is lost in the limbo of unverifiable speculation. From excursions of this nature, no knowledge has ever been brought back. For knowledge,—and this is the method of science,—

1. Implies some reality to be known. A reality may not be the same as what we call a physical fact. But is it not clear that whatever comes into consciousness comes from somewhere, and is caused by something? All facts are, to us, facts of consciousness; and all are equally real, though they may not be equally important. First, then, some fact must be observed in consciousness.

2. The next step is to discover what external reality—if any—corresponds to and produces this internal impression. This is done by experiment. We either devise experiments for ourselves, or else observe those which the natural order of the world about us is carrying on. We thus exclude all pseudo-causes, and fix at last on the real antecedent.

3. Then, we classify our observed fact, assign its place in the order of our thought, label it, and call it a part of our knowledge.

When this process has been gone through with concerning a certain number of facts, they have then become knowledge in the only sense in which that word has any meaning for us. That is, we have found out the relation in which they stand to us, the effects they produce on us and on each other, and so have learned how to order our conduct in regard to them.

Now, whether these facts are physical or psychical, whether they belong to geology or religion, the above is the only way by which any one ever found out about them, or ever can. And if from physical impressions we have a right to draw certain scientific inferences as to physical realities, from moral and religious facts we have the equal right to draw certain scientific inferences. It may be more difficult in the one case to verify our conclusions than it is in the other; but the intricacy of the problem does not invalidate the method. In both cases alike, we have a right—nay, we are logically compelled—to infer a cause adequate to the production of the result. And when, if ever, it shall be demonstrated that moral and religious facts demand a cause that is superhuman, then the scientific inference to such a cause will be not only permissible, it will be a rational necessity to all sane and intelligent thought. The inference will be as legitimate as was that which resulted in the discovery of Neptune. And, though this cause remain invisible and intangible, it will not therefore be made illegitimate. For science has already demonstrated the reality of many forces that can neither be seen nor weighed.

By superhuman, I do not mean supernatural. The facts of the world about us, as reported in consciousness, demand in explanation a cause that is infra-human. It may well be that other classes of facts ask as explanation a cause that is super-human. And yet all may be natural.

If the day ever comes when the intellectual, moral, and religious facts of human nature are seen to demand—as an adequate explanation—an intelligent, moral, and religious cause, external to man, then theism will take its place as scientific demonstration. I believe that the day is already here.

Perhaps it is hardly needful for me to say that this article is not written with any thought or feeling of personal controversy. Mr. Wasson's position was taken only as a convenient starting-point.

M. J. SAVAGE.

THE HOLY THORN.

I have in my garden a little tree which I have been watching from day to day with much interest. It is a slip from the famous Glastonbury thorn. According to the cherished legend of Glastonbury, Joseph of Arimathea wandered to England, anno 66, Christmas eve; and a snow-storm overtook him in a certain solitude. Overpowered, he stuck his staff in the snow, and laid down to die; but in the bright morning he awoke, and found that his staff had become a thorn-tree which canopied him with its blossoms. Beside that miraculous thorn, the ancient Glastonbury Abbey was founded; and ever since, it is claimed, this particular white thorn blossomed during Christmas time, whatever the weather. The abbey has long been a ruin; the original thorn has long ago disappeared; but the tree's descendants flourish still, and inherit the marvellous peculiarity of their ancestor. Some years ago, in conversation with a gentleman who owns an estate at Glastonbury, I expressed some doubts about this thorn; and he sent me a slip from it, which I planted. It is now eight feet high; and, sure enough, about Christmas (a few days after) it bourgeoned out wonderfully, and promised to flower. It did not do so, however: perhaps it will succeed next year, when its sense of responsibility is more mature; but it put forth leaves, and the little buds were and are sufficiently advanced to show the whitish tint. I believe, however, that the Glastonbury legend has been modified to suit the normal marvel, which is winter leafage. A writer in the Whitehall Review of Sept. 20, 1879, says: "Some sceptical persons are unwilling to believe that the Glastonbury thorn still puts forth its leaves in the winter, though in the western countries no doubt whatever is felt upon the subject. I can, however, bear testimony to the truth of the popular belief; for, when I made a pilgrimage to Glastonbury, in February last, the snow being on the ground at the time, I saw within the ruins the young thorn-tree, the successor of an older trunk. It was fully out in very green leaves, though all the other trees for miles round were perfectly brown. I am not a sufficiently good botanist to say whether this fact arose from mere natural causes or not. But a fact is a fact." This looks as if winter leafage is all that Glastonbury now expects; and no doubt a Roman Catholic would find no difficulty in explaining this diminution of the annual miracle on the same principle that the gradual disappearance of Augustine's footprint on Thanet Island, since Protestant times, has been explained.

I have had ample opportunities of consulting my neighbor, Sir Joseph Hooker, and his assistant at Kew Gardens, Mr. Thistleton Dyer. The Glastonbury thorn is regarded as an early flowering form of the common white thorn, Crataegus oxyacanthus. "These cases of precocious flowering," writes Mr. Dyer, "are not perhaps very improbable. Flower-buds, in the case of most shrubs and trees, are formed toward the end of the year preceding that in which they open. In the case of the Glastonbury thorn, they expand some months before their due time, which, however curious, is a bad habit which natural selection would promptly nip in the bud, as it is not conducive to the setting of their fruit. Early leafing, of which the Marionier de vingt Mars in the Tuileries Garden is a notable instance, is another phenomenon of the same sort."

In 1879, when rambling on the Loire, I visited the little village of "Saint Patrice," to see a "holy thorn," about which a similar legend is told: St. Patrick being on his way to visit his relative, St. Martin of Tours, was similarly overtaken on Christmas eve, and similarly sheltered by a flowering thorn, which has flowered annually ever since—of course, in its successors. Knowing that a saintly Patrick (not the Patrick, but a relative) is said to be buried in Glastonbury Abbey, I suspected that the English legend had fittted into France with the name, or vice versa. It was summer-time when I visited "Saint Patrice"; and I could not verify the evidently sincere asseverations of the humble peasants, that their thorn blossomed every Christmas. They were, however, particular in declaring that it would never so blossom at any other spot, not even if planted a few yards only from that on which the saint slept. As I gave the woman who guided me her franc, I doubted I might be helping a little local monopoly of the miracle. There was an old shelter for a shrine near the holy bushes; but it had evidently fallen into disuse, suggesting either that the miracle did not occur or that it had ceased to be miraculous. The plant was the common sloe. Of this there are two forms in England, one of which flowers early before the leaves, the other later, at the time the leaves come out. The sloe, however, has already acquired the habit of early flowering; and a local variety, in which the flowers expand at the year's close, would be but an extreme case. "The Glastonbury thorn," to quote another of Mr. Dyer's notes, "is really more remarkable, because the hawthorn ordinarily shows no marked propensity toward precocity. Fruit trees often expand a few of their flower-buds before their proper time. I have seen this autumn an apple-tree which had done so, and a plum-tree in my garden is another case. But cases so marked as the Glastonbury and St. Patrice thorns are of course sufficiently rare to rank as lusus naturee."

Here is a tree of the Glastonbury thorn in the Botanic Gardens at Oxford, and another in the Royal Gardens at Kew. This having been altogether the mildest winter in England remembered by any living person, the continuous spring-like air having brought out many wild-flowers long before their time, I was not certain but that the leafy and half-flowering condition of my Glastonbury thorn might be partly due to the strangely exceptional season. What was my surprise, therefore, to find that the tree at Kew, near by, was not so advanced as usual! "Strange to say," Sir Joseph Hooker wrote me on January 20, "our Glastonbury thorn, which usually leaves and flowers after a fashion in midwinter, has not now a leaf upon it! I enclose the most forward bud it bears. My notion is that ours is a right-minded plant, and obeys the laws of climate,—refusing to flower when the season is unseasonable, as it would if the winter were normal." How gravely would such an example of eccentricity in their thorn have impressed those who built Glastonbury Abbey, as is probable, in homage to the original tree! Here is a tree of traditional sanctity, which flowers at the time of the nativity even amid snows; but, if the season be so exceptionally warm that there would be no miracle in such precocity, it contrives a greater miracle by coming out less than the carnal mind expected in one place, while in the same neighborhood manifesting its wonderful character in a sceptic's garden! This is not merely right-minded, as Sir Joseph says, it is ingenious. And, as there is no revelation so likely to impress the sceptical mind as one vouchsafed to himself personally, mere politeness requires me to respond to this exceptional flowering of my thorn. The response shall be a fresh realization of the fact that "pious frauds" are not so frequent as some sceptics suppose, nor superstition without some basis for its miracles. One morning, on going out to see if my tree had advanced, I found the old gardener gazing upon it with wide eyes. When I asked his opinion of the phenomenon, he glanced at two other hawthorns in the garden, with no speck of green, and at the other brown and leafless trees, then, shaking his head slowly, said: "You'll have to go a good bit before you see the like o' that. I never saw such a thing before." Then he turned to his digging. But I could see by this solid English laborer's face that the notion of anything religious about the plant never occurred to him. Through his vacant eyes, as mere bits of transparent glass, I could see an extinct world in which Pascal, and even the greatest scientists of Europe, devoutly believed in the holy thorn and in the miracles wrought by it, such as the healing of Pascal's sister. The English mind, even in its lowest ranks, has passed out of the supernatural world. No peasant is so credulous as to use Glastonbury thorn medicinally. The thorn mythology is represented by fewer fables than the slips which continue the perished tree merely for the study of scientific men or students of folklore. The "miracle" goes on. The scientists cannot explain it: they find no parallel, yet nobody fancies it a miracle. The phenomena of nature appear as of old, and reappear. From year to year, we behold all the miracles that ever occurred,—eclipses, earthquakes, meteors, and the mysterious comets, which filled the human mind with myths. But they come and go over a new man. The Holy Tree of the Universe blossoms with the old terrors and tokens; but they make no real religious impression. And this is not because science has explained them, but because it has cultivated the mental soil to a degree that no longer raises facts into fairy tales.

I have named my thorn Saint Christopher. I did not go back to Aaron, from whose blossoming rod most of these fables are descended; for the almonds which established a tribal priesthood must have turned to prussic-acid instead of peaches. But Christopher went about the world convincing men that he had borne the infant Jesus across a dangerous river by planting his staff, which at once was clothed with leaf, flower, and fruit of the date. The rich and the poor ate of these dates, and were convinced by Christopher without any sermon. The Christ-bearer's gospel was proved solely by his fruits. If Christians could only manage to get hold of his staff, they would find it very convincing.

My little thorn Christopher has also in his life borne burdens across the stream of time which grew from small things to great. For an example, that wandering Joseph of Arimathea, whose mission in Britain this thorn mythically attested, gradually came to be thought of as a witness preserved from the time of the crucifixion, and in the thirteenth century became identified as the Wandering Jew, thereby expanding to a vast mythology, in which was embodied and fostered the hatred which is even now poured out upon the Jewish race. The living leaf of this Glastonbury tree represents the undying Jew of plants which arctic snows cannot kill, while its thorns represent the equally imperishable Christian cruelty which hunts him through the ages in the name of another thorn-crowned Jew. But my little Saint Christopher has lived to bear witness against all his previous testimony. He flourished as vivaciously when Catholicism fell as when it rose. Each new age and faith, as it came, found his broad, honest shoulders quite as ready to bear it across the flood as its predecessor. It was not less cheery when it came to grow amid the ruins of abbeys and their creeds. Its annual miracle has proved to be so very catholic that it is no longer of any interest to those who seek after signs and wonders.

But I see in my mysterious thorn, so green and pretty amid its leafless comrades, blossoming as blithely in a heretic's garden and in his thoughts as it ever did in the cloister or faith of a priest, a type of the religious life which still proves its power and its genuineness amid whatever ruins of theology, theory, or philosophy. It is not merely that it survives, but that it is the one thing of its kind that blossoms amid the snow. What matters it if a man, botanizing on his experience, labels its outcome theism or atheism, materialism or idealism? Does it flower on amid the decays of opinion? Does its sap mount up into forms of new life, when creeds and gods are cast like autumn leaves? He who is in love does not depend upon the metaphysics of love. He who has a genuine enthusiasm for the moral life, and is inspired by the hope of purifying the world of all pain, wrong, discord,—he in whom this spirit and life are able to weary out opposition, and to give courage under grief and disappointment,—he is a religious man, even though—perhaps all the more when—carrying this imperishable life through intellectual beliefs which promise him no reward or rewarder beyond the fulness of virtue within him.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

DESIGN IN NATURE.

The assumption that the ultimate basis of all phenomena, of which mind is but one, is itself mind, cannot in our opinion be maintained.

Says Mill, "Because among the infinite variety of the phenomena of nature there is one, namely, a particular mode of action of certain nerves which has for its cause, and, as we are now supposing, for its efficient cause, a state of our mind; and because this is the only efficient cause of which we are conscious, being the only one of which in the nature of the case we can be conscious, since it is the only one which exists within ourselves, does this justify us in concluding that all other phenomena must have the same kind of efficient cause with that one eminently special, narrow, and peculiarly human or animal phenomenon?" More reasonable, it seems to us, to regard "that particular mode of action" as one of an "infinite variety," all due ultimately to an eternal existence which presents itself to the living organism in a certain manner, dependent as much upon the organism as upon the absolute reality, and which, as it appears to us, we call matter and force.

But the mind, under the influence of teleological teachings, insists that there are facts which the existence of a designing intelligence alone can explain. Why, it is asked, do animals in cold regions have thicker fur than those in warm climates? Why are the legs of the timid deer adapted to run faster than the more courageous animals need to? Are not the feet of the mole especially designed for digging? Is there not design in the instinct of the cat to catch mice? Are not the wonderful bodies of animals, and especially of man, evidence of wisdom and skill more admirable than are possessed by us? To which we reply, it seems more reasonable to believe that the coverings of animals are determined by the temperature and other natural conditions than by the foresight and skill of a personal Being; that, in the struggle for life, those with the thickest fur, in a cold climate, stand the best chance to survive, while those most thinly clad perish; that, by the law of heredity, the surviving animals transmit their advantage, and by a process of selection, so admirably illustrated by Darwin and Wallace, in course of time we have, naturally and without any design, races of animals in the north with thick, heavy fur, fitting them for a cold climate. The same principle of selection helps to explain why animals are thinly clad in warm regions.

Instead of supposing God gave the deer a timid disposition and long legs to get out of the way of danger, we think it more reasonable that the entire structure of the animal is the result of accumulated advantages acquired through ages, in the great struggle to live, in which varieties with unfavorable variations died out, and that the animal, instead of being endowed with long legs to run fast, simply runs fast, as Büchner remarks, because it has long legs to run with; its ability to run rapidly and avoid the necessity of combat having probably produced the timid disposition that it possesses. If unable to get out of the way, quite likely it would be more courageous.

Instead of supposing cats were made to catch mice, we think, with Huxley, "there was no express construction concerned in the matter; but that among the multitudinous varieties of the feline stock, many of which died out for want of power to resist opposing influences, some (the cats) were better fitted to catch mice than others, whence they thrived and persisted in proportion to the advantage over their fellows thus afforded them." The habit, which had its origin in hunger of the animal and its surroundings, in the course of generations, by the law of heredity, became permanently fixed as an instinct, a part of the nature of the animal.

"For the notion that every organism has been created as it is, launched straight at a purpose," says Huxley, "Mr. Darwin substitutes the conception of something which may be fairly termed a method of trial and error. Organisms vary incessantly. Of these variations, the few meet with surrounding conditions which suit them and thrive, the many are unsuited and become extinguished. According to teleology, each organism is like a rifle-bullet fired straight at the mark. According to Darwin, organisms are like grape-shot, of which one hits something and the rest fall wide. For the teleologist, an organism exists because it was made for the conditions in which it was found; for the Darwinian, an organism exists because, out of many of its kind, it is the only one which has been able to persist in the conditions in which it is found."

The world produces its inhabitants, and they must be adapted to their environments upon penalty of extinction. The world has been changing ever since it came from the nebulous condition. Land has encroached upon the waters, and the seas again upon the land. Mountains have been upheaved from ocean's bed; while climatic changes, involving tropical and polar interchanges, have swept over the face of the earth. Animals and plants change in conformity to the necessity imposed upon them by their environments. The weaker go down, while the stronger survive. By the strong is here meant those individuals that are strong in the peculiar quality or function which, under their changed environments, is advantageous to them. Every year there is a constant gradual increase of these stronger ones, while all individuals that are not able to adjust themselves to the changing conditions must perish. On the other hand, the ability to change, to adjust themselves to their environments, is rewarded by prolonged existence and perpetuation of their kind, with the new modifications in structure and function compelled by the change. But this law of extinction is not unmixed evil, for the capacity to reproduce is immeasurably in excess of the earth's capacity to supply with sustenance.

That natural selection has been an important factor in the production of species is now generally conceded by all who are competent to comprehend the subject, or understand the proofs in favor of the theory. Other causes doubtless have entered into the production of species.

We do not stop to discuss the theory of evolution. It may be considered well established. Prof. O. C. Marsh, the Yale teacher of palæontology, said, in his Presidential address, August, 1879 :

"One of the main characteristics of this epoch is the belief that all life, living and extinct, has been evolved from simple forms." "It is," he says, "now regarded among the active workers of science as a waste of time to discuss the truth of evolution. The battle on this point has been fought and won."

Accepting the theory of evolution, we are justified in rejecting the hypothesis which ascribes plants and animals, life and intelligence, to other than natural causes. Those who, like Prof. Owen, believe in evolution under natural law, and yet speak of a "purposive route of development," we ask to state, if it is so evident, what the purpose is, and to explain the innumerable abortive efforts nature has made. We would like to see them reconcile with their view the existence of disgusting and harmful creatures, like parasites that infest the human body and the insects that destroy our crops and rob us of the fruits of our toil, rudimentary organs, malformations, idiocy, congenital disease, and a thousand other apparently purposeless objects in the world.

There is no adaptation or fitness more unquestionable than that of parasites to vegetables and the bodies of animals. Is this adaptation evidence of design? If so, is it right to sprinkle poison on plants or to give medicine to men or cattle with the intention of killing these parasites? What is the design in parasitic life? Potato bugs are adapted to destroy potatoes, and grasshoppers are adapted to eat almost everything upon which man and beast depend for food. Is there design in these adaptations? Were the bugs and grasshoppers designed for the vegetation or the vegetation for the bugs and grasshoppers? A cancer is wonderfully adapted to prey, like a carnivorous animal, upon the living body in which it exists; and the body is well adapted to be preyed upon by this "rebellion within the organism," as the cancer has been termed by an able writer. Where is the design?

"Parasites are sent as a discipline,—that is, to teach men science, industry, and cleanliness,"—says a theological writer. But what shall we say of the countless species of parasites that live on animal and plant, that prey on beast and bird, and reptile, and every variety of vegetation, in regions of the earth uninhabited by man! Did God make one species of parasites for the anaconda, another for the hyena, another for the ostrich, and another for the weed that is poisonous to man, "to teach men science, industry, and cleanliness"? Even these parasites are the homes of smaller parasitic forms, which prey upon them as they prey upon the bodies they infest. Many of them are so small as to be invisible to the human eye. Did God make all these forms of parasitic life, often producing discord and death, and living even in portions of the earth where man is not found, and upon insects, reptiles, birds, and beasts which he avoids, to teach man science, etc.? And diseases, we are told by the same writer, are "infections designed as punishment for the breaking of the laws of nature." What of those diseases that prevailed among animals, those diseases which twisted and reduced their bones as palæontology attests, ages before man appeared on the globe? Were those diseases designed to punish the animals? If so, what was the design of the punishment? Think of a God causing cancers and malformations, and making disgusting and disease-producing and life-destroying creatures all over the world, ages before man appeared, in regions where he cannot live, just to teach him the importance of cleanliness and industry!

Says Prof. Gunning: "Perhaps the darkest fact on the face of nature is parasitism. Nothing escapes. No organism large enough to be seen by the eyes of men is free from infestations. On this side of nature, things are bad, utterly bad, shockingly bad. A female buries her jaws in the gills of a fish, and hangs there every moment of her life, sucking the life of her host. The male buries his jaws in the body of the female, and hangs there sucking from his mate the life which she is sucking from the fish. Such moral disorder is simply appalling. We stand aghast before the pangs inflicted on all ranks of conscious life, with no compensating good to the victim and no enjoyment to the parasite." The existence of what we call evil, presenting no difficulty whatever to the thinker, who rejects the hypothesis of an infinite intelligence that governs the universe, has troubled the mind of theologians in all ages, and still disturbs the dreams of the modern theist. Optimism may be well suited to some of the moods of frail human nature; but it affords no enduring satisfaction to thinkers who have recourse to it for a solution of the problem of evil, while adhering to the theory of a being of infinite power and goodness. If a man has a child and punishes it to reform it, because he is unable to attain that end without the infliction of pain, his limited power exempts him from the charge of cruelty. If he possessed the power to educate and develop his child without such means, the infliction of pain would surely indicate cruelty. Infinite power and infinite goodness could produce a universe only in which was perfect happiness. If it be said that happiness can be attained only by permitting a certain amount of evil, what becomes of God's omnipotence? If it be said God could have made a perfect universe, without using evil as a means, but he has not chosen to do so, what becomes of his infinite love?

Suffering and torture exist now, and have existed through countless centuries. This fact cannot be blotted out. This cruelty cannot be made less by any amount of happiness in the future. If animals devour one another in the bloody battle of life, if pain and death are ever on the earth, if millions of disgusting parasites prey upon higher animals, if the volcano buries cities, if the hurricane carries destruction in its wings, and the globe itself opens its pitiless jaws and crushes thousands to death, if pestilence poisons the air, if patriots languish in prisons and martyrs die at the stake, if mothers weep over the dead bodies of their children or die in the pangs of maternity, if the world is filled with cruelty and crime and suffering now, and has been in the past, in order to prevent even a worse condition in the future, or because a higher state can be reached only by ages of torture on this globe, and this is all directed by a being who is doing the best he can, then let us admit the horrible fact, and pity the weakness of a being who can do no better. But let us not blind our eyes to the fact that evil, terrible evil, exists.

Adaptation is seen almost everywhere; but it is doubtful whether design in nature has any existence except in the mind that projects itself ideally into the objective world, and imagines the operations of nature subject to volition. What is called "design in nature" is adjustment of things to their environment. The environment precedes the thing that is adapted to it. The thing must get adapted on penalty of extinction; and, in the struggle for life, "the survival of the fittest" is a necessity. In a changing environment, animals or plants that cannot change in adjustment to their medium must perish; while those whose variations are most closely in correspondence with the surroundings will continue to exist, and their successors be subject to the same law of variations and the same chance of survival in the unavoidable struggle for existence. In the parasite and in man, in good and in evil, we see adaptation, adjustment, fitness, but nowhere in nature do we see what can properly be termed "design." He who has recourse to volition to supply the nexus between cause and effect in the objective world simply contemplates his own nature, which he has first put ideally behind the fleeting phenomena that he beholds.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

A DISCUSSION is going on among the Presbyterians about the adoption of a liturgical form of prayer. The editor of the Philadelphia Presbyterian opposes any ritualistic innovation on the old-fashioned methods of worship that have been in vogue in the denomination, and quotes, very patly, on the question the following sharp thrusts from John Ruskin's "Letters to the Clergy, on the Lord's Prayer and the Church":—

Finally, whatever the advantages and decencies of a form of prayer, and how wide soever the scope given to its collected passages, it cannot be at one and the same time fitted for the use of a body of well-taught and experienced Christians, such as should join the services of a church nineteen centuries old, and adapted to the needs of the timid sinner who has that day just entered its porch, or of the remorseful publican who has only recently become conscious of his call to a pew.

And surely our clergy need not be surprised at the daily increasing mistrust in the public mind of the efficacy of prayer, after having so long insisted on their offering supplication at least every Sunday morning at eleven o'clock, that the rest of their lives hereafter might be pure and holy, leaving them conscious all the while that they would be similarly required to inform the Lord next week, at the same hour, that "there was no health in them."

Yet, quite curiously, the same number of the Presbyterian from which we take these quotations has among its editorial notes this remark:—

Mr. Miln, who was pastor of the Unitarian church in Chicago, but is not, pronounced the benediction one morning in the following remarkable manner: "May we be kind to each other, and spend our days in peace and quietness. Amen."

Now, of course, the Presbyterian cannot have any objection to the sentiment of this "benediction." That journal will certainly agree with us that it would be an excellent thing if religious societies more generally lived in accordance with such a sentiment. Yet as evidently the Presbyterian does not like the benediction, because it departs from the customary forms. But why is not freedom from a liturgical form of benediction as good as freedom from liturgical prayer? In connection with this topic, we may add that some of the Episcopalian papers are complaining of Phillips Brooks because, in taking his turn at conducting morning prayers at Harvard College, he did not use his church Prayer-Book at all, but prayed as any Puritan Round-head might.

Our neighbor, the Jewish Watchman, pays a well-merited tribute to the lamented Auerbach:—

With deep sorrow, we have to announce the demise of Berthold Auerbach. The great scholar, the renowned novelist, the brilliant intellect, the staunch advocate of Jewish rights, is no more. He died at Cannes, at the age of seventy years. Some newspapers state that his death was hastened by grief at the Jewish persecutions now prevailing. . . . Auerbach was an earnest and a determined defender of the Jews and Judaism, and with all the accomplishment of his brilliant intellect he championed their cause, fought for their inalienable rights, and did his utmost to break the chain that held Judaism captive in the bonds of injustice and tyranny. He attained the age generally allotted to man,—seventy; but such intellectual and moral giants the world cannot very well spare, the chasm made cannot be so easily filled. Yet he lives in his works. Peace to his ashes.

"UNITY," the organ of Western Unitarianism, has been put evidently in a tight place by the case of "Brother" Miln and his Chicago church. Unity has been proclaiming that theological beliefs should not be the test of religious fellowship, and latterly has been doing this with special emphasis. Only last month, it quoted with enthusiastic approval a resolution passed by the Western Unitarian Conference, May 7, 1875, wherein it was declared that "fidelity in duty, not accuracy in belief, has been from the first among us the essential test of Christian character." And, on the strength of such statements, it has been sometimes claimed that Western Unitarianism is as broad as the Free Religious movement. But when Mr. Miln announces important and unexpected changes in his belief, and Unity Church, one of the most prominent representative societies of Western Unitarianism, voted him, plainly for that reason and that alone, by a very large majority out of its pulpit, Unity newspaper seems to be no better prepared than was Unity Church to apply this test which the Western Conference had adopted "unanimously by a rising vote." In its last number, March 1, it extends its sympathies wholly to "the earnest and noble men and women who constitute Unity Church" in their action toward Mr. Miln. If they are "blameworthy at all, it is for the hasty way" in which they first selected Mr. Miln as their minister. The query arises whether, in this new aspect of affairs, Western Unitarianism (which admits doubtless of several varieties) will be strong enough to repeat at its conference next May its resolution of seven years ago, with application to this more recent case of "disfellowship" close at home. Probably not a little part of the constituency of Western Unitarianism has been awakened by this Chicago case to the fact that, when heretofore it has declared for religious freedom, it has assumed that the "freedom," at least so far as the preachers are concerned, should be within the limits of theism, if not Christian theism; and perhaps it will now think it more ingenious to say this. As we wrote last week, the point of our complaint against Unity Church is that, having expressly given their minister liberty, they should have so summarily dismissed him for using it as soon as it cut across some of their favorite beliefs, and without waiting to see whether in his work he would subordinate both theological belief and non-beliefs to the building up of "fidelity in duty" and the improvement of society.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WE have a contribution from George Jacob Holyoake, on the "Progress of Opinion" in England, which we shall publish next week.

CAPT. R. C. ADAMS, son of the well-known Rev. Nehemiah Adams, will, in an article entitled "Loss or Gain?" which will appear in the next number of our paper, reply to those who have criticised his change of belief.

THE remarkable series of papers on "The Christian Religion," first published in the North American Review from the pens of Colonel Ingersoll, Judge Black, and Prof. George Fisher, which have been noticed in these columns in the order of their appearance, have now, in response to requests from all parts of the country, been brought together in a magazine-sized pamphlet, with handsome paper covers, and can be obtained at this office, at the price of fifty cents per copy.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago comes to us in a new and improved dress,—its "spring dress," it says; and it is bright and cheery enough in appearance to belong to that season. Colonel Bundy has our best wishes for the continued success of his journal, which he has always held up to a high moral level, even when by his determination to do so at all hazards he has been misappreciated and maligned by those who should have thanked him rather for his unselfish and manly course in exposing fraud, dishonesty, and immorality under whatever name they sought to hide.

WE frequently meet men who pass for educated, and yet who are like the old Parisian woman, who lived through the entire career of Napoleon innocent of any knowledge of his existence. Many such persons are found among the orthodox clergy. They are utterly ignorant of the higher thought and culture of the age. They know nothing of the best Biblical criticism of the time. The reasoning faculty in them is atrophied by non-use. There is no mystery in the universe for such. It is formulated and impersonated for them, so that questions of origin and destiny are as clear as sunlight.

THE large audience which gathered at Parker Memorial Hall on last Sunday forenoon to do honor to the memory of George Eliot (Mrs. Lewes) was well repaid for its attendance in the successful carrying out of all parts of the impressive and appropriate programme of services. The thanks of that audience for the pleasure thus given it is due mainly to Mr. W. H. Hamlin, who planned most of the arrangements and who has worked earnestly for their success. To the many who revere and admire George Eliot as a woman and a writer, the proceedings at Parker Memorial must have been very gratifying, and the more so because the words for the music, recitation, and readings were extracts from her own works, so that the motto of the occasion might well have been, "She, being dead, yet speaketh." Around and above the platform were draped beautiful vines, wreaths, and baskets of flowers; while vases of lovely and fragrant flowers graced every available part of the speaker's desk. The services, conducted by W. H. Spear, began with singing by Miss Garlin's "Euterpe Club" of young ladies, followed by the reading of choice selections from George Eliot's works by a lady whose name we did not hear. Mr. Hamlin then recited in a very impressive manner, from memory and without perceptible break, the whole of the grand poem, "The Legend of Jubal,"—a feat of memory rare in these days. Then, singing again by the Euterpe Club, after which Mr. Henry Harland, who has been several times mentioned in these columns as a promising young speaker, and whose address at the anniversary of the New York Society for Ethical Culture will be remembered, gave a short address on the life and works of Mrs. Lewes, which showed a fine appreciation of the lessons contained in both. Miss M. A. Hardaker read with much power and feeling the poem "Brother and Sister," said to be autobiographical, and which has its prose counterpart in The Mill on the Floss. In conclusion, the quartette rendered in a very fine manner the words so often quoted, "Oh, may I join the choir invisible"; and, as a sort of benediction, Mr. Spear read an excellent tribute, by a writer whose name we failed to catch, to the moral lessons contained in George Eliot's idealizations, in the way of a review of Adam Bede. The music to which the words of Mrs. Lewes were set was arranged for the occasion by Miss J. P. Titcomb; and to Miss Garlin's efforts with her class, under somewhat discouraging circumstances, is due the successful rendering of the music. All parts of these memorial services were well arranged, and carried out in a manner worthy of the great writer in whose honor they were held.

THE following are the resolutions which present the subject-matter of the Conference of the Free Religious Association to be held in this city on the 28th inst.:—

Resolved, 1. That, in order to obtain the preliminary knowledge necessary to more effective work, the Executive Committee be instructed to select and appoint some able and zealous member of the Association, so far as possible, from each State, to act as local correspondent.

2. That the Executive Committee furnish said State local correspondents with a list of questions to be answered by them, relating to legal restrictions upon religious liberty, to general educational and church influences, to the possibilities of forming Free Religious Associations in their States, and to such other moral and social conditions as may be of use in gaining accurate statistical information respecting the progress and needs of our movement throughout the United States; and, further, that, wherever said local correspondents desire and the Executive Committee think advisable, the general agent (if one be employed) be sent to aid in collecting these facts.

3. That a midwinter conference of the Association be held, at such time and place as shall be determined by the Executive Committee, before which the reports of the local correspondents shall be presented, together with the general agent's supplementary report of State conditions.

4. That, in order to attain greater solidity and breadth of action, we now appoint a special committee to report to said midwinter conference a plan for the formation of State auxiliaries to the National Free Religious Association, and for the suitable recognition of the delegate power of such auxiliaries in our Constitution, which plan, if approved by the conference, shall be submitted to the next annual meeting for final action; or, if such plan shall not in the judgment of the Committee be feasible, to report any other plan of increased activity which shall make our work more national and more effective.

TWO SONNETS.

BY J. H. C.

I.

The Undeified Reward.

All righteous causes owe thee tribute great,
God's servant free, self-mastered slave of Truth!
Behold thy fruits, in quickened heart of youth,
In nobler fealty to save the State,
In conscience clearer, more inviolate.
Thou bringer of the Orient's sacred light,
Of faiths and hopes that lose themselves in sight,
Of wisdom from the far primeval date!
Be thine the Benefactor's fitting prize,—
The love thy love begets. To greet thee rise Fresh charities. Thy glory shall it be
The life of man with manliest strength to lift,
And make belated blessings sure and swift.
Such, then, thy way to immortality!

II.

"The Burden and Release."

Thou who didst shape to life the Buddhist's dream,
O'er whose still soul nirvana breathed its spell:
In that deep quiet didst thou ever dwell
Wherein man's current joins the Eternal Stream.
Yet thou didst love the meadows and the gleam
Of sun-clad hills, that poured down light and strength,
And made life joy to thee through all its length
Of sweet and holy days. Who, then, can deem
That on the earth man lives, or ever did,
A life than thine in heaven more deeply hid?
From mortal burden thou couldst find release,
E'en while upon thy patient heart it lay,—
Thou, who couldst know the Eternal in a day.
And feel, midst wars, the Everlasting Peace.

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 16, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended, for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

LAST WORDS IN THE PULPIT.*

Farewell Discourse in Unity Church, Chicago, March 12, 1882.

BY GEORGE C. MILN.

Since we last met here, it has been by yourselves decided that we shall not meet again. The resolution passed at your meeting of February 13, instructing the trustees to notify me that my services must terminate at the expiration of three months, coupled with the ingenious suggestion that the same officers be empowered to grant me a vacation during those three months, renders it quite impossible, of course, for me to ever again address this congregation upon any terms whatever. And I only appear before you this morning for the purpose of placing on record my conception of the causes which have led to the abrupt termination of my relations with this church. I do this in justice to myself, as well as to the many friends throughout the country who, during the past trying weeks, have sustained me with their sympathetic words, and who feel my wound as though it were their own.

I wish to avoid the utterance of any harsh or unseemly word in what I have to say at this time; and, if any tinge of acerbity creeps into this address, no one will regret it more sincerely than myself. This desire, I confess, is not born of the conviction that this congregation, since the 13th of February, deserves such consideration on my part, but rather of the feeling that justice to my own better self, as well as to the cause I represent, requires the suppression of every thing malicious and vindictive. I remember and will act upon Hamlet's charge to Polonius in reference to the entertainment of the actors:—

Hamlet.—Good, my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?

Polonius.—My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

Hamlet.—God's bodykins, man, much better! Use every man after his desert, and who should 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity: the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty.

As I stand here to-day, and realize that it is the last time I shall ever speak to you, I cannot suppress a feeling of astonishment at the suddenness of the proceeding which has led to this separation. It is not yet six weeks since I here uttered that address upon the "Church of the Future" which has excited so much virulent and so little intelligent criticism. It seems, indeed, but yesterday that I listened to the pleasant congratulations of the congregation over my determination to remain in this pulpit; and, to-day, the same hands which then clasped mine in the warmth of friendship are eager to wave me a none too friendly farewell. Surely, a change so swift and so complete may be traced to a cause most emphatic or to a mistake most egregious.

Before attempting to show the cause of this revolution of feeling, I wish to explain the circumstances connected with my resignation and its subsequent withdrawal, which have been so generally misunderstood. On the 15th of October, 1881, I addressed a letter to the leading trustee of this church, telling him I wished to be released from this pulpit, and giving as one reason for that desire my conviction that I was too far in advance of the congregation in my philosophical position, and that we had therefore better separate. The gentleman to whom I addressed that letter urged delay, and I yielded to his wish. In December of 1881, however, I renewed the request for release from my duties in this pulpit. In the letter then written, I did not mention my theological position, because, on consultation with leading men in the congregation, it was considered best to leave that unmentioned. You will remember that just at that time the religious (?) papers of the country were gloating over the fact that Mr. Frothingham had forever rendered the advance of rational religion impossible by a supposed recantation. And I wished to quietly withdraw from my position without furnishing the religious (!) editors any further material for their poorly written misrepresentations. In response to the letter I have mentioned, a committee was appointed to wait upon me, and induce me to withdraw the resignation just offered. At the interview which followed, I plainly described my theological position as "ultra" and "radical"; spoke of myself as a disciple of Herbert Spencer's in philosophy; and said, "If I withdraw this resignation, you will ask me for it again within a year." Reply was made that "I was not aware how radical the congregation was." But we separated without any intimation on my part that I would withdraw the resignation. After this, another committee was appointed; and this committee again urged me to remain here. I told them emphatically that I considered myself "too radical" for the place; but it was urged that the congregation, too, was progressive in its tendencies, and that I had better stay. I thereupon withdrew the resignation, and, in my announcement to the congregation on the ensuing Sunday, said that I had become convinced that I might henceforth "utter the utmost truth to which my mind might reach." The facts here recorded are simply irrefragable. And, one month after they had transpired, I was abruptly and harshly notified that my services were no longer needed. Let us now seek the cause of this swift revolution in the mind of the congregation. It is easy to conceive of circumstances which would justify such treatment. Had I suddenly taken to stealing overcoats, or had I announced that the late Brigham Young's family relations were ideal, or that gambling was, in point of fact, the finest flower of our civilization, the abruptness of this society's method in dismissing me would have been entirely justifiable. But, no. No man has arisen to charge me with abating "one jot or tittle" of the moral code which governs our modern life. Whatever builds up noble manhood, whatever enshrines the virtue of women, whatever preserves unstained and sacred the hearthstone, I have taught with all the emphasis of my nature. We must then look elsewhere for the cause of this action now under discussion. And here I may say that, when I asked the society to furnish me with a reason for its action, it absolutely refused to do so. Lawyers arose to inform me that it was not "So nominated in the bond," that my contract called for the giving of no reason, and that the society proposed simply to

"Stand upon its bond."

That the contract indeed called for no reason, I very well knew; but I had supposed—foolishly enough, I now see—that a society of Christians might take a broader view than that of mere technicality, that it might recall some old lines about the "long-suffering of charity," about going forth "into the wilderness" after "the lost sheep"; and, when I found a church-meeting disposed to fall back upon those technicalities which a railroad corporation would instinctively employ in contesting some trivial cow case or personal injury, I could not avoid recalling this magnificent strain:—

"Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness."

Nor could I resist a disposition to contrast my own conduct when asked by the society for a reason for my resignation, which I most freely and unreservedly gave, with the conduct of the society in so curtly refusing my request. Others said that it was "quite impossible for the society to give a reason for its action,"—this, too, from a society composed of intelligent people, accustomed generally to assign a reason for their actions in the daily affairs of life. This statement, however, was regarded by thoughtful men throughout the country as a bit of quiet irony, and I will not be guilty of reviving a stale joke. I am obliged, therefore, to imagine a cause. Having asked for one in vain of those who only could give it, I must look into the nature of all the circumstances and find one for myself.

And, when I do this, I am driven to the conclusion that the reason of my displacement from this pulpit lies in the fact of my unambiguous use of the English language. I have inherited, from my mother I think, a most detestable habit of calling a spade—a spade! This is unfortunate in the pulpit, especially in the pulpit of a liberal church. The language of diplomacy, of expediency, of policy,—a kind of phraseology which I do most cordially hate,—answers the purpose better. I have in my "mind's eye," at this moment, a Sunday lecturer in this city, who has achieved distinction in this kind of phraseologic jugglery.

He is, oh! so eloquent in talking of Socrates; but, instead of pronouncing himself as a man upon any vital question of the day, he wriggles along on the top of the fence, and never lands on either side till all other travellers have alighted. The Halifax of the pulpit! A natural trimmer and twister of words, who sustains himself with the Orthodox by frequent indulgence in their favorite adjectives and nouns, and keeps in with the heretics by occasional, wisely timed excursions into the domain of rationalism! Unfortunately for me, as some may think, but most fortunately, in my own judgment, it has been found quite impossible to teach me this highly useful art. Word-twisting I am not skilled in! There is no use attempting to conceal that fact. I have always announced my convictions in the pulpit. I have not supposed that my work was that of hoodwinking the people, but of leading them away from superstitious into the clear and blessed light of reason. I understand that Rev. Henry Ward Beecher—for whom I have always cherished a sincere regard—has recently said that a minister should not tell the people all he knows. That, he says, is just the difference between a minister and a professor! Well, I have been wishing, ever since I heard that remark, that Princeton would call Mr. Beecher to the chair of systematic theology (!), so that the world might once find out all he believes! As a professor, he could tell it all, you know. Now, to me, any such sophism as that is thoroughly contemptible. "The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," is, in my judgment, the formula for the pulpit. And loyalty to that formula is the cause of my exclusion from this pulpit. For does any one doubt that many ministers in the pulpits and thousands of laymen in the pews entertain views similar to those expressed in my address on the "Church of the Future," the only difference between us being that I have spoken of a spade as a spade, while others denominate it "an implement for disturbing the crust of the earth"?

If we examine the present status of theological parties to-day, we will find at least three pretty distinct classes: first, the supernaturalists, or those who accept without modification all the miraculous claims of the New Testament; second, the rationalists, or those who give to reason the supreme place in religion as in everything else; and, third, the nondescripts, or those who play fast and loose with the two parties just mentioned. Let us look at the respective positions of these three classes for a little while.

The position of the supernaturalists it is not easy to mistake. Commencing with a mystical foundation for their religious theories, their entire theological castle is built in the air. Beginning with the assumption of an infallible book, they end with the assumption of a physical and exclusive heaven. Their grotesque story of the fall of man is only equalled by their fantastic picture of his ultimate exaltation. In a word, their whole position is described when we say that they postulate, as demonstrable facts, dogmas whose only foundation is mysticism.

"The Bible and the Bible only," said one of their number, "is the religion of Protestants." Now, at the time when the yoke of a corrupt Church was grinding men's souls and bodies alike in the dust, to exchange an infallible church for an infallible book was doubtless a step in right direction. An ecclesiastical tyrant in flesh and blood could inflict tortures more terrible than any ill effects which might proceed from the various interpretations of ancient manuscripts, however sacred they might be. No wonder, then, that lovers of human liberty hailed the change of authority with manifestations of delight. But now how different it all seems! Doctrines contradictory to human reason and repugnant to human sensibility are evolved from these time-worn documents, and enforced as relentlessly, if not as bloodily, as any papal bull or council's edict in the by-gone days.

It is from this source that the doctrine of a personal deity has been so confidently deduced. Commencing with the ancient Hebrew, who, in his strifes with the predatory tribes of the desert, always vainly supposed God to be on his side, the attributes of personality have been promiscuously and irreverently ascribed to that unseen and unknowable force which lies back of all phenomena, and the existence of which none of us deny. "The Lord is a man of war, the Lord is his name," exclaimed the exultant Jew; and ever since they who have accepted as infallibly inspired the Old and New Testaments have kept up the same cry, with trifling modifications. Nor do I find it difficult to account for the genesis of this attempt to picture, under the terms of personality, the energizing principle of nature. The highest thing known to primitive man was his own nature: he therefore magnified that nature, and thus made a personal God. Every man's God is himself exaggerated. That is, if he clings to the conception of a personal deity.

So also was the devil originated. Men saw the malevolent workings of nature, and they attributed them to the agency of a person. All this is easy to conceive as an operation of the crude speculations of primitive man. But, when we come to an age of reason, it is difficult to understand why men should so desperately cling to these notions. And their inconsistency in doing so is indeed remarkable. For instance, a year ago, in this pulpit, I clearly abandoned the idea of a personal devil, and there was not a ripple of excitement. No one was sad when I announced that the devil was dead, no one put on mourning. In good truth, I thought at the time some of the brethren seemed to be relieved. I said then, "The only devil in the universe is evil: eliminate evil, and the devil is dead." Now, a child can see that the antithesis of a personal devil is a personal God, and that logically the two ideas stand or fall together. But, when I come to say that it is irreverent and rash to limit the mysterious force which underlies all life by the terms of human personality, then those who raised no objection to the removal of a personal devil cry out in holy horror! Alas for their logical acumen!

Another position, which is based on the reception of an infallible book, is that of the vicarious atonement; and still another is the doctrine of a hell and a heaven in which the evil and the good are to spend eternity. Now, if one accepts the premise of an infallible book, supernaturally originated, I for one do not see how he can dodge any of these doctrines. If the Bible says, "God is a man," why then he is a man. If the Bible says, "The devil has hoofs," undoubtedly he has hoofs. If the Bible says that "for so much blood a certain number of folks are going to escape hell," then, doubtless, that also is true. In a word, it is consistent, having accepted the infallible book, to accept without qualification any nonsense which it may be found to contain.

I call your attention to these additional facts, which are part of the system of the supernaturalists. First, morality is made to depend upon a reception of these doctrines. In a word, they are made the only basis of morality. "Do away with a personal God," exclaims the supernaturalist, "and you have no basis for morality left." As though the distinctions between right and wrong depended upon any theological dogma whatever! Second, the chief motives for human conduct are drawn from these improbable dogmas. I do not exaggerate when I say that the burden of ordinary preaching is, "Be bad, and you'll go to hell! be good, and you'll go to heaven!"—teaching so utterly immoral and unworthy that I find no language sufficiently strong with which to condemn it; and so destructive, I may add, of all the finest instincts of men that, until such teaching is displaced by purer ethical instruction, no very swift advance need be expected in the morality of our race.

Such, in brief, is the position of the supernaturalists. An angry God is in their heaven. A pleading God is by his side. A miraculous book explains not only the anger of the first, but the pleading of the second. An atonement has been made through blood. Some souls, through its mystic power, will be lifted to the glory of the New Jerusalem, while others will pass into intolerable and unending anguish. Such is the system of Calvin, in all its diluted forms; such the beauty of the God it offers for our worship; such is the horrible prospect it displays over every grave. How strange then that fatuity which leads men to simulate enthusiasm for a God whose garments are stained with blood, and to long for a heaven which is to be the eternal opposite of a bottomless hell! And yet there is a logical consistency in this system which our friends of the nondescript persuasion entirely lack. Admit its premise, and how will you escape its conclusions? Given the book which cannot err, and it were blasphemy indeed to question its teachings, however grotesque or horrible they may be.

It is from bondage to this horrible nightmare of the middle ages that I, in common with many others, would liberate the human mind; and, in order to do this, we find it necessary to cut loose from the entire system. Do not mistake me. We do not renounce all religion, but we project a new meaning into the word. To us, religion no longer means the holding of a set of mystical ideas upon speculative subjects. It means, instead, enthusiasm for noble morality, for exalted goodness; and it has for its aim the production of right social relations and the idealization of the human race. To this position, I have come, not suddenly, as some say, but as the result of long and painstaking study. For years, the trend of my thoughts has been in this direction.

This is the religion of the Agnostics. It is not mere negation. It is rather a more glorious and more definite positive than any boasted by the old systems. Men who stand where I stand may at least claim the merit of consistency. We postulate as parts of our system only demonstrable facts. When asked to define ourselves in regard to deity, we say, "In the nature of things, no definition can be given!" We indeed regard the attempt to limit the energizing principle of the universe by terms of human personality as contradictory and irreverent. "Contradictory," because all our conceptions of personality are formed from our knowledge of finite persons; and to carry up these conceptions and attribute them to that which is infinite is essentially absurd. It is often said that, if we would think of a God at all, we must think of him as possessing the attributes of personality,—that is, we must carry up our own characteristics and attribute them to him. But, to me, this process of reasoning is extremely weak. For I find that, after this has been done, it is confessed that no satisfactory conception of the divine nature has been reached, and I ask, Why not stop before setting out upon so futile a task? All we can do is to throw our own nature on the canvas, magnify it, and call it God. And yet we are finite and limited. Who, then, is most reverent,—he who thus rashly gives a name to the unnamable, he who thus describes the indescribable, he who thus limits the illimitable, he who pretends to analyze the unknowable, or he who confesses himself but a babe in the face of so great a mystery, and bids his tongue cease its idle prattling on the threshold of the infinite? Let it be understood that we make no rash denial of a force which permeates the universe, a force which sways the planets and paints the petal of the opening rosebud, a force which animates with myriad-fold life this ball on which we live, and spangles the "majestical roof" above with its glory of "golden fire," a force which lends sweetness to the song of birds, and flashes in the love-lit eyes of youth, a force which girdles the earth with light as with a garment, and stretches its mystic wand to the uttermost limits of space. To deny this, we have already said, were evidence of an unsound mind; and I, for one, have never denied it. But, having made this confession, we refuse to be driven into the incongruity of limiting with human conditions and human terms that which baffles our closest thought and defies our keenest inspection. And I hold such deference is essentially more reverential than the presumption of a man who glibly applies to this mysterious force his own pet names.

But, in regard to other points of supernatural theology, we take far different ground. The doctrine of a vicarious atonement we hold in derision as a scheme unworthy of just men, and certainly unworthy of a just God. The picture of one God bribing another is so grotesque that with difficulty we suppress our ridicule. We admire the lofty personality of Jesus. As for myself, I can truly say that never from these lips has one word of irreverence escaped in speaking of that noble man. His magnificent enthusiasm, his quick-springing sympathy, his moral fervor, his poetic appreciation of the beautiful and the noble, together with the undertone of pathos in his nature, which made him swift to dry all tears, as well as charitable to the meanest and the most brutal, have always charmed my sensibilities and compelled my admiration. But the idea that he died to change the attitude of an Infinite Being toward the inhabitants of this planet is so incongruous that I am amazed at the credulity of those who accept it. A God who could consent to the suffering of so pure and lofty a man in behalf of men unworthy and criminal is himself immoral, and needs saving. The conception of the atonement ordinarily dealt out from orthodox pulpits is exploded and obsolete in the judgment of thinking men, and this is the reason that so few really thoughtful men are found in the churches where it is wearily reiterated.

And when we come to the question of eschatology, of the future state of human beings, we at once denounce as absurd the supernatural representations of heaven and hell, and confess ourselves as totally ignorant upon the whole subject. The idea of a local heaven with pavements laid in gold and foundation stones of jewelry is as fancifully improbable as the picture of an eternal hell is unlikely and brutal. It is not illogical, however, if you once accept the conception of a God who can partially select some of his children to be glorified, and leave others to be damned. With such a God on the summit of Olympus, any Tartarus is possible. But, against this God and this hell, we protest with equal vehemence. To make any person responsible for the present brutalities of this world is bad enough, but to project these agonies across the infinite waste of eternal years; to magnify every pain that tortures a human soul, till it be adequate to eternal time; to perpetuate every wail of anguish that escapes from human lips, and make it of everlasting duration; to think of Dives as forever calling in vain to Abraham for the end of a finger dipped in water to relieve his thirst; and then point to a smiling God in the centre of the universe as the author of it all,—why, this is nothing less than to enthroned an incarnate devil, and to elevate Mephistopheles as monarch of the universe.

The immorality of an eternal hell should brand every man who teaches it as being himself immoral. At any rate, I have this to say: that from a God who could make possible such a hereafter I would turn away in loathing and contempt. I recall at this moment the memory of my mother: "She was a woman! Take her for all in all, I shall not look upon her like again!" How swift her sympathies, how magnificent her scorn, how loyal her friendship, how noble and complete her enmity, how tender her love, and how gentle her charity! The mildness of the stars and the brilliance of the sun beamed from her beautiful eyes. And yet, if the orthodox theology be true, that woman, upon whose bosom I leaned as a babe, is now in hell: for she never felt the necessity of joining any church. And I deliberately say to you that, if there is a God in this universe mean enough to damn that woman, I want him to damn me too; for I still wish to keep my mother's company.

Heaven and hell are antithetical terms here or hereafter; and, while I would teach men to be honest and true and brave and loving, that they may live in heaven here, I would also say, in regard to the future, "I know nothing." Here let me quote the corroborating language of Bishop Foster, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who says:—

However it may awaken surprise, truth demands that we should make the confession that we do not know that death does not end all. . . . We have neither sense nor mental vision of man after he dies. He does not appear again within the range of our faculties. We do not find him. Where he is, or that he is at all, is absolutely unknown to us. Our consciousness is silent on the subject. The dead do not come back to us, and we are not able to go to them. This without doubt is the common experience of humanity.

To those who confidently predict a future existence for the soul of man, I again propose the demonstration of the separability of mind and body. Prove that, and I am convinced.

But the cry is raised that such views destroy the basis of morality; and we are asked, What incentive will you now offer men for right action? If you cannot bribe them with heaven or frighten them with hell, what influence will you bring to bear on them? And again we fall back upon our original position, and say we can only postulate as parts of our system demonstrable facts. We will not journey to ghostland for motives. We will say, and say emphatically, that there is such a thing as right conduct and there is such a thing as wrong conduct. In other words, we will fall back upon the existence of that distinction between right and wrong, out of which has been evolved the objective personal devil and the objective personal God. We deny the personality, but we recognize the existence of an ideal evil and an ideal good in the universe. And then, as an incentive to the individual to strive after the attainment of this ideal, we will point out: first, its intrinsic beauty; second, the fact of its beneficial effect upon the race; and, third, the fact that only by the subjugation of all evil, and the universal sway of ideal good, will humanity reach its golden age, and dwell indeed in Paradise. Before going forward to a brief survey of the position of the nondescripts, the third party of which I spoke, I wish to reply to the criticism that the agnostic position which I have just attempted to describe is not worthy the name of religion. As it seems to me, that depends very much upon our usage of language. If new meanings must ever find new words, then we must give up the word "religion" and the word "church." A correspondent of mine, who graduated at Harvard in 1855, in writing to me upon this subject, after expressing his amazement at the harsh and abrupt course of this church, says:—

I fear that you concede too much, and that the old bottles will all have to be broken to pieces, and, instead of "church," say simply some form of mutual co-operation. I don't object to "church," but it will be very long before the word is not misunderstood and associated with the old superstitions. Just so I do not think that the term "religion" will very soon come to signify simple, rational morality. And is it not better to say so,—to say, "We do not want religion, but right living, right thinking, acting, and feeling?"

This friend seems to me to strike the matter in the right way. If, to be religious, one must be also superstitious, then the Agnostics have no right to be called religious. But if to believe in right and wrong, if to believe in charity and fraternity, if to labor to relieve the under classes of their burdens, if to keep one's hopes fixed upon a lofty ideal, and work ever toward lifting humanity to the plane of that excellence,—if this is to be religious, that is to say, if we may project this new meaning into the old term,—then we may be said to have our religion and our faith. And if to meet together for the stimulation of these lofty purposes be to us a strength, then, too, we have as good and as logical a right to so meet as the Romanist himself!

But it is often said, "Such a religion would produce no practical fruits. Having lost the incentives of supernatural theology, all enthusiasm for practical philanthropic enterprise is also lost." But such criticism is very shallow, and finds its sufficient and unanswerable refutation when we consider the work done and the fruit borne by the "Society for Ethical Culture" in the city of New York. That society proceeds in all its work upon the idea "that it is possible to establish a code of ethics resting solely on the enlightened moral consciousness of man, without any reference to Divine Providence, revelation, or a future life," and the extent and beauty of its work is the best vindication of its theory. Besides sustaining a Sunday lectureship, at which eager multitudes always wait for the truly inspired words of that thrice noble leader, Felix Adler, they have established and maintain an "Ethical School," a "Free Kindergarten," an "Industrial School," and a "System of District Nursing." In the Ethical School, the children of the society, and other children, are instructed in a system of natural ethics, independent of any supernatural basis entirely. And, if you could have listened with me to the calm, rational instruction given to a class of young women on the ethics of daily life, you would, I am sure, have felt the last quail of scepticism slinking slyly away. The kindergarten takes children of the poorest classes, and grounds them thoroughly in Froebel's system, and the industrial school "proposes to combine industrial education with instruction in the ordinary branches of a school course"; while the system of district nursing aims to send trained and cultivated nurses to the bed-sides of the poor and degraded. I have not the space at present to adequately picture the splendid work being done by this society; but, to those who assert that Agnosticism produces no good fruit, I confidently point out this most admirable institution. In the language of Prof. Adler himself, their motto is, "Diversity in creed, unanimity in deed. The vital point with us," he continues, "is to insist on the independence of morality of any religious dogma. While it is commonly held that moral teaching must be based upon some doctrine of Deity or the immortality of the soul, we find in the sovereign law of ethics itself the foundation of the spiritual life."

I have briefly described the position of the supernaturalists and that of the rationalists or Agnostics, and now turn to a few words about the nondescripts. "Neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red-herring," theologically considered, they like to be classified in turn as belonging to every class. I understand that Mr. Herford has been recently betrayed into an unfortunate simile about a cow and a pump, in describing the Unitarian position. I wish I had seen it. Anything suggestive of a dairy is refreshing, especially a theological dairy: But, as I have not, I wish to suggest, as an appropriate analogy for Unitarianism as compared with other denominations, the phrase "theological catch-all." This, I think, is appropriate and logical and not too irreverent. Unitarianism does not write down its creed, lest somebody might be barred out thereby or lest the language might grow old. It believes in the largest liberty, but not in writing. It is a camp where unwritten profanity is allowed, but woe to the unfortunate who swears in black and white! If any one doubts this, I offer in evidence my own case. Dozens of friends in this society stand where I stand, but they do not wish the world to know it. One of them says, "If it is true, I see no use in preaching it"; another, who has often confessed to me his complete agnosticism about the future, has recently become very sad at the prospect of having no one sufficiently orthodox to conduct his funeral exercises. Such symptoms teach me this lesson,—though, alas! rather late, I confess,—that you may be an Agnostic in a nondescript pulpit, but you must never confess it!

Looking at the whole position of the Unitarianism of to-day, it seems to me unworthy the respect of the supernaturalists or the rationalists. It is in fact a weak attempt to splice a rope of sand, and, in the nature of things, must fail. It rejects the easy miracles and indorses the more difficult. It believes in the invariability of law, but nevertheless prays, and thus tries to overturn it. It rejects the idea that Jesus was a God, but thinks he was not altogether a man. In fact, as a denomination, it has an architectural peculiarity of the New Jerusalem, with none of its beauty. That is, it has gates opening in every direction anxious to receive any one to its fold who will ask no questions for conscience' sake. And that is why I call it the Church of the Nondescripts. Let no young man within the orthodox lines to-day be deceived by it. When he gets ready to break with supernaturalism in toto, let him come squarely out, and forever leave the pulpit. But, if he would fain linger within church lines, let him remember that Unitarianism, while boasting her freedom from dogmatic supernaturalism, and while indeed insisting upon fewer articles than the ordinary sectarian, in point of fact demands all the forms and boasts all the prestige of supernatural theology, without possessing a title of its spirit. The young preacher will find that his congregation neglects prayer, but at the same time expects him to pray; that they reject the miracles, but will permit him to do no such thing; that they entertain doubts about a future existence, but will tolerate no acknowledgment of such doubt on his part. In other words, he will come to regard himself and to despise himself, if he has in him the right material, as a mere functionary, whose duty it is to conceal the smile on his own face as he conducts forms which are empty and meaningless to himself and his hearers. And, if he has any doubt of this, let him observe the listless stare and unbowed heads of his hearers when he says, "Let us pray," and the pitiful handful from a great congregation which joins in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Yes, I, too, reiterate the advice of a religious editor of this town,—himself an Agnostic in private,—and warn all young men within the orthodox ranks, of liberal tendencies, to remain there till such time as they are prepared to forever break with supernaturalism. Unitarianism holds out the promise of liberty, but does not fulfil it. In it, you may indeed think as I have thought; but woe to you, if you speak as I have spoken! Nor do I think this state of things grows out of intentional dishonesty, but rather out of the attempt to bridge over the chasm between the position of the supernaturalist and that of the rationalists. This is a task which defies philosophy. The positions are diametrically opposite. Nay, they are essentially antagonistic; and, compared with the attempt to harmonize them, the solving of Samson's riddle was child's play. And so it follows that those who try to unite the two extremes, and please all parties, fall into dire and often amusing confusion.

And now I must close. I could speak much longer upon this suggestive theme; but I have said enough to make evident my conviction that consistency requires one to belong either to the great host of supernatural religionists or to the great and increasing host of rationalists. I have said enough also to show that, in leaving the pulpit, I lay aside no ambition for the nobilitation of the human race. Before my eyes is the glorious ideal of moral perfection, upon it I would centre your hopes and mine, and indulge the aspiration that in our day and generation we may do at least some little to pave the way for its final victory. I hate to say "good-by." It is the word that is always breaking in upon the midst of happiness, and yet in this case it is the only word left to say. To the young men and women of this church, who have been as my brothers and sisters, let me once more say, be true, be kind, be honest, be brave; and so in this world, or any other, life shall be full of joy and death shall bring no terror. To the members of the society for all their kindness, barring the meeting of the 13th of February, I say, Thank you. I should say no less to a servant, and could say no more to a king. And to the small band of devoted friends, who in the midst of misrepresentation and unkind criticism have stood by my side, sustaining me with their noble words, I can only say, May you ever find friends as true and as loving in every hour of darkness and of storm! Farewell! Yes, farewell, not only to the associations and friendship of this place, but to the toils and hopes of my young manhood, to the ten years I have spent in the pulpit, to the occupations to which I have become accustomed, to the ambitions which I have fondly cherished, to the noble men I have known and loved in the ministry,—in a word, to all the old life from which I now turn away, for, when I leave this pulpit, I will never enter another. And now, at last, as for you, I hope the best and brightest things; and for myself, turning my back upon the past, I look into the future with hope and confidence.

AN ADDRESS BY MRS. CLARA NEYMANN.

The following is a summary of an address given in German by Mrs. Neymann in this city on the occasion of the celebration of Washington's and Karl Heinzen's birthdays in the "Turn-Halle," February 22, reported by Miss Sprague.

Mrs. Neymann spoke first of Washington in his character as patriot, general, and statesman, a subject of which we should never tire; for such unselfish and lofty patriotism we especially need to recall now, forming as it does so striking a contrast to that of many politicians and statesmen of to-day. It has been said that Washington possessed no extraordinary traits of character; but, in the speaker's opinion, his was a most uncommon character, through that very power of self-government which produced that happy balancing of qualities which is so rare, although he was not of a purely "cosmopolitan" nature (embracing the whole universe in its thought), in the radical sense of the word. His sense of duty was strongly shown in his suppressing his love for retirement, and, while having no desire for office, yielding to the wishes of his countrymen,—a sense of duty in which the best and ablest men of to-day are sometimes lacking. Washington's greatness lay perhaps not so much in natural talent as in the will-power to make the best use of what he did possess for the effecting of his aims, and this is often the greatest of acquirements. Washington was of the true English stamp of character, not stormy and impulsive, but quiet, grave, impressing one with that feeling of reserved strength which is so helpful when the emergency comes, and then, at the right moment, works with Titanic energy, untiring till the object is accomplished.

Could Germany in 1848 have had such a wise, thoughtful, judicious leader, instead of enthusiastic revolutionists, its whole present condition might have been reversed.

The American Constitution was regarded by Washington and most of his able associates to be the result of compromise, its defects were known and felt, and we are now witnessing the developments of some of those half-hidden evils which, through the weakness of human nature, have helped to develop such characters as Grant, Conkling, and Blaine, striking contrasts to Washington,—men whose ambition unrestrained finds them only too ready to accept power, and perhaps even title, if offered to them by the people. Unbridled ambition, impure motives, have taken the place of the republican self-denial and simplicity of those earlier days of the Republic. These evil qualities are nourished by the defects in our political system which tend to encourage political vices and foster corruption.

Our great German, Karl Heinzen, whose birthday we also celebrate, was among the first to observe and fearlessly expose these evils, and point out their inevitable results. Why do we celebrate Heinzen's memory? Not because he contended ably against bigotry and superstition, for here others shared the field with him; not because he was the untiring champion of equal rights for women, for here too he was not alone; but because for more than thirty years he preached political reforms and demanded a purer democracy, and it is his doctrines which are beginning to find hearing and approval, and are now advocated by some of our best American thinkers. Why do we know so little of this great man? Because he unfortunately had no power of acquiring languages, and thus could not work among Americans; and the Germans, it must be confessed, with few exceptions, were slow to recognize his ability as politician from a defect in their character,—political indifference. His power of foresight was wonderful, so that he often seemed like a prophet. To the neglect of his warnings, we owe a Guiteau. Lincoln and Garfield are the victims of the people's negligence and deafness to his warning words.

Heinzen died unsatisfied. Washington, on the contrary, saw his mission fulfilled. Heinzen did not see, could never, perhaps, have seen the completion of his aims, because they require a complete, perfectly balanced humanity. German men and women, to you, especially, he leaves as an inheritance his ideas, his doctrines, to carry out and to fulfil. Let us as Germans be proud of this great mind which was so purely German in all its essential characteristics, and yet embraced all humanity in its beneficent thought. Let us keep, then, ever fresh the memory of Karl Heinzen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SECULARISM IN WISCONSIN POLITICS.

Editors of The Index:—

A goodly warfare has been carried on in the legislature of Wisconsin this winter on the question of the taxation of church property. Previous to the opening of the session, an "Association for the Equalization of Taxes" was organized in Milwaukee. Two bills were prepared by this association, aimed at the repeal of existing exemption laws in this State. The first bill was to amend the section of the revised statutes relating to the assessment of taxes, so that nearly all property therein described as exempt from taxation should be taxed, including that of railroad and insurance companies, etc. The second bill was to amend the statute by simply striking out the subdivision relating to religious, scientific, literary, and benevolent associations from the section describing property now exempt from taxation.

These bills were presented by Hon. Arthur Bate member from the first district of Milwaukee, January 18. The first bill was killed early in the session; the second, by the persistent efforts of Mr. Bate, was kept before the house. After repeated references to committees and repeated reports sent in recommending indefinite postponement, special action was taken on the bill, Tuesday, February 28, the result being that it was laid on the table.

This was the result anticipated by the supporters of the bills; but they seem well satisfied with what has been accomplished, and reckon it, as I have stated, a goodly warfare. Intelligent public sympathy has been one gain in the contest, on the side of justice. The measure has received respectful consideration in the legislature, and careful attention. The Catholic Church has been fairly aroused to fight in defence of their privileges. Remonstrances have been pouring into the legislature since the introduction of the bills. Up to February 27, 157 remonstrances with 16,859 signatures were thus sent, mainly from the Catholics. These remonstrances were prepared by the Catholic Church, and were copies of one that was issued in the Catholic Citizen February 4, and was as follows:—

Church Taxation.

To the Honorable the Senate and Assembly of the State of Wisconsin:—

We, the undersigned, citizens of the State of Wisconsin, respectfully protest against the passage of a proposed law now before the legislature of the State, embodied in two bills introduced by Mr. Bate of Milwaukee and numbered respectfully 8 and 12 A, each entitled a bill relating to the assessment of taxes and amendatory of Section 1038 of the Revised Statutes of 1878, and against all future bills that may be introduced of the same import.

Eight thousand copies of this remonstrance were printed and sent all over the State, accompanied by circulars addressed to the priests, as follows:—

Reverend Dear Sir,—On next Sunday, after mass, or as soon thereafter as possible, please get this remonstrance signed by all men in your parish, and send it forthwith to your representative in our State legislature now in session at Madison. Head the list with the names of prominent native and naturalized citizens.

It is the desire of our Most Reverend Archbishop and the Very Reverend Vicar-General that all interest themselves in this matter, and put in their protest against the proposition of taxing church and school property in our State.

By order of the Equal Rights Alliance, Milwaukee, Wis.

Early in the struggle, an editorial appeared in the Catholic Citizen, asking, "Why does not some friend of the churches propose an amendment looking toward the constitutional exemption of churches, thus settling the matter definitely?"

A friend did propose just such an amendment; and it was introduced in the legislature, and became one of the most forcible weapons used in the arguments in defence of the measure by the member who introduced the bills 8 and 12 A.

The ground taken by the Association for the Equalization of Taxes, that prepared the bills, was that the present exemption laws were unconstitutional, and that members of the legislature were acting in violation of their oath of office by not voting for the passage of the bills, and were disobeying the constitutional requirements. It was also decided by the association that no petitions should be sent in to the legislature.

Mr. Bate spoke at length on the bills showing that the law was unconstitutional which exempted church property from taxation, and that the Catholics who were fighting the repeal of these laws acknowledged that they were unconstitutional. Other arguments were urged by the gentleman, but they are too familiar to the readers of The Index to be reiterated.

That this battle is lost is no cause for discouragement. Other battles will be fought year after year on this question, and, as was well said in an editorial in to-day's issue of the Milwaukee Sentinel:—

After one or more attempts, the compromise of limited exemption to churches will probably be made, and after resting at that point for a greater or less number of years all exemption will finally be removed, when religious societies will stand before the law in precisely the same attitude as other associations owning property. For these ultimate results, it is well for the churches to begin their preparation. Their coming is only a matter of time, and the signs are that the time will not be very long.

This tone of the Milwaukee press indicates the influence which is felt upon public sentiment by the efforts of secularists in various directions.

To the credit of Milwaukee, it is to be said that the churches, aside from the Catholic, look upon the movement to tax church property with favor, not only as a measure in the defence of justice, but as a matter of policy.

The most discouraging feature of this fight has been the action of members of the assembly who believe in the justice of the measure, believe in the unconstitutionality of the law that exempts church property, and who would, if untrammelled, have advocated the passage of the bills, but who voted repeatedly against it. After the bills had been killed, no less than ten of these members declared that the measure was just, and that Mr. Bate's arguments were unanswerable, but still they voted against it. And why? It needs no guessing. One of these men has acknowledged himself bound, body and mind, to his constituency. How useless, worse than useless, it is to endeavor to wield weapons of manly warfare with slaves who are bought and sold with office, who dance attendance upon party, who act from policy and not from principle! It is the attitude of such men that takes the heart out of the honest laborers in the cause of progress. One can entertain unbounded respect for a consistent churchman who looks upon this measure of taxing church property as a sacrilege, who has been educated in and holds the belief that churches are consecrated to divine work, are in themselves divine, the bulwarks of moral influence, of civilization. There are many such. But that a man imbued with the spirit of free thought, who is devoid of superstition, should sell himself to a Catholic constituency, is past all respect, and he becomes only an object for our pity and our contempt. He adds to the sum of political impurities that are fouling the national atmosphere, but toward which the attention of all right-minded men is turned, toward which are directed the efforts of civil-service reform, with hopeful promises of successful sanitation.

One of these efforts is at present apparent in Milwaukee. A society has been organized whose object is the "purification of the caucus." Its officers include some of our representative citizens of wealth and influence, who have not weakly abandoned the political arena, disgusted with its demoralized condition, but have vigorously set themselves to infuse a healthier influence into political affairs.

MILWAUKEE, March 1, 1882.

CHURCH AUDIENCES.

Editors of The Index:—

A recent letter in your columns regarding "Sunday-evening Lyceums" ought not to represent Stoneham without some qualification. There has been no large falling off in church audiences here during the last quarter of a century. Leaving out of account the change from two preaching services to one, but making allowance for the growth of the town, the total of the Sabbath audiences here is full as large as in 1859, at which time I knew them.

Again, with all respect for my neighbor, the writer, his letter does not fairly represent the standard of professional courtesy among us. The editorial, the medical, the legal, and the other professions, whatever the faults of any of them, are, I am sure, held entitled at least to a fair measure of respect. It would be painful to us if some lawyer should publicly charge that doctors as a class furnish nothing worth going for, that their prescriptions are neither wholesome "nor funny," and that, while there are "many exceptions to the general rule," such as Dr. Bliss and Dr. Agnew, for instance, who "work hard, etc.," the exceptions prove the rule of prevailing indolence, incompetence, and unfaithfulness. I am unwilling to think that the doctor intended the insult which his words very strongly suggest. It must have been his nimble pen that made the mistake.

As the subject of the attendance upon church services has interested me deeply, will you permit me to mention an obstacle very different from the one your correspondent emphasizes. I do so not to divert attention from the limitations of preachers. Ministers, as I believe, feel the imperfection of their services as sincerely as any of their friends do. If we all had the liberality and sympathy of the Trinity Church pastor, or the courage and moral earnestness of Mr. Savage (the two men whom Dr. Brown named), more people would come to church, no doubt, and more good would be done. Still, nothing will be gained by confining our view entirely to faults of which ministers, in common with other men, have their share.

Society is tending toward cities. It is in cities that wealth is most concentrated. Just where luxury increases fastest, Sabbath habits have changed most. Church success is absolutely impossible without mutual sympathy in the congregation. The early Church enjoyed such a wonderful development of personal affection that they were sometimes said to have all things in common. The principle of mutual love, of sacrifice for each other's sake, is the church principle in all ages. What is prayer in the house of God but every worshipper taking upon his own heart the burden of every other worshipper. There can be no real prayer in the congregation save as, so to speak, we pool our troubles. When the great assembly do that, when the strong bear the burden of the weak, and they that have least of their own to carry carry most for others, heaven is moved and the blessing of God fills their souls to overflowing. But the disposition that does that is just what abounding luxury is almost sure to kill.

The opposite of this church principle is what may be called the theatre principle. The theatre says, Come in here, pay your money and be civil, and we will do all the rest. We reply in surprise: What, must I not extend social recognition to the actors that please me? Must I not speak with those that sit near me? Must I not sympathize with the troubled whom I meet there? And must I not surrender my seat to the woman or the aged who have none? The reply is: The theatre asks nothing of all this. You come under no obligation. You have nothing to do but to be entertained.

That is what luxury likes. Luxury likes it so well as to be trying to-day to make over the Church itself on the theatre principle. Luxury is saying to-day: I want my own box in church. I don't mean to put my riches under the poor man's poverty, my intelligence under his ignorance, my culture under his lack. As for sympathizing with people, or mingling with them, or even speaking with them, I won't do it, except just as I fancy. But the preacher and the choir must entertain me. Pray, what are they for, if not for that? And, if they can't do that, they don't know their business.

The pulpit may possibly persuade such hearers to correct their grave mistake, and present themselves in church in a different attitude. But, although it may persuade, it cannot compel. And, if these hearers will insist upon sacrificing a fundamental condition upon which church success is irrevocably based, the natural consequences must follow. They must be disappointed. Neither fidelity nor genius in the pulpit can save them, when they are fighting against God. Many a time, the minister has done his very best to meet the wishes of such people; and, when he had to fail, they drove him out. Possibly, if the Lord were here as of old, he might think the wrong ones remained behind. When men converted the house of the Lord into a den of thieves, he once gave them the whip. Who knows but he would do the same to-day with men who try to convert that house into a theatre?

We do not admit that the Church entirely fails to overcome even luxury. If there is any enemy with which she cannot find means to battle, she is herself a failure. But abounding luxury is a terrible foe, a foe ten thousand times worse than persecution; and this fact is especially pertinent to this discussion. And, in all our battle, we must fight upon the line of the church principle. By putting the lecturer in place of the preacher, we gain nothing; for the lecturer cannot live on the theatre principle. The lyceum inevitably appeals to moral earnestness in the community. If it fail in that appeal, it retreats to "combinations" and concerts. And the pulpit that surrenders the church principle may try to make a stand upon a lyceum, but is liable to come down at last to a drama and a dance, and not first-rate at that. Although it is very well to entertain people and even better to instruct them, nevertheless whatever Sabbath plans compromise with the theatre principle offer no solution of the real trouble. Let all the readers of The Index and all critics of the pulpit, however severe, who already consider themselves intelligent friends of the pulpit, help to make the church principle operative in the congregations we already have, and we shall all see more plainly where the fault lies, if those congregations do not grow still larger. ASPECTS OF POETRY. Being lectures delivered at Oxford. By Prof. John C. Shairp. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

To all lovers of poetry, this series of lectures will be pleasant and profitable reading, and will tend to awaken new interest and give some fresh ideas in regard to standard poets and their writings, though the criticisms and conclusions of Prof. Shairp may not always be acquiesced in. The many quotations from favorite poems which enliven and grace the lectures will add to their interest with the majority of readers, who have already learned to appreciate the writers of the poems quoted from. To American readers, the fact that no American poet is considered in these lectures will detract somewhat from the lecturer's credit as a fair critic of poetry in all of its "aspects"; but, as they were delivered before and intended for the edification of only English audiences, it was perhaps natural enough that with a few exceptions only British poets should be taken by Prof. Shairp as standards. One of his criticisms of Shelley may be of interest to the readers of this paper, and we therefore in conclusion quote it: "His rebellion was not against the limitations and corruptions of his own day, but against the moral verities which two thousand years have tested, and which have been approved not only by eighteen Christian centuries, but no less by the wisdom of Virgil and Cicero, of Aristotle and Sophocles. Shelley may be the prophet of a new morality; but it is one which never can be realized till moral law has been obliterated from the universe and conscience from the heart of man."

HAMLET, PRINCE OF DENMARK. New York: The Useful Knowledge Publishing Co., 162 William Street.

This is one of a series of the well-known plays of Shakspeare, published by the above-mentioned firm, in tasteful cloth bindings, on excellent paper, at the nominal price of twenty-five cents each.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. ANNIE L. DIGGS, who has been spending the winter in Boston, left this city on Wednesday of last week for her home in Lawrence, Kan.

REV. A. D. MAYO, of the New England Journal of Education, is taking an extended trip through the Southern States, for the purpose of inspecting the condition of their public schools.

MESSRS. GEO. BELL & SONS, London, Eng., are about to publish Nine Stories from Robert Browning, by F. M. Holland of Concord, Mass., one of them being "Sordello," which appeared in New York a year ago.

PROF. THOMAS EDWARD CLIFFE LESLIE, for twenty-five years professor of jurisprudence and political economy at Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland, died recently. He was a frequent contributor to the English quarterlies and the author of an important work on the different land systems of the world.

MRS. H. R. SHATTUCK will read her paper on "Ideal Marriage" at the committee room of Parker Memorial Hall on Saturday, March 18, at 3 P.M. The paper was designed for young ladies especially, but those of maturer years are also cordially welcome. This essay has awakened deep interest wherever it has been heard.

News has been received at the State Department from Liberia of the death on the 13th ult. of our colored minister to that colony, Rev. Henry Highland Garnet, at the age of sixty-seven. His parents were runaway slaves; and he obtained his education under many difficulties, owing it mainly to his own persistent courage and determination. He was appointed minister to Liberia by President Arthur, and had been in office but a few months.

MISS ALICE M. CURTIS, a pupil of the artist Hunt, and daughter of one of the most active and earnest friends of The Index, has on exhibition at the gallery of J. Eastman Chase, 7 Hamilton Place, this city, a fine collection of original paintings, which will well repay a visit, especially to those who delight in marine subjects. The Journal pronounces her "one of the most original and promising of the women painters of Boston," and the Transcript says her "exhibition proves again that the spirit of the Hunt school has not lost its virtue or creative energy."

THE Chicago Times says of the English apostle of æstheticism that his is "the last face in the world one would suspect of belonging to a genuine lover of the ideally beautiful. The face is neither that of a man nor a woman. It was a positive relief to turn from the face to those legs. They were done up in great shape, and attracted no little share of the attention that was bestowed upon the man." The Times says the lecture was decidedly flat, and that it was a positive relief when he closed. About twenty-five hundred people attended his lecture in Chicago. The New York Tablet characterizes him as "a man of eccentricities, nudities, and indecencies."

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

CURRENT TOPICS.

REPUBLICANISM in France has no reverence for the titles of the nobility. One of the deputies proposes that a tax be put on all titles. Another, evidently with more good sense, wants anybody who desires a title to have the legal right to assume it at his pleasure.

A MEETING of the electors of Northampton has approved Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct in the House of Commons, and passed resolutions authorizing the executive of the Liberal and Radical Union to sign a petition to the House, asking that he be heard at the bar in support of his claim.

THE St. Petersburg Commission on the Jewish question have decided in favor of compelling the Jews to leave the rural districts to prevent further persecution. This Herr Rulf, of Memel, Prussia, says "will have the immediate effect of depriving a million people of houses and rendering their lives unbearable."

REFERRING to the demand of the Chicago Tribune that Sergeant Mason be pardoned and promoted, the Boston Herald observes: "If a criminal can be shot with impunity because he has made himself unpopular, what is the use of guards and courts of law? Every man who justifies private revenge or mob law descends to the level of the murderer. A desire for substantial justice is common to all men who are not villains; but a certain degree of civilization is required to appreciate the forms of law which are the bulwarks of justice."

A DETACHMENT of the English "Salvation Army" has invaded Paris, and undertaken its conversion. General Booth, the leader, thinking to conquer the Parisians with their own weapons, hired as an orchestra an accordion player and an accomplished performer on the cornet. The result so far has been rather disheartening from the Army's point of view; for the volatile French people, instead of being subdued by the music into repentance and confession of sin, rose in the meetings and danced to the lively hymn-tunes with much apparent enjoyment.

REFERRING to the Northampton election, the Secular Review says: "What will be the result of the present contest, of course, cannot be definitely foreseen. That will depend upon whether or not the majority of the electors of Northampton are firmly determined to vindicate their political rights. Let, however, the issue of the contest be what it may, our duty as secularists is clear. We must continue to agitate until an Affirmation Bill is passed by Parliament, by which any future injustice similar to that to which Mr. Bradlaugh has been subjected will be rendered impossible."

A MINISTER preached a sermon in Pittsburgh recently in favor of good Sunday newspapers. The religious journals of that city thereupon assailed him on the ground that he was encouraging Sabbath-breaking, especially as Sunday papers were published to make money. "And every religious sheet in this city," retorted the minister, "is issued purely and solely for the sake of money-making." He might have added, since the assault is sustained by the orthodox clergy, without misrepresentation or captiousness, that money-making is a consideration not wholly ignored by ministers who preach on Sunday. This is not urged against their right to preach, even when their preaching is of the poorest quality, and not worth what they are paid. With what show of consistency can they object to a good Sunday paper that is fully worth the price charged.

THE bill which has been passed by both Houses of Congress for the suppression of polygamy re-enacts existing laws against polygamous marriages, makes plural cohabitation a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment, deprives of the rights of suffrage and holding office all who practice or defend polygamy, and turns over the functions of the Territorial Government to a commission of five persons to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. There is outside of Utah no divided sentiment as to necessity of legislation against polygamy; but there are many who think that to deprive the Territory of Utah of responsible government, and place it under a commission with arbitrary authority, is to place the Mormons at the mercy of men who will have it in their power to execute the letter of the law and plunder the people of half their wealth, destroying the vested rights of families, and carrying out a revolutionary policy more likely to result in flagrant wrongs to the Mormons under the color of law than in the suppression of polygamy. We hope such fears will prove unfounded.

STRIKES and labor demonstrations in cities and inland towns, East and West, show much discontent among wage-workers of the country. Although during the past winter enterprise has been active in all departments, the prices of the necessities of life have been high, and enhanced values have consumed the fruits of labor. The improvement in business that was expected to come with the spring has not been realized; and there has been a resort to the usual remedy, the reduction of wages. For this, the labor element is poorly prepared; and hence the strike of mill hands at Lawrence, Mass., and of miners in the Cumberland coal regions, the labor demonstrations in Philadelphia, and the revolt of the iron-workers at Pittsburgh, and of the railroad men at Omaha. The situation, in whatever aspect it is viewed, is a serious one. Strikes involve not only loss to employers, but suffering to the employed; and it is to be hoped that the impending difficulty can be solved without their becoming general throughout the country.

IT is the practice in the judicial system of France to put the jury on oath, not before the trial commences, but after the verdict has been arrived at; and the oath is taken in the name of the foreman alone, who speaks not only for himself, but also in behalf of his colleagues. In a recent case in Paris, the foreman of the jury, being a free thinker with scruples against taking an oath, when called upon to pronounce the verdict, began with the legal formula, "Upon my honor and conscience," but, having gone thus far, instead of continuing "before God and man," confined himself to appealing to his fellow-creatures alone. Called to order by the judge, he observed, "My conscience forbids me to pronounce those expressions." Two of his colleagues arose, and declared their entire concurrence in the sentiment thus announced. The judges, instead of arguing the point or deciding the foreman and his colleagues in contempt of court, ordered the jury to retire to their room and to elect another foreman. Whereupon, by a vote nine to three, one was chosen who was willing to conform to the legal custom. What would have been done if seven out of the twelve jurymen had objected to the formality of the oath? When the oath is recognized by the French courts only as a mere form, and when many honest men object to it on moral grounds, common justice demands its abolition, and the substitution for it of affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury. We are pleased to see that a bill was introduced last Saturday in the Chamber allowing witnesses to affirm,

THE TWO SEED-THOUGHTS OF RELIGION.

We have received from Professor Max Müller the very valuable and interesting preface, issued in pamphlet form, to his translation into English of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. The translation has been a labor of love, and has been made as a devout and grateful offering among the many commemorations of the centennial anniversary of the first publication of this famous and epoch-making book. The preface is a vigorous answer to the question which the writer says had been put to him by some of his friends, who asked him why he should waste his time on translating the Critique of Pure Reason. In answering this question, after giving the personal reasons why he had undertaken the translation, he treats the three points, (1) why a study of the Critique seems necessary at present, (2) the relation of Kant's metaphysic to physical science, and (3) Kant's philosophy as judged by history; and to this he adds some important pages on the condition of the German text of the Critique. But our chief purpose to-day is to call attention to certain suggestive and finely expressed passages near the close of the preface, where Professor Müller alludes to his work of translating the Critique in connection with that larger task which has so long absorbed him,—the translation of the Rig-Veda. We here transcribe these passages in full, and not so much for making any comment upon them as for their suggestive beauty:—

"And now, while I am looking at the last lines that I have written, it may be the last lines that I shall ever write, on Kant, the same feeling comes over me which I expressed in the preface to the last volume of my edition of the Rig-Veda and its ancient commentary. I feel as if an old friend with whom I have had many communings during the sunny and during the dark days of life was taken from me, and I should hear his voice no more.

"The two friends, the Rig-Veda and Kant's Critique of Pure Reason, may seem very different; and yet my life would have been incomplete without the one as without the other.

"The bridge of thoughts and sighs that spans the whole history of the Aryan world has its first arch in the Veda, its last in Kant's Critique. In the Veda, we watch the first unfolding of the human mind as we can watch it nowhere else. Life seems simple, natural, childlike, full of hopes, undisturbed as yet by many doubts or fears. What is beneath and above and beyond this life is dimly perceived and expressed in a thousand words and ways, all mere stammerings, all aiming to express what cannot be expressed, yet all full of a belief in the real presence of the Divine in nature, of the Infinite in the finite. Here is the childhood of our race unfolded before our eyes, at least so much of it as we shall ever know on Aryan ground; and there are lessons to be read in those hymns, ay, in every word that is used by those ancient poets, which will occupy and delight generations to come.

"And, while in the Veda we may study the childhood, we may study in Kant's Critique of Pure Reason the perfect manhood of the Aryan mind. It has passed through many phases, and every one of them had its purpose, and has left its mark. It is no longer dogmatical, it is no longer sceptical, least of all is it positive. It has arrived at and passed through its critical phase, and in Kant's Critique stands before us, conscious both of its weakness and of its strength, modest, yet brave. It knows what the old idols of its childhood and of its youth, too, were made of. It does not break them: it only tries to understand them; but it places above them the ideals of reason,—no longer tangible, not even within reach of the understanding, yet real, if anything can be called real,—bright and heavenly stars to guide us even in the darkest night.

"In the Veda, we see how the Divine appears in the fire and in the earthquake, and in the great and strong wind which rends the mountain. In Kant's Critique, the Divine is heard in the still, small voice,—the categorical imperative,—the I ought,—which nature does not know and cannot teach. Everything in nature is or is not, is necessary or contingent, true or false. But there is no room in nature for the Ought, as little as there is in logic, mathematics, or geometry. Let that suffice, and let future generations learn all the lessons contained in that simple word, I ought, as interpreted by Kant."

These extracts remind us of Kant's own saying that there were two things that filled him with reverence,—the starry heavens and the moral nature of man; and in these passages Professor Müller indicates the two seed-thoughts of all well-developed religions: one, the inevitable question of the Whence and How that man's intellect puts to the universe of which he finds himself a part; the other, the inevitable recognition of a law of right, which man feels to be binding upon his will and conduct. Even though the first of these thoughts may be pronounced to imply an insoluble problem, and the attempt be made to put it aside as leading only to vain speculation, it will not thus be silenced nor exiled. Though the problem of sovereign being be too profound for finite solution, the problem nevertheless remains as the fascination of the human intellect. In its Whence, it entices the imagination indeed into realms of mystery, where poetry may be fed, if not science; but in its How it is the spur of scientific and philanthropic research, whose end is positive and practical knowledge. But the second thought—the recognition of the sovereign law of right—is the more important, as giving to man his guiding aim and goal. This makes him a coöperator with and fulfiller and perfecter of the aims of the universe itself. Professor Müller uses the word "Nature" in its ordinary sense of the material universe as distinct from man. But, in a larger sense, and in accordance with the doctrine of evolution, man is a part of nature; and because of the moral consciousness, or the sense of I ought, which has come in man, Nature may be credited with a moral purpose through all her processes: in other words, in a rational religious philosophy, the action of sovereign being and the law of sovereign right will be found to be one.

PROGRESS OF OPINION IN ENGLAND.

When I undertook to contribute periodically to The Index, it was not my intention to be so intermittent in writing as I have proved to be. My explanation is that I have been induced to prepare certain memorials of a propagandist,—political, insurgent, social, and secular,—which involve more of time, labor, and research among forgotten documents and ten thousand letters than was comprehensible to me at the commencement. Having collected the materials, I shall now be able to write from them at leisure, and in the mean time resume my engagement of sending monthly contributions to The Index.

Since I last wrote, The Index has increased its editorial force, extended the scope of liberal discussions, simplified its title, and generally increased the popular interest in its pages. There can be no greater proof of its comprehensive sympathy with all forms of relevant thought than its insertion of the last paper I sent to it, which, besides having the fault of being long, treated Theism in what some would think a pagan spirit, alien to that spiritual view maintained with so much earnestness and power in your pages. No Liberalism could be wider than that which has admitted my article explaining secularism as a new form of free thought, and as "a religion [the only one on this English side of the Atlantic] which gives heaven no trouble."

Since I last wrote you, a respected contributor to your paper, Mr. Edward C. Towne, has replied to the remarks made by me in your columns (Feb. 3, 1881) concerning the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. I was surprised and pained at his charge of "long hypocrisy" against an eminent preacher, who, like Mr. Towne himself, had made honorable sacrifices to honesty and conscience. One of the "ecclesiastical facts known to most of us," to which I referred, was that of Mr. Brooke, saying, as the opening words of a sermon when he was in York Street, St. James', "There is no hell." He never pretended otherwise afterward, and he ceased to be regarded in London as an "orthodox" divine after that. Mr. Towne's article of April 14 last amounts to a general charge of "hypocrisy" against the most eminent preachers. He regards all who are inconsistent as dishonest. The old Unitarians had this wild way of talking of preachers whom they thought ought logically to hold the unity of the Godhead. They only ceased doing this with Prof. F. D. Maurice.

When I was in America, I attended the service of the church of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. In the hymn-book used by the congregation, I found sentiments which the distinguished preacher who addressed us neither preached nor believed. In the Unitarian Church, I commonly find both hymns and prayers expressing sentiments relating to phases of theology extinct in the heart of every worshipper. Yet it would be quite unwarranted to bring a charge of hypocrisy against the minister and the congregation. Among all non-conformist Christians in England there is an active sense of the progressive liberalism of theological thought. Hymn-books have been continually revised and new forms of prayer composed. In a few years, it is found that these are inconsistent with the wiser beliefs that have grown up. It would be unfair to charge the minister, who is the exponent of higher ideas in religion, with dishonest inconsistency on this ground, since he cannot always make the amendments in his formularies when he would. My observations on the progress of religious opinion in these days of growing learning, scholarly criticism, and new revisions of the Scriptures, lead me to think that congregations ought to revise every ten years their professions of faith and services of prayer and song. Has Mr. Towne got all this perfect at Birmingham, where he preaches?

The clergy of the Church of England hold annual convocations, which represent the most stereotyped and State-protected forms of faith prevalent in England. The changes they have lately manifested are so remarkable that I intend sending you some account of them. At present, much interest is taken among all classes concerning the eligibility of atheists to sit in the British Parliament. At present, such a person can only do so by taking a Christian oath. Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, who has been elected member for Northampton, and who professes to be an atheist, offers to take this oath. The law and custom of Parliament permits it. The House never goes behind the oath to ascertain whether the taker of the oath really believes in the God whose presence as a witness he solemnly invokes. The law assumes that every member so swearing is a gentleman who would not present himself to take the oath of a Christian when he was an atheist. The House assumes that he is a Christian at the time of taking it. The House may know that he had proclaimed himself an atheist on setting out from his home; but, for all they know, he may, like Saul of Tarsus, have heard a voice in the air on his way to the House of Commons, and that he has really entered it a converted man. Be this as it may, the House assumes that this is so, and that he who takes the Christian oath is a Christian. My wish has been that Mr. Bradlaugh, who professes himself an atheist, should not take the Christian oath, but ask from the House a concession like that made to the Quakers, which would permit him to make an affirmation. For myself, I cannot conceive how an atheist can present himself to a legislative assembly to take the oath. My argument against it in the public papers and elsewhere has been the following:—

No English gentleman would think of going into a Turkish court and taking a Mohammedan oath. He would be understood by the act to have changed, not only his religion, but his nationality. No person would think of presenting himself to be sworn in a Roman Catholic court, avowing that he disbelieved the solemn words he had to utter. The profanation would not be suffered. He who proposes to take the oath, without holding the belief of the oath, says in effect to the House: The terms of the oath are, as I have made known to you, unmeaning to me; and I assume that they are unmeaning to you also, or I could not expect your permission to utter them. I am aware, you say, that the oath is a solemn appeal to God. But that is a mere farce of the law, and I am ready to go through that farce with your consent. If you had any actual belief in God yourselves or in what you call his "holy name," you could not authorize my uttering it as an empty word, and invoking his presence in this assembly to witness my attestation, as though I had belief in his righteousness and fear of his displeasure, when I have nothing of the kind. That would seem to you a mockery and a profanation. If you really regarded truth as an element of the oath, I could not propose to take it, and thus affront public veracity. It is because I believe you to be without sincerity in this matter that I present myself to take the oath, and expect the House to sanction it.

The proceedings in respect of this question in England has presented an amusing feature. One afternoon, Mr. Bradlaugh was ejected by the police from the House, and suffered some injuries in his attempt to enter it and take his seat. Surely, Christians can no longer accuse atheism of being wanting in reverence or devoutness, in the face of the spectacle of that afternoon, of the most publicly known atheist in England fighting his way into the House to kiss the Bible! Every day, the Speaker of the House, preceded by loud proclamation and the Serjeant-at-Arms bearing the Golden Mace, enters the assembly with stately steps, followed by his train-bearer, holding up his robe, and the surpliced chaplain who has to offer up invocations to Heaven. On the day when Mr. Bradlaugh said he would force his way into the House, he stood by the door; and had he entered then, as he might have done, he would also have been ejected, but then we should have had upon historic record the droll incident of a Christian assembly expelling an atheist who had entered to pray. The late John Stuart Mill wished me to enter the House of Commons, and subscribed to a fund for that purpose. I described to him, as I did to the constituency, that I should not take the oath, which he approved in very direct words. Mr. John Morley may become a member. Mr. Herbert Spencer, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Tyndall, also may become members. Therefore, I wish the right of affirmation should be won, now it is in the minds of the country, that philosophers may not abstain from the public service, lest they be exposed to the humiliation of the oath or the outrage of their convictions.

GEO. JACOB HOLYOAKE.

MAGNANIMOUS ATHEISM.

If I am not mistaken, we are indebted to Frances Power Cobbe for this expression. I do not always find the corresponding thing where I am told to look for it. For example, a Unitarian clergyman—he has since gone to his own place—said a few years ago, "The man who does not believe in God will lie, he will steal, he will get drunk." An almost forgotten writer, Mr. Mallock, has maintained a similar thesis, insisting more, however, on certain grosser vices as the natural and inevitable result of atheism. It is not pretended that the man who does believe in God will not indulge in any of these vices, but only that, if he does, it will be in spite of his belief: whereas, the atheist who indulges in them does so because of his belief or no-belief. The magnanimous atheist of these writers is the atheist who does not lie or steal or get drunk or indulge in any heinous or degrading vice or crime. There is no reason in his creed, we are assured, why he should refrain from vice or criminality. To be consistent, he should be full of wickedness. But there are atheists who are not consistent, who are not logical,—atheists who persist in leading decent, honorable, and helpful lives.

If magnanimous atheism could exist only within these limits, I should be obliged to say that there is no such thing. I can see nothing specially magnanimous in a man's still refraining from vice or crime, when his intellectual nature can no longer make the theistic affirmation; for I can see no reason why he should not be as moral after his hold upon this affirmation has been broken as before. In simple truth there is here an indirect confession of the sordidness of the prevailing creed. To make belief in God and immortality a reason for doing well may well make such well-doing as does not depend on these beliefs appear magnanimous. It is so relatively to the little-mindedness and selfishness of those who say as did the clergyman already quoted, "If it were not for immortality, I would have my fling," or, as many others do, that without belief in God there can be no morality. But absolute magnanimity there is none in declining to be immoral, when one can no longer affirm immortality and God. For morality is the secret of men's living together with the least possible friction and the greatest mutual advantage. It is still this, God or no God; and therefore it is a secret to be learned and practised, whatever our belief or disbelief concerning immortality and God. Until it can be shown that the reasons for being moral do not appeal equally to the theist and the atheist, the magnanimity of the moral atheist because of his morality can in no wise be conceded.

There are those who seem to think that atheism is magnanimous simply in virtue of its being atheism. But it seems to me there is plenty of atheism, or at least would-be atheism, which is not by any means magnanimous. Magnanimity, for one thing, is great-mindedness; and of little-mindedness there is no surer sign than the persistent disposition to assign petty causes for sublime effects in history or in the natural order of the world. Nothing is more characteristic of the manner of Gibbon, for example, than his eagerness to let down as much as possible the characters of all great persons and events. And hereby, for all the splendor with which his history is conceived, he is convicted of an essentially little mind. The great mind believes in greatness, and does not delight to make it appear that the great movements of history hinge on contemptible accidents, such as the straightness of a Cleopatra's nose. The determining influence of petty circumstances delights the petty mind. The larger mind sees that the appearance here is largely superficial, sees that the petty circumstance is the merest straw upon the bosom of a stream, the tendency of which it indicates, but does not cause.

As in the sphere of history, so in the sphere of natural development. The would-be atheist often delights in "taking down" those who for one reason or another still cherish a theistic conception of the world. There is nothing so wonderful, after all, in this brain of Shakspeare, this heart of his Cordelia, this tide of spring, rolling its waves of green and blossom to our feet, this azure roof fretted with golden fires. The whole thing can be explained in terms of matter and force. I do not say that it cannot be; but I say that there can be no intellectual magnanimity for him who thinks that he has substituted here a smaller for a larger, a meaner for a grander explanation of the make of things. Where there is magnanimity there will be an overmastering sense of the sublimity and grandeur and mystery and wonder of the world, and a conviction that no cause which is not sublime and grand, mysterious and wonderful, could possibly be adequate to the production of the natural and human aspects of the universe. Where there is magnanimity there will be the conviction that, if the theistic explanation of the world is not an adequate explanation, it is not because it is too exalted and poetic, but because it is not sufficiently exalted and poetic. Where there is magnanimity there will be the conviction that, if matter and force are "all and all in all," it is only because these words are symbols of a mystery and an order that transcend the mystery and order that our theistic thinking labors to express. The would-be atheist is oftentimes affronted at the theist's affirmation of the personality of God. This anthropomorphism is thought to give too high a character to the fundamental Power that underlies the order of the world. But no. If anthropomorphism, the doctrine of a manlike God, fails to express the truth, it is because the "Power not ourselves" is infinitely higher and greater than ourselves, not because it is something less than human. If personality does not inhere in the Eternal Power, it is because it is something more than personal, something higher and better.

The magnanimous are the great-minded. This is the root significance. They are also the generous. Usage has made this the more common meaning of the word. And, as there is atheism that fails of magnanimity because of little-mindedness, so there is atheism which fails of magnanimity because it is ungenerous. It is this in its contemptuous attitude with reference to men's past and present faith in God. To be irreverent of others' reverence,—this is ungenerous always. The generous atheist will have no scorn, no laughter, no derision, for any faith in God that men have ever honestly cherished, for any conception of God that men have ever honestly framed. All rationality is relative, and the most irrational conceptions of deity that have been devised have been the best possible for the men who framed and cherished them. Infinitely pathetic are these conceptions to all generous souls. If we had lived in those old times, we should have been no wiser than were they who did live in them, and framed to themselves such doctrines as they could of man and God and the mysterious world. And their doctrines did just as much credit to their intelligence and their opportunities as the most enlightened opinions of the most enlightened atheist do to his intelligence and his present opportunity, and even more, it may be.

Let those who think that all atheism is magnanimous in virtue of its being atheism consider whether it is generous for men who have arrived at the negation of all theism to regard as utterly irrational and meaningless all of the vast, incalculable thought and meditation—brains throbbing and aching, hearts yearning and breaking—that have been spent upon this conception of a Divine Being in all the centuries of recorded time. To be generous here, must not one at least allow that all this thought and meditation have been necessary steps in the long march of man's intelligence,—ay, more, that not without deep inner meaning has been all this, however crude and irrational the outward form? The magnanimous atheist believes that, at the worst, without the shoulders of the giant Past to sit upon, the dwarfish Present could not peer over as it does now into the vast unknown, and see—O vision most entrancing!—that there is nothing there. If he has only a little magnanimity, he believes as much as this. If he has much, he believes that there is a soul of truth in things erroneous, and that men's crudest thought concerning God has been the awkward symbol of some honest verity, and so truer to the fact than any mere silence on this head could ever be.

But the magnanimous atheism of the present time is not exhausted by this mental attitude. The fact is that many, finding in the popular statements about God, and in some philosophical statements also, much that appears to them irrational, prefer the repute of atheism to identification with the opinions of the majority. Such men are atheists with an if. If, they say, these statements that we hear are fairly representative, not to say exhaustive, of theism, then we are not theistic. One cannot but admire, in many instances, the temper of these men. Theirs is the nicest sense of honor. They dread nothing so much as to appear desirous to enjoy the prestige of a belief which they no longer hold in any of the ordinary forms. To be accounted atheistic seems to them a lesser evil than to be accounted theistic in the ordinary sense, and desirous to be so accounted. There are many, I am sure, in these last days, who, in the privacy of their own thought, esteem themselves truly theistic in their interpretation of the world, while openly they accept the opprobrium of atheism without a murmur, yea, even covet such opprobrium as a convincing proof that they have not hankered for the prestige or honor which the conventional opinions of mankind carry along with them.

But, if here is magnanimity, there is more and better in that reticence which is relative not to the opinions or the formulas of others, but to one's own thought and feeling concerning the deep things of God. It is a higher magnanimity to refrain from all theistic affirmation, because anything that we can say concerning the abounding mystery of the world seems to us infinitely below the fact, than because our affirmation may be confounded with the affirmation of the unthinking and irrational. Nothing is surer than that the silence of some men is more religious than the speech of others. It implies a deeper reverence, a profounder awe, a heart more deeply touched by the infinities and immensities of the outward universe and those mysteries of the inner life which are so much more solemn and appealing.

"Who can name Him, and say, I believe in Him?" The atheism which this line expresses is certainly magnanimous in comparison with a theism that is trivial, conceited, garrulous. But there is a theism which these words do not define, a magnanimous theism, of which more hereafter.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

THE F. R. A. CONFERENCE.

Next Tuesday, an important conference of members of the Free Religious Association is to be held in this city at the Parker Fraternity Hall. The vote which directed the holding of this conference contemplated that it should meet "mid-winter." There have been delays, however, in fixing the date: first, by reason of the time required for obtaining the reports on which the business of the meeting is in part to be based; and, second, because of the difficulty in selecting a day convenient to all the persons whose presence is not simply desirable, but quite necessary to the purpose of the occasion. Yet that the conference meets some two months later than was anticipated in no wise detracts from its interest or usefulness; and it is probable that the attendance of members will be larger rather than smaller on account of the postponement.

It is to be noted that this is a meeting for the earnest deliberation of members rather than for speeches and essays addressed to the public, and for deliberation on a question of vital moment to the future of the Free Religious Association. For several years, the question has been coming up whether the Association could not organize its work more effectively. This question has been more than once discussed at the annual meetings; and some things in the direction of further organization have been attempted, but with no marked results. The truth is (and it is no secret that needs to be kept hidden, or which there is any occasion to be ashamed of) that there is a good deal of diversity of opinion in the membership of the Association on this question of more organized activity. Religious Liberalism has always been suspicious of organization, and naturally, since ecclesiastical organizations have been almost universally the foe of mental liberty. For this reason, the Free Religious Association was organized on the simplest and freest basis possible consistent with any form of associated action. Its machinery is of the slightest description, its line of membership indefinite, its constituency not subjected to statistical enumeration. Yet not a few of the most earnest liberal thinkers have objected even to this much of organization, and, though sympathizing fully with the spirit and objects of the Association, and speaking on its platform and through its publications, have never become formal members. There are others who stand near to this group, but who, after seeing how simple and free from entangling machinery the effected organization was, became active members and even officers of it. These naturally incline to question the advisability of any farther appliances of organization, or of very much increase of organized activity. But there are others who think that a society which has such good objects should be able to do very much more for the practical promotion of those objects. And these divide, again, into two or more groups, one section favoring chiefly an extension of work along the line of methods already adopted, another section proposing new methods better adapted, as they think, to the changed conditions of the liberal cause, but not as yet seeing alike entirely as to what the methods shall be.

Now, this conference is to give an opportunity for a full, free, candid, and thoughtful expression of views by members to each other on these questions. Reports from different States and from the special committee appointed last May will afford a more definite basis for consideration of the subject than has heretofore existed. And it may be assumed, we are sure, that all sections of the Association, however differing in opinion, will come to the meeting equally intent upon so speaking and acting as best to help the cause for which the Free Religious Association stands. Such a comparison of judgments cannot but result in good.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

PROFESSOR PARK has so long held such a distinguished and influential position in the Andover Theological Seminary that it may be said he has himself become one of the institutions of New England. As he has resigned his office, there is naturally, therefore, great interest in the appointment of his successor. In years past, Professor Park has been regarded as the leader of liberal Orthodoxy. Now there are others in the Orthodox Congregational body who have advanced beyond him. But, by his great abilities as well as by his office as instructor of theological students, he has been a power in modifying the Calvinistic creeds preached in Orthodox churches a generation or two ago. His selected successor, Rev. Newman Smythe, D.D., though now preaching to a Presbyterian Church in Quincy, Ill., appears to be a man of the same stamp. He is, indeed, a more pronounced heretic than Professor Park. He is so much of a heretic that the Boston Congregationalist has opposed his confirmation, though conceding his eminent fitness for the place in other respects. He is the author of several books well known in theological circles, which, it seems, "have caused him to be regarded with serious distrust." But the Congregationalist says:—

The chief objection to be urged against Dr. Smythe is that he has expressed himself with too much vagueness upon the subject of future punishment. He has condemned the doctrine of annihilation decidedly, and he evidently believes in the fact of a future punishment; but he has been careful to avoid committing himself to anything more definite than this. We respect him for refusing to assert more than he thinks that he knows, but we believe that considerable more is taught definitely and purposely on the topic by the Scriptures than he has been able to find in them. We should think it impossible for any one holding his views upon this point to subscribe to the creed of Andover Seminary. But, however this may be, we do not believe that his opinions upon the subject are quite what ought to be taught there.

From which, we judge that Dr. Smythe will make a fit successor to Dr. Park.

The Sunday-School Times has the following excellent remarks on the falsehood of pretending to know more than one does know:—

Some moralists have gone so far as to say that all lies, reduced to their lowest terms, are lies of cowardice; and, though this broad assertion can hardly be accepted, it is certain that the sum of man's falsehoods would very greatly be reduced, were all cowardly misstatements and equivocations and excuses taken from it. Take, for instance, the single matter of pretending to know what we do not know. Some person or fact is mentioned of which, at the first thought, one is a little ashamed to confess himself ignorant; and so, by word or nod or deceitful silence, he tells a lie, and makes believe that he knows what he never knew, and what, very likely, there was no reason that he should know. And then the falsehood or evasion is pretty sure to come to light sooner or later, to the destruction, or at least injury, of one's reputation and sense of honesty. In no single matter, perhaps, do we all need to watch our words and deeds more closely than in this perilous temptation to pretend to know more than we do. There is, of course, such a thing as the courtesy of silence; but courtesy and dishonesty are two very different things. The Times, of course, intended this criticism for the common matters of conversation in daily life. But we cannot help querying whether a good application might not be made of it to the realm of theology, and especially to theological professors and preachers.

THIS is the way in which the Independent speaks of Mr. Miln's change of belief:—

No God, no soul, no immortality, no heaven, no hell, death an eternal sleep, nothing but matter. Such is the materialistic creed to which Mr. George C. Miln, once a Methodist Protestant minister, then, when he next emerges, an Orthodox Congregationalist, then a Liberal Unitarian, and finally, too liberal for the Unitarians of Chicago, has at last ascended, or rather descended. Of course, all religion, in the view of Mr. Miln, is a sheer superstition.

Yet Mr. Miln has been very careful to say that it is belief in "personal Deity" that he has abandoned. He has never denied the existence of "a mysterious force that permeates the universe," and which he calls "indescribable," "illimitable," "unnamable." "To deny this," he says, "were evidence of unsound mind." Mr. Miln has also distinctly affirmed the permanence of religion, and not as "a sheer superstition," but as a rational outcome of human nature. He has affirmed this in the very sermons on which the outcry is made against him; and for his critics to overlook it shows in them a careless disregard of an old commandment, which says, "Thou shalt not bear false witness." Mr. Miln may not be able to believe in the immortality of the individual soul; but, as to "heaven" and "hell," we venture to say that he believes in them very much as the Independent does, —namely, as the legitimate consequences, respectively, of man's good and bad actions.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THE article which we publish this week from the pen of Capt. R. C. Adams, whose views are quite in contrast to the doctrines preached by his father, the celebrated Nehemiah Adams, will be read with interest by his former co-religionists.

NEXT week, Miss M. A. Hardaker will present in The Index her views on "The Problems of Russia," and Mr. F. M. Holland will contribute an article on "The Theophilanthropists, and why they failed." A letter sent us from California by Mrs. E. D. Cheney will also appear next week.

REV. E. M. GUSHEE, in a recent sermon, claimed that the laws and principles laid down in books like Spencer's Data of Ethics are of vastly greater importance than the studies ordinarily pursued. He urges the systematizing of ethics, apart from differing religious creeds, and their inculcation upon a common basis as a part of our popular education.

WHY does the Religio-Philosophical Journal refer to the National Liberal League as an organization arrayed in defence of "blatant materialism," when it is made up in part of Spiritualists, and when among its acknowledged leaders and representatives are men and women like D. M. Bennett, "Prof." Toohey, George Lynn, Mrs. Severance, and Mrs. Lake, who are avowed Spiritualists?

THE Presbyterian mysteriously remarks: "Mr. Miln, among other free sayings, late averred that there was a 'religious editor in Chicago who was an agnostic in private.' Who is this religious editor? And, if he is an agnostic in private, what is he in public? These questions are respectfully referred to the Alliance for answer." And now we wonder what the Presbyterian wishes to insinuate.

A MEMORIAL, signed by a number of Baptist ministers at a conference in New York city, has been sent to Congress, opposing the bill prohibiting or limiting Chinese immigration to this country.

The memorialists say that the country needs the labor of the Chinese, that they as a people are quiet and inoffensive, that under the Constitution of the United States they have a right to come here on the same terms as other immigrants, that it is contrary to our constitution and the spirit of our government and laws to permit them to come or to stay here as bond-servants for a term of years, however limited, and that all restrictions applicable only to Chinese should be obliterated from our statute books.

"MIRACLES" are now performed not by supernatural means, but by natural agencies and forces, simply through the ever-increasing ingenuity and enlightenment of men in communities where science is cultivated and nature investigated. What alleged miracle of theology ever equalled the feat of modern science and inventiveness in bringing persons on opposite sides of the globe into instantaneous communication with one another! Saints used to swim across narrow arms of the sea, carrying their own heads in their teeth; but the miracles of the modern scientist are tainted with no absurdity. They are as useful and beneficent as they are marvellous. Science shows nature to be more wonderful than the imaginary super-nature of the theologians.

COMMENTING on a sermon by Rev. Dr. Ryder, the Chicago Times says: "Here is a plain assertion that the people called Unitarians have an unwritten creed, in which they are constituted a church. Yet, when we inquire what it is, they refuse to answer. One man may tell us what he thinks it is, but he at the same time assures us that he can state only his personal opinion, to which every other member of the church may dissent. Mr. Herford has stated somewhat definitely what he understands the unwritten creed of his church to be, or as Mr. Ryder observes, what he desires it to be. But Mr. Ryder's observation and information do not justify him in saying that what Mr. Herford supposes to be the belief on which there is agreement among Unitarians is actually taught in their churches."

LAST week, the Speaker presented to the House of Representatives a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Utah, complaining that the people of Utah are suffering from monstrous exaggerations and misrepresentations; that they are placed in jeopardy, and are threatened with the deprivation of the right of local self-government; that the aim of the persons who have started the false rumors is to gain control of the wealthy and prosperous territory, and to manipulate its finances; that they have succeeded in arousing the anger of many people against the large majority of the people of Utah. And the memorial urges that it is impolitic and unstatesmanlike to disarrange the political machinery of the Commonwealth in an effort to furnish the alleged offences of a few individuals. Congress is therefore asked to suspend action in regard to Utah until an investigation can be made, facts learned, and a tangible foundation laid for rational proceedings.

REV. R. R. MEREDITH, a popular Methodist clergyman in this city, in his class which meets Saturday afternoons in Tremont Temple recently declared his belief "that evil spirits had actual domination over men in the days of Christ, and that they have not now in such a sense as then." But he "believed in a personal devil, and found comfort (!) in the doctrine from the fact that human nature would look so much worse even than it does now, if all the worst and most devilish acts of men must be attributed simply to a depraved nature." Not much chance for reform then, in Mr. Meredith's view, if the devil is the source of all evil, unless the Methodists can capture and convert him, which we think even their faith holds out no hope of doing. We prefer the secular view, that what we call "evil" is the result of man's undeveloped nature and unadjusted condition, since thus in the process of evolution there is some hope of the gradual elimination of evil.

A few days ago, a Hebrew, named Rosenstrach was arrested at Paterson, N.J., on complaint of a Catholic, named Deutschle, for blasphemy. The Hebrew denies that he used the language attributed to him, and says that the charge was made in spite, because of his refusal to sell goods on credit. The statute, for the alleged violation of which the arrest was made, is as follows: "If any person shall wilfully blaspheme the holy name of God by denying, cursing, or contumeliously reproaching his being or providence, or by cursing or contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost or the Christian religion or the holy Word of God (that is, the canonical scriptures contained in the books of the Old and New Testaments), or by profane scoffing at or exposing them or any of them to contempt and ridicule, then every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $200, or imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding twelve months, or both."

THE New York Herald does not see how, "with our constitutional amendments and our clearly defined policy of freedom and independence, any valid law can be passed legislating against a race." The New York World, referring to the anti-Chinese bill, says that, after declaiming for many generations against "the exclusiveness of the Chinese policy as barbarous, we have no sooner succeeded in breaking it down than we have come to see its wisdom as applied to the Chinese themselves, and to offer it the sincere flattery of imitation"; that, after "bombarding forts and making ourselves generally unpleasant otherwise, in order to induce the empire to admit Americans to China and allow Chinamen to emigrate to America, we have concluded that the Chinese knew all along what was better for them and ourselves than we did." The World adds: "We build a Chinese wall, in the form of a protective tariff, against all the products of European nations except men and women, whom we admit duty free. In the case of China alone, we put a prohibitory enactment upon men, so that the three things which we proclaim that we will not have at any price are steamships, Chinamen, and immoral books and works of art."

Look at your tags! We would respectfully suggest to all our subscribers, and especially those who have recently sent money to renew their subscriptions, that they examine the address-tags on their copy of The Index. Attached to each address is the date to which subscription is paid. Such date is the subscriber's receipt for payment; and if, within two weeks after renewing, the date on the tag is not changed to correspond with such renewal, a note addressed to this office, calling attention to the omission, will meet with prompt reply and explanation. Many of our subscribers seem not to understand that the dates on their tags are in lieu of a written receipt for their money, and write us, after the lapse of a week or two, requesting us to send them receipts. By looking at their tags also, some of our neglectful friends (and we have too many such) may be reminded of how much they are in arrears; and we hope all these will at once send us the amount due on their subscriptions. Recent changes in The Index having increased its expenses, we need all the money due us to meet our bills.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 23, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, } Editors.

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

AN AGNOSTIC REQUIEM.

This life, where I have found enough to know,
And love, and hope for, and where all my work
Hath met as fair reward as I can wish,
Will end, as is ordained by laws whose source
Is hid to man. If any other world
Await me, I shall play my part therein
The better for this earth's experience.
Should this life be my last, then welcome rest!
I do not long to go, and do not fear.
I would not have my death cause needless grief,
Or fan the flames of strife I sought to quench.
No friends shall meet to listen round my bier
To pride dogmatic, claiming it has solved
The problems I would have men lay aside,
As far beyond our utmost reach of thought.
Nor would I be a theme for eulogy
Extravagant, by one who knew me not;
And yet I trust my friends would not consent
To see me laid away, without a word
To tell where they may look for strength and peace.
Some friend who knows how rich this life may be
In loving ties, kind deeds, and noble thoughts,
What treasures science opens to patient eyes,
What joy we find in making others glad,
What peace of mind awaits us as we rise
Above the strife of creeds, how bright this earth
Becomes to him who will not be the slave
Of superstition or of vice, shall show
To those who love me, as they meet to see Me laid to rest, the grandeur of this life,
The sanctity of earthly duties, bliss
Which purity and wisdom give us here!
A nobler requiem I cannot ask.

THE TREE.

I love thee when thy swelling buds appear,
And one by one their tender leaves unfold,
As if they knew that warmer suns were near,
Nor longer sought to hide from winter's cold;
And when with darker growth thy leaves are seen
To veil from view the early robin's nest,
I love to lie beneath thy waving screen
With limbs by summer's heat and toil oppress;
And when the autumn's winds have stripped thee bare,
And round thee lies the smooth untrodden snow,
When nought is thine that made thee once so fair,
I love to watch thy shadowy form below,
And through thy leafless arms to look above
On stars that brighter beam when most we need their love.

GAIN OR LOSS.

BY ROBERT C. ADAMS.

For The Index.

The Congregationalist of November 30, under the above title, replied to "A Radical Avowal," published in The Index of November 10. Several weeks elapsed before I obtained a copy, as friends were strangely neglectful of my request.

It appeared to me easy to give satisfactory answers to the criticisms; but, having no desire for controversy, especially with so respected an old friend, I decided not to reply.

Numerous letters, some of them anonymous and not a few abusive, show that the readers of the Congregationalist consider that my positions have been utterly overthrown; and some of these dear, good people allow me only the alternative of demonism or an unbalanced mind as explanations for my opinions. Therefore, I feel it a duty, to myself at least, to see if I can "give a reason for the (unbelief) that is in me."

After stating my position as fairly as a brief abstract of my words would permit, the Congregationalist says it is "characterized, in nearly equal degree, by inconsistency, unfair statement, and hasty inference." The first inconsistency is the denial of a personal God, and yet saying "all things are subject to law"; for the editor says, "if there be law, the very conception necessarily implies a lawgiver." My words were, "I see no proof of a personal God who sits up aloft and makes butterflies and counts hairs, and conjures up squalls to upset the boats of Sabbath-breakers." This is the kind of God I was "brought up on," a being who consciously superintends the formation of every insect, who notes and influences all the details of each human life, and who takes vengeance on sinners through "special providences." Many still believe in such a God, and draw the belief from the Bible. As opposed to this idea of a supreme being, I say, "I see an ever-active, unerring force in nature," and "all things are subject to law." "There is no supernatural interference." Many intelligent religious teachers call the force which works in an orderly method throughout nature God. They personify the principle of action which pervades existence; but this personal God is a great first cause, who endowed matter with the presence of force and the principle of development, by which all events spring from preceding causes, and who only acts through the successions of cause and effect, never exercising his will in an arbitrary way. My only purpose was to deny the existence of such a being as the Hebrew Jehovah or Calvin's God, who walked and talked with men, who destroyed them purposely with flood and fire and earthquake and plague, who turned a woman into salt, made an ass speak, killed fifty thousand and seventy men for looking into the ark, stopped the sun and moon in the heavens that a "Hebrew filibuster" might slaughter the Canaanites, saved a drowning prophet in a whale's belly, and who makes eternal decrees for the salvation of some, and allows others to inhabit an eternal hell.

What "God" is I am not wise enough to say. I am only sure he is not what the Hebrew writers imagined him to be. But, even had I denied the existence of any principle which can be called God, it is not inconsistent to speak of law. Webster gives nine definitions of law. The third is: "(Nature.) The regular method or sequence by which certain phenomena or effects follow certain conditions or causes, as the law of gravitation, a geological law, the laws of physical descent, of trade, etc.; the uniform methods or relations according to which material and mental forces act in producing effects, or are manifested in phenomena; a norm or rule for the working of a force; hence, any force, tendency, profession, or instinct, whether natural or acquired; as, the law of self-preservation, etc."

If law may be defined as "a rule for the working of a force," or the regular method of cause and effect, a materialist, who believes in no existence save that of eternal matter, may as consistently speak of the laws of the universe as may a Christian theist. This play upon words is a stock argument with theologians, but an honest consideration of the customary use of language shows it is a mere verbal quibble.

I claim, therefore, that, though I deny a personal God, who now consciously acts, creates, and repeats

Bible wonders, I may consistently personify the force of evolution as God, and have an infinitely superior being to worship than the one described by Jewish and Christian poets, historians, and philosophers. Or, if I profess to believe in the eternity of matter, and that it is self-acting, I may consistently speak of the regular method of its working as law.

My second inconsistency is rejecting "the theorem that the Bible is a revelation to man, on the ground that it is inconceivable that any such thing can be true as to whose interpretation there is radical difference," forgetting that men differ about "philosophy, politics, medicine, and the like"; and it is asked, "Will he therefore affirm there is nothing which men can trust?"

I reply, There is nothing that men can trust, as an infallible revelation from God, about either religion, "philosophy, politics, medicine, and the like." When God reveals philosophy, idealists and materialists will agree; when he reveals politics, monarchists and republicans, free-traders and protectionists, will cease to quarrel; when he reveals medicine, allopathists, homeopaths, rubbing and electric doctors will adopt an harmonious system of treatment; and, when he reveals religion, the one hundred and sixty sects of Protestants, the Roman and Greek Churches, Mohammedans and Buddhists, will cease to revile each other, and will unite upon one theology. The illustration the Congregationalist gives to prove my inconsistency is all the evidence I ask to demonstrate the human origin of religion. Men admit that all knowledge of "philosophy, politics, medicine, and the like," has been slowly gained by the experience of man and his own toilsome efforts, unaided by any supernatural power; but they say religion has been revealed to man direct from a perfect omniscient God. We find, however, that men are no more agreed about religion which has been revealed than about science which has not been revealed. Of what advantage, then, is revelation? And is it not derogatory to God to suppose he could reveal what men cannot understand? The fact that men differ about religion, philosophy, politics, and medicine, proves that God has never given direct positive instruction upon these subjects. I cannot retort that the Congregationalist is "inconsistent" for such reasoning is consistent with the style of many of its arguments; but I may say it is illogical, when it maintains that the fact that men differ about unrevealed science is a reason why they may differ about revealed religion, for I assert that a revelation from an infinite God would compel the united assent of human minds. It seems, to my mind, to prove that religion rests on just the same authority as science,—namely, human experience and research; and God has never spoken about religion in any way that he may not be said to have talked politics or given medical lectures. "The Lord spoke unto" Solon and Galen as truly as unto Moses. When men recognize the truth that religious ideas have no higher authority than medical ideas possess, they will become as charitable about theological differences as they now are about varying medical theories. Will it not be a social improvement?

The next charge is, "He seems to us unfair in a statement, whenever he undertakes to describe what is Orthodox." My words are quoted, "The Bible says the world was made in six days by magic; man was perfect, but sinned; Christ died to save a few; and soon God will destroy the world, and punish the vast majority of men forever in hell." The editor then remarks, "We have studied the Bible for years with earnest care, but we have never found either of these statements in it; and, with a considerable acquaintance with Orthodox men, we know of none who would be willing to accept either as true."

This denial that the Bible teaches what I affirm it does, to use a sea phrase, struck me flat aback. Can it be that for thirty years I studied the Bible, and understood it to teach things which nobody else finds there? If so, only one verdict can be given against my intelligence. But, if even a few men of good judgment and fair education have interpreted the Bible as I have, then it is the marvel of marvels that God should write a book expressly to give information on certain subjects, and, when some intelligent men decided what it taught, others equally intelligent should say it teaches no such thing. A governor of Massachusetts who should issue so obscure a proclamation would be elected to stay at home.

Fortunately for my self-assurance, I know many men whom the Congregationalist would pronounce orthodox and intelligent, who have found all these statements in the Bible. But let the book speak for itself. In Genesis, first chapter, we read that God created the present form of the world, its land, seas, vegetable and animal life, sun, moon, and stars, and man, in six days of evenings and mornings. In Exodus xx., 11, we read, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is."

Within a late period, learned men have discovered that the world was not made all at once in this complete condition, but through vast ages has gradually been assuming its present forms and life. Theologians therefore tell us these days, each of which Scripture says was an evening and a morning, were really long periods. If the Bible is God's word, I prefer to take God's statement as my Orthodox and not unlearned father did, who once said to me substantially: "This day-period theory is not consistent with a common-sense treatment of Bible language. I prefer to hold to the plain words of God that he made the world in six days; and, though I cannot reconcile it with what are called geological facts, I believe some day science will come back to Moses." I have at hand literature showing that scholarly men hold in the same way to the literal day theory, and it will not be denied that the Church in all ages before the nineteenth century has followed this teaching. If God's people of to-day do not find it, they must admit that God allowed his church for many centuries to be deceived by false words of his,—a libel upon perfection.

God made the world by magic; that is, by "occult and superhuman agency." He made it "out of nothing" and said, "Let there be," and "there was."

We have found my first statement in the Bible, as an average man would understand it. Now for the second, "Man was perfect, but sinned." In Genesis i., 27, it says, "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him." I used to believe that this meant that man was perfect; but, since I have seen the imperfection of the Old Testament representations of Jehovah, I cannot so regard it, though I think it was the intention of the writer to give the impression that man was made perfect. If the Congregationalist will admit that the Hebrew God was imperfect, I must confess that his image will be faulty. As man's sin is spoken of on nearly every page of the Bible, I need not say this can be found there.

"Christ died to save a few." Now, I am in danger from theology. Men have battled for centuries as to whether Christ's atonement was limited or infinite; and the factions have made a kind of compromise, saying it is infinite in design, but limited in extent. Christ died for all, but only a part are saved. It is the practical effect of Christ's death that I refer to; and he said, "Narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." "He that believeth not shall be damned," and very few believe. Principal Dawson says of nominal Christians that God would call only two per cent. Christians. When one asked Christ, "Are there few that be saved?" he replied, "Many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able." He said, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Certainly, but few are born again in the Orthodox sense. How then can Orthodoxy deny that but few will be saved? The good taste and intelligence of this age are limiting hell and expanding heaven; but the fact remains that the Church until recent years has found in the Bible the teaching that "God will punish the vast majority of men forever in hell."

"God will soon destroy the world." The Congregationalist and the post-millennarians say this cannot happen for a thousand years; but the pre-millennarians, among whom are such able Orthodox ministers as A. J. Gordon, H. M. Parsons, and Brooks of St. Louis, not to mention D. L. Moody and the numerous evangelists of this school, believe that the first stage of this destruction may be ushered in at any moment by the appearance of Christ, "taking vengeance on them that know not God." Multitudes of Christians are looking for the coming of the Lord and "the end of the world" in its present condition. They see that the disciples were taught by Christ to expect this in their own day, and that all the teaching of the New Testament shows that this "hope" inspired its writers.

Perhaps the Congregationalist meant this denial for a joke. I can hardly believe it to be serious, though a joke would be so incongruous with its usual staid demeanor in theological discussions. But the second part of its assertion I am prepared to admit,—“With a considerable acquaintance with Orthodox men, we know of none who would be willing to accept either [of these statements] as true." Men are becoming too intelligent to accept these doctrines as true; but there they stand in the Bible, and millions of readers in the past have believed them, and many do still. After hearing a number of ministers in the neighborhood of Boston, I once wrote to the Congregationalist, asking, "Is Christ preached?" I stated that I heard no allusion to man's sinfulness and need of a Saviour. The old-fashioned gospel of sin, hell, and atonement, as I had been instructed to read it in the Bible, which I still find there and which my father and brother faithfully preached, I have found to be tacitly ignored in the Congregational pulpits of cultured societies. Ministers have ceased to believe it, or even to find it in the Bible, by the exercise of ingenious methods of criticism especially designed to bring God's truth "up to the times." They are right to ignore these false notions; but, when they consistently explain their reasons for doing so, they are usually dismissed from their pulpits. I know whereof I speak when I say there are Congregational ministers of high standing who are thorough disciples of the evolution philosophy, who have lost every atom of belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures according to the definitions of creeds, who read the Old Testament with only the same credence that they give to Herodotus and Josephus and Eusebius, and yet by a discreet reticence, a use of old phraseology in a private sense with mental reservations, they maintain their status, and their hearers have no conception of their true belief. They are good and sincere men: they never utter what to their minds in their private understanding is false; but they know that people are not yet generally prepared to receive the truths which modern science has revealed, and they believe that the highest usefulness is subserved by this suppression of their convictions. Others see the light, and know that scholarly criticism has disproved the authenticity and genuineness of many of the books of the Bible, but early training and present surroundings make them shut their eyes and murmur the maxims of their youth: "The finite cannot comprehend the Infinite." "Reason must yield to faith." "God's thoughts are higher than ours." "If we could understand all God's words, it would throw doubt on their divine origin." And they trample on their intellects, as multitudes like myself have done and are still doing, to preserve their faith. My "evidence" of this is asked for. My reason told me years ago that Christianity was merely the best form of morality and religion that the human mind had been able to develop, and its literature was only the best religious writings of men. The difference between them and all other religious and sacred books was only one of degree, not of kind.

I yielded to early training so far as resolutely to trample on my intellect,—there is no other word for it,—and for years I buried myself in the Bible and Orthodox commentaries, upon the theory that the Christian must be "a man of one book." And so he must. A truer word was never uttered. If he could read this book as he reads his newspaper, with intelligence and common-sense, he would see it in its true light as a human compilation of Jewish literature; but the bias of education, church, and commentator is too strong, and it becomes God's word, which only theologians can harmonize. Men therefore become the mental slaves of teachers who have had a life-training in the art of defending preconceived theories formulated by their ancestors. It would be a wonder if such ingenious effort did not produce some seemingly plausible arguments. These teachers are sincere. I was sincere, in spite of my substratum of doubt. Men are unconsciously biased by their interests. The manufacturer is a protectionist, but the farmer and sailor are free-traders; and the minister is a Calvinist or Unitarian, or any thing between, as his environment may determine.

More honest avowal of doubt is a duty which ministers will soon awaken to. They now hinder advancement by fearing to allude to the researches of the ablest scholars of the day, which they privately delight in, but feel it inexpedient to make public.

But I must not neglect the charge of "hasty inferences." Morality, I claim, exists independently of religion, being the result of universal experience. Then why, asks the Congregationalist, is the stay-at-home farm laborer more moral than the travelled sailor? If the world lasted but one generation, this question might apply to the case. But the dissolute sailor dies an early and loathsome death in a hospital, and the farm laborer lives to a green old age in tolerable health and comfort. This experience teaches the next generation that drunkenness and licentiousness are injurious, and in time further experience so impresses this fact upon society that commands are issued against these practices "in the name of God." These theories are too well defended by learned philosophers to be called "hasty inferences" of mine.

The other "hasty inference" is my assumption that "the Holy Spirit leads men to different and often opposing views." "How does he know it is the Holy Spirit?" it is asked. In this way:—Jesus said to his followers: "When he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth. . . . How much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? . . . He shall teach you all things." In the Epistles, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in believers is too frequently asserted to need quotation. The divine injunctions for the gaining of religious knowledge are "Search the Scriptures," and "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God." Prayerful study of Scripture is therefore generally accepted by Protestant Christians as God's channel of enlightenment to man. I was brought up among sincere, godly men, who read the Bible on their knees, and taught me that God's truth embraces everlasting punishment of all unbelievers in Christ, the election of a few to be saved, the baptism of infants, the keeping of the Sabbath, a select ordained ministry of preachers, a post-millennial advent of Christ, the spiritual or symbolical interpretation of prophecy and other dogmas. During voyages to the East Indies, I became intimate with English missionaries holding some forms of the doctrines of the Plymouth brethren. They were godly, self-sacrificing men, intelligent, and wonderfully familiar with the Scriptures. They studied "the Word" with special prayer for the Holy Spirit; and, if the Bible promises are true, they must have possessed it. Here was the result: The Bible taught them adult baptism, the abrogation of the "Sabbath," liberty of ministry for all believers according to their gifts (not their licenses), the pre-millennial advent and near coming of Christ, the literal interpretation of prophetic writings, and so on. My own prayerful study made me see that the Bible, read as it seemed to me God's word to man should be read, gives much support to these views; for God would not give a "revelation" in unintelligible allegories. When he speaks, he means what he says. Afterward, I came across men praying for the Spirit, who found the doctrine of annihilation of the unbelieving; and I met others who saw a limit to eternal punishment, and some who denied the deity and the atonement of Christ. Hell was my strong point, as became the son of the champion of the "Scriptural Argument for the Reasonableness of Future Everlasting Punishment." But here were believers in the inspiration of the Bible praying for the Holy Spirit's guidance, and disproving eternal hell from the very words of the Bible. In dismay, I cried, Of what use is such a word of God and such a Holy Spirit? Man's word, inspired only by man's spirit, teaches me when it pretends to, and men agree upon its meaning. If God's word is true and my observation of men is worth anything at all, some of these men who hold opposing views are led by the Spirit, therefore the Spirit teaches error. This is impossible, therefore God's word is not infallible.

If this is a hasty inference or is illogical, if some one will kindly demonstrate it by some argument other than the Orthodox one,—“You are mad or possessed with the devil,”—I shall welcome it, for this is the root of scepticism with me. Let me repeat and condense my argument. The revelation of an infinite God must convey to men truths which they will understand alike. The Bible is said to be a revelation from God. Good, intelligent men understand it differently. Therefore, the Bible is not the "word of God."

One point more. It is denied that "Christianity ignores this sinful world as incapable of improvement." Bible Christianity does,—not that which now prevails most generally,—though the growing pre-millennial creed is decidedly pessimistic. The Bible calls Christians out of "the world," warns them not to "love the world," reminds them that all will "be burned up," tells them not to "lay up treasure," but to "wait for their Lord." My own sense of consistency has in the past weakened my interest in either the material advancement or the pleasures of the world. Spiritual growth and salvation from hell were the only worthy objects of concern in this rapidly ending age. How could I dance and smoke and go to theatres, while the multitude of men around me were passing into ceaseless doom! I helped to start a young men's society in the church, "for the moral, social, and literary improvement of the members and their enlistment in Christian work." The pastor was president. We started a night school and a prayer-meeting, which were soon abandoned; and the meetings became jovial entertainments, with violin and piano, songs, readings of Shakspeare and Handy Andy, and finally the erection of a theatre stage in the lecture-room of the church, and the performance of "Bardell vs. Pickwick" in costume. Believing the Bible to be the word of God, I could not approve of this, and left the society. Seeing the Bible to be the word of man, I now say, Do what will make you better and happier now, in church and out of it; take care of your body and mind, and your "soul" will take care of itself. I do not deny that Christians enjoy life and believe in "the world," but I say they do so in spite of their creeds.

I must congratulate the Congregationalist and its friends that they have ceased to believe the teachings of the Bible as they were understood by the last generation of Christians. The sermons which I read or hear from Orthodox pulpits show that the most scholarly ministers are adopting the religion of evolution, which scientists and liberal thinkers have propounded, and quietly ignoring miracle and dogma. They add to this a sentimental and exaggerated estimate of the character of Jesus. This they call Christianity, and preach as though it had never been anything else. Heresy hunters are turned off by this enthusiastic loyalty to the person of Jesus. Greatly was I astonished to hear Boston's most talented Congregational minister declare that the Eden stories were allegories, and in their literal sense were offensive to reason and conscience. Would that more ministers would show such "courage of conviction"! Such consistency would relieve them from unfair statement, and save the hearers from the hasty inference that the preachers are still "Orthodox."

I have been treated with more courtesy by the Congregationalists than heretics often receive; and I appreciate the kindly-intentioned desires for my restoration to the faith, though their fulfilment I should only regard as a calamity. I have lost a superstitious belief which I know has been injurious to me. All else is gain, unless my position loses for me the regard of the good Congregationalist.

THE DIVORCE QUESTION AND MORMONISM.

Editors of The Index:—

At the present time, our people are interested in two important questions, divorce and Mormonism. The magazines contain articles from pens of the ablest men in the land, senators, lawyers, and divines. So far, I notice very little agreement among the different writers about the methods to be employed for the suppression of the one and the decrease in the number of the other. On one hand there is unanimity,—namely, that they are both great evils: one, Mormonism, being a disgrace to our country; the other, a sign of the growth of lax moral principles among us.

In these articles which deal with these subjects may be detected a method which begins at the wrong end of the question. Thus, the many recommendations neglect the causes which give life to these sins, and advocate measures which would bring the civil power to bear upon them individually, as if they contained in themselves their own vital energy. To speak of suppressing Mormonism by declaring it a crime to be dealt with as a violation of the law prohibiting bigamy, or to recommend that Utah be divided among the adjacent territories, is to forget that by declaring a tree to be part in one State or territory and part in another will not kill the tree, is to forget that the Mormons may emigrate. But the soil which produced Mormonism is still with us, to produce equally bad or worse growths.

Indeed, may we not ask, Is it not producing even now these very growths? Our editors, our senators, our many writers, are they so pure that they can cast stones at the men of Utah? If the men of our time, who dwell in our midst and who profess abhorrence for Mormonism, were as true to their marriage vows as they should be,—if, in a word, there was not from Maine to California a Mormonism deeper, fouler, and blacker than that of Utah,—the barbarism of that Territory would be of short duration. We are stirred with holy indignation as we read of the sufferings of the women of Mormonism, our moral sense is shocked when we read of the many-wived men; and yet we can easily match, even in our small New England towns, the sufferings of the women and the immoralities of the men of Utah. In witness of this, we have only to bring forward the statistics of divorce.

As these statistics have been very generally published, we will here omit them, and simply say that they show us that the number of divorces is on the increase. And this, let it be remembered, is the fact not only in Western States, but in New England. Not Chicago, but Bangor, Maine, and New Haven, Conn., show the highest ratio of divorces to marriages. In the West, the Western Reserve, Ohio, leads all other sections in the ratio of divorces to marriages. If Mormonism, therefore, had such a bad influence on the land, it should show it in the States adjacent to it and not in those on the Atlantic coast. The truth is patent, almost, that Mormonism is not the cause of much evil attributed to it, but is the effect of an evil which is wide-spread, the lax ideas about marriage. Men and women alike tire of their union, and desire separation. This would indicate that on the part of the women there is much misery in married life, and that we must apply a remedy which meets them not after they have entered into this estate and learned its misery, but before they enter into it. This is beginning at the right end; and it applies also to the men.

We know no right by which a legislature may pass a law dooming individuals to perpetual suffering, as would be the case to restrict the right of divorce to violations of the marriage vow. Many women would be put into very hells, if they were compelled to live with their intemperate and brutal husbands. Nor need we attribute the desire on the part of the women for divorce from such husbands to any peculiar hardness of heart on the part of these women. To grant divorce in such cases is not, as Woolsey suggests, to comply with the present wickedness of the human heart; it is simple justice.

We must therefore, as I have said, begin with marriage. In order to do this, the pulpit, the press, and the family are to handle this subject with less flippancy on the one hand, and on the other with less false modesty. In the articles from the press, we too often notice the careless, flippant tone. It would seem as if marriage were some play in which our young people engaged, an hour's pleasure before the life's sorrow. We are in need that the press treat this most important of all subjects with a seriousness and earnestness which no other subject can demand.

There is need that a voice be heard in the land, which shall arouse the consciences of the young men. As young men, we demand that the women we marry be at least pure. The press might put to each of us these questions: What have you to give in return for what you ask? Are you likely to be a genuine companion to any pure and true woman? Are you likely to make her life brighter and more cheerful? Have your haunts been such as to fit you for the head of a pure home? Do you bring into this new home you are about to form a genuine and high purpose in life, a high moral sense, a pure body? Indeed, the voice should be stern, demanding that we come not into this holy circle, a new home, with low ideas, with the aroma of unholy haunts, with a tainted body which will cast a cloud of misery over the future. We too easily forgive our young men their sins of indulgence, their crime of destroying purity, their degrading of the most holy relationship between man and woman. We cover these over with the easy-going phrase, "They are sowing their wild oats," forgetting that said wild oats are not likely to yield a desirable harvest. The harvest yielded at present, in addition to children diseased, is an increasing number of divorces.

The Church or the pulpit has been remiss in its duty to the young people on this subject. A false idea of marriage has restrained the pulpit from doing its duty, and by its silence it has given countenance to the too prevalent sensual or at least sensuous ideas which the young people have of marriage. To speak to them on the subject is to call up in their minds the mere physical union. Were the pulpit to speak out as it should, instead of avoiding the subject as it does, a higher idea would possess the minds of the young people. They would reason thus: If marriage is a subject which may be treated by the pulpit, then it is a religious subject, it is a pure act, it is a holy relation, it has to do with the soul as well as the body. It is this very truth that must possess the minds of those entering into the marriage relation before we can have that union of which it may be said, What God hath joined together let no man put asunder. We forget the weighty sentence with which Dickens closes his third book of David Copperfield: "There can be no disparity in marriage like unsuitability of mind and purpose." There is an affinity of mind, and this and not wealth or social position should be the basis of union. Divorce in such a case would be as impossible as the divorcing of the different parts of the heart.

The Church is culpable in another direction, in that it seems by its actions to favor the idea that celibacy is the more holy estate, and that marriage is to be preferred to a worse evil. Keeping silent about the celibacy of the Roman Catholic priests and nuns, we have only to remember that the highest authority in the Church is the New Testament. Only by a process which the young mind cannot take in, seeing it is untrained in theological methods, can it be made to appear that Paul does not condemn marriage, or at least favor the unmarried state. Again, this estate is lower by the fiction of the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus. These things cannot be overcome in the religiously-inclined young mind by any theological process; and they bear their fruit in making it appear that marriage is not the highest and best relationship in life, whereas in fact there is no relationship so honorable, so holy.

If there is need that the press insists on the purity of the young men, and that the pulpit proclaims the spirituality and holiness of marriage, there is need, too, that parents preach to their daughters the doctrine of helpfulness.

As the financial world is now moving, the prospect before young men without means is not very hopeful. The wealth of the country is centralizing; and to centralize is to draw from the circumference. The men who are dependent on their own exertions, and with no capital behind them, form part of this circumference, which is continually becoming poorer. Two hands cannot as easily supply the demands of one mouth and back as they used to do. What wonder that there is hesitation on the part of young men to undertake the work of supplying the demands of a wife and children? The trouble to-day lies not so much in the fact that young men demand as homes "establishments" as that two hands cannot so readily supply the demands of a home as formerly; and, as the case now stands, it is generally left to the two hands instead of four, as it should be, to meet all demands.

Hence, the need, and in our day of centralization the added need, of parents preaching helpfulness to their daughters. What have they to give to the husband in return for his labor? Their beauty of face will fade. They should be told that they must bring something permanent into the new home. "The things which are seen are temporal. The things which are not seen are eternal." Is the wife's aim to be one in purpose with her husband? Is it to be an inspiration to him, to be his companion in his soul as well as in body? Has she made up her mind to take upon her shoulders a part of the burden, add her two hands to his, so that with four hands the work of life is undertaken. Failing in this, the man has come to the woman with his whole mind aglow with a lofty purpose, seeking further inspiration from her, and hoping for companionship, only to be disappointed, and to find his wife—who a moment ago was his all—a nonentity or a weight. Around the home altar, therefore, let the doctrine of helpfulness be preached.

Beginning at this end of the divorce question, in that we make marriage a serious and pure thing, a spiritual and holy relation, an adding of force to forge instead of a subtracting of forces, we will reduce the number of divorces. Legal processes can at best only smooth the surface, leaving underneath the aches and sores which will show themselves in some form or other. As with divorce, so with Mormonism; for, until we are purer and our ideas of marriage more pure than they are, we are unfit to deal with the subject, no matter how much we may imagine the contrary. We cannot, be it ever so desirable, return to the old laws; nor does history encourage our hope that any return to the old, if it were possible, can meet the new and present evils. In our present subject, it is not to the old, but to the new, we must look; and that new thing which will aid in remedying our present evil is the exaltation and purification of marriage, and that, too, not from without, but from within.

THE TEACHINGS OF FREE RELIGION.

Editors of The Index:—

The human mind, in its oscillations through time, has usually followed the movement of the pendulum, and swung as far from the middle line in one direction as it formerly did in the other. And so acquired freedom to many, morally as well as politically, conveys frequently the idea of license. But we know that no country is free whose laws are not well observed; and that citizen is the freest who best obeys those laws.

The majority of men and women need to be taught that the greatest freedom of existence in religion and morality is obtained by the most intelligent obedience to all the laws of our being. But, when we speak of laws, the mind conceives of some Newtonian formula, and the motions of countless worlds, forgetting that there are mental and moral laws equally as binding as the physical, and the disobedience to which is followed by as positive consequences. And it seems to me that the teachings of our leaders of Free Religious thought should take more the form of practical applications, especially when addressed to mixed audiences on weekly occasions or at other times.

There are not so very many minds among us that can follow and realize as an aim an abstract conception. The average mind needs something in a tangible, concrete form that it can measure and bring within the scope of the senses. Not very many can love and admire the beautiful apart from a sense of valuable possession or desire to possess, as a true lover of nature can in nature's own gallery of art. The brilliant possessed by its fair owner would lose its beauty in her eyes, if its value should be suddenly counted by cents instead of thousands of dollars. She has no love for abstract intrinsic beauty.

And so with abstract goodness as a goal held up to men. Thought must be led up to it by gradual development. It must be put before men so that they can grasp it in their every-day life, so that they can shape and build the levers and wheels that run for them in accordance with its laws and plans.

Of what use would it be for a scientist to elaborate abstract theories to a mixed audience? The people need to be taught to use this higher thought in better modes of living and practical applications. And so, while placing an ideal goodness before man, let us not forget to tell him that, if he puts his hand in the fire, it will burn. He knows it in a physical sense, he needs to know it in a mental and a moral one. Nor is it necessary that this concrete form should be an idealized humanity projected to an infinite and named God, that there should be any dread of a flaming hell, that there should be any hope of a crystal heaven. Of these matters, we know nothing. The form most to be dwelt upon should be the realization of goodness in the individual.

What is Free Religion? And what is Free Religious thought? It is freedom from superstition, freedom to apply reason and goodness to any phase of our existence, freedom from the domination of one mind or any number of minds. It is the intellectual honesty of the individual, the honest courage to refuse to accept assumptions as facts, the courageous honesty to say, "I don't know." It is not only to be tolerant of another's opinions, but to have thought for another's welfare. It is not only to have the conception of an ideal goodness, but to possess the thought to act out that goodness. It is not freedom for men any longer to falsify in business. It is not freedom for women any longer to falsify in society. It is not a freedom to raise yourself by the sufferings and misfortunes of others.

But it is that freedom of manhood, that highest, grandest, noblest development of freedom,—freedom from outraging his own noblest nature, the freedom from all that restrains, all that retards a cheerful, intelligent obedience to the laws of our being, physical, mental, and moral. And this, it seems to me, is the height and essence of all true, all free religion.

When men and women are so educated, and have such freedom of action and perception as to see that their happiness and that of others is obtained by obedience to natural laws, what higher form of religion, what more ultimate conception of harmony, can be formed than of lives so ordered?

And, in reaching toward this ultimate, we must follow one law of our nature, and that is growth, development. First, we learn to obey physical laws; then, on a higher plane, mental laws; then, on the highest plane, moral laws.

And so I would have men taught by our leaders that, as we sow, so will we reap; that there is a future. I do not know whether it is a hundred, a thousand, a million, an eternity of moments: it is and will be to us only and at all times the next moment. That moment will be for each of us a consequence of this present; and in it, the present, we must do the task for ourselves. Teach men that obedience to physical laws gives physical health, obedience to mental laws mental health, and obedience to moral laws gives moral health, and that the combination gives harmony and happiness. Teach men to freely do right because it is right, because it is acting out their highest nature, because it is degrading and retarding their development to do wrong. Teach men that to the highest and noblest form that man has ever attained they have the capacity to reach and go beyond; teach them that to the lowest depths that man has ever fallen the same path lies open before them.

The time was, some few hundred years ago, when physical prowess was the estimate of manhood. Now, we bow to mental power, whether rightly or wrongly used. The time will come when a man will be known by his moral endurance, his ability and freedom to do right. We should shun to-day the society of one who continually walked through our sewers, and whose person was polluted with its contents. We should shun and shall shun those whose gold and position we now worship, and have them turn in our eyes to the vilest slime.

Free Religion must have free humanities. The groans and cries of thousands more unfortunate than ourselves require asylums, hospitals, educational institutions, and countless philanthropic paths to be trodden that are yet untrod. These helps to others have been, and always will be, from the promptings of our humanity, and not the outcome of creed or theological dogma. These deeds of kindness to others make men more free than any other act can do. It frees man from the tyranny of himself, and gives a freedom that can never be enslaved. To help, to care for, to encourage, to bear with others, is indeed a free religion.

Thus, I have endeavored to put into a concise form what should be Free Religious thought in its relations to humanity. Let us not be charged with want of sensibility. Let our leaders and our followers feel that the emotional portion of our nature needs developing as well as our mental part. If we cannot believe in a crucified God, we can believe in a suffering and crucified humanity around us. Let us give that humanity more than abstract thoughts; let us teach them what capacities they possess of doing for others, and thus to raise all to that life which, though expressed in differing terms, is one and the same,—a life of true, natural religion,—a life of true, obedient harmony to the laws of our being, physical, mental, and moral,—a life of true, manly humanity. Then shall we see men free physically, free mentally, free morally, free religiously. THEO. A. B. PUTNAM.

A BELLIGERENT BISHOP.

Editors of The Index:—

The subjoined paragraph is from the Canton Repository; and it refers to Mr. Underwood, although it gives his name wrong. My attention was called to it by a Liberal in this city who would like to arrange for a debate between Mr. Underwood and the bishop.

CANTON, OHIO, March 10, 1882. c.

"Reason and Religion."

Although several able and interesting lectures have been given in our city during the autumn and winter, we doubt not the lecture of the season will be delivered by Bishop J. Weaver, D.D., Tuesday evening, March 28, on "Reason and Religion." Bishop Weaver is bishop of the north-west district of the United Brethren Church, is an able lecturer, and as a preacher sustains the same relation to his church that Bishop Simpson does to the Methodist Church. He is the man who accepted a challenge to meet Mr. Underhill, of New York, in debate at Massillon a few years ago, and whom Mr. Underhill refused to meet when he found who the champion was. The bishop has had a number of debates with leading infidels and ministers of other churches, and his always winning the day is a guarantee that his lecture will be worth much more than it will cost to hear it, and will more than answer the Ingersolls of the day in an able and eloquent manner. For the convenience of the masses who will want to attend the lecture, it will be given in the Baptist church. An admission fee of fifty cents will be charged for the benefit of the United Brethren Church; and everybody should go and enjoy the lecture and help the church.

[We know nothing of Bishop Weaver's ability. We have never heard of any debates between him and "leading infidels." We never "refused to meet" him. Once, in reply to a letter which he authorized somebody to write us, as we were informed, we distinctly stated that we would be pleased to meet him in a public debate at any time upon which we could mutually agree. After learning of our willingness, he found some reason or excuse for declining to engage in a debate. From that time—some five or six years ago—we never heard of the learned and renowned "Bishop J. Weaver, D.D., . . . bishop of the north-west district of the United Brethren Church," until the letter and notice, printed above, were received. But since the bishop has had "debates with leading infidels and ministers of other churches, . . . always winning the day," and since he now advertises himself or permits his brethren to advertise him as a "champion" we "refused to meet," because of his extraordinary ability and "winning" ways (doing this evidently to attract the attention of Liberals and to get their attendance at his lectures), perhaps he will avail himself of an opportunity to achieve another controversial triumph by consenting to meet us in the near future in a public debate in the city of Canton, Ohio, on the origin and authority of the Bible. With a view to affording him such an opportunity, we have addressed a letter to friends in Canton, authorizing them to correspond with Bishop J. Weaver, D.D., in regard to a debate, and to make all necessary arrangements in our behalf for the same. "We pause for a reply." B. F. U.]

THE PRACTICAL MAN'S CONSCIENCE.

Editors of The Index:—

Unity journal, Chicago, must feel itself almost contemptuously used by such hasty and flippant treatment as W. B. Weedon of Providence and A. V. H. Carpenter of Milwaukee have recently given in its columns to the subjects respectively of "The Manufacturer's Conscience" and "The Railroad Man's Conscience." Mr. Weedon begins: "Your favor of even date, ordering an invoice of the manufacturer's conscience, is at hand. We have none in stock, and are unable to fill the order. I look over the whole premises," etc., and concludes, "You are welcome to this sample bit (of a very indifferent manufacturer's conscience) on paying freight and charges." The quality of Mr. Carpenter's contribution to his theme may be judged from his picture of "the despoilers of railroads to-day," who "rob the innocent, distressed, and helpless, whose all is vested in the stocks or bonds of these omniferent institutions." He regards it safe to assume that "the railway and the railway man of the future will be the strongest reliance of society and government for their integrity," and predicts that no institution "will do as much toward adjusting the proper relations between labor and capital." If we could have no more serious treatment of great problems than such as these writers give us, the state of things would be sad enough. The Nation (of March 2) takes a strikingly contrasted view of the railroad question, in remarking that railroad property "has in its more absolute form begun to develop evils and inconveniences very much resembling those created in France and Ireland and England by the concentration of land in the hands of a few owners over-conscious of their proprietorship. It affects the interests of commerce and agriculture and manufactures at so many points, in short, as to make the private property theory untenable, and to make State interference not only justifiable, but imperative, for the very reasons which call for the existence of government at all." The idea of Unity, in securing treatment of ethical subjects by specialists, was admirable; and it should be said that the articles on "The Farmer's Conscience" and "The Mechanic's Conscience," appearing in January, were of some value. Let us hope that the future contributors will at least spare us such childish, if not disingenuous reflections upon their respective topics as Mr. Weedon and Mr. Carpenter have indulged in upon theirs. s.

GLEANINGS FROM OUR CORRESPONDENCE.

ROBERT C. ADAMS writes from Montreal, "The weekly visit of your paper is an enjoyable event, and the sense of fellowship with good and intelligent people which it imparts consoles one for the isolation which avowed Liberalism brings, and enables one to endure the pious rant of Orthodox correspondents."

MR. W. F. JAMIESON, writing us in regard to the treatment the junior editor of this journal has received from a certain paper, since his connection with The Index, observes: "My idea of Liberalism is that, if you did not wish to work inside the League, you had a right indisputably to work outside in your own chosen way. Coercion is not Liberalism."

ALLEN PRINGLE writes from Selby, Ont., March 6: "I may add here that the Evidence Amendment Bill, for which we petitioned, enabling agnostics to give evidence in our courts, has just passed our Provincial Legislature. Hereafter, any 'infidel,' atheist, or agnostic, not otherwise disqualified, can make an affirmation in the courts instead of taking the Christian oath. Ontario has thus made a very important step forward, and the fact that the Bill met with but trifling opposition in the House is another proof of the rapid progress of Liberalism in this country."

ALTHOUGH we do not deem it worth while to publish the many letters we have received in criticism of the action of the National Liberal League or in reply to claims made by its representatives in different papers, justice to Dr. J. R. Monroe, editor of the Seymour Times, who it seems was elected one of its vice-presidents at Chicago last year, demands that we give the following paragraph from a letter he has sent us: "I had nothing to do with putting myself forward as vice-president of the National Liberal League. Never authorized anybody to publish me. The League business is now too ridiculous to merit serious thought. As I never went to it, but always opposed it, it is singular they should have the effrontery to use my name in connection with the organization."

J. M. FREESE writes from Mount Pleasant, Carbarus County, N.C.: "This county is a part of Mecklenburg, of 1775 renown. This is a college town, located nine miles east of Concord, in a neighborhood of Pennsylvania Dutch, consequently all Lutheran. I was Lutheran myself, but was treated like Dr. Thomas, of Chicago. The prospects of Liberalism in this section are good, and I expect to work in its interests in my own way. My former brethren are treating me very kindly, and some of them are rather well impressed with rational thought. I have been brought to where I now stand by the force of circumstances. I was through the war, and was taken prisoner at Roanoke Island by Massachusetts troops under Burnside. . . . Science has been ameliorating the race and humanizing theology for a thousand years, and now Christianity claims the honor of these results. As well might we of the South claim the honor of having abolished slavery. True, we did help abolish it; but we happened to be on the wrong side. I have been a free thinker the past ten years, and am happy to say that Dr. Adler first introduced me to the Free Religious Association, with which I am now fully in sympathy."

J. ICK EVANS writes from Toronto: "We are much gratified with the extremely favorable results of recent lecture and soirée, both of which were largely attended, and by many influential citizens who now mingle freely in the meetings of our society. Last Sunday was organized a debating class, principally for the benefit of our younger members, considerable numbers of whom have joined. Great commotion (in undertones) is occurring from the fact of nearly every occupant of the numerous Toronto pulpits having scandalized the cloth by becoming a land speculator in the 'Temperance Colonization' scheme, got up here for profit by a few ingenious and not over-scrupulous supporters of the present government of the Dominion. These schemes have actually tempted the Doctors of Divinity and pastors of our churches to turn an honest penny by enhancing the price of lands to the actual settler in our great North-west. I had an invitation to join the general scramble myself; and a convincing argument on the morality of the movement was clenched by the assurance that, if anything unpleasant was said, the scheme would be defended by every pulpit in the city. A great deal is being said on this subject. Our friend Allen Pringle has lately 'nailed the lie' in a very effective manner on our conservative and Church and State organ, the Mail newspaper of Toronto, in a challenge of $500 in each of two cases of flagrant misrepresentation in connection with the present persecution of Mr. Bradlaugh by the Tories of England."

MISCELLANEOUS.

SAYS the New York Times: "Unity Church should reconsider its project of turning Mr. Miln out of his pulpit, simply because he is in advance of his people; for otherwise it will be guilty of the same illiberality which was displayed by the Chicago Presbyterians when they drove out Mr. Swing, and which was widely characterized as the persecution of a man who was in advance of his sect."

COL. INGERSOLL, in reply to recent statements by Rev. Talmage, defends himself in the following vigorous language: "Mr. Talmage, in order to make a point against infidelity, states from his pulpit that I was in favor of poisoning the minds of children by the circulation of immoral books. The statement was entirely false. He ought to have known that I withdrew from the Liberal League upon the very question whether the law should be repealed or modified. I favored a modification of that law, so that books and papers could not be thrown from the mails simply because they were 'infidel.' I was and am in favor of the destruction of every immoral book in the world. I was and am in favor not only of the law against the circulation of such filth, but want it executed to the letter in every State of this Union. Long before he made that statement, I had introduced a resolution to that effect, and supported the resolution in a speech. Notwithstanding these facts, hundreds of clergymen have made haste to tell the exact opposite of the truth. This they have done in the name of Christianity, under the pretence of pleasing their God. In my judgment, it is far better to tell your honest opinions, even upon the subject of theology, than to knowingly tell a falsehood about a fellow-man. Mr. Talmage may have been ignorant of the truth. He may have been misled by other ministers, and for his benefit I make this explanation. I wanted the laws modified, so that bigotry could not interfere with the literature of intelligence; but I did not want in any way to shield the writers or publishers of immoral books. Upon this subject, I used at the last meeting of the Liberal League that I attended the following language: 'But there is a distinction wide as the Mississippi, yes, wider than the Atlantic, wider than all the oceans, between the literature of immorality and the literature of free thought. One is a crawling, slimy lizard, and the other an angel with wings of light. Let us draw this distinction. Let us understand ourselves. Do not make the wholesale statement that all these laws ought to be repealed. They ought not to be repealed. Some of them are good, and the law against sending instruments of vice through the mails is good. The law against sending obscene pictures and books is good. The law against sending bogus diplomas through the mails, to allow a lot of ignorant hyenas to prey upon the sick people of the world, is a good law. The law against rascals who are getting up bogus lotteries, and send their circulars in the mails, is a good law. You know, as well as I, that there are certain books not fit to go through the mails. You know that. You know there are certain pictures not fit to be transmitted, not fit to be delivered to any human being. When these books and pictures come into the control of the United States, I say, Burn them up! And when any man has been indicted who has been trying to make money by pandering to the lowest passions in the human breast, then I say, Prosecute him! let the law take its course.'"

PROFESSORS CHURCH, Emerson, and Woodberry, until recently of the Faculty of the Nebraska State University, have addressed a circular letter to the citizens of that State, explaining the nature of the contest that led to their removal and the issues involved therein. "At the outset," they say, "let it clearly be understood that religion has had nothing to do with the matter. The students in the late so-called investigation were used as tools under a religious pretext. The regents were undoubtedly influenced by religious considerations; but, practically, religion is merely a screen behind which the Chancellor saves himself, a cry to raise the Church on his party, a mask to delude the people." The authors of the circular say that the head and front of their offence are that they have insisted on administrative control by the Faculty as the law provides, a high standard of admission, discipline adapted to young men and women and not to children, a perfect record and a truthful catalogue, and "a real elective course of study with its consequences in methods of instruction." "These," the circular says, "include every measure of reform introduced. Through such efforts on the part of us and those who have acted with us in the Faculty, the University was taking on the semblance at least of organization, discipline, and scholarship. Ideas were passing into facts, and in these changes men could begin to see the promise of a true university." To these measures, the Chancellor has been an "irreconcilable foe." "He has had no policy of his own save to aggrandize himself, sometimes by plainly illegal methods; he has brought forward no measure, save a feeble 'literary course' that the Faculty speedily reformed and at last entirely remodelled; he has originated nothing, but has stood merely for the defence and continuance of old abuse and the obstruction of all reform. Looked at under any aspect, his administration from the beginning till the present has utterly failed. Nor is it any wonder; for he has no apprehension, sympathy, nor toleration for modern educational ideas. In a true sense, he is an ignorant man; and his ignorance has not only made improvement in the University exceedingly difficult and unstable, but has constantly influenced the students for the worse. . . . At last, seeing that he was losing the educational fight, he has played upon religious prejudice and resorted to the most base and brutal slanders, and by a sudden stroke has gained on the false issues a decisive victory. Now, he, in religion a turncoat, in politics a demagogue, in education a charlatan, is left in supreme control. If the State wishes a sectarian college, conducted on the ideas of a generation ago, it should approve this action of the board; if the State desires a real university, vitalized by living thought, under the influence of the present age, willing to be taught by the experience of successful universities, East and West, it should denounce this action." In the Lincoln Journal has appeared a communication signed by a number of citizens, severely censuring the Chancellor and the regents, and concluding as follows: "The State through the press gives the same almost unanimous decision. The people will not tolerate such action, pursued by such methods, in the conduct of its highest institution of learning. As matters are now, it is time the regents began to understand it is no longer the professors, but they themselves, who are on trial before the public."

BOOK NOTICES.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF LANGUAGE. A Critical Survey of the History and Methods of Comparative Philology of the Indo-European Languages. By B. Delbrück. Authorized translation, with a preface by the author.

Students of philology will be grateful to Miss Eva Channing for having given them access to this learned work of a distinguished German professor by her careful and pleasant translation. It is a book for the student, and not for the general reader; and a further analysis of its contents is therefore hardly appropriate here.

A PECULIAR PEOPLE. By William S. Balch. Chicago: Henry A. Sumner & Co.

In this work, the scenery and incidents of every-day life in the Orient are described in the form of a romance. It is the story of the adventures of several travellers of different nationalities and more or less piety, and is evidently designed for Sunday-school reading. Though not very thrilling in style, this book will be of use among that class of young people whose interest in books of travel depends upon their romantic sensationalism of recital.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE.—The February number opens with an article called "Germany and Italy," showing how the latter country would be benefited by the departure of the head of the Church, which so often has sacrificed the national independence and prosperity in order to secure her own dominion over a little strip of territory. Then follows a plea that republican institutions have been accompanied with too much corruption in America and too many revolutions in France to be considered fully successful thus far, and that they will never be consistently established until some system of proportional representation be enacted to give the minority its just share in the government. Certainly, our own ideal would be better realized, if the Southern republicans and Northern Democrats had more power to send representatives to Congress. We have also a touching tale of a child's labors in a printing-office; an account of the Theophilanthropists (to be noticed next week); and two replies to learned Belgian Romanists, one vindicating the memory of William the Silent, and the other defending the introduction of a car, representing the Inquisition, into the historical procession of 1876, to celebrate the third centennial of the Pacification of Ghent. It has been urged that the Spanish Inquisition was not brought into the Netherlands; but this is only because, as expressly stated by Philip II., they had a more severe institution of their own, based on laws which in 1521 sentenced not only all heretics, but all printers of heterodox books and all givers of food or drink to Protestants to be hung, beheaded, burnt, and buried alive, punishments denounced against even those who failed to betray the non-conformist. Eighteen thousand citizens had been executed in six years, when the Prince of Orange declared on July 12, 1878, that "since religion can never be imprinted on the human heart by violence, and since all Christians, of whatever religion, ought to live together in all peace and unity, it is therefore found good that both Catholics and Protestants should be able to follow their own religions freely."

In the Atlantic Monthly for April, just come to hand, we have more than its usual allotment of fiction. There is the conclusion of G. P. Lathrop's serial, the middle of W. H. Bishop's, and the beginning of a third by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, with two shorter stories by good writers. But there is no consequent lack of more solid articles, as, for instance, "Europe before the Arrival of Man," by Prof. John Fiske; "A Modern Hindu Reformer" (meaning Keshub Chunder Sen), by Charles Wood; "Progress in Agriculture by Education and Government Aid," by Eugene W. Hilgard; and "The Folk Lore of Lower Canada," by Edward Farrar. The poems are of average interest, and the reviews of current literature more than usually complete and interesting.

THE March number of the Unitarian Review is a peculiarly strong and interesting one. Every article is extremely readable and timely. Rev. Howard N. Brown treats in a thoughtful manner "The Liberal Movement and Religious Institutions"; Mrs. Frances S. Sanborn writes charmingly of "Dante." Two of the longer articles, "The Defender of the Faith," by Rev. John A. Bellows, and "Henry Whitney Bellows," by Rev. C. A. Bartol, do ample justice to the memory of the late Dr. Bellows; and he is also paid tribute to in two of the editorial notices. In fact, this is in great measure a memorial number, though also an excellent one.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

HON. ROBERT C. WINTHROP expects to spend the coming summer in Europe.

THE Parker and Paine memorial buildings in this city are called "the two T. P.'s."

THE collection of Spiritualist books and periodicals owned by the late Czar of Russia is said to be the largest of the kind in the world.

It is suggested that the statue of Theodore Parker, for which $9,500 of the $12,000 required to procure it has been given, shall be placed in front of the new Public Library building.

MR. BANCROFT has almost finished the last volume of his history. The Critic says, "Mr. Bancroft writes that the printers can work as fast as they please, and he will keep pace with them."

SOPHIE BARDINE, whose speech on her condemnation five years ago to nine years of hard labor in Siberia for circulating pamphlets was given in The Index on January 12, has escaped from Siberia.

BARNUM, the showman, is said to be worth three millions of dollars, and although seventy-three years of age he is as brisk and busy as the average man of twenty-three. His house and grounds at Bridgeport, Conn., are the finest in that city.

AMONG the results of the Centennial Celebration of Kant is a Commentary on the Critique of pure Reason by Prof. H. Vaihinger of the Strasburg University, in four volumes, of which the first has just been published by Spemann at Stuttgart.

MRS. REBECCA TAYLOR, the mother of Bayard Taylor, is still living in their old home at Kennett Square, Pa. She is in her eighty-second year, and recently took the first prize of $200 for the best silk cocoons at the Silk Culture Fair at Philadelphia.

ADMIRERS of "George Eliot" will be grieved to hear that the publication of her life and letters will be inevitably postponed by the illness of Mr. Cross, her widower and literary executor, whose sojourn in the south of France has not resulted in health.

REV. URIAL GRAVES, an ex-Lutheran preacher, is creating a sensation in Albany, N.Y., as a leader in liberal thought. He has organized a society in that city on a Free Religious basis, and is awakening considerable interest and meeting with much success.

THE Georgia Congressman, Alexander H. Stephens, is so confirmed an invalid that he professes to have remained a bachelor because of his valetudinarianism, declaring that he was by far "too modest a man to have the face to ask any woman to tie herself down to the duties of a nurse under the name of wife."

In a recent number of Knowledge, Prof. R. A. Proctor's new London weekly, the editor, in response to a query from a subscriber, says that it is an open secret that Robert Chambers was the author of The Vestiges of Creation, and that in his old age Mr. Chambers acknowledged repeatedly that he wrote that work.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES, probably the best known lady litigant living, has one lawsuit on hand which she did not begin herself. Mrs. Randolph, the widow of Mrs. Gaines' lawyer, sues her for payment of Mr. Randolph's services, which, it seems, the sprightly old lady forgot to pay while her lawyer was still living.

REV. S. J. STEWART, a Unitarian clergyman of Bangor, Me., has been exciting considerable interest in that city by his liberal discourses from the pulpit of his church, reported by the city papers in full, and the brave radicalism of articles written by him in reply to comments expressed by the editors of these papers.

At the dedication on the third of this month of the twin monuments erected to the memory of the poet Keats and his friend, Joseph Severn, in the Protestant cemetery in Rome, T. A. Trollope presided; and Story, the American sculptor, gave a brilliant and touching address on the friendship subsisting between Keats and Severn.

ON Victor Hugo's eightieth birthday, lately celebrated in Paris by many citizens who wished to show the patriot-author honor, among other tokens of appreciation he was presented with a bronze miniature of Michael Angelo's "Moses," in accepting which he said he was now "expecting even a greater one,—the greatest boon that can be conferred upon a man,—by which I mean death,—that reward for the good that man has done on this earth."

THE Saginaw Herald of the 9th inst. reports the opening of new reading-rooms in East Saginaw, Mich., and says, "The city is largely indebted to Rev. Rowland Connor for the boon it possesses in these rooms. . . . From first to last, he and his good lady have been assiduous in bringing to pass what is to be hoped will prove a great incentive in the education of the masses in popular sound and invigorating literature." Among the weekly papers on file there is The Index.

PROF. HAECKEL, the eminent scholar, who, like Humboldt, prefers to study nature in her own wilds, was at last accounts in a small village on the south coast of the Island of Ceylon,—the only white man there. The village, which bears the melodious name of Belligamma, lies on the shore of a fine bay, and is surrounded by dense forests of cocoanut and bread-fruit trees, filled in with other luxuriant tropical vegetation. The professor received an enthusiastic welcome from the governor of the island, and has been afforded every aid in the pursuit of his zoological investigations.

REV. PHOTIUS FISK, the generous-hearted philanthropist (who has outgrown all theological dogmas), has shown us a letter of thanks from Grinnell, Iowa, College for various benefactions received, in which the following paragraph occurs: "There is a beginning of great things here. One of our recent graduates is to be ordained here in two weeks as a missionary to Micronesia. Another, a colored man who came on with me from South Carolina, has finished his studies, and is now preaching the gospel in the Palmetto State." Mr. Fisk is quite as generous in circulating Colonel Ingersoll's lectures and contributing to radical free thought movements.

By a Board of Seven Trustees, who are nominated by the Free Religious Association and incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts.

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Chicago Standard says that the American Bible Society is "the most unprogressive and illiberal organization at present in sight."

IN Greece, the Deputy swears "in the name of the Holy and Consubstantial and Indivisible Trinity." In Sweden, he says, "I will be faithful to this oath, as sure as God shall save my body and soul." In Servia, he says, "I swear by one God and with all that is according to law most sacred and in this world dearest." In Prussia, Holland, and Switzerland, the oath may be taken or affirmation made.

THE Catholic Review, describing the condition of Europe in the eighteenth century, affirms that the "Church was mercilessly gagged and bound by statesmen of every Court in Europe that called itself Catholic, and for this Victor Hugo's favorite Voltaire and his associate philosophes are chiefly answerable. Voltaire was only the lineal descendant of Martin Luther, and Rousseau was of the same root and branch."

MR. GEORGE MARTIN, President of the Montreal Pioneer Free Thought Club, writes to the Daily Witness of that city to say that the Club desires to make "grateful acknowledgment of having received the sum of $500, bequeathed by the late John C. Baker, Esq., of Stanbridge, P.Q., who was an esteemed member of the Club, and who lived and died a worthy exemplar of the principles of mental freedom."

THE Louisville Christian Observer criticises Hammond, the revivalist, for going across the platform on all fours, in order to show the boys and girls how Satan goes after them "like a roaring lion." "But, on the other hand," says the Philadelphia Times, "some people say that, on account of dignity put on by most of the regular clergy, contrasts of this sort are called for, just to keep the preaching of the gospel from falling into ruts of rigidity."

THE statement having been made in the debate on the Chinese bill in the House that "Wendell Phillips, the friend of the workingman and the candidate for the governorship of Massachusetts of the national labor party," was in favor of restrictions on Chinese immigration, Mr. Phillips sent a telegram to Representative Chandler, of Massachusetts, saying: "I am not the candidate of any party. Years ago, I published in California my detestation of all restrictions on Chinese immigration as inconsistent, absurd, unjust, and wicked."

THE Iowa legislators say that their proposed anti-liquor amendment to the Constitution is designed to prohibit the manufacture of alcoholic beverages for sale within the State only. They do not intend to interfere with the home market of the farmers for grain, nor to give up their distilleries and breweries. The Boston Herald is provoked to say: "The Prohibitionists in Iowa have a morality very like the religion which was 'got' by an impressible woman at a camp-meeting. 'Believing,' she said, 'that the wearing of jewelry was dragging me down to hell, I took it off and gave it to my sister.'"

THE London Daily News says: "The right of the junior member for Northampton to take the oath, if he demands that it be administered to him, ought to be supported, not for his sake, but for the sake of a principle much more important than himself or any individual. This being done, an affirmation should be substituted by Parliamentary enactment for the oath, which, to the most religious minds, taken as it is and necessarily must be, in the most perfunctory and business-like fashion, is rather a mockery of religion than a serious invocation of its sanctions, and which is the last relic of the principle of political disqualification for theological opinion."

LAST June, a man in England for kicking his wife to death was sentenced to six weeks' hard labor, and another man for stealing nine shillings from a woman received a sentence of ten years' penal servitude. In November, three men caused the death of a young woman. One received a sentence of sixteen months' imprisonment, and the other two, six months' each. In December, a man convicted of stealing two shillings' worth of coal was sentenced to eight months' hard labor. An English writer who adduces these judicial sentences to show the inequalities of English criminal law remarks, "If a purse had been concerned in the former offence, ten years would have been the least punishment; but a poor woman's property in her life and honor are apparently not vested interests."

THE Dunedin, New Zealand, Echo says: "The free-thought movement is becoming very popular, so much so that there is a new society being formed, the name of which is to be 'The Free-thought Christian Association.' This body by implication admit that heretofore there have been no Christian free thinkers, a defect in the churches which they are about to remedy. No wonder the reverend editor of the Presbyterian condemns the movement as a 'blunder,' and quite unnecessary, as he holds that the gospel is the true charter of liberty, and that the Christian is the only true free thinker. Be this as it may, one thing is certain, namely, that the term 'free thinker' is no longer one of opprobrium, but, on the contrary, one that even orthodox people are anxious to claim as a title. During the late elections, some of Mr. Donnelly's friends, though of course without that gentleman's knowledge or authority, were going about among the electors of the peninsula declaring that the candidate was no longer a Roman Catholic, but a free thinker, and thus endeavored to get him into Parliament under a good name. We cannot approve of the act, though we must accept it as a compliment to ourselves, and a mark of progress."

REV. MERCER DAVIES and Ellen Davies have sent a petition to the Archbishop of Canterbury, with a request that it be presented to the Upper House of Convocation, declaring "That it appears by the example of the Patriarch Abraham, and by other facts recorded in the Holy Scriptures, that the practice of concubinage, as a distinct and lower form of marriage, was allowed in former days without rebuke by Almighty God, and is not forbidden or censured by any part of Scripture; that it was expressly permitted to Christians by some of the canons of the early Church; that it is not forbidden by any law or canon of the Church of England, so far as your petitioners are aware; that, having these facts in mind, in the year of the Lord 1876, your petitioners, being then both unmarried persons, and of full age, did solemnly and deliberately together enter upon this state of concubinage, in a private ceremony, which included a prayer to Almighty God, and the giving and receiving of a ring. . . . That your petitioners, having lived together in faithful concubinage during the space of five years, were lawfully joined together in marriage on the twenty-third day of December, 1880, but that the said Lord Bishop still continues his prohibition [to approach the Lord's Table] as before, thereby depriving your petitioner, the said Mercer Davies, both of his rights of Christian fellowship and also of the means of obtaining any maintenance by the exercise of his sacred calling; that your petitioner, the said Mercer Davies, has set forth the principal facts of Scripture and of the laws of the Church, on which he relies for his jurisdiction in these matters, in a book published by him, entitled Hagar; or, Scripture Facts concerning Marriage, which book he now respectfully submits to the serious consideration of your Right Reverend House; and that he is further ready to produce such letters or other evidence as may be required to substantiate the facts above stated." The petitioners conclude by asking the "Right Reverend House" to declare, "firstly, that the state of concubinage such as they have practised, that is to say, when openly declared and faithfully observed, is not condemned or prohibited by the written word of God, nor by the laws or canons of the Church of England; and therefore ought not to be visited with excommunication or suspension from the rights of Christian communion and fellowship. And, secondly, that the said Lord Bishop of London hath gravely erred in charging your petitioners with wilful sin, and forbidding them from Holy Communion."

THE BACK-YARD DEITY.

A gentleman asked a friend of Goldwin Smith, "Does Goldwin believe in a God?" "Well," replied the other, hesitatingly, "he keeps him in the back-yard to fly at anybody he doesn't like." I should be far from giving this as a true description of the Professor's theism, but the similitude fairly expresses the main use to which the deity is put in England just now. All the beautiful reasons of Francis Newman, the fine statements of Martineau, and the pleadings of Frances Power Cobbe, for theism, are overwhelmed by the shout and yelp of the pulpit and parliamentary pack hunting down Bradlaugh in the name of God. The scene of the Wild Huntsman's train in Der Freischütz is but a faint picture of what has occurred in the House of Commons, so often as the member for Northampton has tried to take his seat as commanded by the law. Jews, agonizing over the Judenhetze of the continent; Irish Catholics, enraged because some of their number are shut out of Parliament for treasonable patriotism; orthodox non-conformists, whose forefathers had their noses slit for dissent from the Church,—these now join with that political party which resisted successively Non-conformist, Catholic, and Jewish emancipation, in a grand "meet," as the fox-hunters say, to run the latest heretic to the ground. There is no circumstance of heartlessness, injustice, meanness, hypocrisy, and falsehood wanting to this last carnival of theological hatred and ferocity. These wealthy and luxurious defenders of the faith have not spared the honor of woman or the simplest rights of man. They have reiterated slanders disproved in courts of law. They have unblushingly maintained that atheism is to be thrust out of Parliament only when it has the courage of its convictions, thus setting a premium on hypocrisy. There is no question at all that the law is on Bradlaugh's side. He has acted throughout with strict legality and perfect veracity. When nearly every eminent lawyer in England, including the law officers of the crown, believed that he had the right to choose whether he would swear or affirm, he of course preferred the affirmation. When it was decided that he could not legally affirm, he offered to take the oath,—just as anybody but a pedant would go through any form of asseveration rather than let a great injustice be done to man or woman. The Speaker, who throughout has acted with gross partiality, has no legal right whatever to decide upon the theological state of mind in any duly elected member who advances to take the oath. When Bradlaugh came up to perform his duty, the Speaker could not know but what he had joined the Salvation Army the night before. The only creditable thing about the action of the House, and its cowed Speaker, is that it has not pretended to act in accordance with law. These law-makers have cynically accepted the rôle of law-breakers,—that is, morally, for technically there is no wrong where there is no remedy; and, the will of Parliament being supreme law, its conduct is technically legal while plainly unconstitutional. I wish it were in my power to believe in the religious sincerity of these gentlemen. They affected to be sorely aggrieved when John Bright said, "The working classes care as little about the dogmas of Christianity as the upper classes about its practice." But the long parliamentary howl which followed this hit confessed that it had gone home. The old Quaker Commoner's Christianity is a survival: it means honesty and humanity. It was born amid such persecutions as those which, to humble believers hiding in the catacombs, made human kindness seem so beautiful that they drew on their subterranean wall a picture of the Good Shepherd carrying on his shoulder—a goat. But observe what, to a Christianity grown imperial, among worshippers of a golden-fleeced Lamb, has become the standard of fair dealing and moral conduct. Sir Stafford Northcote secured the votes of some members against Bradlaugh's taking a seat by an implied promise that the Opposition, which he leads, would favorably consider a bill to render the oath optional. After he had secured his practical point, he and his party prevented even the introduction of such a bill by Mr. Labouchere, the sitting member for Northampton. Mr. Brand, the Speaker, whenever Bradlaugh tried to take the oath, was sure to have his eye caught by him who arose to oppose it. But when Mr. Collins, a newly elected member and a ritualist, came forward to take the oath, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson, in accordance with an announced intention, stood up to ask him (Collins) if he believed in the words of the oath, the Speaker alone, of all the members present, failed to "see" Sir Wilfrid; and this pretence was received with mirth and delight by the majority of the legislators of England. When Parliament had decided that Bradlaugh might "affirm," at his own legal risk, and was about to do, Mr. Newdegate secretly instigated a common informer, supplying the necessary funds, to prosecute him in the law courts (as was afterwards confessed by the informer, one Clark), so voting in a matter in which he was peculiarly interested, and also violating the law against promoting a prosecution without open responsibility. Sir Hardinge Gifford, law officer under the Beaconsfield government, voted in the House that Bradlaugh should not take the oath, then appeared in court as the informer's counsel to prosecute him for not having done what he helped to prevent his doing. The Judges fined Bradlaugh five hundred pounds and costs on the evidence of a clerk who had, the judges admitted, "prevaricated."

In speeches before their constituencies, generally made during recess, his parliamentary enemies, with hardly an exception, have declared that Bradlaugh had asked to affirm because the oath would not be binding on his conscience. This is an unmitigated falsehood. Bradlaugh, from first to last, has declared that the oath would be binding on his conscience exactly the same as an affirmation. Samuel Morley, leading representative of the Dissenters in the House, when, at the last general election, it seemed doubtful whether Gladstone could defeat Beaconsfield, sent a telegram to Northampton, advising all Liberals to sink their religious objections and vote for Bradlaugh, in order to prevent the return of a conservative. But, now that his party is in power, Samuel Morley remembers his God, and has written a letter to Northampton, begging all pious people to vote for the conservative against Bradlaugh. Samuel Morley's letter for God was placarded one day this week all over Northampton. Next morning found his telegram of two years ago for his party placarded beneath it; and nothing more is needed but a picture of Mr. Facing-both-ways. This same Samuel Morley sits for Bristol. In a recent speech there, he declared that, if any considerable number of his constituents called for his resignation, he would resign. A meeting was convened, and three thousand persons unanimously called for his resignation. Samuel Morley has made no response. He is the wealthiest and most eminent member of the Orthodox Congregational body, and he may now be regarded as the man whose recent record is more particularly mean than that of any member of the House of Commons. This is saying a great deal. I have already admitted that the Tories have been cynically bold in planting themselves on brute force in dealing with the junior member for Northampton. But what shall be said of the so-called Liberals, whose evasions or half-hearted action led to the great wrong? The late Rev. F. D. Maurice, at the conclusion of a Bible-class talk, in which Jacob and Esau were declared types of the spiritual and natural man, remarked: "As for that matter of the mess of pottage, it only illustrates what has been observed in all ages,—the tendency of the spiritual man to become a sneak." Ninety Liberals sneaked out of the House when the vote came on. And they did so because of the half-hearted course of Gladstone, between whose hesitating words, spoken so low that the reporters could hardly hear them, could be felt his plain desire to have the parliamentary victim offered up to his church idol, provided it could be done by the Tory mob. Gladstone had courted Bradlaugh's support when the latter seemed to be securely placed in Parliament, for he could not despise Bradlaugh's large following. If Bradlaugh is defeated to-day at Northampton, it will be by the Irish vote there going solid against him, because of his support of Gladstone. Yet, when Bradlaugh was brought up for sacrifice, Gladstone washed his hands and said, "See ye to it." The London Times expressed next day the disgust of all brave Englishmen, when it remarked that Gladstone had put the matter upon the lowest instead of the highest and broadest ground. One word from him appealing to the House to defend the constitutional principles of religious liberty and the rights of constituencies would have prevented the miserable spectacle of the Commons of England joining in a rite of human sacrifice. Religious liberty in England has suffered under William Ewart Gladstone.

And all this catalogue of meannesses and outrages has been run up in the name of God. One of the sorriest facts is that those "liberal thinkers" who style themselves theists have uttered no protest against this wrong. Professor Newman has indeed been suffering too much of late to make his voice heard, or I cannot doubt that he would have made it heard on the right side. But, apparently because Bradlaugh is despised and rejected, the theists have also washed their hands of him, and allowed the wrong to go on.

I am happy to say that two Unitarian ministers—one of them, Mr. Sharman, who was for some time in America—are now in Northampton working for Bradlaugh, where, indeed, the writer of this would be, were it not that his advocacy might be injurious to its object. But there will be other hand-washings after this episode in the recent history of intolerance. "What is truth? Bring me the wash-basin, is Pilate's reply." And, amid all this dirt that is set afloat in the name of truth, the common-sense of England and its just heart, though it may not save the right, will call for the wash-basin. To Heine's words just quoted may be added those of Thoreau, who, in the days when piety and slavery went hand in hand, said he thought that "atheism might be comparatively popular with God himself." It is utterly idle to suppose that the name of God can retain its hold upon the reverence of this people in the face of the crimes against human liberty, justice, and charity, committed in that name whenever it has been invoked. Already is heard in the streets the contemptuous epithet, "Goddite." This week, when the bitter struggle has been going on which will end to-day, the name of God has been kicked about like a football between the parties. The House of Commons having appealed to brute force—having dragged Bradlaugh by physical violence down the lobbies, in the name of God—has succeeded in arousing the people of Northampton to a like wrath and violence. The problem of the divine existence is being settled in Northampton by fisticuff. If the Tories win the seat, there will be triumphant Christian jubilees throughout the land. But there will be in the breast of a million men a rankling hatred of all religion, a detestation of the ministers of religion, a festering sense of the wrong and brutal oppression, whose gilded figure-head is labelled "God." Bradlaugh may lose his seat, but a rude radicalism will gain the victory. All the atheists that have lived in England have never done so much to degrade belief in a deity as Christian bigotry has been doing these two years. And all the theistic kings, their horses and men, will not be able to put together again that invisible graven image which devout thinkers have been trying so hard to spiritualize. Whatever may be the fate of "theism" in America, in this country it has very little prospect of a career. It cannot be saved from its friends. Theism has been caught away out of the region of philosophical and scientific discussion, so far as the people are concerned, by partisan political passions. The doctrine is judged by its seeming fruits, and they are bad. The question of God means whether radicals shall be free to criticise the monarchy, and attack the perpetual pensions of idle aristocrats. It means whether Gladstone cannot be got out of office and Northcote or Salisbury got in by flying at him (Gladstone) the small pulpit-god of Scotch, Welsh, and Irish fanaticism, for having voted to admit an atheist into Parliament. Fancy a Martineau defending the same God as that wild Irishman to whom, after his scurrilous speech, a member remarked, "You may be a gentleman among pigs, but you are certainly a pig among gentlemen." Heine, in his light way, has described how he was converted from atheism by the atmosphere of brandy and tobacco in which it flourished in Paris. But the intellect and heart of England are, to a large extent, unconsciously abandoning theistic dogmas, because of the lower-class vulgarity and the upper-class brutality which have made the established deity into their own image and likeness.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

THE THEOPHILANTHROPISTS, AND WHY THEY FAILED.

"Lovers of God and Man" was the name under which the friends of natural religion were organized on December 26, 1796, by Professor Chemin and Haüy, brother of the mineralogist, in a room at the Blind Asylum, 34 Rue Saint-Denis in Paris. Their number soon became so great that they got possession of ten churches in 1797, as well as of Notre Dame after April, 1798. Among their numbers were Thomas Paine, Saint-Pierre, the author of Paul and Virginia, and Larevéillère, a member of the Directory. Other cities followed the example of Paris; and church-bells, which had long been silent, awoke to summon worshippers in many villages to the new rites. Efforts at propagandism were made in Switzerland, Italy, Germany, and England, but with little success. Even in France itself, the movement was declining, when it was suppressed by Napoleon, with his usual despotism, on March 1, 1803. Such was the end of a religion which had no creed, except belief in God and immortality, whose chief commandments were, "Worship God, love your neighbor, and serve your country," and whose rule of life was, "Whatever tends to preserve or develop man is good; all that would destroy or degrade him is bad; to serve ourselves by harming others is crime; to serve others by sacrificing ourselves is heroism." The public worship commenced by a hymn, followed by the offering of a basket of fruit or flowers on the altar by children, or the burning of incense. Then came an invocation, in which the head of a family, clothed in a long blue tunic, a red girdle, and a white robe, took the lead, and the congregation responded. Two more hymns were separated by a pause for self-examination, in silent reply to questions read aloud from the ritual, and a prayer, followed by reading from ancient and modern moralists in the pulpit; where, after a fourth hymn, a sermon of not more than fifteen minutes in length was preached. A fifth hymn introduced an invocation of the mother country, and to her was sung the closing hymn, after which came the benediction. These hymns commemorated the glory of God, the bounty of his providence, and the changes of the seasons. Patriotism, too, held a prominent place; and festivals in honor of Liberty were frequent, too frequent to please Napoleon. Among other ceremonies was the presentation of each infant by the father, who swore to train him to virtue, and the hearing of a nuptial discourse by each newly married pair, who were placed before the altar, bound together with ribbons and flowers. To the childish character of many of these ceremonies is justly attributed the failure of Theophilanthropism by James Hocart, whose article in the Revue de Belgique for February has furnished almost all these particulars. He is further right in condemning the violent rupture with past history, and the small place given to the sermon, which is the main strength of Protestantism. His own ideal of worship involves preservation of all the truth and goodness in Christianity, with cordial welcome of all the results of science, so as to satisfy at once all the wants of the reason and of the heart.

Our readers are aware of the progress made by liberal Unitarians and Free Religionists in establishing a scientific religion. This work would be comparatively easy, if it were not for the rapid growth of agnosticism. The Nation seems to me perfectly correct in saying, as it did on February 23 and March 2, that agnostic worship is a contradiction in terms, and that the genuine agnostic who knows nothing about the supernatural will not pray to it or preach about it. And I must add that the existence of agnosticism, whose fundamental basis is complete indifference to theology, goes far to weaken the position, taken by M. Hocart and most other writers, that human nature is necessarily and permanently religious. He who considers how much less power the Bible, the church, and the habit of family and private prayer have to-day than they had even fifty years ago, and who duly estimates the effect of scientific education on future generations, will find it difficult to deny that we are passing through a great change, and departing farther and farther from such a supremacy of religion over all national, social, and individual life as was seen in the Middle Ages. We shall never go back to the days of the crusades and the founding of the great monastic orders. Nothing shows how far we are from the age of faith more plainly than does the appearance in Puck for March 8, 1882, of a two-page colored cartoon representing the "Light of Reason" as a golden beam, in which shine the faces of Kepler, Spinoza, Kant, Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, and Haeckel, while ministers, priests, and rabbis, holding croziers and books marked "Bible," "Talmud," etc., are hiding themselves under an immense umbrella inscribed "Supernaturalism," and held up by Henry Ward Beecher, beside whom stands Talmage. This picture is published, with comments to match, by men who have made it their business for the last five years to know what the average American likes to read and look at. No one knows better than Puck what is popular. Tens of thousands of business men, mechanics, and school-boys will laugh with delight at this attack on supernaturalism in the name of Voltaire, Darwin, and Paine. There can be no plainer proof that the hearts of our people are no longer with the Church. And there are many other indications in the character of our literature that the demand for religious institutions is on the wane. He who outgrows the Church may be glad to join societies like that of the Theophilanthropists, but he has only to take one more step to find that his new forms cannot fill the place of the old, because for him all such needs are passing away.

F. M. HOLLAND.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

To speak the English language or, better, the English-American language as one's mother tongue is a sign that one belongs to the most powerful and advanced moiety of the human race. Prof. John Fiske calculates that by the twentieth century English will no doubt be spoken by something like eight hundred million people, crowding all over North America and Australia, as well as over a good part of Africa and India, with island colonies in every sea and naval stations on every cape. By that time, the Professor concludes that so large a proportion of the business of the world will be transacted by people of English descent that, as a mere matter of convenience, the whole world will have to learn English. Such are the imperial prospects of the English or English-American language in a not remote future. And it is a language in every way fitted for its great destiny. It is more than any other current language a composite speech. In it, the Latin races and the races of the Levant find a copious admixture of their own tongues; while at bottom it is a Teutonic language, as its monosyllabic element shows. Thus, it is fitted by its very polyglotness of composition beyond any other to become a cosmopolitan speech. Meantime, it has been more than any other the language of civil and religious liberty, a most important consideration in these days of a universal aspiration for spiritual and political freedom. As Wordsworth says:—

"We must be free or die, who speak the tongue That Shakspeare spoke."

It is of course useless for any other language on this continent to undertake to coexist with English in any other shape than as a provincial speech or patois. English was the language of the old thirteen colonies, and is the language of the no longer homogeneous but highly heterogeneous great Republic. It has grown with the country's growth, and can vindicate itself against all later comers. Of course, the many-languaged immigrants hither will continue to speak their mother-tongues, but their children "to the manner born" will be English-speaking. Such exceptional alien-born citizens as Carl Schurz quickly learn to think and speak in English as well as in their native tongues. Spanish, which was once far more widely spoken in this hemisphere than English, and which is still as widely spoken at least even now, though a noble language, the finest indeed of all the Romanic languages, is a tongue of the past when compared with English voicing antiquated ideas and beliefs. English is in fact the most modern in its spirit of the Indo-European group of languages; while the unequalled nautical, commercial, and colonizing energy of the English-speaking people has made the air of every region of the globe vocal with its accents. Grimm, the great German lexicographer, with the cosmopolitan spirit of a true philologist, long ago eulogized the English language as the fittest and most likely to become a world-speech, and to realize the dream of Leibnitz and others of a universal medium of thought as pervasive as the atmosphere. Such a universal medium of intercommunication is beginning already to be a desideratum in these days of an ap proaching federation of the world. Alexander the Great made Greek the language of the civilized world of his day. Later along, Latin was the language of civilization, of the camp, the court, the school. Still later along, French fulfilled that function. But the civilization of which Greek, Latin, and French were the lingual interpreters, was narrow and limited in its area. But the civilization of to-day is getting to be truly cosmopolitan, being as wide-spread as locomotion by steam and the printing-press. Thus, the language of civilization hereafter will be literally a world-speech, coextensive with the globe. In the past, sectionalism and nationalism have prevailed, despite a few great, overweening, imperial sways. Every race and community has had its own language or dialect or patois at least. And, on the whole, it has been better so. The confusion of tongues was brought about in no miraculous way of course, albeit the old Mesopotamian legend asserts that it was. But this venerable myth is not without historic significance. Difference of race and of local environment accounts largely for the variety of languages which still distinguishes the different divisions of mankind. Every language voices the peculiar genius of the people speaking it, and will be found to have been modulated by that genius and the peculiar aspect of the scenery in which it is spoken, each language expressing shades of thought which no other language expresses, so that by means of variety of language thought has found a fuller embodiment than a single universal tongue could have given it. Thus, a familiarity with a variety of languages enlarges the mind. Familiar ideas in the garb of a foreign language assume a novel aspect, and lose their triteness and commonplaceness. An ability at least to read the principal languages of the West is almost indispensable to the scholar and thinker of to-day. But the time for sectionalism and nationalism, in the old narrow sense of the word, is rapidly passing away. The cosmopolitan spirit of to-day demands a world-speech to promote it. The English language, being spoken already in all regions and climates of the earth, and being itself a complex of the chief languages of Western and Southern Europe with an admixture of Oriental words, naturally enough is most likely to come to the front as the language of the cosmopolitan civilization of the future.

B. W. BALL.

IN MEMORIAM.—R. W. MACKAY.

Robert William Mackay, whose death was recently recorded in the journals, deserves the recognition due to scholarship and independent thought. Mr. Mackay was born in London, 27th of May, 1803, and educated at Winchester and Oxford. After graduating in honors, he was called to the bar, but never practised. In 1851, he married Frances, a daughter of Dr. Fellowes, the author of the Religion of the Universe, a third edition of which was edited by his son-in-law in 1864, and whose sincere devotion to what he deemed the cause of truth was attested by the practical sacrifices which illustrated it. A life of thoughtful leisure and literary activity was closed by Mr. Mackay, after some years of patient suffering, in a death which came like a sudden sleep, at his residence in Hamilton Terrace, London. In early life, Mr. Mackay turned his attention to the study of political economy. The science of chemistry had also a fascination for him. Philosophy, however, was his chief attraction. In particular, the works of Plato and Aristotle, the speculations of the German metaphysicians, and the profound criticism of the German theologians, preoccupied and stimulated his reflective and logical mind. The result of prolonged reading and careful inquiry, his most important work, The Progress of the Intellect, as exemplified in the Religious Development of the Greeks and Hebrews, was given to the world in 1851. The book is, in the main, an attempt to interpret the myths of the classical world; but it is also an essay on Jewish symbolism, Alexandrian theosophy, and speculative Christianity. If reason presides over the process of interpretation, the "free fancy that wove the web of Mythus" is not unrecognized by the philosophical critic, nor is the poetry of the symbol obscured by the erudition which explains it. In 1854, Mr. Mackay published A Sketch of the Rise and Progress of Christianity, defining that religion as originally a reform of the narrow ceremonial Judaism of the time, and tracing the various phases of its historical development from the Catholic concentration of the second century to the rise of the papacy and the scholastic philosophy of the Middle Ages. In The Tübingen School and its Antecedents (1863), he reviews the history and the present condition of modern theology, with a general acceptance of the critical results of the labors of Dr. F. C. Baur and his followers. In The Eternal Gospel (1867), he identifies Christianity with ideal morality, absolute harmony of the will, or the free perfection affirmed by Saint Paul. To a translation of the Sophistes of Plato (1868), he prefixed an introductory essay on ancient and modern sophistry, containing strictures which will not command universal assent. Divergence, indeed, from some of his conclusions, here as elsewhere in his writings, is inevitable. In theology, Mr. Mackay was a pantheist of a refined type. His rational Christianity repudiated all supernatural intervention. His idealism was that of an independent Platonist. With his passion for all philosophical studies, he united a strong predilection for poetry and painting. He was himself no mean amateur artist. The chief personal traits which impressed his friends were his truthfulness, or fidelity to conviction, and his simplicity of character.

ADDISON GARDENS, SOUTH LONDON.

THE CHURCH, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

So much of Mr. Clarke's interesting paper (published in The Index of March 9) as relates to the decrease in the number of attendants upon the English churches may perhaps be supplemented by the present essay:—

The tendency of the age is toward investigations of doubtful creeds and dogmas, not less than the annihilation of false doctrines. Men are not satisfied, as formerly, to accept without question the statements of self-exalted teachers. There has come into the life of to-day a spirit of contradiction, of questioning, fatal alike to the continuance of repulsive observances and to the belief in absurd and self-contradictory tenets. "Religious matters," so to say, are receiving more attention than ever before. But the modern seekers after truth do not find the object of their solicitude within the pale of the "Christian" Church; and the consequence is that the Church visible, if I may so speak, is losing ground, while the Church spiritual is adding many who have heretofore been content with the old wives' fables of popular theology.

The Church cannot attract nor hold men by argument; for its logic is unsound, its reasoning is fallacious. Plainly, it must appeal to passion and prejudice, or it must veil its dreary platitudes behind attractive observances and solemn ceremonies. The Catholic Church is enabled to maintain undiminished the number of its worshippers, partly because its communicants cannot or will not think; and, again, because, by means of its feast-days and shows,—savoring always of the "vain pomp and glory of the world," as our ancestors would have said,—it appeals to man's sense of the sublime and beautiful, and holds him rapt in an ecstasy of admiration which has no place for reflection. The "High Church" party among the Episcopalians realizes that this outward seeming is the only thing that can save their Church, which else must meet the fate of its more consistent though more rapidly dying orthodox neighbors. The "Low Church" faction opposes the movement—which is, outwardly, in the direction of Catholicism—now. Will this opposition be exerted when it comes to be realized that in a more perfect secularization lies the only hope for the Church?

The other Evangelical churches recruit their membership, as a general thing, by means of "revivals," "special" services conducted by men of much zeal and little knowledge, who make converts chiefly by depicting the torments of the damned and the bliss of the saints. Is the man who is "converted" during a revival season likely to be made, for all time to come, a better man? Experience teaches us that such is seldom the case. The statements accepted without question, under the pressure of strong excitement, are seen, upon after examination, to have been partial or, worse, false, and misleading. It is found that the belief rashly and hastily professed cannot be defended against the assaults of science, progress, truth. If the convert is an honest man, he will, when he discovers where he has been led, abjure his faith and look for something more reasonable: otherwise, he will become and will remain a hypocrite.

Let us turn from church methods to consider for a moment the use which is made of them and of the Church.

It is not pleasant to believe that, as would seem to be indicated, the Orthodox Church membership of to-day is made up of the ignorant, the thoughtless—not as literally without thought, but thoughtless—and the dishonest; and perhaps the division ought not so to be made. Yet we know that many persons receive their religious beliefs, as they do their real estate, from their parents, never stopping to inquire into the creed which they profess, because of the mistaken idea that, "My father's religion is good enough for me"; that there are those who join a church as they would join a literary club, and attend it as they would attend the theatre, with a thought for only the amusement of the hour or the demands of etiquette; that business men, politicians, people who have to "make their way in the world" profess Christianity as a blind, and use the Church as a stepping-stone to place or preferment. It is not pleasant or consoling, I say, to believe all this; but what are we to think? And it may fairly be asked, Does not the Church, through selfish motives, encourage this ignorance, overlook this carelessness, and condone this dishonesty?

The Church of the Future will not seek to make proselytes by first frightening those whom it would aim to reach, it will not address itself to their passions and prejudices, it will not depend for its support upon the beauties of its ritualistic ceremonies. It will not commend itself to wilful ignorance, it will not aim to attract those who cannot comprehend its teachings, it will not take the place of a coöperative store or serve as an adjunct to a political "machine." Its beginning and ending will be in reason, truth, and justice; its creed will not call for supernatural demonstration; its theories even—if it has any—will be at least reasonable. This, as I have said, will be the Church of the Future. With those of us who will, it may be also the Church of To-day.

THE ANTI-CHINESE LEGISLATION.

The bill to prohibit for twenty years Chinese immigration into this country has passed both houses of Congress, and, unless it meets the veto of the President, may be the law of the land before this number of The Index reaches its readers. It is not pleasant reading. Even from the point of view which regards our national affairs only from the plane of commercial values, the legislation is short-sighted and narrow. But to those who have been accustomed to consider the Republic of the United States as standing for certain ideal principles of liberty, equity, and equality, such as are enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, the bill is much more than merely narrow or short-sighted: it is a violation of the nation's most sacred trusts, a departure from its best traditions and aims, a deliberate abandonment of the fundamental polity which this country has hitherto claimed to have in all its international relations. There is some hope that the bill may be vetoed,—not, perhaps, on this high ground, but because, as some of the best jurists in Congress believe, it violates the treaty now existing between the United States and China. Senator Edmunds, in particular, though favoring the general principle of the bill, voted finally against it, because of the failure to amend it by reducing the period during which immigration from China is to be prohibited from twenty years to ten; the longer period, in his view, being in conflict with the treaty rights guaranteed by our government to the Chinese. The executive department of the government being especially charged with the responsibility of guarding treaties, it is to be presumed that the President and his advisers will scan this feature of the bill carefully, and that, if their judgment accords with that of Senator Edmunds and others on this point, the President will return the bill without his signature. Nor should he be deterred from a veto on this ground, nor, indeed, on any other that seems to him good, by the largeness of the majorities by which the bill passed. In the House, the majority was much above two-thirds. In the Senate, it lacked one vote of being two-thirds. But even if the bill could be passed over his veto, which is not probable, the President, if he does not really approve it, should none the less state his objections, and then leave the responsibility to Congress of passing it without his signature, by the requisite constitutional majorities.

One of the objectionable things about the bill is that, so far as concerns the great majority of those who have voted for it, it cannot be called sincere legislation. There has been no general demand for the bill, nor any real belief in its necessity for the good of the country among the constituents of the Congressmen of either party who have favored it. It is only in California and its two or three adjacent States on the Pacific Slope that there has been any special interest in securing this legislation. It may be said with entire safety that such legislation could never have been introduced into Congress, or, if introduced and left to the judgment of the States this side of the Rocky Mountains, could hardly have received a dozen votes in Congress, had it not been for the pressure exerted from the Pacific States. And this pressure has not been the legitimate power of argument. The Californians, there is no doubt, are sincere in this matter, though it be the sincerity of passion and short-sightedness. They, it must be admitted, though not without many exceptions, are deadly in earnest in their opposition to the continuance of Chinese immigration. But there is no such opposition in the country at large. Nor could the large majorities have been secured for this anti-Chinese bill, were it not that the two great political parties are now so nearly equal in the country, both on the popular vote and on the presidential electoral vote, that the Pacific States hold the balance of power between the two, and neither party dares to offend them. The bill, therefore, is a triumph of sheer partisan competition,—a triumph, not of one set of party principles over another, but of party fears on both sides over the best judgment of both. California has secured the anti-Chinese bill, not through the justice of her cause, but by reason of the fact that she was in a position to bribe Congress by giving her electoral vote to whichever party would show most zeal in favoring her special measure.

Yet it is doubtless true that the enemies of the Chinese in California have infected some of the leaders of both parties with a measure of the spirit of their own passionate proscriptiveness, and convinced them that the Chinese are really a dangerous element in our civilization. Senator Edmunds, for instance, is a man who would not favor the principle of such a bill, if he did not believe in it as necessary to the good of the country. Others of the Eastern Congressmen who have spoken for the bill are unquestionably sincere in their advocacy. There is a class of men prominent in American political life who are specially susceptible to such arguments as the Californians bring, when they aver that the Chinese are so utterly different in race, religion, and habits of life that they will never assimilate with the American people and institutions, but will remain as a parasite on the body politic, drawing from its life and contributing nothing to it. This is not the first time that Senator Edmunds, in particular, though one of the very ablest and most conscientious of our national legislators, and eminently faithful to the special tasks of the Republican party, has shown a deficiency of vision for grasping the full breadth of the application of the principle of equal rights to national affairs. A few years ago, when the amendment to the Constitution was proposed, forbidding Congress and the States appropriating money for sectarian schools, it was under Senator Edmunds' lead that a proviso was added in the Senate, to the effect that the amendment should not be construed as prohibiting the reading of the Bible as a religious exercise in the public schools,—a clause that would make the Constitution, contrary to its whole present tenor, distinctly recognize the Bible as a religious book, different in character from all others. Some such apprehension of harm to the Christian institutions of the country is most likely now at the bottom of the opposition felt by Senator Edmunds, and others like him, to the continued immigration of the Chinese.

But, whatever the motives of those who have voted for this measure, the measure itself is a denial of the fundamental principles of the Republic and a reversal of its policy. It is a measure especially antagonistic to the doctrines which the Republican party has been laboring to establish, and which a few years ago it secured an express and complete recognition of in the amendments to the national Constitution forbidding any discrimination in civil or political rights on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The anti-Chinese bill is not technically a violation of these amendments to the Constitution; but it is certainly a violation of their spirit. It discriminates in our immigration laws against a certain race. It forbids laborers of a certain nationality from coming into the country to pursue their vocation. To laborers of every other nation and country, we keep open doors. To those of one race only, we bar admission. Even those citizens of China who may wish to come to this country for purposes of travel and study must hereafter, by this bill, bring passports from their government. It has been our boast heretofore that any person from any country on earth could travel from one end of the United States to the other without any question asked as to his right to travel, provided only he paid his fare and obeyed the laws. Now, if this bill becomes law, travellers may continue to come as freely as ever from every other country but China,—from Germany or Ireland or Turkey or Guinea or Patagonia. The Chinese only are to be subjected to the humiliation of a passport.

And yet the Chinese are by no means barbarians that they are to be thus excluded and humiliated. They are the living representatives of the oldest civilization on earth. They are a peaceable, law-abiding, ingenious, industrious people. They have not a few national characteristics which this country would be the better for learning. It is not many years since the people of the United States were glorying over the fact of having succeeded in establishing diplomatic and commercial relations with them. This iniquitous bill, specially excepting them from privileges we grant to all the rest of the world, is the return this country now makes for the opening of their country to the intercourse we then sought. They will be hardly human, if they do not retaliate by excluding Americans from their territory and cutting off our trade. When they see that they alone, of all the nations of earth, are singled out for this treatment, they would be amply justified in recalling their minister from Washington and sending ours home from Peking. Some such spirited action as this might convince the American Congress that they have passed a law which not only violates our own national principles of equal justice, but is poor political economy also, as well as an insult to a nation with which we are at peace. INSINCERITY IN RELIGION.

Although, during the past few years, a multitude of causes have combined to lessen the influence of theological beliefs, they are still, even in their modified form and deprived of much of their authoritative character, an obstruction to progress. A faith that has prevailed for centuries, and that has become a wide-spread and popular religion, continues to affect most powerfully the character and conduct of the masses long after the profoundest thinkers have outgrown it, and when scepticism in regard to it has become general. Its past influence, whether for good or evil, continues to exist in the inherited tendencies it has produced and in the habits of thought, the customs, conventionalities, laws, and institutions, secular and ecclesiastical, which it has helped to establish. As every belief is but a modification of some preëxisting belief, and as every belief influences, however imperceptibly, character and conduct, even the earliest and crudest thought of man must be felt to the remotest generations. So far as the superstitions of by-gone ages can be perpetuated or the waning tendencies which they produced can be revived, the advocates and adherents of conservatism will retain their influence and have an advantage over the friends of progress. Coincidentally with religious revivals, we have noticed in several places, the past few years, a revival of the old spirit of intolerance and persecution, generally encouraged and fostered, we regret to say, by the orthodox clergy. But its influence is largely neutralized and continually weakened by the diffusion of knowledge and the growth of liberal thought, to which many inside, as well as outside of the churches are contributing in their own way.

One of the inevitable and legitimate results of the power and prestige of the old faith in connection with the progress of free thought is a vast amount of insincerity and downright hypocrisy.

The orthodox theology makes its adherents intolerant in proportion as they believe in and are dominated by its doctrines and spirit. On the other hand, liberalism makes men broad, catholic, and charitable, in proportion as it exerts on their minds its legitimate influence. The adherents of Orthodoxy know they are in no danger of persecution or proscription from Liberals. But, as Rev. Dr. Thompson once said, Christianity is "a religion which by its very nature is intolerant, which declares war against all difference, which has a clear-cut, definite faith and creed, and says, 'There is one God and one Lord Jesus Christ, and there is no other name given among men whereby they can be saved.'" Christianity, in this land, no longer burns heretics, but it injures them in their business and subjects them to social ostracism, and thus offers a premium on hypocrisy. Politicians who want office, merchants who want patronage, lawyers and physicians who want practice, teachers who want schools, are bribed into silence respecting their views on religion, and even into hypocritical assent to what they disbelieve. The premium is too great for them in the competition of life to resist; and thus theology, by its absurd teachings and intolerant policy, makes men insincere, dishonest, and corrupt.

There is, perhaps, no class on whom this theology has a more pernicious influence than the clergy. They are educated to a profession which is to them a means of support. They know that wealth is timid and conservative, that the press panders to popular prejudice, that their congregations are composed in part of men and women who are narrow and intolerant, that the more liberal element they address is cautious and reticent in consequence of the strong pressure brought to bear upon it from every quarter, that the creed, discipline, and machinery of the Church put them at the mercy of the more orthodox and unprogressive of their supporters; and it is not strange, therefore, that only now and then a minister who has advanced beyond Moses and St. Paul has the courage to avow his honest convictions,—“is bold enough to be honest, and honest enough to be bold.” The result is very general insincerity in the pulpit, great as a rule in proportion to the intelligence and culture of the minister. During a recent lecture trip through the West, three orthodox ministers, two of them Congregationalists and one of them a Baptist, called upon us and expressed themselves in sympathy with the general thought of our lectures, and asked our advice as to the best way of harmonizing their interests and their honest sentiments with the requirements of their profession. Mr. Miln was frank enough to state his views, and the result is well known. And yet, to our knowledge, a large number of the Unitarian ministers in the West have no more belief than Mr. Miln in any form of theology. The treatment he has received from Unity Church can have no other effect than to intimidate other Unitarian ministers from the expression of their views, when their views are not in accord with the right wing of Unitarianism and when they think more of a good salary and easy living than they do of loyalty to truth and fidelity to their convictions. During the next few years, the proportion of temporizers and trimmers among Unitarian ministers will be as large we fear as among the preachers of any orthodox denomination. It is gratifying, however, to know that the influence of the clergy diminishes in the same ratio that their insincerity becomes anifest.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THE article by Miss Hardaker, promised for this number of The Index, is unavoidably deferred until next week.

WE are glad to hear that a new edition of John Weiss' book on The Immortal Life has been issued. No other book by Mr. Weiss so fully preserves his rare genius both as a critic and a positive believer as this. That another edition has been called for shows that its circle of appreciating friends is increasing. Its price is $1.50, and the book will be sent from The Index office to any one forwarding to us this sum for it.

For the word "liberal," we have always had a fondness, and are pleased to quote the following from the orthodox Congregationalist as to the primary sense and real meaning of the word: "The philologists tell us that the word 'liberal' etymologically runs back through French and Latin to a Greek and even Sanscrit root, having the primary sense of acting according to desire, and hence of self-mastery and independence of external control. Upon this is superinduced the secondary sense of living in a manner befitting one thus free. Hence the term 'liberality' grew to signify that largeness and comprehensiveness of mind which fairly considers other interests than its own, and duly estimates the claims of all related facts and welfares in making up its final judgments."

WE regret that Mr. George Schumm has been obliged to discontinue the Radical Review, an excellent liberal journal started some months ago at Madison, Wis.; but, as its discontinuance could not be avoided, we are pleased that an arrangement has been made by which The Index will be sent to the subscribers of the Review for the unexpired time of their subscriptions. In the last number of the Review, Mr. Schumm says: "The subscribers of the Review will suffer no loss from its discontinuance. Those who have sent us their subscriptions will be supplied, for a proportionate time, with The Index,—the best free-thought paper in the country. Those of our subscribers who also take The Index will be allowed their time. We have been enabled to make an arrangement to this effect chiefly by the great liberality of the business managers of The Index, which we feel bound publicly to acknowledge. We trust that those of our friends who do not already take The Index will become permanent subscribers to it."

IN a discriminating notice of one whose death has touched the hearts of millions, the Springfield Republican says: "The death of the poet Longfellow has awakened a quick utterance of sympathy over the world. The English papers have repeated their old praises of him, and, so far as the cable tells us, only one of them has described him falsely as 'America's greatest literary son.' He, with his unaffected modesty, never so esteemed himself; and no careful critic, respecting not merely the canons of taste, but the poet's own fame, would call him so. It is the English fashion to do it for two reasons,—one that he was almost the first of American writers to catch the ear of England; the other and later reason is that such an attribution would restrict our literature to a certain level of excellence, which, without doubt, has been far exceeded by others of our authors. But, while the tremendous artifice of Swinburne will inevitably pall on the ear and finally sink into the half-forgotten abyss of curiosities, Longfellow's pure and simple melody will live in perennial freshness, because it is sweet, unaffected, genuine, and, beyond all, because it conveys noble messages instead of ignoble. It is in this point that Longfellow stands armed against any captious assault. His soul was as clean as a child's through his whole life, and yet nowhere devoid of manly strength and fellowship."

THE Republican movement in Europe finds itself everywhere confronted by ecclesiastical hate and opposition. The clergy and established churches are its implacable foes, bitterer toward it than kings and nobilities. It is not strange, therefore, that Garibaldi has a sort of priestphobia, and that in this respect he is only a model of the living European revolutionists and agitators. They evidently see that a population which is under the influence of ecclesiastics must be unfit for the robust and manly business of self-government. European priests are harder to tame than kings and nobles; but they will be tamed in the process of the Republicanization of civilized society. The humble pie which hierarchies are even now eating is only an antefast of what is evidently to come. Protestantism at the start partially reduced the priest to the level of ordinary citizenship and humanity. It made him simply a minister dependent on his parishioners and fellow religionists for support, and removable at their pleasure. Protestantism further transformed the priest from a celibate, having no interest but that of his order at heart, to a domestic man with a family and a stake in society as a citizen and a parent. Thus, he was no longer a conspirator against society as it were, seeking to make the people his spiritual slaves and moral serfs, and benefited by their ignorance, cruelty, and lack of moral fibre. In this work, Protestantism did a service of inestimable advantage to society. Without this transformation, there would have been no progress, no popular liberty. But much remains to be done in Protestant as well as in Catholic countries.

POETRY.

A pagan dreamer dreams of Truth,
And finds the world way vain,
And in his honest-hearted youth
Conjectures after Gain.

Saith: Inspirations of Regret
And Love that answers Loss
Are poems that the priests forget
Beneath the Roman Cross;

A cross above the market place,
Dome-borne against the sky,
Above a world-way trader race
That lives to moll and die.

A race that offers beaten straw
And thorns and thistle bloom,
And writes its lines of trader law
Upon Nazara's tomb;

A race that makes Contentment wage
Its way of trader reign,
That measures with a brazen gauge
The Light and Law and Pain,
That measures with its brazen gauge
The thought of God and Gain.

Saith: Faith of hopeful discontent
'Gainst low and littling things,
Negation toward the shame-descent
That light pretension brings,

A faith of hopeful use-prepense
That answers Lack and Loss,
Is more than sin or priest's pretense
Or Roman torture-cross;
And it shall overthrow the fools
That scatter thistle-seeds,
And overthrow the shameless schools
That teach the trader creeds.

Saith: Inspirations of Regret
Must bring us truth for loss:
The poems that the priests forget
Are more than creed or cross.

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS IN THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

THE PROPHET AND HIS WORK.

A Discourse commemorative of Samuel Johnson, delivered before the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I., March 5, 1882.

BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

Probably few great men have been less appreciated by their fellows than Samuel Johnson. The simple announcement last week that he, a co-laborer with Garrison and Phillips during the early anti-slavery agitation and the author of several religious works, died at North Andover, February 19, age fifty-nine, was perhaps hardly noticed by many Liberals; and its real meaning to the cause of religious freedom was little comprehended by many more. And yet in him, as in very few men and women, the spirit of Free Religion was manifest; and in his departure the principles which we individually hold dear, and for which our Society, as such, stands, have met with a momentous loss. I ask you to contemplate with me for a few moments to-day the prophet and his work.

I call him a "prophet," because it was preëminently his life's business to interpret the universal will to man; because he was inspired to speak in the name of the Ideal, and to summon man to its service. More than this, he was a prophet of the rarest order. He could have said with Jesus at any time, had not his own modesty forbidden it, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I might bear witness to the truth,"—not a fraction of truth, as exemplified in some one sectarian or reformatory movement, but the truth, exact and unqualified, in all its cosmic beauty and wholeness.

It was Mr. Johnson's good fortune to enter upon the consideration of the world's problems through the spiritual training of the Transcendental School. In his youthful days, New England was stirred to its profoundest depths by the new German philosophy. Have we or have we not ideas that are true of necessity and absolutely,—ideas independent of experience in their origin, and out of the reach of experience by their nature? That was the problem. On the one hand, it was contended, as it is now contended by some, that all knowledge is empirical; that is, is derived from observation and experiment. This was and is the doctrine of Materialism. On the other hand, it was contended that at least a portion of knowledge comes directly from the mind itself. This was and is the doctrine of Spiritualism, using the word in its philosophical sense. As a metaphysical discussion, incapable perhaps of satisfactory settlement, I confess to little interest in this controversy; but in its bearing upon certain phases of thought, in the effect it has had upon certain phases of life, I feel very great interest in it. The idea that the mind is the man, "the mind is first, foremost, creative, and supreme," and that it has laws independent of experience or contact with outward facts, whether strictly true or not, was an emphasis of the unseen, spiritual side of human nature. It tended to lead men away from the merely physical, animal facts of life to the Ideal, not—as I believe will some time be proved—in any antagonism to science, but only as elevating and enlarging the sphere of science. One of the great writers of the Transcendental School, to whom Frothingham claims the idealists of New England were much indebted, wrote: "I give myself no concern about external things. I endeavor to be, not to seem. I am no man's master and no man's slave." There are some things superior to matter, said the Transcendentalist in effect. There is a knowledge which does not come by observation and experiment,—a knowledge which betokens the supremacy of mind and its power to grasp or to receive truth through some at present ill-defined spiritual process. Emerson, the very prince of idealists, expressed the same thought in 1836, when he said:—

"In the presence of ideas, we feel that the outward circumstance is a dream and a shade. While we wait in this Olympus of gods, we think of nature as an appendix to the soul."

It is not necessary to my present purpose to enter into the debate which has been long carried on between the materialistic and the spiritualistic schools as to the relative merits of the transcendental and the scientific methods of inquiry. The point to which I now wish to call attention is this,—that he is best able to meet the problems of his own and of his neighbor's life who starts out with a clear recognition of the supremacy of mind over matter, and the inherent power of ideas. The man who is floundering in a swamp of empirical facts is not half so likely to be a reformer, either of his own or his brother's condition, as one who is clinging to a principle or truth to which he believes all facts should sooner or later conform. In other words, life is rendered holy, not in reasoning from facts to ideals, but from ideals to facts. Practical ethics, it is claimed, never had a more stanch supporter than Immanuel Kant. Boston and vicinity, the hot-bed of Transcendentalism in America, was the hot-bed of reform here. From this one central thought of the divinity of the human soul, expressed in divers ways, have grown all the fair humanities. Now, it was into this school of thought that Samuel Johnson was spiritually born. In it he lived, in it he died. It shaped his whole career. In no small degree, it made him what he was. And in most cases it caused him to go right where very often the lack of it caused others to go wrong.

If you should ask what was the one grand principle around which in his mind all others revolved, I should say it was the consummate flowering out of these early influences; namely, the dignity of man as a spiritual force.

The profound significance of the word freedom for our age, he says, lies in the full consciousness, by mind, of its own essential validity. To his thought, as to our own, the gigantic error of the old systems was in looking outside instead of inside man for the divine revelation. Not more certain to him were the material than the spiritual facts of existence. As rock is rock, as hand is hand, so is soul soul,—realities all. We must have implicit faith in the soundness of the spiritual organization of man,—that was to him an axiomatic truth, needing no demonstration. In all that he wrote and said, he regarded humanity from this fine stand-point of the Ideal,—not simply as an animal existence, with necessities for shelter, with bread and butter to earn, all included in a body to be pampered, indulged, and at last buried, but a spiritual existence, here and now and always, with necessities for eternal growth, hungry for truth, as boundless and aspiring as the universe of mind. In an age trying its best to justify the divine by degrading the human, with its doctrines of everlasting punishment and total depravity, and shading off its bigotry into nothingness on the one hand and absolute denial on the other, Samuel Johnson struck the key-note of the coming faith, when he said, "Nothing less than the justification of human nature can justify God." And so accepting man, in his highest and sublimest characteristics,—man the living soul,—as his fundamental article of faith, he took his place, both by temperament and by conviction, as a prophet of individualism. He had seen all about him, as we may see if we will all about us, how the Ideal is lost from sight, how the soul is swamped, as it were, in a sea of forms and ceremonies, and how law and custom frequently lose the individual in the mass, and sacrifice the finer to the coarser side of human nature. With all the keen perception possible to a sensitive soul, he felt the pressure against his own vitals of the straight-jackets others were wearing. He came to think, as a wise man has put it, that every institution is an iron dress for a growing child. And, when he joined his protest with that of others against increasing ecclesiasticism and religious tyranny, it was not with the slightest intention of helping the formation of a new organization: it was only to affirm the supreme majesty of the unfettered, individual soul. It is often said that individualism and egotism are inseparable parts of one whole. They may be so sometimes; but there was no egotism in this man. He was retiring and undemonstrative in the extreme. So much so that, amid the less solid but more noisy movements of many of his contemporaries, the calm but eternal undertone of his song has been of late scarcely heard. He was a reverent, awe-struck worshipper at the shrine of spirit. When he emphasized the individual, it was the individual spirit which he ever saw struggling upward into the ideal realm. How beautifully come back to us now such words as illustrate this characteristic! They often fell from his lips. The feeling which prompted them was always in his heart. "We worship wisdom, justice, love," he says, "not as mere outwardness, but as our best and highest, as our liberty, our infinity." Nor was there the slightest tinge of selfishness with him in this position. Our country and our institutions derived their greatness, in his eyes, from the fact that they meant the largest opportunity for individual aspiration after and reception of divine life. He saw, and exulted in seeing, that, when human nature honors individuals, it is more loyal to character than to peculiar genius or class interests. The soul, all souls, are inexpressibly sacred. The real man, all men, are at least germs of the Divine. With such a philosophy as this, he was of course a prophet of freedom.

The great religious question of the ages, he says, is that between outward authority and inward freedom. It is the work of this age to test utterly the principle of inward freedom. To this work, he gave himself with rare ability and devotion. The spirit man was not to be bound. The mind could, in the nature of the case, know no law which should interfere with its own action. To say to a human soul seeking the light, Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther, was an absurdity. Every power of man must be developed in its natural way. The right of all faculties in the individual and all individuals in the State to complete culture was among the "blazing ubiquities." The conditions which should make the acquirement and exercise of this right easy were among the things to be taken for granted. First among these conditions, he recognized freedom as the necessary method of all true culture. That he should ever be a mere administrator of forms was an impossibility. That he should ever trim the sails of his thought to catch the popular breezes was inconceivable. He entered the ministry to preach the truth as it was given him to see it, and the sect never existed strong enough to seal his lips. He was a man of faith. Nothing human or divine could swerve him from a steadfast loyalty to his own soul. The infidel, he affirmed, in clear-cut English, is he who deliberately declines to speak what he thinks, or to trust humanity with what helpful truth has been intrusted to himself. Faithlessness, not to a church, a book, a system, but to the divine temple which he himself was, and to the divine revelation which he himself contained,—this was the infidelity he shunned as he would a viper.

But freedom was never confounded in his mind with license. It was not the body, of the earth, earthy, which he would release from proper and wholesome subjection. It was the immortal spirit, the real man, within, without, transcending the body, which he sought to free

"From binding law to glorious liberty."

And just here came in his conception of Moral Order. From the humblest to the highest form of life, he saw the beauty of wholeness, which is but another name for the beauty of holiness. He saw it in the outward universe. He saw it in man. To him, the lofty ideal was but an expression of moral need. To him, the true dignity of the citizen was to concentrate moral power. To him, the only unmitigated atheism was to doubt the moral brotherhood of man. And, when contact with the baser phases of human existence cast a little shadow, not of doubt, but of sadness, over his faith, he felt how healthful was that intimate communion with the physical universe, which also speaks of infinite integrity. I confess, he says with poetic beauty, I confess the splash of my oar in the lake in moonlight drowns the murmurs of the busy town: the nestling song of a bird at nightfall out of the still, dark forest will not let me hear the caucous speech and the drum-beat of the canvass; the boast of Christendom in its only truth and way dies out of my hearing, at the rebuke of the serious and spiritual pine woods; the newspaper is trivial, and I cannot be roused by the latest sensation or the wickedest lie; the telegrams are like heat-lightning on a summer eve, and the new political conspiracy flits like a ghost on the far horizon.

But let none think that this mood in him meant any lazy indifference to practical affairs. For he adds in almost the next breath: "Does nature eclipse the social conflict, and make it dreamlike for a while? It is only that our faith may the better master its discouragements. How puny does evil seem, when the heavens and earth swim in tender purity and beauty, and every rock is older than the oldest sin!" Thus, it was that this idealist could reinforce himself for the struggles of the world at the altar of a temple not built with hands, whose priests were the gnarled oaks and tall pines, and whose sweet-voiced choirs were the feathered songsters of the grove. It was because he saw in and through it all universal order, blending freedom and duty as the warp and woof in the divine fabric of life. It was because above all the senseless parade, the immoral ambitions, the unholy practices of the street and the senate-house, he saw the equality of men before the moral law. It was because in that spiritual communion with nature, which only the holiest may know, he seemed to draw near to the universal wisdom, and to better understand the law which, in the long run, must know only universal good.

In such idealism as this, we naturally expect to find the spirit of reform. And in his case we shall not be disappointed. All may not have realized it, but Samuel Johnson was a thorough reformer. Unlike those writers who think science means dealing with physical facts merely, and on that basis proceed to demonstrate that one race is inferior to another, and women inferior to men, he saw beneath the superficial—the color of the skin, the differences of size, weight, and outline—to the essential, spiritual unity underlying all. No man was ever stronger than he in the conviction that the world could not do without love and justice. Natural religion, he believed, must find in its humanities that holy living which supernatural religion could not find in its miracles. Natural religion is, he said, absolute confidence in thought, in liberty, in progress, as human functions and forces. Its watchword is: let each be true to his own soul; let the whole guard the rights that are shrined in each. There was no disposition in him to think social reform a thing beneath the interest and active participation of the scholar. It was not less a necessity of self-respecting scholarship than of reform that they should be identified the one with the other. It was eminently fitting, therefore, that, in the bare announcement of his death, the newspapers should speak of him as a co-worker with the anti-slavery reformers. Only, he was not limited to one movement. His mind grasped the universal equities. His heart took in the universal loves. Office-seeking was an inexcusable offence in his eyes. A nation, he said, rests on loyalty, not on greed. Drill of children to uniformity in mental processes in our public schools, he pronounced a kind of social absolutism. It may make smart human apes and effective parrots, were his words, but we must educate our youth to free thought and noble aims. He was an ardent believer in equality of rights. He found his way to the side of Garrison, in his onslaught on slavery. In the discourse upon "Natural Democracy," published during the war, and one of the finest productions which have come from the pen of modern thought, he says: The negro slave judges the Saxon freeman. It is in him that democracy concludes her great argument: I take this least of men, by your showing, and prove by him that, wherever man is, there are all things possible that have honored manhood. I show you in him valor and loyalty, a piety, a fortitude, a patience and trust, a glow of faith in the present and the future, that put your petrified religion to shame and your traditional creeds to school. I show you inspiration again: the living God felt once more closer than life, in the touch of liberty, and this by the children of night, the little one among the races. Ah, yes, sainted leader, thou readst the lesson well; and if at times some of us are inclined to reject the faith in the presence of ignorant, unthinking exercise of a freeman's rights, thou still pointest us to the Ideal as containing the solution of all difficulties: thou makest us to feel anew the divine touch ordaining freedom.

Nor did this man's reformatory impulse expend itself in asserting the rights of his own sex. He saw easily and defended bravely the application of the democratic principle to woman. He believed fully in the mutual influence of the sexes in common cultures and disciplines. It was the spirit man and the spirit woman he saw always. He had a profounder task on hand than that of gauging the relative capacity of skulls. He was pioneering in a universe of souls. And so when little minds, unable to look beyond the immediate, overshadowing fact to universal and eternal principles, were debating the latest interpretation of human rights, his voice sounded as from the spirit world the vital question and its only possible answer. "Argue whether it will do to let women have equal political rights with men? Drop the word 'male' out of your statute books rather, as silently as you can, and with a blush of manly shame!" We hear very much in these days about the decay of Transcendentalism. Facts, sir, all we want is facts, is the cry in scientific monthlies, in the counting-rooms of trade, and on the platforms of some phases of so-called advanced thought. I tell you, friends, if we could have a heaven of such Transcendentalism as Samuel Johnson's working among us now, we should not find men so anxious to prove their wives inferior to themselves. We should not find men, and, alas! women, too, dealing with this question on exclusively physical grounds. Their sense of honor, their love of liberty, in a word their spiritual natures, would take the matter into their jurisdiction and settle it in accordance with spiritual laws such as belong to science, though science does not as yet own and proclaim them.

I think we may say of Mr. Johnson as he once said of another, who was like him interested in every good work, that in him justice was so reconciled with love that it took all his gravitations with it. In him, creed was dissolved in conduct. His mind accepted the principles of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. His heart responded to the clarion appeal of the reformer, whether from the platform or the scaffold. Like Emerson, he accepted truth as the summit of being. He recognized justice as simply its application to human affairs. On this rock as the basis of all real progress, he stood with any who would stand by his side, or, if need be, he stood alone. If he is to-day enjoying that immortality in which he so firmly believed, he can say with the old Egyptian, "I have given bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, and a shelter to the stranger."

And now what is the one word which comprehends the creed of Samuel Johnson—the dignity of man as a spiritual force, freedom, moral order, practical reform, what is the one word that covers and comprehends it all? That word, friends, according to his own definition and ours, is religion. Religion in our way of thinking includes all of life and all that life contains; and because his philosophy while it soared to the infinite held fast to the finite, because his vision took in the entire sweep of thought and action, he was a prophet of religion. Among the many good statements of the modern conception, as distinguished from the old definitions which are not yet expunged from the dictionaries, I know of none better than some of his. Religion, he says, is the natural movement of the faculties: it is gravitation by inherent affinity.

Religion is a constant sense of the infinite. It is the natural attraction of mind as finite to mind as infinite. It includes both finite and infinite in the process of personal growth; it is pursuit of ideal aims; it is unity.

Previous to Mr. Johnson's day, religion had been, as to some extent down to this very hour it is still, regarded as the worship of God, pure and simple. Such a conception has made its sphere a narrow and limited one. It has enabled men to say this thing is religious, that is secular or non-religious. It has made it possible for one to lead a very questionable life during six days of the week, and still to be classed as religious because of compliance with certain forms and ceremonies on the seventh. In a word, it has made religion depend upon intellectual assent to certain dogmas and outward physical compliance with certain artificially established conditions. And when the new movement in thought came, protesting against spiritual lordship and tyranny, the old devotees who believed Jesus a superhuman being said, You radicals have no religion then, because you reject Christ and Christianity. And other devotees who had rejected the Christ, but believed the worship of a personal God was what constituted religion, said, You radicals then have no religion, because you are in doubt about the divine essence and character. So much was this feeling prevalent at one time that many radicals, admitting the charges to be true, declined to take the name "religion," and even spoke of the thing itself as something to be despised and rejected. I doubt if any idealist ever made that mistake. Certain it is Mr. Johnson never made it. With clear vision, he saw at once that worship was an irresistible instinct of human nature, and that the worship of the true and the beautiful, by whatsoever name called, was what made the substance of religion. He could not fence in his faith by traditional walls. He could not see that the ancient time contained all of good. What we owe to the past, he said, we owe not to one Bible, Church, Messiah, race, but to every hair-breadth fraction of the past. Its robe was seamless, and every thread was needed for the tissue. But, much as he enjoyed the study of the past in all its wholeness, how beautifully he affirmed the superior value of the present time! "Not there the fountain-head, not there the morning of the spirit, not thence its viewless wind. Not there, but here! Not then, but now!" Such was the sublime faith of this man to whom religion was a present and a constant inspiration. He could see no antagonism between religion and philosophy, between religion and reason, between religion and science. Religion was universal philosophy, universal reason, universal science to him. To such confession, he believed nature would hold mankind, until they should become one in the unity of the spirit. More perhaps than any man of his time, save Emerson, he stood on the pedestal of personal religion, the representative of soul liberty, unwilling to be hampered by the slightest threads of organization, but always bearing his testimony, pure and strong, to those causes of love and freedom which organizations have been so largely designed to serve. Wholeness, holiness, such as knows no bounds for love on the finite or for aspiration on the infinite side, was his: it stamped him as a great spiritual force, coming almost without observation, exerting an influence at once as silent and as immortal as the stars.

There was a point concerning which Mr. Johnson and some of the earlier and most of the later advocates of Free Religion did not agree. His experience with the old organizations, his natural disposition, and perhaps most of all his emphasis of spiritual freedom, led him to distrust all cooperative movements. He thought that even three was one too many. While I dissented from his view in this respect, I shall always think him nearer right than many of the advocates of combined effort have thought him. What he saw in such effort, what he believed was an inevitable accompaniment of such effort, is bad, inherently bad, whether exercised by a Catholic or a Free Religious pope. Spiritual tyranny is not to be tolerated; and, if cooperation must lead to that, if it means, sooner or later, a fetter, however small, upon human thought, or a gag, however slight, upon human lips, then I think Mr. Johnson was right in this as in other things. Certainly, those of us who are engaged in the work of organization cannot afford to lose sight for a moment of his cherished philosophy; namely, that, if a man will but act from his own centre, better forms will in time arise than he or his wisest comrade knows how to plan. We must agree with him in thinking of man as a part of society, not as the piston is part of a machine, but as the lark is part of the morning. Any clipping of the soul's wings was, of all things, the most disastrous in his eyes. I think in all this he was largely right; but, as it seems to me, he failed to comprehend the possibility of organization on a basis of freedom. He failed, if I do him justice, to recognize the beauty and safety of the cooperative principle. Possibly, opinion, even among Liberals, justified him in this view. I know it is not unusual for those holding the best conceptions of truth to be intolerant and oppressive toward those who do not receive them. But, allowing for all such weakness, I still believe that a local movement like ours, furnishing a platform on which the universal gospel of spiritual liberty, as he understood it, can be preached, is a good thing; and I feel eager, as he did not, to coöperate with my fellows in making easy the spread of the ideas which were so dear to him, and which he served so long and well.

Still, I do not regret his attitude even on this matter, which is to me and to those who agree with me so vital. During his last years, while we have been dealing with affairs, he has been giving, as he could not have done had he agreed with us, his almost undivided attention to the great and crowning work of his life. He has been furnishing us with the weapons of history with which to fight the spiritual battles of the future. If his own character, dear in memory to all who knew anything of it, if his noble hymns and discourses, were not a sufficient memorial, his volumes upon the Oriental Religions would be. With less of outfit in some respects for his work than some of the foreign writers, he has the great advantage of having approached it from the democratic, the American, the ideal stand-point. Among our own New Englanders, Mr. Clarke's Ten Great Religions takes more popular form, but his Christian bias constantly mars his work; while the various collections of beautiful sentences, like Mrs. Child's Aspirations of the World, are exceedingly important, though of course making no pretension to completeness. It was Mr. Johnson's fortune to start upon a broader basis in a broader work. For Christianity, he substituted universal religion. For detached phrases, he substituted a history. Without prejudice in favor of one form as against another, with a judicial state of mind toward all, he has sought to bring out, as only one more or less tintured with the transcendental philosophy could, the many good things in all religions. He bases his work on the unassailable proposition that those great truths, which are found expressed in differing language in all, must form a portion of one great universal faith, the natural religion of mankind. The corner-stones of worship, as of work, he says, are no longer to be laid in what is special, local, exclusive, or anomalous, but in that which is essentially human and therefore unmistakably divine. Read the introduction to the volume on India, and you will find there an expression of the spirit in which this task was undertaken and in part fulfilled. These books—the religions of India, of China, and of Persia, should the latter be published—will ever remain his fitting monument, reminding us of how much the cause of religious freedom is indebted to him, how much it has lost in his premature death. Col. Higginson, a critical judge surely, says of The Oriental Religions it is a work of which Johnson's friends may well be proud, and on which they may be content to rest his reputation.

As I have recalled in the light of his completed earthly career the fine words and manly deeds of this prophet, one of the most loved of the original leaders of our movement, it has seemed to me that his life was marvellously full of lessons which we who gather here from Sunday to Sunday ought not to overlook. The things for which he stood, they are the very things for which we need to stand. His emphasis of the soul, his love of freedom, his sense of moral order, his instincts toward practical reform, combined in a free, practical, and universal religion,—they should be ours too. Like him, we should aim at wholeness; like him, we should seek the good in everything; above all, like him, we should worship at the shrine of the Ideal. Art thou cast down, dear friend, does life's load seem to thee too heavy to bear, is thy existence one prolonged struggle to make physical, mental, and moral ends meet? Cling then to the Ideal as to the very rock of ages. It alone can save thee from the engulfing flood: it alone can lift thee to the Eternal Calm. Is our collective work disappointing, does it fail at times to reach human minds and touch human hearts, does it appear to pay small dividends? By all that is worthy let us keep it true to the soul, let us make it the means of spiritual salvation. Do not count numbers, do not count receipts only, count ideas. That is what he always did. That is what his example summons us to do. I can seem to hear his words ringing in my ears now: "Up, heart, conscience, will,—up, love of man, believing all things, hoping all things, enduring all things! O happy youth, to whom this morning calls! Into each golden moment may go such reality of living that should you die the next, you would have known Immortal Life."

Samuel Johnson knew such immortal life here: he has shown us how we may know it too. Blessings upon thee for such a legacy, O thou prophet of the soul, so finely poised to the Ideal! No one is left to take up from thy spiritual altitude the task which has fallen from thy nerveless hands. There are brave souls, doing other noble work; but it is theirs, and not thine.

"Thou hast left us, O our brother,
For the spirit-land!
Vainly look we for another
In thy place to stand.

"Oh, thy gentle smile of greeting
Who again shall see?
Who amidst the solemn meeting
Gaze again on thee?

"Who, when peril gathers o'er us,
Wear so calm a brow?
Who, with evil men before us,
So serene as thou?

"Peace be with thee, O our brother,
In the spirit-land!
Vainly look we for another
In thy place to stand.

"Unto Truth and Freedom giving
All thy early powers,
Be thy virtues with the living,
And thy spirit ours."

CORRESPONDENCE.

FREE-THOUGHT CONGRESS AT ROME. 1882.

[Translated for The Index]

The Committee of Arrangements for the Universal Congress of Socialist Free Thinkers for 1882 to all free-thought assemblies, anti-clerical societies, rationalistic or atheistic bodies, masonic lodges, and to free thinkers constituting as yet no part of any body or association:—

Fellow Men and Women.—The Universal Free-thought Congress of 1881, held at Paris in the month of September last, in accordance with the decision of the Congress assembled the preceding year at Brussels, has appointed, in conformity with the by-laws of the International Federation, that the session of the Universal Congress for 1882 be held at Rome.

A committee of arrangements, consisting of fifteen members, was elected by the Congress. This committee is already organized. It enters at once upon its duties by addressing to you the present appeal.

Without going into an analysis of the reasons which decided the Congress to fix upon Rome as the place for its next meeting, we ought nevertheless to mention the determination of free thinkers to protest once more against the malevolent insinuations purposely disseminated by the worst enemies of progress and liberty, and to solemnly affirm the strong and permanent union of republican and anti-clerical France with all Italy, animated by the spirit of liberty, and desiring, like all civilized nations, to free herself from the clerical yoke.

To the valuable and indispensable coöperation of Italy, which is certainly assured us, should be added the support of all free thinkers, organized or not, who are pursuing in their own sphere the common end, the importance and utility of which were demonstrated by the Congress at Brussels and that of Paris.

We consequently urgently appeal to all associations and to free thinkers in all countries, inviting them to unite with Italy and France to make the Congress at Rome still more remarkable and effectual than that of Brussels and of Paris.

At Rome, in the presence of the Vatican, face to face with the papacy, is the very place where free thought should raise her standard decisively, go up to the capitol and render thanks to humanity, which is at last freed from the sacerdotal yoke.

We adjure you then, fellow men and women, to send in to us, with the least possible delay, your adhesion in principle to the Congress at Rome.

A list of the questions to be discussed at the Congress of 1882 will be sent to all associations whose address is known, and to all free thinkers who request it.

A general correspondence has been organized at the session of the committee. We urgently entreat all those who are interested in the progress of free thought, and who have at heart the success of the Congress at Rome, to have the kindness to enter at once into communication with the committee.

Circulars indicating all the practical means to be used will be sent to the adherents.

Besides, a quarterly bulletin containing an account of the labors of the committee and of all international communications concerning the Congress will be addressed to the associations and the free thinkers in affiliation with us, whenever requested.

The funds collected or to be collected by associations or furnished directly by free thinkers may be for the present sent to Théodore Brisson,—former municipal councillor of Paris,—Treasurer, 40 Quai de la Rapée, Paris.

The list of subscribers will be published.

A series of conferences has already been planned with a view to obtain memberships (adhésions) and funds for the Congress. We invite all associations to multiply conferences and meetings to this end.

A large number of deputies, journalists, and men in politics have already promised us their coöperation. The list of adhesions, comprising the names of the most upright and esteemed of the French democracy, will soon be published. The list of adhesions coming from foreign countries will be published later. We ask all associations to send us on this account, as soon as possible, the names of the adherents of every nationality.

Fellow men and women, the Universal Congress of 1882 is neither the work of a few persons nor of any nation whatsoever: it is in an especial sense an international work. That federation of the united states of Europe, which will be the political formula of the future, must have the way prepared for it by a federation of minds. Rome, in ancient times, was the point of convergence of all peoples, as also of all despotisms. In modern times, Rome has been the centre of all military and sacerdotal civilization. Thanks to your efforts, thanks to the coöperation of all the free and generous minds of the world, it shall hereafter become the centre of scientific civilization, the centre of progress and of human knowledge.

In the name of universal free thought, we hope to meet you all at the Congress of 1882 at Rome.

Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.

THE COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS.

For the Committee: Secretaries, Bergerol, Charlier, Sleyden.

The Committee of Arrangements is composed of the following persons: Amoureux, Bergerol, Madame Bonneval, Théodore Brisson, Raoul Canivet, Madame La Cécilia, Charlier, Deluc, E. Digeon, Edmond Lepelletier, Pempel, Perrinelle, Emile Richard, Madame Sleyden, Van Cauberg.

Address, for the present, letters and adhesions to M. Pempel, 153 Quai Lafayette, à Paris, France.

Treasurer, Théodore Brisson,—former municipal councillor of Paris,—40 Quai de la Rapée, Paris.

Form of Adhesion.

I (or we), the undersigned, in the name of the Association of — (or personally), declare my (or our) adhesion to the Universal Congress of Socialist Free Thinkers, to be held at Rome.

A RIDE ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

Editors of The Index :—

A ride across the continent can hardly be called a novelty or an adventure now; yet, to one who experiences it for the first time, it is a wonderful revelation of the life and character of our own times, of the immense resources and possibilities of modern science and mechanism, of the varied wealth of nature, and of the mingling of the most distant and unlike races in our modern civilization. In a week or two, we pass over three thousand miles of land, from one ocean to another, from the snow-storms of New England to the palm-trees and orange-groves of an almost tropical climate, from the elegant Back-Bay residence to the adobe hut of the Mexican, the Indian's tent, and the Chinaman's lodge. You hear the German, French, and Spanish language familiarly spoken, with the Mexican patois and the Chinaman's unknown tongue; and yet everywhere in the Pullman you carry with you the best results of ingenuity in the production of comfort, everywhere you feel that you are in your own native land, and the familiar evidences of American government and civilization, the flag, the post-office, the railroad station, and, alas! the drinking saloon and the hateful cigar, prevent the illusion constantly trying to creep over you that you are out of bounds in a foreign land. The sharp, nasal twang of the Yankee overpowers the soft Spanish gutturals.

And what a medley of people filling these cars, and all so intent upon schemes of work and profit! A journey for pleasure or sight-seeing only seems an anomaly one is half-ashamed of, where all others are going to the engineer's camp or the mines, or to establish a new home in these distant lands.

The journey to St. Louis over the Pennsylvania and Ohio roads offers little of interest except the passage of the Alleghenies, which, owing to the impossibility of getting our tickets in New York on Washington's birthday, we unfortunately made in the night. Pittsburgh with its huge furnaces and deep ravines looked wilder than usual in contrast to the white crown of snow upon the hills. We were detained a few hours at Greenville, Ill., by the floods which had washed the roads, and took advantage of it to walk up to the village and buy milk. We then lighted up our Ætna, and made a delicious cup of breakfast cocoa, whose flavor was a little enhanced by the accounts of the scrabbled and unsatisfactory breakfast obtained by those who went to the hotel. In our car was a Swiss woman who spoke no English, who was going all the way to Leadville. The passengers were very kind in trying to talk French and German to her, and it was touching to see the patience with which she sat day after day looking out of the window at the strange, flat country, which must have seemed so dreary in contrast with her home. Owing to the delay, she had to wait six weary hours in the station at St. Louis; and she was glad indeed to see us when we came back from a visit to a friend in the city. But she had found a German-speaking policeman, who had made arrangements for her going on; and our last glimpse of her was at Kansas City, established in a sleeper for Leadville.

Kansas City, built up in the most rapid manner on high bluffs, surpasses all places that I have ever seen,—in mud. Only on the plank sidewalks could one walk without danger of leaving boots sticking in the tenacious clay. The State line runs through the city; and, as our hotel is on the Missouri side, the bar was constantly full of visitors whom the strict liquor laws of Kansas debarred of their Sunday drink. Here, we took the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad. The day's ride across the Kansas plains, at least at this season of the year, is almost wholly devoid of interest, flat, and monotonous; and we were forced to beguile the time with cards or books. Still, it passes away rapidly. The motion of the cars produces a certain inertia of mind and body similar to that felt on shipboard; and one has to rouse up the will to take the walk at every stopping-place which does so much to preserve one's digestion in good order and promote sleep. But, on entering New Mexico, the scene changes, and at Trinidad begins a glorious ride of two hundred miles through mountain scenery which for extent, variety, and grandeur surpasses everything I had ever seen before.

It was hardly daylight at Trinidad, and we could only see the shapes of the mountains as they loomed up through the twilight; but, all through the morning, the mountains were becoming more and more grand, until at last we had to sit out on the platform to enjoy to the utmost the glorious panorama.

The mountains are generally either of red sandstone or of limestone, and the wear of these comparatively soft rocks gives very great variety and picturesqueness to the forms of the peaks. One realizes that this is a far newer formation than New England; and indeed nature seems to have prepared a geologic demonstration before your eyes; for in the mud hills and clay banks on the sides of the roads washed by the rains you see, in miniature, the same processes going on and the same shapes produced as in the grand mountains which shut out the horizon from view. The most striking peak which remains in view for many miles is called Starvation Mount, from a tradition that the Spaniards drove a party of Indians to seek refuge among its rocks and caves, where they starved to death. The summit is an immense parallelogram of limestone rock, which looks like a grand mausoleum for a giant monarch. Below the sides slope down in symmetrical lines, and a long grand sweep connects it with the succeeding peaks of similar but less striking formation.

The color is extremely rich; for the rock, varying from the red sandstone to the almost pure limestone, takes on almost every shade of yellow and red, which is splendidly contrasted with the dark rich green of the pines and the brilliant glancing of the dry stubble, which looks like white sand in the distance. The snow mountains rise in the distance, giving the appearance of immense height.

For over two hundred miles, we passed over scenery of this character; and the foreground was constantly enlivened by the most novel forms of human life. Here, we first saw the adobe, or sun-baked brick house, which is the general habitation of the whole territory. The poorer ones are dreary enough, sometimes built into the bank, so that you only know by the protruding funnel that it is not the cave of some animal. At other times, you see the Indian huts, with the shy, wild-looking papposes around, or a group of Irish laborers working on the road, and once in a while a gayly dressed Mexican dashes by on horseback. We begin to see the agaves, which first give a hint of the new vegetation of the South. The pines are unlike ours, being less fine and graceful than the white pine, but very full and rich in form and deep in color. The cedars, too, are less pointed, but very full and rich.

It is curious to see how the railroad is settling the country. At every stopping-place, the same features recur. The station agent has a good wooden house, neat and orderly, often with a little garden around it. A saloon and an eating-house, showy and shabby, next appear, while around them are grouped the poor huts of the people who work upon the road. The Atchison and Topeka is a very interesting road, and we felt perfectly satisfied both with its construction and management. They are busily engaged now in protecting it from the wash-outs, which have been so troublesome this summer, by building up high board-fences by the side, which are filled in with stones. The familiar pile-driver was at work, inserting the posts.

It was pleasant to see the little donkeys—which we generally see starved, overworked, and beaten—grazing at freedom in the pleasant valleys. Perhaps this is the paradise to which worn-out donkeys go, when, as Sam Weller says, a post-boy and a donkey ride off together.

Occasionally, between the mountains, the plain opens in the distance, and it is hard to believe that the sea is not breaking in beyond. Often, indeed, in crossing the plain, the illusion was almost perfect. One seemed to see the sand-dunes with their covering of dry grasses, and needed to go only a few steps to find the sea, which is two thousand miles away. Occasional heaps of bones of buffaloes or other animals add to the wildness of the scene; and flocks of crows, seeking their prey, look like flitting sunbeams, as the sunlight is reflected from their glossy wings.

The Apache Cañon is wildly beautiful. The railroad crosses the little stream which has worn out the gorge, and you almost try to touch the rocks and shrubs on either side.

While the general character of these mountains is unlike any others I have ever seen, there is very great variety in them, and occasionally one is reminded of Switzerland by a rounded dome covered with snow or, very rarely, by sharp pointed rocks almost like the Aiguilles; and, as we left Lamy to go up to Santa Fé, a distant range of mountains rose in the south, which at once called out our exclamations of "These are like the White Hills!" It was indeed strikingly like the view of the Pemigewasset Valley from the Flume House. Indeed, two hundred miles of mountain scenery, rising from a perfect plain to heights of thirteen thousand feet, can hardly fail to give immense range and variety of form. ENNAH D. CHENEY.

WHAT CAUSES IMMIGRATION?

Editors of The Index:—

Speaking of the emigration from Germany, The Index of February 9 says: "One of the causes of this departure [emigration] is clear. Prussia is a military power, and extracts from its male subjects in army service the best years of their lives."

Allow me to say in reference to this: first, that France is even more of a military power than Prussia (by some twenty per centum), and yet emigration from France is slight; second, that emigration from Great Britain is far more considerable than emigration from Germany, and yet Great Britain exacts no military service from her citizens.

Hence must we infer that the emigration from Germany is greater than that from France, because France is more of a military power than Germany? Or (2) emigration from Germany is smaller than emigration from Great Britain, because Great Britain is less of a military power than Germany?

Is not the simple explanation of the increased immigration from both Great Britain and Germany to be found in the excess of population in those countries and in the flourishing condition of business in the countries to which emigration is chiefly directed? It is a fact that immigration decreases when business is bad in this country, and increases when business improves. Immigration is therefore a very accurate barometer of our business prosperity.

Very truly,

C. A. EGGER.

IOWA CITY.

REV. ORVILLE DEWEY, D.D., died at Sheffield, Mass., on the 21st inst., being within one week of eighty-eight years old. For a number of years, Dr. Dewey has lived in comparative retirement on the ancestral farm where he was born and where he has now died. But, when he was in active service, he stood in the very front ranks of Unitarian clergymen. Nor, after old age gradually threw its mantle about him in his quiet Sheffield home, did he lose his interest in the questions that had absorbed his manhood. He was fond of reading the new books and of hearing of the new thought. The theological changes did not disturb him. His own thought changed and grew with his years. Ten years ago, he preached in several places what he called "an old man's sermon." Yet he delivered it with a young man's fervor, and it had all the characteristics of a young man's hospitality to the fresh views of the time. One sentence from it still rings in the present writer's ears in the tones as it came from his lips,—"All the religions may go, yet religion remain." Dr. Dewey was educated at the Andover Theological Seminary for the orthodox ministry. The controversy between Orthodoxy and Unitarianism was then at its height, and soon after his graduation he sided with the Unitarians. For a short time, he was an assistant to Dr. Channing in Boston. In 1823, he was settled as pastor over the Unitarian society in New Bedford. His able and liberal ministry there, of ten years, drew into the society a large number of Hicksite or Unitarian Quakers, and built it up into a strength and an independence it has never lost. Afterward, he was settled in New York over the society of which Robert Collyer is now minister. A special characteristic of his preaching was always a marked emphasis on the moral element of religion over the doctrinal, and his topics were most habitually such as concerned the common interests of daily life.

BOOK NOTICES.

COFFEE-HOUSES AND COFFEE-PALACES IN ENGLAND. By James Freeman Clarke. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. Price 20 cents.

This pamphlet is a condensation of two English works descriptive of the temperance work done in England by means of coffee-houses, as an encouragement and inducement toward their more general establishment for the same end in this country, and will be found interesting and useful reading for all.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE BIBLE. Being a popular account of the formation of the Canon. By Branson C. Keeler. Chicago: The Century Publishing Co. 1881. 75 cts.

The author of this work aims to show that the most important books of the Bible, those most relied on for doctrinal support, are compilations from preëxisting records, and that who wrote the books or made the records is wholly unknown, that the books of the Old Testament were not considered inspired when they came into use, and that the same is true of the books of the New Testament. At the close of the second or the beginning of the third century, the necessity for some source of authority to settle doctrinal disputes led the Fathers to institute the theory that certain books were inspired and divine; but the books thus stamped were not always the same books we now have. Books were declared inspired that are not so regarded now by anybody, and books were refuted that now form a part of the New Testament. The contending sects could not agree on the Gospels first in use, and they were discarded, and the present Four Gospels accepted in their place. To invest them with authority, they were ascribed to the persons whose names they bear. The Fathers were destitute of critical ability, and were credulous and superstitious. After much controversy, councils took the Canon in hand and discussed it for nearly twelve centuries, when the Roman Catholic Church in the Council of Trent and the Greek Church in the Council of Constantinople decided once for all what books should be regarded by their adherents as canonical. The Westminster Assembly gave the English-speaking Protestants their catalogue. Such are the author's claims. The book is well written, authorities carefully cited, and a large amount of information in regard to the Bible is brought together in a form adapted to common readers.

HOW WE MADE A NINE CENT DINNER. With some other Economies. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

For ten cents, the careful housekeeper will find in this little pamphlet much more than her money's worth of valuable suggestion and information as to economic cookery; while the story of the nine-cent dinner is told in a bright, attractive style that will insure the interest of all readers.

THE April Wide-Awake is full of good reading as usual. There is an excellent instalment of the serial story written by a boy, "Their Club and Ours." Edward Everett Hale discourses in sensible fashion on "The Aesthetic Movement." "Little Peachling, a Japanese Folk-Lore Story," is rehearsed in delightful verse by Mary E. Wilkins. Another charming poem is "A Deep Sea Dream," by Mary A. Lathbury. Ernest Ingersoll, in a paper on "Old Ocean," gives some useful information regarding ships and ship-building. There are also timely articles on Fast-day and the First of April. The illustrations are as numerous and fine as usual. Among the best in the present number are those illustrating the first of a series of "Wild Flower Papers," drawn by Miss L. B. Humphreys, who won so many of the prizes in Prang's last Christmas Card Competition. D. Lothrop & Co.

The articles in the North American Review for April are all of timely interest, treating of the current questions of the day. Gov. Eli H. Murray, in "The Crisis in Utah," gives his view, as a practical observer of the Utah problem. "Why They Come," by Edward Self, considers many important questions connected with European immigration to this country. Dr. Henry A. Martin replies to Henry Bergh's recent anti-vaccination article. E. L. Godkin writes on "The Civil Service Reform Controversy," Gen. A. Ordway on "A National Militia." Senator Riddleberger, in "Bourbonism in Virginia," replies to a previous article from Senator Johnson, of that State, on "Repudiation in Virginia." The remaining paper is one of a series by Désiré Charnay, descriptive of his latest explorations in Central America.

The Popular Science Monthly for April is a little more fragmentary than usual in its scientific articles, but not much less interesting therefor. Among the longest of its papers is one from Goldwin Smith, "Has Science yet found a New Basis for Morality?" to which the editor gives a page or two of reply. Gerritt L. Lansing, of San Francisco, scientifically considers the Chinese problem under the title, "Chinese Immigration, a Sociological Study," in which he seems to come to the conclusion that "the Chinese must go." H. D. Macleod gives a graphic sketch of the condition of thought in the Middle Ages, which he calls "The Scholastic Prelude to Modern Science." The other articles are all of interest to the general reader, if not to the student.

BABY-LAND for April, from the above publishers, is also received, full of pleasant pictures, stories, and verses for the babies.

JESTINGS.

The Popular Science Monthly has an elaborate discussion on the question "Are Cemeteries Unhealthy?" We should imagine they were not, from the fact that doctors are constantly sending their patients there.

A MISERABLE shoemaker was brought up before a Western court, the other day, charged with bigamy. It transpired in the evidence that the knight of the last had married eight wives, all of whom are living. The judge, who is an aesthete, besides sending the man up for trial, commented severely upon the case, declaring the conduct of the offender to be "too utterly Utah."

A BOSTON man took occasion to remark to his wife: "My dear, the infinite is always silent. 'Tis the finite only that speaks." She was a dull woman, who didn't take hints; but she never forgot the remark, and long afterward, when some friends expressed a wish to visit the deaf and dumb asylum, she turned to her husband and asked, "What days, my love, is the asylum of the infinite open for the reception of finite visitors?"

PERSONAL ITEMS.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE writes us that he intends to visit this country again the present year.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will lecture at Haverhill, Mass., Sunday evening, April 2, on "What Liberalism offers in the place of Theology."

REV. A. N. ALCOTT, until recently a Presbyterian minister at Fredericksburg, Ohio, is now speaking for the Unitarian church at Kalamazoo, Mich.

THERE will be a memorial service at Parker Memorial Hall on Sunday, April 2, in honor of the dead poet Longfellow, conducted by James Kay Applebee.

A DOZEN essays compose Mr. Huxley's new volume, Science and Culture. The key-note of all may be said to be the question, What is the position of science in modern culture?

THE Free-thinkers' League has invited Mr. Bradlaugh of the British House of Commons to accept the presidency of the International Congress which is to be held at Rome next autumn.

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE proposes to spend a longer time abroad than first contemplated. He sails in season to be in London at the May anniversaries, called there the Exeter Hall meetings.

ALFRED TENNYSON publishes a song of thanksgiving for the Queen's escape at the hands of MacLean, which will be sung throughout the colonies on the anniversary of her Majesty's birthday.

WE received a pleasant call last week from Col. John C. Bundy, editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, and his wife, who passed several days in this city and vicinity, where they have many friends.

MISS ALICE FLETCHER of this city, well known as a public speaker and writer on progressive topics, is studying practical ethnology among the tribes of American Indians in the great West. She lives with them, enduring the hardships of their daily life and fare in the interests of science.

PRESIDENT WHITE of Cornell University condemns the efforts making to secure a remission of Sergeant Mason's sentence. He speaks of the crime as "one of the most dangerous known, either from a civil or a military point of view; and it is rendered infinitely more dangerous by the proposed glorification of it."

"JOSH BILLINGS" (Henry W. Shaw) is sixty years old, has longish iron-gray hair and a stiff, drooping moustache of the same color. He is said to be rather unsocial and eccentric in his private manners. From the proceeds of his comic writings and lectures, he has amassed, according to rumor, a fortune of over $50,000.

THE German Emperor William celebrated, on Wednesday last, the eighty-fifth anniversary of his birth. Among the many congratulations received by him on that day was a very enthusiastic one from the Czar and Empress of Russia, assuring him of their warm friendship and wishing him many years more of health and prosperity.

MRS. CLARA NEYMANN, 343 West 58th Street, New York city, has ready two interesting and timely lectures, one on "Woman's Mission in the Service of Humanity," and another on "The Spirit of Republicanism," which she will deliver before any society desirous of her services. Those who have once heard Mrs. Neyman will be glad to hear these new lectures from her, given with her accustomed fervor, earnestness, and devotion to truth.

REV. O. A. BURGESS, a popular pulpit orator and debater of the denomination known as Campbellites, and for several years President of Butler University at Indianapolis, died in Chicago on the 14th, of heart disease. He was fifty-two years old. He was rather conservative in his theology, and omitted no opportunity to oppose modern liberal thought. Mr. Burgess and the junior editor of The Index were in public discussions at four different times.

THE London Daily Telegraph says: "The place Longfellow occupies in English literature is decidedly bright. He is almost as well known and widely read in England as in America. His influence has been wholly good. As long as the English language lasts, his works will be quoted as models of simplicity of style and purity of thought. Death has taken America's greatest literary son." The London Times says: "The news of Longfellow's death will be read with deep regret wherever the English language is spoken. The death of no literary Englishman could excite more genuine sorrow than that of the much-loved author of Evangeline. He will be no more sincerely lamented in America than in this country."

EDITORS,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

CURRENT TOPICS.

RECENTLY, a quarrel between the Armenian and Syrian Christians who worship in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, originating in some question as to the ownership of the chapel, resulted in a Sunday fight, in which several persons, including the Syrian bishop, were seriously wounded.

THE Catholic Review says that, "in Catholic lands like France and Italy, the secular press is distinctively and aggressively anti-Catholic," that "the number of sincere Catholics is far larger than that of all non-Catholics put together, and yet they have no press that begins to compare with the anti-Catholic press."

IN regard to the exclusion of Bradlaugh, Cardinal Manning says: "When we are told that this is a violation of constitutional and religious liberty, we answer that constitutional liberty is not legislation without morals, and religious liberty is not the equalization of theism and atheism." Although Bradlaugh is in accord substantially with the Irish members of Parliament, they are a unit in opposition to his taking his seat, because he does not, and says he does not, believe in a God.

THE superintendent of the Presbyterian Mission in Utah writes to Representative Willets that, though the school laws of that Territory expressly forbid the use of public school funds for the support of sectarian schools, yet the Book of Mormon and the Mormon catechism are used as text-books, and children have been expelled for refusal to study and recite from those books. He says further that throughout Utah none but Mormons can obtain a situation in the schools as teachers. Here, we have an illustration of the injustice of introducing religion into public schools which even the Christian clergy can understand.

THE Congregationalist says, "We hear a painful rumor that one at least of the Professors of the Johns Hopkins University is a pronounced infidel, and has used his influence over the students in the direction of his scepticism to a degree which has caused some Baltimore parents to decline to have their sons educated there." A "pronounced infidel" should not take advantage of his position as a university professor to inculcate his views on disputed religious questions; and, judging from the indefiniteness of the Congregationalist statement, we doubt whether this has been done in the case referred to; but it is quite as fair and just that a "pronounced infidel" should do this as that a pronounced Christian, under the same circumstances, should teach his theological notions.

THERE appears to be good missionary ground in Kentucky, whose convict camps have lately been undergoing an investigation which revealed horrible cruelty on the part of those employed to guard and care for the unhappy convicts. "In one camp, only thirteen out of fifty convicts survived a year of excessive labor at lumbering, insufficient food, scant clothing, and entire absence of medical attention. Suicides have been common among the prisoners; and deliberate murders by the keepers, under the plea of enforcing discipline, have come to light. In a coal-mining camp, when the men protested against going into a dangerous tunnel, the keeper drove them in at the mouth of a cocked revolver. Three hours afterward, a fall of earth killed eleven of them. The lash and the thumb-screw have been in use." Public indignation over these revelations is causing the State government to make some efforts to correct the existing abuses. It would have been better if the right sort of men had been put in such responsible positions in the first place.

THE Mormons have been quite successful of late in making converts in England, chiefly among the poor and ignorant population. The Pall Mall Gazette, describing one of their meetings in London, says: "The congregation numbered about one hundred, one-third being girls whose ages ranged from ten years to about eighteen. There were, perhaps, two dozen men present. Six of these, elders or office-bearers, were seated around a table, which does duty for a pulpit, at the head of the room. The 'saints,' both male and female, seemed to belong to the lower working class, and to be such persons as would be likely to find a strong argument for the Mormon religion in the fact that it has an earthly Zion. . . . On Sunday night, the proceedings began by singing a hymn to a galloping tune, from a book which has a short preface signed by Brigham Young, Elder Pratt, and John Taylor. After the hymn there was a minute's pause, and then a stalwart young 'elder' from Utah, in a voice which comes through his nose and his mouth, rose to preach what he spoke of as 'the gospel.' He preached a rambling sermon, in which he said that all sects but his own were wrong, and then, producing a bottle of oil, anointed the sick, who, he said, would be healed, if they had sufficient faith."

THE event of the past week in this city has been the visit of the chiefs of the Zuñis of New Mexico, with their white guide and "brother," Mr. Frank Cushing, who, if the reporters of the daily papers are to be believed, has been exceedingly "Frank" and even garrulous in his revelations as to this mysterious people during his short stay here. The inborn and unconquered love of the marvellous in the average civilized man has been catered to in no small degree among our citizens during the visit of these semi-savages, and those who were unable to accompany them to Deer Island, and witness their strange incantations and worship in presence of the sea, have read with a sense of romantic satisfaction of the strange rites and ceremonies performed in the initiation of Mr. Cushing at that time into one of the higher orders of their system of faith. Some of the romance so extensively fostered by the daily press during the past week in regard to the Zuñis will be rather dampened in some of our readers by the interesting letter of Mrs. Dall in this number of The Index, concerning this people. But Boston vindicated itself as a centre of "culture," and showed its intense interest in the study of ethnology by the attentions it showered on these strange guests. Every sight likely to impress the uncivilized mind of these Zuñis was shown freely and at its best. If civilization can impress such minds, these visitors will certainly return to their people, in a sense, missionaries of our civilization. Within a few weeks, Boston has feted and petted two extremes,—Oscar Wilde, the apostle of "tootoo" culture, and these uncivilized, isolated remnants of the earliest culture. What next?

EX-CHIEF JUSTICE AGNEW, of Pennsylvania, recently gave a lecture at Pittsburg on "Christianity the Religion and True Life of the American People," in which, after a labored argument to prove that ours is a Christian government and we are a Christian nation, he said: "Already, we have a great problem in the negro race. But add to this the Mongolian races, and the Christianity of America must fade in the face of a foe to be encountered in our very midst. . . . Unless we are willing to give up our Bible, our Christianity, our high standing as a civilized people, our free institutions, and suffer our people to become a mongrel nation, we must oppose the assimilation of the pagan Mongolian races." The Pittsburg Leader, commenting on this lecture, remarks: "When we read in our morning paper to-day that ex-Chief Justice Agnew had delivered 'an able argument at the First Church last night to prove that we are not a heathen nation,' it occurred to us as consummately funny that at this late day 'an able argument' should be thought necessary to prove such a thing as that. . . . And when we next saw the ex-Chief Justice suddenly and unexpectedly come out in favor of putting up a prohibitory barrier against the coming of the Mongolian heathen into this country, lest, in the contest between the faith of Confucius and the faith of Christ, the former should prove the stronger, and overwhelm and extinguish the latter, we began to realize that there wasn't anything funny at all in the case. When the very champions of the cross themselves confess to having lost faith in the power of the gospel, and beg the heathen and infidel to spare it, things have indeed come to a very serious pass in this alleged Christian America of ours."

THE PROBLEMS OF RUSSIA.

There is a prevalent conviction that the great part which Russia is to play in the European drama must be a political one. Her tremendous numerical strength, vast territory, and restless energy are the external marks of power; and it is not strange that the nations of Western Europe watch her apprehensively, and chronicle every new movement as food for suspicion. International politics still consist largely in theoretical estimates of the military resources of one's neighbors. Hence, it behooves each nation to see to it that no other makes dangerous additions to its population or territory.

Eighty millions of people in ownership of one-seventh of the land surface of the planet is a phenomenon that might make even cisatlantic statesmen thankful that they have seldom to reckon with such a gigantic power. But a close look at Russian character and history proves that the half-expressed fear with which the other nations regard Russia is a hasty half-interpretation of her spirit. This giant of the North has thrown itself against the civilization of the West, in obedience to the ambition of its warlike czars. Religious fanaticism has inspired it to repeated quarrels with Mohammedan Turkey. But the military spirit is, after all, rather a matter of example and discipline than of innate tendency in the Russians. The spirit of aggression, of plunder, and of military conquest has been tenfold stronger in France, in Austria, and even in England, than in this half-barbarous offspring of Asia. It seems, indeed, as if Russia had imbibed the petty spirit of conquest along with other lessons from civilized Europe.

But this statement, which seems at variance with surface facts, needs elaboration. The present Russian people have had a double historic origin. The imperial family and a part of the nobility are the undoubted descendants of the roving and plundering Normans. The lesser noblesse and the great mass of the people are of the more passive Slavonic type. Their blood flows sluggishly, they love peace, and are not disturbed by aspirations. The average Russian of the industrial classes is silent and phlegmatic; but he is well disposed, he does not seek a quarrel, and is not revengeful. He lives in unexpressed but substantial good-will toward his neighbor. Hatred of the foreigner, or at least distrust of him, is something which he imbibes with his mother's milk. The genuine Slav asks only to be let alone. He would never of his own accord take up arms for the conquest of foreign territory. Holy Russia, with all its barbarisms, is dearer to him than the wealth of other lands; and he nurses no visions of military glory. The common peasant and the emancipated serf are often gloomy, obstinate, and dull in character; but they, too, are lovers of peace. They till their fields and gather their crops by the slow application of brute strength. Their ideal of success is the timely payment of the annual rent. Their recreation is the pipe and, too often, the brandy bottle. These rural proprietors, agricultural laborers, and freedmen make about sixty-four millions of the present population of Russia, over three-fourths of the whole. To these, we may add nearly seven hundred thousand of the clergy, who in Russia as elsewhere must be classed as non-belligerents.

Looking at further statistics, we find that the Russian nobility numbers a little more than a million souls. In this petty fraction of a great people dwells the military spirit which makes Russia dreaded by Western diplomats. The commercial classes do not desire war. The army itself, two millions strong, does not desire it; but this same army will fight valiantly, and would blush to disgrace itself in the eyes of Europe. But the aristocracy, the educated and privileged minority, who crowd the civil service and the universities, are the very ones whose opinions get expression and dissemination. Still, the great burden of responsibility has always been with the autocratic rulers of the nation. The personal will of the czar has caused the repeated formation and destruction of great armies. Just here, one realizes the immense restraint which constitutionalism puts upon absolutism. Neither the King of Prussia nor the Emperor of Austria can declare war without parliamentary sanction. In the last war with Austria, Bismarck's impatient blood seethed in his veins at the parliamentary delay in granting supplies. But the task of Russia has always been simple obedience. Not until the reign of the lately murdered Czar Alexander II. did Russians feel something of that self-respectful ease which comes from a sense of personal freedom; and, although this added freedom came as the arbitrary gift of one man, the nation bloomed beneath it as beneath a warm spring sunshine. The experiment which has been tried in Russia for the last quarter of a century proves that many of the advantages of democracy may be gained without democratic machinery. Still, not only the fiery Nihilists, but the large-minded and educated "liberals" among the imperialists, prefer free institutions of their own making to those granted by the generosity of a czar. Trial by jury was one of Alexander's free gifts. But no ardent lover of constitutionalism but would rather have waited ten years longer for the sake of doing this work himself.

Religious veneration for the czar is still very powerful among the ignorant and affectionate Russians. The revolutionary spirit is still faint among the cultivated classes. They hope for governmental reforms, but are inclined to wait the voluntary action of the czar. These moderates expect the pressure of public opinion and the example of other European States to act as a moral coercion upon the mind of Alexander III. This one short year, however, gives little promise of any initiative from him. All the signs show that he expects to compromise with the nineteenth century, cling to his absolutism, and put off the evil day. Nihilism, the revolutionary movement which has drawn the eyes of all the world toward Russia, has undoubtedly been immensely magnified. Nihilists are so bitter, so intense, and so active, that their deeds have led to an exaggeration of their numbers. Moreover, the trials and executions of the past ten years have roused such pain and pity throughout all civilized countries that the proportions of this revolution have gained false dimensions. Nihilism is chiefly confined to the cities. Traced far enough, it turns out to be some fifty years old. But the name belongs to the past fifteen years, and was invented by the novelist Turgenev. Robbed of its political quality, Nihilism is just as abundant in Germany, England, and America as in autocratic Russia. As held in Russia, it is a perverted and ignorant application of Darwinism, Comteism, and of the whole materialistic philosophy. Even Herbert Spencer and George Eliot are tortured into support of Nihilism by the hot-headed students of St. Petersburg. This modern capital is the chosen home of Nihilism, as ancient Moscow is the head-quarters of political conservatism.

It seems impossible to write of Russia without making politics of prime importance, yet politics make but the superficial life of any country. The form of government is but a vessel to hold the social, educational, and industrial activity of the people. In judging the national traits of the Russians, we must not forget how late civilization came to them and how greedily they have absorbed it. But here again we must make a distinction. It is the aristocracy who appropriated European customs, dress, manners, and language, even to a ridiculous apishness. But the peasantry can hardly be induced to use an imported plough or rake, and still wear the primitive sheepskin for an invariable costume. The imperative need of Russia is more intelligence, more activity, more education and enterprise among the millions who make the body of the people. Only one million of her children are in the public schools. Only one soldier in five of her great army can read. Her mines are lying idle, her fields are wretchedly cultivated. Her highways are impassable from mud. The machinery (almost all imported) rusts in her manufactories because they have no intelligent supervision. Forty millions of her peasantry live but from hand to mouth, and have no dream of better things. Many of her tradesmen are Jews. Many of her teachers in the universities, in schools, and in families, are Germans. Private tutors and governesses, French, German, and English, are in all the wealthy families. City life is deeply colored by foreign influences. Newspapers and periodicals, in French, German, and Russian, abound at St. Petersburg. Russian classical literature is by no means imitative. Art and music are imported into Russia, but her literature is her own. It is vigorous, natural, sweet, and strong. Englishmen and Americans should love Russia and have hope of her, if only for these beginnings of a splendid literature. Her greatest misfortunes are such as cannot be cured by any legislative reforms. Were Nihilism to explode the Winter Palace, destroy the last vestige of the House of Romanof, and end imperialism, not all these and more revolutionary measures would stir the mass of the people from their contented apathy. The best things and the worst things grow and thrive the world over independently of any system of government.

M. A. HARDAKER.

DEBATES AND DEBATERS.

People generally enjoy a debate, especially if the subject is one of interest, and the disputants possess ability. The prospect of a lively debate in Congress is sure to fill the halls and galleries with eager listeners. The famous debates between Lincoln and Douglass brought together immense crowds, and the published reports of the speeches were read throughout the country with avidity. In the West, during every political campaign, public oral debates constitute no unimportant feature of the contests. The discussions at the meetings of the Anti-Slavery Society not only gave to them a sort of democratic character, but infused into them an earnestness and invested them with an interest for the public, which greatly added to the influence of that organization. Religious debates, from the days of Luther to the present time, have awakened great, often general, interest, and contributed to modify public sentiment. The best meetings of the Free Religious Association, those the proceedings of which are the most entertaining and instructive, are the meetings which are open to discussion and in which variety of thought is elicited.

Yet many have an aversion to debates. They regard them as undignified and unwise, and to be discountenanced rather than encouraged. The written essay and the published discourse they think better than oral debate. Perhaps one reason for this view is that much which is uttered in debate is superficial and commonplace, being often mere declamation or special pleading, in which the suppression of facts, the distortion of truth, exhibitions of ill-temper, offensive personalities, a deficiency of knowledge, and an exuberance of zeal are the most prominent characteristics. But this is hardly less true of very much that is given to the public in lectures, and it is really no valid objection to debate as a means of bringing out the truth and exposing fallacies on both sides of questions.

The art of debating has been but little cultivated, especially in New England, of late years. We have no such debates in Congress now as represented the people and the States a half or even a quarter of a century ago. Lawyers depend for success in practice now less than formerly upon ability for effective extemporaneous speaking. And it is safe to say that not one clergyman in fifty is able to state and defend his views in debate with precision, clearness, coolness, and force. Unaccustomed to adduce evidence and meet objections in the presence of opponents, they are, as a class, quite unfit to meet a trained debater even in the discussion of subjects to which they give their time and study. This may be one reason why they think, as they often remark, that "no good can come from debates." A few years ago, an educated speaker hardly dared appear before an audience in New England without a manuscript before him. But a change has been taking place in this respect the past dozen years, and now lecturers who can speak well without the aid of manuscript do not feel it necessary to hamper themselves with it. With the cultivation of extemporaneous speaking in New England, the practice of presenting both sides of important subjects in joint discussion before the people may grow in favor.

A good debater must possess ability to express his thought with conciseness, clearness, and vigor; his mind must be well stored with facts, and he must know how and when to use them; he must understand human nature and have the tact to use arguments and illustrations adapted to the condition of his hearers; he must be earnest yet imperturbable, courteous yet direct and forcible in speech, discreet and magnanimous to his opponent, yet alert, critical, and aggressive; and, to retain the confidence and respect of intelligent people,—without which he loses his influence even among the adherents of the movement he defends,—he must be above the tricks of the demagogue, must state facts correctly, must cite authorities honestly, and state his opponent's position with fairness.

Debates are of the greatest advantage to a theory or reform, if it has truth or justice as a basis, when it is in its infancy, when it is unpopular and is struggling to gain the attention of the public; but they are always helpful to any cause in proportion to the amount of truth it has to contribute to popular knowledge, or the importance of the work it aims to advance. Debates between advocates of liberal thought and the clergy have been of great advantage in bringing large numbers to listen to arguments they could not be induced to hear under other circumstances. A joint discussion between Rev. O. A. Burgess and the writer, which was held about twelve years ago in Illinois, lasting five days, was attended daily by fully two thousand people, including one hundred and fifty ministers. In no other way, at that time especially, could so many people, a large proportion of them believers in the orthodox theology, have been reached by the views and reasonings of an advocate of free thought. More than a third of a century ago, George Jacob Holyoake was debating with clergymen in England; and no one acquainted with the history and progress of liberal thought in that country can doubt the good effects of his criticism of theology, and his able advocacy of secularism in the many debates he held with the clergy. Others were engaged in the same heroic work at the same time, and contributed to the liberal sentiment that now prevails in that country.

In this country, the sect known as the Campbellites have been the most ready of any of the denominations to encourage debate on the origin and authority of the Bible. Some fifty years ago, a debate was held in Cincinnati between Alexander Campbell and Robert Owen, the former a scholar and an accomplished debater, the latter an intelligent and kind-hearted man, but poorly qualified to meet in debate a disputant like Campbell, especially before an audience made up almost wholly of Christians. The Campbellites claimed a great victory, and since that time they have referred to and quoted from that debate with pride. Nearly all Campbell's arguments are now obsolete among the more advanced theologians; but the impression that Campbell's reasonings produced on the minds of his adherents accounts in part, perhaps, for the confidence they evinced years afterward in the unanswerableness of his positions. The past eight or ten years, since Campbell's arguments are seen to be weak if not worthless, the preachers of that denomination have been less inclined than formerly to engage in such discussions; for not many of them have kept up with modern discoveries and researches, without acquaintance with which the theologian to-day appears to poor advantage in public debate with the free thinker. Cradled however in controversy, the sect retains its fondness for discussion, but shows a marked preference for discussion with other Christian denominations, on doctrinal points.

Of the nearly one hundred Christian ministers we have met in debate the past fifteen years, perhaps a dozen may fairly be considered good debaters. Prof. T. F. Campbell of Monmouth College, Oregon, Prof. J. B. Walker, author of the Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation, Rev. W. I. Gill, author of Evolution and Progress, Rev. Frank Evans of Iowa, are among those with whom we have debated who have evinced ability to take comprehensive views and to make an ingenious defence of supernaturalism.

Our latest opponent, Rev. A. R. Horne, D.D., with whom we debated at Doylestown, Pa., last month, deserves brief mention. This gentleman is "President of Muhlenberg College." Of this, we were repeatedly informed before we met him. He did not wish to discuss successive evenings, "because," he wrote, "time is needed between every debate to hunt up authorities, make tests and experiments in science and philosophy; hence, may necessitate visits to Philadelphia, New York," etc. "I have," he continued, "devoted the greater part of twenty years to the study of the harmony of science with the Bible as well as historic corroboration, and I am desirous to discuss the topics with a fair, scholarly, and truth-dealing opponent. The man with whom I am willing to debate must be able to translate Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac. We want no second-hand translations or guessing at renderings." Evidently, this was a "bluff game." We were three evenings in debate with Mr. Horne; and if he has any knowledge of any of the languages he mentions, or any acquaintance with even the rudiments of science, there was at least nothing in his speeches to indicate it. It was indeed apparent to those of his own denomination (Lutheran), the first evening, that he was utterly unqualified to discuss the issues between orthodox Christianity and modern science. We went to Doylestown expecting to meet a man of unusual ability and erudition. But we found Mr. Horne, although a "D.D.," and "President of Muhlenberg College," a mere exhorter, with very meagre attainments, and with no argumentative ability whatever. Yet the debate in Doylestown gave us an opportunity to present our views in an extremely orthodox community to audiences three times as large, at least, as would have assembled to hear a lecture, and composed largely of Christian believers.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

"THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD."

MR. SALTER TO MR. SAVAGE.

You say in to-day's Index (16 March): "The only things of which we have any direct knowledge are facts of consciousness. All things else are known only by inference. But these inferences may be based on so many and such uniform experiences as to become to us practical certainties." I suppose an illustration of what you mean by an inference would be the existence of my mind, as the explanation of the various phenomena, sounds, motions, changes of countenance that you have witnessed in connection with my person, and now these sentences that I am writing, which will, I trust, by their orderliness and sense evince an origin in intelligence of some kind. The phenomena are all, sooner or later, states of your consciousness; but my mind is not such a state, but a cause which you project to account for them. You are aware that your thought causes similar phenomena in your own person, and so you infer that my thought produces them in my own.

But how much verification is there for your inference? It may seem to you very strange, but I confess that I do not see how there can be any verification whatever. If I ever incline to regard the law of gravitation as a mere hypothesis, I can very easily have it verified to my complete, perhaps painful satisfaction, by attempting to suspend myself in the air. And, if I analyze what I mean by verification, I find it is that the idea or hypothesis about which I was doubtful becomes an experience. All ideas that may be thus tested by experience are verifiable ideas. Or, to take another example, since I do not find a certain book on my table, I infer that I left it at a friend's house, where I made a call last night. My inference in this case may be verified by going to the friend's house, and is verified, if I find it there. Any other manner of verification than this of experience is to me inconceivable. If there is any matter in regard to which, whether from my limitations or from the nature of the case, I can have no experience, any notion I may form of it must be at least unverifiable. Is it then possible for you to have an experience of my thought (I will avoid the use of the term mind, since it is, to some, suggestive of a substance, and a discussion of this would lead us wide of the mark), so that you may thereby verify the inference, which you make from the phenomena presented to you in these words I am writing?

That there is some cause for these phenomena you may indeed assert, as this is the demand of your causative instinct in general (and whether this instinct is derived from experience or not is immaterial for our present discussion). But how can you verify the assertion that the cause in this case is my thought? You have known similar phenomena coming from me in the past, and you may by questioning provoke more; but can you ever get more than phenomena into your consciousness, can you ever get my thought itself? Yet, without such a successful endeavor, how can you properly speak of verifying the inference that I have thought? Is not the truth of the matter what I have already stated, that the only ground you have for asserting thought in me is that you have it in yourself and that it produces similar phenomena in me to those which you are conscious of producing yourself? The causal connection in you is not inference, but immediate knowledge (i.e., if there is any immediate knowledge about the matter at all); but in me, and every other man you know of, it is inference: you simply imagine or believe that thought is in any of us; and, though this imagination or belief you always and unhesitatingly act on, I do not see how you can ever verify it. You will hardly say that you can verify it by provoking new manifestations of intelligence, since the question is, Are they manifestations of intelligence? I do not doubt that you interpret them as such; but the question is, How do you justify your interpretation?

I have reflected a good deal on the simple psychological facts of the case; and it seems to me that what we are all of us doing is simply to make a leap, though we have become so accustomed to it that it is an easy leap. From what may seem philosophically a very slender foundation (namely, the consciousness of the connection of thoughts and words or acts in ourselves), we throw out an hypothesis with regard to certain phenomena which do not come from ourselves, and hold to it all our lives, not because we have any experimental evidence of its truth, but in spite of the fact that we have no experimental evidence with regard to it whatever. I know that we speak of knowing one another's thoughts; but any one can on very slight reflection perceive that it is really words, sounds, glances, etc., that we know and interpret as expressive of thoughts, but that are not thoughts themselves. Hence, it would seem as if unverified, if not unverifiable, inferences make up a very important part of the mental furniture we are constantly using. We all unhesitatingly believe that other people have thought, as well as ourselves; but it is, strictly speaking, belief or opinion or conviction, not knowledge, that we are thus possessed with.

A little reflection realizes to us that the same is true of the pain which any animal experiences. We have no sensible knowledge of it. We can see the contortions, perhaps, of the body, and hear its cries, and we involuntarily associate therewith the suffering; but this is a mental association, and not an experience on our part. We may be confident as to the amount and character of the suffering, by reason of its sensible accompaniments or manifestations; but it is a confidence, and not a knowledge, however much practical certainty is connected with it. If science is to take no account of things in regard to which we cannot have experimental evidence or verified inferences, I see not how it can avoid ignoring all thought, save that of the scientific investigator himself. And, as he may view his own thought objectively, —i.e., as expressed in the various sensible phenomena connected with his own physical organism,—he can be allowed to say that science is in its very nature materialistic. No one need quarrel with him, who is persuaded that the sphere of human belief or conviction is and must be larger than that of "scientific" knowledge. As to morality and theism, it seems to me that the scientific method of observation and experiment is, if possible, still more inadequate,—and this without denying at all that, after we have made certain unverifiable hypotheses or inferences, the scientific method may be of great service to us.

P. S.—You say, "The next step [i.e., after having noted the fact of consciousness] is to discover what external reality, if any, corresponds to and produces this internal impression. This is done by experiment" (italics are mine). I confess that your meaning is very obscure. You have told us before that "we cannot go outside of consciousness to see what this external thing may be." How, then, we can speak of experimenting with external reality is really unintelligible to me. What we do learn by experiment is what other fact of consciousness stands in constant connection with the one we have already noted; i.e., we thereby connect phenomena with phenomena, but not with their causes, whether external or internal, save in the one solitary case where each individual connects certain phenomena inhering in his physical organism, namely, his words and acts, with his own thought or volition. But this thought and volition are matter of belief or imagination to every one but himself.

W. M. SALTER.

NEW YORK, March 16, 1882.

REPLY TO MR. SALTER.

Let me first thank my kind and courteous critic for his letter. It is a model of fairness, and shows plainly the truth-seeker as opposed to the carper; and with a keen instinct he has put his finger on the central point of the whole discussion. He has thus simplified my task, whether he has made it easy or not. All his questions and all his illustrations converge and point toward one central difficulty, which it is thought cannot be disposed of by the scientific method.

This difficulty is substantially the same one insisted on by Mr. Wasson. Let me lead toward a clear statement of it by quoting one of Mr. Salter's own sentences: "If science is to take no account of things in regard to which we cannot have experimental evidence or verified inferences, I see not how it can avoid ignoring all thought save that of the scientific investigator himself."

(Science is to "take account" of everything within the reach of human faculties; but it is to say we know only those things which are verifiable. So much, in parenthesis, to avoid misunderstanding.)

This sentence, in the light of the various illustrations used to illuminate and enforce its thought, puts Mr. Salter in the position of holding that, while the scientific method is competent to deal with physical phenomena, so called, it is not competent to deal with psychical phenomena. He thinks we can have experience of and can verify the one class, but not the other. Let me call attention to some of his illustrations to show that this is his point.

He thinks "the law of gravitation" can be verified as something more than a hypothesis, and this by personal experiment. On the other hand, he thinks that the existence of his "mind" cannot be thus verified. In the latter case, he thinks we "make a leap" in logic, of which, whether we can help it or not, science can take no account. Instead of confusing ourselves with more, let us fasten our attention on these two illustrations. I cannot help thinking the difficulty may be solved by a little clearer thought and more exact definition. Mr. Salter expects too much in the matter of finding "intelligence," and thinks he gets more than he really does in the matter of "the law of gravitation." Let us make this point clear.

He says, "The phenomena [from which I infer his mind] are all, sooner or later, states of your consciousness; but my mind is not such a state, but a cause which you project to account for them." Of course. But is not the same thing true of gravitation? Certain phenomena, caused by what we call gravitation, are "states of your consciousness," or rather, report themselves in states of consciousness; but "the law of gravitation is not such a state, but a cause which you project to account for them." I can see no difference whatever in the method by which we come to our conclusion in the two cases. I can never be conscious of his mind as a thing. I can never be conscious of gravitation as a thing. And, though Mr. Salter seems to think we are directly conscious of our own minds, I cannot agree with him even in that. I am not conscious of my own mind. I am conscious only of thoughts and feelings, for which I infer an adequate cause or occasion. That ground from which spring thoughts and feelings may be called by any name, but the fact remains. Science does not attempt to determine what mind is in itself, and could not, if it did. But it can do it quite as easily as it can determine what gravitation is in itself. In the one case, we can observe and verify "words, sounds, glances," etc., for which intelligence is inferred as an explanation. In the other case, we can observe and verify certain movements of stones or stars, for which gravitation is inferred as an explanation. Intelligence and gravitation both are only our names for forces which experience compels us to believe are real, but which can never be known to us except in their phenomenal manifestations. The method of whatever knowledge we can have in the two cases seems to me precisely the same.

Let me now take an extreme illustration of my own. Let me place before myself two supposed realities, concerning which I wish to learn as much as I can. Let one of these supposed realities be Mr. Salter's mind and the other a bar of iron. Of the bar of iron, everybody concedes that what is called "scientific knowledge" may be obtained. Of the mind, Mr. Salter, and with him many others, think no such knowledge is possible. Mark, please, that I do not say that a great deal of knowledge can be obtained of either of them. But the point I wish to make is this: Whatever knowledge can be obtained of either of them is equally real, and is to be gained in precisely the same way. Now, let us look and see.

First, note two or three things we do not know. What mind is in itself we do not know. What iron is in itself we do not know. Whether mind is a distinct entity at all, or whether iron is a distinct entity at all, we do not know. So long as we cannot tell what mind is or what matter is, of course we cannot tell whether mind is a manifestation of what we call matter, or whether matter is a manifestation of what we call mind. All we know is that here are two classes of manifestations or phenomena, each of which report themselves through our senses in facts of consciousness. My knowledge of my own mind comes to me in the same way; for, if my senses are all taken away or paralyzed, I have no longer any consciousness of self; and all I know of my own mind is certain facts, from which I infer it as an explanation, just as, from certain other facts, I infer Mr. Salter's mind as an explanation.

Now, then, what do we really know in regard either to Mr. Salter's mind or the bar of iron? After observation and experiment with the iron, I say, it reports itself in my consciousness as representing a reality, possessing certain qualities or attributes which I name hardness, weight, color, dimensions, etc. What this thing is, I do not know. I only call it, for convenience' sake, iron. Thus, after observation and experiment with Mr. Salter, I say, Here, too, is a reality which reports itself in my consciousness as possessing certain qualities or attributes which I name thought and feeling, love, hate, hope, etc. What this reality is, I do not know. I only call it, for convenience' sake intelligence. That the iron and the intelligence are different, I know: that both represent something real, I know. But that we have a different kind of knowledge concerning the two I cannot see. We deepen and darken the mystery of mind, as compared with that of matter, by constantly assuming—what is not true—that we have a truer knowledge of one than we have of the other, or else a different kind of knowledge. From the phenomena in one case, we infer a ground that we call mind: from the phenomena in the other case, we infer a ground that we call matter.

The point made in the postscript calls for an additional word. Mr. Salter thinks he cannot see what is meant by finding out "by experiment" "what external reality corresponds to and produces internal impressions." If I make the experiment of touching a hot coal, though I only know it by the resulting sensation which reports itself in consciousness as what I call heat, am I not nevertheless justified in inferring a tolerably vivid external reality as an explanation? And if, on the other hand, Mr. Salter tells me a funny story, and gets me to laughing, am I not again justified by experiment in supposing another external reality as an explanation for my sense of the ludicrous? And the inference seems to me as direct and certain as in the "one solitary case" which he admits. My own words and physical movements are quite as external to my consciousness as are the words and movements of Mr. Salter. When he touches me with his hand, he is as near to my consciousness as I am when I touch myself with my own hand. And I infer the cause of the sensation in the two cases in precisely the same way.

THE F. R. A. CONFERENCE.

The proposed Conference of the Free Religious Association was held, according to announcement, in the Parker Fraternity Hall, Boston, on Tuesday, March 28. About fifty persons were present, though not quite all of them were members. The business for which the Conference was called was completed in the forenoon and afternoon sessions, so that no meeting was held in the evening. Prof. Felix Adler, the President of the Association, presided during the greater part of both sessions.

The morning session was devoted to hearing the reports from State correspondents in answer to inquiries sent out by the Executive Committee, in accordance with the instructions voted at the last annual meeting. These inquiries covered a pretty large field, and were classed under four heads: 1, Constitutional and statute provisions respecting religious opinions; 2, Schools as affected by sectarian influence; 3, Social conditions as making sectarian discriminations; 4, Conditions as to liberal religious organizations, favorable or unfavorable. Considering the wide range of these inquiries, the number of questions under each head, and the shortness of time since the appointment of the correspondents, the members of the Conference were surprised at the number and fulness of the answers received. And the Association is greatly indebted to those friends in different States who were ready to undertake this gratuitous service, involving no small amount of time and labor. In nineteen States, correspondents have been appointed, and, from sixteen of these, reports more or less complete had been received. From all the New England States, and from New Jersey, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Kansas, Nebraska, and California, the answers covered the whole range of inquiries, and the majority of them were prepared evidently with care and with all the thoroughness admissible under the circumstances. In the other States, the correspondents as yet have returned answers only to portions of the questions. But one Southern State was reported at all,—Arkansas. Several of these reports were read in full, selected from both Eastern and Western States, and portions of others,—especially the portions concerning the conditions of liberal religious organization. Together, they contain valuable information, which, with that yet to be received from other States, can by and by be put to good use in the interest of the Free Religious movement. On the whole, it may be said that they speak hopefully of the conditions for the progress of liberal religious ideas. And even if the correspondents have doubts as to whether much impetus can be given to effective local organization through the agency of conventions and lectures arranged by the Free Religious Association, yet, almost without exception, they express a hope that something of the kind might be attempted, to see what it would develop. At the close of the Arkansas report, however, the suggestive and doubtless wise remark is made that what that State is in most urgent need of at present is public schools.

The afternoon session of the Conference was occupied with the hearing and consideration of the report of the committee appointed at the last annual meeting to consider and if possible devise some plan for increasing the activity of the Association and making its work more national and more effective. This committee consisted of Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer and Mr. Arthur G. Hill, of Florence, Mass., Mr. B. A. Ballou, of Providence, Mr. W. H. Hamlen, of Boston, and Mrs. Annie L. Diggs, of Lawrence, Kan. The report was prepared and presented by Mrs. Spencer, as chairman of the committee, and embodied the views of all the members excepting Mr. Hamlen, who sent a minority statement expressing his dissent from the plan proposed by the majority, chiefly on account of the great pecuniary expense, as he thought, involved in it. Next week, the majority report and Mr. Hamlen's statement will be given to the readers of The Index in full, together with the action taken by the Conference upon the matter. Therefore, it must suffice to-day to say that Mrs. Spencer's paper was an able and earnest presentation of the views of those members of the Free Religious Association who believe that the Association is intrusted with a mission to the American people which it cannot fulfil until it adopts a more effective working organization. And the gist of the plan proposed for such organization is the employment of an agent or agents who should visit the States where the conditions appear most favorable, seek out the friends of Free Religious ideas, awaken their interest, arrange for conventions and lecture courses, aid in the formation of State Associations (which should have, however, no official affiliation with the National Association), and encourage and counsel the organization of local societies according to the opportunities and needs of different localities,—these local societies for a limited time to receive pecuniary aid from the National Association, at the discretion of its Executive Committee, in places where such aid may appear likely to result in a society that will soon become self-sustaining.

With the large and generous spirit and enthusiastic faith in the practical power of Free Religion manifest in this majority report, the members of the Conference appeared to be in entire sympathy; and up to the point where it is recommended that direct aid be given toward the formation of local societies, not only by counsel and personal assistance, but by financial help, there was little difference of opinion. But on this point a divergence became evident; and, after a free expression of views, the voting showed that this part of the plan, though it had a small majority of the members voting, divided the judgment of the Conference pretty equally. The discussion doubtless would have been more thorough, if it had been within the province of this Conference to decide the question finally. But it now goes forward to the annual meeting of the Association, for further consideration and action. In the mean time, the report will be spread in full before the members, so that they will have opportunity to give it their thought, and will come to the annual meeting in May better prepared to act wisely. It were well also if the subject were to have some discussion in The Index between now and then by persons who may have matured ideas upon it on either side. Let the discussion, whether in The Index or at the annual meeting, be conducted with the candor, fairness, and fraternal spirit that prevailed at the Conference, and it is not improbable that some plan of greatly increased activity may be devised which shall harmonize the present diversity of opinion without weakening the interest of any section of members in the Association's aim and work.

NOTES ON THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

W. J. P.

THE Congregationalist continues its opposition to the appointment of Dr. Smyth as successor to Professor Park at Andover. Its heaviest gun is an elaborate history of the founding of the Theological Seminary and of the extraordinary pains taken by the founders to prevent their endowments ever being perverted to the teaching of any other doctrine than Calvinism. That the professors are required to subscribe to an Orthodox creed has been generally understood; but it is probably not so generally understood of what a rigid and antique form of Orthodoxy this creed is. The Congregationalist says that the creed which every professor must sign at his inauguration, and every five years thereafter, contains, among others, the following declarations:—

I believe . . . that Adam [was] the federal head and representative of the human race; that by nature every man is personally depraved, destitute of holiness, unlike and opposed to God; . . . that, being morally incapable of recovering the image of his Creator, which was lost in Adam, every man is justly exposed to eternal damnation; . . . that God, of his mere good pleasure, from all eternity elected some to everlasting life; . . . that, agreeably to the covenant of redemption, the Son of God, and he alone, by his sufferings and death, has made atonement for the sins of all men; . . . that no means whatever can change the heart of a sinner, and make it holy; . . . that the wicked will awake to shame and everlasting contempt, and with devils be plunged into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone forever and ever. . . .

The Associate Founders, to make it still more difficult for heresy to enter the seminary, made, according to the Congregationalist, these additional provisions:—

1. They required that "no man shall be continued a professor on said foundation, who shall not continue to approve himself a man of sound and orthodox principles in Divinity agreeably to the aforesaid creed."
2. They "strictly and solemnly enjoined" and left it "in sacred charge" that "every article of the aforesaid creed shall forever remain entirely and identically the same, without the least alteration, addition, or diminution."

And then, to crown their work of guarding their faith, the founders appointed an independent and self-perpetuating body of "visitors," three in number, outside of the corporation of the seminary, who shall themselves subscribe every five years to the iron-clad creed made for the professors, and one of whose duties it is to see that the professors do not depart from it. In such a state of things, we confess we do not see how Dr. Smyth can receive or accept the appointment of professor there, any more than we can see how Professor Park could have been "continued" in the office there so long. Indeed, we see not how at this day the Orthodox Congregational body on the terms of this creed can supply men enough of the requisite learning to keep the professorships filled. If done at all, it is to be feared it must be done at the cost of an amount of mental reservation which should require the serious attention of a professor of ethics. The editor of the Congregationalist, for instance, is commonly regarded as one of the leaders of the right wing of Orthodoxy. But could he subscribe unreservedly to all the creed above quoted? We doubt.

THE Christian Union, in an article opposing the anti-Chinese bill, says:—

No movement in modern times is so impressive as the reunion of the East and the West, and none promises such vast and beneficent results in the future. The East still keeps the homestead of the race and all its common memories. Society, law, art, literature, government, religion, were born there; and few, indeed, are the commanding ideas which cannot be traced to the Orient. Long separated by mutual suspicion or by actual antagonism, the parent and the child have been slowly coming together during the last century and a half. Eastern thought has found sympathetic students in the West, and Western energy, order, and wealth are slowly moving over the East. These comminglings of races have always been followed by epochs of immense advancement, and no one who has given thought to this subject can doubt this is one of those vast movements by which civilization is moved along the path of progress.

ONE of the results of Rev. Joseph Cook's recent visit to India is said to be the establishment of an antichristian newspaper there.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"THE INDEX" will be sent six months to trial subscribers for one dollar.

In the advertising columns of the Chicago Tribune, we find the following: "A handsome family Bible, perfectly new, cost $20, to exchange for almost any new goods of same value."

We mention, as an indication of a growing interest in liberal thought, the fact that an audience of eight hundred persons assembled last Sunday evening at Haverhill, Mass., to hear a radical lecture by the junior editor of this journal.

We are of the opinion that, if as the Presbyterian says there is "no responsibility on the part of God to man," there is no obligation on the part of man to God. A radical change would have to take place in our moral nature or in our conceptions of justice before we could worship, or even contemplate without aversion, such a being as the God of the Presbyterian.

"The good chaplain of the State senate," says the Rochester Democrat, "makes invidious distinctions. Several times, he has prayed that mercy might be shown to all 'Turks, infidels, and Jews.' Whether there are any 'Turks, infidels, or Jews' in the senate or not, he might avoid an insult to a portion of the community by omitting to specify any class especially deserving of God's mercy. The belief is that there are those in the State legislature not known as 'Turks, infidels, or Jews,' who, to achieve salvation, must be recipients of divine favor. Their own merits will hardly save them."

THE London Times says: "A pitched battle is certain to be fought very speedily over the revised version of the New Testament. Already a respectable organ of Conservative opinion has sounded the war-cry against its new readings with as much feeling as if it thought Mr. Gladstone had been among the revisers. Vituperation and taunts will not arbitrate finally between contending scholars. If at the end of the wordy warfare the public be able to perceive what is the actual amount of questionable matter, something will have been gained. The high probability is that a majority of persons who speak the English language will be content to regard the uncertainties as still uncertain, provided they may keep so much as remains behind admitted."

In the most intelligent quarters, current civilization has practically passed the theological stage, and emerged upon a rational plane,—upon fresh fields and pastures new. Right conduct is enjoined upon every thinking person by his reason and not by creeds. Ethics are rational, not theological. The sense of duty is to the enlightened consciousness what gravitation is to matter, native to it. With theologians, ethics are secondary to faith, right conduct to creed,—that is, such is the direct teaching or necessary implication of their faith; but its influence is almost neutralized by rational thought, and theologians, although lagging behind, have to conform to the demands of advancing civilization, and march with the army and under the banner of human progress.

THE Fergus Printing Company of Chicago, Ill., have just issued a small volume consisting of five of Mr. George C. Miln's recent discourses, entitled Last Words in the Pulpit. The subjects of these discourses are as follows: "The Church: Its Past"; "The Church: Its Present"; "The Church: Its Future"; "The Mastery of Love"; "Last Words in the Pulpit." Those of our readers who have read the sermons or essays of Mr. Miln, published in these columns since his open avowal of Agnosticism, will be glad to obtain this series in one compact volume, which they can do by ordering from this office. In paper covers, the price is 50 cents; in handsomely bound cloth covers, 75 cents. An excellent portrait of Mr. Miln adorns the first page, and the volume is appropriately dedicated "To All who believe in Reason as the Supreme Authority for Human Conduct."

A SUBSCRIBER writes requesting us "to name a juvenile paper suitable for the children of a free thinker." As this is a question frequently asked us in one form or another, we would here state that, so far as we know, there is no juvenile paper distinctly antichristian or distinctively free thought in its teachings. But we find that all juvenile literature nowadays, except that published for Sunday-school use or in the avowedly religious organs of the various sects, partakes largely of the scientific spirit which permeates the literature designed for maturer minds,—a spirit that is sure to awaken thought and inquiry, and especially in the naturally inquisitive brain of youth, and so is sure to give a strong impulse in the right direction, the search after truth. In such papers as the Youth's Companion, published in this city, and Harper's Young People, New York, and in such magazines as Wide-Awake and St. Nicholas, there is no danger of any strong orthodox bias being given to any youthful mind. The best and highest talent in the land is secured by the publishers of these and other juvenile periodicals for the purpose of instructing, as well as amusing the children of this generation; and the result is that they are healthful in tone, scientific in spirit, and moral in purpose, and no parent need to hesitate to put such literature into his children's hands, nor any free thinker from fear of warping his child's mind in a wrong direction.

THE Presbyterian, true to the spirit and history of its faith, says: "And now the latest occasion for intermeddling in Russian affairs and denouncing that country is the Jew, who, we think, is to be pitied more on account of his poverty and consequent sorrow than his innocence. How is it that the Israelite is persecuted everywhere? Not many would answer it is the wrath of God indiscriminately. History tells the tale, and it is that they are disturbers,—sorely persecuted and oppressed and objects of pity, but like the child that has brought chastisement on itself, and become an object of pity when that chastisement is cruel. They generally have no home feelings and care but little for governments. With few noble exceptions, they make no effort to sus-tain governments. . . . We say this from the records of history that the Jew is persecuted as no other race; and the facts show that he has had a hand in most of it, and it is the marvel of marvels that, if he is always innocent, he should always suffer." The logic of the Presbyterian is evidently something like the following: The Jews rejected and continue to reject Christ. They are therefore a wicked people with whom God is displeased, and Russian soldiers and peasants who rob and kill them and outrage the women are but instruments in the hands of the Almighty for punishing them as justice demands. All this is not expressed in the quotation, but it is an implication of the article from which the quotation is made, in connection with the theology of the Presbyterian.

JULES SIMON is arrayed among the enemies of secular education in France. He recently defended in a vigorous and passionate speech an amendment to the education bill, making it obligatory upon teachers to instruct children in the primary schools on their duties to God. The republic, he said, was drifting away from reverence for sacred things, and the present government desired to become entirely godless. M. Jules Ferry, the Minister of Public Instruction, replied that the pupils' duties to God and country were always sufficiently taught, and in a spirit of proper reverence, in all the schools of France; that there was no reason for inserting this paragraph in the education law, except the reason that the clericals wanted it inserted, so that they might have a pretext for insisting upon religious teaching in school hours. Every member of that party was opposed to secular instruction, and every member was glad to fight under M. Jules Simon's banner. M. Simon called himself a Liberal and a philosopher; but it was notorious that he was fighting the battles of the party which did not believe in liberty of conscience. Why was M. Simon more anxious at present to see the name of the Supreme Being inserted in the text of a law than he was when, a member of the Opposition in the Corps Législatif under the Second Empire, he scouted the idea of prosecuting newspapers for printing articles against religion, on the ground that it was irreverent and absurd to pretend that an all-powerful God needed the protection of human laws? M. Simon's amendment was voted down by a large majority.

NORTHERN LIGHTS.

Tintings of tremulous space,
Pulsatile rhythms of rose,
Violet throbs from the hidden heart of days,
Glory of ether that wanes and grows,
Cosmic thrills of the great harmonied motion,
Zenithward waves of the vast, magnetic ocean,
Spears of Ithuriel glancing,
Sin-smiting, mailed hosts of the Infinite swift-advancing,—
Are ye the things ye seem,
Or hopeless wraiths of the unquiet dead?
Heroes of Greece, or ghosts of Vikings read
Whose sword-blades caught that red, eternal gleam,
Stain of a brother's life,
When ceaseless shocks of battle hurled
Fierce, in the dim, sad morning of the world,
When man's existence was but storm and strife?
Now, in your centuried woe,
Anguished, repentant of that Long Ago,
That time of doom and dearth,
Come ye to warn the later sons of earth?

And, lo! from heavens serene
Vanished the flame-thrusts scintillant and slender,
Spears, waves, and color-throbs a bygone splendor,—
Naught but the stars' cold sheen!

The Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 6, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, } Editors.
BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, }

NO WRITERS in THE INDEX, editorial or other, are to be regarded as speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association as a whole; nor is any writer to be held responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own. For all editorial matter not signed, B. F. UNDERWOOD, the office editor, is responsible.

ALL communications intended for the paper and all business letters should be addressed to "THE INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Letters for Mr. Potter should be addressed to him, at New Bedford, Mass.

COMPENSATION.

BY J. VILA BLAKE.

Recent scientific discoveries have developed the law of mechanical compensation with great rigorousness. The mechanic will show you now the precise amount of work that the combustion of a pound of coal will do; and, conversely, he will show that, if the weight which it will raise a thousand feet be permitted to fall again, when it rushes through the air and strikes upon the earth, it will evolve heat precisely identical in amount with that of the combustion of the coal. More than this: he will show you by nice experiment and calculation that it is impossible by any device to trick nature out of this established equation.

You can in no wise get more than just so much mechanical equivalent from so much heat; and, if it be applied in one way, it will be lost in another. You may, for example, construct a device which shall raise ten times as much weight as another one with the same amount of heat as power; but you may be certain that the weight will move ten times more slowly and accomplish only a tenth of the distance. Or you may choose to aim at rapidity of motion; but you must diminish your weight in proportion. What is gained in time or space is always lost in power, and contrariwise. So, in the mechanical appliances, a screw with a very fine thread will exert great pressure, but it will move very slowly; a lever with very great difference in the length of the arms will lift an enormous weight, but will require a long time to lift it far. Weight and velocity make up momentum; and, when either is diminished, the other must be increased to maintain the equation. A mosquito could stop a locomotive and cause a horrible calamity, if it could fly full against the front with a velocity as many times greater than the speed of the engine as its weight is less.

This strict numerical equation maintained in the mechanics of nature has its analogue in man. In truth there is not, and probably cannot be, a great general law of physics which has not its part also in the explication of mental and moral life. I heard a great astronomer say that mathematics would yet have its formulæ for the poet and philosopher, and analyze the dream of the enthusiast or reformer with algebraic symbols. I would not risk this dictum without hesitation. There is more in spiritual being than we dream of. It may be impossible for mathematics to formulate itself, and equally impossible to reduce to symbols of numerical relations the structure and processes of that mental and moral nature which includes the possibility of numbers, and is, as it were, the essence of the distinctions which the mathematician studies in their relations. At any rate, I should recommend the disciples of the calculus to try it first upon the human face, wherein the emotions take material and permanent form. Let the formulæ for an aged face be set down: let its history be wrought out backward, and every emotion of a long life be credited with its delicate chiseling. Let the curves which pain furrowed be counted and formulated, till the kind, the time, the endurance, the comfort, be rehearsed. Let anger, love, hatred, disappointment, thought, resolution, joy and grief, business and pleasure, hope and despair, hypocrisy, honesty, marriage, religion, parenthood, be set down in their values and sequences on one side of an equation, and their culmination in an aged countenance with all its mystery of meaning and beauty on the other. But, when such a feat be achieved, I suspect that the science of quantity will still be far from formulating the arising of emotion and reflection out of the abyss over which life broods.

Nevertheless, the laws of mechanical compensations have their analogous laws in moral development. Here, as in physical relations, something must be sacrificed for some other thing: to gain in one direction is to lose in another. Yet there is an extraordinary difference in the aspect and operation of the law of compensation in human life from its nature and results in physical connections, a difference which appears to me full of meaning and instruction. This I will endeavor to unfold, if you will follow me in a discourse which aims simply to set forth the old sanctities of experience and homely truths of life, so combined as to distil a draught of richer spiritual significance.

Lord Bacon, in his essay on "Youth and Age," holds the two up in contrast, and states the compensating balance whereby one seems infallibly to lose what the other gains. Youth excels in invention, in imagination, in executive activity; but it lacks care and discretion, "and, that which doubleth all errors, will not acknowledge or retract them." Age has experience, judgment, authority, calmness, but "men of age object too much, consult too long, adventure too little, repent too soon, and seldom drive business home to the full period, but content themselves with a mediocrity of success."

The judgment of age is itself a snare, and may be as bad in regard to the new as it is good in regard to the old; "for the experience of age, in things that fall within the compass of it, directeth them, but in new things abuseth them." And then follows what seems to me a somewhat remarkable passage: "But for the moral part," says the philosopher, "perhaps youth will have the preëminence, as age hath for the politic. A certain rabbin upon the text 'Your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams,' inferreth that young men are admitted nearer to God than old, because vision is a clearer revelation than a dream. And certainly the more a man drinketh of the world, the more it intoxicateth; and age doth profit rather in the powers of understanding than in the virtues of the will and affections." Is it now to be supposed that each human being represents a given power; and if, in the process of growth into old age, it be used to enlarge "the powers of understanding," there will be so much the less to maintain virtue of will and tenderness of heart? The question is not to be dismissed with a breath. In some way, multitudes of facts appear to make it a practical and important question. It is continually hinted at in such terms as "sophisticated" and "unsophisticated," "youthful enthusiasm" or "innocence," "knowledge of the world," "childlikeness" of character. Jesus made the perpetuity of the childlike spirit in maturity and age the condition of heavenly acceptance. Then there is the influence of power, emolument, fame, social influence. Jesus thought these to be a pack so large that a camel might go through a needle's eye better than a man so encumbered pass the gate of the happy city. An old philosopher said he never mingled with men but he came home less of a man than he went out. Is there an occult moral doctrine in the old El Dorado of realizing a perpetual youth? Or is it possible to dream of a beatific longevity which shall garner the mental harvest and moral experience of age into the storehouse of that pure and beautiful simplicity of youth which no hypocrisy can imitate?

Take other cases of moral compensation. It is said that people who live in sumptuous and luxurious circumstances are not so profoundly attached to each other as the more moderately endowed or even the poor. They have such a superabundance of means of enjoyment that they are generally less needful to each other, it is said. Is it, then, possible to abound in pleasures only at the price of poverty in love? Must an excess of possible enjoyments limit the appreciation of the delights of profound intimacy and of the joys of natural affection? Can many pleasures, however innocent, be had only at the expense of the incommunicable bliss with which others drain the one best cup? Are we so to understand the fact that savages very far below even incipient civilization often show affections of a depth and power which seem directly proportional to their hardships and privations? Is it so that we must account for the pathetic story told by Humboldt of the painful and exhausting journeys of a South American Indian mother in search of her child? And, apart from the affections, is it to be held as true, according to a law of compensation, that the man who has little will still enjoy as much as he who is better furnished with pleasures, because the fervency of the concentration will balance the varied excitement of the distribution?

Perhaps even it might be said that the effect of concentration of affection upon a few objects is able to compensate satisfactorily for deficiency of cultivation. It would seem as if education should expand all the faculties together, as if the increase of knowledge should arouse love to a nobler quality, and the draught of a finer life quicken affection as well as invention. Yet, in general, love is much the same all the world over: among high and low, ignorant and learned, civilized and savage, its throes and ecstasies differ but little. It goes to bed with ignorance, and is not lowered: it walks up Parnassus, and is not elevated.

"Wonderful as it may seem," says the author of The Seven Curses of London, "it is not in well-to-do quarters that the utterly abandoned child finds protection, but in quarters that are decidedly the worst-to-do, and that unfortunately, in every possible respect, than any within the city's limits. The tender consideration of poverty for its kind is a phase of humanity that might be studied both with instruction and profit by those who, through their gold-rimmed spectacles, regard deprivation from clothes and meat and the other good things of this world as involving a corresponding deficiency of virtue and generosity. They have grown so accustomed to associate cherubs with chubbiness, and chubbiness with high respectability and rich gravities, that they would, if such a thing were possible, scarcely be seen conversing with an angel of bony and vulgar type. Nevertheless, it is an undoubted fact that, for one child taken from the streets in the highly respectable West End and privately housed and taken care of, there might be shown fifty who have found open door and lasting entertainment in the most poverty-stricken haunts of London."

Are such facts to be explained by the concentration consequent on having little making up for the cultivating effect of civilization and knowledge?

Bacon says that "certainly there be not two more fortunate properties than to have a little of the fool and not too much of the honest. Therefore, extreme lovers of their country or masters were never fortunate, neither can they be. For, when a man placeth his thoughts without himself, he goeth not his own way." Emerson says it is "the uncivil man" that makes the world move; and a recent essayist comments on the difficulty which suavity and complaisance of disposition may oppose to reformatory activity and power. Is it then to be inferred that an inevitable compensation tends to divide fortune from virtue, to associate mercantile influence and social prestige with dishonesty and obsequiousness? Are we to conclude that each man has a given amount of motive energy, and that whatever thereof is devoted to fortune is just so much withdrawn from morality?

Vice and crime make up part of experience, and experience is the great teacher. A being who should know nothing of wrong-doing in himself would miss just so much of a round and complete experience: a chapter of life would be sealed from him. Are we then to conclude that even virtue has its compensating disadvantages, that absolute fidelity to it can be gained only at the expense of a rich experience and of breadth of development? Is it true, as the German poet exclaims, that "Man is made richer than the gods themselves

By pain and agony, by tears, by death,
In and beside long, full felicity?"

Turning to our intellectual side, similar difficulties appear. The generalizing mind is limited on the side of observation. The observing mind gropes helplessly amid speculations. The scientist and the mechanic tend to materialism or to indifference to mental problems. But the philosopher, on the other hand, becomes a dreamer, oblivious of facts. And, above all, there is the crucial contrariety between depth and breadth which afflicts all mental occupation at present. The field of knowledge has so expanded, its subjects are so diversified and dissimilar, that a man can know one thing well only by being voluntarily ignorant of a thousand; and a broad and generous culture of all the faculties is inconsistent with the precise and authoritative development of any, at least to the extreme of such extraordinary instances of minute and exhaustive grasp of one subject as adorn the present age. A recent writer says: "Among scientific men themselves, the increasing specialization of their employments—inevitable, as far as we see, for the present—has produced, and is likely to produce, most serious disadvantages. It is Mill, we think, and before him Comte, the French philosopher, who deploras the moral and social effect of this dispersion of effort, and the concentration of it on only minute fragments of the business of life. The interests of the whole, says the former, the bearings of things on the ends of the social union, are less and less present to the minds of men who have so contracted a sphere of activity. The insignificant details which form their whole occupation, the infinitely minute wheel they help to turn in the machinery of society, does not arouse or gratify any feeling of public spirit or unity with their fellow-men. A man's mind is as fatally narrowed, and his feelings toward the great ends of humanity as miserably stunted, by giving all his thoughts to the classification of a few insects or the resolution of a few equations as to sharpening the points and putting on the heads of pins." Shall we then admit that there is an essential incompatibility herein; that profound knowledge must be contracted, wide knowledge shallow; that there is a definite amount of power, like water in a channel, so that, if it be deep, it must be so much the more narrow, and, if wide, so much the more shallow?

This is the problem of compensation in the mental and moral sphere which meets us on every side. It seems inseparable from human nature, probably from the experience of all beings in proportion to their powers of conscience and reason. Humboldt, when in South America, made the curious and interesting observation that "the monkeys seem the more depressed and melancholy the nearer they resemble men; that, with the increase of their apparent reasoning faculties, their impetuous sprightliness diminishes in equal proportions." Poor creatures! That is the most human trait that was ever ascribed to them. They but tremble on the verge of human dignity, in compensation whereof they accept the first instalment of human sadness, abdicating a measure of the untutored ecstasy of forest life at the first approaches of reason. And, when reason ushers in the coronation day and sets her royal crown on man, with the illimitable possibilities of joy attending the new sensitiveness, immeasurable woes throng also to the festival and possibilities of suffering as intense and as rational as the bliss. Come love and marriage with the home and the cradle; come also heart-rendings, separations, death, and the voice of mourning. Friendship awakes and all the delightful joys of personal sympathy, fond intimacy, and everlasting fidelity; but in the school of the joy and the trust are learned also the lessons of betrayal, treachery, selfishness, and fickleness. Conscience steps forth regally, remorse crouches behind. Prosperity tips its golden horn, plenty, comfort, and pleasure pour out. With them come care, contention, animosity, sycophancy, avarice. Reason begins to examine and instruct, and civil order asserts its salutary subordinations. Instantly there is tyranny, usurpation, cruelty, ambition. And, with every effort to expand the horizon of knowledge and thought, the rational nature finds the limits and difficulties multiplying with the opportunities.

Now, before stating, as may be done very briefly, the difference which I have mentioned as existing between these balancing compensations and the analogous correlations of force in mechanics, I will say a few words in general upon the ministration of the difficulties, perils, and griefs to our souls.

It cannot be but offences will come, and there is this great result in the coming of grief or temptation to ourselves; namely, that we are enabled to understand them in others. A German poet writes forebodingly of the kind of heaven that tradition anticipates, because there is no room for compassion in it. The "unalterable health," which leaves no room for doubt and pity, seems bleak and barren to him. But the capacity to sympathize is the fruit of suffering in one's own privacy of heart or body. It is something enviable to be fitted to approach with comprehension the sick and feeble, the subjects of pain, the martyrs of doubt, the children of grief, or, most unhappy and most needy of all, the morally fallen, whether agonized or obtuse. Every true soul that suffers suffers vicariously, not for itself only, but for others. It is thus commissioned to be a minister and savior. It is able first of all to comprehend, and then, with inimitable sympathy, to assuage, help, and uplift.

And, for this, the law of compensation, well studied, itself supplies the text. It appears in its working as the testimony of God to the value of truth and love. It is the best things which are most solicitously hedged about with perils or sacrifices. The more excellent is a quality, the more it is compensated by difficulties and privations; and the finer and higher anything is, the worse it becomes when it suffers overthrow amid its related dangers. The worse a moral being appears to be, the more is he marked for salvation, because his state, by its recognized degradation, reveals an insufferable contrast with his real nature. For by what cause does he appear so bad, or by what is his perdition measured, if not by the sensitiveness of the general moral sense of the creation and his own moral possibilities? "The cradle of liberty," said Kossuth in Faneuil Hall,—"I do not like the phrase: there is a scent of mortality about it." He thought that whatever could be born could die. The best and the worst lie close together; nor can either be discerned against the effulgence of God, save in the shelter of the other's shadow.

In the compensation, therefore, which on every hand sets off trial and bliss against each other, we encounter a discipline which is as reasonable as it is powerful. This we must meet, each one for himself, in impenetrable solitude. Every soul must have its own visions, or none. No experience can be described or taken at second hand, or divided by the most mighty love. "The sun shines on the just and on the unjust"; but appropriation is individual, and is for the just. God blesses the children of his love with such great experiences as he must bring to them all alone; and it is only to him who has no "slavish dread of solitude that breeds reflection and remorse," who accepts the discipline and wrestles till he comprehends it, that the perfect benediction comes. This is the task of living, which can be lightened but little by any neighbor, and delegated not at all. "You cannot teach a man anything," said Galileo: "you can only help him to find it within himself." But, within all shadows, God stands. It is possible always to lay hold of his hand. Nay, but think of it, and you will find him holding yours. Supported, strengthened, never for an instant forsaken, what beautiful graces of character a well-used discipline produces! Such a spirit walks among us as truly a divine revelation! What dignity attends its patient footsteps! How luminous its path! What pathetic simplicity of faith and endurance! What faithfulness in mind to remedy and uplift all hard conditions! What strength and beauty of will! What directness of moral sense! What truthfulness, candor, insight, and comprehension!

The point of permanent temperature in the tropics lies only a foot beneath the surface: in rugged New England, a man must dig down forty feet to reach that point; but, when he has done so, and at last stands upon the axis of the unvariable and sure, looking up, he will see the stars at mid-day.

Now, in conclusion, to state briefly what seems to be the great difference between the compensations in the moral world and the similar laws of equation in physical forces, by which difference the nature of moral compensation is made clear and the answer to all the questions of this discourse returned, the general truth appears to be that in nature and in human experience it is impossible to have everything, and that we therefore must give up some things for the sake of having others,—a mere statement of the general principle of sacrifice as it occurs continually in daily life. Now, compensation, whether moral or mechanical, is simply sacrifice the alternatives of which are fixed by nature instead of arising out of particular circumstances. A man, e.g., may be so situated that he must choose between losing some particular possession or all his possessions. But this is obviously only contingent and circumstantial. He may perhaps recover his property again, and be able to hold all undivided. But compensation is compulsory sacrifice ordained in the nature of things, in which the alternatives, one of which must be given up in order to have the other, are fixed by nature's laws: it is a natural and constant incompatibility between two things, so that the possession of one excludes the other; it is such a relation between two or more objects or qualities that to have one is, by necessity, to renounce the others. For example, in mechanics, power and rapidity are related in such a manner that a choice must be made, since one must be sacrificed to increase the other: in intellectual things, depth and breadth of culture are similarly related, and one must be chosen to the exclusion of the other. And yet there is a world-wide difference between these two compensations, the mechanical and the moral; and it lies in this: that the latter involves the idea of time, and depends for its integrity upon limitation of time; while the former is a mutual exclusion of correlatives founded in nature alone, independent of time, and neither increased nor diminished by duration. In matters of character and experience, compensations, I say, depend for the most part on time: there is no necessary incompatibility, founded in the nature of things, between depth and width of culture. It is an actual incompatibility according to this existing order of things, with its allowance of time for progress. It results necessarily from the present balance between the short time allowed us and the magnitude of the field of knowledge to be traversed; but there is nothing essential in this balance itself. Either element might be changed in its proportion; and, whether we lengthen the time enough or contract the field of knowledge enough, the opposition between deep knowledge and wide knowledge equally disappears. But mechanical correlation is ineradicable and necessary: it is founded in the nature of things. An eternity of effort would not enable us to get over the law which governs the operation of the screw or lever or inclined plane: it will be forever impossible to increase their power and rapidity at once, with the same amount of force. In character, on the other hand, no alternative, no compensation, can be imagined, in which time does not enter; and the indefinite increase of the time removes the opposition, so that all may be possessed at once. Grant but the time, and it is possible to conceive of character blooming with all imaginable graces, dignified with all accruing knowledge, and thirsting for more in a generous, orbicular cultivation, no trait suppressed or put aside for another, all fairly developed in their natural subordinations, and agreeing in a moral grandeur which would be a fit and glorious product of untold ages of development.

And herein lies, to my mind, a pregnant hint of immortality,—at least, if we may assume that nothing is placed in human nature to be suppressed; that complete unfolding in symmetrical beauty on all sides is the end of a moral being; and that no order of things which suppresses any endowment or sacrifices one side to another can be the complete environment for such a being, or be otherwise than transient to more perfect conditions. Here, in the mental and moral sphere, compensations, incompatibilities, appear as exact, as certain, as ineradicable as the rigorous limitations of mechanical force; but in the mind these alternatives appear as turning awry the true end of being, in mechanics they directly maintain the serviceability of force and the trustworthiness of calculations. There is no compensation which by an inevitable and necessary incongruity forbids to the mind complete integrity of culture and symmetry of growth, but only such as are alternatives in this visible order with its limitation of time. In mechanics, the correlation is essential, necessary, independent of all time and of all possible conditions. But, raise the element of time to an infinite or indefinite magnitude, and all the contingent partialities and compensations disappear at once from the pathway of character, which then only, when time is so multiplied, obtains the conditions of the true end of a moral being.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A RIDE ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

(Concluded from last week.)

A visit to Santa Fé affords the most unique experience one can find in the United States; and, while the city constantly reminds one of places in Europe, it is as often by sharp contrasts as by resemblances.

Leaving Lamy just at sunset, a beautiful ride of an hour takes you up to this old Spanish city, situated on a small plain surrounded by high mountains. As we got out of the train and looked over the ranges of flat-roofed, low, adobe houses, the first thought was of Pompeii, which it resembles more than any living city. At this season, the ground and houses are nearly of the same color; and the effect is singularly quiet and monotonous, like a city seen by night. But, as we passed up the main street of the town, it was no longer the half-unburied city of Pompeii, but the strange, busy, half-attractive, half-repulsive scenes of the Mercato Vecchio of Florence which were recalled to thought. Gay shops of all kinds line the miserable, unpaved streets, almost without sidewalks; and they are filled with a mixture of all classes and nations of people.

Here is the Mexican native sitting outside his adobe hut, generally doing nothing, but occasionally smoking or perhaps mending his clothes in lazy fashion. The women are washing, or more often gossiping or sitting idly on the ground. The little children, with black hair and red cheeks, the picture of half-savage enjoyment, are playing rude games or fighting and squabbling, while occasionally a virago rushes upon them with a torrent of Mexican abuse, from which they run away, laughing, around the corner. The Indian from the country, with his blanket around him, guides the patient little burro (donkey) with his load of wood, which smells pleasantly of the forest; and occasionally a wild-looking fellow, with pistols at his belt, reminds one of the heroes of dime novels.

Just as eye and ear are attuned to these foreign and picturesque surroundings appears an advertisement of the last new goods, of the richest mining company, of the railroad or hotel, the sharp sounds of the New England tongue are heard discussing the chances of Conkling's nomination, and one wakens as from a dream to find one's self in the nineteenth century and in Yankee land instead of in Spain in the fifteenth.

The Palace Hotel is one of the best in its appointments I have seen west of the Mississippi; and the telephone and the gas-light leave you in no doubt that modern improvements have fairly invaded this last refuge of conservatism, intrenched seven thousand feet above the sea. As one of us attempted to turn off the gas, she was startled by a distinct electric spark from the metal cock, showing the highly electric condition of the atmosphere. We all tried it with the same result.

Directly opposite the hotel is the camp of a United States regiment; and the bugle notes sounding the night-call increase the illusion of a foreign city, while reminding us how lately this place had become the charge of our government. By moonlight, it was a weird, strange scene to look down upon the ranges of low, flat houses stretching far over the plain,—for the city is not crowded together,—and then up to the glorious amphitheatre of snow-covered mountains enclosing it as with a mighty ring of fortifications. The church bells, ringing early in the morning, suggested that we were in a Catholic city; and we started at once to visit the old Spanish churches.

The most important one is that of San Miguel, which is situated on rising ground on the outskirts of the city. Close to it is the new college of St. Miguel, a large modern building. The old church is a square building with a round tower at the back, built wholly of the sun-burned brick. It is very small, and built in the simplest form. The original church was erected about 1582, but the roof was destroyed by the Pueblo Indians in 1680. It was restored by the Spaniards in 1710. A very handsome carved beam over the chancel is a relic of this restoration, and it bears an inscription in memory of the restorer of the church. Catholic worship is still celebrated here on Sundays. Another old church of uncertain date is being enclosed by a new cathedral built of the same material, but so nicely prepared as to resemble stone. One or two handsome Protestant churches are in process of building.

There is another college in the city, and efforts are being made in the direction of public school education, but as yet but little is accomplished. Remembering that the whole territory of New Mexico contains only about one hundred and twenty-five thousand inhabitants, one cannot expect very great institutions even in its capital.

The soil looks light and easy to work, and with irrigation produces well. The season for agriculture was just beginning. In the country, we saw a man toiling with the old wooden plough; but in Santa Fé they used a modern iron plough, with the trade-mark conspicuous on the side. I noticed glass frames for hot-beds in one of the gardens.

We found a good shop for the sale of Indian pottery and other curiosities. The soap-root is much prized for its cleansing properties, and the Indians make baskets of its stalks. Canes made of cactus stalks attracted our attention, and we afterwards saw the tall, weird stalks of the plant from which they were made rising singly from the ground eight or ten feet high.

The Mexican filigree silver jewelry is sold in the shops; but we could not see that it differed from that sold in various places in Europe, and the price was double. Red peppers form an important article of diet, and make a picturesque ornament festooned about the shops.

It is not known when Santa Fé was founded, but it was probably one of the Indian Pueblos mentioned by the earliest Spanish travellers. Under the Spanish rule, it had great commercial importance, much of which it still retains, and with the increase of railroad facilities a new career of prosperity seems open to it. We were glad, indeed, to have seen it before more of its distinctive character is lost.

The adobe brick is in general use for common dwellings all over the country, even to Los Angeles. The bricks are about four times the size of ordinary baked bricks, and cost about $8.00 a thousand. It is quite durable, and makes a very thick wall, giving warmth in winter and coolness in summer. The better class of houses are often plastered within and without, and papered and carpeted, while the poorer ones look like mere mud huts. Many of the inhabitants speak no English. The wealthier class dress very showily, but look vulgar and uneducated, so far as we had the opportunity of seeing them.

The night ride from Lamy was over a plain with little variety, but the moonlight was picturesque on the low adobe huts. Here, we began upon the dreary alkali plains, and the little hillocks by the roadside were so white in the moonlight that we could hardly believe they were not covered with snow. For two days and nights, we were crossing these dreary plains, almost entirely destitute of vegetation save in some places where the cactuses, from twenty to thirty feet high, rise like giants out of the barren plain. Yet it was by no means an uninteresting ride: the mountains were on either side in the distance, with their varying shapes and ever-changing lights and shadows. At one time, the sand was as absolutely barren as in the deserts of Arabia, and, rising over the plain, were the gray, rocky mountains with a light covering of snow, which precisely suited the description of Mt. Caucasus in the Arabian Nights, when the noble Prince Habi, deserted by his companions, toils over the plain to reach the summit which constantly retreats before him. We saw the deceitful mirage holding out the beautiful sheen of water to the thirsty traveller, the low hills seemingly reflected in the clear, beautiful lake.

With all this was the strange mingling of races. Beside the Indian woman who came into the cars to sell crystals dressed in all her finery, and the squalid men, women, and children clustered about their huts, we saw the gay Mexican riding wildly by on his pony; and now the Chinese, who have built the Southern Pacific Road, began to appear, either working on the road or gathered in their little camps, cooking or eating their food or washing. At one station, we saw representatives of four races, the European, Indian, African, and Asiatic. At the wildest spot of the desert, a group of Chinese workmen were clearing the road, and they could scarcely stand against the driving wind which filled eyes and nose and mouth with the irritating soda dust. How this land can ever be redeemed is the great problem. Only the baptism of water can save it. They have sunk artesian wells to the depth of fifteen hundred feet, but brought up only sulphur and salt water. A part of this tract is two hundred feet below the level of the sea, protected from it by the mountains around. It is touching to see a little grass or weed springing up from the drippings of the water tanks.

Gradually, rising up from this low level, signs of spring begin to creep over the arid plain. There is a little run of water by the roadside, the station houses have gardens around them, the cactuses become very numerous, other plants and bushes appear, some of the hills wear a decided coat of green, and at last we come down into the fertile country of Los Angeles, with its groves of orange and olive and walnut, the graceful pepper-tree shading the roadsides, the eucalyptus with its dark foliage rising to a great height in five or six years, and the whole air fragrant with the acacia, the jasmine, the orange, and the lemon.

This is the favorite region of the fruit-growers. Only water is needed to develop the riches of the fertile soil; and the river supplies this, the right of irrigation from it going with the purchase of the land.

We were glad to feel that our long ride across the continent was over, and that this was the California of golden dreams and lovely skies.

A LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1882.

We are fast losing interest here in President Arthur's appointments. This administration has chiefly distinguished itself so far by the eating of great dinners, and especially by eating them in style. What was felt as the spirit of James Garfield has vanished from the White House, and more than once the sacred chamber where he languished has been occupied by those wholly alien to his purposes. The nomination of Mr. Teller, of Colorado, as Minister of the Interior, however, excites a good deal of feeling among those who are not politicians. He is a Stalwart, which is not pleasant. At a sign from the White House, he has relinquished his purpose of speaking on the silver bill, which is the special duty to which his constituents assigned him. On the other hand, I find that the most zealous and honest friends of the Indian among the scientists and explorers are satisfied with this appointment, and expect great reforms from it. It is acknowledged that Teller has no sentimental prepossessions; but, on the other hand, he is said to be fully alive to the corruptions of the Indian Bureau, which we have been expecting Senator Dawes to drag into the light of day, and it is stated that hereafter the Indians will get their proper share of the millions which up to this date have faded out of sight before they reached the Indian country.

The visit of the Zuñis, the oldest gens of the Pueblo Indians, is the most interesting event that has occurred here since I wrote you last. There are but sixteen hundred of these people. They have kept themselves free from all intermarriage with others, and have been so isolated that they have not responded to the efforts of missionaries. They are sun-worshippers, and naturally devout like the old Hebrews. There are many things in their worship to remind one of Central Asia and the Caucasus. Like the Chinese, the lower classes pray to their dead ancestors, the middle or selected classes to six deputy gods, which remind us of those known to the Akkad races, and the high-priest to the sun-god himself.

"Boston people may be very bright," said a member of the government to me lately, "but they are very easily gulled"; and he handed me a Daily Advertiser containing the astounding statement that the Zuñis had come here to get holy water from the "ocean of sunrise"!

The collector of the Ethnological Bureau, Mr. James Stevenson, assisted by a gifted wife, who has found her way into the estufas and altar-places of the tribe, was the first person to draw attention to the great ethnological importance of this people. Mr. Cushing originally went out under Mr. Stevenson, and the uniformly just and brotherly dealings of Mr. Stevenson had already won the affection of the people. Pedro Piño, the old governor, who speaks Mexican Spanish as well as Zuñi, is between ninety and a hundred years old. It was he who arranged the treaties between the tribes and the United States at the close of the Mexican war. He calls Mrs. Stevenson his daughter, and, when he first arrived, was not content to fold her in his arms with a prayer and blessing, but had to repeat the same ceremony with her father and mother when they approached him. It was a great object with the Ethnological Bureau to obtain possession of the sacred amulets and pottery of the tribe; and Pedro, with others, assisted Mr. Stevenson to get them. The ancient "hunting charms," which I call amulets, consist of small figures of animals cut in stone. To each of these, an arrow is bound very firmly. The amulet, thrust into a sack in the belt of the wearer, leads him straight to his game. The old caziques shed tears when they gave these up, and it is safe to say that their love for Mr. and Mrs. Stevenson was the compelling motive. As soon, therefore, as Mr. Stevenson returned last winter, he pressed upon the bureau the question of inviting a party of Zuñis to Washington. He thought that he needed their assistance in cataloguing the pottery from the Pueblos, and that a sight of the manner in which their possessions would be treasured would have a favorable effect upon them. But, as these sun worshippers have never yet lifted their hand against a white man, the government saw no reason to propitiate them. The bureau was too poor to do much, and transportation for them and Mr. Cushing was secured by Mr. Stevenson's personal efforts. This is why they have come. They never heard of the "ocean of sunrise" till they got here. Pedro Piño, who was too tired to go North, has been staying with the Stevensons ever since his companions left. I went with the Stevensons to meet the party on the evening of their arrival, when they all smoked together and embraced their old friends. In a sacred song, which I heard them sing in the Zuñi language at Mr. Stevenson's reception, there was a constant repetition of the word "hal-lulujah." This song belonged to the "Order of the Bow," which may have originated not merely in the time of Nimrod, but in his neighborhood. Some time ago, I directed the attention of the chief of the Ethnological Bureau to the fact that George Kennan, author of Tent-Life in Siberia, had brought home from the Caucasus some photographs which I mistook for pictures of Zuñi towns, and I asked if it would not be well to have these reproduced in one of the ethnological reports. Major Powell promised to see this done. Shortly after Mr. Stevenson's reception, the Zuñis went to pass an evening with Mr. Kennan. When they saw the pictures in question, and certain others representing Asiatic Cossacks with their caps on, they became much excited. They said, "Whoever these people are, no matter how far away they live, they are our people." And they pointed out that the Cossack cap was like the one the Zuñis wear in the "Order of the Bow."

Last evening, I had Pedro Piño here for a long evening's talk. As he uses Mexican Spanish freely, it is easy to "audit accounts" by his testimony, and that testimony shows how very loosely the newspaper reporters gather their materials.

There is no war-chief in the party. The war captain, with his three lieutenants, remains in Zuñi for the "safety of the people." The little amulets are not gods, but charms, "animalita," as he said; and in their songs the lion comes out of the north, the cat crouches in the south, the wolf prowls in the east, the coyote bays in the west, the eagle drops from heaven, and the lizard comes out of the earth. It was a long time before I could make out what the lizard was. The Zuñi word for it, "Tka-lut-si," I did not understand. When I did, I looked in the dictionary to give him the Spanish word for it, "Lagarto"; but he gave me the Mexican immediately, "Lagartia," and went away quite happy because he knew more than the "white man's book."

Pedro sang for me a sweet little Mexican song, called "Montezuma of Guadalupe," the story of which bears such a resemblance to that of Elizabeth of Hungary that it is worth preserving.

Montezuma was an Indian, whom the priests at Santa Fé would not receive. When they sent him away from the church of St. Guadalupe, the spirit put it into his heart to go after beautiful flowers for the altar. He filled his poncha, and, hurrying back to the church, threw it open. As he bent to breathe on them according to Indian custom, they disappeared; and, lo! he had in his arms a copy of the picture over the great altar of the very saint herself. Then, the bishop saw that he was truly a child of the spirit. I dined with Pedro the second time he had ever used a fork. He used it as gracefully as a Frenchman. Mrs. Stevenson did not give him a finger-bowl; but he watched the rest of us, and as soon as Mr. Stevenson had used his he drew it slyly toward himself, and purloining his "son's" napkin followed our example. The Boston papers talk about the "parrot clan."

There is no such bird known to the Zuñis: it is the white hawk.

These mistakes or differences of statement show what the Ethnological Bureau ought to have seen from the beginning; that is, the impossibility of understanding the language through the work of one young student, no matter how accomplished he may be. An experienced student of language should go out to Zuñi. Mr. Cushing told me one evening that there were at least eight words meaning to "know," each differing as much from the others as the French connaître differs from savoir. He states that at each initiation of a member into the "Order of the Bow" a sort of Iliad is recited, which occupies nearly two days. Strangely enough, this tells the story of the people from the day when they left their far-off homes, not merely to the place where they were to settle and prosper, but where they were to "perish." It recites the story of thirty-six settlements. This is never written, but is kept in the memory of four priests. When one of these dies, another man is trained; and not a change of any sort is permitted in word or accent. If this be so, this epic is the most important thing our knowledge of the Western tribes has so far brought us; and it is safe to say that not only interpretations of it will be questioned, but also the mere writing of it down. There should be some way of bringing more than one judgment to bear upon it.

As water is the most precious of all things on the Western plains, great bodies of it deeply impress our simple-hearted friends; and, when they went down to Mount Vernon, they thanked the great sun-god all the way for the sight of so much water, and prayed him to send them some at Zuñi. The first night Pedro slept at Mr. Stevenson's, he sat up on his blankets for two hours after the house was closed, praying for blessings on his "son's" house and family. Pedro means to carry home a bottle of Potomac water to show how far away he has been. There is something in the looks of these men and the square style in which they bind their kerchiefs about their heads which makes me think of the Persians. They are not clean in their own homes. Mrs. Stevenson, when living among them, covers her hair close, and puts a calico wrapper on over her dress; but they are very quick to learn all new ways, and naturally courteous. Piño, who smokes all the time at home, will only allow himself two cigarettes a day here, for fear of spoiling his "son's" nice house. The dress they now wear is more Mexican than Indian. Indeed, one must travel far now to get sight of an Indian untouched by civilization. So far as religion is concerned, the Zuñis are untouched; but, in giving some directions about a Navajo blanket lately to Mr. Keam, a gentleman living in New Mexico, and my assistant in talking with the old chief, I found that it was almost impossible now to secure a blanket made of Navajo wool, or even dyed by the tribe. They send by Mr. Keam to Germantown for their wool, or rather their yarn, and that decidedly detracts from the value of the blanket.

I forgot to say that one special service that the Zuñis are expected to perform for the Smithsonian before they return West is the setting up of the Indian looms. I look forward with great anxiety to the completion of Mr. Cushing's work; but I should look forward with far more hope and enthusiasm, if it did not depend on the life and wisdom of one man. So far as I can judge from his own statements, if he were to die now, he would leave nothing in relation to the language or the epic which another student could make use of.

CAROLINE H. DALL.

P.S.—As I lay down my pen and take up the morning paper, I see that the Zuñis have to-day performed their "long-contemplated" religious rite at the sea-shore. I object to this adjective afresh. Money and transportation would not have been furnished here for any such cause. They always pray in the neighborhood of large bodies of water. But neither their gourds nor their cigarettes are "sacred." They will carry back the water of the ocean, as Pedro Piño will carry that of the Potomac. Who set this nonsense afloat?

LIBERALISM IN AUSTRALIA.

Editors of The Index :—

I have just received The Index of March 9, and notice that a lady, writing from Washington, conceives that I have done injustice to other speakers in the Unitarian Church, Melbourne, and notably to Mrs.

Webster (née Martha Turner), by not naming them in my brief and necessarily imperfect article on Liberalism in Victoria. In extenuation, I must plead that I was not writing about Unitarianism as such, but only in so far as it proved the foundation of broader liberal organization and propagandism. Even within the bounds of my immediate subject there were many brave workers to whom I could make no reference in the limited space I conceived your well-filled columns to afford me. I may be permitted now, however, to indorse your fair correspondent's high estimate of the ability manifested by the lady pastor of the Melbourne Unitarian congregation, both in pulpit and press.

CHARLES BRIGHT.

SALT LAKE CITY, March 25.

BROOK FARM.

Editors of The Index :—

It is pleasant to read such addresses as those of Mr. Frothingham, Mr. Dwight, and Mr. Sturgis, made at Dr. Ellis' church in Boston recently. The Brook Farm project was, as pictured by Mr. Frothingham, intensely idealistic, representing the transcendental aspirations of the best hearts and minds. It was, on the other hand, eminently practical, as stated by Mr. Dwight. It was not a dream simply, but an earnest reality, costly, instructive, and pleasant to remember and recall. But why did it fail? Mr. Sturgis has given two valid reasons,—poor soil and laziness. He could doubtless add others.

We might ask why all good does not succeed, why men everywhere do not live on the ideal plane and plan. The effort to realize in practical life every ideal excellence is praiseworthy; and, if it were the substance of religion, who would not be religious?

But so it is: "poor soil" is everywhere, and we must succumb to the stern inflexibility of nature's order or method, to human selfishness, and what not. Pray we ever so earnestly for a "kingdom of heaven," our prayers float away as "idle dreams," unless they descend into intelligent work in good soil.

The ideal Brook Farm will be realized only when the world is better understood, when church creeds and divisions and hopes of miraculous interference and help are abandoned or reformed, and men everywhere go to work, with the aid of science, and in conformity to the law of natural evolution, to produce in themselves and society at large a right state of thought, feeling, and action. Radical revolutions in cherished beliefs may be necessary. Old and popular methods have failed. Why not drop them, and exalt this life and world into greater consequence?

GLEANINGS FROM OUR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. CHARLES BRIGHT writes: "I am glad to say that my lectures here are attracting much attention and apparently doing good work. I expect to form a liberal association on a broad basis before I leave, which will probably not be till the middle of April."

HUDSON TUTTLE writes from Berlin Heights, Ohio: "The strange transformations of the reform movement no one can conjecture. Of one thing we are certain,—there is nothing fixed or permanent. There is unrest and change, and the restless waves of free thought are fast erasing the old landmarks on the coast line which for ages has been regarded as adamantine."

E. M. J. writes: "I clip the following from the proceedings of the Connecticut legislature of March 30, as given in one of our local dailies:—

The House rejected the petition of Theodore D. Woolsey and others respecting Sabbath profanation by railway traffic.

It is a pity that the venerable Dr. Woolsey (if he it is) should mark his declining years by 'attempting to interpose barriers to the march of civilization,' as a Frenchman would say."

JOHN DUGAN writes from Albany, N.Y.: "We have tried once more to revive liberal thought in this conservative old city; and, with the help of Mr. Graves, I trust we will succeed in firmly establishing a society based upon the principles laid down in The Index. Mr. Graves is doing splendid work here. He is brimful of good nature, possesses talent, and is thoroughly alive to the wants of the age. He desires now to have a Sunday morning service for children, to consist of music and a quarter of an hour's lecture adapted to the young. If he can succeed in this movement, it will be a good thing." From a declaration of principles written by Mr. Groves for the society referred to above, we give the following: "Our religion is emphatically a religion of this world. It contemplates the creation of human happiness by the removal of sin and its essential results, not by substitution, and in a speculative and doubtful future, but by righting the wrongs of mankind here and now."

BOOK NOTICES.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN THE ORIGINAL GREEK. Two volumes. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1882.

First, we have an Introduction of eighty-seven pages by Dr. Philip Schaff. Then, we have the revised text, completing the first volume. In the second volume, we have the introduction of the English editors, Drs. Westcott and Hort, and an appendix containing reasons for certain special readings. The book, taken as a whole, is a marvel of erudition. The introduction of Drs. Westcott and Hort reveals how delicate an art they have brought to bear upon the manuscript material with which they have had to work. Their text is no mere revision of "the received text," of which they have a most contemptuous opinion, and rightly so, as they are abundantly able to show. No account whatever is made to any printed edition of the Greek text. Recourse is had directly to the manuscripts; and, where these differ among themselves, the choice is made on purely scientific grounds. It would be very interesting to have a translation of this text made by some master of style, say, for example, Cardinal Newman, without any reference to our revised translation, and see how they would agree. There is, however, something sad about a book of this sort; for it implies at every step a conception of the New Testament which is utterly incongruous with the mass of facts on hand. Only the idea that the New Testament is a theography can justify such labor on its text, but the necessity for such labor proves that it is no theography. If God had chosen to make a miraculous revelation of himself, it is impossible that he could have left its preservation to such hap-hazard chances as those by which the New Testament documents were beset for several centuries.

THE LAND OF THE MIDNIGHT SUN. By Paul B. Du Chaillu. Two volumes. New York: Harper & Brothers.

We come late to our notice of these handsome volumes; but better late than never, for they are deserving of the most honorable mention. They contain the record of various journeys to and fro and up and down in Scandinavia, from 1871 to 1878. Altogether, Mr. Du Chaillu was in Norway and Sweden, Lapland and Finland, the length of five years; and during this period he gave himself earnestly to understand the language, customs, habits, literature, religion, history, and general social life of the various peoples among whom he was staying. The presentation of his results is, for the most part, exceedingly informal; but it is interesting and engrossing from first to last. It reproduces in the reader something of the traveller's delight. Especially interesting is the description of the Norway fjords and the simple life of those who live in the deep valleys that lead down into their strangeness of clear waters overhung with mighty cliffs and crags. If it had pleased Mr. Du Chaillu to have written a chapter summarizing the religious aspects and another summarizing the political aspects of Scandinavia, the value of his book would have been much increased. His admirable chapter summarizing the educational aspects of the country is convincing that he might have ventured on a similar treatment of politics and religion without any danger of dulness. The illustrations of his book are a remarkable addition to the reader's satisfaction, and the map is an invaluable aid. Harper & Brothers deserve the highest praise for the truly sumptuous manner in which the book is printed and bound.

We have received from Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, a catalogue of their publications, which is a gem in its way. In addition to its enticing catalogue of live literature, good portraits of many of the most distinguished authors in Europe and America adorn the pages devoted to the list of their works. This feature makes this catalogue a most desirable addition to the library of every reader. It will be sent free to any address, upon application to the publishers.

"OUR LITTLE ONES" for April, from the Russell Publishing House, 149 A Tremont Street, Boston, has just come to hand, and is instructive and interesting in all its departments for the little ones it is designed to please. Its numerous illustrations are in the highest style of art.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will lecture at Orange, Mass., afternoon and evening Sunday, April 9.

PROF. ROBERTSON SMITH has received the degree of doctor of laws from Aberdeen University. Dr. Smith's lectures on the Old Testament prophecy have been finished, and will soon be published.

We are sorry to learn that Col. T. W. Higginson, while attempting to raise a fallen horse, was severely kicked on his leg by the animal, sustaining injuries which will confine him to the house for several days.

MR. FRED. A. HINCKLEY, of Providence, R.I., will be open to engagements for lectures in the East or West after June 1. He is, as our readers know, an able, earnest speaker and a worthy representative of the Free Religious movement.

THE poet Whittier has written for Wide-Awake a tender and exquisite poem commemorative of the children's love for Longfellow and of Longfellow's death. It will appear in the May number, together with a fine frontispiece portrait of Longfellow, engraved by Closson.

A MR. WOODS gives notice that his wife has left him, and "when she last wrote home was playing in Ohio. She is recently reported to be in Iowa with a barn-storming show." He adds, "Members of troupes in which she may be found are liable to have their baggage attached." Mr. Woods is evidently not well read in law.

REV. ADAMS AYER, a retired Unitarian clergyman, and during a number of years past an active business man in Boston, died in Montreal, Tuesday, March 21, aged fifty-nine years. Mr. Ayer was graduated at Harvard in 1848, and at the Cambridge Divinity School in 1851. He was at one time connected with the Hinckley & Drury Locomotive Works, and at the time of his death with Mr. George H. Ellis, printer and publisher, of this city. He was a very energetic worker in the denomination.

MAJOR JOHN HERSCHEL, son of the late Sir John Herschel and grandson of Sir William, who discovered the planet Uranus (the first planet ever discovered), is in this country, to make pendulum observations for the purpose of connecting the pendulum work of the Indian Trigonometrical Survey with that of the Coast Survey. He has brought with him pendulums which have been swung in India and at several points in England occupied by previous observers, so that his work will do a great deal to connect together the various results obtained by different observers in different parts of the world.

MRS. IMOGENE C. FALES, of Brooklyn, began a series of lectures on "Social Science," explaining the theory and practice of coöperation, its religious and economic principles and relation to man and society, on Friday last, in New York. Social science is a subject with which Mrs. Fales is thoroughly conversant, and she is so deeply interested in it that she cannot fail to interest others. She is an advocate of Goudin's system, and ladies particularly who desire to become acquainted with the theory and practice of coöperation will not find a more competent expounder. Mrs. Fales has been frequently heard in Brooklyn on the rostrum, and her lectures in New York will doubtless be largely attended.

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE has shown us a letter from a friend at Salonica, relating to the capture by brigands of Senior Rudolph Adams, an Austrian gentleman, who escaped in February, after being held nearly five months for ransom. He was kept on the top of Mount Olympus. "The band of brigands was suddenly attacked, when they threw off their arms, capes, and even shoes, and, while the soldiers were overlooking these, they escaped. The soldiers started in pursuit, leaving the poor invalid (Adams) by himself to crawl down the side of the mountain as well as he could. On the way, his arm was run through by a soldier's bayonet, the poor man crawling along being taken for a brigand." Mr. Fiske, with his characteristic philanthropy, has sent money to help the unfortunate man, who lies now in a hospital at Salonica.

BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD.

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE veto of the anti-Chinese bill by President Arthur is one of the most sensible acts of his administration, and shows that he is far-sighted enough to understand better, apparently, than Congressmen do the true sentiment of the American nation.

GUITEAU would stand no chance of acquittal in China, where, if a lunatic commits an offence, not only is he punished, but his relatives also for not taking care of him. The authorities in China evidently think that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure."

"UNITY," says that the Margaret Fuller Society of Chicago has applied for a charter, "under which it is proposed to found 'the first Margaret Fuller Home for Young Women.' It is designed to make it a place where single women and girls can secure the necessities and a few of the luxuries of life at the lowest price consistent with the self-respect and self-sustaining basis of the home."

GENERAL POPE describes the condition of the Indians at the Reno agency, where they are crowded together, with very scant supplies and destitute of game, a condition rendering an outbreak almost impossible, and says, "The only legal act the military can do is to make them starve peaceably, a most inhuman service." The Indian management in this country is a disgrace to the government.

BISHOP HERBERT VAUGHN, in describing the religious condition of England, says: "It would appear that considerably less than half of the population of this country frequents any place of worship on a Sunday, and that the minds of men are becoming silently alienated from the Christianity of their fathers. Doubt and unbelief are spreading even among the young, and girls in their teens prate about infidelity. We are witnessing the gradual dechristianization of society."

ACCORDING to William Hoyle, a very careful statistician, the expenditure for intoxicating liquors in Great Britain in 1881 was $635,372,300. The indirect costs and losses that result from drinking he estimates at $500,000,000 annually, and he declares that the drink expenditure averages yearly $7,500,000 more than the rental of all the houses and lands in the kingdom. The facts and figures by which he shows that the financial success of the budgets has been obtained at the cost of crime, pauperism, and lunacy are appalling.

SENATOR HOAR proposes to use books instead of powder as a means of civilizing and subduing refractory Indian tribes, contending that it is in the end a more efficacious, economical, as well as satisfactory plan to educate than to exterminate them; and, after showing by statistics that it has cost the United States government since 1779 more than one thousand million dollars to support and fight the Indians, he asks Congress to pass his bill appropriating two million dollars for the education of Indian children of the uncivilized tribes.

ONE wonders what sort of a prayer that was offered by a Rev. Mr. McClure, one of a mob who succeeded in lynching a criminal lately at Kokomo, Ind. We fancy it is a new departure for Judge Lynch's court to be opened by prayer. The prisoner, probably fearing the mob would complete the ceremonies by singing some hymn of their own choice, asked permission to do the singing himself. His request was granted, and he sang with much fervor, "See that my grave is kept green." On the conclusion of these services, the crowd hung him to the nearest tree.

ON the 2d inst., an attack was made on the Jews by the peasants near Anannieff, and thirty shops and eighty houses were destroyed. Soldiers have been sent to the place of disturbance, and thirty arrests are reported. But for the past negligence of the government, these demonstrations against the Jews would have been stopped long ere now. However, it is gratifying to see, notwithstanding the indignation of the Russian official press at the agitation in foreign countries in behalf of the Jews, that it has had the good effect to increase the efforts on the part of the government to suppress these disgraceful outrages.

THE stockholders in the mysterious "Keeley-motor" Company have grown tired after years of waiting for the completion of Mr. Keeley's wonderful motor and his consequent revelation of the secret of it, and, apparently beginning at this late day to mistrust that they have been befooled by the plausible stories of the inventor, have at last invoked the power of the law to compel him to reveal the secret of his invention. The Philadelphia court, which has according to their request ordered him to do so, may possibly find out the meaning contained in the adage that "any one may lead a horse to water, but who can make him drink?"

"THE Institute of France, which already contains on its rolls the names of some of the most eminent Jewish savants in that country," says the Jewish Watchman, "has admitted another co-religionist within its ranks by the election of M. Henry Weill, of Paris, as a member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, this body being a section of the Institute. While science has thus again honored a Jew, distinctions have also been conferred on Jewish votaries of Mars by the appointment of General Levy, Director of Engineering at Paris, and of Colonel Samuel as members of the Superior Commission on the Organization of the French Army. MM. Franck Breal and Oppert are also professors in the Collège de France. Decidedly, France is the only country where merit is rewarded with the highest distinction without regard to race, nationality, or religion."

STRIKES on a large scale continue in many of the labor centres of the country. The marble-cutters of New York city, the glass makers of New Jersey, the brick-layers of Philadelphia, the coal-miners of the Cumberland region, the lumbermen of Michigan, the railroad hands and shoemakers of Toronto, ask for higher wages and have stopped work to obtain them. The cost of living they say has increased, and they are entitled to more pay than they have been receiving. On the other hand, employers are disinclined to raise the pay of employes, for the reason that the increased cost of living is not balanced by larger incomes. To the poor crops of wheat and corn in the West and of cotton in the South, diminishing the demand for manufactured articles of the East, and reducing the price of railroad securities while causing the increased cost of living, the present critical situation of the country is no doubt largely due. A good crop more than anything else is needed to restore the country to a normal business condition.

EASTER SUNDAY, observed by orthodox Christians everywhere as the anniversary of the resurrection of the crucified Christ, was on last Sunday very generally observed by all the churches in this city, and even by a large proportion of non-church-going people. The extra attractions of choice music and elegant floral decorations offered by the churches, of late years, on that day, appeal to the æsthetic tastes of multitudes who have no denominational tendencies in religion and even to those of decided radical opinions. There is a growing demand in America among all classes for more frequent holidays, and every opportunity offered by Church or State in this direction is eagerly accepted as a means of recreation and relaxation. There is also a fast developing appreciation of the æsthetic in religion and in the daily concerns of life. The love of the beautiful and artistic is a taste which, despite the maudlinism of the Wilde school, should be cultivated and encouraged; and since even the rationalistic churches recognize Easter by the ministry of lovely flowers and exquisite music as a holiday, an anniversary worthy to be observed, it certainly can be added to the fête-days of Liberals as the anniversary of the resurrection of nature, especially if as on Sunday last it chances to be a day so spring-like that its every breeze seems to whisper welcome promise of the awakening of nature near at hand. By so observing it, we can help to turn the celebration of the day to its naturally symbolic meaning.

CONVICTION AND SENTIMENT IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

There is nothing, perhaps, that more forcibly reveals the transformation that has been going on in the religion of New England within the last twenty-five years than the increasing celebration of Easter. Our Puritan ancestors looked upon both the Easter and Christmas festivals as savoring of popery, and therefore as the very instigation of Satan. There were gross excesses on the celebration of these days in England; and against excesses of all kinds, especially of the spirit of worldliness and of the flesh, in the name of religion, the Puritans set their faces like flint. It was a part of their purpose in coming to these shores, not only to escape the contamination of false doctrines, but quite as much to be free from the contamination of pernicious observances and corrupt forms of worship. Christianity to them was a stern system of logical truth, to be accepted by the intellect and to break down the rebellious natural passions of the heart; but it had nothing for the imagination, nothing for the senses. All this part of human nature was to be crucified. Even the love of outward nature was a temptation to be resisted. And the deepest natural affections and instincts of the heart were to be stringently watched and checked and pared down and often mutilated and sacrificed in subjection to the stern demands of piety. The Easter and Christmas celebrations, though professedly religious, were too outward and sensuous and social not to share in this prohibition; and the prohibition was so effectual that for two centuries and more these festivals were hardly heard of in New England, except in the then comparatively few Catholic and Episcopal churches. Even flowers were not introduced into the Sunday services of churches until the time of Theodore Parker, who is said to have been the first minister in Boston to have had them on his pulpit.

But in the last twenty-five years, and mostly in the last half of these twenty-five years, a great change has been wrought in these respects. Now, the churches of the Congregational order, both Unitarian and Orthodox, vie with each other and with the Catholic and Episcopal churches in the special observance of both Easter and Christmas. At the Easter festival, in particular, in the last few years, there has been in many churches such extravagance in elaborate and costly floral decorations in connection with the services that some of the more thoughtful members are beginning to think that the rigid old Puritan broom may be in demand again before the proper standard of moderation and beautiful simplicity in the use of flowers shall be reached.

That the change thus denoted in the spirit of the dominant Protestant sects is in many regards a happy one will be generally admitted. The softening of the harsher features of Puritanism is itself a great gain. The change also is in the direction of an increasing liberality of religious convictions and of an approach of the sects to each other in sentiment and form, and hence it indicates a corresponding decrease of sectarian feeling. But there is another side to the picture. The change is not wholly good. It indicates, on the other hand, the weakening of the reign of thought in religion. It signals the advent of an era of religious sentiment in place of conviction, or the supremacy of the æsthetic and imaginative side of religion over beliefs. It is true that some not very penetrating Christian believers lay stress upon the fact that this increased celebration of Easter and Christmas is calling public attention in a very marked manner to the mission of Jesus, and is a recognition of his unique relation to the world; and hence to them it seems to indicate the growth of what they call "Christian truth." But this is an argument that does not have much weight with the wisest heads in the Church. For, though it be true that, in the popular belief the celebration is in honor of Jesus, yet it is a noteworthy fact that just those parts of the festivals which have been increasing in favor in latter years are features that date back to pagan beliefs and usages anterior to Christianity; and it is a further fact that many people join in the celebration precisely because it is not to them of peculiarly Christian lineage or significance, but has its sources in that deep subsoil of human nature which underlies a great variety of religious faiths; and, so far as it has reference to Jesus, it means to these persons the same natural thing as does a celebration in honor of Washington or Lincoln or any other human benefactor.

Moreover, it is a fact of still greater moment that, during these very years while the celebration of Easter and Christmas has been growing in favor, the whole dogmatic scheme of theology which has its centre in the birth and death of Jesus, and depends for its validity on the authenticity of the New Testament as the supernaturally inspired word of God, has been losing its hold on the convictions of people. There has never been a time in the history of Christendom when there has been so much doubt, doubt in the very heart of the Church itself, upon all the doctrines concerning the advent, nature, and mission of Jesus, nay, concerning his very words and acts, as there is to-day. It may even be said that the increased observance of these Christian festivals, so far from denoting an increasing adherence to the old phases of Christian faith, is not only entirely consistent with, but may actually signify, a decay of that faith in its intellectual form. Nor, if this be so, would it be the first time in history when people who have become conscious that a religious belief in which they have been wont to trust was slipping irrecoverably from their minds have clung all the more tenaciously to some usage or institution that has been associated with such belief, as if it could take the place of the vanishing faith and conceal even from themselves the vacancy. One of the marked characteristics of the Christian Church to-day, in spite of the evidences of outward prosperity, is death of mental conviction. Sentiment and sentimental practices are to large extent taking the place of the old robust beliefs that used to be rigorously proclaimed. Religious societies are devoting themselves much more than formerly to the æsthetics of spiritual culture. They appeal to the senses and make more effort to satisfy the imagination. They are becoming, too, more of the nature of social clubs. But, as a rule, they do not have so much of that kind of preaching which arouses thought and shakes profoundly the moral natures of people as used to be heard in Protestant pulpits.

This is not to be regarded as a plea for bringing back the old beliefs, however robust they were. They were often very rough and harsh in their robustness, and have gone or are going, never to return. But it is a plea for the thought-element in religion. This era of sentiment through which Christendom is passing is not wholly healthful, even though it has a liberalizing tendency. For the liberality that it begets is too often the liberality of indifference to convictions. Sentiment has its place, but it is a subordinate place: it cannot do the work of thought. It is thought that must guide. What religion, in both its conservative and its liberal phases, needs to-day more than anything else, is some powerfully vitalizing thought,—not thought merely as a speculative entertainment,— there is enough of that,—but thought so organic as to shape itself at once in masses of men to beneficent action. Positive beliefs are wanted,—not beliefs to be formulated and recited in creeds, but beliefs so all afire with mental and moral enthusiasm as to flame of themselves into noble deeds. Convictions are wanted,—not merely for free airing in a public convention, the sole use to which some people think convictions are to be put, but convictions to live by and to live for and to die for rather than abandon.

In spite of all attempts to save them, the old religious beliefs are steadily vanishing; while the new ones have not yet come in any well-conceived and systematic shape, or at least have not so been received by any large number of people. In this transition of Christendom from supernaturalism to natural religion, the Christian Church has taken to nourishing itself by sentiment. It lives and moves and has its being to-day in a misty feeling of reverence and gratitude for everything associated with the name and career of Jesus, making the most of this feeling in outward and visible modes of expression to strike the imagination. The sentiment is but the shadowy ghost of departed beliefs, yet it serves very well for those melodramatic representations of religion in which Christian churches are now most proficient. And the play will go on until there shall come some grand awakening of vital thought, bringing a fresh era of positive beliefs, which, like a mighty wind from heaven, shall sweep the stage of all shows and shams, and set up religion itself again in all its tremendous reality. When genuine religion comes, the acting of it will cease. It will be itself conviction and action and life. As Emerson says, "When God arrives, the gods depart."

MAGNANIMOUS THEISM.

That the possibility of such a thing as magnanimous theism has often seemed of late to be denied, if not in terms, with no uncertain implication, is an unquestionable fact. But the atheistic thinker cannot convict himself of mental smallness and ungenerosity in any surer way than by denying magnanimity to the theist,—not as a universal but as a possible possession. That theism is not necessarily magnanimous, I have confessed upon a previous occasion. All that theism does, as theism, says Frederic Harrison, is to answer a certain cosmical problem in a certain way. And to answer it in this way is not necessarily magnanimous. If there is lack of intellectual magnanimity in the atheist's literalness, which conceives of every theist as believing in a localized deity, there is an equal lack of intellectual magnanimity in the theist whose belief is in a localized deity, and who cannot conceive of a deity whose throne is not in some "part of the wide heavens." And, as the great majority of theists even at the present time do undeniably conceive God as a localized deity, a "non-natural man," it is not too much to say that a great majority of all theists are characterized by a lack of intellectual magnanimity. But it is not alone in virtue of its localizing God that theism fails of magnanimity. It fails of this whenever it ascribes to God unworthy attributes or courses of action which would ruin the character of a human being. Calvinism is one form of theism; but Calvinism is not magnanimous, if for no other reason than because it does not offer to our worship a magnanimous God. Surely, a God who calls into existence a race of beings with the intention of foredooming the greater part of them to eternal misery is not magnanimous. Surely, a God who could make the eternal welfare of countless generations depend upon the "original sin" of their first parents would not be magnanimous. Nor any more would be a God who should condemn a man to everlasting hell for any amount of sin that he could manage to commit within the extremest limits of our mortal life. Does not our popular theism also fail of magnanimity in virtue of its ideas of special providence and answer to prayer and supernatural revelation? Is it a magnanimous way of thinking about God,—to think of him as deliberately guiding this ocean-steamer safely across the Atlantic, and that one to inevitable collision with some iceberg drifting slowly down into the path of traffic, or with some other ship laden more deep with hopes and longings than with corn and wine? Is it a magnanimous way of thinking about God,—to think that he can be bull-dozed by the importunity of men's petitions into granting certain material or spiritual blessings which he would otherwise withhold? Is it a magnanimous way of thinking about God,—to think that he must interfere once and again with some after-thought of revelation to save the moral order of the world from ruinous collapse, or to imagine that he would turn water into wine or raise the dead to life to assure men of his power and grace when he could not assure them by the majestic order of the universe and the marvellousness of their own daily lives?

And yet again our popular theism fails of magnanimity, in virtue—which no virtue is—of its insistence that, if there be no "great task-master's eye" to oversee us at our work, then we have no reason for doing it well. And not only our popular theism indulges in this talk, but the deliberate, reasoned, argumentative theism of those who have come forward as the champions of theism against all of its assailants in these latter days is full of it to overflowing. Now, if I had allowed that atheism is magnanimous when it does not lie and steal, I should be debarred from charging lack of magnanimity upon the theist who insists, No God, no reason for right living. But I have not allowed that moral atheism, as such, is magnanimous. The moral atheist does no more than it is his duty to do, no more than his idea of morality as the survival of the fittest conditions of social well-being requires him to perform. But, seeing that there is no special magnanimity in his doing that which is for his own good and for the good of all, it follows that there is something less than magnanimity in the attitude of the theist who insists that, without a God to reward him for his good actions and punish him for his bad ones, he will not do those things and has no reason for doing those things which are for his own and all men's benefit. Our popular and polemical theism fails of magnanimity in no other respect so gravely as in its insistence that, without a consciously theistic basis, morality would have no claim on our regard. From the stand-point of such theism, the moral atheist may well seem magnanimous. And from the stand-point of the moral atheist, who recognizes that morality is the art of living happily together, such theism may well seem anything but magnanimous,—yea, altogether mean and sordid and contemptible.

There is then theism as well as atheism which is not magnanimous, which for one reason or another is very far from being so. There is also atheism which is magnanimous, as we have seen. And, now, magnanimous theism,—what is there to say for this? That it is infinitely possible and already grandly actual, that it has never been without its witnesses at any time in modern history, and that it is little likely to be without their natural and fit successors in any future generation.

Magnanimous theism! It is the theism of those who gladly recognize the truth that, by no fault of their own, many who have desired with strong desire to see and state aright the principle and law of universal life have found themselves unable to accept what seems to them to be involved in the theistic interpretation of the world. Therefore, for such they have no words of blame. They would be glad if these could honestly agree with them; but they would rather, infinitely rather, that they should honestly disagree with them than that they should try to make their thought appear different to others, by any infinitesimal shade of meaning, from what it appears to them in their most sacred privacy. I note the fact that many who can concede the perfect honesty and sincerity of men who have abandoned many of the commonly received beliefs of the community make a distinction when the question is of such central and commanding doctrines as those which are concerned with God and immortality. Here, unbelief is felt to have some criminal implication. I have been myself upbraided for allowing that without belief in God or immortality one might still be a good man, though I need not have gone beyond the limits of my own congregation for the most ample proof that this is so. The magnanimous theist will never be guilty of denying this. He can generally count among his friends and neighbors one or two living examples of the fact,—men of such moral whiteness that the morality of many a theist would show dark on such a ground. Nor will the magnanimous theist make any grudging allowance of the integrity and purity of the atheistic thinker, when these qualities are undoubtedly present. Rather will he rejoice that the foundations of morality are independent of all speculative opinions, and bear witness to his faith upon all suitable occasions, whatever social disesteem is earned thereby.

Magnanimous theism has another class of representatives in those who are not in any hurry to affix the taint of atheism upon those who hesitate to recite the ordinary formulas of belief. For, to the theist who is of a truly large and generous mind, his own belief in God is something so exceedingly precious that he does not willingly believe that others are without the substance of his creed, however they may be without its superficial form. That the magnanimous theists have never been in the majority is proved conclusively by the names of those who have been accounted atheists from first to last along the course of human history. "He is an atheist: he does not believe in the devil," is a fair sample of the course of reasoning that has been generally pursued. And with what result? With this,—that almost every man whose name is worth remembering in the history of philosophic, scientific, or religious thought, has been esteemed an atheist in his own time, and frequently long after. "The atheist Spinoza" is one of the commonplaces of religious literature. In Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, published a few years since, he is designated thus, "Philosopher, metaphysician, atheist." But after the "atheist" an interrogation point is thoughtfully inserted. Well may it be! For, if ever there lived upon this earth a man who was not an atheist,—a God-intoxicated man," as said Novalis,—it was Benedict Spinoza. But, in hundreds of instances, the stigma of atheism has been affixed where there was quite as little reason as in the case of Spinoza.

"Far in front the cross stands ready,
And the crackling fagots burn,
While the hooting mob of yesterday
In silent awe return,
To glean up the scattered ashes
Into history's golden urn."

The magnanimous theist is not over-anxious to affix the stigma of atheism. He sees that there are many ways of phrasing the supreme idea. He sees that a departure from the conventional phrasing often means a more vital appropriation of the essential quality of belief. He sees that, while a conscious theism may be little, an unconscious theism may be much. Willing to see things as they are, and not disposed to wrench things which are different and hostile into apparent unity, he cannot but perceive that the ideas which give to our theistic thought its purest spirituality and its most abiding helpfulness sometimes ally themselves with forms of thought extremely different from those which are most commonly received. A magnanimity is possible here which questions whether what is best in theism does not sometimes declare itself more seriously in those forms of thought which are not reckoned theistic by those who hold them than in those which are examples of the concretest theism of the time.

"God's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are his ways our ways." In the lore of magnanimous theism there is no text that takes a higher rank than this. It is because theism is becoming more magnanimous, and because with its enlarging mind it is developing a larger thought of God, that many of the forms of speech which have been satisfactory heretofore are used with steadily increasing hesitation. To many, I need hardly say, this hesitation is a sign of atheistic tendency. Any unwillingness to speak of God in the terms of a more or less refined anthropomorphism is assumed to be a stepping down from the old heights of affirmation. "Like us or less than we" is the accepted formula of the majority. Man is the highest that we know, and so we must conceive of God in terms of manlikeness or in something less. This is the argument. It is true and not true. It is true that, if we are going to conceive of God pictorially, we must conceive of him in terms of manlikeness or in something lower. But we surely can conceive of God as being infinitely different from man without attempting to conceive the nature of this difference; and to do this theism is being urged more and more powerfully by every new advance of its perception of the nature and the magnitude of the tremendous forces of the world.

"Unless above himself he can

in his conception of the Infinite and Eternal Power. Oh, it is not because the God-idea is becoming less exalted that the terms of manlikeness which have so long expressed it are falling into ever deeper disrepute! No: rather is it because the vastness and the splendor of the universe which science has revealed, and the nature of the processes by which it has been so far evolved, demand the supposition of a Being the methods of whose operation as infinitely transcend all human methods as its scope transcends the labors of our hands. "God's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are his ways our ways." Magnanimous theism is profoundly convinced of the truth of this text of ancient Scripture, but no less profoundly of the truth of that which follows, "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his thoughts higher than our thoughts, and his ways than our ways."

The theism of the past has shown its magnanimity in nothing else so much as in its steadfast cleaving to its faith in the eternal goodness; in spite of manifold disaster, grief, and pain. "Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him." For five and twenty centuries, these words have been the expression of this highest magnanimity. How many lips quivering with mortal agony have uttered them! How many, chill from their last kiss of husband, wife, or child, more dear to them than their own life! "Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him." And it shall go hard with us in the future if we cannot still take up this cry of many generations, and fill it with a confidence as sweet and strong as ever has informed the words since first they dared the Omnipotent to disappoint a trust so pure and high. Magnanimous theism! It is not enough that it shall conceive a God of infinitely greater power, infinitely more subtle operation, than any heretofore conceived,—a God infinitely different from our human personality. This might suffice our reason and imagination, but it would not satisfy our hearts. Better the old anthropomorphism and the old trust than the new magnanimity without that trust.

But why be without it? There is another text from that same Book of Job from which I have already quoted which has not lost one particle of its logical force by the rude wear and tear of centuries, "Can mortal man be more just than God, a man more pure than his Maker?" Does any one suggest that the God of our new theism is not a maker? True, he is not. True, he is "something far more deeply interfused" than any manufacturing deity. So much the better. For, if evolution be the method of the infinite operation, then it is sure that nothing can be evolved which is not first involved; no love, no tenderness can shine in any face of man or woman which was not part and parcel of the infinite life of God before the earliest singing of the morning stars. Ay, more: nothing can be evolved in thought which can suggest a higher possibility than the original and eternal spirit of the world.

"Nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean. Even that art
Which you say adds to nature is an art
That nature makes."

So, too, that thought which criticises nature is a thought which nature makes,—which God makes, if you prefer to speak in monosyllables. Perish the vanity which imagines that we can think of anything better than that which is forever and eternally, when all our thinking is the product of the eternal order of the world! And so for us it is still possible to say as confidently as any theist of the past, ay, with a confidence which no theist of the past could rationally legitimate as we can to-day, "Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him." Trouble and care and grief and pain and death may press upon us with a hard and crushing weight, but forevermore the sentiment of justice in our hearts is proof of an eternal principle of justice at the heart of things,—is proof that, if we could but follow the great sweep of events until it comes full circle, we should see all that is now most difficult to understand becoming part and parcel of a beneficent and all-embracing unity.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

ANOTHER TRIBUTE TO SAMUEL JOHNSON.

I have no doubt that some friend will pay a tribute to the memory of Samuel Johnson more fully and fitly than I can do, and yet I feel that, having had the privilege of knowing him since he was a student in the Divinity School, I cannot refrain from expressing something of the admiration and reverence I have felt for him through all the years of his life. The Buddhists have a beautiful doctrine of the Karma which a man gains by his life and his deeds, and which is all that he takes with him into another sphere of existence. More than any one I have ever known do I feel of Samuel Johnson that he had achieved a true personality, a Karma which would be his in all changes or chances of existence. Whatever else he failed in, this he achieved, the building up of himself in nobleness, in truth, in singleness of heart, in reverence.

But this personality was as far as possible from an intrusive individuality, thrusting the concerns or the accidents of self upon others. His own grand saying was characteristic,—“Self-reliance must mean reliance upon God, or it is folly or something worse.” There was a remarkable simplicity and earnestness in the way in which he met you after a long absence. He did not pass through the ordinary commonplaces of inquiries after health and relations and friends; but he would at once almost startle you with some earnest question or thought, which it seemed as if he had held ready in his mind until he met the one who could respond to it.

Three occasions rise prominently in my memory as I think of him. When a young man just ready to enter the Unitarian ministry, his friend and relation, Theodore Parker, was struggling with the censure of that Church. Samuel Johnson wished to place himself squarely by his side, and he urged Mr. Parker to allow him to speak in his pulpit. Mr. Parker refused to let him commit himself thus. But when Mr. Parker was absent for a month, leaving John T. Sargent to supply the pulpit, Mr. Johnson went to him, and obtained the coveted opportunity to take his place by the side of him who was reviled and rejected of men. Again, during the first years of the War of the Rebellion, the whole country was excited almost to hatred against England and the English from the aid and comfort which they were supposed to give to the Confederate cause. Samuel Johnson chanced to be in England at that time, and learned the true temper of the middle classes of England. On his return, he spoke in the Music Hall, and told his countrymen of the injustice they were doing to a noble nation, and how, in spite of the scorn of a few conservatives and bigots, the great heart of the English nation was with us in a war against slavery, and her manufacturing population bore with patience the terrible sufferings it brought to them, knowing that their sacrifice was to bring freedom to the slave. At the close of his address, that noble abolitionist, Miss Lucy Osgood, went up to take him by the hand, and said in her slow, emphatic language, “Mr. Johnson, God has given you the great gift to increase, and not to decrease.”

And the third time which stands out prominently from the many occasions when I have heard his eloquent speech was when he spoke to the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society after the death of Charles Sumner. Never was a nobler tribute paid by one heroic soul to another, and the tenderness and depth of feeling still thrill through my heart with which he said, “Massachusetts rejoices to-day with joy unspeakable that she had wiped off from her record the stain of unjust reproach on this greatest of her heroes and statesmen.” My recollection of the words may not be exact, but the look and the tone will never be forgotten. Few worldly honors came to this man. His life was quiet, sad, solitary, girt around with trial and sorrow known but to very few. But it was a grand, heroic life, unsullied by vice or passion or selfishness, heroic in its devotion to truth, to righteousness, to the welfare of others. From his recluse life, the sundering of the personal tie by death is keenly felt by but few,—by those few, oh, how keenly!—but the grand influence of such a nature and such fidelity to its highest demands should never be allowed to fade away.

E. D. CHENEY.

THE PROVINCE OF SCIENCE.

To a great and complicated question, a fresh interest has been imparted by the recent able articles of Mr. Wasson in The Index; and the interest of the readers of this journal will doubtless be well promoted by giving this subject a large attention. The excellent response of Mr. M. J. Savage is not final. The question is whether science can vindicate theism; that is, the existence of a personal supramundane deity. Before we can settle this question, we must agree on the sphere and function of science; and, in facilitation of this, I beg leave to utter in your broad-based journal the following reflections.

The phrase “scientific knowledge” has in these days become very familiar and popular. If it has any distinctive significance, it denotes a knowledge which has some characteristic differentiation from all other knowledge, and comprehensively from knowledge which is non-scientific. Is there any such distinction definable? This question has been raised by the most distinguished of living English philosophers, in his essay on the “Genesis of Science,” and he answers it in the negative. He says scientific knowledge is distinguished from the prescientific only accidentally and superficially by its greater remoteness from perception, and by a greater “complexity of the processes required to achieve previsions,” and by its “greater exactness of quantitative observations and calculations.”

I consider this as too vague, and think that a precise discrimination is possible, and that thus we can secure a precise definition of scientific knowledge. The primary characteristic of scientific knowledge is its LEXICALITY, or a knowledge of phenomena as occurring and recurring according to law or in a uniform order. Prescientific observation does not take the lexical character of phenomena into consideration. It views phenomena without any mental reference to any order of succession and without any notice of the fixedness of their connection, and sometimes even on an assumption that the order may be or is uncertain and capricious. The conception of law, as we are all aware, in its purity,—that is, of the pure lexical character and connection of phenomena,—has been of very gradual formation in the human mind. It does not belong to men in the lower stages of mental development; and, even when that development is much advanced, the conception and belief in the reign of law are still confused and uncertain. It is only within quite recent times, and even now only in minds of scientific culture, that the lexical conception is entertained with any adequate degree of clearness and purity.

It is just here, I conceive, that we should draw the line of demarkation between a scientific mind and a mind which is essentially unscientific. The mind enters upon the scientific pathway when it fairly attains the conception and conviction of the lexicality of all phenomena, and proceeds to make this the ground of action and judgment. Thought and knowledge are, then, scientific, because they are lexical. Hence, conflict with known laws becomes a scientific proof of error in any of our inferences or supposed observations.

Mr. Spencer says that the notation of likeness and unlikeness is the beginning of science. But this is too general to be significant. This notation is necessary to science, but it does not imply the slightest degree of science proper. It would be possible and even necessary, though all change were considered as supernatural and capricious and irregular, in which case it has been allowed there could be no science; and it is and will be actually carried on where miracles and various supernatural interpositions of gods and demons are supposed to be very common; and where science is not thought of or thought of only to be repudiated. This notation belongs to the lowest form of consciousness, and cannot be any characteristic of a scientific mind or procedure. So the prescientific mind of every grade has made quantitative observations quite accurately to a degree, even in regard to supposed non-lexical phenomena. Nearly all myths and legends exemplify this. They tell the stature of the giants, the number of their slain; and the Bible tells how long the sun and moon were stayed in their course by Joshua, and how far the sun receded to please Hezekiah. But, in such low conditions of the mental world, you never find the general utterance of the lexicality of all phenomena, and that, in the light of this principle, they ought always to be investigated. The evident reason is that this is the distinctive conception and method of science, and was therefore impossible in prescientific times. As soon as we attain to this, it is plain we have become essentially scientific in the grain and habit of the mind. Our conclusions may not be always correct and our inquiries may be comparatively barren from various causes, but, if we proceed on the assumption of the lexicality of phenomena, we are unimpeachably scientific in the essential spirit and method of our work, though it may admit of vast improvement in the details of its operation.

From the acknowledged lexicality of phenomena, the anticipation and retrospection of them become possible, and thus only are they possible; and this possibility is by induction or deduction from the lexicality. Thus, these two great processes of ratiocination in science depend on the lexicality. Without it, they would have neither fulcrum nor place to put it for their lever.

Another of the great processes of science growing out of the recognition of phenomenal lexicality is Classification. There can be no classes or orders till there is an Order. After we have found a fixity of co-existence and succession, we can note the characteristics of things under this all-embracing order of things, and put like with like, until the total of known objects are classified.

Now, if we make a generous allowance for the varying use of terms to express the same idea, it will be easy to furnish proof that the principle I have advanced is not so novel as justly to subject it to suspicion and harsh treatment as a mere adventurer. Under the impression that science and philosophy are one and the same, the term "philosophy" has by many great writers been defined as I have defined science. With M. Comte, the highest action of the human mind is the notation of lexical phenomena and making legitimate inferences and classification therefrom, and this he calls "philosophy positive." This, too, was the notion which Lord Bacon always had in his mind when he used the term "philosophy." Bacon's influence led to the universal use in England, till quite recently, of the term "philosophy" to designate science, especially physical science; so that psychology and metaphysics for distinction's sake had to be called mental or intellectual philosophy, and by reaction physical science came to be wretchedly designated as natural philosophy. From Bacon to Sir William Hamilton there was no variation from this notion of the nature and characteristic method of science or philosophy as one, as a lexical pursuit of lexicality. As a decisive verification of this statement, I will cite Dugald Stewart, who is an unimpeachable representative of British methods of thought. He says, in his introduction to Moral Philosophy: "We find from experience that certain events are invariably conjoined, so that, when we see the one, we expect the other; but our knowledge in such cases extends no further than to the fact. To ascertain those established conjunctions of successive events which constitute the order of the universe, to record the phenomena which it exhibits to our observation, and to refer them to their general laws, is the great business of philosophy. Lord Bacon was the first person who was fully aware of the importance of this fundamental truth." In contrasting this Baconian wisdom with the folly of all previous thought, Stewart adds in the next sentence that "the ancients considered philosophy as the science of causes [his own Italics], and hence were led to many speculations to which the human faculties are altogether incompetent." Thus, he expressly excludes causes from the domain of philosophy, and, like M. Comte, confines philosophy to the notation of lexical phenomena. In the next paragraph but one, he says: "By investigating the general laws of nature, and by reasoning from them synthetically, he can often trace an established order where a mere observer would perceive nothing but irregularity. This last process of the mind is more peculiarly dignified with the name of philosophy; and the object of the rules of philosophizing is to explain in what manner it ought to be conducted."

"In all our inquiries, whether they relate to matter or mind, the business of philosophy is confined to a reference of particular facts to other facts more general; and our most successful researches must always terminate in some law of nature, of which no explanation can be given," because it cannot be referred to any ulterior or any more general law.

"To this method of philosophizing (which is commonly distinguished by the title of the 'method of induction'), we are indebted for the rapid progress which physical science has made since the time of Lord Bacon. The publication of his writings fixes one of the most important eras in the history of science." Thus, he identifies the method of induction with the notation and generalization of lexical phenomena. And to this, again, he limits "all our inquiries, whether they relate to matter or to mind." This is the positive philosophy, pure and simple, published five years before M. Comte was born, and in the orthodox city of Edinburgh. And this, so far, is Baconian, as Stewart affirmed.

This is enough for one paper. In the next, I propose to show how on this basis it is impossible, "by searching, to find out God." W. I. GILL, A.M.

"THE CONSCIOUSNESS OF GOD."

Our minds themselves are inheritances as well as our bodily peculiarities. At any rate, they are so sophisticated by traditions sucked in with our mother's milk, or with inherited beliefs and mental and moral tendencies of all sorts, that it is hard to say what beliefs are native to our consciousness, or instinctive and constitutional with it. In general, one can affirm that a religious belief or a belief in God has to be learned as much as a language. Because English is a child's native language, he does not necessarily speak it, unless he is gradually taught it. The Mohammedan child knows nothing about Allah or his prophet, until he is taught to ejaculate their names with a fervid devotion. So with regard to Christ. The child of Christian parents has no instinctive consciousness of Christ. In a recent able sermon on "The Wisdom of the World," which I happened to peruse, occurs the following statement; namely, that "the consciousness of God is just as native to the mind as the instinct that holds the child to the parent's breast." If a child should be secluded from human intercourse, as Caspar Hauser was, it is safe to say that not a theological name or notion would be found in his consciousness, that he would be Godless and languageless both. Of course, according to the really able sermon from which I have detached the above dognia, "the world" has no real "wisdom," the Hebrew apostle, Paul, having been the monopolist of that article. But let that pass. The notion of God in the consciousness is beyond question an imported notion, one brought from afar both in space and time. The word "God" is in such common use that we seem to mean something or somebody, when we use it. But, in these days, we are not on terms of easy intercourse with any supernatural being or beings, as certain races of the fore-world were, if we may credit the documents which they left as legacies to us. According to Homer and the Hebrew Bible, the two books which have moulded Western belief and civilization longer and more potently than any other books, men once knew the gods or god as we know our next-door acquaintances. Such people might well believe in God or gods. "The consciousness of God" might well be found in their minds. But we continue to use their phraseology and familiar way of speaking of "God" without any personal experience of a supernatural being whatever. All the personalities which we know are our fellow-men. Meantime, an earthly parent, especially the mother, is a part of the infant's existence. Their personalities are not yet fairly separated while the infant is a nursing. One of the oldest or earliest cults was that of the earth as the all-mother, or The Mother by way of emphasis. Such a worship and deification were natural, almost inevitable. Far back in historic time, the blue sky was regarded as the dwelling-place of an all-father, the correlate, so to speak, of the all-mother below. That there has been what may be called a "sense of deity" in all the different races of men is true enough; that is, there has been a feeling on the part of men, and a constant experience for good and evil, and weal and woe, of a controlling power or complex of powers outside of themselves, which moulded them and sustained them, and from which they could not escape. The Indian of the far West, who is still in his primitive state, believes that the thunder and lightning are live, lively, conscious manifestations of power, fierce, destructive, supernatural personalities or gods. The Indian is thus still at that stage of human development in which "the consciousness of God is native to his mind." He still remains in the world of to-day a primitive man, capable of actual theological experiences; while we, poor, civilized "fellows," have lost that capability.

The Semitic race is said to have been originally monotheistic, other races were as naturally and on as reasonable ground polytheistic. "The consciousness of God," if it is meant thereby the God of the theologians, metaphysicians, and creed-makers, could never have been a spontaneous, instinctive belief. It is a highly sophisticated notion. The primitive man could feel himself in an environment of powers, forces, and phenomena, which he could not control; and so he fell to deifying and personifying them and propitiating them with prayers, offerings, and sacrifices. Here, we have the genesis of religion with its rites. But it is useless to go over this ground further. According to theology, cosmos is an infinite papacy or imperialism or royalty. It is the God of theology which current science and reflective thought repudiate and refuse to recognize. Indeed, the word "God" draws along with it so many concessions to superstition and a cruel, persecuting dogmatism, it is the synonyme of so much that is detestable, it is a word that has been so constantly and immemorably in the mouths of hypocrites and fanatics, and of the persecutors and oppressors of humanity, that it is not wonderful that some of the noblest champions of human rights refuse to speak or write it. Theism, atheism, pantheism, monotheism, tritheism, polytheism,—with none of these words in your mouth can you solve the riddle of the world: you only multiply unknown terms by using them. The above are all Greek words, coinages of the subtle, metaphysical brains of the Greek philosophers, from whom they were borrowed by the early Christian synods and councils. One of the old Greek philosophers, Theodorus by name, was expressly called atheos; that is, "the man without a God," a needless state of destitution, one would think, in an ancient Greek whose countrymen had such an extensive assortment of deities to choose from. But Theodorus was a profound thinker, with a deep insight into man and nature. He said that the world was the wise man's country. He was content to be stigmatized as an atheist, and to be insulted by brutal mobs and brutal tyrants for his non-acquiescence in their puerile superstitions; for the worshippers of Apollo and Zeus were as implacable persecutors of so-called atheists as were the worshippers of the Semitic Jehovah, or as have been the worshippers of the Holy Trinity or tri-personal God, of the Vatican and Lutheranism and Calvinism or of the Mohammedan Allah. Fortunately for the moral, social, political, and intellectual prospects of mankind, there are ever-increasing multitudes of men of the purest character and profoundest insight who, like Theodorus of yore, are willing to incur the charge of atheism rather than subscribe to the immemorial orthodoxies. It is because such have in their souls "the feeling infinite" and the deepest sense of the whole, the good, the beautiful, and the true that they have done with religious formulas and supernatural personalities.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

AN article on "Scientific Philosophy," by Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D., is to appear in the London Mind, the quarterly review edited by Prof. G. Croom Robertson, which Mr. Conway has described as "the very highest philosophical periodical in Europe." Owing to the length of the article, its publication will be delayed till next October or January.

THE Seymour Times, a radical weekly paper, edited and published by Dr. J. R. Monroe, late of Seymour, Ind., has recently changed its title and place of publication, and will hereafter be known as The Age of Indianapolis. Under whatever name it is known, so long as the present versatile editor is at its head, it will be sure to keep up with the times and be found occasionally abreast of the age.

OUR next number will contain, among other attractions, a fine tribute to the character and work of the late Samuel Johnson from the pen of the distinguished Oriental scholar and writer, Max Müller, an article by Geo. Jacob Holyoake, entitled "A Wild Preacher," which will be of interest to many American readers who remember the erratic career of Joseph Barker, the "preacher" referred to, and contributions from Prof. W. D. Gunning and Mr. F. M. Holland.

THE Boston Post, referring to the New England Fast day, which was originally a day of actual fasting, humiliation, and prayer, remarks: "A man may go to church or to the theatre, to a ball game or to a bicycle race, according to his preference; and the fast is a custom now more honored in the breach than the observance." The Transcript says of this day: "It is unique even among our own local customs. Ostensibly a day of penance and prayer, it is really as pleasant and gleesome a holiday as we have. . . . We have not too many holidays; and, as a wise and genial ex-governor says, 'Must not the young men have a base-ball day, and must not the fathers of families have a day to go house-hunting by the seaside?'"

THE Congregationalist, in a courteous notice of Capt. R. C. Adams' article published in The Index of March 23, after quoting a sentence in which the author says in substance that he knows Congregationalist ministers who are rationalists, remarks, "If Captain Adams really knows any such ministers, is he not, in fairness to those to whom he does not refer, in honor bound to mention their names?" Captain Adams thinks differently. He writes us: "I cannot respond to the invitation of the Congregationalist to mention the names of rationalistic ministers. My idea of 'honor' suggests just the opposite course. It is an easy matter for every parishioner to satisfy himself about the Orthodoxy of his own minister; and, if he fears my imputations point in that direction, let him wait on his minister in private with the printed confession of faith and church creed, and put his questions point blank. On the other hand, if any minister feels the need of vindicating his Orthodoxy, he has opportunity every Sunday to declare his position."

REV. DR. RYDER says: "The supreme question before every human soul now upon earth is not Whence came I? but Whither am I going, and what are the rules by which I am to be guided while I tarry upon this earth? To this question, religion attempts to furnish an answer; but with it science has nothing to do." A question with which "science has nothing to do" is a question which admits of no answer, and which is therefore of no practical interest or value to the race. But "religion attempts to furnish an answer." The answer either admits of verification or proof of some kind, or it does not. If it does, it belongs to the province of science, even though at the same time it belongs to the province of religion. If it does not admit of proof, it is unworthy of consideration. Men who dogmatize about matters of which they know nothing, and who, when asked for the proofs of their statements, declare that they relate to matters with which "science has nothing to do," are "survivals" of an age of theology. "Theology is the art of teaching what nobody knows anything about."

THE following paragraph we find in the Montreal Daily Star: "On Sunday last, the esteemed pastor of the American Presbyterian Church was called upon to perform a duty which, to him, must have been exceedingly unpleasant. It was an announcement proclaiming the removal from the roll of church membership of five of his congregation, at their own request, for the reason that they had adopted views conflicting with the doctrines of evangelical religion. Before taking final action in the matter, those in authority conferred with the heretical members to discuss with them the points of difference, and to persuade them to reconsider their position. These efforts were unavailing, and there was, it appears, no course left but the public proclamation referred to, which was expressed in terms of great kindness and sympathy. We are informed that it is the custom in the American Presbyterian Church to make a public announcement of admissions to church membership, as it is of any removals, which are exceedingly rare. The persons whose names have been struck off the roll include two ladies and three gentlemen, whose alienation is a matter of profound regret to pastor and congregation alike."

SAYS Draper, in his Intellectual Development of Europe: "Labor was despised, hence the downfall of the Roman Empire. The treatment of the laborers was atrocious. On the murder of one Pedanius, four hundred slaves were put to death, when it was obvious to every one that scarcely any of them had known of the crime. To such a degree had this system been developed that slave labor was cheaper than animal labor, and work formerly done by cattle was done by men. The class which should have constituted the chief strength of the country disappeared, labor becoming so ignoble that the poor citizen would not become an artisan, but became a pauper. The concentration of power and the increase of immorality proceeded with equal step. Crimes were committed such as the world had never before witnessed. An evil day is approaching, when it becomes recognized in a community that the only standard of social distinction is wealth. That day in Rome was soon followed by corruption and terrorism. No language can describe its state after the civil wars. The accumulation of power and wealth gave rise to untold depravity among the aristocracy. A citizen had to deposit a bribe before a trial at law could be had. The social body was a festering mass of rottenness. The aristocracy was demagogue. The city was a hell for the laborer. No villainy that the annals of human wickedness can show was left unperpetrated. Remorseless murders, the betrayal of parents, husbands, wives, and friends, was reduced to a system which degenerated into crimes that cannot be written."

THE first impulse of people brought up under theological teachings, in the presence of mortal peril or a great natural convulsion, is to drop on their knees and fall to praying, as though behind the danger, the tempest, earthquake, or tornado, were a being who could be induced by abject servility and supplication to stay his hand. But Horace represents his stoic just man as standing upright and unalarmed amid the ruins of nature, in the strength of his own conscious rectitude. Once, universal mankind were devotees, accustomed to resort to prayer in all emergencies of peace and war. At present, the most intelligent, enlightened persons have ceased to offer petitionary prayers. Their religion is not servile, and they are not sycophantic courtiers of the higher powers. Their religion is a disinterested, reverential, intelligent recognition of the truth, or, as John Stuart Mill says, "the strong and earnest direction of the emotions and desires to an ideal object, recognized as of the highest excellence and as rightfully paramount over all selfish objects of desire." So long as men remain abjectly ignorant, the discipline of religious fear and servile, selfish devotion will continue to control them; while as fast as men are delivered from bondage to ignorance, and become rational seekers after truth and knowledge, their naturally upright persons will cease to be bowed in servile homage of aught in heaven or earth. The sense of awe inspired by the mystery of being, and the effort to realize in character and conduct the noblest ideals of the human mind, constitute the most fitting worship and the most rational religion.

POETRY.

EXISTENCE. For The Index.

Mist on the mountain top,
Rills down the mountain side,
Rivers in the vale below,
Endless ocean beyond.

Out from the arms of death,
Snatched by a sunny breath,
Back to the mountain top
Again comes the mist.

Rills down the mountain side,
Rivers in the vale below,
Endless ocean beyond.

The round of the mist
From mountain to sea
Is the round of existence,
Past, present, to be.

The Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 13, 1882.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, by an incorporated Board of Trustees nominated by the Free Religious Association. Terms: Three dollars per year, in advance.

THE objects of THE INDEX may be defined by the objects of the Free Religious Association; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

REPORT

Special Committee appointed at Annual Meeting, May, 1881, to present plans for "more national and effective work" to the Midwinter Conference of the Free Religious Association.

[Printed as adopted by the Conference, and referred for action to the next Annual Meeting.]

As the first conference of this Committee developed a wide range of opinion in its membership, the Chairman addressed the following questions to each member, for the purpose of eliciting distinct individual expression of views for presentation at this meeting:

1st. Do you approve of attempting to form State auxiliaries to the Free Religious Association?

2d. If so, should they have delegate power of representation in the annual meeting of the Association, or should the effort be made to create independent State organizations, auxiliary to the parent Association only, in forming, consolidating, and making more effective the liberal sentiment of the country?

3d. Is there any kind of State society, not suggested above, which you would favor, and, if so, will you define it?

4th. With or without State Free Religious Associations, do the best interests of the National Free Religious Association require the services of an agent for the whole or a portion of the time?

5th. Is there, in your opinion, any way by which the Free Religious Association as it is, or through State societies, if such existed, could properly help in the formation of local organizations of the character of Professor Adler's society in New York or the societies in Providence, R.I., or Florence, Mass.?

6th. Can you suggest any plan, not included in the above, which in your opinion would give "increased activity" and "more national and effective" usefulness to the Free Religious Association?

The replies to these questions showed that four out of the five members of your Committee, including the Chairman, earnestly advise increased work by the Association; and also, as the one most important means to that end, the constant employment of a paid agent to carry out its plans for further usefulness. As to the methods to be used in this increased work of the Association, there are differences of opinion in your Committee as in the Association at large. Two members of the Committee, for different reasons, discourage all attempts to form any kind of State associations. Three members of the Committee, on the other hand, believe that some form of State association is needed in certain sections of the country to bring our scattered membership into vital, helpful acquaintance, and to attract to the ranks of paying supporters of The Index and of the various activities of our Association the wholly unorganized liberal sentiment of the country. One member of the Committee thinks we should devote ourselves wholly to building up local societies wherever there is a promising field for such. One thinks we should form some connection with those societies already existing which are of a character to commend themselves to us. The majority of the Committee, while agreeing with the minority in desiring, above all things, to see strong, self-sustaining, respected, and helpful liberal societies established in all possible places, believe that this end can be accomplished, in many instances, better through some preliminary forms of State and general work than by making it the primary and direct object.

Your Committee conceived its work to be not only the expression of its own individual opinions, whether united or divergent, but also the collection and condensation in definite form of the general views of the Association on the subject of further organization, so far as such could be obtained, and the recommendation of such a scheme as in its judgment would secure the largest and most devoted adherence. Acting on this view, the Chairman has corresponded as widely as was in her power, and consulted the records of past action by the society, and the Committee now make a majority report, which does not perfectly express the views of any member, but aims to fairly represent that element in the Free Religious Association which is in favor of a more vigorous promulgation of our principles.

What may be called the aggressive element of the Association seems to be divided into two wings as to method. One class or wing feels the transcendent importance of local liberal societies to do for the radical what the churches do for the supernatural religionist in social, intellectual, and moral lines. They see the imperative need for ethical training and intellectual stimulus of the children of those who have left the special and limited forms of religion, by methods consistent with the parents' lives and profession. They see also, that the principles of rational religion can never take deep, strong, enduring root in the mass of humanity until its philosophical theories are made manifest in practical measures, and that for this the devotion of men and women set apart to the work of teachers and expounders of the new faith is absolutely necessary; and they feel sure that these necessary teachers will not be found in sufficient numbers and of the quality demanded until there seems to be prepared for them some field of work. Hence, this class of members, who are in favor of "increased activity" of the Association, urge that it all be directed toward the formation of local societies of the character of those mentioned above, namely, Professor Adler's and the Providence and Florence societies.

The other wing are less anxious for attempts to form local societies, many of them being very shy of anything "churchly" in form or of any kind of organization which binds to stated attendance upon Sunday meetings, to Sunday-school teachings for children, and to close personal relations of radicals on bases of union liable, like all such, to need revision. These look to the general educational, charitable, and social forces to divide up the work of the old church life, and to private parental instruction for the training of the children of radicals. They think they see little need for the older form of organization after the older faith has passed away. Yet they heartily believe in and favor the extension of the work of general enlightenment in which the Free Religious Association is engaged. They feel that the results of modern thought and investigation should be applied to religious problems of belief and duty, by public teachers, through the press and the platform, in conventions, and by means of lecture-courses in all favorable places. And many of this class believe that we shall yet have local organizations (such as the other wing desire to help in forming), but that we are not yet ready for it and must prepare the ground by more active general work. Others again feel that all movement for local organization which has power, which comes to stay and hold a place of influence among the beneficent forces of society, must be a movement from within, self-incited and shaped, not superinduced from without by means of missionary efforts of the National Association. The majority of your Committee have tried, in the resolutions which they offer, to furnish a common ground of work for these varying elements.

For any form of activity, money, enthusiasm, and workers are needed. To gain these, the Association must increase its membership; must secure more vital coöperation between liberals of different sections of our country; must arouse the indifferent but cultured and wise liberalism of our land to some adequate conception of the dangers to morality which inhere in the divorce of the highest intelligence of an era from its popular forms of religion; must stir the common heart by presenting some transcendent devotion of life side by side with its pure philosophy of belief. And this means that we must lift up our standard of rational religion to a more prominent and commanding position, that all over this great America it may be seen by those who belong with us, but do not yet know it. If we commence by exclusive efforts toward local organization, we shall have but a limited area in which to work until our knowledge of the needs and conditions of the different sections of our country is more extended and exact. On the other hand, the advice of those who warn us against too diffused and formal effort must be heeded. The vote of the twelfth annual meeting of this Association, indorsing the resolutions of Messrs. C. D. B. Mills, Seth Hunt, and David H. Clark, as further defined by the Sub-committee, Messrs. Abbot, Potter, and Hinckley, committed us to the support of an agent, and to encouragement of the formation of local societies, as well as to other activities. The majority of your Committee would emphasize this past action of the Association, and we suggest that the chronic difficulty of securing a suitable person to act as agent for the inadequate compensation we can afford might be overcome by carefully defining the work, and trying to obtain partial service, from one to six months, from several competent persons. The person we desire for an agent is generally occupied more congenially with better pay elsewhere, being too valuable to be left idle. And we cannot ask such persons to leave that work and accept the small sum and hard labor we offer. But we believe there are devoted helpers in our ranks who, while unable to give us all their time for half or quarter pay, would gladly give two or three months a year for merely nominal remuneration, for the sake of the cause.

We further suggest, as the next step in importance of progress toward a "more national and effective" organization of the Free Religious Association, that our annual meeting be held in different sections of the country, instead of always in Boston. Other national bodies—the "Social Science Association," the "Association for the Advancement of Women," and similar educational and philanthropic societies—find the movable plan of annual meeting very efficacious in enlarging membership and spreading abroad interest in and knowledge of their purposes and work. Why should we not find the same good results follow us from section to section, as we were invited from one centre of radical thought to another?

We further recommend that the annual meeting be a longer and more educational gathering; that its sessions continue for three days, giving opportunity for more thorough attention to business in the morning hours, and fuller discussion in the afternoon and evening sessions. And we earnestly recommend that Free Religion be presented at these annual meetings, not only or chiefly as a movement in philosophy, but equally at least as a movement of moral devotion, set free from all limiting traditions of the past, to work out the real salvation of man individually and through a regenerated social order, here and now, from evil and evil-working conditions. Other agencies are at work in general literature, in institutions of learning, in advancing science, in special reformatory movements, to free the human mind from slavish superstitions and traditional forms of belief.

Other agencies are at work to cultivate in men and women the critical habit of mind that emancipates from supernatural dogmas. Other religious bodies are at work, notably the Unitarian Christian, in spiritualizing inherited faiths, and in gently welding the new and old thought-growths together. But we, if we are to have a distinctive place and office powerful enough to arouse in our membership that enthusiasm of devotion which alone ensures successful effort, must place our emphasis, more strongly than is done by any other religious body, on the preëminent duty of ethical training of the individual, and the establishment of just social relations in all the conditions of life. Let us have it understood that this Association stands first, last, and always, for the moral development of mankind in its present life, and in its actual and practical conditions; that we direct our most earnest efforts toward the study and practice of what is right, as taught by investigation of actions and their results on the individual and on society; that, in our view, neither any theological nor any anti-theological belief saves, but only obedience, willing and constant, to discovered laws of conduct; that, with us, speculative opinions, however valuable and wise, are not only obsolete as tests of future salvation and present character, but relegated to a secondary place in discussion of the vital interests of human welfare. Let us have it understood, in short, that the Free Religious Association is not only a free platform for the statement of the most advanced thought in religion, but a working laboratory for the discovery of laws of social progress, and their rigorous and beneficent application to the most needy men and women we know; that we desire freedom of inquiry and expression chiefly for the great work of learning to distinguish between conventional and real morality, for finding out the secrets of ethics by the same method which gives us scientific knowledge in other branches; namely, the method of untrammelled investigation, of acceptance of verified facts of experience.

We must rid ourselves of the vice of exclusiveness, of that intellectual aristocracy that feels itself commissioned with a message only to the learned and fortunate, if we would root ourselves in the common earth as a living growth of power. And our mission is directly to the whole of humanity in just so far as it has a moral significance. Your Committee ventures these suggestions because, in its opinion, we must have a rallying cry to touch and enkindle the moral devotion as no purely intellectual statement of belief can do, if we would join great numbers of workers to our call; and because, in its opinion, much recognition of this element of our work should be heard at our proposed lengthened annual meetings. We would also suggest that some definite and persistent effort be made at our public meetings to increase our memberships, and secure new subscribers to The Index, and pledges of pecuniary aid; and that for these purposes a Business Committee be appointed to have these matters in charge at each annual meeting and convention of the Association.

Your Committee, as will be seen by the resolutions appended, do not recommend any form of State Association having organic union with the Free Religious Association by means of delegate representation at our annual meeting. Although two members of the Committee favored such organic union as giving firmness to our organization, the Chairman found that there was decided opposition to the plan on the part of some of our wisest counsellors, and hence it was abandoned. Another suggestion looking toward continued union between the National and State Association was also given up for the same reason; which suggestion was as follows: That the President of each State Association, should such be formed, should be ex-officio member of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association. Your Committee gladly heeds the advice of those who warn us against anything savoring of denominational censorship or control over local liberal societies, and would avoid recommending any kind of work leading toward the embarrassments of two fixed forms of union. We recommend simply the selection of favorable States as points of aggressive action, and the sending to such States of our selected agent to arouse, by conference with our members and friends in those localities, an interest in our work; that the agent seek to direct that interest into the channels of conventions or lecture-courses, supervising them, and assisting before and after the public gatherings in concentrating the awakened enthusiasm upon some form of State or local Association pledged to continue the work there begun; that this State Committee or State Association or local society choose its own constitution and methods of work, and be independent of all control by us, the only requisite being a general conformity to our principles and methods; that our agent be instructed to earnestly urge upon the local friends in these selected States the need of securing and supporting some agent or agents, either as resident teacher in its chief centre of Free Religious thought through the stated work of a local society, or as supervisor of lecture-courses and conventions, and of small isolated bands of Liberals throughout the State. In States where there are cities or large towns having large numbers of radicals ready to organize (after a little stimulation of interest), a series of conventions, or the personal work of an enthusiastic and tactful agent even, would very likely result in the formation of local societies strong enough to support a resident teacher. And in those States the State society formed by our efforts, if it should be deemed wise to have such in addition to local societies, would act chiefly as a committee to carry out any scheme of work we might suggest, and to give opportunity at its annual meetings for the various liberal bodies in the State to come together informally and make acquaintance. In other States, —those in which the earnest liberal sentiment and power of service are too much scattered to admit of local organizations strong enough to support each its own resident teacher,—the State society would be able to play a more important part. If, as we strongly advise, the State society planted in the conditions last noted could be induced to employ an agent to visit at stated times these scattered Liberals, and give lectures, arrange possible lecture-courses by other speakers, suggest plans of local work less burdensome than the constant support of a local society, the State interest could be consolidated into a "parish-at-large," with an itinerant supervisor. The whole State might employ a much more able and efficient person than any one town or city could secure. And such a person could furnish opportunity for the dissemination of our views, for the spread of our literature, and the clear teaching of our principles as no other agency could do. Such an agent could assist in the formation of parlor-clubs for intellectual and moral improvement on the rational basis, and energize, direct, and shape in constructive lines the Free Religious sentiment of the State.

From this work would spring naturally, as fast as numbers and means would allow, the more complete local organizations of Liberals in the centres of radical interest.

Your Committee in its majority embody the foregoing suggestions more in detail in the resolutions they offer,—which resolutions seem to need no further explanation. All is respectfully submitted in the earnest hope that this or some wiser "plan of increased activity" may be acted upon with vigor by the Association. We believe that the time is ripe, the need is pressing, the laborers ready to fall into line so soon as a clear command of practical direction is given; and, if we will only have faith in our own principles, they will mightily prevail.

Resolved, 1. That this Association herewith instruct its Executive Committee to select and appoint a suitable person or number of persons to act as agent or agents of the Association during the ensuing year.

2. That the sum of $2,000 or more be raised and appropriated for the agent-work, to be paid to the agent or agents at the rate of $100 a month, and travelling expenses.

3. That the first work of the agent or agents be the preparation, as thorough and exact as possible, from data furnished by the State correspondents and other sources, of the following memoranda of information, namely:—

(a) A complete list of the names and addresses of members of the Free Religious Association, classified according to States, towns, and cities.

(b) A similar list of subscribers to The Index not members of the Free Religious Association.

(c) A similar list of well-known Liberals not members or subscribers.

(d) A full list of organizations, State and local, whose constitution and methods are in substantial conformity with those of the Free Religious Association, with names of officers and description of form of union and of work appended to each.

(e) A brief statement of the needs and conditions of each State in relation to the Free Religious movement, compiled from the returns of the State correspondents, so far as reported.

4. That, aided by this memoranda of information, the Executive Committee choose not less than two (2) nor more than six (6) States, which in its opinion present the most favorable conditions for the spread of our principles and their local organization, as the field of work for our agent or agents during the ensuing year.

5. That the agent or agents visit the selected States, and call in each, by letter and personal interview, a private conference of our members and friends, for the purpose of stimulating their interest in our cause, and urging them to pledge pecuniary and moral support sufficient to secure either a successful convention or a course of lectures by the accredited speakers of the Free Religious Association in the most promising centre of liberal thought in said State, the choice between the two methods of work being left with the local friends.

6. That, when the local friends are unable to raise all the money necessary for this work, the Executive Committee shall be empowered to aid, in cases promising good results, from the $2,000 fund or any other sum which may be raised for the purpose.

7. That, the agent appointed to visit a State for the purposes indicated above shall, if possible, be present and speak at the convention, if such be held, or, if the lecture-course be given, shall, if possible so to arrange it, deliver the first or last lecture, and in either case shall present the constructive side of Liberalism, the need, the possibility, and the most practicable methods of organization for State or local work.

8. That the agent remain in the State where said convention or lecture-course has been held, if requested so to do by the local workers, as long as the Executive Committee deem advisable, to assist in effecting some permanent union of Liberals on a basis consistent with the Free Religious Association's constitution and methods; and that where there are a sufficient number of local friends in one city or town to justify, in the opinion of the agent, such action, this assistance be rendered toward the formation of local societies, and where the liberal workers of the State are scattered, effort be made to form a State Free Religious Association, the object of which shall be to establish lecture-courses, arrange for conventions, and shape the liberal sentiment in all parts of the State toward more complete organization.

9. That this Association urge upon State Free Religious Associations, wherever formed, the duty of employing some person or persons at least a portion of the year to carry out the scheme of organization indicated above.

10. That when the State associations or local societies which our agent has helped to form need pecuniary aid in their work, and their conditions are, in the opinion of the agent, sufficiently promising to justify such action, this Association shall give such aid as the Executive Committee deem advisable in the case, and that such aid be given with the following conditions, namely:—

(a) Money given to a State association shall be in all cases for the salary of an agent.

(b) State associations or local societies aided shall be in substantial conformity to Free Religious Association principles and methods.

(c) State associations or local societies shall receive aid only for a limited time.

(d) All formal relation between a State association or local society and the National Association shall cease with the suspension of aid from the Free Religious Association.

11. That the office of State correspondent be continued in States which do not have State organizations of similar character to the Free Religious Association, and effort be made to secure one in all States not now represented by such an officer, in order that the memoranda of information be kept as complete as possible.

12. That Article IV. of the Constitution of this Association be amended so as to read as follows:—

The annual meeting of the Association shall be held during the last week in September in such city and State and with such sessions as the Executive Committee shall yearly determine, of which three months' previous notice shall be publicly given.

ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Chairman.

NOTE.—The above report, prepared and presented by Mrs. Spencer, though not signed by any, is understood to be approved by three other members of the Committee, Messrs. Ballou and Hill, and Mrs. Diggs.

The appended resolutions up to No. 8 received the affirmative vote of the Conference, without any division being called for. No. 8 was adopted by a vote of eleven to ten; No. 9 by a vote of nine to seven; No. 10 by a vote of ten to nine. No. 11, again, was adopted without division, and No. 12, much objected to by many members, was referred, without recommendation, to the Executive Committee. Several members present did not vote at all on the resolutions. The matter now goes for further consideration to the annual meeting.

Mr. Hamlen's minority report is printed below.

W. J. P.

To the Members of the Mid-winter Conference of the Free Religious Association:—

As one of the special Committee appointed at the last annual meeting to consider the fourth of the resolutions then adopted, I hereby present the following as a minority report.

I find myself unable to advocate the formation of State auxiliaries as proposed in that resolution, my chief objection to such a movement being a pecuniary one. It is the general opinion of those who favor it that the salary paid to an agent employed to organize local auxiliaries would represent the sum of our expenditure in that direction; but if the work be done thoroughly this is only a partial estimate, for experience has shown that such societies need the constant superintendence of a leader, without whom they practically disband soon after the glow of organization has passed. To satisfy this need, we should require not only one agent, but many, whose expenses (salaries, rather) would have to be drawn in part, if not wholly, from the treasury of the Free Religious Association. We cannot afford to undertake so expensive a movement as this would be. What money we have, it has taken years to obtain; and to authorize the expenditure of any of it to start societies that could give no pledge of continued existence would for the present at least be a very unwise measure.

Instead of looking to the formation of State auxiliaries as the means by which to "attain greater breadth and solidity of action," I recommend that an effort be made to form an alliance between the Free Religious Association and those societies throughout the country known to be in sympathy with it, whose aim and organization are directed toward the advancement of practical religion. Were such an alliance formed, it seems hardly necessary to say that we might hold more influential conventions and do better work than we are now doing. All that can be said in favor of the proposed State auxiliaries can be urged in behalf of a constituency composed of already existing societies, with some advantages on the side of the latter plan. The ways and means to accomplish it need not be dwelt upon in this report: they will be readily suggested, if the matter be thought worthy of your deliberate consideration. To me, it seems the first step to be taken in order to make our work "more national and more effective," and one that need not be long delayed.

Respectfully submitted,

Boston, March 27, 1882.

WM. H. HAMLEN.

THE CHINESE BILL AND AMERICAN LABOR.

Editors of The Index :—

I trust that you will excuse me for being so presumptuous as to take any exceptions to anything written by Mr. Potter, for he is a man I greatly admire. I am confident that he never wrote a line which he did not think was the truth. Still, the best of us can be mistaken,—it all depends upon the quality of the glass in the spectacles we use what the color of objects may be; in other words, upon our education and surroundings. In this week's issue of The Index is an article upon the "Chinese Bill," by Mr. Potter, wherein he uses strong language and good logic (if his premises were correct) in opposition to the bill. It is not necessary for me to quote any of his words, for the question can be discussed without. In the first place, the opponents of the bill are quoting words from the Declaration of Independence, wherein it states that all men were "created free and equal."

Now, this assertion (and it is only an assertion) is false, every word of it, for all men are not created free and equal. They have never been created at all,—they developed from a lower form, some outstripping others, who have been left behind in the race for perfection, and are now fossils so far as growth is concerned.

When those words were used, people were ignorant of the fact that we would ever have to compete with the fossilized hordes of Asia, or that so-called intelligent men would quote words which were used on a certain emergency for a certain purpose, and were not to be quoted afterwards for the purpose of enslaving, through servile competition with an enslaved and barbarous race, the descendants of those who fought and bled for the rights of man.

People falsely class the introduction of the Chinese into this country as an "immigrant" affair undertaken as an individual act of each and every Chinaman. Such is not the fact. They are imported here by certain organized companies; they are private speculations to make money, just as African slavery originally was, and are upheld by those who are interested in getting cheap labor.

It is another type of slavery, an Americanized coolie system, with cheap clap-trap arguments to sustain it. I wish to say right here that the forces which really emancipated the African in this country are not to be credited to mankind at all, but to the climate.

The climate of the North, East, and West was not favorable for slavery, as the slaves had to be kept through a long and severe winter, with nothing to do. Consequently, their owners were obliged to let them go. I should say that they sold them to the South, and pocketed the cash.

Now, the descendants of those men who formerly profited in the slave-trade are interested in manufactures (and not ships), and they want to introduce another bad social element, a servile race, for the purpose of obtaining cheap labor. As if labor is not already cheap enough, with flour $10 a barrel and butter fifty cents per pound, and meat impossible to get unless you are a millionaire!

Mr. Potter appears to think that, because the people upon this side of the Rocky Mountains do not protest against the introduction of this evil, those upon the "Pacific Coast" have no rights which we are bound to respect. Before advancing such arguments, it would be more consistent to introduce them here first, in order to give an opportunity for the people in this quarter to form a correct opinion upon the subject.

At present, the only people who are enabled to form a correct or rational opinion are those who have had the experience, or who have been brought into competition with them; consequently, they are the only judges in the case, and their conclusion should be final. If I have a bunion on my foot, and should undertake to cut it off to avoid pain, I certainly cannot take into consideration the protest of those who are not suffering with my complaint, and who are living thousands of miles away.

This government is a compromise from beginning to end: we are all governed by self-interest; self-preservation is the first law of nature, and the survival of the fittest has been the law from the beginning; consequently, I have no fear from the fossils of China nor sentimentalists in America.

When our race has completely occupied every available inch of this continent, then their destiny is to spread out and drive the Chinese from Asia as they have already driven off the Indian of America. Thence they will occupy and make a garden of Africa, even to the "desert"; for if the Peruvians of old could carry soil to the tops of their mountains, who knows but my predictions in reference to the desert of Africa may not be fulfilled? However, there is a certainty in this,—that this world has not seen the highest type of man yet; but as sure as the present highest type arose from the mere animal, and that animal from a still lower, so will the present type eventually arise to the height of perfection; and it will not require fossilized Asiatic stock to accomplish it, either. I believe that this world is fully competent to confer happiness upon all of its inhabitants, if everything were managed in a proper manner; and this desirable end will come in the future through the spread of knowledge. I believe if we adopted the system of the bees we would be happy now. I do not believe in man owning men, water, air, sunlight, or land, for such blessings are not produced by the labor of men. They are free gifts from great nature. But if those in authority could fence in air, light, and water, they would do so, and monopolize them as they now do the minerals and the lands containing them. Those free gifts from great nature are blessings bestowed upon us as a whole, and we should be part owners in them, and full owners in the products of our own labor. I believe in the systems laid down by Henry George, Thomas Paine, H. Spencer, G. H. Lewes, Haeckel, Tyndall, and others, and I wish also to say that the working-classes are getting their mental eyes open to the nature of the causes which have been bearing them down. In the Argus of this date is an article which I have marked and which I will forward to you, showing the tendency of the Catholic Church to make capital out of monopolists, or those who have the "cash" and influence, for the benefit of their individual theocracy.

It is history repeating itself; but the days of faith are gone. They have no more Roman empires, with Roman emperors to beguile and capture, for the people know more, consequently the Roman power in our midst has not such an opportunity as of old, and we will finally put the quietus on it, as I trust we shall also upon that other relic of barbarism in Utah. I and those I sympathize with are not opposed to any people coming here, provided they come as real emigrants, with their families and relatives; but if certain scoundrels who want to make money embark in the business of scouring this planet for a people who are and have been through untold ages accustomed to toil for the offals and filth of the earth, and bring them here to compete with men who have built this country up, then I say the sooner the world is rid of such villains the better.

We hear sometimes the cry, "What will Europe say? What will Europe think of us for our conduct to the Chinese?" etc. Well, who cares what monarchists and their serfs do think! To demonstrate in a proper manner what they really would think, we must give them some of the medicine which is being poured down our own throats; that is, engage in the business of shipping "Celestials" to France, England, and Germany. They would very soon give us to understand what they would think. They might put up with every imposition forced upon them by fraud and violence in the past, and which they have been educated to consider divine; but all the power of the combined potentates of Europe could never force upon them such a system as is being forced upon the people of so-called free America.

I hope that Mr. Potter will take a broader view of this question, and put himself mentally, if he cannot do so physically, in the place of those who have to contend, with families depending upon them for bread, with those who have been imported—not emigrated—to supersede them in the labor market. If I have no resource but my physical powers to enable me to get a living, and I or mine cannot live on rats and mice, I shall certainly starve to death, provided I have to compete with those who can; and, as I have to die but once, I may as well pass away fighting for the benefit of my fellow-men and children as to die in a ditch. These thoughts of mine are the thoughts which are passing through the minds of the people; and when they organize, and organize they eventually will, then good-by to representative government until after the storm has passed. I know more of what is passing in the minds of those who labor physically than people who are not brought into contact with them. I also know, and history proves that there is a point beyond which it is dangerous to go with those we are taught to look down upon with contempt.

Whether the "Chinese Bill" is signed by the President or not makes no difference. For my part, I hope he will veto it,—the sooner this question is brought to maturity the better. I would like to see imported into Massachusetts a half-million pig-tails, into New York one million, and into all the other States in proportion. We then could find out the sentiments of those east of the mountains, and not until then.

The arguments made use of by Mr. Potter in favor of the Chinese could be used in favor of the Bushmen of Africa,—for they certainly are men; and, as far as the treaty with China is concerned, I have this to say: that the people never ratified such a treaty, nor were they consulted in regard to it at its inception. It was concocted by our "masters"—not our public servants—for the benefit solely of those who had the said masters bribed, and was easily grasped by the masters of the Chinese barbarians, to get rid of their surplus paupers and criminals. This treaty is the life of China, and our death, and the sooner it is abolished the better for us.

To conclude, I have this to say: that we, the people, have as much right to oppose the introduction of servile labor as we have to oppose the introduction of any other nuisance; and we have as much right also to abolish the social evil foisted upon us by our so-called masters as we have to abolish another specimen of barbarism in Utah.

I am sorry to be under the necessity of being obliged to write anything upon this subject, or in fact any subject, as I am not capable by education for such a task; but I cannot rest content without giving a few of my reasons upon this topic to the editor of The Index, knowing as I do that he wrote what he thought was the truth. This is why the people have been trampled upon so long,—men who are fully competent through education and capacity, and who are also alive to every evil in ordinary life, cannot grasp this question of necessity for the preservation of life and happiness, and hence they give their support to a principle which would be the ruin of the race and play into the hands of the genuine oppressors of the people by allowing their altruistic feelings to get the better of their reason.

I am satisfied that if Mr. Potter knew all sides of this question he would never have written such an article. Europe was buried up for centuries by a false system imposed upon the people, and which they supposed was good. India is buried yet. And if Americans intend to avoid the fate of such countries, they must devote more time in going personally among the toilers everywhere, and see and study the causes of their present degradation. Individuals among these toilers are doing it, and they will eventually save the race. Respectfully, ALBANY, N.Y., March 31, 1882. THOMAS DUGAN.

TWO CRITICISMS.

Editors of The Index:—

The question of "emotion" has been ably handled in The Index. Mrs. Spencer's very helpful words, strengthened by her experience, cannot fail to be a light to many feet. The two papers that followed were also good; but the subject and its treatment are too good to let J. P. Titcomb's article pass without criticism of one paragraph,—namely: "To promote just considerations of merciful conduct among fellow-beings, whether brute or human, the child can hardly be too diligently plied with exciting influences," etc. If children's sensibilities were awakened to the extent that the adults' are, it would be fatal to all farther development; for, with a child's immature moral and intellectual power and his undeveloped character and self-poise, a full appreciation of and sympathy with need and suffering, or anything like a full appreciation, would be moral shipwreck.

The late unfolding of the sympathies is nature's protection of the young soul, as burrs and pulp are to the ripening seed. Plying children with exciting influence is a powerful means of developing the emotions. As the writer says, "The mass of adult and also experienced persons are grossly undeveloped in their discriminating sensibility."

Many lack emotional sensibilities, others are governed by them, and many more are not discriminating in them; and my experience and observation teach me most emphatically that the awakening of children's emotions—of any kind—until they can be fortified by judgment and discrimination is directly responsible for both these abnormal phases. The most dangerous of all these excitements,—because the subtlest,—yet most common, is that of appealing to the child's love for you to secure the performance of whatever you wish him to do. How often we hear mothers say to children, "Willie does not love mamma," if he will not do this or that which he has no interest in, and sees no reason for doing other than to assure his mother of his love for her.

This would be all right, if it were true that he did not love his mother, and if there were not a legitimate and lawful reason for everything we ought to ask of the child. But, if we wish to have our children base their actions upon right, upon law,—the only safe foundation for child as adult,—we must not say anything but the truth, however much we may wish a certain thing done, and be discriminating as to the proper truth for each occasion, and also keep love to its high and holy mission, instead of using it as a means of traffic,—so much love for so much done. This subject opens an endless field for thought, and I hope will be kept before us through the columns of The Index. Child culture and all it includes—the development of the emotions, the conscience, the reasoning faculties and their relations to each other, to the physical growth, and to the complete rounding of the human being—is the science which underlies all science and art; and who, if not liberal thinkers, are commissioned to deal earnestly with this subject, and demonstrate that law is just as inexorable in human as in all other growth, and that unconscious, careless, or wilful disobedience of law is responsible for our failures, mistakes, and sins?

Mr. Conway's criticism of "Despair" is very fine, but he goes too far. Whatever his individual experience may have been, I believe a very great majority of human beings who aspire to the best that is in them do feel that endless distance between their conception and accomplishment which demands endless opportunity.

There are inexplicable sufferings from remorse and from the sins and mistakes of others you would gladly serve, even at your own peril, but cannot. These must have adequate results for good somewhere at some time; and I do not believe there is any faith great enough to see and feel the depths of human agony or the height of human aspiration, and be satisfied with the results of one as the accomplishment of the other. Because faith must build upon what we know; and, if we know anything, it is that there is no joy in life like accomplishment of high and holy purposes. And this joy increases and intensifies with years, while our aspirations rise as we ascend in the scale of progress.

As the single moment more of daylight on Christmas day is the sure promise of genial and kindly warmth that shall renew all the dreary and slumbering earth, so the exquisite delight of hope, which is born of present joy in doing, will not lead us onward and upward, growing brighter through life, to end just when it is highest, and yet while we are more conscious than ever of the distance of that power to which she points. If so, human life is the most incomplete of anything in existence, so far as we can see; and I, for one, cannot be satisfied with any such interpretation of justice as that which could call me into being endowed with capacity for suffering which I feel to be infinite in its intense quality, blessed with a personal consciousness of being which will not be satisfied with anything less than the realization of my highest thought, which stretches up and out endlessly, unless room and opportunity have also been provided. If it is said this is not proof, scarcely evidence, then I say it is just as much proof as is the one moment more of daylight at Christmas; and I believe this one moment would comfort and assure a race of beings who, if such a thing were possible, has sprung up full grown, and watched with dismay and horror the days growing shorter and the earth colder, and endless cold and darkness settling down upon them hopelessly until this one moment dawned.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE ON THE ENGLISH OATH QUESTION.

Editors of The Index:—

Some years ago, at a time when public opinion in England was much agitated by the prosecution of Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant for the publication of the Knowlton pamphlet, I remember listening to a lecture before the Secular Institute, Glasgow, by Mr. Holyoake. His subject was "Policy and Progress," and the lecture was from first to last a stinging impeachment of the uncompromising and stubborn attitude which Charles Bradlaugh had then assumed.

He there advocated that policy was necessary to progress; and I can recall with what bitter sarcasm he compared the progress of Bradlaugh to that of the Norwegian rat, which in his unwisdom never swerved from his straight path, never went around or over a difficulty, but ever, even to his destruction, would eat his way through.

I can remember this well; for it pained me, coming at a time with much more in that most critical period when unanimity was so much needed, above all coming as it did from George Jacob Holyoake, than whom there is no brighter nor braver name in the annals of recent free thought.

Having these utterances in mind, I had expected during this Parliamentary struggle that, while their relations were anything but cordial, yet, in his public action toward Mr. Bradlaugh, that Mr. Holyoake at least should have had some care for consistency.

In the letter which appears in your issue of March 23, the writer states the argument which he intimates he has used in the public papers and elsewhere in England. Let me add that it is unfortunate for Mr. Holyoake, no less than for Charles Bradlaugh, that these sentiments, taken not in their own strength, but with the added weight of their author's name and reputation, have been used against the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh in the Commons, by disreputable bigots who had no such pure purposes to serve as the argument infers.

In offering to take the oath, Mr. Bradlaugh only seeks to do what John Stuart Mill and other equally pronounced atheists have done in the past without loss of credit to themselves, the only point in which their conduct is at variance being in this,—that Mr. Bradlaugh has earnestly and frankly avowed his opinions and sought to do, at risk of heavy penalties to himself, what Mr. Holyoake says he should do.

The course indicated by the argument is, I think, an utterly impracticable one, and wherever resorted to must result, if not in retrogression, at least in a very serious impediment of progress.

Republicans who regard monarchy as a useless and cumbrous institution must refuse henceforth to sit in St. Stephens, because there a declaration of support to that institution is required of them; judges must refuse to administer the laws, since their individual sense of justice has not been consulted; and so, in every other relation, like results must inevitably follow the application of this abstraction to the details of everyday life.

The truth is that when a public man has progressed in his political and religious thought beyond the institutions of his time, and when the common good demands that he should use those institutions, it is his duty to do so, even if his conduct wear the character of inconsistency.

With regard to the scenes which have occasioned Mr. Holyoake such amusement, I am glad that with the great body of secularists in England they have awakened far different and more proper feelings, and that, so far are they from perceiving the droll elements of comedy, they are justly incensed against a bigoted, tyrannical majority whose actions prove that they are bent on accomplishing, if they can, the political proscription of the free thought party.

I have written this because I felt that I must place on record my protest against sentiments which, emanating as they do from a free thinker, I hold to be unworthy and reprehensible.

Trusting that you will give this a place in your columns, I am sincerely yours,

THOMAS PETTIGREW.

STREATOR, LA SALLE CO., ILL., March 28.

VACCINATION.

Editors of The Index:—

No free State has a right to force an individual to any surgical operation; therefore, I consider it wrong to have "compulsory vaccination." It ought to be advisory, educational, and optional. But are all the statistical facts for vaccination fictions, and can they be overruled by the thus far rather vague anti-vaccination publications?

Are the honest, experienced, and well-educated physicians, who vaccinate, themselves careless?

Have the anti-vaccination writers better chances to ascertain whether vaccination is for the welfare of or injurious to humanity?

The following article from the Physicians and Surgeons' Investigator, Buffalo, N.Y., Feb. 15, 1882, is one of the many fair statements on this subject.

Small-pox and Vaccination.

There are many who oppose vaccination, first, because it is a means of communicating disease; and second, because it does not protect the subject either from an attack or the severity of small-pox. To the first objection, we believe that very few diseases can be thus transmitted from one person to another. Indeed, we are inclined to the opinion that syphilis is almost the only one; but even granting the force of the objection, the method of using pure bovine virus invalidates it entirely.

To the second objection, that vaccination is not a protection, we would say that observation and statistics invalidate that also. These show that in proportion to the thoroughness and perfectness of vaccination, as indicated by the number and character of the vaccine marks, it is a safeguard and protection.

Dr. Marston, of London, in an aggregate of 15,000 cases of small-pox (see Reynold's System of Medicine), finds the mortality with good cicatrices (described as "distinct, foveated, dotted or indented, and having a well or tolerably well defined edge") was 2.52 per cent.; with indifferent cicatrices, 8.82 per cent. The unvaccinated died at the rate of 35 per cent.; those having one cicatrix, 7.73 per cent.; those having two, 4.70 per cent.; those having three, 1.95 per cent.; those having four or more, .55 per cent.

Among the hospital records of England, it is found that the average deaths in that country were, for thirty years prior to vaccination, 3,000 for each million of inhabitants; while after the practice of vaccination, from 1854 to 1865, they were only 202 per million. Dr. Buchanan, medical officer of the London Board of Trade, says that, during the year ending May last, the deaths in London from small-pox among those who had been vaccinated were in the proportion of 90 to 1,000,000 of the population; while among those who had not been vaccinated they were 3,550 to 1,000,000. According to Dr. Baruch (Medical Record), the Hampstead Small-pox Hospital Reports from 1876 to 1878 show that in patients bearing good marks of vaccination the death-rate was 57 per 1,000 in those with four marks or more, to 96 per 1,000 in those having one, two, or three marks. In patients bearing indifferent marks of vaccination, the death-rate was 113 per 1,000. In patients who stated to have been vaccinated, but who showed no marks, the death-rate was 320 per 1,000. In patients unvaccinated, the death-rate was 468 per 1,000.

The Homerton Hospital Reports from 1871 to 1878 show a death-rate in those patients having good vaccination marks to have been 53 per 1,000. In those with indifferent marks, the death-rate was 111 per 1,000. In those with no marks, but who claimed to have been vaccinated, the death-rate was 272 per 1,000. In those unvaccinated, it was 452 per 1,000.

Mr. Marshall, of Chelsea, reports 757 individuals to have been exposed to small-pox infection. Of these, 527 were not vaccinated, and all but seven took small-pox. The remaining 231 had been vaccinated, and only 27 contracted the disease.

Dr. Cross, of Norwich, says that 215 unvaccinated persons had been thoroughly exposed to small-pox. Of these, 200 took the disease, and 46 died. On the other hand, 91 vaccinated persons had been similarly exposed, but only two took the disease, and none died.

We might multiply statistics; but the above are sufficient, it seems to us, to prove beyond question that vaccination does protect and does save life; and this in proportion to the quality and number of the cicatrices. Indeed, the protection both to society and individuals is beyond measure, and the saving of human life unlimited. Supposing then that vaccination does occasionally communicate scrofula, erysipelas, syphilis, etc. (which with the present practice and with proper precaution is entirely avoidable), the suffering and death-rate arising therefrom is exceedingly trifling compared with the number of lives it saves as shown by the above figures. Such an objection therefore has but little weight.

If our anti-vaccination friends will give a better showing than the above for their side of the question, or will prove our statistics untrue, we will be most happy to yield to their evidence if it is conclusive.

While, then, we thus admit the protective power of vaccination, yet we believe isolation of those sick or exposed is the only sure method of arresting or preventing an epidemic of small-pox. Vaccination however is a powerful auxiliary, and should not be neglected. This and isolation must certainly eradicate small-pox wherever effectually carried out, whether applied to the community or the world.

CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N.H., March 10, 1882.

JOHN WARR writes from Paterson, N.J., March 3: "Under the auspices of 'The Paterson Liberal League,' Paterson has been favored with two splendid lectures within the last two weeks. One from Mr. Courtland Palmer, of New York, on 'Coöperation, or the Reign of the Common People,' clearly proving (to the writer, at least) that the 'common people' are nearer to the 'millennium' now than at any other time; but that, before they can arrive at that, they have a great deal to accomplish, which must be done through education, coöperation, and other forms of organization. If the League should survive for a few months longer, Mr. Palmer will, I think, speak for them again, as his heart beats in sympathy with that of the masses. He should, by all means, be universally heard."

"Mrs. Neymann's lecture on 'The Spirit of Republicanism' was simply grand, far exceeding the writer's expectations, both in matter and delivery. This is a new lecture, and I wish it could be heard or read by every voter throughout the Union. It comes at an opportune time, and our liberal friends should keep her fully employed. Mrs. Neymann is one of our rising stars in the lecture field, and should be generously encouraged. Her heart and sympathies are in the work. Let her work while it is day."

BOOK NOTICES.

THE OCCULT WORLD. By A. P. Sinnett. pp. 172. Boston: Colby & Rich, publishers. 1882.

This work informs us that "modern metaphysics, and to a large extent modern physical science, have been groping for centuries after knowledge which occult philosophy has enjoyed in full measure all the while." "Owing to a train of fortunate circumstances," says the writer, "I have come to know that this is the case. I have come in contact with persons who are heirs of a greater knowledge concerning the mysteries of Nature than modern culture has yet evolved," etc. The object of the work is to show this by appealing to "occult phenomena." "Occult phenomena must not," says the writer, "be confused with the phenomena of Spiritualism. The latter, whatever they may be, are manifestations which mediums can neither control nor understand. The former are achievements of a conscious, living operator comprehending the laws with which he works. If these achievements appear miraculous, that is the fault of the observer's ignorance." The author thinks that phenomena called spiritual can be produced by adepts in occultism without any aid from spirits. He has seen the "spirit rap" manifested under conditions "which render the hypothesis of any spiritual agency in the matter wholly preposterous." "I have," he adds, "over and over again received 'direct writing,' produced on paper in sealed envelopes of my own, which was created or precipitated by a living, human correspondent." We are assured that "the occultist can project his soul from his body," and has thus ascertained beyond all shadow of doubt that he has got a soul. The author presents a number of alleged facts to prove occultism, but many of the facts are quite as much in need of verification as his theory is in need of proof.

COLUMBIAN OXFORD DOUBLE TESTAMENT. New York: Published by the Bible Revision Association, 37 Park Row. 1882. Price $1.50.

This work contains the old and new versions, in parallel columns; the marginal readings of the old version and the notes of the new version; the notes of the American Committee; the chronology of the New Testament, which has been universally adopted by Biblical scholars; full index to subjects of every chapter (this matter is all on the page with the two Testaments, which makes it more convenient to examine than any other edition); the history of the revision, and the principles and rules by which the Committee were governed in their work; the history of the three authorities, by Daniel Curry, D.D., LL.D., —1. The Vatican Codex or Manuscript; 2. The Alexandrian Codex or Manuscript; 3. The Sinaitic Codex or Manuscript. This is a cheap and handy edition of the "Comparative New Testament."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JESSE JAMES, the notorious Western outlaw and bandit, was shot at and killed by a member of his gang at St. Joseph, Mo., one day last week.

JAMES WILLIAMS writes from Conneautville, Pa., "F. M. Holland's poem, 'An Agnostic Requiem,' was read at our mother's grave, at her request, and well read, by a Baptist minister."

LONGFELLOW's last poem will be published in the May Atlantic. The "revise" was received from him only a few days before his death, and will be cherished as one of the choicest of the many literary treasures belonging to the magazine.

CORNELIUS J. VANDERBILT, whose name became so well known in connection with the famous Vanderbilt will case a year or two ago, committed suicide by shooting himself at a hotel in New York city on Sunday, the 2d inst. He was a confirmed invalid and subject to frequent epileptic fits, and it is thought had grown weary of life under such circumstances.

DR. MAX LILIENTHAL, one of the foremost Hebrew theologians in this country, died in Cincinnati, Ohio, on Wednesday, April 5, aged sixty-seven. He graduated at Munich University in 1837, with the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. After holding for some years positions of trust in his own country, he came to America in 1845, where he has ever since resided.

WENDELL PHILLIPS has sold his estate on Essex Street in this city, where for so many years he has made his home, and will soon remove to Hotel La Grange on Tremont Street, where he will with his invalid wife occupy the suite of rooms made vacant by the death of the late Madame Rudersdorff. The widening of the streets in the vicinity has made this sale and removal necessary.

GEN. STEPHEN A. HURLBUT, United States Minister to Peru, died at Lima, March 28, of heart disease. He was sixty-seven years of age. The ministers appointed to serve in Chili and Peru have been peculiarly unfortunate during the past year. General Kilpatrick and Hurlbut are both dead, while Christianity was recalled in disgrace, and the annoyances of the situation had caused Hurlbut to resign and may have hastened his death.

Our correspondent, Mrs. Caroline Dall, daughter of the late Mark Healy, is a resident of Washington. The Republic says: "Her Monday receptions always call together the literary element of the District, and her house is full of things rare, curious, and valuable. She has two old pictures, one of Luke and one of Matthew, which were preserved from destruction at one of the many turbulent eruptions of the volcanic Peruvians. Mrs. Dall has never had to rummage second-hand furniture stores or search through ancient burghs for furniture which would suggest ancestral possession. It is hers by right of descent, and it shines with the polish of generations of rubbings. Then, she has some exquisite specimens of china and rare old cut glass. Her house from top to bottom is a specimen of New England neatness and order, which can never be taken off its guard."

THE INDEX is the continuation of the paper which was founded and for ten and one-half years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. The paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when free religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. The editors will be assisted by able contributors.

NO RELIGIOUS teaching of any kind, under the new education law of France, can be taught in the schools. Religious instruction may be given on Thursday, if the parents request it, but as an adjunct and not as a part of the school exercises, State secularization is certainly making rapid progress in France.

THE conservative Boston Advertiser feels compelled to say: "It is useless to try to maintain a Puritan Sunday on the statute-books, because the State House is no longer the servitor of the church-member, but of the voter. Sunday must stand or fall upon its merits. It will die out from our civilization exactly in proportion as Christianity does, and this nation will never consent to keep it as a monument of the dead. We shall probably have in the near future neither Puritan nor a continental European Sunday, but an American one. The American one will undoubtedly follow the old maxim that 'the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.'"

REV. W. H. TURTON, a Baptist minister of Farmington, Iowa, has been "suspended from the privileges of the Church" for teaching universal salvation in a funeral sermon. Mr. Turton has issued a circular, in which occurs the following vigorous language: "Now, therefore, be it known that by my own voluntary act I utterly disregard the jurisdiction so begun and so concluded; and I hereby assert my independent right, thought, and act in the performance of any ministerial duty I find convenient; and therefore, whenever I may be called upon in the future as in the past, I will cheerfully respond to such call, regardless of any clique who may in their audacity claim jurisdiction over me. So help me God! I did not derive my ministry from the Baptist or any other earthly organization, nor will I relinquish it at the dictation of any parson, priest, or puppet. In maintaining this position, I seek and desire the countenance and support of all well-balanced minds."

THE Jeffersonian Club of Newark celebrated last Thursday evening the anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Jefferson. Two hundred gentlemen sat down to supper. Numerous letters were read. Hon. S. J. Tilden wrote, "The numerous commemorations of that event recently held are auspicious indications of the revival of public attention to the teachings and example of that great apostle of the true principles of American self-government." Hon. Abram S. Hewitt wrote: "Jefferson not only believed in the rights of the people, but, most of all men of his day, had faith in the capacity of the people to establish and maintain their rights. History has proved that he was right, and has vindicated the truth of the great principles which he laid down in the Declaration of Independence. . . . We cannot too often renew our allegiance to these fundamental doctrines, essential to the preservation of political freedom and the rights of man." A telegram was received from Washington, stating the House had just passed a bill appropriating $10,000 for a monument to be erected over Jefferson's grave.

IN his address to the "Majority of Monday," Charles Bradlaugh says: "It is pretended that when your committee, by a majority of one, decided that I could not affirm, I was then inconsistent in offering to take the oath, which it is said I had previously declined or objected to or refused to take. But as a matter of fact, as the evidence of Sir T. Erskine May shows, I had neither declined nor objected nor refused. I had simply claimed to affirm, making no remark whatever as to the oath. The oath was never at any time tendered to me. I have never had the opportunity of refusing it. If it be said that my having asked to affirm is to be held to be equivalent to a refusal to be sworn, that can hardly be a true position; for, according to the practice of your House, in the case of John Archdale, the House directed the oaths to be again tendered to him, although he had claimed to affirm. You have been less just to me than your House was to Daniel O'Connell, to whom the oath was tendered after he had formally and positively refused to take it. Yet Daniel O'Connell before the whole House had declared 'that the oath contained one proposition which he knew to be false, and another proposition which he believed to be untrue.'"

AMONG the official declarations of the late Catholic Provincial Council at Cincinnati are the following: "Death alone dissolves a marriage contracted between a baptized man and a baptized woman. This is the Catholic doctrine; and a Catholic once validly married cannot be divorced by either Church or State. And if such Catholic attempt to remarry, before the death of his or her partner, under the pretence that he or she has been divorced by the courts, such Catholic must be denied the sacrament, and, dying without repentance, be deprived of Christian burial. . . . It is not Catholic doctrine that all power comes from the people, and that rulers do not exercise authority as their own, but as intrusted to them by the people. The Catholic doctrine is that the grant of power is not given by the people, but they only designate who is to wield it." Commenting on these and other statements contained in the Provincial letter, Puck observes "that in this free country, where every man is on an equal footing, they [Catholic priests] should have the presumption to fling defiance in the face of the whole nation ought not to excite surprise, for the Roman Catholic Church has never been deficient in presumption; but it ought to cause all lovers of freedom to do their utmost to preserve their rights and liberties, which have been obtained at such a cost, and not to allow any church, Roman Catholic or otherwise, to interfere directly or indirectly with the people's laws and institutions,—made for the people and by the people,—the only true source of power and government."
