YTEGER'S CABINET.

SPIRITUAL VAMPIRISM:

THE HISTORY

01

ETHERIAL SOFTDOWN,

BY C. W. WEBB.ER

 Undmow ix

LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO: OO.
1853.

Entered, mecording to Act of Congress, in the year 1858, by LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & CO., in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, in and for the Eastern District of Pennsylvanit

```
            *)
```

INTRODUCTION.

On page 392 of the concluding sketch of a late series, the "Tales of the Southern Border," occurs the following passage: - > co

"The author, being a resident of New York during the period of the leading incidents narrated. as occyring in that gity, had formed the acquaintance of the: Mincipat persomage:": Himself itably been attracted toward Carter. The intercourse between them, at first reserved, had imperteptibifi warméd into a degree of intimacy, which, however, had by no means been such as to render him at all cognisant, beyond the merest generalities, of the progress of his private affairs. He was not a little surprised, therefore, at finding, one day, an elegant escritoire or cabinet, of dark, rich wood, heavily banded in the old-fashioned style with silver, which had been placed, in his absence, on the table of his sanctum. A note, in a sealed envelope, lay upon it. He instantly recognised the handwriting of the address as that of Mr. Carter, and broke the seal.
"It was evidently written in great haste, but without any sig " of trepidation. It ran thus:-

${ }^{6}$ My dear Friend:

"I have no time for explanations, as I am in the midst of hurried preparations for an unexpected yacht-voyage - upon which I set sail in a few minutes. I send you an escritoire, which was left in my charge by a highly valued friend. He was an extraordinary man; and its contents will be, I doubt not, of great value to the world.
"It was given me, with the injunction that it should not be opened until six months after his death. The six months were up some weeks since, but I have lately been too much otherwise absorbed to think of making use of the privilege of the key. I now therefore transfer to you this bequest in full, with the proviso that you will not open it for six months. If at the end of that thene I haye not been heard from, please open, and without reserve mite what oise afjitgbur excellent sense may justify. Please take chinge pry thatever correspondence may arrive to my address for the same length of time, at the expiration of which you "wili allso "tieate to consider yourself as my ex-ecutor-open my correspondence and proceed as you may think best. Pardon this unceremonious intrusion of responsibilities upon an intimacy, the terms of which I hardly feel would strictly justify me; but the plea that I know no one else whom I can trust, and have no time for further explanation, will I am sure justify me in the eyes of a brother Southron.

$$
\begin{aligned} & \text { "Yours truly, } \\ & \text { "Frany Cartea. } \end{aligned}
$$

"Six months having elapsed, and still no news of my singular friend Carter, the fulfilment of the important duties of executor, thus unexpectedly devolved upon him, were deferred by the narrator as long as his sense of duty would possibly admit. At last, when longer delay would have seemed to assume almost the aspect of criminality, the duty of opening the cabinet was unwillingly eatered upon."

On my next meeting with my friend Carter, who proved still to be in the land of the living, I spoke to him of the cabinet and its remarkable contents, which had so unexpectedly been left in my charge; offering to resign to him my trusteeship. To this, however, he would by no means consent, but continued to insist, as in his original letter, that I should without reserve make what use of it my sense of propriety might dictate. I was finally overruled into undertaking the mere arrangement and editorship of its contents-for the revelations there made are in many respects so strangely horrifying and unusual, that Ifear the world will be little disposed to pardon my agency in giving them publicity. However, as I believe them to be, in every respect, genuine life-experiences, I have determined to make the venture, come what will of it. We shall therefore give, as proper introduction to the singular narrative which we have selected from beneath the blood-stained seals of the cabinet it has been our fate to open, the following singular paper, which we found lying separately above the folds of the MS. which constitutes the History of Etherial Softdown.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF MESMERIC IMPOSITION.

to be read by philosophers only.*

The existence of what may be called the nerrous or Odic fluid-the sympathetic element-has been partially known to all ages. The knowledge of this powerful secret, in moving and controlling mankind, has been professionally and almost exclusively confined to the adepts of all sects, religions, and periods; though it has occasionally, in various ways, leaked out of the penetralia, principally through its forms, accompanied with little or no apprehension of their vital meaning. It is in this way that a series of scientific phenomena, the discovery of which probably originated with a remote priestcraft, and had been made to subserve exclusive ends, has gradually been fragmented among the people, and in many imperfect, ignorant, and vitiated forms has now become the common property of science. .

When it is understood that this nervous fluid is nothing more nor less than that force-whether electrical, magnetic, odic, or otherwise named - which, lubricating the nervous system in man, produces all vital phenomena - is, in a word, the vital force - the active principle of life - it will not be difficult to comprehend how important a knowledge of its laws may be rendered to even those relations of life not exclusively physical.

Mesmer promulgated, under his own name, as a new and astounding discovery in science, something of the sympathetic laws to which this nervous or Odic fluid is subject, and by

[^0]which the vital and apiritual relations of man to the external univorae: ar: in a great measure modified, and even comitrolled. Thus was wo diseovery of his, but had been the mainly exclusive secrent of the ancient priesthood ; employed alike in the cerremonies of the novitiate in the 'Thibetian templem of Buddha, in the Figyptian Initation, and in Cirecian Pythimm. But the jarticular reason why his announcememon caused such pronligious excitement, in 1784, as to run all Paris mad, even including the coourt of the wary Lousia XVI., and ntill conntinue to axrite: and madden mankind, is, that, an the nympathoric eretarifa and furcors, superinduced by the mummerieg of him fammen "vat," were called hy a new name, the peepole failed to recer, 品e: them, although they had bern familiarised with, and evon metines hahitually muder their influrowe, while surrounderd morres of Mresiner's expuriments amazerd mern. Ife, in fact, lithle knew what he was doing himeself; the effecte he under-the formulas. Having gone through these, whirlh, thenghi most grotempe and preprosterous, later experience has shown, really im:luded all the "pmoses" and other e:onditions neeressary to enablinh nympathy through the: nervorous fluid with the victimas of his delusion, he proceceded to produce: bxhibitions the: mosit. extmordinary the world ever maw, exerph in the hirdrous and frentic argies of some wild, barbaric creed, and the paralleln to which, in this conatry, are to be found in the shriciks and belberinge of a fansilc come nting, Miller ancersion-tent, Mor-I mandmeeting.
hat "Nature abhory a vacuum," comething, at least, of the rationale of this sympathetic influence of one man over another. The laws of the distribution of this Olic force seem to bear a somewhat general affinity to those of electricity. The surcharged cloud discharges its superfluous fluid into the cloud more negatively charged. The man holding a superfluous amount of vital or Odic force, can dismiss a portion of this along the course of ats proper lightning-rods, or conveyers, the nerves-into the organisation of a being more negatively charged, or, in other words, of a weaker man. As electricity can only act upon inert matter through its proper media, the elements, so the Odic fluid can only act upon organised matter normally through its proper medium, the nerves of vitality. This communication of the Odic fluid, by which sympathy between the two beings has been established, can be, to a certain degree, regulated and controlled by manipulations which bring the thumbs and fingers of the hand, which are properly Odic poles, in contact with certain great nerves, or centres of nerves, along which the influence can be readily communicated. These manipulations, the vital and original meanings of which these Mesmer agitators have betrayed, may be traced very clearly through the most important ceremonies of religion, and the secret orders of fraternisation in the world. From this point of view, how significant the "laying-on of hands" in ordination, the "joining of hands" in the marriage ceremony, &c.

Here let us remark, that we would no more be understood as accusing a Christian Priesthood, in modern times, of having made an improper use, either inside or out of their profession, of the manipulations mentioned above, than we would think of accusing them of having, as a class, any special knowledge of their significance beyond that of ceremonial forms, set down in the discipline. It has been to the Heathen Priesthood that we have consistently attributed a knowledge of the psychological meaning of these ceremonials, which have descended through the Hebrew and Christian churches as avowedly divested of vital significance, and intended, in their arbitrary exaction, as, to a certain degree, ordained tests of Christian faith and obedience.

But it is by no means indispensable to the exhibition of the Odic phenomena, that the processes of manipulation should have been literally gone through with in all cases-nor, indeed, in the majority even-for some of the most apparenty inexplicable and extraordinary of them all are brought about without such intervention. Take, as comparatively "modern instances," such effects as those produced by the preaching of Peter the Hermit, when not only rast armiew of men were moved like flights of locusts toward the Desert, on the breeze of his fery breath, to disappear, too, as they, within its bosom, and never be heard from again, but even great armiea of chilldren rasbed in migratory hordes to the sea-ports, to ship for the Holy Land? -and those produced by the crosade of Father Mathew against intemperance, in our time, when all Ireland lay waining at hi feet. These great furors were precisely identical with thowe already enumerated, so tar as the swmpathetic or motive pormest went. So with the story of the rise of Mabowet, Ine Sminh, Miller, and all such agitators. They are namally men if prom digious vital power, and of course surcharger with the futice fluid, who begin these great movemens; and they pensw, :m side, vast patience and endurance. They begin ty fint ohe individuals in immediate contact with them, Maksmex side his own family, with the superfinity of the Odie torse in theme selves, and having thus obtrined a single medion ty thio asame diate contact - which, although it may not imply the formal manipulations with preconceived design, implies the accidental equivalents - the circle gradually enlarges through each fresh accession, in much the same way that it began, until, after a few patient years of unshaken endurance, the apostle finds himself surrounded by thousands and thousands of human beings, whose volition is swayed through this Odic force - this sympam thetic medium - by his own central, resolute, and self-poised will, as if they were but one man. His moveless rolition has been, from the beginning, the base and axis of the wast sympam thetic movement going on around him, and upon the single strength of the Odic force within him, all depends, until, through a thorough organisation of ceremonial laws and obserm vances, the system of which he was the vital centre assumes a corporate existence, and can stand alone.

This is about the method in which all such organisations, radiating from the one man power or centre, widen their circles to an extreme circumference, until the force of the pebble thrown into the great lake is exhausted. So it is with all sympathetic excitements-from the Dancing Dervishes, the Shaking Quakers, or the Barking Brothers, to the vast Empire of France, led fren zied over the world in the will-o'the-wisp chase of universal sovereignty, by the fantastic will of a Napoleon. These are some of the general phenomena of sympathy, and there are many quite as extraordinary, if not as broad in what are called atmospheric or epidemic conditions, which go to prove the universality of this sympathetic law.

The distinctions between Od and Heat, Od and Electricity, as well as Od and Magnetism, have been so clearly demonstrated by the investigations of Baron Reichenbach as to leave at present no choice between the terms. Od expresses that force which, differing in many essential properties from the other two, can alone through its phenomena be reconciled with what we know of the Sympathetic or Nervous Fluid. It is therefore used as a synonym of this mysterious agency, and as conveying a far higher definition and significance than either the term Electricity or Mesmerism.

The worst and the best that the agitation begun by Mesmer has accomplished, is, to have stripped old Necromancy of its mysterious spells, by revealing something of the rationale of them, while at the same time, in unveiling its processes to the sharp eyes of modern knaves, they have been enabled to appropriate and practise them again with even more than the old success, under the new christening of "scientific experiment." It is, I think, easily enough shown, by a minute and circumstantial comparison of the cotemporary history of the darly age of black art ascendancy in Europe, which was literally the darl age of chivalry, with that of Cotton Mather witch-burning enlightenment in New England, that the arts practised by the accused in both these countries, and at all other such periods in all other countries, were nearly identical with each other; and those familiarised to us through the doings of mesm meric manipulation, revelation, clairvoyance, spiritual knockings, sc., &cc., are generally the very same, though assuming slight shades of difference, indicating some progressive development. A partial knowledge of psychological laws, which was formerly, nd with great plausibility, considered altogether too dangerous pabulum for the vulgar mind, has been sown broadcast by the empiricism of this mesmeric movement, the principal oracles and expounders of which have been clearly as ignorant of the causes with which they agitated, as ever wrinkled crone of peatsmoked hovel was of the true laws of that occult palmistry, through the practice, or vague traditions of which, she finally prophesied herself into the martyrdom of the "red-hot ploughshares," or the warm resting-place of the pot of boiling pitch. They only know that certain formulas produce certain results, and as they are blundering eatirely in the dark, they mix those which have a basis in science with the crude and meaningless forms which ignorance, with its abject cunning, easily supplies. From such amalgamations have arisen the mummeries of conjuration in whatever form, and by the imprudent use of which, the credulous, simple and superstitious, are so easily "frightened from their propriety," and thus made easy victims of more dangerous arts.

But it is a study of the fearful uses which have been made by the evil-disposed, of this partial knowledge of the laws of relation of soul to the body, that is more interesting now than these olden disguises of the same evil in more helpless forms; as now, through the mesmeric agitation, it has really attained to some gleam of causes-has now something of scientific illumination to steady and give direction to its reckless and deadly aira. In the radius of its hurtful circumference, the vicious power of the witch, fortune-teller or conjuror, was as much more circumscribed than that of the semi-scientific charlatan of clairvoyance, as the vision of the mole is less than that of the viper, which, at least, looks out into the sunshine though every cloud may impede its malignant gaze.

The relative degrees in which the Odic or sympathetic fluid may be found exhibited in the different individuals of our race, hare been previously remarked in general terms. In the sexes, centreč゙

observec $=\square=\square=\square=$

the circle $\underset{\sim}{*}=5 \square \cdots \cdots \cdots$ as it is $\mathrm{p}=-3=-\mathrm{m}=-\mathrm{m}$ hese comp: $=-=-=\cdot=-$ or Odic ceme. $-=:=\cdots \quad:=$ been, what we wrsx :- …

have seemed in sax: $12=$

given out the $E=n=0$

lation, and $\quad==\cdots \quad \because \cdot \cdot \cdots$

Now them $5=-\cdots$ men, throact wan or sent therugx :

grees, is fount mavis.
the same time. athonex: - when we compranaL" "ذs
mole medium of comutumes. . . . 5
world, as well as with the visible and material world, it can then be easily understood how what are called "evil" and "good spirits" should through it affect mankind. This will be fully illustrated when we observe the common conditions of health and disease. Health is good and disease in evil; and these are the two eternally antagonistic chemical forces in the universe. Health is that normal condition of the body which enables it to resist evil and maintain the proper balance of the spiritual and material elements. Disease is that abnormal condition of the body in which the integrity of the spiritual and organic functions has been destroyed through the sympam thetic media by evil, and good overcome.

In either case, the balance is destroyed, and the immediate consequence may be, in the one, sudden paroxysms of fearful insanity, or in the other, sudden death, as in common apoplezy.

Thus the popular fallacy, that all things having a source in the spiritual, or rather the invisible, must of necessity be good, is in a very simple way exposed. We see there may be what are called evil, as well as good spirits, which hold communion with us ; and the safest and only true general rule with regard to such matters is, that, while the good spirits are those propitiou cheraical forces which make themselves known to us in love, and joy, and peace, through the unbounded happiness of the normal conditions of health, the evil spirits are those vicious chemical forces, morbid delusions, and malign revelations, which are made known to us through all other diseased conditions as well as that of Clairvoyance. Remember that no such being has yet been known throughout the whole range of Mesmeric experiment as a healthy Clairvoyant, or a "subject" who has attained to the super-eminence of Clairvoyance, who was not what they fancifully term "delicate"-that in, linhble to thome dimeamew which me well known to muperverwe upon nervoum weaknew, exhautions, of amamexation. Thim condition of mervous exhaumion prodorn them, of eourwe, the very nugation of the nogrative pole of mympathy, and the firm perwon apponching then, whes poom menem the ordisuary Ddice conditionw of healfh, im cloteched hofld of by their fanine-totruck vitality, in the myonimed plea for life! life!
"Give! give!" in mill the insaliable cry. Thary mum bave the Odie fuid reatured, and that, in theing from your "enough," tury crawat and undernine the boly parpowew of your life to sumbe up that defietit in their own-which boablowe vise bas they ran at leant, through thim danyeroum medium, live in the integritimem of your hifo, and repjoy, buth phynically and mpirite wiling phomonuera of your own mind and mpiritual bring, bam, of your highory lowith.

Thewe hutan vampiren of mponger may be, therefore, an well protem sumy wrile intes the very cerzatron of life, and their hungry welerem remormelemaly druw away the virility of manhow, of the upiritual marmyth.

They mem so be mainly divided intes iwe chanser, one of which, borm, meerningly, with but an rudinestary woul, stainm to mpparent mpiritual through merely nucgial developinarnt, by
 - chelat, born with prefominating mpiritual (th figmique, im riveroum of maimal strength, and can only live by its sympathetic absorption of the same from others, through the same pervading medium. Of the two, the first is the evil type; for, born in the gross sphere of the passions, with a vigorous organisation, but faintly illuminated at the beginning with that golden light of love which is spiritual life, the fierce balf-monkey being is propelled onwards, and even upwards, by the basest of the purely animal instincts, appetites, and lusts. If such beings strive towards the light of the harmonious and the beautiful, it is not because they yearn for either the holy or the good, but because it lends a lurid charm to appetite and glorifies a lust.

The other character, in whom the spiritual predominates, whether from a natal inequality, as is very frequently the case, or from the sheer exhaustion of the physical powers, through emasculating vices, is yet, in itself, good, so far as its morbid conditions leave it an unaccountable being; but, as its reveliations and utterings depend entirely upon the Odic characters and will of those from whom its strength may be derived, it can only be regarded, whether used for evil or good, as a medium. This character' is the common Clairroyant, to whom we are indebted for those strangely-mingled gleams of remote truth, with errors the most grave and injurious, which have so tended to confuse the judgment of mankind in regard to the phenomena of Clairyoyance. Such persons can be made as readily the medium of any falsehood which the knavish passions of their "Mesmerisers" may dictate, as they can be caused to announce, by a will as strong, but soul more pure, the disconnected myths of science and of history, which have so surprised the world in what are called the "Revelations" of Andrew Jackson Davis. This man belongs to our second class, and is purely "a medium" of the sympathetic faid. His organisation is most sensibly sympathetic and delicately responsive, but is too feeble to balance his spiritual development. His case stands, therefore, as the most remarkable modern instance of what the ancients termed "vaticination;" but, as has been the case with other false prophets, his "gifts" have proved of no value, except to knaves. He was undoubtedly practised upon by a choice set of such characters; and, now that he has found in marriage a sympathetic restoration, through the physical, of its needed balance with the spiritual, he has lost his "lying gitt" of prophecy.

We have examined this man carefully, and are convinced that the whole mystery of his revelations and character may be contained in a nut-shell. He is to the sphere of intellectual and spiritual sympathy, and in a lower sense, precisely an analogous case with that of Mozart in the sphere of the musical and spiritual. When the great soul of humanity has been long - may one generation - in travail with a great thought in art, science, music, or mechanics, there is sure to be somebody born in the succeeding generation who is physically, mentally, and mpiritually, the impersonation and embodiment of this thought, of which the age is in labor, and who must of necessity become, solely and singly, the expression and embodiment thereof. Thus Mozart, the infant prodigy in music, who at five years old was the pet of monarchs and the miracle of his age, continued, with no signs of precociousness, a steady and consistent development, which ahowed him to be indeed the embodiment of the musical inspirations of bis age. His revelations in music were just as prodigious as even the rabid worshippers of the Davis $2 *$ revelations would imagine those to be; yet there are some most essential differences between the results of the two.

Davis, born amidst the travail of this new Mesmeric agitation, became the most sensitive organ of the sympathetic fluid in intellect, as the other had been in music; but as, in the case of Mozart, the exciting cause came from Nature, and constituted her purest and most sacred inspirations, so the inspiration of Davis came from man, with all his imperfections and subjective tendencies. The sequel has been, the inspirations of Mozart are considered now by mankind as only second to the Divine, while those of Davis are justly regarded as morbid, fragmentary, incormplete, and worthless.

The organisation of Mozart was equally sympathetic with that of Davis; but it was of that healthy tone which could only respond to nature and the natural; while the organisation of Davis belongs to that much inferior type, which, from its morbid and unbalanced conditions, can respond only to the human as the representative of nature. Such persons receive nothing direct from nature, but only through its representative, man.

It would seem as if the world were absolutely divided into two classes- the radiating and the absorbing; the first receiving from nature, and the second from man. In the first, are the holy brotherhood of prophets and the poets, and in the second, the poor slaves of sympathy-the knaves and fools-the impostors who play upon its well-known laws, and, deceiving themselves as well as others, may well be said to "know not what they do."

We are convinced that no man, who has kept himself informed of the psychological history and progress of his race, can by any means fall to recognise at once, in the pretended newerifed try bie heeper bot the queat, while the chiof expment

tracted by the notoriety they know well how to produce, the "登edium" becomes gradually surrounded by the enthusiaste of every school; and as he is brought into their various Odic spheres, he pronounces the creed of each in his morbidly illuminated language, and it sounds to the mob like inspiration.

There is no greater nonsense; men are inspired through natural laws. But this comparatively innocuous character, which we have thus far stepped aside to indicate, is nothing compared to the first specimen of this Clairvoyant type which we have classified. This, it will be remembered, is the animal born with feeble spirituality, but vigorous physique, which is, at the same time, intensely sympathetic. These, as we have said, are the infernal natures; for, possessing no life outside the lowet animal passions, self is to them the close centre of all being, and their Odic sensitiveness a vampire-absorption, the horrible craving of which, not content with the mere exhaustion of the animal life of the victim, by wanton provocations, drinks up soul and mind to fill the beastly void of their own. Theme worse than ghouls, that live upon the dying rather than the dead, possess some fearfully dangerous and extraordinary powers.

Vampirism, as a superstition, prevailed, not many years ago, like a general pestilence, throughout the countries of Servia and Wallachia. Whole districts, infected by this horrible disease, were desolated; people grew wild with terror, and; in their savage ignorance, committed monstrous sacrilege upon the sanctities of burial. Bodies that had rested quictly in their graves for ten, twenty, and even eighty days, were dragged forth, to have stakes driven through their chests; and if any blood was found, they were burned to ashes.

The belief was, that the deceased, when living, had been bitem by a buraan vampire, which, corming forth from its grave by sight, had sunk its white teeth in his throat, and drunk his broul, thereby causing a lingering death; in which he was als, deromed to the: hideroun fate of becorning a vampire, after his harial.

The bedien of vampiren, when dug up, presented a perfectly natural aprearance; and, even in thome camen where the scarfskiss peeked off, a new skin was found underneath, and new mails forroed on the: fingers. 'The: vital blowed was found in the beart, Junge, and viscera, exhibiting the conditions of perfect bealth. How the vampire got ont of his grave, without meratsibing a boole, does not applear.
'Thus we find, in modern varnpirism, a strange compoundol of ancilent auperestition with well-known eriesentific: truths. The vampire in the cenunterpart of the ancient ghenul, with the simple transerex of the habits of the vampire-bant to its identity. 'Theses: are thrn eronnerted with the: fact, well known to, the medic:al profesesion, that permone have beecri buried, nupposed to be dead, whos, in reality, had only fallen into what is calle:d the deathfrance ; and who, had they beren left aboves ground for in sufficient period, would have probably resumeitated of themselves. That they have done wo after burial, is a familiar fact ; since: bodies exhumed, long after, have beeten foumel to, have changed theis position in the cofin. How long bodien, thum inconnidereately buried, relain a resemblance to the normal conditions of life, has not been fully aseertsised.

We have lere the historical origin of what is called vamprimm; ledt there ant certhin phengmens of thin fearfol infection, closely resembling thowe which we have attributed to the Spiritual Vampire.

Vampirism is clearly a disease of the nervous system; it being first excited through the imagination of ignorance and superstition. The nerves, then affected through the odic medium, lose their balance, and the mind constantly playing within the circle of the one thought of horror, a rapid and premature decline is the immediate consequence.

The infection of which the victim died remaining still within the odic medium of the sphere it occupied, passea into the nerves of others, who die also; and thus the disease spreads like any other epidemic. But mark-whence the true origin of this superstition of the ghoul and the vampire, so universal in the world? Is it not that mankind, everywhere, has felt, with an unconscious shuddering, the presence of the spiritual vampire? The instincts of the masses have, in their superstitions, foreshadowed all the great discoveries of science. Has it not been, that they have felt the hideous incubus always; but not being able, through any connected series of observations, to discover the real cause of their dread and suffering, have given its nearly identical attributes a "local habitation and a name" among their superstitions?

What we have termed the Spiritual Vampire, is a scientific fact - we believe as much so as the bat-vampire; and that it feeds, not alone upon the living, but upon the spiritually dead; that originally, so far as its spiritual entity is concerned, it too comes forth from its sensual charnal to feed upon the soulblood of mankind. This may seem a horrible picture, but we cannot consent to withdraw it. These records were made under a sense of duty to mankind; and if they should ever see the licht, it munt be an thay have been written. We dare not reveral all that we know of thim thing - we ean only venture to may ervough to aroume men in amazement, at the realiwation of what they have always known and felt to eximt, without having exproued it. Nis mortal mind could have conceived nuch pomaiblinien, evern in hell, much lom in netual life.

Amulat the profound mecurities of the bent-oridered househeolde in the world, unilesu a miriet eye be hard to much facten and phenomerna an we have adverted to and ahall demeribe, the mont insidrous and fatal coorruptionas of the bodien ard mouly of your children, gour wiven, and your mimtern, may creep in, while thare in nes, dreatn of wrong of danger. If we mbock gou, it in tes put yeu monewwat uporn your guard againat the many evily, cosireabed under the apparent harmienn approathess of the viruously-purpoumed manipulator, or the covert practiver apon the eodic: of aympathectic vitality of the pure and unsuapecting. We will abide the inave.
Miteon clearly had vampirism in him thought when he wrote-
"Clatted by sontagion,
Imbodied and inmbruited, till quith lont
The divime property of their fret boing - Chate are those thick and gloomy ohadowe demp,
On cme, ha chamelmelan and mplehron,
Linguing and sitting by a new-mado grave."

SPIRITUAL VAMPIRISM;

THE HISTORY OF ETHERIAL SOFTDOWN.

CHAPTERI.

"Be thou a spirit of health, or goblin dawned ?"
In a mean and sterile district of Vermont, which shall be nameless, but which exhibits on every side stretches of bare land, with here and there the variety of clumps of gnarled and stunted oaks, Etherial Softdown was born. If mountains give birth to heroes, what ought to have been the product of a lowlying land like this, on whose dreary basins the summer's sun wilted the feeble vegetation, and the bleak winds of winter wrestled fiercely with the scrubby oaks, whose crooked and claw-like limbs seemed talons of some hideous, gaunt and reptile growth?

On the edge of one of the most desolate of these stretches, and beneath the shelter of the most ugly of these demonised oaks, were scattered the storm-blackened sheds of a miserable hamlet, in one of which, for there were no degrees in their comfortless dilapidation, the family of our heroine, the Softdowns, resided, and another yet smaller and at some distance apart from the rest, was occupied by her father, who was a shoemaker, as a workshop. This was one of those strange, out-of-the-way, starved and dismal looking places that you sometimes stumble upon in our prosperous land - which ought long since to have been deserted with the wanished cause of the temporary prosperity which had given it birth - but in which the people seem to be petrified into a morbid serenity of endurance, and look as if under the spell of some great Enchanter they awaited his awakening touch.

The child, which was the birth of a coarsely arganised mother was as drolly deformed with its squint eye and stooping shoulders as fancy could depict the elfin genius of such a scene. Dirty, bedraggled and neglected, with unkempt locks tangled and writhing like snakes about her face, and sharp, gray animal eyes gleaming from beneath, the ill-conditioned creature darted impishly hither and yon amidst the hamlet bovels, or peering from some thicket of weird oaks, started the stolid neighbors with the dread that apparitions bring.

Indeed, so wilful, unexpected and eccentric were her movements, that the people, in addition to regarding the oaflike child with a half feeling of dread, gave her the credit of being halfwitted as well. There was a hungry sharpness in her eye that made them shrink; a furious, raging, craving lust for something, they could not understand what, which startled them beyond measure; for, as in their stagnant lives, they had never been much troubled with souls themselves, they could not understand this soul-famine that so whetted those fierce eager eyes.

The father, Softdown, who appears to have been something more developed than the mother, and to have possessed a grotesque and rugged wit, more remarkable for its directness than its delicacy, became the sole instructor and companion of the distraught child, who readily acquired from him an uncouth method of enouncing trite truisms unexpectedly, which was to constitute in after life one of her chief, because most successful weapons.

Etherial early displayed a passion for acquiring not knowledge, but a facility of gibberish, which proved exhausting enough to the shallow receptacles around her, especially as ber mode of getting at the names and properties of things so closely resembled the monkey's method of studying physical laws. She had first to burn her fingers before she could be made to comprehend that fire was hot, but that was enough about fire for this wise child; she remembered it ever after as a physical sensation, and therefore it had ever after a name for her; and so with all other experiences, they were to her sensational, not spiritual or intellectual. The name of a truth could come to her with great vividness through a blow or pain of whatever character that might be purely physical, but through no higher senses, for these she did not yet possess. Of a moral sense she seemed now to develope no more consciousness than any other wild animal, but in her the memory of sensation took the place of mind and soul.

Thus passed the girlhood of our slattern oaf-shy and sullen -avoiding others herself, and gladly avoided by them, with the single exception of her father, from whom her strong imitative or sympathetic faculty was daily acquiring a rough, keen readiness of repartee, in the use of which she found abundant home-practice in defending herself against the smarting malig* nity of the matron Softdown, who charmingly combined in her person and habits all and singly the cleanly graces of the fishwife.

At sixteen, with no advance in personal loveliness, with passions fiercely developed, a mind nearly utterly blank, a taste for tawdry finery quite as drolly crude as that displayed by the plantation negresses of the South, and manners so fantastically. awkward and eccentric as to leave the general impression that she was underwitted, Etherial suddenly married a lusty and good-looking young Quaker, threw off her bedraggled plumes, and became a member of that prim order.
Now her career commences in earnest, for this was the first great step in her life in which she seems to have attained to some gleams of the knowledge of that extraordinary power of Odic irradiation and absorption which was afterwards to be exercised with such remarkable results.

She did not make her great discovery without comprehending its meaning quickly. She first perceived that, day by day, she grew more comely to look upon-that her figure was becoming erect, and losing its harsh angularities - the pitiless obliquity of her features growing more reconciled to harmonious lines and last, and most astounding, that the immediate result of the contact of marriage had been a rapid increase of her own spiritual and mental illumination, accompanied as well by a corresponding decline on the part of the husband in both these respects.

Here was a secret for you with a vengeance! Like an electric flash, a new light burst upon Etherial; and, as there was only one feeling of which her being was capable towards man, she chuckled over the delicious secret which now opened out before her with a terrible gloating.

Glorious discovery! Hah! the spiritual vampire might feed on his strength - might grow strong on this cannibalism of the noul! and what of him if she dragged him down into idiocy? Served him right! Did Etherial care that his spiritual death must be her life? She laughed and screamed with the joy of unutterable ferocity! Eureka! Eureka! They shall all be my slaves! They taunt me with being born without a soul, with being underwitted! I shall devour souls hereafter by the hundreds! I shall grow fat upon them! We shall see who has the wit! Their thoughts shall be my thoughts, their brains shall work for me, their spirits shall inform my frame! Ah, glorious! glorious! I shall live on souls hereafter! I shall go up and down in the land, seeking whom I may devour! Delicious! Delectable Etheria! !

CHAPTERII.

> And all around her, shapes, wixard and bruto, Laughing and wailing, grovelling, serpentine, Showing tooth, tuak, and venom-bag, sad sting! O, such deformitien!
> wnpwuow.

In Barclay Street, New York, years ago, flourished, at No. 63, that famous caravansarie of all the most rabid wild animals on the Continent, who styled themselves Reformers and New-light People; Come-outers, Vegetarians, Abolitionists, Amalgamationists, &c. &c., well known to fame as the "Graham House." Here, any fine morning, at the breakfast-table, you might meet a dozen or so of the most boisterous of the then existing or embryo Reform notorieties of the day. Mark, we say notorieties, for that is the word.

From the Meglatherium Oracle, whose monstrous head, com vered with a mouldy excrescence, answering for hair, which gave it most the seeming of a huge swamp-born fungus of a night-who sat bolting his hard-boiled eggs by the dozen, with bran-bread in proportion, washing them down with pints of diluted parched-corn coffee-even to the most meagre, hungryeyed, and talon-fingered of the soul-starved World-Reformers, that stooped forward amidst the babble, and, between huge gulps of hot meal mush, croaked forth his orphic words - they were all one and alike - the mutterers of myths made yet more misty by their parrot-mouthings of them!

Here every crude, ungainly crotchet that ever possessed ignorant and presumptuous brains; here every wild and unbroken hobby that ever driveller or madman rode, was urged together, pell-mell, in a loud-voiced gabbling chaos. Here the negro squared his uncouth and musky-ebon personalities beside the $3^{*}$ fair, frail form of some lean, rectangular-figured spinster-devotee of amalgamation from New England.

Here the hollow-eyed bony spectre of an old bran-bread disciple stared, in the grim ecstacy of anticipation, at the ruddy cheeks of the new convert opposite, whose lymphatic, wellconditioned corporation shivered with affight, as he met those ravin-lit eyes, and a vague sense of their awful meaning first possessed him, as his furtive glance took in the sterile "spread" upon the table, to which he had been ostentatiously summoned for " a feast."

Here some Come-outer Quaker, with what had been, at best, cropped hair, might be seen with the crop now shaven yet more close to his bullet-head, in sign of his greater accession in spiritual strength beyond the heathen he had left behind, sitting side by side with some New-light or Phalanxterian apostle, with his long, sandy, carroty, or rather golden locks, as he chooses to style them, cultivated down his back in a ludicrously impious emulation of the revered "Christ Head" of the old Italian painters.

Here the blustering peace-man and professed non-resistant, raled with a noisy insolence, rendered more insufferably insulting in the precise ratio of exemption from personal accountability claimed by his pusillanimous doctrines. Here too, a notorious Abolitionist, with his tallow-skinned and generally-disgusting face, roared through gross lips his vulgar anathemas against the South, which had foolishly canonised this soulless and meddlesome non-resistant ruffian, in expressing their readiness to hang him, should he be caught within their territory.

Here the weak and puling sectary of some milk-and-water creed rolled up his rheumy eyes amidst the din, and sighed for horror of a " sad, wicked world." Here the sharp animal eyes, the cool effrontery and hard-faced impudence of ignoramus Professors of all sorts of occult sciences, ologies, and isms, met you, with hungry glances that seemed searching for "the green". in your eye; and mingled with the whole, a sufficiently spicy sprinkle of feminine "Professors," of the same class, whose bold looks and sensual faces were quite sufficient offisets to the extreme etherialisation of their spiritualized doctrines.

Here, in a word, the blank and ever-shocking glare of harmless and positive idiocy absolutely would escape notice at all, or be mistaken for the solid repose of common sense, in contrast with the unnatural sultry wildness of the prevailing and predominating expression!

But this menagerie of mad people held caged, in one of its upper rooms, the object of immediate interest. On entering the apartment, which was an ordinary boarding-house bedchamber, a scene at once shocking and startling was presented. A female, seemingly about thirty-three, was stretched upon a low cot-bed, near the middle of the floor, while on the bed and upon the floor were scattered napkins, which appeared deeply saturated with blood, with which the pillow-case and sheet were also stained. A napkin was pressed with a convulsive clutch of the hands to her mouth, into which, with a low, suffocating cough, which now and then broke the silence, she seemed to be throwing up quantities of blood from what appeared an alarming hemorrhage.

A gentleman, whose neat apparel and fresh benevolent face somehow spoke "physician!" leaned over the woman, with an expression of anxiety, which appeared to be subdued by great effort of a trained will. He bent lower, and in an almost whispered voice, said:
${ }^{6}$ My dear madam, you must restrain yourself. This hemorrhage continues beyond the reach of any remedies, so long as you permit this wiolent excitement of your maternal feelings to continue. Let me exhort you to patience - to bear the necessary evils of your unfortunate condition with more patience!"

The only answer was a slow despairing shake of the head, accompanied by a deep hysterical groan, which seemed to flood the napkin at her mouth with a fresh effusion of blood, which now trickled between ber fingers and down upon her breast.

The humane physician turned, with an uncontrollable expression of horrified sympathy and alarm upon his face, and snatching a clean napkin from the table, gently removed the saturated cloth from the clutching pressure of her fingers, and tenderly wiping the blood from her mouth and person, left the clean one in her grasp.
"Be calm! be calm-I pray you! you must some day escape his persecutions. You have friends; they will assist you to obtain a divorce yet, and rescue your child from him clutches. Do, pray now, be calm!" The voice of the good man trembled with emotion while he spoke, and the perspiration started from his forehead.

At this instant the door was suddenly thrown open, and a tall, gaunt man, with a very small round head, leaden eyes, and a wide ungainly mouth, with a projecting under jaw, singularly expressive of animal stolidity, paused on the threshold and coolly looked around the room. The woman sprang forward at the sight, as if to rise, while a fresh gush of blood poured from her mouth, bedabbling her fingers and the sheet. The physician instinctively seized her to prevent her rising, but, resisting the pressure by which be gently strove to restore her head to the pillow, she retained her half-erect position, and with eyes that had suddenly become strangely distorted, or awry in their sockets, she glared towards the intruder for an instant, and then slowly raising her flickering hand, which dripped with ber own blood, she pointed at him, and muttered, in a sepulchral voice, that, besides, seemed choking:
"That is he! see him! see him! There stands the monster who would rob me of my babe, as he daily robs me of money." Here the blood gushed up again, and she was for a moment suffocated into silence, as the object of her denunciation stood perfectly unmoved, whule a cold smile half lit his leadea eyes. This seemed to fill the apparently dying woman widh renewed and hysterical life. She raised herself yet more erect, and still pointing with her bloody, quivering finger, while her head tossed to and fro, and the distorted eyes glared staringly out before her, she spoke in a gasping, uncertain way, as if communing with herself. "The wretch taunts me! my murderer dares to sneer! 0 God! must this always continue? must that brute always follow me up and down in the land, to rob me of the money that I earn - to be my tyrant, my jailor! He will not give me money to pay postage even, out of that I earn abundantly, while he is earning nothing. He will not give me clothes to keep me decent, while I earn enough. He will not give my child shoes to wear, though be is trying to take her from me!"
"That is a lie, Etherial! you know I gave the child a new pair yesterday!" gruffly interposed the man at this stage of the deeply tragic soliloquy, while he stepped forward towards the bed. A choling scream followed, and the blood was spattered over the spread as she fell back screaming - ${ }^{6}$ Take him away! take him away! He is killing me with his brutality!" and then her head sank in sudden collapse upon the pillow, and the face, which had heretofore looked singularly natural in color, for one in such a dreadful strait from hemorrhage, turned livid pale, while the blood continued to pour upon the pillow from the comers of the relaxed mouth.

The poor physician, whose frame had been shivering with intense excitement during this interview, sprang erect; as the form of what he supposed to be a corpse fell heavily from his arms, and with the natural indignation of a feeling man, fully roused at what be considered the murderous brutality of the husband, rushed forward, and seizing him furiously by the collar, shook and choked him in a perfect ecstacy of rage, shouting, at the same time -
"Unnatural beast! monster! You have killed that poor child at last! murdered your own wife, whom you swore to nourish and protect! Infernal villain! you ought to be drawn and quartered -hanging is too good for you! You saw the terrible condition of the poor victim of your brutalities when you came, yet you persisted! In the name of humanity, I send you hence! Death is too light punishment for you!" and ha hurled the unresisting wretch - who, by this time, had grow perfectly black in the face under the rough handling of this roused and indeed infuriate humanity - staggering out of the door-and closing it upon him, he proceeded to apply such restoratives as on an examination the real condition of the patient suggested.

A short and anxious investigation proved it to be rather a state of syncope than actual death; and, with a full return of all his professional caution, skill and coolness, be applied himself to the restoration of his patient, with a beart greatly relieved by the discovery that the result he so much dreaded wat not yet, and hugging to his kindly breast the consolation " while there is life there is hope!" He paid no attention to clamorous knocks for admission and lond-talking excitement, which the violence of the preceding scene had no doubt caumed in alarming the house. In a short time the good doctor cantiously unbolted the door and came forth from the room, tread ing as though on egg-shells. After leaving careful instructions with the landlady that his patient, who now slept, should under no pretence be disturbed, most especially by the husband, umfil his return, as her present repose might prove a matter of 踔 and death, he left the house, promising to call again in tw hours.

For one hour the woman lay calm and motionless on her gory bed, as if in catalepsy, when to a low, peculiar knock at the door, she sprang up, wide awake, and in the apparent full po session of her faculties.
"Who ?" she asked, in a quick, firm tone, as she threw the hair back from her eyes.

To the low response, "I, love!" she stepped quickly from the bed and snatched a shawl from the back of a chair, and by several rapid sideway movements of her feet at the same time thrust the bloody napkins which strewed the floor beneath the bed, where they would be out of sight, and by a movement almost as swift, threw a clean "spread" over the blood-stained pillows and sheet, then drawing her large shawl closely over the stained dressing-gown in which she had risen, she rushed first to the glass, and smoothed her hair with an activity that was positively amazing, and then to the door, which she unbolted on the inside-showing that she must have risen to bolt it immediately as the doctor passed out-and admitted a man who was in waiting.
"Ah, my soul's sister! my Heaven-bride! how is thy spiritual strength this evening?" and at the same time, as her yielding form sank into his outspread arms, he pressed her lips with his, adding, "I salute thy chaste spirit!"
"Brother of my soul, I was weary, but now I am at rest. I was wounded and fainting by the way, but the good Samaritan has come!" and she turned her eyes upward to his with a melting expression of confiding abandon.
"Angel!" accompanied by a closer and convulsive clasp, was the response.
"What do they say of poor me again, to-day, those cruel wicked people outside ?"3 she asked, with eyes still reverentially upraised to his, as they moved slowly with clasped arms towards the cot, on the side of which they sat, she still leaning against his bosom.
"My good sister, they say what evil spinits always prompt men to say of the good, who, like the Prophets, are sent to be stoned and persecuted on earth. You should not regard such. There are those who know you in the spirit, to whom it has been revealed through the spiritual sense, that you are good and true, as well as in the right, and through such, you will find strength of the Father."
"Oh, you are so strong in spiritual mightiness that you do not sympathise with the weaknesses of we humbler mortals! I wonder, indeed, how you can forgive them?" and her downcast eyes were furtively raised to his. The man wore his hair thrown back over his head and behind his ears. He drew himself up shghtly at this, and stroked back his locks, then placing hin hand with patriarchal solemnity upon her bowed head, proceedec in a somewhat louder tone. "My simple child-my soul-sisters, I should say, you are hardly upon the threshold of the true wis dom. Your knowledge of the law of spiritual correspondence is yet too incomplete for you to understand how eatirely gooi has been mistaken for evil, and evil confounded with good it the world. For instance-it is called evil by the ignoran world, for a brother man to caress thee in the spirit as I hav caressed thee but now. The imaginations of a world that liett in evil are impure. 'Evil to him who evil thinks!' The greal doctrine of correspondence teaches that there are two lives-the spiritual and the animal. The passions of the animal are in the fleshly lusts; those of the spiritual are in no wise such, they are in the Heavenly sphere, they are of love and wisdom Thus, my caress in this Heavenly sphere is of no sin to thee, for by and through it I convey to you, my spiritual sister, the strength of love and wisdom for which your heart yearn Thus-"
As he stooped his head to renew the unresisted caress, the door flew open again, and the man with the wide mouth, the hideous chin and the leaden eye, stood again upon the threstold, and as the affrighted pair looked up they saw he was backed by the curious faces of half-a-dozen chambermaids, jealous of the honor of the house, flanked by the indignant landlady and a score of prying, curious, sharp-eyed faces, which might be recognised at a glance as belonging to those pickled seraphs of reform, known as "free-spoken" spinsterr in New England.
"There, they are at it!" shouted the man with the gaping mouth. "I told you so! I told you that Professor was always kissing her !"
"Yes!"
"There they are, sure enough!"
"I always thought so!"
"The honor of my house!" bristled the landlady, striding forward. "I did not expect this of you, Professor!"
${ }^{6}$ Madam !"' said the gentleman with his hair behind his ears, striding forward as he released the suddenly collapsed and seemingly lifeless form he had just held within his embrace, and which fell back now heavily upon the pillow-spread, which was instantly discolored by a new gush of blood from the mouth. "I was administering, with all my zeal, spiritual comfort to this poor, sick and dying sister, when you burst in! See her condition now!"

He waved his hand towards the tragic figure. "The Professor" occupied a parlor on the first floor, beside two bed-rooms adjoining this, and being on the palmy heights of his renown and plenitude of purse, it was not convenient for the landlady to quarrel with him at present. "Ah, if that is the case, Professor, I beg you to pardon us. The husband of this woman has misrepresented you and your beneficent motives, and accuses you of all sorts of improprieties. We came up, at his urgency, to see for ourselves, and the shocking condition in which we find her now, proves that the ravings of the husband are, as she has always represented them, insane."
"I've seen you kissing her before!" roared the husband, advancing threateningly upon the Professor, who, however spiritual in creed, did not now appear particularly spirited, as he turned very pale, retreated backwards, and holding up his two trembling hands imploringly, exclaimed-" Hold! hold! my dear brother! It was a spiritual kiss! I meant you no harm, nor that angel who lies there dying! Our kiss was pure and holy as the new snow. Hold him! hold him! Don't let him hurt me! I am a non-resistant! I am for peace!"
" Your holy kisses! I don't believe in your holy kisses!" gnashed the enraged husband, still following him up with warlike demonstrations; but here the easily appeased landlady interposed once more, to save the honor of her house in preventing a fight.
"No blows in my house!" she shrieked, as she threw herself between the parties. "The Professor is a man of God, and shall not be abused here; shame on you, Aminadab, with your poor, persecuted wife there, dying before your face! Everybody will believe what she says about your persecutions now !"
"Bah, you don't know that woman! she's no more dying than you are!" grunted the fellow, whose wrath fortunately seemed to be of that kind that a straw might turn it aside. All the women rolled up their eyes and lifted their two hands at this speech.
"What a brute!"
"The horrid, murdering wretch! and she bleeding at the mouth, and from the lungs, too!"
"Lord save the poor woman's soul, with a husband like that!"

And other speeches of like character were ejaculated by all the women present.

At this moment a fresh effusion of blood, accompanied by a low groan, from the mouth of the suffering patient, flooded the clean spread with its purple current, and the horrified female rushed from the room, screaming -
"He's killed her at last, poor thing ""
"Where's the doctor?"
"She's dying of his brutality-run for the doctor!" At this moment, with a hasty and heavy step, that gentleman was heard advancing along the passage, followed by a crowd of pale, frightened-looking women. He strode into the room.
"What now?-what's to pay?" and his eye fell on the trembling form of the brutal husband, who had by no means forgotten the rough handling he had received, and now skulked and quailed like a whipped cur, as his eye saw the instant thunder darken on the brow of the doughty doctor.
"You here again-you brutal fellow? I shall instantly bind you over to keep the peace toward this unfortunate woman, whose life you are daily endangering by your brutalities. Take yourself off, sir!" Aminadab waited for no second invitation, but availed himself of the open doorway.

Without noticing the spiritual professor, who had drawn himself into as small space as possible in one corner, the good man advanced to the side of his patient with an anxious, flurried manner.
"What can that besotted wretch have been doing to her again ?" and he gently placed his fingers upon her pulse, and shook his head gravely as he did so.
"Very low! very low, indeed!-nearly absolute syncope again! This is horrible! How sorry I am that I was compelled to leave her for a moment."
"Is she really in danger, doctor?" asked the spiritual prom fessor, advancing with recovered assurance.
"Who are you, sir?" he said, looking up sharply. "One of these officious fools, I suppose?" Then glancing his eye around at the crowded doorway, he straightened himself hastily, and exclaimed - "Leave the room, all of you-she must be quiet-I wish to be alone with my patient! Leave the room, sir, I say!" in a sterner voice, as the spiritual professor hesitated on his backward retreat.
"I-I-I p-pro-test against the impropriety!" he stammered forth, looking back at the women, with a very pale face, as he accelerated his backward movement before the steady stride of the resolute doctor.
"Out with you, sir-I will answer for the proprieties in this case ${ }^{9}$

The door was slammed in the ashy face of the spiritual professor, and securely doubled-locked before the doctor returned to the bedside of his patient.

The bleeding from the mouth had now ceased. All the usual remedies in such cases having so far entirely failed, the puzzled doctor had come to the final conclusion that the hemor-rhage-be its seat where it might-was only to be subdued by a restoration of the patient to the most perfect repose. Sleep, calm, unbroken sleep, to his sagacious judgment and sensibilities, seemed to offer the sole alternative to death. He had been impressed by his patient that her constitutional tendencies were, by a sad inheritance, towards consumption, and the loss from the lungs, of such quantities of blood as he had witnessed, was well calculated to fill his professional mind with horror and dread. The case had thus appeared to him a fearfully uncertain and delicate one, and this sense may fully account for the stern and unusual procedure of turning even the husband out of the room on the two occasions we have mentioned.

As her physician, he felt himself bound to protect his helpless patient against those moral causes of irritation which he had been led to believe existed, not only from her reluctant disclosures, but from what he had himself witnessed. Believing that her beastly husband was the chief and immediate cause of this fatal irritation, he had felt himself justified in his rough course towards him, and was now fully and resolutely determined to protect what he considered a death-bed-providentially thrown into his charge - inviolate from farther annoyance, from whatever quarter, at least so long as he held the professional responsibility. In this resolute feeling, and as the day was warm, he threw of his coat, raised all the windows, and sat himself quietly down beside his patient to watch for results.

The eyes of the kind man very naturally rested upon the object of his solicitude, and after the first excitement of anmiety was over, and he had settled calmly into a contemplative mood, he first became conscious that there was something strangely fascinating in the position of the nearly inamimate figure. He had never before thought of the being before him as other than a very plain, but much-afflicted woman, by whose evident physical calamities, no less than her private sufferings, he had been strongly interested.

She had told him her own story, and he had believed her, thinking he saw confirmation enough in the conduct of those she accused of ill-treatment; but the idea of regarding her as attractive in any material sense, had never for an instant croaed his pure soul. Now there was an indescribable something in her attitude, so expressive of passion, that, in the pulseless silence, he felt himself blush to have recognised it.

Her arms, which he now remembered to have been bare in all his late interviews with her, were exquisitely rounded and beautifully white, and he could not but wonder that he had not before observed the strange contrast between them and the plain weather-beaten face. They looked startlingly voluptuous now, contrasted with the pallid cheek which rested on them, and the glossy folds of dark hair in which they were entangled. So strikingly indeed was this expression conveyed, that even the purple stains of blood upon the spread beneath would not divest him of the dangerous illusion. The good doctor felt the blood mount to his forehead in the shame of deep humiliation as he recognised in himself this wandering of thought.

What! could it be that one so habitually pure in feeling as he, could permit the intrusion at such an hour of impure associations? Such things were unknown to his life, so disinterested, so spotless, so humane. What could it be that had caused such feelings to possess him thus unusually? It could not be possible she was conscious of the position in which her body was thrown. Was there some strange spell about this woman - some mysterious power of sphere emanating from that still form, that crept into his blood and brain with the evil glow of these unnatural fires?

The poor doctor shuddered as he turned aside from the bed, and, with a soft step, glided to the window, and there seating himself, strove to recover the command of his thoughts by distracting them with other objects in the busy street.

The good man was on grievous terms with himself, as he continued to beat the devil's tattoo on the window-sill with his heavy fingers. He felt alarmed, nay, even guilty. He knew not why. We shall see!

4*

CHAPTERIII.

> And after all the rakal many ran, Heaped together in rude rabblement. Spernimin

What intricate impench in this ?-I think you all have drunk of Circe'm cup!

Tre woman continued, with calm, regular breathings, to sleep for several hours. The dusk of evening had now closed in, and yet her patient guardian sat silently watching her motionless figure. A long and serene self-communion had gradually restored the excellent doctor to his ordinary equanimity, and he now, with untiring vigilance, awaited the changes that might supervene in the condition of the patient.

After all his thinking on the subject, he found himself now no nearer comprehending the cause of the late unwonted disturbance of his habitual serenity than at the beginning. He had dealt harshly with himself, in endeavoring to account for it, and never dreamed of reproaching the feeble and wretched being before him, as in any degree the conscious agent of what he considered a weakness unpardonable in himself.

With the natural proclivity of generous souls towards the extremes, he had, in the plenitude of his self-reproach, proceeded to exalt the sleeping woman into an earth-visiting angel with wounded wings, the spotless purity of which the breath of his darkened thought had soiled. The poor, good-hearted doctor!

The silence of the room was now broken by a low exclamation of fright, accompanied by a slight movement of the patient. The doctor sprang forward softly to the bed-side.
"Who? - what?-where am I? What has been bappening ?"
asked the woman, with an expression of bewilderment and alarm.
"Nothing! nothing, my dear madam! I am here-you are safe - but you must not talk."
"Where is he? is he gone?" she persisted in a wild, terrified manner.
"Yes, he is gone. He shall not come back to disturb you again. You must be quiet now, and get well. Please be calm, and trust in me."
"Trust in thee?" said the patient, in a voice which had instantly lost its vague tone. "Trust in thee, thou minister of light, who hast come to my darkened pillow, to my bloody death-bed, to console me!" and here she clutched his band. ${ }^{6}$ Trust thee - I would trust thee ns I trast Cod!" and she pressed his hand to her heart.
"You must be silent, madam," urged the physician, endeavoring to extricate his imprisoned hand, for he felt strange tinglings along his veins, which alarmed his now penitent and vigilant spirit. She only shook her bead, and clung with yet greater tenacity to his hand, and then, first raising it to her lips with a reverential kiss, she placed it upon the top of her head, with the palm outstretched, and signified her desire that he should keep it there, with a smile of entire beatitude. The doctor barely knew enough of mesmeric manipulations, to understand that this laying-on of hands was commonly resorted to among the believers in the science, as a remedy for nervous headache. He could see no harm in the innocent formula, if it assisted the imagination in throwing off pain, and he very willingly humored his poor patient, in permitting his hand to remain there.

In a moment or two a singular change came over the face and general physical expression of the woman, and the doctor, who had witnessed something of mesmeric phenomena, instantly recognised this as clearly presenting all the symptoms of such a case. He had mesmerised her by a touch, and it was not without a thrill of vague wonder that be awaited further developments.

There was a perfect silence of ten minutes' duration, when the mesmerised patient began moving her lips as if in the effort to articulate. The curiosity of the doctor was now fully aroused-his will became concentrated-he desired to hear her speak; in his unconscious eagerness, he willed that she should do so with all the energy of his firm nature; and speak she did.
"Happy! happy! Ah, I am content in this pure sphere! My soul can rest here !"' a long pause, then suddenly a shudder vibrated through her frame, and she shrank back as one appalled by some spectral horror.
"Ha! it is all dark now! I see! I see! his hand is red! red! red! red! There is murder on this sou!!"

The doctor sprang up and back as if he had been shot. His face grew livid pale, and he trembled in every joint, while with chattering teeth he stammered-"Woman! Woman, how know you this?"
"I see it there-that buge red hand! Now all is red! There! there! I felt it must be so! The pale and golden light breaks through! It spreads! It fills and covers everything! His heart did no murder-it was his hand! He can be redeemed! This soul is pure!"

The poor doctor sank upon his chair and groaned heavily, while be covered his face with his hands. He spoke, in a few moments, in an almost inaudible tone, to himself, while the woman, who had suddenly opened ber eyes, turned her head slightly, and watched him with a sharp attention.
"Alas! alas! how came this strange being in possession of the fatal secret of my life? I believed it buried in the oblivion of thirty years. My life of dedication to humanity, since, I thought might have atoned for that quick sad deed! Yes! I struck him! O, my God-I struck him! but the provocation was most fearful! Woman, who and what are you, that you should know this thing?" and with a vehement gesture he jerked his bunde from before his eyew, and turning nwifly upon her, he met the keen, mill glance of thowe watchful ryem, which mone through the subdued light of the room, steadily upon him. The doctor wat mounded! He mprang to him feet again, exclaining angrily-
"What ohallow trick id this? You meemed but now in the memmeric sleep, and mouthed to me concerning my past hife, and here you are, wide awale! How came you with the secret of my life ?"

The woman mawered feebly, and with a sob that at once touched the gentle-hemeded doctor, and turned aside him wrath-
" You took your hand away-you would not let zne apeak. Place your band upon my head again, and I will tell you all."

The troubled doctor reonewted himedf with maddering reluctmace, and renewed the manipulation.

In a few moments whe appeared aggin to have mank into the meep, and commenced in that mow, fragmentary manner muphowed to be peculiar to wuch conditions:
" I Eee! The dark nhadow in on this monl agyain! It is of ongep mod mumpicion-they are both evil apirits! They strive to make it wrong the innocent! It is too holy und pure to yield! I mee the golden light fill all sgain! The bloody hand is gone. No stain of crizue remains upon thin woul. It will be pardoned of Giod. Thim moul neted only haman love. Through love it can be made free before (ion! • All the prat will be forgiven then-the rerl stainm will fade! $A$ mudten anger made it min. lave: ran only intercede for this min. Love will intercede! It will be maved!"
llere her voice became mblued into indintinct mutteringes mad the doctor drew a long loreath as he withdrew him hand-
"Singular woman! IIs, remid all thin have been revented to her? She munt cenme, me with spirits in thiw wate. My mory in not known to sny here. Inever saw or herard of her, until went Seatully pamionate and repernted deed should thum rise up in my path, thousands of miles away, amidst strangers, who can know nothing of me! Oh, my God! my God! Thou art indeed vengeful and just!" and the miserable man clasped his hands before his eyes and moaned. "It was my first draught of love and life. He dashed it! I was delinious in my joy, while the beams rained from her eyes into my hungry soul-hungry of beauty and of bliss. He dashed it all, and in the hot blood of my darkened madness I slew him! Oh, I slew him! His shadow, that can never be appeased, though I bave given body, and soul, and substance, to relieving the sufferings of my race since that unhappy hour-it rises here again! It haunts me! Yes! yes! I feel that love alone can make me strong once more, to bear such tortures! But have I not denied myself such dreams? Have I not with dedicated heart walked humbly since in selfdenying ways? Have I not clothed the orphan, fed the poor and nursed the sick? Have I not ministered amidst pestilence, and held my life as of none account that I might bring good to others? Can I be forgiven? No! no! The Pharisee recounts his holy deeds and thanks God that his life is not sinful as another man! I am not to be forgiven! I shall never know those drearas of love!"

The strong man bowed his frame and shook with agony. Could he but have looked up, a keen, quick gleam from the eyes which had been so steadily fixed upon him during this painful soliloquy, would have struck him as conveying the ecstacy of a sainted spirit over a soul repentant - or of some other feeling quite as exultant.

This curious scene was, however, most unexpectedly interrupted at this moment, by a loud yelling from the street below. The clamor was so sudden, and yet so angrily harsh, that both parties sprang forward in the alarm it caused-the woman, springing up into a sitting posture on the bed, and the doctor to go to the window.
"What is it "" she exclaimed wildly, as she tossed back her hair. "What do these cruel people want to do to me now?"

The doctor, who saw at a glance the meaning of what was going on below, and the necessity of keeping his patient cool, turned to her, with a very quiet expression-
"Do not be alarmed, madam. It is merely some disorderly gathering of rowdies, in the street below. There is no danger to you-only do not get excited, or you will bleed again. I am here to protect you."
"Then I am safe!" was the fervid response, which, however, was followed by a roar so sullen and portentous, from the infuriated mob underneath, as to leave some doubt of its truth even upon the mind of the doctor.
"Down with the amalgamation den!"
"Down with the saw-dust palace!"
"Tear it down!"
"Let's lynch the wretches!"
The response to speeches of this sort, from single voices, would be a simultaneous burst of approbation from the great crowd, and a trampling and rush to get nearer the building. It seemed a formidable sight, indeed, to the doctor, as he looked down upon this living mass of men, surging like huge waves tossed against some cliff, while the torches, that many of them bore, glared fitully upon the upturned, angry faces.

A powerful voice, which rose above all the tumult, exclaimed with a hoarse oath, as the speaker turned for an instant towards the crowd, from the top of the front steps-
"Let us burst open the door and lynch every white person found with a negro. Here goes for the door!" and he threw himself furiously against it, while a perfect thunder-crash of roars attested the approbation of the dangerous mob. The door resisted for a moment, when there was a sudden yell from the outside of the mob, nearly a square distant-
"Here! here's what'll do it! pass 'em on!" and the alarmed doctor saw immediately the portentous gleam of fire-axes, which were being passed over the heads of the crowd towards the door, and in another instant the crash of the cutting would commence. The doctor, as we have seen, was e very prompt man. He thrust his head out of the window, and in a loud, commanding voice, shouted-"Stop ""
The man at the door, who had just received the axe, and was in the act of wielding it, paused for an instant, to look up, while the whole sea of faces was raised toward the window, amidst a finoment's silence, of which the doctor instantly availed himself-${ }^{66}$ Gentlemen, do you war upon women? I have a female patient here, in this room, at the point of death! If you proceed, you will kill her!"
"Who is she?" shouted some one, while another voice, in a derisive tone, yelled out amidst screams of laughter-${ }^{\text {"I Is }}$ Is Rhe Rose? Rose? de coal-brack Rose? I wish I may be shot if I don't lub Rose!"

Amidst the thunders which followed, some one shouted from a distant part of the mob, to the man with the axe-" Go on, Jim! It's all pretence with their sick women!"
${ }^{4}$ Down with the door-they don't escape us that way! Look out for your bones, old covey, when we catch you!"

The axe was again swung back, but the doughty doctor still persisted-"Stop!" he shouted again, in a tone so startling for energy of command, that the axe was again lowered.
"Are you Americans? Have you mothers and sisters ?"
"Yes, but they ain't black gals!" gibed one of the mob, and set the rest into a roar once again.
"I appeal to you as men-as brothers and fathers, do not murder my poor patient!"
"Who is that noisy fellow?" bellowed a brutal voice below.
"I am a physician! I have nothing to do with this house or its principles; I only beg to be permitted to save my patient!"
"What is your name, I say " bellowed the hoarse man again.
"Out with it! We'll know you-some of us!"
The name was mentioned. There was a momentary pause, and a low murmur ran through the crowd; then shout after shout of applauding huzzas.
"We know you!"
"Just like him!"
"Noble fellow!"
"The good doctor! Huzza! huzza!"
And so the cry went up on all sides, for the doctor's reputation for benevolence was as wide as that of John Jacob Astor for the opposite trait.

There seemed to be a vehement consultation among what appeared the leaders of the mob, which lasted but for a moment or two, when one who stood upon the top step looked up, and in a firm, respectful voice, said to the doctor-
"It's all right, sir, about you! We shall let the women pass out! But you must clear the house of them!"
"But it is dangerous to more my patient."
"We cannot help that, doctor; we do this for your sake, not theirs, for they ought every one of them to be burned, and we are determined to abate the nuisance of this house. So hurry them along here quick, for the boys will not keep quiet long."
"Yes, hurry them women along; we'll let them go this time."
"All but that lecturing lady (?), who says that she would as soon marry a negro as a white man!"
"Yes, all but her; we want to be rid of such creatures; let's duck her in the Hudson."
"No, boys, we will make no distinction. We have promised - let the woman go."
"Down with the lecturing women and their black lovers!"
"Duck the hag! we'll wash off the scent for her!"
Cries such as these convinced the doctor that indeed no time was to be lost, particularly as the sound of the axe was now heard below in good earnest. Approaching the bed hastily, he took the shivering form of the panic-stricken woman, who had heard distinctly these last ominous cries, into his arms.

She clutched him with desperate grip, while be hurried down the stairs.

On the way, he met the Spiritual Professor in the passage, surrounded by the women of the house, who were clustered about him, in the seemingly vain hope of obtaining from him something of that ethereal consolation and strength, of which he was the so much vaunted Professor. Indeed, he himself now seemed the most woful, of all the whimpering, terrified group, in want of any kind of strength, whether spiritual or otherwise; and his teeth literally chattered, as he clutched at the doctor's passing arm.
"Wh - wh - what shall we do? They mean to burn the house, don't they?"
"Do ?" said the doctor, sternly, shaking off his grasp. "Try and be a man, if you've got it in you! Get these women out of the house, and take yourself off on your spiritual legs as fast as you can, or you may make some ugly acquaintances."

The Professor still clung to his skirts.
" Oh Lord! the doctrine of correspondences does not sanc-tion-"
"Go to the devil, with your correspondence, or I shall kick you out of my path!" roared the angry doctor, while the snivelling Professor, more alarmed than ever, slunk aside to let hiro pass. The crash and clatter from below now announced that the mob had effected an entrance from the street, and leaving the women, all screaming at the top of their lungs, around their doughty spiritual guide, he rushed on with his burden towards the front entrance, which had thus been taken by storm, and was now rapidly filling with excited men. Some were seizing the furniture, which they began to demolish, while others hurried forward to intercept him.
"It is the sick woman. Remember your promise; let me pass."
"Yes, that's the good doctor; let him pass, boys."
${ }^{85}$ No, yet y" pared a burly-looking ruflian, preasing threrght the throng. "We must see who it is he has got there. Who she s" and he roughly dragged aside the shawl that partially covered lier face.
"Monster!" shouted the excited doctor, "the woman in Aying! Malke way! Let me pross!"
"Sot so fast!" wid the ruffian, resisting bis forward rush. "I shatll I shall wee! Boym, here she is! By C-d, this in she, that lecture-woman; she wants to marry a nigger, hah! We won't let ther go. ${ }^{3 \prime}$
"Bht you will !" said the dortor, releasing one arm, with which he struck the muffian directly in the mouth, and with a force that ment him reeling backwards.
" Cifrod! grod!" shouted twenty voices; "served him right, dre:tor."

The fellow had rallied instantly, and was rushing, like wild buil, headlong upon the doctor, when neveral powerful men throw themselves betweem the two, seizing the ruffian at the same time.
"t No, Jims, you stand back!" waid one of them, brandishing a heary axe before his eyes. "You touch that gentleman again, and I'll bram you!"
"It's a shame?" interponed otherw. "It', the good doctor who nurses the poor for nothing. Doubt if he gete a cent for that crmature."
"Yea, if whe wa the devil's dam hernelf, we promised the gerom man to let her gro. Stand back, boys, and let the doctor panan "

An opening was arcordingly formed, throngh which the doceton hatened to make his way. When he made his appearo ance at the doop, he wat greetod with three wild, hearty cherer In himelf, and as many groans and hiseses for the character of the woman whom lue bure, the nows of the identifieation of whom had inmanly foum it way to the ontside.

Hegardlew of all thim, and only congratulating himedf upon the prospect of getting his patient off alive, he pressed rapidly through the crowd, with the purpose of bearing her to the shelter of his own bachelor home.

The mob now instantly occupied the building, which was gutted by them, and the shattered contents, along with its occupants, men and women, roughly hurled into the street. Some of the former were very severely handled, and among the rest, the Spiritual Professor had his share of material chastening. The mob found him under a cot-bed, with three or four feminine disciples of his spiritual correspondences piled over him, or clinging distractedly to his nerveless limbs.

They dragged him out by the heels, with his squalling cortege trailing after him, and finding that the occult professor of spiritualities had gone into a state of obliviousness, or rather fainted, they proceeded, in their solicitude for his recovery, to deluge his person with sundry convenient slops, which shall be nameless, and afterwards kicked him beadlong into the street below, where the screaming boys pelted him with gutter-mud and rotten eggs, until, finding his spiritual legs, as he had been advised - it is to be supposed - of a sudden, he made himself scarce, down Barclay Street, in an inappreciable twinkle.

In a word, the people, in this instance, as in many others, when they have found it necessary to take the laws of decency and common sense into their own sovereign bands, did the work of ridding themselves of this most detestable nuisance effectually. The Graham House was broken up, and although the pestilent nest of knaves and fools who most delighted there to congregate, have endeavored, in subsequent years, to reassemble, and renew the ancient character of the place as their head-quarters, yet the attempt has only been attended with partial success.

The blow was too decisive on this night; for, although the walls were left standing, the proprietor was given clearly to understand, that the unnatural orgies of amalgamation would not be tolerated again by the community, under the decisive pealty of no one stone left manding upon the other, of the bailding.

We fook the hint, and it was about time! It has been fairly conjectured by this time, from the glimpsees we have taken of the interiof, that the house was the wene of other vicem than thone implied in amalgamation merely. It will be seen in yet ohber wordin and yeary how moch there was of real danger to the well-being of society, in the doctrinestaught and practised within ite mhallowed walls. No one leswon could ever prove suffcient for the people; they enjoy a fatal impunity even now, and we thall endeavor that men thall know them as they are!

CHAPTERIV.

The Arrikem mo ocin, "tim true, but ooing thew phrwees, And wond them forth at knwou wend githof counterw, Whinh wime men ecorn, and fooly wecopt ia payment.

> Smantrinatio

Fone of theme rogromend cowarde, but Ajax is thoir fooll Jidem.

Trat the world ham dealt hardly by its heroes, is a truism we need not insint upon at this late day. But whether the world lnow who its heroes are, is another question, and one more open to controversy. Now I insist that the world doe not know, of elme Boanerges Phospher, the Spiritual Profensor, would long tince have been stoned and persecuted into one of the holy company of caints and martyrs!

There are meveral kinds of heroism heretofore known among men. There in the fiere, aggressive heroism of the wollier and comqueror - there in the "glils and oily" heroism of the politi-曻 cian-the calm, enduring heroism of the saint-the lofty, deathdefying heroism of the patriot; but it remains for modern times to record the brazen heroism of impudence. Impudence, too, has its grades and degrees - its ancient types and its more modern ones - but as they all veil their brassy splendors, merging their separate rays in the central effulgence of our spiritual Co lossus, we shall waive their particular enumeration in favor of the individualised impersonation of them all.

Ah, verily-and this is he!-our Spiritual Professor! Borm in Yankee-land, of course, the earliest feat of Boanerges Phos-pher-literally, according to his own account of it-was to pry up a huge stone upon one of the sterile paternal acres: for what purpose, would you suppose? To place his feet upon the soil beneath, because the foot of no other man could have pressed it!

A laudable ambition, truly, but one which, somehow, unluckily, suggests that

$$
\text { "Fools may walk where mingelm fom to tread ! }{ }^{p}
$$

It was a necessary sequence to the career of this modern Columbus of untrodden discovery, that we find his "first appearance upon any stage" to have been, while so pitiably ignorant as to be barely able to read his own language by spelling the words, and write his own name execrably, as Proresson or Elocutron!

Admirable! admirable!. Why make two bites of a cherry? Why not step at once where no foot of such man ever trod before?

Shade of Blair! Look ye not askance at this danng intruder upon your classic company! He intends you no harm; he only means to re-fuse his brass back into copper s!

In lecturing on Elocution, our Professor, of necessity, gre dually learned to read-with fluency, we mean-that is, he could "talk right eout," like the head boy in a class, though it was in a nasal sing-song, more remarkable for its pietistic intonation than its rhythm. This was, no doubt, in a great measure owing pipformontip.

 that, pluphoue mothe!

of course could not do less than know a great deal more about Kamtschatka and the "Tropic Isles" than their furred and fig" leaved denizens. Brass is the Yankee's capital, and no wonder they made the great discoveries of copper on Lake Superior, to extensively patronised by New-light sages. It is the offset to California gold; for, while one promises an infinite supply of the substantial basis of commerce and all trade, the other promises to furnish, in perpetuity, the crude material of impudence.

We mean no insinuation in regard to the Spiritual Professor, however much he may have had to do, by "spherical influmence," in precipitating the discovery of this great mine of the metal so much in favor with the sages above mentioned-and the remainder of the sect to which the Professor belonged-the motto of which is, that, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings shall ye be confounded." Yet we can freely venture to assert, that he had no connection whatever with those unfortunate commercial results, which, in the first place, nearly, if not entirely, swamped the great Patron of the enterprise. The mind of our Professor was necessarily not of that vast reach and generalising comprehension, which could lead to the Behemoth stride and wizard calculation of results, which had enabled his master thus confidently to speculate in so subtle a material.

The operations of our Professor were essentially minified; that is, their sphere and scope had been particularly narrow. He was heroic enough, Heaven knows; but then his heroism was of that dashing character which only required a patron to illustrate and make it known.

Hacing published a book upon this occult (in his hands) science of elocution, which was, of course, written for him by another party, he suddenly felt himself inspired with new inspiration.

He had already taught men how to talk, and it now became necessary, and indeed spiritually incumbent upon him, to teach them how to live. He accordingly announced himself, forthwith, as Revelator-in-Chief of the spiritual mysteries of the uniwerme. Every reader will probably remember thone flaming programme of lectures which appeared, by the half column, in a New Yoris paper, for a long period, daily, between ' 43 and ${ }^{3} 45$. Mendacioum impudence never vaulted higher! Our Spiritual Profemor was in his glory now.

An illamtrioum man lived once in Sweden. He was humble, pure and firm. Him atonimhing works on acientific mbjects left the mind of hie period far behind him, utterly confounded by bin direct and stringent elucidation of the mowt wubtle of the purely phywical lawi. It meemed a miracle to them; they found their profeswonal accuracy to far murpaswed, that they durst not do more than wonder. Work after worl of thim amazing intellect came forth, drewsed in a language, while handling much themen, common to the world of acience.

Then came audden change, and this vast mind, which herewfore had dealt in mimple demonatration with mankind, threw down it compane and its equaret, and, in the language of humility, proclaimed itself Medium. The God of Jacob and humanity had revealed himell to him, not in the burning bunh of mystery, but in the lustrous quiet of a calto repose. He had talked acientific truth before, but now be mpoke of spiritual thing-a chowen Medium betwcen God and man! His theme war far beyond all wience. We have nothing to do with his wide pontulate; him name wat too mublime and venerable among the patriarch of mankind, for me to mpeak of it otherwise in this connection, than in disgust and loathing of the profanation to which it has been subjected, in our country, by monkeyish and parrot-tongued ignoramuces.

Our learned and sagacious Professor of Elocution, happening to stumble upon some of the carlier tranmations of the works of Swedenborg; weized upon them with great avidity, and, as he had now learned to read without spelling the words out loud, he managed to get thern by heart with mowe surprising facility, and, to the astonishment of Jew and Gentile, suddenly proclaitned himaelf an apontle of the new church.

To be sure, when one considers this undertaking in the abstract, it was rather a serious one; one indeed that would have appalled most men, as the works of Swedenborg really consisted of some forty-odd buge volumes, written in Latin, not a line of which the Professor could translate; and the hand-books he had fallen upon were merely translations of introductory compends. What though the field was one of the most prodigious in human learning - what though the themes were the highest that could occupy mortal contemplation - what though the patient diligence of an ordinary lifetime would scarce suffice intelligent persons for the studious comprehension of the truths taught by this wonderful man? it was all the same to the Professor; and, indeed, instead of being discouraged, he was rather encouraged, by the magnitude of the undertaking! An exponent of Swedenborg! Well, why not? He could spell words in three syllables!

Big with the prodigious discovery of his own capabilities and the new mine of doctrinal science, the learned Professor rushed precipitately into the ever-extended arms of his Patron saint, the nourisher and cherisher of empirics and empiricism. And why should he not be so, forsooth? It was cheap, not "too much learning," that had made him "mad" as well! He too had found it to his account to scorn the decencies of a thorough education, and from a printer's devil, with a mind that had fed upon scraps and paragraphs, had doggedly risen, through the help of the familiar demon of labor, which possessed him, into this position of Patron to all new-comers - provided they bore "new-lights" and coppers!

It mattered little to this self-constituted and unscrupulous dignitary whether the theme was new to the world, or only to himself; the latter was most likely to be the case with one who had probably never read a dozen books consecutively through in his life, and who, from gross physique, dress, habits, and mental idiosyncrasies, was necessarily incapacitated for comprehending the fine and subtle relations of truth; who, even with U. weverevigre mid of the suew-light Panaces, bran-bread, had luse, and that fragnent, fow, gobled without the wightemt regard for fom oclation wo to other truthe

Hore wom hathy appreciation with a wougenem! - wom it kense of forel, or foed of knave- which? Ther quention in inso froberny! At all curom, the revilte were the mane, mo far am the forsure of ternight, that in the waverse there ares thowe throe:

 in aner ; that the univerwe in as work cohbering from firsta to las:m.
"That Good if from iwofold origin, and thomes admeititioum.

That celestial good is good in essence, and spiritual good is good in form. That the good of the inmost Heaven is called celestial; of the middle Heaven, spiritual; and of the ultimate Heaven, spiritual, natural. That good is called lord, and truth servant, before they are conjoined, but afterwards they are called brethren. That he who is good is in the faculty of seeing truth, which flows from general truths, and this in a continual series. That good is actually spiritual fire, from which spiritual heat, which makes alone, is derived.
"That all Evil has its rise from the sensual principle, and also from the scientific. There is an evil derived from the false, and a false from evil.
"That gold sig. the good of love. When twice mentioned, sig. the good of love, and the good of faith originating in love.
"That influx from the Lord is through the internal into the external. Spiritual influx is founded on the nature of things, which is spirit acting on matter.
"That physical influx, or natural, originates from the fallacy of the senses that the body acts on spirit.
"That harmonious influx is founded on a false conclusion, viz. : that the soul acts jointly and at the same instant with the body. That there is a common influx; and this influr possess into the life of animals, and also into the subjects of the vegetable kingdom. That influx passes from the Lord to man through the forehead-for the forehead corresponds to love, and the face to the interior of the mind."

To be followed by questions in the correspondences by any of the audience who may choose to ask them, such as, To what does "horse" correspond ?-To what does "table," "chair," or "soap-stone" correspond?-To what does "hog," "goose," "butter-milk," or "jackass" correspond? &c., &cc. To all of which questions the leamed lecturer will give edifying answers from the stand. Admittance, one dollar-Children, half-price.

This is a long programme, to be sure, and somewhat overwhelning to we common people, who have been in the habit of regarding certain subjects with the profoundest veneration, and our modest and capable teachers with reverence. But the very length of this programme, and the enormous stretch of the themes, only go, I suppose, to illustrate the hardihood of our "admirable Crichton," the professor of the occult-and the genial and the generous-to call it by its lightest name-gullim bility, of his gaping audience.

Forth went these flaming announcements day by day, on thousand hot-pressed sheets, until New York became all agog, and the great mass conceived that they had found a new prophet. All its spectacled and thin-bearded women forthwith were in arms; the Professor wore his hair behind his ears, and, of course, was the soft and honey-sucking seraph of their dreams.

He could be indeed nothing short of seraphim-revealed, for he discoursed with them in winning tones of mists and mysteries. He told them bald tales of angels with whom he had been on terms of intimacy; for he sagaciously kept his master, Swedenborg, mainly in the background throughout.

Representing himself as the individual recipient of these revelations, from the spherical ladies who wear wings, and who are habitually desiguated as angels by both the sexes, on our little clod of earth, our champion became, of course, the hero of all such semi-whiskered maidens or matrons, who, though essentially "pard-like spirits," were yet, to reverse the words of Shelley, more "swift," alias "fast," than "beautiful!" It is, of course, to be comprehended that beauty is comparative as well as wit, and we would no more be understood as insinuating that these thinly-hirsute virgins and dames, who at once constituted the principal audience of the mighty Professor, were themselves in any degree deficient in sympathy either with the man and his profound doctrines, or the man per se, than that we would assert they understood one word of what he mouthed to them, with his hair behind his ears.

Boanerges Phospher, the Spiritual Professor, was successful, and never was there anything so professionally brilliant as the crowded bouses that he nightly drew. The immense Tabernacle seemed a mere nut-shell ; he could have filled hali-a-dozen such houses nightly. The mob had grown excited by the norelty. The paper of the Patron Saint, at so many pennies a line, day by day, continued to prostitute its columns to this rulgar trap of silly serrant-maids and profound clerks.

The Professor's lectures were attended by countless swarms of inquirers after truth, who, as they were willing to accept a spoken for a written language of which they knew nothing, permitted him to stumble through propositions, which, in themselves, were so ridiculously ahsurd as even to disarm contempt in the wise, and make denunciation harmless as supertluous.

$$
\begin{aligned}
& \text { CHAPTER V. } \end{aligned}
$$

> Famine in in thy checkus Need and oppression whareth in thy eyew, Upon thy back hangs ragged mitery.
> Sunamename
> There's no more
> Mercy in him than there's milk in the male tiger.

Yidem

The bowels of Boanerges Phospher, the Spiritual Professor, were possessed of such extraordinary capacity for yearaing orer the fallen and lost condition of his brothers of mankind, that, not content with saving them by wholesale, and nightly, in those marvellously spiritualized lectures, his indomitable energies took up the trade of "saving" men individually and by detail.

This, let it be understood, was done between times, by way of recreation, just to keep his hand in. Let us follow him on one of these errands of mercy.

 (.. : © © , wiod thint,

${ }^{6} \mathrm{Ha}$ ! my son! my spiritual child! how is it with you? Have you finished? Is it done?"

The poor student shook his head slightly, and muttered feebly -
"No, no ; 1 oannot finish it."
The eager face of the Professor turned suddenly very blank and very white at the same time, as, straightening himself, be stammered out -
"Wh-what ! c-cannot finish it! You must finish it! you shall finish it!" and then continuing with greater vehemence, without apparently noticing that the weary head of the poor being before him was slowly drooping yet lower-
"Here's a pretty business, to be sure! This is the reward I am to get for all I have done for you - for all my efforts to advance you in the world - for all the heavy expenses I have incurred in bringing you on from Cincinnati, and supporting you here! The evil spirits must have re-entered the boy! Have I not striven for these six months faithfully, with all my spiritual strength, to drive them forth, that I might save him? The boy must be born again - he must be regenerated once more. Cannot finish it! He must be chastened, to rebuke this evil spirit in him ; he must be reduced to bread and water. I must recall my liberal allowance for his food; he has been living too high. The evil demon has probably entered him through a meal of fat pork!" and the spiritually outraged Professor sniffed with an indignant and eager sniffle, that he might detect the presence of the forbidden food.

The poor youth, in the mean time, had been slowly sliding from his chair, and, as the Professor turned aside with the air of an injured cherub, the body lost its balance, and the fainting youth fell to the floor.
${ }^{6} \mathrm{Ha}$ ! what now ?" shouted our cherub with the hair behind his cars, springing into the air with a nervous agility, as if he in reality wore wings. He placed himself on the opposite side of the room in a twinhling, and then turning his face, ghastly with *a is:

 4, in io, $\%$

 fees to a dravee yul in wo writ. Reventer your grear wort, tat is : mane y"n you hare been saver."."
"Strred, you mean." fecty wiscen ter roms man, whom a few draugts of the precicas ti:3 had rapith perived.
"S.a-a-r-red! cues he sy :"o re"ed Bumerges stinhing back as if horitied, am zearly urnpige the buty ter wis stpporting from his arms. TLea, suckerty neieasty cme zw, he smoothed bach his kuir gen:ly: that rabianto angelic expression of sweet hamilit, for whith it was so famus among te female par of his select and nighiy awatemes, orertame tis face as with a halo, and leaning ciewn. so as to low into the eyes of his victim, te asked. in a liquid vice, "My son, hare I-have I-thy spiritual fa:ber, starred thee:"' and item tenderty be gazed into his eyes. With a look of assured self-satistimetion that those siren tones had done the business, he silenty waited the answer to the gente and rebuleful questiva. But no mas swer came to the sweet, lingering look; the young nam only closed his eves heavily, and shaddered.
" Mr son, my son!" continued the Prolessor. in yet more griered and meek, and culcet tones. "My spiritual son, hate I starred thee? have I nor been generous to a fault, mad eren to wronging the belored child of my own loins? This noom, these writing materials, this fumbler, this pitcher, that delighuful bed, are they not all my free-will gifts to thee for thy own edwancement, to enable thee to glorify God in thy works? Hare I not rather sared thee from starving: lou had nothing when It took you up, to patronise your genius, and bring you before the world; and now you have plenty! See, see, your mantel is even now crowded with bread and cheese, that you are wasting here in the midst of such superlative abundance."

The young man, at the mention of the bread and cheese, turned his head aside with an expression of bituer loathing and disernat.
"Pah!" he muttered; "the very name of it makes me sick; 1 have tanted nothing elane for the last six months. That iff what in killing me; my stomach can retain it no longer! Who can keep body and moul together on thirty cents a week?"
"Horror!" exclaimed the Prolessor, rolling up his eyew meekly. "To think of such frantic extravagance! And besides, my son, your spiritual strength should have sustained you - the guccess of your great work, the prospect of future glory! A man starve on bread and cheese! Why, who ever beard of such a thing? Why, when I was a boy of ten years of age, I wtarted alone, on foot, to cross the Alleghanies, to make: my way to the North to school. My father had moved Wi-d whea I was very young. I started with only one loat of white: bread in my bundle, when the whole country was wild and full of bears and wolves. The wolves chased me, and I climured a trees; they murounded it, barking and gnashing their : $4 \times+\mathrm{h}$, , get at me; there were five hundred wolver at least, Lut I in tay faith kept my strength, and remained cool waniel in the lion's den, until at last they kept me there so long, I fell aslarg, when the limbl broke, and If flll down into the midst of them; the wolves were wo frightened, that they all took to their heots and ran away, leaving me safe. There is as specinen of the spirimat strongh that fath gives, and should encourage you never tre give up and faint by the way. Had you possessed mure of such faith, my son, you would never have been strectued herge, upon this hoor, in such a condition, and talking ala, set sarving on bread and cherese. It is the soul, my son, the pergenerate sonl, that sustains the heroic man on carth, an I have mefien "puleavored to twath yon."
"Yew," groaned the poor youth, with a gexture of impatience.
"The body must live too, and life cannot be sustained so long upon unvaried food."
"Listen, may son!" said the patient saint at his head"listen, and you shall hear what I accomplished on that single loaf of bread. I travelled on with my little bundle on my shoulder, containing the home-spun suit I was to wear when I arrived at school, and my loaf of bread. I travelled on till my clothes were all worn out, and my shoes full of holes, and my feet were so sore and swollen that I was afraid to pull off my shoes, for fear I should not be able to get them on again. So I waded across all the brooks and mountain streams with my clothes on, until, at last, one atternoon, when high up in the mountains, my strength gave out, and I laid me down in the howling wilderness, thinking I must die. The weather was very cold, and my clothes, all wet from crossing the streams, were freezing, and the dreaded sleepiness was coming over me, when a good widow woman, who lived with her children on the mountains, and was out gathering wood, accidentally found me. She took me up in her arms, and carried me to her hut, and laid me on her bed, where I slept all night. In the morning, when I opened my eyes, I saw her breaking the hot Indian-corn bread, and giving it to her children. I told her if she would give me some of her com bread, I would divide my loaf of white bread with her and her, children. She eagerly accepted the offer, for such a luxury as white bread had been long unknown to them, and that was my first speculation! While they ravenously devoured my loaf, I feasted upon her rich hot bread. My soul overflowed with delight as I witnessed their intense enjoyment of the meal I had been thus instrum mental in bringing them, and Ifelt as if the Lord had thus enabled me to fully repay them for their kindness. I rose to depart, and the good woman, filling my bundle with a large piece of her hot bread, sent me, with her blessing, on my way rejoicing. Thus, you see, my dear son, how, through the spiritual strength which faith imparts, and which you so much need,

I was enabled to cross the Alleghany mountains alone, at ten years of age, with nothing but my loaf of white bread, and without so much as a bit of cheese, or a cent in my pocket, and attained to the great goal of my ambition, the school; and from whence, by the aid of selling an occasional button from my jacket, I have been able to rise to my present position as professor and patron of struggling genius."
"Ah!" said the young man, "words, words! Give me to eat -I am starving!" and his head sank back once more.

The Professor again deluged him with water, and, profoundly surprised and alarmed that the honeyed eloquence of his sagacious narrative had proved unavailing in convincing his victim that he could and ought to live upon faith, came to the desperate resolution of being guilty of the extravagance, for once, of a small bowl of soup to resuscitate his victim, and depositing his head upon some books, though the pillow was equally convenient, he hurried off to the nearest eating-house, with his hands upon his pockets, which were overflowing with gold, as he was then in the raeridian height of his prosperity.

The sequel to this particular story is a short one. The young man revived with the change of a single nutritious meal, and with it returned the courage of even the trodden worm; for he now stoutly told the Spiritual Professor that, unless he furnished him with ample means to support life, he would not touch an-

[^1]other figure of the immense and complicated calculations on which he had been so long engaged.

The Professor, of course, resisted to the last, and quoted the correspondences upon him, with desperate fluency. But when the young man coolly seized the manuscript on the table before him, and held it over the fickering flame of the miserable dip candle, which had now been of necessity lighted, the Professor sprang forward to arrest his hand, shrieking -
"I will! I will! for God's sake, stop! - how much do you want?"
"Five dollars a week!" was the cold response, as the flame caught the edges of the paper.
"I'll give it! I'll give it! What fearful extravagance! My God! put it out!"
"Pay me five dollars at once," said the other.
"Here it is - here it is!" and he jerked, in his excitement, from his pocket, a dozen gold-pieces of that value, and dashed them upon the table.
"Take your five dollars ! put it out !"
The young man quietly swept the pieces within his reach into a drawer, which he at the same moment opened; and, extinguishing the margin of the manuscript, which had burned slowly from its thickness, he replied deliberately to the Professor, who had shrieked out -
"Do you mean to rob me?"
"No, sir! but I mean to keep this money, and if you approach me, I shall destroy this manuscript if it cost me my life. You have starved and outraged melong enough; you expect to make a fortune off my labors, and kill me with famine just as my work is done. But with all my humility, abstraction and patience, this is too much! I am roused at last, in self-defence, and you shall find it so!"

The Professor sank into a chair as if fainting, and for some moments continued to mutter, with more than the magnanimity of a sick kitten"sTo think! Robbed! All my generosity! The ruflian! Here, to my very face! What have I gained by maving him?"

This last expression was gasped out, as if the vital breath of the speaker was passing in the final spasm.

The scene need not be prolonged. The valorous Proferms crept away, cowed beneath the cold, firm, lustrous eye of the now aggressive victim, whose enthusiamm for science and sarnemt self-dedication, had heretofore kept him blinded to a full realim sation of all the monstrous iniquity which had me long heen practised upon his abstracted, meel, and uncomplaining nature. He now determined to take his life into his own hands, und naw clearly through all the shallow and ridiculous pretence of praronage and "saving," by which his single-hearted fervor had been beguiled.

In a few days it was announced to the Profeswor, whowe faith and spiritual strength-the same that had seared off the wolvese when be fell among them-had in the interval been remorodites their equilibrium, that the great work was now completerd, sum! the annourcement was accompanied by propromition on tho part of the young mathematician to sell out th himantirn him copyright share in the whole enterprise, at a price wo comparame tively insignificant, when the Professor'm own florid anticipntionn of future results were considered, that he mprang at the offe: eagerly, and thus possessed himself at once of the "gridera goose."

The young mathematician disappeared, and the lyrofomoly was left exulting in the sole possesoivn of what neernofd to him, int vision, the nearest representative of the gold of ophif, not oo speak of Califormia.

The idea of the young mathematician was, in itwelf, a praco tical one, and seemed rationally conceired.

We hare used the word almanar, by which it wat denignated, but in reainty in wery prosty comveys the mabtie and mingulat combination which were bere brought to bear upon a circular, rotary surface, the aim of which was, to so far simplify the cal culations of interest, wages, discounts, and a hundred other tedious and difficult problems occurring in complicated business affairs, that the merchant or banker had only to glance bis eye down a line of figures, to ascertain in a moment results which would take him, by all the ordinary aids and processes, a long calculation to arrive at.

It was a brilliant conception, which must prove ultimately a most successful discovery of the young mathematician, and one which had cost him many years of careful analysis and profound observation. But as be handed orer the perfected copyright to our astute Professor, who had just enough of button-trading cunning to perceive the immense practical results of the enterprise, without the slightest knowledge of the processes by which it had been perfected, there might have been noticed upon the face of his former rictim, as he pocketed his paltry bonus, a slight sneer, which would have alarmed any one less gifted with occasional short-sightedness than our Professor has showin himself to be.

He made off with the documents in an ecstacy of triumph, and forthwith began making round purchases of paper, pasteboard, and other mechanical appliances necessary to his success, to the amount of thousands of his easily-got gains; and them as heary sums were as rapidly expended upon the costly and difficult copper-plate engraving, which was to set forth in full the triumph, the undivided honors of which he now claimed, to the world.

There are few of the main printing-offices in the country that had not, or have not, that famous circular almanac hanging upon their walls. Unfortunately the Professor had been too eager to promulgate his triumph, and powerfully illustrated in this experiment the truth of the old aphorism, "The greater haste the less speed;" for it turned out, upon a close examination of the long and intricate series of calculations, by scientific men, that the fatal error of a single numeral ran throughout its complex demonstration, and rendered its whole results utterly futile, without the enormous expense of cancelling the costly copper-plate, and the tremendous edition which had been already issued. The incorrigible ignorance of the Spiritual Professor had rendered him incapable of detecting the error himself, and he had thereby swamped effectually not only his magnanimous speculation in this particular case, but thoroughly dissipated the abundant proceeds of his more successful speculation in the spiritual correspondences.

This little accident threw him upon his shifts, but we shall surely find him upon his feet again hereafter.

Had not his starving victim subtly worked out a sublime revenge, in spite of the fact that he had been over and over again so thoroughly saved? So much for Boanerges and the young mathematician.

CHAPTER VI.

the new "saymg grace."
Thou hast thews
Immortal, for thou art of heavenly race; But such a love is mine, that here I chase Eternally away from thee all bloom Of youth, and destine thee towards a tomb. Endyyton.

Fierce, wan, And tyrrazizing was the lady'd look.

Idem.
A rear, in the life of man, is a long time. Alas! what changes may it not bring about to any, the strongest of us, the most secure - those weary, dragging twelve months! Such a period has elapsed in the chronology of our narrative, since the scenes described as occurring at the Graham House.

It is late, on a dark stormy evening, and we will look into the well-stocked half library and half office of a handsome private residence in Beekman Street, New York.

The cushioned appliances of the most fastidious luxury of repose were strewed about the room in the strangest disorder of heaped cushions, fallen chairs, and out-of-place lounges; while books, surgical instruments, vials, dusty, erusty, broken, and corkless, all mingled in the desolate confusion which seemed to have usurped the place.

A shaded lamp stood upon the table in the centre of this chaos, and threw its light upon a large decanter of brandy and a glass beneath. A deep-drawn moaning sigh disturbs the deathlike silence of the room; and a broad, stout figure, which had leaned back within the shadow of a huge cushioned chair beside the table, reached suddenly forward and clutched the brandy-botle convulsively. He dashed a great gulp into the glass, and then, with trembling hand, attempted to carry it to his lips. After two or three efforts, which proved unavailing from his excessive nervousness, he replaced the glass, muttering, "Curse this nervousness! It will not even let me drink my poisom any more!" He shuddered as he turned his head away. "No wonder! how horribly the hell-broth smells!" He fell back into the deep chair again and was silent for some time, when, uttering from the depths of his chest that strange moan, he sprang to his feet.
"I must drink!" he gnashed, as, seizing the decanter again, he filled the tumbler to overflowing, splashing the dark fluid over everything on the table. "I shall die if I do not drink! I shall go crazy! I will not be baffed!"

Without attempting to raise it again to his lips, he bowed them to the brimming glass, and as the beast drinks, so drank he. Oh, fearful degradation! Where now is the strong man? that powerful frame would speak. After leaning the tumbler wilh his lips and trembling hands in a long, deep draught, he straightened himself with an expression of loathing that distorted bis fare hiderouly.
"Paugh! Hell mould mim nore nectar with ite chiefest phymic! Thim anff is loathome, and my revoling nerves seem with a separate life to shudder as the new babe does to hear the that it hould come to me in thim short time, even at a wecond mare, to learn to feed on poisons! It wam not no once; nature wat sufficient, mye, wufficient, when the skies rained glory out of day, and the starm came down in beamy marength through night! But then! but then! Ah, yen! it had not bucome nee cemary then, that I mould be s-avee-d by human love!" and hia feature writhed a beolonged the word. - ${ }^{6} \mathrm{~S}$-avoved! no! no! no heavenly gaise of horrid lust to s-avere me! The chate and bluhhing mpring came to the early winter of my sterike life that bloomed beneath itm radiant warmth, and gladdened wo grow green and odor-breathed and wofl, and then! wh, horror! lwortor! I am strong efinough to drink again. My nerves are numbed now ; they dare not tremble."

He meized the decanter once more, and then, with unobaking hand, conveyed the brimming glams to him lips, and after a deep dranght threw himelf upon the chair again, and drawing at the masot time glitering oljuct from his breast, he leaned forward within the circle of the latnp-light to regard it as it lay open upon the table before him. Thin is the first time we have meen that face slearly- that haggard, pallid facs. Ha! can it be? Thowe manken, bloated cheeks! 'Ihome dimmed, hollow eyew, with lowlon, drooping lidn! O, can it lee? Have we known that face before? God belp us! The grod Doctor! and only one year!

But wee the change! Him cye bas rested upon that face before hime A mimiature, beantifully exteruted. In it a charmed art ham pretided at a miracle! an arch meraphic brow all " sunnied ofes" by the golden reflex from its tangled curlm, broken in beam and modow, grecefully glanced a gay defiance in his eyci, from . . ....... ax ar . . "e extil.s."

- $\cdot$. $\quad \therefore \quad \therefore \quad \therefore$ mol broken man in changing!
. . ... 1.... ......... m-lit withlife, as some dead
The brigh, the terder past;
- ... ... $\therefore$.. mon mated to the eyes and ... .... ...... . .. . A.... A...ss" but for a moment!

*..." .... *.... $\because 6^{2}$ erus moan again-and the
- . $\therefore$. . . $\quad$ an folls buck once more into bis

* $\because$..... , . $\because$ sinobuy air of that dim room, and with
: .. -. : 6.t sm. lue sieve! ! Ah, that seems a fearful . ... . $\because$ ind: Marm fars, still pouring pouring down - $\because$......n' $\ldots$... .... lany burns on, and fifully the chaos of that *. . mot therer, is fourhed by its funt light. A slight $\therefore$.... .. binh, with black veil about her face, and the umw . . winh hand protected her from the storia in her hand, stood ... .. Ho sheremt. She evidenty had a passekey, for she
 . Lot.enty

Whe hous! Drunk, dead atrunk again!"s she muttered. - shom' frel the money I wanted to-night, that is plain! Curse s.a , htabury! Anter all my trouble to save him, this is my twinll Worse and worse!"

Alu mmung forward eagerly as her cye fell upon the jewelled umbuture that lay before him on the table, and smatehed it up. " If ! His will save me some trouble!" She turned it eagerly nuer in her hands, throwing back hor veil at the same time, to c He valuable case with vivid glistening eyes, that did not to notice in the leant degree the exquimite painting withirt.
"Ah, yem, thim ir great! Wonder the fool never let me know of it bofore!! I thould have had it in Chathams Street before thin? Saver mind, 'never too late;' I wee! It savem ne the trouble of exploring him pocketw and table-drawers to-night, for what ingeting to be a mecarce commodity. Bats! what willy moroosel-ginl face in thin? He is falling back to whine about the pant. O, that'm all right. Ill fill him decanter for him! He haw drome enough. Ife ham fed me for a year. I'll let the poor wrotch ofit! Yem, l've waved him! I have feasted on ham "" Aut alos drew herwelf erect with a triumphant wwelling of the whole frame, which memed to efrit, fre the monemt, from itm onstine , a been quick exhalation now like the beatolightang of a nultry mumarnex my.

She fill the decanter rapidly from a dewajolon whe drage from ectowe in the room, and phacen it by him side. Shor pumes the wator-pitcherg fas beyond bien reach, and thers stepu forward for a momerat into the light.

Have we ever meen that face before? No! no! It might bave ixern-Where a wome resemblance--but this form and face met woy full of arrogant ahounding strength to be the same faint beoding victim of ruthene perwecution that we waw at firw! No! wo! It cannot he ahe! Ha! an whe thrusu that jewelled miniature into bey browom and turns to glide away, I can detect that infernal obliguity of the left eye! 0 , dainty Eitherial!

CHAPTER VII.

THE CONVENTHCLE OF THE STRONG-MTMDED.

Her atrong toils of grace.
Smambrtamiz
Tame we a glimpse now of another interior scene in the strange, mingled life of the great metropolis. In a bare and meanly-furnished but roomy parlor of a house in Tenth Street, near Tompkins Square, we find assembled, on one summer's afternoon, a group of females. There are perhaps ten of them in all. The characteristic which first strikes the eye, on glancing around this group, is the strange angularity of lines presented everywhere, in faces, figures, and attitudes, except when contrasted with an uncouth and squabby embonpoint, which seemed equally at variance with the physical harmonies, supposed to be characteristic of the sex. What all this meant, you could not comprebend at first glance; but the impression was, of something " out of joint." Where, or what, it was impossible to conjecture. Some sat with their bonnets on, which had a Quakerish cut about them, though not strictly orthodox. Some, conscious of fine hair, had tossed their bonnets on the floor or chairs, as the case might be. There was, in a word, a prevailing atmosphere of steadfast and devil-may-care belligerence a seeming, on brow, in hand, and foot, that, demurely restrained, as it certainly was, unconsciously led you to feel that a slow and simultaneous unbuttoning of the cuffs of sleeves, a delsberate rolling up of the same, and a dazzling development of lean, taut tendons, corrugated muscles, and swollen veins, would be the most natural movement conceivable. Not that this bellicose sentiment, by any means, seemed to have found its proper antagonism in the forms and personalities then and there presented; but that you felt, in the vacant reach and persiment abstraction of the expression, that the foe, at whom they gazed through the infinite of space, was not an Individuality, but an Essence, - world-devouring element of Evil, with which they warred.

And warriors indeed they seemed-we should say Amazonswielding, not the weapons of carnal strife, but those mightier arms with which the Spirit doth, at times, endow our race. As for the war they waged, whatever might be the power with whom they were engaged, it seerned to have been a protracted and a desperate one; for, verily, judging from the harsh lines that seamed the faces of those present, one would imagine them to be "rich only in large hurts!"

There were young women present who were clearly under twenty; whowe foreheads, when they elevated their eyebrows, were wrinkled and parchment-like as any

"Puinful wharior fumouted for fight."

Why this unnatural wilting? would be the certain question of the cool obwerver. What fearful wrongs have these women suffered? What "contagious blastments?" Is the wicked world arraigned against them for no just cause? Has it comm bined it respiring masses into one large, simultaneous breath of wolcanic cursingw, to be wreaked upon their unoflending headi alone? To be sure,

* Gome innocents 'mcape not the thunderbolt;"
and can it be that these, too, are "innocents?" It is true, phywiology teaches that, when women wither prematurely, acquire an unnatural sharnness of feature, become > "Beated and chapped with tanned antiquity" before they have seen years enough for the bloom of the life of true maturity to have freshened on their cheeks and foreheads, there sunst be some cause for it. Common sense teaches, too, that that cause most likely to be, originally, rather a physical than a spiritual one-that mental aberration, dogged and sullen moods, one-ideaed abstractions, a general peevishness and fretful discontent, a suspicious unbelief in the warm-blooded genialities, and much enduring sympathies of those around them, whose lives are intact-or, in other words, who hare held themselves, in health, through nature, near to God - must have its source in some evil not entirely foreign to themselves.

Ask the wise physician why are these things so? He will answer, God has so ordered this material universe, that, while we live in it, we must conform to its laws; that, however powerful our spiritual entity, our relations to this life must, to be happy, be normal.

But this is prosing. It may, or it may not, account, in part, for the combative and generally corrugated aspect of this conventicle of the "strong-minded," to which we have been introduced. Now let us listen!

She to whom the place of presiding Pythoness seemed to have been, by general understanding, assigned, now solemnly arose, amidst a sudden pause of shrill-tongued clatter. She was very tall - nearly six feet. Her straight figure would have seemed voluptwously rounded, but that the loose-folded and wilted oval of her face suggested that the plump bust, with its close, manly jacket of black velvet, buttoned down in front, might owe something of its elastic seeming roundness to those conventionalities, a la modiste, and otherwise, against which her principles most vehemently protested. Her flaxen hair emulated the classic tie of any Venus of them all, on the back part of the head; while the effulgence of sumny curls flooded the very crow's-feet in the corners of her great, cold, dead, grey eyes.

She shook her curls slightly, and spoke : -
"My sisters, we have come together this aftemoon, not to talk about abstractions of right and wrong to our sex; for, upon all these elementary subjects, our minds are fully made up - all those inductive processes of which the human intellect is capable, onr minds have already passed through. Our opinions are irrevorably formed, our conclusions absolute! Woman is oppressed tyy man. She is denied her just rights. She is taxed, yet desiod the privilege of representation. She is a slave, without :he privileges of slavery! for, in the old slave-states, the posassion of twenty, or thirty, or forty slaves gives to their master the faintly-representative privilege of an additional vote, while, to, cup tyrants, though each may hold, in reality, a dozen wives, the law grants nothing! Leaving us, in fact, not even the 'sthadow of shade' of a social or civil existence! We are thus reduced to a condition of insignificanee, in relation to the artive affiaiss of life and the world, that we have determined to be, Perth incongruous and insufferable.
"Man, our time-out-ofmind despot, has determined to rofluce us to, and hold us within, the sphere of mere wet-nurses to his insolent and bifurcate progeny;-we must, forsooth, spawn for him, and then dedicate our lives to educating his proc:ppative vices into what he calls manhood! We are wearied with the dull, stale, commonplace of nursery-slops, and of the fractions suruallings of our embryo tyrants! Man must learn to nurse his own monsters, and we will nurse ours! We have declared our independence of his tyranny; our great object is to dieplare him from his seat of power! Por six thousand years he has been our despot - our ruthless and unscrupulons tyrant! We have therefore a settlement to make with hirn-a long arrearage of accounts to be rendered.
"But we are weak, while he is strong! Me possenses the physical force, and all the guarantee of precedence since time began, while we have only our own weaknessen to fall back uperi - what they, in their surfeited rythm, style "witching graces,' and 'nampless tharms!'
"C Well, we must use these against our obese foe as beat we may. We must clip the claws and teeth of the lion, at any rate; and, in consideration that the whole World of Past and Present is arraigned against us, we must accerpt as our motto, that of the only man who ever deserved to be a woman, Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits,

> "s The ord justifiem the zaeazag"

A small noise-a scarcely sensible "teetering" of pedal extremities upon the thin carpet, followed this "stern demonstra tion" of "woman's rights," from the accepted Priestess of the conventicle; when various exclamations arose from different parts of the room, such as - ${ }^{6}$ Right! right! End justifies the means, in dealing with the brutes!"
"They give us no quarter, and we will give them none!"
"Nurse their brats, forsooth!"
"We must circumvent them as we can, to obtain our 'rights!"
"Yes! yes! All stratagems are fair in love and war!"
Suddenly sprang to ber feet a very omphatic, stout woman, straight and thick-set, with soiled cap, coarse, stubby, grayish hair, sparse, silvery bristles on her chin, gray, savage eyes, and large fists, which she brought down with a crash upon the frail chair-back which constituted the bulwark of her position. In a voice of creaking bass, she exclaimed-
" The sister is right - they are our oppressors; but it is because we have been cowards enough to yield them the supremacy; it is nothing but our own cowardice that is to blame. Man knows, as well as any other animal, on which side his bread is buttered; we have only got to learn him what and where his place is, and he will keep it. When I first married, I had some trouble with my Jonas; but I soon taught him that he had better be back again in the whale's belly, than employed in trenching upon my 'woman's rights!' (A general disposition to laugh, which was, however, frowned down by the dignified Priestess.)
"It is true, my sisters ; we have only to assert our rights, and take them! Man will never dare to rebel, if we are resolute. Overwhelm him with our strength - make him feel him littleness beside us, and he will slink into any hole to hide. I am myself in creed a non-resivtant - (supprested laughter.) Ido not believe in pummelling truth into man; forced conversions do not last, and should not. But I will tell you what ort of conversions I do believe in; they are spiritual. Bow, bend, aye, break his spirit to your will, and then he is yours; instead of being slave to him, he is your mave. Thim is what we want. When he can be reduced to obedicnce, then he will be happy; for when he has accepted us as his spiritual guides, and no longer dreats of lifting hir thoughts in rebellion, then will he always go right. They themselves are for ever confesson ing, that without us, as mothers, they would never-the greatent of them - arrive at any thing; that they owe it all to us-all their greatness, all their goodness. Let us take the hint, and bold the spiritual birch over them always, and they will ever remain obedient, for their own good."

This speech was received with very general approbation; though, that all did not recognise it as orthodox, became immediately apparent. A tall, thin, cadaverous-looking lady, with excessively black hair, and eyes that literally glistered as she prose - the huge earrings and multifariou trinkets about her person quivering with excitement-exclaimed, in a shrill wrice -
"It is false! it is not true that we desire to make slavew of man. We are opposed to slavery-to slavery of all sorts; and, allough man deserves, on account of his oppressions of the purn negro, to be made a slave of, if human slavery were to be ulolerated, yet we desire rather to return good for evil; and all we ask is equality in the Senate, in the Presidential chair, on the bench of justice, in the counting-bouse and work-shop. We want our righte; our right to marriage as a mere civil contract -our right to choose with whom we shall enter into that contract, whether colored or white man, and our right to annul that contract when it pleawe us. What kind of freedom is it, when, if 1 choowe to marry a man of color, no suatter how noble he may be, I am to be mobbed and driven out of the socrety of my race; while, if I am so unfortunate as to marry a white man, who turns out to be a brute and tyrant, as he is most like to do, and attempt to rid myself of the horrid incubus, by leaving him, or by suing him for a divorce, I am equally mobbed by the hue-and-cry, and banished from society as an outlaw? We want our rights in marriage - we want equality. I can-"

Here the speaker was interrupted by a voice marvellously flute-like and lingering in its intonations:
> ${ }^{4}$ At which, like unbocked colts, thoy prioked their eaves, Advanced their eyelidm, lifted up their nosem, As they mell musio: ${ }^{\prime \prime}$ "

And cold shoulders were simultaneously turned upon the darlm haired and be-jewelled orator of amalgamation.

The dulcet-toned interrogator, who, to the surprise of all eyes, appeared a squabby, cottony, pale-eyed, thick-lipped, lymphatic-looking personage, who wore a wigg clumsily, and had no vestige of hair upon brow or violet eyelids, proceeded, in melifluous phrase -
"We did not come here to talk about private grievances, The sister who speaks so fiercely of our rights, in regard to marriage, had better have had a little experience on the subject. She is, I should judge, considerably the rise of forty, and has never yet been married; not even to one of the dark-browed children of Ham, towards whom she exhibits so decided a leaning. Now, I have been married six times already-great sensation, - - and to white men, and gentlemen, at that; and consider myself, therefore, qualified to speak of marriage. Marriage is a great blessing; let her try it when she gets a chance, and she will find it so! (much bristling and fidgeting, the darkhaired woman looking daggers.) It isn't marriage that is the great evil, against which we have to fight - nor it isn't the slavery of the colored race, either. It is the slavery of our own race, of our own kith and kin, of our own blood and complexion. It is the emancipation of our own fatheres, wons, and brothers, from the barbarous penaltie of the penal code. Our erring fathers, sons, and brothers; it is their cause, my sisters, it is their cause we are called upon to vindicate. According to our brutal laws, one little frailty, to which we all may be sub-ject,-one little slip, which any, the purest of us may make suljects man to solitary incarceration for life, in which he is cut off from all loving communion with our sex; or to the horrible perally of death by the rope! This, my beloved sisters, is the crying evil of the day; and man, cruel man, is in favor of such inflictions. We must soften his finty heart, through our charms. It is our duty, it is our mission, to effect amelioration in favor of the erring classes. We are all erring; and in how much are we better than they? - except, that through our cunning, and in our cowardice, we have as yet escaped penalties which, under the same measure of justice, might as well have been visited upon us. I have visited the penitentiaries and prisons of many States, that I might carry consolation to the shorn and manacled children of oppression. I tell you that I have seen among them grods, whose shattered armor gleamed in light! I have seen Apollo, with his winged heel chained to a round-shot! I have witnessed more glorious effulg-"
"Hism-mon m" "Nonsense!"
"It was Mercury, the god of thieves, you saw with the round-shot at his beels!" said an oily voice; and, as all eyes lurned in that direction, the forehead of the speaker flushed crimson while she proceeded-
"It is not man at all; it is we who shut ourselves up in tight frocks, who make hooks-and-eyes our jailors, and ribs of whalebone our strait-jackets! Let us first free ourselves physically, give our lungs and hearts room to play, and then we may talk about open battle with man for our rights. But, as it is, to speak thus, im nonsense. We are weak, while man is strong; we must fight him with other weapons than open force. While he laughs at our pretensions, let us, too, laugh at him foibles, and govern him through them. It was to consult, as to some consistent and uniform system, by which we should be enabled to accomplish this result, that we came together this afternoon. It has been well said, that our motto should be, 'The end justifies the means.' To the weak and the determined, this is a sacred creed, and we should go forth with it in our hearts, and act upon it in all our relations towards men. It should be our business to get possession of them, body and soul. We need their influence, to advance our views, to obtain our rights. We should be all things to all men; should believe in the Bible, in Fourier, in Swedenborg, in Joe Smith, or Mahomet, if necessary, so that the influence be gained. We must seek out everywhere men who hold places of power and public influence, and win them - not to our cause, for that would be hopeless - but to ourselves; and through ourselves to our cause. We must not scruple as to the means; for "the end justifies the means." We must find, by whatever stratagem, art, or intrigue, that may be available, the assailable points in the characters of those who may be of use to us, and secure them, at whatever risk of reputation; for, as we will secretly sustain each other, we will at once dignify ourselves and our cause into the position of martyrdom, and be able to take shelter behind the omnipotent cry of persecution. There we are safe."
" Good!" "Good!" "Right!" "Right!" "Just the thing!" burst from all sides of the room; while the weatherbeaten face, - that is, the forehead, -of the lithe, glib speaker flushed with momentary exultation, while she continued, with still greater emphasis -
"Thus banded, my sisters, if we are firm, faithful, and enduriug, we may conquer the world. There is never a period when there is more than a dozen men who wield its destinies. There are nearly a dozen of us here present, and there are other spirits that I know, resolute and strong enough, to be our associates; let us resolve, then, to govern those who govern; and the romantic fragments of the life of a Lola Montes will have been furmly eompoined in the fact of a governing dynasty, the sceptre of which shall be uphell by woman."

Stome of applante, during which the plain, Quakerishlooking spaker wolsided into her seat. As she did son, there might have been obsterved, wnder the flubh of exultation which manfind hee Brow, satingular obliquity of the lefteye! Ha! Pherial!

CHAPTER VII.

INTRUSKOM.

This he! II Gen the mamner of his gaitHe rises on the toe; that spirite of hia In sapiration lifts him from the earth.

A barren-spirited fellow I one that feeds On objects, arts, mad imitations.

Hidm.

This is a slight, ummeritable man, Neet to be sent on crrands.

Idem.

We will now enter one of the upper rooms of the notonous Graham House, with the interior of which we have before been familiarised, and which had been reopened, on a modified basis. A single glance at the confused piles of manuscripts, books, and papers, scattered about the room and on the table, mingled with stumps of pens and cigars, and a long-tubed meerschaum, showed that it could be no other than the characteristic den of a literary bachelor, who, with chair and table drawn close to the stove, sat there to show for himself, earnestly engaged in what seemed to be the business of his life writing.

You saw in a moment that this was not a Northern man, for in addition to the long, black, and wavy hair, the dark, bronzed, and vaulting features indicated clearly a Southern origin. He was evidently young - certainly not more than twenty-seven, judging, as one instinctively does, by contour of person and features, and not by the expression of the face. But that expression, when you saw it, as he lifted his head, at once left you in doubt whether it could possibly belong to so immature a period of life. Although the brow wam broad, and mild am that of a child, yet there was a solemn and unnatural fixedness in the whole face, which, united with the cold utilness of the great, gray, bollow eyen, told at once a dreary tale of suffering, which ent an involuntary shudder through your soul. Where the expreanion rested mont, it was impomible for you to tell; but the fecting it conveyed wam one of abiolute horror. That a face, which seemed so young, should be one that never miled!Aud could the atory that it told be true? Could it be that for years that face bad never miled?

A light tap was heard at the door, and, with a momentary frown of vexation at the interruption, he furned hif head, and a young man entered the room, with somewhat hesitating step, which howed that he wam by momean certain of hir ground.

He was slight and thin, something below the average height, whth even a darker complexion than that of the face we have just dencribed; hie black hair, and preternaturally black and vivid eyee, glittered beneath straight, heavy browi, which nearly suet. His none wam prominent and partly arched; and here wats, in the whole bowed bearing and cat-like gait of this persom, an inezplicably strange and foreign look, which, alike in all countries, characterises that fated race which in yet an outrast anong the nations.

His greeting wat mingularly expressive of eager appreciation, while that of his host to him was cold, distant, and noceely prolite. Pushing aside his writing materials, as he handed him a chair, Manton-for such was the name of our young writerturned ujun his wiviter a frigid look of inquiry, and said, with a fortmality almont drawling -

Dector E. Willamot Weasel, I hope it in well with you thim evening:"

Ilis visiter, in rather a confused manner, commenced "Yeen, yeel-I -I fear I am intruding on your seclusion; but phardon ine, I cannot brar any longer to see you thus seclude jourwif from all the amenities of sociad life. You need relaxation; your stern isolation here with the pen, and pen alone, is playing wild work with your fine faculties. Pardon me, if I insist upon it, that you must and should accept the sympathies of the men and women around you. In the doctrine of unity in diversity, Fourier demonstrates that there is nothing more fatal to consistent development of both body and mind, than entire pre-occupation in a single object or pursuit."

Detecting a shade of vexation, at this juncture, crossing the open brow of Manton, Doctor Ebenezer Willamot Weazel hastily reiterated his apologies.
"I beg of you not to mistake my zeal for impertinence: I bave already received much good and many valuable truths from conversation with you, and I conceive myself under strong personal obligations of gratitude to you, that I hope may plead for me in extenuation of what you, no doubt, consider an impertinent intrusion. I would, as some measure of acknowledgment for such obligations, beg to be permitted to protest with you against this dangerous and obstinate isolation from all human sympathies, in which your life, dedicated to literary ambition, seems to be here fixed."
"My good friend, Doctor Weasel, my life is my own, and my purposes are fixed. I need no sympathisers, since I am sufficient unto myself. They would only distract and minify the higher aims of my life. You may call it literary ambition, but I call it a settled and sacred purpose to achieve good in my day and generation. I am content, sir! Do not attempt to disturb that contentment!"

This reply was somewhat curtly delivered, and seemed to discompose the Doctor, who, however, hesitatingly persisted-${ }^{\text {" Ah! ah! ah! yes! I expected to hear something of the sort }}$ from you, of course, but I beg you to consider that, under the harmonic law of reciprocation or mutual support and benefits, discovered by Fourier, and which hes at the base of all true organisation, you have no more right, as an individual, to hold yourself aloof, intellectually and socially, from the great body of mankind who are working for your bencfit as well as for their own, than a rich man has to lock up his hoards of gold, and Lury it where future generations may not reach it! The mocial state can only exint by individual concemions in favour of the whole."
"Your argument," wam the cold respone, "like all generalisinu pontulates aimed at particular cases, overlcaps its mark. I consider that I mall eflect more carnest good by persisting in this inolation against which you protest. For as I do not ask or require the individual mypathise of my race, but rather choose the will-life of undisturbed sympathy and communion with nature, I feel that I mhall accomplish more, far more, for bumanity, in thum dedicating myself to her interpretation. Through me, 解a medium, toy fellow men may thum learn far lofiser trubin than they themselves might ever impart reciprocally amidst the babble of what you call nocial intercourne."
"Dut you do not exclude women, murely? That would be unnatural; for you know that the life of man cannot be comb pletoly balanced, without the ameliorating premence and subduing contact of woman. He becomes a wavage without her; his pamanons are brutalised, and the man in spiritually and mocially deqrade ol."
"An atmirable truism, Doctor! Ihonor and revere woman; in her hiegh place ahe in to us, emphatically-angel! But this wery revercence in which I hold heer, promptu me to avoid cono tacte that may despoil me of my ideal. Iam prepared to woralijp hor, but mot to clegrade or look upon her degraded. Theree is nothing, in the range of human poswibilitisw, no hideous to me w meth contact-for I would hold my mother's inage always unerontaminated. Iatn a meranger, wir. I make no female ace quaintances at prosent here,"
"Sorry," mid the Doctor, "wory worty, wir; for my mpecial minuan in this case was to persuade yon to give up your isolaLion, in faver of an arequantane with a mom noble and chatming woman, afriend of mint, who, having mot with your papers in the journal you are now editing, is exceedingly anxious for an introduction, which 1 , in plain terms, have come to request. She is a woman of masculine and daring mind, and is taking the initial in most of the reform movements of the day, and particularly the most important of them all, the science of physiology as applicable to her own sex. She has taken the lead as the first lecturer on such subjects, and is accomplishing a vast amount of good. I am sure you will be much struck with her, and I never met two people whom I was more anxious to see brought together. You will appreciate each other, as physiology is one of your favorite subjects."
"Bah! a lecture-woman! But 1 don't mean to be disrespectful, Doctor. You could have fold me nothing that would have more firmly fixed my resolution neither to be introduced to or know the person of whom you speak, on any terms whatever! Your manly-minded women are both my disgust and abhorrence!-as what they choose to call manliness is most usually a coarse and sensual impudence, based on inherent immodesty, which renders them incapable of recognising the delicate unities of propriety, either in thought or deed. Ifully concede a woman's capacity for displaying the great and even loftier processes of intellection; but the moment she unsexes herself, she and her thoughts become vulgarised. Such people are universally adventuresses, and of the most unscrupulous sort. 1, as a stranger here, wish to run no risk of becoming entangled in their plausibilities. I am working for a full, free and frank recognition, by the social world, of my right to choose the place, the social circle rather, that I shall enter and become a part of. I do not wish to be dragged into such contacts, but to command them at my will!"
"But, sir," persisted the Doctor, "she admires your papers so fervently, and pities the cruel and self-inflicted isolation in which you live, with such ardent, disinterested and motherly warmth, that you can scarcely, in your heart, be so obdurate as to reject her genial overture-the sole object of which is, to draw you forth into mome participation with the railder bumani-tus-to make you feel that New York is not really the savage, bute and fowerlesa waste which we are led to presume you cymider it, from the attitude you bave assumed toward its weial conditions. You are killing yourself here with tobacco, wise and labour, while she would show that even self-immolated gexum may find a warm place to nestle, in distant lands, and near the matronly bosom, in spite of cold and sullen self. reliance" "
"The fact of her being a matron," frigidly responded Manton, "conniderably mondifes the general character of the proposition which whe ham done me the honor, through you, to communicate. Bhat, Doctor, I must finally and definitively state to you that I dos not, at prement, wish to cultivate any female acquaintance whaterer in the city of New York. I propose to wait until I can melert inntead of being eclected." And rising at the same tirae with an impatient movement, which might or might not, be mimitaken for a desire to be left alone, Mr. Manton politely shorwed Dowtor E. Willamot Weasel, who had now taken the hinst, to the doror.

Alroont the wame moment after hiss discomfited visiter left, Matson hastily gathered up the serattered leaves of manuseript of him tatde, and muntring, as ho thrust the roll into his pocket, "Curbe the intrusion! this ought to have been in the printers" hasaly ann hour agt, and yet it is not finished!" and matching up hin eap, be passed from the room, and bet the house.

Not long after, thore carne a sharp ring at the door of the fipabans Illouse, and the fetnale wervant, who hurriedly hastened tos ofen it, wam cquite as sharply intorrogated by a woman on the contide, who wat clowely veiled, and wore a mort of Quaker gerth -
"I Mr. Manton in :"
${ }^{64}$ No, manam, be has jum gonc out."
"Where is his room? I have a letter for him, which I wish to deposit in a safe place with my own hands. What is the number of his room?" she asked, in an imperative manner.
"Ma'am, the gentleman is out. Can't you leave the letter with me or the mistress? We will give it to him when he comes."
"No, I choose to place it myself. What is his number?" And as she spoke, she slighty unveiled herself. The servant seemed to recognise her face even through the dusk, and said, though rather sullenly, as she gave way for her to pass -
"Yes, ma'am, walk in. His room is No. 26, on the third floor." The female glided rapidly past, and as the servent attempted to follow her, exclaiming, "Ma"am, I will show yon the number," she answered hastily, "Never mind, I know where the room is now!" and darted up the stairs.

The servant muttered some droll commentaries on this procedure, which it is not necessary to repeat, and seeming to be afraid to complain to her superiors, dragged herself surlily back towards her subterranean home.

In the meantime our light-footed and unceremonions caller had reached the third lloor, and walked straight forward to the door of the room just left by Manton. She troubled herself with no idle ceremony of knocking, but walked confidently in.

CMAPTEMUX.

 Whont Ayricans, with mill him nurtirmen gavery,

Am hous wfter the lant werne, Manton returued to his room, and, weenning grealy hurrict, lit his lanp, and throwing hiaso melf into achair, weized his peng, zantering betwern his treth, "It mant be finimbed to-right! a man has mo right to lee tived!" He wam drawing hin writing matorials powards hibs, bo procered with him work, when a momerthing of spratuge dimorder anong him paperm caught him quick rye.
"Ah! who hom lows dinturbing my parare?" and an a fland of menpietion mbot throught him, he sprateg to his firt, "welaimieng, ping quickly io them, he threw up the lids.
 mine, feaving ererybing untocked in this fathon!"

 an thry were before. Ditering mane rampgrtice expletiver of wrath, he kowlt bemide one to aceertain how far the examinaton hat liosti earriect, when, roseching the parkager of letterw and pianem at the bothon, be maw threre, tow, ummintakable evidence of a pretty thorongh emamination having been beld of their comernis.

If he hal been erraged before, hiw folled him with uncons Itrollable fury. Ife mataped him for, bravily upen the flos, and cealled down a Eearfal imprecation upon the head of thin wretched violator, whoever it might be, of the sad and mournful secrets of his past life, which he had held sealed in his own bosom, so sternly, so long, and, alas! so vainly. Those letters revealed all. Some prying reptile had thus slimed the holy penetralia of his proud life!

The very thought was horror--loathing! A shudder of unutterable disgust crept through him; an uncontrollable fury blazed through his soul ; his eyes glittered with almast demoniac fire; his face turned deathly white, and his teeth ground and clattered like the clamp of a wild boar's tusks, and yet he made no tragic start; he stood still, with his arms clutching each other across his breast, and his eyes looking out into the blank distance, through which their concentrated light seemed to pierce to some far object. He at length pronounced slowly-
"Yes, my curse shall follow you; be you man or woman, it shall overtake you in terror! I feel the prophecy in me! The wretch who has thus contaminated those chaste and loved mementoes, shall yet feel my curse! My consciousness is filled with it! I know not how, or when, or where! my curse shall reach and blast the author of this sacrilege! - bah!" and his face writhed into the devilish mockery of a smile; "it is almost sufficient vengeance, one would think, that the wretch' found no money!"

Starting suddenly forward, he commenced pacing to and fro with long strides, with knitted brows, compressed lips, and eyes bent upon the floor.-For more than an hour he thus silently communed with himself, without the change of a muscle in expression, when drawing a long sigh, be threw off this frigid look in a degree, merely saying in a low voice, "My curse is good!" and returned to the table to resume his seat and his labors.

As he did so, his eye fell upon a note directed to himself, which, as it had been placed in no very conspicuous position among the objects on the table, had, till now, escaped his attention. He reached it, and the dainty crow-quilled hand of the mperscription, the nowy envelopes, and the pure white seal, dimelemed at once the woman.- Wle regarded it for a moment, coilly, and without any expression of interest or surprises and with a light net upon his face, broke the seal, when out alipped gilt-edged note, which he opened and read aloud with - jetring tone:

Freamb-May I not claim to be thy friend in common with the whole world, who have learned to love thee, through thy beutiful thoughte? Stricken, tad, and wicidal child of genius, anay I nor teal into the tiger'm hair of thy wavage isolation, to bring one aingle ray of bleaning, to tell thee how, at least, one human moul has throbbed to the seraphic eloquence of powers, that, was!-I qppeal to your inmost consciouncess!-are being rapidiy dentroyed by your ohstinate seclusion in labos, and by the vices of wine and tobacco, which are its neceswary atten damte. You have it in you to be saved; your soul in tall and strong 解 an archangel; your vice are the withem of grasm that bind you; and love, wocial hove, the calm and genial recipo rocation of domestic mymathem, can alone redeern you.

You are proud-I know it ! but pride will yield to gentlenew, and in a distant land among strangers, the tearless, motherles hoy, will not reject a mother's proffre of a mother's yearninga. You naughty, baughty child, we must save you from yourgell, in apite of yourmelf!

> Yourm spiritually,

Mambe.
Manton, whose face bad, during this realings, writhen with alnow every conceivable exprossion, tossord the letter from him an he finimhed it, with the "xelanation -." Poh! this must be Doctor E . Willarnot Weasel's lerture woman! Impudent allventure in cewry line, as I "xpertard!" And he resumed bis him writing-"C Cinferturatre allusiom, by the way, to the withes of grate-we cannot help bring reminded of a certain Mr. Samong and a Mism or Mrs. Deliaho Cupse her! how came 9 she to speak of my mother ?" and grinding his teeth heavily, he proceeded with the work before him, without paying any further attention to the circumstance.

The greater portion of the night was spent in intense labor; but, when, after a very late bath and breakfast, the next morning, Manton went out to the office of the Journal for an hour, and returned, he was not a little surprised to find another missive, as neat and snowy as the first, awaiting him, on the table.

He thought it must surely be the first, that he had, in some unconscious mood, re-enclosed in the envelope; but, glancing around, he saw it lying open, where he had tossed it.
"Gramercy! but she fires fast!" he said, with a droll look passing across his features, as he stooped down, his hands cautiously clasped behind his back, to survey more closely the delicate superscription-Mr. Stewart Manton, Graham House, Present.
"Present! present! but this sounds rather ominous! Can it be that my spiritual correspondent of last night is an inmate too? My correspondent is evidently both in earnest and in a hurry! What shall I do? By my faith, I have a great mind to throw it upon the centre-table of the common parlor below, and let this benevolent lady reclaim her own, or else leave it to the irresistible access of curiosity, common to the sex, and peculiar to this queer house, to explore its unclaimed sweets. The first taste has quite sickened me. I have something other to do than listen to such inane twattle."

He continued for some moments to gaze upon the letter, while a half-sneering smile played upon his grave and melancholy features. "Well, but this must be a quaint specimen of a feminine, to say the least of it! I have heard of these spiritual ladies before! The character must be worth studying, though it seems to be transparent enough, too. Well! we'll see what she has to say this time, at any rate! It can hardly be richer than the first! Here it is!"

Fairnd - I know your heart. That proud heart of yours is at this moment flled with scorn for my poor words and humble profiers. But it does not affect me much, for well I know that this pride is the evil which ever strives in the unregenerate soul, to fence against the approaches of good. As yet this demon possesses thee, and, until conquered and humbled by love, you can never be saved. Thy physical life is poisoned - is poisoned with tobacco - and it is through such poisons that this evil spirit of pride enters into thy soul. Thy spiritual vision is thus obscured, that you may not perceive the truth. I shall pray for you. My spirit shall wrestle with thine when you know it not, and God will help his humble instrument. May He soon move that obdurate heart of thine, proud boy!

Marie
"Well! but this is cool! decidedly refreshing! This pertinacious creature is surely some mad woman confessed, as she certainly is a most raging and impertinent fanatic! Boy, forsooth! patronising. I should almost be provoked, were not the thing so egregiously ludicrous! Well, well! it is consoling, at least, that I have found my good Samaritan at last. I shall preserve these precious epistles, as decidedly curious memoranda of this original type of the Yankee adventuress, for Yankee she must be, who has set out thus boldly on a speculation in the spiritualities. I think I have had enough of this trash now, as I intend to take no notice either of it or of the writer. I should suppose she might get discouraged."

The letters were thrown carelessly into a drawer, and Manton sat down to his work.

The next morning, when Manton returned from the office, at the usual hour, what should meet his eye, the first thing on entering the room, but a third snowy missive, placed now more conspicuously, on the very centre of the table. The poor man stopped, frowned, then gradually his eyes distended into a wild stare, and lifting his hands at the same moment, he shouted out - "Good God! What, another ?" and then, with a sudden revulsion of feeling, he burst into a loud, unnatural laugh. "This is patience for you! By heaven! she dies game to the last! Well! let's see what now, for I am beginning to be charmed with the progress of this thing. There's an absolute fascination in such daring."

He snatched up the note, and opening it, read it sotto voce, with an indescribable intonation of contempt:-

Friend-Ah, glorious soul, that I might call thee so indeed! I have just read your poem in the Journal. Read it, did I say? My soul has devoured it! Again and again have I retumed to the feast unsated. Ah me, that mighty rythm! It has filled me with new strength and light! On its harmonious flow the universe of beauty, love and life has been brought closer to mehas been revealed in splendor and unutterable music, until I have sobbed for joy thereof, and prayed and wrestled for thee, with my Father above, that thou mightest be saved. It is terrible to think that a soul so godlike as thine should be unregenerate. I bless thee! I bless thee, my son! I pray for thee! I am praying for thee! I shall pray for thee always, untal thon art saved!

Marie.
"Good! I am in a fair way for salvation now, one would think! This seems a strange character - such a mixture of fanaticism, cant, and, withal, appreciation! That poem of mine was certainly an extraordinary one. I hardly expected to find any one that would appreciate it at first. But see! she has already caught its subtle reach and meaning. Pooh! what a fool I am! This is perfectly on a par with all the other hysterical cant which I have received from this person. The probability is, if the lines had been written by Mr. Julian Augustus Maximilian Dieaway, upon whose soft sconce she desired to make an impression (in the way of speculation), the same extravagant tropes and metaphors would have found their way to the snowy surface of this gilt-edged paper, through the deli-cately-handled crow-quill! Curse it! I shall order the chambermaid to stop the nuisance of these missives!"

This letter was impatiently tossed into the drawer with the others, and Manton threw himself into his chair; when, after sitting with bis head leaning on his hands, moody and motionless, for some time, he suddenly straightened himself, and drew from the heap of magazines and books before him a fresh-looking copy of the -Journal. Turning over its leaves cagerly to that which contained his new poem, he perused it and reperused it over and over again, with an expression of restlessness and intense inquiry in his manner during the time. At last he drew a long breath, and threw the book back upon the table, exclaiming in a firm voice, "No! I am satisfied. This is no namby-pamby die-away rhyming - there is genuine stuff there; that is true poetry, or I have it not in my nature to produce it. That cursed meddlesome woman has made me distrust myself for the moment; by her extravagant praises, has made me doubt the genuineness of my own inspiration. Her letter is so evidently disjointed ranting, that it has shaken my self-reliance to have even read it. Curse her silly and inapertinent legends, I shall read no more of them!"

Poor Manton was eridently troubled now, at length; and can the reader conjecture why this last letter had so excited him? Had a subtle arrow found its mark? Was there any thing in the poem really to justify the high-fown and ecstatic parectryics of missive No. 3 , in the snow-white envelope: You shall seeyou shall judge. Here is a true copy of the poem:-

NOREST.

0 monl, dream not of rest on earth: On: fort on! It is thy derm! Too stern for paisy, tors bigh for zairth, Mated with the warephim?

Time outlogtinge all whowe length
Fraem, within thine gee, dim?
O mbong treveller, cmist thou tires Whom, but touching at the grave, Thy worn feets, re-bod, mapire, Winged, to clonve se Uriol黄 clave?

Rembl alh, rewthem! be alone Cod the Worker, thou the Drone !

Boon yom atom, wwiftly driving Patt thee, in the upward rwee, Brwver for the perfect striwing Shall ammone tho higher placo.

God, the Woxker, Enow wo rew panme, and be of Hixu unblest

Ho ! low by thee nid in fying!

Evem matter outupeeds theel
Strouger thou, yet thou seem'st dying - Mading down immensity.
Rouse the quickened life to know ! God work mubtly, work thow mol

Thou mert mabler then the wind,
Than the waters, than the light,
Tham old Chaos, whom these bind,
Beautiful, on axle bright.
Yet thou sleepert, while they speed-
God, of sleeperr has no meed !
Waiteth clond, or fremm, or flower,
Robing meadows and the wood?
Waiteth awellow past its hour,
Chasing sprigg beyond the flood?
Yet thou witert, weain, untrue God rebuketh sloth in you!

Old though wind gray
Spin they not chearily
Cycle bodiny
Look they like faling,

Fince none may uty
fyyum are folling Aubumni hive they:
Starw yot are cenling
Lifo from decsy.
Dead world but gild then Duwted in light:
Det timee hewithled them
Pullew of might.
Brightening, ntill brightoning

Wharnity limhtening
The why mad the wo
De Noro.

CHAPTER X.

"owcy mowe ro trie meactu"

- Once more to the bremeh, my friondy!

Once morn!

$$
\text { OLL } \mathbb{P}_{\text {LA }}
$$

Poom Manton wal not permitted to remain in peace at his laborn long. On the afternoon of the wame day, Doctor Li. Willamot Weasel, mearcely taking time to announce himself by a mharp knock, holted into the room, exclaining-
"Ah! my dear friend, pardon me; but the lady concerning whom I mpoke to you, in now in the parlor below, and requesta the pleasure of an interview."

A frown instantly darkened the brow of Manton, and he answered angrily -
"Sir! you will remember that I expressed to you, most distinctly, a disinclination for such an introduction. I told you I did not wish to know this woman, then, and I feel still less inclination to know her now."
${ }^{66}$ But, a-ah! my dear sir, you would not surely be unkind enough to refuse to see the lady now, when she waits in the parlor, in momentary expectation of seeing you - for the servant told her you were in? It certainly can do you no harm to be courteous."
"That's a strong appeal to make to a Southerner, Doctor Weasel, it must be confessed."
"Yes," said he, rubbing his hands, "I thought you could not disregard it. I am so anxious to bring you together! Do come. I shall be delighted. Come! pray come! she is waiting."
" Doctor Weasel, I do this thing with great reluctance," said Manton, rising. "I suppose I must go; but rest assured, I do not feel particularly obliged to you for forcing me into this position."

This was said in a very cold, measured tone; but the Doctor's delight at the prospect of accomplishing his favorite and benevolent scheme, was so great, that his excitement prevented him from observing it.
"Never mind, come along; you will thank me for it, on the contrary, as long as you live."

Manton left the room with him, and when they reached the parlor, he was rapidly introduced to Mrs. Orne and her daughter, who sat upon a lounge awaiting him. The Doctor instantly darted out of the room; and Manton was left vis-a-vis with his ecstatic correspondent.

As the woman rose to meet him, the blood mounted to her very plain face, and square, compact, masculine forehead. The child, which was an ugly, impish-looking girl, with a mean fore-

프 -

```
E=-m= -m-m
```

```
#5rm=n-
```

```
        \-= = = =
```

```
##m,* m
    #- - ".. =- =- -
```

```
#-- = -- - - - -
```

```
#=~=~"
星: " = = = % \cdots
    - - - - m m =.
```

```
7= :3-7=
    *- - . . .
```

```
    #*)
```

however, and commenced a conversation upon the general literature of the day, in which Manton, in spite of himself, was gradually interested, by a certain sharp epigrammatic method of uttering heresies, and bold paradoxes, which seemed to be peculiar to ber mind, and which could not but prove refreshing to one, who, like Manton, most heartily detested commonplace.

He, however, did not unbend in the slightest, and the woman, who finally, in despair of "getting at him," rose to depart, said, yet perseveringly, with winning badinage -
"I find you in a naughty humor to-day. You are as cold as an iceberg and sharp as a nor'wester. When you get to be a good boy, you may come and see me!"
"When I do, madam, I shall surely come!" was the response, accompanied by a very low bow, and delivered in a tone that would have frost-bitten the ear of a polar bear.

The discomfited woman hurried from the parlor with the blood almost bursting from her face, while Manton, turning on his heel, muttered -
" Well! if that does not freeze her off, she ought to be canonised!"

CHAPTER XI.

CARRIED HY STORM.

You call it an ill angel - it may be so: Dut sure am I, smong the ranks that fell This the firet fiend e'er counselled man to rise !

Anow.
Manton had reckoned without his host, in supposing that his self-constituted patroness had any idea whatever of being frozen off: on the contrary, her benevolent ardor had been only warmed still more, as he had abundant evidence, when, on returning b: hie metry? What have I ackery of you, but that youstruld firon, when the is nothing, in fact, but foral mand

ed, with a little disjointed mother-wit. Curse the whole affair! I wish she and her endless letters were in the bottom of the sea! By these persistent impertinences she disturbs me in my work; these distractions are unendurable! I wish she were only safe in heaven.

It is useless to give all the letters which poor Manton received within the next four or five days, but it is sufficient to say that at last, in a fit of veritable desperation, spleen and humor, he answered one of the last in a tone of hyperbolical exaggeration that would have put to shame, not Mercutio only, but the veritable Bombastes Furioso himself. The effect was coldly studied, and behold the result.

The next morning a servant informed him that a lady desired to see him in the parlor.

Terror-stricken by the announcement, be nevertheless knew, in his conscience, that he had brought down the judgment upon his own head. He therefore felt it to be his duty to abide the consequences of his own imprudence, and went down to wait upon his caller, who, of course, was no other than his correspondent.

She received him with a flushing face, as seemed to be usual to her shrinking nature. She was this time without her dauglter. There were other persons in the parlor, and this seemed to disconcert her somewhat, for she had evidently come full of some important disclosure. Although it was the latter part of winter, and a heavy snow had just commenced breaking up, which rendered the streets of New York almost impassable, she nevertheless proposed that they should go out for a long walk. Manton looked through the window into the sloppy street, opened his eyes a little, and assented.

There was something wonderfully rare in the idea of a wo* man's proposing a long walk on such a day, and Manton relished the hardiness and originality of the thing.
"Well!" said he to himself, "I like her spunk, anyhow! She has shown herself in every way to be in earnest in what she

 4:

in her cause, who finally rescued the child, by strategy or force, and restored it to its weeping mother's arms.

In addition to this sad tale of suffering connected with her private history, which was most akilfully and artistically worked up, she had another, of public martyrdom, which was, to Manion, far more impressive.

Through obscurity and poverty, this resolute and daring woman had dedicated herself to the amelioration of the physical evils of her helpless sex. She had, with unflagging ardor, studied the books of anatomical science, the diseases of her sex, and the wisest means of cure. And thus, in addition to having been the first woman in New England to publicly assert that there is no true marriage but in love, she had also led the way in announcing to women their sanitary duties to themselves; that they must learn to heal their bodies, and leave the other sex to take care of their own diseases; that delicacy as well as utility prompted this course.

This idea at once met the approbation of Manton, to whom its assertion was comparatively novel, but who had always deeply felt the lamentable helplessness of woman, and the unnatural relation of the male members of the profession to them.

The brave and hearty manner in which this singular woman had evidently breasted alone the popular prejudice, in a cause which he saw, at a glance, to be so just and nobly utilitarian, for the first time moved his sympathies somewhat in her favor, in spite of his contempt and disgust for women who ventured beyond their sphere.

The vocation of a learned nurse to diseased persons of her own sex, was clearly to him not beyond the proper sphere of woman, but a most important, legitimate, and - however little recognised, conventionally - the most honorable and useful. He could not but respect the woman, whatever her eccentricities might be, who could be brave and true enough to assert effectively to her sex, the natural and inevitable mandate, "Know thysel!!"

There was sonething chivalrous in the thought-a generous daring, a martyr apirit, that could not fail to arrest a nature in itelf, rashly, scornful of all that was merely conventional, and whose untamed, half-smage noul rejoiced in all noveltie that expresmed to him a higher utility than mere forms conveyed.
The wall was continued for hours ; and nitl further to try her nerves, during this long converation, Manton turned through many intricaciee into the most darkened labyrinthe of the viceprofaned metropolis.

The woman never flinched; nothing seemed to appal her, and, we they threaded rapidly the dingy alleys of the "Five Points," she had an acute theory or a daring speculation for each evil, the external form of which they successively encountered.

There wal a vigor and originality in all this, as coming from a woman, that interested Manton in spite of himelf. Plain, uncouth, and eccentric as was this scorned "lecture-woman," the could not but confets to himelf, as they peturned mud-bee draggled and tired enough from that long walk, that his respect for her had very much increased.

CHAPTER XII.

SPRMTUAL CONHDENCES

> And ander fair protence of friendly ends, And well-placed words of gloning courtesy; Baited with ressons not unplasible, Wind me into eagy-hearted men, And hug him into snaree.

Mase or Comus.
We shall follow the bedraggled heroine of the last chapter, begging leave of the reader to "see her home."

Mark with what an elate and vigorous step she trips it up Barclay Street into Broadway, after taking leave of Manton at the door of the Graham House. One would think that she should surely be tired, after that tremendous morning's work, trudging and splashing through the dirtiest mire of three-fourths of the great city. But no-she springs in her gait, and her strange, animal eye, glitters fairly with a devilish obliquity, which has for the moment usurped its expression. She does not mind that people turn and stare after her dragging and bespattered skirts-not she!-her very soul is possessed with the pre-occupation of an ecstatic gloating over some great conquest achieved, or closely perceived already in the prospective future into which she glares.

We shall see what we shall see-only follow, still follow. She has turned up Broadway, and threads the great throng there with rapid glide, as street after street is passed. Ah, now we have it! She crosses-this is Eighth Street! There, in Broadway, near the corner, stands a great house, with wide-open door; the smeared and dirty lintels, the greasy latch, the wide, uncarpeted hall of which, at once reveals it to be one of those miscellaneous and incomprehensible edifices, which are not unfrequently met with on the great thoroughfare, and the umew of which are not generally more specifically known, than that they are fashionable boarding-houses.

Into this ever-gaping entrance she wheeled, and darted up U.e broad, uncarpeted stairway, which she continued to ascend with almost incredible ease and switness to the fifth story. When near the end of a long and narrow passage, she paused before one of the doors, and tapping it slightly, entered without farther cermony.

A handsome and well-dresed woman, who was engaged in writing at a mall escritoire, looked up indifferently as she enteped, but the moment she caught the expression of the new. romer's face, she aprang to her feet, throwing down the pen, and with a atrangely ahrill and unmusical laugh, screamed out in a most inconceivably voluble style-
"Why, I declare! Marie, what's the matter? Your eyes are almost bursting out of your head! You look as if you had found a bage of gold, and meant to give me half! Why, blese the woman, how she looks! Have you caught him at last? Whll, we're in luck! I've caught my man for sure! He'm been hare all the morning, he's just left! Why, how the woman broks! She kereps staring so! You haven't gone crazy for joy, have yous? Now, do tell! how have you managed to catch that insolent baby, you seemed to have wet your beart on m? Why, how muldy the woman is!" she shrieked, looking down at the condition of her drem. "Hha! ha! ha! ha! Ho tell, what sort of a game have you been playing? Did you have to hume him through a pig-sty ?"

The woman hat been standing motionlesm, in the meantime, with distended eyes and compressed mouth, stretched in a nigid mmile of anpernaturally savage exultation. She gazed towards her features. She looked the abstrated ambodiment of triuniphing evil. Very scon ber stiffered lips quivered alighty, 10* while the voluble lady stepping forward, shook her sharply by the shoulder, shrilling out again-
"Do look at the woman! Why, what can be the matter? Can't you talk? The cat's got the woman's tongue surely! I did not think you were so much in earnest about that green boy! Why, I could twist him about my finger like a tow-string! I have achieved something in conquering my man!"
"Y-your man!" said the woman slowly, interrupting her. But these words were accompanied by a look of such strange and taunting significance, that the other turned instantly pale and sprang back, as if she had received an electric shock from those singular eyes, that fell upon her for a moment with their evil obliquity, and then returned instantly to their natural expression. "Wh-why, what do you mean?" stammered the other angrily.

The woman only answered with a pleasant smile-"Now don't be a jealous fool, Jeannette Shrewell-I shall never interfere with your schemes if you don't with mine."
"Yes! but because you knew Edmond long ago," continued the other in a fierce and shrewish voice, "you dare to insinuate to me that he too has passed through your hands!"

The woman broke out into a loud laugh - "Why, what a child you are! You know what my relations to Edmond are, perfectly. Spiritual-purely and spotlessly spiritual. I should no more think of him than of my grandfather."
"Spiritual!" shrieked the other, springing forward; "do you dare to use that stupid cant to me? Keep it for the sapheaded boys and senile drivellers that you decoy with such bait, to plunder. You shan't insult me to my teeth with it."

The speaker, whose physical energies were far more vehement and overbearing than the other, seemed to have entirely awed her. She sank meekly into a chair, turned very pale, and lifting her eyes with an humble look, she said, in a low imploring voice, "Now, Jeannette, please don't be so violent. I did not mean to taunt or insult you. You have altogether mistaken me, dear friend. Now, please be calm."

But the other, whowe long black curle will writhed and qui. refed, Hike the makew of the Gorgon head, with rage, mood tow wrisug before the muppliant, a if mac meant to crush her; and athe thum stood, we really looked wuperb.

Her profile wat delicately chimelled and Roman, with large, dark gray cyew, thin lipm, and fine chin; and now that every teature wat inapifed will anger, the cye ceated to be oflimded by their habintual expremsion of melfish, cold, and wharp intellec. won. Siue continued, quite vehomently -
"You have mown the wind, and you must reap. I have Herard thim vile inminuation hefore of monething hetween you and Fingotid at B.
"s Jrabinetu! Jeannutt it in falm! every word of it. It im w.It you it it mo."
"You! yom! Iknow it is false, But who gave circulation to Lowe ropartw? Iley! Your enemive, were they? Your enemion mund have a great deal to do, that they ketep themuelvel Lowy wifh theme masifuld morie of your adventure:". Who wat it augired to the erlat of any affair with the rich, generoum, Bartacol, amd travelled Hodenond! Who was it draggeod him, into conditionw which resodered him liable to wach ant ingputa iotn: Whe bogated of it, and atternpred to places bitn in the alowety ruined and plundered? Iley? Who waw it? Marie be's had hoe vinion not been binded by pasiosit, whe might have fingop. "! know you, wentin! Beware! beware how you jug, tiggres withs bor young in yeur armas. He shall be mines! I Barroper, and kefo everything, mother, winderw, friendm, and came on to this city; a thousand miles, alone and unprotected, that I might throw myself in his way, I swore that he should be mine. I had watched his career for years, from a distance, and he had grown to be my ideal. When he became, first the pupil and then the expounder of the new philosophy in France, I too became its student; with unwearied labor I mastered its prodigious science, for I divined the purpose of the man. I knew he must return to his own country, and become its exponent here, and that then my time would come.

"I studied the German, the French, and the Italian; with all which languages I knew him to be familiar. I acquainted myself with the literature of each, that I might be able always to speak with him in the tongues and of the themes of which his long residence in Europe had made the associations most pleasant. Armed thus, cap-a-pie, I have met him at last, as I felt it was my destiny to do.
"I have attracted him; I have all but conquered him. That man shall be my lover! Ay, woman, he shall be my lawful husband! Cross my track in any way, if you d-a-a-r-e! I know your arts; I will render them for ever unavailing to you; I will explain them, and expose them. Cross noy track, then, if you d-a-a-r-e !" and, as she hissed out the words between her teeth, she stooped forward and shook her finger in the face of the now actually trembling woman. "Remember! our compact is, you let me alone, and I will let you alone; you help me, I'll help you; cross me, I destroy you!"
"Is that all?" murmured the woman, in a sof voice, opening her eyes, which had been closed during the greater part of this tirade, while, at the same time, the old obliquity became for a moment apparent.
"Why, Jeannette, I never dreamed of any thing else. I would sooner cut off my right hand than interfere with you, in any respect. Our two courses are entirely different. You have one object and one species of game to hunt down, while I have another. We shall not clash!" and seeing the features of the gitic -
 Wencric geve

取边

"*"." "

*) I $\ddagger$ i $=\cdots$

-

ducect

failed before, he treated them with what I suppose he meant to be silent contempt, for he did not answer one of them, though I had taken the pains to place them all upon his table with my own hands, during his absence, and find out all I could concerring him at the same time.
"I found the key-note, however; the boy loved his mother, and has been playing hyena with the rest of the world erer since she died, and been endeavoring to imagine himself a misanthrope, with a life dedicated since solely to the ambition of achieving, in her name, good for mankind. This discovery, privately made, put me fully in possession of all I wanted to know of his weakness. I saw he was earnest and chivalrous, as his origin implies, and proudly secretive, so far as the privacies of his life were concerned. So I at once felt that this incrustation of reserve with which he had fenced about his life, could only be broken down by a coup de main.
"I determined to come down upon him, by surprise, in spite of everything. I called on him, and sent our trusty Doctor up to bring him to the parlor per force. The ruse succeeded so far as to effect an introduction; but, to tell you the truth," and her forehead fairly blazed while she spoke, "I never was treated with such insolent and frozen hauteur in my life before! I went away with my ears tingling and blood on fire, but I cursed him in my very heart, and swore to have a woman's vengeance! You remember how sick I was that night. Oh, God! such furies as tortured me! II scarcely, slept; but a happy thought came to me just about morning.
${ }^{6}$ He was a poet-his brow revealed that-but with characteristic sternness be had yet published nothing which could be accounted the highest expression of his inmost life. He had made his way in literature rapidly and brilliantly through a novel combination of style, in which the essential elements of prose and poetry were combined; but had never yet ventured to associate his proper name with anything bearing the forms of poctry.
"Now, the Doctor had told me that the poem, under the moubriquet of 'De Noto,' in the last number of the Journal, was his, and it at once flashed across me-appreciation! appreciation! The young poet has stolen timidly forth, under disguise, with this myth clear from his soul! He does not expect to be understood at once, and any prompt appreciation will overwhelm him from the very suddenness of the thing; and in his delighted surprise he would yearn towards the acknowIedged devil himeelf.

Isent him another note expressing that intense appreciation for which I knew he was craving. He treated it with the neglect that he had the others; but I somehow felt that I had made my mark. I called this moning, and as I knew his contempt for more conventional forms, I vertured upon a dashing ruse de guarre.
"I thallenged him, for I knew his own personal hardiness, to take a long walk through all the slop of the thaw. With a stare of surprise be accepted it. Ifelt even then that my point was half gained. There were people in the parlor, and my object was to get him alone with myself. I fell that I had already innched one weakness, and my object now was to arrest his chicalrous sympathies in behalf of my forforn and unprotected maryymom to the cause of woman in her resistance to the hrutalities of the marital haw, and her right of proclaiming to bur sisterlood the manitary laws of health, in which they have beren kept in profound ignorance by the 'profession.'
"At first, I arrested his attention by the daring of the position ahich I had assumed, and then aroused his sympathies by a fervent relation of the wrongs inflicted on me by my brutal habland. The story was old, but I managed to throw into it a great deal of ferfing, for there is nothing like a tale of persecution to arrest chivalrous minds all over the world. We underwand all these proponitions as secienific! When I parted with him he sniled upon me, for the first time, genially. I am mure of him now?"
"I ghould think you might be!"

CHAPTER XIII.

> What nee you there, That has so cowrrded and chased your blood Out of appearance?

SEAESFEA思。

In a good-sized, neatly-furnished apartment, of a large house in Bond Street, about two weeks after the incidents which were related in the last chapters, a group was assembled, about nine o'clock in the evening, which consisted of Manton, the woman Marie Orne, her daughter, and Dr. E. Willamot Weasel, of whom we have before spoken.

The dark eye of Doctor Weasel glistened with benevolent delight as he gazed upon the group, from which he sat somewhat apart. Manton was seated on a chair near the glowing fire, with the mother on a low stool on one side of him, and the daughter kneeling on the other, while both with upturned reverential eyes drank in eagerly each word that fell from his lips. They seemed to be enchained, enchanted, while he spoke; and the mother, in the almost total speechlessness of her rapt appreciation, could only venture to trust her trembling voice in low, whispered exclamations; while the sad eyes of the impish-looking daughter imitatively stared unutterable things.

The woman's subtle suggestiveness had roused the brain of Manton, and fully drawn him out on his favorite themes; whatever of natural eloquence he possessed, and he possessed much, flowed smoothly now, for, in spite of himself, his frozen heart had been warmed by the unwearying deference which he met with from these people.

The lamps burned brightly, the hearth glowed, and the eyes of all were bent upon him with genial warmth and admuring

Yet she seemed so utterly lawless and quietly defiant of what the world, that works in harness, might say, he could not help respecting her for it. It was a new thing in his life, to meet with a woman, sufficiently heroic, to face the martyrdom that she was daring, for so elevated and noble an aim as the emancipation of her own sex from the conditions of utter helplessness, into which their ignorance of the laws of life had sunk them.

Besides, she had shown so much earnest patience with his rude pride, had followed up its aberrations with such a matronly tenderness, exhorting him only, and unceasingly, to be at rest -a rest, the need of which his proud and fainting soul had confessed so often to his inward consciousness. And then this fine appreciation - ah, where is the young poet who can withstand appreciation? And then such delicate deference in triffes!

He had spoken incidentally of his taste in dress; and now the mother and daughter were dressed in the most graceful and faultess simplicity! The heart of Manton was touched. He felt grateful and pleased with these strange Samaritans to him in a strange land.

On a slight pause in the conversation, the woman, still gazing up timidly into the face of Manton, changed the theme suddenly, by asking him,
"What do you think of Clairvoyance?"
"The world is not old enough yet, by twenty years, I think, to answer that question."
${ }^{6}$ My reason for asking the question, was, that I have some strange premonitions myself, which I cannot explain. You will, no doubt, be able to explain the mystery at once-""
"Yes!" interrupted Doctor Weasel, eagerly, "do let us have you examine the matter! Facts have come within my own knowledge, concerning revelations which have been made by her, that are the most extraordinary I ever knew. For instance, when she has been brought into clairroyant rapport with individuals whom she has never seen or heard of before, she has revealed to them the whole history of their lives. ${ }^{3 \prime}$
"This unexpected enunciation of their life-secrets to men, must of course be productive of strange scenes occasionally," said Manton, in a tone which had suddenly become cold.
"Oh, very curious and interesting! very curious!" exclaimed the Doctor, quiclly. "Marie, do relate to him that incident of the bloody hand, that you have so often told me."
"Well," said she, "it has been some years since that a number of my friends, who knew of this gif of mine, were in the habit of inviting me to their respective houses, to meet friends of distinction, who were curious to observe the experiments, either upon themselves or upon others.
${ }^{6}$ On one occasion I was invited to meet a celebrated physician of this city, whose reputation for purity of character and life was very high. There were no parties present but my friend, this physician, and myself. Such an arrangement, I afterwards understood, had been made at the particular request of the physician himself, who desired that there should be no other person present but his host at the interview.
" When the physician placed his hand upon my head, as is the necessary formula to bring me into spiritual communion with my interrogator, I relapsed almost immediately into the syncope of the clairvoyant state, and of course became entirely unconscious of what I uttered in that condition. But our host, who was his most intimate friend, has given me many times the following explanation of the scene :-
"He says that when the physician placed his hand upon my head, I first said from the sleep, 'I am content! All is pure here-this is a holy soul-one that is regenerate and will be saved!' and then that while I was recounting his many deeds of kindness to the poor and friendless, and the rich, I suddenly shrank back, exclaiming, ${ }^{6}$ Blood! blood! blood! There is blood upon this hand! This soul is darkened now with blood! Here is some fearful crime! Murder has been committed by this hand; everything seems red beneath it!' My friend says the doctor staggered back as if he had been shot, on hearing this, 11 turned pale as death, and swooned on the floor; and atter he recovered, acknowledged that he had committed murder and fled from the consequences; the name by which he was now known was an assumed one, and he implored his host not to expose him to the penalty of the gallows by revealing these terrible facts.

- "My friend, of course, did everything he could to relieve him on that point, and assured him that he would never breathe the fact where it could injure him; that the purity of his life for so many years had cancelled the enormity of the crime, so far as society was concerned.
"But in spite of all this, the wretched and guilty man left the house in overwhelming despair, and the last I have heard of him was that he had locked himself in his own house, and was killing himself with the most unheard-of excesses in drinking brandy, to which vice he never before had been addicted.
"When I realised the tragic results of this fearful insight, with which I seem to have been mysteriously endowed, my very soul was shaken with sorrow; and since that time my spirit has wrestled in agonies of prayer with God, that this poor chill of crime and headlong vices might be "saved!""

As the woman uttered these last words, Manton recognised, for the first time, and with a shudder, a peculiar obliquity of the left eye. His soul was chilled within him; and for the moment, the light of the glowing room was darkened as if the shadow of drear winter had passed over and through it.

Doctor Weasel exclaimed gaily, "Is not that extraordinary? I assure you, I have myself witnessed things in connection with this power of hers, quite as inexplicable, though happily not so tragic."
"It sounds strangely enough," said Manton, shortly.
"I assure you I have no means of accounting for these things," said the woman in a meek, deprecatory tone.
"Suppose you demonstrate it, madam, in my case;" and a slight sneer, which crossed the face of Manton, whose manuer had entirely changed, did not escape the hawk-like quickness of the woman's eye. "My life, I am willing to submit to the scrutiny of your inscrutable sense."
"Oh, by all" means!" exclaimed Doctor Weasel, springing to his feet in a paroxysm of delight. "Let us have the experiment, by all means! Do please place your hand on the top of her head!"

Manton turned, and with a bow most studiously deferential, seemed to ask of the lady her permission to do so.
"Oh, yes, yes," and her head was bowed forward to meet his upraised hand; while the daughter, who seemed to understand the thing, either from previous experience, or from some private signal, rose from her clinging position about his knee, and stepped back, leaving the two alone, without other contact.

In a few moments after the hand of Manton had rested upon the meel, submissive head of the woman before him, she commenced exhibiting the common and preliminary attitudes, muscular retchings of the throat, nervous twitchings of the lips and limbs, accompanied by the apparently palpable, organic changes, which are recognised to be symptomatic with wellknown conditions of the mesmeric sleep.

Manton watched all these phenomena with the sharpest attention, and then, as the lips began to move as if in inarticulate enunciation, be leant forward over her, and asked - "What can you tell us of the soul, with which you are now in communication?"

After several preluding and spasmodic efforts to articulate sounds, the Clairvoyant at length said, in a voice only distinct above a whisper -
"I see light! all light!-pure, holy light. It fills the universe with a mild radiance! I can see no blurs, no clouds in the foreground. I can see only angels, seraphs, and seraphim, and all forms of light revolving in the sphere of this mighty soul !"
"Is there no evil there ?" said Manton.
"No, I see none; I see only white light."
${ }^{66}$ But look close - perhaps you might find something dark. Look long and steadily into the world you visit-see if there be not clouds there."

There was a pause. The lips moved without articulation again; and again Manton asked -"What do you see now?"
"I see, I see, the light is parting on either side; out in the far distance, between those walls of light, a giant form uprears itself in shadow. Down the long vista stands this darkened giant. He is fierce and stern, and wears a cold, hard front, with flaming eyes, that scare the ministering angels all away. He strikes around him with the imperious sway of his huge, knotted club, and all the bright forms flee. He seems the savage Hercules of pride !"

There is a pause; and after a stillness of some moments, Manton asked again -
"What now is the vision, to your sense?-is the giant gone?"
"No, he is humbled but not subdued; and from afar behind him, down this darkened vista, a light has grown up, like a rising star. It adrances slowly, rising over his head. The splendor increases as it comes. Now, the dark and wrathrul giant has fallen on his knees - the flood of glory overcomes him. His club is dropped. His eyes, upturned in awe, seem dimmed by the sudden glory of an angel's presence. Ha! I see! the features of that angel are like his whose soul I see! The giant is subdued! His pride has bowed its forehead in the dust, before the angel radiance of a visiting mother!"

Manton felt his flesh creep as this was spoken, and as the Clairvoyant paused for some moments, he asked: "What does this spirit of the mother say?"

The slow answer was -
"She seems to rebuke this pride even more with her effulgence, and to say, My son, I am with thee in the spirit, but I cannot be with thee through the medium of the flesh which thou hast so poisoned and corrupted, since I passed from thee into this higher sphere. Make thy body clean and purify thy life,

云

前

sw=T

T-cы" " Entorin :

C13*

"Ta":

not $0^{*}=0$
I mis

CHAPTER XIV.

THE PRODD MA HOWED.

Dim burns the once bright star of Avenel: There is ninfluence sorrowful and fearful, Thet dogs its downward course.
§cotr.
Transparmat as is the meaning of the foregoing scene, it conveyed to Manton, who knew none of these things which have been revealed to the reader, a tremendous shock. Mind and soul were thrown into chaotic convulsions; he knew not what to think, or which way to turn for truth.

Had the incident occurred but a short time previous, before his nature had begun to be moved by generous sympathy and honest respect for this loyal, persecuted, and indomitable woman; had it occurred before that eventful walk through the slush of New York, he would bave at once turned upon her in freezing wrath, with the deliberate accusation of having entered his room in his absence, and searched his private papers, or else have merely sneered at it, as the accidental hit of a reckless adventuress.

But he had admitted her to his respect as a noble and unprotected devotee. In a word, he had, as was usual with him wherever women were concerned, idealised her into a heroine. Could he suspect her after this? He rejected the weakness of such suspicion almost with terror.

Had he known any thing of New York life; had he formed any relations except those of a strictly business character; had he cultivated acquaintances at all, who belonged to the city, and knew it, a few inquiries might have settled all his doubts. But,

```
cez* =>**
```

```
#-mon =-m
```

of his hand with the thin and sensitive region on the top of her head.

She might thus have been made to feel him intellectually, if. not spiritually; to see, through this sympathetic sense, those images with which his brain was most full, and thus express this startling outline of his life.

Be those things as they may, he was restless and excited; his imagination was aroused, his memory profoundly stirred. He was thus fast hurried past the point where a cool analysis could well avail to rescue him. Tossed to and fro by doubts and dark suspicions, which a generous confidence strove hard to banish with its magnanimous suggestions, backed by self-reliant pride; confounded with the fear of acting with injustice towards a belpless female; with the fear, too, of the soft pluckings at his heart, from those tender memories which she had thus aroused by her offers of maternal sympathy - together with the penetrating light and warmth of that genial and unlucky evening spent with her, amidst the quiet of domestic surroundings-he could form no conclusions, discriminate no clearly definite purpose-could only wander to and fro, restless, in troubled, sad irresolution.

A vague dread of evil in advance afforded apprehension of he knew not what, that always, when the gloaming darkened most, seemed parted to a tremulous, dim light, like summer coming through the mom, and made his pulse go quicker, while those yearning memories faintly glimmered, as if within a shaded reflex of the glowing day.

He kept himself strictly secluded; yet, day by day, those dainty missives crept in upon him by some mysterious agency. At first they were read mechanically, and, amidst his troubled doubts, produced no apparent effect; but, by and by, they grew more chaste, more delicately worded, and more sweetly toned.

Was it that they were really advanced upon the blundering specimens we have seen? or could it be that his fancy had become excited with regard to them-that he was merely idealising unconsciously? or was it that those awkward first attempte at producing imitations of the rhapsodical style peculiar to hirnself, which had so excited his contempt, as obviously taken from the study of his writings, had now been cunningly improved upon, since personal intercourse had afforded his correspondent a closer insight of his purer and more simple forms of expresm sion?

Had his haughty egotism been touched at last, by a skilful reflex of himself, thrown shrewdly into his eyes, from the dazzling surface of this snowy crow-quilled page?

We shall see, perhaps. Here is the last that he received from her:-
${ }^{6}$ My poom Friend-My heart yearns over you; I am oppressed with your suffering, for I feel how you suffer yet - how you are struggling, by day and by night, with those twin fends of Doubt and Pride. I know my letters soothe you, though they cannot heal. Had you not informed me so, in your note, I should yet have been conscious of it. Had you never written to me again, I should yet have known that the great deep of your soul had been stirred at last, and that, though pride had triumphed in the struggle, love, genial, human love, had yet found, beneath the dark shadow of his wing, a warm restingplace once more beside thy heart.

No human aid can save thee now-that stiff neck must be bowed-you must be bumbled! Then willcome the full influx of the light from heaven. Then you will know joy and peace again-the pure raptures of a holy rest will calm this dark, bewildering struggle. I pray for you without ceasing-weary the throne with supplication that you may be humbled! Your little sister sends you her tearful greetings-she weeps for you with me always-for she dearly loves her tiger-brother. She says that, like all terrible creatures, he is so beautiful-oh, that he were ouly good! Marie."

This letter strangely thrilled upon the already over-wrought sensibilities of Manton, whose nervous organisation had been rendered intensely susceptible by the protracted exeitement under which he had been laboring. He read it over and over again, with increasing agitation, until it seemed, while his eyes suffused, as if the accusing angel of his own conscience spoke to him in mild rebuke.

Long be moaned and tossed-the dim moisture struggling all the while to brim over those parched lids, that for years before had never known a freshening. Those tearless lids-how rigid they had been! how bleak! Like some oasis fountain where the hot simoon had drank!-Dry! dry!

Suddenly, with a deep groan, the young man bowed his head upon his hands, while the tears gushed between his fingers in a flood, that seemed the more violent from its long restraint. His body shook and rocked, while he gasped aloud-
"It is true! It is true! This woman tells what is true! This sullen pride has been the cause of all- 1 feel its crushing judgment on my shoulders now! Great God! deliver us from this thraldom! Let me but know my race once more! let me but weep when others weep, and smile when others smile, and it will be to me for a sign that thou hast received the outcast into the family of thy love, once more! Forgive, oh, forgive me, that have so long beld thy goodly gitts of earthly consolation in despite! The worm's presumptuous arrogance has but moved thy pity, oh, thou Infinite One! Forgive! forgive! oh, let me feel that countenance reconciled once more! Give back to my weary soul the holy communion of thy creatures! Pity! Pity! Pity! Ah, there is a paradise somewhere on the earth, for the most wayworn of her darkened children-a rift in the sunless sky, a glitering point above the darkened waters! Men are not all and totally accursed by their defiant passions. Pity sends starbeams through the port-holes of the dungeon. Mercy comes down on holy light of visions, where stars cannot get in. Oh, love, Infinite Love! Thou art so powerful of penetration- come to me now!"

For a long time he sat thus, while his frame shivered in voiceless throes; when suddenly straightening himself, with a powerful effort，and while the tears yet rained like an April shower，he drew towards him his paper，and wrote－

Woman－I know not what to call you－you have sorangely moved me！In my most desperate and sullen pride has in $n$ ， struggled long with this great blessing，which thro hast bereneght me！I would have driven the good angel from tro in wrath and scom－but it would not be offended．In patianet atd lomeg $^{2}$ suffering it has abided near，hovering on white wings，until n，w， at last，the fountain has been troubled．Ah！wersan，its，ifophos have been broken up，indeed－and the dark，leng，nhatural winter of my life，has felt the glowing breath of spring ；and in one mighty crash，the hideous ice－crusts that had gatheren， heaping over it，have burst away before the flashing f tiap of un－ chained waters．Once more my soul is frot－rince mofill smile back love for love into the sunlight，and werp for jory－ that God is good．Once more Ifeel as if the earth were a hely earth，and its flowers，too，might grow for me．Throu hast con－ quered！Thou hast conquered，woman！Thy pure and chas－ tened sympathies，thy gentle and unwearied ploadings，thy meck compassion for the harsh and wayward boy，have conquered． The stiff neck is bowed even now before God，and thee，his minister of good．Ah！forgire and pity me！My eyes are raining so，I can scarcely see to write．I am shaken as in a great tempest，body and soul．I could weep at your feet in penitence，and pray to be forgiven and for pity！Ah，that，I know you have！I am blinded with these tears－I know not what I say！Oh，be to me what I have lost！I faint by the wayside；my soul dies within me for that holy rest that I have lost－for the sweet，calm and tender peace，all the holy memories your loving gentleness has thus recalled． Ah ，be to me all that you bave thus filled me with，anew！Receive me as your adopted child，that I may rest my throbbing head once more in peace and joy，upon a sacred bosom．Be to me，forever， ＂Marie，mother！＂

Manton．

CHAPTER XV.

Now, with 2 bitter mmilo, whose light did shine Live fiend'e hope upon her lipa and eyne.

SnHLens
Turn we now to that large and mysterious house, to which we have before referred, near the corner of Broadway and Eighth Street. We will pass the greasy lintels, into the wide and dirty entry, climb those five flights of stairs, turn down the long, dark passage, and pause before a door, just one beyond that which we have had occasion to remember in the course of this narrative.

We will take the liberty to enter. The scene presents the woman, Marie, reclining on a lounge, holding a note in her hand, which she seems to have read and re-read with a peculiar look of puzzled inquiry.

The impish-looking daughter, to whom we have before re ferred, was seated in a chair, behind the woman's head, and out of her sight. The creature seemed to have much ado to leep from laughing outright, for her face was screwed into all sorts of contortions in the effort to subdue it, as she peeped over her mother's shoulder, and watched her puzzled looks and bewildered gestures.
"Well!" said the mother, as if speaking to herself; "if one could only comprehend how he came to write this to me-it seems to contain a great deal. Upon my word, it appears a beautiful snatch of rhyme, and to convey quite a confessiononly I don't understand - it reads as if it were an answer to something that had gone before." She reads -

> Angels a subtler name may know, Buit not a sablere theugh of joy Could thrilling through a aeraph go, Than that your presence broughtito cloy And weigh my life down into calm, With an unutterable senseLike masio perfumed with the balm Of dewe star-shed - all too intense!
" Most too high-strung for my purposes, it must be confessed! He never expresses any flesh and blood in his correspondence. Ah, well, I'll soon bring him out of that! But this really does puzzle me! This is all the note contains." She turns the note to examine it. "It is certainly in his hand, yet he makes no explanation."

Here the child, whose blood seemed ready to burst through her face in the continued effort to restrain her laughter, tittered aloud. The mother sprang erect, and, turning upon her with an expression of rage and surprise upon her face -
"What! Why, what are you laughing about? What business is this of yours, pray?"

The child, although evidently a little frightened, had so entirely lost her selfcontrol as to be unable to restrain the bursts of laughter which now followed each other, peal upon peal, as she danced about the room in a perfect ecstacy of glee.

The mother's face turned first pale and then red, as she followed the motions of the child with her eye, until at last, with the expression of an infuriate tigress, she sprang to seize her. The child was too quick for her, and with the agility of a monkey, darted from beneath her grasp; and still shrieking with laughter, was pursued around the roorn - leaping the furniture with an airiness that defied pursuit - which her strange, wild laugh yet taunted.

The woman, after exhausting herself in vain attempts at catching her, sank upon the lounge-and at once, in a whining, fretful voice, commenced to pour upon the head of the child, the most inconceivable and galling epithets. So long as this tone was held, the child held out in defiant spinit, either of sulking obstinacy, or of harsh and irritating laughter, and to every reiterated question from the angry mother-" What are you laughing at? What do you mean?" - she only clapped ber hands and danced more wildly to her elfin mirth.

The mother now changed her tone of a sudden, in seeming hopelessness of carrying her point by storm. She began to sob violently, and turning with streaming eyes towards the child -
"You - you tre-treat your poor mother very cruelly to-day; I am dying to know what it is you mean; but you will not tell me! Please, dear, come and tell poor mother why you laugh, what it is you mean, and what you know about this letter? for I am sure you know something - do tell poor mother, and she will forgive you all! Come, dear child!" and she reached out her hand as if to clasp her to her bosom.

The child, who seemed to have no intellectual comprehension of the meaning of all this, but to have taken a purely impish delight in watching the confusion and puzzle of her mother, in regard to the letter at first, and then instantly, when she flew into a rage, to have answered in a monkeyish and hysterical rage, on her own part; now at once, with equal promptness, and with the common instinct of young animals, responded to the tender inflections of the maternal voice.

Dropping her whole previous manner, she instantly sprang forward and knelt at her mother's side. The mother did not speak for some moments, but silently caressed her, placing her hand frequently on her head, the top of which she fondly stroked with a tenderness that seemed to linger there. She drew the child's face to hers too; and although she seemed to kiss it frequently, it might have been observed that she breathed deep and heavy exhalations upon different portions of it, which she only touched with her lips.

The effect was magical beyond any power of expression. The hard, ugly, animal lines of that child's face, which had been writhed and curled but a few' moments before, in every conceivable expression of most ignoble passions, at once subsided into the meek and suppliant confiding of that inexplicable and most tender of all the relations known to the animal world, mother and child!
"Dear, why did you not tell me what you knew about this letter before ?" said the mother, in a tone as musically reproachful as if she dallied with her suckling babe. The child buried her head in her mother's bosom, and after a silence of some time, during which her mother industriously stroked the top of her head, she looked up, and in a sly, bashful tone exclaimed-
"I did it just for fun, to try how writing love-letters wentI copied the verses from a book, in your hand, and sent them to him as yours!"

Scarcely were these words uttered, than the languishing and tender-seeming mother hurled the child from her, backwards, upon the floor, with a violence that left her stunned and prostrate, and springing to her feet, raged round and round the room, as only a feminine demon infuriate could be imagined to do, spurning now and then with her foot, as she passed, the still senseless form of her own child!

Hell might find an equal to this whole scene, but hell has always been too civil! It is enough! This is jealousy! That woman is jealous of her own child! and she only thirteen years old!

How long she might have raged and raved, and to what consequences it might have led, heaven can only judge. Providentially, perhaps, a knock at her door announced the postman. She clutched the letter she received convulsively, and tearing it open, the instant he closed the door, read - what? The letter of Manton, which we saw in the last chapter!

She read it through, standing where she had received it-her eyes dilating, and her whole form changing. She literally screamed with joy as she finished the letter, and clapped her hands like one bewildered with a sudden triumph.
"Ah, ha! I have him! I have him! He is mine henceforth! He cannot escape me now!" and her oblique eyes fell upon the motionless child upon the floor. "The little fool!she catches my arts too soon-she is not hurt-but I must help her." She moved towards the child, but the demoniac triumph which possessed ber seemed irrepressible. She bounded suddenly into the air, and almost shrieking aloud as she did so - "I have conquered - I have conquered him at last!" came down like a statuesque Apollyon transfixed in exultation. It was a horrible glimpse of unnatural triumph! It lasted but for a moment; for, with a sudden drooping of the usually stooped shoulders, as she turned towards the letter again, she said, thoughtfully,
"This will not do-he perseveres even here in talking about mother! mother! and chaste! and holy! and all that sort of thing. The foolish boy is too much in eacnest. I have used this stuff about long enough. I must find the means of bringing him gradually around. Such a relation as the silly fellow desires wont do between us-we are both too full of life! Oh, Ill write him a note at once that will prepare the way - will break up the ice, as he calls it, still more about his life!"

She raised the child, which had been stunned by the fall, and sprinkling some water upon her face, which caused the first long breathing of recovery, she laid her upon the lounge, muttering, as she did so, "The meddlesome little fool! She must do everything she sees me do! She must imagine herself in love with every one whom she sees me pretend to love. She must write love-letters when she sees me write them, and heaven only knows what she wont do next with her monkeyish imitation! But I can't be crossed by a child so, if she is my own. Lie there until you get over the sulks - you are not much hurt!"

She turned away from the child and seated herself at the table, exclaiming, as she seized her pen, "Ah! this letter! I feel that I shall need all my skill and wit to word this properly, so as not to alarm him. In his present excited and hysterical mood, the werient trifte would have the effect of driving him off, at angent, forever leyond my reach. And yet it will not do to let thingg geo on in thim way; forl mee that that indea of the sandherly relation, if once permitted to become methed in him mind now, will seraain a fixed barrier, which I whall never be able: wo grame on tarth. I must mee himn teonight, and take: adm vantage of his prement over-wrought, ecotatic, and bewildered condition, to break down thi boyinh drean of him! Bah! to thinh that he whuld have taketr rae to be wo much in earnewt in all Uat first twatle about moutherly relationa, which If found noceso mary to use in otder to get at him at all! Dity my correwponddrete buann't warmed him up a little by this time! I've tried hard rorough, bo be kure, but the quecer follow will permist in etherealising everylbing!"

During thin molileguy, the child, who had entirely reeovereed, lay perfertly mill, with hharperoed aftention, catching every word that was npooken. There was ann eagernow inf her age at leant a very atterative ones 'The woman wrote:-
" "Bur fiather whore art in Hecaum, ballowed be thy name! thy lingegon econat, thy will be done on cearth ats it in in Hferaten!' Aly mul in dectjly moved for thee in thim thy time of trial. The greod Good chandench these now-now in the bour of thy groat tribulation tonut; now thy lifeolenomen wrentle in there, with the love; the grow the finther has sent to perlecera thefe. Dhe wromes! Ah, be mronig everis now, thous c:hild of many morrowz, and then ohall yot find gracu and juace in acerptane with Ilin. Mearwhile: I cean but pray for the and with there, I weary lleavers with mupplications, that atot of thim travail a gruat and ghoriono wol may be born in the bunility of lowe, for light, erternat light.
"Comme to the this weving, hat I may take that ilrobbing give you remb-rem conce only from the fither! You ank no to be for you, forever, 'Marie, mother!' I can be to you, forever, your friend Marie."
"Ah! ha! that will do it!" she said in a low chuckling tone, as she rapidly folded and directed the letter; "though he might take the alarm at this if he were cool, yet there's no danger now! It will no doubt shock him a little, but he has learned to believe in me, and in his present excited state he has deified me almost into an object of worship; and any suspicion he might feel he would only blame himself for. Ah! this will do! it shall go instantly! Here!" she said, turning sharply to the child, "Here! get up there, put on your bonnet, and take this letter! You know how to deliver it, and where! Come, up with you!"
"But, mother," said the child, as she slowly lifted berself half-erect, "I don't feel like it-I'm not well! You hurt me!"
"Nonsense !" said the mother, harshly ; "go take a bath, and do it quickly too! You'll feel well enough! This letter must go, and shall go! Get along, I say, and do what I tell you!"

The child dragged herself slowly out of the room.
"That little wretch will torment me to death!"
The letter was despatched and reached its destination.
Manton, whose excitement had continued, without the slightest diminution, to return upon him, in paroxysm after paroxysm, seized upon this last letter with the famishing eagerness of a man who looks for strength-for spiritual consoling. He read it with suffused and swollen eyes; he scarcely saw what he read, so much had his vision been dizzied and obscured by weeping. But those last words did indeed shock and thrill him. He was strangely startled, and for a moment they seemed to open to him an appalling and terrific gulf of falsehood, more hideous than yawning hell.

We say, it was but for a moment; but in that little space the blackness of darkness overcame his soul. A shuddering of dread, of doubt, of fear, and all that horrid brood, the birth of payle and unutterable gloom, paswed over him convulaively, and then the whole wam gene. He had been too intensely wrought supen by the ecomacief of Failh. He whook off, by owe great threre, the giant shadow of its natural enerny, this loubt, which bue now conveiven! had mo loug made him hfe accursed; and the rebround, by a necesmary law, carried hirn to a yet greater and garre unreawning exfreme of trumb, and unguentioning confidence in thim woman, under fiod the instrument and mediutn fop rentering him once more to life and the worls.

Her at once determined wo visit ber, and prove to his own monl the falewhored of thered dark wnspiciong of the being who hate Thas moved and moken hin inname life for grod.

GHAPTERHXVI.

Tue sevening was cloging in when Manton ruble bis way hirough a heravy, drifing mow-atorn, to the number of the wew whiferse, war the cermer of browlway and Biehth sircet, which poly made aware, thereliy, that ahe bath changed herp rexidence freme the termen where he had visited hes in hond Strect, and had Thoreght aro turere about the matcer ; for it would have somewhat dighan, fob have lewta told that the woman he was visitiog, with grown to the purperef and business in hand.
 sificant appearance of the confy, ferther than to seel ite trearim mos, an he rang the boll amd wainod an untetamable litue for admismion. The dore was wide "hough opors lo bo murn, but be whan not mufficiently initiated into the myytery of much glacem to understand the meaning of this exactly, even if it had been possible for it to have excited his attention, in the then absorbed and abstracted condition of his whole faculties.

A negro servant at length made his appearance, and approaching him closely, answered his inquiries in a tone so insolently confidential that under other circumstances he would surely have been in danger of a flooring at the hands of Manton, who, however, only passed on up the stairs with a feeling of annoyance, the cause of which he made no attempt at apprehending. He ascended three steps at a bound, and in a moment tapped lightly at the door.

A sof woice, "Come!" was the response. The door flew open.
"Yes! yes! I come! Ah, Marie, mother, it must be so!" And dropping his cloak and hat upon the floor, he sprang forward to the woman, who, with her pale face beaming with unnatural light, was seated upon a lounge, where she seemed to have been awaiting him.
"My poor friend!" and she stretched forth her arms towards him. He laid his head upon her bosom, while his whole frame shivered violently, and he sobbed forth -
"Ah, blessed mother, let me rest here! My brain is bursting! I am become as a little child again! Ah, I am so weak! A wisp of straw would bind me! My own vaunted strength is gone-all gone! I have no pride, no scorn, no defiance now! My lips are in the dust! Ah, I am humble, humble, humble, now! Do thou, incarnation of that angel mother who has passed from earth, adopt me for thine own! Thine own, poor, lost, bewildered, panting child!"
"My poor friend, be calm!" and she caressed his wet cheek lightly with her fingers. "Only be calm, and God will give you strength to pass through this valley and shadow of trial."
"God gave me strength!" said he, with a sharp and sudden change of tone, raising his head slightly to look in her face. ${ }^{66}$ Woman, he gave me strengith when he gave me life! I have apoph enough, am men call it, to move the world, aye, to wirld Fate itself. It was not for such wirength 1 come to yon. It wat not for such gtrengh I would ronderernd to plead 6 mortal. If in for that sof and beautiful presence that liveth in inmertal fredneew, the apringeflower of the heart, bracath the moveless gututretehed wing of Faith. Faith in our own kind, Fifll in what in true and chaste in the purposes and charities, which, widely meparate from the finsuonu and the passionate, consitute all the blent amenitiet of intercourse: between the sexps. 'Tis not that 1 would ank you to be aill ruy mothber, for that could not be: lont that you mould impersenate to tne that calm joy, that erenity of repore in which I lived me long, upen a troubled marth, through here it was she fo whom If turne-l when the world hafferd and bafted mef, for rewew upon her bewn my fath in my fellown, and it was upon that sererrel resting-place that alone fonad mothing. She reconciled tne to wholure madness ; #yp, from the strait-waisteont ant the chailn, whorn my brain wan like to burat from throbhing that sommed like a grapple wilh the world and ita huge evile. In my imperent wrath I whold have dashed myself to athons suminst its mevelesh lomifments of wrong, but that a low, swert voice wonld furll and hold me back.

"I wam the child of murh pravail, and yoars of wemry and io wom not like the common love of suother for her chilh. In all thinge concerning me she kumperf to he fillorl with a stranye preserience-she real my innost thought a if it werther own ing in the fleah, ahe wan my pownt anch, retonciling the to life; and when she passed from me and the world, I first realised what darkness, death, and separation meant.

I was delirious I know not how long-for they seemed slowly tearing my heart out by the roots, chord by chord, with a heavy drag; until the last one snapped, and then I went into deep oblivion, from which I awoke a man of stone, so far as sensation went; and if stone could walk, with no more heart than itor rather if you can imagine this walking statue moulded of the red lava, and only cooled upon the surface, you can better conceive the smouldering, heart-devouring chaos in which'my life now moved among my fellows. I did not stop to curse and battle with my old foes, I only hated them with a liquid flame of scorn that found its level in me and was still. I would not harm them-no, not I-I wanted them to live for companionship in suffering. I gloried in their perversions-they filled me with ecstasy. I could not but add to them, and in ferocious delight threw myself into all the excesses and extremes that demonise the world.
"But ambition came to rescue my dignity at last, and of its iron despotism you have seen the worst. From its hard and meagre thraldom you have released me for the time, but it remains with you to hold me free. The wings that have bome me thus far on this bold upward flight must feel the soft freshening of the breeze and the glad welcoming of sunlight, to the purer realm they try, or flagging soon of the unwonted effort, they will sink again to seek the old accustomed sullen perch. The strength I need now is a subtler thing than any power of will within myself-purer than the breath of angels, it is chaste and mild as star-beams.
"It is you who have filled me with these yearnings-'tis to you that I look for their realisation, and yet you have not accepted that pure and holy relation conveyed in the "Marie, mother,' I have named yon, and plead with you to recognise."

During all this time the face of the woman had been bowed so close to that of Manton that she seemed almost to touch with Her lipm, fint hin teraplem and then him check. A clowe olowerver would huve perceived, in her long and drexp inupirations, her mightly pyortend lipe and the mow sxeeping novernemt of the head, that the wat meadily breathing uphen certain well-bnown and mighly menuitive nurvew. The brain of Munton waw too full to motice thit wtrange manusurre; but while be tulked, that hoo breath had been mending wof thrilling through him frame, which, mit frat unoburved, had gradually grown more palpubly delim einum, until, we cemed in mpala, he found hit whole frame literally quivering with pamion.

He wailent for anoment, that he might fully realine the menotion, and then, with a mudder of horror, mprang away from contmet with the wowan, exchairnimg-in an enyremion of ruge and corocity which wan aboolutaly hidroum, mine cye glanced coldly on hero.

"I mak you, wornan, wam it mont infersul ant of yourm? Anower men!-for, by the biernal corod, you whall mever thum tamper with the wacredsenmem of a true man'w heart agais !"
 hiw blind rage, he would rend her wo atome.

The woman had taken lut one glimpene of the terrible face before her, and then monok bowed and aronching intos the mpemerdic rethinge of the throat connmenced, and whern Mantors palling current from tur tnouth, budabbling him fivgerw and her elocthings.

 me he harik buck with upraiswof basudm..
${ }^{6}$ My facd! I bave killed! 1 linve killed ber by any brutal violence! I wa mecurwed! | an werumed for over! I huve slain the white dove of peace they sent to me from Heaven!" Snatching a towel, he was on his knees by her side in an instant; and placing it within her bloody hands, which were clutched upon her mouth, as if to stay the fatal tide, be burst into an agony of tears, praying in frantic accents to be forgiven; for he could see nothing but immediate death in a hemorrhage so violent as this seemed, and he remembered now, but too vividly, how often she had told him of her melancholy predisposition to such attacks from the lungs, by which she was kept constantly in expectation of being carried off.

Ah , with what fierce remorse, what agonised penitence, all these things came up to him now, as gush after gush of crimson saturated the towel! In answer to his prayers for forgiveness, she at last reached one cold, bloody hand to his, pressing it gently.

And now his self-possession was immediately restored. His only thought, at first, had been forgiveness before she died; now he thought alone how to save her. Strange, he did not once think of giving the allarm, and sending for medical aid; for he instantly felt the case was one beyond the reach of ordinary remedies, and one in which the most perfect restoration of both the moral and physical natures to absolute repose could alone avail.

He reached another towel from the toilet-table, on which he found, by the way, abundant supply, which, innocently enough, seemed to him remarkably apropos; then, seating himself by her side, he endeavored, by the use of all tender epithets which could be applied, to soothe and calm her. She suddenly seized his right hand and placed it upon the top of her head, and from that moment he thought he could faintly perceive an increase of his control over the more violent symptoms of the case.

More than half an hour of harrowing suspense had passed, before the paroxysm of bleeding had so far subsided as to enable him to breathe more freely; but even when the bleeding had at length entirely ceased, a long period of coma, or death-like sleep, whaterer migh: wecm.

 low tone, "The groef 9 : boy now, always!"

 ment his bead fow :

 of the slequer. S:w; , inspirations. $1 \%$
the slight parivit of on :
furnace of her breath play along the helpless surface of those prostrate nerves; but you might have seen an eager, oblique glitter in her eye, that grew the stronger while the darkness thickened, as ghouls look sharper out of graves they have uncovered. But then, had you been patient, you would have seen, as the hours went by, a gradual twitching of the nerves possess that deathlike frame-a restless motion, a moan, an allunconscious smile of ecstatic delight; and then, if your sense was not frightened and appalled by the fierce, swift blaze from those still eyes above, a fiend's triumph would be all familiar to you.

Alas! alas! will that young man wake sane? The owner of those glittering eyes seems to know; for hark! in her exceeding joy she whispers aloud, "He is mine now! See how his nerves vibrate. I was right in choosing this time of great prostration. I am scudding along those nerves like a sea-bird on currents of the sea; all that is animal in him is mine now. He is mine at last-the insolent tyro! I shall drag him down from his vauilting self-esteem; I shall humble him; I shall degrade him. Ah, ha! I shall feed upon him!"

There may be retribution on earth or in heaven. We will let that dark night's history rest!

MTZ

```
##..
```

IT wrinion int vast if wวu．： aent of six．w＝．．．．－－－ ime of mais．：－－．．－ re fexsiot
Tue efire

rouㄹ k＂

tear $-\ldots=-$－ is stas 三－．． rere： laves ：n ．＊．．．＊．．．． atris ․：．：．．．．n＊
THe ○号…

！＝．－－
ジニ＝．．．－ ＂ジ：$:$－－
\％：－

$\cdots \div$
と．．ま：
$\div$ ： $\therefore$ i45
裡
it was sultry, slow and self-consuming - shranik from observation, and burned inward.

He neither sought nor found any palliation for himself. He blamed no one else; his pride would not permit him to confess to himself that he had been unduly influenced, or that any unfair advantage had or could have been taken of him. No, it was his own fall. His own grossness had profaned those associations which he had stupidly deluded himself, for years, into supposing to be really sacred things in his life. He had rendered himself, thereby, unfit for Heaven, unworthy Earth, too base for even Hell.

His first sullen recourse was to the wine-cup, that he might numb the unendurable agonies. He drank to monstrous excess; but, no, it would not do; that cold burning, as of an ice-bolt through his heart and brain, lay there still, in the two centres. He sought and found men like himself, with great thoughts and stricken hearts; hike himself, brain-workers; and in the fiercest orgies of desperation, hours and hours were spent without attaining to one moment of the coveted oblivion.

The evening had long set in among such scenes, when a note was suddenly thrust into his hand from behind, and as he turned his head, he saw a boy hastily making his way through the thronged room. This movement had not been observed by his noisy companions - be hastily concealed the note.

He had recognised the superscription with a feeling of deathly sickness, for which he could not clearly account. It was as if the fresh wounds were all to be torn open again.

He soon after found an opportunity to withdraw beyond observation, and opened the note, which contained only these words: -

Mī Friend:-why have you left me all day? come to me-I am dying.

Marie.
The sheet was bespattered with blood. Manton neanly fainted. Recovering himself in a moment, he muttered, "Jom fernal brute that I am! to have neglected the poor, frail creature thus-after last night, too! May God forgive me, for I shall never forgive myself!" He hurried from the room.

The scene, on reaching her apartment, was, as may by this time be expected, ghastly enough. But as we have seen a little more of these horrid bleeding scenes than Manton has, we will refrain from another description of one, since we have found that they only differed in the intensity of effect and degree in the precise ratio of the results to be attained. In this instance she had not reckoned without her host.

Manton, who never dreamed of suspecting her, and had been fully impressed with the belief that these attacks were fearfully dangerous, and that the magnetism of his touch, whether imaginary or otherwise, could alone suffice to restore her to the calmness necessary for the arrest of the hemorrhage, felt as if an awful responsibility had been suddenly devolved upon him, as he thus apparently held the very life of this singular woman in his own hands.

This impression had been consummately fixed upon the mind of Manton by her obstinate refusal to permit the presence, at their interviews, of any third person, not even that of her own child. She could thus, through his generous humanity, most effectually draw him to her side; and, when once in her reach, he was again in the power of those fearful arts, of which we have seen something.

The life of Manton became now a succession of the "tomorrows ${ }^{33}$ of remorse. Each new sun arose upon its succeeding scene of wilful, self-degrading excess, such as we have witnessed. He never permitted himself to grow fully sober, but drank incessantly -morning, noon and night. But that the wines he chose were comparatively light, and less rapidly fatal than the heavier and more dangerous drinks of our country, he must have, undoubtedly, destroyed his life, as he did his business repatation.

He still wrote brilliantly-nay, even with a fierce and poetic dazzle of style that surprised men greatly, and added much to the notoriety, if not to the solidity of his reputation. But everything went wrong with him. His purse was regularly drained by a remorseless hand; his wardrobe fell into neglect, and the marks of excess upon his fine, proud features, were at once rendered conspicuous by their association with almost seedy habiliments.

Before one year had passed he had begun to exhibit himself before men, in the pitiable light of one who had more pride left than self-respect. In a word, he had fallen fully into the toils of the hellish Jezabel.

Remember, in judging of poor Manton, that while he is hoodwinked, through mach that is most noble in him, we see this woman through the strong light of day. He looks upon her as a devotee of science, in the boly cause of human progress and social amelioration. A poet and enthusiast, his life is dedicate to both. He regards her as a frail being, whose life hangs by a thread, and that thread held in his own hand-degraded into a false relation to himself-a relation which he loathes, to be sure, and which he feels to be heavily and swiftly dragging him downward, every instant, while it lasts, but which he dare not utterly break, for the fear that that frail thread of life, of which he bas so strangely become the holder, should be snapped. He has only seen her, through her representations of herself; and therefore, all that is chivalrous and tender in him has been aroused in her defence, as the white roe, hunted into his strong protection for defence against the demon hounds of New England bigotry, jealousy, and fear. Apart from all other considerations, these were sufficient to compel an utter negation of self, in all that related to her, as well as a hasty dismissal of those suspicions that might thrust themselves upon him.

A house, in the meantime, had been taken for her in Tenth Street, for the rent of which Manton and the benevolent Doctor Weasel were to become jointly responsible. But the woman

What too atute to permit any much entanguenentim might lead, prompectively, to mutual explanations between her victimg. The Doctor alone ultimately became her endormer for the rent. She had other denignm upon the lems plethoric purme of Manton.

In entering upon thim arrangement, Manion had been induced to believe, by her own reprementation, that for ten yearn before the name of Preismitg had been heard of on thil continent, thim woman had been practiwing water-cure among her women patiente. Manton had been muficiently educated in the profemsion, to undenutand that it general pretenmion were enomitally empirical. He wa too much an Indian, indeed, and had lived too much mong Indiane, to regard anything beyond the mimpleat mard agentim enficienty curative. He therefore recognized what Preidnitz had ditcovered, mimply confirmatory of him experience of the ungeu of wavage life, and him own obmervation - far ait went. It contained not to him my more than any other pathy, the emential vir medicatrix of nature; but it meemed good to him, becuuee it was new to the popular mente, and wam well worthy to be urged upon ite recognition, and thum to find ft proper place among the other mymtem.

He entered upon the project with the fulletr enthumam, for this woman weetned to him, from her perwonal habitm and untifo ing energy, to be mpecially wet apart to preach the crusade of phywical clemaninutu to her wex. 'Ithe house wat therefore occupied by her an proprietrew and female physician, while Munton, Doctor Weemel, the fiery Jeannette, and vietimiwed Edmond, of - Iormer wene, occupied reapective chamber a boarderw, and patron of the new enterprite.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A DTyEnsion.

Never did moon so ebb, or sems wo wane, But they left Hope-seed to fill up ugain.

But even in the black abysses of the hell down which he had fallen, a flower could grow to the eye of Manton. It was the strange birth of a wizard evil place; yet, as it spread beneath his nourishing eye and hand, it daily grew more beautiful to him. It may have been the unconscious contrast of a something young, living, and blooming in an unnatural sphere like this, where he, with the sudden weight of centuries upon him, breathed with such heavy gasping. He could not tell what it was that thickened this drear air; he only felt the oppression on his lungs, and shuddered when sleep had partly sobered him, and he could realise it for the hour. His sympathies had been first touched for that ugly, impish, persecuted child, to which we have frequently referred, because he saw, at once, that the mother's querulous jealousy was forever subjecting it to a species of covert torture, which kept it always haggard and wretched. Had it been a sick and neglected kitten on the bearth, he would have felt for it the same kind of sympathy. He accordingly noticed and caressed the child, and endeavoured to rouse its low, ignoble frontal region into activity. The response of a hungry and vivid animality, surprised him with its aptitude of apparent intelligence. He did not understand that marvellous faculty of imitation which, in all the animal tribes approximating man, or which, in other words, are born with embryo souls, assumes the external semblances of intelligent expression. The faculty of music is below man, and common both to bird and beast; and

```
#
```

The idea was a strange one, but it suited the intellectual audacity of Manton for that very reason.

It seemed to his darkened hopelessness, that here, through the innocence of childhood, he might renew that broken chain of living light which held him in communion with the upper world, until its blackened, severed links, falling about him, had left his manacled soul in hopeless bondage. He dreamed that if he guarded it with holy zeal, his prayers might rise upon the first odors that went up from this strange young flower to Heaven, and bring its light down too, in forgiveness, to him.

He did not know-for he had fed on poisons until it had become a kind of second nature to him, as to that old Pontiac king -that the pure light of spheres could never reach him through this lurid glare, which he had now come to think the natural day that the odor of no flower could rise through its thickened air to meet the keen, grey stars. The man became bewildered with the gorgeous dream he nourished; and, day by day, without knowing why, he threw himself between the child and the baleful shadow of its mother. He spread his hands above her in blessing; he watched that he might shield her.

From the moment when his attention had been first attracted to her, she seemed to become illuminated; her ungainly body appeared assuming the lines of beauty; her mean, harsh features, softened, as the guarled shrub assumes, in slow unfolding, the graceful mellowed drapery of spring. The coarse, elin locks, grew tamed and smooth; a dark blue, in soft and gradual displacement, entered the sharp, greenish, animal eyes. The low, ape-like forehead, swelled above meekly-curved brows that had lost their hirsute squareness. Indeed, so rapid was the expansion of the frontal region, that it absolutely startied and affrighted the devout experimenter, when he placed his hand upon it, and felt it almost lifted by the wild throbbings beneath. The work was progressing too fast; he feared that the general health of the subject might fail; but how to check and remedy this powerful reaction, so as to control it from fatal results, now so

```
Tー"世: : : "-
```

```
= 品
```

```
大去
```

```
    포 5
```

```
LE"
```

```
Czin"
```

```
        14
```

possessed the actual entity of soul, would have loved him madly - but no, she hated him, as the slave hates the despotic master to whom he hourly cringes for each favor. In a word, she hated him as a man-or in his double capacity of a spiritual being, rather; and, as even her hate was secondary, her appetites towards him were those of the weir-wolf for mankind. She would devour him body and soul, but she meant to feast alone.

Fearing lest the tenderness of his nature might be too strongly moved towards the child, if not diverted in other directions, she at once set her subtle wits to work to furnish her "Tiger," as she called him, with sufficient toys of the same kind to keep him quiet, and avert the chances of his leaning more towards one than another. Some letters were hastily despatched to New England, and the result was the appearance of a fair and gentle child, about the age of ber own.

Elna and the stranger, Moione, sprang into each other's arms when they met, as if their very heart were one. They were fast friends, it seemed, and a thousand times had Elna said how dearly she loved the gentle Moione; and so jealous were the children of their first meeting, that Manton saw little of either for several days. A glance at the broad, serene brow, great, clear eyes, and delicate mouth of the new-comer, filled him with a strange, inexplicable sense of confidence, and even relief; which he could not well explain, to be sure, because it was too undefined to himself. He could only wonder how that white-browed creature came in such a place. It seemed as though it were a promise, answering to his prayer for the ellish Elna, that this calm spirit should have descended in their midst.

The vehement and headstrong petulance of her nature promised to find here a balance that would sober it within the bounds of reason; and strangely, although he saw hope for her, and for his own yet undefined purpose in her development, he saw nothing definitely in the stranger, but a good angel sent to aid him. His soul went out to greet her, but was it yet his heart?

The wex"-

 Wih cne $\dot{j}=\underline{=}$

As
straw =it itutian : - =

HEェ

cf:

M": :

H -

- "

aside and forgoten until this moment. It seems the most wonderful coincidence. I am no believer in miracles, but this appears a marvellous reach of the soul into the future; I was conscious of nothing when I wrote, but the pleasure of embodying in words what seemed to me a beautiful thought; strange, it should have been thus thrown aside and so utterly forgotten, until the increasing coincidences of my present relation have gradually forced me back to find it! What blind instinct, struggling in me, sent me here to look through these old manuscripts, with no definite purpose? What vague struggle of consciousness and memory is this, that has been moving me for weeks to understand why it is those children seem so familiar to me? Strange! strange! strange!"

Manton now proceeded to read this curious manuscript, the contents of which we shall alsoplace before you:-

"THE LEGEND OF THE MOCKING-BIRD.

Friend, do you know the Mocking-Bird? I warrant, if he is a familiar of your childhood, you have a thousand times wondered at the strange malignant intelligence which characterises his tyrannical supremacy over all the feathered singers. Not only is he "accepted king of song," but he is the pest and terror of the groves and meadows. Spiteful and subtle, he conquers in battle, or by manceuvre, all in reach of him; and you may easily detect his favourite haunts, by the incessant din and clatter of wrath and fear he keeps up by his malicious mockery among his neighbors. From my earliest childhood, I can remember having been singularly impressed by the weird and curious humors of this creature. Since those times of innocent wonder, I have been a wide wanderer. The prepossessions of my fancy were irresistibly attracted by the wild legend I give below. It was told me by an old Wako warrior.

On a hill-side, above an ancient village of his tribe, while we were stretched upon the grass beneath a moss-hung live-oalt, he related it. The moon was out, gilding with silver alchemy the shrub-crowned crests of prairie undulations-piled, as we may conceive the waves of the ocean would be-stayed by a word from heaven, while on the leap before a tempest. It was a fitting scene for such a story. Out from the dark gorges on every side ascended the night-song of the mocking-bird. The old man had listened to the rapid gushing symphonies for some time in silence, then drawing a long breath he remarked-"That is an evil bird!" I begged him for an explanation, and he prom ceeded.

Those peculiarities, indeed, of the Indian's phraseologythose broken-pointed expressions, so condensed and meaning, and eked out continually by significant gestures, 1 could hardly hope to convey, were I fully able to remember them. The wild and fanciful methods of the Indian mind, believing what it dwells upon, yet half conscious that it is dreaming, are diffcult to remember or repeat. We can only do the best we may to preserve the idiosyncracies.
"Yahshan, the Sun," said the old chief, pausing reverently as he uttered the name, "in his great wigwam beyond the big waters, made the first Wako! He laid him in his fire-canoe and oared his way up through the thick mists that hung everywhere. When his arm tired of pulling, he took him out and stretched him upon his back on a wide dark bank, and then rowed on his path and lef him. The Wako lay like the sten of an oak, still and cold. Before Yahshan entered his nightlodge in the wet, a dim hazy light had hung over the figure, but this only made it broad couch look blacker-for nouling that had form could be seen. Yalubku, the Moon-the pale bride of Yahtor-came forth when he bad gone in, and rowed her silrer bark through the ugly whadows above the Wake, to wated le apirite teat hated Yahatas dhould do harys to his work, mind it had tuken him many long aget to faish. ILo phantom shapes across the way of Yahshau, and tried to overwhelm her light canoe, but its keen shining prow cut through them all, and left them torn and ragged behind her. At last they fled, for when her eye was on the mute form of the Wako, they feared to do it any harm. When all were gone, and nothing that looked like mischief was to be seen, she too went in. And then they flocked out from the deep places where they had been hid, and gathered with hot fingers and red eyes about the quiet Wako. He did not stir, for his senses had not yet been waked. Quick they pried open his clenched teeth, and poured a green smoking fluid down his throat. Just then the prow of the fire-canoe appeared parting the eastern mists, and they all fled.

 14*
"Yahshan came on. He looked upon his work and smiled -for he did not know that evil had been wrought-and came now in glory, riding on golden billows, scattering the chill mists that clung around the icy form, for it was time to waken it up with life. He rolled the yellow flood upon it, and the figure shivered; again the glowing waves pass over it-the figure was convulsed-tossed its limbs about, and rocked to and fro. Its eyes were open, but it saw not; its ears were open, but it heard not; it was tasteless and dumb; it smelt not, nor did it feel. Life had gone into it, and the heart beat, the pulses throbbed, the blood coursed fast, and it was monstrous strong. But what was this? Being, self-fed and self-consumed, hung upon the void of midnight, hurried and driven from its own still gathering impulse through a chaos of crude matter. That green liquid of the evil one now rushed in burning currents through the veins, and it dashed away, crawling, leaping, tumbling, like a mad torrent, over piled-up rocks across the dark plains, striking against hard, formless things, and rebounding to rush on more swiftly, till it had left the fire-canoe and Yahshan all astounded, far behind, and the terror of darkness was beneath and above it. But what was this to it? On! on! the green fire still burned within, and it must go-chasms and cliffs, with jagged rocks-into them, over them all. What were rough points and bruises, and crashing down steeps, and midnight to it? There was no feeling, yet the heart leaped, the blood careered, the limbs must follow. Motion, blind motion-no control, no guide-but through and over everything, move it must.
" The bad spirits thronged after it, grating and clanging their scaly pinions against each other, and crealing their pleasant gibes, when suddenly there was no footing, and the headlong form pitched down, downward, whirling through the empty gloom, while all the herd of ill things laughed and flapped themselves in the prone wake behind it.
"At once, with a sigh of wings, like a sharp moan of treeharps, a shape of light shot arrowy down amidst them. They scattered, howling with affright. It bore up the falling Wako on strong, shining vans an instant, then stretching them out, subsided slowly, and laid it on a soft, dark couch again. This was Ah - i -wee-o, the soul of harmonies, the good spirit of sweet sounds. She is the great queen of spirit-land. Yahshan and Yahshau are her slaves; and all the lesser fire-canoes that slime in Yahshau's train obey her. She gises all life its outer being; to know and feel beyond itself-without her, life is only motion. There is no form, no law, no existence beside, for she holds and grants them each sense, and in them reveals all these. Yahshan could give life-but not content with this, he was ambitious. The formless chaos his fire-canoe sailed over must be a world of beauty! A soul dwelt in it, but that world was passionless and barren. Yabshan had given life to many shapes ${ }_{3}$ but the cold spirit had scorned them all; and yet she must be wooed to wed herself to life, that, out of the glow of that embrace, might spring the eternal round of thoughts made vital, clothed out of shapeless matter with symmetry. He planned an impious scheme. He would not pray the good Ah-i-wee-o for aid, but would act alone, and be the great Medicine Spirit. He would frame a creature from out the subtlest elements within this chaos, so exquisite that, when it came to live, confusion would be harmonised in it, and the order of its being go,forth the law of beauty and of form to all. Then that coy spirit of desolation would be won at last, and passing into its life, a royal lineage would spring forth, and procreation wake insensate matter in myriad living things, gorgeous ideals, harmoniously wrought, and self-producing forever. All these would be his subjects, and he would rule, with Yahshan, this most excellent show himself! So he labored on, in the deep chambers of his night-lodge, through many cycles. The work was finished. It lay in state, within his golden wigwam at the east, that Yahshau and her glittering train might look upon it and wonder. Then he carried it forth; but evil spirits are wise, and, though it was a mighty work, they knew that it was too daring, and that Ah-i-wee-o would punish its presumption, and would not let the senses wake with life; so they poured that fearful fluid in, that fires the blood, and makes life slay itself. They say the white man has dealt with them, has learned from them the spell of that bad magic, and makes his "fire-water" by it. So when Yahshan waked up life, its power waked too; for he knew not of the craft, and it tore the glorious work from out his hands, while they flew behind and mocked him.
"Ah-i-wee-o bent over the swooning Wako; for the life that had been so tumultuous scarcely now stirred his pulse. She was a thing of beams, silvery and clear; a warm, lustrous light clung around her limbs and showed their delicate outline. She floated on the air, her wings and figure waving with its eddies, like the shadows of a Lee-ka-loo bird upon the sea. Her eyes, deep as the fathomless blue heaven, looked down on him with pity and unutterable gentleness. It was a marvellous work the overdaring Yahshan had accomplished. Beautiful, exceedingly, was that mute form, and rarely exquisite its finish. Must that glorious mechanism be destroyed, and all the noble purpose of its framing be lost? No! She moves her tiny, flower-like hand above it, and every blotch and all the bruises disappear, and it was fair to view, and perfect as when Yahshan had given it the last touch. Now she stooped beside and touched him, white sparks flew up, and she mang a low mong. At the first note, the dark, formlethe masse round therm quivered and rocked: the Wako miled; for feeling now first thrilled along his nerves. The wong rone; the dumb thinge whook and stirred the more. She touched his notirils and his lips; the sparks played between her small fingers and danced up. Yet a louder note swelled out, and the thick mitut swayed and curled, and a cool wind suabed through them, and dashed a stream of odor on his face. He drew long breaths, and sighed with the burden of delight, and moved his lips to inarticulate joy; and now that wondrou oong pealed out clear, ringing bursts that shook the blue arch and mwung the fire-boats, cadent with its gushes; and through the dim niste great shapers, like rocks and trees, leaped to the speasure, marshalling in lines and order. Now she pressed his eyelide with her fingers; the silver sparks sprung in exulting showers, snapping and bursting with sweet smells. Once more, pealing triumphant, a keen, hhining flood, that symphony poured wilder forth; bis eyes fly open, and that heavy mist, like a great curtain, wlowly rises. First the green grass and the flowers, bending beneath the gente breeze, turn their deep eyes and spotted cupw towards him in salutation, and all the creeping thingg and birds, that love the low herbs, dewobesprent, are there: and as the mist goes up, majestically slow, other forms of bird and beast are seen, and dark trunk of trees, and great sterms bevide them, looking like trees, until his cyes have traced them up to the great moose, the big-horned stag, the grizaly beary and the wast-moving mammoth. But then it has drunk the harsaony of grades; for all are there. And, side by side, lhe marks how, from the crawler, every step ascends, in beautiful gradation ; the last linked to the first in one all-perfect chain. Then carae the knotted linbs, with all their burden of green leavew; and, underneath, the round, yellow fruits, or purple funhing of nich cluters and gay forms, that flutter through them on wings of amethyst, or flame, or gold, their every movement a music-note, although all was dumb to him as yet. Still higher the mist-curtaia goes; and the grey cliff, with shining peaks, and a proud, fierce-eyed bird perched on them, meet his gaze; and then the mists float far away, and scatter into clouds, and all the splendor and the pomp of the thronged earth is spread, a gorgeous, but voiceless, revelation to his new being. With every touch of the enchantress, Ah-i-wee-o, the soul of chaos had passed into a sense; and all the pleasant harmonies the Wako felt, and all the scented harmonies the Wako tasted and inhaled - all the thoughts of harmony in grand or graceful forms the Wako saw - that blissful interpenetration gave conception to, and the magic of that powerful song brought forth. One more act, and his high marriage to eternity is consummated: ecstacy has found a voice, and all these harmonies articulation, yet his ears were sealed; and though music flowed in through every other sense, his dumb lips strove in vain to wake its language.
"But this was the supremest gitt of all. This was the charm that had drawn beauty out of chaos -- the magic by which Ahi -wee-o ruled in spirit-land, and chained the powers of evil: It were death to spirits less than she, to hear the fierce crashing of those awful symphonies she knew. His nature could not bear the revelation. Besides, what had he to do with that celestial minstrelsy which led the heaven-fires on their rounds? There was ambition, full enough, up there; and Yahshan had been playing far too rashly on those burning keys. She would not curse this perfect being with a gift too high, and add another daring rebel to her realm! No! he must be ruler here, as she ruled everything. From all those harmonies he must extract the tone, and on it weave his song of power to lead them captive. This divine music is the voice of all the beautiful, the higher language of every sense; and not until the soul is brimmed to overfowing with sparkling thoughts of it, drank in through each of them, will the beamy current run, as streams do -and he shall go forth into simu-mute-and from the low prelucing of we water: an: wame the first notes of his exuling powers swai. reare-... an :

 er, more faint, it is gone!
 lips with one entraucing hiss auc syray away. "It cute on the new sense, and sirs tue ienc var o: enemone wom chords, and the deep berming of grear wares and ul has sinks into the first sleep.

${ }^{6}$ The Wako is roused nex: moruing by a warm flood from 'he fire-canoe-for Yahshan had come forth right poyally, and throzh Ah-i-wee-o had bumbled his presumption and wrold wot pon: him to be sole lord as he had hoped, yet all he lland dacon at. tempt had been accomplished, and be believed in ont in en $n$ his own work, and thus wore all his panoply of epirenciof in fono of his glorious creation. The Wako rose, and la! aprond him as far as the eye could reach, a mighty moltienteo of all the ani!mals of the earth were rising too. They waited for their king. and it was he. They came flocking amond him to caress him in obeisance - a gentle, eager throng!
"The panther stroked hie sleel glowy fur againe him lox anot rolled and gambolled like a kitten at his feet. The great bear of the north rubbed his jaws against his hand and begged to be caressed. Big mountain (the mammoth) thrust his huge tusks in for a touch; and the white-horned moose bowed his smoothbristled neck and plead with meek black eyes for notice. All the huge grotesque things pressed around, and the smaller creatures, pied, flecked, and dotted, crowded beneath their heavy limbs, unhurt-all, full of confidence and love, gracefully sporting to win one glance.
"Above him the air was thick with wings, and the whirr and winnowing of soft plumes made pleasant music, and the play of brilliant hues was like a thousand rainbows arched and waying over him; and the little flame-like things would flutter near his face, and gleam their sharp brown eyes into his, and strive, in vain, to warble out their joy, for their sweet pipes were not yet tuned.
"All were there, great and small; and the wide-winged eagle came from its high perch and circled round his head, and brushed its strong plumes with light caressing, through his hair. He went with them into the forest burdened with rich fruits, and ate, then shook the heavy clusters down for them. Then he passed forth to look upon the land, the first shepherd, with that countless flock thronging about his steps.
"It was, indeed, a lovely land! Here a rolling meadow, there a heavy wood; the trees all bearing fruits, or hung with vines and bloom. A still, deep river, doubled sky and trees in its clear mirror, and he gazed, in a half-waking wonder, when the ripples the swan-trains made, shivered it to glancing fragments.
"But wander which way he might, he came to tall gray cliffs, with small streams, that pitched from their cloudy summits, and bounding off from the rough crags below, filled all the valley with cool spray.
"He found his lovely world was fenced about with equare towering rocks, that nothing without wings could scale. But there was earth sraig warble.

"One of them was fair-whte zs tom mibe-whity awn :tat licked her hand and gazed up at aee assecal ins .ns .nem :atr was dark and a strong light gleame: in wer mall , werts :..
 song-bird that perched upon ner inger. snt whent tiny foot, and fromned ani laughest mat wror;' .. . symphony to puzzie it the more.
"The other was a darker mauren an: as: : .
This was Mnemoia; her wnire sis at: s:. sweet songs and lonker full at owe na: .f. .. . .
half rose in joy and wonder. "...".
sang a rapturous roundela: 1 : $\%$ threw their arms abour his are:k ts.: . o his squaws, and Yahshau smo.ar: . - night.
"The Wako was : 5 ... $\%$. . .
She grew very 1 rowi? ,n:
became more esis.
birds, and tantan mes. ..
and the passicon" $\because$ :......
"As yetwo": $\because$ :
little world: : $\because=$ - stand before cot wite: s....

fierce eyeballs until he learned to growl with pain, and then she would mock him; and when he growled louder she would mock birm still, until at last he roared with rage and sprang upon the panther-for he feared Ki-ke-wee's eye!-and the panther tasted blood and sprang to the battle fiercely. And now the tempest broke, and everything with claws and fangs howled in the savage discord. Ki-ke-wee clapped her hands and laughed. Mnemoia raised the enchantment of her song above it all, and it was atilled. Then Ki-ke-wee would tease the eagle and mock him till he screamed and dashed at the great vulture in his rage; and she would dance and shout for joy; and Mnemoia would quell it, then go aside and weep.
"The Wako loved the beautiful witch, and when he plead with her she would mock even him, and every day and every hour this mocking elf stirred some new passion, until at last even Mnemoia's song had lost its charm, and the bear skulked in the deep thickets and shook them with his growl, and the panther moaned from out the forest, and the gaunt wolves snapped their white teeth and howled, and all the timid things fled away from these fierce voices; and battle, and blood, and death, were rife where love and peace had been. The birds scattered in affright and sung their new songs in snatches only; and hateful sounds of deadly passions, and the screams and wails of fear, resounded everywhere.
" Ki-ke-wee made a bow and poisoned the barbed arrow, and mocked the death-bleat of the milk-white fawn when the Wako shot it at her tempting. This was too much! Ah-i-wee-o cursed her and she fell. The Wako knelt over her and wept; and when the dissolving spasm seemed upon her, he covered his face with his hands and wailed aloud. A voice just above him wailed too! He looked up surprised; a strange bird with graceful form and sharp black spiteful eyes was mocking him! He looked down-Ki-ke-wee was gone; and the strange bird gaped its long bill hissing at him ; and when it spread its wings to bound up fros the swig in an ceutary of passion, bee knew by ${ }^{6}$ He found the neglected Mownoia werping in the forent; and mon witer they mealed the cliffer mod fed from that fair land to hicle from Kiokenwee. But whe ham followed them and mockw theif children yet, med we dare mot alay ber, for the wiwe man think the we the daughter of the Evil spirit that poured the green fuid down the Wako'm thromt, and that the mame bad fire barne yet in our weing. Our huntery chaming the monnain-groat wornetiene losk from the blufin intos that lovely vale that liew in the bromom of the Mocky Mountain chain, but they never venture to go down?"

CHAPTER XIX.

 clearer inder of how life wred now with Manton, amidnt the new c:hame which it had gained. The whole man was rapidly cheroged; hin habitn of exceat in wineodrinking were, in a great memure, thrown mide, and the bourw he hat thum wated in mupitying madnom, were given to the worinty and developo mont of the we hir children, that had hum cotrue to him in bleme ing. He now knew no difference in him thought of them; they tender light of apring ofinwn in hil darkened heart. Yen, there mpreal and waken in wofl besm, trunulots and faint, along the we-bound chaom where the lifeofloode surt within bits.
 bour by hour, he watched beaide then, guiding their whyward pencils with his sure eye, to teach their yet irresolute wills and unaccustomed fingers to act together with that consciousness that always triumphs; and then, with the long evenings, came lessons in botany, or the eloquent discourse, half poetical, half rhapsodical, and all inspired, which led their young spirits forth, amidst the mysteries and beauties of the other kingdoms of the natural world. Or, when the stars came out, and their calm inspiration slid into his soul, he communed with them of higher themes - of aspirations holy, wise, and pure-of the heroic souls of art-of their pale, unmoved dedication, through dark, saddened years of neglect, obloquy, and want-of their glorious triumphs, their immortal bays, that time can never wither-until, with trembling lips and glistening eyes, they hung upon his words.

It was wonderful to see how quickly Elna wept, like an April shower, at any tender word or thought; but the great eyes of Moione only trembled like darla violets brimming with heavy dew. All the truth, the religion of Manton's soul, was poured out at such times.

The door would sharply open- "Elna! Moione! go to bed!" This would be spoken in a low tone, evidently halfchoked with rage, by the woman. Her bent form looming within the shadow of the entry, looks ghastly enough in her white gown, loose dark hair, and the greenish glitter of her oblique eye. The poor children rise, with a deep sigh from Moione over her broken dream, and a quick exclamation of petulant wrath from Elna - while Manton mutters an involuntary curse on the unwelcome intruder; and, as the light forms of the children recede before his vision and disappear in the dark passage, he shudders, unconsciously, as if a ghoul had disturbed him at a feast with angels.

Now, again, had he fallen back to hell. With a fierce outbreak of jealous fury, she would spring into the room, if literally to devour him with talons and teeth; and, when but a few paces off, catching his cold, concentrated eye, whe would stagger backwards, a if shot through the beart, to her white arms wildly into the air, and, with head thrown back, utter, in a atrange, choking, guttural screech -
"Auh! auh! auh!-yaugh!-you kill!-you kill me !' and pitch forward convulsively, with the blood bursting in torrents from her mouth. Then came the long, harrowing, and oftdemcribed wcene of terror, remorse, pity, on the part of Manton, and the plea for forgivenese, the slow recovery, and- and mon.

Or elme, with mome modification of tactics, the lioness changed to the lamb, the Corgon-head to that of Circe, she would throw herwelf upon him, with tender expostulations, call hin "cherubim, ${ }^{9}$ and stroke his "hyacinthian curls;" and, when that failed, cling about his knees, and weep and pray, and then, as the desperate resort, suddenly swoon, with a tremendous crash, upon the floor, and lie there for an hour, if need be, in a condition of syncope, so absolute, that Manton-who had now witnemed this comparatively harmless phenomenon so many times, ar to be relieved from any apprehensions of immediate resultshad lately felt the curiosity of the philosopher irremistibly aroused in him, and would frequently leave her for a considerable length of time, in order to watch the symptoms, before he proceeded to apply the very simple remedy for recalling her to conscious neem, with which, by the way, whe had furnished him long ago, in advance, through certain adroit hints and indirections. When be had matiffied his more analytical moods, in this way, he would proceed with the restorative process, as per prescription.

This mysterious operation consisted in placing the pillow of the wofa, or the rounds of a chair, under her feet, so as to elevate them at slight angle higher than the head. As he was led to anderatand the result, the blood, by the laws of capillary atraction, wam instantly carricd up, from her head to her feet, thereby relieving the oppression of the brain; when lo! to this new "open sesame," the rigid lids flew wide apart, disclosing eyte vivid with life aterer.

The strangest part of this scene consisted in the fact, that while the fit lasted, it was impossible to perceive the slightest symptorns of breathing or pulsation, any more than in the most broadly-defined case of catalepsy, or of absolute death itself. It was, therefore, clear enough to his mind, that such conditions could not be entirely counterfeit; though the suggestion had now become frequent, that they might, after long training, become, in a great measure, voluntary.

Another scene. The mother reclines upon her bed, and the child Elna by her side, with arms around her neck and face against her bosom. Moione stands leaning over the foot-board, with folded arms, her pale face expressing mingled grief, anger, and pain, while she looks with a cold, steadfast glance into the oblique eye of the woman, who addresses her rapidly, in bitter tones -
"You love that bad man, Moione?"
"Yes, I do!" said the young girl, curtly and coldly.
"Ha! you acknowledge it, do you, ungrateful girl? Acknowledge that, at your age, you love a prolligate wretch like this? a man utterly without principle, where our sex is concerned. A villin, who has already attempted the ruin of my own daughter, under my very eyes!"

Moione turned paler still at this, and looked inquiringly towards her friend Elna, who, however, gave no sign, either by word or movement, of dissent to this vile insinuation. Instantly the blood mounted to Moione's brow, and her gentle eye shot fire, her thin lips curled with scom -
"It is false! It is false! You know it to be so! He hum taught us nothing but what is pure and high! He never breathed a thought of evil to either of us, and Elna dare not say so! Il love him as our lofty, noble brother, and shall continue to do so so long as he shows himself only to me, and to her, as he has done! Pray, madam, why do you permit him to remain in the house, if he be so wicked? You tell me you have the power to turn him out at any minute. Why not do it? Why do you trust your child with him, at all hours, and under all circumstances? Why do you so constantly seek his society yourself? If he were the fiend you represented, one would think you would have reason to fear for yourself, if not for Elna. What he has done once he will do again! How do you reconcile all this?"

The flashing look and withering tone in which this unespected outburst of indignation, on the part of the usually quiet Moione, had been delivered, cowed the craven nature to which it was addressed. It was but for an instant, though; her subtle cunning returned to the charge, in a lower tone, and on another tack. She reached out her hand, affectionately, towards her "Come, Moione, dear! come, kiss me!"
The child did not move, but merely answered in a low, contemptuous "No!"

The woman continued, in a wheedling tone, "Hear! my naughty Moione! She will not come to kiss me, when I love her so! Moione does not understand everything she seek, or she would not have spoken thus sharply to her friend. She does not understand that I am striving to save this poor youth from his frightful vices! his wine-drinking, his tobacco, his tneateating, and all those ugly sins which so delace, what I hope one day to see a beautiful spirit! She does not know I must endure this evil that good may come! She does not realise how much pain it costs me to have the purity of my houschold thus demecrated by his poisoned sphere! She does not remember that God has placed us here, on this earth, to bear and forbear towards his erring children; that they may, through us, become regenerate and redeemed! I know his eloquence, I know his subtlety, therefore I have warned you against him; he cannot be dealt with as other men, for he is but a foolinh, headstrong boy, with a great soul, if he were only free; but white his vices hold him in bondage, he is not to be trusted. Though I have lifed him out of the very gutters of debasement - given him a home in my house-I have no confidence, at this moment, that he would not deliberately ruin either you or Elna to-morrow, if he could! You should, therefore, rather pity me than be angry with me, dearest Moione!"
"So I perceive!" said the young girl, with a cold sneer, as she turned and walked haughtily from the room, slamming the door emphatically behind her. The woman sprang to her feet, with an expression of ungovernable fury in her face. "The insolent, ungrateful wretch! This is what I get for all my trouble to make sornething out of her - to render her of some value to me! To sa-a-ve her!" and she hissed out the words with a horrible writhing of her features, while the pupil of her oblique eye was wrung aside, until nothing but the white, ghastly blank of the ball was to be seen.
"Yes, I'll save you! I'll use you; you insolent beggar! I have not brought you here, alone, as the ant carries off the aphide, to give spiritual milk to my own offispring! I brought you to use, too, and use you I will! I will coin you into profit! I'll humble your insolent airs! l've got a market for you already, and a bidder! Dare to cross my path, ha? - with your supercilious insolence? I'll bow that white forehead! I'll fill those blue eyes with ashes! until, bleared and rheumy with premature decay, you crawl to kiss my foot for favors!"

During this horrid apostrophe, the woman had stood stiffened where sbe bad first planted her feet upon the carpet, staring blankly at the door through which the young girl had passed, and throwing her arms out in wild gesticulations after her.

The girl Elna lay, in the meantime, with her face half concealed in the pillow, closely watching, with one sharp eye uncovered, the whole scene. The woman, who had forgotten herself in her fury, turned suddenly and saw her. Her manner instantly changed. She threw herself by her side, took her caressingly into her arms, drew her face close to hers, breathed upon it long and steadily, and then commenced in low, confdential tones, a conversation between them, the purport of which we must leave to conjecture.

Another scene. About this time, Manton had effected the advantageous sale of a new work, which placed him suddenly in the possession of a larger sum of money than he had been able to command, at one time, for a long period. His first thought was for his young proteges, and, although his own wardrobe was sufficiently dilapidated, he expended a portion of the sum for their comfort and gratification before he thought at all of his own necessities. Unluckily for him, however, it was evening when the money was received, and the purchases intended to surprise them were the only ones made on the way to the house.

In almost boyish eagerness, and all breathless with the delight of giving joy to these gentle ones he loved so much, he hastened home and threw his presents down before thero, to be greeted with rapturous expressions and gleeful merriment, the silvery and most musical clamoring of which, soon brought the woman, Marie, to the scene. Her eyes danced and glistened as she saw them ; her infallible instinct scented the money in an instant.
"Beautiful! beautiful!" she exclaimed, clapping ber hands with childike artlessness. "How lovely! How sweet! How noble! How generous of you to think of these dear girls first, when you need so much yourself!" and she looked up with bewitching candor into the face of Manton, though it might have been noticed by more careful observers that one eye turned obliquely towards his pockets. She sprang suddenly to his side, and leant affectionately against his arm, which she clasped with both her hands.
${ }^{88}$ Ab, my gentle Tiger! How shall I ever thank you for your unwearying kindness to these my tender blossoms? My precious 'Monies!' You are too good! We shall never know how to thank you enough!"

And leaning still closer and in a more confidential manner towards his ear, while her forehead flushed and her voice sank,
"You sold the book, did you ?"
"Yes."
"For how much ?"
"The receipts in my pocket will show!"
"Ah, let us see them then!" said she playtully, as she thrust her hand into his pocket. "I want to see if those evil and stupid publishers have understood the value of the precious genius they were purchasing! Oh, dear, why what a treasure! Here are fifties, twenties, ever so many!" while she, with eager and trembling hands, fumbled the notes that she had smatched from the vest-pocket where he had, with his characteristic carelessness of money, thrust them loosely. "Ah, I must take time to count all this treasure for you, for I do n't believe you know how much you've got, you careless boy!" And as she said this she hastily deposited the money in the bottom of her pocket.

Manton looked at her a moment with a very hard, cold glance, while a flush of indignation gleamed across his brow; for he had a sure presentiment that he should never see this money again. The great misfortune of his organisation was his recklessness in regard to money, and the absolute inability of his nature to comprehend the sterile meannesses of its abject worshippers. For the first time the impulse to strike this woman to the earth came across him, but in an instant this angry feeling was dissipated amidst the gay and laughing caresses of his petted favorites.

When, on the next day, Manton demanded of the woman an account of the money, she turned pale and red, looked upwards and downwards, and finally askance, while she faintly told him that she had spent the whole; but, for his good, as well as that of the dear girls and herself, "for," she said, "you know you are so careless about money, so generous, so liberal, that you would have thrown it all away without accomplishing any of the good you so much desire. Pray, forgive me, for $m y$ anxiety to do the best for us all!" and as she saw the brow of Manton, who had not uttered a word, settling darker and darker above his cold dilated eyes, she sank upon her knees-at his feet, and clasping his in her arms, she plaintively plead - ${ }^{\text {" }} \mathrm{Ah}$, forgive me! forgive me! I acted for the best! For God's sake do not look so, you will kill me!"

He spurned her contemptuously from him with his foot, and retreating, as she crawled abjectly back again, he said in a measured, deliberate tone -
"Keep away from me, woman! You may retain your illgotten plander once more, but, mark you, if ever you dare to put your hands into my pockets again I will strike you to the earth, woman as you are, and trample you beneath my feet, as I wrould another reptile! I have had enough of this remorseless fleecing !" And spurning yet more contemptuously her persistent attempts to clutch bis knees again, he left her swooning upon the floor. He went forth with the scales falling from his eyes regarding this woman, in some particulars at least.

The sequel to the last scene is too rich to be passed over. Since that wholesale and impudent robbery, Manton had maintained his ground firmly, in regard to money. All her arts were brought to bear, in vain; he steadily and sternly refused to be plundered any farther; until finally, his feminine "savious" being driven to the extreme verge of desperation, tried a new and dashing game.

She had just been reading Zschokke's charming tale, " Illumination, or the Sleep-Walker." The reader will remember how the Sleep-Walker, the heroine of the tale, instructs Emanuel, while in the clairyoyant state, as to how he should proceed in her own case, which he had been elected to restore to health again, through the nervous, or sympathetic medium, by re-establishing the balance of the lost physical with the spiritual life. That, in addition, the Sleep-Walker revealed to him the thoughts of his own soul, and counselled him as an angel would have done, against the evil she saw in him - tells him too, that he must not regard her weakness, or the petulance of her words towards him in her waking state.

Well, our clairvoyant, after reading this book herself, exhibited an unusual degree of restlessness to have it read by Manton, too; nothing would content ber until be had fairly commenced it, when she knew there was no probability of his pausing until he got through. She watched him during the reading, with great curiosity, frequently interrupting him to draw out his opinion as he progressed.

Everybody knows the fascination of the tale, and confesses the fine skill with which its wonderful details are wrought up. Manton could do no less; he was charmed, of course, as ruillions of other readers have been. A few hours after finishing the book, while sitting at his table, engaged in writing, the door, which was unbolted, flew open wide, and there stood Madame, dressed in pure white-the eyes nearly closed, and features pale and rigid, the outstretched hands reaching vaguely forward, atter the manner of the somnambulist.

She paused for a moment thus-while the whole meaning of the scene flashed through the mind of Manton in an instant; and, although he felt e very great inclination to laugh, he restrained himself, and determined to encourage the thing, and see how far it would go. The new Sleep-Walker now advanced slowly towards him; and as she crossed the room, a slight movement of her fingers beat the air before her, as if through the guidance of these magnetic poles ber soul sought its centre of attraction; with a slow, gliding movement she thus approached, until within a few inches of him, when ber hand leaped, as the magnet does to the stone, to meet his, and then a certain painful rigidity that had marked her brow at first, was displaced and gave way to a serene expression of content, as if she had now found rest.

That peculiar action of the muscles of the throat, as if in the effort to swallow, now followed immediately, and was sufficient intimation to Manton that she desired to speak. He accordingly asked her, solemnly - "Why are you here ?"
But there was evidently something of mockery in the tone in which this question was asked, for the Sleep-Walker only frowned and shook her head impatiently. Manton now changed his voice, and with real curiosity, proceeded.
"Speak: why have you come to me thus? What would you say to me ?"

After some four or five efforts to produce sound, she articum lated-"For your good."
"Tell me then, what is for my good?"
She again frowned and shoolk her head and muttered-"4 You are naughty."
"Why ?"
"You have no faith."
"Faith in what?"
"Faith in me-in my mission-in my truth."
"I have faith in you-tell me what is for my good.
"You must be more humble; your pride and your suspicion will never let you be saved. You must have some hard lessone yet to bring you down-to humiliate you-to purify."

Here there was a long pause, when Manton, growing impatient, finally asked-"Is this all you have to say to me? Is this all you see now?"
"No."
"Well, what is it ?"
After considerable hesitation, she at length said-
${ }^{6}$ You do not treat me right!-you hold my life in your hands-yet you are cold-you do not come near me-you are leaving me to die!"

Here then was another long pause.
"What more is there ?" at length asked Manton; "this is not all."

This time the choking and besitation, before pronouncing the words, seemed greater than ever. At length, however, out they came.
"They complain of you in Heaven, that you let me sufferthat you do not care for my necessities-that-that you do not -not-give me money now."

This was too much-Manton literally roared with acornful laughter, am he spurned ber from him-
"Ha! ha! ha! here is illumination for you with a vengeance! Alas! poor Zschokke! 'to what base user do we come!' The divine inspiration of the Sleep-Walker raising the wind! Vive la bagatelle! Hurrah! hurrah!" He fairly danced about the floor, in an ecstacy of enjoyment-the scene seemed to him so irresistibly ludicrous.

During this time, the woman, who had staggered towards the bed, and fallen across it, lay perfectly immovable and white, without the change of a muscle, or the quiver of a nerve. Manton, however, paid no attention to her, and half an hour afterwards, taking his hat, left the roorn, without again approaching her. But what was his astonishment on returning, two hours afterwards, to meet the sobbing Elna, and the pale, troubled face of Moione, in the passage. Elna, at the sight of him, seemed wild with grief, and sprang, with her arms about bis neck, screaming-
"Oh, mother is dead! mother is lead! My dear mother is dead!"
"Why, Moione," said Manton quickly, taking her hand, as he shook Elna off, "what is the matter? what is all this?"
"She seems to be in a fit of some sort. We missed her, and after looking all over the bouse, found her lying on the bed in your room, without motion or breath. We have not been able to wake her since, and did not know what to do until you carme."
"Oh, come! do come!" screamed the horrified Elina. "Save my poor mother! save her! save her! You must save her! I shall die!"

Manton. whe imme jiarely fol: his conscrence sing tim. assure $\ddagger$ tue gis tha i: was merely a mesmeric slect, from which be woine peiteve her in a few minutes. He then rushod up stairs, accompanied br them, and found her, indeed, in precisely the same atusade and apparens condition in which he had lefi her. After a few of the usual reverse passes for removing the magnetic influence, she slowly opened her eyes, while the blood returned to her face. Starting up and staring about with a bewildered look, she uttered merely an exclamation of surprise, and then, after rubbing her eyes, quickly asked the poor child, Elna, who had thrown herself sobbing wildly on her breast-
"Why, you foolish girl, what's the matter now ?"
"Mother, dear mother, we thought you were dead!"
And now came an explanation, so far as the thoroughly repentant Manton was disposed to make it, of the scene we hare just described; the amount of which was, that she had come into his room in a clairvoyant state, and, being called out suddenly, he had left it for an hour or two, forgetting to make any explanation to the family, and without having relieved her, as he should have done, before going, by using the necessary reverse passes.

The incredulity of Manton had never before received so severe a shock; and it was a long time before his conscience would forgive him, for what now seemed his brutal suspicion. Alas, poor Manton! had he only possessed, for a little while after he left that room, the invisible cap of the "Devil on two sticks," he would have been most essentially enlightened as to something of the art and mystery of Clairvoyance.

As soon as the front-door had slammed behind him, he would have seen that woman spring to her feet, and, with lipm and whole frame quivering with rage, glide from the room, tnuttering to herself; and when she entered her own room, which could be reached through an empty bath-room, he would have heard several low, peculiar raps upon the partition walll which separated her own from the room of her daughter. The mow were repeated, at intervals, until a single tap at her door responded, and in another moment the girl Elna glided in on tiptoe. The conference between them was carried on in a low, rapid, business-like tone, while every half-minute the girl thrust ber head from the window, to watch as for some one coming.

After a few moments thus spent, the child left the room, with an intelligent nod, in answer to the repeated injunction not to leave the window of ber own room until she saw him coming, far up the street-and then-!

After this, he would have seen the woman quietly seat herself at the table, after locking her door, and write a long letter; when, on hearing three low taps in succession, she sprang to her feet, rushed through the bath-room into the room of Manton, and threw herself across the bed, in the precise position in which be left her, and, after three or four violent retchings of the whole muscular system, her face collapsed-grew ashen-whiteher lids drooped-her muscles became rigid, and she exhibited all the outward resemblances of suspended vitality. Then the wild Elna rushed in, accompanied by the deluded Moione, and, the moment she looked at the condition of the mother, burst into the most extravagant demonstrations of helpless grief; while Moione, with perfect presence of mind, sprinkled water upon the face and endeavored to restore animation. Soon the street door-bell rings with a peculiar energetic pull, and the frantic Elna at once exclaims, "Manton! dear Manton! he can save my mother; let us run for him." She seizes the hand of Moione, and - we know the rest!

Shocking, ludicrous, and monstrous as all this may appear to the reader, from his point of view, its only effect upon Manton was necessarily to rebuke the feeling of harsh incredulity which was beginning to become so strong in him, with regard to this inexplicable woman. He was now more troubled and con founded than he had ever been; for it was impossible that a nature like his could ever have voluntarily suspected the unimaginable trickery and collusion which we have traced in this mcene; while him common menwe wam too atrong to be in any degree mhaken by what wam simply unexplained. Hia magranisbity would not permit him to muppect due full degree of knavery, of his conmeientioumess to run much risk, again, of doing grievou injuatice, za it now seemed to him he had clearly done in thim came. He felt it utterly imposible to treat these phenowene with entire diwreapect hereafter, however little influence he might permit them to exert upon his fixed purponem and will.

CHAPTERXX.

We have lont might of the other characters in our narrative, nd it in now time that we return to them. The reader will renwenber, in the darkecyed, wharp-ongued Jeamnette of a paat cene, the contrawted type of another clans of adventuress, whowe whennem menned to have been rapidly culninating. Iher wacerne, inderd, neerned now to be abolutely assured; the coveted comquent had been achieved - Rdmond was daily at her feet. They were, an it was understood, woon to be publicly smartied. In the meanwhile, she occupied the beat room in the houme, and became daily more and more imprioum and owero bearing towardm the woman Marie, ws she believed the time to We approaching when the would bol longer noed ber wervicere.

In common with her type the world over, nhe wam incredibly welfiwh and ungrateful, where she: had once fawned and cringerd. Thim little weaknese of arrogasce alue had bergun to make some blight exhibition of, even towards Fotmond hinsolf; while, am for the woman Marie, mhe luectored bre on all eccoakionm with the pitiem volubility of a mont cauntie wit. In thin, however, she made mont fatal mimake; mine litile dreaned of the dark and terrible subtlety of the reptile she thus hourly trampled with her ruthless scom. She, too, was doomed to feel the fearful pois n of the hidden sting she carried, and writhe beneath its hideous tortures.

There had been more than usually bitter scene between them, in which Jeannette had loftily taunted her with the abjectness of the game she was now playing, in putting forward her own daughter, as the attraction, by which to hold Manton any longer near her. It was not that Madame Jeannette was so much shocked at any villany in the act itself, but that her lofty pride was revolted at the inconceivable meanness it displayed; for, as among thieves and robbers, there is among adventuresses a certain esprit du corps,--and the haughty Jeannette aspired to be a sort of banditi chieftainess in sentiment, and was really a person of refined cultivation, so far as mere intellect was con-cerned,- it is little wonder, that at such a time of unbounded confidence in the security of her own position, and independence, as she supposed, of any farther aid from the woman, that she should have given way to a natural feeling of diagust and abhorrence, in a moment of irritation. But that taunt proved to her the most deadly error of her life.

The woman, who feared her presence mortally, left the room hurriedly and in silence, shivering in an ague-fit of rage. In another moment she left the house, without speaking a word to any one. Indeed, she seemed incapable of speaking. Her cyes looked bloodshot and hideously awry; the veins of her face swollen as if to bursting, and the skin absolutely livid.

It was a long walk she had set out upon, and gradually the beadlong rapidity of her gait subsided into a more measured tread. Her face became pale, as it had before suffused, and a sort of ghastly calmness succeeded. At length, in White Street, she rang the bell of an old-fashioned, but respectable-looking mansion, and shot past the servant in the passage, when, instead of turning into the parlor, she hurried up-stairs to the chamber of the lady.

A momewhat masculine voice answered her tap, and she paswed in. A woman of stout nymmetrical figure, imperiou bearing, whome ornewhat coarse featurem were relieved by the animal mplendor of her large black eyes, the luxuriance of her jetty hair, and voluptuous mbonpoint of person, greeted her in ahort, abrupt tyle, at ohe looked up with a cold glance from some lacework over which the was bending.
${ }^{66}$ What is it, Marie? You look flurried."
"No, no," maid the, throwing off her bonnet and minking into (chaip. "I's only tired! It' a long walk from my place bere; and then it it very hot to-day. Hut, Eugenie," whe said mbruply, changing her tone, "I came thim morning to tell you mbout Limond."
"What of him "" wid the other tharply, turning full upon ber:
"Dear Eugenie, the fact is, I could not rentrain myelf longer-l mould not be acting truly by you or hinn, if I did wo. You know you love him atill."

The face of the lirench-woman dumhed slighty; ber head wam thrown hack with a haughty curve of the neck.
"Ah, no," maid the woman, interrupting her quickly an she wam about to mpeak.
"No nonsenme, Fugenie; you remember that proud aw you me, you loved him well enough to risk the low of your mocial pomition for him. You naver loved any one an well since, and never will again; and I know that he lover you, and you only, to thim hour. It wan your mide caumed the meparation, it in your pride that han reduced him wo low to become, in sheer dempair, the victim of much a wapless, bodilemes, dry and marpo mon mpeculator, am this Jeannette! Why, would yom believe it, whe han tormented hitn at last into a promiwe to marry hor !"
"What!" waid the other, springing to her feet ; " what! marry that marving! Hedenond marry that pauper adventurens, after having loved ne! Phhaw! Maris, you are mistaken. He only telle her this to get rid of her importunitus. He' trilling with her : he's not in earnest-he can't be-he's too proud: and besides, his father would disinherit him !"
"Sit down and keep cool, Eugenie. I am not mistaken; so far from it, that every day he comes to me, grievously bewailing his hard fate, in having so far committed himself to Jeannette, whom he curses, while he mourns over this obdurate pride of yours, in refusing to see him again. He says if he could only see you once more he would be strong enough to break with Jeannette forever. I've shown him how be could easily buy her off, in case of reconciliation with you-that her object, from the first, had been simply money, and the eclat of the position it would give her abroad-and that when she had become convinced that a separation must take place, she would soon be brought to compromise her claims. Beside, the marriage is impossible; I have seen his father and his brother, and have given them some seasonable hints in regard to her; and the testy old man now swears that he will disinherit him, if he dares to marry what he considers to be little better than a common adventuress. And the brother, whom you know is the most influential of the two with the old man, is equally violent about it. So you see, my dear Eugenie, I have been working for you faithfully all the while, while you considered me as co-operating with Jeannette."
"Yes," said the other, who had resumed her seat quite calmly, "I dare say I did you injustice, for I had conceived all the time, that it was through you that this affair, between Jeannette and Edmond, had been brought about; that you had had some interest in it you have not thought proper to explain to me; and an explanation of which I have not chosen to ask of you. It is quite sufficient for me to know that you now desire to supplant Jeannette, and thereby undo your own work. Now, if you choose to explain to me what the object you wish to accomplish is, so that I can understand your motive, then, perhaps, we may come together in this matter-for I know you, Marie, that you never do things without a motive for yourself.

Come, out with it ! Man deannette cromed your track in may way? Ham mefoiled you? In word, do you hate her now?"
"Of courme I hate hur now," maid the worman, "or why thim timit? Why the deliberate care 1 have taken to preppare the way tos foil her dearent weloemen? She ham outraged nee beyond eno durance by her inwoleat muperiority. She frightens, bulliew and tuunt rne. She ham insulted me beyond the powibility of wo man'm forgivencem to another! I hate ber an decply an Iove revenge?"
"All thim may be very trum, Marie," maid the ofher, with m cool mosile, "but knowing you 1 do, I whould prefer to be ins formed mpecifically in what dim insult conminted. Trell me what ohe mid mad didy, give me all the circumatancew in depail, and then I shall undermand your motive and know how far we can wet together!"

The woman praued an inmant an in inesitation, her eye grew hidrounly atanace once noore, her forchead Liazed, wnd her lipm quivered, am glancing furtively around the roonn, with a stomethy gaovernent, whe glided clowly to the wide of lise French-wonam, mand whimpered in her ear, with purple lipm, a rapid, eayer corno ohair main, prate an death and menemingly exibunted.

 electre, gleam darted fron her ayy, and with untrembling fingery he fininheal bee mitch, while she mald in a low tone-
"that will des, Maree; that'm enough to mexure your fath. We will panimith lor, Fidmond whall come back to my feet!"

 whe wem deniroum tos retain her incognifes. She came and went twice forced itolf upen him mind that there wam momething unm usual going on, yet in his pre-occupation it created but little attention. But we, who have undertaken from the first to be sonewhat closer and more widely-awakened observers than he, can see something more significant than met his eye in all this.

An accidental raeeting in one of the rooms of the house soon occurred between Edmond and Eugenie, upon the privacy of which we are not disposed to intrude. Let the consequences suffice.

In a few weeks the imperious tone of Jeannette, who, too, had been kept entirely ignorant of what was going on, was lowered, though the covert and sardonic vindictiveness of her wit had clearly lost nothing of its directness and ferocity even; because, as she daily became less exultant, the moroseness of her temper increased.

It would be anything but a pleasant picture to unveil the harrowing struggles of such a woman to regain an ascendency, which she felt was daily driven by some malign and invisible power beyond the breath of her heretofore ascendant will. She only felt its devastation amidst her towering lopes, and the moon-stone battements of regal schemes that she had nourished in daring fancies. She only felt the shadow of desolation on her soul, but ber vision was not strong enough to see the demon wing that threw it.

She was passing through the valley and the shadow, yet knew not where to aim the lightning of her curse. She sank at last, bewildered, stunned, and utterly humiliated; for she had crawled upon her very knees to Edmond to plead for mercy, but he was inexorable. The old passion had been restored to his life, and her proud, voluptuous rival held the sensual philosopher a prisoner, "rescue or no rescue," once more.

For days and days after the fremendous realisation of her loss had been forced upon her, she lay upon her bed, tossing in dumb and tearless torture: then her concentrated madness took a new and sudden turn; she shrieked and wailed, she cursed heaven, and earth, and men, and even Edmond, with the lurid curses of madnew, while whe kissed the hand and blessed the ministeringe of the soft-gliding genius of her ruin, who hung with a cunning weience about her suffering bed.

But leannette wat clearly not the stuff to die of any one pamo mion lea intense than her love of self. She came through at last, haggard and broken, and humble enough, but ahe received her pemsion neverthelesw, and soon ater sailed for England, leaving the field to her stronger rival, to whom Edmond was soon afterward maried.

CHAPTER XXI.

We have frequently meationed the eccentric Dr. Weamel in the coure of this narrative. Another scene will enlighten the reader womewhat in regard to the yet undefined character of him relation towards the woman Marie. He had juat entered her soom; and approaching with a quick, nervoum step, he maid to ber in an irritated and squeaking voice -
${ }^{\text {" Marie }}$ Orne, I tell you I must have my money back again! I did not give it to you, when I advanced it to get you started in businem. You were to bave returned it to me, long since! You have been doing well now for two yearm and more, and yet inutead of returning the money I first advanced to you, you have been borrowing more than double am much! At thim moment you have more than five hundred dollars belonging to me, of which you have never returned me a cent! Yet I have been mullering for money, for months, and you know it! You know 1 eannot receive remittances now, since the death of my grandmother, till the mettlement of our estate! I am tired of this treatment, Madam! I will have my money!"

The Doctor, who had been walking hurriedly up and down the room during this speech, now paused abruptly before the woman, who had quietly continued ber writing - "Do you hear me ?" he said angrily, in a loud, sharp tone. "Where is the money you have plundered me of?"

The woman now looked up, staring at him with wide-open eyes, that expressed the most unutterable astonishment, while, at the same moment, a bland smile broke across her face, while she exclaimed in a low, sweet, reproachful voice -
"Why, Doctor E. Willamot Weasel! What can you mean? My dear friend -I plunder you? You forget yourself! Remember what a feeble child you were-how sad, how sicle, how despairing, when I took hold of you, as the tender nurse does the dying foundling at her door-"
"I beliere you had no door, till I gave you one!" interrupted the Doctor, while his sharp little eyes shot fire.
"This were all very fine, if it were only true: I advanced you my money, not to pay you for curing me, which you have never accomplished, but that you might do good with it; because I believed in your mission to your sex! But I am not pleased with the use you--"
"Does not that mission exist still ?" said the woman, with flushing brow, quickly interrupting him. "Has not the number of my patients increased daily ? - including the first ladies of the land? Have not my lecture-classes become more full and widely-attended every season? Have you not a thousand evidences, in the extent of my correspondence, that women are becoming awakened throughout the country? What more do you ask? Do you expect me to perform miracles?"
"No! unless the expectation that you will deal honestly with those who have befriended you, be what you call a miracle. Come, I know what all this amounts to, perfectly! I gave you my money, as you know I dedicate all that I have, in trust, for humanity! You seemed to be laboring in common cause with myself, for the restoration of the Passional Harmonies; and as you appeared to me capable of accomplishing much for the yreat cetue, 1 felt that I had no right to withhold nay aid from would have given you al drink of water, whem whirmt. But you have not beem jus and true - you have used it uellinhly - you have murrendered yourvelf exclusively to the cabolintic uphere; yow life wouted in merie of ignoble plotingm; menmal in triguet merely, in utter disergard of the harmonic relations. Do monterrupt me I heve watched you clowely; 1 know thin to be true! Intead of clevating that noble wovl, Mantom, whom I thought, throughin you, to rewcue from the dominion of him appee tites, and met with all him glorioum powerm, to the ex= itted priexthood of the Hamonies, you have metedily dragged him down from the beginning until now, when he is further remorved then ever beyond our reach, mad regardm with conterapt end diagua the very mame of the aytem with which 1 had yeamed to met him identified. You have done this, and all for yourn own individul and unworthy ends, and have defeated one of my mon tremured purpones!"
"This in fue! " mricked the woman, as, with fuched face, and with the ampect of a roused tigresw, whe sprang to her feet, and placed herell directly acrom the treck of the excited Lloctor.
${ }^{64}$ You lie in your teeth, you ingrate! It in not ma! IIIM wwin betlly panionm have degraded him, in spite of me! Jut . 1 huse failed to make man out of you, through your own welmen ! for yem 1 heve patiently wrexted with your down Werd tendenciet, in the hope you, tory, might be redeemednight be maned frow yoursell! The moncy that you have given me, I bow carned twice over again, in the we wain and enhauting atrugglem to bring yon buck to the true health of wnity with Cod through nature! Your chilhish aberrationm and cccentricitien hete bafmed all my spinitual atrength! The proof of it in, that you lare to taunt mo in thin way! I wef that you are incorigible! You may ge! fin from meforever! Ism hopeliew! I will no longer expend myeelf upon you! Your money I shall keep until it is my convenience to restore it, if ever! It is my due, and you may recover it if you can; I own nothing here. The furniture of this house has wll been loaned me. Seize it, if you dare! Go, I say! Go! Leave my house instantly!"

And she stamped her foot, and, waving her hand in melodramatic fashion towards the door, repeated the imperative order to " begone!"

We have mentioned, that the Doctor was a mall man, and the woman was, no doubt, fully conscious of her physical duiperiority over him, before her coward and reptile nature could have dared to have assumed such a tone. But ahe had min taken the metal with which she had to deal.

The Doctor had listened to this tirade with a cold, sardonic smile upon his face, while his keen little eyes fairly mapped with scintillating fury.
"You are a fool!" said he, in a low, smooth tone, "as well a thief and an impostor! Ill put you in the Tombs tomorrow, if you do not at once lower your tone! And what is more, I will expose your practices, fully and publicly. I will swear to the false pretences by which you have swindled me out of my money. I will swear that you have made overtures to me, time after time, at an equivalent for the money you are dragging from me, to sell to me the chaste and gentle Moione, whose unprotected poverty you have dared to think you could traffic in! I will swear, too, that at one time you did not scruple to suggest, by indirection, one much nearer to you; the true scope of which suggestion, however artfully disguised, the world will readily comprehend. Furthermore, I can now understand, perfectly, the secret of all those physiological phenomena, by which you have managed to delude and degrade Manton, not forgetting the disgusting fact, which has become too apparent to me, that you are endearoring to play off Elna upon him, and, through his generous susceptibilities, to retain him within the reach of your damnable arts! You are becoming wware that he, too, in beginning to see through them, and through you. I have never apoken word, for I wished him to work out the problem himself! I will secure even bina from your cluthben!"

The woman made no attempt to reply. Her face became, of a mudden, am white and rigid wa death, and, mutcring fow choked and guttural wound, she pitched forward muddenly, like affling statue, mainst the bosom of the irritated Doctor Weanel; who, not a litte hocked by the unexpected concussion, utaggered backwadd, for an ingtunt, in the utmout confusion, while her form fell upon the thaken door. He recovered him coolnem, however, in another moment, and mertly mutered, a he left the roon-
${ }^{4}$ Puh! nonsenue! The old trick - whe' purely in the wubveraive aphere-and I can make nothing of her in the Pasmional Harmoniew! We require purity and ainglenew of purpoue. She ming go to the dogw, hereafter, for me."

CHAPTERXXII.

TUETRER REVELATMONS.

Aworner year had now passed, which, although it found Manton not entirely released from his thrall, had yet left him a calmer and a stronger man. One by one the manacles had fallea off, unconsciously to himself. Hope was slowly filling his darkened life once more with visions of an emancipated future, and he now even dared to smile in dreams.

Whence came these fairy visitors? Ah, he did not understand yet, clearly, in his own heart. He only felt and welcomed them, fresh-comers from he knew not what far Eden of God's ministers of grace. He did not question them - it was joy enough to have had them come down to him in his hell. Perhaps they were but airy counterparts of those sweet children he had watched over with such fostering tenderness.

But now at once a shadow fell upon his dream. Moione, the wise, the resolute, and the gentle, seemed all at once to droop, to become wavering and shy, while Elna grew more conscious in her impish grace, and more exultant, more capriciously tender, more caressingly electrical. Manton could not but observe that although Moione shrank from him now, she held her pencil with a heary hand, and worked with a hopeless carelessness, while her lids drooped low and trembled otten with a furtive moisture.

Another might have observed what he could not see, how at such times the eyes of Elna lit with glistening joy, and how her spirit mounted in rollicking ecstacies; how she danced and sang like some mad elf; or else her drawing-sheet was spoiled while her pencil went riot over it, in all fantastic drolleries of form, mocking characters, of every sentiment, and worst of all that me mocked Moione, too, and made bim wee her henvy brow, and coverly muggented painful quetions.

Manton would sometime" see enough of this to starle him gravely, and make him quention him own heart, long and painfully. Elina seemed to watch these moodm and dread them, and would break in upon them with mome wild antic or pouting cares.

Suddenly Moione went awny, without any olher explanation than the the mould return to her mother in New England. The thing wandone in cold and retolute way that left no room for wplapation. Stu bad been here--he wain gone; and atrangely enough it whe not until now that Manton realised how much of light there had been from her peemence. Deep ahade filled the placem which bad known her once, and it meemed at if him vieion hed been filmed - at if the shadow of that ahade filled lleaven man durkened earth before him. Ile could not bate explained why thim wm mo. It wam voiceleme conacioumesu, through which be felt went mont indercribable, that made him firmt mare of a great wamb. It weemed an if the moon and marm were gone, with their calm ingurations of repose, their pure and boly weamings, and that their place about him had been unurped by ared and ualty light, more garish than perpetual day, and clouded in brazen unnatural nplendorm, too thick for those mtarpencillinge to break through, or that chante moon to overcome.

A the werping Elna clong about him now, he shudiered while he felt that strange, new thrilingererept olong hin veina Why had he not felt this befire, when Moione wai beside them? Wam he agais given over to the evil one? and had the white dove agnin been banimhed from him bowm? Theme vague lortboding could never be entirely banimhed from the heart of Manton, although the lavinh tenderness of Elinm, who, by wome mange innlinct, merned awaft of the strumgle, the thadow and the canee, mul wrought ragerly to dispel thern.

- Elom wo longer a rhild, if, in reality, she ever had leem mince Manton had known her. She becurre daily more 17* and more lovely in his eyes, which noon grev again accustomed to the unnatural atmosphere surrounding him, though he yearned often for the calmer and the clearer sky he had lost; yet she gave him little time to think of the past. The preternatural activity into which her brain had been roused gave him full employment in guiding its eccentric energies. And then the bud had begun to unfold its petals, as well as give out its aroma. Her sick and wilted frame seemed to have become suddenly inspired with a tender and voluptuous sensuoumess, which filled out her graceful limbs in rounded, bounding vigor, and swelled her fine bust with its elartic tension, and lit and deepened her keen eyes with most lustrous and magnetic fires.

He could not dream long among such conditions. One morning, as he sat beside her at her drawing, she looked up suddenly into his face, and with bewitching naivele remarked-${ }^{6}$ This is my birthday - do you know how old I am ?"
"No, I never thought."
"Well, I am seventeen to-day."
"Seventeen! Great God! is it possible?" And Manton bowed his face, covering it with his hands, and for a long time spoke not a word, though his frame trembled. That magical word, "seventeen," had revealed every thing to himself. He had as yet always called her by the affectionate baby-name of "Sis." He had thought of her only as a child; for through these four weary years he had kept no note of time. He supposed, up to this moment, that he had been feeling towards her, too, as towards a child-the same saddened, persecuted child which had first attracted his sympathies by her mournful expression of constant suffering. He had never once thought before that any change had taken place in their relations; he had still fondled her as a spoiled and petted playmate; he still attributed the strange thrills her touch had lately produced in him to thousand other and innocent causes beside the real. He had not dreamed of passion; he had only learned to dearly love her, as he thought, because she had been developed beneath his hand,

Tㅗ

```
: %- -
7-a-"- 最= - - - - - -
```

(10 $=$ TE = = ic

y =

[5\%
- -1 - $=$

4-
* *** *
业被思
* W

安它安 from about him neck, " your mother in an evil woman; I know, and you know, something of her terrible passions. But she shall submit to this; my will is her fate-she cannot escape me, now that it is thoroughly aroused. She must bear it-she shall bear it, if it kills her. I shall hold no middle ground; and she dare not stand before me, or openly cross my track. Thim expiation is due from her to me. She has striven to hideously wrong me, and wrong you, and she shall now reap the consequences. I shall hold no terms with her; and you must make your choice now, calmly, between us, for ever! I have not guarded you thus for years, with sleepless vigilance, against her demonising influence, to have you fall back at once into ber talons. Iknow it is a fearful thing to ask a child to do-to sunder all instinctive ties, and go apart into the house of trangers; but where implacable evil dwells, purity must look to be grieved in every contact, and there are no human ties suff ficiently sacred to justify pollution of soul and body in continuing such contacts. I love you, Elna - I feel it now - I have loved you long, unconsciously; I woukd make you my true and honored wife, within another year - say the birthnight eve of eighteen. But mark me, you must be separate from this horrid mother. Elna, which do you choose?"

She threw herself hysterically upon his breast, sobbing-
"You!-you! Ah, my poor mother! I see it all! there is no choice! Yours! I am yours!--for ever yours! She is good to me sometimes; but I know she is bad-you must shield me from her. But we will not go away at once - it would kill ber. Oh, my poor mother! my dear mother! this is hard!" and she shuddered, as she clasped him more closely in her arms, and sobbed yet more wildly still.

Manton spoke in tender soothing to the gentle trembler, who continued, amidst bursts of hysteric laughter, and smiles of stormy joy, to moan-"Poor mother! how will she bear it?"

Manton, at length, gently released himself from her caress, and placing her head upon the cushion of the sofa, whispered, "Be calm, Elma! the mut beaf it - whe will bear it; it im righteons retribution, that haw overtalken lier at lant. I go now co tell her every thing. Promise swe to be quiet, and wait till I petarm. She wall lnow luer doom, in thiw wame wacred hour in which I beve learned to know myelf and you."

She baried ber face in her bandm and mbivered an be turned mwimy

He mounted the atairy with calm, unhurried apep, and, tapo ping at the door of the woman'm room, it wam opened inmantly, mad athe set him on the threebold. Her eyem mought bilim he emtered, with m wrange mat troubled glare of inguify. III brow wh ixed, 解d all hiw feturew weemed jut cat in iron. she rewhed out her hand to hirrs, with : vague, quick genture; but the did not mecept tit. He unod up Before luer, erect, rigid, and impative. lier eye grew wilder, and a yet morte furtive and uartied expremion glanced acruen ber face, all he gatped on eebly -
*What now! han it come "n
 tone; "t it hain cotne, woman! The mame curue that your devilo inh wis brought upon poor Jeanaette, hat now conse bonte to roon. We are foy ever meverd, and, un no pretence of artifice, hamll you ever mgain come near me. Know you, wommn, that 1 love your chitd with an borne love-have comot to realimation of the fact, and wold ber wo."

She retled wad mangertd backwardm, matrieling - ${ }^{\text {" }}$ Ah! ah! it hame reme at han! If fell it would be mon?
 madnew, that Manton involunturily mprang forward, to ctatch her Wevering formn in him arnn. Hhe thrut amide him claup, mond, daggering toward the ben, fell acrote it - not in a worem, not poword, no whin, no gemue of impationce, but her yew ran alwayi selew flood of milent traty

Ha! ha! Etherial! has it come to thee at last? Is it thou that must in turn be s-a-v-e-d? Where now thy disguises? Where thy unnatural triumphs? 0 , woman! art thou woman, Etherial?

To Manton, the phenomenon seened more moving and inexplicable than any we bave yet described. She did not sleep, but always the tears poured forth; and for twenty-four hours she did not change her posture, or utter any word, but these, which sent chill shiver through the frame of Manton, as he heard them -
"She will serve you so, too!"
Those words he could never forget. It was a weary watching beside that bed, that Manton had to pass through before the incessant flow of tears began to be checked, and the woman to recover something of her power of speech, at intervals.

The first thing now spoken was, "I must be content. It cannot be escaped! She must be yours, if you can hold her!"

A fearful "if" was that suggested to Manton; but he was too happy after all this solemn travail, to notice its significance-
"I shall try to reconcile myself to see you both made happy; while I shall walk aside in the cold isolation of my duties to my mission among women."

Manton, who had expected a much more sultry and formidable climax to this critical scene, felt his heart bound with the sense of relief, as, when after all this exhausting watch over that dumb and sleepless flow of tears, the calm and unexpected philosophy of this conclusion came to his consolation. He had anticipated a frantic, obstinate collision; perhaps as savage as it might prove tragical. And his grateful surprise may be conceived at the result.

- So soon as this result had been attained, he hastened to impart the news to Elna, whose approach to her mother, while in this condition, had been studiously guarded against by Manton. When he saw her, now, in ber own room, to which he eagerly hastened, she sprang about bis neck, exclaiming-
"Will she bear it? Can she live?"
"My darling, she has passed through a terrible struggle, but she has now awakened to a recognition of what is, and has been, and must continue to be, the falsehood of her purposed relation to me."
"Ah!" exclaimed the joung girl rapturously, clasping his neck still closer-" ${ }^{4}$ Now I may dare to love you an much as I please ! ${ }^{3 n}$

CHAPTER XXIII.

ANOTHER MNTRIGUE.

Wrrit all the apparent amount of suffering which we hnve attempted to describe above, Manton was no little astonished, not only at the promptness and completeness of the recovery of the woman Marie, but at the shortness of the time which she permitted to elapse before he found her again engaged deep in a bold and characteristic intrigue.

He had immediately determined that Elna should be separated from him until the time of the proposed marriage had approached. While she was to be sent to New England to prosecute her studies under the charge of an artist friend, he himself proposed to spend the greater part of the year in the northem mountains, hunting, fishing and exploring.

But before this prudent and proper step could be taken, a week or so of preparation became necessary. It was only a week since the woman had risen from her bed, a showery Niobe, as we have seen, when Manton entered the house one morning at an hour when he was not expected, he met the woman gliding hastily through a passage, with one of the sleeves of her dress gone. The meaning of this sign at once flashed across him, for he remembered to have seea that fair and beautiful arm, by skilful accident, exposed to his own gaze during her first attempts at diverting and exciting his passions, and he shrewdy conceived that there must be some new victim on hand, even already.
"Ha!" said he maliciously, as she was hurrying past. "Why, what's become of your sleeve this morning ?"

The woman flushed very red, and ber eye turned obliquely upon him as she muttered confusedly-
"I-I've lost it!"
${ }^{\text {" }} \mathrm{Ah}$, well, come! Let us look for it! Let us find it! The morning is ton cold! I will help you! I fear you will suffer!"
"No, no, never mind! I will find it myself!"
"But I insist! We must find it at once, before you take cold! Come, we will look in the parlor!" And he made a movement of his outstretched hand as if to open the door.

She clutched him nervously, saying in a low whisper-
"Don't go in there, I have a visitor!"
But as Manton only smiled at this and showed no disposition to desist, she continued in an imploring voice-
"Don't go in! Mr. Narcissus, the editor, is there! I will get the sleeve and put it on immediately! Don't disturb us now; I am just reading to him the MS. of my new novel, which I hope he will undertake to publish in his paper!""
"Well," said Manton, quietly stepping back, "it must be confessed you are prompt in finding alternatives! I wish you success in your new publishing enterprise! And I suppose this bare arm is to have nothing to do with his anticipated commentory upon your text!"

Manton turned away with a light laugh, but the look which was sent after him would have chilled his very soul could he have met it. His sneering conjecture was only too true. She had already fastened upon a new victim. But for once it turned out that it was "file cut file." She had at last met her equal in all that was detestable-her peer in baseness, and only an under-graduate to her in cunning.

She had elected him the did all her victims, with reference to social and pecuniary position. He was at the time coeditor and ostensible part-owner of one of the caom brilliant and succemful weekly papers of New York. She had always aspired to command an "organ." And anything in that line, from a review down to a thumb-paper, to ber rentess ambition, was better than nothing. For by a procesw more hideous to the world than anomalous in fact, the bad come to reconcile any degree of private intrigue, by balancing it with the walue of abtract teachinge for the public good, under that liberal postulate of the school to which ahe belonged, that the end justifies the means.

In eeting herself down for a regular siege before this news. paper establishment, she had first in her eye, all three of the associate owners. It was a matter of entire indifference to her, through which she succeeded in obtaining an entrance to its columns, which might lead to her control of the future tone of the paper. She opened the investment in the usual form; first, by viiting them alone, in their offices; then by bombarding them, from the distance of her own writing-table, with a connant hail of tho snow-white missives, with the sugared contente of which we have before been made acquainted.

They were each privately and successively pronounced in their own ears, and under seal of those crow-quilled envelopew, to be "naughty boys," whose proud and wilful natures were driving them headlong to ruin-to be sons of genius, who only required to be saved from themselves and their own vices, by her, to become the illustrious reformers of the age! One of them smoked too much-was making a "chimney of his nose," through which he was exhaling mpiritual mightiness, that might equalise him with the cherubim, if only free! But this unhap pily did not tell; the llrewd and wary business-man, who knew more about coppers than cherubin, and was by no means concioum of the spiritual prowess she so pathetically atributed to him; " mmoked" her, or her motive at least, and threw the dainty correspondence aside, with a jeering laugh.

The other, who was really chief editor, and handsome and talented fellow, might not have got off so well, had he not been pre-occupied, and predisposed to bestow the exalted attributes which she had discovered in him, in another direction. He was duly grateful to her, bowever, for the discovery that he was a child of genius; and, though a little disposed to be suspicious, could not, for some time, restrain the expression of his delight at having met with a lady possessing such unquestionable and extraordinary discrimiaation.

He was a jovial and generous fellow, though very shrewd and suaspicious withal. She was not quite aware of the last two attributes, and therefore expected a great deal from him, as he proverbially drank too much. She therefore opened her batteries mercilessly upon this weakness, which, as she affirmed, combined with the horrible practice of chewing to excess, was demonising an "Archangel! Dragging down the loftiest spirit of his age! A spirit that might guide the destinies of the human race, and rule it, whether for evil or for good." She particularly desired his salvation. She prayed for it, day and night! She had a spiritual monition that he could be saved; and the fact was, he would be saved, if he would only listen to her counsel! Indeed, she might guarantee be should be saved, if he would only give up his poisons, and dedicate the columns of his paper to the great cause of progressive hygiene and popular physiology. In a word, the fact was, he must be saved, whether he wanted to be or not!

But the trouble was, our editor was a person who would do nothing on compulsion. And when be found that such a powerful edict had gone forth, that he must be saved, he swore, in his benighted obstinacy, that he would be -_ if he would!

This led, through his spleen, to an explanation between himself and the business-man of the firm, and what was their mutual astonishment, on privately comparing "notes," to find that one was absolutely a "Cherubim," and the other an "Archangel !" They looked at each other with a blank stare of surprise. The tawney, lean, angular, iron-jawed face of the busi-ness-man suggested anything but the plump and dimpled outlines of that prolific progeny of winged infants, which Haphael has rendered so illustrious. While, in contrast, the features of the young editor were remarkable for their plump and childlike freshness.
"Why!" shouted the business-man, with a tremendous guffaw, "there's a great mistake here - she has clearly misdirected the notes. You should be the cherub!"

The breath of a simultaneous roar of laughter dissipated all her fine-spun web, in these two directions at least. She was more successful, however, with the third party.

Manton had been deceived, egregiously, in regard to this man's past history, or he would never have permitted him to pass the threshold of the house where he lived. He had known him only as ostensibly associate editor of a highlyrespectable paper, and therefore had not felt himself called upon to interfere in any way. Although he had, as we have perceived, early indications of his having become a frequent visiter at the house.

To have gone any higher in her classification of him than she had already gone in that of his associates, would have puzzled any less versatile genius than hers. But as cherubim and archangel had already been used up, she placed him among the "principalities and powers in heavenly places," and there be decided to stick. It was certainly time for him to be pleased with elevation of some sort, for, as it turned out afterwards, when his history became better understood by Manton, he was one of those slugs, or barnacles of the press, that cling about and slime the keels of every noble and thought-freighted bark. From the precarious and eminently honourable occupation of writing obscene books for private circulation, "getting up" quack advertisements, interpolating the pages of Paul De Kock with smeanngs of darier filth than ever his mousing vision had yet discovered in the sinks and gutters of Paris, he had gradually risen, through his facile availability, to the sub rosa respectability of a well-paid " sub" in a respectable office-1 say sub rosa, for it seems to have been well understood, in New York, that the appearance of his name, at the head of the columns of any paper, would be sufficient to damn it, outright, so linked had it become with sneaking infamy of every sort.

However, this "child of geaius" and Madame progressed bravely towards a mutual understanding; and billets-doux flew between them thick as snow-flakes. As for their contents, the reader is, by this time, pretty well prepared to conjecture. Interviews, from weekly to semi-weelly, crowded fast upon each other's heels; until, at last, Manton began to perceive that, not only was the sleeve lost every day, but that the new novel, like the pious labor of the needle of Penelope, "grew with its growth."

About this time, however, it came to his knowledge, that this highly respectable literary personage, Mr. Narcissus, had been as notoriously abject in his private relations as he had been in those to the press. However, as be had determined to drag Elna from beneath the clutches of her mother, and to sever all remote, or even possible connection between them, he did not feel himself called upon to do more than announce the fact to Madame that the fellow was even now an infamous stipendiary to a party no less infamous than himself, who had privately furnished him, out of her ill-gotten gains, the money to buy his share in the weekly paper she was so ambitious of controlling, through him. As he had now to expect, she received the news with the most refreshing coolness, and merely remarked, that it was no fault of hers that this bad woman had loved Mr. Narcissus; that he possessed great talent in affairs; could be made of much use in the cause of buman progress and advancement -in a word, deserved to be saved, and to save him she meant. She should rescue him from such gross and debasing association, , nd give to him montoning energiek a nobler bent; that thin future life, under ber inmpiration and guidance, mould be maale tos atone for the pasat.

Thin logic seemed wo very conclunive and characteristic, that Manton made no reply, but mhudder, at the thought of that saving procem, to which, dempicable be wam, new victim wam to be subyected. Hut it was no part of his plan to divert ber from ber purpone; for he wisheed, by all means, to see her metive mad dangeroum energiem employed in any direction, save that of the mubvernion and counteraction of hit own design in regard to her daughter.
 undermanding between Manton and herself, that the would by no mean condent to return to her mother, until he himetf mould rome back from hie tour, and mould mend for her. He did not dure to trust her for an hour heneath the accursed Hadow of thit domentic Uipan, that had given ber birth; and noore particularly did be dread the hideons combination of in fuencea which were likely now to be brought to bear upon her, - Madum had openly announced her intention, since she had obtaned divorce from her former humband, to marry the delectable Narcinuum.

We may an well dispone of thiw aflair at once, by remarking, that in laf few monthe afterward whe did marry him ; that the unm fortunate woman, who had heretofore wo long lived with and loved Narcinsum, intantly withdrew the support which her ill gotten gminm furnished; mod that, amerting her right to the shmre which be had pretended to own in the properfy of the paper, and dinclosing the whole of him infany to him former partners, the cherubim mad archangel indignantly kicked him ont of doorm, and at once toppled alout the montonimed cart of Madame wll her ratien in the air reared, with regard to "controlling a powerfil orgnn."

Rut Madame, 解 we have perceived, whe pomemed of one of thom elantic naturem which mwave rebound from collinionw, or which, in a word, "never say die;" wo that, instead of being discouraged by this untoward conclusion of her ambitions schemes, she set herself to work forthwith to make the best of a bad bargain; and, as she had already exhibited her passion for professignal spouses, in immediately converting her furst and dear Ebenezer, into an M. D., she could not do less than make a Doctor out of her beloved Narcisens.

It did not matter to her that both of them were ludicrously ignorant - that neither of them had probably ever read a book clear through in their lives; parchments were dog-cheap in New York, and could be had any day for an equivalent in hard coin. She accordingly "put him through;" and in something less than three months, one more legalised murderer was turned loose upon society, under the cabalistic regis of M. D:

CHAPTER XXIV.

beanimation.

Amidst the green and savage solitude of pine-haired hills, wild-bounding streams, and islet-fretted lakes, asleep, 'twixt gleam and shadow, where the bellowing moose still roused the echoes, and the light deer whistled to the brown bear's growl, and the trout leaped, flashing from its clear, still home, Manton renewed his life once more, in refreshing communion with nature.

It was not till now that he realised how terribly he had suffered during his long and hideous bondage. His physical bealth bad been shockingly impaired; the elasticity of his constitution seemed to be gone forever; but it was only in the presence of Nature, with whom there are no disguises, that he could first comprehend, in all its ghasliness, the mental and spiritual deterioration that had gradually supervened. He scarcely knew himself, now that he had found his way back to the only standard of comparison. He was profoundly humiliated, but not utterly despairing.

He felt his chest already beginning to play more freely, and a deadly sense, as if a thousand years of suffocating oppression had lain upon his lungs, was beginning to be dissipated before the pure air of the mountains, and the exciting pre-occupations of angling and the chase, in the rough wilderness-life he now led; and beside, there was the image of that wizard child, that had so grown in beauty beneath his hand, that sat forever in his beart, glowing and fair, to warm it with a new life of hope. How studiously his fancy exalted her. Each fortnight brought him a package of her daily letters; and though in spite of his isolation, and his idealising enthusiasm, as he eagerly read and re-read them all a thousand times, and carried thern near him beart, to kcep the glow there all alive, be could not help realising at times, with mournful presentiment, their hollowness, the entire absence of ingenuousness and natural dignity which mostly characterised them. He would feel his flesh creep strangely too, as he recognised their close resemblance in artificiality of sentiment and tone, to those first letters he had received from her mother.

But he earmestly strove to banish all such impressions; he felt as if they were profane, as if they were a monstrous wrong to her, as well as to himself. That she was too young as yet to have developed into the full faculty of expression; that she was timid, and dared not trust berself to speak freely out ; that she feared his sharp criticism, and did not say everything that her soul moved her to speak ; that she dreaded his analysis; and, in a word, had not quite overcome, in her feelings towards him, the instinctive apprehension of the master, the preceptor, which so long lingers in a youthful mind; and this very timidity, of all things, he was desirous of removing, as he felt that, so long as it remained in her mind, the full and entire reciprocation of confidence, which the jealous exclusiveness of passion demands, could not take place. He felt that it was a most hazardous experiment he had been unconsciously making, in thus attempting to develope and educate a wife, especially under circumstances so unusual and ill-omened. He therefore fatally persisted in blaming himself for the self-evident shallowness of Elna's letters; and would not hear to the whispers of his common sense, that the child was a mere chip of the old block.

So that still, in spite of his determined idealisation of ber, while these evidences stared him in the face with each new, yearned-for, and eagerly-welcomed budget of letters from her, they only served to fill him, to a more sensitive degree, with the dangers of this excessive timidity, and the necessity of greater spiritual activity and tenderness of treatment on his part, that might arouse her to a more full realisation of the sacred confidences which love implies. His letters to her overflowed with natural eloquence; and all that was chastening, ennobling, fair and pure, in the inspirations surrounding him, were lavished in the prodigality of an absorbing and overflowing affection upon this fair, hollow idol, that his passion alone had rendered all divine.

This brooding, constantly and long, upon a single image, amidst the solemn privacies, the wild and drear solemnities of primeval nature, was quite sufficient to give, in time, to any nature possessing the intensity of that of Manton, a sultry tinge of monomania in reference to it. This was clearly the case with him now. Her image, glorified through his imagination, now filled all his life; he saw her everywhere-where the beautiful might be, it took some shade of semblance to her-where the wild-flowers gave out their odors to the breeze, it was to him the aroma of her presence; when the wild berry tingled his palate in a nameless ecstacy of flavor, the taste was of his sense of her, when, in their last kiss, her lips were touched to his.

But it is a strange thing that, with all the fervor of this passional attraction, he never dreamed of ber at all; she never came to his soul when his senses were asleep. This single fact might have warmed a man ci janagnacion exirec ذa
 it enabled him, br a suxde chery framed out in the wilderues

Elna had returned and met him Hias: how his beart sant as, on the meeting, he fit the ranbow-hues an meliing form out the visionary stry, and he tooir inoo his arms a cuid, oreracting, artificial semblano of his passionate ideal! He felt as if the sky had torned to lead, and fallen oa hiva; and the first inage recalled to his mind, was of the sich and monkey-imp, souliess and animal-eyed, that he had years ago rescued, in compassion, from the demon-talons of the mother. He clurched her aesperately to his heart, endeavoring to recall the soul he missea, and that she had lost, while he had been away. He felt as if there were fire enough in his own veins to make a soul - to fill that delicate and graceful organisation with a subtler element, that might answer to the ravin of his sympathies.

No such response as he yearned for came; but be felt instantly, from the contact of her hand, that fierce and sultry thrill, the memory of which had lingered so long with him, tinging his imagination with a lurid light amidst the white clear calm of nature's inspirations. He would not give up now; he had loved too long already-or, rather, the habit of confounding passion with love, had become too confirmed with him, for it to be readily possible that he should make the clear distinction between images nurtured in his own mind and the objective reality. It was his own mistake; he had expected too much of the child-he must give her time to gain confidence and apeak out herself.

Infatuated man! She only wanted a few hours' contact to speak out himself to himself, through the Odic medium!

And so it proved. Her organisation soon took the keymote from his, and, in a few hours, responded as rapturously as he could desire, to the most vehement expressions of his enthusiam.

First and foremont, she showed to him the drawings that whe had made during their long probation. Among them were some, so characterised by firm, exquisite delicacy of handling, that Manton regarded them with delighted wonder,-more especially as the defect in Elna's pencilling, which he had always noticed and lamented, had been precisely contrasted with the excellencen here displayed. Elna's had, with all its gay and mocking eccentricity, always been trembling and uncertain. The want of smooth and poised directness in her harsh, rude handling, had often been contrasted by him in his lewsons to her, upon art, with the clear, firm, and mathematical precision of the lines of Moione. He could not but exclaim impulsively, on examining them curiously -
"Why, dearest, you have equalled the brightest excellence of the style of Moione in these. Ah, how I love you for this! you are deserving of all that 1 have dreamed and thought and felt of you, since I have been away."

The blushing girl slid into his embrace; and that moment was to Manton a sufficient compensation for all the self-degradation and the humiliating conditions through which he had passed. He was now to attain the coveted crown and glory of his life, as he conceived. An artist-wife! Capable, inspired, true, and a "help-mate" indeed, through whose assistance and tutored skill he might embody in realisation those fleeting and majestic creations which visited him, not alone in dreams, but in the real impersonations of his habitual thought. It had been a dream of such chaste beanty, that all these visionary forms might be transfigured to him in the alembic of art, through love, and become, in form and color, fireside realities of the canvass.

We shall see how vague and emply was this fanciful dream, as yet.

CHAPTERXXV

Had it ever occurred to Manton to reaton at all upon the nubject of him passion for this girl Eina, or had it been poosible for him, under the circumntance which had lately wurrounded him life, to reamon conceming her, in any mense, he must and would have felt how ominous wuch a passion in reality was. To be wure, he did not feel that the relations into which it had been attempted to drag him by the mother, had ever been volumtary or accepted on his part; he had loathed and rebelled againt them from the first.

But this did not, in reality, male the fact of him having continued near her-to occupy the same house-any the lem oflenwive to the moral mente; for, tuking the betat ampects of the came; the durance had not been a physical one, and he might, if he had so willed, bave walked himself bodily off, and thus eccaped this horible entanglement; but he had not done so. Although we heve endeavored, an mome exienuation, to trace the reamone Why he had not thus acted, yet we have found no excueve unfincient, in all this, for the new sin he bas committed, in daring to love, and contemplating honorable mmriage, even, with the duughter of much a mother. But we have naught to extenuate, naught to wet down in malice, in this too fatally true narrative; we have related it becaume it is true, and becaune we felt it to be our duty to do w, that othery might be warned of the thingw, which may, perhapm, enlighten the reader sormewhat, to the character of the new thraldom to which Manton has been mubjected.

It muat alwayw be bome in mind, in mpeaking of Manton and ceemaring him action, that mithough the mervoum wanguine temperament predominated to an extraordinary degree in this man's organisation, the tendencies of his mind were, nevertheless, unusually conservative. This rendered him, necessarily, a man of habits; and therefore, more than usually liable to suffer from gradual and constant encroachment: for, if his quick sense has not instantly detected the danger on its first presentation-if his ear has not recognised the serpent's hiss at once among the flowers, his fearless hand would soon be caressing the ahining reptile, and bear it, it might be, even to his own bosom. It was this tenacity of habits which had rendered him so easy to be imposed upon. Nothing was so difficult for him to throw off as a habit; for, from the intensity of his nature, it always cost him the suffering of a strong excitement before its chains could be broken.

Manton found, very soon after his return, that what he most dreaded now, was to be at once precipitated, which was a separation between himself and Elna. Not that he did not fully concede to the general propriety and prudence of such a step; for he remembered that he had at once proposed the previous separation, when he came to understand the nature of his feelings towards her; but that had been when she was to be placed beyond the reach of her mother, and they could be both out of town at the same time; but now that his business made it imperative for him to remain in New York, if be dreaded before lest she be left with the mother one day even, were not the same causes operating still, and with redoubled force, when, in addition to her baleful contact, he had to contemplate that of the creature she had married?

The moral and spiritual grime of such a contact wes enough to blast an angel's bloom - to sully the purest wing that ever winnowed dream. He must be there to shield his fair treasare always, till the time had come when be could snatch ber for ever beyond their reach. But the war had now fairly opened.

On the very day of his return, Manton had been not a litue astonished to find the heretofore abject and cringing mother tum

```
#m= %% %-M
```

```
**)
```

```
    1 3
```

speculations, would not fully coincide with him in his view of the policy of defeating Manton, who, in the event of success, would be sure to separate her from them as far as the poles are sundered?

We shall now see how far the young lady herself was likely to, or had already, become & party to such utilitarian views.

Manton had left the house, and taken board elsewhere. The mame evening, he visited Elna, who received him alone, in the warm, well-lighted, and neatly-arranged parlor. Manton had come in the most hopeless mood, for all the results of this separation had been most fully and painfully impressed upon him since the first indication of the rupture that had led to his quitting the house.

The young girl sprang eagerly to meet him, and with a bounding caress clasped his neck, exclaiming -
"Dearest one, you must not look so sad! We are to have the parlor thus every evening, when you shall come to see me; when we shall be very stately and proper foll. I shall play the dignifed matron in anticipation, and you shall be my very wise and solemn lord and master. Mother is not to permit any interruption, and we shall have such nice and easy times. Come, sit down here by my side, and let us begin to play stately. And clear up that gloomy brow of yours, for I am determined that we shall be happy!"

Manton could only smile faintly, as he seated himself.
${ }^{66}$ Ah, heedless child, you do not see in all this gay vision, the black and deadly realities that couch within its shadows! I understand your mother's game fully. This will not last long; and you are about to be sorely tried, my little love?"

His head fell back heavily, and his eyelids drooped with an expression of unutterable despondency. Elna, who had been watching him eagerly, now flew to his side, and taking his head gently on her shoulder, commenced caressing his face in a peculiar manner. She did not absolutely touch it, but her lips crept over certain portions with a slow snake-like motion, while the deep heavings of her chest, disclosed that she was breathing heavily upon them, and a certain greenish dilation of the pupil of her eyes revealed-what? Ah, horror! and she so young! What? what! is that the mother's art? Let us see.

The lines of the man's face are sunken in the expression of hopeless prostration. Soon a slight twitching of the nerves becomes evident, then a faint smile breaks across its pallor; the inspirations become deeper, and she breathes with almost convulsive energy. The glowing air lingers and burns along the sensitive temple, and now it pauses on the cheek, close beside the ear-ha! her arm is about his neck; is it a wonder that the blood mounts flushing to that man's cheek and forehead, that his eyes fly open filled with wild and vivid fires, that a shuddering thrill is running through his frame, as he stretches forth his arms to her, with a low, ecstatic laugh, of passionate yearning, while she clings about him, and their lips meet, in a burning, lingering kiss, and then, with a light laugh, she springs beyond his reach, and dances in tantalising mockery about him, permitting him but to touch her for a moment, eluding his grasp, with yet more subtle sleight, until exhausted by morbid excitement the unfortunate man sinks upon the sofa?

This picture is only but too real. But why should Manton have endured the repetition of a scene like this? He was a man of habits, and for years, before a thought of passion had for once intruded upon him, this young girl, under the sacred shield of childhood, had been taught to approach him with fondling caresses. There seemed no danger then, but when the real time for danger came, he felt a vague and general monition of it, yet failed to locate it where it really rested. These caremsew had become so dear and natural to him; they secmed so harmless.

He blamed only himself, cursed only the unetherialised grono ness of his own nature. There was to him far too much of affection and accustomed tenderness in all thim to arouse him sutw picions for a moment. He hated only himself, and wtrove on each of thete now frequent occasions, to chasten, by the severest self-inflicted penance, his own soul.

In the meanwhile, this modern Tantalus grew thinner and more pale each day; was wasting rapidly to a shadow, beneath such scenes as we have witnessed.

The girl, Elna, grew fairer and more strong each dayseeming to have fed upon his slow consumption.

We will not dwell upon such pictures farther. It was enough that all the consequences dreaded by Manton followed, in slow, but sure progression, and that the last blow the subtle couple struck at him was fully characteristic and consummated the meparation.

Elna had seen little, as yet, of public amusements, and her strong imitative faculty had led her to express a passion for the stage, which Manton greatly dreaded, and had particularly wished to guard her against, until her mind should become more fully developed, and until he, himself, should possess the legal right to attend her, upon all such occasions. He had, therefore, at all times resolutely opposed her going to any public place of amusement, unless he could accompany her. But now it happened that, being engaged in bringing out a new work, with the press only twenty-four hours behind him, urging him inexorably for a certain amount of daily matter, which left him no leisure whatever, except a few moments, which he wrested from the vortex, for the short evening re-union with her he so loved, be had, therefore, no time left to accompany her to such places.

Here the enterprising couple saw at once their advantage; the mother understood what Manton did not, the extreme shallowness of the character he had thus perseveringly idealised. She at once laid siege to her passion for dress and display, as well as novelty. They bought her fine and showy clothes, and urged her first to accompany them to concerts, then to theatres, and then to public balls.

When the young girl first came to Manton, all flushed with eagerness, to show him her finery, and ask him if she might not of time she migh renaie to riccise sut puce wid Ler, the still urged that she did nat gee wivin way fropei for ber to accompany the man whom her motion had maried, io any public place-that her dre wee so beaiful-that she wished to attend this magniniozt concert

 "papa."

Manton sighed hearily and coly maswered in a mournfal voice to her repeated entreaties-
"A Alas! poor child, my dream mearly over! I see they have bought you with the winsel of a fine dress and new ribbons!"

The child wept and fondled and caressed; but all her arts failed this time. His heart felt like lead within him; and he no longer had nerves with life enough to be played upon. But she went that night, nevertheless, and the great gulf had sunk im= passably between them.

Manton was now again a madman. In the pride of his hopeful love he had built magnificent schemes, which his singular energies had rapidly placed upon the firm basis of realisation; it only required the calm exercise of his own will to consummate all and make his name illustrious. But he had not labored for himself-and she, for whom all had been achieved, was no longer his-she was gone-utterly gone! She had sold her birthright, and was no longer his. The world became dark, ifm bonors and its ambitions as nothing. To recount the will mund desperate extravagance by whith he dashed to earth wll that he had achieved, as the heartless and hideous shallownm of tha 19*.
phantom soul he had been worshipping, became, with each day, more apparent, would be only painful to the reader, who can well understand what to expect from the recklessness of such a madman. Suffice it that the separation was complete. He last saw her, but for an instant, on her eighteenth birth-night, to commemorate which, the mother, in pursuance of her schemes, had assembled a large party at her house. This was to have been their wedding-night; and Manton, though long since hopelessly separated from her, could not resist the passionate desire to see once more, upon this night, to which he had so long looked forward with holy raptures, that face and form.

He rang the bell, and, by a curious instinct, she recognised the characteristic pull, and met him alone at the door. She was lovely, radiant even, as she had sometimes come to him in his wild imaginings. Dressed in pure white, with w wreath of flowering myrtle resting lightly on her brow. There was a look of exultation on her face which she had not been able to throw ofif, as she came forth from the admiration of the crowded room. Manton took her hand -
"Ah, child, you are very lovely now - you look just as I dreamed you would look on this night, when you were to have been my bride. My eyes are filled with blood, now! I cannot see you any more! Farewell! farewell!" and he rushed from the door into the dark street, while she, who had spoken no word, made no attempt to detain him, turned coldly back, and entered, with a beaming face, the scene of her new triumph.

CHAPTER XXVI.    DESPAN.  ${ }^{4}$ The white feet of sugels yet upon the hills. ${ }^{3}$

Mowrtis and months had passed, and yet this wretched man was staggering on, not this time drunk, literally, but, as though blinded by red blood ooring from his brain, which had beem crushed by the weight of this blow. He was wandering vaguely hither and yon, distracting his brain in ineffectual chimeras, the very impossibilities of their success affording to him their greatest attraction. But gradually all this maddened struggle bad been wetling down into one sultry, close, inevitable comclusion of sullen self-destruction, which must result from the continued precipitation, upon conditions that promised death in one form or other. He went to Boston while the cholera was raging there at its worst. The preteace of the visit was some wild, distracting scheme that he had seized upon, and in which he was endeavoring to secure comperation there.

But unfortunately for his mad purpose, since that very separation from daily contact with the girl Elna, which was working *o sadly upon his imagination now, his attenuated and exhausted physique had rapidly recovered all its inherent vigor, and in animal health and strength he had suddenly become, by an inezw plicable reaction, more prodigally abounding than ever for many years. So that fate seemed to have closed up to him any ordinary means of getting rid of himself, except the pistol and the dagger, from the use of which his manliness unconquerably revolted.

But by a strange process of self-delusion, he had managed to confound himself into the idea that the abject cowardice of the act of suicide might be avoided by a species of half unconscious indirection; For instance, cholera was nife in the city, and he.
well knew that long warm baths, by relaxing the system, would lay it more open to the attacks of any epidemical tendencies that might be prevalent; and accordingly, without ever venturing to explain to himself why, he continued, day after day, to take these long hot baths, and then to eat and drink, in the quietest possible way, everything that was specially to be avoided at such a time.

While this novel proces was thus coolly progressing, he one morning met, by the merest accident, on State Street, a person whom he knew to have been long and intimately the friend of the lost Moione and her family. Manton eagerly asked him if he knew where she could now be found; for, strange enough, her calm image had lately intruded often into the darkened ristas of his thought, from whence he had supposed her banished long ago.

Her address was promptly given: it was in a remote and humble district of the city; and, although Manton already felt the seeds of the disease, which he had thus pertinaciously invited, rioting within him, yet he vowed to himself that he would at once seek her. His first visit failed; but the second found her, thin and wan, stretched on a lounge, awaiting she knew not whom.

With a short cry of sudden joy, as she recognised his features, she sprang to meet him, as of old, with a childish caress. Ah, why was it that he felt such sullen cold, and yet saw light, falling like star-beams upon the midnight of his soul, as his arms met this fond and childish clasp? He did not understand it - but we shall see!

The physical results, which he had so assiduously courted, could not be avoided. As he had walked about among his friends already for several days, with the premonitory symptoms of the fatal epidemic fully developed in his system, and as fully understood by himself, yet without the adoption, on his own part, of one single precautionary step, it was now sure to wrealk its worst. Some, who could not help observing his ghastly ap-lesty mwan

 couct "\%

Monome wa wicuman
 been detwined

 Manton; and the blacie lear of the might ouasike only nervo sponded to the convalsed and writhing aymiows which mow tossed him to and fro, in belpless, but most murfal usporive. The thunder crashed, and the frail house shook, und the thersw pangs shot along his quirering nerves, as vividly is any blindinft burgt of lightning from without. The darkness which witm rounded him had been penetrated by a calm, pure liph, thut dimmed not nor trembled before the blinding bint. A voitoms the sot, clear, cheerful tones of which viluruten nut fir Ihm quick rattling of thunder-crashes from without, thlit hin of strength and hope, of peace and calm finturs', in thr lifo ym beyond him on the earth--that he could not dive now, num mbull not!-until his will became electrifed wifh surw impmimm, wil own invitation, possessed him; and, illunubuded whil m molling and rapid intellection, he directed her how to baffle every paroxysm of cramp as it rose.

It is sufficient, he was thus sustained by light applications of cold-water, until the passing of the storm enabled ber to summon to his aid a physician, whose skilful application of the same powerful remedy, even in the "blue-stage" of collapse into which Manton had now fallen, sufficed to relieve him from the disease, with the vital principle yet striving in his frame; though many days must elapse before those starry eyes, that held sleepless watch above him, could impart to his dimmed and incredulous consciousness sufficient strength to enable him to lift his hand, in vague and mournful wonder that he still possessed a being.

Ah , what an awakening was this! Deep, deep, beneath the realms of shadow - dark and deep - he had lain in long and dumb oblivion of consciousness. He knew not that he lived; it was a blank of rayless rest-a peace without sunshine. How profound! how unutterably still! What a contrast with the ceaseless, dreadful tension of the moiling chaos of past years, during which the passions had never slept, but, through his very dreams, had moaned in the weariness of strife. Alas! the rebellious beart, which struggleth in unyielding pride with life, refusing to concede to its conditions, how it must suffer? The world know little of the life-long horrors of that fight - the unidealizing world, the conservative, the compromising world. It little dreams what this self-immolating madman must endureto what nights of sleepless thought, to what days of bleak and sullen isolation-walking apart from sympathies that are distrusted and scorned, yet yearned for-hating nothing, yet loving nothing which is warmed in the embrace of earth, because that earth may be accursed in his sight: its barren bosom has not yielded to his exacting soul the flowers and streams and echoing groves of the Utopia it has framed within him.

This is the unpardonable sin of pride! He dares to treat with contempt a world that will not turn to his inspired voice, and live as he has dreamed it might live. It is not to be wondered at, that the bolts fall thick and fast about him; but when we see his pale brow scathed and seamed with many a stunning stroke, while his hollow eyes yet glitter with a deathless and defiant fire-when we think of the mortal tension of his unsympathised life -oh, should we not remember, that this painful warrior has been batting, not for base lucre, not for selfish ends, but for the beautiful, as it has been revealed to him - the true, as lue has felt it-for the ideal in bim; and that, though wretched and suffering and wan, it is, after all,

> The of such stafig na he, Thode are made.

It is of his suffering that his prowess comes-of his experiences, his themes-of his solitude, his reach and radiance of thoughtof his strong will, his conquering flight at last. Do not think to pity him; may-be he is pitying you. Do not attempt to "save" him ; it may be, it is you who will be damned in the effort. Only let him alone-do not persecute him. Let his pride passthat is what sustains him; but for that, he would be like you, a mere "compromise." Give him the same chance that you give to others around you, and, although you may not understand him now, only give him time, he will make you understand him; it may be, in wonder and in joy.

But this waking-but this waking of the weary man! Was it a new birth-a new resurrection-or, a mere waking from a light sleep, without a dream? The world upon which his abrinking vision now opened wrail filled with sunshine - he was blinded with the glory thereof. He closed his thin eyelids, and the splendor came through them, all rosy-hued and dimmed, that he could bear it; but there was a starlight for him too, and he could bear its calm effulgence better.
Yes, there were two stars, and they were tempered, that they might neither freeze nor slay his feeble life. When they came orer him, as he lay in a half-trance of weakness, be could feel them through his eyelids and upon his heart; and they were warm, and he felt his heart warna, as buds to the unfolding spring. A dim-remembered music flowed into his soul, faint and dim, but oh, sweetly mellowed, that he might not die !

There was a rustling, too,-it was as of a tempered wind,and a soft touch; it sent no thrill, but it was of healing-it sunk into his life in strength. A strange, balsamic tenderness, like a new sense of peace and joy, pervaded all his being-and a new growth set in apace, and a dim remembrance of ancient strength flitted into his thought.
$\mathrm{Ah}, \mathrm{ha}$ ! this wondrous presence, what was it? Moione, the ministering Moione! It was she! Ever there, sleeping and awake, she leaned over him. When he dreamed, he dreamed of a fair spirit, that bung upon the air above him, on viewless wings, and ever, with still eyes looking upon his, shedding their soft radiance deep into his soul. No wonder that life, in switt, light waves, cane flooding in again; no wonder that the crushed and much-enduring man became as a child once more, and laughed out in the sunshine with a simple joy. The Present was sufficient unto him; he remembered not the Past now-the hideous, the spectre-haunted Past. What was it to him, when serene hope thus smiled? Ah, it was a happy time, that period of rapid convalescence. Yes, rapid, for his heart beat freely again. The natural sun could reach him; no lurid delusion, like miasmatic fog, hung over to intercept the rays.

They talked of the future, and peopled it with wild dreams, like children, until it all became as real to them as their own being.

There was a strange and mournful romance, connected with the origin of Moione's family, that pointed at possible realiza. tions in another country, through inheritance, that would be as gorgeous as the creations of Aladdin's lamp. They talked of these prospects as of facts assumed, and of all the highthoughted enterprises of the day which promised to be of true benefit to mankind, as already achieved, through their aid; and, with mannenimons simplicity, were already distributing hoarded mal ruting million to blem the world withal. Theme were gay day-dreams; but they were innorent, and, although they may mover be realized, they gave them juy-ingpitrd the yet fefole Manton with m fulure.

There could be but ome result to all this. Ilim health was papinlly reatored; and when Manton married Moione, which lue mon did, his moul now first found rest. The last that waw mpoken between them concerning Blna wan in a conversation mon after, when whe camually anked him-
"Bid Nom how you my drawing, when you came back from the North ?"
"Your drawingn? your drawings? She ahowed me arme, the delicacy and calm precision of which, I remember, vainly intoxicated me with dolight. Sut why do you ask, dear?"
"Why, mee carrief fff from me, shemt that fiste, certaim (udizen of buman anatomy, which I had olmberated muth, and which I valued. Am 1 have mever been able to recover them, wher repaterlly requenting their peturn, Ithought, wethap, she night bave whown them fo you, and then thrown them asule, thrench forgevinineme."
${ }^{4}$ Ah! ha!" 解ill Manton, " 1 remember now. They were of my recougution of the fact, that she did not porawe originally, mal mux have very mudenly secpuired, the comatitutional steradi-fine and erapisitely acevrate, I never dramed of invomition, of frow what whe bat molen of you, fa new and infinitely sigmifichen attribute, which I had hermoforf, epecially and hermemesly, in upite of my pranaiom, denied to her."

 the watipus which hawe existed betwern you; the dolusion in awer."

Such was the fact, indeed. Manton had at last found his artist-wife, and a true and woudrous artist did she prove indeed, realising his fond, high dream. Under this blessed and holy guardianship, he had returned fully to the realities of a true existence. He now saw, felt, and understood all that had occurred in that long shuddering dream; and this reality he had attained seemed only the more unutterably precious.

When the calm Moione revealed to him all the secret of the bleak and poverty-stricken desolation, in which he found her living, he was not at all astonished to find that her mother, who was a generous, trusting, noble-bearted zealot of Water-cure, had been another of the many victims of Boanerges Phospher, the "Spiritual Professor." He had not only stripped her widowed isolation of all the appliances of household comfort, which years of devoted and self-sacrificing labor had enabled her to collect and throw together, in respectable defence between her helpless children and common want, but had absolutely turned her out of doors, without evea spoon, or knife, or fork left her, of all this little property which she had thrown in rashly, perhaps, but earnestly, and with a noble dedication of her widow's mite, towards furnishing a Water-cure establishment.

The cause was one that she revered for the good that she knew, practically, it might accomplish; and Boanerges, who was in this case, as usual, profoundly ignorant of what he had undertaken to do, had availed himself of her well-known expenience and knowledge of Water-cure, just so long as sufficed to collect around him again a hirsute confederacy of faithful Amazons; the strength of which he thought would be sufficient to over-ride all opposition, and sustain him in the valorous assault upon helpless widowhood intended. He then openly claimed her property as his own, and the proud, uncomplaining mother of Moione was, of course, plundered of her all-victimised!

The sainted Boanerges soon met with a just retribution. The partner, to whom he had assigned, in trust, to stave off his creditors, all his claims upon this illustrious institution, and who, from the late chrymalim of a wulgar tailor, had undenly been ernancipated into an M. D. of Water-cure, at once aprung upon him him legal rights, under the trander, and he wai reduced ugain to beggary.

Sonee method wrented from him puerile mudiel of Swedenborg, ham no doubt, by thil time, and upon morme other tack, muggented to the "Spiritual Profemor" jumt enough of wimdom to cnable him to perwevere in "waviag" the elderly New Lightat of the hand.

We widh Boanerges happinee in hil new enterpriset; for, certainly, hie veratility at leaut command rempect.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Tue Editor finds that here the connected narrative of Etherial Softdown breaks off. Though there are many fragmentary notes, which he found in Yieger's Cabinet, which bear a clear, yet somewhat disconnected relation, to the past and future of the scenes and actors already described; these he has thought proper to collate, and throw together into something as nearly approaching order as their desultory character will permit.

This man Yieger seems to have been an enthusiast of a very unusual stamp. He has, however, left so little concerning himself, that we can only say, he appears to have made it his business to follow up, in a quiet and unsuspected way, a certain series of investigations, the purport and tendency of which was to unveil a class of crimes, which, from being secret, were enabled to work and worm their way nearest to the core of the social state.

Thus, in addition to the monstrous and unimagined vices described by him in the preceding chapters, he seems to have discovered secret combinations, the possibilities of which have probably never entered before into human brains, but the results of which were as prodigious as the causes were unsuspected. These were composed of no mystic demagogues of humanitarianism, who sheltered mere partisan and personal designs, under the broad curtain of secret rituals symbolising philanthropic aims; no bald enthusiasts, who soflly sunk their individualities in an Order, and sold their god-like birthrights of universal benevolence, of world-wide charity, for the golden shackles of a pretentious benevolence, the selfish code of which was, mutual protection first, and - nobody else afterwards!

These were wise, bold, hardened men-hardened in the rough contests by the highwars of life-who had seen all, felt all, and known all, that liee could give or take. They were prepared for any of its extremes, but had outlived its sympathies. They were incarnations of pare intellection; the accomplishment of the object was their conscience-they despised allegories, and they trampled upon symbols. Nothing was mysterious to them, but an undigested purpose. For them there was no law but that raight be eluded - no sanctities, but as they might be used - no religion but necessity, which was, to them, achievement!

When such men organised, they merely came together,-ten or a dozen of them,-they required no oaths, no pledges-they knew each other! "We hold such and such opinions upon one point only; and that one point is, mutual interest, and under that, 1st, that we can govern this nation; 2d, that to govern it, we must subvert its institutions; and, 3 d , subvert them we will! It is our interest; this is our only bond. Capital must have expansion. This hybrid republicanism saps the power of our great agent by its obstinate competition. We must demoralise the republic. We must make public virtue a by-word and a mockery, and private infamy to be honor. Beginning with the people, through our agents, we shall corrupt the State.
${ }^{6}$ We must pamper superstition, and pension energetic fanatio cism-as on 'Change we degrade commercial honor, and make 'success" the idol. We may fairly and reasonably calculate, that within a succeeding generation, even our theoretical scheme of republican subversion may be accomplished, and upon it ruine be erected that noble Oligarchy of caste and wealth for which we all conspire, as affording the only true protection to capital.
"Beside these general views, we may in a thoumand other wyw apply our combined capital to immediate advantage. We may buy up, through our agents, claims upon litigated entatem, uponit confiscated bonds, mortgages upon embarrawed property, land-claims, Government contracts, that have fallen into wewt 20 * hands, and all those floating operations, constantly within hail, in which ready-money is eagerly grasped as the equivalent for enormous prospective gains.
"In addition, through our monopoly of the manufacturing interest, by a rigorous and impartial system of discipline, we shall soon be able to fill the masses of operators and producers.with such distrust of each other, and fear of us, as to disintegrate their radical combinations, and bring them to our feet. Governing on 'Change, we rule in politics; governing in politics, we are the despots in trade; ruling in trade, we subjugate production; production conquered, we domineer over labor. This is the common-sense view of our interests - of the interests of capital, which we represent. In the promotion of this object, we appoint and pension our secret agents, who are everywhere on the lookout for our interests. We arrange correspondence, in cipher, throughcut the civilized world; 'we pension our editors and our reporters; we bribe our legislators, and, last of all, we establish and pay our secret police, local, and travelling, whose business it is, not alone yo report to us the conduct of agents already employed, but to find and report to us others, who may be useful in such capacity.
"We punish treachery by death!"
Such is a partial schedule of the terms of one of these terrible confederacies, as furnished in a detached note by Yieger, which held its secret sessions in New York city. He seems to have obtained a sight of some of their records, but by what means, the most daring could only conjecture. He appears to have regarded this particular organisation as the most formidable of all, and to have traced many of its ramifications, in their covert results, with a singularly dogged tenacity.

Among the extraordinary papers contained in the Cabinet he has left, are to be found short notes, containing what are clearly reports and proceedings of this formidable conclave. Its mysterious signature, Regulus, seems to have been known throughout the world; and even he, though clearly a fierce and relentless foe, never writes it, but with the involuntary concession of respect, which large, clear letters, underscored, would seem to convey.

Having now presented such an outline of the character and designs of this secret conclave, as the means of information furnished him have enabled him to do, the Editor will proceed with the promised extracts from its proceedings, such as relate to those in regard to whom the reader may be supposed to have some curiosity.

First, we have here

"4 NOTE CONCERNING ETERELAL SORTDOWN.

"This woman, whose patronymic was Softdown, first married a Quaker, named Orne; which name, atter her separation, and until after her divorce, she continued to bear, with the alias of Marie. She began her public career, soon after her marriage, as a Quaker preacher; but the straitness of this sect not conforming at all to her latitudinarian principles, she recanted in disgust, and left the society. She now plunged at once into Physiology, and, after a miraculously short gestation, produced a few lectures, with which she went the rounds of two or three New England States, accompanied by her husband, whom she, sans ceremonie, dubbed M. D., without putting him to the trouble of reading, or ever having read, a book on any subject. He officiated as ner doorkeeper, and received the 'shillings;' but, refusing to render any account of the proceeds, a furious feud grew up between them, and soon the war waxed hot and fierce.
"Finding this to be poor business on the whole, she deserted nim, taking her child with her. The next occupation in which we find her versatile genius engaged, was that of teaching French; a more humble employment, surely, but one for which she was equally well fitted. This, however, soon disgusted her, as her unreasonable patrons would insist upon the vulgar necessity of her being able to speak French, as well as teach it. It was at best but a tame avocation, and one entirely unsuited to her ambitious temper.
"Having now fairly assayed her wings for flight, she soared alof at once, in full career, through mid-air. She became first a preacher of Universalism; but meeting, about this time, with the celebrated Boanerges Phospher, she, in a few weelk, turned out full-plumed, as a lecturer on Elocution. To this she soon added a knowledge of Phrenology, which, in her active zeal, she took care to impart to the world, as fast as acquired, and in the same public manner.
"Then, as a natural consequence, came Mesmerism; then Neurology. Of all these sciences she became the prompt expounder, after a few days ${ }^{2}$ investigation.
"From this point she immediately ascended a step higher, and announced herself as a revelator in Clairvoyance; and, by an inevitable progression, she at once found admission, along with Andrew Jackson Davis and a host of other seers, into the Swedenborgian Arcana, and held herself on terms of frequent intercourse and positive intimacy with the angel Gabriel, and, indeed, the whole heavenly host.
${ }^{66}$ They revealed to her that the great and unpardonable sins of humanity were, first, eating pork; second, using tobacco, whether snuffing, smoking, or chewing; and, third, wine-drinking in all its forms. They accordingly commissioned her, formally, to go forth inte the world as a missionary, to warn zoankind against the fearful consequences of these vices, and to "save" them therefrom.
"The exposition of Grahamism and Bran-bread was now added to the enlarged circle of ber enlightened Professorships; and, by this aid, and that of her spiritual commission, she wrought wonders, in assailing the camps of the great foes of humanity-Pork, Tobacco, and Wine!
"Many were the brands plucked by her from the burning, or rather 'saved'- preachers, lawyers, editors, artists, and wateryeyed young gentlemen, in particular. It was on this grand tous that she first asummed her most distinguished attribute, the Paronete of Art-particularly of the Artists.
" Heturning to civilization once nore, she again asumed her cast-off Profesmormip of Phywiology, and began lecturing to clansem of her own mex. Now, with the first gleam of light from Grafenberg, she pronounced herself as having been, for many years before, a practitioner of the system; and at once proceeded to combine Grahamism, Memermm, Water-cure, and Phymiology.
"While in the vein of Physiolugy, whe almo lectured on the benefit of Amalgamation, Abolitionimm, and Nomresimance. About thin time, having met with one of the chief expounders of Fourierimm, whom whe almo undertork to 'save,' she turned out in a few week a Phalanyeterian lecturer. That hubble had barely exploded, whem whe carace forth a Communimt. Shortly afterwarlm, having one or two editors meparately undergoing the procem of being 'saved, she became authoress! She prom duced weveral physiological novelm, a number of essayw, poems, volume of lecturem, see.s sec.
"The police which obley the randatem of the formidable Ihrgulum, have kept the changes of this frminine Protens for now upward of forfy yearn, metcadily in view; and the Council of Disorganisation report, through their committee, that they have ample reason to be ploased with thin Etherial Sofdown, am the mont indefatigable, active, uncrupulous, and energctic of the agents of Demoralisation in the employment of the Secret Conclave.
"They congratulate themelver in the belief that, with an hundred nuch eumployteas devoted to their mervice, they could corm rupt the private faith and public virtue of the whole Union so effectually, in a wingle generation, am to cnable them to utterly destroy itm mocial organisation and subvert its Conmtitution.
${ }^{6}$ Thin would, of course, 符cure the denired Oligarchy of cante and wealu, and reduce the mation to serform.
"She is to be encouraged, and placed upon the pemion-limet of the "Secret Conclave."
"Since this report, the latest transformations of Etherial Softdown have been, frrs, into rabid Bloomerism; in the height of which madness, she possessed a sufficiency of the martyr-spinit to parade herself, on all public occasions, though nearly fifty years of age, in full costume.
"By a necessary transition, the next step was into an apostleship of the new school of 'Woman's Rights' and Abolitionism; which openly rejoices in the repudiation of the Bible from among the sacred books of the world-accepting it merely as the text-book of popular cant, to be used in working upon the passions and superstitions of the mob.
"This last metamorphosis of Etherial Softdown seems to be the most promising of all those through which the police of the 'Conclave' have, thus far, been able to trace her." "

[^2]
CHAPTHRXXVHIL.

We continue our reporte of the police of the "Conclave," friend.
(

 with mantiewin who wn wolmantily contrmet and dilmto tho pupil of

This report says of Eusedora Polypheme:- "This woman is between thirty and thirty-five years of age. She is of New England birth, and commenced her education at what we consider the fermale high-schools of demoralisation on the Conti-nent- ' the factories.'
"These establishments are especially patronised by the "Council of Disorganisation,' who consider them of vast efficiency, on account of the well-understood certainty with which the results we aim at are achieved, under this system. So great is this certainty, indeed, that we may always safely calculate that eight-tenths of the females who seek employment in them come forth, if they ever do alive, inoculated with just such principles and habits as we desire to have spread among the rural population to which the majority of them return. Corrupted themselves, they act as admirable mediums and conductors of corruption to the class from whom they went forth innocent, and which receives them again without suspicion.
"Besides the spinal diseases, affections of the lungs, twisted

[^3]bodies, and deformed limbs, which the greater number of these girls take home with them, all the foolish romanticism of girlhood has been thoroughly crushed out of them, by the morale which we have promoted in these institutions, and their minds and tastes have become even more vitiated than their bodies.
"It will thus be seen that this factory system is our chefdeuvre of demoralisation of the simple agricultural classes.
"But in yet another aspect the results, it will be perceived, are still more brilliant. We soon found the necessity of creating a public sentiment in favor of our system, which would put a stop to officious investigation and interference with our plans. We accordingly established a defensive literature, in the shape of dainty serials, announced as being edited by the factory-girls themselves. These were filled with sentimental effusions, writtea principally to order, outside the factories, the general burden of which consisted in poetico-rural pictures of the joys brought home by the patient and industrious factory-girl, to some hipshotten father or bedridden grand-papa. These little incidents zels by habitual meohanical distension, by compressing the chest in the mannor just described. There is such matural tendency, in all parts about the throat and nose, to bleed from slight causes, particularly after repeated inflammation, that it atrites me as by no means wonderw ful, that a designing person should, by long-praotised mechanical effortw, sided, perhaps, by the consequences of former colds, reduce these parte to condition such that they would bleed from voluntary distemsion. The only wonder in the cnse in the quantity discharged, while this person. doee not appear to be subject to involuntary hemorrhage also. This result will probsbly occur hereafter, and the impostor may share the fate of the man who arrested the motion of his heart.
"These cmses of feigned diseases give great vexation to army surm geons and almshouso physicians; and, in private life, wre often resorted to by the cunning and unprincipled, for the purpose of harrowing the feelings of relatives, from some sinister intention. It might well be - wished, that the case you describe were one of the most difficult of dotection, but it it for from being so.

> " Believe me, my dear sir,
> "Very truly, yours," &c.
were studiously invested with all that charming unexpectedness and die-away bathos, which is so attractive to girlish imaginations, and so satisfactory to elder philanthropists. Then there was still another class of romances, cultivated with yet more fervid unction. These consisted in stories of a lovely young girl, who, all for 'love of independence,' gave up a home of luxury, to come to the factories and make a living for herwelf, independent of her natural guardians. How this stout-hearted young lady one day attracted, by her beauty, the attention of a handsome young gentleman of romantic appearance, who visited the mills along with a party of other strangera. How the romantic young gentleman was very much struck, while the mtrong-minded Angelina was rendered nervous; how the heart-stricken, after many trials, succeeded in moving upon the heart of the 'sleepless gryphon' of morality with whom Angelina boarded, to permit him to have an interview - at least in said gryphon's presence; how that then and there the young gentleman, in the most 'proper' way declared himself, sought Angelina's hand, and was accepted; and how he turned out to be the son of a Southern nabob, and Angelina, from a poor factory-girl, became one of the foremost ladies of the land; and how, though, she never forgot her dear and happy companions of the factory. This same susceptible young South erner is the standing hero of four-fifths of these girls, and, as he does not come every year to make them all rich, we may congratulate ourselves upon the general morals consequent upon such reasonable expectations.
"Out of one or two thousand girls, there are usually a few who exhibit some sprightliness. In the ratio of the ductility of their characters, are they sure to be selected, and brought forward by our managers; and in proportion as they exhibit their availability, are they readily promoted to editorships. They receive private salaries, and are released from any other than nominal participation in the routine of factory labor. From this distinguished caste of young ladies of the factory, Eusedora Polypheme originated.
"We expect gratitude from all such farored parties; and Eusedora proved the most grateful of the grateful. She as readily took to the shallow limpidity of Mr. Little, alias Tommy Moore, as ever did callow cygnet to the drains of a Holland fiat.

She possessed, indeed, a marvellous gift of sentiment-a succhariferous faculty, that would have caused Cerberus himself to have licked his jagged lips. She was accordingly encouraged to cultivate transcendental tendencies, exchanged with the Dial, and, after a few months' exercise, she spoke like a veritable Pythoness.
"Considering that she had now made bernelf auficiently familiar with > "The celeatial syren's hurmony," to make her of value to us abroad, we placed her on our pen-sion-list, and turned her loose upon society.

"This step the Committee have never had cause to regret. She leaped upon the social stage, a specimen of what the factory system could produce - achieved the lioness at once, and had the honour of being hailed in all circles, a phenomenon, a lusus nature- the world was undecided which, considering she was nothing but a factorygirl. They must be eminent institutions surely, since they could turn out young ladies who talked so 'divinely,' possessed 'such' command of language, and were such favorites with the gentemen!
"There was a society, too, not very far off from this, into which she had forced her way, and which haughtily called itself 'the best,' that held its court in houses with dingy outsides, that lined the back-alleys; but, amidst garish and sickening splendors within, the 'highly intellectual' character of the bolloww eyed and painted queens who presided there, was equally owing to the educations they had received at the same "eminent' institutions - only they had had more soul and less cunning than Eusedora Polypheme, and would not, therefore, have been so available to the Committee.
"When a class is already sunk as low as it can sink, it is not our policy to go aside to interfere with them, for they are sure to fecundate in degradation fast enough; our sole aim is to drag the grades above down to their level, which we consider a safe one.
"There is nothing so dangerous to the designs of the Committee of Disorganisation, as soul - what the world calls heart. To an executive power, these are always considered intrusive and distasteful superfuities; and it was because Eusedora has managed, by some surprisingly efficient process, to rid berself of both, that she is to be so trusted.
"Besides parading her accomplishments everywhere, as merely a fair average of the education of a factory-girl, she very soon mapped out for herself a very peculiar field for operations. She became the leader of a new school of Platonic Sentimentalism, in New England. This was an achievementa decided triumph. She soon gathered around her a host of feminine disciples-principally young and unmarried, with premature wrinkles on their brows.
"After years of close observation of the operations of this sect, its police would beg to express to the Committee their unqualified admiration of the results obtained. The increase of the number of suicides has been gratifying. The number of young men and girls rendered worthless for life; the number of elderly men plundered and cajoled out of their means and driven into dotage, is only equalled by the surprising rapidity with which the fanaticism has spread; indeed, it would seem as if the first step towards all the popular forms of fanaticism, is through Platonic Sentimentalism.

60 It seems, that it is through the teachings of this school; of which Eusedora Polypheme is now the acknowledged priestess, that the hollowness and unsatisfactory character of all our natural sentiments and passions is first perceived. This illumination achieved, it becomes necessary that their place be supplied by what the world would call morbid sentimentality and unaatural passions, but which Eusedora Polypheme aptly terms, "spherical illuminations' and 'divine ecstacies.' But since we know, ${ }^{\text {s }}$ well as Eusedora, that flesh is flesh, and blood is blood, we can therefore calculate, with great precision, whither such myatific. tions must lead.
"Hardened and sharpened in mind and temper, by a graduution in this school, its disciples pass, not from it, but through it, into other, and, to us, not less important fields of activity. Hence come the fiercest and most unscrupulous partisans of Infidelity, Abolitionism, and Woman's Rights. Having learned both theoretically and practically to disbelicve in themselves, by the most natural transition in the world, they become infidel of all other truths, and scorn all other sacrednesses alike. They are then prepared to be of use to us in a variety of ways. The spirit of antagonism, the love of strife and notoriety, have assumed in them the sense of duty; justice, and modesty; a spiritual diablerie has possessed itself of the emasculated remains of womanhood left in them. Only give them a chance for martyrdom - only give them an excuse for the cry of persecution, and upon whatever theme or theory, ology or ism, that may promise to afford them such healthful and natural excitements, they will at once seize, and, hugging the dear abstraction to their bosoms, do battle for the same, with a cunning and unscrupulous ferocity that has no parallel.
"But for their thorough training under the teaching of Eusedora Polypheme, they might, perhaps, be sometimes disposed to pause, and inquire if there might not be two sides to every question; whether they might not have made some slight mistake in crying out 'Eureka' so soon. But, fortunately, they are never troubled with this weakness; and, as their capacity for mischief is not, therefore, liable to be impaired by any maudlin conscientiousness, or feeble questioning of their own infallibility, or that of their teachers, they are from the beginning as valuable as trained veterans.
${ }^{66}$ The jargon of the sect, which they acguire with wonderful 21 * facility, constitutes their logic; and their efficiency in the use of this weapon, consists in the savage, waspish, and persevering iteration of its phrases, at all times and on all occasions.
"It is astonishing, the ease with which the majority of mankind can be bullied, especially from within the bulwark of petticoats. But when at once the terrible aspect is hid behind the mask of Circe, as the followers of Polypheme know so well to accomplish, the power becomes resistless indeed.
"The principal weapons of offence used by the followers of Polypheme, in all their subsequent metamorphoses, are, first and foremost, what is technically termed the "electrical eye." This is the most brilliant and effective of their weapons. It is not by any means necessary that the spiritual Amazon should have been gifted by Nature, in this respect; for the arts of Polypheme were clearly inspired from > "Some other deity than Nature, That shapes man better."

"After long practice, the power is acquired of dilating or straining the eyes wide open, and suffusing them at the same time. The moisture gives them a marvellous effect of electrical splendor. As this habitual tension can only be sustained for a few seconds at a time, Polypheme happily offisets it by the modest babit of dropping her eyes towards the floor, or a flower or book in her hand; then up go the and out leaps another humid flash, to electrify her audience.

> 'Downy windows close,'
"Great energy and activity of gesticulation is recommended, in order to distract attention, as much as possible, from the fact, that these cruelly-worked eyes sometimes run over with the 'salt-heum' - of any thing but 'grief.' A loud voice, too, is especially recommended - as, without it, somebody else might be heard in the room.
"Secondly, a thorough knowledge of the minor dramatics of emphasis is also suggested. Sneers should be thoroughly practised before the glass, as well as interjections, exclamations, shriels of wonder and surprise. The grimaces of rage, worked up with great ferocity, without the slightest regard to the poor victim. Scorn should be lofty and incredibly superb; archness, irresistible, taking care not to pucker the wrinkles in the brow too much; sentiment, nothing short of the white rolling-up of two huge spheres in spasm. Childlike simplicity requires great practice in the dancing-room; it is very effective, when artistically done. Favorite poets - Petrarch, Shelley, Mrs. Elizabeth Brownson, and her husband, 'poor Keats.' Gods - Tom Moore, Byron, and Author of Festus. High-priest of the Arcana - Emerson. Priestess - Margaret Fuller Ossoli. Apocalypse - The Dial, &c., &c.
"Travelling should be studied as an art. The many correspondences held in different portions of the country should be made the dutiful occasion of sentimental visits, which, as they may be protracted for a month or two, will, no doubt, result in the effectual 'saving' of some half-dozen, at the rery least, of both sexes. Neither scrip nor money need be provided for the journey; for is not the laborer worthy of his hire? Besides, who ever heard of a lioness carrying a purse? The world owes all its benefactors a living.
"It is necessary to be an authoress-abundantly prolific and intensely literary: to write dashing, slashing, graceful letters, in which your own superb horsewomanship shall always figure most prominently; next, your own disinterestedness; next, your own amiability, and dangerous powers of attraction; and, last, the dashing, slashing, graceful character of your own wit; your romantic love-affairs, by brook and meadow, on highway and in byway, by ocean-side or in greenwood.
"These, with a lofty scorn of the commonplace, a darling love of the arts-that is, you must know the names of the pictures, and what they are all about, but most particularly the names of the painters. And if somebody says the picture is a good one, be on terms of intimacy with the painter, or at least in close correspondence with him; and be sure be is a 'roble spirit,' a 'divine creature,' one of the 'elect of genius,' whose 'eyes have been unsealed to the touch of the Promethean fire.'
"Must know French, Italian, German, and Spanish phrases, out of the Pronouncing Dictionary. Quote these occasionally, but very guardedly, when you are certain there are no apeish foreigners or troublesome old fogy scholars present.
"Thus panoplied, the novitiate will be, in every sense, the equal of Eusedora Polypheme herself, and entitled to go upon the pension-list of the Committee. Indeed, we are booking them rapidly, and sending out missionaries in every direction.
"The disciples of this school are among the chief favorites of the 'Committee of Disorganisation.'"

CHAPTER XXIX.

We have already obtained a glimpse of Regina Straightback, in character. Her tall Indian-like figure, with her picturesque and semi-manly costume, will not be readily forgotten.

The faithful police of the 'Committee of Disorganisation," in course of a detailed report concerning this woman, says:
"Regina Straightback is nearly as unbending in temper as in figure, which peculiarity renders her of somewhat less avail to us than such more ductile natures as her fast friend, Etherial Softdown, and her soul's sister, Eusedora Polypheme.
${ }^{6}$ However, she possesses an availability of her own, which is invaluable in its way. She is incontrovertibly the Amazonian queen of the 'New-Lights.' Her commanding figure and her dramatic carriage, together with her unanswerably positive and mperious manner, have, as implying a natural gift of command, won for her the universal suffrage of her sisters militant. So it never fails that, by a species of spontaneous acclaim, she is selected to preside over all convocations of the 'faithful,' whether held in public or in private.
"By tacit consent, she has, therefore, come to be regarded as the actual figure-bead of the bark of Progress; and, hence, there is no movement, on the part of feminine schismatics, worthy of attention, to which she has chosen to deny her presiding countenance.
${ }^{6}$ This renders her, of course, a very formidable and important person, in all the 'New-Light' agitations of the day. Conscious of supremacy, she exercises it without hesitation; and, with a boldness that is startling to all parties, dares to assert outright those opinions which, in reality, lie at the bottom of the whole agitation in which they are engaged.
"Indeed, not only does she defiantly assert them openly on all occasions, but openly lives up to them in the face of society. While her followers modestly say, they want woman's civil rights in marriage, she courageously asserts, that there is no marriage except in love, and that the civil contract is like any other partnership in which equivalents are exckanged; and, by way of proof of her sincerity, she boasts, publicly and privately, of the terms on which she married her present husband; who, by the way, possessed considerable property. "I do not love you, sir,' said she ; 'I love another man, whom you know. If you choose to take me on these conditions, I am ready to marry you.'
"The charming candor of this proposal won the day; and the superannuated 'New-Light' was fain content to exchange his hand and fortune for her kand, and to leave her heart to settle its affairs in some other direction.
"This is the sort of frankness in which the 'Committee of Disorganisation' do most rejoice. They regard it as a highly favourable omen, when a 'distinguished female' can take such grounds as this, and be publicly sustained by thousands of her sez; for with whatever gravity they may pretend to repudiate the doings of Regina Straightback, in this one particular, it is very certain, that they must regard it with secret favor, and that this is the principal cause of her universal and overwhelming popularity.
"They regard her with a species of covert adoration - as a heroine, who has first, since Fanny Wright, dared, in living up to principle, to do that which they are all, in reality, yearning for courage to do themselves.
"The chaos of social licentiousness, to which the general acceptation of such doctrine as this must lead, may be regarded, to say the least of it, as pleasantly melo-dramatic. When one woman may go to the house of another, and say, "Though thou hast been bound to this man, in the holy bonds of matrimony, yet these bonds are of no moral force; though thou hast borne to this man children from his loins, yet the fact that thou hast suffered gives thee no claim upon him, for it is the penalty of thy sex; and that they are bone of thy bone, and flesh of his flesh, gives thee no just hold upon him, but rather upon the State. And if thou hast nursed him in sickness, he has fed thee and clothed thee, in ample equivalent; if thou hast loved him, he has loved thee; if thou lovest him still, it is thy weakness. Get thee gone! This man no longer loveth thee; he is mine. Thou shalt surrender to me thy nuptial couch ; there is no true marriage but in love!'
"Nor does the candor of Regina Straightback rest with practical declarations such as these; she goes quite as far in other directions. She does not hesitate to denounce the Bible, as sanctioning all the oppressions of woman-as the mere tool of the priesthood, the orthodox of whom are banded, to a man, in mortal opposition to their rights. She recommends the use of it, as a means-to those who are more disposed than she is to Jesuitism - of conquering by indirections. They may influence and control the masses, by involing its sanction, to be mare; bat we, for ber own part, will have nothing to do with mabrerfuge"; mbe rejectu the Bible mystem in toto, am false-falme in fact and tendency. God has made woman aufficient unto merrelf in the univerue. She can and ought to protect herwell; and if the does not, itt' her own fault.
${ }^{6}$ The Bible might do for men; but women powe a higher prirituality, and mtronger intuition; they do not need it. Man, with him beary logic, pever gets beyond a truime or self-evidem fect, of the mere physical world; while woman, with her electrical ingpiration, leaps the 'large lengths' of universal law, and, like conquering prewence, glidew within the mpiritual, mpreme. Il ik thum that, corming all bond of wence, the booweth that he doth know!
${ }^{64}$ The announcement of these tremendorum propomitions would, A cource, be calculated to have an overwhelming eflect upon the teader adolescence of thousands of bright spiritt - to elec. trify their hearts and wouls with the novel consciousnéa of claims and attributew, of which they had never dremmed themelve or their sex to be poseseors.
${ }^{6}$ The result has been, of necessity, the inatitution of a femio mine order of "Lnighterrantry,' of which the Quixote haa yet to be mang.
${ }^{6}$ The Committee do not generally employ such mgentm an Regina Straightback; but the time memm to have practically arrived, owing to the preparatory labor of Etherial Softdown and Eumedora Polypheme, they seem to bave conceded that wach pretenione may be wifly risked, though, it it well known, they usually do far more harm than grod to any cause.
"The fact that wuch a mep may be wifely ventured upon, eems to be the mont encouraging token of the progress already achieved, and of the ultimate and triumphant wuccet of the exertions of the "Committee of Disorganisation." ${ }^{\text {" }}$

CHAPTER XXX.

gUMILITY BABEBOEES BTOUT.

Tee report goes on to say -
"But what the circumscribed wits of Etherial Softdown, the divine languishments of Eusedora Polypheme, the defiant unscrupulousness of Regina Straightback, failed to accomplish, namely, the convulsing of all Christendom, by one dexterous jugglery of cant, was left to be achieved by our at present most honored agent, Humility Barebones Stout.
"It will be seen, by her genealogical tree, as indicated in her middle name, that she came, as it were, prepared, through a long table of evangelical descent, for the work before her. Nothing could be conceived more apropos: the blood of the Covenanters in the veins of the modern 'NewLight.' Sharpened in its passage through New England Puritanism, it has now become as professionally capable of splitting hairs, as it formerly was of splitting heads. And then there was a time-honored nasal, in which it

> Poured ite dolows forth;
the preservation of the exact intonations of which does marvellous credit to the antiquarian proclivities of this distinguished line. Then there is a characteristic command of doggerel snatches, confessedly without rhythm, because they were in-spired,--for which the Fathers Barebones and Poundtext were peculiarly noted in their day,-which seems to have been transmitted, without the slightest deterioration of manner or emphasis. And, in addition, there was an ecstaticism of textology, to which these revered fathers uniformly resigned themselves, about the time they had reached their 'sixteenthlies,' che facilities of which seem to have been more than improved upon by their modern represemtative. In word, no reach of masal effect, 'From coughing trombone down to hoarnened pipos'- no fecundant sprightlinest of doggerel-no illuminated aptitude of text, betwixt Daniel in the lion's den, and Death on the pale horse - no syllogistic or aphoristic touch of bedridden theology that has been in vogue since the time of Luther, but is at the tongue's end of this Cyclopean daughter of the "Fathers of the Covenant."
"Admirable! admirable! What was to prevent Humility Barebones Stout from using these rightfully-derived and extraordinary gifts for the good of humanity? Not that ahe liad thought anything more philosophically about it, than that the good of humanity ought to consist with the claims of her inherited renown, her caste, and her prescriptive righte. Not that she cared particularly who suffered; but being of a hystrical and exacting temperament, whe had come to the conclusion that her own, the white race, had conspired against her - that they were jealous of her - would never yiuld to her ancestral clains a fair precedence.
"Her pride would not permit her to cry persecution for herself and in her own name; for she had been, lo! these many days! a tireless scribbler and notoriety-seeker, in appeals to her own race, through the legitimate channels of current literature, on the simple bamis of her own individual experiencem and the inspirations proper to her sez and grade. These having failed to attract any attention beyond the day's notoriety, and from the additional fact of the most labored of them having been consigned to oblivion through the pages of silly annuals, she turned herself about in wrath, to avenge her wrongs. Her heart was filled with bitterness.
"She had known Etherial Sofldown, with jealous unction; she had communed with Eusedora Polypheme, in hopeless 22
emulation of spirit; she bad shrunk before the lioness moods of the triumphing Regina Straightback. She felt that she was displaced - that she had been left behind. She saw that they were all too proud, or too far advanced, to condescend to use the rusty weapons which had fallen to her by inheritance; that they had set their feet above her, on the platform of progress; that they at least called the semblances of science and philosophy, through their terminalogies, to aid them, while they left cant to their menials.
"She felt that she was as bold as they. In what, then, consisted her weakness? Could the fault be in her 'stars,' that she was still an 'underling'? 'Ha! ha! ha! Cant! cant! cant!" and she laughed out, with the exultation of Softdown's first. 'Eureka!' 'Cant! cant! I have it! It descended to me from Barebones, my illustrious ancestor. Insolent beldames! I will show them! They affect to quote the pure strains of philosophy -
"To imitate the graces of the gods."
We shall see! we shall see! I hate my own race; it has not appreciated me. What care I for white-slavery and its abusesfor fairness, for truth? Cant! cant! By its magic, I shall > "Show as snowy dove trooping with crows."

Eureka! Eureka!
Etherial! ah, Etherial! the race bath not been to the swift, nor the battle to the strong - thou hast been overshadowed!

[^0]:    * The Story begine at OI

[^1]:    * Incredible an it may seem, we pledge our personal werncity that this bald and silly narration, which appoars to be morely foolish burlesque, is a bona fide et literatim, et punctuatim, transeript, as close ass it is possible for memory to furmish, of stories that were, at least as often as five days out of the neven, related at the dinner-table at which Donnerges presided, to long donble lines of gaping women, who, obodient to the irresistible spell he bore, had followed up this maudlin Proteus of Professors, as disciples of water-cure, through his latest methr morphoses, into physician of such an establishment in Boston. It was thus he axhorted them to frith, and encouraged his backslidern

[^2]:    *The following note was received, in answer to one addressed to - distinguished surgeon of Philadelphia, in relation to the phonomenon of voluntary bloeding, so frequently illustrated in the History of Rtherial Sofdown.-Emror.
    ${ }^{46}$ Duar Stie:
    "The case which you presented to me, for an explanation of the ceusees which may bave produced voluntary diecharge of blood from the mouth, is certainly a very remarkable one, though by no means without parallel in the records of feigned discases. The power of the will, in persons of peculiar formation or constitution, is seen, occasionally, to be extended to various organs designed by nature to act without awaikening concciounnose and in a manner altogether beyond the control of the individual. To say nothing of many muscles of the soalp, the ears, the akin of the neok, tan, which are used to great parpose by the inferior animale, but are totally inective in man, except in a few rare instances, it is well known that many persons poseess the power of voluntary vomiting. About forty years ago, a man presented himself before a celebrated surgeon of London, and proved that he possessed the sbility to oheck completely the flow of blood through the artery at the wrist, by violantly contracting a muscle of the arm above the elbow, which, in his case, happened to overlap and press upon the main trunk of the vessel. I am sequainted with a gentieman in this sountry, who can perform the same feato There is on record a well-authenticated history

[^3]:    "By strong contraction of all the nuscles of the chest, while thow of the neck are rigid and the lungs fully infiated, the vewsels of the bowd and neck oan be distended almost to bursting. Actorm nometimes une this power to produce voluntary blushing, or the suffusion of anger, though the practice endangers apoplexy. I take this to be the secret of the voluatary bleeding, in the case describod by you.
    "The tonsils, and the membrame of the throat behind the nose and mouth, wre full of innumerable blood-vesself, forming net-wort; ned very slight causes often produce great calargement of these vesseld. By frequent temporary distension, they are not only permmently enlarged, but made more ausceptible of additional expansion from trivial cocidenta. In this condition, they may be brought to resemble, in nome degree, what in tormed, by anstomists, the erectile tisete, which atruetare has wuffiont contractility to prevent the admission of more than an ordinary amount of blood on common occasions, but when excited in amy wisy, it yielde with great ease, and admitw of onormous dilatir tion. Erectile tumore are dangerons, from their tendenoy, ultimately, to bleed spontanooumly. They are sometimen formed in the throst. The party reforred to may have one, or ghe may have aimply enlarged the vee

