“It provides that the body in our State shall pay annually to the Grand Orient of France the sum of $10, for each active lodge; that it shall buy all diplomas it may require of the Grand Orient at the price of 15 francs each, the diplomas to be on parchment, printed in both English and French.

“The body working under the Grand Orient is to have the right to institute new Lodges in the United States wherever it may deem convenient. It shall receive for them warrants issued from the Grand Orient of France, but it is not to be permitted to create Lodges in territories of the United States outside of Pennsylvania with which the Grand Orient of France is in fraternal relations. These territories are stated as being Alabama, Iowa, Minnesota, Rhode Island and New Jersey.

“It is further provided that should there be at any time in the future a cessation of the relations of the Grand Orient of France with one or more of these states, then the body in Pennsylvania shall have ‘plenitude of action.’

“The body in Pennsylvania is given the right to practise the Scottish Rite including the Symbolic Degrees.

“In the official records of the Grand Orient of France for December, 1923, the Grand Secretary submits a report which was adopted. In it he said:

“‘The Regional Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania was abandoned by the Grand Orient of Spain. They now ask the Grand Orient of France to take it under its wings. You will recall that we entered into relations with the Grand Master of this Grand Lodge through the intervention of our Brother Ben, Past Master of L’Atlantide. . . . The correspondence with the Pennsylvania Brethren was through a Brother Gould, Lawyer.’

“We feel that Pennsylvania should with the utmost emphasis denounce this action of the Grand Orient of France. We cannot acknowledge the right of any other Grand Body outside of our Grand Jurisdiction (whether regarded by us as legitimate or not) whether in fraternal relations with us or not) to invade the territory of our Grand Lodge.

“The association which the Grand Secretary of the Grand Orient of France styles the ‘Regional Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania’ and which we have called the ‘Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite Universal Freemasonry,’ is not rightfully in possession of the rights which the Grand Orient attempted to give.

“We deem it our duty to call the matter to the attention of the Grand Lodge. We ask the adoption of the following:

RESOLVED, That the Grand Secretary forward to each of the Grand Lodges in the United States a copy of this report, calling their attention to the fact that the body which the Grand Orient of France has ‘taken under its wings’ is authorized by the Grand Orient of France to create Lodges in every State, excepting Alabama, Iowa, Missouri, Rhode Island and New Jersey, and that its power is to extend to those States if and when the fraternal relations now existing between the several Grand Lodges of those States and the Grand Orient of France cease.

RESOLVED FURTHER, That this Grand Lodge, which has always firmly held and still holds the views expressed by our Right Worshipful Grand Master Brother Richard Vaux (set out in the foregoing report) respectfully and confidently asks its sister jurisdictions to adopt those views as fundamental in Freemasonry and requests those Grand Lodges which are in fraternal relations with the Grand Orient of France to give their adherence to those views and sever further relations with the said Grand Orient.

The above resolutions presented by Brother Beiler, Chairman of the Committee on Clandestine Lodges in Pennsylvania, were unanimously adopted by the Grand Lodge of that State (see Territorial Jurisdiction).

EXCUSE. Lodges in the eighteenth century and at the beginning of the nineteenth inflicted fines for non-attendance at Lodge meetings, and of course excuses were then required to avoid the penalty. But this has now grown out of use. Freemasonry being considered a voluntary institution, fines for absence are not inflicted, and excuses are therefore not now required. The infliction of a fine would, it is supposed, detract from the solemnity of the obligation which makes attendance a duty. The old Constitutions, however, required excuses for non-attendance, although no penalty was prescribed for a violation of the rule. Thus, in the Matthew Cooke Manuscript (of the fifteenth century) it is said, “that every master of this art should be warned to come to his congregation that they come duly, but if (unless) they may be excused by some manner of cause” (see lines 740-4). And in the Regius Manuscript (lines 107-12) it is written:

That every mason, that is a Mason, Must ben at the generale congregacyon, So that he hyt resonably y-told Where that the samble shall be holde; And to that samble he must neade gon, But he have a reseabul skwsacyon.

EXECUTIVE POWERS OF A GRAND LODGE. See Grand Lodge.

EXEGETICAL AND PHILANTHROPICAL SOCIETY. According to Thory (Acta Latomorum i, 312), founded at Stockholm in 1787. It united Magnetism to Swedenborgianism, the religious doctrines of the celebrated Swedish philosopher; it was at first secret, but when it became known it was killed by ridicule.

EXEMPLIFICATION OF THE WORK. This term is of frequent use in American Freemasonry. When a lecturer or teacher performs the ceremonies of a Degree for instruction, using generally one of the Freemasons present as a substitute for the candidate, he is said “to exemplify the work.” It is done for instruction, or to enable the members of the Grand or subordinate Lodge to determine on the character of the ritual that is taught by the exemplifier.

EXODUS. The date of the Exodus has been determined by the excavations recently made at Tel el-Maskhûta. This is the name of large mounds near Tel el-Kebër, excavated by M. Naville for the Egyptian Exploration Fund, wherein he found inscriptions showing that they represent the ancient City of Pithom or Succoth, the “treasure-cities” (Exodus i, 11), and that Ramses II, was the founder. This was the Pharaoh of the oppression. The walls of the treasure-chambers were about six hundred and fifty feet square and twenty-two feet thick. From Pithom, or Succoth, where the Israelites were at work, they started on their exodus toward Etham (Khefem), then to Piwhiroth (Exodus xiv, 2), and so on north and east. The exodus took place under Menepthah II, who ascended the throne 1325 B.C., and reigned but a short period. It was along the isthmus that the Egyptian army per-EXOTERIC. From the Greek combining word, exo, meaning outside. Public, not secret, belonging to the uninstructed (see also Esoteric).
EXOTERIC

EXPERT. In Lodges of the French Rite, there are two officers called First and Second Experts, whose duty it is to assist the Master of Ceremonies in the initiation of a candidate. In Lodges of Perfection of the Scottish Rite, there are similar officers who are known as the Senior and Junior Expert.

EXPERT, PERFECT. Conferred in three grades, and cited in Fustier’s collection (see Thory, Acta Latomorum i, page 312).

EXPOSITIONS. Very early after the revival of Freemasonry, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, pretended expositions of the ritual of Freemasonry began to be published. The following catalogue comprises the most notorious of these pseudo-revelations. The leading titles only are given.

1. A Mason’s Examination, which appeared in The Flying Post for April 11–3, 1723. This has been reprinted in Brother Gould’s History of Freemasonry (iii, page 487).

5. The Grand Mystery laid open, or the Free Masons Signs and Words discovered. A sheet printed on one side only. 1726.

6. The Mystery of Freemasonry. A sheet reprinted in the Daily Journal of London, August 15, and again on August 18, 1730. Brother Lionel Vibert, Rare Books of Freemasonry, records that this is the work that with some small variations was published in the Pennsylvania Gazette, December 5 to 8, 1730, by Benjamin Franklin who later on was to be so actively identified with the Craft in the United States and in Europe. Another reprint of this work and in the same year is entitled The Puerile Signs and Wonders of a Free-Mason.

7. Masonry Dissected (second edition, Dissected), by Samuel Prichard. London, 1730. Several editions, and a French translation in 1737, and a German one in 1738. This was also reprinted by Brother Enoch T. Carson, 1867. Brother Vibert states that this book by Prichard went through twenty-one editions by 1787 and he further points out that The Secrets of Masonry, London, 1737, and The Entertaining Mystery of Freemasonry of Glasgow, 1803, are also reprints with some variation from the original. A curious reprint is in the library of the Masonic History Company and is in English but printed as part of a work in French of 1788, entitled Les Jésuites Chassés de la Maçonnerie et Leur Poignard Brisé par les Maçons, meaning The Jesuit Driven from Freemasonry and Their Weapon Broken by the Freemasons.

8. The Secrets of Masonry made known to all men, by S. P. (The initials are those of Samuel Prichard.) London, 1737.

11. Masonry Further Dissected. London, 1738. Brother Vibert says this is a translation of a French work L’Ordre des Franc-Maçons Trahi, meaning The Order of Freemasons Betrayed, but of an edition earlier than that of the same name in 1745 which is usually considered the first.

14. L’Ordre des Franc-Maçons trahi et le Secret des Mopses revélé, meaning The Order of the Freemasons Betrayed and The Secret of the Mopses Revealed. Amsterdam, 1745. There were many subsequent editions, and a German and a Dutch translation.

15. Le Maçon démasqué, meaning The Mason Unmasked. 1751.

17. The Secrets of the Free Masons Revealed by a Disgusted Brother, London, 1759.

18. A Master Key to Freemasonry. 1760.

20. Shibboleth, or Every Man a Freemason. 1765.

22. Solomon in all his Glory. 1766. This is a reprint in English of Le Maçon démasqué.

23. Mahhabone, or the Grand Lodge Door Open’d. 1766.

24. Shibboleth, or Every Man a Freemason. 1765.

25. Tubal-Kain. 1767. This is a part only of Solomon in all his Glory.

27. Récueil précieux de la Maçonnerie Adonhiramite, meaning Choice Selection of Adonhiramite Masonry, par Louis Guillaume de Saint Victor. Paris, 1781. This work was not written with an unfriendly purpose, and many editions of it were published.
EXPULSION

28. The Master Key, by I. Browne. London, 1794. Scarcely an exposition, since the cipher in which it is printed renders it a sealed book to all who do not possess the key.

31. Manual of Freemasonry, by Richard Carlisle, 1825. These essays printed in The Republican at London were collected and published in one volume in 1845.

32. Illustrations of Masonry, by William Morgan. The first edition is without date or place, but it was probably printed at Batavia, New York, in 1828.

There have been several other American expositions but the compilers have only been servile copyists of Morgan, Bernard, and Allyn. The undertaking has been, and continues to be, simply the pouring out of one vial into another.

The expositions which abound in the French, German, and other continental languages, are not attacks upon Freemasonry, but are written often under authority, for the use of the Fraternity. The usages of continental Freemasonry permit a freedom of publication that would scarcely be tolerated by the English or American Craft.

EXPULSION. Expulsion is, of all Masonic penalties, the most severe that can be inflicted on a member of the Order, and hence it has been often called a Masonic death. It deprives the expelled of all the rights and privileges that he ever enjoyed, not only as a member of the particular Lodge from which he has been ejected, but also of those which were inherent in him as a member of the Fraternity at large. He is at once as completely divested of his Masonic character as though he had never been admitted, so far as regards his rights, while his duties and obligations remain as firm as ever, it being impossible for any human power to cancel them. He can no longer demand the aid of his Brethren nor require from them the performance of any of the duties to which he was formerly entitled, nor visit any Lodge, nor unite in any of the public or private ceremonies of the Order. He is considered as being without the pale, and it would be criminal in any Brother, aware of his expulsion, to hold communication with him on Masonic subjects.

The only proper tribunal to impose this heavy punishment is a Grand Lodge. A subordinate Lodge tries its delinquent member, and if guilty declares him expelled. But the sentence is of no force until the Grand Lodge, under whose jurisdiction it is working, has confirmed it. And it is optional with the Grand Lodge to do so, or, as is frequently done, to reverse the decision and reinstate the Brother. Some of the Lodges in this country claim the right to expel independently of the action of the Grand Lodge, but the claim in Brother Mackey's opinion is not valid. He held that the very fact that an expulsion is a penalty, affecting the general relations of the punished Brother with the whole Fraternity, proves that its exercise never could with propriety be entrusted to a Body so circumscribed in its authority as a subordinate Lodge. Besides, the general practise of the Fraternity is against it. The English Constitutions vest the powers to expel exclusively in the Grand Lodge. A Private Lodge has only the power to exclude an offending member from its own meetings.

All Freemasons, whether members of Lodges or not, are subject to the infliction of this punishment when found to merit it. Resignation or withdrawal from the Order does not cancel a Freemason's obligations, nor exempt him from that wholesome control which the Order exercises over the moral conduct of its members. The fact that a Freemason, not a member of any particular Lodge, who has been guilty of immoral or unmasonic conduct, can be tried and punished by any Lodge within whose jurisdiction he may be residing, is a point on which there is no doubt.

Immoral conduct, such as would subject a candidate for admission to rejection, should be the only offense visited with expulsion. As the punishment is general, affecting the relation of the one expelled with the whole Fraternity, it should not be lightly imposed for the violation of any Masonic act not general in its character. The commission of a grossly immoral act is a violation of the contract entered into between each Freemason and his Order. If sanctioned by silence or impunity, it would bring discredit on the Institution, and tend to impair its usefulness. A Freemason who is a bad man is to the Fraternity what a mortified limb is to the body, and should be treated with the same mode of cure—he should be cut off, lest his example spread, and disease be propagated through the constitution.

Expulsion from one of what is called the higher Degrees of Freemasonry, such as a Chapter or an Encampment, does not affect the relations of the expelled party to Blue Masonry. A Chapter of Royal Arch Masons is not and cannot be recognized as a Masonic Body by a Lodge of Master Masons by any of the modes of recognition known to Freemasonry. The acts, therefore, of a Chapter cannot be recognized by a Master Mason's Lodge any more than the acts of a literary or charitable society wholly unconnected with the Order. Besides, by the present organization of Freemasonry, Grand Lodges are the supreme Masonic tribunals. If, therefore, expulsion from a Chapter of Royal Arch Masons involved expulsion from a Blue Lodge, the right of the Grand Lodge to hear and determine causes, and to regulate the internal concerns of the Institution, would be interfered with by another Body beyond its control. But the converse of this proposition does not hold good. Expulsion from a Blue Lodge involves expulsion from all the other Degrees; because, as they are composed of what Brother Mackey here terms Blue Masons, the members could not of right sit and hold communications on Masonic subjects with one who was an expelled Freemason.

EXTENDED WINGS OF THE CHERUBIM.

An expression used in the ceremonies of Royal Master, a Degree of the American Rite, and intended to teach symbolically that he who comes to ask and to seek Divine Truth symbolized by the True Word, should begin by placing himself under the protection of that Divine Power who alone is Truth, and from whom alone Truth can be obtained. Of Him the cherubim with extended wings in the Holy of Holies were a type.

EXTENT OF THE LODGE. The extent of a Freemason’s Lodge is said to be in height from the earth to the highest heavens; in depth, from the surface to the center; in length, from east to west; and in breadth, from north to south. The expression is a symbolic one, and is intended to teach the extensive boundaries of Freemasonry and the coterminous extension of Masonic charity (see Form of the Lodge).

EXTERIOR. The name of the First Degree of the Rite d’Orient, or East, according to the nomenclature of M. Fustier (see Thory, Acta Latomorum i, 312).

EXTERNAL QUALIFICATIONS. The external qualifications of candidates for initiation are those which refer to their outward fitness, based upon the exhibited moral and religious character, the established reputation, the frame of body, the constitution of the mind, and social position. Hence they are divided into Moral, Religious, Physical, Mental, and Political for which see Qualifications of Candidates. The expression in the instruction, that “it is the internal and not the external qualifications that recommend a man to be made a Freemason,” it is evident, from the context, refers entirely to “worldly wealth and honors,” which, of course, are not to be taken into consideration in inquiring into the qualifications of a candidate.

EXTINCT LODGE. A Lodge is said to be extinct which has ceased to exist and work, which is no longer on the registry of the Grand Lodge, and whose Charter had been revoked for misuse or forfeited for non-use.

EXTRA COMMUNICATION. The same as Special Communication (see Communication).

EXTRANEOUS. From the Latin and applied to that which is outside, and thus said among the Craft to be not regularly made; clandestine. The word is now obsolete in this signification, but was so used by the Grand Lodge of England in a motion adopted March 31, 1735, and reported by Anderson in his 1738 edition of the Constitutions (page 182). “No extraneous brothers, that is, not regularly made, but clandestinely, . . . shall be ever qualified to partake of the Mason’s general charity.”

EXTRUSION. Used in the Constitution of the Royal Order of Scotland for expulsion. “If a brother shall be convicted of crime by any Court of Justice, such brother shall be permanently extruded” (see Section 29). Not in use elsewhere as a Masonic term.
F. The sixth letter in the English and Latin alphabets, and the same as the Greek digamma or the φ or ϕ, and the waw of the Hebrew, which has a numerical value of six.

F.: In French Masonic documents the abbreviation of Frère, or Brother. F.P.: is the abbreviation of Frères, or Brethren.

FABRE-PALAPRAT, BERNARD RAYMOND. The restorer, or, to speak more correctly, the organizer of the Order of the Temple at Paris, of which he was elected Grand Master in 1804. He died at Pau, in the lower Pyrénées, February 18, 1838 (see Temple, Order of the).

FACTORIAL OF ABRAH. In the so-called Leland Manuscript, it is said that Freemasons "conceal the way of winning the faculty of Abrac." That is, that they conceal the method of acquiring the powers bestowed by a knowledge of the magical talisman that is called Abracadabra (see Abracadabra and Leland Manuscript).

FAITH. In the theological ladder, the explanation of which forms a part of the instruction of the First Degree of Masonry, faith is said to typify the lowest rung. Faith, here, is synonymous with confidence or trust, and hence we find merely a repetition of the lesson which had been previously taught that the first, the essential qualification of a candidate for initiation, is that he should trust in God.

In the lecture of the same Degree, it is said that "Faith may be lost in sight; Hope ends in fruition; but Charity extends beyond the grave, through the boundless realms of eternity." And this is said, because faith is "the evidence of things not seen," when we see we no longer believe by faith but through demonstration; and as hope lives only in the expectation of possession, it ceases to exist when the object once hoped for is at length enjoyed, but charity, exercised on earth in acts of mutual kindness and forbearance, is still found in the world to come, in the sublimer form of mercy from God to his erring creatures.

FAITHFUL BREAST. See Breast, the Faithful.

FALK, RABBI DE. A native Israelis of Furth, who attracted attention in London at the close of the eighteenth century in consequence of his presumed extraordinary powers, acquired through the secrets of the Cabala, as a Thaumaturgist, a worker of wonders. It was alleged, among other surprising stories that he could and did transmute metals, making one into another, and thereby acquired large sums with which he was liberal to the poor. A merry incident is preserved of his leaving upon his death a sealed box to his particular friend, Aaron Goldsmid, stating that to open it portended evil. Aaron could not withstand his curiosity, and one day opened it, and ere the night came Aaron was picked up dead.

Brother Gordon P. G. Hills (Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, 1913, volume xxvi, pages 93-130) says:

MacKenzie in his Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia appears to make three individuals out of the one personality. His dates are wrong and he evidently has a suspicion that two of the characters, Rabbi de Falk and Cain Chenuel Falk, or Falcon, may be the same person, as they undoubtedly are; but he further refers to John Frederick Falk a son of the preceding, born at Hambourg of Jewish parents, to have been the head of the Cabalist college in London and to have died about 1824. As Doctor Falk had no children this seems another confusion.

The description would fit Falk himself. But see paper by Doctor Adler (Transactions Jewish Historical Society of England, volume v, page 148) entitled the "Baal Shen of London," Baal Shen meaning Master of the Name—or one able to work miracles through the Name of God. This expression became a professional designation for a practitioner combining quack doctor, physician and cabalist in his art. Born in Podhayce, in Podolia, a portion of Poland, a territory afterwards included in the Austrian Empire, he came to London in 1742 where he gained a position of notoriety by his practices and strange stories were told of supernatural achievements which evidently lost nothing in the telling. He died on April 17, 1782.

FALL OF WATER. See Waterfall.

FAMILY LODGE. A Lodge held especially for the transaction of private and local business of so delicate a nature that it is found necessary to exclude, during the session, the presence of all except members. In France a Lodge when so meeting is said to be en famille, or in the family, a private affair, and the meeting is called a tenue de famille or family session; in Germany such Lodges are called, sometimes, Familienlogen, but more generally Conferenz-Logen (see Conference Lodges).

FANATICISM. The English interpretation of the name of the second assassin of the Grand Master, or of mankind. The frenzy that over-balances the mind. The Gravelot or Romvel of philosophical Freemasonry.

FANOR. The name given to the Syrian Freemason, who is represented in some legends as one of the assassins, Amru and Metusael being the other two. of the General Assembly met the beginning of this month, and agreed on an act for a national fast, to implore the blessing of God for success to his Majesty's arms, &c. At the same time, they humbly addressed his Majesty for that effect. In consequence of this, the King has been pleased, by a proclamation, to order its observance in England and Wales.

The Right Worshipful toasted and drunk the usual healths upon this occasion, and the Lodge was closed by the proper officers and adjourned till Thursday the tenth day of January 1740 the Wednesday preceding being a National fast day therefore we could have no meeting in the January number of the same magazine:

A reference to the holding of the Fast is contained in the January number of the same magazine:

Agreeable to the address of the Commission of the General Assembly, and the royal proclamation consequent thereupon, the 9th of January was observed as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. The Minute of Saint John the Evangelist day, December 27, 1739, concludes as follows:

The Right Worshipful toasted and drunk the usual healths upon this occasion, and the Lodge was closed by the proper officers and adjourned till Thursday the tenth day of January 1740 the Wednesday preceding being a National fast day therefore we could have no meeting as usual.

From the Scots Magazine we learn the reason for the observance of this “Nationall fast day”:

Edinburgh, November 1739. The Reverend Commission of the General Assembly met the beginning of this month, and agreed on an act for a national fast, to implore the blessing of God for success to his Majesty’s arms, &c. At the same time, they humbly addressed his Majesty to nominate the day on which it should be observed, and further to interpose his royal authority for that effect. In consequence of this, the King has been pleased, by a proclamation, to order its observance on the 9th day of January next, thro’ Scotland; as also in England and Wales.

Agreeable to the address of the Commission of the General Assembly, and the royal proclamation consequent thereupon, the 9th of January was observed as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, to implore the blessing of God on his Majesty’s arms, &c.

War was declared in October, 1739, between the forces of George II, of Great Britain and Ireland, and of Philip V, of Spain, and only came to an end with the Treaty of Peace signed in October, 1748. In consequence of the war, and the weather, the regular meetings of the Lodge in April and October 1744 were given up altogether. “April 10th, 1744 Noe Lodge being the day appointed for a National fast.” The date, which should really be April 11, was fixed by royal proclamation to be observed as in the former instance “as a fast throughout G. Britain, on account of the war with Spain.”

Cannongate Kilwinning from Leith 10th of Octr. 1744 Year of Masonry, 5744 This being the Day immediately after the fast appointed by the Presbytery for the Judgement like weather it was thought proper to hold no Lodge but adjourned to the 14th Novr. next.

From what are termed “Poetical Essays” printed in the October number of the Scots Magazine of that year we obtain some idea of “the judgment like weather”:

ON THE INCLEMENTY OF THE WEATHER

We rural swains lament, in plaintive strains,
The dismal ruins of our wasted plains.
Tempestuous winds, who in hurricanes, have torn
From 'mongst our reapers hands our richest corn;
Strange and impetuous deluges of rain,
Have spread a mournful aspect o'er the plain;
While raging floods, in rapid surges, sweep
Our hapless harvest to the foaming deep:

Yet let's resign'dly bear
'Tis for our crimes.

The author of these lines appears to have had no doubt as to the cause of the ruined harvest—“'Tis for our crimes” but as referred to in Graham’s Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century, the folks of these days seemed sometimes to find it very difficult to decide whether a calamity was due to the devil who is vexing a man, or due to Heaven which is punishing him. To quote further from the same book:

In the religious life of Scotland in the early decades of the eighteenth century, the intense religious fervour and faith which characterised the covenanting days retained an all-influence and held over great masses of the people of all classes, and the belief in the constant interference of Providence with every act of existence, however minute, was unbounded.

That there were unbroken, unbreakable laws, a succession of physical cause and effect, inevitable, changeless, passing on their silent course unbending to mortal prayers, unfyielding to human needs—this, of course, was a conception of the material world unknown to those days, incredible to these men.

When calamities befell the country it was not easy to discriminate for which or for whose particular sins the wrath was shown. When therefore a Fast and day of humiliation was appointed to avert the hand of Providence, there was always announced a list of various alternative sins for which penitence was due.

When the “ill years” came with frost and haar, snow and rain, destroying crops and starving the people, the General Assembly ordered a Fast, comprehensively “to appease the anger of God for the sins of Sabbath breaking, profanity, drunkenness, uncleanness and infidelity.”

FAVORITE BROTHER OF SAINT ANDREW. The Ninth Degree of the Swedish Rite.

FAVORITE BROTHER OF SAINT JOHN. The Eighth Degree of the Swedish Rite.
FEAST. The convocation of the Craft together at an annual feast, for the laudable purpose of promoting social feelings, and cementing the bonds of brotherly love by the interchange of courtesies, is a time-honored custom, which is unfortunately growing into disuse. The Assembly and Feast are words constantly conjoined in the Book of Constitutions. At this meeting, no business of any kind, except the installation of officers, was transacted, and the day was passed in innocent festivity. The election of officers always took place at a previous meeting, in obedience to a regulation adopted by the Grand Lodge of England, in 1720, as follows: "It was agreed, in order to avoid disputes on the annual feast-day, that the new Grand Master for the future shall be named and proposed to the Grand Lodge some time before the feast" (see Constitutions, 1738, page 111).

FEASTS OF THE ORDER. The festivals of Saint John the Baptist and Saint John the Evangelist, June 24 and December 27, are so called.

FEELING. One of the five human senses, and esteemed by Freemasons above all the others. For as Anthony Brewer, an old dramatist, says: Though one hear, and see, and smell, and taste, if he wants touch, he is counted but a block.

FEES OF HONOR. In the Grand Lodge of England every Grand Officer, on his election or re-election, is required to pay a sum of money, varying from two to twenty guineas, an amount ranging from say ten to one hundred dollars. The sums thus paid for honors bestowed are technically called Fees of Honor. A similar custom prevails in the Grand Lodges of Ireland and Scotland; but the usage is unknown in America.

FEE, TEST. See Test Fee.

FEIX-FEAX. A term signifying School of Thought, which is found in the First Degree of the French Adoptive Rite.

FELD LOGE. What is designated in England and America as a Military or Traveling Lodge is called in Germany a Feld Loge. Sometimes, ein ambulante Loge.

FELICITAIRES, ORDRE DES. French for the Order of Happy People. An Order established in Paris in 1742 or 1743 by Brother de Chambonnet and several officers of marine. All the emblems of the Order, the ritual and expressions were nautical in character. The Order, which for a long time conducted its proceedings without reproach, numbered at first many noblemen and distinguished women amongst its members but later the meetings became so grossly immoral in character that, within two years of its foundation, it was dissolved, to be succeeded in 1745 by L'Ordre des Chevaliers et Chevalieres de l'Ancre, the latter meaning anchor. The principal features of The Order of Happy People were followed, their four Degrees being Cabin-boy, Captain, Commodore, and Vice-Admiral. Only the passwords and regalia were changed. The cable was replaced by an anchor, this becoming the jewel of the Order.

FELICITY, ORDER OF. An androgynous, or both sexes, secret society, founded in 1743, at Paris, by M. Chambonnet. It was among the first of the pseudo-Masonic associations, or coteries, invented by French Freemasons to gratify the curiosity and to secure the support of women. It had a ritual and a vocabulary which were nautical in their character, and there was a rather too free indulgence in the latitude of gallantry. It consisted of fourDegrees, Cabin Boy, Master, Commodore, and Vice Admiral. The chief of the order was called Admiral, and this position was of course occupied by M. Chambonnet, the inventor of the system (Clavel, Historie Pittoresque, page 111).

FELLOW. The Saxon word for fellow is felaw. Spelman derives it from two words fe and loy, which signifies bound in mutual trust; a plausible derivation, and not unsuited to the meaning of the world. But Hicks gives a better etymology when he derives it from the Anglo-Saxon folgian, meaning to follow and thus a fellow would be a follower, a companion, an associate. In the Middle Ages, therefore, the Operative Masons were divided into Masters and Fellows. Thus in the Harleian Manuscript, No. 2054, it is said: "Now I will rehearse other charges in singular for Maisters & fellows." Those who were of greater skill held a higher position and were designated as Masters, while the masses of the Fraternity, the commonalty, as we might say, were called Fellows. In the Matthew Cooke Manuscript this principle is very plainly laid down. There it is written that Euclid "ordained that they who were passing of cunning should be passing honored, and commanded to call the cunninger Master . . . . and commanded that they that were less of wit should not be called servant nor subject, but Fellow, for nobility of their gentle blood" (see lines 675–88). From this custom has originated the modern title of Fellow Craft, given to the Second Degree of Speculative Freemasonry; although not long after the revival of 1717 the Fellows ceased to constitute the main Body of the Fraternity, the Masters having taken and still holding that position.

FELLOW CRAFT. The Second Degree of Freemasonry in all the Rites is that of the Fellow Craft. In French it is called Compagnon; in Spanish, Compañero; in Italian, Compagno; and in German, Gesell; all of which the radical meaning of the word is a fellow workman, thus showing the origin of the title from an operative institution. Like the Degree of Apprentice, it is only preparatory in the higher initiation of the Master; and yet it differs essentially from it in its symbolism. For, as the First Degree was typical of youth, the Second is supposed to represent the stage of manhood, and hence the acquisition of science is made its prominent characteristic. While the former is directed toward the purification of the heart, the latter is intended by its lessons to train the reasoning faculties and improve the intellectual powers. Before the eighteenth century, the great Body of the Fraternity consisted of Fellow Crafts, who are designated in all the old manuscripts as Fellows. After the revival in 1717, the Fellow Crafts, who then began to be called by that name, lost their prominent position, and the great body of the brotherhood was, for a long time, made up altogether of Apprentices, while the government of the institution was committed to the Masters and Fellows, both of whom were made only in the Grand Lodge until 1725, when the regulation was repealed, and subordinate Lodges were permitted to confer those two Degrees (see Middle Chamber Lecture and the Dew Drop Lecture).

FELLOW CRAFT PERFECT ARCHITECT. The French expression being Compagnon Parfait Architect. The Twenty-sixth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. There are several other Degrees which, like this, are so called, not because they have any relation to the original Second Degree of Symbolic Freemasonry, but to indicate that they constitute the second in any particular series of Degrees which are preparatory to the culmination of that series. Thus, in the Rite of Mizraim, we have the Master Perfect Architect, which is the Twenty-seventh Degree, while the Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth are Apprentice and Fellow Craft Perfect Architect. So we have in other rites and systems the Fellow Craft Cohen, Hermetic, and Cabalistc Fellow Craft, where Master Cohen and Hermetic and Cabalistic Master are the topmost Degrees of the different series. Fellow Craft in all these, and many other instances like them, means only the second preparation toward perfection.

FELLOWS, COLONEL JOHN. The author of An Exposition of the Mysteries, or Religious Dogmas and Customs of the ancient Egyptians, Pythagoreans, and Druids, also an Inquiry into the Origin, History, and Purport of Freemasonry, New York, 1835. A similar volume published at London in 1857 and followed by other editions in 1860, 1866, 1871, and 1880, was entitled The Mysteries of Freemasonry. Moncure D. Conway, biographer of Thomas Paine, credits Colonel Fellows with the authorship of the preface to Paine's essay on Freemasonry.

FELLOWSHIP OF MASONS. See Masons, Company of.

FEMALE FREEMASONRY. See Adoptive Freemasonry.

FEMALE FREEMASONS. The landmarks of Speculative Freemasonry peremptorily exclude females from any active participation in its mysteries. But there are a few instances in which the otherwise unalterable rule of female exclusion has been made to yield to the peculiar exigencies of the occasion; and some cases are well authenticated where this Salic law has been violated from necessity, and females have been permitted to receive at least the First Degree. The Salic regulation, law of the Salian Franks excluded women from the throne of France. Such, however, have been only the exceptions which have given confirmation to the rule (see Altworth, Beaton, and Xaintrailles).

FENCING THE LODGE. The name of an old ceremony in the Scottish Operative Lodges. There was prayer to God for power to impartially deal with what might be brought before the Brethren and there was also a solemn obligation that all the participants should be purged of the evils of prejudice and injustice in making their decisions (see also Purging the Lodge).

FENDEURS. More fully in French, L'Ordre des Fendeurs, meaning the Order of Woodcutters, was a secret society, established at Paris, in 1743, by the Chevalier Beauchaine. The Lodge represented a forest, and was generally held in a garden. It was androgynous, for both sexes, and held secret signs and words, and an allegorical language borrowed from the profession of woodcutting. The Abbe Barruel (tome ii, page 350, edition of 1797) thought that the Order originated in the forests among the actual woodcutters, and that many intelligent inhabitants of the city having united with them, the operative business of felling trees was abandoned and Philosophic Lodges were established—a course of conversion from Operative to Speculative precisely like that, he says, which occurred in Freemasonry, and this conversion was owing to the number of Fendeurs who were also Freemasons. A complete ritual of the Fendeurs is given in the Transactions of Quatuor Coronati Lodge (volume xxi, pages 37-52).

FENDEURS, ORDER OF. Ordre des Fendeurs et Fendeuses. Also known as the Forest Masons. A French Order accepting both men and women as members, though not necessarily connected with the Masonic Fraternity. They traced their Order back to the time of Alexander the Great. They were, in all probability, a branch of the Carbonari, or Charcoal Burners, a political league which made its appearance in the twelfth century. In 1747 there was a revival of this society and it became popular with ladies and gentlemen of high rank and distinction. Meetings were held in rooms decorated to represent a forest or in the summer time, when the weather permitted, the meetings were held outdoors. In their ritual they used implements connected with woodcutting, such as axes, logs, tree stumps, stone cups, whistles, and their regalia included a carpenter's apron and a russet-colored sash edged with green. The Master was called Père Maître or Parent Master, and the other offices were Cousin Hermit, Cousin Winedresser, Cousin Bear, Cousin Elm, Cousin Oak, and so forth. A woman candidate was called a Briquette and a man, Briquet.

FERDINAND IV. This King of the two Sicilies, on the 12th of September, 1775, issued an edict forbidding the meeting of Freemasons in Lodges in his dominions, under penalty of death. In 1777, at the solicitation of his queen, Caroline, this edict was repealed, and Freemasonry was once more tolerated; but in 1781 the decree was renewed.

FERDINAND VI. In 1751, Ferdinand VI, King of Spain, at the solicitation of Joseph Torrubia, Visitor of the Holy Inquisition, enforced in his dominions the Bull of excommunication of Pope Benedict XIV, and forbade the congregation of Freemasons under the highest penalties of law. In the Journal of Freemasonry, Vienna, 1784 (pages 176-224), will be found a translation from Spanish into German of Torrubia's Act of Accusation, which gave rise to this persecution.

FERDINAND VII. The King of Spain who bore this title was one of the greatest bigots of his time. He had no sooner ascended the throne in 1814, than he re-established the Inquisition, which had been abolished by his predecessor, prescribed the exercise of Freemasonry, and ordered the closing of all the Lodges, under the heaviest penalties. In September following, twenty-five persons, among whom were several distinguished noblemen, were arrested as "suspected of Freemasonry. On March 30, 1818, a still more rigorous edict was issued, by which those convicted of being Freemasons were subjected to the most severe punishments, such as banishment to India and confiscation of goods, or sometimes death by a cruel form of execution. But the subsequent Revolution of 1820 and the abolition of the Inquisition removed these blots from the Spanish records.

Fernow, Karl Ludwig. Painter and author on ancient art, was born on November 19, 1763, at Pomerania, Germany; was at Rome from 1785 and lectured there on archaeology; returning to Germany, 1802, he became a professor of Italian literature at Jena; then in 1804 was librarian for the Duchess Amalia at Weimar. Fernow was a member of the Lodge Amalia, which honored his memory by a special assembly in 1809, he having died on December 4, 1808.

Ferry, Jules François Camille. A French statesman, born at Saint Diô, April 5, 1832, studied law, entered politics at Paris, protested against war of 1870 but administered that city during the siege by the German army. Twice Premier, he had been Minister of Education and Minister of Foreign Affairs; in the latter positions he organized public education on a non-clerical basis and provided for colonial growth. He made elementary education free, obligatory, and non-clerical, and urged the removal from religious orders of a right to teach. On March 17, 1893, from a pistol shot. He was an associate of Emile Littre and Leon Gambetta and died in 1893.

Fervency. From the middle eighteen century, ardent devotion to duty, fervor or fervency, was described as a Masonic virtue in the lectures of the First Degree, and symbolized by charcoal, because, as later instructions say, all metals were dissolved by the fervor of ignited charcoal. Subsequently, in further Degrees, fervency and zeal were symbolized by the color scarlet, which is the appropriate tincture of Royal Arch Masonry.

Fessler, Ignaz Aurelius. A distinguished German writer and Masonic reformer, who was born at Czarendorf, in Hungary, in 1756. He was the son of very poor parents. His mother, who was a bigoted Catholic, had devoted him to a monastic life, and having been educated at the Jesuit School of Raab, he took holy orders in 1772, and was removed to the Capuchin monastery in Vienna. In consequence, however, of his exposure to the Emperor Joseph II of monastic abuses, he incurred the persecutions of his superiors. But the emperor, having taken him under his protection, nominated him, in 1753, as co-professor of the Oriental languages in the University of Lemberg. But the monks having threatened him with legal proceedings, he fled to Breslau in 1788, where he subsequently was appointed the tutor of the son of the Prince of Corolath. Here he established a secret Order, called by him the Evergreen, which bore a resemblance to Freemasonry in its organization, and was intended to effect moral reforms, which at the time he thought Freemasonry incapable of producing. The Order, however, never really had an active existence, and the attempt of Fessler failed by the dissolution, in 1793, of the society. In 1791 he adopted the Lutheran faith, and, having married, settled in Berlin, where until 1806, he was employed as a superintendent of schools. He wrote during this period several historical works, which gave him a high reputation as an author.

But the victorious progress of the French army in Prussia caused him to lose his official position. Having been divorced from his wife in 1802, he again married, and retiring in 1803 from Berlin, betook himself to the quietude of a country life. Becoming now greatly embarrased in pecuniary matters, he received adequate relief from several of the German Lodges, for which he expressed the most lively gratitude. In 1808 he accepted the position of a professor in the University of St. Petersburg, which, however, he was soon compelled to relinquish in consequence of the intrigues of the clergy, who were displeased with his liberal views. Subsequently he was appointed superintendent of the evangelical community, over nine Russian departments, and Ecclesiastical President of the Consistory at Saratow, with a large salary. In 1827, on the invitation of the Emperor Alexander, he removed permanently to St. Petersburg, where, in 1833, he received the appointment of Ecclesiastical Counsellor, and died there December 15, 1839, at the advanced age of eighty-three years.

Fessler was initiated in Freemasonry at Lemberg, in 1783, and immediately devoted himself to the study of its science and history. In June, 1796, he affiliated with the Lodge Royal York, zur Freundschaft, in Berlin, and having been made one of its Sublime Council, was invested with the charge of revising and remodeling the entire ritual of the Lodge, which was based on the advanced Degrees of the French system.

To the accomplishment of this laborious task, Fessler at once, and for a long time afterward, devoted his great intellect and his indefatigable energies. In a very short period he succeeded in a reformation of the symbolic Degrees, and finding the Brethren unwilling to reject the high Degrees, which were four in number, then practised by the Lodge, he remodeled them, retaining a considerable part of the French ritual, but incorporated with it a portion of the Swedish system. The work thus accomplished met with general approbation. In his next task of forming a new Constitution he was not so successful, although at length he induced the Royal York Lodge to assume the character and rank of a Grand Lodge, which it did in 1798, with seven subordinate Lodges under its obedience. Again Fessler commenced the work of a revision of the ritual. He had always been opposed to the high Degree system. He proposed, therefore, the abolition of everything above the Degree of Master. In this, however, he was warmly opposed, and was compelled to abandon his project of reducing German Freemasonry to the simplicity of the English system. Yet he was enabled to accomplish something, and had the satisfaction, in 1800, of metamorphosing the Eli, the Escossais, and the Rose Croix, of the old ritual of the Royal York Lodge, into the "degrees of knowledge," which constitute the system known as the Rite of Fessler.

In 1798, Fessler had been elected Deputy Grand Master when there were but three Lodges under FESSLER, RITE OF. This Rite, which was prepared by Fessler at the request of the Grand Lodge Royal York of Berlin, consisted of nine Degrees, as follows:

1. Entered Apprentice
2. Fellow Craft
3. Master Mason
4. The Holy of Holies. This Degree is occupied in a critical exposition of the various hypotheses which have been proposed as to the origin of Freemasonry; as, whether it sprang from the Templars, from the Cathedral of Strasburg, from the Rose Croix of the seventeenth century, from Oliver Cromwell, from the Cathedral of Saint Paul’s at London, from that of the Palace of Kensington, or from the Jesuits.
5. Justification. Critical examination of the origin of certain of the advanced Degrees, such as the Ecossais and the Chapter of Clermont.
7. True Light. Critical examination of the Swedish System, the System of Zinnendorf, the Royal Arch of England, of the succession of the Mysteries, and of all systems and their ramifications.
8. The Country. Examination of the origin of the Mysteries of the Divine Kingdom, introduced by Jesus of Nazareth; of the exoteric doctrines communicated by him immediately to his disciples, and of those which sprang up after his death, up to the time of the Gnostics.

Both Clavel and Ragon say that the rituals of these Degrees were drawn up from the work of the Golden Rose Croix, of the Rite of Strict Observance, of the Illuminated Chapter of Sweden, and the Ancient Chapter of Clermont. Fessler’s Rite was, perhaps, the most abstrusely learned and philosophical of all the Masonic systems; but it did not have a long existence, as it was abandoned by the Grand Lodge, which had at first accepted it, for the purpose of adopting the Ancient York Rite under the Constitutions of England.

FESTIVALS. All religions have had certain days consecrated to festive enjoyment, hence called festivals. Sir Isaac Newton (on Daniel, page 204) says:

The heathen were delighted with the festivals of their gods, and unwilling to part with these delights; and, therefore, Gregory Thaumaturgus, who died in 263, and was Bishop of Neocaesarea, to facilitate their conversion, instituted annual festivals to the saints and martyrs. Hence it came to pass that, for exploding the festivals of the heathens, the principal festivals of the Christians succeeded in their room; as the keeping of Christmas with joy, and feasting, and playing, and sports, in the room of the Bacchalia and Saturnalia; the celebrating of May day with flowers, in the room of the Floralia; and the keeping of festivals to the Virgin Mary, John the Baptist, and divers of the apostles, in the room of the solemnities at the entrance of the sun into the signs of the Zodiac, in the old Julian Calendar.

The Freemasons, borrowing from and imitating the usage of the Church, have also always had their festivals or days of festivity and celebration. The chief festivals of the Operatives or Stonemasons of the Middle Ages were those of Saint John the Baptist on June 24, and the Four Crowned Martyrs on the 8th of November. The latter was, however, discarded by the Speculative Freemasons; and the festivals now most generally celebrated by the Fraternity are those of Saint John the Baptist, June 24, and Saint John the Evangelist, December 27. These are the days kept in the United States. Such, too, was formerly the ease in England; but the annual festival of the Grand Lodge of England now falls on the Wednesday following Saint George’s day, April 23, that Saint being the patron of England. For a similar reason, Saint Andrew’s day, November 30, is kept by the Grand Lodge of Scotland. In Ireland the festival kept is that of Saint John on December 27.

FEUILLANTS. An androgynous, both sexes, system, found in Fustier’s collection, and governed by the statutes of Saint Bernard.

FEUILLANTS, or DAMES PHLEIADES. An organization established about the middle of the eighteenth century in Brittany, France. The grip was given by shaking hands with the fingers interlaced three times reciprocally. The sign was made by the hands being raised to a level with the eyes, the palms turned upwards with the fingers interlaced. The pass-words were—Have you gathered the roses? The correct response was—Also the grapes.

FIAT LUX ET LUX FIT. A Latin motto frequently written Sit Lux et Lux Fuit, referring to Genesis (i, 3), “Let there be light, and there was light” (see True Light).
FIDELITY

See Fides.

FIDELITY OF BADEN DURLACH, ORDER OF. Instituted in 1716 by Charles Margrave of Baden Durlach. The members of the Order were knighted, selections being made only from the nobles of ancient family. The reigning princes were hereditary Grand Masters.

FIDES. In the instruction of the First Degree, it is said that “our ancient Brethren worshipped deity under the name of Fides or Fidelity, which was sometimes represented by two right hands joined, and some times by two human figures holding each other by the right hands.” The deity here referred to was the goddess Fides, to whom Numa first erected temples, and whose priests were covered by a white veil as a symbol of the purity which should characterize Fidelity. No victims were slain on her altars, and no offerings made to her except flowers, wine, and incense. Her statues were represented clothed in a white mantle, with a key in her hand and a dog at her feet. The virtue of Fidelity is, however, frequently symbolized in ancient medals by a heart in the open hand, but more usually by two right hands clasped. Horace calls her Incepta Fides, and makes her the sister of Justice; while Cicero says that that which is religion toward God and piety toward our parents is fidelity toward our fellow-men. There was among the Romans another deity called Fidius, who presided over oaths and contracts, a very usual form of imprecation thus explained by Doctor Oliver (Dictionary of Symbolic Masonry).

The fiducial sign shows us if we prostrate ourselves with our face to the earth, we thus throw ourselves on the mercy of our Creator and Judge, looking forward with humble confidence to his holy promises, by which alone we hope to pass through the Ark of our redemption into the mansion of eternal bliss and glory to the presence of Him who is the great I AM, the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the Ending, the First and the Last.

FIDUCIAL SIGN. That is, the sign of confiding trust, called also the sign of Truth and Hope. One of the signs of the English Royal Arch system, which is intended for the tented field, and have been of the greatest service to humanity in its trying hours, when the worst of passions are appeased.

FIELD LODGE, or ARMY LODGE. A Lodge duly instituted under proper authority from a Grand Body of competent jurisdiction, and authorized to exercise during its peripatetic existence all the powers and privileges that it might possess if permanently located. Charters of this nature, as the name implies, are intended for the tented field, and have been of the greatest service to humanity in its trying hours, when the worst of passions are appeased.

FIFTEEN. A sacred number symbolic of the name of God, because the letters of the holy name נוֹר, יָה, are equal, in the Hebrew mode of numeration by the letters of the alphabet, to fifteen; for י is equal to ten, and נ is equal to five. Hence, from veneration for this sacred name, the Hebrews do not, in ordinary computations, when they wish to express the number fifteen, make use of these two letters, but of two others, which are equivalent to nine and six (see also Fourteen).

FIJI ISLANDS. See Oceania.

FINANCES. According to universal usage on Freemasonry, the Treasurer of the Lodge or other Body is the banker or depository of the finances of the Lodge. They are first received by the Secretary, who receipts for them, and immediately pays them over to the Treasurer. The Treasurer distributes them under the orders of the Master and the consent of the Lodge. This consent can only be known officially to him by the statement of the Secretary, and hence all orders drawn on the Treasurer for the disbursement of money should be countersigned by the Secretary.

FINCH, WILLIAM. A Masonic charlatan, or fraud, who flourished at the end of the preceding and the beginning of the nineteenth century. Finch was a tailor in Canterbury, who, having been expelled for some misconduct by the Grand Lodge, commenced a system of practical Freemasonry on his own account, and opened a Lodge in his house, where he undertook to initiate candidates and to give instructions in Freemasonry. He published a great number of pamphlets, many of them in a cipher of his own, which he pretended were for the instruction of the Fraternity. Among the books published by him are: A Masonic Treatise, with an Elucidation on the Religious and Moral Beauties of Freemasonry, etc.; printed at Canterbury in 1802. The Lectures, Laws, and Ceremonies of the Holy Arch Degree of Freemasonry, etc., Lambeth, 1812. The Origin of Freemasons, etc.; London, 1816.

Finch found many dupes, and made a great deal of money. But having on one occasion been sued by an engraver named Smith, for money due for printing his plates, Finch pleaded an offset of money due by Smith for initiation and instruction in Freemasonry. Smith brought the Grand Secretary and other distinguished Freemasons into court, who testified that Finch was an impostor. In consequence of this exposure, Finch lost credit with the community, and, sinking into obscurity, died sometime after, in abject poverty.

As it is impossible to read Finch’s Treatises without a knowledge of the cipher employed by him, the following key will be found useful. We owe it to the researches of Brother H. C. Levander (Freemasons Magazine and Review, 1859, page 490). In the first part of the book the cipher used is formed by reversing the alphabet, writing z for a, y for b, etc. The cipher used on the title-page differs somewhat from this, as will be seen from the following:

Cipher. a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, j, k, l, m, n, o, p, q, r, s, t, u, v, w, x, y, z.

Key. b, d, f, h, j, l, n, p, r, t, v, w, x, y, z, u, s, q, o, m, k, g, e, c, a.

FOR THE FIRST PART

Cipher. a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, j, k, l, m, n, o, p, q, r, s, t, u, v, w, x, y, z.

Key. z, y, x, w, v, u, t, s, r, q, p, o, n, m, l, k, j, h, g, f, e, d, c, b, a.

In the second part of the work, a totally different system is employed. The words may be deciphered by taking the last letter, then the first, then the last but one, then the second, and so on. Two or three words...
The purifying power of fire is naturally deduced from this symbol of the holiness of the element. And in the advanced Degrees of Freemasonry, as in the ancient institutions, there is a purification by fire, coming down to us insensibly and unconsciously from the old Magian cultus. In the Medieval ages there was a sect of fire-philosophers—philosophi per ignem—who were a branch of offshoot of Rosicrucianism, with which Freemasonry has so much in common. These fire-philosophers kept up the veneration for fire, and cultivated the fire-secret, not as an idolatrous belief, but modified by their hermetic notions. They were also called theosophists, and through them, or in reference to them, we find the theosophic Degrees of Freemasonry, which sprung up in the eighteenth century. As fire and light are identical, so the fire, which was to the Zoroastrians the symbol of the Divine Being, is to the Freemason, under the equivalent idea of light, the symbol of Divine Truth, or of the Grand Architect.

FIRRAO, JOSEPH. A cardinal priest who, in 1738, published the edict of Pope Clement XII against Freemasonry.

FIRST MASONIC OPERA. See Generous Freemasonry.

FISH. The Greek word for fish is ἸΧΘΥΣ. Now these five letters are the initials of the five words Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Φίλος Σωτήρ, that is, Jesus Christ the Son of God, the Saviour. Hence the early Christians adopted the fish as a Christian symbol; and it is to be found on many of their tombs, and was often worn as an ornament. Clement of Alexandria, in writing of the ornaments that a Christian may constantly wear, mentions the fish as a proper device for a ring, as serving to remind the Christian of the origin of his spiritual life, the fish referring to the waters of baptism. The Vesica Piscis, which is an oval figure, pointed at both ends, and representing the air bladder of a fish, was adopted, and is still often used as the form of the seal of religious houses and con-fraternities, Margoliouth (Vestiges of General Freemasonry, 45) says: “In former days, the Grand Master of our Order used to wear a silver fish on his person; but it is to be regretted that, amongst the many innovations which have been of late introduced into the Society to conciliate the prejudices of some who cannot consistently be members of it, this beautiful emblem has disappeared.”

master, or Chief Surveyor, under Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Dorchester, Grand Master, in the reign of King John of England, until the death of Geoffrey, 1213.

FIVE. Among the Pythagoreans, five was a mystical number, because it was formed by the union of the first even number and the first odd, rejecting unity; and hence it symbolized the mixed conditions of order and disorder, happiness and misfortune, life and death. The same union of the odd and even, or male and female, numbers made it the symbol of marriage. Among the Greeks it was a symbol of the world, because, says Diodorus, it represented ether and the four elements. It was a sacred round number among the Hebrews. In Egypt, India, and other Oriental nations, says Gesenius, the five minor planets and the five elementary powers were accounted sacred. It was the pentas of the Gnostics and the Hermic Philosophers; it was the symbol of their quintessence, the fifth or highest essence of power in a natural body. In Freemasonry, five is a sacred number, inferior only in importance to three and seven. It is especially significant in the Fellow Craft's Degree, where five are required to hold a Lodge, and where, in the winding stairs, the five steps are referred to the orders of architecture and the human senses. In the Third Degree we find the reference to the five points of fellowship and their symbol, the five-pointed star. Geometry, too, which is deemed synonymous with Freemasonry, is called the fifth science; and, in fact, throughout nearly all the Degrees of Freemasonry, we find abundant allusions to five as a sacred and mystical number.

FIVE-POINTED STAR. The five-pointed star, which is not to be confounded with the blazing star, is not found among the old symbols of Freemasonry; indeed, some writers have denied that it is a Masonic emblem at all. It is undoubtedly of recent origin, and was probably introduced by Jeremy Cross, who placed it among the plates in the emblems of the Third Degree prefixed to his Hieroglyphic Chart. It is not mentioned in the ritual or the lecture of the Third Degree, but the Freemasons of the United States have, by tacit consent, referred to it as a symbol of the Five Points of Fellowship. The outlines of the five-pointed star are the same as those of the pentagram of Pythagoras, which was the symbol of health. M. Jomard, in his Description de L'Egypte (tome viii, page 423) says that the star engraved on the Egyptian monuments, where it is a very common hieroglyphic, has constantly five points, never more nor less.

FIVE POINTS. See Chromatic Calendar.

FIVE POINTS OF FELLOWSHIP. See Points of Fellowship, Five.

FIVE SENSES. The five senses of Hearing, Seeing, Feeling, Tasting, and Smelling are introduced into the lecture of the Fellow Craft as a part of the instructions of that Degree (see each word in its appropriate place). In the earlier lectures of the eighteenth century, the five senses were explained in the First Degree as referring to the five who make a Lodge. Their subsequent reference to the winding stairs, and their introduction into the Second Degree, were modern improvements. As these senses are the avenues by which the mind receives its perceptions of things exterior to it, and thus becomes the storehouse of ideas, they are most appropriately referred to that Degree of Freemasonry whose professed object is the pursuit and acquisition of knowledge.

FIXED LIGHTS. In the old lectures of the eighteenth century, the fixed lights were the three windows always supposed to exist in the East, South, and West. Their uses were, according to the old instructions "to light the men to, at, and from their work." In the modern lectures they have been omitted, and their place as symbols supplied by the lesser lights.

FLAG CEREMONY. A formal reception of the National Flag was especially frequent in all fraternal Bodies during the World War and ceremonies of most impressive character were noted in leading Masonic organizations as in the Grand Lodges of Iowa, Indiana, and elsewhere. The making of the first "Stars and Stripes" is credited to Mrs. Elizabeth Ross of Philadelphia. We have seen on the door posts of the old ancestral home of the Washingtons at Sulgrave Manor, England, two shields each bearing three stars surmounting a horizontal bar or stripe. Doubtless this had a suggestive force in designing the new flag. When the National Flag is hung either horizontally or vertically across a wall, the union (the stars on the blue field or background) should be uppermost and to the flag's own right, that is to the observer's left. When displayed from a staff projecting horizontally or at an angle from a window sill or the front of a building, the same rule should be followed. The union should go down to the truck (as the peak or point of the staff is called) unless the flag is at half-mast position.

A Service Flag was designed by Brother Robert L. Queisser, Captain, Fifth Ohio Machine Gun Company, in honor of those in the military or naval service. This flag was used in the United States during the World War. The flag had a center field of white with a red border. On the white field blue stars were placed for those in service, gold stars for the dead.

At the fifty-fourth annual session held at Miami, Florida, May 1-3, 1928, of the Imperial Council, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, the Committee on Revision of Ritual reported that some Temples were using elaborate and beautiful flag ceremonies. In a great many cases bugle calls were used in connection with the activities of the Color Guard and bands rendered patriotic airs in keeping with the spirit of the occasion. Usually the National Anthems were sung by the entire membership present. The Committee submitted a minimum requirement to be made applicable to all the Temples of the Order with the understanding that the following simple ceremony might be developed and elaborated:

When the Color Guard, or Marshal, with his assistants presents the Colors at the altar after the Temple has been duly opened, the Potentate will cause the Nobility to come to attention and salute. After the salute is rendered, the following pledge will be recited in concert:

"I pledge allegiance to my flag, to the principles for which it stands, one Brotherhood indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

The Color Guard will then escort the Colors to their proper position while the Nobility continue at attention. The Color Guard will then return to the altar and the Potentate will seat the Temple.

The suggestion of the Committee was recommended to the Subordinate Temples.

FLAMING SWORD. A sword whose blade is of a spiral or twisted form is called by the heralds a flamsword, from its resemblance to the ascending curvature of a flame of fire. Until very recently, this was the form of the Tiler's sword. Carelessness or ignorance has now in many Lodges substituted for it a common sword of any form. The flaming sword of the Tiler refers to the flaming sword which guarded the entrance to Paradise, as described in Genesis (iii, 24): "So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubim and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life;" or, as Raphall has translated it, "the flaming sword which revolveth, to guard the way to the tree of life." In former times, when symbols and ceremonies were more respected than they are now; when collars were worn, and not ribbons in the button-hole; and when the standing column of the Senior Warden, and the recumbent one of the Junior during labor, to be reversed during refreshment, were deemed necessary for the complete furniture of the Lodge, the cavalry sword was unknown as a Masonic implement, and the Tiler always bore a flaming sword. It were better if we could get back to the old customs.

FLEMING, DR. WALTER MILLARD. Established the Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine in the United States. In 1867 Brother William J. Florence made a trip to the Old World and is reported to have secured there useful information for the introduction and establishment of the Shrine. When he returned to the United States with all the data obtainable he communicated the particulars to Doctor Fleming, and thereby after further consultation with Brother Charles T. McClennach and other able Masonic ritualists, they prepared the way to establish the Shrine in the United States. On June 16, 1871, Doctor Fleming, assisted by Brother Florence, conferred the Degrees upon four Knights Templar and seven members of Aurora Grata Consistory, Thirty-second Degree, and September 26, 1872, the organization was effected and officers elected.

Doctor Fleming was born on June 13, 1838, in Portland, Maine, and died at Mount Vernon, New York, September 9, 1913, being buried in Kensico Cemetery. He was a prominent medical man; joined the Masonic Fraternity February 13, 1869, was raised in Rochester Lodge No. 660 of Rochester, New York. He removed his office and residence to New York City and associated himself with Aurora Grata Consistory, Thirty-second Degree, and September 26, 1872, the organization was effected and officers elected.

Brother Fleming held his original office from the time of its inception until December, 1887. He was elected Grand Imperial Potentate at the first Session of the Imperial Grand Council of the Order, June 6, 1876, and retained this office until June 14, 1886. The name Grand was after a time dropped from the titles (see Doctor Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry, pages 1973-83, for a detailed account of the Order of the Mystic Shrine. See also Florence, William Jermy, and Shrine).

FLOATS. Pieces of timber, made fast together with rafters, for conveying burdens down a river with the stream. The use of these floats in the building of the Temple is thus described in the letter of King Hiram to Solomon: "And we will cut wood out of Lebanon, as much as thou shalt need: and we will bring it to thee in flottes by sea to Joppa; and thou shalt carry it up to Jerusalem" (Second Chronicles ii, 10).

FLOQUET, French Freemason and musician; composer of the Te Deum (a term based on the opening words in Latin of an early hymn, Te Deum Laudamus, We Praise Thee, O God, and often applied to any thanksgiving song or service), which the Mother Lodge of the Scottish Philisophic Rite sang in 1781 at the Church of Notre Dame, Paris, in honor of the birth of the Dauphin, the first-born son of the King of France.

FLOOR. The floor of a properly constructed Lodge-room should be covered with alternate squares of black and white, to represent the Mosaic pavement which was the ground floor of King Solomon's Temple.

FLOOR-CLOTH. A framework of board or canvas, on which the emblems of any particular Degree are inscribed, for the assistance of the Master in giving a lecture. It is so called because formerly it was the custom to inscribe these designs on the floor of the Lodge-room in chalk, which were wiped out when the Lodge was closed. It is the same as the Carpet, or Tracing-Board.

The washing out of the designs chalked upon the floor is seen in the early caricatures of the Craft where a mop and pail are illustrated. These would soon be put aside when Lodges met in carpeted rooms. Then the symbols were shown by marking out the Lodge with tape and nails or shaving the symbols in wood or metal to be laid upon the floor or table or pedestal as the case might be in the Lodge. Such use of separate symbols we have seen in English Lodges, as at Bristol, where the ancient ceremonies are jealously and successfully preserved. An easy development would be to picture the designs on a cloth to be spread out on floor when in use or folded up for storage. Then there would be the further movement to the stereopticon slides of a similar character, and which find frequent use in the United States. Brother John Harris in 1820 designed and made a set of Tracing Boards for the three Degrees. These designs were never authorised by the Grand Lodge of England, the individual Lodges employed their own artists and the results varied accordingly, though the influence of Brother Harris tended to the uniformity that practically now prevails among the Tracing-Board makers. Articles of much interest and value on the subject are "Evolution and Development of the Tracing or Lodge Board," by Brother E. H. Dring (Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, 1916, volume xxix, pages 243 and 275), and "Some Notes on the Tracing Board of the Lodge of Union, No. 38," by Brother O. N. Wyatt (Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, 1910, volume xxiii, page 191). The latter article refers particularly to the work of Brother Josiah Bowring, a portrait painter of London, who painted the Boards for the Chichester Lodge in 1811, himself being initiated in 1795.

FLOORING. The same as Floor-cloth, which see. FLORENCE, WILLIAM J. William J., or Billy, Florence was the professional name used by William Jermy Conlin, a popular actor, and a Freemason whose name is romantically as well as practically associated with the founding of the Ancient and Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. This organization was doubtless erected upon a ritual and ceremonies established and brought into being by Brother Florence and his co-workers, Dr. Walter M. Fleming, with their immediate Masonic friends. Little of the actual detail of the work at headquarters was done by Florence himself, that being left to Doctor Fleming, due to Brother Florence’s enforced long absences while touring the United States or foreign lands in following his profession. He, however, lent his popular name to the cause and enthusiastically contributed what assistance he could to the propagation of the Order.

Brother Florence was born July 26, 1831, at Albany, New York. Adopted the stage as a profession and met with immediate success and continuous popularity until the time of his death, which occurred at the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia, November 19, 1891. His body was interred in Greenwood Cemetery—Protestant—in Brooklyn, in a plot which Florence had purchased years before and which was the burial place of his mother, although his wife was a Roman Catholic who had the last rites performed over him by the priesthood of her choice in Saint Agnes Church.

Brother Charles Thomas McClenachan, Thirty-third Degree, and closely associated with Brothers Florence and Fleming in the founding of the Mystic Shrine, conferred the Scottish Rite upon all the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia, November 19, 1891. Noble Florence conferred the Degrees of the Shrine upon Sam Briggs, who was Potentate of Al Koran Temple from 1876 to 1901, and Imperial Potentate from 1886 to 1892, as well as on Brenton D. Babcock and three other Clevelanders at the Opera House and at the Kennard Hotel on October 21 and 22, 1876. When the Al Koran Temple of Cleveland was instituted, Florence was an honored visitor, he having suggested its name.

Noble Florence was known as "in art admirable; in life gentle; he was widely known, and he was known only to be loved.”

By Virtue cherished, by Affection mourned. By Florence hallowed and by Florence revered. Here Florence sleeps, and over his sacred rest Each word is tender and each thought is blest. Long, for his loss, shall pensive Memory show Through the visionary mask of humor’s veil, her woes—

FLUDD

James Grant was appointed Provincial Grand Master over the Lodges in the Southern District of North America. This Grand Lodge, however, became extinct with the Spanish succession at St. Augustine in 1786. Saint Andrew's Lodge, No. 1, then applied for authority to the Grand Lodge of Philadelphia to continue the work. In 1783 this Lodge came under the jurisdiction of South Carolina, but in 1790 it became dormant and dropped from the roll. On July 5, 1830, Jackson, Washington and Harmony Lodges sent representatives to a Convention for forming a Grand Lodge of Florida. A Constitution was framed and adopted on the following day and the Grand Officers elected and installed.

Two Chapters, Magnolia, No. 16, and Florida, No. 32, were chartered in Florida by the Grand Chapter of Virginia, and one at St. Augustine by the Grand Chapter of South Carolina. Delegates from these three Chapters met on January 11, 1847, and resolved to form a Grand Chapter for Florida. On the 21st of the month they elected officers and organized the Grand Chapter. After some delay, due to their not having furnished particulars of the Chapters who took part in the Convention, the General Grand High Priest was authorized in 1856 to recognize the Grand Chapter of Florida.

For some years the Council Degrees were conferred in the Chapters. Companion Albert G. Mackey then organized a Council of Royal and Select Masters, Columbia Council at Lake City. The records of this and of the establishment of two other Councils were lost, but Companion Mackey, to whom an appeal for dates was made, said that the probable date of Columbia Council was 1852. At a meeting held at Tallahassee on January 12, 1858, Columbia, Mackey and Douglas Councils opened a Grand Council and appointed a Committee to draft a Constitution and By-Laws. These were adopted the following day and Brother Thomas Hayward, then Grand High Priest, was elected Grand Master.

A Dispensation was granted on March 17, 1851, to De Molay Commandery, No. 1, at Quincy. When the hall of this Commandery was destroyed by fire permission was given to hold several meetings at Tallahassee. Representatives of five Commanderies, namely, Coeur de Lion, No. 1; Damascus, No. 2; Olivet, No. 4; Palatka, under Dispensation, and Plant City, under Dispensation, took part in the organization of a Grand Commandery on August 15, 1895.

The first introduction of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite to Florida was the establishment on October 19, 1892, of the Ponce de Leon Lodge of Perfection, No. 3, at Ocala. On October 20, 1899, the McLean Chapter of Rose Croix, No. 1, was opened, and on October 24, 1901, the Bruce Council of Kadosh, No. 1, and the Tampa Consistory, No. 1, began work.

FOLKES, MARTIN. From his acquaintance with Sir Christopher Wren, and his intimacy with Doctor Desaguliers, Martin Folkes was induced to take an active part in the reorganization of Freemasonry in the beginning of the last century, and his literary attainments and prominent position in the scientific world enabled him to exercise a favorable influence on the character of the Institution. He was descended from a good family, being the eldest son of Martin Folkes, Counsellor at Law, and Dorothy, the daughter of Sir William Howell, of the County of Norfolk. He was born in Queen Street, Leicester Inn Fields, Westminster, October 29, 1690. In 1707 he was entered at Clare Hall, Cambridge, and in 1713 elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, of which, in 1723, he was appointed Vice-President. In 1727, on the death of Sir Isaac Newton, he became a candidate for the Presidency, in which he was defeated by Sir Hans Sloane, who, however, renewed his appointment as Vice-President, and in 1741, on the resignation of Sloane as President, he was elected his successor. In 1742 he was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences of Paris, and in 1746 received the degree of Doctor of Laws from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

In 1750, he was elected President of the Society of Antiquaries. To this and to the Royal Society he contributed many essays, and published a work entitled, A Table of English Silver Coins, which is still much esteemed as a numismatic authority. On September 26, 1751, he was struck with paralysis, from which he never completely recovered. On November 30, 1753, he resigned the Presidency of the Royal Society, but retained that of the Society of Antiquaries until his death. In 1753, he visited Italy, and remained there until 1735, during which time he appears to have ingratiated himself with the Freemasons of that country, for in 1742 they struck a medal in his honor, a copy of which is to be found in Thory's History of the Foundation of the Grand Orient of France. On one side is a pyramid, a sphinx, some Masonic ciphers, and the two pillars, and on the obverse a likeness of Folkes.

Of the Masonic life of Folkes we have but few records. In 1725, he was appointed Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of England, and is recorded as having paid great attention to the duties of his office. Anderson says that he presided over the Grand Lodge in May of that year, and "prompted a most agreeable Communication" (see Constitutions, 1738, page 119). But he held no office afterward; yet he is spoken of as having taken great interest in the Institution. Of his literary contributions to Freemasonry nothing remains.

The Pocket Companion cites an address by him, in 1725, before the Grand Lodge, probably at that very Communication to which Anderson has alluded, but it is unfortunately no longer extant. He died June 28, 1754, and was buried in the Chancel of Hillington Church near Lynn, Norfolk. He left a wife and two daughters, an only son having died before him.

Nichols, who knew him personally, says in his Literary Anecdotes (ii, 591) of him: "His knowledge was very extensive, his judgment exact and accurate, and the precision of his ideas appeared from the perspicuity and conciseness of his expression in his discourses and writings on abstruse and difficult topics. . . . He had turned his thoughts to the study of antiquity and the polite arts with a philosophical spirit, which he had contracted by the cultivation of the mathematical sciences from his earliest youth." His valuable library of more than five thousand volumes was sold for £3090 at auction after his decease.

FONTANES, MARQUIS LOUIS DE. Born at Niort, France, March 6, 1757; he died at Paris, March 17, 1821. Poet and statesman; President of the Corps Legislatif, head of the Imperial University and Senator under Napoleon I; a member of the famous Lodge of Nine Sisters, his name appears on the lists of members for 1783, 1784, and 1806 (see Une Loge Maçonnique, Louis Amiable, 1897, page 308). Created a marquis and a peer by Louis XVIII.

FOOL. A fool, as one not in possession of sound reason, a natural or idiot, is intellectually unfit for initiation into the mysteries of Freemasonry, because he is incapable of comprehending the principles of the Institution, and is without any moral responsibility for a violation or neglect of its duties.

FOOTSTONE. The Corner-stone. To lay the Footstone means to lay the corner-stone of the Temple in the fourth year of his reign.

FOOT TO FOOT. The old lectures of the eighteenth century descanted on the symbolism of foot to foot as teaching us "that indolence should not permit the foot to halt or wrath to turn our steps out of the way; but forgetting injuries and selfish feelings, and remembering that man was born for the aid of his fellow-creatures, not for his own enjoyments only; but to do that which is good, we should be swift to extend our mercy and benevolence to all, but more particularly to a Brother Mason." The latter lecture on the same subject gives the same lesson more forcibly and more emphatically, when it says, "we should never halt nor grow weary in the service of a Brother Mason."

FORDS OF THE JORDAN. The slaughter of the Ephraimites at the passages or fords of the River Jordan, which is described in the twelfth chapter of the Book of Judges, is referred to in the Fellow Craft's Degree. Brother Rob Morris, in his Freemasonry in the Holy Land (page 316) says:

The exact locality of these fords or "passages," as the Bible terms them, cannot now be designated, but most likely they were those nearly due east of Seikoot and opposite Mirpah. At these fords, in summer time, the water is not more than three or four feet deep, the bottom being composed of a hard limestone rock. If, as some think, the fords, thirty miles higher up, are those referred to, the same description will apply. At either place, the Jordan is about eighty feet wide, its banks encumbered by a dense growth of tamarisks, cane, willows, thorn-bushes, and other low vegetation of the shrubby and thorny sorts, which make it difficult even to approach the bank. The Arabs cross the river at the present day, at stages of low water, at a number of fords, from the one near the point where the Jordan leaves the Sea of Galilee down to the Pilgrims' Ford, six miles above the Dead Sea.

FOREIGN COUNTRY. A certain Degree lecture begins by declaring that the recipient was induced to seek that sublime Degree "that he might perfect himself in Masonry, so as to travel into foreign countries, and work and receive wages as a Master Mason." Thousands have often heard this expression in connection with a Master's Lodge, without dreaming for a moment of its hidden and spiritual meaning, or, if they think of any meaning at all, they content themselves by interpreting it as referring to the actual travels of the Freemasons, after the completion of the Temple, into the surrounding countries in search of employment, whose wages were to be the gold and silver which they could earn by the exercise of their skill in the operative art.

But the true symbolic meaning of the foreign country into which the Master Mason travels in search of wages is far different. The symbolism of this life terminates with the Master's Degree. The completion of that degree is the lesson of death and the resurrection to a future life, where the True Word, or Divine Truth, not given in this, is to be received as the reward of a life worthily spent in its search.
Heaven, the future life, the higher state of existence after death, is the foreign country in which the Master Mason is to enter, and there he is to receive his wages in the reception of that Truth which can be imparted only in that better land.

FORESTERS DEGREES. This title has been given to certain secret associations which derive their symbols and ceremonies from trades practised in forests, such as the Carbonari, or Charcoal-burners; the Fendeurs, or Woodcutters; the Sawyers, etc. They are all imitative of Freemasonry.

FOREST MASON. See Fendeurs, Order of.

FOREST OF LEBANON. See Lebanon.

FOREFEITURE OF CHARTER. A Lodge may forfeit its Charter for misconduct, and when forfeited, the Warrant or Charter is revoked by the Grand Lodge.

FORM. In Freemasonry, an official act is said to be done, according to the rank of the person who does it, either in ample form, in due form, or simply in form. Thus, when the Grand Lodge is opened by the Grand Master in person, it is said to be opened in ample form; when by the Deputy Grand Master, it is said to be in due form; when by any other qualified officer, it is said to be in form. The legality of the act is the same whether it be done in form or in ample form; and the expression refers only to the dignity of the officer by whom the act is performed. The terms Ample and Due Form appear to have been introduced by Anderson in the 1738 edition of the Constitutions (page 110).

FORM OF THE LODGE. The form of a Free-mason’s Lodge is said to be an oblong square, having its greatest length from east to west, and its greatest breadth from north to south. This oblong form of the Lodge, has, as Brother Mackey thought, a symbolic illusion that has not been adverted to by any other writer.

If, on a map of the world, we draw lines which shall circumscribe just that portion which was known and inhabited at the time of the building of Solomon’s Temple, these lines, running a short distance north and south of the Mediterranean Sea, and extending from Spain to Asia Minor, will form an oblong square, whose greatest length will be from east to west, and whose greatest breadth will be from north to south, as is shown in the annexed diagram.

There is a peculiar fitness in this theory, which is really only making the Masonic Lodge a symbol of the world. It must be remembered that, at the era of the Temple, the earth was supposed to have the form of a parallelogram, or oblong square. Such a figure inscribed upon a map of the world, and including only that part of it which was known in the days of Solomon, would present just such a square, embracing the Mediterranean Sea and the countries lying immediately on its northern, southern, and eastern borders. Beyond, far in the north, would be Cimmerian deserts as a place of darkness, while the pillars of Hercules in the west, on each side of the Straits of Gades—now Gibraltar—might appropriately be referred to the two pillars that stood at the porch of the Temple. Thus the world itself would be shown to the true Freemason’s Lodge, in which he was to live and labor. Again: the solid contents of the earth below, “from the surface to the centre,” and the profound expanse above, “from the earth to the highest heavens,” would give to this parallelogram definition which says that “the form of the Lodge ought to be a double cube, as an expressive emblem of the powers of light and darkness in the creation.”

FORMULA. A prescribed mode or form of doing or saying anything. The word is derived from the technical language of the Roman law, where, after the old legal actions had been abolished, suits were practised according to certain prescribed forms called formulae. Formulas in Freemasonry are very frequent. They are either oral or monitorial. Oral formulas are those that are employed in various parts of the ritual, such as the opening and closing of a Lodge, the investiture of a candidate, etc. From the fact of their oral transmission they are frequently corrupted or altered, which is one of the most prolific sources of nonconformity so often complained of by Masonic teachers. Monitorial formulas are those that are committed to writing, and are to be found in the various Monitors and Manuals. They are such as relate to public installations, to laying foundation-stones, to dedications of halls, to funerals, etc. Their monitorial character ought to preserve them from change; but uniformity is not even here always attained, owing to the whims of the compilers of manuals or of monitors, who have often unnecessarily changed the form of words from the original standard.

FORT, GEORGE FRANKLIN. Masonic author. Born at Absecon, New Jersey, November 20, 1848, and died at Atlantic City, March 30, 1909. Edited the Keystone, Philadelphia, and wrote Early History and Antiquities of Freemasonry, A Historical Treatise on Early Builders’ Marks, Medieval Builders, and other works of Masonic worth. Initiated in Camden Lodge No. 15, Camden, New Jersey, a founder member and second Master, 1871, of Trumble Lodge No. 117, also of Camden, New Jersey (see Builder, 1918, pages 171 and 210).

FORT HIRAM. An earthwork erected on October 3, 1814, at Fox Point, Rhode Island, by the Grand Lodge, with the members of the subordinate Lodges, about two hundred and thirty in number. The object was to build a fortification for the defense of the harbor of Providence, and the Grand Lodge, of which Thomas Smith Webb was Grand Master, through its Deputy, Senior Grand Warden, and Worshipful Brother Carlisle, were authorized to work on the defenses. They formed a procession, marched in the early morning to the Point, and by sunset had completed their labors, consisting of a breastwork four hundred and thirty feet in length, ten wide, and five high. They then marched and countermarched upon the parapet from one extremity to the other, when the Grand Master gave the work the appellation of Fort Hiram, which was approved and sanctioned by the Governor.

FORTITUDE. One of the four cardinal virtues, whose excellencies are dilated on in the First Degree. It not only instructs the worthy Freemason to bear the ills of life with becoming resignation, “taking up arms against a sea of trouble,” but, by its intimate connection with a portion of our ceremonies, it teaches him to let no dangers shake, no pains dissolve the inviolable fidelity he owes to the trusts reposed in him. Or, in the words of the old Prestonian lecture, it is “a fence or security against any attack that might be made upon him by force or otherwise, to extort from him any of our Royal Secrets.”

Spence, in his Polymetis (page 139), when describing the moral virtues, says of Fortitude: “She may be easily known by her erect air and military dress, the spear she rests on with one hand, and the sword which she holds in the other. She has a globe under her feet; I suppose to show that the Romans, by means of this virtue, were to subdue the whole world.”

FORT MASONIC. A redoubt of the fortifications on what was known as the Heights of Brooklyn, located between, what was later, Bond and Nevins Streets, Brooklyn, the south point of the quadrangle resting on State Street and extending north nearly to Schermerhorn Street. This Fort Masonic was built by members of the fourteen Lodges located in New York City, who, agreeable to a resolution of the Grand Lodge, of which Brother De Witt Clinton was Grand Master, adopted August 22, 1814, assembled at sunrise on the morning of Thursday, September 1. Accompanied by the officers of the Grand Lodge, they proceeded to Brooklyn where they were joined by the members of Fortitude and Newton Union Lodges, marched to the Height and performed one day’s work on the fortifications. The redoubt was not completed, however, until September 17, when another day’s labor was performed.

FORTY. The multiple of two perfect numbers—four and ten. This was deemed a sacred number, as commemorating many events of religious significance, some of which are as follows: The alleged period of probation of our first parents in Eden; the continuous deluge of forty days and nights, and the same number of days in which the waters remained upon the face of the earth; the Lenten season of forty days’ fast observed by Christians with reference to the fast of Jesus in the Wilderness, and by the Hebrews to the earlier desert fast for a similar period; of the forty years spent in the Desert by Moses and Elijah and the Israelites, which succeeded the concealment of Moses the same number of years in the land of Midian. Moses was forty days and nights on the Mount. The days for embalming the dead were forty. The forty years of the reign of Saul, of David, and of Solomon; the forty days of grace allotted to Nineveh for repentance; the forty days’ fast before Christmas in the Greek Church; as well as its being the number of days of mourning in Assyria, Phenicia, and Egypt, to commemorate the death and burial of their Sun God; and as well the period in the festivals of the resurrection of Adonis and Osiris; the period of forty days thus being a bond by which the whole world, ancient and modern, Pagan, Jewish, and Christian, is united in religious sympathy. Hence, it was determined as the period of mourning by the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of the Northern Jurisdiction, United States of America.

FORTY-SEVENTH PROBLEM. The forty-seventh problem of Euclid’s first book, which has been adopted as a symbol in the Master’s Degree, is thus enunciated: “In any right-angled triangle, the square which is described upon the side subtending the right angle is equal to the squares described upon the sides which contain the right angle.” Thus, in a triangle whose perpendicular is three feet, the square of which is nine, and whose base is four feet, the square of which is sixteen, the hypothenuse, or subtending side, will be five feet, the square of which will be twenty-five, which is the sum of nine and sixteen. This interesting problem, on account of its great utility in making calculations and drawing plans for buildings, is sometimes called the Carpenter’s Theorem.

For the demonstration of this problem the world is indebted to Pythagoras, who, it is said, was so elated after making the discovery, that he made an offering of a hecatomb, or a sacrifice of a hundred oxen, to the gods. The devotion to learning which this religious act indicated in the mind of the ancient philosopher has induced Freemasons to adopt the problem as a memento, instructing them to be lovers of the arts and sciences.

The triangle, whose base is four parts, whose perpendicular is three, and whose hypothenuse is five, and which would exactly serve for a demonstration of this problem, was, according to Plutarch, a symbol frequently employed by the Egyptian priests, and hence it is called by M. Jomard, in his Exposition du Systeme Metrique des Anciens Egyptiens, Exposition of the Ancient Egyptians System of Measurements, the Egyptian triangle. It was, with the Egyptians, the symbol of universal nature, the base representing Osiris, or the male principle; the perpendicular, Isis, or the female principle; and the hypothenuse, Horus, their son, or the produce of the two principles. They added that three was the first perfect odd number, that four was the square of two, the first even number, and that five was the result of three and two.

But the Egyptians made a still more important use of this triangle. It was the standard of all their measures of extent, and was applied by them to the building of the pyramids. The researches of M. Jomard, on the Egyptian system of measures, published in the magnificent work of the French savants on Egypt, has placed us completely in possession of the uses made by the Egyptians of this forty-seventh problem of Euclid, and of the triangle which formed the diagram by which it was demonstrated.

If we inscribe within a circle a triangle, whose perpendicular shall be 300 parts, whose base shall be 400 parts, and whose hypothenuse shall be 500 parts, which, of course, bear the same proportion to each other as three, four, and five; then if we let a perpendicular fall from the angle of the perpendicular and base to the hypothenuse, and extend it through the hypothesis to the circumference of the circle, this chord or line will be equal to 480 parts, and the two segments of the hypothesis, on each side of it, will be found equal, respectively, to 180 and 320. From the point where this chord intersects the hypothesis let another line fall perpendicularly to the shortest side of the triangle, and this line will be equal to 144 parts, while the shorter segment, formed by its junction with the perpendicular side of the triangle, will be equal to 108 parts.

Hence, we may derive the following measures from the diagram: 500, 480, 400, 320, 180, 144, and 108, and all these without the slightest fraction. Supposing, then, the 500 to be cubes, we have the measure of the base of the great pyramid of Memphis. In the 400 cubits of the base of the triangle we have the exact length of the Egyptian stadium. The 320 gives us the exact number of Egyptian cubits contained in the Hebrew and Babylonian stadium. The stadium of Ptolemy is represented by the 480 cubits, or the length of the line falling from the right angle to the circumference of the circle, through the hypothesis. The number 180, which expresses the smaller segment of the hypothesis being doubled, will give 360 cubits, which will be the stadium of Cleomedes. By doubling the 144, the result will be 288 cubits, or the length of the stadium of Archimedes; and by doubling the 108 the product 216 cubits, or the precise value of the lesser Egyptian stadium.

Thus we get all the length measures used by the Egyptians; and since this triangle, whose sides are equal to three, four, and five, was the very one that the Egyptians; and since this triangle, whose sides are equal to three, four, and five, was the very one that the Egyptians, the Geos of the Greeks, the Deus of the nations of antiquity the name of God consists of four letters, as the Adad, of the Syrians, the Amum of the Egyptians, the Os of the Greeks, the Deus of the Romans, and pre-eminently the Tetragrammaton or four-lettered name of the Jews. But in Symbolic Freemasonry this number has no special significance.

FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS. The legend of the Four Crowned Martyrs should be interesting to Masonic scholars, because it is one of the few instances, perhaps the only one, in which the church has been willing to do honor to those old workers in stone, whose services it readily secured in the Medieval ages, but with whom, as with their successors the modern Freemasons, it has always appeared to be in a greater or less degree of antagonism. Besides, these humble but true-hearted confessors of the faith of Christianity were adopted by the Stonemasons of Germany as the patron saints of Operative Masonry, just as the two Saints John have been since selected as the patrons of the Speculative branch of the Institution.

Dr. Christian Ehrmann, of Strasburg, who for thirty years had devoted his attention to this and to kindred subjects of Masonic archology, has supplied us with the most interesting details of the life and death of the Four Crowned Martyrs. The Roman Church has consecrated November 8 to the commemoration of these martyrs, and yearly, on that day, offers up the prayer: "Grant, we beseech thee, O Almighty God, that as we have been informed of the constancy of the glorious martyrs in the profession of Thy faith, so we may experience their kindness in recommending us to Thy mercy." The Roman Breviary of 1474 is more explicit, and mentions them particularly by name.

It is, therefore, somewhat remarkable, that, although thus careful in their commemoration, the Missals of the Roman Church give us no information of the deeds of these holy men. It is only from the Breviaries that we can learn anything of the act on which the commemoration in the calendar was founded. Of these Breviaries, Ehrmann has given full citations from two: the Breviary of Rome, published in 1474, and the Breviary of Spire, published in 1478. These, with some few extracts from other books on the subject, have been made accessible to us by George Kloss, in his interesting work entitled, Freemasonry in ihrer wahren Bedeutung, or Freemasonry in its true significance.

The Breviarius Romanum is much more complete in its details than the Breviarius Spirense; and yet the latter contains a few incidents that are not related in the former. Both agree in applying to the Four Crowned Martyrs the title of quadratarii. Now quadratarius, in the Latin of the lower age, signified a Stone-squarer or a Mason. This will remind us of the passage in the Book of Kings, thus translated in the authorized version: "And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them, and the stone-squarers." It is evident from the use of this word quadratarii in the ecclesiastical legends, as well as from the incidents of the martyrdom itself, that the four martyrs were not simply sculptors, but stone-cutters and builders of temples; in other words, Operative Masons. Nor can we deny the probability of the supposition, that they were members of one of those colleges of architects, which afterward gave birth to the gilds of the Middle Ages, the corporations of builders, and through these to the modern Lodges of Freemasons. Supposing the legend to be true, or even admitting that it is only symbolical, we must acknowledge that there has been good reason why the Operative Masons should have selected these martyrs as the patron saints of their profession.

Now let us apply ourselves to the legend. Taking the Roman Breviary as the groundwork, and only interpolating it at the proper points with the additional incidents related in the Breviary of Spire, we have the following result as the story of the Four Crowned Martyrs. In the last quarter of the third century Diocletian was Emperor of the Roman Empire. In his reign commenced that series of persecutions of the Christian church, which threatened at once the lives of the disciples of the prophet of Nazareth.

Diocletian went to the Province of Pannonia, that he might by his own presence superintend the bringing of metals and stones from the neighboring mines of Noricum, wherewith to construct a temple consecrated to the sun-god, Apollo. Among the six hundred and twenty-two artisans whom he had collected together for this purpose were four—by name Claudius, Castorius, Symphorianus, and Nichostratus—said to have been distinguished for their skill as Stonemasons. They had abandoned the old heathen faith and were in secret Christians, doing all their work as Masons in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Breviary of Spire relates here an additional occurrence, which is not contained in the Breviary of Rome, and which, as giving a miraculous aspect to the legend, must have made it doubly acceptable to the pious Christians of the fifteenth century, upon whose religious credulity one could safely draw without danger of a protest.

It seems that, in company with our four blessed martyrs, there worked one Simplicius, who was also a mason, but a heathen. While he was employed in labor near them, he wondered at the great spirit of skill and cunning all the other artisans. They succeeded in all that they attempted, while he was unfortunate, and always breaking his working tools. At last he approached Claudius, and said to him:

"Strengthen, I beseech thee, my tools, that they may no longer break."

Claudius took them in his hands, and said:

"In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ be these tools hallowed, and let them do service for our work." From this time, Simplicius did his work well, and succeeded in all that he attempted to do. Amazed at the change, Simplicius was continually asking his fellow-workers how it was that the tools had been so strengthened that now they never broke. At length Claudius replied:

"God, who is our Creator, and the Lord of all things, has made His creatures strong."

Then Simplicius inquired:

"Was not this done by the God Zeus?"

To this Claudius replied:

"O my brother, of what thou hast said, for thou hast blasphemed God, our Creator, whom alone we worship; that which our own hands have made we do not recognize as a God."

To these and such sentences they converted Simplicius to the Christian faith, who, being baptized by Cyrilus, bishop of Antioch, soon afterward suffered martyrdom for his refusal to sacrifice to the pagan gods.

One day Diocletian issued an order, that out of the marble should be constructed a noble statue of Apollo sitting in his chariot. And now all the workmen and the philosophers began to consult on the subject, and each one had arrived at a different opinion. And when in length they had found a huge block of stone, which had been brought from the Island of Thasos, it proved that the marble was not fit for the statue which Diocletian had commanded; and now began a great war of words between the masters of the work and the philosophers. But one day the whole of the artisans, six hundred and twenty-two in number, with five philosophers, came together, that they might examine the defects and the veins of the stone, and there arise a still more wonderful contest between the workmen and the philosophers.

Then began the philosophers to rail against Claudius, Symphorianus, Nichostratus, and Simplicius, and said:

"Why do ye not hearken to the command of our devout Emperor, Diocletian, and obey his will?"

Claudius answered and said:

"Because we cannot offend our Creator and commit a sin, while we should serve and gild in His sight."

Then said the philosophers:

"From this it appears that you are Christians."

Claudius replied:

"Truly we are Christians."

Nor can we deny the probability of the supposition, that they were members of one of those colleges of architects, which afterward gave birth to the gilds of the Middle Ages, the corporations of builders, and through these to the modern Lodges of Freemasons. Once they had abandoned the old heathen faith, became the victims of the bigotry and intolerance, the hatred and the cruelty, of the Pagan priests and the Platonic philosophers; and the scourge, the cross, or the watery grave daily testified to the constancy and firmness of the disciples of the prophet of Nazareth.
Hereupon the philosophers chose other masons, and caused them to make a statue of Esculapius out of the stone which had been rejected, which, after thirty-one days, they finished and presented to the philosophers. These then informed the Emperor that the statue of Esculapius was finished, when he ordered it to be brought before him for inspection. But as soon as he saw it he was greatly satisfied, and addressed them:

"This is a proof of the skill of these men, who receive my approval as sculptors."

It is very apparent that this, like all other legends of the church, is insufficient in its details, and that it leaves many links in the chain of the narrative to be supplied by the fancy or the judgment of the readers. It is equally evident from what has already been said, in connection with what is subsequently told, that the writer of the legend desired to make the impression that it was through the influence of Claudius and the other Christian Masons that the rest of the workmen were persuaded that the Thasian stone was defective and unfit for the use of a sculptor; that this was done by them because they were unwilling to engage in the construction of the statue of a Pagan god; that this was the cause of the controversy between the workmen and the philosophers; that the latter denied the defectiveness of the stone; and, lastly, that they sought to prove its fitness by causing other masons, who were not Christians, to make out the proclamation of the herald, and showed them many instruments for the punishment of martyrs, and then he said to them: "Hearken to me and avoid the doom of martyrs, and be obedient to the mighty prince, and offer a sacrifice to the God that the Emperor commanded you to consecrate your skill in their art to the construction of Pagan temples, they have been adopted by the Freemasons of Germany as the Patron Saints of Operative Masonry. Thus the oldest Regulation of the Freemasons of Strasburg, which has the date of the year 1459, commences with the following invocation: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and of our gracious Mother Mary, and also of her Blessed Servants, the Four Crowned Martyrs of everlasting memory."

Such allusions are common in the German Masonic documents of the Middle Ages. It is true, however, that the English Freemasons ceased at a later period to refer in their Constitutions to those martyrs, although they undoubtedly borrowed many of their usages from Germany. Yet the Regius Manuscript of the Constitutions of Freemasonry, the oldest of the English records, which is supposed to have been written about the year 1390, under the title of Ars Quatuor Coronatorum, gives a rather copious detail of the legend (lines 497 to 534), which is here inserted with only those slight alterations of its antiquated phraseology which are necessary to render it intelligible to modern readers, although in doing so the rhyme of the original is somewhat destroyed:

Pray we now to God Almighty,
And to His Mother, Mary bright,
That we may keep these articles here
And these points well altogether,
As did those holy martyrs four
That in this Craft were of great honour,
They were as good Mason as on earth shall go,
Gravers and image makers they were also,
For they were workmen of the best,
The emperor had them in great liking;
He willed of them an image to make,
That might be worshiped for his sake;
Such idols he had in his day
To turn the people from Christ's law,
But they were steadfast in Christ's law
And to their Craft, without denial.
They loved well God and all his lore,
And were in his service evermore.
True men they were, in that day,
And lived well in God's law;
They thought no idols for to make,
For no good that they might take;
To believe on that idol for their god,
They would not do so, though he were mad,
For they would not forsake their true faith,
And believe on his false law.
The emperor caused to take them at once
And put them in a deep prison.
The soror he punished them in that place,
The more joy was to them of Christ's grace.
Then when he saw no other one,
To death he let them then go.
Who so will of their life more know.
By the book he may it show,
In the legends of the saints.
The names of the four crowned ones.
Their fate will be, without denial,
After All Hallows, the eighth day.
The devotion of these saints, which led to the introduction of their legend into an ancient Constitution of Freemasonry, shows how much they were revereden by the Craft. In fact, the Four Crowned Martyrs were to the Stone-cutters of Germany and to the earlier Operative Masons of England what Saint John the Baptist and Saint John the Evangelist became to their successors, the Speculative Freemasons of the eighteenth century. From them the famous literary Lodge—the Quatuor Coronati, of London, England—has been so named.

FOURFOLD CORD. In the instructions of the Past Master's Degree in America we find the following expression: "A twofold cord is strong, a threefold cord is stronger, but a fourfold cord is not easily broken." The expression is taken from a Hebrew proverb which is to be found in the Book of Ecclesiastes (iv, 12): "And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken." The form of the Hebrew proverb was changed to suit the symbolism of the Degree.

FOUR NEW YEARS. According to the Talmud there were four New Years. The first of Nisan was the new year for kings and festivals; the reign of a king was calculated from this date. The first of Elul was a new year for the tithing of cattle. The first of Tishri was a new year for civil years, for years of release, jubilees, and planting. The first of Shebat was a new year for the tithing of trees.

FOUR OLD LODGES. Of the four old Lodges which constituted the Grand Lodge of England, on Saint John the Baptist's day, 1717, the Lodge of Antiquity, No. 2, London, was the first. The Lodge meets by "Time Immemorial Constitution," having no Warrant, and, until the "Union," was first on the roll; a decision, however, by ballot, lost it its numerical priority. As Lodges were known by the house in which they met, Antiquity Lodge was designated The West India and American.

FOURTEEN

The Royal Somerset House and Inverness, No. 4, London, is the junior of the four Lodges which constituted the Grand Lodge. At that time it met at the Rummer and Grapes Tavern, Westminster, and subsequently at the Horn, which latter gave the Lodge a name for many years. This Lodge now represents three united Lodges, the names of two of which are to be found in its present designation.

Of the four original Lodges, two only have been on the roll from 1740 as of "Time Immemorial Constitution." The original No. 2 ceased working about 1736 and was erased in 1740, and No. 3 accepted a "New Constitution," now No. 12, and is known as Fortitude and Cumberland. The four original Lodges, after the issue of the Regulations of 1723, simply enjoyed the advantage of being ahead of all the Warrant Lodges, the privilege of assembling by "Time Immemorial Constitution," and the honor of having established the first Grand Lodge in the universe (see Freemasonry, Early British).

FOURTEEN. It is only necessary to remind the well-informed Freemason of the fourteen days of burial mentioned in the legend of the Third Degree. Now, this period of fourteen was not in the opinion of Masonic symbologists, an arbitrary selection, but was intended to refer to or symbolize the fourteen days of lunary darkness, or decreasing light, which intervene between the full moon and its continued decrease until the end of the lunar month. In the Egyptian mysteries, the body of Osiris is said to have been cut into fourteen pieces by Typhon, and thrown into the Nile. Plutarch, speaking of this in his treatise On Isis and Osiris, thus explains the symbolism of the number fourteen, which comprises the Masonic idea:

The body of Osiris was cut into fourteen pieces; that is, into as many parts as there are days between the full moon. The moon, at the end of fourteen days, enters Taurus, and becomes united to the sun, from whom she collects fire upon her disk during the fourteen days which follow. She is then found every month in conjunction with him in the superior parts of the signs. The equinoctial year finishes at the moment when the sun and moon are coextensive with each other, and they are united with each other, and the stellation placed under Taurus, which unites itself to the Neomenia of spring. The moon renews herself in Taurus, and a few days afterward is seen, in the form of a crescent, in the following sign, that is, Gemini, the horsehead of Mercury. Then Orion, united to the sun in the attitude of a formidable warrior, precipitates Scorpio, his rival, into the shades of night; for he sets every time Orion appears above the horizon. The day becomes lengthened, and the germs of evil are by degrees destroyed. It is thus that the poet Nonnus pictures to us Typhon conquered at the end of winter, when the sun arrives in Taurus, and when Orion mounts into the heavens with him.

The first few lines of this article, Fourteen, prompted a discussion in the Builder of November, 1927 (page 352), and in the Sandusky Masonic Bulletin, December 1927 (page 149), relative to fourteen or fifteen days of burial. The former quotes Prichard of 1730 in favor of fifteen; that several Masonic Jurisdictions in the United States prefer fifteen as the number; that Webb and Cross so taught; that England has no definite period but mentions a considerate time; that Doctor Mackey was probably right in assuming an astronomical significance—the lunar period between the full and the new moon—but the fifteenth day is nevertheless the first day of the new moon. Doctor Mora in the Bulletin, however, quotes Fellows in favor of fourteen days, mentions the Great Pyramid and its latitude as providing that fourteen days before the Vernal Equinox, the sun would cease to cast a shadow at noon and would not again cast it for fourteen days after the Autumnal Equinox, and that the significant conformity of the legends of Osiris and of Hiram deserves favor. The Builder suggests further that altogether too many alterations in the ritual have been made in the interests of schemes of interpretation and of superficial consistency, that the thing to do is to discover the oldest available wording and then try to assign a meaning to it, the first duty being to preserve the tradition, a conclusion in which Doctor Merz and the rest of us will join cordially with Brother Meekren (see Fifteen).

FOWLE, HENRY. A native of Medford, Massachusetts, born in September, 1766, went to Boston at fourteen years of age and served an apprenticeship as a pump and block maker, which occupation he followed in after life. Better educated than most mechanics of his time, he had good knowledge of the French language and spoke it with the same fluency as his mother tongue. He was initiated into the Lodge of Saint Andrew, Boston, April 10, 1793; was first Master of Mount Lebanon Lodge, Boston, the Lodge of Saint Andrew, Boston, April 10, 1793; was admitted a Master of Arts in Harvard College, May 27, 1796; was second Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, May 25, 1797; was elected Senior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, January 28, 1795, and first Priest of the Chapter and remaining in this position for several years, and for several years an officer of high rank in the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States. Received Knight Templar Degree in Arch Chapter, Boston, 1866 (pages 106 and 107) where his activity he served almost constantly on various Committees of the Grand Lodge and records show his name on each and every Committee appointed which had anything whatever to do with matters pertaining to regalia, and his correspondence shows that he personally submitted designs to the Grand Lodge for many of the official Jewels of Office. Right Worshipful Brother Henry Fowle died in Boston, at the age of seventy-one, March 10, 1837.

FRANCE. The early history of Freemasonry in France is, from the want of authentic documents, in a state of much uncertainty. Kloss, in his Geschichte der Freimaurerei in Frankreich or History of Freemasonry in France (volume i, page 14), says, in reference to the introduction of Freemasonry into that kingdom, that the earliest date of any certainty is 1725. Yet he copies the statement of the Seceu Rompu, meaning the Broken Seal—a work published in 1745—that the earliest recognized date of its introduction is 1718; and the Abbé Robin says that nothing of it is to be found further back than 1720.

Brother Lalande, the great astronomer, was the author of the article on Freemasonry in the Encyclopédie Méthodique, and his account has been generally recognized as authentic by succeeding writers. According to him, Lord Derwentwater, the Chevalier Maskeleyne, a Mr. Heguety, and some other Englishmen, the names being corrupted, of course, according to French usage, founded, in 1725, the first Lodge in Paris. It was held at the house of an English confectioner named Hire, in the Rue de Boucheries. In ten years the number of Lodges in France had increased to six, and there were several also in the provincial towns.

As the first Paris Lodge had been opened by Lord Derwentwater, he was regarded as the Grand Master of the French Freemasons, without any formal recognition on the part of the Brethren, at least until 1736, when the six Lodges of Paris formally elected Lord Harnouester as Provincial Grand Master; in 1738, he was succeeded by the Duke d'Antin; and on the death of the Duke, in 1743, the Count de Clermont was elected to supply his place. Brother R. F. Gould, in his Concise History of Freemasonry (page 355), considers that the name Harnouester is probably a corruption of Derwentwater.

Organized Freemasonry in France dates its existence from this latter year. In 1735, the Lodges of Paris had petitioned the Grand Lodge of England for the establishment of a Provincial Grand Lodge, which, on political grounds, had been refused. In 1743, however, it was granted, and the Provincial Grand Lodge of France was constituted under the name of the Grande Loge Anglaise de France. The Grand Master, the Count de Clermont, was, however, an inefficient officer; anarchy and confusion once more invaded the Fraternity; the authority of the Grand Lodge was prostrated; and the establishment of Mother Lodges in the provinces, with the original intention of superintending the proceedings of the distant provincial Lodges, instead of restoring harmony, as was vainly expected, widened still more the breach. For, assuming the rank and exercising the functions of Grand Lodges, they ceased all correspondence with the metropolitan Body, and became in fact its rivals.
Under these circumstances, the Grand Lodge declared itself independent of England in 1765, and assumed the title of the Grande Loge de France. It recognized only the three Degrees of Apprentice, Fellow Craft, and Master Mason, and was composed of the Grand Officers to be elected out of the body of the Fraternity, and of the Masters for life of the Parisian Lodges; thus formally excluding the provincial Lodges from any participation in the government of the Craft.

But the proceedings of this Body were not less stormy than those of its predecessor. The Count de Clermont appointed, in succession, two Deputies, both of whom had been displeasing to the Fraternity. The last, Lacorne, was a man of such low origin and rude manners, that the Grand Lodge refused to meet him as their presiding officer. Irritated at this pointed disrespect, he sought in the taverns of Paris those Masters who had made a traffic of initiations, but who, heretofore, had submitted to the control, and been checked by the authority of the Grand Lodge. From among them he selected officers devoted to his service, and undertook a complete reorganization of the Grand Lodge.

The retired members, however, protested against these illegal proceedings; and in the subsequent year, the Grand Master consented to revoke the authority he had bestowed upon Lacorne, and appointed as his deputy, M. Chaillou de Jonville. The respectable Masters now returned to their seats in the Grand Lodge; and in the triennial election which took place in June, 1765, the officers who had been elected during the Deputy Grand Mastership of Lacorne were all removed. The displaced officers protested, and published a defamatory memoir on the subject, and were in consequence expelled from Freemasonry by the Grand Lodge. Ill feeling on both sides was thus engendered, and carried to such a height, that, at one tenant of police issued an edict, forbidding the future meetings. The Count de Clermont died in 1771; and the Deputy, M. Chaillou de Jonville. The respectable Masters who had made a traffic of initiations, but who, heretofore, had submitted to the control, and been checked by the authority of the Grand Lodge. From among them he selected officers devoted to his service, and undertook a complete reorganization of the Grand Lodge.

The expelling party, however, still continued their meetings. The Count de Clermont died in 1771; and the excluded Brethren having invited the Duke of Chartres, afterward Duke of Orleans, to the Grand Mastership, he accepted the appointment. They now offered to unite with the Grand Lodge, on condition that the latter would revoke the decree of expulsion. The proposal was accepted, and the Grand Lodge went once more into operation.

Another union took place, which has since considerably influenced the character of French Freemasonry. During the troubles of the preceding years, Masonic Bodies were instituted in various parts of the kingdom, which professed to confer Degrees of a higher nature than those belonging to Craft Freemasonry, and which have since been so commonly known by the name of the High Degrees. These Chapters assumed the right to organize and control Symbolic or Blue Lodges, and this assumption has been a fertile source of controversy between them and the Grand Lodge. By the latter Body they had never been recognized, but the Lodges under their direction had often been declared irregular, and their members expelled. They now, however, demanded a recognition, and proposed, if their request was complied with, to bestow the government of the Hauts Grads, or High Degrees, upon the same person who was at the head of the Grand Lodge. The compromise was made, the recognition was decreed, and the Duke of Chartres was elected Grand Master of all the Councils, Chapters, and Scotch Lodges of France.

But peace was not yet restored. The party who had been expelled, moved by a spirit of revenge for the disgrace formerly inflicted on them, succeeded in obtaining the appointment of a committee which was empowered to prepare the new Constitution. All the Lodges of Paris and the provinces were requested to appoint Deputies, who were to form a Convention to take the new Constitution into consideration. This Convention, or, as they called it, National Assembly, met at Paris in December, 1771. The Duke of Luxembourg presided, and on the twenty-fourth of that month the Ancient Grand Lodge of France was declared extinct, and in its place another substituted with the title of Grand Orient de France.

Notwithstanding the declaration of extinction by the National Assembly, the Grand Lodge continued to meet and to exercise its functions. Thus the Fraternity of France continued to be harassed, by the bitter contentions of these rival Bodies, until the commencement of the Revolution compelled both the Grand Orient and the Grand Lodge to suspend their labors.

On the restoration of civil order, both Bodies resumed their operations, but the Grand Lodge had been weakened by the death of many of the perpetual Masters, who had originally been attached to it; and a better spirit arising, the Grand Lodge was, by a solemn and mutual declaration, united to the Grand Orient on the 28th of June, 1799.

Dissensions, however, continued to arise between the Grand Orient and the different Chapters of the high Degrees. Several of those Bodies had at various periods given in their adhesion to the Grand Orient, and again violated the compact of peace. Finally, the Grand Orient, perceiving that the pretensions of the Scottish Rite Freemasons would be a perpetual source of disorder, decreed on the 16th of September, 1805, that the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree should thenceforth become an independent Body, with the power to confer Warrants of Constitution for all the Degrees superior to the Eighteenth, or Rose Croix; while the Chapters of that and the inferior Degrees were placed under the exclusive control of the Grand Orient.

But the Concordat was not faithfully observed by either party, and dissensions continued to exist with intermittent and unsuccessful attempts at reconciliation, which was, however, at last effected in some sort in 1841. The Masonic Obedience of France was later on more amicably divided between the two Bodies, and the Grand Orient and the Supreme Council exist as independent powers in French Freemasonry. The constant tendency of the former to interfere in the administration of other countries would furnish an unpleasant history for the succeeding thirty years, at last terminated by the general refusal of the Grand Lodges in the United States, and some in Europe, to hold further Masonic communication.
with it; a breach which every good Freemason must desire to see eventually healed. One of the most extraordinary acts of the Grand Orient of France has been the abolition in 1871 of the office of Grand Master, the duties being performed by the President of the Council of the Order.

Discussion and an attempted avoidance of a threatening Masonic calamity by a large number of the Fraternity of France did not avail to prevent the General Assembly of the Grand Orient from completing its overthrow and that of its subordinates by the almost unanimous adoption of the new famous amendment of Article I of the Constitution of Freemasonry, on September 14, 1877.

The following is the text of the amendment and of the original second paragraph which was expunged:

Original paragraph: "Freemasonry has for its principles the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the solidarity of mankind."

Substituted amendment: "Whereas, Freemasonry is not a religion, and has therefore no doctrine or dogma to affirm in its Constitution, the Assembly adopting the Vœu IX has decided and decreed that the second paragraph of Article I of the Constitution shall be erased, and that for the words of the said article the following shall be substituted:

"Being an institution essentially philanthropic, philosophical, and progressive, Freemasonry has for its object, search after truth, study of universal morality, sciences and arts, and the practice of benevolence. It has for its principles, absolute liberty of conscience and human solidarity, it excludes no person on account of his belief and its motto is Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity."

The adoption of the above was after a full and deliberate consideration by its constituents, who for more than a year were in the throes of deep deliberation and judgment.

The Grand Lodge of England appointed a Committee to consider this action of the Grand Orient in thus expunging the existence of T. G. A. O. T. U. from its tenets, and they reported that such alteration is "opposed to the traditions, practice and feelings of all true and genuine Masons from the earliest to the present time"; and it was resolved that foreign brethren could only be received as visitors if they had been initiated in a Lodge professing belief in T. G. A. O. T. U., and would themselves acknowledge such belief to be an essential landmark of the Order. Similar action was taken by other Grand Lodges.

Since the above article was prepared by Brother E. L. Hawkins, and Grand Lodge came into being in France. This is the Grande Loge Nationale Indépendante et Régulière pour la France et les Colonies Françaises, or the National Independent and Regular Grand Lodge for France and the French Colonies as constituted and recognized by the Grand Lodge of England. From the Manifesto issued to the Brethren on December 27, 1913, at Paris by Grand Master E. L. Hawkins, and from the Histoire de la Franc-Maçonnerie Française by Albert Lantoine, 1925 (pages 410–5) we learn that a Lodge at Paris, named the Centre des amis, the Center of Friends, worked the Degrees of the Rectified Scottish Rite, in French the Rite Écossais Rectifié, from 1910 under the auspices of the Diriéatoire Helvéétique of Geneva, Switzerland, but joined the Grand Orient of France in 1911 with the understanding that it could continue to practise its old ritualistic customs. The Lodge was accordingly constituted as a subordinate Lodge of the Grand Orient on May 12, 1911, by Gaston Bouley, President of the Council. This Lodge in 1913 wished to establish a Chapter of Saint Andrew which in operation we may say in passing is deemed by the Grand Orient and similar Bodies to be equivalent, to use Brother Albert Lantoine's expression in his History (page 411), to the Eighteenth Degree, the completion of the series contemplated by the usual ceremonies of the Rectified Scottish Rite that the Lodge practised. When the rituals were supplied through the Grand Orient they were discovered to omit mention of the Grand Architect of the Universe. Against this omission the Lodge protested but in vain. Accordingly the Lodge Centre des Amis of Paris with the Lodge Anglaise (meaning English) of Bordeaux formed the new Grand Lodge as is said by the Manifesto, "to safeguard the integrity of our Rectified Rituals and preserve in France the true Masonry of Tradition."

Brother W. J. Coombs, commenting on the situation in a letter read in 1927 before the literary Lodge, Saint Claudius, No. 21, Paris, had this to say:

Our position (that of the National, Independent and Regular Grand Lodge) is clear for the Grand Orient forbids the use of the phrase concerning the G. A. O. T. U. (Grand Architect of the Universe) and Juvenon, in his Vers la Lumière (meaning in French, Towards the Light) purged the status of Freemasonry in England in 1734 before the Grand Orient (this when he says (page 81) that the Grand Lodge of France has in order to attract the sympathy of the Anglo-Saxons, authorized its Lodges to use or to reject, as they please, the formula of the Grand Architect of the Universe, and has even permitted certain Lodges to place the V. S. L. (the Volume of the Sacred Law, the Bible) on the pedestal of the Worshipful Master, and on its Master Masons Diplomas puts M. G. A. D. L. (the initials of the French words meaning To the Glory of the Grand Architect of the Universe) leaving every member to interpret the phrase as he pleases.

This Grand Lodge formed the Provincial Grand Lodge of Neustrie with headquarters at Paris, and the Provincial Grand Lodge of Aquitaine under Bordeaux, having several Lodges at Paris, as well as at Boulogne, Havre, Dunkirk, Rouen, Bordeaux, etc. (see Independent and Regular National Grand Lodge of France).

An essay read by Brother N. Choumitsky, Saint Claudius Lodge, No. 21, Paris, 1927, deals with the matter of mutual recognition and was based on some twenty documents in the archives of the Grand Lodge of the Ukraine. From these we find the Grand Lodge of France early in 1764 asked the Grand Lodge at London to supply a list of the Lodges she had warranted. On July 15, 1764, these details were sent showing that of 340 Lodges only three were constituted in France by her: The Lodge, No. 49, Paris, a la Ville de Tonnerre, July 3, 1732; Lodge, No. 60, Valenciennes, in Hainault, 1733, and Lodge No. 73, Chateau d'Aubigny (in Artois or Berry, probably the latter), October 12, 1735. These Lodges were erased from the English list and the two Grand Lodges agreed not to create Lodges on each other's territory. In 1765 the French Grand Lodge sent a list of her Lodges to England, and a new list early in 1767 with copy of rules and a form of Deputation. These were welcomed and the reply to them promised various documents. But operations in France were suspended by the authorities, February 21, 1767.

The official relations of the two Grand Bodies ceased. Freemasonry again showed signs of life in France in 1771 and in 1772 there was submitted to the Grand Lodge of England the subject of a treaty drawn up by Lebady. Brother Choumitsky says the Grand Lodge of England no longer wished to treat as between peers, but attempted to enjoy certain prerogatives. This did not meet with approval but efforts toward establishing mutual relations continued and December 1, 1773, prompted by La Chaussee, Baron de Toussaint, Grand Secretary, wrote to the Marquis de Vignoles, of the Grand Lodge of England, but his letter remained unanswered. Again he wrote on December 17 to the Marquis as well as to Brother Charles Dillon, D.G.M., also to Lord Petre, Grand Master, and to the Grand Lodge of England itself. To each one of them he sent a report of his Masonic organization.

A treaty was sent from France on June 13, 1775, and we may also note that on June 28, in the name of the Grand Lodge of England, Brother Vignoles complained of the establishment at Naples of a Lodge, Saint John of Secret and Perfect Friendship, by the French authorities. On August 8, 1775, Vignoles wrote to La Chaussee expressing a belief that the treaty would be acceptable. Three items were announced on September 5, by Brother Heseltine, as being inadmissible because of the same objections as were made to Lebady's project in 1772.

The difficulty really arose by the word equality. Brother Heseltine, as reported by Vignoles, was of the opinion that that basis could not hold good since Germany, Sweden, Holland, etc., recognized their Mother in the Grand Lodge of London, and the latter had proofs of its pioneer Masonic labors in France. Vignoles planned to meet this in a complimentary way by suggesting that the reference to English authorities should be to the Sublime Grand Lodge of the Noble and the Ancient Society of Free and Accepted Masons, established at the East of London, etc. However, Brother Guillotin, Orator of the Chamber of Provinces and member of the Commission charged to examine this, offered advice that the best course would be not to speak about equality at all, taking care at the same time to insert nothing whatever in the treaty which might confirm the idea of any claim for superiority. Vignoles again wrote, June 4, 1776, announcing that the Grand Lodge of England remained steadfast in her decision. Brother Choumistsky tells of the upheaval in their plans made by the struggle for American Independence followed by the French Revolution and the Wars of the Empire. He quotes Rebold about the later and undated sending of Brother Morand to London unsuccessfully to negotiate an alliance with the Grand Lodge of England, and that in 1851 Brother Razy also failed. He therefore makes the claim that while French Freemasons were individually welcome, the Grand Bodies in France were not recognized until the formation of the National and Independent Grand Lodge in October, 1913.

Of the Grande Loge Mixte in France, and the steps leading up to this curious situation, the proposed initiation of women, see Co-Masonry. The Histoire de la Franc-Maconnerie Francaise by Brother Albert Lantoine (pages 383-93) points out that the Grand Orient of France in the General Assembly of 1920 recognized the Lodge Droit Humain (Human Right or Equity) a leading Co-Masonic Lodge at Paris but that this recognition was limited. Brothers but not Sisters might visit Grand Orient Lodges. The Grand Lodge of France has since the Convention of October 25, 1903, declared members of any Co-Masonic Bodies as irregular and by a decision of the Federal Council of September 15, 1913, refused to make any distinction between the Bodies claiming to be Co-Masonic.

FRANCIS I, EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA. Eldest son of the Duke of Lorraine, born December 8, 1708, succeeding his father in 1729. Also Duke of Tuscany. He married the famous Maria Theresa, Empress of Austria, and in 1745 became Emperor of Germany. Initiated at The Hague, 1731, and made a Master Mason at a Special Lodge held at Houghton Hall that year while visiting England. During the reign of Maria Theresa Freemasonry was tolerated in Vienna, due, no doubt, to the patronage of the Emperor. His death occurred at Innsbruck, Austria, August 18, 1775, when he was Grand Master (see Dr. A. Mackey's History of Freemasonry, 1921, pages 2236 and 2255).

FRANCIS II. This Emperor of Germany, was a bitter enemy of Freemasonry. In 1789, he ordered all the Lodges in his dominions to be closed, and directed all civil and military functionaries to take an oath never to unite with any secret society, under pain of exemplary punishment and destitution of office. In 1794, he proposed to the Diet of Ratisbon the suppression of the Freemasons, the Illuminati, and all other secret societies. Diet, by the way, is from the Latin dies, meaning a day, and formerly applied to the period of a session or sitting of delegates or other persons of importance was given to the group of individuals and in Austria and Germany particularly the name has been attached to assemblies of parliament. The Diet, controlled by the influence of Prussia, Brunswick, and Hanover, refused to accede to the proposition, replying to the emperor that he might interdict the Lodges in his own states, but that others claimed Germanic liberty. In 1801, he renewed his opposition to secret societies, and especially to the Masonic Lodges, and all civil, military, and ecclesiastical functionaries were restrained from taking any part in them under the penalty of forfeiting their offices.

FRANCKEN, HENRY A. The first Deputy Inspector General appointed by Stephen Morin, under his Commission from the Emperors of the East and West. Francken received his Degrees and his appointment at Kingston, Jamaica. The date is not known, but it must have been between 1762 and 1767. Francken soon afterward repaired to the United States, where he gave the appointment of a Deputy to Moses M. Hayes, at Boston, and organized a Council of Princes of Jerusalem at Albany. He may be considered as the first propagator of the advanced Degrees in the United States.

FRANC-MACON, FRANC-MACONNERIE. The French names of Freemason and of Freemasonry. The construction of these words is not conformable to the genius or the idiom of the French language, which would more properly employ the terms Maçon libre, and Maçonnerie libre; and hence Laurens, in his Essais historiques et critiques sur la Franc-Maconnerie, meaning Essays, Historical and Critical, on Freema-
Benjamin Franklin
Statesman and Scientist, Worshipful Master of Lodges in America and France, First American Masonic Publisher
FRANÇOIS DE NEUFCHATEAU, LE COMTE.
In the memoirs of Dixmerie, the surname is shortened to Chateau. Member of the famous Lodge of Nine Sisters and a renowned man of letters in France, as well as an able statesman. Born at Saffais, Lorraine, France, April 17, 1750; died at Paris, January 10, 1838. His real name was François but he was authorized by the Nancy Parliament in 1777 to take the name of Neufchateau. He was twice Minister of the Interior, President of the Senate, 1804 and 1814, and in 1806, together with Comte Lacepede, he revived the Lodge first founded in 1776. His name is on the Lodge lists of members in 1783, 1784, and on both issued for 1806. In the calendar of the Grand Orient for 1814, he figures as one of the three Conservators of the Grand Chapter (see Une Loge Maconnique, Louis Amiable, 1897, page 304–7).

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAIN.
A Provincial Grand Lodge was established in this city, in 1766, by the Grand Lodge of England. In the dissensions which soon after prevailed among the Freemasons of Germany, the Provincial Grand Lodge of Frankfort, not finding itself supported by its mother Grand Lodge, declared itself independent in 1783. Since 1823, it has worked under the title of the Grosse Mutterloge des Eklektischen Freimaurerverbundes zu Frankfort a. M.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN.
Greatest of American authors and statesmen, hero of the War of Independence, distinguished also as publisher and printer, editor and author, a notable philosopher whose instructive wisdom always charms and edifies, a scientist whose valuable discoveries are even today highly esteemed, made fundamental additions to practical knowledge—he was a devoted Freemason occupying for many years places of official prominence and serving his Brethren with conspicuous Masonic zeal and aptitude. Born at Boston, Massachusetts, he had only two years of school and at the age of ten left to work for his father in soap and candlemaking. At thirteen apprenticed to his brother James, a printer and publisher who started in 1721 a newspaper, the New England Courant, Franklin soon commenced to write verse and prose, the latter quaint and vigorous of expression. In 1724 he started the Junto—a compact debating club, he was the organizer of the Junto—a compact debating club, an academy that became the University of Pennsylvania, a promoter of the American Philosophical Society, the organizer of the Junto—a compact debating club, an evidence that the Institution in France was somehow curiously resembling in its practices the same exchange of thought characterizing many past and present French Lodges to which Franklin may have contributed some influence if only by example. Active in forming the first police force in the Colonies, starting the fire department, the militia, improving street paving, bettering the street lighting, introducing hospital service, and so forth, it has truly been said of him that he gave in his day the impulse to nearly every project for the welfare of his city. A member of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, for almost twenty years in joint charge of the mails in the Colonies, delegated to the Albany Convention where he submitted a plan for colonial union, he was later entrusted with the raising of troops and the building of forts in the wilderness against the Indians. Recalled from this western responsibility, he was sent eastward, to England, as the agent of the protesting Colonies. Honored by the freedom of the city of Edinburgh, made a Doctor of Laws by the University of Saint Andrews, Doctor of Civil Law by Oxford, he was already a Master of Arts at Harvard, at Yale, and at the College of William and Mary. Returning to handle successfully public service at home, he was once more employed abroad to represent the Colonies at a Committee of the English Parliament, and was back in Philadelphia in 1775. A delegate to the Continental Congress, Post-Master General, on the Commission to Canada, one of the five to prepare the Declaration of Independence, President of the Constitutional Convention of Pennsylvania, chosen by Congress one of three to discuss terms of peace with Admiral Howe in 1776, Commissioner to France where John Adams wrote of him “Franklin’s reputation was more universal than that of Leibnitz or Newton, Frederick or Voltaire; and his character more esteemed and beloved than all of them.” Of his shrewd forcefulness we may read the dramatic estimate of Thackeray in the Virginianas (chapter 9). A member appointed in 1781 of the Commission to make peace with England, he also made treaties with Sweden and Prussia. Going home he at once was elected on the Municipal Council of Philadelphia and its chairman, then President of the Supreme Executive Council, and twice re-elected Delegate to the Convention of 1787 framing the Federal Constitution, President of the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery—signing a petition to Congress in 1790 and six weeks later in his old spirited style he defended with wit and literary art this plea. Last of his remarkable exploits for the public good these efforts just preceded his serene death in his home at Philadelphia on April 17, 1790.

Franklin’s Masonic connections are discussed in Beginnings of Freemasonry in America by Brother Melvin M. Johnson, P. G. M.; Benjamin Franklin as a Freemason by Brother Julius F. Sachse; Une Loge Maconnique d’Avant 1789, by Brother Louis Mülterloge des Eklektischen Freimaurer Ferdz zu Frankfort a. M. Written for a quarter of a century averaged a sale of 10,000 copies annually. Postmaster in 1737, he also with twenty-three other citizens in 1749 founded an academy that became the University of Pennsylvania, a promoter of the American Philosophical Society, the organizer of the Junto—a compact debating club somehow curiously resembling in its practices the same exchange of thought characterizing many past and present French Lodges to which Franklin may have contributed some influence if only by example.
FRANKLIN

Amiable, the latter work being the history of the Lodge of the Nine Sisters, or Muses, at Paris. Other sources of information are mentioned in the text. A concise statement of Franklin's activities of leading interest to Freemasons is as follows:

1705-6, January 6, Old Style, born at Boston, Massachusetts (New Style, January 17, 1706).
1727, organized the Leather Apron Club, a secret society, at Philadelphia (see Franklin in a Freemason, pages 7-9; Annals of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, 1850, volume ii, page 495).
1730-1, February, initiated in Saint John's Lodge, Philadelphia (see Liber B in Collection of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania; also An Account of Saint John's Lodge, Philadelphia, and Its Liber B).

1734, June 24, elected Grand Master of Pennsylvania (see Pennsylvania Gazette, No. 290, June 27, 1734).
1734, August 30, joined Masonic Lodge Quest and Brother Henry Price at Boston two fraternal letters, one officially regarding Masonic affairs and the other less formal (see Price, Henry).
1734-5, the State House, Independence Hall, built during Franklin's administration as Grand Master. According to the old Masonic and family traditions, the cornerstone was laid by him and the Brethren of Saint John's Lodge, Assembly; Etting's History of Independence Hall, also date on water spouts of the Hall).
1735-8, served as Secretary of Saint John's Lodge (see Lib. B, 1731-1734).
1738, April 13, Franklin, in a letter to his mother, wrote, "Freemasons have no principles or practices that are inconsistent with religion and good manners." (See original draft in Franklin's handwriting in his Commonplace Book in Collection of Historical Society of Pennsylvania.)
1743, May 25, visited First Lodge (Saint John's) Boston (see Proceedings, Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, 1753-92, page 390).
1750, March 12, appointed on Committee for building the "Freemason's Lodge" in Philadelphia (see original manuscript in Masonic Temple Library, Philadelphia).
1752, October 25, visited the Tun Tavern Lodge (see manuscript, Minutes of the Tun Tavern Lodge).
1754, October 11, present at Quarterly Communication of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts held in Philadelphia, Boston (see Proceedings, Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, 1753-92, page 34, and 1781, page 361).
1755, June 24, took a prominent part in the Grand Anniversary and Dedication of the "Freemason's Lodge" in Philadelphia, the first Masonic building in America (see Pennsylvania Gazette, No. 1384, July 3, 1755; also A Sermon preached in Christ Church, Philadelphia, 1755, in Collection of Historical Society of Pennsylvania).
1759, October 10, visitor to Lodge Saint David, Edinburgh, Scotland (see Ars Quatuor Coronatorum, 1908, volume xxii, Part 3, page 270).

FRASER

1760, November 17, present at Grand Lodge of England, held at Crown & Anchor, London. Entered upon the degree of "Provincial Grand Master" (see Minutes Book of Grand Lodge of England).
1762, addressed as Grand Master of Pennsylvania (see letters to Franklin from Brother Valents in Collection of American Philosophical Society).
1776, affiliated with Masonic Lodges in France (see documents in Collection of American Philosophical Society).
1777, April 7, assisted at the initiation of Voltaire in the Lodge of the Nine Sisters, Loge des Neuf Sœurs, meaning Nine Sisters or Muses, a famous Lodge at Paris (see Amiable's Une Loge Maçonnique d'Avant 1787, page 65; Lantoin's Histoire de la Franois-Maçonnique Franklin).
1778, affiliated with Loges des Neuf Sœurs at Paris "Presumably the example of Franklin was not without influence on the resolution taken by the leader of philosophy to be accepted a Freemason; and on the other hand it is certain that the initiation of Voltaire determined the illustrious American to become affiliated with the Nine Sisters (Lodge)." The name of Franklin comes a little after that of Voltaire on the printed list of 1779 (see Une Loge Maçonnique d'Avant 1789, page 145).
1778, November 28, officiated at the Lodge of Sorrows or Masonic funeral services of Voltaire (see manuscript in Collection of American Philosophical Society). A Grand Lodge of Mecklenburg, Germany, Medallion struck in honor of the occasion in Masonic Temple Library, Philadelphia. Brother Hawkins states that another specimen of this rare medal is in the possession of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, the occasion being to observe the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brother Benjamin Franklin.
1779, May 21, elected Worshipful Master of the Lodge of the Nine Sisters and the committee in notifying him at Passy, near Paris, spoke of the important and many affairs in which he was engaged and that notwithstanding his responsibility he could find time to "follow the sessions of the Freemasons as though a brother of utmost leisure. Franklin was Worshipful Master for two years, his authority being removed in 1780 (see Une Loge Maçonnique d'Avant 1789, by Brother Louis Amiable, 1897, pages 136, 145).
1782, elected Venerable, meaning Worshipful Master, of Loge des Neuf Sœurs, Grand Orient de Paris (see documents in Collection of American Philosophical Society).
1782, July 7, member of the Respectable Lodge de Saint Jean de Jerusalem (see documents in Collection of American Philosophical Society).
1785, April 24, elected Vénérable d'Honneur of Respectable Lodge de Saint Jean de Jerusalem (see documents in Collection of American Philosophical Society).
1785, Novembbrown, an honorary member of Loge des Bon Amis, Good Friends, Rouen, France (see documents in Collection of University of Pennsylvania).
1786, December 27, in the dedication of a sermon delivered at the request of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, by Reverend Joseph Filmore in Saint Paul's Church, Philadelphia, Franklin is referred to as "an illustrious Brother whose distinguished merit among Masons entitled him to their highest veneration" (see manuscript, the book is in Collection of Historical Society of Pennsylvania and in Masonic Temple Library, Philadelphia).
1790, April 17, Benjamin Franklin passed to the Grand Lodge above.
1906, April 19, memorial services at his grave in Christ Church yard, S. E. corner Fifth and Arch Sts., Philadelphia, by the officers of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, the occasion being to observe the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brother Benjamin Franklin.

FRANKS, ORDER OF REGENERATED. A political brotherhood that was instituted in France in 1815, flourished for a while, and imitated in its ceremonies the Masonic Fraternity.

FRASER, GEORGE. On November 30, 1736, when William Saint Clare of the Hereditary Grand Mastership of Scottish Freemasons resigned, the resignation being signed on November 24, Brother Fraser was present and his name was attached as a witness to the document. He was Deputy-Auditor of the Excise and Worshipful Master, Canongate Kilwinning Lodge (see History of Freemasonry and Grand Lodge of Scotland, William A. Laurie, 1859, page 100).

FRATER. Latin, meaning Brother. An expression borrowed from the monks by the Military Orders of the Middle Ages, and applied by the members to each other. It is constantly employed in England by the Masonic Knights Templar, and is beginning to be adopted, although not as generally, in the United States. When speaking of two or more, it is an error to call them Fraters. The correct plural is Fratres.

FRATERNALLY. Doctor Mackey records the usual mode of subscription to letters in his day written by one Freemason to another as, "I remain, fraternally, yours," custom and preference that continues to be frequently adopted.

FRATERNITY. The word was originally used to designate those associations formed in the Roman Catholic Church for the pursuit of special religious and ecclesiastical purposes, such as the nursing of the sick, the support of the poor, the practice of particular devotions, etc. They do not date earlier than the thirteenth century. The name was subsequently applied to secular associations, such as the Freemasons. The word is only a Latin form of the Anglo-Saxon Brotherhood.

In the earliest lectures of the eighteenth century we find the word fraternity alluded to in the following formula:

How many particular points pertain to a Freemason? Three: Fraternity, Fidelity, and Taciturnity.

What do they represent? Brotherly Love, Relief, and Truth among all Right Masons.

FRATERNIZE. To recognize as a Brother; to associate with Masonically.

FREDERICK, DUKE OF YORK. Born 1763, second son of George III; died in 1827. Made a Freemason, November 21, 1787, at the Star and Garter Tavern, London, England, at a Special Lodge held for that purpose by the Duke of Cumberland, then Grand Master. The Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV, acted as sponsor for his brother.

FREDERICK HENRY LOUIS, Prince of Prussia, was received into Freemasonry at Berlin by Frederick the Great, his brother, in 1740.

FREDERICK OF NASAU. Prince Frederick, son of the King of the Netherlands, and for many years the Grand Master of the National Grand Lodge of that kingdom. He was ambitious of becoming a Masonic reformer, and in addition to his connection with the Charter of Cologne, an account of which has been given under that head, he attempted, in 1819, to introduce a new rite. He denounced the advanced Degrees as being contrary to the true intent of Freemasonry; and in a circular to all the Lodges under the obedience of the National Grand Lodge, he proposed a new system, to consist of five Degrees, namely, the three symbolic, and two more as complements or illustrations of the third, which he called Elect Master and Supreme Elect Master. Some few Lodges adopted this new system, but most of them rejected it. The Grand Chapter, whose existence it had attacked, denounced it. The Lodges practising it in Belgium were dissolved in 1830, but a few of them probably remain in Holland. The full rituals of the two supplementary Degrees are printed in the second volume of Hermes, and an attentive perusal of them does not give an exalted idea of the inventive genius of the Prince.

FREDERICK, PRINCE OF WALES. Father of King George III. Made a Freemason November 5, 1737, in a Special Lodge at Kew, Doctor Desaguliers presiding. He died in 1751. Three of his sons became members of the Craft, the Dukes of York and Gloucester initiated in 1766, the Duke of Cumberland, 1767 (see Royal Freemasons, George W. Speth, 1885).

FREDERICK THE GREAT. Frederick II, King of Prussia, surnamed the Great, was born on January 24, 1712, and died on August 17, 1786, at the age of seventy-four years and a few months. He was initiated as a Freemason, at Brunswick, on the night of August 14, 1738, not quite two years before he ascended the throne.

In English, we have two accounts of this initiation,—one by Campbell, in his work on Frederick the Great and his Times, and the other by Carlyle in his History of Frederick the Second. Both are substantially the same, because both are merely translations of the original account given by Bielfeld in his Freund-schaftliche Briefe, or Familiar Letters. The Baron von Bielfeld was, at the time, an intimate companion of the Prince, and was present at the initiation.

Bielfeld tells us that in a conversation which took place on August 6 at Loo—although Carlyle corrects him as to time and place, and says it probably occurred at Minden, on July 17—the Institution of Freemasonry had been enthusiastically lauded by the Count of Lippe Buckeburg. The Crown Prince soon after privately expressed to the Count his wish to join the society. Of course, this wish was to be gratified. The necessary furniture and assistance for conferring the Degrees were obtained from the Lodge at Hamburg. Bielfeld gives an amusing account of the embarrassments which were encountered in passing the chest containing the Masonic implements through the Custom-House without detection. Campbell, quoting from Bielfeld, says:

The whole of August 14 was spent in preparations for the Lodge, and at twelve at night the Prince Royal arrived, accompanied by Count Wartenslieben, a captain in the king's regiment at Potsdam. The Prince introduced him to us as a candidate whom he very warmly recommended, and begged that he might be admitted immediately after himself. At the same time, he desired that he might be treated like any private individual, and that none of the usual ceremonies might be altered on his account. Accordingly, he was admitted in the customary form, and I could not sufficiently admire his fearlessness, his composure, and his address. After the double reception, a Lodge was held. All was over by four in the morning, and the Prince returned to the ducal palace, apparently as well pleased with us as we were charmed with him.

Of the truth of this account there never has been any doubt. Frederick the Great was certainly a Freemason. But Carlyle, in his usual sarcastic vein, adds:

The Crown Prince prosecuted his Masonry at Reinsberg or elsewhere, occasionally, for a year or two, but was never ardent in it, and very soon after his accession left off altogether. . . . A Royal Lodge was established at Berlin, of which the new king consented to be patron; but he never once entered the palace, and only his portrait, a welcome good one, still to be found there, presided over the mysteries of that establishment.

Now how much of truth with the sarcasm, and how much of sarcasm without the truth, there is in this remark of Carlyle, is just what the Masonic world is bound to discover. Until further light is thrown upon the subject by documentary evidence from the Prussian Lodges, the question can not be definitely answered. But what is the now known further Masonic history of Frederick?

Bielfeld tells us that the zeal of the Prince for the Fraternity induced him to invite the Baron Von Oberg and himself to Reinsberg, where, in 1739, they founded a Lodge, into which Keyserling, Jordan, Moolendorf, Queis, and Frederdsdorff, Frederick's valet, were admitted.

Bielfeld is again our authority for stating that on June 20, 1740, King Frederick—for he had then ascended the throne—held a Lodge at Charlottenburg, and, as Master in the chair, initiated Prince William of Prussia, his brother, the Margrave Charles of Brandenburg, and Frederick William, Duke of Holstein. The Duke of Holstein was seven years afterward elected Adjutant Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the Three Globes at Berlin.

We hear no more of Frederick's Freemasonry in the printed records until the 16th of July, 1774, when he granted his protection to the National Grand Lodge of Germany, and officially approved of the treaty with the Grand Lodge of England, by which the National Grand Lodge was established. In the year 1777, the Mother Lodge, Royal York of Friendship, at Berlin, celebrated, by a festival, the king's birthday, on which occasion Frederick wrote the following letter, which, as it is the only printed declaration of his opinion of Freemasonry that is now extant, is well worth copying:

I cannot but be sensible of the new homage of the Lodge Royal York of Friendship on the occasion of the anniversary of my birth, bearing, as it does, the evidence of its zeal and attachment for my person. Its orator has well expressed the sentiments which animate all its labors; and a society which employs itself only in sowing the seed and bringing forth the fruit of every kind of virtue in my dominions may always be assured of my protection. It is the glorious task of every good sovereign, and I will never cease to fulfil it. And so I pray God to take you and your Lodge under his holy and deserved protection. Potsdam, this 14th of February, 1777.—Frederick.

Brother E. E. Cauthorne submits here that, Frederick did not in his latter days take the active interest in Freemasonry that he had during the early part of his reign. It is true that the Grand Lodge of the Three Globes at Berlin, as well as many European historians, have often shown this to have been impossible.

But we must not forget that the adoption of the Constitutions makes them legally binding upon the Freemasons who subscribe to this document, no matter whether it was or was not the creation of Frederick. Further, in reference to the above comments by Brother Cauthorne, the subject of Frederick's Masonic activity and the Constitutions has been given critical study by Brothers General Albert Pike, Enoch T. Carson and Dr. Wilhelm Bogemann (see their various conclusions in Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry, pages 1828-39).

FREDERICK WILLIAM III. King of Prussia, and, although not a Freemason, a generous patron of the Order. On December 29, 1797, he wrote to the Lodge Royal York of Friendship, at Berlin, these words: "I have never been initiated, as every one knows, but I am far from conceiving the slightest distrust of the intentions of the members of the Lodge. I believe that its design is noble, and founded on the cultivation of virtue; that its methods are legitimate, and that every political tendency is banished from its operations. Hence, I shall take pleasure in manifesting on all occasions my good-will and my affection to the Lodge Royal York of Friendship, as well as to every other Lodge in my dominions." In a similar tone of kindness toward Freemasonry, he wrote three months afterward to Fessler. And when he issued, October 20, 1798, an Edict forbidding secret societies, he made a special exemption in favor of the Masonic Lodges. To the time of his death, he was always the avowed friend of the Order.

FREE. The word Free, in connection with Mason, originally signified that the person so called was free, entrusted with certain rights, of the Company or Gild of Incorporated Masons. For those Operative Masons who were not thus made free of the gild, were not permitted to work with those who were. A similar regulation still exists in many parts of Europe, although it is not known to the United States. The term appears to have been first thus used in the tenth century, when the traveling Freemasons we are told were incorporated by the Roman Pontiff (see Traveling Freemasons).

In reference to the other sense of free as meaning not bound, not in captivity, it is a rule of Freemasonry that no one can be initiated who is at the time restrained of his liberty. The Grand Lodge of England extends this doctrine, that Freemasons should be free in all their thoughts and actions, so far, that it will not permit the initiation of a candidate who is only temporarily in a place of confinement. In the year 1783, the Master of the Royal Military Lodge at Woolwich, No. 371, being confined, most probably for debt, in the King's Bench prison, at London, the Lodge, which was itinerant in its character and allowed to move from place to place with its regiment, adjourned, with its Warrant of Constitution, to the Master in prison, where several Freemasons were made. The Grand Lodge, being informed of the circumstances, immediately summoned the Master and Wardens of the Lodge "to answer for their conduct in making Masons in the King's Bench prison," and, at the same time, adopted a resolution, affirming that "it is inconsistent with the principles of Masonry for any Freemasons' Lodge to be held, for the purposes of making, passing, or raising Masons, in any prison or place of confinement" (see Constitutions, 1784, page 349).

FREE AND ACCEPTED. The title Free and Accepted first occurs in the Roberts Print of 1722, which is headed The Old Constitutions belonging to the Ancient and Honourable Society of Free and Accepted Masons, and was adopted by Doctor Anderson in the second edition of the Book of Constitutions, published.
Free and Accepted Americans. Formed about 1853 as a native American patriotic secret society by William Patton, who became its first president, the first meeting being held in a stable, the second in Convention Hall, New York City. By 1855 there were fifty-nine Temples of the organization in New York City and Kings County. Later on the society was absorbed by the Know-nothing Party which flourished in the ten years preceding 1860, and did not survive that movement. Its first name was the American Brethren, afterwards the Wide Awakes, but most commonly the Templars Order of the American Star, Free and Accepted Americans. While the style adopted for the name might suggest that the institution of the same.

The object of this organization shall be to protect and serve and uphold the Union of these States and the Constitution of the United States in all lawful ways; to place in all offices of honor, trust or profit, in the gift of the people, or by appointment, none but native-born Protestant citizens, and to protect, preserve and uphold the Union of these States and the Constitution of the same.

The name, Know-nothing, came from that or an equivalent expression being used by the members in reply to questions concerning the organization.
the application of the words free-born and free man, we use them in their usual legal acceptation, we combine freedom with fervency and zeal as embodying a symbolic idea. Gädicke, under the word Freiheit, in his Freimaurer-Lexicon, thus defines the word:

A word that is often heard among us, but which is restricted to the same limitation as the freedom of social life. We have in our assemblies no freedom to act each one as he pleases. But we are, or should be, free from the dominion of passion, pride, prejudice, and all the other follies of human nature. We are free from the false delusion that we need not be obedient to the laws.

Thus he makes it equivalent to integrity; a sense that Brother Mackey believed it to bear in the following article.

Fisk has some observations on the freeing of slaves among the Romans that are of value here. The liberating of slaves took place in several ways. The most usual mode seems to have been by will, freedom by bequest, manumissio per testamentum, on the death of the owner. There were two other modes; census, the listing, and per vindicatum, by the freedom of the rod; the former was when the slave with the master's consent, was enrolled in the taxation list as a freedman; the latter was a formal and public enfranchisement before the praetor (a Roman magistrate). In the last case, the master appeared with his slave, before the tribunal, and commenced the ceremony by striking him with a rod, vindicta; thus treating him as still his slave. Then a protector or defender, assertor libertatis, steps forward and requests the liberation of the slave, by saying hunc hominem liberum esse volo. A declaration by the praetor, that the slave should be free, is given under the word Free. In the old lectures of the eighteenth century a Freemason was described as being “a freeman, born of a freewoman, brother to a king, fellow to a prince, or companion to a beggar, if a Mason,” and this was meant to indicate the universality of the Brotherhood.

The word Freemason was until recently divided into two words, sometimes with and sometimes without a hyphen; and we find in all the old books and manuscripts Free Mason or Free-Mason. But this usage has generally been abandoned by writers, and Freemason is usually spelled as one word. The old Constitutions constantly used the word Mason. Yet the word was employed at a very early period in the parish registers of England, and by some writers. Thus, in the register of the parish of Astonbury we find these items:

But the most singular passage is one found in Cawdray’s Treasurie of Similies, published in 1609, and which he copied from Bishop Coverdale’s translation of Werdmuller’s A Spiritual and most Precious Perle, which was published in 1550. It is as follows:

As the Free-Mason heweth the hard stones . . . even so God the Heavenly Free-Mason buildeth a Christian church.

But, in fact, the word was used at a much earlier period, and occurs, Steinbrenner says in his Origine and Early History of Masonry (page 110), for the first time in a statute passed in 1350, in the twenty-fifth year of Edward I, where the wages of a Master Freemason are fixed at 4 pence, and of other Masons at 3 pence. The original French text of the statute is “Mestre de franche-peur.” “Here,” says Steinbrenner, “the word Freemason evidently signifies a free-stone mason—one who works in free-stone, the French franche-peur, meaning franche-pierre, as distinguished from the rough mason, who merely builds walls of rough, unhewn stone.” This latter sort of workmen was that class called by the Scotch Mason cowans, whom the Freemasons were forbidden to work with, whence we get the modern use of that word.

Ten years after, in 1360, we have a statute of Edward III, in which it is ordained that “every Mason shall finish his work, be it of free-stone or a rough-stone,” where the French text of the statute is “de franche-pere ou de grosse-pere.” Thus it seems evident that the word free-mason was originally used in contradistinction to rough-mason. The old Consti
The precise import with which the adjective was originally used in this designation has been much disputed. Three views have been propounded.

1. The suggestion that freestone masons for free-stone masons work without an advance of wages, when summoned from several counties by writs of Edward III, to rebuild and enlarge Windsor Castle, under the direction of William of Wykeham, has been placed at the same date. It is said also that these masons agreed on certain signs and tokens by which they might know one another, and render mutual assistance against impressment, and further agreed not to work unless free and on their own terms. Hence they called themselves Free-Masons.

A child's book, Dives Pragmaticus, printed in the year 1563, and reproduced in 1910 by the owner, the John Rylands Library at Manchester, England, contains a list of occupations and line 97 is:

Al Free masons, bride layers and dawbers of walls.

The earliest instance quoted of the word in this sense is in a list of the London City Companies of 1376.

2. A member of the Fraternity, called more fully Free and Accepted Masons. Early in the seventeenth century, the Societies of Freemasons, in sense 1, began to unite and to employ connected with the building trade, and so to assume the name free-stone masons. A member was permitted to travel and render their services wherever any great building was in progress of construction.

And then the following meanings are given:

1. A member of a certain class of skilled workers in stone, in the fourteenth and following centuries often mentioned in contradistinction to rough masons, tapers, masons, or workmen who undertook not to work without an advance of wages, when summoned from several counties by writs of Edward III, to rebuild and enlarge Windsor Castle, under the direction of William of Wykeham, has been placed at the same date. It is said also that these masons agreed on certain signs and tokens by which they might know one another, and render mutual assistance against impressment, and further agreed not to work unless free and on their own terms. Hence they called themselves Free-Masons.

A child's book, Dives Pragmaticus, printed in the year 1563, and reproduced in 1910 by the owner, the John Rylands Library at Manchester, England, contains a list of occupations and line 97 is:

Al Free masons, bride layers and dawbers of walls.

The belief is that the identity was purposely disguised (see Slade, Alexander).

FREEMASONRY, EARLY BRITISH. Brother Robert Freke Gould, in his History of Freemasonry (volume i, page 381), says:

The Minutes of Scottish Lodges from the sixteenth century, and evidences of British Masonic life dating further back by some two hundred years than the second decade of the eighteenth century, were actually left unheeded by our premier historiographer, although many of such authentic and invaluable documents lay ready to hand, only awaiting examination, amongst the muniments in the old Lodge chests. By the collection and comparatively recent publication of many of the interesting records above alluded to, so much evidence has been accumulated respecting the early history, progress, and character of the craft as to be almost embarrassing, and the proposition may be safely advanced that the Grand Lodges of Great Britain are the direct descendants, by continuity and absorption, of the ancient Freemasonry which immediately preceded their institution, which will be demonstrated without requiring the exercise of either dogmatism or credulity. The oldest Lodges in Scotland possess registers of members and meetings, as well as particulars of their laws and customs, ranging backward nearly three hundred years. These will form an important link in the chain which connects what is popularly known as the Lodges of Modern Freemasonry, with their operative and speculative ancestors.

Early Freemasonry and the customs of the Craft in that country are discussed at length in Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry (pages 663–99). There are no Lodge records in England of the sixteenth century, and records of only one between 1700 and 1717. The original Saint Clair Charters now in the custody of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, dated, respectively, 1601, 1602, and 1628, are referred to by Gould. They are considered the Schaw Statutes, No. 1, of 1599 A.D. (see Schaw Manuscript), the Schaw Statutes, No. 2, of 1599 A.D. and their relevancy to Mother Kilwinning.
Lodge, Ayrshire, No. 0, with an important certificate from William Schaw, which proves that the document of 1599 was intended exclusively for the Freemasons under the Jurisdiction of the Kilwinning Lodge. The subject of the Lodge of Edinburgh, No. 1, and its career from its earliest records, dating back to 1599, down to the year 1736, when the Grand Lodge of Scotland was inaugurated, as most fully described in Lyon's history of this ancient Lodge, passes under review; then appears, as Brother Gould says, one of the adornments of that history in the facsimile of the record of that Lodge, showing that the earliest Minute of the presence of a speculative freeman Mason in a Lodge, and taking part in its deliberations, is dated June 8, 1600 (see his History of Freemasonry i, 406). It is to be noted that "the admission of General Alexander Hamilton, on May 20, 1640, and of the Right Honorable Sir Patrick Hume, Baronet, on December 27, 1667, are specially recorded as constituting the intrants "Fellow of craft" and "Fellow of craft (and Master) of this Lodge," respectively" (Gould's History of Freemasonry i, page 408). It is assumed that Master simply meant a compliment; certainly, there was nothing now known to us as corresponding with the ceremony of a Master Mason's Degree at that time. But the allusion starts some speculation. Many of the operatives did not view the introduction of the speculative element with favor, and at one time they were arrayed in hostile camps; but eventually those who supported the Gentlemen or Geomatic Masons won the day, the Domatics having to succumb. In the Lodge of Aberdeen, the majority in 1670 A.D. were actually nonoperative or speculative members.

On March 2, 1653, appears the important fact of the election of a joining member. Again, Lyon declares that the reference to frie mesones, in the Minute of December 27, 1636, is the earliest instance yet discovered of Free-Mason being applied to designate members of the Mason craft, and considers that it is used as an abbreviation of the term Freemen Masons. But while concurring therein, as did Brother Hughan, Gould thinks the word freemason may be traced back to 1551, when the Melrose version of the Old Charges was originally written.

Canongate Kilwinning Lodge, No. 2, was Commissioned or Warranted by the Lodge of Kilwinning, No. 0, granting powers to several of their own members resident in the Canongate, Edinburgh, and dated December 20, 1677. This, Brother Gould says (page 410) was a direct invasion of Jurisdiction, for it was not simply a Charter to enable their members to meet as Freemasons in Edinburgh, but also to act as independently as "Mother Kilwinning" herself, with a separate existence, which was the actual result that ensued.

Secon and Perth Lodge, No. 3, is much older than No. 2, although fourth on the roll, though the authorities state that it existed before 1658, and the Grand Lodge acknowledges this date at the present time, placing Nos. 0 and 1, however, as before 1598, and No. 57, Haddington, at 1599, there being also many bearing seventeenth century designations.

The Lodge of Glasgow Saint John, No. 3, bis, is the one next mentioned as "an old Lodge, undoubtedly, though its documents do not date back as far as some of its admirers have declared." The Rev. A. T. Grant is quoted as saying that every line is inconsistent with the charter phraseology of the period to which it has been assigned. But W. P. Buchan states that the first notice in the Minutes of the Glasgow Incorporation of Masons bears date September 22, 1620, namely, "Entry of Apprentices to the Lodge of Glasgow, the last day of Dec., 1613 years, compared John Stewart, &c." It was placed on the roll of the Grand Lodge of Scotland in 1580 as No. 3, bis; it was exclusively operative.

Canongate and Leith, Leith and Canongate Lodge, No. 5, is authoritatively acknowledged as dating from 1688.

Lodge of Old Kilwinning Saint John, at Inverness, No. 6, was granted a Charter of Confirmation on November 30, 1737, its existence being admitted from the year 1678, but a cloud rests upon the latter record.

Hamilton Kilwinning Lodge, No. 7, is considered to date from the year 1695.

Brother Gould, in his examination of Brother Lyons and other authorities, relating to the above records, thus dissects largely from the conclusions of Brother George F. Fort in his Early History and Antiquities of Freemasonry, as from the Antiquities of Freemasonry, by Brother J. G. Findel (see also Four Old Lodges in this Encyclopedia). The organization of the Grand Lodge of Scotland is discussed in detail in Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry (pages 1152–78).

FREEMASONS AUTHORIZED BY POPE. There is a curious reference in the History of Wiltshire by John Aubrey. This book of 1691 contains this statement by Aubrey, "Sir William Dugdale told me many years since that about Henry III's time the Pope gave a Bull to . . . Freemasons to travel up and down all Europe to build Churches. From those are derived the Fraternity of Adopted Masons." Such a Bull from the Pope is still undiscovered. Aubrey refers to a period long prior to his own lifetime, namely the reign of Henry III stretching through the years 1216–72 A.D. Sir William Dugdale (1605–85 A.D.) was the Garter King-at-Arms from 1677, an officer of the Order of the Garter or Order of Saint George, a Knightly organization founded in England about 1344 A.D., and still ranking first among such institutions in Europe. Sir William Dugdale was an antiquarian of note whose painstaking zeal would have added much to the worth of Aubrey's assertion had it been recorded by him with further particulars of the Bull in question. Of Aubrey (1626-97 A.D.) there is every evidence of industry in the collection of his materials but his readiness to freely accept and confidently believe the gossip of his day earned for his comments a verdict of un-reliability. As the matter stands, his allusion has aroused speculations but gained no further proof than what is here recorded.

FREEMASONS MEDAL AND HALL. Silver medal suspended from the arms of the Master's square. On one side a winged figure, Fame, writes on a column In Honour of the Subscriber, and has a trumpet and a design of a temple in her left hand. In the background a building under erection bears the date MDCCCLXXX. The other side has the subscription acknowledgment with subscriber's name surrounded by the phrase Grand Lodge of Freemasons in England. This method was decided upon in 1779 to pay off the balance due on grounds and buildings. Subscribers were given this medal and one went to every subscribing Lodge to be worn by the Master. Every subscribing Lodge in 1783 was allowed to send an extra representative to the Grand Lodge besides the Master and Wardens until the money should be repaid, and each subscriber was also made a member of the Grand Lodge. There existed a Freemasons Coffee Tavern in Wild Court, before the Grand Lodge in 1774 acquired property in Great Queen Street, London, England, on which to erect a Freemasons Hall. Lord Peter as Grand Master laid the foundation stone on May 1, 1775, and in 1777 the building was dedicated. On April 27, 1864, the day of Grand Festival, the Earl of Zetland, Grand Master for a quarter of a century, laid the foundation stone of the new Hall, but owing to many difficulties, financial and structural, it was not for five years that the work was completed. In 1919 the Duke of Connaught, as Grand Master, in a message to the Special Grand Lodge held at the Royal Albert Hall on June 27, for the celebration of Peace, expressed the earnest hope that the Craft, "as a fitting sequel to the proceedings, would determine to create a perpetual Memorial of its gratitude to Almighty God, for the special blessings He has been pleased to confer upon us, both as Englishmen and as Masons, whereby we can render fitting honour to the many Brethren who fell during the War. The great and continued growth of Freemasonry amongst us demands a central Home." He suggested that the most fitting Masonic Peace Memorial would be "the erection of that Home in the metropolis of the Empire dedicated to the Most High, and worthy of the traditions of the United Grand Lodge of England." The largest gathering of its kind ever held in the City of London met on August 8, 1925, in joint celebration of the anniversary of the twenty-fifth year as Most Worshipful Grand Master of the Duke of Connaught, and the culmination of six years' labor on the part of the Fraternity in raising the $5,000,000 required for building the Masonic Peace Memorial in London.
preconceived notions, and consider it their duty to exert all their influence in persuading their friends to become members of the Craft. Men who thus misunderstand the true policy of our Institution should be instructed by their older and more experienced Brethren that it is wholly in opposition to all our laws and principles to ask any man to become a Freemason, or to exercise any kind of influence upon the minds of others, except that of a truly Masonic life and a practical exemplification of its tenets, by which they may be induced to ask admission into our Lodges. We must not seek—we are to be sought.

And if this were not an ancient law, embedded in the very cement that upholds our system, policy alone would dictate an adherence to the voluntary usage. We need not now fear that our Institution will suffer from a deficiency of members. Our greater dread should be that, in its rapid extension less care may be given to the selection of candidates than the interests and welfare of the Order demand. There can, therefore, be no excuse for the practise of persuading candidates, and every hope of safety in avoiding such a practise. It should always be borne in mind that the candidate who comes to us not of his own free will and accord, but induced by the persuasions of his friends—no matter how worthy he otherwise may be—violates, by so coming, the requirements of our Institution on the very threshold of its temple, and, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, fails to become imbued with that zealous attachment to the Order which is absolutely essential to the formation of a true Masonic character.

FREIMAURER. German for Freemason. Mauer means a wall, and mauen, to build a wall. Hence, literally, freimaurer is a builder of walls, who is free of his gild, from the fact that the building of walls was the first occupation of masons.

FREIMAUREREREI. German for Freemasonry.

FREIMAURERISCHE WELTGESCHAFTSSTELLE, DIE. See International Bureau for Masonic Affairs.

FREIMAURER, VEREIN DEUTSCHER. See Union of German Freemasons.

FRENCH, BENJAMIN BROWN. A distinguished Freemason of the United States, who was born at Chester, in New Hampshire, September 4, 1800, and died at the City of Washington, where he had long resided, on August 12, 1870. He was initiated into Freemasonry in 1825, and during his whole life took an active interest in the affairs of the Fraternity. He served for many years as General Grand Secretary of the General Grand Chapter, and Grand Recorder of the Grand Encampment of the United States. In 1846, soon after his arrival in Washington, he was elected Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the District, a position which he repeatedly occupied. In 1859, he was elected Grand Master of the Templars of the United States, a distinguished position which he held for six years, having been re-elected in 1862. His administration, during a period of much excitement in the country, was marked by great firmness, mingled with a spirit of conciliation. He was also a prominent member of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and at the time of his death was the Lieutenant Grand Commander of the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States.

Brother French was possessed of much intellectual ability, and contributed no small share of his studies to the literature of Freemasonry. His writings, which have not yet been collected, were numerous, and consisted of Masonic odes, many of them marked with the true poetical spirit, eloquent addresses on various public occasions, learned dissertations on Masonic law, and didactic essays, which were published at the time in various periodicals. His decisions on Templar Law have always been esteemed of great value.

FRENCH GUIANA. See Cayenne.

FRENCH GUIANA. The capital of this district, Konakry, on the west coast of Africa, has one Lodge, No. 468, which is controlled by the Grand Lodge of France, since 1916, and is named L’Etoile de Guinée, meaning the Star of Guineea.

FRENCH INDO CHINA. See Indo-China, French, also Cochín China.

FRENCH PRISONERS’ LODGES. Between 1740 and 1815, almost constant warfare between France and Britain resulted in a large number of French prisoners of war, who, from 1759 onwards, established Masonic Lodges, working without Warrant or authority. Freemasonry was exceedingly popular with the army of France and, while some French officers visited and joined the local Lodges in England where they were being held, most of them belonged to these French Prisoners’ Lodges conducted by themselves (see French Prisoners’ Lodges, an account of twenty-six Lodges established by them in England and elsewhere, John T. Thorp, 1900, Leicester, England).

FRENCH RITE. The French term is Rite Français ou Moderne. The French or Modern Rite is one of the three principal Rites of Freemasonry. It consists of seven Degrees, three symbolic and four higher, namely, 1. Apprentice; 2. Fellow Craft; 3. Master; 4. Elect; 5. Scotch Master; 6. Knight of the East; 7. Rose Croix. This Rite is practised in France, in Brazil, and in Louisiana. It was founded in 1786 by the Grand Orient of France, who, unwilling to destroy entirely the advanced Degrees which were then practised by the different Rites, and yet anxious to reduce them to a smaller number and to greater simplicity, extracted these Degrees out of the Rite of Perfection, making some few slight modifications. Most of the authors who have treated of this Rite have given to its symbolism an entirely astronomical meaning. Among these writers, we may refer to Ragon, in his Cour Philosphique, as probably the most scientific.

Ragon, in his Tuileur général, meaning Handbook to the Degrees (page 51), says that the four Degrees of the French Rite, which were elaborated to take the place of the thirty Degrees of the Scottish Rite, have for their basis the four physical proofs to which the reciprocally submits in the First Degree. And that the symbolism further represents the sun in its annual progress through the four seasons. Thus, the Elect Degree represents the element of Earth and the season of Spring; the Scottish Master represents Air and the Summer; the Knight of the East represents Water and Autumn; and the Rose Croix represents Fire; but he does not claim that it is consecrated to Winter, although that would be the natural conclusion.

The original Rose Croix was an eminently Christian Degree, which, being found inconvenient, was in 1880 substituted by the Philosophic Rose Croix, which now forms the summit of the French Rite.

FREY or FREIA. Grimm, in his Deutsche Mythologie (pages 191, 279), traces the name Freia through the ancient Teutonic dialects and explains it to signify plenty and beauty (see Thorpe, Northern Mythology, volume i, pages 197-8, for further information). The column or pillar set apart to the goddess Frey in the temple of Upsala became the pillar of beauty or plenteousness. Brother Fort says, in his Antiquities (chapter 27) the three divinities in the Norse temple at Upsala, in Denmark, Odin, Thor, and Frey, were typical supports of the universe—Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty—or the three of the ten columns in the Hebrew Sephiroth, in the Jewish philosophy, designated as Sapientia, Pulchritudo, and Fundamentum, which, like the three columns existing in a Lodge of Freemasons, symbolize the moralistic pillars of the world, represented by the Lodge itself. An additional significant fact confronts us at this point: the column of Beauty or Plenty, originally emblematic of Frey, is situated in the south of the Lodge. Masonic symbol—sheaf of grain—always suspended above that station, denoted plenteousness. Freia may also be comparatively described as the Scandinavian Isis, the principal goddess of Egyptian mythology.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES. Societies first established toward the end of the eighteenth century, in England, for the relief of mechanics, laborers, and other persons who derived their support from their daily toil. By the weekly payment of a stipulated sum, the members secured support, and assistance from the society when sick, and payment of the expenses of burial when they died. These societies gave origin to the Odd Fellows and other similar associations, but the weekly fund was an additional furniture of a Lodge. They are respectively dedicated to God, the Master of the Lodge, and the Craft. Our present, to which the petitioner does or did belong, or from some other contributing Lodge, certifying that they have known him to have been in reputable or at least tolerable, circumstances, and that he has been not less than five years a subscribing member to a regular Lodge.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY OF FREE AND ACCEPTED MASTERS. Brother W. Wonmacott (on page 45, Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge volume xxvii, 1914) mentioned a Society conducted as a club for mutual benefit, which in 1737 met at the White Swan tavern in New Street, Covent Garden, London, and went by the name of the Friendly Society of Free and Accepted Masons (see also Miscellanea Latomorum, August, 1913, page 13).

FRIEND OF ST. JOHN. The Sixth Degree of the system practised by the Grand Lodge of Sweden. It is comprehended in the Degree of Knight of the East and West.

FRIEND OF TRUTH. The Fifth Degree of the Rite of African Architects.

FRIENDSHIP. Leslie, in 1741, delivered the first discourse on Friendship, as peculiarly a Masonic virtue. He was followed by Hutchinson, Preston, and other writers, and now in the modern lectures it is adopted as one of the precious jewels of a Master Freemason. Of universal friendship, blue is said to be the symbolic color. "In regulargradation," says Munkhouse (Discussions i, 17), "and by an easy descent, brotherly love extends itself to lesser distinct societies or to particular persons, because thus becomes friendship either of convenience or personal affection," Cicero says, "Amicitia nisi inter bonos non potest," meaning, "Friendship can exist only among the good."

FUND, GRAND MASTERS. A fund over which the Grand Master of the United Grand Lodge of England exercises exclusive control. It originated with a sum of £2,730 subscribed by the Craft in 1870, when the Earl of Zetland retired from the Grand Mastership, and is known as the Zetland Fund.

FUND OF BENEVOLENCE. A fund established in 1727 by the Grand Lodge of England, and solely devoted to charity. The regulations for its management are as follows: Its distinction and application is directed by the Constitutions to be monthly, for which purpose a Board of Benevolence is holden on the last Wednesday of every month except December, when it is on the third Wednesday. This Lodge consists of all the present and past Grand Officers, all actual Masters of Lodges, and twelve Past Masters.

FUND OF THE LODGE. The funds of the Lodge are placed in the keeping of the Treasurer, to whom all moneys received by the Secretary must be immediately paid. Hence each of these officers is a check on the other. And hence, too, the Thirty-nine Regulations of 1721 say that the Grand Treasurer should be "a Brother of good worldly substance" (see Constitutions, 1728) lest impudence and the urge of poverty should tempt him to make use of the Lodge funds.

FUNERAL LODGE. See Sorrow Lodge.

FUNERAL RITES. See Burial.

FURLAC. A word in the advanced Degrees, whose etymology is uncertain, but probably from the Arabic. It is said to signify the Angel of the Earth.

FURNITURE OF A LODGE. The Bible, Square, and Compasses are technically said to constitute the furniture of a Lodge. They are respectively dedicated to God, the Master of the Lodge, and the Craft. Our English Brethren differ from those in the United States in their explanation of the furniture. Brother George Oliver gives their illustration, from the English lectures (in his Landmarks i, 169) as follows:

The Bible is said to derive from God to man in general, because the Almighty has been pleased to reveal more of His divine will by that holy book than by any other means. The Compasses, being the chief implement used in the construction of all architectural plans and designs, are assigned to the Grand Master in particular as emblems of his dignity, he being the chief head and ruler of the Craft. The Square is given to the whole Masonic body, because the Almighty has been pleased to reveal more of his divine will by that holy book than by any other means.

But the lecture of the early part of the eighteenth century made the furniture consist of the Mosaic Pavement, Blazing Star, and the Indented Tarsel, while the Bible, Square, and Compasses were considered as additional furniture.
the German for Encyclopedia of Freemasonry) that Fustier was a dealer in Masonic decorations and in the transcription of rituals, of which he had made a collection of more than four hundred, which he sold at established prices.

FUTURE LIFE. Lorenzo de Medici said that all those are dead, even for the present life, who do not believe in a future state. The belief in that future life, it is the object of Freemasonry, as it was of the ancient initiations, to teach (see Immortality of the Soul).

FYLFO To. An ancient symbol well known in the science of coats of arms and the other details of heraldry. It is sometimes known as the crucis dissimulata, found in the catacombs of Rome, and forms one of the symbols of the Degrees of Prince of Mercy, Scottish Rite System. It is a form of the Svastika (see Jaina Cross).

G. In the Hebrew, represented by נ. The seventh letter of the English, Latin, and Romance alphabets. In the Greek and many other alphabets it is the third in place; in the Russian, Wallachian, and some others it is the fourth; in the Arabic the fifth, and in the Ethiopic the twentieth. In Hebrew it is called Ghéemel, is of the numerical value of three, and its signification is camel. It is associated with the third sacred name of God, in Hebrew, איה, Ghadol, or in Latin magnus, the Mighty. In Freemasonry it is given as the initial of the word God. The Masonic use of the letter tends to the belief of a modern form in the ceremony of the Fellow Craft Degree (see G. O. D.). As in all Roman Catholic and in many Protestant churches the cross, engraved or sculptured in some prominent position, will be found as the expressive symbol of Christianity, so in every Masonic Lodge a letter G may be seen in the East, either painted on the wall or sculptured in wood or metal, and suspended over the Master's chair. This is, in fact, if not the most prominent, certainly the most familiar, of all the symbols of Freemasonry. It is the one to which the poet, Brother Robert Burns, alluded in those well-known and often-quoted lines, in which he speaks of

G—In the midst of Solomon's Temple there stands a G, Which none but Craftsmen ever saw;"
Geometry. But this veneration could not have been oreans because it was the initial of yeuykrpia, or of it as an initial would necessarily confine it to the hidden things about the symbol.

English language and to modern times. It wants which, that explanation was obtained are the only meaning. The mode in which, and the purpose for has hesitated openly to give an explanation of its esoteric or secret part of the ritual. No Masonic writer

The term G. A. 0. Being, designated by the letter G, be calculated and formed; and to Masons, contains the determination, definition, and proof of the order, beauty, and wonderful wisdom of the power of God in His creation.

Lastly, Doctor Oliver has said, in his Golden Remains of the Early Masonic Writers, that "the term G. A. O.
T. U. is used among Masons for this great and glorious Being, designated by the letter G, that it may be applied by every brother to the object of his adoration."

More quotations are unnecessary to show that from the earliest times, since the adoption of the letter as a symbol, its explanation has not been deemed an esoteric or secret part of the ritual. No Masonic writer has hesitated openly to give an explanation of its meaning. The mode in which, and the purpose for which, that explanation was obtained are the only hidden things about the symbol.

It is to be regretted that the letter G, as a symbol, was ever admitted into the Masonic system. The use of it as an initial would necessarily confine it to the English language and to modern times. It wants therefore, as a symbol, the necessary characteristics of both universality and antiquity. The Greek letter gamma is said to have been venerated by the Pythagogreens because it was the initial of γεωμετρία, or Geometry. But this veneration could not have been shared by other nations whose alphabet had no gamma, and where the word for geometry was entirely different.

There can be no doubt that the letter G is a very modern symbol, not belonging to any old system anterior to the origin of the English language. It is, in fact, a corruption of the old Hebrew Cabalistic symbol, the letter יוד, by which the sacred name of God—in fact, the most sacred name, the Tetragram-aton—is expressed. This letter יוד is the initial letter of the word יהוה, or Jehovah, and is constantly to be met with among Hebrew writers, as the abbreviation or symbol of that most holy name, which, indeed, was never written at length. Now, as G is in like manner the initial of God, the English equivalent of the Hebrew Jehovah, the letter has been adopted as a symbol intended to supply to modern Lodges the place of the Hebrew symbol. First adopted by the English ceremony makers, it has without remark, been transferred to the Freemasonry of the Continent, and it is to be found as a symbol in all the systems of Germany, France, Spain, Italy, Portugal, and every other country where Freemasonry has been introduced; although in Germany only can it serve, as it does in England, for an intelligent symbol.

The letter G, then has in Freemasonry the same force and significature that the letter יוד had among the Cabalists. It is only a symbol of the Hebrew letter, and, as that is a symbol of God, the letter G is only a symbol of a symbol. As for its reference to geometry, Kloss, the German Masonic historian, says that the old Operative Masons referred the entire science of geometry to the art of building, which gave to the modern English Freemasons occasion to embrace the whole system of Freemasonry under the head of Geometry, and hence the symbol of that science, as well as of God, was adopted for the purpose of giving elevation to the Fellow Craft's Degree.

Indeed, the symbol, made sacred by its reference to the Grand Geometrician of the universe, was well worthy to be applied to that science which has, from the remotest times, been deemed synonymous with Freemasonry.

GABAON. A significant word in the advanced Degrees. Oliver says (Landmarks i, 333), "in philosophical Masonry, heaven, or, more correctly speaking, the third heaven, is denominated Mount Gabaon, which is feigned to be accessible only by the seven degrees that compose the winding staircase. These are the degrees terminating in the Royal Arch."
Gabaon is defined to signify a high place. It is the Septuagint and Vulgate form of גבעה, Gibeon, which was the city in which the tabernacle was stationed during the reigns of David and Solomon. The word means a city built on a hill, and is referred to in Second Chronicles (i, 3). "So Solomon, and all the congreagation with him, went to the high place that was at Gibeon; for there was the tabernacle of the congreagation of God."

In a ritual, middle of the eighteenth century, it is said that Gabanon is the name of a Master Mason.
This word is a striking evidence of the changes which Hebrew words have undergone in their transmission to Masonic ceremonies, and of the almost impossibility of tracing them to their proper root. It would seem difficult to find a connection between Gabanon and any known Hebrew word. But if we refer to Guilemain's Ritual of Adonhiramite Masonry (page 95) we will find the following passage:
How is a Master called?

Gabaon, which is the name of the place where the Israelites deposited the ark in the time of trouble.

What does this signify?

That the heart of a Mason ought to be pure enough to be a temple suitable for God.

There is abundant internal evidence that these two rituals came from a common source, and that Gabaon is a French distortion, as Gabaon is an English one, of some unknown word—connected, however, with the Ark of the Covenant as the place where that article was deposited.

Now, we learn from the Jewish records that the Philistines, who had captured the ark, deposited it "in the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah," and that David, subsequently recapturing it, carried it to Jerusalem, but left the tabernacle at Gibeon. The ritualist did not remember that the tabernacle at Gibeon was without the ark, but supposed that it was still in that sacred shrine. Hence Gabaon or Gabanon must have been corrupted from either Gibeah or Gibeon, because the ark was considered to be at some time in both places. But Gibeon had already been corrupted by the Septuagint and the Vulgate versions into Gabaon; and this undoubtedly is the word from which Gabanon is derived, through either the Septuagint or the Vulgate, or perhaps from Josephus, who calls it Gabao.

GABAONNE. In French Masonic language the widow of a Master Mason. Derived from Gabao.

GABOR. Hebrew, יַסִּר, strong. A significant word in the advanced Degrees.

GABRIEL. Hebrew, ‏גָּבִרְיָא, a man or hero of God. The name of one of the archangels, referred to in some of the advanced Degrees. He interpreted to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat, and made the prophecy of the "seventy weeks" (Daniel viii and ix); he announced the future appearance of the Messiah (Daniel ix, 26). Among the Rabbis Gabriel is entrusted with the care of the souls of the dead, and is represented as the Prince of Fire, the Spirit presiding over the Last Supper, and in its preservation to have been the Keeper of the Seals in the Scottish Degree of Knights of the Ninth Arch or Sacred Vault of James VI.

GAMBETTA, LÉON. French statesman, born at Cahors on April 2, 1838, the son of a Genoese grocer and a Frenchwoman. Studied for the law at Paris and although hindered by the accidental loss of an eye, his energy won for him prominence. Opposing the rupture with Germany in 1870, he patriotically gave every aid to France during the war, escaped in a balloon from the besieged Paris, raised another army, fighting to the finish. He founded the influential journal, La République française, succeeded in the adoption of a new constitution, massed an effective opposition to the restoration of the Pope's temporal power, became memorable as president of the Chamber of Deputies, formed a ministry, sought to establish friendly relations between France and former foes, and was ever powerful, progressive, and persevering in public service. His career was cut short at the age of forty-four by the accidental discharge of a revolver in his home at Ville d'Avray near Sèvres on December 31, 1882. He was initiated in a Masonic Lodge at Bordeaux and on July 8, 1875, with Emile Littré and Jules Ferry affiliated with the Lodge La Clemente Amitie at Paris.

GANGLER. The title given to the candidate in the Scandinavian Mysteries, signifying wanderer. The application is also made to the sun.

GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE (Joseph). Renowned Italian patriot, born at Nice, July 4, 1807, died June 2, 1882, at Caprera, a small island off the north coast of Sardinia in the Mediterranean Sea. Son of a sailor, he commanded a vessel in 1830; was condemned to death in 1834 as a revolutionist but escaped to South America; his limbs were dislocated by torture while a prisoner in the revolt against Brazil, and regaining his liberty he enabled Uruguay to secure independence and returned to Italy, refusing any recompense. Forming a new army he was pursued by the forces of France, Spain, Austria, and Naples, lost his wife and most of his followers by death and escaped to New York, where he prospered, and returned to Italy in 1854. Took command of Alpine infantry in war of 1859 and was from that time successfully engaged in the many struggles for a united Italy. His biography in the books by G. M. Trevelyan is most exhilarating reading. As a Freemason he was Grand Master at Palermo, 1860, and called a convention in 1867 to unite all the Italian Bodies, a project not then fully successful. Through the courtesy of Brother Melvin M. Johnson, Past Grand Master, Massachusetts, an incident relating to General Garibaldi was verified for us. Brother Curtis Guild, Jr., died in 1915, had been governor of Massachusetts for three years and later was Ambassador to Russia, his last year as Governor was also the first of his two years as Thrice Potent Master of Boston Lafayette Lodge of Perfection. He had a sister and brother, Courtenay Guild, 32°. The account that follows is as both remember their father telling it a number of times:

My father, Curtis Guild, who died in 1911, was a Knight Templar, 33° Mason and Past Thrice Potent Master of Boston Lafayette Lodge of Perfection. My brother, Curtis Guild, who died in 1915, was a Knight Templar, 33° Mason and Past Thrice Potent Master of Boston Lafayette Lodge of Perfection. The story of my father's meeting with Garibaldi was told by my father and by my brother at various Masonic meetings, and the desire to preserve an accurate record of the incident is my reason for writing out the story that I heard many times from the lips of my father.

In 1867 my father and mother made their first visit to Europe, and after travel in England, France and Switzerland had arrived in Florence, with the intention of continuing the journey to Rome. It was summer, and there was some talk of an epidemic of cholera in Rome, although little was said about the scourge in the newspapers. Travellers were an actual epidemic of cholera in Rome it would be most interesting for American travelers to visit the city, but how could one learn the truth? General Giuseppe Garibaldi, with his army of red-shirted soldiers, was preparing his campaign for a united Italy, and this traveler felt that he had the benefit of a pass that the General would receive the American gentleman and ask his advice.

The idea of an American traveler making a social call on the chief of a revolutionary army was ridiculed, but this traveler felt that he had the benefit of a pass that would gain him admission. He went to the General's headquarters where there were about twenty men before him awaiting an audience. On his card that he handed to the Orderly were these words:

Curtis Guild,
Boston, America,

It was a surprise to the traveler as well as to the others when the Orderly returned from an inner room and said that the General would receive the American gentleman at once. The General spoke excellent English. "What can I do for you, Mr. Guild?" were his first words after greetings had been exchanged. He was quite willing to discuss the inquiry about the cholera he said: "Don't go to Rome. The local government tries to keep the facts out of the headlines, but in the walls of the building itself there were about a hundred new cases of cholera a day there, and there is a better reason why you should not go to Rome. Under pledge of Masonic secrecy I tell you that you might find it easier to get into Rome than to get out."

My father thanked the General and could only say to his wife and friends that he had decided not to go to Rome. The following week the army of Garibaldi began its advance from Rome, and many American travelers in the city were shut up there and delayed so that they missed the steamer on which they had engaged rooms for the return journey to America. The pledge of secrecy was, of course, removed after the siege of Rome was begun, as it was in 1870, and his headquarters were established in Florence. General Garibaldi was at one time Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Italy. My father knew him to be a Mason, and had double-storied a seat in a Lodge with him during one of his visits to America, so he decided to call on the General and ask his advice.

"What's the use of Masonry?"

As a part of the costume of a Knights Templar, under a regulation of the Grand Encampment, which directed them to be "of buff leather, the flap to extend four inches upwards from the wrist, and to have the appropriate cross embroidered in gold, on the proper colored velvet, two inches in length." As to uniforms of the Order, see The Habit of a Templar Knight, by Brother Ray V. Denlow for the Grand Commandery of Missouri, a valuable and stimulating report.

GAVEL. The common gavel is one of the working tools of an Entered Apprentice. It is made use of by the Operative Mason to break off the corners of the rough ashlar, and thus fit it the better for the builder's use, and is therefore adopted as a symbol in Speculative Freemasonry, to admonish us of the duty of divesting our minds and consciences of all the vices and impurities of life, thereby fitting our bodies as living stones for that spiritual building not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. It borrows its name from its shape, being that of the gable or gavel end of a house; and this word again comes from the German gipfel, a summit, top, or peak—the idea of a pointed extremity being common to all.

The true form of the gavel is that of the stonemason's hammer. It is to be made with a cutting edge, as in the engraving, that it may be used to break off the corners of rough stones, an operation which could never be effected by the common hammer or mallet. The gavel thus shaped will give, when looked at in the corners of rough stones, an operation which could never be effected by the common hammer or mallet. The true form of the gavel is that of the stone-mason's hammer. It is to be made with a cutting edge,

Jeremiah to death, from which he was rescued only by the intercession of a eunuch of the palace.

The other Gedaliah was the son of Ahikam. He seems to have been greatly in favor with Nebuchadnezzar, for after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the deportation of Zedekiah, he was appointed by the Chaldean monarch as his Satrap or Governor over Judea. He took up his residence at Mizpah, where he was shortly afterward murdered by Ishmael, one of the descendants of the house of David.

The question now arises, which of these two is the one referred to in the ceremonies of a Council of Super-Excellant Masters? I think there can be no doubt that the founders of the Degree intended the second officer of the Council to represent the former, and not the latter Gedaliah—the son of Pashur, and not Gedaliah the son of Ahikam; the Prince of Judah, and not the Governor of Judea.

We are forced to this conclusion, continues Brother Mackey, by various reasons. The Gedaliah represented in the Degree must have been a resident of Jerusalem during the siege, and at the very time of the assault, which immediately preceded the destruction of the Temple and the city. Now, we know that Gedaliah the son of Pashur was with Hezekiah as one of his advisers. On the other hand, it is most likely that Gedaliah the son of Ahikam could have been a resident of Jerusalem, for it is not at all probable that Nebuchadnezzar would have selected such a one for the important and confidential office of a Satrap or Governor. We should rather suppose that Gedaliah the son of Ahikam had been carried away to Babylon after one of the former sieges; that he had there, like Daniel, gained by his good conduct the esteem and respect of the Chaldean monarch; that he had come back to Judea with the army; and that, on the taking of the city, he had been appointed Governor by Nebuchadnezzar. Such being the facts, it is evident that he could not have been in the Council of King Zedekiah, advising and directing his attempted escape.

The modern revivers of the Degree of Super-Excellant Master have, therefore, been wrong in supposing that Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, and afterward Governor of Judea, was the person represented by the second officer of the Council. He was Gedaliah the son of Pashur, a wicked man, one of Zedekiah's princes, and was most probably put to death by Nebuchadnezzar, with the other princes and nobles whom he captured in the plains of Jericho.

GEMARA. See Talmud.

GEMATRIA. Means in Hebrew to reckon by letters as well as numbers, a cabalistic method of interpreting the Scriptures by interchanging words whose letters have the same numerical value when added (see Numbers).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY. See Assembly.

GENERAL GRAND CHAPTER. Until the year 1797, the Royal Arch Degree and the Degrees subsidiary to it were conferred in America, either in irresponsible Bodies calling themselves Chapters, but obedient to no superior authority, or in Lodges working under a Grand Lodge Warrant. On October 24, 1797, a Convention of Committees from three Chapters, namely, the Saint Andrew's Chapter of Boston, Temple Chapter of Albany, and Newburyport Chapter, was held at Boston, which recommended to the several Chapters within the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, and New York to hold a Convention at...
Hartford on the fourth Wednesday of January ensuing, to form a Grand Chapter for the said States. Accordingly, on January 24, 1798, delegates from Saint Andrew's Chapter of Boston, Massachusetts; King Cyrus Chapter of Newburyport, Massachusetts; Providence Chapter of Providence, Rhode Island; Solomon Chapter of Derby, Connecticut; Franklin Chapter of Norwich, Connecticut, and Hudson Chapter of Hudson, New York; to which were the next day added Temple Chapter of Albany, New York, and Horeb Chapter of Whitestown, New York, assembled at Hartford in Convention and, having adopted a Constitution organized a governing Body which they styled The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the Northern States of America. This Body assumed in its Constitution jurisdiction over only the States of New England and New York, and provided that Deputy Grand Chapters, subject to its obedience, should be organized in those States. Ephraim Kirby, of Litchfield, Connecticut, was elected Grand High Priest; and it was ordered that the first meeting of the Grand Chapter should be held at Middletown, Connecticut, on the third Wednesday of September next ensuing.

On that day the Grand Chapter met, but the Grand Secretary and Grand Chaplain were the only Grand Officers present. The Grand King was represented by a proxy. The Grand Chapter, however, proceeded to an election of Grand Officers, and the old officers were elected. The Body then adjourned to meet in January, 1799, at Providence, Rhode Island.

On January 9, 1799, the Grand Chapter met at Providence, the Deputy Grand Chapters of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New York being represented. At this meeting, the Constitution was very considerably modified, and the Grand Chapter assumed the title of The General Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons for the six Northern States enumerated in the preamble. The meetings were directed to be held septennially; and the Deputy Grand Chapters were in future to be called State Grand Chapters. No attempt was, however, made in words to extend the jurisdiction of the General Grand Chapter beyond the States already named.

On January 9, 1806, a meeting of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter was held at Middletown, representatives being present from the States of Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, and New York. The Constitution was again revised. The title was for the first time assumed of The General Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons for the United States of America, and jurisdiction was extended over the whole country. This year may, therefore, be considered as the true date of the establishment of the General Grand Chapter. In 1826 the septennial meetings were abolished, and the General Grand Chapter has ever since met triennially. The General Grand Chapter consists of the present and past Grand High Priests, Deputy Grand High Priests, Grand Kings and Scribes of the State Grand Chapters, and the Past Grand General Officers. The officers are a General Grand High Priest, Deputy General Grand High Priest, General Grand King, General Grand Scribe, General Grand Treasurer, General Grand Secretary, General Grand Chaplain, General Grand Captain of the Host, and General Grand Royal Arch Captain. It originally possessed large prerogatives, extending even to the suspension of Grand Chapters; but by its present organization it has "no power of discipline, admonition, censure, or instruction over the Grand Chapters, nor any legislative powers whatever not specially granted" by its Constitution. It may, indeed, be considered as scarcely more than a great Masonic Congress meeting every three years for consultation. But even with these restricted powers, it is capable of doing much good.

GENERAL GRAND HIGH PRIEST. The presiding officer of the General Grand Chapter of the United States of America. He is elected every third year by the General Grand Chapter. The title was first assumed in 1799, although the General Grand Chapter did not at that time extend its jurisdiction beyond six of the Northern States.

GENERAL GRAND LODGE. Ever since the Grand Lodges of the United States of America began, at the commencement of the Revolutionary War, to abandon their dependence on the Grand Lodges of England and Scotland—that is to say, as soon as they emerged from the subordinate position of Provincial Grand Lodges and were compelled to assume a sovereign and independent character—attempts have, from time to time, been made by members of the Craft to destroy this sovereignty of the State Grand Lodges, and to institute in its place a superintending power, to be constituted either as a Grand Master of North America or as a General Grand Lodge of the United States. Led, perhaps, by the analogy of the united Colonies under one federal head, or, in the very commencement of the Revolutionary struggle, controlled by long habits of dependence on the Mother Grand Lodges of Europe, the contest had no sooner begun, and a disseverance of political relations between England and America taken place, than the attempt was made to institute the office of Grand Master of the United States, the object being—of which there can hardly be a doubt—to invest Washington with the distinguished dignity.

The effort emanated, it appears, with the Military Lodges in the Army. Provincial Grand Master John Rowe, of the then dormant Saint John's Grand Lodge of Boston, had granted a Charter to American Union Lodge, "now erected at Roxbury, or wherever your body shall remove on the continent of America, provided it is where no Grand Master is appointed." This Lodge was part of the American Army which, toward the close of the year 1779, took up winter quarters at Morristown, New Jersey. The Minute Book of this Military Lodge, covering the period from February 5, 1779, to April 23, 1783, has been preserved and published (see Early Records of Freemasonry in Connecticut, by E. G. Storer). From it we learn that the Festival of Saint John the Evangelist was celebrated in camp at Morristown, December 27, 1779. A large number of Brothers assembled on that occasion, among them being George Washington and others prominent in the councils of the Army. A petition addressed to the several Provincial Grand Masters was formulated at this meeting. The document set forth the deplorable condition of Freemasonry in America, and urged action looking to the unification of the Fraternity and the appointment of a Grand Master for the United States. The reasons for such suggestion are thus given:
With sincere regret we contemplate the misfortunes of war which have unhappily separated us from the Grand Lodge of Europe, and deprived us of the benefits arising therefrom, so essentially necessary for the well-being of Masonry, and which has in many instances been the cause of very serious inconvenience to our Brothers. At the same time we lament that political disputes and national quarrels should influence the exercise of charity and benevolence, and their several virtues, so necessary for the present and future happiness. Yet, considering the present situation of our Lodges, and Masonry in general, the necessity for the honor of the Craft, and the importance of enjoying the benefits of so valuable an institution at so favorable a period, we have endeavored to make for correcting the present irregularities, restoring peace and harmony to the Lodges, for opening a way to the enjoyment of the fruits of Benevolence, Charity and Brotherly Love, and for the re-establishment of the Order on the ancient and respectable foundation, which we conceive can never be done more effectually than by the appointment of a Grand Master in and over the United States of America.

We therefore most earnestly request that the present Provincial Grand Masters in the respective United States, would take some measures for the appointment of a Grand Master in and over the said thirteen United States of America, either by nominating a person proper for that office, whose abilities and rank in life shall answer the importance of that conspicuous and elevated station, and transmitting such nomination to our Mother Lodge, or in such other manner as shall to them appear most eligible. And we further beg leave to express our wishes, that the several Provincial Grand Masters in these States would, at the same date, unite, in adopting and vigorously measures for checking the growing irregularities in the Society, cementing the different branches, erasing the distinction between Ancient and Modern in the Craft, that the Craft may be established in unanimity, the established principles of its institutions more universally extended, and that our conduct may not only be the admiration of men in this world, but receive the final applause of the Grand Architect of the Universe in the other, where there is nothing but Light and Love.

In pursuance of action taken at this meeting the Masonic organizations of the Army appointed members of a Committee to consider the foregoing petition. The Committee, thus constituted, met as "a Convention Lodge from the different lines of the Army and the Departments, held in due form under the authority of the American Union Lodge, at Morristown, the 6th day of March, in the year of Salvation 1780." As a result of its labors the following report was presented and adopted (see Origin of Masonry in the State of New Jersey, Trenton, 1870):

To the Right Worshipful the Grand Masters of the Several Lodges in the Respective United States of America: UNION

The subscribers, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons in convention, to you, as the patrons and protectors of the Craft upon the continent, prefer their humble address.

As far as the distinctions of interest, the political views and national disputes existing between Great Britain and these United States have involved us, not only in the general calamities that disturb the tranquility in Britain, that have in this our happy state, but in a peculiar manner affects our society, by separating us from the Grand Mother Lodge in Europe, by disturbing our connection with each other, impeding the progress and preventing the perfection of Masonry in America.

We deplore the miseries of our countrymen, and particularly lament the distresses which many of our Brothers in the Southern States have suffered, and the temporary relief as for the want of a source of light to govern their pursuits and illustrate the path of happiness. And we ardently desire to restore, if possible, that fountain of charity from which, to the unspeakable benefit of mankind, comes benevolence and love. Considering with anxiety these disputes, and the many irregularities and improprieties committed by weak or wicked Brethren, which too manifestly show the present dissipated and almost abandoned condition of our lodges in America, as well as the relaxation of virtue amongst individuals.

We think it our duty, Right Worshipful Brothers and Seniors in the Craft, to solicit your immediate interposition to put a stop to the danger of schism and apostasy. To obtain security from these fatal evils, with affectionate humility we beg leave to recommend the adopting and pursuing the most necessary measures for establishing one Grand Lodge in America, to preside over and govern all other Lodges of whatever degree or denomination, licensed or to be licensed, upon this Continent; that the ancient principles and discipline of Masonry being restored, we may mutually and universally enjoy the advantages arising from frequent communion and social intercourse. To accomplish this beneficial and essential work, permit us to propose that you, the Right Worshipful Grand Masters, or a majority of your number, may nominate as Most Worshipful Grand Master of said lodge a Brother whose merit and capacity may be adequate to a station so elevated and important, and transmitting the name and nomination of such Brother, together with the name of the Lodge to be established, to our Grand Mother Lodge in Europe for approbation and confirmation, and that you adopt and execute, by the Lodge, such measures as may appear most eligible for preventing impositions, correcting abuses and for establishing the general principles of Masonry, etc.

In the interval of these two meetings of Army Freemasons at Morristown the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania convened a "Grand Lodge of Emergency," January 13, 1780, to consider the subject of a supreme Governing Body for the American Craft. "From the records," wrote the late Josiah H. Drummond (see Symbolic Masonry in the United States), "it might well be inferred that the movements by the Lodge and the Grand Lodge were entirely independent of each other; but Morristown, where the Lodge met, is sufficiently near Philadelphia to justify the influence that this action was soon known to the Grand Lodge; and as the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge, in his letter to the Grand Master of Massachusetts, says, 'It has been a measure long wished for among the Brethren especially in the Army, and from them the request came originally to us,' it is quite certain that the movement by the Grand Lodge was in consequence of the action of this Lodge."

There is here a slight discrepancy of dates, which may affect by a few days the question of priority of action by these two Bodies. Brother Julius F. Sachse has this in the preface to his account of the "Emergent" meeting at Philadelphia (see Freemasonry in Pennsylvania, 1727-1907, volume i, page 96):

Washington, from his affiliation with our Pennsylvania Grand Lodge, was naturally in the South and when his brethren in Pennsylvania, and from almost the very day of the procession to Christ Church, in Philadelphia, on Saint John the Evangelist's Day, 1779, in which Washington participated, his name was suggested as a General Grand Master and Lodge in America, Colonies. The movement continued to find favor amongst the Craft, and culminated in a motion to that effect at a General Grand Communication of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, December 26, 1779.

As stated above, the first meeting at Morristown was held December 27, 1779. Brother Sachse's last quoted statement, therefore, gives priority of action to the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, but against this is the statement of the Grand Secretary of Pennsylvania of the time, as quoted above, that the first motion came to Grand Lodge from Brothers in the Army. The point, however, is of minor, even negligible, importance. The action was almost simultaneous, was presumably concerted, and reveals the sentiment of the time as favoring a national governing Body, and an equally strong sentiment favoring Washington as the first General Grand Master. Still following Brother Sachse's reproduction of the old records of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, we have this of the "Emergent" session of that Body:

The Lodge being called to order by the Grand Master, upon the request of sundry Brothers, and also in pursuance of a motion made at the last General Communication, to consider the United States as well as the necessity of appointing a Grand Master over all the Grand Lodges formed or to be formed in these United States, as the consequence whereof the rules of Masonry require cannot now be carried on with the Grand Lodge of London, under whose jurisdiction the Grand Lodges in these States were originally constituted; the ballot was put upon the question: Whether it is for the benefit of the Brethren, and Grand Master of Masons throughout the United States, shall be now nominated on the part of this Grand Lodge; and it was unanimously determined in the affirmative.

Sundry respectable Brethren being then put in nomination, it was moved that the ballot be put for them separately, and His Excellency George Washington, Esquire, General and Commander-in-Chief of the Army, it having been a measure long wished for among the Brethren, especially in the army, and from them the request came originally to us, that we might improve the opportunity which our central situation gave us of setting this measure on foot.

From these considerations, joined to an earnest desire of advancing and doing honor to Masonry, and not from any affectation of superiority or of dictating to any of the Brethren, we have prepared this proposition communicated to you from the Grand Lodge of this State.

The Lodge being called to order by the Grand Master, was as follows:

Boston, September 4, 1780.

Sir—Your agreeable favor of the 19th ult. I duly received the 31st, covering a printed abstract of the proceedings of your Grand Lodge. I had received one before, near three months, from the Master of a travelling Lodge of the Connecticut line, but not coming officially, did not lay it before the Grand Lodge, but the evening after I received yours, it being Grand Lodge, I laid it before and had some debate on it, whereupon it was agreed to adjourn the Lodge for three weeks, to the 22d inst., likewise to write to all the Lodges under this jurisdiction to attend themselves, if convenient, by their Masters and Wardens, and if not, to give instructions to their proxies here concerning their acquiescence in the proposition communicated to you from the Grand Lodge of this State.

We are happy to find that you agree with us in the necessity of having one complete Masonic Jurisdiction, under some one grand head throughout the United States. to grant a Charter to the Lodge, taking it under his royal protection, at the same time investing the new Grand Master with an emblazoned fane cloak, after which he was presented by the Grand Lodge, clothed in the mantle of his new dignity, and there received the compliments of all the members, who, according to their rank, were admittance to kiss the hand, sceptre or medal, struck to perpetuate the memory of this solemnity, which was thereafter received by all the Lodges, either Provincial or Independent that existed in Pennsylvania, and recognized the Moderns as Masons, and it had endeavored for years to establish mutual visitation with the Lodges under the Saint John's Grand Lodge. When the correspondence took place, the Grand Lodges of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts were all the Antient Grand Lodges, either Provincial or Independent that existed in the state of activity in America. Pennsylvania contemplated the formation of the National organization by those two Grand Lodges, unless it should appear that there were other Antient Grand Lodges in the country. But Massachusetts evidently contemplated the union of all the Grand Lodges, whether Antient or Modern, the postponement of the matter for such a purpose was equivalent to an absolute rejection of the plan of Pennsylvania.
But the attempt to form a General Grand Lodge, although, on this occasion, unsuccessful, was soon to be renewed. In 1790, the proposition was again made by the Grand Lodge of Georgia, and here, true to the Roman axiom, Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis, Times change and we change with them, the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania became the opponent of the measure, and declared it to be impracticable.
From that time the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania set itself against any attempts to revivify the movement of Freemasonry in the infant States, and also reveals how vague was the knowledge of the Craft, its traditions and its history possessed by the leaders and spokesmen of their time. Brother Joseph E. Mor-combe published in the American Freemason (from November, 1909, to October, 1910, inclusive), a discussion of the various attempts at forming a General or National Grand Lodge in the United States of America. To these essays we are indebted for many particulars of this important movement.

Doctor Mackey thought it possible that there was some concert of action between the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania and the Freemasons at Morristown.
Perhaps, the initiative having been taken by the latter in December, the former determined to give its influence, in January, to the final recommendations which were to be made in the following February.
All this, however, although plausible, is but conjecture. Nothing appears to have resulted from the action of either Body. A further documentary reference to the subject is the declaration of a Convention held in 1785, to organize a Grand Lodge of Masons in the United States, and it is said that "another Grand Lodge was requisite before an election could be had of a Grand Master for the United States."

Brother Josiah H. Drummond, writing of the failure of the Grand Lodges of Pennsylvania and Massaachusetts to agree on the project of a General Grand Lodge, throws some needed light upon the subject.
He refers the plan, indeed, in its motive, to the strife or jealousy then existing between Antients and Moderns, and says:
The Massachusetts Grand Lodge was not willing to adopt the plan proposed by American Union Lodge, even as modified by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, without the concurrence of other Grand Lodges, and as their sentiments could not then be ascertained, consideration of the matter was postponed "until a general peac-shall happily take place through the Continent." This action of Massachusetts was more significant than at first appears. The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania was an Antient Grand Lodge, and the members of its obedien-ced did not recognize the Moderns as regular Masons; it proposed to limit the National organization to Antient Grand Lodges, and it had endeavored for years to establish mutual visitation with the Lodges under the Saint John's Grand Lodge. When the correspondence took place, the Grand Lodges of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts were all the Antient Grand Lodges, either Provincial or Independent that existed in the state of activity in America. Pennsylvania contemplated the formation of the National organization by those two Grand Lodges, unless it should appear that there were other Antient Grand Lodges in the country. But Massachusetts evidently contemplated the union of all the Grand Lodges, whether Antient or Modern, the postponement of the matter for such a purpose was equivalent to an absolute rejection of the plan of Pennsylvania.

But the attempt to form a General Grand Lodge, although, on this occasion, unsuccessful, was soon to be renewed. In 1790, the proposition was again made by the Grand Lodge of Georgia, and here, true to the Roman axiom, Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis, Times change and we change with them, the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania became the opponent of the measure, and declared it to be impracticable.
From that time the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania set itself against any attempts to revivify the move-
Carolina, and with a like want of success. Again made in 1803, by the Grand Lodge of North Carolina, a proposition for holding a Convention, although they believed the scheme of a "Superintending Grand Lodge of America." The reasons assigned by the Grand Lodge of Georgia declared itself as favoring a General Grand Lodge, and out a circular letter to other Jurisdictions proposing its establishment, upon receipt of which the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania resolved unanimously—

That the constituting of a Federal or Supreme Grand Lodge, to have jurisdiction over the respective Grand Lodges throughout the Continent, as proposed by the R. W. Grand Lodge of Georgia, is inexpedient and appears impracticable; but that a Convention of Deputies from the several Grand Lodges of the United States for the purpose of forming a more intimate union and establishing a regular and permanent intercourse betwixt the said Grand Lodges, would be highly advantageous to the Fraternity, and that Grand Lodge will appoint Deputies to such Convention for the aforesaid purposes.

Again, in 1799, the Grand Lodge of South Carolina renewed the proposition, and recommended a Convention to be held at the City of Washington for the purpose of establishing a "Superintending Grand Lodge of America." The reasons assigned by the Grand Lodge of South Carolina for making this proposition are set forth in the circular which is issued on receipt of which the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania resolved unanimously—

To draw closer the bonds of union between the different Lodges of the United States, and to induce them to join in some systematic plan whereby the drooping spirit of the Ancient Craft may be revived and become more generally useful and beneficial, and whereby Ancient Masonry, so excellent and beautiful in its primitive institution, may be placed upon such a respectable and firm basis in this western world as to bid defiance to the shafts of malice or the feeble attempts of any foreign dissemblers to bring it into disrepute.

The allusion here is to the Abbé Barruel, who had just published his abusive and anti-Masonic History of Jacobinism. Several Grand Lodges acceded to the proposition for holding a Convention, although they believed the scheme of a "Superintending Grand Lodge" inexpedient and impracticable; but they were willing to send delegates for the purpose of producing uniformity in the Masonic system. The Convention, however, did not assemble.

Again, in 1806, the subject of a General Grand Lodge was again presented to the consideration of the Grand Lodges of the Union, and propositions were made for Conventions to be held in Philadelphia in 1807, and in Washington City in 1808, neither of which was con-vened. The Proceedings of the various Grand Lodges in the years 1806, 1807, and 1808 contain allusions to this subject, most of them in favor of a Convention to introduce uniformity, but unfavorable to the permanent establishment of a General Grand Lodge. North Carolina, however, in 1807, expressed the opinion that "a National Grand Lodge should possess controlling and corrective powers over all Grand Lodges under its jurisdiction."

An unsuccessful attempt was again made to hold a Convention at Washington in January, 1811, "for the purpose of forming a Superintending Grand Lodge of America." After the failure of this effort, the Grand Lodge of North Carolina, which seems to have been earnest in its endeavors to accomplish its favorite object, again proposed a Convention, to be convoked at Washington in 1812. But the effort, like all which had preceded it, proved abortive. No Convention was held.

The effort seems now, after all these discouraging attempts, to have been laid upon the shelf for nearly ten years. At length, however, the effort for a Convention which had so often failed was destined to meet with partial success, and one rather extemporaneous in its character was held in Washington. In the National Intelligencer of March 9, 1822, there appeared the following notice:

Masonic Notice. Those members of Congress who belong to the Masonic Fraternity, and those visitors of the city who are or have been members of any State Grand Lodge are respectfully invited to attend a meeting, to be held in the Senate Chamber this evening at seven o'clock, to take into consideration matters of general interest to the Masonic institution.

In answer to this invitation, as stated in the rare pamphlet preserved by the Grand Lodge of Iowa,

A number of members of Congress, and strangers, assembled at the Capitol, in the City of Washington, on March 9, 1822. Brother Thomas R. Ross of Ohio was appointed Chairman, and Brother William Darlington, Member of Congress, of Pennsylvania, Secretary, and it was unanimously resolved, That it be proposed to the several Grand Lodges in the United States to take the subject into their respective consideration at their next Annual Communications; and that, if they approve of the formation of a General Grand Lodge, it be recommended to them to appoint one or more Delegates, to assemble in the City of Washington, on the second Monday of February next, to agree on the organization of such a Grand Lodge.

Resolved, That if two-thirds of the Grand Lodges within the United States concur in the propriety of establishing a General Grand Lodge, it be recommended to them to instruct their representatives to proceed to the formation of a Constitution of a General Grand Lodge, to be subsequently submitted to the several Grand Lodges in the Union, for their ratification, and which, being ratified by a majority of them, shall be considered as thenceforth binding on all the Grand Lodges assenting thereto.

Resolved, That the Most Worshipful John Marshall, of Virginia, Henry Clay, of Kentucky; William H. Winder of Maryland; William S. Cardell of New York; Joel Abbott of Georgia; John Holes of Maine; John H. Eaton of Tennessee; William W. Sexton of Washington; Christopher Rankin of Mississippi; Thomas R. Ross of Ohio; H. G. Burton of North Carolina, and the Rev. Theonius M. Harris, D. D., of Massachusetts, be, and they hereby are, appointed a Committee to open a correspondence with the respective Grand Lodges within the United States, and to take such measures therein, as they may deem expedient to carry the aforesaid resolutions into effect.
The Committee, in performing the duty thus imposed upon it, issued an address to the Masonic Fraternity of the United States. Henry Clay of Kentucky, was the Chairman, and it is not doubted that the brilliant sentences which make up this address are from his pen. The full text of this document, apart from its connection with our subject, deserves to be read by the present generation of Freemasons.

The address follows:

The Committee, in complying with the above resolutions, are aware that a meeting of individual Masons, however respectable and of good repute, would delegate no regular authority in behalf of the Masonic Body, and if they could, it was unnecessary. This paper will therefore be understood as it is intended, a proceeding originated by the Committee, to adopt some mode by which the general views of Masons in the different States of the American Union may be ascertained. The history of the Masonic Institutions in that, though established among various nations, it was, in each country, confined to a comparatively small number. The jurisdiction exercised by Grand Lodges, like almost every exertion of power or of moral influence, was concentrated in the different capital cities. There were few numbers, and their connection with the supreme head was very direct. Till within a recent period, it is believed, no great number of Lodges have been united under a single Jurisdiction. This... work in the Lodges became more and more glaring. It was realized that some sort of standard should be set, or otherwise the eccentricities of conceits of individuals might be perpetuated to the injury of the Craft. Brother Morcombe says it is true that "uniformity of work" was, at the time mentioned, and has been since, a fetish, and the letter of Freemasonry was exalted to the position of all-importance, while the spirit of the Institution was neglected and in many cases entirely lost sight of.

With the object of fixing a Standard Work, the Grand Lodge of Alabama in 1841 urged an assemblage of delegates, accredited from the various jurisdictions, "to decide upon a uniform mode of work for the Grand Lodges of the United States and for the making of other lawful regulations for the interest and security of the Craft." With this object in view representatives gathered at Washington on Monday, March 7, 1842, from the Grand Lodges of Maryland, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, District of Columbia, Connecticut, Alabama, and Virginia. Delegates appeared also from the Grand Lodge of Michigan, but their credentials were not recognized, because of the then alleged irregularity of that Body. Of this Convention Brother Charles Gilman of Maryland was chosen President and Brother John Dove of Virginia, Secretary. After sessions covering four days the representatives were able to do little beyond passing a series of rather conventional resolutions, and recommended the appointment of Grand Lecturers, who should meet and agree upon instruction to be given.

There was at this gathering no mention of a General Grand Lodge, at least as recorded in the published proceedings. But judging from the Grand Lodges participating and the distinguished Brothers who constituted the Convention, we cannot avoid a conclusion that one of the motives was to familiarize American Freemasons with national gatherings of Craftsmen, to the end that a way might be prepared for a governing body embracing the whole of the Fraternity in the United States. An account of the Convention is detailed in Schultz's History of Freemasonry in Maryland, which work also deals at length with the propositions for a General Grand Lodge in the United States.

As a result of this Convention, and of the resolution that the first meeting of said Grand Lecturers be held in the city of Baltimore on the second Monday in May, 1843, such meeting convened on the date named. Brother John Dove of Virginia was made President; Brother the Rev. Albert Case of South Carolina, Secretary. It assembled May 8, 1843, the following Grand Lodges being represented: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Ohio, District of Columbia, Missouri, Alabama, Tennessee. Thus sixteen of the twenty-three Grand Lodges of the United States sent delegates to a gathering which had as the objects—

I. To produce uniformity of Masonic work.
II. To recommend such measures as shall tend to the elevation of the Order to its due degree of respect throughout the world at large.

As result of the deliberations an authorized form of monitorial work was prepared and disseminated, which for years was referred to as "the Baltimore Work," and enjoyed some measure of authority.

But again there is no mention made of a General Grand Lodge, though by these two gatherings the way had been prepared. The subject was again brought to the attention of the Fraternity by the Grand Lodge of Maryland, which Body, at its Communication in May, 1845, invited its sister Grand Lodges to meet in Convention at Baltimore on September 23, 1847, for the purpose of reporting a Constitution of a General Grand Lodge. This Convention met at the appointed time and place, but only seven Grand Lodges were represented by twice that number of Delegates. A Constitution was formed for a "Supreme Grand Lodge of the United States," which was submitted for approval or rejection to the Grand Lodges of the Union.

The opinion expressed of that Constitution by the Grand Lodge of Ohio, "that it embraced, in several of its sections, indefinite and unmeaning powers, to which it was impossible to give a definite construction, and that it gave a jurisdiction to the body which that Grand Lodge would in no event consent to," seems to have been very generally concurred in by the other Grand Bodies, and the "Supreme Grand Lodge of the United States" never went into operation. The formation of its Constitution was its first and its only act.

The next action was by the Grand Lodge of New York, which Body recommended, in 1848, that each of the Grand Lodges should frame the outlines of a General Grand Constitution such as would be acceptable to it, and send it with a Delegate to a Convention to be held at Boston in 1850, at the time of meeting of the General Grand Chapter and General Grand Encampment. The Committee of the Grand Lodge of New York, who made this recommendation, also presented the outlines of a General Grand Constitution. This instrument defines the Jurisdiction of the proposed General Grand Lodge as intended to be "over all controversies and disputes between the different Grand Lodges which may become parties to the compact, when such controversies are referred for decision; and the decisions in all cases to be final when concurred in by a majority of the Grand Lodges present;" but it disclaims all appeals from State Grand Lodges or their subordinates in matters relating to their internal affairs. It is evident that the friends of the measure had abated much of their pretensions since the year 1779, when they wanted a Grand Lodge of America, "to preside over and govern all other Lodges of whatsoever degree or denomination, licensed or to be licensed, on the continent."

The Grand Lodge of Rhode Island also submitted the draft of a General Grand Constitution, more extensive in its details than that presented by New York, but substantially the same in principle. The Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia also concurred in the proposition. The Convention did not, however, meet; for the idea of a Supreme Grand Lodge was still an unpopular one with the Craft. In January, 1850, Texas expressed the general sentiment of the Fraternity when it said: "The formation of a General Grand Lodge will not accomplish the desired end. The same feeling and spirit that now lead to difficulties between the different Grand Lodges would produce insubordination and disobedience of the Edicts of a General Grand Lodge.

But the subject was not allowed to lie dormant. We come next upon an action of the Grand Lodge of Maine. At its Annual Communication for 1851 the Committee on Foreign Correspondence was instructed "to correspond with the several Grand Lodges of the United States, recognized by this Grand Lodge, as such, urging upon them the necessary steps for forming a General Grand Lodge of the United States." In conformity with such instruction the Committee, consisting of Brothers Cyril Pearl, Allen Haines and F. Bradford, presented a report, which is important for our purpose. This was issued as a circular letter, and distributed to the Grand Lodges and their principal officers, that so the matter might be thoroughly discussed and clearly understood.

It will have been noticed so far in this review that the proposals for a General Grand Lodge had come from Grand Lodges in the Southern States, and the chief support of the movement had been from that section. The members of the Grand Lodge of Maine Committee were especially careful to avoid all possible subjects of controversy, setting forth their opinions of the benefits to be derived from a General Grand Lodge, and leaving for a representative gathering any real discussion of the subject. The opening paragraphs of the report merely recited the instructions under which it was prepared, and expressed the natural hesitancy of the Committee as to the best method of procedure. The report, bearing the date of May 6, 1852, then continued:

From the result of efforts thus far made to secure a General Grand Lodge, the Committee were satisfied that nothing could be gained by precipitation, but that if such a body was to be formed, with any prospect of success, it must be a work of time and mature deliberation. It has seemed to them desirable that if another attempt were made to organize such a body, it should be done when this branch of the Masonic Fraternity could be generally and ably represented, and without involving heavy expense to the several State and Local Lodges. It has also seemed desirable that such an attempt should be made when there were no exciting influences or perplexing controversies to disturb the deliberations of a preliminary character, and enlist any of the Grand Lodges against the measure, or against each other. The Committee have also desired to profit by the experience of the General Grand Lodges in the other departments of Masonry, and by whatever light the communications from the several Grand Lodges and Grand Chapters of the Union might incidentally reflect on this subject the present year. They have believed that the most favorable time for attempting an organization would be at the time of the Triennial Meeting of the General Grand Chapter and General Grand Encampment, which Bodies are to assemble at Lexington, Kentucky, in September, 1853.

For these and other reasons, your Committee have thought proper to delay addressing the sister Grand Lodges on the subject till their views could be better matured and submitted to this Grand Lodge; and, if approved, to send them out in connection with the Proceedings of this Annual Communication, and also in the form of a circular, to all the elective officers of the several Grand Lodges of the United States, inviting the early attention and reply of their respective Bodies to this proposition. Such being the views of the Committee, they will indicate briefly the outlines of the question as they have been brought forward.

1. They believe the interests of Freemasonry in our country, in all its departments, would be greatly promoted by the formation of a General Grand Lodge of the United States, with appropriate powers and limitations.

2. That a voice of decided majority of the Grand Lodges of this country has been clearly expressed in favor of such an organization.

3. That the diversities of sentiment as to the precise duties, powers and limitations of such a Body, so far as they have been indicated, are not at all in such a degree of essential agreement on a satisfactory basis, whenever a suitable meeting of delegates can be assembled.

4. That the progress already made in the settlement of long-standing difficulties in some of the States, is one of the most encouraging evidences that a General Grand Lodge may be harmoniously and successfully organized.

5. If all the difficulties of Jurisdiction and the intestine strifes in the several States could be healed, so far from diminishing the necessity for a General Grand Lodge the difficulties in the way of its organization would be removed, and the way successfully opened for its beneficial career.

6. That such an organization is highly desirable, that it may complete our national Masonic organization, and co-operate successfully with the other national Bodies—the General Grand Chapter and General Grand Encampment. Such an organization should hold its sessions in connection with the other two, and in some cases the same individuals should represent each department under both the Grand and the General Grand Bodies, and they would be shared equitably by their several Bodies. In this way all the interest of Masonry would be brought into notice, and in a way most likely to harmonize and promote the interests of Masonry and its prosperity. The progress of a gathering of the Masonic family, in all its branches, would bring together Masons of high character, talent and moral worth, familiar with the wants of the various departments of the Order, to the promotion of whose interests the happiest results might be anticipated from their labors.

7. Your Committee believe that such an organization, with proper regulations, would be of great value, not only to the Masonic Fraternity in this country, but to the interests of our Order throughout the world. It would be the center of correspondence for all the Grand Lodges of the world, and a Masonic union of these United States would present to our Brethren of all lands, a most happy illustration of our national motto, E pluribus unum out of many, one.

In conclusion the Committee suggests that such an organization, meeting regularly with the General Grand Chapter and General Grand Encampment, and bringing together from all parts of the country noble-minded men, imbued with the spirit of Masonry, and charged with the responsibilities of legislating for its welfare, should have as its central object the establishment of a National Grand Lodge, consisting of Brothers Cyril Pearl, Allen Haines and F. Bradford. It was approved by Grand Lodge, and was thereupon sent out to all the governing Bodies of American Freemasonry. From the arguments, admissions and inferences of the foregoing document we become aware of a new factor in the controversy. The national Bodies of allied or concordant organizations are constantly referred to, their examples are quoted with emphatic approval, and there is manifested a desire that "Masonry, in all its departments," should progress along identical lines. We find, as a result of the invitation extended by the Grand Lodge of Maine, several of the sister Bodies took favorable action. Delegates were appointed by these, principally New England Jurisdictions. The Convention met at Lexington, Kentucky, September 17, 1853, and Grand Lodges of Alabama, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, New York, Ohio, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Vermont, were represented.

This report is signed by Brothers Cyril Pearl, Allen Haines and F. Bradford. It was approved by Grand Lodge, and was thereupon sent out to all the governing Bodies of American Freemasonry. From the arguments, admissions and inferences of the foregoing document we become aware of a new factor in the controversy. The national Bodies of allied or concordant organizations are constantly referred to, their examples are quoted with emphatic approval, and there is manifested a desire that "Masonry, in all its departments," should progress along identical lines. Nathan B. Haswell, Grand Master of Vermont, was chosen as President of the Convention, with Brothers John L. Lewis, Jr., of New York, and Eliphalet Storrs of Connecticut as Secretaries. The President of the Convention stated the objects of meeting to be the "consideration of a suitable plan to be presented for a National Grand Lodge, an Confederation of Grand Lodges of the Masonic Fraternity in the United States, for the speedy and final adjustment and decision of matters in difference, which may arise between the various Grand Lodges—to promote uniformity in work, and to cultivate the general good of the Fraternity." The proceedings of this Convention were brief, being concluded in two short sessions. A Committee was raised to propose a definite plan, constituted of the following named Brothers: Most Worshipful A. B. Thompson, Maine; Most Worshipful William Field, Rhode Island; Most Worshipful Benjamin B. French, District of Columbia; Most Worshipful David Clark, Connecticut, and Right Worshipful John L. Lewis, Jr., New York. This Committee submitted the following report:

The Committee appointed by the Delegates of several Grand Lodges of the United States, assembled in Convention at Lexington, Kentucky, September, 1853, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposition submitted by the Grand Lodge of Maine, to form a General Grand Lodge of the United States, having duly considered the proposition, ask to leave to report:

That in their opinion it is inexpedient at this time to attempt the formation of a General Grand Lodge, but, from a free interchange of opinion among the Delegates assembled, you your Committee believe that a proposition for a National Confederation for specific objects, would meet the approbation of the several Grand Lodges of the Union. They therefore submit the following plan:

First—That all matters of difficulty which may hereafter arise in any Grand Lodge, or between two or more Grand Bodies of the same Order, which cannot, by their own action, be satisfactorily adjusted or disposed of, shall, if the importance of the case or the common welfare of the Fraternity demand it, be submitted to Grand Bodies, the approbation of the several Grand Lodges of the Union, as specifically stated by the Lexington Convention. Such a Committee was accordingly erected, consisting of Brothers Clopton, King, Smith, Ames, and Gilman.

Second—That from and after the adoption of the foregoing proposition by two thirds of the several Grand Lodges, its provision shall be considered radical, and all matters therein contemplated for adjustment shall then and thereafter take the course prescribed.

Resolved: That each of the Grand Lodges be requested to adopt a resolution, if they acceed to the proposed measure, pledging themselves to abide by the concurrent decisions of two thirds of the several Grand Lodges, relating to all matters submitted to their action.

For the purpose of further maturing the plan for the proposed Confederation, your Committee propose that the several Grand Lodges be respectfully requested to send one or more Delegates each to a Convention to be held at Washington, District of Columbia, on the first Wednesday of January, 1855, to consider such propositions as may be submitted by the several Grand Lodges in relation thereto. The Committee further recommends that the proceedings of this Convention be officially communicated to the several Grand Lodges of the United States.

As suggested by the Lexington Convention, another gathering of leaders of the American Craft was held at Washington on Wednesday, January 3, 1855. David Clopton, Past Grand Master of Alabama, was chosen President, with Finlay W. King, Senior Grand Warden of New York, as Secretary. The Vice-Presidents were Charles Gilman and Benjamin B. French, Past Grand Masters of Maryland and the District of Columbia respectively. The Committee on Credentials reported the Grand Lodges that were represented, and by Brothers, as follows:

California—Milton S. Latham; James A. McDougall, District of Columbia—Benjamin B. French, P.G.M.; William B. Magruder, P.G.M.; Charles S. Frailey, G.M.
Maryland—Charles Gilman, P.G.M.
Michigan—Albert C. Smith, P.G.S.
Minnesota—Alfred E. Ames, District of Columbia—Benjamin B. French, P.G.M.; Finlay M. King, S.G.W.; James H. Perry, Grand Chaplain; James M. Austin.

Immediately upon opening the Convention the subject matter of the meeting was brought forward in a resolution offered by the Michigan Delegate, as follows:

Resolved: That to form a more perfect union, establish uniformity, insure domestic as well as foreign Masonic tranquility, and secure for the blessings flowing from the perpetuity and diffusion of the principles embraced in the ancient ritual of the Order, it is eminently expedient to organize a Federative National Head, with well-defined and limited powers, reserving to the several Grand Lodges, or to the Fraternity, all powers, privileges and prerogatives not expressly deputed.

For this a substitute was offered, and prevailed, that the whole matter involved be referred to a Committee of five, with the President of the Convention as chairman, "to mature the plan of a Confederation, as contemplated by the Lexington Convention." Such a Committee was accordingly erected, consisting of Brothers Clopton, King, Smith, Ames, and Gilman.

Pending the formulation of their report a communication was read from Brothers Nathan B. Haswell and Philip C. Tucker, Past Grand Masters of Vermont. These had been appointed Delegates from their Grand Lodge, but were unable to attend. This document indicates the reservations suggested to the minds of these distinguished Freemasons. The Convention was warned that the only authority to be conferred upon the Confederation, as specifically stated by the Lexington gathering, was to settle "all matters of difficulty which may arise in any Grand Lodge, or between two or more Grand Bodies of the same Order, which cannot, by their own action, be satisfactorily adjusted or disposed of." The writers are careful to point out that the words Grand Bodies can apply only to Grand Lodges. The letter thus concludes:

It is, we think, entirely obvious, that to carry out the plan proposed, to the efficiency of which it aims, particular care will be required in establishing the details for its practical action. Who or what Bodies are to decide when the importance of the case or the common welfare of the Fraternity demand that action is necessary, under the confederate regulations, and what shall be the manner of proceeding to bring about that action, are things important to be specified with clearness, and appear to us to present strong difficulties in their satisfactory adjustment.

Upon the day following its appointment the Committee on Plan was ready with its report. This formulates a plan for a Court of Final Appeal and Arbitration, without power to interfere between disputants unless specially invoked.
PREAMBLE—For the purpose of establishing a unity of interest among the Grand Lodges of the United States—a unity of design and purpose—and of securing mutual confidence between them, and promoting the general welfare of the Fraternity, said Grand Lodges do ordain and establish the following

ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION

I. All matters of difficulty which may hereafter arise in any Grand Lodge, or between two or more Grand Lodges of the United States, which cannot, by their own action, be satisfactorily adjusted or disposed of, shall, if the importance of the case, or the common welfare of the Fraternity demand it, be submitted, with accompanying evidence and documents, to the several Grand Lodges in their individual capacities, and the concurrent decision thereon of two-thirds of the whole number, officially communicated, shall be held authoritative and binding upon each and every member of the Confederacy

II. When any matter of difficulty shall arise, in any Grand Lodge, belonging to this Confederacy, between such Grand Lodge and its subordinates, of a revolutionary character, and when any difficulty, if it have arisen in any Grand Lodge, or between two or more Grand Lodges, as mentioned in Article I, it shall be so submitted upon the request or direction of either of the Grand Lodges immediately interested therein.

III. Any member of the Confederacy shall have the right to submit to the several members of the same any question of Masonic jurisprudence, or Masonic action, contemplated within its own Jurisdiction, which may be deemed of sufficient importance to call the united opinions of the members thereof; and in all such cases, the like action shall be had by the said Grand Lodges, as is herein provided in other cases, and the decision thereupon shall be conclusive.

IV. Each Grand Lodge belonging to this Confederacy shall take action upon the matter so submitted to it, and make a decision thereupon at its first annual communication after having received such evidence and documents relating thereto as shall have been received; unless for want of time or information it shall be unable to arrive at a decision, and in this case it shall have until the next Annual Communication, at which time a decision shall be made.

V. When any matter of difficulty shall have arisen in any Grand Lodge, or between two or more Grand Lodges, as mentioned in Articles II and III, the Grand Lodge submitting such difficulty, or the Grand Lodge or Grand Lodges, as the case may be, shall notify the other party or parties concerned therein, of its intention to submit the same to the Confederacy, and in case of the omission, neglect or refusal of such other party or parties to supply the evidence and documents, to the said Grand Lodge, or between two or more Grand Lodges, the Grand Lodge or Grand Lodges of the United States, which cannot, by their united opinions of the members thereof; and in all such cases, the like action shall be had by the said Grand Lodges, as is herein provided in other cases, and the decision thereupon shall be conclusive.

VI. Each Grand Lodge belonging to this Confederacy shall take action upon the matter so submitted to it, and make a decision thereupon at its first annual communication after having received such evidence and documents relating thereto as shall have been received; unless for want of time or information it shall be unable to arrive at a decision, and in this case it shall have until the next Annual Communication, at which time a decision shall be made.

VII. These Articles may be altered, amended or revised, by proposition in writing, submitted by any Grand Lodge, or Grand Lodges, to a majority of two thirds of the Grand Lodges in this Confederacy; and such alteration, revision or amendment shall be operative and binding upon each and every member of the Confederacy from the time of its adoption, in manner as aforesaid.
This document set forth the need of closer union and increased harmony among American Grand Lodges, and the necessity "to extend our knowledge of the History, Work, Symbolism, Philosophy and Jurisprudence of Craft Masonry." To bring about this very desirable result it was proposed to form the various Bodies into a "North American Masonic Congress." To this Body three Delegates should be chosen from each assenting Grand Lodge. The Congress, when fully organized, was to maintain three permanent Committees—on International Correspondence; Work, Symbolism and Philosophy; Jurisprudence, Masonic History and Antiquities. It was further proposed that this Congress triennially, in such place as might be determined. The scope of the Body was, also, "to take cognizance of all cases of difference which may occur between two or more Grand Lodges; provided the parties shall mutually submit the said difference for decision." It was further intended that the Congress should "consult and advise on questions of Masonic law," that so, in course of time, uniformity of law and usage might prevail. Further, the triennial meetings were to be made notable by presentation of papers and essays on Masonic topics, with discussions thereon. It was provided, further, that this plan of permanent organization should go into effect when five or more Grand Lodges had given in their adhesion to the same. To make all plain to the various Bodies a Committee of Correspondence was constituted and Brother Samuel G. Risk of Louisiana was elected the permanent Secretary.

This Committee on Correspondence prepared an address to the Grand Masters and Grand Lodges, in which was set forth the necessity for a closer union, and urging the plan adopted by the Convention. This effort might have been successful, and the Congress speedily formed, had not the Civil War immediately followed. By that struggle the sections were divided, and Freemasons, like other citizens, went with one or the other side as conscience and patriotic motives dictated. During the years of strife there could be no hope of even meeting as an Association of Grand Lodges of the United States.

There is preserved an interesting correspondence between Brother Cyril Pearl of Maine, and Brother Richard Vaux of Pennsylvania. The former was chairman of the Permanent Committee of the Chicago Convention, and Brother Vaux was at that time, 1862, Chairman of the Committee on Correspondence for the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania. Brother Pearl urged the calling of a national Masonic Convention, "not so much for discussion of the esoteric subjects of ordinary times as for a sincere endeavor to pour the oil of tranquility on the troubled waters of national strife." To this appeal Brother Vaux replied, for his Grand Lodge, expressing opinion that such effort might have been successful, and the Congress speedily formed, when fully organized, was to maintain three permanent Committees—on International Correspondence; Work, Symbolism and Philosophy; Jurisprudence, Masonic History and Antiquities. It was further proposed that this Congress triennially, in such place as might be determined. The opera was billed as "a tragico-farcical ballad opera" and published by "J. Roberts in Warwick Lane, and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster," the third page bearing the following dedication:

To the Right Worshipful the Grand Master, Deputy Grand Master, Grand Wardens, and the rest of the Brethren of the Ancient and Honourable Society of Free and Accepted Masons, this opera is dedicated by Your most obedient and devoted Servant, The Author, a Free-Mason.

The two leading characters in the play are Maris, an English lady, and Sebastian, an English gentleman, who are secretly engaged to each other. When
GEOMETRIAN

GEOMETRY

What do you learn by being a Gentleman Mason?
Secrecy, Morality, and Good-Fellowship.

What do you learn by being an Operative Mason?
Hew, Square, Mould stone, lay a Level, and raise a Perpendicular.

Hence we see that Gentleman Mason was in contrast with Operative Mason.

GENUFECTION. Bending the knees has, in all ages of the world, been considered as an act of reverence and humility, and hence Pliny, the Roman naturalist, observes, that "a certain degree of religious reverence is attributed to the knees of a man." Solomon placed himself in this position when he prayed at the consecration of the Temple; and Freemasons use the same posture in some portions of their ceremonies, as a token of solemn reverence. In Ancient Craft Masonry, during prayer, it is the custom for the members to stand, but in the advanced Degrees, kneeling, and generally on one knee, is the more usual form.

GEOMATIC. See Domatic.

GEOMETRICAL MASTER MASON. A term in use in England during the eighteenth and early in the following century. By the primitive regulations of the Grand Chapter, an applicant for the Royal Arch Degree was required to produce a certificate that he was "a Geometrical Master Mason," and had Passed the Chair. The word Geometrical was, in Doctor Mackey's opinion, thus synonymous with Speculative.

Later researches proved that there was actually a Degree of this name. Brother George W. Speth in 1899 (Transactions, Quator Coronati Lodge, volume xii, page 205) mentions the ritual of the Most Excellent Order of Geometrical Master Masons, as having been about 1819 to 1820 but that the Degree is probably much older. He says there are nine Lectures. Much of the ritual is in very rough verse, archaic, containing allusions to matters which were in use early in the eighteenth century, such as the broached thurnell, which had disappeared from Craft Masonry long before the nineteenth century. On the other hand, much of it will be recognized by members of so-called Higher Degrees as at present in use. The Degree was given apparently after the Three Craft Degrees but is unconnected with the Royal Arch. It was conferred in a Chapter, not in a Lodge, and is Christian throughout.

Both Doctor Mackey and Brother Woodford give the name Geometrical Master Masons in the Encyclopedias for which they are responsible, but neither seems to have realized that it represented an actual Degree.

GEOMETRIC POINTS. In the language of French Freemasonry, this name is given to the four cardinal points of the compass, because they must agree with the four sides of a regular Temple or Lodge. They form a symbol of regularity and perfection.

GEOMETRY. In the modern instructions, geometry is said to be the basis on which the superstructure of Freemasonry is erected; and in the Old Constitutions of the Medieval Freemasons of England the most prominent place of all the sciences is given to geometry, which is made synonymous with Freemasonry. Thus, in the Regius Manuscript, which dates not later than the latter part of the fourteenth century, the Constitutions of Freemasonry are called "the Constitutions of the art of geometry according to Euclid," the words geometry and Masonry being used indifferently throughout the document; and in the Harleian Manuscript, No. 2054, it is said, "thus the craft Geometry was governed there, and that worthy Master (Euclid) gave it the name of Geometry, and it is called Masonry in this land long after." In another part of the same manuscript, it is thus defined: "The fifth science is called Geometry, and it teaches a man to mete and measure of the earth and other things, which science is Masonry." The Egyptians were undoubtedly among the first who cultivated geometry as a science. "It was not less useful and necessary to them," as Goguet observes (Origine des Lois, Origin of the Laws, I, iv, 4), "in the affairs of life, than agreeable to their speculatively philosophical genius." From Egypt, which was the parent both of the sciences and the mysteries of the Pagan world, it passed over into other countries; and geometry and Operative Masonry have ever been found together, the latter carrying into execution those designs which were first traced according to the principles of the former. Speculative Freemasonry is, in like manner, intimately connected with geometry. In deference to our operative ancestors, and, in fact, as a necessary result of our close connection with them, Speculative Freemasonry derives its most important symbols from this parent science. Hence it is not strange that Euclid, the most famous of geometricalians, should be spoken of in all the Old Records as a founder of Freemasonry in Egypt, and that a special legend should have been invented in honor of his memory.

GEORGE IV. Born 1762; died 1830. King of Great Britain. February 6, 1878, in a Special Lodge, the Duke of Cumberland, Grand Master, made George IV, then Prince of Wales, a Freemason. The Duke of Cumberland died in 1790 and the Prince of Wales was elected Grand Master on November 24.

GEORGIA. Major-General James Edward Oglethorpe, founder of the Colony of Georgia on February 12, 1733, also founded on February 10, 1734, the Masonic Lodge now known as Solomon's Lodge No. 1, at Savannah, the name being so attached in 1776. To Past Master William B. Clarke's Early and Historic Freemasonry of Georgia we are indebted for definite light upon the old traditions of the Craft. The present Charter of this old Lodge, granted by the Grand Lodge of Georgia in 1786, states that Roger Lacey was granted a Warrant as the first Provincial Grand Master of Georgia in 1735 by Viscount Weymouth, Grand Master of England. Unity Lodge was constituted in 1774, and Grenadier's Lodge in 1775. During these years and up to 1786 a Provincial Grand Lodge existed and in the revolutionary period acted independently, formal reconstruction being made on December 21, 1786, when the permanent appointments under England were abolished and annual elections adopted. Major-General Samuel Elbert resigned the chair and William Stephens was elected Grand Master with other officers for 1787.

Solomon's Lodge at Savannah possesses an apron worn by Worshipful Master Benjamin Sheftall in 1758. The flap bears the emblem of the Royal Arch Degree and this suggests that at that time this ceremony was conferred in the Lodge where the Master himself was initiated. Georgia Chapter of Savannah worked under a Dispensation from the General Grand Chapter, December 1, 1802, and a Warrant was granted, January 9, 1806. Union Chapter at Louisville received a Charter, from the General Grand Chapter, June 6, 1816; Augusta Chapter, December 6, 1818; Mechanics Chapter at Lexington, June 10, 1820; Webb Chapter at Sparta, November 16, 1921. A Grand Chapter was organized on February 4, 1822.

The first document mentioning the Degree of Select Masons in Georgia was a Diploma from Brother Cohen in possession of Brother Jacobs. In May, 1792, the latter was in Savannah and was invited to go to Augusta and confer the Degrees. The first Council, Adoniram Council, No. 1, of Augusta, was probably organized by Companion Webb or Companion Cross. On May 2, 1826, this Council took part in constituting the Grand Council of Georgia. Savannah Council, No. 2; Eureka Council, No. 3; Georgia Council, No. 4, and Hancock Council were also represented at the meeting. Soon after May 7, 1827, however, the activities of this Grand Council ceased for nearly fifteen years. On June 22, 1841, delegates from three Councils met at Augusta and again organized the Grand Council of Georgia.

Georgia Encampment, No. 1, at Augusta received a Dispensation dated 1823, and was chartered on May 5. Three other Commanderies, namely Saint Omar, No. 2, Saint Aldemar, and Coeur de Lion, were chartered before the Grand Commandery was organized on April 25, 1860.

The year 1888 saw the establishment of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, Southern Jurisdiction, at Savannah when Alpha, No. 1, a Lodge of Perfection, was granted a Charter on October 17. On the following day Temple, No. 1, a Chapter of Rose Croix, was chartered and on October 23, two years later, a Council, No. 1, of Augusta, was granted a Charter, and a Consistory, No. 1, was also granted a Charter.

GERBIER, DOCTOR. An energetic Freemason, and, as mentioned in the Royal Masonic Cyclopedia, one of the removeable Masters of the ancient Grand Lodge of France. He is said to have fabricated the title of the Metropolitan Chapter of France, which it was pretended had emanated from Edinburgh, in 1721.

GERMAN FREEMASONS, UNION OF. See Verein deutscher Freimaurer.

GERMAN RITUAL. The principal systems of ritual or working in Germany are:

1. The old English as remodeled by Schroeder and used by the Grand Lodge of Hamburg, most of the Lodges under the Grand Lodge of Saxony and all of the Hanoverian Lodges which belong to the Grand Lodge Royal York, and the Five Independent Lodges.

2. Rectified Strict Observance, or Scottish, by the Three Globes, Berlin. The Ritual of the Saint John's Lodge is, we understand, that of Fessler, as revised by Zoeller.

4. Fessler's, differing slightly from that of Schroeder. The Grand Lodge of the Sun, at Bayreuth, and the Grand Lodge Royal York use this ritual. Great freedom is accorded the daughters of the Grand Lodge of the Sun, the only requirement being that once each year they are to work according to a common Ritual.
5. Modern English, Ecclectic, in the Grand Lodge of Frankfort and Darmstadt. The Ritual is reported to be slightly mixed with other ceremonies under the latter Grand Lodge.

The most complicated of all of these forms of working is the Swedish system, see No. 3 above. No. 1 or the Schroeder system is the simplest. The entire apparatus of the ceremonies just as gone through in ancient times is displayed at the initiations in the Swedish Ritual—that is, terrors, threats, and so forth. However, in Fessler's system these likenesses gradually disappear just as they do in the Grand Lodge, Kaiser Frederick, where they are only inferred indirectly in the declared historical reminiscences. The work in England appertaining to portions of the First and Second Degrees has been transposed in Germany so that an Entered Apprentice from America or England if visiting in Germany would not be able to work his way into the Lodge in the First Degree.

GERMAN SOUTHWEST AFRICA. Three German Lodges exist here, at Lüderitzbucht, Swakopmund and Walhurg, the Kaiser Friedrich III Lodge from 1840, the Zur Hoffnung Lodge from 1908, and the Kränzchen zur Kreuz des Siidens, 1909. Following the World War this German colonial possession became subject to the British Empire as the Protectorate of Southwest Africa.

GERMAN UNION OF TWO AND TWENTY. A secret society founded in Germany, in 1786, by Doctor Bahrdt, whose only connection with Freemasonry was that Bahrdt and the twenty-one others who founded it were Freemasons, and that they invited to their co-operation the most distinguished Freemasons of Germany. The founder professed that the object of the association was to diffuse intellectual light, to annihilate superstition, and to perfect the human race. Its instruction was divided into six Degrees, as follows: 1. The Adolescent; 2. The Man; 3. The Old Man; 4. The Mesopotite; 5. The Diocesan; 6. The Superior. The first three Degrees were considered a preparatory school for the last three, out of which the rules of the society were chosen. It lasted only four years, and was dissolved by the imprisonment of its founder for a political libel, most of its members joining the Illuminati. The publication of a work in 1789 entitled Mehr Noten als Text, etc., meaning More Notes than Text, or The German Union of Two and Twenty, which divulged its secret organization, tended to hasten its dissolution (see Bahrdt).

GERMANY. Of all countries Germany plays the most important part in the history of ancient Freemasonry, since it was there that the gilds of Operative Stone-Masons first assumed that definite organization which subsequently led to the establishment of Speculative Freemasonry. But it was not until a later date that the latter institution obtained a footing on German soil. Findel in his History (page 238) says that as early as 1730 temporary Lodges, occupied only in the communication of Masonic knowledge and in the study of the ritual, were formed at different points. But the first regular Lodge was established at Hamburg, in 1733, under a Warrant of Lord Strathmore, Grand Master of England; which did not, however, come into active operation until four years later. Its progress was at first slow; and nowhere is Freemasonry now more popular or more deserving of popularity. Its scholars have brought to the study of its antiquities and its philosophy all the laborious research that distinguishes the Teutonic mind, and the most learned works on these subjects have emanated from the German press. The detailed history of its progress would involve the necessity of no ordinary volume (see Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry published by the Masonic History Company, Chicago, pages 746-94, and 2242-53, also references in this work to Masonic leaders and society of Germany).

William Preston's Illustrations of Masonry state that in 1733 the Earl of Strathmore warranted a Lodge at Hamburg. It has been said also that Doctor Jaenisch was appointed Provincial Grand Master between 1718 and 1720, but there is no record, either of his name or of the Lodge at Hamburg, in the Minutes of the Grand Lodge. In 1741 a Lodge was established at Leipzig by seven Brethren who had held informal meetings during the five previous years.

Brother H. W. Marschall had been appointed Provincial Grand Master of Upper Saxony in 1737, and thereafter many other Provincial Grand Lodges were opened.

In August, 1738, although the King was opposed to Freemasonry, the Crown Prince Frederick was secretly initiated at Brunswick, August 14-5, 1738, and always afterwards ardently supported the Fraternity.

A curious feature of the growth of the Craft in Germany is the number of independent Masonic Bodies which, with or without special authority, exercise control over other Lodges. There are also several independent Lodges in existence. The first of these Grand Lodges was probably the Zu den drei Weltkugeln (Three Globes) Lodge, opened at Berlin by the command of Frederick, who afterwards assumed the position of Grand Master as often as his military duties permitted.

Of these bodies there has been a marked tendency in the more modern times to confine the ritual to the exemplification of the first three Degrees. But the earlier records show that other ceremonies were practised. A Lodge, Three Doves, instituted in 1760, by a Warrant from the “Three Globes,” also of Berlin, is recorded that in 1763 other Degrees were employed, including some if not all of the following: Elect of Nine, Elect of Fifteen, Elect of Perpigan, Red Scots Degree, Saint Andrew's Scot, Knight of the East, Knight of the Eagle or Prince Sovereign Rose Croix, a Supreme Council being formed of members of this last Degree to govern the others. This use of the supplementary grades at so early a period is in marked contrast with the later conditions when they were in Germany less favorably pursued.

Students will not overlook the building of the old cathedrals in Germany, especially those of Cologne and Strasburg, and the associations of the Craftsmen that grew with these stately structures, fraternities whose exploits and government are described in Doctor Mackey's History of Freemasonry. Their rules have a peculiar resemblance to our modern regulations.

Mention must also be made here of the Verein deutscher Freimaurer, Association of German Freemasons, founded on May 19, 1861, at Potsdam with the object of laboring for the development of Masonic ideals and for promoting their advancement, to respond to the requirements of Masonic science, to cultivate Masonic endeavor, to encourage fraternal relief in Lodges, and the exercise of discreet charity. The Association publishes a periodical, Zwanziglose Mit-tellungen, every other month, holds yearly conventions of the membership, and also prints various pamphlets and books of value to Freemasons everywhere. The headquarters are at Leipzig.

Among various interesting enterprises is that of the Grand Lodge of the Sun, Zur Sonne, for facilitating the exchange from one Masonic family to another of young people, say from eleven to twenty years of age, principally during the holiday months of the year or at other times as may be desired. These youngsters were preferably to be placed in surroundings corresponding to those of their own homes.

GHEMOUN BINAH THEBOUNAH. Hebrew, meaning, as usually explained, Prudence in the midst of vicissitude. The Hebrew characters are: נבון ביהודא. The name of the seventh step of the mystical Kadosh Ladder of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

GHIHLEM. The form in which Doctor Anderson spells Gibbim. In the Book of Constitutions, 1738 (page 70) it is stated that in 1350 "John de Spoulee, call'd Master of the Ghiblim," rebuilt Saint George's chapel.

GIBALIM. A Masonic corruption of Gibbim, the Gibbites, or men of Gebal (see Gibbim).

GIBBON, EDWARD. English historian, author of Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Made a Freemason in Friendship Lodge No. 6, London, in March, 1775. Born April 27, 1737; died 1794 (see GIBEAH. A Hebrew word signifying a hill, and giving name to several towns and places in ancient Palestine. The only one requiring special mention is Gibeath of Benjamin, a small city about four miles north of Jerusalem. It was the residence, if not the birthplace, of King Saul. In the French Rite the word symbolically refers to the Master, who must be pure in heart, that the High and Holy One may dwell therein. The word is also used in the Swedish Rite.

GIBLIM. Hebrew, צִיבִל. A significant word in Freemasonry. It is the plural of the noun Gibb, the g pronounced hard, and means, according to the idiom of the Hebrew, Gibbites, or inhabitants of the city of Gebal. The Giblim, or Gibbites, are mentioned in Scripture as assisting Solomon's and Hiram's builders to prepare the trees and the stones for building the Temple, and from this passage it is evident that they were clever artificers. The passage is in First Kings (v, 18) and, in our common version, is as follows: "And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them, and the stone-squarers; so they prepared timber and stones to build the house," where the word translated in the authorized version by stone-squarers is, in the original, Giblim. It is so also in that translation known as the Bishop's Bible. The Geneva version has Masons. The French version of Martin has tail-leurs de pierres, following the English meaning; but Luther, in his German version retains the original word Giblim (see Gibbim).

It is probable that the English translation followed the Jewish Targum, which has a word of similar import in this passage. The error has, however, assumed importance in the Masonic instructions, where Giblim is supposed to be synonymous with a Freemason. And Sir Wm. Drummond confirms this by saying in his Origines (volume iii, book v, chapter iv, page 129) that "the Gibalim were Master Masons who put the finishing hand to King Solomon's Temple (see Gebal)."

GILDS. The word guild, guild, or gold, from the Saxon gildan, to pay, originally meant a tax or tribute, and hence those fraternities which, in the early ages, contributed sums to a common stock, were called Gilds. Cowell, the old English jurist, defines a Gild to be a "fraternity or commonalty of men gathered to-together into one combination, supporting their common charge by mutual contributions."

Societies of this kind, but not under the same name, were known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, and their artificers and traders were formed into distinct companies which occupied particular streets named after them. But according to Dr. Lujo Brentano, who published, in 1870, an essay on The History and Development of Gilds, England is the birthplace of the Medieval Gilds, from whom he says that the modern Freemasons emerged. They existed, however, in every country of Europe, and we identify them in the Compagnons de la Tour de France, and the Baucorporations of Germany. The difference, however, was that while they were patronized by the municipal authorities in England, they were discouraged by both the Church and State on the Continent.

The Gilds in England were of three kinds, Religious Gilds, Merchant Gilds, and Craft Gilds, specimens of all of which still exist, although greatly modified in their laws and usages. The Religious or Ecclesiastical Gilds are principally found in Roman Catholic countries, where, under the patronage of the Church, they often accomplish much good by the direction of their benevolence to particular purposes. Merchant Gilds are exemplified in the twelve great Livery Companies of London. And the modern Trades Unions are nothing else but Craft Gilds under another name. But the most interesting point in the history of the Craft Gilds is the fact that from them arose the Brother-hoods of the Freemasons.

Brentano gives the following almost exhaustive account of the organization and customs of the Craft Gilds:

The Craft Gilds themselves first sprang up amongst the free craftsmen, when they were excluded from the fraternities which had taken the place of the family unions, and later among the bondmen, when they ceased to belong to the familia of their lord. Like those Frith Gilds, the object of the early Craft Gilds was to create relations as if among brothers; and above all things, to grant to their members that assistance which the member of a family might expect from that family. As men's wants had become different, this assistance no longer concerned the protection of life, limbs, and property, for this was provided for by the Frith Gilds, now recognized as the legitimate authority; but the principal object of the Craft Gilds was to secure their members in the independent, unimpaired, and regular earning of their daily bread by means of their craft.

The very soul of the Craft Gild was its meetings, which brought all the Gild brothers together every week or closer. These meetings were also held with certain ceremonies, for the sake of greater solemnity. The box, having several locks like that of the Trade Unions, and containing the charters of the Gild, the statutes, the members, and other valuable articles, was opened on such occasions, and all present had to uncover their heads.
These meetings possessed all the rights which they themselves had not chosen to delegate. They elected the GILGUL, DOCTRINE OF. We learn from Brother Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie’s Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia that certain of the learned Jews have believed, for many centuries, in the doctrine of Gilgul, according to which the bodies of Jews deposited in foreign tombs contain within them a principle of soul which cannot rest until, by a process called by them the whirling of the soul, the immortal particle reaches once more the sacred soil of the Promised Land. This whirling of souls was supposed to be accomplished by a process somewhat similar to that of the metempsychosis of the Hindus, the spiritual power being conveyed by bird, beast, or fish, and on the death of any member, special services were held for his soul, and distribution of alms was made to the poor, who, in return, had to offer up prayers for the dead, as is still the custom in Roman Catholic countries.

In a History of the English Guilds, edited by Toulmin Smith from old documents in the Record Office at London, and published by the Early English Text Society, we find many facts confirmatory of those given by Brentano, as to the organization of these Gilds.

The testimony of these old records shows that a religious element pervaded the Gilds, and exercised a very powerful influence over them. Women were admitted to all of them, which Herbert (Livery Companies, v. 83) thinks was borrowed from the Ecclesiastical Gilds of Southern Europe; and the Brethren and Sisters were on terms of complete equality. There were fees on entry, yearly and special payments, and fines for wax for lights to burn at the altar or in funeral rites. The Gilds had set days of meeting, known as moming speeches, or day of speyngness totiared for here comune profyte, and a grand festival on the patron saint’s day, when the members assembled for worship, almsgiving, feasting, and for nourishing of brotherly love.

Mystery plays were often performed. They had a treasure-chest, the opening of which was a sign that business had begun. While it remained open all stood with uncovered heads, when cursing and swearing and all loose conduct were severely punished. The Gild property consisted of land, cattle, money, etc. The expenditure was on the sick, poor and aged, in making good losses by robbery, etc. Loans were advanced, pilgrims assisted, and, in one city, “any good girl of the Gild” was to have a dowry on marriage, if her father could not provide it. Poor travelers were lodged and fed. Roads were kept in repair, and churches were sustained and beautified. They wore a particular costume, which was enforced by their statutes, whence come the liverys of the London Companies of the present day and the clothing of the Freemasons.

An investigation of the usages of these Medieval Gilds, and a comparison of their regulations with the old Masonic Constitutions, will furnish a fertile source of interest to the Masonic archæologist, and throw much light on the early history of Freemasonry (see Gilds, Encyclopaedia Britannica, also the Hole Craft and Fellowship of Masonry, Edward Conder Jr., and the Libre Albus, the White Book of the City of London, compiled in 1419 A.D., and reprinted in 1861).

As showing the spirit of the old Brethren we give here the pledge or oath of the Masters and Wardens of the Crafts or Mysteries, as then they were called, from page 451 of the Libre Albus, presumably the one approved by law in the reign of Henry IV of England but probably in use even before that time, 1367-1413:

> You shall swear, that well and lawfully you shall overlook the Art or Mystery of..., of which you are Masters, or Wardens for the year elected. And the good rules and ordinances of the same Mystery, approved here by the Court, you shall keep and shall cause to be kept. And all the defaults that you shall find therein, done contrary thereto, you shall present unto the Chamberlain of the City, from time to time, sparing no one for favour, and aggraving no one for hate. Extortion or wrong unto no one, by colour of your office, you shall do; nor anything that shall be against the estate and peace of the King, or of the City, you shall consent. But for the time that you shall be in office, in all things pertaining unto the said Mystery and franchises of the said city, well and lawfully you shall behave yourself. So God you help, and the Saints.
GILKES, PETER WILLIAM. Surname spelled in some old Masonic records as Gilks and so pronounced. An English Freemason who devoted practically his entire life to the dissemination of knowledge regarding the ceremonies of the Craft and the teaching of the ritual of the Grand Lodge of England, acknowledged by all as an authority on Masonic regulations. Born in London, May 1, 1765, and died on December 11, 1833. Initiated at the age of twenty-one in British Lodge, No. 4, now No. 8, in 1786. This record is not in accord with the Grand Lodge Register which gives the year as 1794 but the general choice is for 1786 (see Peter Gilkes, by Brother A. F. Calvert, 1916, page 4). Little is known of the early history of Brother Gilkes except that he carried on, after the death of his father, a small retail establishment near Carnaby Market and Great Marlborough Street, London. In Dixon’s History of Freemasonry in Lincolnshire we note that in August, 1820, in recognition of the “very polite manner in which he has always shown himself towards this Lodge in giving to the Brethren the instruction in Masonry as laid down by the United Lodge of Promulgation,” a vote of thanks was passed to “Brother P. Gilks, Green-grocer, Carnaby Market, London.” It is certain that Brother Gilkes did not pursue this long after the death of his mother but, “Finding himself independent and being of an unambitious nature, he determined to retire from business and devote himself to pursuits more genial to his disposition. His accounts were soon closed, he engaged a single room which he furnished plainly, and arranged with Hannah, an old faithful servant of his late mother to attend to his apartment and prepare the frugal meals,” he remaining a bachelor his entire life.

Brother Gilkes maintained and taught daily a class of Freemasons without making any charge for his service. The Freemasons Quarterly Review, of 1834, said: “Although universally held in esteem amongst Masons his conduct was always characterised by good sense; he never aspired beyond his station in life, and declined the honour of an office in the Grand Lodge because he considered that his circumstances in life were not equal to the appointment.” An entertaining old book by Dr. George Oliver is entitled The Discrepancies of Freemasonry examined during a week’s gossip with the late celebrated Brother Gilkes and other eminent Masons. Page 32 tells of questions of Masonic importance discussed by Brothers Oliver and Gilkes in 1825 and the book shows clearly the high esteem in which the latter was held for his thorough knowledge of the Craft.

Peter Gilkes attended and was prominent from the first meeting when the Emulation Lodge of Improvement for Master Masons was founded on October 2, 1823. This group believed in the regulation of all ceremonial by Grand Lodge and also desired that United Grand Lodge should extend its control to the three Lectures explaining the ceremonies. The form of government they adopted was to enable Emulation Lodge “to hand down the Ceremonies and Lectures unaltered and unchanged from generation to generation.” After frequent visits to this Lodge, Peter Gilkes became a joining member and leader of its Committee in May, 1825. This Lodge “differed from all other Lodges of Instruction in being designed for Master Masons only and therefore gave as much attention to the Third and Second as it gave to the First Ceremony, preference being given to the Third.”

An account of Brother Gilkes’ activities in various Masonic Lodges would fill many pages. Briefly, he was a member of British Lodge, where he was initiated, Royal York Lodge of Perseverance, Lodge of Hope, Globe Lodge, Lodge of Unity, Cadogan Lodge, Old Concord Lodge, Saint James’ Union Lodge, Lodge of Good Intent, Saint Michael’s Lodge, Hope and Unity Lodge, and Lodge of Unions. Of ten Lodges he is said to have occupied the chairs. His visits to other Lodges were frequent. Never a subscribing member of the Percy Lodge “he often conducted the ceremonies,” says the history of the Lodge, and is recorded as present on eighty-five occasions from 1817 to 1833. While attending Lodges in this way he frequently instructed the Brethren and in one case Brother Calvert in his biography (page 13) records “Gilkes, while only attending the meetings as a visitor, occupied the chair on every occasion for three years running.” Then he joined the Lodge and was elected Worshipful Master for the ensuing year.

Brother Gilkes’ London pupils presented him in 1822 with a Past Master’s jewel, profusely embelished with diamonds, handsomely designed by Brother John Harris and costing one hundred guineas, over $500. This was only one of a number of tokens of respect and admiration received by Brother Gilkes during his life. This jewel is possessed by the Percy Lodge. A year after his death plans were made for the erection of a monument to his memory. His friend and pupil, Stephen Barton Wilson, one of the three instructors responsible for carrying on the work of their preceptor, was commissioned to execute the tablet. This beautiful memorial erected in 1834, is in Saint James Church, Piccadilly, London. The activities of Brother Gilkes are intimately bound up with the story of Emulation Lodge of Improvement which should be read in Some Account of the Ritual, by Brother G. J. V. Rankin, 1925, and the Illustrated History of the Emulation Lodge of Improvement, by Brother Henry Sadler.

GIRARD, STEPHEN. A wealthy Freemason, widely known for his philanthropies. Born in France, May 20, 1730; visited New York in 1774, in the meantime a sea captain, and began a trade to and from New Orleans and Port au Prince. Settled in Philadelphia in 1776, married, and established himself as a merchant. Aikman Rezon, Pennsylvania, shows Stephen Girard was initiated September 7, 1778 in Lodge No. 3, Philadelphia; crafted October 1, 1778; raised November 23, 1778. An old copy of the By-Laws of Lodge No. 3, 1844, gives these dates. In 1810 Brother Girard lent the Government of the United States much assistance in establishing and maintaining their credit with foreign countries, placing at the disposal of the Government, by the purchase of stock in the Bank of the United States, one million dollars. In 1812 he opened the Bank of Stephen Girard and in 1814 he personally subscribed for about 95 per cent of the Government’s entire war loan.

for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises of the same Missionary or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any duty whatsoever in the said Order. He recommended the use of "to provide for such a number of poor male and female orphan children ... a better education as well as a more comfortable maintenance than they had ever been known in the United States up to that time. His will included numerous and generous contributions to various charitable and civic enterprises. Practically his entire fortune, amounting to some thirty-five million in 1908, was devoted to charitable purposes, and he founded one school in particular and provided funds for the continued maintenance of it. His will reads that this is to be used "to provide for such a number of poor male white orphan children... a better education as well as a more comfortable maintenance than they usually receive from the application of public funds."

Another indication of the eccentricities of Brother Girard is the fact that he also states in the will above quoted that "I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any duty whatsoever in the said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of said college. . . . I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans . . . . free from the excitaments which clashing doctrines and sectarian controversy are so apt to produce."

Girard's heirs-at-law hotly contested this will, and, although Daniel Webster made a famous plea for the Christian religion in the effort to set aside the will, it was sustained by the Court. The Masonic fund, known as the Stephen Girard Charity Fund, amounting to $90,000.00 in 1918, is handled by the Fraternity and has done much to alleviate poverty and hardship among the poor.

Two days after the death of Brother Girard a general invitation to his funeral appeared in the public newspapers and this invitation requested the attendance of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania and of the subordinate Lodges and fistled as well a number of other benevolent associations in which he had been interested. Almost four hundred members of the Fraternity assembled at the Masonic Hall and attended the funeral, which was held in the German Roman Catholic Church of the Holy Trinity and the body being interred in a vault adjoining the Church. There was some difficulty when the Brethren entered the Church, which they did without their aprons in order to avoid any criticism, and it is recorded that the Roman Catholic clergy left the Church in a body and therefore the funeral services were not performed. The Brethren waited some time and then removed the body from the Church and placed it in the vault as had been desired by Brother Girard. It has been said that when Brother Girard was found to be near death he consented, at the request of his sister, to see a Catholic priest and this has been construed to mean that this intention had been to become reconciled to the Church in which he had been baptised, although by the time the priest arrived Brother Girard was dead. Under the circumstances, however, the Bishop of the Catholic Church consented to the body being admitted into the Church. The following is taken from Bishop Francis Patrick Kenrick's diary written at the time:

The body of Stephen Girard was brought with much funeral pomp, attended by many Free Masons marching in procession in scarfs and ornaments, as a tribute of respect to their deceased companion, to the church of the Holy Trinity. When, therefore, I saw these enter the Church to have the funeral rites gone through, no priest assisting, I ordered the body taken away for burial. I allowed it to have Christian burial for the potent reason that the deceased was baptised in the church and never left it, and when death came his illness was such that he did not perceive its approach.

In January, 1851, when the buildings of the College for orphans had reached sufficient completion to receive it, the body of Brother Girard was removed by the City Councils and the Board of Commissioners of the Girard Estate from the Church and the body was finally reinterred in the marble tomb which had been prepared for it within the grounds of the College in September, 1851, and this ceremony was participated in by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania at the express request of the Commissioners of the Girard Estates, the coffin being borne by eight Past Masters of the Order. A very impressive ceremony was held, about three hundred of the small orphans being present and the Masonic dirge having been expressly composed for the occasion. The heirs of Brother Girard objected to the removal of the remains from the Church by the city officials but the Courts ruled against them.

GIRDLÉ. In ancient symbology the girdle was always considered as typical of chastity and purity. In the Brahmanical initiations, the candidate was presented with the Zennar, or sacred cord, as a part of the holy garments; and Gibbon says that "at the age of puberty, or maturity, the faithful Persian was invested with a mysterious girdle; fifteen genuflections, or kneelings, were required after he put on the sacred girdle." The old Templars assumed the obligations of poverty, obedience, and chastity; and a girdle was given them, at their initiation, as a symbol of the last of the three vows. As a symbol of purity, the girdle is still used in many chivalric initiations, and may be properly considered as similar to the Masonic apron in its message.

GLAIRE, PETER MAURICE. A distinguished Freemason, who was born in Switzerland in 1743, and died in 1819. In 1764, he went to Poland, and became the intimate friend of King Stanislaus Poniatowski, who confided to him many important diplomatic missions. During his residence in Poland, Glaire, greatly patronized the Freemasons of that kingdom and established there a Rite of seven Degrees. He returned to Switzerland in 1788, where he continued to exercise an interest in Freemasonry, and in 1810 was elected Grand Master for three years, and in 1813 for life, of the Grand Orient of Helvetia, which Body adopted his Rite.

GLASTONBURY, HOLY THORN OF. There is an ancient market town in Somersetshire, England, which owes its origin to a celebrated abbey, founded, according to tradition, in 60 A.D. We are further told that Joseph of Arimathaea was the founder, and the “miraculous thorn” which flowered on Christmas day was believed by the common people to be the veritable staff with which Joseph aided his steps from the Holy Land. The tree was destroyed during the civil wars, but grafts flourish in neighboring gardens. Glastonbury has the honor of ranking Saint Patrick, 415 A.D., and Saint Dunstan, 940 A.D., among its abbots. In 1539 Henry VIII summoned Abbot Whiting to surrender the town and all its treasures, and on his refusal condemned him to be hanged and quartered, and the monastery confiscated to the king’s use, which sentence was immediately carried into execution. King Arthur is said to be buried in this place.

GLEASON, BENJAMIN. Masonic ritualist.

Graduated at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, in 1802, and was a public lecturer on geography and astronomy. About 1801 received the Preston Lectures from Thomas Smith Webb and in 1805 was appointed Grand Lecturer of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, which office he held until 1842. A member of Mount Lebanon Lodge in Massachusetts in 1807. Visited England and exemplified the Lectures before the Grand Lodge there. He died in Concord, Massachusetts, 1847, at seventy years of age (see Notes on the Ritual, Silas H. Shepherd, Research Pamphlet No. 19, 1924).

GLOBE. In the Second Degree, the celestial and terrestrial globes have been adopted as symbols of the universal extension of the Order, and as suggestive of the universal claims of brotherly love. The symbol is a very ancient one, and is to be found in the religious systems of many countries. Among the Mexicans the globe was the symbol of universal power. But the Masonic symbol appears to have been derived from, or at least to have an allusion to, the Egyptian symbol of the winged globe. There is nothing more common among the Egyptian monuments than the symbol of a globe supported on each side by a serpent, and accompanied with wings extended wide beyond them, occupying nearly the whole of the entablature above the entrance of many of their temples. We are thus reminded of the globes on the pillars at the entrance of the Temple of Solomon. The winged globe, as the symbol of Kneoph, the Creator Sun, an Egyptian myth of a god having the body of a man and the head of a ram, was adopted by the Egyptians as their national device, as the Lion is that of England, or the Eagle of the United States. In Isaiah (xviii, 1) where the author of the Book of Kings, whence Freemasonry has derived its ritualistic description, it is said (First Kings vii, 16), “And he made two chapiters of molten brass, to set upon the tops of the pillars.” In some Masonic instructions it is said that “the pillars were surmounted by two pomels or globes.” Now pomel, pomel, is the very word employed by Rabbi Solomon in his commentary on this passage, a word which signifies a globe or spherical body. The Masonic globes were really the chapiters described in the Book of Kings, exemplified by the same Hebrew word. Again it is said (First Kings vii, 22), “Upon the top of the pillars was lily work.” We now know that the plant here called the lily was really the lotus, or the Egyptian water-lily. But among the Egyptians the lotus was a symbol of the universe; and hence, although the Freemasons in their lectures have changed the expanded flower of the lotus, which crowned the chapiter and surmounted each pillar of the porch, into a globe, they have retained the interpretation of universality. The Egyptian globe or egg and lotus or lily and the Masonic globe are all symbols of something universal, and the Masonic idea has only been restricted by a natural impulse the idea to the universality of the Order and its benign influences. But in Brother Mackey’s opinion it is a pity that Masonic ritualists did not preserve the Egyptian and Scriptural symbol of the lotus surrounding a ball or sphere, and omit the more modern figures of globes celestial and terrestrial.

GLORY, SYMBOL OF. The Blazing Star in the old lectures was called the glory in the center, because it was placed in the center of the floor-cloth, and represented the glorious name of Deity. Hence, Doctor Oliver gives to one of his most interesting works, which treats of the symbolism of the Blazing Star, the title of The Symbol of Glory.

GLOUCESTER, DUKE OF. Brother of George III of England. Initiated at an Occasional Lodge at the Horn Tavern, London, on February 16, 1766, by Lord Blayney, Grand Master, receiving the Three Degrees the same evening.

GLOVES. In the continental rites of Freemasonry, as practised in France, in Germany, and in other countries of Europe, it is an invariable custom to present the newly initiated candidate not only, as we do, with a white leather apron, but also with two pair of white kid gloves—one a man’s pair for himself, and the other a woman’s—to be presented by him in turn to his wife or his betrothed, according to the custom of the German Freemasons, or, according to the French, to the female whom he most esteems, which, indeed, amounts, or should amount, to the same thing. The custom has been continued in some few American Lodges following foreign practices.
There is in this, of course, as there is in everything else which pertains to Freemasonry, a symbolism. The gloves given to the candidate for himself are intended to teach him that the acts of a Freemason should be as pure and spotless as the gloves now given to him. In the German Lodges, the word used for acts is, of course, handlung, or handleings, "the works of his hands," which makes the symbolic idea more impressive.

Dr. Robert Plot—no friend of Freemasonry, but still a historian of much research—says, in his Natural History of Staffordshire, that the Society of Freemasons in his time, and he wrote in 1686, presented their candidates with gloves for themselves and their wives. This shows that the custom, still preserved on the Continent of Europe, once was practised in England; although there, as well as in America, it is as a rule discontinued, which is perhaps to be regretted. But although the presentation of the gloves to the candidate is no longer frequently practised as a ceremony in England or America, yet the use of them as a part of the proper professional clothing of a Freemason in the duties of the Lodge or in processions, is still retained; and in many well-regulated Lodges the members are almost as regularly clothed in their white gloves as in their white aprons.

The symbolism of the gloves, it will be admitted, is in fact but a modification of that of the apron. They both signify the same thing, both are allusive to a purification of life. "Who shall ascend," says the Psalmist, "into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands and a pure heart." The apron may be said to refer to the "pure heart"; the gloves, to the "clean hands." Both are significant of purification—of that purification which was always symbolized by the ablution which preceded the ancient initiations into the sacred mysteries. But while our American and English Freemasons have adhered to the apron, and as a rule rejected the gloves as a Masonic symbol, the latter appear to be far more important in symbolic science, because the allusions to pure or clean hands are abundant in all the ancient writers.

"Hands," says Wemyss in his Clavis Symbolica, "are the symbols of human actions—pure hands are pure actions; unjust hands are deeds of injustice." There are numerous references in sacred or profane writers to this symbolism. The washing of the hands has the outward sign of an internal purification. Hence the Psalmist says, "I will wash my hands in innocence, and I will encompass thine altar, Jehovah."

In the Ancient Mysteries, the washing of the hands was always an introductory ceremony to the initiation, and, of course, it was used symbolically to indicate the necessity of purity from crime as a qualification of those who sought admission into the sacred rites; and hence on a temple in the island of Crete this inscription was placed: "Cleanse your feet, wash your hands and then enter." Indeed, the washing of hands, as symbolic of purity, was among the ancients a peculiarly religious rite. No one dared to pray to the gods until he had cleansed his hands. Thus, Homer makes Hector say,

I dread with unwashed hands to bring
My incensed wine to Jove an offering.

The same practise existed among the Jews; and a striking instance of the symbolism is exhibited in that well-known action of Pilate, who, when the Jews clamored for Jesus that they might crucify him, appeared before the people, and, having taken water, washed his hands, saying at the same time, "I am innocent of the blood of this just man. See ye to it."

In the Christian Church of the Middle Ages, gloves were always worn by bishops or priests when in the performance of ecclesiastical functions. They were made of linen and were white; and Durandus, a celebrated ritualist, says that "by the white gloves were denoted chastity and purity, because the hands were thus kept clean and free from all impurity." William Durandus was born 1220, died 1296, author of Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, of which the first book was published in 1906 under the title of Symbolism of Churches and Church Ornaments. There is no necessity to extend examples any further. There is no doubt that the use of the gloves in Freemasonry is a symbolic idea, borrowed from the ancient and universal language of symbolism, and was intended, like the apron, to denote the necessity of purity of life.

The builders, who associated in companies, who traversed Europe and were engaged in the construction of palaces and cathedrals, have left to us as their descendants, their name, their technical language, and the apron, that distinctive piece of clothing by which they protected their garments from the pollutions of their laborious employment. Did they also bequeath to us their gloves? This is a question which some modern discoveries will at last enable us to solve. M. Didron, in his Annales Archéologiques, presents us with an engraving copied from the painted glass of a window in the Cathedral of Chartres, in France. The painting was executed in the thirteenth century, and represents a number of Operative Masons there at work. Three of them are adorned with laurel crowns. May not these be intended to represent the three officers of a Lodge? All of the Masons are wearing gloves. M. Didron remarks that in the old documents which he has examined mention is often made of gloves which are intended to be presented to Freemasons and stone-cutters. In a subsequent number of the Annales, he gives the following three examples of this fact: In the year 1331, the Chatelan of Vilaines, in Duemois, bought a considerable quantity of gloves to be given to the workmen, in order, as it is said, "to shield their hands from the stone and lime."

In October, 1383, as he learns from a document of that period, three dozen pair of gloves were bought and distributed among the Masons when they commenced the buildings at the Chartreuse of Dijon. And, lastly, in 1486 or 1487, twenty-two pair of gloves were given to the Masons and stone-cutters who were engaged in work at the city of Amiens. It is thus evident that the builders—the Operative Masons—of the Middle Ages wore gloves to protect their hands from the effects of their work. It is equally evident that the Speculative Freemasons have received from their operative predecessors the gloves as well as the apron, both of which, being used by the latter for practical uses, have been, in the spirit of symbolism, appropriated by the former to "a more noble and glorious purpose" (see Illustrious).
GNOSTICS. The general name of Gnostics has been employed to designate several sects that sprung up in the eastern parts of the Roman Empire about the time of the advent of Christianity; although it is supposed that their principal doctrines had been taught centuries before in many of the cities of Asia Minor. The word Gnosticism is derived from the Greek Gnosis or knowledge, and was a term used in the earliest days of philosophy to signify the science of Divine things, or as Mater says, "superior or celestial knowledge." He thinks the word was first used by the Jewish philosophers of the famous school of Alexandria. The favorite opinion of scholars is that the sect of Gnostics arose among the philosophers who were the converts of Paul and the other Apostles and who sought to mingle the notions of the Jewish Egyptian school, the speculations of the Cabalists and the Grecian and Asiatic doctrines with the simpler teachings of the new religion which they had embraced. They believed that the writings of the Apostles enunciated only the articles of the vulgar faith; but that there were esoteric traditions which had been transmitted from generation to generation in mysteries, to which they gave the name of Gnostic or Gnositicism. King says (Gnostics page 7) that they drew the materials out of which they constructed their system from two religions, namely, the Zend-Avesta and its modifications in the Cabala, and the reformed Brahmanical religion, as taught by the Buddhist missionaries.

Notwithstanding the large area of country over which this system of mystical philosophy extended, and the number of different sects that adopted it, the same fundamental doctrine was everywhere held by the chiefs of Gnosticism. This was, that the visible creation was not the work of the Supreme Deity, but of the Demiurgus, a simple emanation, and several degrees removed from the Godhead. To the latter, indeed, styled by them the unknown Father, they attributed the creation of the intellectual world, the Aeons and Angels, while they made the creation of the world of matter the work of the Demiurgus. Gnosticism abounded in symbols and legends, in talismans and amulets, many of which were adopted into the popular superstitions of the Medieval ages borrowed many of the principles of ornamentation, by which they decorated the ecclesiastical edifices which they constructed, from the abstruse symbols of the Gnostics. So, too, we find Gnostic symbols in the Hermetic Philosophy and in the system of Rosicrucianism; and lastly, many of the symbols still used by Freemasonry—such, for instance, as the triangle within a circle, the letter G and the pentacle of Solomon—have been traced to a Gnostic source.

GOAT, RIDING THE. The vulgar idea that riding the goat constitutes a part of the ceremonies of initiation in a Masonic Lodge has its real origin in the superstition of antiquity. The old Greeks and Romans portrayed their mystical god Pan in horns and hoof and shaggy hide and called him goat-footed. When the demonology of the classics was adopted and modified by the early Christians, Pan gave way to Satan, who naturally inherited his attributes; so that to the common mind the Devil was represented by a he-goat, and his best known marks were the horns, the beard, and the cloven hoofs. Then came the witch stories of the Middle Ages, and the belief in the witch orgies, where, it was said, the Devil appeared riding on a goat. These orgies of the witches, where, amid fearfully blasphemous ceremonies, they practised initiation into their Satanic Rites, became, to the vulgar and the illiterate, the type of the Masonic initiation; for as Doctor Oliver says, it was in England a common belief that the Freemasons were accustomed in their Lodges "to raise the Devil." So the riding of the goat, which was believed to be practised by the witches, was transferred to the Freemasons; and the saying remains to this day, although the belief has long since died out.

G. O. D. The initials of Gomer, Oz, Dabar. It is a singular coincidence, and worthy of thought, that the letters composing the English name of Deity should be the initials of the Hebrew words Wisdom, Strength, Beauty; the three great pillars, or metaphorical supports of Freemasonry. They seem to present almost the only reason that can reconcile a Freemason to the use of the initial G in its conspicuous suspension in the East of the Lodge in place of the Delta. The incident seems to be more than an accident.

Thus the initials conceal the true meaning.

GOD. A belief in the existence of God is an essential point of Speculative Freemasonry—so essential, indeed, that it is a landmark of the Order that no Atheist can be made a Freemason. Nor is this left to an inference; for a specific declaration to that effect is demanded as an indispensable preparation for initiation. Hence Hutchinson says that the worship of God "was the first and corner-stone on which our originals thought it expedient to place the foundation of Masonry." The religion of Freemasonry is cosmopolitan, universal; but the required belief in God is not incompatible with this universality; for it is the belief of all peoples. "Be assured," says Godfrey Higgins, "that God is equally present with the pious Rites of the Mithraic Cave featured in that old faith of the Romans (see Mithras, Mysteries of). The architects and stone-masons of the Middle Ages borrowed many of the principles of ornamentation, by which they decorated the ecclesiastical edifices which they constructed, from the abstruse symbols of the Gnostics. So, too, we find Gnostic symbols in the Hermetic Philosophy and in the system of Rosicrucianism; and lastly, many of the symbols still used by Freemasonry—such, for instance, as the triangle within a circle, the letter G and the pentacle of Solomon—have been traced to a Gnostic source.
Hindoo in the temple, the Jew in the synagogue, the Mohammedan in the mosque, and the Christian in the church." There never has been a time since the revival of Freemasonry, when this belief in God as a superintending power did not form a part of the system. The very earliest lectures that are extant, going back almost to the beginning of the eighteenth century, contain precisely the same question as to the trust in God which is found in those of the present day; and the oldest Manuscript Constitutions, dating as far back as the fifteenth century at least, all commence with, or contain, an invocation to the "Mighty Father in Heaven." There never was a time when the dogmas did not form an essential part of the Masonic system (see Deism, also Switzerland, France, and the Independent and Regular National Grand Lodge of France and the French Colonies).

GOD AND HIS TEMPLE, KNIGHT OF. A Degree mentioned by Fustier.

GODFATHER. In French Lodges the member who introduces a candidate for initiation is called his parrain, or godfather.

GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON. An illustrious German poet, dramatist and philosopher, born August 28, 1749, at Frankfort-on-Maine, and died at Weimar on March 22, 1832. The first sixteen years of his life were spent in Frankfort, studying with his father and with tutors, after which he went to Leipzig and entered the university there. From there he went to Strassburg to complete legal studies to which he had given a good deal of his time although his previous schooling had included literature, art and kindred subjects. Here he wrote his first important drama, Gött von Berlichingen, receiving his degree about 1771. Then he moved to Weimar. These were the most productive literary years of his career, 1771-5, and it was during this time that Faust was written. At Weimar Goethe lived the balance of his life, taking up certain duties as Minister of State. Goethe was initiated into the Masonic Fraternity in the Lodge Amalia at Weimar. He petitioned the Lodge for initiation in his thirty-first year, on February 13, 1780. He was initiated on the eve of the festival of Saint John the Baptist in 1780. On the eve of the same festival, on June 23, 1830, the Freemasons of Weimar celebrated the semi-centennial anniversary of his admission into the Order, of which, in a letter to the musical composer, Zeeter, who had been, like himself, initiated on the same day fifty years before, he speaks with great gratification as his "Masonic jubilee." He says, "The gentlemen have treated this epoch with the greatest courtesy. I responded to it in the most friendly manner on the following day." Goethe's writings contain many favorable allusions to the Masonic Institution. Another celebration was held by the Craft on the one hundredth anniversary of Goethe's admittance into Freemasonry. Thomas Carlyle, translating Goethe's poem, the one best known as the Masonic Lodge, an outstretched protecting shield, Die Zukunft decket, in 1843, says that he finds it devout, yet fully credible and veritable, full of piety, yet free from cant. "To me it has something of a modern psalm in it in some measure. It is deep as the foundations, deep and high, and it is true and clear. No clearer man or nobler and grander intellect has lived in the world, I believe, since Shake-with which the apron is compared. The eagle was to the Romans the ensign of imperial power; the Order of the Golden Fleece was of high repute as an Order of Knighthood. It was established in Flanders, in 1429, by the Duke of Burgundy, who selected the fleece for its badge because wool was the staple production of the country. It has ever been considered, says Clark, one of the most illustrious Orders of Europe. The Order of the Garter was, and is still considered, the highest decoration that can be bestowed upon a subject by a sovereign of Great Britain. Thus, the apron is proudly compared with the noblest decorations of ancient Rome and of modern Europe. But the Freemasons may have been also influenced in their selection of a reference to the Golden Fleece, by the fact that in the Middle Ages it was one of the most important symbols of the Hermetic philosophers.

GOLDEN KEY, KNIGHT OF THE. See Knight of the Golden Key.

GOLDEN LION OF HESSE-CASSEL, ORDER OF THE. Instituted by Frederick II, 14th of August, 1770, under a decree of 6th July, to recompense virtue and merit. The Grand Master is the reigning sovereign of Hesse-Cassel. Motto, Virtute et Fidelitate.

GOLDEN STOLE OF VENICE. The Italian expression for the Order of this name is Cavalieri della Stola d'Oro. An ancient order of knighthood, conferred by the Republic of Venice. The number of knights was unlimited. The decoration, worn over the left shoulder, was richly embroidered with flowers of gold, and being in width a handbreadth, fell behind and before to the knee. An ambassador, for some distinctive service, was deemed worthy. The ducal robe was of red material. Originally the outer garment of a Roman matron, the stole has been loosely applied to any vestment used in the church but is more strictly said of a narrow fringed band worn by the clergy.

GOLD THALER, or Gold Golden, we are informed in Kenning's Cyclopaedia of Freemasonry, is the Saint John's Offering, as it was called under the Strict Observance in Germany, and which amounted to one ducat, or, at the least, one and two-thirds of a thaler, was paid by every member on Saint John's Day. This practise is still kept up in many German Lodges for the benefit of the fund for the poor.

GOLGOtha. Greek. ἱγκολγοθα, from the Hebrew, גולגולם, Gulgolet, meaning a skull. The name given by the Jews to Calvary, the place of Christ's crucifixion and burial. It is a significant word in Templar Freemasonry (see Calvary).

GOMEL. The Hebrew is גומל, Latin, retribuens. Irregularly given as Gomez and Gomer. A word found in the Twenty-sixth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, signifying reward.

GONFALON. The Italian word is Gonfalone, Old German, Gündofano. An ecclesiastical war flag or banner, a standard; used in several of the chivalric Degrees of Freemasonry. The chief magistrates in Italian cities when bearing this ensign are known as Gonfaloniers. The banner is triune, of white silk, trimmed and mounted with gold.

GOODALL. The reputed author of the book on Freemasonry, known as Jachin and Boaz. It is said that he was at one time Master of the West India and American Lodge, now known as the Lodge of Antiquity; but this statement has never been confirmed.

GOOD SAMARITAN. An androgynous (of both sexes), honorary or side Degree conferred in the United States with rather impressive ceremonies. It is, of course, as a Degree to be conferred on females, unconnected with Masonic history or traditions, but draws its allusions from the fate of Lot's wife, and from the parable of the Good Samaritan related in the Gospels. The passages of Scripture which refer to these events are read during the ceremony of initiation. This Degree is to be conferred only on Royal Arch Masons and their wives, and in conferring it two Good Samarians must always be present, one of whom must be a Royal Arch Mason. Much dignity and importance has been given to this Degree by its possessors; and it is usual in many places for a certain number of Good Samarians to organize themselves into regular, but of course independent, Bodies to hold monthly meetings under the name of Assemblies, to elect proper officers, and receive applications for initiation. In this manner the assemblies of Good Samarians, consisting of male and female members, bear a very near resemblance to the female Lodges, which, under the name of Maçonnerie d'Adoption, prevail in France.

and know my sheep, and am known of mine. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep. And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also must I bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd.” Hence, in Masonic as well as in Christian symbolism, Christ is naturally called the Good Shepherd.

GOOD SHEPHERD, FIG. 1. THE SIGN FORMERLY ON THE FRONT OF THE GOOSE AND GRIDIRON TAVERN

Jesus was relating (Luke xv) the parable in which one having lost a sheep goes into the wilderness to search for it. He said: “And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing.” Hettner, a German writer on Greek customs, says: “When the Greek carries home his lamb, he slings it round his neck, holding it by the feet crossed over the breast. This is to be seen with us also, but the sight is especially attractive at Athens, for it was in this manner that the ancients represented Hermes as the guardian and multiplier of flocks; so stood the statue of Hermes at Olympia, Oechalia, and Tanagra. Small marble statues of this kind have even come down to us, one of which is to be seen in the Pembroke collection at Wilton House; another, a smaller one, in the Stoa of Hadrian, at Athens. This representation, however, appears most frequently in the oldest works of Christian art, in which the laden Hermes is turned into a laden Christ, who often called himself the Good Shepherd, and expressly says in the Gospel of Saint Luke, that when the shepherd finds the sheep, he lays it joyfully on his shoulder.”

Now, although the idea of the Good Shepherd may have been of pagan origin, yet derived from the parable of our Savior in Saint Luke and his language in Saint John, it was early adopted by the Christians as a religious emblem. The Good Shepherd bearing the sheep upon his shoulders, the two hands of the Shepherd crossed upon his breast and holding the legs of the sheep, is a very common subject in the paintings of the earliest Christian era. It is an expressive symbol of the Savior's love—of Him who taught us to build the new temple of eternal life—and, consequently, as Didron says, "the heart and imagination of Christians have dwelt fondly upon this theme; it has been unceasingly repeated under every possible aspect, and may be almost said to have been worn threadbare by Christian art. From the earliest ages, Christianity completely made it her own." And hence the Christian Degree of Rose Croix has very naturally appropriated the sign of the Good Shepherd, the representation of Christ bearing his once lost but now recovered sheep upon his shoulders, as one of its most impressive symbols.

GOOSE AND GRIDIRON. An alehouse with this sign, in St. Paul’s Church Yard, London. In 1717 the Lodge of Antiquity met at the Goose and Gridiron, and it was there that the first Quarterly Communication of the Grand Lodge of England, after the revival of 1717, was held on the 24th of June, 1717. It was on the headquarters of a musical society, whose arms—a lyre and a swan—were converted into Goose and Gridiron.

GORDON, JAMES. Provincial Grand Master over the Lodges warranted by the Grand Lodge of Scotland, east of Balbos in Andulusia, Southern Spain, appointed August 3, 1807 (see History of Freemasonry and Grand Lodge of Scotland, William A. Laurie, 1859, page 408).

GORMOGONS. A secret society established in 1724, in England, in opposition to Freemasonry. One of its rules was that no Freemason could be admitted until he was first degraded, and had then renounced the Masonic Order. It was absurdly and intentionally pretentious in its character; claiming in ridicule of Freemasonry, a great antiquity, and pretending that it was descended from an ancient society in China. There was much antipathy between the two associations, as will appear from the following verses, published in 1729, by Henry Cary:

The Masons and the Gormogons
Are laughing at one another,
While all mankind are laughing at them;
Then why do they make such a pother?
They bait their hook for simple gulls,
And truth with baits they smoother;
But when they've taken in their culls,
Why then is—"Welcome, Brother!"

The Gormogons made a great splutter in their day, and published many squibs against Freemasonry; yet that is still living, while the Gormogons were long ago extinguished. They seemed to have flourished for but a very few years. Brother R. F. Gould has collected about all that is known about the Gormogons in his article on the Duke of Wharton, in volume viii of Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge. But the reader must not overlook a pertinent quotation, from a letter written by Brother Gould, mentioned in Melville's Philip, Duke of Wharton (page 114), "About the Gormogons, indeed, all is inference and conjecture. We must suppose that the Society or Association actually met, but there is no distinct proof of their having done so."

GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE. Of all the styles of architecture, the Gothic is that which is most intimately connected with the history of Freemasonry, having been the system peculiarly practised by the Freemasons of the Middle Ages. To what country or people it owes its origin has never been satisfactorily determined; although it has generally been conjectured that it was of Arabic or Saracenic extraction, and that it was descended from an ancient society in China. The rounded arch and horizontal lines of previous styles, was altogether in the hands of those architects who were known, from the tenth to the sixteenth centuries, as Freemasons, and who kept their system of building as a secret, and thus obtained an entire monopoly of both domestic and ecclesiastical architecture. At length, when the gilds or fraternities of Freemasons, "who alone," says Hope, "held the secrets of Gothic art," were dissolved, the style itself was lost, and was succeeded by what Paley says (Manual of Gothic Architecture, page 15) was "a worse than brazen era of architecture" (see Traveling Freemasons).

GOTHIC CONSTITUTIONS. A title sometimes given to the Institutions which are supposed to have been adopted by the Freemasons at the City of York, in the tenth century, and so called in allusion to the Gothic architecture which was introduced into England by the Fraternity. A more correct and more usual designation of these laws is the York Constitutions, which see.

GOULD, ROBERT FREKE. This well-known historian of Freemasonry had a varied career. Born in 1836, and died March 26, 1915. He entered the English army at the age of eighteen, becoming a lieutenant in the same year, and serving with distinction in North China in 1860-2. On his return to England he studied law and became a barrister in 1868. He was initiated at Ramsgate in the Royal Navy Lodge, No. 429, and was Master of the Inhabitants Lodge at Gibraltar, also of the Meridian Lodge, No. 743, a Military Lodge attached to his regiment. Afterward he held the Chair of the Moira, Quatuor Coronati and Jerusalem Lodges. In 1880 he was appointed Senior Grand Deacon of England. He had been a constant writer in the Masonic press since 1858; in 1879 he published The Four Old Lodges and The Atholl Lodges, and in 1899 a book on Military Lodges. But his greatest work is the History of Freemasonry in three large volumes, which occupied him from 1882 to 1887, which was followed in 1903 by A Concise History of Freemasonry abridged from the larger work and brought up to date.

GOURGAS, JOHN JAMES JOSEPH. A merchant of New York, who was born in France in 1777, and received a member of the Scottish Rite in 1806. His name is intimately connected with the rise and progress of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite in the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States. Through his representations and his indefatigable exertions, the Mother Council at Charleston was induced to denounce the Consistory of Joseph Cerneau in the City of New York, and to establish there a Supreme Council for the Northern Jurisdiction, of which Brother Gourgas was elected the Secretary-General. He continued to hold this office until 1832, when he was elected Sovereign Grand Commander. In 1851, on the removal of the Grand East of the Supreme Council to Boston, he resigned his office in favor of Brother Giles Fonda Yates, but continued to take an active interest, so far as his age would permit, in the Rite until his death, which occurred at New York on February 14, 1865, at the ripe old age of eighty-eight, and being at the time probably the oldest possessor of the Thirtieth Degree in the world. Brother Gourgas was distinguished for the purity of his life and the powers of his intellect. His Masonic library was very valuable, and especially rich in manuscripts. His correspondence with Dr. Moses Holbrook, at one time Grand Commander of the Southern Council, is in the archives of that Body, and bears testimony to his large Masonic attainments.

GRAAL

GRAAL, HOLY. See Sons Grual.

GRADES. Degrees in Freemasonry are sometimes so called. In this connection it is a French word (see Degrees).

GRAMMARB. One of the seven liberal arts and sciences, which forms, with Logic and Rhetoric, a triad dedicated to the cultivation of language. "God," says Sanctius, "created man the participant of reason; and as he willed him to be a social being, he bestowed upon him the gift of language, in the perfecting of which there are three aids. The first is Grammar, which rejects from language all solecisms and barbarous expressions; the second is Logic, which is occupied with the truthfulness of language; and the third is Rhetoric, which seeks only the adornment of language."

GRAND ARCHITECT. A Degree in several of the Rites modeled upon the Twelfth of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. It is the Sixth Degree of the Reform of Saint Martin; the Fourteenth of the Rite of Elected Cohens; the Twenty-third of the Rite of Mizraim, and the Twenty-fourth of the Metropolitan Chapter of France (see also Great Architect of the Universe).

GRAND CHAPTER. A Grand Chapter consists of the High Priests, Kings, and Scribes for the time being, of the several Chapters under its Jurisdiction, of the Past Grand and Deputy High Priests, Kings and Scribes of the said Grand Chapter. In some Grand Chapters Past High Priests are admitted to membership, but in others they are not granted this privilege, unless they have served as Grand and Deputy High Priests, Kings, or Scribes. Grand Chapters in the United States have the sole government and superintendence of the several Royal Arch Chapters and Lodges of the Most Excellent, Past, and Mark Masters within their several Jurisdictions.

Until the year 1797, there was no organization of Grand Chapters in the United States. Chapters were held under the authority of a Master's Warrant, although the consent of a neighboring Chapter was generally deemed expedient. But in 1797, delegates from several of the Chapters in the Northern States assembled at Boston for the purpose of deliberating on the expediency of organizing a Grand Chapter for the government and regulation of the several Chapters within the said States.

This Convention prepared an address to the Chapters in New York and New England, disclaiming the power of any Grand Lodge to exercise authority over Royal Arch Masters, and declaring it expedient to establish a Grand Chapter. In consequence of this address, delegates from most of the States above mentioned met at Hartford in January, 1798, and organized a Grand Chapter, formed and adopted a Constitution, and elected and installed their officers. This example was quickly followed by other parts of the Union and Grand Chapters came into existence in nearly all the States (see General Grand Chapter).

The officers of a Grand Chapter are usually the same as those of a Chapter, with the distinguished prefix of Grand to the titles. The jewels are also the same, but enclosed within a circle. In England and Scotland the Grand Chapter bears the title of Supreme Grand Chapter.

GRAND CHAPTER OF PRINCE MASTERS. See Prince Masons of Ireland.

GRAND COMMANDER. The presiding officer of a Grand Commandery of Knights Templar.

GRAND COMMANDER OF THE EASTERN STAR. The French expression is Grand Commandeur de l'Étoile d'Orient. A Degree in Pyron's collection.

GRAND CONCLAVE. The title of the presiding Body of Templarism in England is the Grand Conclave of the Religious and Military Order of Masonic Knights Templar.

GRAND CONSERVATORS. On July 1, 1814, the Grand Mastership of the Order in France, then held by Prince Cambacérès, was, in consequence of the political troubles attendant upon the restoration of the monarchy, declared vacant by the Grand Orient. On August 12 the Grand Orient decreed that the functions of Grand Master should be provisionally discharged by a Commission consisting of three Grand Officers, to be called Grand Conservators, and Macdonald, Duke of Tarentum, the Count de Beurnonville, and Timbrune, Count de Valence, were appointed to that office.

GRAND CONSISTORY. The governing Body over a State of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite; subject, however, to the superior Jurisdiction of the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third. The members of the Grand Consistory are required to be in possession of the Thirty-second Degree. Such was the practise in the Southern Masonic Jurisdiction which prevails in the Northern Body but the name is there the Council of Deliberation.

GRAND COUNCIL. The title given to the first three officers of a Royal Arch Chapter. Also the name of the superintending Body of Cryptic Freemasonry in any Jurisdiction. It is composed of the first three officers of each Council in the Jurisdiction. Its officers are: Most Puissant Grand Master, Thrice Illustrious Deputy Grand Master, Illustrious Grand Conductor of the Works, Grand Treasurer, Grand Recorder, Grand Chaplain, Grand Marshal, Grand Captain of the Guards, Grand Commandor of the Council, and Grand Steward.

GRAND DIRECTOR OF THE CEREMONIES. An important officer in the United Grand Lodge of England; a similar office to that of Grand Master-General of Ceremonies of a Supreme Council, upon whom the order of the Grand Body largely depends, and who has charge of the service or ceremonies of whatever nature that may transpire.

GRAND EAST. The city in which the Grand Lodge, or other governing Masonic Body is situated, and whence its official documents emanate, is called the Grand East. Thus, a document issued by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts would be dated from the Grand East of Boston, or if from the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, it would be the Grand East of New Orleans. The place where a Grand Lodge meets is therefore called a Grand East. The word is in frequent Masonic use on the Continent of Europe and in America, but seldom employed in England, Scotland, or Ireland.

GRAND ELECT, PERFECT AND SUBLIME MASON. The Fourteenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite (see Perfection, Lodge of).

GRAND ENCAMPMENT. See Encampment, Grand.

GRAND HIGH PRIEST. The presiding officer of a Grand Royal Arch Chapter in the American system. The powers and prerogatives of a Grand High Priest are far more circumscribed than those of a Grand Master. As the office has been constitutionally created by the Grand Chapter, and did not precede it as that of Grand Masters did the Grand Lodges, he possesses no inherent prerogatives, but those only which are derived from and delegated to him by the Constitution of the Grand Chapter and regulations formed under it for the government of Royal Arch Masonry.

GRAND INQUIRING COMMANDER. The Sixty-sixth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

GRAND INSPECTOR, INQUISITOR COMMANDER. The Thirty-first Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. It is not a historical Degree, but simply a judicial power of the advanced Degrees. The place of meeting is called a Supreme Tribunal. The decorations are white, and the presiding officer is styled Most Perfect President. The jewel of the Degree is a Teutonic cross of silver attached to white watered ribbon. The Teutonic Cross is the same in shape as the Jerusalem Cross, four plain T's joined to make a cross, a cross potent, or having crutched arms.

GRAND LODGE. A Grand Lodge is the dogmatic and administrative authority of Ancient Craft Masonry, or the three Symbolic Degrees. It is defined in the Regulations of 1721, as “consisting of and formed by the Masters and Wardens of all the regular Lodges upon record, with the Grand Master at their head, and his Deputy on his left hand, and the Grand Wardens in their proper places” (see Constitutions, 1723, page 61). This definition refers to a very modern organization, for of Grand Lodges thus constituted we have no written evidence previous to the years 1717, when Freemasonry was revived in England. Previous to that time the administrative authority of the Craft was exercised by a General Assembly of Freemasons of a Jurisdiction which met annually (see Assembly). The true history of Grand Lodges commences, therefore, from what has been called the Era of the Revival.

In 1716 four old Lodges in London determined, if possible, to revive the Institution from its depressed state, and accordingly they met in February, 1717, at the Apple-Tree Tavern, whose name has thus been rendered famous for all time; and after placing the oldest Master Mason, who was the Master of a Lodge, in the chair, they constituted themselves into a Grand Lodge, and forthwith “revived the Quarterly Communications of the officers of Lodges call’d the Grand Lodge” (see Constitutions, 1738, page 100). On the following Saint John the Baptist’s Day, the Grand Lodge was duly organized, and Antony Sayer, Gentleman, was elected Grand Master, who appointed his Wardens, and commanded the Masters and Wardens of Lodges to meet the Grand Officers every quarter in communication. From that time Grand Lodges have been uninterruptedly held; receiving, however, at different periods, various modifications.

A Grand Lodge is invested with power and authority over all the Craft within its Jurisdiction. It is the Supreme Court of Appeal in all Masonic cases, and to its decrees implicit obedience must be paid by every Lodge and every Freemason situated within its control. The government of Grand Lodges is, therefore, completely despotic, but of course a benevolent despotism. While a Grand Lodge exists, its edicts must be respected and obeyed without examination by its subordinate Lodges.

This autocratic power of a Grand Lodge is based upon a principle of expediency, and derived from the fundamental law established at the organization of Grand Lodges in the beginning of the eighteenth century. In so large a Body as the Craft, it is absolutely necessary that there should be a supreme controlling Body to protect the Institution from anarchy, and none could be more conveniently selected than one which, by its representative character is, or ought to be, composed of the united wisdom, prudence, and experience of all the subordinate Lodges under its obedience; so that the voice of the Grand Lodge is nothing else than the voice of the Craft expressed by their representatives. Hence the twelfth of the General Regulations declares that “the Grand Lodge consists of, and is formed by, the Masters and Wardens of all the particular Lodges upon record” (see Constitutions, 1738, page 158).

So careful has the Institution been to preserve the dogmatic and autocratic power of the Grand Lodge that all elected Masters are required, at the time of their installation, to make the following declaration:

You agree to hold in veneration the original rulers and patrons of the Order of Freemasonry, and their regular successors, supreme and subordinate, according to their stations; and to submit to the awards and resolutions of your Brethren in general Lodge convened, in every case, consistent with the Constitutions of the Order. You promise to pay homage to the Grand Master for the time being, and to his officers when duly installed, and strictly to conform to every edict of the Grand Lodge.

The organization of new Grand Lodges in the United States of America has followed that adopted, in essential particulars, by the four Lodges which established the Grand Lodge of England in 1717. When it is desired to organize a Grand Lodge, three or more legally constituted Lodges, working in any State, Territory, or other independent political division, where no Grand Lodge already exists, may meet in Convention, adopt by-laws, elect officers, and organize a Grand Lodge. The Lodges within its Jurisdiction then surrender their Warrants of Constitution to the Grand Lodges from which they respectively had received them, and accept others from the newly organized Grand Lodge, which thenceforward exercises all Masonic Jurisdiction over the State in which it has been organized.

A Grand Lodge thus organized consists of the Masters and Wardens of all the Lodges under its Jurisdiction, and such Past Masters as may enroll themselves or be elected as members. Past Masters are not, however, members of the Grand Lodge by inherent right, but only by courtesy, and no Past Master can remain a member of the Grand Lodge unless he is attached to some subordinate Lodge in its Jurisdiction.

All Grand Lodges are governed by the following officers: Grand Master, Deputy Grand Master, Senior and Junior Grand Wardens, Grand Treasurer, and Grand Secretary. These are usually termed the Grand Officers; in addition to them there are subordinate officers appointed by the Grand Master and the Grand Stewards, Grand Marshal, Grand Pursuivant, Grand Sword Bearer, and Grand Tiler; but their number and titles vary in different Grand Lodges.

Sir Alfred Robbins, P.G.W., President of the Board of General Purposes, in an address before the Manchester Association for Masonic Research says of the United Grand Lodge of England:

It is necessary at the outset to have a precise definition of what "Grand Lodge" is. This is supplied in the very precise definition of the original Charter of Incorporation of Free and Accepted Masons, "to be found in an unauthorized edition of the Book of Constitutions, published in London and Dublin in 1769, in accordance with a movement for turning Free and Accepted Masons of England into a chartered body—a movement favoured by the original Grand Lodge, popular for a short period, but doomed to oblivion. The preamble of the projected Charter declared in the name of King George III that the "Society of Free and Accepted Masons have for Ages held frequent Meetings within this Realm, and have ever demeaned themselves with Duty and Loyalty to the Laws, and Kindness and Good-will to their Fellow-Subjects: and that the said Society appears to have been originally instituted for humane and beneficent Purposes, and have distributed from Time to Time to all without Distinction, who have had the single Claim of Wretchedness, Sums to a great Amount, collected by voluntary Contribution among themselves." It was then sought to set up by Royal Charter "a Perpetual Society, which shall be called by the Name of The Society of Free and Accepted Masons of England"; and the Sovereign was expected to go on to declare, "That the said Society shall consist of a Grand Lodge, with a Grand Master, Deputy Grand Master, Senior and Junior Grand Wardens, Past Grand Officers, Provincial Grand Masters, Grand Treasurer, Grand Secretary, Grand Sword Bearer, Twelve Stewards, and the Masters and Wardens of the several Lodges, who, together with those already enumerated, compose the Grand Lodge."

The present definition is supplied by the second Rule of the Book of Constitutions in the following terms: "The public interests of the Fraternity are managed by a general representation of all Private Lodges on record, together with the Grand Stewards of the Year, and the Present and Past Grand Officers, and the Grand Master at their head. This collective body is styled The United Grand Lodge of Antient, Free and Accepted Masons of England, and is hereinafter referred to as The Grand Lodge.

The composition of Grand Lodge is determined by Rule 6, which, having placed in order of rank and precedence sixty-one different classes of Present and Past Grand Officers, concludes by saying that Past Grand Stewards as are Masters or Past Masters of Private Lodges, concludes by embracing within the membership of Grand Lodge the Master, Past Masters, and Grand Stewards of the Grand Lodge of every other Private Lodge, together, by Rule 7, with certain Brethren of eminence and ability who have rendered service to the Craft, and who may, in certain circumstances, be elected to the Grand Lodge. This is a Grand Lodge that has not for many years been exercised. This present arrangement, except in one important particular, follows closely the seventh of the Articles of Union which, in 1913, united the two Grand Lodges of English Free-masons, this directing that the United Grand Lodge should be composed of Grand Officers and the actual Masters and Wardens of all Private Lodges, not more than one Past Master of a Lodge being at that time allowed to attend (with certain exceptions for pre-Union Lodges) unless he had been delegated to do so by his Lodge. The only exception to this rule is that Past Masters, each of whom, after service for a full year as Master, can attend Grand Lodge so long as he continues a subscribing member of any Private Lodge. This is how Grand Lodge is composed; and, when we come to consider its work, we find that from it all laws affecting the Craft emanate, and in every matter it has the final decision. These powers are very clearly defined by Rules 4 and 5 of the Book of Constitutions, necessary to be invoked whenever questions of Craft government or discipline are raised. The fourth Rule reads: "The Grand Lodge possesses the supreme superintending authority, and also has the inherent powers of enacting laws and regulations for the government of the Craft, and of altering, repealing, and abrogating them, always taking care that the Antient Landmarks of the Order be preserved." The Grand Lodge also has the power of investigating, regulating, and deciding all matters relative to the Craft, or to particular Lodges, or to individual Brothers, which it may exercise either of itself, by such delegates as it may appoint, or with the wisdom and discretion it may appoint; but the Grand Lodge alone has the power of erasing Lodges and expelling Brethren from the Craft, a power which it does not delegate to any subordinate authority."}

In the case of the Grand Lodge of South Australia, a meeting was called by a Past Master of one of the Lodges of that country. At this meeting a resolution was offered "that, in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable that a Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of South Australia be formed, and that immediate steps be taken to that end." An amendment was offered to the effect that the officers of the Grand Lodges of England, Scotland and Ireland must be obtained. This led to a discussion in which the following statements were made:

V. W. Brother Doctor (Seabrook, P. B. G. P. E. C.)—In reply to the amendment, I will bring forward two facts. Sometime ago, Brother Muecke applied home with a view of gaining the consent of the Scotch Grand Lodge, and the reply was that they could not, directly, neither could they assist them, and they would have their full sympathy. That was three years ago. With reference to the Grand Lodge of England, in addition to what Brother Downer did when at home, the Grand Lodge, through their managing man, the Grand Secretary, was asked the same thing, and his reply was that they could not, assist in any shape or form—they could not give their assent; but they saw that the time would come when a Grand Lodge would be formed, and, presuming that it was done regularly, they would not oppose it. With reference to the Irish Grand Lodge, I cannot say anything at all. Brother Barlow, perhaps, knows something of it. These two facts are sufficient basis to take energetic action on to form a Grand Lodge as soon as possible. They (the Grand Lodge) will not give their consent or courtesies until it becomes an actual fact that the Grand Lodge does exist. It is no use losing time. In fifty years hence the same impediment will exist as now. Brother Barlow, perhaps, knows something of it. These two facts are sufficient basis to take energetic action on to form a Grand Lodge. (Brother Lee—Have the Grand Lodges been asked by Lodges?) By their representative men. (Brother Lee—Not by authority.) Can any Brother, from Masonic authority or experience, say a Grand Lodge has been formed by consent of another? Never. All the Grand Lodges in the civilized world have been formed by taking independent action. We have a sample of it in one instance where four old Lodges formed into a Grand Lodge. In Scotland, France and elsewhere. Nobody can prevent the case of a Grand Lodge being formed by another.

Brother Hocking.—We are in the position of rebelling nations. If they form a new Government they are recognized. We must establish this Grand Lodge, and as united South Australian Lodges, pull together; then the Grand Lodges will recognize us.

—Much has been said about getting the consent of the Grand Lodges at home, but the Grand Lodges of Ireland and Scotland were formed in precisely the same way as we are doing here. It seems that we have not given our consent to the Grand Lodges, and now given, until they established themselves. This is beyond dispute (see page 236, History of South Australia).

Brother Addison:—I shall endeavour to reply to one or two points raised in the Masonic discussion. I think it is inadvisable to make ourselves contemptible by asking without the assurance of a majority, and intend to declare ourselves, and request the Grand Lodges with any disrespect. Nothing was further from my intentions than to be guilty of any breach of etiquette to those from whom we derive our Masonic heritage. Are we not doing as every Grand Lodge in the world has done? As stated by Brother Seabrook, it has never been known that any proposed Grand Lodge has asked another Grand Lodge to form it. I am only stating facts, as you look upon it as incapable of misunderstanding the idea of enforcing obedience on any Lodges in that district which did not wish to join them. They have approached this Grand Lodge in a most proper spirit. If Grand Lodge decides to accept this motion I feel sure that we shall have in South Australia a Body of Brethren who, although no longer directly subject to this Grand Lodge, will maintain and uphold the great traditions of English Masonry. I think it is not out of place to remember that our Colonies, although in civil matters possessing local self-government, have shown that they are ready to rally to the assistance of the mother country whenever they may be called upon to do so, and I am sure that that spirit would exist also in Freemasonry. I trust, Brethren, speaking individually, that this motion may be accepted unanimously, and that we may wish the Grand Lodge of Australia hearty good wishes and God speed, and that we may recognize it in a promising addition to the Grand Lodges of the World.

The motion was then put to vote and declared carried unanimously (see Proceedings of the Grand Lodge of England, page 397).

In reference to the formation of Grand Lodges in the United States, no better illustration can be given of the action of the pioneer regular Lodges in a country to form an independent Grand Lodge, than the case of the formation of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania in 1786, and its prompt recognition by the Grand Lodge of England. Proceedings had on this occasion are set out very fully in the Memorial to the Grand Lodge of South Australia (see Proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania in 1786, and its prompt recognition by the Grand Lodge of England. Proceedings had on this occasion are set out very fully in the Memorial to the Grand Lodge of South Australia). This declaration is as follows:

Resolved that this Grand Lodge is and ought to be a Grand Lodge Independent of Great Britain or any other Grand Lodge, to be called the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania in 1786, and its prompt recognition by the Grand Lodge of England. Proceedings had on this occasion are set out very fully in the Memorial to the Grand Lodge of South Australia. On page 57 of this volume, we find the Masonic Declaration of Independence, which was passed unanimously on Monday, September 25, 1786. This declaration is as follows:

Resolved that this Grand Lodge is and ought to be a Grand Lodge Independent of Great Britain or any other Grand Lodge, and now do form themselves into a Grand Lodge to be called the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania and Masonic Jurisdiction thereto belonging to be held in Philadelphia and that the late Grand Officers continue to be the Grand Officers of Pennsylvania invested with all the Powers, Jurisdictions, prominence and authority thereunto belonging, 'till the usual time for the next election, and that the Grand Lodge and the particular Lodges contained therein, shall have the same rights and privileges before established 'till other Rules and Regulations shall be adopted.
A letter was then written to the Grand Lodge of England announcing the action taken and the reasons therefor. The reply of the Grand Lodge of England was as follows:

We reflect with pleasure that the Grand Lodge of England has given birth to a Grand Lodge in the Western World, whose strict adherence to the ancient and immutable landmarks of our order reflects honor on its original founders. Here we must beg leave to state that we conceive that in constituting your Grand Lodge we necessarily communicated to it the same independent sovereign Masonic authority within your Jurisdiction which we ourselves possessed within ours, amenable to no superior Jurisdiction under Heaven, and subject only to the immutable landmarks of the craft. All Grand Lodges in Masonry being necessarily Free, Independent, and Equipollent within their respective Jurisdictions, which consequently excludes the idea of subjection to a foreign authority or the establishment of an Imperium in Imperio (Empire within Empire).

It should be noted that, in declaring their independence from the Grand Lodges of Great Britain, the prevailing motive was loyalty to the government of the land in which they lived. Inasmuch as loyalty to the State is one of the cardinal principles of Freemasonry, this action has met with universal Masonic approval.

Gould's Concise History (page 338) gives the following note which has been quoted as authority for claiming the regular Grand Lodges of the world are illegitimate:

The death of Joseph Warren raised a constitutional question of much complexity. What was the status of the Grand Lodge after the death of the Grand Master? It was disposed of by the election of Joseph Webb to the position of "Grand Master of Ancient Masonry" in the State of Massachusetts. This, if we leave out of consideration the Lodge, and Grand Lodge, of Pennsylvania in 1731, was the first sovereign and independent Grand Lodge in America and the second was the Grand Lodge of Virginia, which was established in the following year.

As a matter of fact, all that this statement was intended to mean is that the Grand Lodge could not legitimately be formed from a Provincial Grand Lodge. The death of the Grand Master of the Provincial Grand Lodge left the Grand Lodge with no executive officer until another could be appointed by the home Grand Lodge, but this difficulty was solved by the formation of a Grand Lodge and the election of Joseph Webb to the position of Grand Master of Ancient Masonry. Brother Gould nowhere states, either directly or indirectly, that this election or the action of the Lodges of Massachusetts in thus forming a Grand Lodge was illegal. In fact, he expresses states:

Within seven years after the close of the War of the Revolution, the system of Grand Lodges with Territorial Jurisdiction was firmly established. It became an accepted doctrine that the Lodges in an independent State had a right to organize a Grand Lodge; that a Lodge so created possessed exclusive jurisdiction within the State; and that it might constitute Lodges in another State in which no Grand Lodge existed, and maintain them until a Grand Lodge should be established in such State" (page 339, Gould's Concise History).

Thus he is recognizing the principle that the authority to form a Grand Lodge rests in the Lodges themselves and does not come from some outside power.

In order to provide a method by which Provincial Lodges in Colonies, still loyal to Great Britain, might legitimately become Grand Lodges, the Grand Lodge of England in 1897 adopted the following sections as a part of its Book of Constitutions. These sections in effect provide simply a means by which a proposed new Grand Lodge could determine whether or not it would be officially recognized before the final steps were taken.

218a. In a Colony or Foreign part in which a District Grand Lodge exists, if the District Grand Master shall think proper to grant a dispensation for that purpose, it shall be lawful for any Lodge to hold a special meeting, or meetings, to discuss and resolve on the question of the formation of a Sovereign Grand Lodge for or including the District or part thereof, or any Lodges not in a District. Such dispensation may be granted subject to any conditions that the District Grand Master may deem proper, and also to provisions enabling two or more Lodges to unite in the special meeting; and, if the District Grand Master should refuse to grant a dispensation, an appeal may be made to the Grand Master. In a Colony or Foreign part in which more than one District Grand Lodge exists the same provision shall be adopted in each District, and be the Grand Lodge shall be recognized as having jurisdiction over the whole of such Colony or Foreign part, the consent of each District Grand Lodge shall be certified by the District Grand Master therefor.

218b. Whenever Grand Lodge shall, with the assent of the Grand Master, recognize a Grand Lodge as regular and independent Sovereign Body, the action in any Colony or Foreign part where a District Grand Lodge or Lodges not in a District exist, and the Grand Master shall signify that it is not his intention to grant for the future any Warrant for a new Lodge in that Jurisdiction, the following rules shall apply:

1. Within six months after recognition the Master of every Lodge in such Jurisdiction shall convene a special meeting of the Lodge on not less than twenty-one days' notice to every Brother in good standing in the Lodge. It is recognized that the Lodge may not only act in the absence of the Master for good cause, but that at a special meeting held for the purpose he may be called to order, and the Grand Lodge may act and proceed.

2. The Brethren present at such meeting, whose names appear as subscribing members on the last return filed with the Grand Secretary shall decide whether they desire that the Lodge shall continue under the Grand Lodge of England or not. If the decision be to join the new Grand Lodge, the Brethren shall, at the same meeting, decide in whom the property and effects of the Lodge shall be vested, and the Warrant shall be forthwith returned to the Grand Secretary to be delivered up to the Grand Lodge, which shall, at such time as the Grand Master or the acting Deputy shall convene such meeting, and preside thereat.

3. The Brethren present at such meeting, whose names appear as subscribing members on the last return filed with the Grand Secretary shall decide whether they desire that the Lodge shall continue under the Grand Lodge of England or not. If the decision be to join the new Grand Lodge, the Brethren shall, at the same meeting, decide in whom the property and effects of the Lodge shall be vested, and the Warrant shall be forthwith returned to the Grand Secretary to be delivered up to the Grand Lodge, which shall, at such time as the Grand Master or the acting Deputy shall convene such meeting, and preside thereat.

4. Immediately after such meeting a full copy of the minutes and a list from the signature book of all members attending, together with the numbers voting for or against, shall be sent to the Grand Secretary, and verified under the hand of the presiding Master, and countersigned by the Secretary of the Lodge.

5. No second meeting shall be called to discuss the above questions without the special leave of the Grand Master.

GRAND LODGE MANUSCRIPT, NO. 1. A roll of parchment, nine inches in length and five in breadth, containing the Copyhold of the Craft and the Old Charges. It is preserved in the Archives of the Grand Lodge of England, having been bought in 1839 for £25. It was dated by its writer 1583. It has been reproduced in Hughan's Old Charges, 1872; in Sadler's Masonic Facts and Fictions, and in facsimile by Quatuor Coronati Lodge.

GRAND LODGE, REPRESENTATIVE OF.
See Representative of a Grand Lodge.

GRAND LODGE, SUPREME OR GENERAL.
See General Grand Lodge.
GRAND MASTER. The chief presiding officer of the Symbolic Degrees in a Jurisdiction. He presides, of course, over the Grand Lodge, and has the right not only to be present, but also to preside in every Lodge, with the Master of the Lodge on his left hand, and to order his Grand Wardens to attend him, and act as Wardens in that particular Lodge. He has the right of visiting the Lodges and inspecting their books and mode of work as often as he pleases, or, if unable to do so, he may depute his Grand Officers to act for him. He has the power of granting Dispensations for the formation of new Lodges; which Dispensations are of force until revoked by himself or the Grand Lodge. He may also grant Dispensations for several other purposes (see the article Dispensation). Formerly, the Grand Master appointed his Grand Officers, but this regulation has been repealed, and the Grand Officers are now all elected by the Grand Lodges, except in England, where the Grand Master appoints all but the Grand Treasurer.

When the Grand Master visits a Lodge, he must be received with the greatest respect, and the Master of the Lodge should always offer him the chair, which the Grand Master may or may not accept at his pleasure.

Should the Grand Master die, or be absent from the Jurisdiction during his term of office, the Deputy Grand Master assumes his powers, or, if there be no deputy, then the Grand Wardens according to seniority.

GRAND MASTER ARCHITECT. The French is Grand Maitre Architect. The Twelfth Degree in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. This is strictly a scientific degree, resembling in that respect the Degree of Fellow Craft. In it the principles of architecture and the connection of the liberal arts with Freemasonry are unfolded. Its officers are three—a Master, and two Wardens. The Chapter is decorated with white and red hangings, and furnished with the five orders of architecture, and a case of mathematical instruments. The apron is decorated with blue and yellow. The Jewel is a gold medal, on which are engraved the orders of architecture. It is suspended by a stone-colored ribbon.

GRAND MASTER, INHERENT RIGHTS OF. See Inherent Rights of a Grand Master.

GRAND MASTER MASON. The title given to the Grand Master in the Grand Lodge of Scotland.

GRAND MASTER OF ALL SYMBOLIC LODGES. The French title of this officer is Vénérable Maître de toutes les Loges. The Twentieth Degree in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. The presiding officer is styled Venerable Grand Master, and is assisted by two Wardens in the West. The decorations of the Lodge are blue and yellow. The old ritual contains some interesting instructions respecting the first and second Temple. Among the traditions preserved by the possessors of this Degree, is one which states that after the third Temple was destroyed by Titus, the son of Vespasian, the Christian Freemasons, who were then in the Holy Land, being filled with sorrow, departed from home with the determination of building a fourth, and that, dividing themselves into several bodies, they dispersed over the various parts of Europe. The greater number went to Scotland, and repaired to the town of Kilmarning, where they established a Lodge and built an abbey, and where the records of the Order were deposited. This tradition, preserved in the original rituals, was to Brother Mackey a very strong presump­tive evidence that the Degree owed its existence to the Templar system of Ramsay.

GRAND MASTER OF LIGHT. One of the various names bestowed on the Degree of Knight of Saint Andrew.

GRAND OFFERINGS. According to the English system of lectures, three important events recorded in Scripture are designed as the three Grand Offerings of Freemasonry, because they are said to have occurred on Mount Moriah, which symbolically repre­sents the ground floor of the Lodge. These three grand offerings are as follows: The first grand offering was when Abraham prepared to offer up his son Isaac; the second was when David built an altar to stay the pestilence with which his people were afflicted; and the third was when Solomon dedicated to Jehovah the Temple which he had completed (see Ground Floor of the Lodge).

GRAND OFFICERS. The elective officers of a superintending Masonic Body, such as Grand Lodge, Grand Chapter, etc., are so called. The appointed officers have been designated as subordinate officers, but this distinction is not always strictly observed.

GRAND ORIENT. Most of the Grand Lodges established by the Latin races, such as those of France, Spain, Italy, and the South American States, are called Grand Orientis. The word is thus, in one sense, synonymous with Grand Lodge; but these Grand Orientis have often a more extensive obedience than Grand Lodges, frequently exercising jurisdiction over the highest Degrees, from which English and American Grand Lodges refrain. Thus, the Grand Orient of France exercises jurisdiction not only over the seven Degrees of its own Rite, but also over the thirty-three of the Ancient and Accepted, and over all the other Rites which are practised in France by the Brethren of its Obedience.

Grand Orient is also used in English, and especially in American, Freemasonry to indicate the seat of the Grand Lodge of highest Masonic power, and is thus equivalent to Grand East, which see.

GRAND PONTIFF. The French title is Grand Pontife ou Sublime Ecossais. The Nineteenth Degree is occupied in an examination of the Apocalyptic mysteries of the New Jerusalem. Its officers are a Thrice Puissant and one Warden. The Thrice Puissant is seated in the East on a throne canopied with blue, and wears a white satin robe. The Warden is in the West, and holds a staff of gold. The members are clothed in white, with blue fillets embroidered with twelve stars of gold, and are called True and Faithful Brothers. The decorations of the Lodge are blue sprinkled with gold stars.

GRAND PRINCIPALS. The first three officers of the Grand Chapter of England are so called. They are respectively designated as Z., H., and J., meaning Zerubbabel, Haggai, and Joshua.

GRAND PRIOR. There are two available explanations of this title.

1. Each chief or conventual bailiff of the eight Grand Chapters of England was called a Grand Prior. There were also other Grand Priors, under whom were several Commanderies. The Grand Priors of the Order were twenty-six in number.

2. The third officer in the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States (see Prior).

GRAND SECRETARIES GUILD, MASONIC. See Masonic Grand Secretaries Guild.

GRAND SECRETARY. The recording and corresponding officer of a Grand Lodge, whose signature must be attached to every document issued from the Grand Lodge; where there is no Grand Register or Keeper of the Seals, he is the Custodian of the Seal of the Grand Lodge. The Regulations of 1722 had provided for the office, but no appointment was made until 1728, when William Cooper was chosen by the Grand Lodge. The office was therefore at first an elective one, but Anderson, in his edition of 1738 (page 161), says that "ever since, the new Grand Master, upon his commencement, appoints the Secretary, or continues him by returning him the books.” This usage is still pursued by the modern Grand Lodge of England; but in every Jurisdiction of the United States the office of Grand Secretary is an elective one. The jewel of the Grand Secretary is a circle enclosing two pens crossed. His badge of office was formerly a bag (see Bag).

GRAND STEWARDS. Officers of a Grand Lodge, whose duty it is to prepare and serve at the Grand Feast. This duty was at first performed by the Grand Wardens, but in 1721 they were authorized “to take some Stewards to their assistance” (see Constitutions, 1738, page 112). This was sometimes done and sometimes omitted, so that often there were no Stewards. In 1728 (see Constitutions, 1738, page 123), the Stewards, to the number of twelve, were made permanent officers; and it was resolved that in future, at the annual election, each Steward should nominate his successor. At present, in the Grand Lodge of England, nineteen Grand Stewards are annually appointed from nineteen different Lodges. Each Lodge recommends one of its subscribing members, who is nominated by the former Steward of that Lodge, and the appointment is made by the Grand Master. The number of Grand Stewards in the United States seldom exceeds two, and the appointment is made in some Grand Lodges by the Grand Master, and in others by the Junior Grand Warden. The jewel of a Grand Steward is a cornucopia within a circle, the cornucopia being the horn of plenty, representing peace and prosperity, the circle meaning endless, and his badge of office a white rod.

GRAND STEWARDS LODGE. According to the Constitutions of England, the past and present Grand Stewards constitute a Lodge, which has no number, but is registered in the Grand Lodge books at the head of all other Lodges. It is represented in the Grand Lodge by its Master, Wardens, and Past Masters, but has no power of making Freemasons. The institution has not been introduced into this country except in the Grand Lodge of Maryland, where the Grand Stewards’ Lodge has acted as a Committee of Grievances during the recess of the Grand Lodge.

GRAND TILER. An officer who performs in a Grand Lodge the same duties that a Tiler does in a subordinate Lodge. The Grand Tiler is prohibited from being an active member of the Grand Lodge, because his duties outside of the door prevent his taking part in the deliberations of the Body.
GRAND TREASURER. The office of Grand Treasurer was provided for by the Regulations of 1722, and in 1724, on the organization of the Committee of Charity, it was enacted that a Treasurer should be appointed. But it was not until 1727 that the office appears to have been really filled by the selection of Nathaniel Blakerby. As he was elected Deputy Grand Master in the same year, and yet continued to perform the duties of Treasurer, it does not appear to have been considered as a distinct appointment. In 1738, he dismissed the office, when Revis, the Grand Secretary, was appointed. But he declined on the ground that the offices of Secretary and Treasurer should not be held by the same person—"the one being a check on the other" (see Constitutions, 1738, page 184). So that, in 1739, it was made a permanent office of the Grand Lodge by the appointment of Brother John Lesse. It is an elective office; and it was provided, by the Old Regulations, that he should be "a Brother of good worldly substance." The duties are similar to those of the Treasurer of a subordinate Lodge. The jewel is a circle enclosing two keys crossed, or in saltire. According to ancient custom, his badge of office was a white staff, but this is generally disused in the United States.

GRAND WARDENS. The Senior and Junior Grand Wardens are the third and fourth officers of a Grand Lodge. Their duties do not differ very materially from those of the corresponding officers of a subordinate Lodge, but their powers are of course more extensive.

The Grand Wardens succeed to the government of the Craft, in order of rank, upon the death or absence from the Jurisdiction of the Grand and Deputy Grand Masters (see Succession to the Chair).

It is also their prerogative to accompany the Grand Master in his visitations of the Lodges, and when there to act as his Wardens. In the absence of the Senior Grand Warden, the Junior does not occupy the West, but retains his position in the South. Having been elected and installed to preside in the South, and to leave that station only for the East, the temporary vacancy in the West must be supplied by the appointment by the Grand Master of some other Brother (see Wardens).

On the same principle, the Senior Grand Warden does not supply the place of the absent Deputy Grand Master, but retains his station in the West.

The Old Charges of 1722 required that no one could be a Grand Warden until he has been the Master of a Lodge. The rule still continues in force, either by specific regulations or by the force of usage.

By the Regulations of 1721, the Grand Master nominated the Grand Wardens, but if his nomination was not approved, the Grand Lodge proceeded to an election. By the present Constitutions of England the power of appointment is vested absolutely in the Grand Master. In the United States the Grand Wardens are elected by the Grand Lodge.

GRASSE TILLY, ALEXANDRE FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE, COMTE DE. He was the son of the Comte de Grasse who commanded the French fleet that had been sent to the assistance of the Americans in their revolutionary struggle. De Grasse Tilly was born at Versailles, in France, about the year 1766. He was initiated in the Mother Scottish Lodge du Contrat Social, and subsequently, going over to America, resided for some time in the island of St. Domingo, whence he removed to the city of Charleston, in South Carolina, where, in 1796, he affiliated with the French Lodge la Candeur. In 1799, he was one of the founders of the Lodge la Rénovation Française, of which he was at one time the Venerable or Master. In 1802, the Comte de Grasse was a member of the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, which had been established the year before at Charleston; and in the same year he received a Patent as Grand Commander for life of the French West India islands. In 1802 he returned to St. Domingo, and established a Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite at Port au Prince. In 1804 he went to Europe, and labored with great energy for the extension of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. On September 22, 1804, he founded at Paris a Supreme Council, of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, of which Body he was, until 1806, the Grand Commander. On March 5, 1805, he organized a Supreme Council at Milan, in Italy, and on July 4, 1811, another at Madrid, in Spain. The Comte de Grasse was an officer in the French army, and was taken prisoner by the English and detained in England until 1815, when he returned to Paris. He immediately resumed his functions as Grand Commander of a Body which took the unauthorized pretentious title of the Supreme Council of America. For several years Scottish Freemasonry in France was convulsed with dissensions, which De Grasse vainly labored to reconcile. Finally, in 1818, he resigned his post as Grand Commander, and was succeeded by the Comte Deceazs. From that period he appears to have passed quietly out of the Masonic history of France, and probably died soon after.

GRAVE. The grave is, in the Master's Degree, the analogue of the pastos, couch or coffin, in the Ancient Mysteries, and is intended scenically to serve the same purpose. The grave is, therefore, in that Degree, intended, in connection with the sprig of acacia, to teach symbolically the great Masonic doctrine of a future life.

GRAVELOT. The name of the second of the three conspirators in the Master's Degree, according to the Adonhiramate Rite. The others are Romvel and Abiram. The etymology of Gravelot is unknown.

GREAT ARCHITECT OF THE UNIVERSE. The title applied in the technical language of Freemasonry to the Deity. It is appropriate that a society founded on the principles of architecture, which symbolizes the terms of that science to moral purposes, and whose members profess to be the architects of a spiritual temple, should view the Divine Being, under whose holy law they are constructing that edifice, as their Master Builder or Great Architect. Sometimes, but less correctly, the title Grand Architect of the Universe is found.

Such was the opinion of Brother Mackey but it is worth while to note the evidence to the contrary. Great is said of that which is more than ordinarily powerful and influential, grand of that which is worthy so.

In the late eighteenth century the term Great Architect of the Universe had not become crystallized.
In the Book of Constitutions, Antient Charge I, certainly not later than 1815, we find the Glorius Architect of Heaven and Earth, and it is still extant in the Antient Charges we are still bound by. The term as we otherwise use it can be traced back but probably it was not general. Wellsen Calcott's Candid Disquisition of Masonry, 1769, uses the terms Great Architect, Chief Architect, Most Holy and Glorious Lord God, Thou Architect of Heaven and Earth. The prayers of some of them he refers to are purely Christian. He gives a charge delivered by Thomas Dunckerley, September 11, 1769, at Marlborough, wherein occurs the term Grand Architect of the Universe. Preston, first edition, Illustrations of Masonry, 1772, follows Calcott to some extent. He speaks of Almighty Author of the World. An examination of later editions would substantially show the term Grand was still in use. Brother Sandby was appointed by the Grand Lodge to be Grand Architect as a personal mark of distinction but it died with him in 1779. On the revision of Constitutions, Ritual, etc., in 1814 after the Union, much which had been used before was discarded. Brother J. Walter Hobbs has examined a Manuscript series of Lectures, Prayers and Addresses to officers, copied in 1849, apparently used in Lodge. These are largely Preston's with some Calcott's altered a bit here and there. Here are used terms such as God the Grand Geometrician of the Universe whose Son died for us and rose again; Great Architect of the Universe in whose image we were first formed; Divine Architect. In a Prayer to the Fellow Craft Degree appears O Thou Supreme Grand Ruler of the Universe, and O Thou Supreme Grand Master. In the Prayer to the Master Mason Degree we have O Thou blessed and glorious Lord God, coequal, coeternal, omniscient.

GREAT LIGHTS. See Lights, Greater; Bible; Square and Compasses.

GREAT PRIORY. The ruling Body of the Order of the Temple for England, Wales, and Canada is so called.

GREECE. A Lodge working under the Grand Orient of France was in existence at Corfu in 1809 and there was another one under the same authority acting in Athens. The Grand Orient of France also chartered in 1843 at Corfu a Lodge, Le Phoenix, which continues to be active, with Lodge Veritas at Saloniki in 1904. The first English Lodge was Pythagoras, No. 654, chartered in 1836 at Corfu. The Grand Lodge of France chartered a Lodge, L'Avenir de l'Orient, The Future East, at Saloniki in 1907. The Grand Orient of Italy has chartered two Lodges at Saloniki and the Grand Orient of Portugal has also organized a Lodge at Saloniki. The claim has been made that a Grand Orient of Greece existed in 1814 and that a Grand Lodge of Greece in 1840 had as Grand Master Angelo Calichipullo, but the latter organization soon became extinct and nothing is known of its history. A Provincial Grand Lodge was organized in 1866 by the Grand Orient of Italy. Steps were taken in 1867 to reorganize these Lodges into a Grand Lodge of Greece and in July, 1872, Prince Dimitrius Rhodocanaki of Selo was made Grand Master, and at the same time a Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite was established with the seat of both Bodies at Athens. Sundry complications brought about the closing down of the Lodges but in 1906 a committee of the several Worshipful Masters was convened to reorganize both the Grand Orient and the Supreme Council, and recreate the former activity. The present Grand Orient of Greece operates with the Supreme Hellenic Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite and has founded Lodges in Constantinople, Alexandria, Smyrna, Cyprus and other places on the Mediterranean Sea.

GREECE, MYSTERIES IN. The principal Pagan mysteries celebrated in Greece were the Eleusinian and the Bacchic (see Eleusinian Mysteries).

GREEN. Green, as a Masonic color, is almost confined to the four Degrees of Perfect Master, Knight of the East, Knight of the Red Cross, and Prince of Mercy. In the Degree of Perfect Master it is a symbol of the moral resurrection of the candidate, teaching him that being dead to vice he should hope to revive in virtue.

In the Degree of Knight of the Red Cross, this color is employed as a symbol of the immutable nature of truth, which, like the bay tree, will ever flourish in immortal green.

This idea of the unchanging mortality of that which is divine and true, was always connected by the ancients with the color of green. Among the Egyptians, the god Phtha, the active spirit, the creator and regenerator of the world, the goddess Pascht, the Divine preserver, and Thoth, the instructor of men in the sacred doctrines of truth, were all painted in the hieroglyphic system with green flesh.

Portal says, in his essay on Symbolic Colors, that "green was the symbol of victory"; and this reminds us of the motto of the Red Cross Knights, "magna est veritas et praevalebit," meaning—great is truth and mighty above all things; and hence green is the symbolic color of that Degree.

In the Degree of Prince of Mercy, or the Twenty-sixth Degree of the Scottish Rite, green is also symbolic of truth, and is the appropriate color of the Degree, because truth is there said to be the palladium or safeguard of the Order.

In the Degree of Knight of the East, in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, green is also the symbolic color. We may very readily suppose, from the close connection of this Degree in its ritual with that of the Companion of the Red Cross, that the same symbolic explanation of the color would apply to both, and Brother Mackey was of opinion that such an explanation might very properly be made; but it is generally supposed by its possessors that the green of the Knights of the East alludes to the waters of the river Euphrates, and hence its symbolism is not moral but historical.

The evergreen of the Third Degree is to the Master Mason an emblem of immortality. Green was with the Druids a symbol of hope, and the virtue of hope with a Freemason illustrates the hope of immortality. In all the Ancient Mysteries, this idea was carried out, and green symbolized the birth of the world, and the moral creation or resurrection of the initiate. If we apply this to the evergreen of the Master Mason we shall again find a resemblance, for the acacia is emblematic of a new creation of the body, and a moral and physical resurrection.
GREEN DRAGON TAVERN. Known also as Freemason’s Arms, a famous building in Boston, Massachusetts, on what was later on Union Street near the corner of Hanover Street. An account of this celebrated Masonic resort was written for the centenary occasion by Brother Charles W. Moore for the Lodge of Saint Andrew and was printed, 1870. Brother Moore was Recording Grand Secretary of Massachusetts, 1834-67, and edited Masonic journals, 1825-73. The Green Dragon Tavern was bought on March 31, 1764, for the Lodge of Saint Andrew, a Committee for that purpose being appointed on January 12. The Tavern’s hall was a suitable and preferred location for the political clubs of the time and Elliott’s History of New England, says “Among the most active of the Sons of Liberty was Paul Revere. In the fall and winter of 1774-5, some of the best Boston mechanics formed themselves into a club to watch the doings of the British soldiers. They were ‘High Sons of Liberty’ and men of action, who met at the Green Dragon Tavern, and every man swore on the Bible that nothing should be revealed except to Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Doctor Warren, and Doctor Church.” An authentic record of the persons taking part in the various activities planned at the Green Dragon Tavern, such as the Boston Tea Party of 1773, is not available for obvious reasons. A comparison of several published lists with the roster of the Lodge found a number of names identical in both. Daniel Webster, at Andover, Massachusetts, 1843, called the Green Dragon Tavern the headquarters of the American Revolution and speaks particularly of two members of the Lodge of Saint Andrew, “It was there, in Union Street, that John Gray, Paul Revere, and others of their class met for consultation.” Edward Everett, another American orator, at Lexington, April 19, 1835, dealing with the war and its genesis, tells of bringing the question “home to bosoms and firesides, not by profound disquisitions and elaborate reports—though these in their place were not spared—but in caucuses, the club rooms, at the Green Dragon, in the shipyards, in actual conference, man to man and heart to heart.” And noting the pertinence of this reference we can the more easily see the relation of the Lodge and its members to these stirring times (see Boston Tea Party).

GREENE, GENERAL NATHANIEL. Famous Revolutionary War General, born August 7, 1742; died June 19, 1786. Member of a Lodge in Rhode Island, wore a Masonic emblem around his neck all through the Revolution, and Brother Roth (Masonry in the Formation of Our Government, 1927, page 90) says: “The Grand Tyler of the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island states that they have in their possession a Masonic medal once worn by General Greene.” The Government has erected an equestrian statue to this distinguished soldier at Washington, District of Columbia (see New Age, August, 1924).

GREENLEAF, LAWRENCE NICHOLS. Born October 4, 1838, in Boston, Massachusetts, in which city he was initiated into the Masonic Fraternity by Columbian Lodge, March, 1863. Later in this year he went West and arriving at Denver he affiliated with Denver Lodge No. 5, where he retained membership until his death. At Denver he was in the mercantile business until 1893 when he purchased, edited and published the Masonic magazine Square and Compass, which he continued until 1917 when failing health forced him to retire. Senior Warden, 1865, and Worshipful Master in 1866, 1868, 1869, 1877 and 1878 of Denver Lodge No. 5. Made a Royal Arch Mason in Denver Royal Arch Chapter No. 2, April 18, 1864, was High Priest in 1867 and 1868, elected Grand High Priest of Colorado in 1885. Received Degrees of the Cryptic Rite in Boston Council, 1868, charter member of Denver Council No. 1 and Master in 1901, elected Grand Master of the Grand Council of Colorado in 1907. Created a Knight Templar in DeMolay Commandery at Boston, June 12, 1868, affiliated with Colorado Commandery No. 1, July 17, 1883, and elected Commander in 1890, served as Recorder from 1895 to 1913. He received the Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite from Brother Albert G. Mackey. He initiated and was the principal factor in the organization of this Rite in Denver, was a charter member of each of the several Bodies and presiding officer of each. Albert Pike, Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite, appointed him Deputy for Colorado in 1878, a post he held for many years. He received the Thirty-third Degree, October 19, 1880. Elected Junior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Colorado, at Central City, October 2, 1886, and re-elected, September 17, 1878. On September 16, 1879, he was elected Senior Grand Warden, and on September 21, 1880, Grand Master. Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Correspondence of the Grand Lodge in 1870, 1878, 1882 and 1885, and from 1889 to September, 1917, when ill-health necessitated his giving up this work. For years he was Chairman of the Committee on Necrology in the Grand Lodge. His distinction among Freemasons is not based merely upon the Degrees and offices which he held as he was an author of fine ability and a prolific poet. His centennial poem at Philadelphia in 1876 was one of the features of that occasion. His best known Masonic poem is the Lodge-Room Over Simpkins’ Store, published in the Square and Compass in 1898 (see Poetry of Freemasonry), and in another entitled Hands Across the Sea, written in 1912, he seems to have had a prophetetic vision of the war clouds hovering near. Brother Greenleaf died on October 25, 1922, and a memorial was read in every Lodge in the entire State of Colorado to honor him who wrote:

LIVE ON, O MASONRY!

Live on! O Masonry, live on! Thy work hath scarce begun;
Live on! nor end, if end there be, till earth’s last setting sun.
Live on! thy work in ages past hath but prepared the way:
For every truth thy symbols teach there’s presssing need today.
In cultured or unlettered age humanity’s the same,
And evermore the passions rage whose furies thou wouldst tame;
Wouldst but the nations head thy Plumb—war’s carnage soon would end, Thy Trowel rivals subdue, thy Square to virtue tend,
Thy Level spread that true cement which doth all hearts unite.
And darkness comprehend and glow with thy immortal Light.
Live on, O Masonry, live on!
GREETING. This word means salutation, and under the form of “Thrice Greeting,” it is very common at the head of Masonic documents. In the beginning of the eighteenth century it was usual at the meeting of Freemasons to say, “God’s good greeting be to this our happy meeting.” Browne gives the formula as practised in 1800: “The recommendation I bring is from the Right Worthy and Worshipful Brothers and Fellows of the Holy Lodge of Saint John, who greet your Worship well.” This formula is obsolete, but the word greeting is still in use among Freemasons. In Masonic documents it is sometimes found in the form of S: S: S:, which three letters are the initials of the Latin word salutem or health, three times repeated, and therefore equivalent to Thrice Greeting. In European Lodges, especially in England, a brief but most acceptable response to the usually few but always very cordial words of welcome to any visiting official is “Brethren, I greet you well.”

GRENIERANS. An association established early in the eighteenth century in ridicule of and in opposition of the Freemasons. There was some feud between the two Orders, but the Grenierians at last succumbed, and long ago became extinct. They lasted, however, at least until the end of the century, for there is extant a Sermon preached before them in 1797. They must, too, by that time, have changed their character, for Prince William Frederick of Gloucester was then their presiding officer; and Doctor Munkhouse, the author of that sermon, who was a very ardent Freemason, speaks in high terms of the Order as an ally of Freemasonry, and distinguished for its “benign tendency and salutary effects.”

GREINEMANN, LUDWIG. A Dominican monk, who, while preaching a course of Lenten sermons at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1779, endeavored to prove that the Jews who crucified Jesus were Freemasons; that Judas, before he betrayed his Lord, had threatened, if his followers would assist him, he would slay every Freemason he met with his own hand, so excited the people that the magistrates were compelled to issue an edict for the destruction of Masons in North America. The Boston Marine Society, formerly the Fellowship Club, on February 26, 1754, in acknowledgment of his services, voted him the “freedom of the society for life.” Prior to May 19, 1755, Brother Gridley moved to Brookline and on May 25, 1767, he was appointed King’s Attorney General. From 1767 his health failed and the last time he presided over Grand Lodge was January 23, 1767. His death occurred September 10, 1767, when he was Grand Master of Freemasons, Attorney General for the Province of Massachusetts Bay, a member of the Great and General Court of the Province and a Justice, Colonel of the First Regiment of Militia, President of the Marine Society, Selectman and Assessor of Brookline. The following was written in memory of Brother Gridley by James Otis, an eminent lawyer, raised in the Masters Lodge on January 4, 1754:

Of Parts and Learning, Wit and Worth possess’d, Gridley shone forth conspicuous o’er the rest:
In native Powers robust, and smit with Fame;
Nature and Science wove the laurel Crown Ambitious, each alike, conferr’d Renown.
High in the Dignity and Strength of Thought,
The Maze of Knowledge sedulous he sought.
Gay e’en in Dignity, with Wisdom grave;
Alert to Friendship, with the ties of Blood
Awake to every Sport, by Nature planned.
His Heart expanded, and his Soul o’erflow’d.
Rest! Peaceful Shade! innoxious as they Walk
But human Frailties in thy Worth forgot.
Ne’er on thy Mem’ry cast a Blot—

Brother Riddell brought ideal qualifications to the task, brilliantly embellishing the revised work with genius fanciful and sparkling, and inspiring much of the showy dash, urge and glitter. His suggestion was that the characters be given mythological names. This idea worked out splendidly though it makes no claim to be Freemasonry. So the Order came: Mystic in its subtle lessons as in its form; Veiled because no human heart stands all revealed; of an En¬ chanted Realm, because who does not know how duties wear and sorrows burden in any unenchanted realm?
If Rites are framed to teach higher speculative tenets—and we have them, so too may Rites well be framed to

The Grand Alchemist has tested it; it is elixir.

The origin and development of the Order is ex¬ plained at length in Doctor Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry (pages 1894–91). The Grotto was born of an effort for stronger sociability among the Brethren of Hamilton Lodge No. 120, Free and Accepted Masons, Hamilton, New York. The very informality did not tend to the keeping of complete records but any uncertainty later about the facts was met by the circumstance that several of the original members long continued their able activities in the Grotto, Brother Sidney D. Smith becoming the Grand Secretary. Brother LeRoy Fairchild and other Brethren of Hamilton Lodge had often met for fun and frolic. Their lively social relations, sometimes mischievous but never mean, resulted during the summer of 1889 in an initiation promising rich enjoyment. This project received a warm welcome and a more permanent organization seemed neces¬
ary. September 10, 1889, there was an organization meeting held in the Masonic Hall at Hamilton of the following Brethren: LeRoy Fairchild, George Beal, Smith, H. S. Gardiner, C. J. Griswold, Robert Patterson, A. M. Russell, John A. Holmgren, John F.
Howe, G. G. Waldron, and Edwin L. Feet. At this first meeting the following officers were elected:
LeRoy Fairchild, K. D.; B. J. Stimson, C. J.; George and Sidney D. Smith, Secretary.

there was scarcely anything of classical mythology in the drama. Prophet George Beal was the author of the original Ritual and received valuable assistance from Brother Riddell and others in working out the first revision but all the later work was done by him alone. The pioneer labor of Brother Beal survived. Brother Smith says that none of the changes since made in the Ritual disturbed the main lines laid down by Brother Beal.

The services of Prophet Beal were officially recognized by the Supreme Council at the Annual Session held in June, 1917, at Washington, District of Columbia, when a suitable resolution was unanimously adopted and a Committee comprising Past Grand Monarchs Charles E. Lansing, Hiram D. Rogers and J. F. McGregory was appointed to have it engrossed and presented. The following quotation is from this testimonial:

Resolved, that the Supreme Council in conjunction with all Veiled Prophets of the Realm do assure our worthy and esteemed Prophet George Beal of our appreciation of his work as Committee on Ritual, embracing as it does all the essential and beautiful effects of the Order, the promulgation of which has been a potent factor and conducive to the advancement and upbuilding of the Order.

Brother Smith contradicts the statement that the Grotto was founded on Chapter Twenty-four of the ancient Egyptian Book of the Dead, as the original Ritual will show. A copy of this as well as every revised edition is preserved in the safe of the Grand Secretary and nearly all are in the handwriting of Prophet George Beal who, Brother Smith tells us, never saw the Egyptian Book of the Dead. Minor modifications became advisable and another Committee was appointed. This comprised Brothers LeRoy Fairchild, George Beal, W. C. Eaton, and J. F. McGregory. They eliminated some features and some additions were made by this Committee, and these proved most acceptable. These amendments were adopted. Thereby the Supreme Council of the Mystic Order of Veiled Prophets of the Enchanted Realm was duly set in operation on Friday, June 13, 1890, to carry systematically onward to Master Obligation presented by Brother W. C. Eaton was formally adopted, and on his motion also, the Deputy Grand Monarch, the Deputy Grand Chief Justice and the Deputy Grand Master of Ceremonies were appointed a Committee to act upon reports submitted by various Committees of the Supreme Council. After a banquet in the evening, the Supreme Council adjourned to the following afternoon of June 14, 1890, at 3 p.m., when Deputy Grand Monarch LeRoy Fairchild installed Brother Thomas L. James as Grand Monarch of the Mystic Order of Veiled Prophets of the Enchanted Realm. At this session the seal and badge of the Order were adopted. The turbans of the Veiled Prophets were by resolution at a later session of 1890 permitted to be of any color a Grotto might select but to be used with a silver veil. All turbans of the same Grotto were to be alike as to color, but no purple to be worn except by members of the Supreme Council.

The Supreme Council meeting at the Masonic Hall, Hamilton, June 11, 1891, was memorable because a Dispensation for the second Grotto was granted. This Body received a Charter from the Supreme Council June 9, 1892, as Xhorassan Grotto, No. 2, of Ilion, New York, and at the same session a Charter was issued to Zeba Grotto, No. 4, at Rome in that State. Dispensations had previously been given on August 26, 1891, to Lalla Rookh Grotto, No. 3, of Rochester, New York, and to Zeba Grotto, Lalla Rookh receiving a Charter on June 27, 1893, at the first New York City meeting of the Supreme Council when a Charter was also issued to Mirzola Grotto, No. 5, at Amsterdam, New York. Hiawatha Grotto, No. 8, at Anoka, Minnesota; Azim Grotto, No. 7, of New York City, and Shiras Grotto, No. 8, at Antwerp, New York, were granted Dispensations at this session. founder and constant inspiration of the Grotto was of the Supreme Council on June 6, 1895. The genial institution of the Supreme Council up to his death. 51 years. He was Deputy Grand Monarch from the annual sessions from June 14, 1894, to October 31, 1899. He was also Monarch of Azim Grotto, No. 7. A revision of the Constitution and Statutes, and a Password were adopted at the New York City session of the Supreme Council on June 6, 1895. The genial founder and constant inspiration of the Grotto was Brother LeRoy Fairchild who died at his home in Hamilton, New York, January 23, 1897, aged but 51 years. He was Deputy Grand Monarch from the institution of the Supreme Council up to his death. Brother George F. Loder of Rochester, New York, was Grand Monarch in 1901 and 1902. He presided at the Buffalo session on October 19, 1900, of the Supreme Council, Grand Monarch Adon Smith dying in his 65th year on June 13, 1900, the tenth anniversary of the organization of the Supreme Council.

Grand Secretary Sidney D. Smith resigned his office at the annual meeting in June, 1924, and was succeeded in that position by Brother George Edward Hatch of Rochester, New York, a Past Grand Monarch of 1910. In the Proceedings, Thirteenth Annual Convention, 1902, there is a tribute on pages 126–7 to Brother Smith by his old associate, Prophet George Beal, from which the following extract is taken: “Grand Monarch Balston in writing on this matter said, ‘Surely, no one is more entitled to recognition than our Grand Secretary who by his zealous work in the cause has done so much toward the success of the Order.’ To be thus mentioned by the Grand Monarch is indeed a distinguished honor, but it is no more than is justly due Sidney D. Smith for the eminent ability, zeal and fidelity with which he has ever discharged his duties as Grand Secretary.” Of this we also bear tribute for he generously co-operated in making this account of the Grotto accurate and complete. Brother Smith died on November 12, 1924.

GROUND FLOOR OF KING SOLOMON’S TEMPLE. This is said to have been a Mosaic pavement, consisting of black and white stones laid lozenge-wise, and surrounded by a tesselated border. The tradition of the Order is that Entered Apprentices Lodges were held on the ground floor of King Solomon’s Temple; and hence a Mosaic pavement, or a carpet representing one, is a very common decoration of Masonic Lodges (see Mosaic Pavement and Grand Offerings).

GROUND FLOOR OF THE LODGE. Mount Moriah, on which the Temple of Solomon was built, is symbolically called the ground floor of the Lodge, and hence it is said that “the Lodge rests on holy ground.” This ground floor of the Lodge is remarkable for three great events recorded in Scripture, which are called the three grand offerings of Freemasonry. It was here that Abraham prepared, as a token of his faith, to offer up his beloved son Isaac—this was the first grand offering; it was here that David, when his people were afflicted with pestilence, built an altar, and offered thereon peace-offerings and burnt-offerings to appease the wrath of God—this was the second grand offering; and lastly, it was here that when the Temple was completed, King Solomon dedicated that magnificent structure to the service of Jehovah, with the offering of pious prayers and many costly presents—and this was the third grand offering. This sacred spot was once the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite, and from him David purchased it for fifty shekels of silver. The Cabalists delight to invest it with still more solemn associations, and declare that it was the spot on which Adam was created and Abel slain (see Holy Ground).

GRUMBACH, SYLVESTER. Mentioned in the legend of the Strict Observance, and was the reputed Grand Master of the Templars from 1330 to 1332, and the twenty-second Grand Master.

GUARD. See Due Guard.

GUARD OF THE CONCLAVE. See Knight of the Christian Mark.

GUARDS. Officers used in working the ceremonies of the Red Cross and Templar Degrees. They do not constitute regular officers of a Council or Commandery, but are appointed for a particular purpose.

GUATEMALA. A republic of Central America. The Grand Orient of Colombia organized in 1881 Constance Lodge at Cartagena. This divided into three others affiliated with the Grand Orient of Central America.

On October 20, 1903, the Grand Orient of Guatemala was opened at Guatemala City.

GUERRIER DE DUMAST. A distinguished French Freemason, born at Nancy on February 26, 1796. He was the author of a poem entitled La Maçonnerie, in three cantos, enriched with historical, etymological, and critical notes, published in 1820. For this work he received from the Lodge Freres Artistes, Brother Artists, of which he was the Orator, a gold medal. He was the author of several other works, both Masonic and secular.

GUGLIELMUS TYRIUS. Wrote a history of the crusades having many references to the Knights Templar. An edition of this work was published at London in 1640.

GUGOMOS, BARON VON. An impostor in Freemasonry, who, in 1775, appeared in Germany, and, being a member of the Order of Strict Observance, claimed that he had been delegated by the Unknown Superiors of the Holy See, or principal office, at Cyprus to establish a new Order of Knights Templars. Calling himself Duz, or the Ruler, and High Priest, he convoked a Masonic Congress at Wiesbaden, which, notwithstanding the warning of Doctor Bode, was attended by many influential members of the Fraternity. His pretensions were so absurd, that at length his imposture was detected, and he escaped secretly out of Wiesbaden. In 1786, Gugomos confessed the imposition, and, it is said, asserted that he had been employed as a tool by the Jesuits to perform this part, that Freemasonry might be injured.

GUIANA. See British Guiana, Cayenne, and Surinam.
GUILBBS. The names given to the Assassins of the Third Degree by some of the inventors of the advanced Degrees, are of so singular a form as to have almost irresistibly led to the conclusion that these names were bestowed by the adherents of the house of Stuart upon some of their enemies as marks of infamy. Such, for instance, is Bowed, the name of one of the Assassins in certain Scottish Degrees, which is probably a corruption of Cromwell. Jubulum Guibbs, another name of one of these traitors, has much puzzled the Masonic etymologists. Brother Mackey believed that he had found its origin in the name of the Rev. Adam Gib, who was an antiburgher clergyman of Edinburgh. When that city was taken possession of by the young Pretender, Charles Edward in 1745, the clergy generally fled. But Gib removed only three miles from the city, where, collecting his loyal congregation, he hurled anathemas for five successive Sundays against the Pretender, and boldly prayed for the downfall of the rebellion. He subsequently joined the loyal army, and at Falkirk took a rebel prisoner. So active was Gib in his opposition to the cause of the house of Stuart, and so obnoxious had he become, that several attempts were made by the rebels to take his life. On Charles Edward’s return to France, he erected in 1747 his Primordial Chapter at Arras; and in the composition of the advanced Degrees there practised, it is very probable that he bestowed the name of his old enemy Gib on the most atrocious of the Assassins who figure in the legend of Third Degree. The letter u was doubtless inserted to prevent the French, in pronouncing the name, from falling into the soft sound of the g and called the word Jib. The additional b and s were the natural and customary results of a French attempt to spell a foreign proper name (see Arras, Primordial Chapter of).

An old handbook in French, Thuleus des Trente-Trois Degres de l’Ecosisme, published in 1815 at Paris, mentions on page 79 that some had derived the word Jabulum from Zabulon, a Hebrew word meaning habitation.

GUICHARD, JEAN FRANCOIS. A famous literary Freemason; born at Chartrettes, near Melun, France, May 5, 1731; died there on February 23, 1811. He wrote a number of books including some comic operas and sprightly verse. His name is on both lists of the Lodge of the Nine Sisters for 1806, as having taken part in the Lodge after its revival but he is also on the roster for 1779 (see Une Loge Magonnaique, Louis Amiable, 1897, pages 298 and 313).

GUILD, MASONIC GRAND SECRETARIES. See Masonic Grand Secretaries Guild.

GUILLEMAIN DE ST. VICTOR, LOUIS. A distinguished French writer, who published several works on Freemasonry, the most valuable and best known of which is his Recueil Precieux de la Magonnaire Adonhiramite, meaning Choice Selections of Adonhiramate Masonry, first issued at Paris in 1782. This work, which several editions were published, contains the catechisms of the first four Degrees of Adonhiramite Freemasonry, and an account of several other Degrees, and is enriched with many learned notes. Ragon, who speaks highly of the work, erroneously attributes its authorship to the celebrated Baron de Tschoudy.

GUILLOTIN, DOCTOR JOSEPH IGNACE. Famous French physician and zealous Freemason. Born at Saintes, May 28, 1738; died at Paris, March 28, 1814. Often credited with inventing the guillotine, a machine for beheading those condemned to death in France, but this is untrue; neither did he die by this means, as has been asserted. As Deputy to the Assembly, he urged, on December 1, 1789, that capital punishment should be inflicted as speedily and painlessly as possible, and argued for a machine. Although such contrivances were not new, and in fact the one adopted at the time was perfected by Antoine Louis, secretary of the Academy of Surgeons, and a mechanic, Schmidt, the machine unjustly bears the name of him who pleaded for its use on humane grounds. One of the founders of the Grand Orient of France, Doctor Guillotin was first the Orator of the Chamber of the Provinces, becoming President, October 27, 1775, and was Worshipful Master of Concorde Fraternelle Lodge at Paris, his name being on the list of Lodges for 1776 with the address “at Schools of Medicine,” and among the officers of the Grand Orient, that year, he is qualified as professor of the medical faculty in the University of Paris. He was in 1778 the founder of the society which became the Academy of Medicine, and in 1784 he was with Benjamin Franklin, American statesman, and Jean Sylvain Bailly, French astronomer, all three members of the Lodge of the Nine Sisters, appointed the Royal Commission to report on the animal magnetism claims of Mesmer (see Une Loge Magonnaique d’Avant 1789, Louis Amiable, 1897, page 282).

GUINEA, FRENCH. See French Guinea.

GUSTAVUS IV, King of Sweden. He was initiated into Freemasonry, at Stockholm, on March 10, 1793. Ten years after, on March 9, 1803, Gustavus issued an Ordonnance by which he required all the secret societies in his dominions to make known to the Stadtholders of the cities where they resided, and in the provinces to his Governors, not only the formula of the oath which they administered to their members, but the duties which they prescribed, and the object of their association; and also to submit at any time to a personal inspection by the officers of government. But at the end of the Ordonnance the King says: “The Freemasons, who are under our immediate protection, are alone excepted from this inspection, and from this Ordonnance in general.”

GUTTURAL POINT OF ENTRANCE. From the Latin guttur, meaning the throat. The throat is that avenue of the body which is most employed in physical contemplation and the practice of the most rigorous asceticism. Strabo divides them into Brahmins and Samans, the former of whom adhered to the strictest principles of caste, while the latter admitted any one into their number regarding whose character and kindred they were satisfied. They believed in the immortality of the soul and its migration into other bodies. They practised celibacy, abstained from wine, and lived on fruits. They held riches in contempt, and abstained from sensual indulgences.

GYPSIES. Cornelius Van Paun, more generally known as De Paun, in his Philosophical Researches on the Egyptians and Chinese, published at Paris, 1774, advances the theory that Freemasonry originated with the Gypsies. He says: “Every person who was not guilty of some crime could obtain admission to the lesser mysteries. Those vagabonds called Egyptian priests in Greece and Italy required considerable sums for initiation; and their successors, the Gypsies, practise similar mummeries to obtain money. And thus was Freemasonry introduced into Europe.” But De Paun is remarkable for the paradoxical character of his opinions. James Simpson, who has written a rather exhaustive History of the Gypsies, published in 1866, points out (page 357), “a considerable resemblance between Gypsysim, in its harmless aspect, and Freemasonry— with this difference, that the former is a general, while the latter is a special, society; that is to say, the Gypsies have the language, or some of the words and the signs peculiar to the whole race, which each individual or class will use for different purposes. The race does not necessarily, and does not in fact, have intercourse with every other member of it. In that respect they resemble any ordinary community of men.” And he adds: “There are many Gypsies Freemasons; indeed, they are the very people to push their way into a Freemasons Lodge; for they have secrets of their own, and are naturally anxious to pry into those of others, by which they may be benefited. I was told of a Gypsy who died, lately, the Master of a Freemasons’ Lodge. A friend, a Freemason, told me the other day of his having entered a house in Yetholm where were five Gypsies, all of whom responded to his Masonic signs.” But it must be remembered that Simpson is writing of the Gypsies of Scotland, a kingdom where the race is considerably advanced above those of any other country in civilization and in social position.

H. In Hebrew the letter is נ. Cheth; the hieroglyph was an altar as in the illustration, and finally the Hebrew נ. The eighth letter in the alphabet, and in Hebrew has the value in number of 8, while the Hebrew נ, He, which is of the same hieroglyphic formation, has the numerical value of 5.

HABAKKUK. The Hebrew is נַחַנִי, meaning a struggler, a favorite. The eighth of the twelve minor prophets. No account is contained in the Book of Habakkuk, either of the events of his life or the date when he lived. He is believed by many to have flourished about 630 b.c. In the Thirty-second Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, his name answers to the passwords Tuesday and Xerxes.

HABIN. The Hebrew is נַחַנִי, Intelligius. Name of the initiate in the Fourth Degree of the modern French Rite, sometimes given as Johaben, or Jabin.

HABRAMAH or JABAMIAH. The Hebrew word is נַחַנִי, the Fanum excellsum or high holy place. The French explanation is that the word was applied to a holy place or an elevation near the altar in the Jewish Tabernacle where a feast was prepared. Said to be used in the Thirtieth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite in France; it is not used in America.

HAGQUET, G. A French notary at Port-au-Prince, subsequently a member of the Grand Orient of Paris, and President of the Royal Arch Chapter at Paris in 1814.

HADLY, BENJAMIN. English Freemason said to have attended the Occasional Lodge at The Hague for the conferring of the first two Degrees on the Duke of Tuscany and Lorraine, afterwards Emperor Francis I. William Preston {Illustrations of Masonry, 1812, page 231) asserts Brother Hadly then acted as a Warden.

HAFEDHA. The second of the four gods worshipped by the Arak tribe of Ad, before the time of Mohammed, to which Hûd, or Heber, was sent. These were Sâkia, the god of rain; Háfeda, the preserver from danger; Râzeeka, the provider of food; and Sâlema, the god of health.

HAGAMATANA. See Echatana.

HAGAR. The old lectures taught the doctrine, and hence it was the theory of the Freemasons of the eighteenth century, that the landmark which requires all candidates for initiation to be free born is derived from the fact that the promise which was given to Isaac, the free-born son of Abraham and Sarah, was denied to Ishmael, the slave-born son of the Egyptian bondwoman Hagar. This theory is entertained by Brother Oliver in all his writings, as a part of the old Masonic system (see Free Born).

HAGGAI. According to Jewish tradition, Haggai was born in Babylon during the captivity, and being a young man at the time of the liberation by Cyrus, he came to Jerusalem in company with Joshua and Zerubbabel, to aid in the rebuilding of the Temple. The work being suspended during the reigns of the two immediate successors of Cyrus, on the accession of Darius, Haggai urged the renewal of the undertaking, and for that purpose obtained the sanction of the king. Animated by the courage and patriotism of Haggai and Zechariah, the people prosecuted the work with vigor, and the second Temple was completed and dedicated in the year 516 B.C.

In the Royal Arch system of America, Haggai represents the Scribe, or third officer of a Royal Arch Chapter. In the English system he represents the second officer, and is called the Prophet.

HAGUE, THE. A city of the Netherlands, formerly South Holland. Freemasonry was introduced there in 1731 by the Grand Lodge of England, when an occasional Lodge was opened for the initiation of Francis, Duke of Lorraine, afterward Emperor of Germany. Between that year and 1735 an English and a Dutch Lodge were regularly instituted, from which other Lodges in Holland subsequently proceeded. In 1749, the Lodge at The Hague assumed the name of the Mother Lodge of the Royal Union, whence resulted the National Grand Lodge, which declared its independence of the Grand Lodge of England in 1770 (see Netherlands).

HAAH. The Hebrew definite article the, or the. It forms the second syllable of the Substitutive Word.

HAHNEMANN, SAMUEL CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH. Famous physician. Born April 10, 1755, at Meissen, Saxony, and a member of the Lodge Minerva at Leipsic, Germany, from 1817. Founder of the homoeopathic system. He died at Paris on July 2, 1843.

HAIL or HALE. This word is used among Freemasons with two very different significations.

1. When addressed as an inquiry to a visiting Brother it has the same import as that in which it is used under like circumstances by mariners. Thus: “Whence do you hail?” that is, “Of what Lodge are you a member?” Used in this sense, it comes from the Saxon term of salutation heal, and should be spelled hail.

2. Its second use is confined to what Freemasons understand by the tie, and in this sense its signification is conceal, being derived from the Saxon word helan, to hide, the e being pronounced in Anglo-Saxon as a in the word fate. By the rules of etymology, it should be written hele, but is usually spelled hel.

The preservation of this Saxon word in the Masonic dialect, while it has ceased to exist in the vernacular, is a striking proof of the antiquity of the Order and its ceremonies in England. “In the western parts of England,” says Lord King (Critical History of the Apostle’s Creed, page 175), “at this very day, to hele over anything signifies, among the common people, to cover it; and he that covereth an house with tile or slate is called a hellier.”

“As regards the Anglo-Saxon hele, it survives of course in the word Hell—the covered world—of the Apostle’s Creed, but,” says Brother Canon J. W. Horsley, (page 21, Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume xxvi, 1913), “I thought until lately that a hellier, that is, a thatcher who covers over with thatch the sticks of corn, was only North Country. However, lately when asking who had so well covered a stick close to Dething Church I was told it was a hellier from the next village. And in the best dictionary of the Kentish dialect I find:

Hele (heel) verb, to cover. Heal (heel) verb, to hide; to cover anything up; to roof in.

Heler (hee-ler), substantive, anything which is laid over another: as, for instance, the cover of a thurrick, or wooden drain.

To the above information Brother Doctor Hammond added that in the West of England, the word “hale” is used at the present time, and its common pronunciation there and on the moors of the Cornish Country is hale (see also Heler). From correspondence with Brother Charles E. Funk in regard to the pronunciation of the word, we learn he is convinced that in most Lodges until 1750, and perhaps even later than 1800, the words hele, conceal, reveal, were perfect rhymes pronounced hayl, conceayl, revayl, as they would be in Ireland today, but modern dictionaries give the pronunciation as heel.

HALE, NATHAN. American patriot, born at Coventry, Connecticut, in 1756. Gave his life for his country in 1776, when he was hanged as a spy by the British in New York City on September 22. He was a member of Saint John’s Regimental Lodge of New York City and had already received recognition as a Freemason although not twenty-one years of age (see New Age, September, 1924).

HALL COMMITTEE. A Committee established in all Lodges and Grand Lodges which own the buildings in which they meet, to which is entrusted the supervision of the building. The Grand Lodge of England first appointed its Hall Committee in 1773, for the purpose of superintending the erection of the hall which had been projected.

HALL, MASONIC. For a long time after the revival of Freemasonry in 1717, Masonic Lodges continued to meet, as they had done before that period, in taverns. Thus, the Grand Lodge of England was organized, and, to use the language of Anderson, “the Quarterly Communications were revived” by four Lodges, whose respective places of meeting were the Goose and Gridiron Ale-House, the Crown Ale-House, the Apple-Tree Tavern, and the Rummer and Grapes Tavern. For many years the Grand Lodge held its quarterly meetings sometimes at the Apple-Tree, but principally at the Devil Tavern, and kept the Grand Feast at the hall of one of the Livery Companies. The first Lodge in Paris was organized at a tavern kept in the Rue des Boucheries by one Hure, and the Lodges subsequently organized in France continued to meet, like those of England, in public houses. The custom was long followed in other countries of Europe. In the United States the practice ceased only at a comparatively recent period, and it is possible that in some obscure villages it has not yet been abandoned.

At as early a period as the beginning of the fourteenth century, the Gilds, or Livery Companies, of London, had their halls or places of meeting, and in which they stored their goods for sale. At first these were mean buildings, but gradually they rose into importance, and the Goldsmith's Hall, erected in the fifteenth century, is said to have been an edifice of large dimensions and of imposing appearance. These halls, probably, as they were very common in the eighteenth century, were suggestive to the Freemasons of similar edifices for their own Fraternity; but undoubtedly the necessity, as the Association grew into importance, of a more respectable, more convenient, and more secure locality than was afforded by temporary resort to taverns and alehouses must have led to the erection of isolated edifices for their own special use.

The first Masonic Hall of which we have any account is the one that was erected by the Lodge at Marseilles, in France, in the year 1765. Smith describes it very fully in his Use and Abuse of Freemasonry (page 165), and calls it "a very magnificent hall." In 1773, the Grand Lodge of England made preliminary arrangements for the construction of a hall, a considerable sum having been already subscribed for that purpose. On May 1, 1775, the foundation-stone of the new edifice was laid in solemn form, according to a ceremonial which was then adopted, and which, with a few modifications, continues to be used at the present day on similar occasions. On the foundation-stone it was designated as \textit{Aula Latanorum}, meaning \textit{The Freemasons Hall}. It was finished in less than twelve months, and was dedicated on May 23, 1776, to \textit{Masonry, Virtue, Universal Charity and Benevolence}; a formula still adhered to without variation in the English and American Grand Lodges. At present there is no dearth of these buildings for Masonic use of imposing grandeur and architectural beauty to be found scattered all over the land.

In the United States, Lodges were held in taverns up to a comparatively recent period. It is not now considered respectable. It is impossible to tell at what precise period and in what locality the first Masonic Hall was erected in the United States. It is true that in a Boston paper of 1773 we find, according to Moore's Magazine (xv, page 162), an advertisement summoning the Freemasons to celebrate the festival of Saint John the Evangelist at "Freemasons Hall"; but, on examination, we learn that this was no other than a room in the Green Dragon Tavern. Other buildings, such as the Exchange Coffee-House, only partially used for Masonic purposes, were subsequently erected in Boston, and received by courtesy, but not by right, the name of \textit{Masonic Halls}; but it was not until 1832 that the first independent hall was built in that city, which received the name of the \textit{Masonic Temple}, a title which has since been very usually conferred on the halls in the larger cities. We may suppose that it was about this time, when a resuscitation of Masonic energy, which had been paralyzed by the anti-Masonic opposition, had commenced to develop itself, that the Lodges and Grand Lodges began to erect halls for their peculiar use. At present there is no dearth of these buildings.
to be a vestry, where the ornaments, furniture, jewels, and other regalia are deposited. This is called the treasury, or Tiler's conclave, because these things are made to this apartment from the Tiler's room.

There ought to be also a chapel for preparations, hung with black, and having only one small light, placed high up, near the ceiling; a chapel for the dead furnished with a table, on which are a lamp and emblems of mortality; the Master's conclave, where the records, the Warrants, the Minutes, and every written document are kept. To this room the Worshipful Master retires when the Lodge is called from labor to refreshment, and at other times; when his presence in the Lodge is not essential; and here he transacts the Lodge business with his Secretary. The Ark of the Covenant is also deposited in this apartment. None may be of smaller dimensions, according to circumstances.

In the middle of the hall there should be a movable trapdoor in the floor, seven feet long and three or four feet broad, opening into a small crypt, about three feet in depth, the use of which is known to none but perfect Freemasons, who have passed through all the symbolical Degrees. All of these particulars may not be equally necessary to the construction of a Masonic Hall; but a close similarity in their general spirit and direction, or to similar regulations, should be impressed on every Lodge that undertakes the construction of a building exclusively for Masonic purposes; and such a building only is entitled to be called a Masonic Hall.

In the division in the American Rite of the Degrees among various Bodies imposes the necessity, or at least the convenience, when erecting a Masonic Hall in the United States, of appropriating some of the rooms to the uses of Ancient Craft Lodges, some to Royal Arch Chapters, some to Royal and Select Councils, and some to Commanderies of Knights Templars. It is neither proper nor convenient that a Chapter should be held in a Lodge; and it is equally expedient that the Asylum of a Commandery should be kept separate from both. All of these rooms should be oblong in form, lofty in height, with an elevated dais or platform in the East, and two doors in the West, the one in the Northwest corner leading into the preparation room, and the other communicating with the Tiler's apartment. But in other respects they differ. First, as to the color of the decorations. In a Lodge room the predominating color should be blue, in a Chapter red, and in a Council and Commandery black.

In a Lodge-room the dais should be elevated on three steps, and provided with a pedestal for the Master, while on each side are seats for the Past Masters, and dignitaries who may visit the Lodge. The pedestal of the Senior Warden in the West should be elevated on two steps, and that of the Junior Warden in the South on one. A similar arrangement, either permanent or temporary, should be provided in the Chapter room for working the intermediate Degrees; but the Eastern dais should be supplied with three pedestals instead of one, for the reception of the Grand Council. The tabernacle also forms an essential part of the Chapter room. This is sometimes erected in the center of the room, although the consistency of the symbolism would require that the whole room, during the working of the Royal Arch Degree, should be deemed a tabernacle, and then the veils would, with propriety, extend from the ceiling to the floor, and from one side of the room to the other. There are some other arrangements required in the construction of a Chapter room, of which it is unnecessary to speak.

Councils of Royal and Select Masters are usually held in Chapter rooms, with an entire disregard of the historical teachings of the Degrees. In a properly constructed Council chamber, which, of course, would be in a distinct apartment, there should be no veils, but nine curtains of a stone color; and these, except the last, starting from one side of the room, should stop short of the other, so as to form a narrow passage between the walls and the extremities of the curtains, reaching from the door to the ninth curtain, which alone should reach across the entire extent of the room. These are used only in the Select Degree, and can be removed when the Royal Master is to be conferred. Unlike a Lodge and Chapter, in a Council there is no dais or raised platform; but three tables, of a triangular form, are placed upon the level of the floor in the East. It is, however, very seldom that the funds of a Council will permit of the indulgence in a separate room, and those Bodies are content to work, although at a disadvantage, in a Chapter room.

It is impossible, with any convenience, to work a Commandery in a Lodge, or even a Chapter room. The officers and their stations are so different, that what is suitable for one is unsuitable for the other. The dais, which has but one station in a Lodge and three in a Chapter, requires four in a Commandery, the Prelate taking his proper place on the right of the Generalissimo. But there are other more important differences. The principal apartment should be capable of a division by a curtain, which should separate the Asylum proper from the rest of the room, as the mystical veil in the ancient Church shut off the prospect of the altar, during the eucharistic sacrifice, from the view of the catechumens. There are several other rooms required in the Templar ritual which are not used by a Lodge, a Chapter, or a Council, and which makes it necessary that the apartments of a Commandery should be distinct. A banquet-room in close proximity to the Asylum is essential; and convenience requires that there should be an armory for the deposit of the arms and costume of the Knights. But it is unnecessary to speak of reflection rooms, and other places well known to those who are familiar with the ceremonies, and which cannot be dispensed with.

HALLELUJAH. Meaning Praise the Lord. Expression of applause in the Degree of Sublime Ecossoonis, Heavenly Jerusalem, and others.

HALLIWELL MANUSCRIPT. The earliest of the old Constitutions. It is in poetic form, and was probably transcribed in 1390 from an earlier copy. The manuscript is in the King's Library of the British Museum. It was published in 1840 by James O. Halliwell, and again in 1844, under the title of The Early History of Freemasonry in England. The Masonic character of the poem remained unknown until its discovery by Halliwell, who was not a Freemason, because it was catalogued as A Poem of Moral Duties. It is now more commonly known as the Regius Manuscript, because it formed part of the Royal Library commenced by Henry VII and presented to the British Museum by George II.

What is said above by Brother Hawkins of this early reference to the Craft does not exhibit as fully as many may desire the peculiar features of the Halliwell or Regius Manuscript. The book is about four by five and a half inches, the writing being on vellum, a fine parchment, and it was bound in its present cover, according to Brother H. J. Whymper, about the year 1838. The cover bears the Royal Arms stamped on both sides with G. R. II, and the date 1757. In that year the King, George II, by an instrument that passed the Great Seal of England presented the Library containing the volume to the British Museum where the present reviser of this work had the pleasure of personally examining it. In the possession of Charles Thornton, a book collector of the seventeenth century, and listed in Bernard's Catalogus Manuscriptorum Angliae, Oxford, 1697 (page 200), and described in David Casley's Catalogue of the Manuscripts of the Old Royal Library, 1734 (page 259), as a Poem of Moral Duties, the contents were mistaken until J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps mentioned it in his paper On the Introduction of Freemasonry into England, read before the Society of Antiquaries during the session of 1838 to 1839. Two small editions of the transcript of the poem were published as Brother Hawkins tells us. The first edition contained a facsimile reproduction of four lines of the manuscript, the second similarly reproduced the first page, and he also gave a glossary which with the transcript was published in a veritable gem of a work in 1889, Spencer and Company, with an introduction by Brother H. J. Whymper. Halliwell-Phillipps pointed out that the writer was probably a priest, this evidence from the allusions in line 629 (page LI). He also gives attention to line 143 (page XI), as intimating that a still older manuscript was in existence when the poem was written.

The writing is done in a neat but characteristic style of the early period and in these modern days far from familiar to us, the English of that generation was also very different from that of our time. Brother Roderick H. Baxter, Past Master of Quatuor Coronati Lodge and Past President of the Manchester Association for Masonic Research, has carefully modernized the transcript of the poem were published as Brother Hawkins tells us. The first edition contained a facsimile reproduction of four lines of the manuscript, the second similarly reproduced the first page, and he also gave a glossary which with the transcript was published in a veritable gem of a work in 1889, Spencer and Company, with an introduction by Brother H. J. Whymper. Halliwell-Phillipps pointed out that the writer was probably a priest, this evidence from the allusions in line 629 (page LI). He also gives attention to line 143 (page XI), as intimating that a still older manuscript was in existence when the poem was written.

In the following transcript Brother Baxter has adhered strictly to the phraseology of the original with all its vagaries of person, tense and mood, and has retained the peculiarities of double and sometimes even treble negatives, the only variation being in the substitution of modern words for those now obsolete. However, where the modern words at the ends of lines could not have been used to preserve the jingle of the verses the old words have been utilized with their present equivalents added in brackets so as to avoid the necessity or referring to a glossary. Dukes, earls, and barons also,
Knights, squires and many mo, (more)
And the great burgesses of that city.
They were there all in their degree;
These were there each one algate, (always)
To ordain for these masons' estate.
And the great burgesses of that city.
An assembly then he could let make
And fifteen points there they wrought.
These were there each one algate, (always)
They were there all in their degree;
Knights, squires and many mo, (more)
Of divers lords in their state,
By good counsel, if it might fall.
To come to him full even straightsite, (straight)
After all the masons of the craft.
For all the masons that be there
That the 'prentice should be of gentle kind;
By old time written I find
For more ease than, and of honesty.
Take a 'prentice of higher degree.
The fifth article is very good,
For all the masons that be there
That the 'prentice be of lawful blood;
The master shall not, for no advantage.
Make no 'prentice that is outrage; (deformed)
To make a halt man and a lame.
That he have his limbs whole all y-fere; (together)
For in that craft they be full perfect,
To take his hire as his fellows do. (dread)
Full well will tell you all y-fere (together)
That no master for favour nor dread.
The seventh article that is now here.
That the 'prentice be of lawful blood;
The master shall not, for no advantage.
Make no 'prentice that is outrage; (deformed)
To make a halt man and a lame.
That he have his limbs whole all y-fere; (together)
For in that craft they be full perfect,
To take his hire as his fellows do. (dread)
Full well will tell you all y-fere (together)
That no master for favour nor dread.
And to his craft, wheresoever he go;
And that the ground be well y-take, (taken)
That it neither flaw nor grake. (crack)

Articulus decimus.
Tenth article.

The tenth article is for to know,
Among the craft, to high and low,
There shall no master superintend another,
But be together as sister and brother,
In this curious craft, all and some,
That belongeth to a master mason.
Nor he shall not superintend no other man,
That hath taken a work him upon,
In pain thereof that is so strong,
That weigheth no less than ten ponge, (pounds)

To bring the work to full good end.

He hath it securely in his mind XVII.
That hath taken a work him upon.

There shall no master supplant another,
The tenth article is for to know,
There shall no mason meddle withal.

In such a case if it do fall.

Then may a mason that work crave.

For no man in masonry
That he is both fair and free;

The eleventh article I tell thee.

If he be a mason good and sound.

But if that he be guilty found.

In pain thereof that is so strong, XVl.

That belongeth to a master mason.

But be together as sister and brother.

Among the craft, to high and low.

That who will know this craft and come to estate,

Of great lords and masters also.

At this assembly were points ordained mo, (more)

As truly as he can or may, XXI.

That the mason work upon tne work day,

To teach him so, that for no man.

For to the master he is a friend;

To deserve his hire for the holy-day,

That he is both fair and free.

The second point as I you say.

And truly to labour on his deed.

He shall not his fellows' work deprave.

That to the lords' profit for it to save

That he is both fair and free;

That weigheth no less than ten ponge, (pounds)

To bring the work to full good end.

He hath it securely in his mind XVII.
That hath taken a work him upon.

Among the craft, to high and low.

That in turn the work to nought;

Shall not supplant other securely,

That it neither flaw nor grake. (crack)

That no mason should work by night.

Forsooth he that beginneth the ground.

In this curious craft, all and some.

But it amend by all that thou may.

And measurable points that he him reche, (tell)

Wheresoever he go under the sun.

And bring the craft into great shame.

For he teacheth, by his might.

And that the ground be well y-take, ftaken)
To every mason wheresoever he be.

And the fourteenth article by good reason,

That he may within his term,

He shall no 'prentice to him take, XIX.

Sheweth the master how he shall do; (do)

Wheresoever he go in field or frythe, (enclosed wood)

And his master also that he is with.

That who will know this craft and come to estate,

Of great lords and masters also.

And his master also that he is with.

That who will know this craft and come to estate,
That they stand well in God's law.

Septimus punctus. Seventh point.

The seventh point he may well mean, Of well long life that God us lene, (lend) Thou shalt not by thy master's wife lie, Nor by thy fellows', in no manner wise, Lest the craft would thee despise; Of well long life that God us lene, (lend) Nor by thy fellows' concubine, That he be 'prentice full seven year.
No more thou wouldst he did by thine. Nor by thy fellows', in no manner wise.
Nor by thy fellows', in no manner wise.
So chastised then must he ben; (be)
So chastised then must he ben; (be)
If they stand well in God's law.

Octavus punctus. Eighth point.

The eighth point, he may be sure, A true mediator thou must needs be
If thou hast taken any cure,
For that point thou shalt never rue;
A true mediator thou must needs be
To thy master, and thy fellows free; For to appear before his fellows all.
If thou hast taken any cure,
To both parties, and that is good right.
To appear before his fellows all.

Nonus punctus. Ninth point.

The ninth point we shall him call, That he be steward of our hall.
That he be steward of our hall.
That seeth his fellow hew on a stone.
For that point thou shalt never rue;
As though they were sister and brother;
If thou hast taken any cure,
There shall never one another costage (cost)
For to appear wheresoever you will.
But every man shall be equally free
As though they were sister and brother.
As though they were sister and brother.

In that cost, so must it be;
In that cost, so must it be;
That thou mayest pay well every man algate, (always)
And bring thyself into great blame.
And bring thyself into great blame.
That he be steward of our hall.
That seeth his fellow hew on a stone.
For to appear wheresoever you will.
As though they were sister and brother.
That seeth his fellow hew on a stone.
As though they were sister and brother.

XXVIII.

Decimus punctus. Tenth point.

The tenth point presenteth well good life, To live without care and strife;
To live without care and strife;
For if the mason live amiss, And through such a false slander (excuse)
And through such a false slander (excuse)
May slander his fellows without reason,
May slander his fellows without reason,
Through false slander of such fame.
Through false slander of such fame.

May make the craft acquire blame.
May make the craft acquire blame.
If he do the craft such villainy,
If he do the craft such villainy,
Do him no favour then securely;
Do him no favour then securely;
Nor maintain not him in wicked life, To live without care and strife;
Lest it would turn to care and strife;
Lest it would turn to care and strife;

XXX.

But yet him you shall not delayme, (delay)
Unless that you shall him constrain,
For to appear wheresoever you will,
To live without care and strife;
To the next assembly you shall him call,
To appear before his fellows all,
And unless he will before them appear,
To appear before his fellows all.
And unless he will before them appear,

XXVI.

The eleventh point is of great discretion, Against that man, whatsoever he be.
As you must know by good reason;
And is in point to spoil that stone,
And is in point to spoil that stone,
For that good pay as thou dost make.
For that good pay as thou dost make.

The thirteenth point is to us full lief, And thou must it know or sin,^.
He shall swear never to be no thief.
For no good that he hath beth; (bereft)
To live without care and strife;
To live without care and strife;
Nor to thy fellows in no degree.
Nor to thy fellows in no degree.
For his sake that sit above, _
For his sake that sit above, _

The fourteenth point is full good law
To him that would be under awe;
A good true oath he must there swear
To all this ordinance, wheresoever he go.
To all this ordinance, wheresoever he go.
And who he be, let him be sought.
And who he be, let him be sought.

And to the assembly let him be brought.
Halliwell

Fifteenth point.

The fifteenth point is of full good lore,
For them that shall be there y-swore, (sworn)
Such ordinance at the assembly was laid.
Of great lords and masters before said;
For the same that is disobedient y-wisse, (I know)
XXXVI.

Against the ordinance that there is,
Of these articles that were moved there,
Of great lords and masons all y-tere. (together)
And if they be proved openly Before that assembly, by and by.
And for their guilts no amends will make,
Then must they need the craft forsake;
And no masons craft they shall refuse,
And swear it never more to use.
But if they will amends make,
Again to the craft they shall never take;
And if that they will not do so,
The sheriff shall come them soon to,
XXXVII.

And put their bodies in deep prison,
For the trespass that they have done,
And take their goods and their cattle
Into the king's hand, every delle, (part)
And let them dwell there full still,
Till it be our liege king's will.

Alia ordinacio artis gemetriae.
Another ordinance of the art of geometry.
They ordained there an assembly to be y-holde, (held) Every year, wheresoever they would,
To amend the defaults, if any were found
Among the craft within the land;
Each year or third year it should be holde, (held)
XXXVIII.

In every place wheresoever they would;
Time and place must be ordained also,
In what place they should assemble to,
All the men of craft there they must be,
And other great lords, as you must see,
To keep their statutes every one
That were ordained by King Athelstane;
These statutes that I have here found XXXIX.

I ordain they be held through my land,
For the worship of my royalty,
That I have by my dignity.
Also at every assembly that you hold,
That you come to your liege king bold,
Beseeching him of his high grace.
To stand with you in every place.
To confirm the statutes of King Athelstane,
That he ordained to this craft by good reason.

Ars quattor coronatorum.
The art of the four crowned ones.

Pray we now to God almighty, (almighty)
And to his mother Mary bright,
That we may keep these articles here,
And these points well all y-tere, (together)
As did these holy martyrs four,
That in this craft were of great honour;
They were as good masons as on earth shall go,
Gravers and image-makers they were also.
For they were workmen of the best,
The emperor had to them great luste; (liking)
That might be worshipped for his sake;
Such monuments he had in his dawe, (day)
To turn the people from Christ's law.
XL.

Halliwell

But they were steadfast in Christ's lay, (law)
And to their craft without nay; (doubt)
They loved well God and all his lore,
And were in his service ever more.
True men they were in that dawe, (day)
And lived well in God's law;
They thought no monuments to make,
For no good that they might take,
To believe on that monument for their God,
They would not so do, though he were wold; (furious)
For they would not forsake their true lay, (faith)
XXXII.

And believe on his false lay, (law)
The emperor let take them soon anon,
And put them in a deep prison.
The more sorely he punished them in that place,
The more joy was to them of Christ's grace.
Then when he saw no other one,
To death let them then gon; (go)
Whose will of their life yet more know.
By the book he might it show
In the legend of sanctorum (holy ones)
The names of quatuor coronatorum (four crowned ones)
XLIII.

Their feast will be without nay, (doubt)
After Hallow-e'en the eighth day.
You may hear as I do read.
That many years after, for great dread
That Noah's flood was all run,
The tower of Babylon was begun,
As plain work of lime and stone,
That any man should look upon;
So long and broad it was begun,
Seven miles the height shadoweth the sun.
King Nebuchadnezzar let it make
To great strength for man's sake, XLIV.

Though such a flood again should come,
Over the work it should not nome; (take)
For they had so high pride, with strong boast,
All that work therefore was lost;
An angel smote them so with divers speech,
That never one knew what the other should reche.
(tell)
Many years after, the good clerk Euclid
Taught the craft of geometry full wonder wide,
So he did that other time also.
Of divers crafts many mo. (more)
Through high grace of Christ in heaven,
He commenced in the sciences seven;
XLV.

Grammar is the first science y-wisse, (I know)
Dialect the second, so have I bliss, Rhetoric the third without nay, (doubt)
Music is the fourth, as I you say.
Astronomy numbers th, my dear brother.
And music it is a sweet song;
As the fruit doth the root of the tree; XLVI.
Rhetoric measureth with ornate speech among,
And music it is a sweet song;
Astronomy numbereth, my dear brother.
Arithmetic sheweth one thing that is another, Geometrical the seventh science it is,
That can separate falsehood from truth y-wisse, (I know)
These be the sciences seven,
Who used them well he may have heaven.
Now dear children by your wit
Pride and covetousness that you leave it,
And taketh heed to good discretion,
And to good nurture, whomsoever you come.
Now I pray you take good heed,
XLVII.
For this you must know nede, (needs)
But much more you must wyten, (know)
Than you find here written.
If thee fail thereto wit,
Pray to God to send thee it;
For Christ himself, he teacheth us (us)
That holy church is God's house,
That is made for nothing else (else)
But for to pray in, as the book tellus; (tell us)
There the people shall gather in,
To pray and weep for their sin.
Look thou come not to church late,
For to speak harlotry by the gate;
Then to church when thou dost fare,
Have in thy mind ever more (more)
Then to church when thou dost fare.
Have in thy mind ever more (more)
Then to church when thou dost fare.

Pull up thy heart to Christ, anon; XLIX.
Then pray to him so here to worche (work)
Pull up thy heart to Christ, anon; XLIX.
Then pray to him so here to worche (work)
Pull up thy heart to Christ, anon; XLIX.

First thou must do down thy hood.
For every drop thou feelest there
To the church door when thou dost come
There the people all gather in.

To keep thee from the sins seven.
That thou here may in this life,
And pray to him with mild steven (voice)
That is made for nothing else
That holy church is God's house,
For Christ himself, he teacheth us (us)

But always to be in thy prayer;
Look also that thou make no here, (noise)
When the Gospel is done.

And when the Gospel me read shall, LI.
When thou kneelest at the sakeringe, (sacrament)
Grant me the bliss without end;
Thus thou might say, or some other thing.

Amen! Amen! so mote it be!
Now sweet lady pray for me.
I should like to ask you to carefully consider the wording of the poem, and to notice the remarkable number of instances in which the lines have been introduced—although in different terminology—into our ritual, and the cases in which its requirements have been incorporated with our Constitutions. Even the last stage of the document, which deals with examiners at table and in the presence of superiors, and appears at first sight to be quite irrelevant, may be accepted as evidence that our present custom of celebrating special Masonic events by banqueting was a feature of the Craft, at the time of which the Manuscript speaks. You will all be acquainted in some degree with the remarkable series of documents known variously as the Manuscript Collections, the Gothic Constitutions, or more currently nowadays as the Old Charges of the British Freemasons, and you will further know that after an introductory prayer, of a purely Christian character, they go on to the bygone age.) It is therefore not possible to arrive at the actual time of the writing of the poem, we can only conclude that such a progression of design as commonly proceeded over the whole of England almost simultaneously, could only have been produced by a school of thought and not by individual effort. My firm conviction is that the school was composed of the Master Freemasons of the period.

Commenting on lines 143–6 of the poem which (modernised) read:

By old time written I find
That the 'prentice should be of gentle kind,
And not deinate of your mead. (reward)
Amen! Amen! so mote it be!
So we say all for charity.

The Manuscript has been discussed at various times by several students. A lengthy and careful examination of it appears in volume i of the Autographa of Quatuor Coronati Lodge, 1889, and among the Collected Essays and Papers Relating to Freemasonry by Robert F. Gould, 1913, published by William Tait of Belfast, Ireland. Brother William Begemann published a discussion of it in the German language, as indicating its pre-eminence as a part of the poem we are now considering, and as it clearly states that the story is to be found in old books, abundantly in the Old Charges of the Freemasons which are unhappily now lost to us.

I wish to use this legend as the basis of a theory which I shall try to develop. Briefly stated, my idea is that the poem, as well as all the other Old Charges, clearly indicates that buildings of any architectural pretensions could have been erected, without carefully thought-out designs having been prepared. Dealing more particularly with the actual time of the writing of the poem, we can only conclude that such a progression of design as commonly proceeded over the whole of England almost simultaneously, could only have been produced by a school of thought and not by individual effort. My firm conviction is that the school was composed of the Master Freemasons of the period.

Dealing more particularly with the actual time of the writing of the poem, we can only conclude that such a progression of design as commonly proceeded over the whole of England almost simultaneously, could only have been produced by a school of thought and not by individual effort. My firm conviction is that the school was composed of the Master Freemasons of the period.

Commenting on lines 143–6 of the poem which (modernised) read:

By old time written I find
That the 'prentice should be of gentle kind,
And not deinate of your mead. (reward)
Amen! Amen! so mote it be!
So we say all for charity.
way likely, and was in no way derogatory to their dignity. I might even point out that the present Lord Ferrers (the successor in the earldom of your own late Provincial Grand Master) has been a practising architect, and that other scions of noble families are at present similarly engaged. There seems to be some good evidence of this in the poem, particularly in lines 279-35, which read:

The privies of the chamber tell he no man,
Nor does the lodge whatsoever they don;
Whatever thou hearst or seest thee do,
Tell to no man wheresoever thou go;
The counsel of hall and even of bower,
Keep it well to great honour.

That these gentlemen are on a different footing from the ordinary craftsmen, and that their labours were conducted, not in the Lodge, but in the chamber, are conditions which I suggest are parallel to the masons' shed and the drawing office.

Reverting now to Henry Yevley, whose name is variously spelled, but always easily recognisable, I find on turning up his name in Kenning's Cyclopaedia "Said by the Revd. James Anderson, D.D. (in the first edition of the Book of Constitutions, 1723) to have been the King's Freemason, or general surveyor of the buildings of King Edward III, and employed by His Majesty to build several abbeys and other ediﬁcations. Doctor Anderson was gifted with the imaginative faculty to an undue extent, so that such statements as the foregoing (which are frequently met with in his work) confuse more than they beneﬁt the general reader, and, Masonically speaking, have done much harm. We fail to see why Masonry requires unhistorical statements to render it acceptable in any way."

The Reverend Brother Woodford, who was the author and editor of the cyclopaedia, in conjunction with Brother Hughan, who wrote the articles under the letters U, V, W, Y, and Z, appears, however, to be wrong on this occasion, and the imaginative doctor quite right.

Doctor Begemann contributed a note to Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, xxi, in which he endeavored to prove—and I think with complete success—that the title of Freemason applied to Yevley by Stow in his Survey of London, 1598, had actually been used during the former's lifetime, and was not a posthumous designation. Doctor Begemann's note inspired an article by Brother E. W. M. Wonnacott, of Quatuor Coronati Lodge, and himself an architect, in the same volume, in which he conclusively proved, from existing documents, that as early as 1362 Yevley was described as a 'depositor of Masonry,' having been a great architect, was merely mentioned as a clerk. In 1381 Nicholas Teypert took up the aisle of Saint Dunstan's Church in Thames Street 'scion of the great Yevley,' and in 1385 works were carried out at Westminster Hall from a model made by the advice of Master Henri Zeveley.

"Selene le purpur d'une journye et mule, fait par conseil de mestre Henri Zeveley."

(According to the style of a form and mold made by counsel of Master Henri Zeveley.)

I have not picked out the case of Yevley as being at all singular, but merely because it has been so fully dealt with in Masonic writings which are available to us all. An examination of the list of names in Wyatt Papworth's paper on the Superintendence of English Buildings during the Middle Ages, and a careful study of their records, would doubtless prove that their duties were in every way analogous to those of the character so described. I am quite justified in saying that the Master Masons of the Gothic Era at least (and possibly so long as architecture has been practised), were architects in the truest sense of the word, for when we consider the constructive faculty of ordinary craftsmen, no less than their perfect proportions and beauty, we are compelled at once to admit, that their skill and knowledge of geometry were profound. Thus I think you will agree that the legend of the founding of the science of geometry by the children of great lords and ladies, as related in the first part of the poem, is no myth, but is founded on fact, for unlettered working masons could never have produced the temples and churches for the worship of T. G. A. O. T. U., which of all rites that excite pleasure to the eye, rank next only to the works of the Great Creator Himself.

HAMBURG. In 1733, the Earl of Strathmore, Grand Master of England, granted a Deputation "to eleven German gentlemen, good Brothers, for constituting a Lodge at Hamburg" (see Anderson, Constitutions, 1738, page 194). Of the proceedings of this Lodge we have no information. In 1740, Brother Luettman brought from England a Warrant for the establishment of a Lodge, and a Patent for himself, as Provincial Grand Master of Hamburg and Lower Saxony. In October, 1741, it assumed the name of Absalon, and in the same year the Provincial Grand Lodge of Hamburg and Saxony was opened, a Body which, Lindel says (on page 230 of his History) was the oldest Mother Lodge in Germany. About the year 1787, the Provincial Grand Lodge adopted the newly invented Rite of Frederick L. Schroder, consisting of only three Degrees. In 1801, it declared itself an independent Grand Lodge, and has so continued. The Grand Lodge of Hamburg practises Schroder's Rite (see Schroder). There is also in Hamburg a sort of Chapter, which was formed by Schroder, under the title of Geschichtliche Engbund, or Historical Select Union. It was intended as a substitute for Fessler's Degrees of Knowledge, the members of which employ their time in studying the various systems of Freemasonry. The Mutter-Bund of the Confederacy of Hamburg Lodges, which make up this system, is independent of the Grand Lodge. The two authorities are entirely distinct, and bear much the same relation to each other as the Grand Lodges and Grand Chapters of the United States.

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER. American economist and statesman, born January 11, 1757, in West Indies, and as the result of a duel with Aaron Burr at Weehawken, New Jersey, died July 12, 1804. Organized an artillery company in Revolutionary War, became private secretary to Washington. Brilliant as a soldier, he was equally effective in organizing the United States Government under the 1787 Constitution and became Secretary of State. His able reports cover a wide range of investigation and he bestowed order and confidence to national finances. His name is recorded among those visiting American Union Lodge at Morristown, New Jersey, December 27, 1779, and is identified because the only one of that name then holding a commission in the Army under General Washington.

HAMILTON, HON. ROBERT, M.A., M.D. Born 1820; died May, 1850, at Jamaica, of which island he was District Grand Master. This English gentleman was a member of the Queen's Body Guard. He was appointed District Grand Master of Jamaica, November 5, 1858; District Grand Superintendent of Royal Arch Masons, January 10, 1859; Provincial Grand Master of Mark Masons, 1877; and was a supernumerary member of the Supreme Council, 33°, of England, and Provincial Grand Master of the Royal Order of Scotland.
HANCOCK, JOHN. Born January 12, 1737; died October 8, 1793. President of the Continental Congress from May 1775, to October 1777, and the first to attach his name to the Declaration of Independence. He took the Masonic Degrees in Merchants Lodge No. 277, Quebec, Canada, in 1762, and on October 14, 1762, affiliated with the Lodge of Saint Andrew, Boston, Massachusetts (see New Age, October, 1925; Masonic Presidents, Vice-Presidents and Signers, Wm. L. Boyden; Masonry in the Formation of our Government—1761-99, Philip A. Roth, page 40).

HAND. In Freemasonry, the hand as a symbol holds a high place, because it is the principal seat of the sense of feeling so necessary to and so highly revered by Freemasons. The same symbol is found in the most ancient religions, and some of their analogies to Masonic symbolism are peculiar. Thus, Horapollo says that among the Egyptians the hand was the symbol of a builder, or one fond of building, because all labor proceeds from the hand. In many of the Ancient Mysteries the hand, especially the left, was deemed the symbol of equity. In Christian art a hand is the indication of a holy person or thing. In early medieval art, the Supreme Being was always represented by a hand extended from a cloud, and generally in the act of benediction.

The form of this act of benediction, as adopted by the Roman Church, which seems to have been borrowed from the symbols of the Phrygian and Eleusinian priests or hierophants, who used it in their mystical processions, presents a singular analogy, and the hand is the indication of a holy person or thing. In early medieval art, the Supreme Being was always represented by a hand extended from a cloud, and generally in the act of benediction.

Attention may be directed to the additional authority given in the signing of a document by one's own hand. Even where a person cannot write for himself, a mark made by the one attesting to the truth of the rest of the writing is acceptable and customary. To pass a coin from hand to hand is a mark made by the one attesting to the truth of the rest of the writing is acceptable and customary. refer to the covenant authorized by a sign made by the hand. We must not forget the common expressions relating to the hand as an agency, a source, an authority, and so on, as in “at first hand,” “by hand,” “in hand,” “in the hands of,” etc. Nor may we overlook the use of blood to emphasize the importance of a contract. Professor Trumbull offers a suggestive comment on the relation of this to an oath or obligation. “The very term sign manual, employed for a veritable signature, may point to an origin in this custom. Indeed, may it not be that the large red seal attached to important documents, at the present time, is a survival of the signature and seal of the bloody hand?” (Threshold Covenant, page 94).

Of such gestures as are made by the laying on of hands in Church ceremonies and elsewhere in sealing a covenant there are many pregnant allusions in the Bible and other places. Compare Genesis ii 8, 24; Numbers xxvi, 8 to 23; Acts vi 6; viii 18, xiii 3; xix 6; First Timothy iv 14; vi 2; viii 9; Hebrews vi 2; viii 9 (see Covenant and Oath, also Penalty).

HANOVER. Freemasonry was introduced into Hanover, in the year 1744, by the organization of the Lodge Frederick; which did not, however, get into active operation, in consequence of the opposition of the priests, until two years after. A Provincial Grand Lodge was established in 1755, which in 1828 became an independent Grand Lodge. In 1866, in consequence of the war between Austria and Prussia, Hanover was annexed to the latter country. There being three Grand Lodges at that time in Prussia, the King deemed it inexpedient to add a fourth, and, by a cabinet order of February 17, 1867, the Grand Lodge of Hanover was dissolved. Most of the Hanoverian Lodges united with the Grand Lodge Royal York at Berlin, and a few with the Grand Lodge of the Three Globes.

HAPHTZIEL. The Hebrew word הפתזיל, in Latin Voluntas Dei. A covered word used in the Twenty-third Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

HAR. The name of the second king in the Scandanavian Mysteries.

HARAM, GRAND. The Seventy-third Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

HARBINGER. The title of an officer in the Knights of the Holy Sepulcher, and also in the Knights of Saint John the Evangelist.

HARIE, JAMES. A Freemason of New York, who published, in 1818, a work entitled The New Freemasons’ Monitor and Masonic Guide. It evinces considerable ability, was in Brother Mackey’s opinion more valuable than the Monitors of Webb and Cross, and deserved a greater popularity than it seems to have received.

HARLEIAN MANUSCRIPTS. An old record of the Constitutions of Freemasonry, so called because it forms No. 2054 of the collection of manuscripts in the British Museum, which were originally collected by Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford, the celebrated Prime Minister of Queen Anne, and known as the Bibliotheca Harleian, or Harleian Library. The Manuscript consists of four leaves, containing six and a half pages of close writing in a cramped hand, said to be that of Randle Holmes, Chester Herald, who died in 1699. The Manuscript was first published by Brother William James Hughan, in his Masonic Sketches and Reprints. The Manuscript was carefully transcribed for Brother Hughan by a faithful抄ist, and its correctness was verified by Sims, of the Manuscript Department of the British Museum. Brother Hughan places the date of the record in the middle of the seventeenth century, and in this he is probably correct.

The two following folios, says the Reverend Brother Woodford, in the volume (namely 33 and 34) are of a very important character, inasmuch as the secrets of Freemasonry are referred to in the “obligation” taken by Initiates, and the sums are recorded which “William Wade give to be a Freemason,” and others who were admitted members of the Lodge. The amounts varied from five shillings to a pound, the majority being ten shillings and upwards. The fragment on folio 33 is as follows, and was written about the same time as the Manuscript Constitutions;

“There are several words & signs of a free mason to be revealed to you which as you will answer before God at the great & terrible day of judgement you keep secret & not to revale the same in the heares of any person or to any but the Maste)rs & fellows of the said society of free masons so helpe me God etc.”

A facsimile of the Manuscript has been published by the Quatuor Coronati Lodge.

There is another Manuscript in the same collection marked No. 1492, the date of which is conjectured to be about 1650, or rather later. It was copied by Brother Henry Phillips, and first published in the Freemasons Quarterly Review in 1836 (pages 288 to 295). The copy, however, unfortunately, is not an exact one, as E. A. Bond, of the Museum, who compared a part of the transcript with the original, says that “the copyist has overlooked peculiarities in many instances.” It is important in containing an Oath of Secrecy, which is in the following words:
I (giving full name) in the presence of Almighty God, and my fellows and Brethren here present, promise and declare that I will not at any time hereafter, by any Act, or Circumstance whatsoever, directly or indirectly publish, discover, reveal, or make knowne any of the Secrets, priviledges, or Counsels of the Fraternity or fellowship of Freemasonry, which at this time, or any time hereafter shall be made known unto me; soe helpe mee God and the holy contents of this book.

A facsimile of this manuscript also has been published by the Quatuor Coronati Lodge.

HARMONY. It is a duty especially entrusted to the Senior Warden of a Lodge, who is figuratively supposed to preside over the Craft during the hours of labor, so to act that none shall depart from the Lodge dissatisfied or discontented, that harmony may be thus preserved, because, as the instruction expresses it, harmony is the strength and support of all well-regulated institutions.

HARMONY, KNIGHT OF. See Knight of Harmony.

HARMONY, UNIVERSAL. See Mesmeric Freemasonry.

HARNETT, CORNELIUS. See Montfort, Colonel Joseph.

HARNOUESTER. Lord Harnoouester is said to have been elected by the four Lodges of Paris, as the Earl of Derwentwater. Nothing is known of this nobleman in contemporary history. Burke makes no allusion to him in his Extinct Peerages, and probably the name has undergone one of those indecipherable mutations to which French writers are accustomed to subject all foreign names; indeed, Brother R. F. Gould, in his Concise History of Freemasonry (page 355), considers that the name may even be a corruption of Derwentwater.

HARODIM. We owe the Masonic use of this word to Anderson, who first employed it in the Book of Constitutions, where he tells us that “there were employed about the Temple no less than three thousand harodim over the people who labored at the work.”

Harodim, in Hebrew הָרֹדִים, is a grammatically compounded word of the plural form, and is composed of the definite article ה, הרא, ה or those, and a participle of the verb רד, radah, to rule over, and means therefore, those who rule over, or overseers. In the parallel passage of Second Chronicles (ii, 18), the word used is Menatsschim, which has a similar meaning.

But from the use of this word Harodim in First Kings, and the commentary on it by Anderson, it has come to pass that Harodim is now technically used to signify Princes in Masonry. They were really overseers of the work, and hence the Masonic use of the term is not altogether inappropriate.

Whoever inspects the two parallel passages in First Kings (v, 16) and Second Chronicles (ii, 18), will notice an apparent discrepancy. In the former it is said that there were three thousand and three hundred of these overseers, and in the latter the number is increased to three thousand and six hundred. The commentators have noted but not explained the incongruity.

Lee, in his Temple of Solomon, attempts to solve it by supposing that “possibly three hundred at a second review might be added to the number of officers for the greater care of the business.” This is not satisfactory; not more so is the explanation offered by myself, continues Brother Mackey, many years ago, in the Lecticon of Freemasonry. It is much more reasonable to suspect a clerical error of some old copyist which has been perpetuated. There is room for such an inadvertence, for there is no very great difference between וְרוֹדִים, the Hebrew and the Latin form, which is six. The omission of the central letter would create the mistake. Masonic writers have adhered to the three thousand and six hundred, which is the enumeration in Chronicles.

Brother E. L. Hawkins tells us that a Degree bearing this name was commonly conferred by the Lodges in the County of Durham, England, during the latter half of the eighteenth century, but what its exact nature was has now been forgotten.

HARODIM, GRAND CHAPTER OF. An institution under the title of the Grand Chapter of the Ancient and Venerable Order of Harodim was established in London, in the year 1787, by the celebrated Masonic lecturer, William Preston. He thus defines, in his Illustrations, its nature and objects (see twelfth edition, page 310):

The mysteries of this Order are peculiar to the Institution itself; while the lectures of the Chapter include every branch of the Masonic system, and represent the art of Masonry in a finished and complete form.

Different classes are established, and particular lectures restricted to each class. The lectures are divided into sections, and the sections into clauses. The sections are annually assigned by the Chief Harod and General Director, and out of these the General Director is always chosen.

Every Clauseholder, on his appointment, is presented with a ticket, signed by the Chief Harod, specifying the clause allotted to him. This ticket entitles him to enjoy the rank and privileges of a Clauseholder in the Chapter; and no Clauseholder can transfer his ticket to another Companion, unless the consent of the Council has been obtained for that purpose, and the General Director has approved the Companion to whom it is to be transferred as qualified to hold it. In case of the death, sickness, or non-residence in London of any Lecturer, Sectionist, or Clauseholder, another Companion is appointed to fill up the vacancy for the time being, that the lectures may be always complete; and during the session a public lecture is usually delivered at stated times.

The Grand Chapter is governed by a Grand Patron, two Vice-Patrcons, a chief Ruler, and two Assistants, with a Council of twelve respectable Companions, who are chosen annually at the Chapter nearest to the festival of Saint John the Evangelist.

The whole system was admirably adapted to the purposes of Masonic instruction, and was intended for propagating the Prestonian system of lectures.

HARODIM, PRINCE OF. In the old lectures of the Ineffable Degrees, it is said that Tito, the oldest of the Provosts and Judges, was the Prince of Harodim, that is, chief of the three hundred architects who were the Harodim, or additional three hundred added to the thirty-three thousand Menatychim mentioned in Chronicles, and who in the old lecture of the Degree of Provost and Judge are supposed to have been the Harodim or Rulers in Masonry. The statement is a myth; but it thus attempts to explain the discrepancy alluded to in our article on Harodim.

HARPER, EDWARDS. There were two Grand Secretaries acting together from the Union of the Grand Lodges of England in 1813, Brother Harper officiating from 1813 to 1838. For twelve years previously to 1813 Brother Harper had been Deputy Grand Secretary and on December 1, 1813, he was given a gold jewel or medal by the Grand Lodge for "eminent services rendered the Ancient Craft" during that period. Brother William Henry White, who became Grand Secretary of the Moderns in 1810, continued from 1813 with Brother Harper until 1838 and then acted alone as Grand Secretary up to 1856 (see Memorials of the Masonic Union, W. J. Hughan-John T. Thorp, 1913, pages 11 and 18).

HARPER, THOMAS. Deputy Grand Master of the Athol Lodge and an ardent Freemason. Published an edition of the Ahiman Rezon in 1800 and two others in 1807 and 1813. At the Union of the two Grand Lodges he opened the Especial Grand Lodge as Deputy Grand Master and by unanimous accord was fraternally requested to continue in office and fulfill the duties until the appointment and installation of a Grand Master, the Duke of Kent, who subsequently appointed and installed Brother Harper as his Deputy (see Memorials of the Masonic Union, W. J. Hughan-John T. Thorp, 1913, pages 17–20).

HARPOCRATES. The Greek god of silence and secrecy. He was, however, a divinity of the Egyptian mythology; his true name being, according to Bunsen and Lepsius, Har-pi-kraii, that is, Horus the child; and he is supposed to have been the son of Osiris and Isis. He is represented as a nude figure, sitting sometimes on a lotus flower, either bareheaded or covered by an Egyptian miter, but always with his finger pressed upon his lips. Plutarch thinks that this gesture was an indication of his childlike and helpless nature; but the Greeks, and after them the Romans, supposed it to be a symbol of silence; and hence, while he is sometimes described as the god of the renewed year, whence peach blossoms were consecrated to him because of their early appearance in spring, he is more commonly represented as the god of silence and secrecy. Thus, Ovid says of him:

Quique premit voceg digitoque silentiis suadet.

He who controls the voice and persuades to silence with his finger.

In this capacity, his statue was often placed at the entrance of temples and places where the mysteries were celebrated, as an indication of the silence and secrecy that should there be observed. Hence the finger on the lips is a symbol of secrecy, and has so been adopted in Masonic symbolism.

HARRIS, THADDEUS MASON. The Rev. Thaddeus Mason Harris, D.D., an American Masonic writer of high reputation, was born in Charlestown, Massachusetts, July 7, 1767, and graduated at Harvard University in 1787. He was ordained as minister of a church in Dorchester in 1793, and died at Boston, April 3, 1842. He held at different times the offices of Deputy Grand Master, Grand Chaplain, and Corresponding Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. Huntoon says (in his Eulogy):

His first great Masonic work was the editing of a collection, revision, and publication of the Constitutions of the Ancient and Honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons, a quarto volume, printed at Worcester, Massachusetts, 1792; a work which he accomplished with the accustomed diligence and fidelity with which he performed every enterprise confided to his care. His various occasional addresses while Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge, Masonic defences, and his volume of Masonic Discourses, published in 1801, constitute a large and valuable portion of the Masonic classic literature of America.

HARUGARI, ORDER OF. Secret society founded in New York City in 1847 or 1848 among immigrants from Germany to preserve the use of the German language and to mutually assist the needy and aid the widows and orphans of the members. The name is thought to be derived from an old German word, haruc, meaning grove or forest, and the title itself to have been that of an ancient organization. The Order teaches Friendship, Love and Humanity (see Cyclopedia of Fraternities, Albert C. Stevens, and the Deutsch-Amerikanisches Conversations-Lexikon).

HARUSPIGES, ORDER OF. The word Haruspe comes from a Sanskrit word hira, meaning entrails; therefore implying a soothsayer or aruspice. The founder of the Etruscan Order was Tages, doubtless a myth of self-creative power. This Order is claimed to have been re-established in Rome at the time of the foundation of the city. It embraced two divisions, those who formed their judgment from the movements and habits of animals as well as the flight of birds, and those who judged and foretold events by the inspection of the entrails of newly-killed animals. These were the precursors, the forerunners, of naturalists and physiologists.

HASIDIM, SOVEREIGN PRINCE. The Seventy-fifth and Seventy-sixth Degrees of the Rite of Mizraim. It should be Chasidim, which see.

HAT. To uncover the head in the presence of superiors has been, among all Christian nations, held as a mark of respect and reverence. The Eastern nations uncover the feet when they enter a place of worship; the Western uncover the head. The converse of this is also true; and to keep the head covered while all around are uncovered is a token of superiority of rank or office. The king remains covered, the courtiers standing around him take off their hats.

To wear the hat in an assemblage has been thus done as a sign of equality and it is so worn in the English Parliament and in certain Masonic Lodges on the Continent of Europe. So very common is the ceremonial use of the hat when at labor by the presiding officers of a Masonic Body in the United States and to a far less frequent extent elsewhere, Bristol, in England, where a hat is worn being an exception...
The liberation of slaves took place in several ways. The most ancient mode seems to have been by will, manumissio per testamentum, on the decease of the master. There were two other modes; censu, and per vindictam. When the former was when the slave, with the master's consent, was enrolled in the taxation list as a freedman; the latter was a formal and public enfranchisement before the praetor. In the last case, the master appeared with his slave, before the tribunal, and commenced the ceremony by striking him with a rod, vindicta; thus treating him as still his slave. Then a protector or defender, assertor liberatatis, steps forward and requests the liberation of the slave by saying hunc hominem liberum esse aio, jure Quiritium, the last word referring to the inhabitants of Cures, a Sabine town, after the union of the Romans and Sabines, being equivalent to meaning citizenship. The first of the two similar expressions was followed by the other, indicating that it was the owner's will the slave should be freed. Then the master, who has hitherto kept hold of the slave, lets him go, e manu emittebat, and gives up his right over him, with the words, hunc hominem liberum esse solvo. A declaration by the praetor, that the slave should be free, formed the conclusion. To confirm this manumission, the freed slave sometimes went to Terracina and received in the temple of Feronia a cap or hat, pileus, as a badge of liberty. The slave to be freed must not be under twenty years of age, nor the person setting him free under thirty.

The goddess of fruits, nurseries, and groves, Feronia, had a Temple on Mount Soracte where a grove was especially sacred to her. She was honored as the patroness of enfranchised slaves, who ordinarily received their liberty in her Temple.

Another, and a custom that prevails in our own times, is mentioned by Dr. George C. Williamson, Curious Survivals (page 92), writing of the House of Sorbonne—alluding to the custom in that place of learning of taking off the cap when a member was to address the House, and there is often confusion when the member is unable to find his hat at the moment, and to put it on, before he addresses the Speaker, but, were he to rise without his hat, he would be greeted immediately with cries of 'Order, Order!'

Pascal’s Provincial Letters, American edition of 1850 translated by Rev. Thomas McCrie of Edinburgh, Scotland (page 79), gives a curious reference to the old Paris proverb about voting without speaking, II capite velato. The woolen cap, the cap of the Craft, which see.

HAUTES GRADES. French, meaning High Degrees, which see.

HAWKINS, EDWARD LOVELL. Author of the Concise Cyclopaedia and founder of the Miscellanea Latomorum, died on April 17, 1913, and was at the time of his death Senior Warden of Quatuor Coronati Lodge, being appointed to that office on November 8, 1912. Born on August 10, 1851, initiated in the Apollo University Lodge No. 357 at Oxford, England, and was its Worshipful Master in 1881. He also served as Provincial Grand Steward of Oxfordshire in 1879, becoming Grand Registrar in 1880, Grand Warden in 1882, and was Grand Secretary of the Province from 1883 to 1885. In the Province of Sussex he was Grand Steward in 1910 and Senior Grand Warden in 1912. In other Bodies he also held prominent rank. One of the earliest joining members of Quatuor Coronati Lodge, on April 7, 1886, the first meeting after the consecration, and on November 8, 1912, he was appointed Senior Warden of Lodge 2076. Among his literary works are a History of Freemasonry in Oxfordshire, 1852; A Concise Cyclopaedia, or Handbook of Masonic References, 1908, and also he took an active part in the preparation of the new and revised edition of Doctor Mackey’s monumental Encyclopaedia of Freemasonry and All Kindred Sciences, published in 1912. He conceived the idea of a periodical consisting of Masonic notes and queries and in May, 1911, the first number of Miscellanea Latomorum appeared and was continued up to his death, then the editorial labor was carried on by Brother F. W. Lavender, and after his death, by Brother Lionel Vibert.

HAYS, MOSES MICHAEL. Born 1739 in Lisbon, Portugal, his parents were Jews. In 1761, while in Jamaica, he secured the appointment of Deputy Inspector-General for North America for the Masonic Rite of Perfection. From Jamaica Brother Hays went to the West Indies and thence to Newport, Rhode Island, where he became active in the Fraternity. November 5, 1782, Brother Hays was proposed as a member of Massachusetts Lodge, Boston. He was elected Master, December 3, 1782, held this office until 1785, when he was appointed Junior Grand Warden and he served as Grand Master of the Massachusetts Grand Lodge from July 24, 1785, until March 5, 1792, at which time the union was effected between the two Grand Lodges of Massachusetts, which unity was due in a large way to the efforts of Brother Hays.

His death occurred May 9, 1805, and the Columbian Sentinel, Boston, published the following obituary notice on May 11:

In the character of the deceased there is much worthy of our admiration, much for our imitation. Possessed by nature of a strong intellect, there was a vigor in his conceptions of men and things which gave a seeming asperity to his conversation, which was ever frank and lucid. He walked abroad fearing no man, but loving all. Under his roof dwelt hospitality; it was an asylum of friendship, the mansion of peace. He was without guile, despising hypocrisy as he despised meanness. Take him for all in all, he was A MAN. In his death society will mourn the loss of a most estimable citizen, his family the kindest of husbands, the most indulgent of fathers.

But what consolation shall we offer to assuage the violence of their grief? Why, this is all—the recollection of his virtues, and that as he lived, so he died; that to his last moment the cheerfulness and benevolence of his whole life wasted not on his falling brow. Calm and without a sign he sunk to rest, and is now secure in the bosom of his Father and our Father, of his God and our God.
HEBREW CHRONOLOGY. The ecclesiastical year commences with the first Nisan, March, but the civil reckoning begins with the first Tishri, September, which is New Year’s Day.

The following dates are accepted by the Hebrews, as given by Doctor Zunz in Remarks prefacing The 24 Books of the Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text:

BEFORE COMMON ERA.
- 3988, Creation.
- 2332, Flood.
- 2040, Abraham born.

5. 22 B.C., upon completion of Herod’s Temple.

The three Temples were destroyed on the same day and month of the year.

The “three-fold destruction” of the Temple took place on the ninth Ab, or fifth ecclesiastical month.

HEBREW FAITH. See Talmud.

HECART, GABRIEL ANTOINE JOSEPH. A French Masonic writer, who was born at Valenciennes in 1755, and died in 1838. He made a curious collection of Degrees, and invented a system of five, namely: 1. Knight of the Prussian Eagle; 2. Knight of the Comet; 3. The Scottish Purifier; 4. Victorious Knight; 5. Scottish Trinitarian, or Grand Master Commander of the Temple. This cannot be called a Rite, because it was never accepted and practised by any Masonic authority. It is known in nomenclatures as Hecart’s System. He was the author of many dissertations and didactic essays on Masonic subjects. He at one time proposed to publish his collection of Degrees with a full explanation of each, but did not carry his design into execution. Many of them are cited in this work.

HEAYTI Freemasonry, which had been in existence for several years in the island of Hayti, was entirely extinguished by the revolution which drove out the white inhabitants. In 1809, the Grand Lodge of England granted a Charter for a Lodge at Port-au-Prince, and for one at Cayes. In 1817, the same authority constituted two others, at Jeremias and at Jacmel. Subsequently, a Provincial Grand Lodge was established under obedience to England. January 25, 1824, this Provincial Grand Lodge declared its independence and organized the Grand Orient of Hayti.

HEAL. A technical Masonic term which signifies to make valid or legal. Hence one who has received a Degree in an irregular manner or from incompetent authority is not recognized until he has been healed. The precise mode of healing depends on circumstances. If the Lodge which conferred the Degree was merely a technical one of legal competence, it is only necessary to exact an obligation of allegiance, and conscience of all men who seek its instructions.

HEARING. One of the five senses, and an important symbol in Freemasonry, because it is through it that we receive instruction when ignorant, admonition when in danger, reproof when in error, and the performance of all his duties; and hence deafness is deemed a disqualification for initiation.

HEART. Notwithstanding that all the modern American Masonic Manuals and Masters Carpets from the time of Jeremy L. Cross exhibit the picture of a heart among the emblems of the Third Degree, there is no such symbol in the instructions except as Krause properly remarks, in Speculative Freemasonry, an internal principle which addresses itself not simply to the outward conduct, but to the inner spirit of a man; and conscience of all men who seek its instructions.

HEART OF HIRAM ABIF. There is a legend in some of the advanced Degrees and in Continental Freemasonry, that the heart of Hiram Abif was deposited in an urn and placed upon a monument near the Holy of Holies; and in some of the Tracing Boards it is represented as a symbol. The myth, for such it is, was probably derived from the very common custom in the Middle Ages of persons causing their bodies to be dismembered after death for the purpose of having parts of them buried in a church, or some place which had been dear to them in life. Thus Hardyng, in his Metrical Chronicle of England, tells us of Richard I that he gave his heart to Rome when he set full mete for their great truth and steadfast great constance.

The medieval idea has descended to modern times; as given by Doctor Zunz in Remarks prefacing The 24 Books of the Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text:

- 536, Second Temple completed.
- 330, Alexander conquers Palestine.
HEATOMB. The Greek compound word hecatombe, from hekaton, meaning one hundred, and boos, or, and therefore strictly speaking a reference to the sacrifice of one hundred oxen. But the allusion to a sacrifice, formerly of one hundred bulls, and in later expressions referring probably only to an indefinitely large number of victims, is also capable of being applied and was frequently so employed, to mean any great sacrifice. In this latter sense should the word be understood by Freemasons. Pythagoras was a vegetarian who taught that killing was wicked and to him the sacrifice of a hecatomb could have meant no loss of animal life in the offering (see Forty-seventh Problem).

HEDGE MASONS. This expression has been believed to be applied to a secret society, probably Masonic, but meeting without Warrant or authority. In Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, 1913 (volume xxvi, part 2, page 197), we find that a letter of Amicus to the Editor of the Northern Star, Ireland, dated March 21, 1792, mentions that all disorders and mischiefs in the country are being hatched by those Body for inspection and correction, which the Lodge, unwilling to submit to such a censorship, demanded that the manuscript should be given to those who associate under the description of Hedge Masons. For this purpose, in 1816, he organized the Lodge zur Brudertreue at Aarau, in Switzerland, and was born at Margetshochheim, in Franconia, November 24, 1770. He was one of the most profound of the German investigators into the history and philosophy of Freemasonry. He was initiated into the Order at Freiburg, in 1809, and, devoting himself to the study of the works of Fessler and other eminent scholars, he resolved to establish a system founded on a collation of all the rituals, and which should be more in accordance with the true design of the Institution. For this purpose, in 1816, he organized the Lodge zur Brudertreue at Aarau, in Switzerland, where he then resided as a professor. For the Lodge he prepared a Manual, which he proposed to publish. But the Helvetian Directory demanded that the manuscript should be given to that Body for inspection and correction, which the Lodge, unwilling to submit to such a censorship, refused to do. Heldmann, being reluctant to involve the Lodge in a controversy with its superiors, withdrew from it. He subsequently published a valuable work entitled Die drei ältesten geschichtlichen Denkmale der deutschen Freimaurerbruderschaft; meaning, The three oldest Memorials of the German Masonic Brotherhood, which appeared at Aarau in 1819. In this work, which is chiefly founded on the learned researches of Krause, the Constitutions of the Stone-Masons of Strasburg were published for the first time.

HETER, TO. See Heler.

HELMET. A defensive weapon wherewith the head and neck are covered. In heraldry, it is a mark of chivalry and nobility. It was, of course, a part of the armor of a knight, and therefore, whatever may be the head covering adopted by modern Knights Templar, it is in the instructions called a helmet.

HELMETS, TO DEPOSIT. In quaint old Templar ritualism, to lay aside the covering of the head.

HEREDOM. In what are called the High Degrees of the Continental Rites, there is nothing more puzzling than the etymology of this word. We have the Royal Order of Heredom, given as the ne plus ultra, meaning nothing farther or nothing beyond, of Freemasonry in Scotland, and in almost all the Rites the Rose Croix of Heredom, but the true meaning of the word is apparently unknown. Ragon, in his Orthodoxie Maçoniques (page 91), asserts that it has a political significance, and that it was invented between the years 1740 and 1745, by the adherents of Charles Edward the Pretender, at the Court of Saint Germain, which was the residence, during that period, of the unfortunate prince, and that in their letters to England, dated from Heredom, they mean... to denote Saint Germain. He supposes it to be derived from the medieval Latin word heredum, signifying a heritage, and that it alludes to the Castle of Saint Germain, the only heritage left to the dethroned sovereign. But as Ragon's favorite notion was that the Hroues Grades or High Degrees, were originally instituted for the purpose of aiding the house of Stuart in its restoration to the throne, a theory not now generally accepted, at least without modification, this etymology must be taken with some grains of allowance. The suggestion is, however, an ingenious one.

In some of the old manuscripts the word Heroden is found as the name of a mountain in Scotland; and we sometimes find in the French Cahiers the title of Rose Croix de Heroden. There is not a very great difference in the French pronunciation of Heredom and Heroden, and one might be a corruption of the other. Brother Mackey says he was once inclined to this theory; but even if it were the correct one we should gain nothing, for the same difficulty would recur in tracing the root and meaning of Heroden.

The most plausible derivation is one given in 1858, by a writer in the London Freemasons Magazine. He thinks it should be spelled Heredom, and traces it to the two Greek words, ἥρως, heros, meaning holy, and ὄμος, domos, meaning house. It would thus refer to Freemasonry as symbolically the Holy House or Temple. In this way the title of Rose Croix of Heredom would signify the Rosy Cross of the Holy House of Freemasonry. This derivation is now very generally recognized as the true one.

So far Brother Mackey's explanation of the word, but at this point Brother Hawkins observes that according to the view taken in the last paragraph the word should be Hierodom (see also Royal Order of Scotland).

HERMAIMES. A corruption of Hermes, found in some of the old Constitutions (see Hermes).

HERMANDAD. The Spanish word for Brotherhood. An association of the principal cities of Castile and Aragon bound by a solemn league for the defense of their liberties in time of trouble. The sovereigns approved this brotherhood as agents for suppressing the increasing power of the nobles, and without cost to the government. The Hermandad was first established in Aragon in the thirteenth century, and in Castile about thirty years later, while, in 1295, thirty-five cities of Castile and Leon formed a joint confederacy, pledging themselves to take summary vengeance on every robber noble who injured a member of the association. The Santa, or Holy Brotherhood, finally checked so effectually the outrages of the nobles, that Isabella of Castile, in 1496, obtained the sanction of the Cortes to reorganize and extend it over the whole kingdom.

HERMES. In all the old manuscript records which contain the Legend of the Craft, mention is made of Hermes as one of the founders of Freemasonry. Thus, in the Grand Lodge Manuscript, No. 1, whose date is 1583—and the statement is substantially and almost verbally the same in all the others—that "The great Hermarmes that was Cubys sonne, the which Cubye was Semmes sonne, that was Noes sonne. This same Hermarmes was afterwards called Hermes the father of Wysdome; he found one of the two pillars of stone, and found the science written therein, and he taught it to other men."

There are two persons of the name of Hermes mentioned in sacred history. The first is the divine Hermes, called by the Romans Mercury. Among the Egyptians he was known as Thoth. Diodorus Siculus describes him as the Secretary of Osiris; he is commonly supposed to have been the son of Mizraim, and Cumberland says that he was the same as Osiris. There is, however, much confusion among the mythologists concerning his attributes.

The second was Hermes Trismegistus or the Thrice Great, who was a celebrated Egyptian legislator, priest, and philosopher, who lived in the reign of Ninus, about the year of the world 2670. He is said to have written thirty-six books on theology and philosophy, and six upon medicine, all of which are lost. There are many traditions of him; one of which, related by Eusebius, is that he introduced hieroglyphics into Egypt. This Hermes Trismegistus, although the reality of his existence is doubtful, was claimed by the alchemists as the founder of their art, whence it is called the Hermetic Science, and whence we get in Freemasonry, Hermetic Rites and Hermetic Degrees. It is to him that the Legend of the Craft refers; and, indeed, the York Constitutions, which are of importance, though not probably of the date of 926, assigned to them by Krause, give him that title, and say that he brought the custom of making himself understood by signs with him to Egypt. In the first ages of the Christian church, this mythical Egyptian philosopher was in fact considered as the inventor of everything known to the human intellect. It was fabled that Pythagoras and Plato had derived their knowledge from him, and that he had recorded his inventions on pillars. The Operative Masons, who wrote the old Constitutions, obtained their acquaintance with him from the Polycrioncon of the monk Ranulf Higden, which was translated from the Latin by Trevisa, and printed by William Caxton in 1482. It is repeatedly quoted in the Cooke Manuscript, whose probable date is the latter part of the fifteenth century, and was undoubtedly familiar to the writers of the other Constitutions.

HERMETIC ART. The art or science of Alchemy, so termed from Hermes Trismegistus, who was looked up to by the alchemists as the founder of their art. The Hermetic philosophers say that all the sages of antiquity, such as Plato, Socrates, Aristotle, and Pythagoras, were initiated into the secrets of their science; and that the hieroglyphics of Egypt and all the fables of mythology were invented to teach the dogmas of Hermetic philosophy (see Alchemy).

HERMETIC PHILOSOPHY. Pertaining or belonging to that species of philosophy which pretends to solve and explain all the phenomena of nature from the three chemical principles, salt, sulphur, and mercury. Also that study of the sciences as pursued by the Rosicrucian Fraternity. A practise of the arts of alchemy and similar pursuits, involving a duplex symbolism with their peculiar distinctions.

HERMETIC RITE. A Rite established by Perronet at Avignon, in France, and more commonly called the Illuminati of Avignon (see Avignon, Illuminati of).
HERMETIC STUDENTS. See Isis-Uranea Temple.

HERODEM. See Heredom.

HERODEM, ROYAL ORDER OF. See Royal Order of Scotland.

HERODEM, "Heredon," says a manuscript of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, "is a mountain situated in the northwest of Scotland, where the first or metropolitan Lodge of Europe was held." The word is now not used by Masonic writers, and was, undoubtedly, a corruption of Heredom or Harodim, which see.

HEROINE OF JERICHO. An androgynous (for both sexes) Degree conferred, in America, on Royal Arch Masons, their wives, and daughters. It is intended to instruct its female recipients in the claims which they have upon the protection of their husbands' and fathers' companions, and to communicate to them an effectual method of proving those claims. An instance of friendship extended to the whole family of a benefactress by those whom she had benefited, and of the influence of a solemn contract in averting danger, is referred to in the case of Rahab, the woman of Jericho, from whom the Degree derives its name; and for this purpose the second chapter of the Book of Joshua is read to the candidate. When the Degree is received by a male, he is called a Knight of Jericho, and when by a female, she is termed a Heroine. It is a side or honorary Degree, and may be conferred by any Royal Arch Mason on a candidate qualified to receive it.

HERRING, JAMES. Born in London, England, January 12, 1794; died in France, October 8, 1867; buried in Greenwood Cemetery, New York, October 27, 1867. The family emigrated to America in 1805. James Herring was initiated in Solomon's Lodge, Somerville, New Jersey, in 1816. He was Master of Clinton Lodge, New York City, in 1827, 1828, 1832, and 1834, a period when the anti-Masonic spirit was in its zenith. He, with the remaining members of Clinton Lodge, united with Saint John's, No. 1, and met in union December 18, 1834. He instituted the formation of the Lodge of Strict Observance, which was constituted by Grand Lodge, December 27, 1843, Right Worshipful Brother Herring being the Master, with which Lodge he remained until his death. On September 3, 1828, he was appointed Assistant Grand Secretary, and on June 3, 1829, was elected Grand Secretary, which office he retained until 1846. He sided with the Phillips or Herring Grand Body at the split in Grand Lodge on June 5, 1849, and remained its Grand Secretary until 1858, when, in June, the two Grand Lodges were fused. He was a delegate to the Convention of Grand Lodges held in Washington on March 7, 1842. Brother Herring delivered the oration, on August 23, 1847, in Saint John's Lodge, in commemoration of the Most Worshipful Grand Masters, Morgan Lewis and Alex. H. Robertson, and other eminent Freemasons, on the occasion of the First Lodge of Sorrow held in America in the English language. He was exalted in Jerusalem Chapter, No. 8, Royal Arch Masons, New York City, January 5, 1817, dubbed a Knight Templar in Columbian Commandery, No. 1, New York, and was received a Sovereign Grand Inspector General, Thirty-third Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Brother Herring was a Past High Priest and Past Grand Secretary of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, Past Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of the United States, and Past Grand Representative of the Orient of Brazil and France. Grand Historian Ossian Lang on page 126, History of Freemasonry in the State of New York, 1922, says "James Herring proved a tower of strength in the trying days. His untiring zeal and masterly management did much to pilot the Grand Lodge through the night of storm."

HESES. Said to be the real name of the author of the Encyclopaedie des Freemaurerei (see Lenning).

HESSE-CASSEL. Freemasonry appears to have been founded in this Electorate in 1743, by a Lodge at Marburg, called Zu den drei Löwen, or Three Lions, which afterward took the name of Marc Aurel zum flammenden Stern, or of the Blazing Star. A Lodge also appears to have existed in 1771, at Cassel, called Zum blauen Löwen. In 1817 the Grand Mother Lodge of Hesse-Cassel was founded, which lasted until 1821, when the government closed all Lodges. In 1849 one was reopened by General von Helmschwert, but it was closed in 1855. It is now understood that this Lodge has been reopened.

HESSE DARMSTADT, GRAND DUCHY OF. German state. An early Masonic Lodge, Die drei Disteln, or Three Thistles, here said to have been first organized at Mayence in 1765. The Lodges in Darmstadt were in the Frankfort Eclectic Union and formed the Grand Lodge Zur Eintracht or of Concord, at Darmstadt in 1845, which is now called Die grosse Loge des Freimaurer Bundes zur Eintracht in Darmstadt or The Grand Lodge of Masonic Bodies of Concord at Darmstadt.

HEXAGON. A figure of six equal sides constitutes a part of the Camp in the Scottish Degree of Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret. Stieglitz, in an essay on the symbols of Freemasonry, published in 1825, in the Altenburg Zeitschrift, says that the hexagon formed by six triangles, whose apices converge to a point, making the accompanying figure, is a symbol of the universal creation, the six points crossing the central point; thus assimilating the hexagon to the older symbol of the point within a circle.

HEXAGRAM. From two words of the Greek language meaning six and written. A geometrical figure made up of two interlaced equilateral triangles, supposed to possess mysterious powers and frequently used as a symbol of the Pythagorean school. It is also known as the Seal of Solomon and the Shield of David (see Magic Squares).

HEXAGRAM. See Magic Squares.

HEXAPLA. Greek for sixfold. A Bible arranged with six versions in parallel columns, sometimes spoken of as the Hexaplar Text of the Holy Scriptures.

H. G. W. Initials of an expression frequently used by visiting English Brethren to convey the hearty good wishes of the Master and Brethren of their own Lodge to the officers and members of the Lodge visited.
HIBBUT-HAKEBEKER. Means the Beating of the sepulcher. A Mohammedan belief as to the state of the soul after death. The form and mode of judgment is explained in Al Koran. The sarcophagus of an orthodox Moslem is so constructed that the deceased can sit upright when notified by his angel of the approach of the examiners, who question him as to his faith in the unity of God and the mission of Mohammed. Satisfactory answers insure peace; but if to the contrary, he is beaten on the temples with iron maces until he roars with anguish. The two angels, Monker and Nakù, then press the earth upon the body, which is gnawed and stung by ninety-nine seven-headed dragons until the day of resurrection. As the Mohammedan was an imitative religion, we naturally look for the origin of its customs and beliefs in older faiths; thus the Hìbbut-Hakebeker is found in the Jewish, which taught that the angel of death would sit on a new-made grave, the soul would return to the body, which would stand up, the angel striking it thrice with a chain, half iron and half fire; at the first blow all the limbs were loosened, at the second the bones were dispersed, but gathered again by angels, and the third stroke reduces it to dust. This need not occur to those who died on the Sabbath or in the land of Israel (see Gilgal).

HIEROGLYPHICS. From the two Greek words which signify the engraving of sacred things. Hieroglyphics are properly the expressions of ideas by representations of visible objects, and the word is more peculiarly applied to that species of picture-writing which was in use among the ancient Egyptians, whose priests by this means concealed from the profane that knowledge which they communicated only to their initiates. Browne says (Master Key, page 87), "The usages amongst Masons have ever corresponded with those of the ancient Egyptians. Their Philosophers, unwilling to expose their Mysteries to vulgar Curiosity, couched the Principles of their Learning and Philosophy under Hieroglyphical Figures and Allegorical Emblems, and expressed their notions of Government by Signs and Symbols, which they communicated to the Magi, or wise Men only, who were solemnly obligated never to reveal them."

HIEROGRAMMATISTS. The title of those priests in the Egyptian mysteries to whom were confided the keeping of the sacred records. Their duty was also to instruct the neophytes in the ritual of initiation, and to secure its accurate observance.

HIERONYMITES. A Hermit Order established in the fourteenth century, formed from the third Order of Saint Francis. Followers of Thomas of Siens, who established themselves among the wild districts of the Sierra Morena, and so forming a community, obtained approval of Pope Gregory XI in 1374.

HIEROPHANT. From the Greek, hierophán, which signifies one who explains the sacred things. The Hierophant was, in the Ancient Mysteries, what the Master is in a Masonic Lodge—he who instructed the neophyte or candidate in the doctrines which it was the object of the Mysteries to inculcate.

HIEROPHANT or MYSTAGOG. The Chief Priest of the Eleusinians, selected from the grade of Eumolpidens. He was selected for his imposing personal presence, and his dignity was sustained by the grandeur of his attire, his head encircled with a costly diadem. He was required to be perfect in animal structure, without blemish, and in the vigor of life, with a commanding voice. He was presumed to be surrounded by a halo of holiness. His duty was to maintain and also expound the laws. He was the instructor of the novices into the Eleusinian Temple, and passed them from the lesser into the greater mysteries, where he became the Demiurg, and impressed the initiate, while instructing him, by his manner and voice. His title of Mystagog was awarded because he alone revealed the secret or mystery.

HIEROPHYLLAX. Title of the Guardian of the holy vessels and vestments, as used in several Rites.

HIGH DEGREES. Not long after the introduction of Freemasonry on the Continent, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, three new Degrees were invented and named, Ecossais, Novice, and Knight Templar. These gave the impulse to the invention of many other Degrees, all above the Master's Degree. To these the name of Hautes Grades or High Degrees was given. Their number is very great. Many of them now remain only in the catalogues of Masonic collectors, or are known merely by their titles; while others still exist, and constitute the body of the different rites. The word is not properly applicable to the Royal Arch Degrees of the English and American systems, which are intimately connected with the Master's Degree, but is confined to the additions made to Ancient Craft Freemasonry by continental ritualists. These Degrees have, from time to time, met with great opposition as innovations on Ancient Freemasonry, and some of the Grand Lodges have not only rejected them, but forbidden their cultivation by those who are under their obedience. But, on the other hand, they have been strenuously supported by many who have believed the Ancient Craft Degrees do not afford a sufficient field for the expansion of Masonic thought. A writer in the London Freemasons Magazine (of 1858, i, 1167) has expressed the true theory on this subject in the following language:

It is the necessary consequence of an exclusive addiction to Craft Masonry that the intellectual and artistic development of the minds of the members must suffer, the ritual sink to formalism, and the administration fall into the hands of the lower members of the Order, by a diminution in the initiations of men of high intellectual calibre, and by the inactivity, or practical secession, of those within the Order. The suppression of the higher Degrees, that is, of the higher Masonry, may be agreeable to those who are content to possess the administrative functions of the Order without genuine qualifications for their exercise, but it is a policy most fatal to the true progress of the Order. When Masonry has so fallen, to restore the higher Degrees to their full activity is the measure essential for restoring the efficacy of Masonry within and without. Thus, in the last century, when Craft Masonry had spread rapidly over the whole of Europe, a reaction set in, till the heads of the Order brought the high Degrees into vigor, and they continued to exercise the most powerful influence.

HIGHEST OF HILLS. In the Old York Lectures was the following passage: "Before we had the convenience of such well-formed Lodges, the Brethren used to meet on the highest of hills and in the lowest of valleys. And if they were asked why they met so high, so low, and so very secret, they replied—the better to see and observe all that might ascend or descend; and in case a Cowan should appear, the Tiler might give timely notice to the Worshipful Master, by which means the Lodge might be closed, the jewels put by, thereby preventing any unlawful intrusion." In commenting on this, Doctor Oliver (Landmarks i, page 319) says: "Amongst other observances which were common to both the true and spurious Freemasonry, we find the practice of performing commemorative rites on the highest of hills and in the lowest of valleys. This practice was in high esteem amongst all the inhabitants of the ancient world, from a fixed persuasion that the summit of mountains made a nearer approach to the celestial deities, and the valley or holy cavern to the infernal and subterranean gods than the level country; and that, therefore, the prayers of mortals were more likely to be heard in such situations." Hutchinson also says: "The highest hills and the lowest valleys were from the earliest times esteemed sacred, and it was supposed that the Spirit of God was peculiarly diffusive in those places."

The sentiment was expressed in the language of the earliest lectures of the eighteenth century, and is still retained, without change of words, in the lectures of the present day. But introduced, at first, undoubtedly with special reference to the ancient worship on high places, and the celebration of the mysteries in the caverns of initiation, it is now retained for the purpose of giving warning and instruction as to the necessity of security and secrecy in the performance of our mystical rites, and this is the reason assigned in the modern lectures. And, indeed, the notion of thus expressing the necessity of secrecy seems to have been early adopted, while that of the sacredness of these places was beginning to be lost sight of; for in a lecture of the middle of the eighteenth century, or earlier, it was said that "the Lodge stands upon holy ground, or the highest hill or lowest vale, or in the Vale of Jehosophat, or any other secret place." The sacredness of the spot is, it is true, here adverted to, but there is an emphasis given to its secrecy.

This custom of meeting on the "highest hills and in the lowest valleys," says Brother E. E. Cawthorne, seems to have prevailed at Aberdeen, Scotland, for they say: "We ordain that no Lodge be holden within a dwelling-house where there is people living in it, but in the open fields, except it be ill weather, and then let a house be chosen that no person shall hear or see us." Also, "We ordain lykeways that all entering prentieses be entered in our ancient outfield Lodge in the mearness in the Parish of Negg, at the Stonnies at the poyn of the Ness."

It is also of interest that Montandon Lodge No. 22, Grand Lodge of Chile, was consecrated in November, 1927, at Potrerillos, some ten thousand feet above sea level in the Andes Mountains and named after George Montandon, the constructing engineer who lost his life in building the railroad there in 1908. The Revisor is reminded of attending the consecration of a Masonic Lodge on the top floor of the pioneer scraper, the old Masonic Temple, later the Capitol building, a 354-foot structure, at Chicago, Illinois.

HIGH GRADES. Sometimes used for High Degrees, which see.

HIGH PRIEST. The presiding officer of a Chapter of Royal Arch Masons according to the American system. His title is Most Excellent, and he represents Joshua, or Jeshua, who was the son of Josedech, and the High Priest of the Jews when they returned from the Babylonian exile. He is seated in the east, and clothed in the apparel of the ancient High Priest of the Jews. He wears a robe of blue, purple, scarlet, and white linen, and is decorated with a breastplate and miter. On the front of the miter is inscribed the words, Holiness to the Lord. His jewel is a miter.

HIGH PRIESTHOOD, ORDER OF. This Order is an honorarium, gift of honor, to be bestowed upon the High Priest of a Royal Arch Chapter in the United States, and consequently no one is legally entitled to receive it until he has been duly elected to preside as High Priest in a regular Chapter of Royal Arch Masons. It should not be conferred when a less number than three duly qualified High Priests are present. Whenever the ceremony is performed in ample form, the assistance of at least nine High Priests, who have received it, is requisite. The General Grand Chapter of the United States has decided that although it is highly expedient that every High Priest should receive the order, yet its possession is not essentially necessary as a qualification for the discharge of his official duties.

The jewel of the Degree consists of a plate of gold in the form of a triple triangle, a breastplate being placed over the point of union. In front, the face of each triangle is inscribed with the Tetragrammaton, יְהֹוָה; on the other side, the upper triangle has the following mystical notation, אֱלֹהִים; the two lower triangles have the Hebrew letters נ א and פ inserted upon them. Each side of each triangle should be one inch in length, and may be ornamented at the fancy of the wearer. The breastplate may be plainly engraved or set with stones. It was adopted in 1856, on the suggestion of the author of this work, at a very general but informal meeting of Grand and Past Grand High Priests during the session of the General Grand Chapter held at Hartford, Connecticut. It is now in general use.

It is impossible, from the want of authentic documents, to throw much light upon the historical origin of this Degree. No allusion to it can be found in any ritual out of America, nor even here before the end of the eighteenth or beginning of the nineteenth century. Webb is the first who mentions it, and gives it a place in the series of capitular Degrees. The question was, however, exhaustively examined by Brother William Hacker, Past Grand High Priest of Indiana, who has paid much attention to the subject of American Masonic archetiology. In a letter to the author in August, 1873, he sought to investigate the origin of this Order, and Brother Mackey gladly availed himself of the result of his inquiries.

Brother Hacker compiled the following details for us:

I infer, as we find no mention of the Order in the edition of 1797, and a monitory ritual appearing in the edition of 1802, that at some time between those dates we must look for the true origin of the Order.

Turning then to the proceedings of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, we find that at the Communication held in the city of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, on January 9, 1799, Benjamin Hurd, Jr., Thomas Smith Webb, and James Harrison were appointed "a Committee to revise the Constitution, and report such alterations and amendments thereto as they shall find necessary to be made." The next day, January 10, 1799, Webb, as chairman of the committee, submitted their report, which was adopted as reported. In Article IV of that Constitution, we find the forms for constituting new Chapters, and installing High Priests, laid down as fully laid down and provided for. In those forms, after certain ceremonies had been gone through with, "All the Companions, except High Priests and Past High Priests, are requested to withdraw while the new High Priest is solemnly bound to the performance of his duties; and after the performance of other necessary ceremonies, not proper to be written, they are permitted to return."

Now, let us look at it naturally. What were those "other necessary ceremonies not proper to be written"? A few lines farther on we find this language laid down: "In consequence of your cheerful acquiescence with the charges and regulations just recited, I now declare you duly installed and anointed High Priest of this new Chapter." Now do not the words "and anointed," as here used, fully answer the question as to what those "other necessary ceremonies" were? It seems so to me. Upon this theory, then, we have Thomas Smith Webb, and his associates on the committee, Benjamin Hurd, Jr., and James Harrison, as the authors of the Order. It was adopted by the General Grand Chapter on January 10, 1799, when it became a part of the constitutional requirements of Royal Arch Masonry, so far at least, as the authority of the General Grand Chapter was concerned. This matter was connected with the ceremonies of installation, leaving the Order of High Priesthood the exclusive property of those who were in possession of it. Where these Excellent Companions got the original thoughts, the Order, the forms, the words, the performance, I have, perhaps, to be left to conjecture; yet even here I think we may find some data upon which to found a conclusion. In setting about the formation of an Order suitable for the office of High Priest, what could be more natural or appropriate than to take the scriptural history of the meeting of Abraham with Melchizedek, Priest of the Most High God; the circumstances which brought that meeting about; the bringing forth the bread and wine; the blessing, etc.; and the anointing of Aaron and his sons to the Priesthood under the Mosaic Dispensations. It does seem to me that these would be the most natural sources for any one to go to for facts and circumstances to work into an Order of this kind. We can illustrate this point farther by reference to a note found in an old ritual of the "Mediterranean Fasai"; as they are called, and perhaps it may be so here—confounded under the Grand Priory of England and Wales, preparatory to the Order of Malta. That note reads as follows:

"In some Priories the candidate partakes of bread from the hand of the High Priest; and perhaps it may be so here. The wine is placed upon the blade, handed to him by the Prelate."

Again, in an old manuscript of the ritual of the Royal Grand Conclave of Scotland, now also lying before me, I find the offering of bread and wine at the installation of a Past High Priest. How well the thoughts contained in these extracts have been worked into the Order of High Priest, even the well-informed High Priest must very well understand.

But the question now comes up: were Webb and his associates in possession of these rituals at the time they originated the Order of High Priesthood? I think they were, and for these reasons: In these rituals to which I have referred I find these expressions used: "That I will not shed the blood of a K. T. unlawfully"; "the skull to be laid open, and all the brains to be exposed to the scorching rays of the sun"; with several other familiar expressions, which every Royal Arch Mason will readily recognize as appropriately wrought into Webb's Royal Arch Degree.

From the foregoing facts, as well as others not stated, I infer that Thomas Smith Webb, with his co-advisers, Benjamin Hurd, Jr., and James Harrison, were the true authors of the Order; that it dates from January 10, 1799, at which time it was adopted by the General Grand Chapter, and became a part of the constitutional regulations and requirements of Royal Arch Masonry so far as the authority of the General Grand Chapter extended, and that it continued as such until the 16th day of September, 1826, when it was revised and amended before stated.

A thought or two further, and I will have done. Webb, in arranging the Order, evidently intended that it should be conferred as a part of the installation ceremonies of a High Priest; and whether he ever conferred it at any other time or in any other manner I have been unable to learn, as I have never met with any one who claimed to have received the Order from him. At what time and by whom it was first conferred as a separate ceremonial is equally unknown to me. All I have yet been able to find upon this point is in Cross's Chart, where, in the edition of 1826, and it may also be in the earlier editions, I find it arranged as a separate ceremonial, and disconnected with the ceremonies of installation.

The earliest authentic record of the organization of a Council of High Priests I have yet found is in the proceedings of the Grand Chapter of Ohio in 1828, where it appears that a Council was duly formed, rules adopted for its government, and a full list of officers elected, with Companion John Snow as President. It is more than probable that the Order has always been conferred, west of the mountains, as a separate ceremonial, and never as a part of the installation ceremonies. It is well known that John Snow, who no doubt brought it with him when he came to the West, always required it, and whether it be conferred as a separate ceremonial, as Doctor Mitchell and others who followed him, point to us to any other single Order or Degree of Masonry that can be so conferred as so connected; that it has in it more of the elements of sublimity and impressiveness, and that is more scripturally and Masonically appropriate for that for which it was intended, than the Order of High-Priesthood; remembering also that it was established upon the constitutional authority of... the General Grand Chapter of the United States, which is, and ever has been, the highest authority in Royal Arch Masonry in the United States. At the same time, the names of those zealous companions who participated in its adoption stands that of the Honorable De Witt Clinton, for so many years the zealous and efficient General Grand High Priest. The hour of noon, when they all stood together, as they stand recorded before us, I think the question as to the origin and authenticity may be considered as fully settled.

HIGH PRIEST OF THE JEWS. The important office of the High Priesthood was instituted by Moses after the completion of the directions for erecting the tabernacle, and was restricted to Aaron and his descendants, and was so confined until the time of the Asmonean dynasty, when it passed into the family of Judas Maccabaeus. The High Priest was at the head not only of ecclesiastical but of civil affairs, presiding in the Sanhedrim and judging the people. He superintended the Temple, directing the mode of worship, and preserving the building from profanation. He was inducted into his office by anointment and sacrifices, and was invested with a peculiar dress. This dress, as the Rabbis describe it, consisted of eight parts, namely, the breastplate, the ephod, with its curious girdle, the robe of the ephod, the miter, the broidered coat, and the girdle. The materials of which these were composed were gold, blue, red, purple, and fine white linen. As these garments are to a certain extent represented in the vestment of a High Priest of a Royal Arch Chapter, a brief description of them may be expedient:

The High Priest was first clothed in a pair of linen drawers. Over this was a coat or shirt of fine linen reaching to his feet, and with sleeves extending to his wrists. Over this again was a robe of blue, called the Coat of Ephod. It was without sleeves, but consisted of two pieces, one before and another behind, having a large opening in the top for the passage of the head, and another on each side to admit the arms. It extended only to the middle of the legs, and its skirt was adorned with little golden bells and pomegranates. Above all these vestiments the ephod, which had already been described as a short garment coming down only to the breast before, but somewhat longer behind, without sleeves, and artificially wrought with gold, blue, and purple, with the embroidery of various figures. It was looped on the shoulders with two onyx stones, on each of which was inscribed the names of six of the tribes. On the front of the ephod he wore the breastplate; at solemn ministrations a miter of fine linen and preserving the building from profanation. He was inducted into his office by anointment and sacrifices, and was invested with a peculiar dress. This dress, as the Rabbis describe it, consisted of eight parts, namely, the breastplate, the ephod, with its curious girdle, the robe of the ephod, the miter, the broidered coat, and the girdle. The materials of which these were composed were gold, blue, red, purple, and fine white linen. As these garments are to a certain extent represented in the vestment of a High Priest of a Royal Arch Chapter, a brief description of them may be expedient:

The ceremonies of initiation, as they have been described by Brother Oliver, were celebrated in spacious caverns, the principal of which were Elephanta and Salsette, both situated near Bombay. The mysteries were divided into four Degrees, and the candidate was permitted to perform the probation of the first at the early age of eight years. It consisted simply in the investiture with the linen garment and Zennar or sacred cord; of sacrifices accompanied by ablutions; and of an explanatory lecture. The aspirant was now delivered into the care of a Brahman in his sacred profession; for the initiation of India, like those of Egypt, were confined to the priesthood. All Brahmans, it is true, do not necessarily belong to the sacerdotal order, but every Brahman who has been initiated, and thus been made acquainted with the formulas of worship, may at any time become an officiating priest. The ceremonies of initiation, as they have been described by Brother Oliver, were celebrated in spacious caverns, the principal of which were Elephanta and Salsette, both situated near Bombay. The mysteries were divided into four Degrees, and the candidate was permitted to perform the probation of the first at the early age of eight years. It consisted simply in the investiture with the linen garment and Zennar or sacred cord; of sacrifices accompanied by ablutions; and of an explanatory lecture. The aspirant was now delivered into the care of a Brahman, who thenceforth became his spiritual guide, and prepared him by repeated instructions and a life of austerity for admission into the Second Degree. To this, if found qualified, he was admitted at the requisite age. The probationary ceremonies of this Degree consisted in an incessant occupation in prayers, fastings, ablutions, and the study of astronomy. Having undergone these austerities for a sufficient period, he was led at night to the gloomy caverns of initiation, which had been duly prepared for his reception.

The interior of this cavern was brilliantly illuminated, and there sat the three chief hierophants, in the east, west, and south, representing the gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, surrounded by the attendant mystagogues, dressed in appropriate vestments. After an invocation to the sun, the aspirant was called upon to promise that he would be obedient to his superiors, keep his body pure, and preserve inviolable secrecy on the subject of the mysteries. He was then sprinkled with water, an invocation of the Deity was whispered in his ear; he was divested of his shoes, and made to circumambulate the cavern three times, in imitation of the course of the sun, whose rising was personated by the hierophant representing Brahma, stationed in the east, whose meridian height by the representative of Siva in the south, and whose setting by the representative of Vishnu in the west. He was then conducted through seven ranges of dark and gloomy caverns, during which period the wailing of Mahadeva for the loss of Siva was represented by dismal howlings. The usual paraphernalia of flashes of light, of dismal sounds and horrid phantoms, was practised to intimidate or confuse the aspirant. After the performance of a variety of other ceremonies, many of which we can only conjecture, the candidate reached the extremity of the seven caverns; he was now prepared for enlightenment by requisite instruction and the administration of a solemn oath. This part of the ceremonies concluded, then the sacred conch or horn was blown, the folding-doors were suddenly thrown open, and the aspirant was admitted into a spacious apartment filled with dazzling light, ornamented with statues and emblematical figures, richly decorated with gems, and scented with the most fragrant perfumes. This was a representation of Paradise.

The candidate was now supposed to be regenerated, and he was invested by the chief Brahman with the white robe and tiara; a cross was marked upon his forehead, and a tau upon his breast, and he was instructed in the signs, tokens, and lectures of the Order. He was presented with the sacred belt, the magical black stone, the talismanic jewel to be worn upon his breast, and the serpent stone, which, as its name imported, was an antidote against the bite of serpents. And, lastly, he was entrusted with the sacred name, known only to the initiated. This ineffable name was Aum, which, in its triliteral form, was significant of the creative, preservative, and destroying power, that is, of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. It could not be pronounced, but was to be the subject of incessant silent contemplation. The symbols and the aporrheta, or secret things of the mysteries, were now explained. Here ended the Second Degree. The Third took place when the candidate had grown old, and his children had all been provided for. This consisted in a total exclusion in the forest, where, as an anchoret, withdrawn from the world, a hermit, he occupied himself in ablations, prayers, and sacrifices. In the Fourth Degree he underwent still greater austerities, the object of which was to impart to the happy sage who observed them a portion of the Divine nature, and to secure him a residence among the immortals gods.

The object of the Indian mysteries appears, says Brother Oliver, to have been to teach the unity of God and the necessity of virtue. The happiness of our first parents, the subsequent depravity of the human race, and the universal deluge were described in a manner which showed that their knowledge must have been derived from an authentic source.

HINNOM. A deep valley south of Mount Moriah, known as Gehenna; in which carrion was cast as food for vultures. The holy Valley of Judgment, Jehovahphat, has been improperly substituted for Hinnom.

HIRAM. The gavel, when wielded by the Master of the Lodge, is sometimes called the Hiram, because as the workmen at the Temple were controlled and directed by Hiram, the chief builder, so the Master keeps order in the Lodge by proper use of the gavel.

HIRAM or HURAM. In Hebrew, הרם or הירם, meaning noble-born. The more correct pronunciation, according to the true value of the Hebrew letters, is Khuram or Khurum; but universal Masonic usage renders it now impossible, or, at least, inexpedient, to make the change. The name of Hiram, King of Tyre, is spelled Hiram everywhere in Scripture except in First Chronicles (xiv, 1), where it occurs as Huram. In First Chronicles xiv, 1, the original Hebrew text has Hiram, but the Masonites in the margin direct it to be read Huram. In our authorized version, the name is spelled Hiram, which is also the form used in the Vulgate and in the Targums; the Septuagint has Χερύμ, or Χεριράμ.

HIRAM ABIF. There is no character in the annals of Freemasonry whose life is so dependent on tradition as the celebrated architect of King Solomon's Temple. Profane history is entirely silent in respect to his career, and the sacred records supply us with only very unimportant items. To fill up the space between his life and his death, we are necessarily compelled to resort to those oral legends which have been handed down from the ancient Freemasons to their successors. Yet, looking to their character, I should be unwilling, says Brother Mackey, to vouch for the authenticity of all; most of them were probably at first symbolical in their character; the symbol in the lapse of time having been converted into a myth, and the myth, by constant repetition, having assumed the formal appearance of a truthful narrative. Such has been the case in the history of all nations. But whatever may have been their true character, to the Freemason, at least, they are interesting, and cannot be altogether void of instruction.

When King Solomon was about to build a temple to Jehovah, the difficulty of obtaining skilful workmen to superintend and to execute the architectural part of the undertaking was such, that he found it necessary to request of his friend and ally, Hiram, King of Tyre, the use of some of his most able builders; for the Tyrians and Sidonians were celebrated artists, and at that time were admitted to be the best mechanics in the world. Hiram willingly complied with his request, and despatched to his assistance an abundance of men and materials, to be employed in the construction of the Temple, and among the former, a distinguished artist, to whom was given the superintendence of all the workmen, both Jews and Tyrians, and who was in possession of all the skill and learning that were required to carry out, in the most efficient manner, all the plans and designs of the King of Israel.

Of this artist, whom Freemasons recognize sometimes as Hiram the Builder, sometimes as the Widow's Son, but more commonly as Hiram Abif, the earliest account is found in the First Book of Kings (vii, 13, 14), where the passage reads as follows:

And King Solomon sent and fetched Hiram out of Tyre. He was a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali, and his father was a man of Tyre, a worker in brass, and he was filled with wisdom and understanding, and cunning to work all works in brass. And he came to King Solomon and wrought all his work.

He is next mentioned in the Second Book of Chronicles (ii, 13, 14), in the following letter from Hiram of Tyre to King Solomon:
associations at home, and thus gave, under the lem, which was in the year 1012 B.C., he was at once Temple.

tained of so much advantage in the Dionysiac arriving at Jerusalem he introduced among the Jewish masons. Of this association, it is not unreasonable to structure engaged exclusively in the construction of Tyre, who were greatly distinguished for their at¬ suppose that Hiram Abif was a member, and that on this subject. He supposes that she herself was of the tribe of Dan, but that her first husband was of the tribe of Naphtali, by whom she had this son; and that when she was a widow, she married a man of Tyre, who is called Hiram's father because he brought him up and was the husband of his mother.

Hiram Abif undoubtedly derived much of his knowledge in mechanical arts from that man of Tyre who had married his mother, and we may justly con¬ clude that he increased that knowledge by assiduous study and constant intercourse with the artisans of Tyre, who were greatly distinguished for their at¬ tainments in architecture. Tyre was one of the prin¬ cipal seats of the Dionysiac fraternity of artificers, a society engaged exclusively in the construction of edifices, and living under a secret organization, which was subsequently imitated by the Operative Free¬ masons. Of this association, it is not unreasonable to suppose that Hiram Abif was a member, and that on arriving at Jerusalem he introduced among the Jewish workmen the same exact system of discipline which he had found of so much advantage in the Dionysiac associations at home, and thus gave, under the sanction of King Solomon, a peculiar organization to the Freemasons who were engaged in building the Temple.

Upon the arrival of this celebrated artist at Jerusa¬ lem, which was in the year 1012 B.C., he was at once received into the intimate confidence of Solomon, and entrusted with the superintendence of all the work¬ men, both Tyrians and Jews, who were engaged in the construction of the building. He received the title of Principal Conductor of the Works, an office which, previous to his arrival, had been filled by Adoniram, and, according to Masonic tradition, formed with Solomon and King Hiram of Tyre, his ancient patron, the Supreme Council of Grand Masters, in which everything was determined in relation to the con¬ struction of the edifice and the government of the workmen.

The Book of Constitutions, as it was edited by Entick (edition of 1756, page 19), speaks of him in the following language:

This inspired Master was, without question, the most cunning, skilful, and curious workman that ever lived; whose abilities were not confined to building only; but extended to all kinds of work, whether in gold, silver, brass or iron; whether in linen, tapestry or embroidery;

whether considered as architect, statuary, founder or designer, separately or together, he equally excelled.
From his designs and under his direction, all the rich and splendid furniture of the Temple and its several appendages were begun, carried on, and finished.
Solomon appointed him, in his absence, to fill the Chair as Deputy Grand Master, and in his presence, Senior Grand Warden, Master of Work, and general overseer of all artists, as well those whom David had formerly procured from Tyre and Sidon, as those Hiram should now send.

This statement requires some correction. Accord¬ ing to the most consistent systems and the general course of the traditions, there were three Grand Masters at the building of the Temple, of whom Hiram Abif was one, and hence in our Lodges he always receives the title of a Grand Master. We may, however, reconcile the assertion of Anderson, that he was sometimes a Deputy Grand Master, and sometimes a Senior Grand Warden, by supposing that the three Grand Masters were, among the Craft, possessed of equal authority, and held in equal rever¬ ce, while among themselves there was an acknowl¬ edged subordination of station and power. But in no way can the assertion be explained that he was at any time a Senior Grand Warden, which would be wholly irreconcilable with the symbolism of the Temple. In the mythical Master's Lodge, supposed to have been held in the Temple, and the only one ever held before its completion, at which the three Grand Masters alone were present, the office of Junior Warden is assigned to Hiram Abif.

According to Masonic tradition, which is in part supported by Scriptural authority, Hiram was charged with all the architectural decorations and interior embellishments of the building. He cast the various vessels and implements that were to be used in the religious service of the Temple, as well as the pillars that adorned the porch, selecting as the most convenient and appropriate place for the scene of his operations, the clay grounds which extend between Succoth and Zaredatha; and the old lectures state that the whole interior of the house, its posts and doors, its very floors and ceilings, which were made of the most expensive timber, and overlaid with plates of burnished gold, were, by his exquisite taste, enchased with magnificent designs and adorned with the most precious gems.

Even the abundance of these precious jewels, in the decorations of the Temple, is attributed to the fore¬ sight and prudence of Hiram Abif; since a Masonic tradition, quoted by Doctor Oliver, informs us, that about four years before the Temple was begun, he, as the agent of the Tyrian king, purchased some precious stones from an Arabian merchant, who told him, upon inquiry, that they had been found by ac¬ cident on an island in the Red Sea. By the permis¬ sion of King Hiram, he investigated the truth of this report, and had the good fortune to discover many precious gems, and among the rest an abundance of the topaz. They were subsequently imported by the ships of Tyre for the service of King Solomon.

In allusion to these labors of taste and skill dis¬ played by the widow's son, our lectures say, that while the wisdom of Solomon contrived the fabric, and the strength of King Hiram's wealth and power sup¬ ported the undertaking, it was adorned by the beauty of Hiram Abif's curious and cunning workmanship.
In the character of the chief architect of the Temple, one of the peculiarities which most strongly attract attention was the systematic manner in which he conducted all the extensive operations which were placed under his charge. In the classification of the workmen, such arrangements were made, by his advice, as to avoid any discord or confusion; and although about two hundred thousand craftsmen and laborers were employed, so complete were his arrangements, that the general harmony was never once disturbed. In the payment of wages, such means were, at his suggestion, adopted, that every one's labor was readily distinguished, and his defects ascertained, every attempt at imposition detected, and the particular amount of money due to each workman accurately determined and easily paid, so that, as Brother Webb remarks, "the disorder and confusion that might otherwise have attended so immense an undertaking was completely prevented." It was his custom never to put off until tomorrow the work that might have been accomplished today, for he was as remarkable for his punctuality in the discharge of the most trifling duties, as he was for his skill in performing the most important. It was his constant habit to furnish the Craftsmen every morning with a copy of the plans which he had, on the previous afternoon, designed for their labor in the course of the ensuing day. As new designs were thus furnished by him from day to day, any neglect to provide the workmen with them on each successive morning would necessarily have stopped the labors of the whole body of the workmen for that day; a circumstance that in so large a number must have produced the greatest disorder and confusion. Hence the practise of punctuality was in him a duty of the highest obligation, and one which could never for a moment have been neglected without leading to immediate observation. Such is the character of this distinguished personage, whether mythical or not, that has been transmitted by the uninterrupted stream of Masonic tradition.

The Trestle-board used by him in drawing his designs is said to have been made, as the ancient tablets were, of wood, and covered with a coating of wax. On this coating he inscribed his plans with a pen or stylus of steel, which an old tradition, preserved by Brother Oliver, says was found upon him when he was raised, and ordered by King Solomon to be deposited in the center of his monument. The same tradition informs us that the first time he used this stylus for any of the purposes of the Temple was on the morning that the foundation-stone of the building was laid, when he drew the celebrated diagram known as the forty-seventh problem of Euclid, and which gained a prize that Solomon had offered on that occasion. But this is so evidently a mere myth, invented by some myth-maker of the last century, without even the excuse of a symbolic meaning, that it has been rejected or, at least, forgotten by the Craft.

Another and more interesting legend has been preserved by Brother Oliver, which may be received as a mythical symbol of the faithful performance of duty. It runs thus:

It was the duty of Hiram Abif to superintend the workmen, and the reports of his officers were always examined with the most scrupulous exactness. At the opening of the day, when the sun was rising in the east, it was his constant custom, before the commencement of labor, to go into the Temple, and offer up his prayers to Jehovah for a blessing on the work; and in like manner when the sun was setting in the west. And after the labors of the day were closed, and the workmen had left the Temple, he returned his thanks to the Great Architect of the Universe for the harmonious protection of the day. Not content with this devout expression of his feelings, he always went into the Temple at the hour of high twelve, when the men were called off from labor to refreshment, to inspect the work, to draw fresh designs upon the trestle-board, if such were necessary, and to perform other scientific labors,—never forgetting to consecrate the duties by solemn prayer. These religious customs were faithfully performed for the first six years in the secret recesses of his Lodge, and for the last year in the precincts of the Most Holy Place.

While assiduously engaged in the discharge of these arduous duties, seven years passed rapidly away, and the magnificent Temple at Jerusalem was nearly completed. The Fraternity were about to celebrate the capstone with the greatest demonstrations of joy; but, in the language of the venerable Book of Constitutions, "the joy was soon interrupted by the sudden death of their dear and worthy Master, Hiram Abif." On the very day appointed for celebrating the capstone of the building, says one tradition, he repaired to his usual place of retirement at the meridian hour, and did not return alive. On this subject we can say no more. This is neither the time nor the place to detail the particulars of his death. It is enough to say that the circumstance filled the Craft with the most profound grief, which was deeply shared by his friend and patron, King Solomon, who, according to the Book of Constitutions, "after some time allowed to the Craft to vent their sorrow, ordered his obsequies to be performed with great solemnity and decency, and buried him in the Lodge near the Temple—according to the ancient usages among Masons—and long mourned his loss."

Thus far Brother Mackey to whose observations a few suggestions from more recent writers may be added.

Brother John Yarker had in the American Freemason (June, 1910, page 944), some comments upon Hiram Abif. He alludes to the belief of some students that there were two Hirams, father and son, employed at the building of King Solomon's Temple. The latter Craftsman on the death of the elder one was, according to this belief, brought from Tyre to finish the father's work. This understanding of the situation can, it is claimed, be proved in the testimony of the Bible itself.

Brother Joel Nash in 1836 printed at Colchester three lectures entitled Light from the Lebanon Lodge. In the second lecture of this series Brother Nash presents the proofs of his claim that there were two Hirams employed at the building of the Temple. Briefly his arguments are as follows: Hiram the King writes as follows in Second Chronicles (ii, 13-14), "Now I have sent you a cunning man, endued with understanding, of Huram my father's, the son of a woman of the daughters of Dan, and his father was a man of Tyre." This Abif, or father, was an all round man, a designer, skilful to work in all arts and sciences. Nash argues that something happened to him, for as related in First Kings (vii, 13), "And King Solomon sent and fetched Hiram out of Tyre. He was the son of a widow woman of the Tribe of Naphthali." Brother Yarker points out, following Brother Nash, that the work done by this man was that of a brass-smith, and that he could not be born both of a woman of Dan and of Naphthali. Moreover, this last was the son of a widow, not the former.

A little further on in his lecture Brother Nash says that Succoth means booths or lodges, and that Zara-datha is the place of sorrow or trouble, but we may here venture to suggest that the reader does not too hastily assume too much upon the usual meaning applied to the word lodges. So far as Succoth goes this means any easily put together shelter, and those who give the word a more extended Masonic significance than this are really placing a greater burden upon the word than it is intended to carry.

H. W. Brewer, a writer on architecture, agrees with Brother Nash, uses the same arguments, and is of the opinion that much of our confusion has arisen over the introduction of the word was in the expression from Second Chronicles (ii, 14), "His father was a man of Tyre." A commentary by Rabbi Melbim, taking the same view was printed in a German Masonic magazine Die Bauhutte (volume xxii, numbers 39-40), and there is a pamphlet entitled Masonic Lectures by Brother Morris Rosenbaum, published at London, 1904, in which the whole subject is carefully examined at length. He points out that the worker in brass of the Book of Kings is termed Ch-i-ram, but in the original Hebrew of Chronicles Ch-u-ram made the pots, etc., but Ch-i-ram finished the work. Also in Second Chronicles (iv, 16) we read: "The pots also, and the shovel and the flesh-hooks, and all their instruments did Huram his father make to King Solomon for the house of the Lord."

To those who accept the Masonic tradition, and the verbal accuracy of the Bible, it is impossible to refute this criticism. On the other hand much might be said against it by the skeptic. The two Kings and Huram the Father, Abif, must have been Freemasons of the Cabiric cult; and Ezra, the Jews say, re-edited the Bible on his return from Babylon. Now the King of Tyre was a builder seven years before Solomon. He erected the temple of Melkarth, with the two great pillars which Herodotus saw, and he walled Tyre around with wrought stone. His chief man, according to Josephus, who quotes Dios and Menander, was the father of Abdon, who was an intimate of Solomon. The inference that the two Abdemons, father and son, for there appears to have been two, were the Tyrian names of these Jewish Hirams, and that the Bible simply refers, in mysterious tones, to the traditions prevalent in Babylon. The echo of the name, or names, Abdon, may perhaps be found in the Amon, Adon, Anon, etc., of the Charges of 1535-60.

Brother J. S. M. Ward in his book Who was Hiram Abiff?, 1925 (page 5), holds that Hiram represented a popular Syrian god against whom the champions of Jehovah strove ceaselessly. He also gives an interesting account of his studies, as in Adonis, Altis, and Osiris merit comparisons with those of the Egyptian Osiris. His account brings up some curious comparisons of the Syrian legends with those of the Egyptian Osiris. Brother Ward gives high praise to Sir J. G. Frazer whose studies, as in Adonis, Altis, and Osiris merit careful examination, and sums up his researches with the claim that the Hiramic Legend is based on a tragedy involving a willing sacrifice, the pre-arranged consecration of a Temple by voluntary loss of life. Of ancient comparisons with certain ceremonies there are not a few, striking and suggestive (see Brother E. E. Town's "Hieratic," and Brother J. S. M. Ward's "The Medieval Stage," Builder, volume xii). The reader may glance to advantage at the third book of Vergil's Aeneid. He can also look over the four Gospels, the trial and death, the burial, the search for the body of the Savior and its raising for more fitting interment. If he reflects that in the early days of the Christian Church such instructions were often conveyed by dramatic means, he will be brought nearer to an understanding of the fundamental considerations and he may go further as his opportunities shall permit into these alluring avenues leading to the relative estimate of Jewish, Grecian, Roman, Mexican, and other legendary lore of the ancients discussed so interestingly by Brother Ward.

HIRAM INTERNATIONAL CLUBS. At a convention of Brethren at Phoenix, Arizona, in August, 1923, the name Hiram was chosen to apply to a civic organization exclusively of Freemasons aiming to follow the example of one who was a master builder and a creator of the beautiful. Branches developed from the parent Body, No. 1, at Phoenix and the other legendary lore of the ancients discussed so interestingly by Brother Ward.
HIRAMITES. In the Degree of Patriarch Noahites, the legend is, that the Freemasons of that Degree are descended from Noah through Peleg. Distinguishing themselves, therefore, as Noahites, they call the Freemasons of the other Degrees Hiramites, as being descended from Hiram Abif. The word is not elsewhere used.

HIRAM, KING OF TYRE. He was the son of Abibal, and the contemporary of both David and Solomon. In the beginning of the former’s reign, he sent messengers to him, and Hiram supplied the Israelitish king with “cedar-trees, and carpenters, and masons: and they built David a house” (see Second Samuel v, 11). Nearly forty years afterward when Solomon ascended the throne and began to prepare for building the Temple, he sent to the old friend of his father for the same kind of assistance. The King of Tyre gave a favorable response, and sent workmen and materials to Jerusalem, by the aid of which Solomon was enabled to carry out his great design. Historians celebrate the friendly intercourse of these monarchs, and Josephus says that the correspondence between them in respect to the building of the Temple was, in his days, preserved in the archives of the kingdom of Tyre. The answer of Hiram to the application of Solomon is given in the First Book of Kings (v, 8, 9), in the following language: “I will do all thy desire concerning timber of cedar and concerning timber of fir. My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea; and I will convey them by sea in floats unto the place that thou shalt appoint me, and will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them; and thou shalt accomplish my desire in giving food for my household.” In return for this kindness, Solomon gave Hiram 20,000 measures, or corim, of wheat and the same quantity of oil, which was nearly 200,000 bushels of one and 1,500,000 gallons of the other; an almost incredible amount, but not disproportioned to the magnificent expenditure of the Temple in other respects. After Solomon had finished his work, he presented the King of Tyre with twenty towns in Galilee; but when Hiram viewed these places, he was so dissatisfied with their appearance that he called them the Land of Cabul—which signifies barren, desolate—saying reproachfully to Solomon, “Are these, my brother, the towns which you have given me?” On this incident the Scottish Rite Freemasons have founded their Sixth Degree, or Intimate Secretary.

Hiram appears, like Solomon, to have been disposed to mysticism, for Dius and Menander, two Greek historians, tell us that the two kings proposed enigmas to each other for solution. Dius says that Solomon first sent some to Hiram; and that the latter king, being unable to solve them, paid a large sum of money as a forfeit, but that afterward he explained them with the assistance of one Abdemon; and that he in turn proposed some to Solomon, who, not being able to solve them, paid a much greater sum to Hiram than he had himself received on the like occasion.

The connection of the King of Tyre with King Solomon in the construction of the Temple has given him a great importance in the legendary history of Freemasonry. Anderson says in the Constitutions of 1738 (page 15), “The tradition is that King Hiram had been Grand Master of all Freemasons; but when the Temple was finished, Hiram came to survey it before its consecration, and to commune with Solomon about wisdom and art; and finding that the Great Architect of the Universe had inspired Solomon above all mortal men, Hiram very readily yielded the pre-eminence to Solomon Jedediah, the beloved of God.” He is called in the Masonic instructions one of our Ancient Grand Masters, and when the mythical Master’s Lodge was held in the Temple is supposed to have acted as the Senior Warden. It is said, too, that in the symbolic supports of Freemasonry he represented the pillar of strength, because “by his power and wealth he assisted the great undertaking” of constructing the Temple. He is reported, also, to have visited Jerusalem several times (a fact on which profane history is silent), for the purpose of consultation with Solomon and his great architect on the symbolism of the Word, and to have been present at the time of the death of the latter. Many other legends are related of him in connection with the Master’s Degree and those connected with it, but he is lost sight of after the completion of the first Temple, and is seldom heard of in the high Degrees.

Hiram reigned over the Tyrians for thirty-four years; he permitted Solomon’s ships to participate in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean, and Jewish sailors, under the instructions of Tyrian mariners, were taught how to bring from India the gold to enrich their people and beautify the temple of their king. Tradition says that Hiram gave his daughter in marriage to King Solomon.

Near Tyre there is a tomb which, to this day, has been pointed out as that of Hiram, King of Tyre, as in the illustration.

Hirschau, Wilhelm von. The Abbot Wilhelm von Hirschau, Count Palatine of Scheuren, is said to have been the founder, at the close of the eleventh century, of the German Bauhütten. Having been previously the Master of the Bauhütte, or Lodge of St. Emmerau, in Ratisbon, when he became Abbot of Hirschau, he collected together in 1080–91 the Freemasons for the purpose of enlarging the Convent. He incorporated the workmen, says Findel (History, page 54), with the monastery, as lay Brethren, and greatly promoted their instruction and general improvement. Their social life was regulated by special laws; and the one most frequently inculcated by him was that brotherly concord should prevail, because only by working together and lovingly uniting all their strength would it be possible to accomplish such great works as were these undertakings for the public benefit.

Hittites. A powerful nation, whose two chief seats were at Kadesh, on the Orontes, and Carchemish, on the River Euphrates, and who subjected as allies, forces from Palestine, Lydia, and the Troad. This great empire had at times contended with the Egyptian monarchs before the days of the Exodus. The Assyrians also had felt their power. They were foremost in arms and in the arts, and carried their religion to the shores of the Aegean Sea; in fact, as shown by the explorations and discoveries of 1879, the early civilization of Greece and other European nations was as much indebted to them as it was to the Phoenicians. Egyptian inscriptions bear out the truth of these discoveries, and more firmly establish Biblical history. Jerusalem came within the influence of this great empire. The Hittites were finally subdued by the capture of their famous capital Carchemish, by Sargon, 717 B.C.

The system of writing by the Hittites was unique; their letters were hieroglyphic and their sculptures a memorial in the Master's Degree. The derivation is uncertain. Oben, in Hebrew, means a stone; or it may be a corruption of Habbone, the Builder or Mason.

Hodi. The Blind Fate mentioned in the Scandinavian Mysteries (see Bolder).

Hogarth, William. Artist and engraver. Born November 10, 1697, and died on October 29, 1764, London. He was a member of the Masonic Lodge at the Hand and Apple Tree Tavern on Little Queen Street at London. This Lodge was organized and constituted in 1725 and ceased in 1737. Hogarth, according to the Grand Lodge Register, was also a member of the Lodge at the Bear and Harrow Tavern in 1731 and was a Grand Steward in 1735. His father-in-law, Sir J. Thornhill, was Senior Grand Warden in 1728.

Ho-hi. Brother George W. Speth was of the opinion that the date of Hogarth's famous picture Night, that is the occurrence it celebrates, was intended to be May 29, the anniversary of the Restoration of Charles II, as shown by the oak-leaves over the barber's sign and in the hats of two of the figures. The street is probably Hartshorn Lane, Charing Cross, opening into what is now Trafalgar Square and which was Northumberland Street but is now North Avenue in London. Brother Speth suggests the principal figure is that of Sir Thomas de Veil, a member of Hogarth's first Lodge, the one meeting at the Vine in 1729. A sword under the arm of the boon companion and the Masonic apron, large in size, as was typical of these times, are suggestive of the Tyler and have been taken to mean a caricature of Brother Montgomerie, the Grand Tyler, or, as he was then called, "garder of ye Grand Lodge." Note the snuffers, useful where candles were a common source of illumination, to be seen hanging at the Tyler's belt in the picture representing Night. This engraving was published in 1837.

Brother Hogarth married Jane Thornhill in 1729, daughter of Sir James Thornhill, at whose art school he studied for a time, and who for a long time refused to admit his genius and skill as an artist. It was not until Hogarth finished his series of six pictures depicting A Harlot's Progress that his father-in-law was entirely reconciled to the painter who had finally attained the fame warranted by his art. Hogarth painted a number of these series or pictures or illustrated stories, among the most popular being Marriage à la mode, A Rake's Progress and Four Times a Day. Hogarth also met with success as a portrait painter and in 1746 he painted Garrick as Richard III, for which he was handsomely paid for that day and age. His celebrated portrait of himself with his dog Trump is now in the National Gallery at London.

Hogarth died at the age of sixty-eight years and was buried in Chiswick, a tomb having since been erected to him, in 1771, by his admirers. A private house in which he spent many of his summers was purchased in 1902 by Lieutenant-Colonel Shipway of Chiswick and turned into a Hogarth Museum.

Ho-Hi. A combination of the two Hebrew pronouns ḫn, ho, meaning He, and ḥn, hi, meaning She; thus mystically representing the twofold sex of the Creator, and obtained by a Cabalistic transposition or inversion of the letters of the Tetragrammaton ḫn or ḫḥ. Ho-hi, therefore, thus Cabalistically obtained, denotes the male and female principle, the vis gentrix, the phallus and lingam, the point within the circle; the notion of which, in some one form or another of this double gender, pervades all the ancient systems as the representative of the creative power.

Thus, one of the names given by the mythological writers to the Supreme Jupiter was ἄνδρονήστος, the man-woman. In one of the Orphic hymns we find the following line:

Zeus ἀρσήν, γυνή, Zeus ἄνδρος ἄνδρος νυμφή.

Jove is a male, Jove is an immortal virgin.
NIGHT

Brother William Hogarth's celebrated picture of Night in London, 1738, shows the Lodge clothing of the period, the ample aprons, the use of a square as the Master's jewel, the Tyler's sword, his candle-snuffers hanging from waist, etc.
HOLINESS

Plutarch, in his Isis and Osiris, says, “God, who is a male and female intelligence, being both Life and Light, brought forth another intelligence, the Creator of the world.” All the Pagan gods and goddesses, however various their appellation, were but different expressions for the male and female principle. “In fact,” says Russell, “they may all be included in the one great Hermaphrodite, the ἀρχαῖον ἄρχων, who combines in His nature all the elements of production, and who continues to support the vast creation which originally proceeded from His will.” And thus, too, may we learn something of the true meaning of the bines in His nature all the elements of production, one great Hermaphrodite, the ἀρχαῖον ἄρχων, who combines in His nature all the elements of production, and who continues to support the vast creation which originally proceeded from His will.

HOLINESS TO THE LORD. In Hebrew, קדש קדשך, Kodesh Layehovah. It was the inscription on the plate of gold that was placed in front of the High Priest’s miter. The letters were in the ancient Samaritan character (see Exodus xxix, 30).

HOLLAND. The first mention of the Craft in Holland belongs properly to the history of Freemasonry in Austria. In 1731 Francis, Duke of Lorraine, later Emperor of Austria and Germany, was initiated by Doctor Desaguliers at a special Lodge at the Hague. The first regular Dutch Lodge was the Loge du Grand Maître des Provinces Réunies, Grand Masters Lodge of the Reunited Provinces, instituted at the Hague with Count Vincent de la Chapelle as Worshipful Master.

Freemasonry in Holland was regarded with disfavor by the Government and suffered much persecution. On December 25, 1756, however, fourteen Lodges attended a Convention to constitute a Grand Lodge and two days later Baron Aerssen Beyeren was elected Grand Master.

A separate Grand Lodge was formed by the Belgian Lodges in 1817 and between the two Grand Bodies there was some dissension. In 1835 a state of peace was at last attained under the leadership of Prince Frederick Wilhelm Karl of the Netherlands.

HOLY CITY, KNIGHT OF THE. The Fifth and last of the Degrees of the rectified Rite of the Benevolent Knights of the Holy City, or the Rite of Strict Observance, settled at Wilhelmsbad in 1782.

HOLY GRAAL. See San Graal.

HOLY GROUND. A Masonic Lodge is said to be held on holy ground, according to the Prestonian lecture, because the first regularly constituted Lodge was held on that holy, consecrated ground wherein the first three grand offerings were made, which afterward met with Divine approbation (see Ground Floor of the Lodge and Grand Offerings).

HOLY LODGE. The lectures of the eighteenth century taught symbolically that there were three Lodges opened at three different periods in Masonic history; these were the Holy Lodge, the Sacred Lodge, and the Royal Lodge. The Holy Lodge was opened in the tabernacle in the wilderness, and over it presided Moses, Aholiab, and Bezaleel; the Sacred Lodge was opened on Mount Moriah during the building of the first Temple, and was presided over by Solomon, King of Israel, Hiram, the King of Tyre, and Hiram the Builder; the Royal Lodge was opened among the ruins of the first Temple, at the building of the second, and was presided over by Joshua, Zerubbabel, and Haggai. Though presented as a tradition, it is really only a symbol intended to illustrate three important events in the progress of Masonic science.

HOLY NAME. Freemasonry teaches, in all its symbols and rituals, a reverence for the name of God, which is emphatically called the “Holy Name.” In the prayer Abhadh Olam, first introduced by Dermott, it is said, “because we trusted in Thy holy, great, mighty, and terrible Name”; and in the introductory prayer of the Royal Arch, according to the American system, similar phraseology is employed: “Teach us, we pray Thee, the true reverence of Thy holy, mighty, and terrible Name.” The expression, if not the sentiment, is borrowed from the Hebrew mysteries.

HOLY OF HOLIES. Every student of Jewish antiquities knows, and every Freemason who has taken the Third Degree ought to know, what was the peculiar construction, character, and uses of the Sanctum Sanctorum or Holy of Holies in King Solomon’s Temple. Situated in the western end of the Temple, separated from the rest of the building by a heavy curtain, and enclosed on three sides by dead walls without any aperture or window, it contained the sacred Ark of the Covenant, and was secluded and set apart from all intrusion save of the High Priest, who only entered it on certain solemn occasions. As it was the most sacred of the three parts of the Temple, so has it been made symbolic of a Master’s Lodge, in which are performed the most sacred rites of initiation in Ancient Craft Freemasonry.

As modern hierologists have found in all the Hebrew rites and ceremonies the traces of more ancient mysteries, from which they seem to have been derived, or on which they have been modified, whence we trace also to the same mysteries most of the Masonic forms which, of course, are more immediately founded on the Jewish Scriptures, so we shall find in the ancient Gentile temples the type of this same Sanctum Sanctorum or Holy of Holies, under the name of Adytum or Adyton. And what is more singular, we shall find a greater resemblance between this Adytum of the Pagan temples and the Lodge of Master Masons, than we will discover between the latter and the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Solomonic Temple. It will be curious and interesting to trace this resemblance, and to follow up the suggestions that it offers in reference to the antiquity of Masonic rites.

The Adytum was the most retired and secret part of the ancient Gentile temple, into which, as into the Holy of Holies of the Jewish Temple, the people were not permitted to enter, but which was accessible only to the priesthood. And hence the derivation of the word from the Greek Aδωνις, meaning not to enter, or that which it is not permitted to enter. Secrecy and mystery were always characteristic of the Adytum, and therefore, like the Holy of Holies, it never admitted of windows.

In the Adytum was to be found a taphos or tomb, and some relics or image or statue of the god to whom the temple was dedicated. The tomb reminds us of the characteristic feature of the Third Degree of Freemasonry; the image or statue of the god finds its analogue or similarity in the Ark of the Covenant and the overshadowing Cherubim.

It being supposed that temples owed their first origin to the reverence paid by the ancients to their deceased friends, and as it was an accepted theory that the gods were once men who had been deified on account of their heroic virtues, temples were, perhaps, in the beginning only stately monuments erected in honor of the dead. Hence the interior of the temple was originally nothing more than a cell or cavity, that is to say, a grave regarded as a place of deposit for the reception of a person interred, and, therefore, in it to be found the soros or coffin, and the taphos or tomb, or, among the Scandavians, the barrow or mound grave. In time the statue or image of a god took the place of the coffin; but the reverence for the spot, as one of peculiar sanctity, remained, and this interior part of the temple became among the Greeks the sekos or chapel, among the Romans the Adytum or forbidden place, and among the Jews the kodesh kodashim, or Holy of Holies.

The sanctity thus acquired," says Dudley in his Naology (page 308), "by the cell of interment might readily and with propriety be assigned to any fabric capable of containing the body of the departed friend, or relic, or even the symbol of the presence or existence of a divine personage." Thus it happened that there was in every ancient temple an Adytum or Most Holy Place.

There was in the Holy of Holies of the Jewish Temple, it is true, no tomb nor coffin containing the relics of the dead. But there was an Ark of the Covenant which was the recipient of the Rod of Aaron, and the Pot of Manna, which might well be considered the relics of the past life of the Jewish nation in the wilderness. There was an analogy easily understood according to the principles of the science of symbolism. There was no statue or image of a god, but there were the sacred cherubim, and, above all, the Shekinah or Divine Presence, and the bathkol or Voice of God.

But when Freemasonry established its system partly on the ancient rites and partly on the Jewish ceremonies, it founded its Third Degree as the Adytum or holy of holies of all its mysteries, the exclusive place into which none but the most worthy—the priesthood of Freemasonry—the Masters in Israel—were permitted to enter; and then going back to the mortuary idea of the ancient temple, it recognized the reverence for the dead which constitutes the peculiar characteristic of that Degree. And, therefore, in every Lodge of Master Masons there should be found, either actually or allegorically, a grave, or tomb, and coffin, because the Third Degree is the inmost sanctuary, the kodesh kodashim, the Holy of Holies of the Masonic temple.

HOLY PLACE. Called also the Sanctuary. It was that part of the Temple of Solomon which was situated between the Porch and Holy of Holies. It was appropriated to the purposes of daily worship, and contained the altars and utensils used in that service. It has no symbolic meaning in Freemasonry; although really, as it occupied the ground floor of the Temple, it might be properly considered as represented by an Entered Apprentice’s Lodge, that is to say, by the Lodge when occupied in the ceremonies of the First Degree.

HOLY SEPULCHER, KNIGHT OF THE. See Knight of the Holy Sepulcher.

HOM. The tree of life and man in the Zoroastrian doctrine of the Persians.

HOMAGED. First employed by Entick, in his edition of the Constitutions, in reference to the installation of the Earl of Kintore, in 1740, as Grand Master: "Who having been homaged and duly congratulated according to the forms and solemnity of Masonry." He never repeats the word, using afterward the expression, "received the homage." Noonthock adopts this latter expression in three or four instances, but more generally employs the word "recognized" or "selected." The expression "to do homage" to the Grand Master at his installation, although now generally disused, is a correct one—not precisely in the feudal sense of homagium, the service of a bondman, but in the more modern one of cheerful reverence, obedience, and loyalty.

HONEST MASON CLUB. An early organization formed by certain members of the Grand Lodge of Scotland in the middle of the eighteenth century for the purpose of instructing the Scottish Brethren in the practice and history of Freemasonry and holding its meetings in Edinburgh. This club, while enthusiastically supported by its projectors, did not meet with success and went out of existence shortly after its inception, only to be revived about twenty-five years later by the forming of a group of Masonic Clubs in various parts of Scotland. These clubs were prohibited by the Grand Lodge because of their unfavorable criticism of the Grand Lodge transactions but in order to further the stated objects of the organization, Grand Lodge resolved to issue "temporary warrants, without fee, for holding Lodges of Instruction in any district or province when a majority of the Masters of the Lodges in the province should petition for it" (see History of the Lodge of Edinburgh, Mary’s Chapel, Brother David Murray Lyon, 1873, page 402). This offer has never been taken advantage of to any extent which, as Brother Lyon observes, leaves the Brethren of Scotland without any centralized method for the giving and receiving of instruction.

HONORABLE. This was the title formerly given to the Degree of Fellow Craft.

HONORARIUM. When a Degree of Freemasonry is conferred honoris caus, that is, as a mark of respect, and without the payment of a fee, it is said to be conferred as an honorarium. This is seldom done in Ancient Craft Freemasonry; but it is not unusual in the advanced Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, which have sometimes been bestowed by Inspectors on distinguished Freemasons as an honorarium.

HONORARY DEGREES. 1. The Mark Master’s Degree in the American system is called the Honorary Degree of Mark Master, because it is traditionally supposed to have been conferred in the Temple upon a portion of the Fellow Crafts as a mark of honor and of trust. The Degrees of Past Master and of High Priesthood are also styled honorary, because each is conferred as an honorarium or reward attendant upon certain offices; that of Past Master upon the elected Master of a Symbolic Lodge, and that of High Priesthood upon the elected High Priest of a Chapter of Royal Arch Masons. 2. These Degrees which are outside of the regular series, and which are more commonly known by the epithet Side Degrees, are also sometimes called Honorary Degrees, because no fee is usually exacted for them.

HONORARY MASONs. A schismatic Body which arose soon after the revival in the beginning of the eighteenth century, the members of which rejected the established formula of an obligation, and bound themselves to secrecy and obedience by a pledge of honor only. Like the Gregorians and the Gormogons, who arose about the same time, they soon died a natural death. A song of theirs, preserved in Carey's Musical Century, is almost the only record left of their existence.

HONORARY MEMBERS. It is a custom in some Lodges to invest distinguished Freemasons with the rank and title of honorary membership. This confers upon them, as the by-laws may prescribe, sometimes all the rights of active membership and sometimes only the right of speaking, but always without the ex-action of annual dues. Nor does honorary membership subject the person receiving it to the discipline of the Lodge further than to a revocation of the honor bestowed. The custom of electing honorary members is a usage of very modern date, and has not the sanction of the old Constitutions. It is common in France; less so, but not altogether unknown, in America and England. Oliver, in the title of one of his works, claimed honorary membership in more than nine Lodges. It may be considered unobjectionable as a method of paying respect to distinguished merit and Masonic services, when it is viewed only as a local regulation, and does not attempt to interfere with Masonic discipline. A Freemason who is expelled forfeits, of course, with his active membership in his own Lodge, his honorary membership in any other Lodge.

HONORARY THIRTY-THIRDS. The Supreme Councils of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite in the United States have adopted the custom of electing honorary members, who are sometimes called Honorary Thirty-Thirds. They possess none of the rights of Inspectors-General or Active Members, except that of being present at the meetings of the Council, taking part to a limited extent in its deliberations, except when it holds an Executive Session. The earliest record that we have been able to discover is a letter of Morris Holbrook, December 24, 1827 (volume x, page 208), Official Bulletins, Supreme Council Southern Jurisdiction, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. This letter was written to Brother J. J. Gourgas and, among other things, he says that Jeremy L. Cross was made an honorary member of this Supreme Council. The same Supreme Council provided for Honorary Thirty-thirds in the Statutes of 1855. Probably the specific idea in this particular case was to make honorary members of those Brethren of the Supreme Council of Louisiana who surrendered their Supreme Council in that year and amalgamated with the Southern Jurisdiction. From that time onward the Statutes contain provisions for Honorary Members.

The original number of Honorary Members in the United States of America was nine Sovereign Grand Inspectors-General comprising a Supreme Council. The additional Thirty-third Degree Members were made only by vacancies occasioned by the death of one of the original nine.

The necessity arising from the circulation of the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite Degrees in America brought about the appointment of Deputy Inspectors-General, assigned sometimes to States; at other times at large. Some of the records of these Deputy Inspectors-General notably omitted the numerical designation of Degree. As time passed on and the organization of Supreme Councils by the several factions proceeded, the number of Thirty-thirds grew. Thirty-three was the number set for a "regular" Supreme Council. After the union of the two Supreme Councils of the Northern Masonic Jurisdiction in 1867, sixty-six was set as the limit and these were expressly defined to be Active Members. The proceedings of the early seventies indicate the differences of opinion resulting in the adjustment of the rite privileges to Honorary Members of the Supreme Council.

In the Northern Masonic Jurisdiction of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite there is but one Thirty-third Degree and persons elected under the provisions of Article 17 of the Constitution became honorary members of the Supreme Council, not Honorary Thirty-third Degree Members—and this subject was carefully dealt with in the Proceedings of 1923 (pages 48 to 50).

Practically the same rule governs in the Southern Jurisdiction except that Honorary Members are invested with a different title, Inspectors-General Honorary (see Article 4, Section 8, of The Statutes).

HONOR, FEES OF. See Fees of Honor.

HONORS, GRAND. The Grand Honors of Freemasonry are those peculiar acts and gestures by which the Craft have always been accustomed to express their homage, their joy, or their grief on memorable occasions. In the Symbolic Degrees of the American Rite, they are of two kinds, the private and public, which are used on different occasions and for different purposes.

The Private Grand Honors of Freemasonry are performed in a manner known only to Master Masons, since they can only be used in a Master's Lodge. They are practised by the Craft only on four occaisons; when a Masonic Hall is to be consecrated, a new Lodge to be constituted, a Master Elect to be installed, or a Grand Master, or his Deputy, to be received on an official visitation to a Lodge. They are used at all these ceremonies as tokens of congratulation and homage. And as they can only be given by Master Masons, it is evident that every consecration of a hall, or constitution of a new Lodge, every installation of a Worshipful Master, and every reception of a Grand Master, must be done in the Third Degree. It is also evident, from what has been said, that the mode and manner of giving the private Grand Honors can only be personally communicated to Master Masons. They are among the aporrheta—the things forbidden to be divulged.

The Public Grand Honors, as their name imports, do not partake of this secret character. They are given on all public occasions, in the presence of the profane as well as the initiated. They are used at the laying of corner-stones of public buildings, or in other services in which the ministrations of the Fraternity are required, and especially in funerals. They are given in the following manner: Both arms are crossed on the breast, the left uppermost, and the open palms of the hands sharply striking the shoulders; they are then raised above the head, the palms striking each other, and then made to fall smartly upon the thighs. This is repeated three times, and as there are three blows given each time, namely, on the breast, on the palms of the hands, and on the thigh making nine concussions in all, the Grand Honors are technically said to be given “by three times three.” On the occasion of funerals, each one of these honors is accompanied by the words, The will of God is accomplished; so mote it be, audibly pronounced by the Brethren.

These Grand Honors of Freemasonry have undoubtedly a classical origin, and are but an imitation of the plaudits and acclamations practised by the ancient Greeks and Romans in their theaters, their senates, and their public games. There is abundant evidence in the writings of the ancients, that in the days of the empire, the Romans had circumscribed the mode of doing homage to their emperors and great men when they made their appearance in public, and of expressing their approbation of actors at the theater, within as explicit rules and regulations as those that govern the system of giving the Grand Honors in Freemasonry. This was not the case in the earlier ages of Rome, for Ovid, speaking of the Sabines, says that when they applauded, they did so without any rules of art, In medio plausu, plausus tunc arte carebat.

Propriety speaks, at a later day, of the ignorance of the country people, who, at the theaters, destroyed the general harmony by their awkward attempts to join in the modulated applause of the more skilful citizens. The ancient Romans had carried their science on this subject to such an extent as to have divided these honors into three kinds, differing from each other in the mode in which the hands were struck against each other, and in the sound that thence resulted. Suetonius, in his life of Nero (chapter xx), gives the names of these various kinds of applause, which he says were called bombi, imbrices, testae, and Seneca, in his Quaestionum Naturatum, gives a description of the manner in which they were executed. The bombi, or hums, were produced by striking the palms of the hands together, while they were in a hollow or concave position, and doing this at frequent intervals, but with little force, so as to imitate the humming sound of a swarm of bees. The imbrices, or tiles, were made by briskly striking the flattened and extended palms of the hands against each other, so as to resemble the sound of hail pattering upon the tiles of a roof. The testae, or earthen vases, were executed by striking the palm of the left hand, with the fingers of the right collected into one point. By this blow a sound was elicited which imitated that given out by an earthen vase when struck by a stick.

The Romans, and other ancient nations, having invested this system of applauding with all the accuracy of a science, used it in its various forms, not only for the purpose of testifying their approbation of actors in the theater, but also bestowed it, as a mark of respect or a token of adulation, on their emperors, and other great men, on the occasion of their making their appearance in public. Huzzas and cheers have, in this latter case, been generally adopted by the moderns, while the manual applause is only appropriated to successful public speakers and declaimers.

The Freemasons, however, have altogether preserved the ancient custom of applause, guarding and regulating its use by as strict, though different rules as did the Romans; and thus showing, as another evidence of the antiquity of their Institution, that the Grand Honors of Freemasonry are legitimately derived from the plausus, or applaudings, practised by the ancients on public occasions. In the advanced Degrees, and in other Rites, the Grand Honors are different from those of Ancient Craft Freemasonry in the American Rite as, indeed, are those of England from those of the United States.

HOODWIN. A symbol of the secrecy, silence, and darkness in which the mysteries of our art should be preserved from the unhallowed gaze of the profane. It has been supposed to have a symbolic reference to the passage in Saint John’s Gospel (i, 5), “And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not.” But it is more certain that there is in the hoodwink a representation of the mystical darkness which always preceded the rites of the ancient initiations.

HOPE. The second round in the theological and Masonic ladder, and symbolic of a hope in immortality. It is appropriately placed there, for, having attained the first, or faith in God, we are led by a belief in His wisdom and goodness to the hope of immortality. This is but a reasonable expectation; without it, virtue would lose its necessary stimulus and vice its salutary fear; life would be devoid of joy, and the grave but a scene of desolation. The ancients represented Hope by a nymph or maiden holding in her hand a bouquet of opening flowers, indicative of the coming fruit; but in modern and Masonic iconology, the science of Craft illustrations and likenesses, it is represented by a virgin leaning on an anchor, the anchor itself being a symbol of hope (see Immortality of the Soul).

HOPE MANUSCRIPT. A manuscript copy of the old Constitutions, which is in the possession of the Lodge of Hope at Bradford, in England. The parchment roll on which this Constitution is written is six feet long and six inches wide, and is defaced and worn away at the lower edge. Its date is supposed to be about 1680. From a transcript in the possession of the late Brother A. F. A. Woodford, whose correctness is certified to by the Master of the Lodge, Brother Hughan first published it in his Old Charges of the British Freemasons.

HORN OF PLENTY. The jewel of the Steward of a Lodge (see Cornucopia).

HORNS OF THE ALTAR. In the Jewish Temple, the altars of burnt-offering and of incense had each at the four corners four horns of shittim wood, shittim being a species of acacia having yellowish wood. Among the Jews, as well as all other ancient people, the altar was considered peculiarly holy and privileged; and hence, when a criminal, fleeing took hold of these horns, he found an asylum and safety. As the Masonic altar is a representation of the altar of the Solomonic member, it should be constructed with these horns; and Brother Cross has very properly so represented it in his Hieroglyphic Chart.

HOSCHEA. The word of acclamation used by the French Freemasons of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. In some of the Cahiers it is spelled Osee. It is, as Brother Mackey believed, a corruption of the word huzza, which has been used by the English and American Freemasons of the same Rite.

HOSMER, HESIKIAH LORD. First Chief Justice of Montana, appointed by President Lincoln, 1864, he organized orderly justice from frontier violence. Born at Hudson, New York, December 10, 1814, he died at San Francisco, California, October 31, 1893. Studied law at Cleveland, Ohio; was editor of the Toledo Blade, and author of the novel "Octoorn," 1859, prompting Boucieau's play of that name. Hosmer in 1861 was at Washington as Secretary of House Committee on Territories. Judge Hosmer published in 1857 "Macaron and Shakespeare in the Sonnets." Made a Freemason in Wood County Lodge No. 112, Ohio, 1843, going ten miles into the forest for the Degrees, the Morgan excitement still causing exultation in 1887 "Bacon and Shakespeare in the Sonnets," for several years Eminent Commander, Toledo Commandery No. 7, Ohio, 1845, and knighted, Toledo Commandery No. 7. He became Grand King, Grand Chapter of Ohio; Grand Orator and then Deputy Grand Master, Grand Lodge of Ohio; at Cleveland, 1851, delivering an eloquent address to the Grand Lodge. In Montana in 1865 he was first Master of Montana Lodge No. 2, and six years Eminent Commander of Virginia City Commandery No. 1. In the Grand Lodge of Montana he was for several years Chairman, Foreign Correspondence Committee, and for two years, 1870–1, Grand Secretary. At death he had been thirteen years Prelate of Golden Gate Commandery No. 16, San Francisco, and ten years Grand Prelate of the Grand Commandery of California. An accomplished and impressive ritualist, an able civic and Masonic official (see Proceedings, Grand Lodge of Montana, 1903, page 62, and volume iii, Transactions, Historical Society of Montana, 1890).

HOSPITALER. An officer in each of the Bodies of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and in the Modern French Rite, one whose duty it is to collect obligatory contributions of the members, and, as the custodian, to disburse the same, under the advisement of the Master, to needy Brethren, or even worthy profanes who may be in distress. The fund is entirely secret one, and is reserved apart from all other receipts and disbursements.

HOSPITALER, KNIGHT. See Knight Hospitator.

HOSPITALERS OF JERUSALEM. In the middle of the eleventh century, some merchants of Amalfi, a rich city of the kingdom of Naples, while trading in Egypt, obtained from the Calif Monstaser Billah permission to establish hospitals in the city of Jerusalem for the use of poor and sick Catholic pilgrims. A site was assigned to them close to the Holy Sepulcher, on which they erected a chapel dedicated to the Virgin, giving it the name of Saint Mary ad Latinos, to distinguish it from those churches where the service was performed according to the Greek ritual. The building was completed in the year 1048; and at the same time two hospitals, one for each sex, were erected in the vicinity of the chapel for the reception of pilgrims. Subsequently each of these hospitals had a separate chapel annexed to it; that for the men being dedicated to Saint John the Almoner, and that for the women to Saint Mary Magdalen. Many of the pilgrims who had experienced the kindness so liberally bestowed upon all wayfarers, abandoned all idea of returning to Europe, and formed themselves into a band of charitable assistants, and, without assuming any regular, religious profession, devoted themselves to the service of the hospital and the care of its sick inmates. The chief cities of the south of Europe subscribed liberally for the support of this institution; and the merchants of Amalfi who were its original founders acted as the stewards of their bounty, which was greatly augmented from the favorable reports of grateful pilgrims who had returned home, and the revenues of the hospital were thus much increased. The associates assumed the name of Hospitellers of Jerusalem. Afterward, taking up arms for the protection of the holy places against the Saracens, they called themselves Knights Hospitellers, a title which they subsequently changed to that of Knights of Rhodes, and finally to that of Knights of Malta.

HOSPITALITY. This virtue has always been highly esteemed among Freemasons. Nothing is more usual in diplomas or certificates than to recommend the bearer "to the hospitality of all the Brethren wheresoever dispersed over the globe"; a recommendation that is seldom disregarded. All of the old Constitutions detail the practice of hospitality, as one of the duties of the Craft, in language like this: "Every Mason shall receive and cherish strange fellows when they come over the country."

HOST, CAPTAIN OF THE. See Captain of the Host.

HOUDON, JEAN ANTOINE. Celebrated French sculptor; born March 20, 1741, at Versailles; died at Paris on July 16, 1828. His name appears on the list of members of the Lodge of the Nine Sisters at Paris for 1779, 1783, 1784 and those of 1806, where he is designated as the "Imperial Sculptor, Member of the Institute, and Professor." At twelve entered the Royal School of Sculpture, won the Prize of Rome at twenty, and became famous for his statues and busts of prominent people. Came to the United States with Franklin and was for a time with Washington at Mount Vernon. His statues of Washington and Voltaire are especially well known.

HOUEL, JEAN PIERRE LOUIS LAURENT.
French engraver and painter, born at Rouen about 1735, studied painting and engraving in Italy, and also wrote four volumes entitled Voyage Pittoresque de Sicile, de Malte, et de Lipari, 1782–7. His name is listed on the rosters of the Lodge of the Nine Sisters at Paris for the years 1783, 1784, 1806. Brother Houël died on November 14, 1813, at Paris.

HOUR-GLASS. An emblem connected with the Third Degree, according to the Webb lectures, to remind us by the quick passage of its sands of the transitory nature of human life. As a Masonic symbol it is of comparatively modern date, but the use of the hour-glass as an emblem of the passage of time is older than our oldest known rituals. Thus, in a speech before Parliament, in 1627, it is said: “We may dandle and play with the hour-glass that is in our power, but the hour will not stay for us; and an opportunity once lost cannot be regained.” We are told in Notes and Queries (First Series, v, page 223) that in the early part of the eighteenth century it was a custom to inter an hour-glass with the dead, as an emblem of the sand of life being run out.

There is in Sir John Soane’s Museum, Lincoln’s Inn Fields, London, a manuscript account book, of 1614–41, once owned by Nicholas Stone, Mason to King James I and Charles I, which on the title page has the following written note:

In time take time while time doth last,
For time is no time when time is past.

A few sad and studious lines written in his Bible by Sir Walter Raleigh are found in Cayley’s biography of him (volume ii, chapter ix):

E'en such is time! which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have;
And pays us naught but age and dust,
Which, in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.
And from which grave, and earth, and dust,
The Lord will raise me up, I trust.

Longfellow, in his “Sand of the Desert in an Hour-glass,” has written thus:

A handful of red sand from the hot clime
Of Arab deserts brought,
Within the glass becomes the spy of Time,
The minister of Thought.

An hour-glass is in the possession of the Lodge at Alexandria, Virginia, of which our Brother George Washington was Master. That old treasure, a measure of the flying moments, well exhibits the changing methods brought about in time.

HOURS, MASONIC. The language of Free-masonry, in reference to the hours of labor and refreshment, is altogether symbolical. The old lectures contained a tradition that our ancient Brethren wrought six days in the week and twelve hours in the freshment, is altogether symbolical. The old lectures therefore the supposed or fictitious time at which a German systems, the Craft were said to be called off at high twelve, and when called on again the time for recommencing labor is said to be “one hour past high twelve”: all this refers to Ancient Craft Freemasonry. In some of the advanced Degrees the hours designated for labor or rest are different. So, too, in the different Rites: thus, in the system of Zinnendorf, it is said that there are in a Mason’s Lodge five hours, namely, twelve struck, noon, high noon, midnight, and high midnight; which are thus explained: Twelve struck, is before the Lodge is opened and after it is closed; noon is when the Master is about to open the Lodge; high noon, when it is duly open; midnight, when the Master is about to close it; and high midnight, when it is closed and the uninitiated are permitted to draw near.

HOURS OF INITIATION. In Masonic Lodges, as they were in the Ancient Mysteries, initiations are always at night. No Lodges ever meet in the daytime for that purpose, if it can be avoided.

More recently than the time of Brother Mackey there have been in the United States and in Europe a number of Masonic Bodies which meet in the afternoon because of greater convenience, the majority of the members being connected with the Stage, the Press, and similar businesses (see Night).

HOUSETON, SAM. Born March 2, 1792; died July 26, 1803. First president of the Republic of Texas in 1836 and later governor of Texas under American rule in 1861. Made a Freemason in 1817, in Cumberland Lodge No. 8, Nashville, Tennessee, and became affiliated with Holland Lodge No. 1, Houston, in 1837. He presided over the Masonic Convention held to create the first Grand Lodge of Texas (see New Age Magazine, March, 1924; also Mackey’s History of Freemasonry, page 1613).

HOW GO SQUARES? The question was one of the earliest of the tests which were common in the eighteenth century. In the Grand Mystery, published in 1724, we find it in the following form:

Q. How go squares?
A. Straight.

It is noteworthy, that this phrase has an earlier date than the eighteenth century, and did not belong exclusively to the Freemasons. In Thomas May’s comedy of The Old Couple, published in 1658, Act iv, scene i (also Dodsley’s Collection of Old Plays, volume 10), will be found the following passage:

Sir Argent Scrape. Ha! Mr. Frightful, welcome.
How go squares? What do you think of me to make a bridegroom? Do I look young enough?

H'. R'. D'. M'. An abbreviation of Heredom or Heredom.

HU. The name of the chief god among the Druids, commonly called Hu Gadarn, or Hu the Mighty. He is thus described by one of the Welsh bards: “The smallest of the small, Hu is mighty in the world's judgment; yet he is the greatest and Lord over us and our God of mystery. His course is right and swift, the greatest whom I shall behold, greater than the worlds. Offer not indignity to him, for time is no time when time is past. For time is no time when time is past. By the quick passage of its sands of the Third Degree, according to the Webb lectures, to remind us by the quick passage of its sands of the transitory nature of human life. As a Masonic symbol it is of comparatively modern date, but the use of the hour-glass as an emblem of the passage of time is older than our oldest known rituals.

HUETTE. A word equivalent among the Stone-Masons of Germany, in the Middle Ages, to the English word Lodge. Findel defines it as “a booth made of boards, erected near the edifice that was being built, where the stonemasons kept their tools, carried on their work, assembled, and most probably occasionally ate and slept.” These Hütten accord exactly with the Lodges which Wren describes as having been erected by the English Masons around the edifice they were constructing.

HUGHAN, WILLIAM JAMES. This able and well-known Masonic scholar was born on February 13, 1841, and died on May 20, 1911. His father was a native of Dunscroft, in Scotland, who had settled at East Stonehouse in Devonshire, where Brother Hughan was born. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a draper at Devonport; at nineteen he entered a wholesale firm at Plymouth, going thence to Manchester and Truro, at which latter place he remained until 1883, when he retired from business and settled at Torquay, where he died. He was initiated in 1863 in the Saint Aubyn Lodge, No. 954, at Devonport; in the following year he joined the Emulation Lodge of Improvement in London, and on removing to Truro in 1864 he joined the Phenix Lodge of Honor and Prudence, No. 331, of which he was Worshipful Master in 1868 and 1875. In 1868 he was exalted in the Glasgow Chapter, No. 60, and joined Kilwinning Chapter, Ayr, No. 80, in 1865, becoming its Z., the chief officer, in 1873, and he was appointed Past Assistant Grand Sojourner of England in 1883; at various times he took most, if not all, of the Degrees worked in England and Scotland. In 1869 he was appointed Provincial Grand Secretary for Cornwall, which post he held for two years, and in 1874 he received the rank of Past Senior Grand Deacon of England, in recognition of his literary labors in the service of the Craft, this honor being the first of its kind to be so bestowed. In 1876 he was given the rank of Past Senior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Egypt, which was followed by many similar honors from various foreign Masonic Bodies, including Senior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Iowa.

Brother Hughan was devoted to Masonic study and research ever since he first saw the light of Freemasonry, and the Masonic periodicals of both hemispheres contain innumerable articles from his pen. His chief published works are: Constitutions of the Freemasons, 1869; History of Freemasonry in York, 1871; Unpublished Records of the Craft, 1871; Old Charges of British Freemasons, 1872; Memorials of the Masonic Union of 1815, 1874; Numerical and Medallic Register of Lodges, 1875; Origin of the English Rite of Freemasonry, 1884 and 1909; Engraved List of Regular Lodges for 1734, 1889; History of the Apollo Lodge and the R. A. York, 1889; History of the Lion and Lamb Lodge, 1894; Old Charges of British Freemasons, 1895; Constitutions of the Freemasons, 1723-1896, 1899; and The Jacobite Lodge at Rome, 1735-7, 1910. His writings cover the whole range of Freemasonry, but he gave special attention to the Old Charges, in the search for which he was indefatigable. The copyright in his books now belongs to the Lodge of Research, Leicester, England.

HUMILITY. The Divine Master has said, “He that humbles himself shall be exalted” (Luke, xiv, 2), and the lesson is emphatically taught by a portion of the instructions of the Royal Arch Degree. Indeed, the first step toward the acquisition of truth is a humility of mind which teaches us our own ignorance and our necessity for knowledge, so that thus we may be prepared for its reception. Doctor Oliver has erred in saying (Landmarks ii, 471) that bare feet are a Masonic symbol of humility. They are properly a symbol of reverence. The true Masonic symbol of humility is bodily prostration, and it is so exemplified in the Royal Arch Degree.

HUMMEL, JOHANN NEPOMU. German composer. Born on November 14, 1778, at Pressburg, Hungary, and died at Weimar, Germany, in 1837. Member of the Lodge Amalia at Weimar and a pupil of Mozart’s. Became celebrated pianoforte player and composer and in the music book published by the Lodge where he was initiated, 1820, there are two songs by him.

HUND, BARON VON. Carl Gotthelf, Baron von Hund, was born in Oberlausitz, in Germany, on September 11, 1722. He was a nobleman and hereditary landed proprietor in the Lausitz. He is said to have been upright in his conduct, although beset by vanity and a love of adventure. But Findel is scarcely correct in characterizing him as a man of moderate understanding, since the position which he took among his Masonic contemporaries—many of whom were of acknowledged talent—and the ability with which he defended and maintained his opinions, would indicate the possession of very respectable intelligence. In religious faith he was a Protestant. That rare work, the Anti-Saint-Nicaise, contains in its first volume a brief biography of Brother von Hund, from which some details of his personal appearance and character may be obtained. He was of middling stature, but well formed; never dressed sumptuously, but always with taste and neatness; and although himself a moderate liver, was distinguished for his hospitality, and his table was always well supplied for the entertainment of friends and visitors. The record that his servants were never changed, but that those who were employed in his domestic service constantly remained with him, is a simple but conclusive testimony to the amiability of his character.

The scanty details of the life of Hund, which are furnished by Clavel in his Histoire Pittoresque; by Thor, in the Acta Latomorum; by Ragon, in his Orthodoxie Masonique; by Robison, in his Proofs of a Conspiracy; by Lenning and Gadicke, in the Encyclopédie of each; by Oliver, in his Historical Landmarks; and by Findel, in his History, vary so much in dates and in the record of events, that he who should depend on their conflicting authority for information would be involved in almost inextricable confusion in attempting to follow any connected thread of a narrative. As Thor, however, writes as an annalist, in chronological order, it may be presumed that his dates are more to be depended on than those of the looser compilers of historical essays. He, therefore, will furnish us with at least an outline of the principal Masonic events in the life of Hund, while from other writers we may derive the material facts which the brevity of Thor does not provide. But even Thor must sometimes be abandoned, where he has evidently neglected to note a particular circumstance, and his omission must be supplied from some other source.
On the 20th of March, 1742, when still lacking some months of being twenty years of age, he was initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry, in the Lodge of the Three Thistles at Frankfort-on-the-Main. Findel places the date of his initiation in the year 1741; but, for the reason already assigned, Brother Mackey preferred the authority of Thory, with whom Lenning concurs. The First and Second Degrees were conferred on the same day, and in due time his initiation into the Symbolic Degrees was completed.

Soon after his initiation, the Baron von Hund traveled through England and Holland, and paid a visit to Paris. Robison, who speaks of the Baron as "a gentleman of honorable character," and whose own reputation secures him from the imputation of wilful falsehood, although it could not preserve him from the effects of prejudice, says that Hund, while in Paris, became acquainted with the Earl of Kilmarnock and some other gentlemen, who were adherents of the Pretender, and received from them the new Degrees, which had been invented, it is said, for political purposes by the followers of the exiled house of Stuart. Gädicke states that while there he also received the Order of the Mopse, which he afterward attempted, but without success, to introduce into Germany. This must, however, be an error; for the Order of the Mopse was an androgynous institution, which subsequently gave birth to the French Lodges of Adoption, was not established until 1776, long after the return of Hund to his native country.

This entire article is by Brother Mackey except where otherwise plainly indicated and here we may insert a comment by Brother Hawkins who says the Order of the Mopse was established in 1738 (see Mopse).

While he resided in Paris he received, says Findel, some intimations of the existence of the Order of Knights Templar in Scotland. The legend, which it is necessary to say has been deemed fabulous, is given to us by Clavel (Histoire Pittoresque, page 184), who tells us that, after the execution of Jacques de Molay, Pierre d'Aumont, the Provincial Grand Master of Auvergne, accompanied by two Commanders and five Knights, escaped to Scotland, assuming during their journey, for the purpose of concealment, the costume of Operative Masons. Having landed on one of the Scottish Islands, they met several other Knights, who were possibly the followers of the Pretender, some of whom were likely to have been with the French army. The point is not, however, worth the trouble of an investigation.

Two things have been well settled, namely: That in 1743 von Hund was initiated as a Knights Templar, and that at the same time he received the appointment of a Provincial Grand Master, with ample powers to propagate the Order in Germany. He returned to his native country, but does not appear to have been very active at first as a missionary of Templarism, although he continued to exhibit his strong attachment to Ancient Craft Freemasonry. In the year 1749 he erected, at his own expense, a Lodge on his estates at Kittlitz, near Lobau, to which he gave the name of the Lodge of the Three Pillars. At the same time he built there a Protestant church, the corner-stone of which was laid by the Brethren, with the usual Masonic ceremonies.

We are compelled to suppose, from incidents in his life which subsequently occurred, that Hund must have visited Paris a second time, and that he was there in the year 1754. On November 24, in that year, the Chevalier de Bonneville, supported by some of the most distinguished Freemasons of Paris, instituted a Chapter of the High Degrees, which received the name of the Chapter of Clermont, and into which he introduced the Templar system, that is, the system which finds the origin of Freemasonry in Templarism. In this Chapter Baron von Hund, who was then in Paris, received the Degrees of the Clermont system, and there, says Thory, he learned the doctrine upon which he subsequently founded his new Rite of Strict Observance. This doctrine was, that Freemasonry owes its existence to Knights Templarism, of which it is the natural successor; and, therefore, that every Freemason is a Templar, although not entitled to all the privileges of the Order until he has attained the highest Degree.

Von Hund returned to Germany possessed of powers, or a Deputation granted to him in Paris by which he was authorized to disseminate the advanced Degrees in that country. He was not slow to exhibit these documents, and soon collected around him a band of adherents. He then attempted what he termed a reform in primitive Freemasonry or the simple English system of the three Symbolic Degrees, which alone most of the German Lodges recognized. The result was the establishment of a new system, well known as the Rite of Strict Observance.

But here we again encounter the embarrassments of conflicting authorities. The distinctive feature of the Rite of Strict Observance was, that Freemasonry is the successor of Templarism; the legend of Aumont being unhesitatingly accepted as authentic. The author of Anti-Saint-Nicaise, the book already referred to, asserted that between the years 1730 and William James Hughan
English Masonic Historian
1740, there was already in Lusatia a Chapter of Templars; that he knew one, at least, who had been there initiated before the innovation of the Baron von Hund; and that the dignities of Prior, Sub-Prior, Prefect, and Commander, which he professed to introduce into Germany for the first time, had been known there at a long antecedent period. Ragon also asserts that the Templar system of Ramsay was known in Germany before the foundation of the Chapter of Clermont, whence von Hund derived his information and his powers; that it consisted of six Degrees, to which Hund added a seventh; and that at the time of von Hund's arrival in Germany this régime had Baron von Marshall as its head, to whom Hund's superiors in Paris had referred him. This seems to be the correct version of the affair; and so the Rite of Strict Observance was not actually established, but only reformed and put into more active operation, by von Hund.

One of the peculiarities of this Rite was, that every member was called a Knight, or Eques; the classical Latin for a Roman knight being, by a strange inconsistency, adopted by these professed Templars, instead of the medieval word Miles, which had been always appropriated to the military knights of chivalry. To this word was appended another, and the title thus formed was called the characteristic name. Lists of these characteristic names, and of the persons whom they represented, are given in all the registers and lists of the Rite. Von Hund selected for himself the title of Eques ab Ense, or Knight of the Sword; and, to show the mixed military and Masonic character of his régime, chose for his seal a square and sword crossed, or, in heraldic language, saltier-wise. Von Hund divided Europe into nine provinces, and called himself the Grand Master of the Seventh Province, which embraced Lower Saxony, Prussian Poland, Livonia, and Courland. He succeeded in getting the Duke Ferdinand of Brunswick to place himself at the head of the Rite, and secured its adoption by most of the Lodges of Berlin and of other parts of Prussia. After this he retired into comparative inactivity, and left the Lodges of his Rite to take care of themselves.

But in 1763 he was aroused by the appearance of one, Johnson, on the Masonic stage. This man, whose real name was Leucht, was a Jew, and had formerly been the secretary of the Prince of Anhalt-Bernburg, under the assumed name of Becker. But, changing his name again to that of Johnson, he visited the city of Jena, and proclaimed himself to the Freemasons there as possessed of powers far more extensive than those of von Hund, which he pretended to have received from "Unknown Superiors" at Aberdeen, Scotland, the supposed seat of the Templar Order, which had been revived by Aumont. Von Hund at first admitted the claims of Johnson, and recognized him as the Grand Prior of the Order.

Ragon says that this recognition was a fraud on the part of von Hund, who had really selected Johnson as his agent, to give greater strength to his Rite. I am reluctant to admit the truth of this charge, and am rather disposed to believe that the enthusiasm and credulity of von Hund had made him for a time the victim of Johnson's ostentatious pretensions. If this be so, he was soon undeceived, and, discovering the true character as well as the dangerous designs of Johnson, he proclaimed him to be an adventurer. He denied that Johnson had been sent as a delegate from Scotland, and asserted anew that he alone was the Grand Master of the Order in Germany, with the power to confer the high Degrees. Johnson, accused of abstracting the papers of a Lord of Courland, in whose service he had been, and of the forgery of documents, was arrested at Magdeburg through the influence of von Hund, on the further charges of larceny and counterfeiting money, and died in 1775 in prison.

Von Hund now renewed his activity as a Freemason, and assembled a Congress of the Rite at Altenberg, where he was recognized as Grand Master of the Templars, and augmented his strength by numerous important initiations. His reappearance among the Brethren exerted as much surprise as joy, and its good effects were speedily seen in a large increase of Chapters; and the Rite of Strict Observance soon became the predominating system in Germany. But dissatisfaction began to appear as a consequence of the high claims of the members of the Rite to the possession of superior knowledge. The Knights looked haughtily upon the Freemasons who had been invested only with the primitive Degrees, and these were offended at the superciliousness with which they were treated. A Mother Lodge was established at Frankfort, which recognized and worked only the three Degrees. Other systems of advanced Degrees also arose as rivals of the Rite, and von Hund's régime began to feel sensibly the effects of this compound antagonism.

Hitherto the Rite of Strict Observance had been cosmopolitan in its constitution, admitting the believers in all creeds to its bosom, and professing to revive only the military and chivalric character of the ancient Templars, without any reference to their religious condition. But in 1767, von Starck, the Rector at Wismar, proposed to engraft upon the Rite a new branch, to be called the clerical system of Knights Templar. This was to be nominally spiritual in character; and, while announcing that it was in possession of secrets not known to the chivalric branch of the Order, demanded as preliminary to admission, that every candidate should be a Roman Catholic, and have previously received the Degrees of the Strict Observance. Starck wrote to von Hund, proposing a fusion of the two branches; and he, "because," to borrow the language of Findel (History of Freemasonry, page 279), "himself helpless and lacking expedients, eagerly stretched out his hand to grasp the offered assistance, and entered into connection with the so-called clergy." He even, it is said, renounced Protestantism and became a Catholic, so as to qualify himself for admission.

In 1774, a Congress assembled at Kohlo, the object of which was to reconcile the difference between these two branches of the Rite. Here von Hund appears to have been divested of some portion of his dignities, for he was appointed only Provincial Superior of Upper and Lower Alsace, of Denmark and of Courland, while the Grand Mastership of the Rite was conferred on Frederick, Duke of Brunswick. Another Congress was held in 1775, at Brunswick, where Hund again appeared. Here Findel, who seems to have no friendly disposition toward von Hund, charges him with "indulgence in his love of outward pomp and show," a charge that is not consistent with the character given him by other writers, who speak of his modesty of demeanor. The question of the Superiori Incogniti, or Unknown Superiors, from whom von Hund professed to derive his powers, came under consideration. He denied that he was bound to give any explanations at all, and asserted that his oath precluded him from saying anything more. Confidence in him now declined, and the Rite to which he was so much attached, and of which he had been the founder and the chief supporter, began to lose its influence. The clerical branch of the Rite seceded, and formed an independent Order, and the Lodges of Strict Observance thenceforward called themselves the United German Lodges.

With his failure at Brunswick, the functions of von Hund ceased. He retired altogether from the field of Masonic labor, and died, in the fifty-fifth year of his life, on November 8, 1776, at Meiningen, in Prussia. The members of the Lodge Minerva, at Leipzig, struck a medal in commemoration of him, which contains on the obverse an urn encircled by a serpent, the symbol of immortality, and on the reverse a likeness of him, which is said to be exceedingly accurate. A copy of it may be found in the Taschenbuche der Freimaurerei, and in the American Quarterly Review of Freemasonry. For this amiable enthusiast, as he certainly was—credulous but untiring in his devotion to Freemasonry; deceived but enthusiastic; generous and kind in his disposition; whose heart was better than his head—we may not entertain the profoundest veneration; but we cannot but feel an emotion of sympathy. We know not how much the antagonism and contest of years, and final defeat and failure, may have embittered his days or destroyed his energy; but we do know that he ceased the warfare of life while still there ought to have been the promise of many years of strength and vigor.

HUNGARY, NATIONAL GRAND LODGE OF. See Austria Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia.

HUR. The Hebrew word שחר, liberty. A term used in the Fourth Degree of Perfect Mistress in the French Rite of Adoption.

HUTCHINSON, WILLIAM. Of all the Masonic writers of the eighteenth century there was no one who did more to elevate the spirit and character of the Institution than William Hutchinson of Barnard Castle, in the county of Durham, England. To him are we indebted for the first philosophical explanation of the symbolism of the Order, and his Spirit of Masonry still remains a priceless boon to the Masonic student. Hutchinson was born in 1732, and died April 7, 1814, at the ripe age of eighty-two years. He was by profession a solicitor; but such was his liberal studies, and became a prominent member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries. His labors in this direction were such as to win for him from Nichols the title of "an industrious antiquary." He published in 1776, A View of Northumberland, in two volumes; in 1785, 1787, and 1794, three consecutive quarto volumes of The History and Antiquities of the County Palatinate of Durham; and in 1794, in two quarto volumes, A History of Cumberland—works which are still referred to by scholars as containing valuable information on the subjects of which they treat, and are an evidence of the learning and industry of the author. But it is as a Masonic writer that Hutchinson has acquired the most lasting reputation, and his labors as such have made his name a household word in the Order. He was for some years the Master of Barnard Castle Lodge, where he sought to instruct the members by the composition and delivery of a series of Lectures and Charges, which were so far superior to those then in use as to attract crowds of visitors from neighboring Lodges to hear him and to profit by his instructions. Some of these were from time to time printed, and won so much admiration from the Craft that he was requested to make a selection, and publish them in a permanent form.

Accordingly, he applied, in 1774, for permission to publish, to the Grand Lodge—which then assumed to be a rigid censor of the Masonic press—and, having obtained it, he gave to the Masonic world the first edition of his now celebrated treatise entitled The Spirit of Masonry, in Moral and Elucidatory Lectures; but the latter part of the title was omitted in all the subsequent editions. The sanction for its publication, prefixed to the first edition, has an almost supercilious sound, when we compare the reputation of the work—which at once created a revolution in Masonic literature—with that of those who gave the sanction, and whose names are preserved only by the official titles, which were affixed to them. The sanction is in these words:

Whereas, Brother William Hutchinson has compiled a book, entitled The Spirit of Masonry, and has requested our sanction for the publication thereof; we, having perused the said book and finding it will be of use to this Society, do recommend the same.

This approval is signed by the Grand Master and his Deputy, also by the Grand Wardens, and the Grand Treasurer and Secretary. But their judgment, though tamely expressed, was not amiss. A century has since shown that the book of Hutchinson has really been "of use to the Society." It opened new thoughts on the symbolism and philosophy of Freemasonry, which, worked out by subsequent writers, have given to Freemasonry the high rank it now holds, and has elevated it from a convivial association, such as it was in the beginning of the eighteenth century, to that school of religious philosophy which it now is. To the suggestions of Hutchinson, Hem-embracing undoubtedly owed that noble definition, that "Freemasonry was a science of morality veiled in allegory, and illustrated by symbols."

The first edition of The Spirit of Masonry was published in 1775, the second in 1785, the third in 1802, the fourth in 1813, the fifth in 1814, and the sixth in 1815, all except the last in the lifetime of the author. Several subsequent editions have been published both in the United States and in Great Britain. In 1780, it was translated into German, and published at Berlin under the title of Der Geist freimaurerrei, in moralischen und erläuternden Vorträgen. Of this great work the Craft appear to have had but one opinion. It was received on its first appearance with enthusiasm, and its popularity among Masonic scholars has never decreased. Doctor Oliver says of it:

It was the first efficient attempt to explain, in a rational and scientific manner, the true philosophy of the Order. Doctor Anderson and the writer of the Gloucester sermon indicate the mine, Calcott opened it, and Hutchinson worked it. In this book he gives to the science its proper value. After explaining his design, he enters copiously on the rites, ceremonies, and institutions of ancient nations. Then he dilates on the Lodge, with its ornaments, furniture, and jewels; the building of the Temple; geometry; and after explaining the Third Degree with a minuteness which is highly gratifying, he expatiates on the vague conjectures of cowans and unbelievers, by a secrecy, charity, and brotherly love; and sets at rest all the false and received. With him, the wisdom of the ancients were not able to raise her. Those who sought her by the old law were frustrated, for their adoration due to God had been buried in the filth and rubbish of the world, so that it might well be said "that the guide to heaven was lost, and the master of the works of righteousness was smitten." In the same way he extends the symbol. "True religion," he says, "was fled. Those who sought her through the wisdom of the ancients were not able to raise her. She eluded the grasp, and their polluted hands were stretched forth in vain for her restoration. Those who sought her by the old law were frustrated, for death had stepped between, and corruption defiled the embrace."

Hence the Hutchinsonian theory is, that the Third Degree of Freemasonry symbolizes the new law of Christ, taking the place of the old law of Judaism, which had become dead and corrupt. With him, Hiram or Huram is only the Greek huramen, meaning I have found it, and acacai, from the same Greek, signifies freedom from sin; and "thus the Master Mason represents a man, under the Christian doctrine saved from the grave of iniquity and raised to the faith of salvation." Some of Hutchinson's etymologies are unquestionably inadmissible; as, when he derives Tubal Cain from a corruption of the Greek, tumbon choeo, "I prepare my sepulcher," and when he translates the Substitute Word as meaning "I ardently wish for life." But fanciful etymologies are the besetting sin of all antiquaries. So his theory of the exclusive Christian application of the Third Degree will not be received as the dogma of the present day. But such was the universally recognized theory of all his contemporaries. Still, in his enlarged and elevated views of the symbolism and philosophy of Freemasonry as a great moral and religious science, he was immeasurably in advance of his age. In his private life, Hutchinson was greatly respected for his cultivated mind and extensive literary acquirements, while the suavity of his manners and the generosity of his disposition secured the admiration of all who knew him. He had been long married to an estimable woman, whose death was followed in only two days by his own, and they were both interred in the same grave.

HUZZA. The acclamation in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. In the old French manuscripts it is generally written Hoschea.

HYMNS, MASONIC. In the History of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire, England, by Brother Philipps Doran, 1912, we are told that Brother W. Clegg, a member of the Lodge of Harmony, No. 272, Boston, Lincolnshire, was the author of the hymns Hail Eternal and Now the Evening Shadows Falling, which are in frequent use at the opening and closing of many Lodges.

HAIL ETERNAL!
Hail, Eternal! by whose aid
All created things are made,
Heaven and earth thy vast design;
Mighty Architect! be Thine.

And may we, when labors cease,
Part in harmony and peace,
By Thy glorious Majesty,
More than precious jewels.

Humbly now we bow before Thee,
Crown our Order with Thy blessing;
Doth to all Thy works extend.
Sacred in each faithful breast.

Now the evening shadows falling
Warn from toil to peaceful rest;
Mystic arts and rites reposing
Sacred in each faithful breast.

God of Light! whose love unceasing,
Doth to all Thy works extend.

Crown our Order with Thy blessing;
Build, sustain us to the end.
Humbly now we bow before Thee,
Grateful for Thine aid Divine;

Everlasting pow'r and glory,
Mighty Architect! be Thine.
I. The ninth letter in the alphabets of Western Europe, called by the Greeks Iota, after its Shemitic name. The Hebrew equivalent is י, of the numerical value of 10, and signifies a hand. The oldest forms of the letter, as seen in the Phenician and Samaritan, have a rude resemblance to a hand with three fingers, but by a gradual simplification, the character came to be the smallest in the alphabet, and iota, or jot, is a synonym for a trifle. The thumb and two fingers are much used, and are of great significance, in religious forms, as well as in Freemasonry. It is the position of the hand when the Pope blesses the congregation, and signifies the Three in One. The Hebrew letter ain, י, with the numerical value of 70, possesses and gives the English sound of the letter י.

SYMBOLISM OF THE IOTA OR І

I. A. A. T. Reghellini (i, 29) says that the Rose Croix Freemasons of Germany and Italy always wear a ring of gold or silver, on which are engraved these letters, the initials of Ignis, Aer, Aqua, Terra, in allusion to the Egyptian mystical doctrine of the generation, destruction, and regeneration of all things by the four elements, fire, air, water, and earth; which doctrine passed over from the Egyptians to the Greeks, and was taught in the philosophy of Empedocles. But these Rosicrucian Freemasons, probably borrowed their doctrine from the Gnostics.

I AM THAT I AM. The name which the Great Architect directed Moses to use (Exodus iii, 14), that he might identify himself to the Israelites as the messenger sent to them by God. It is one of the modifications of the Tetragrammaton, and as such, in its Hebrew form of אֶהְיֶה אֶהְיֶה אֶהְיֶה, eheyeh asher eheyeh, the י pronounced like a in fate, has been adopted as a significant word in the higher Degrees of the York, American, and several other Rites. The original Hebrew words are actually in the future tense, and grammatically mean I will be what I will be; but all the versions give a present signification. Thus, the Vulgate has it, I am who am; the Septuagint, I am he who exists; and the Arabic paraphrase, I am the Eternal who passes not away. The expression seems intended to point out the eternity and self-existence of God, and such is the sense in which it is used in Freemasonry (see Eheyeh asher eheyeh).

IATRIC FREEMASONRY. From the Greek word ἰατρία, the art of medicine. Ragon, in his Orthodoxie Magonnette (page 450), says that this system was instituted in the eighteenth century, and that its adepts were occupied in the search for the universal medicine. It must therefore have been a Hermetic Rite. Ragon knew very little of it, and mentions only one Degree, called the Oracle of Cos. The island of Cos was the birthplace of Hippocrates, the father of medicine, and to him the Degree is dedicated. The Order or Rite has no longer any existence.

ICONOCLASTS. From the Greek words εἰκών, meaning image, and κλάω, I break. The name used to designate those in the Church, from the eighth century downward, who have been opposed to the use of sacred images, or, rather, to the paying of religious honor or reverence to such representations. Image-worship prevailed extensively in the sixth and seventh centuries in the Eastern Empire. The iconoclast movement commenced with the Imperial Edict issued, in 726, by the Emperor Leo III, surnamed the Isaurian, who allowed images only of the Redeemer. The second decree was issued in 730. This was opposed strenuously by Popes Gregory II and III, but without avail.

ICONOLOGY. The science which teaches the doctrine of images and symbolic representations. It is a science collateral with Freemasonry, and is of great importance to the Masonic student, because it is engaged in the consideration of the meaning and history of the symbols which constitute so material a part of the Masonic system.

IDAHO. The Grand Lodge of Oregon granted a Dispensation to Idaho Lodge, No. 35, on July 7, 1863, and on June 21, 1864, a Charter was issued. At a Convention held in Idaho City on December 16, 1867, for the purpose of organizing a Grand Lodge, members of the four chartered Lodges in the State, namely, Idaho, No. 35; Boise City, No. 37; Placer, No. 38, and Pioneer, No. 12, were present. It was agreed that members of Owyhee Lodge, U. D., should be admitted and permitted to vote. On December 17, 1867, Grand Officers were elected and installed, and, adopting the Constitution of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, the Grand Lodge of Idaho was opened in Ample Form.

Idaho Chapter in Idaho City, was granted a Charter on June 18, 1867, by the Grand Chapter of Oregon which was under the impression that the General Grand Chapter had ceased to exist. The General Grand Chapter, when considering the above Charter acknowledged that the petitioners acted in good faith and granted a Charter to Idaho Chapter, No. 1, on September 18, 1868. Ten Chapters in all were also chartered by the General Grand Chapter in this State. The eleven Chapters organized the Grand Chapter of Idaho on June 16, 1908.

The first Council in Idaho, Idaho Council at Pocatello, was issued a Dispensation by the Officers of the General Grand Council on December 15, 1896. This Dispensation was annulled on October 11, 1897. On January 24, 1912, however, the General Grand Council issued a Dispensation to Idaho Council, No. 1, and chartered it on September 10, 1912.

Five Commanderies were instituted in Idaho before the Grand Commandery was organized. The first of these was Idaho, No. 1, at Boise, which was granted a Dispensation May 24, 1882, and a Charter September 13, 1882. With four other Commanderies, Lewiston, No. 2; Moscow, No. 3; Gate City, No. 4; Coeur d’Alene, No. 5, and Idaho, No. 1, the Grand Commandery was organized on August 21, 1904. A Lodge of Perfection, a Chapter of Rose Croix, a Council of Kadosh, and a Consistory, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, Southern Jurisdiction, were established at Lewiston by the Supreme Council as Lewiston, No. 1, by Charters dated respectively June 15, 1895; January 18, 1898; April 29, 1899; and June 27, 1899.

IDIOT. Idiocy is one of the main disqualifications for initiation. This does not, however, include a mere dulness of intellect and indolent of apprehension. These amount only to stupidity, and "the judgment of the heavy or stupid man," as Doctor Good has correctly remarked, "is often as sound in itself as that of the man of more capacious comprehension." The idiot is defined by Blackstone as "one that hath had no understanding from his nativity; and therefore is by law presumed never likely to attain any." A being thus mentally imperfect is incompetent to observe the obligations or to appreciate the instructions of Freemasonry. It is true that the word does not occur in any of the old Constitutions, but from their general tenor it is evident that idiots were excluded, because "cunning," or knowledge and skill, are everywhere deemed essential qualifications of a Freemason. But the law of the ritual is explicit on the subject.

IDOLATRY. The worship paid to any created object. It was in some one of its forms the religion of the entire ancient world except the Jews. The forms of idolatry are generally reckoned as four in number.

1. Fetishism, the lowest form, consisting in the worship of animals, trees, rivers, mountains, and stones. 2. Sabianism or Sabaism, the worship of the sun, moon, and stars. 3. Shintoism, or the worship of deceased ancestors or the leaders of a nation. 4. Idealism, or the worship of abstractions or mental qualities.

Brother Oliver and his school have propounded the theory that among the idolatrous nations of antiquity, who were, of course, the descendants, in common with the monotheistic Jews, of Noah, there were the remains of certain legends and religious truths which they had received from their common ancestor, but which had been greatly distorted and perverted in the system which they practised. This system, taught in the Ancient Mysteries, he called the Spurious Freemasonry of antiquity.

IGNAT NATURE RENOVATUR INTEGRA. A Latin phrase meaning By fire, nature is perfectly renewed (see I.: N.: R.: I.:-). -

IGNORANCE. The ignorant Freemason is a drone and an encumbrance in the Order. He who does not study the nature, the design, the history, and character of the Institution, but from the hour of his initiation neither gives nor receives any ideas that could not be shared by a profane, is of no more advantage to Freemasonry than Freemasonry is to him. The true Freemason seeks light that darkness may be dispelled, and knowledge that ignorance may be removed. The ignorant aspirant, no matter how loudly he may have asked for light, is still a blind groper in the dark.

IH-HO. The Cabalistic mode of reading Ho-hi, one of the forms of the Tetragrammaton (see Ho-hi).

I. H. S. A monogram, to which various meanings have been attached. Thus, these letters have been supposed to be the initials of In hoc signo, words which surrounded the cross seen by Constantine. But that inscription was in Greek; and besides, even in a Latin translation, the letter V, for vincers, would be required to complete it. The Church has generally accepted the monogram as containing the initials of Jesus Hominum Salvator, a Latin expression meaning Jesus the Savior of Men; a sense in which it has been adopted by the Jesuits, who have taken it in the form here illustrated, as the badge of their society. So, too, it is interpreted by the Masonic Templars, on whose banners it often appears. A later interpretation is advocated by the Cambridge Camden Society in a work published by them on the subject. In this work they contend that the monogram is of Greek origin, and is the first three letters of the Greek name, ΙΗΣΟΥΣ, JESUS. But the second of these interpretations is the one most generally received.

IJAR, יא. The eighth month of the Hebrew civil year. It corresponds to a part of the months of April and May.

ILLINOIS. The Anti-Masonic movement had so great an effect on Freemasonry in Illinois that it practically died. After the agitation ceased the Craft appeared again with renewed vigor. There are thus two early Lodges and two Grand Lodges to be considered in an account of the growth of Freemasonry in this State. On September 4, 1805, a Dispensation for six months was issued to Western Star Lodge, No. 107, while Illinois was still in Indian Territory. The Lodge was chartered and on September 13, 1806, was duly constituted. A Convention was held at Vandalia on December 9, 1822, to consider the organization of a Grand Lodge for the State. At another meeting held December 1, 1823, eight Lodges were represented and a Grand Lodge was opened with Shadrach Bond as Grand Master. In 1827, this Grand Lodge ceased operations and after June 24, 1827, all the Lodges in the State went out of existence. A Warrant was issued on August 30, 1838, to Bodley Lodge, No. 97, by the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, there being at that time no other working Lodge in Illinois. At a Convention held at Jacksonville on April 6, 1840, six of the eight chartered Lodges in the State were present and one under Dispensation was represented. The Grand Lodge officers were elected and the Grand Lodge then opened. For some time, however, several Lodges in Illinois paid allegiance to Missouri because their business in St. Louis made it more convenient for the Brethren to attend the Grand Lodge of Missouri.

A Dispensation was granted by the Deputy General Grand High Priest to Springfield Chapter, on July 19, 1841, and in the following September a Charter was issued. Seven Chapters were given permission subsequently by the General Grand King to organize a Grand Chapter. On April 10, 1850, six of these Chapters held a Convention and opened the Grand Chapter of Illinois.

Degrees of the Cryptic Rite were conferred in some of the Royal Arch Chapters in this State. Then several Councils were chartered from 1852 by the Grand Council of Kentucky, the first being Illinois Council No. 15. A Charter was granted to Alton Council at Alton in 1853. Springfield Council at Springfield was not chartered until February, 1854, though the Convention to form a Grand Council was assembled on September 29, 1853, and during the adjourned meeting at Springfield the various Councils were arranged as Illinois Council No. 1; Springfield Council No. 2; and Alton Council No. 3. Any misunderstanding was cleared up by a second Convention at Springfield, March 10, 1854, when the Constitution was re-adopted and the Grand Council constituted by representatives of the three Councils.

Apollo Encampment, later Apollo Commandery, was organized at Chicago under Dispensation dated May 5, 1845, issued by Deputy Grand Master Joseph K. Stapleton of Baltimore. It received a Charter dated September 17, 1847. The Grand Commandery was constituted by representatives of the three Councils.

As early as 1857, appeared the first Body of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite in Illinois, when Van Rensselaer Lodge of Perfection was chartered on May 14, at Chicago. On that date also Chicago Council of Princes of Jerusalem, Gom-gas Chapter of Rose Croix, and Oriental Consistory were established in the same city.

ILLITERACY. The word illiteracy, as signifying an ignorance of letters, an incapability to read and write, suggests the inquiry whether illiterate persons are qualified to be made Freemasons. There can be no doubt, from historic evidence, that at the period when the Institution was operative in its character, the members for the most part—that is, the great mass of the Fraternity—were unable to read or write. At a time when even kings made at the foot of documents the sign of the cross, pro ignorantia litterarum, because they could not write their names, it could hardly be expected that an Operative Mason should be gifted with a greater share of education than his sovereign. But the change of the Society from Operative to Speculative gave to it an intellectual elevation, and the philosophy and science of symbolism which was then introduced could hardly be understood by one who had no preliminary education. Accordingly, the provision in all Lodges, that initiation must be preceded by a written petition, would seem to indicate that no one is expected or desired to apply for initiation unless he can comply with that regulation, by writing, or at least signing, such a petition. The Grand Lodge of England does not leave this principle to be settled by implication, but in express words requires that a candidate shall know how to write, by inserting in its Constitution the provision that a candidate, "previous to his initiation, must subscribe his name at full length to a declaration." The official commentary on this, in an accompanying note, is, that "a Person who cannot write is consequently ineligible to be admitted into the Order," and this is now the very generally accepted law. The Latin words ne varietur in Masonic diplomas, which follows the signature in the margin, indicates that the holder is required to know how to sign his name.

ILLUMINATI. This is a Latin word, signifying the enlightened, and hence often applied in Latin Diplomas as an epithet of Freemasons.

ILLUMINATI OF AVIGNON. See Avignon, Illuminati of.

ILLUMINATI OF BAVARIA. A secret society, founded on May 1, 1776, by Adam Weishaupt, who was Professor of Canon Law at the University of Ingolstadt. Its founder at first called it the Order of the Perfectibilists; but he subsequently gave it the name by which it is now universally known. Its professed object was, by the mutual assistance of its members, to attain the highest possible degree of morality and virtue, and to lay the foundation for the reformation of the world by the association of good men to oppose the progress of moral evil. To give to the Order a higher influence, Weishaupt connected it with the Masonic Institution, after whose system of Degrees, for an account of which see Chastanier.

Illuminati. This is a Latin word, signifying the enlightened, and hence often applied in Latin Diplomas as an epithet of Freemasons.

Illuminated Theosophists. A modification of the system of Pernetti instituted at Paris by Benedict Chastanier, who subsequently succeeded in introducing it into London. It consisted of nine Degrees, for an account of which see Chastanier.

Illuminati. This Latin word, signifying the enlightened, and hence often applied in Latin Diplomas as an epithet of Freemasons.

Illuminati of Avignon. See Avignon, Illuminati of.

Illuminati of Bavaria. A secret society, founded on May 1, 1776, by Adam Weishaupt, who was Professor of Canon Law at the University of Ingolstadt. Its founder at first called it the Order of the Perfectibilists; but he subsequently gave it the name by which it is now universally known. Its professed object was, by the mutual assistance of its members, to attain the highest possible degree of morality and virtue, and to lay the foundation for the reformation of the world by the association of good men to oppose the progress of moral evil. Illuminati. This is a Latin word, signifying the enlightened, and hence often applied in Latin Diplomas as an epithet of Freemasons.
soon became a leader, dividing with Weishaupt the control and direction of the Order.

In its internal organization the Order of Illuminati was divided into three great classes, namely, 1. The Nursery; 2. Symbolic Freemasonry; and 3. The Mysteries; each of which was subdivided into several Degrees, making ten in all, as in the following table:

I. Nursery. After a ceremony of preparation it began:
1. Novice.
2. Minerval.
3. Illuminatus Minor.

II. Symbolic Freemasonry. The first three Degrees were communicated without any exact respect to the divisions, and then the candidate proceeded:
4. Illuminatus Major, or Scottish Novice.
5. Illuminatus Dirigens, or Scottish Knight.

III. The Mysteries. This class was subdivided into the Lesser and the Greater Mysteries.

The Lesser Mysteries were:
6. Presbyter, Priest, or Epopt.
7. Prince, or Regent.
The Greater Mysteries were:
8. Magus.
9. Rex, or King.

Any one otherwise qualified could be received into the Degree of Novice at the age of eighteen; and after a probation of not less than a year he was admitted to the Second and Third Degrees, and so on to the advanced Degrees; though but few reached the Ninth and Tenth Degrees, in which the inmost secret designs of the Order were contained, and, in fact, it is said that these last Degrees were never thoroughly worked up. The Illuminati selected for themselves Order Names, which were always of a classical character. Thus, Weishaupt called himself Spartacus, Knigge was Philo, and Zwack, another leader, was known as Cato. They gave also fictitious names to countries. Ingolstadt, where the Order originated, was called Eleusis; Austria was Egypt, in reference to the Egyptian darkness of that kingdom, which excluded all Freemasonry from its territories; Munich was called Athens, and Vienna was Rome. The Order had also its calendar, and the months were designated by peculiar names; as, Dimeh for January, and Bemeh for February. They had also a cipher, in which the official correspondence of the members was conducted. The character ☻, now so much used by Freemasons to represent a Lodge, was invented and first used by the Illuminati.

The Order was at first very popular, and enrolled no less than two thousand names upon its registers, among whom were some of the most distinguished men of Germany. It extended rapidly into other countries, and its Lodges were to be found in France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, Hungary, and Italy. The original design of Illuminism was undoubtedly the elevation of the human race. Knigge, who was one of its most prominent working members, and the author of several of its Degrees, was a religious man, and would never have united with it had its object been, as has been charged, to abolish Christianity. But it cannot be denied, that in process of time abuses had crept into the Institution and that by the influence of unworthy men the system became corrupted; yet the coarse accusations of such writers as Barruel and Robison are known to be exaggerated, and some of them altogether false. The Conversations-Lexicon, for instance, declares that the society had no influence whatever on the French Revolution, which is charged upon it by these as well as other writers. But Illuminism came directly and professedly in conflict with the Jesuits and with the Roman Church, whose tendencies were to repress the freedom of thought. The priests became, therefore, its active enemies, and waged war so successfully against it, that on June 22, 1784, the Elector of Bavaria issued an Edict for its suppression. Many of its members were fined or imprisoned, and some, among whom was Weishaupt, were compelled to flee the country. The Edicts of the Elector of Bavaria were repeated in March and August, 1785, and the Order began to decline, so that by the end of the eighteenth century it had ceased to exist. Adopting Freemasonry only as a means for its own more successful propagation, and using it only as incidental to its own organization, it exercised while in prosperity no favorable influence on the Masonic Institution, nor any unfavorable effect on it by its dissolution.

ILLUMINATI OF STOCKHOLM. An Order but little known; mentioned by Ragon in his Catalogue as having been instituted for the propagation of Martinism.

ILLUMINISM. The system or Rite practised by the German Illuminati is so called.

ILLUSTRIOUS. A title commonly used in addressing Brethren of the Thirty-Third Degree in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Formerly the word had a more extended usefulness among the Craft. For example, there is a Minute Book preserved in the Museum of the Grand Lodge Zur Sonne at Bayreuth, Germany. This record is written in French as a report of the inauguration of the Lodge Eleusis at Bayreuth on December 4, 1741. A translation of the memorandum is as follows:

The fourth of the month of December our Very Worshipful Lodge has installed the new Lodge in the City at the Golden Eagle. The procession was arranged with beautiful ceremonies.

1. Two Bearers carrying gloves.
2. Two Stewards or Marshalls with their insignia and white batons or staffs in hand.
4. The Secretary of the Grand Lodge.
5. Our Very Illustrious Master—Margrave Friedrich von Brandenburg—Bayreuth—as Grand Master of our Order, between the Wardens.
6. The new Master of the new Lodge, between his Wardens.
7. All the Brethren, fifty in number.

Before the entrance to the Golden Eagle was posted a Sentinel, on the staircase was another. Music of very agreeable kind was heard. We made some Brethren and Masters. After supper the Procession returned in the same manner that it had arrived.

The student of Freemasonry will not only note the early use of the word Illustrious but also the prominence given to the gloves on this occasion (see Gloves).

ILLUSTRIOUS ELECT OF THE FIFTEEN. The title now generally given to the Elect of Fifteen, which see.

IMAUM. The appellation given to the most honored teacher of Mohammedanism. The title of the Sultan, as the spiritual chief of all Moslems.

IMITATIVE SOCIETIES. A title sometimes given to those secret societies which, imitating the general organization of Freemasonry, differ from it entirely in their character and object. In the eight-eighth century, when at one time they abounded, were the Bucks, the Sawyers, the Gormogons, and the Gregorians; and, in the nineteenth century, the Odd Fellows, the Good Templars, and the Knights of Pythias. Most of them imitate the Freemasons in their external appearance, such as the wearing of aprons, collars, and jewels, and in calling their places of meeting, by a strange misnomer, Lodges. But in these points is their only resemblance to the original Institution.

IMMANUEL. A Hebrew word signifying God with us, from עֲמָנוּ, immānu, meaning with us, and הָ, el, God. It was the symbolical name given to the prophet Isaiah to the child who was announced to Ahaz and the people of Judah as the sign which God would give of their deliverance from their enemies, and afterward applied by the Apostle Matthew to the Messiah born of the Virgin. As one of the appellations of Christ, it has been adopted as a significant word in modern Templarism, where, however, the form of Emanuel is most usually employed.

IMMEMORIAL. Applied to ancient Masonic Bodies of unknown age, the term “from time immemorial” then meaning beyond all memory.

IMMATERIALISM. A doctrine relating to the quality of God and of the human soul, showing that He forms an absolute contrast to matter, and is the basis of the qualities of eternity, omnipotence, and unchangeableness. The immateriality of the soul includes simplicity as another of its qualities.

IMMUNISATION. Applied to ancient Masonic Bodies of unknown age, the term “from time immemorial” then meaning beyond all memory.

IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL. Very wisely has Max Müller said (Chips from a German Workshop 1, page 45) that “without a belief in personal immortality, religion is surely like an arch resting on one pillar, like a bridge ending in an abyss”; and he cites passages from the Vedas to show that to the ancient Brahmans the idea was a familiar one. Indeed, almost all the nations of the earth with whose religious faith we are acquainted recognize the dogmas, although sometimes in vague and, perhaps, materialistic forms. It was the professed teaching of the Ancient Mysteries, where, in the concluding rites of their initiation, the restoration of the hero of their legend was a symbol of the immortal life. So, too, the same doctrine is taught by a similar legendary and symbolic method in the Third Degree of Freemasonry.

Archdeacon Mant thus describes the differences, in the teaching of this doctrine of immortality, between what he calls, after the school of Brother Oliver, the spurious and the true Freemasonry:

> Whereas the heathens had taught this doctrine only by the application of a fable to their purpose, the wisdom of the pious Grand Master of the Israelitish Masons took advantage of a real circumstance, which would more forcibly impress the sublime truths he intended to inculcate upon the minds of all Brethren.

It will be doubted by some of our modern skeptics whether the Hiramic myth is entitled to more authenticity as a historic narrative than the Osiric or the Dionysian; but it will not be denied that, while they all taught the same dogma of immortality, the method of teaching by symbolism was in all the same.

In reply to an inquiry, Brother Robert I. Clegg offered in the Builder (December, 1915, page 300), such proofs as in his judgment demonstrated the immortality of the soul as a fact. Aside from faith in the revealed Word of God in the Great Light, the assurances may briefly be outlined thus:

We are taught as Fellow Crafts the symmetry and order of Nature, or the balance between the spirit and the Grand Architect. Seeing in life much that is incomplete, rewards and punishments various and mysterious, seemingly ill-assorted and unequal, there is the mystery that in the belief of the heart the God who finish the work. Men of all tongues and times, the wise and the simple, have accepted the probability of immortality. This universal hope may be classed with the axioms of geometry. Force is eternal. Nature ebbs and flows. The round of existence in the falling rain, the rising evaporation from ocean and lake, the dropping of seed into soil, the upward growing plant, in material forces of moving water and vegetable life we see an analogy of the soul, as the lower so the higher, and thereby the further hope of eternity. Lastly, by ripened knowledge we discover as adults what was hidden in youth. Facts at first are few and unrelated. Finally we see unity. Scientists by observation of facts, few or many, establish relations between them and formulate laws. Astronomers probe into darkness to explain variations in star motion, chemists to define elements, physicists to bound the interplay of atoms, and astral scientists go forward into the unknown with faith founded on the scanty available systematized truths. All truth is but relativeness. Beyond these we look farther and confidently, from inductive facts we evolve our law. To us the present is a promise, the bud is the opened flower. Immortality is the fact that scientifically satisfies. Here in part are the restful rocks on which at least one Freemason builds his expectancy of meeting those he loved who have gone before.

IMMOVABLE JEWELS. See Jewels of a Lodge.

IMPLEMENTS. The Operative Freemasons of the Middle Ages gave to certain of their implements—the most important of which were the square, the compasses, the stone-mason’s hammer, or gavel, and the trowel, and hence this implement is entrusted to the Master Mason. Thus, the tools attached to each Degree—admonish the Freemason, as an Apprentice, to prepare his mind for the reception of the great truths which are hereafter to be unfolded to him; as a Fellow Craft, to mark their importance and adapt them to their proper uses; and as a Master, to adorn their beauty by the practice of brotherly love and kindness, the cement that binds all Freemasons in one common Fraternity.
There is no doubt, as Finkel says (History, page 68), that the stone-masons were not the first who symbolized the implements of their craft. But they had reason, above all other gilds, for investing them with a far higher worth, and associating them with a spiritual meaning, on account of the sacred calling to which they were devoted. By the erection of churches, the Master Mason not only perpetuated his own name, but assisted in giving glory to God, in spreading the knowledge of Christianity, and in stimulating to the practice of the Christian virtues. And hence the Church-building Freemasons naturally gave a more sacred signification in their symbolism to the implements employed in such holy purposes. And thus it was that they transmitted to their successors, the Speculative Freemasons, the same sacred interpretation of their symbols. Modern Freemasonry has been derived from an association of church architects, and this accounts for the religious character of its symbolism. Had it been the offspring of the Templars, as Ramsay contends, its symbolism would have been undoubtedly military, somewhat like that employed by Saint Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians.

IMPOST. The point where an arch rests on a wall or column. Husenbeth says imposts were "members of a secret Society of Tyrian artists who were hired by King Solomon to erect the temple, in order to distinguish them from the Jews, who performed the more humble labors, were honored with the epithet of free annexed to the name of Builder or Mason, and, being talented foreigners, were freed from the usual imposts paid to the state by the subjects of Solomon."" IMPOSTORS. Impostors in Freemasonry may be either Profanes who, never having been initiated, yet endeavor to pass themselves for regular Freemasons, or Freemasons who, having been expelled or suspended from the Order, seek to conceal the fact that they were suspended or expelled them. The Tiler's Oath is intended therefore the Charges of 1722 say, "You are cautioned not to reject with contempt and derision, and as prudence shall direct sou, that you may not be warned of God's presence. For the true God alone. Thus Drusius, Tenagrummaton, sive de Nomine Dei proprio (page 108) says, "Nomen quatuor literarum proprium et absolute non tribui nisi Deo vero. Unde doctores INCHOATE LODGES. From the Latin word, inchoatus, meaning unfinished, incomplete. Lodges working under the dispensation of the Grand Master are said to be inchoate or incomplete, because they do not possess all the rights and prerogatives that belong to a Lodge working under the Warrant of Constitution of a Grand Lodge. The same term is applied to Chapters which work under the Dispensation of a Grand High Priest (see Lodges).

catholicci dicunt incommunicahile—not common—esse creaturea." That is: “The name of four letters, which is not to be attributed, properly and absolutely, except to the true God. Whence the Catholic Doctors say that it is incommunicable, not common to or to be shared, by any creature.”

Brother Oliver, in his Symbolic Dictionary, commits a curious blunder in supposing that the Incommunicable Name is the Name not to be communicated or pronounced by anyone; thus incorrectly confounding the words incommunicable and ineffable. Although the two epithets are applied to the same name, yet the qualities of incommunicability and ineffability are very different.

INCORPORATION. By an act of incorporation, the supreme legislature of a country creates a corporation or body politic, which is defined by Kyd (Corporations i, page 13) to be “a collection of many individuals united in one body, under a special denomination, having perpetual succession under an artificial form, and vested by the policy of the law with a capacity of acting in several respects as an individual, particularly of taking and granting property, contracting obligations, and of suing and being sued; of enjoying privileges and immunities in common, and of exercising a variety of political rights.”

Some Grand Lodges in America have been incorporated by Act of the General Assembly of their respective States; others are not, and these generally hold their property through Trustees.

In 1768, an effort was made in the Grand Lodge of England to petition Parliament for Incorporation, and after many discussions the question was submitted to the Lodges; a large majority of whom having agreed to the measure in 1772, a Bill was introduced in Parliament by the Deputy Grand Master, but, being approved on its second reading, at the request of several of the Fraternity, who had petitioned the House against it, it was withdrawn by the mover, and thus the design of an Incorporation fell to the ground.

Perhaps the best system of Masonic incorporation in existence is that of the Grand Lodge of South Carolina. There the Act, by which the Grand Lodge was incorporated, in 1817, delegates to that Body the power of incorporating its subordinates; so that a Lodge, whenever it receives from the Grand Lodge a Warrant of Constitution, acquires thereby at once all the rights of a corporate body, which it ceases to exercise whenever the said Warrant is revoked by the Grand Lodge.

Objections have been made to the Incorporation of Lodges in consequence of some of the legal results which would follow. An incorporated Lodge becomes subject to the surveillance of the Courts of Law, from which an unincorporated Lodge is exempt. Thus, a Freemason expelled by an unincorporated Lodge must look for his redress to the Grand Lodge alone. But if the Lodge be incorporated, he may apply to the Courts for a restoration of his franchise as a member. Masonic discipline would thus be seriously affected. The objection to incorporation of Lodges is, it seems, founded on good reasons.

The incorporation of the Grand Lodge of England was proposed by its Grand Master, the Duke of Beaufort, in 1768, 168 Lodges declared for it and 43 against it, the motion being carried in Grand Lodge in 1769 by a great majority. A petition was presented to the House of Commons in February, 1772, permission was granted for the bringing in of a bill and on March 4 of the same year this bill was read for the second time. On March 11 another petition, this time against the bill, was submitted by a strong party in the Craft who were able to postpone further consideration of the proposed incorporation until April 1, on which day the bill was withdrawn by motion of one of its original introducers and nothing further was ever done in this direction.

With regard to the practise followed in the United States of America, about which there has not been any uniformity, we may state in general that:

The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts was incorporated in 1859 by the following enactment of the Senate and House of Representatives of that State in General Court assembled:

Section 1. John T. Heard, Grand Master, and his associates, the Grand Wardens and Members of the Voluntary Association known as the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons in Massachusetts, and their successors, are hereby incorporated, and made a body politic, by the name of “The Master, Wardens and Members of the Grand Lodge of Masons in Massachusetts,” for the purpose of managing and administering the charity funds belonging to said voluntary association, with power to have a common seal, to sue and be sued, to make and ordain, from time to time, By-Laws, Rules and Regulations for the government and management of the Corporation, provided the same be not repugnant to the Constitution and Laws of the Commonwealth; and that they have all the privileges, and be subject to all the liabilities set forth in the forty-fourth chapter of the Revised Statutes, so far as the same are applicable to Corporations for charitable purposes.

Section 2. The said Corporation may take by purchase, gift, grant, or otherwise, and hold real estate not exceeding the value of Two Hundred Thousand Dollars and personal estate not exceeding the value of Fifty Thousand Dollars.

Section 3. John T. Heard is hereby authorized to call the first meeting of said Corporation, by advertisement in two newspapers printed in Boston one week previous thereto, and appoint the time and place thereof, at which meeting the mode of calling future meetings shall be regulated.

Section 4. This Act shall take effect on and after its passage.

In 1806, 1896 and 1916, the second section of the above Act has been amended so that now the Master, Wardens and Members of the Grand Lodge may take and hold real estate not exceeding in value five million dollars, and personal estate not exceeding one million dollars. An Act of 1884 incorporated the Masonic Education and Charity Trust of the Grand Lodge and in 1916 this Act was amended so that the Trust might take and hold funds and property not exceeding in value five million dollars.

The Grand Lodge of Mississippi has been incorporated under the Laws of the State of Mississippi.

The Grand Lodge of New Jersey is incorporated under an Act of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, approved March 7, 1866. As a matter of interest a copy of the Act follows:

Indemnity. The indemnity of the Masonic character, as expressed in the often-repeated maxim, "Once a Freemason, always a Freemason," is universally admitted. That is to say, no voluntary or even forced withdrawal from the Order can cancel certain obligations which have been contracted, and place the person withdrawing in precisely the same relative position toward the Institution that he had occupied before his initiation.

Indened Tarcel. In the old lectures these words were used for what is now called the Tessellated Border (see Tassel).

Indende Tessel. The ornamented border which surrounds the Mosaic pavement (see Tessellated Border).

Indenture. This was an old form of contract which was executed in duplicate on the one sheet, between the two parties, the two halves of the document being separated along a notched or waving line. The separation in this tooth-like manner gave the document its name. Indenture, coming from a law term, which is usually applied to an estate or right which cannot be defeated.

Independent. A deistic system. This regular Rite among us had been practised in France by numerous Lodges since 1841. They bequeathed their powers to the Grand Rectified Directory of Geneva, Switzerland, in order that the Lodges of France should be awakened when the time was opportune. That was done in 1910 by the Grand Rectified Directory of Geneva, which created the Respectable Rectified Lodge Le Centre des Amis at the Orient of Paris. Thereupon the Grand Orient of France, preoccupied with the foundation of a new order of things, proposed to us a double Constitution guaranteeing the integrity of our Rituals of 1782, and the free exercise of the symbols of the Grand Architect of the Universe. During these three years, 1910-3, our Rite made much progress in France. In June, 1913, the Council of the Order of the Grand Orient of France violated the solemn promises of 1910 and imposed upon us new rituals, in which the opening and closing invocations had the symbol of the Grand Architect of the Universe suppressed. We carried our case before the Masonic Convent of the Grand Orient in 1913, and we were forbidden to use our old-time rituals. The Ordonnance of the Convent of the Grand Orient of France declared at that time amid the plaudits of the assemblage that the symbol of the Grand Architect of the Universe was contrary to the Constitution of the Grand Orient of France. To defend our mensa Masonic faith and to safeguard the traditions of our Order, we have been obliged to constitute ourselves in October, 1913, into the Independent and Regular National Grand Lodge. The Respectable Rectified Lodge, Le Centre des Amis of Paris, of which records exist as far as 1762, took the initiative and was promptly followed by the Respectable Lodge, L'Anglais No. 204, at Bordeaux, which existed in France.

We have imposed and shall impose upon our Lodges respecting His symbol, and also to resume with those Brethren belonging to the regular Obediences received in the Rectified Regime which we practise, revised in 1755, and in 1766 a Provincial Grand Master, Captain Edmond Pascal, was appointed.

The earlier groupings of the Lodges overseas in India and other countries were designated as in the records of the Grand Lodge as Provinces but since 1866 these have been termed Districts to distinguish them from the Provinces in England itself.

The Grand Lodge of Ireland issued a Charter for a Lodge in 1837 at Kurnaul but this did not survive.

A Lodge was warranted for Bombay under English authority in 1758 and Brother James Todd was appointed Provincial Grand Master in 1763.

The Grand Lodge of Scotland in 1836 appointed Dr. James Burnes of the Indian Medical Service as Provincial Grand Master of Western India and its Dependencies, and a Provincial Grand Lodge came into being on January 1, 1838. A Provincial Grand Lodge of Eastern India was also created to control Masonic matters on behalf of the Grand Lodge of Scotland and of this Body also Doctor Burnes became the head, and in 1846 he was duly invested as Provincial Grand Master for all India. He was the author of a Sketch of the History of the Knights Templar in 1844 and was also the founder of a fraternal organization having three classes of members, Novice, Companion, and Officer, and known as the Brotherhood of the Olive Branch of the East.

Natives of India joined the Craft, and Rising Star Lodge at Bombay and Saint Andrew's Lodge at Poona were set up West and East in 1844 for that purpose and soon followed by others. Some prominent natives of India have become Freemasons. Among these are the son of the Nabob of Arcot, Umdat-ul-Umara, Prince Keyralla, Khan of Mysore, Prince Shadad Khan, the former Ameer of Scinde, Maharajah Duleep, and Maharajah Rundeer Sing.

INDIANA. The first Lodge in Indiana was organized at Vincennes by Dispensation from the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, August 27, 1807, as Vincennes Lodge, No. 15. Prior to this, however, Freemasonry had been introduced by Brethren belonging to Lodges in the army on the northwestern frontier. A Convention of representatives of the following Lodges of Ancient York Masons was held at Corydon on December 3, 1817, to consider the establishment of a Grand Lodge: Vincennes, No. 15; Lawrenceburg, No. 44; Madison Union, No. 99; Rising Star, No. 36; Melchizedeck, No. 43; Pisgah, No. 45. Three Lodges under Dispensation, Switzerland, Rising Sun and Brookville Harmony, also sent representatives and it was resolved to open a Grand Lodge. On January 12, 1818, arrangements were completed. The following day Grand Officers were elected with M. W. Alexander Buckner as Grand Master, and the Grand Constitution was adopted January 15. Since 1828 this Grand Lodge has had permanent quarters at Indianapolis but before then it met at Charlestown and elsewhere.

According to the proceedings of the General Grand Chapter on September 14, 1826, a Charter was granted to Vincennes Chapter on May 13, 1820. At the twelfth Convocation of the General Grand Chapter in 1844, permission was granted for a Convention of Chapter representatives to assemble on November 18, 1845, and the Grand Chapter of Indiana was duly constituted on December 25, 1845. At the meeting of the General Grand Chapter the General Grand Secretary stated that, according to the records of constituted on December 25, 1845. At the meeting in 1844, permission was granted for a Convention of the General Grand Chapter the following day Grand Officers were elected with M. W. January 12,1818, arrangements were completed. The Council Degrees in Indiana were at first given in the Chapter work but, after the General Grand Chapter decided in 1863 to give up control of the Cryptic Degrees, Councils were chartered by the Grand Council of Kentucky, August 30, 1854, and by the Grand Council of Ohio, October 18, 1855. The three Councils thus organized sent delegates to a meeting on December 20, 1855, when the Grand Council of Indiana was formed.

The first Commandery to be organized in Indiana was Roper, No. 1, at Indianapolis, which was granted a Dispensation May 14, 1848. It was chartered October 16, 1850. With three others, Greensburg, No. 2; La Fayette, No. 3, and Fort Wayne, No. 4, this Commandery organized the Grand Commandery of Indiana on May 16, 1854, by authority of the Grand Encampment.

On May 19, 1865, the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite became part of the Masonic life of Indiana when the Adorimom Lodge of Perfection, the Sarah Council of Princes of Jerusalem, the Indianapolis Chapter of Rose Croix, and the Indiana Consistory were established at Indianapolis by the Supreme Council, Northern Masonic Jurisdiction.

INDIAN CALENDAR. An Indian or Hindu year begins in April, thus: First Vaisakha, April 13; First Jyaishtha, May 14; First Ashadha, June 14; First Sravana, July 18; First Bhadrapada, August 16; First Asvina, September 16; First Kartika, October 17; First Agrahayana or Margasirsha, November 16; First Pansha, December 15; First Magha, January 13; First Phalguna, February 15; First Phaṭha, March 13. The days of the week, commencing with Sunday, are Aditya, Soma, Mangala, Buda, Guru, Sukra, and Sani. The Hindu Era, until April 13, 1855, was 1937.

INDIAN FAITH. See Buddhism.

INDIAN FREEMASONRY. There is no doubt that Indians have been Freemasons, and devoted ones. But the claim has been made that there are Indian customs of so decided Masonic a character that a Freemason would at once assume their identity with the ceremonies of the Craft. The subject has been treated in a book, Indian Masonry, by Brother Robert C. Wright, who describes a number of Indian signs, for example, and he arrives at this conclusion (page 18):

> It can thus be readily understood that Masonic signs, which are simply gestures given to convey ideas, no doubt have taken their origin from the same signs or like signs now corrupted but which meant something different in the beginning. Were we able to trace these signs we would then at once jump to the conclusion that the people who used them must have been, to ourselves, the signs which have just been mentioned as given by the Indians could easily be mistaken for Masonic signs by an enthusiastic Freemason, more anxious to find what he thinks is in them than to indulge in sober analysis of the sign and its meaning. A ceremonial sign for peace, friendship, or brotherhood was made by the extended fingers, separated, interlocked in front of the breast, the hand horizontal with the back outwards. When this sign is represented as a pictograph, we have on the Indian chart what corresponds exactly to the clasped hands on the Masonic chart, which means the same thing.

On the next page Brother Wright gives some attention to the study of things that may resemble each other and yet not be identical. For instance, he says:

> Charles Frush, a Freemason who spent many years among the Indians of Oregon and Washington, told me he had never seen any Masonic sign given by Indians, and if any one claimed he had seen such, it was misunderstood and was for conversational purposes. In response to an inquiry about a report that Indians who had the East many years ago, upon returning to Lewiston, Idaho, had formed a Masonic Lodge, T. W. Randall, Grand Secretary of A. F. & A. M. in Idaho, wrote me as follows: "I was in Lewiston as early as 1862 and heard of Indian Freemasons but was never able to trace this to a reliable source. I have frequently discussed this question with old pioneers of Oregon and Washington but never found a person who was a Freemason, and who believed the Indians ever were Freemasons or had a Lodge. That some Tribes have certain signs by which they can recognize each other, there can be no doubt, but those signs are not Masonic signs so far as I can learn. Brother Randall has thus correctly determined that the signs he refers to are nothing more than conversational signs. The different Tribes had a sign which stood for their totem or the name of their Tribe, and it is very probable that a sign was adopted for the purpose of the Indian of the same Tribe on seeing his tribal sign, would recognize the one giving it as a fellow tribesman. Indians of a different Tribe, familiar with it, would recognize the sign and in turn could give their own sign and thus each know where the other trails from." There is nothing strange about it.

The closing chapter by Brother Wright sums up the "Lessons," as he heads it, we may derive from a Masonic study of the American Indian. He says on pages 108 and 109:

> There is no Indian Freemasonry. There is Indian Freemasonry. This wide difference I make clear when I say, no Indian Freemasonry as the average man understands it, but there is a deep Indian Freemasonry for him who seeks to find it. Shall we Freemasons, who tell others the secrets of their life, advise him on important matters and defend him from wrong and violence and at his death is his chief mourner, be able to confide to A. of the university of Freemasonry, dare to say that the Indian is not a Freemason? An interesting institution was found among the Wyandottes and some other tribes—that of fellowship. Two young men agree with it, would also recognize the sign and in turn could give their own sign and thus each know where the other trails from." There is nothing strange about it.
us think of; that is, one who pays Lodge dues, wears an apron like ours and gives signs so nearly like ours that we find him perfect. Freemasonry in any degree degrees we know, and which degrees we are too prone to watch, just as we do a procession of historical floats, which casually interest us, and maybe a little more so if we can but secure a glimpse of the procession. The trappings of the craft mean the meaning of which we have but a faint idea about. This makes our own Freemasonry as meaningless as the interpretation of Indian signs by an ignorant trapper.

In a paper on the North American Indians, their Beliefs and Ceremonies Akin to Freemasonry, read by Brother F. C. Van Duzer on April 10, 1924, at a meeting of the Metropolitan College, London, England, and printed in the Transactions of that year (pages 18 to 27), the author examines several interesting kindred customs of the Indians of North America and the Masonic Craft. He also furnishes some valuable particulars of the initiation of North American Indians into Freemasonry according to the Rites of the Craft. Brother Van Duzer says:

The first American Indian, of whom there is a definite record of having become a Master Mason, is Joseph Brant, the famous Mohawk, Iroquois, Chief, whose native name was Thayendanega, who was married to the noted Tory, Butler, who, exasperated because they could not capture a brood of Indians who were Freemasons, made his way to Queen Anne. He was initiated in the Hiram's Clinton Lodge, No. 417, Moderns, held in Princess Street, in Leicester Fields, London, on April 26, 1776. His Grand Lodge Certificate was signed by Joseph Heseltine, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of the Moderns. He was modernized in the Sixth Grand Chapter, No. 11, Mohawk Village, of which he was first Master. He translated, among other works, the Gospel of Saint John. It is further claimed that the famous Seneca orator, George Copway, the Ojibway, who saved the early settlers of Chicago from the Sauk and Fox, was a member of Lodge No. 10, Hamilton, Canada, and was a warrior of great distinction, having earned practically every honor that is possible to the Sioux and Dakota Nations. It is related that once, at the head of a small party, he completely overwhelmed a large body of the warriors of the Ponca Tribe and personally killed both of their Chiefs. In other accounts it is stated that he dared the fire of the enemy to secure the body of a wounded comrade. Again, he rescued an Indian girl from freezing, carrying her ninety miles on his back over the snow-swept plain. Brother Oneroad had the advantage of a good education. He was a graduate of the Haskell Institute, at Lawrence, Kansas, and of the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York; and he became an ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church. He has been a good and steadfast friend. In fact, that is the literal meaning of his name, for One Road signifies steadfast among the Sioux.

Thus from primitive and ancient rites akin to Freemasonry, which had their origin in the shadows of the American forest, have come of late the Free and Accepted Masonry as it has been taught to us. It is an instructive example of the universality of human belief in fraternity, morality and immortality. General Eli S. Parker, the famous Indian orator, who saved the early settlers of Chicago from the Sauk and Fox, who was a Freemason, has written: "I am almost the sole remnant of what was once a noble race will recognize me as they did my ancestors when we were strong and the white man weak. I knocked at the door of Freemasonry and see if the white race will recognize me as they did my ancestors when we were strong and the white man weak. I knocked at the door of the Blue Lodge and found Brotherhood around its altar. I went before the Great Light in the Chapter and found companionship beneath the Royal Arch. I entered the Encampment and found there valiant Sir Knights willing to shield me without regard to race or nation. If my race shall disappear from the continent I have a consoling hope that our memory shall not perish. If the deeds of my ancestors shall not live in stories their memories will remain in the names of our lakes and rivers, your towns and cities, and will call up memories otherwise forgotten. I am happy; I feel assured that when my glass is run out I shall follow the footsteps of my departed race. Masonic sympathisers will cluster around my coffin and drop in my lonely grave the evergreen acacia, sweet emblem of a better meeting."

Brother Van Duzer says further: "I desire to express my grateful thanks to R. W. Brother Alanson Skinner, the eminent anthropologist of Milwaukee, INDIFFERENTS

United States of America, for the great assistance he has rendered me.

INDIFFERENTS, THE. This organization flourished in the middle of the eighteenth century in France. The rites were of a quasi-Masonic character and both men and women were eligible to membership. The badge was a ribbon, striped with red and yellow, and the device was an imitation of an icicle. When the oaths taken by the members was to fight against Love, whose power they renounced. Mdlle. Salle, a famous danseuse, was President of a lodge.

INDISCHE MYSTERIEN or INDIAN MYSTERIES. In the German Cyclopaedia we find the following:

The East Indians have still their mysteries, which it is very probable they received from the ancient Egyptians. These mysteries are in the possession of the Brahmanes, and their ancestors were the ancient Brachmen. It is only the sons of these priests who are eligible to initiation. Had a grown-up youth of the Brachmen sufficiently hardened his body, learned to subdue his passions, and given the requisite proofs of his abilities at school, he must submit to an especial proof of his fortitude before he was admitted into the mysteries, which proceeded in this manner: In the middle of a high hill contained the statues of nature, which were neither made of gold, nor of silver, nor of earth, nor of stone, but of a very hard material resembling wood, the composition of which was unknown to any mortal.

These statues are said to have been given by God to His Son, to serve as models by which He might form all created beings. Upon the crown of one of these statues stood the likeness of Bruma, who was the same with them as Osiris was with the Egyptians. The inner part, and the entrance also into this cavern, was quite dark, and those who wished to enter into it were obliged to seek the way with a lighted torch. A door led into the inner part, on the opening of which the water that surrounded the border of the cavern broke loose. If the candidate for initiation was worthy, he opened the door quite easily, and a spring of the purest water flowed gently upon him and purified him. Those, on the contrary who were guilty of any crime, could not open the door; and if they were candid, they confessed their sins to the priest, and besought him to turn away the anger of the gods by praying and fasting.

In this cavern, on a certain day, the Brachmen held their annual festival. Some of them dwelt constantly there; others came there only in the spring and harvest—others came there only in the autumn and winter. Some dwelt in their annual assembly. Some of them dwelt constantly there; others came there only in the spring and harvest. Among these was a young man of the name of X.

When the appointed day arrived he bathed himself and went to the Guru, or chief Brahman, who kept one of his own apartments ready in which to perform this ceremony. Before he was admitted he was asked if he earnestly desired to be initiated—if it was not curiosity which induced him to do so—and if he felt himself strong enough to perform the ceremonies which would be prescribed to him for the whole of his life, without the exception of a single day. He was at the same time advised to defer the ceremony if he did not sufficiently command either his strength or his fortitude. If the youth continued firm in his resolution, and showed a zealous disposition to enter into the paths of righteousness, the Guru addressed a charge to him upon the manner of living, to which he was about to pledge himself for the future. He threatened him with the punishment of heaven if he conducted himself wickedly; promised him, on the contrary, the most glorious rewards if he would constantly keep the path of righteousness. After this exhortation, and having received his pledge, the candidate was conducted to the prepared chamber, the door of which stood open, that all those who assembled might participate in the offering about to be made.

Different fruits were thrown into the fire, while the High Priest, with many ceremonies, prayed that God might be present with them in that sacred place. The Guru then conducted the youth behind a curtain, both having their heads covered, and then gently pronounced into his ear a word of one or two syllables, which he was as gently to repeat into the ear of the Guru, that no other person might hear it. In this word was the prayer which the initiated was to repeat as often as he could for the whole day, yet in the greatest stillness and without ever moving the lips. Neither durst he discover this sacred word unto any person. No European has ever been able to discover this word, so sacred is this secret to them. When the newly initiated has repeated this command several times, then the chief Brahman instructs him in the ceremonies, teaches him several songs to the honor of God, and finally dismisses him with many exhortations to pursue a virtuous course of life (see Priya).
INEFFABLE DEGREES. From the Latin word, ineffabilis, that which can not or ought not to be spoken or expressed. The Degrees from the Fourth to the Fourteenth inclusive, of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, which are so called because they are principally engaged in the investigation and contemplation of the Ineffable Name.

INEFFABLE NAME. It was forbidden to the Jews to pronounce the Tetragrammaton or sacred name of God; a reverential usage which is also observed in Freemasonry. Hence the Tetragrammaton is called the Ineffable Name. As in Freemasonry, so in all the secret societies of antiquity, much mystery has been attached to the Divine Name, which it was considered unlawful to pronounce, and for which some other word was substituted. Adonai was among the Hebrews the substitute for the Tetragrammaton.

INEFFABLE TRIANGLE. The two triangles intercrusted one upon the other, containing the Ineffable Name in Enochian characters, represented in the Eleventh Grade of the Ineffable Series. Good and evil, light and darkness, life and death, are here not wanting in symbolism, foreshadowing the philosophical Degrees, and furnishing the true original of the two interlaced triangles adopted in modern Freemasonry (see Enochian Alphabet).

INELEGIBLE. Who are and who are not ineligible for initiation into the mysteries of Freemasonry is treated of under the head of Qualifications of Candidates, which see.

INFORMATION, LAWFUL. One of the modes of recognizing a stranger as a true Brother, is from the lawful information of a third party. No Freemason can lawfully give information of another's qualifications unless he has actually tested him by the strictest trial and examination, or knows that it has been done by another. But it is not every Freemason who is competent to give lawful information. Ignorant and unskilful Brethren cannot do so, because they are incapable of discovering truth or of detecting error. A rusty Freemason should never attempt to examine a stranger, and certainly, if he does, his opinion as to the result is worth nothing. If the information given is on the ground that the party who is vouched for has been seen sitting in a Lodge, care must be taken to inquire if it was a "just and legally constituted Lodge of Master Masons." A person may forget from the lapse of time, and vouch for a stranger as a Master Mason, when the Lodge in which he saw him was only opened in the First or Second Degree. Information given by letter, or through a third party, is irregular. The person giving the information, the one receiving it, and the one of whom it is given, should all be present at the same time, for otherwise there would be no certainty of identity. The information must be positive, not founded on belief or opinion, but derived from a legitimate source. And, lastly, it must not have been received casually, but for the very purpose of being used for Masonic purposes. For one to say to another, in the course of a desultory conversation, "A. B. is a Freemason," is not sufficient. He may not say something to this effect: "I know this man to be a Master Mason, for such or such reasons, and you may safely recognize him as such." This alone will insure the necessary care and proper observance of prudence.

INFRINGEMENT UPON FREEMASONRY. The reader will see under Inimitative Societies certain observations with regard to these organizations that in some ways resemble the Craft. As imitation is said to be a sincere form of flattery, such resemblances may be deemed a compliment to the reputation and the character of the Masonic Institution. Where the features maintained in common by the imitator and the imitated are employed innocently and perhaps for an object thoroughly devoid of any purpose to defame or in any particular to injure the Masonic Institution, the infringing organization is on an entirely distinct and different foundation than if it were guilty of the theft and misuse of a good name. So identified is that name with a recognized and highly respected Institution that any who attempt to take unauthorized liberties with the exclusive use of it do so at some risk of at least a rebuke and a refusal of legal permission to proceed. An instance is afforded in the case of the American Masonic Federation, which will be found concisely explained elsewhere in this work (see Clandestine). Another case where a Charter was sought to use a couple of significant words in combination with the name of a proposed organization is mentioned briefly here.

Brother Thomas G. Price, Past Potentate of Mecca Temple, New York City, contributed to the Meccan, September, 1921, a decision handed down on August 5 of that year by Justice Gannon of the Part II, Supreme Court of New York, to the effect that the words Masonic Rite are the property of the established Masonic Order and are not to be encroached upon by other organizations of any kind. Such a decision reserves to the Masonic Fraternity the right to the use of the word Masonic in connection with Rite and denies its use elsewhere no matter how it may be qualified by other words. Brother Price wrote that so far as he was able to ascertain, Justice Gannon was not a member of the Craft and in making this decision he was guided solely by the law and not by any personal bias. While the decision is given here to show the trend of judicial thought and not because of any claim for its value in law as a general precedent, it should have some influence on the activities of organizations claiming to be Masonic.

The decision reads as follows:

In regard to Masonic Adriatic Rite—Certain citizens have presented a proposed Certificate, under Section 41 of the Membership Corporation Law, for my approval. The objects stated are patriotic and entirely laudable, but the name presents an objection that I am not able to overcome. The title, Masonic Adriatic Rite, containing two words suggestive of a very ancient and familiar organization, cannot but lead to the conclusion that the proposed corporation is connected with and duly sanctioned by Masonic authority. The organizers concede that this is not the case, and they contend that the qualifying word Adriatic removes this apparent identity. I cannot subscribe to this view. A title containing the words Masonic and Rite, however separated, cannot be objectionable to the Masonic Order, with which they have been thus injected from the outset, and it is not fitting that these objections should be challenged.

Thousands of words descriptive and arbitrary are available. The organizers must upon reflection see the reasonableness of these observations. Approval of the Certificate under the present title is withheld.

A few references are given here to show the tendency of court decisions, and incidentally, against the unauthorized use of emblems:

The term "Freemasons" includes all members of any regular Body of the Fraternity known as "Free and Accepted Masons" or "Ancient Free and Accepted Masons." They have a peculiar system of jurisprudence which, in determining legal questions concerning them, is considered and applied by the courts.

Smith v. Smith, 3 Desaus (S. C.), 356.

It is almost the exclusive province of an Order like Freemasons to impose its own terms of membership, and the courts will not interfere to compel recognition as a member of a Masonic Lodge of one who affiliates with a Rite of Masonry different from that recognized by the Grand Lodge.

It is now universally held that the expulsion of a Freemason from a Blue Lodge will effect a like result as regards his membership in any of the higher Bodies in which he may belong.

IN HOC SIGNO VINCES. On the Grand Standard of a Commandery of Knights Templar these words are inscribed over "a blood-red Passion Cross," and they constitute in part the motto of the American branch of the Order. Their meaning, By this sign thou shalt conquer, is a substantial, but not literal, translation of the original Greek, ιν ευρον θεον. For the origin of the motto, we must go back to a well-known legend of the Church, which has, however, found more doubters than believers among the learned. Eusebius, who wrote a life of Constantine says that while the emperor was in Gaul, in the year 312, preparing for war with his rival, Maxentius, about the middle hours of the day, as the sun began to verge toward its setting, he saw in the heavens, with his own eyes, the sun surmounted with the trophy of the cross, which was composed of light, and a legend annexed, which said "by this conquer." This account Eusebius affirms to be in the words of Constantine. Lactantius, who places the occurrence at a later date and on the eve of a battle with Maxentius, in which the latter was defeated, relates it not as an actual occurrence, but as a dream or vision; and this is now the generally received opinion of those who do not deem the whole legend a fabrication. On the next day Constantine had an image of this cross made into a banner, called the labarum, which he ever afterward used as the imperial standard. Eusebius describes it very fully. It was not a Passion Cross, such as is now used on the modern Templar standard, but the monogram of Christ. The shaft was a very long spear. On the top was a crown composed of gold and precious stones, and containing the sacred symbol, namely, the Greek letter rho or ρ, intersected by the chi or Χ, which two letters are the first and second of the name ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ, or Christ. If, then, the Templars retain the motto on their banner, they should, for the sake of

INHERENT RIGHTS OF A GRAND MASTER.

This has been a subject of fertile discussion among Masonic jurists, although only a few have thought proper to deny the existence of such rights. Upon the theory which, however recently controverted, has very generally been recognized, that Grand Masters existed before Grand Lodges were organized, it must be evident that the rights of a Grand Master are of two kinds—those, namely, which he derives from the Constitution of a Grand Lodge of which he has been the presiding officer, and those which exist in the Body independent of any Constitution, because they are derived from the landmarks and ancient usages of the Craft. The rights and prerogatives which depend on and are prescribed by the Constitution may be modified or rescinded by that instrument. They differ in various Jurisdictions, because one Grand Lodge may confer more or less power upon its presiding officer than another; and they differ at different times, because the Constitution of every Grand Lodge is subject, in regard to its internal regulations, to repeated alteration and amendment. These may be called the accidental rights of a Grand Master, because they are derived from the accidental provisions of a Grand Lodge, and have in them nothing essential to the integrity of the office. It is unnecessary to enumerate them, because they may be found in varied modifications in the Constitutions of all Grand Lodges. But the rights and prerogatives which Grand Masters are supposed to have possessed, not as the presiding officers of an artificial Body, but as the Rulers of the Craft in general, before Grand Lodges came into existence, and which are dependent, not on any prescribed rules which may be enacted today and repealed tomorrow, but on the long-continued usages of the Order and the concessions of the Craft from time out of mind, inhere in the office, and cannot be augmented or diminished by the action of any authority, because they are landmarks, and therefore unchangeable. These are called the inherent rights of a Grand Master. They comprise the right to preside over the Craft whenever assembled, to grant Dispensations, and, as a part of that power, to make Freemasons at sight (see Doctor Mackey's revised Jurisprudence of Freemasonry).

historical accuracy, discard the Passion Cross, and replace it with the Constantinian Chronogram, or Cross of the Labarum. But the truth is, that the ancient Templars used neither the Passion Cross, nor that of Constantine, nor yet the motto in hoc signo vinces on their standard. Their only banner was the black and white Beauseant, and at the bottom of it was inscribed their motto, also in Latin, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed omnini tuo da gloriam, meaning Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thee give the glory. This was the song or shout of victory sung by the Templars when triumphant in battle.

INIGO JONES MANUSCRIPT. Brother R. F. Gould (History of Freemasonry, volume i, page 63) informs us that this manuscript was published only in the Masonic Magazine, July, 1881. A very curious folio manuscript, ornamented title and drawing by Inigo Jones, old red morocco, gilt leaves, dated 1607, was sold by Puttick & Simpson, November 12, 1879, and described as The Ancient Constitutions of the Free and Accepted Masons. Brother Woodford became its possessor, who mentions it as "a curious and valuable manuscript per se, not only on account of its special verbiage, but because it possesses a frontispiece of Masons at work, with the words Inigo Jones delin. at the bottom. It is also highly ornamented throughout, both in the capital letters and with finials. It is of date 1607... It is a peculiarly interesting manuscript in that it differs from all known transcripts in many points, and agrees with no one copy extant." Brother Gould remarks, "This, one of the latest discoveries, is certainly to be classed amongst the most valuable of existing versions of our manuscript Constitutions." It is now the property of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Worcestershire, and has been reproduced by the Quatuor Coronati Lodge. It was probably a copy of a much earlier manuscript, and is considered to belong to the latter half of the seventeenth century, and never to have belonged to Inigo Jones.

INITIATE. The Latin is Initiatus. 1. The Fifth and last Degree of the Order of the Temple; 2. The Eleventh Degree of the Rite of Philalethes; 3. The Candidate in any of the Degrees of Freemasonry is called an Initiate.

INITIATE IN THE EGYPTIAN SECRETS. The Second Degree in the Rite of African Architects.

INITIATE IN THE MYSTERIES. The Twenty-first Degree in the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

INITIATE IN THE PROFOUND MYSTERIES. The Sixty-second Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

INITIATE INTO THE SCIENCES, THE. Brother Kenneth Mackenzie, in the Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia, informs us that this is the title of the Second Degree of a Masonic system founded on the doctrines and principles of Pythagoras.

INITIATED KNIGHT AND BROTHER OF ASIA. The Thirty-second Degree of the Order of Initiated Brothers of Asia (see Asia, Initiated Knights and Brothers of).

INITIATION. A term used by the Romans to designate admission into the mysteries of their sacred and secret rites. It is derived from the word initia, which signifies the first principles of a science. Thus Justin (Liber or book xi, chapter 7) says of Midas, King of Phrygia, that he was initiated into the mysteries by Orpheus, Ab Orpheo sacrorum solemnis initiatus. The Greeks used the term Μυστηρια, from μυστηριον, a mystery. From the Latin, the Freemasons have adopted the word to signify a reception into their Order. It is sometimes specially applied to a reception into the First Degree, but he who has been made an Entered Apprentice is more correctly said to be Entered (see Mysteries).

INITIATION, BABYLONIAN RITE OF. Professor Sayce, in his Hibbert Lecture, on the origin and growth of religion as illustrated by the religion of the ancient Babylonians (page 241), tells us of a tablet which describes the initiation of an Augur, a prophet, a soothsayer or fortune-teller, one foretelling future events by interpreting omens and giving advice upon these things, and states how one of these must be "of pure lineage, unblemished in hand or foot," and speaks thus of the vision which is revealed to him before he is "initiated and instructed in the presence of Samas and Rimmon in the use of the book and stylus" by the "scribe, the instructed one, who keeps the oracle of the gods." He is made to descend into an artificial imitation of the lower world and there beholds "the altars amid the waters, the treasures of Anu, Bel, and Ea, the tablets of the Gods, the delivery of the oracle of Heaven and Earth, and the cedar-tree, the beloved of the great gods, which their command has caused to grow."

IN MEMORIAM. Latin, meaning As a memorial. Words frequently placed at the heads of pages in the Transactions of Grand Lodges on which are inscribed the names of Brethren who have died during the past year. The fuller phrase, in Latin, of which they are an abbreviated form, is In perpetuum rei memoriam, meaning, As a perpetual memorial of the event. Words often inscribed on pillars erected in commemoration of some person or thing.

INNER GUARD. An officer of a Lodge, according to the English system, whose functions correspond in some particulars with those of the Junior Deacon in the American system. His duties are to admit visitors, to receive candidates, and to obey the commands of the Junior Warden. This officer is unknown in the American system.

INNER ORDER. Name of the sixth grade of Von Hund's Templar system.

INNOVATIONS. There is a well-known maxim of the law which says Omnis innovatio plus novitate perturbat quam utilitate prodest, that is, every innovation occasions more harm and disarrangement by its novelty than benefit by its actual utility. This maxim is peculiarly applicable to Freemasonry, whose system is opposed to all innovations. Thus Doctor Dalcho says, in his Ahiman Rezon (page 191), "Antiquity is dear to a Mason's heart; innovation is treason, and saps the venerable fabric of the Order." In accordance with this sentiment, we find the installation charges of the Master of a Lodge affirming that "it is not in the power of any man or body of men to make innovations in the body of Masonry." By the "body of Masonry" is here meant, undoubtedly, the landmarks, which have always been declared to be unchangeable. The non-essentials, such as the local and general regulations and the lectures, are not included in this term. The former are changing every day, according as experience or caprice suggests improvement or alteration. The most important of these changes in the United States has been the tendency to abolition of the Quarterly Communications of the Grand Lodge, and the substitution for them, of an Annual Communication. But, after all, this is, perhaps, only a recurrence to first usages; for, although Anderson says that in 1717 the Quarterly Communications "were revived," there is no evidence extant that before that period the Freemasons ever met except once a year in their General Assembly. If so, the change in 1717 was an innovation, and not that which has almost universally prevailed in the United States.

The lectures, which are but the commentaries on the ritual and the interpretation of the symbolism, have been subjected, from the time of Anderson to the present day, to repeated modifications.

But notwithstanding the repugnance of Freemasons to innovations, a few have occurred in the Order. Thus, on the formation of the Grand Lodge of Antients, as they called themselves in contradistinction to the regular Grand Lodge of England, which was styled the Grand Lodge of Moderns, the former Body, to prevent the intrusion of the latter upon their meetings, made changes in some of the modes of recognition—changes which, although Dalcho has said that they amounted to no more than a dispute "whether the glove should be placed first upon the right hand or on the left" (Ahiman Rezon, page 193), were among the causes of continuous acrimony among the two Bodies, which was only healed, in 1813, by a partial sacrifice of principle on the part of the legitimate Grand Lodge, and have perpetuated differences which still exist among the English and American and the Continental Freemasons.

But the most important innovation which sprung out of this unfortunate schism is that which is connected with the Royal Arch Degree. On this subject there have been two theories: One, that the Royal Arch Degree originally constituted a part of the Master's Degree, and that it was disowned by the Antients; the other, that it never had any existence until it was invented by Ramsay, and adopted by Dermott for his Antient Grand Lodge. If the first, which is the most probable and the most generally received opinion, be true, then the regular or Modern Grand Lodge committed an innovation in continuing the dissoeuvrance at the Union in 1713. If the second be the true theory, then the Grand Lodge equally perpetuated an innovation in recognizing it as legal, and declaring, as it did, that "Antient Craft Masonry consists of three degrees, including the Royal Arch." But however the innovation may have been introduced, the Royal Arch Degree has now become, so far as the York and American Rites are concerned, well settled and recognized as an integral part of the Masonic system.

About the same time there was another innovation attempted in France. The adherents of the Pretender, Charles Edward, sought to give to Freemasonry a political bias in favor of the exiled house of Stuarts, and, for this purpose, altered the interpretation of the great legend of the Third Degree, so as to make it applicable to the execution or, as they called it, the martyrdom of Charles I. But this attempted innovation was not successful, and the system in which this lesson was practised has ceased to exist, although its workings are now and then seen in some of the advanced Degrees, without, however, any manifest evil effect.

On the whole, the spirit of Freemasonry, so antagonistic to innovation, has been successfully maintained; and an investigator of the system as it prevailed in the year 1717, and as it is maintained at the present day, will not refrain from wonder at the little change which has been brought about by the long cycle of these many years.

IN PERPETUAM REI MEMORIAM. Latin, meaning In perpetual memory of the thing.

I.-N.-R.-I. The initials of the Latin sentence which was placed upon the cross: Jesus Nazarenus Rex Judaeorum, meaning Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews. The Rosicrucians used them as the initials of one of their Hermetic secrets: Igne Natura Renovatur Integra, meaning that By fire, nature is perfectly renewed. They also adopted them to express the names of their three elementary principles—salt, sulphur, and mercury—by making them the initials of the sentence, Igne Nitrum Roris Inventur. Ragon finds in the equivalent Hebrew letters ויה the initials of the Hebrew names of the ancient elements: Taminin, water; Noul, fire; Yach, air; and Iebeshchah, earth.

INQUISSION. A Court or Tribunal especially established in the twelfth century by Innocent III, to apprehend and punish heretics or persons guilty of any offense against orthodoxy. Freemasonry has always been the subject of much disapproval by the Roman Catholic Church and the Fraternity has been victimized by Papal pronouncements and Bulls issued by one after the other of the popes. Although Freemasonry makes a subscription to a belief in the existence of a Supreme Being a necessity yet the Roman Church chooses to regard its teachings as atheistic and as such has pursued, tortured, imprisoned and burned the Brethren of the Order at every period during the entire course of the Inquisition. Llorente, everywhere regarded as a reliable authority as he was secretary of the Inquisition at Madrid from 1789 to 1791, having access to the original documents and records, says in his History of the Inquisition:

The first severe measure against Freemasons in Europe was that decreed on December 14, 1732, by the Chamber of Police of the Chatelet at Paris: it prohibited Freemasons from assembling, and condemned M. Chapelot to a penalty of 6000 livres for having suffered them to assemble in his house. Louis XV commanded that those peers of France, and other gentlemen who had the privilege of the entry, should be deprived of that honour if they were members of a Masonic Lodge. The Grand Master of the Parisian Lodges, being obliged to quit France, convoked an assembly of Freemasons to appoint his successor. Louis XV, on being informed of this, declared that if a Frenchman was elected, he would send him to the Bastille.

INSECT SHERMAH. A Jewish belief that the Solomonian Temple was constructed by Divine means, that the stones were squared and polished by a specially created worm called samis, and that the stones by innate power came to the temple ground, and were placed in position by angelic aid. The worm has been designated the Insect Shermah.

INSIGNIA. See Jewels, Official.
INSTALLATION. The act by which an officer is put in possession of the place he is to fill. In Freemasonry it is, therefore, applied to the induction of one who has been elected into his office. The officers of a Lodge, before they can proceed to discharge their functions, must be installed. The officers of a new Lodge are installed by the Grand Master, or by some Past Master deputed by him to perform the ceremony. Formerly, the Master was installed by the Grand Master, the Wardens by the Grand Wardens, and the Secretary and Treasurer by the Grand Secretary and Treasurer; but now this custom is not continued. At the election of the officers of an old Lodge, the Master is installed by his predecessor or some Past Master present, and the Master Elect then installs his subordinate officers. No officer after his installation can resign. At his installation, the Master receives the Degree of Past Master. It is a law of Freemasonry that all officers hold on to their respective offices until their successors are installed. It is installation only that gives the right to exercise the franchises of an office.

The ceremony is an old one, and does not pertain exclusively to Freemasonry. The ancient Romans installed their priests, their kings, and their magistrates; but the ceremony was called installation, because performed generally by the augurs. The word installation is of comparatively modern origin, being medieval Latin, and is compounded of in and stullum, meaning a seat. Priests, after ordination or reception into the sacerdotal order, were installed into the churches or parishes to which they were exclusively to Freemasonry. The ancient Romans installed their priests, their kings, and their magistrates; but the ceremony was called inauguration, because performed generally by the augurs. The word installation is of comparatively modern origin, being medieval Latin, and is compounded of in and stullum, meaning a seat. Priests, after ordination or reception into the sacerdotal order, were installed into the churches or parishes to which they were appointed. The term as well as the custom is still in use.

Installation as a Masonic ceremony was early used. We find in the first edition of Anderson’s Constitutions, a form of Constituting a New Lodge, which was practised by the Duke of Wharton, who was Grand Master in 1723. It was probably prepared by Desaguliers, who was Deputy, or by Anderson, who was one of the Wardens, and perhaps by both. It included the ceremony of installing the new Master and Wardens. The words “Shall, in due form, install them” are found in this document. The usage then was for the Grand Master, or some Brother for him, to install the Master, and for the Master to install his Wardens; a custom which still exists.

INSTALLED MASTERS. Similar in form and identical in purpose to the Actual Past Masters Degree. Writing on the subject in Masonic Record, London, December, 1926, Brother Lionel Vibert says in part that “The full working of the Board of Installed Masters followed by Lodges in all parts of England except perhaps the South East. The present Grand Master states it is unknown to the Scottish Craft. The Minutes of Royal Cumberland No. 41, Bath, prove the use of the ceremony in 1827 (see the 1924 volume of the Somerset Master’s Transactions, page 268). At Exeter the Minutes show the working in 1823, and it was no new thing. At Bristol there is evidence back to 1773, and in 1827 it was described in the Minutes of a Lodge.”

INSTALLED MASTERS, BOARD OF. An expression used in England to designate a Committee of Masters to whom “the Master Elect is presented that he may receive from his predecessor the benefit of installation.” It is the same as the Emergent Lodge of Past Masters assembled in the United States for the same purpose.

INSTALLING OFFICER. The person who performs the ceremony of installation is thus called. He should be of the same official dignity at least; although necessity has sometimes permitted a Grand Master to be installed by a Past Deputy, who in such case acts as locum tenens, the holder of the place, of a Grand Master. The Masonic rule is that anyone who has been installed into an office may install others into similar or inferior offices. In this it agrees with the old Rabbinical law as described by Maimonides (Statute de Sanhedrim, chapter 4), who says: “Formerly, all Rabbis who had been installed, hasmochachim, could install others; but since the time of Hillel the faculty can be exercised only by those who have been invested with it by the Prince of the Grand Sanhedrim; nor then, unless there be two witnesses present, for an installation cannot be performed by less than three.” So the strict Masonic rule requires the presence of three Past Masters in the complete installation of a Master and his investiture with the Past Master’s Degree.

The first Master of a new Lodge can be installed only by the Grand Master, or by a Past Master especially appointed by him and acting as his proxy.

INSTRUCTION. It is the duty of the Master of the Lodge to give the necessary instruction to the candidate on his initiation. In some of the advanced Degrees and in the Continental Rites these instructions are imparted by an officer called the Orator; but the office is unknown in the English and American systems of Ancient Craft Freemasonry.

INSTRUCTION, LODGE OF. See Lodge of Instruction.

INSTRUMENTAL FREEMASONRY. Brother Oliver by this term defines a species of Freemasonry which is engaged in the study of mechanical instruments. But there is no authority in any other writer for the use of the term, nor is its necessity or relevancy apparent.

INSTRUMENTS OF FREEMASONRY. Masonic working tools have been called Instruments of Freemasonry.

INTEGRITY. Integrity of purpose and conduct is symbolized by the Plumb, which see.

INTEMPERANCE. This is a vice which is wholly incompatible with the Masonic character, and the habitual indulgence in which subjects the offender to the penalty of expulsion from the Order (see Temperance).

INTENDANT OF THE BUILDING. The French expression is Indendant du Bâtiment: This Degree is sometimes called Master in Israel. It is the Eighth in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Red is the emblematic color; and its principal officers, according to the old rituals, are a Thrice Puissant, representing Solomon; a Senior Warden, representing the Illustrious Tito, one of the Harodim; and a Junior Warden, representing Adoniram the son of Abda. But in the later rituals of the two Supreme Councils of the United States the three chief officers represent Adoniram, Joaobert, and Stolkin; but in the working of the Degree the Past Officer assumes the character of Solomon. The legend of the Degree is, that it was instituted to supply the place of the chief architect of the Temple.

INTENTION. The obligations of Freemasonry are required to be taken with an honest determination to observe them; and hence the Freemason solemnly affirms that in assuming those responsibilities he does so without equivocation, secret evasion, or mental reservation.

INTERNAL PREPARATION. See Preparation of the Candidate.

INTERNAL QUALIFICATIONS. Those qualifications of a candidate which refer to a condition known only to himself, and which are not patent to the world, are called internal qualifications. They are: That he comes forward by his own free-will and accord, and unbiased by the solicitations of others; that he is not influenced by mercenary motives, and that he has a disposition to conform to the usages of the Order. The knowledge of these can only be obtained from his own statements, and hence they are included in the preliminary questions which are proposed before initiation.

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU OF MASONIC AFFAIRS. In German the title is Die Freimaurerische Weltgeschäftsstelle, and in French Le Bureau International de Relations Masoniques. This was organized by the authority of the Grand Lodge Alpina of Switzerland on January 1, 1903. The officer in charge was Brother Edouard Quartier-la-Tente, of Neuchâtel, where the headquarters were located. He died January 19, 1925. Born in New York in 1855, his father was a founder of La Sincerité Lodge there. Past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Alpina of Switzerland, a member of the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree, he had also been General Director of the National Bureau for Masonic Affairs. In 1925 he was General Representative of the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree and Director of Public Education, he had taken an active part in civic and Masonic life. For fifteen years he edited the Masonic Journal Alpina.

The program of the Bureau was announced as the following:

1. Facilitate fraternal intercourse between Masonic Powers.
2. Favor the development of Masonic ideas.
3. Collect all obtainable information about the organization and activity of Freemasonry everywhere.
4. Draw up a list of Grand Orient’s, Grand Lodges and Supreme Councils.
5. Catalogue the Masonic periodicals of all countries.
6. Collect the documents necessary for an abridged history of Freemasonry everywhere.
8. Publish the Bulletin frequently.
9. Publish in the Bulletin the important facts which mark the activity of Freemasonry.
10. Give series of practical and historical questions for discussion in the Lodges.
11. Develop the exchange of interesting works.
12. Spread the knowledge of useful newspapers, documents, and transactions.
13. Found a library of all Masonic works.
14. Study the Masonic Rites and Rituals.
15. Publish a correct Annual of Freemasonry every year.
16. Translate the most useful Masonic works into various languages.

To be admitted as members of the Bureau the regular Masonic Powers only had to send for the Act of Adhesion and sign it, at the same time contributing an optional annual subscription. This gave the right to receive all the publications of the Bureau, and to ask for any information that might be useful to them, without further charge.

But such uncertain donations were insufficient to meet the needs of so ambitious a program. Nevertheless the Bulletin appeared, even if irregularly, and was in English, French, and German, with occasional Esperanto, the international or auxiliary language, altogether a polyglot combination that with all these tongues must have proved most perplexing to the Writer. An Annual or Calendar edition was published and this cataloging of Masonic Bodies was praiseworthy though the desired information was difficult to get and therefore the returns were of uneven value as a showing of Freemasonry everywhere. Some pamphlets were produced, as an outline of Freemasonry in Eastern Europe. Yet up to his death Brother La-Tente was at his post, his last effort immediately at his seizure being to append his signature at the office to a message for the writer of these lines. He was succeeded in office by Brother Max Gottschalk of Brussels, Belgium (see the Masonic International Association).

INTERNATIONAL COMPACT. An agreement entered into by the Grand Lodges of Scotland and Ireland with the Grand Lodge of England in July, 1814. The object of the Compact was to place on record the fact that the United Grand Lodge of England, formed by a coalition of the Antients and Moderns, was in perfect accord with the other two parties to the agreement. Before the union of the two Grand Lodges of England that known as the Moderns had not been in agreement with Scotland and Ireland. Eight articles were specified in the International Compact pertaining to the Degrees of pure ancient Freemasonry, limits of jurisdiction, etc.

INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE OF FREEMONS. This was organized in Europe by Masonic officials but independently of Grand Lodges in the hope of securing a permanent peace among the nations, and to that end to promote mutual understanding, cultivate the sense of knowing one another, and strengthen the will for all to again join hands together. Meetings were held annually before the World War for several years and these assemblies were renewed in December, 1924, when Brethren from France, Germany, Holland, Luxembourg and Switzerland met to discuss the possibility of any practical plan of reconciliation. A Board or International Committee was appointed to consist of a representative of every nation active in this movement and National Committees in every separate country were contemplated. A second meeting was held at Basle, Switzerland, in August, 1925.

INTERNATIONAL MAGIAN SOCIETY. Organized in 1919 with headquarters at 813 Republic building, Louisville, Kentucky (see Light, March 1–15, 1919, published at Louisville), the main object announced as the practical application of Masonic principles (see also Magian Society).
INTIMATE INITIATE. The Latin name is Intimus Initiatum. The Fourth Degree of the Order of the Temple.

INTIMATE SECRETARY. The French title is Secretaire Intime. The Sixth Degree in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Its emblematic color is black, strewed with tears; and its collar and the lining of the apron are red. Its officers are only three: Solomon, King of Israel; Hiram, King of Tyre; and a Captain of the Guards. Its history records an instance of unlawful curiosity, the punishment of which was conceived by the previous fidelity of the offender. The legend in this Degree refers to the cities in Galilee which were presented by Solomon to Hiram, King of Tyre; and with whose character the latter was so displeased that he called them the Land of Cabul.

INVERSION OF LETTERS. In some of the French documents of the advanced Degrees the letters of some words were inverted—not apparently for concealment, but as a mere caprice. Hence Thory (Fondation, page 128) calls them Inversions Enfantines meaning childish inversions. Thus they wrote ὅμοιος ἡσσα for Rosae crucis. But in all French cahiers and rituals, or, as they call them, tuilleurs, words are inverted; that is, the letters are transposed for purposes of secrecy. Thus they would write Nomolos for Solomon, and Marih for Hiram. This was also a custom among the Cabalists and the Alchemists to conceal secret words.

INVESTIGATION OF CANDIDATES. Reference may well be made in this connection to what is said elsewhere in this work regarding Candidate. The subject is of the utmost importance to Freemasons and many Lodges supplement so far as this is deemed proper the work of the usual Investigating Committees. Such additional Committees often carry on an investigation of their own in an independent manner but this is not to say that more or less co-operation of the various Brethren is impracticable in a working combination if this is desired, in fact any and all other available Masonic means are justifiable of making successful inquiries about the qualifications of petitioners for the Degrees.

These supplementary or Advisory Committees, as they are sometimes called, are commonly permanent; that is they are not as in the case of the Investigating Committees specifically appointed to consider but one individual but may examine into all the cases, few or many, referred to them for study. Naturally this task is of such a character that the Advisory Committees frequently are wholly comprised of the older Brethren of the Lodge or they are principally selected from that experienced class of the membership. They may be past or present officers of the Lodge though the doubling or overlapping of responsible duties, active officers of the Lodge serving also on committees, is as a rule avoided in order that Brethren may not be overburdened with exacting labor and that the work may be the better divided among the various members.

FIG. 2. REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON APPLICANT FOR MEMBERSHIP
the requisite search into the worthiness of the applicant for membership.

The foregoing general statement would not be complete without specimens of the forms used by one of the Lodges employing this co-operative investigation of the Candidate. These are given herewith. First is the notice sent by the Secretary of the Lodge to the members of the Investigating Committee on their appointment by their Worshipful Master. Such a blank, eight and a half by four and a half inches over all, for the appointment of a member on an Investigating Committee is here reproduced in Figure 1 to illustrate the practise of Tyrian Lodge No. 307 at Cleveland, Ohio. Figure 2 is the blank, eleven by eight and a half inches over all, signed by an applicant at the close of a personal interview before the Advisory Committee, whose Chairman appends his signature to the report, favorable or unfavorable as it may be. The questions may be taken as fairly representative though there is no absolute uniformity of practise between the several Lodges known to us that have followed this plan of investigation. Figure 3 is a small blank, loose-leaf style, three by five and a half inches over all, as a convenient pocket memorandum record for the Lodge Secretary, a similar thing would be useful to the Worshipful Master, particularly in a large Lodge, for temporary reference while the Candidate progresses.

INVESTITURE. The presentation of an apron to a candidate in the ceremony of initiation.

INVINCIBLE. The Degree of Knights of the Christian Mark, formerly conferred in the United States, was called the Invincible Order, and the title of the presiding officer was Invincible Knight.

INVISIBLES, LES. French expression, meaning The Invisibles. A secret Order of which little is known. Thory (Acta Latomorum i, page 319) quotes a German writer, who says: “C'est la secte la plus dangereuse; les réceptions des initiés se font la nuit, sous une voûte souterraine, et la doctrine des initiés prêche l'athéisme et le suicide,” meaning, “This is a most dangerous organization; the candidates are initiated at night, within an underground vault, and the doctrine of the initiated extols atheism and suicide.” We need say no more upon this subject, and believe the society “sleeps the sleep that knows no waking.”

INWOOD, JETHRO. The Rev. Jethro Inwood was Curate of Saint Paul's at Deptford, in England. He was born about the year 1767, and initiated into Freemasonry in 1785 as a Lewis, according to Brother Oliver. He was soon after appointed Chaplain of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Kent, an office which he held for more than twenty years, during which time he delivered a great number of sermons on festival and other occasions. A volume of these sermons was published in 1799, with a portrait of the author, under the title of Sermons, in which are explained and enforced the religious, moral, and political virtues of Freemasonry, preached upon several occasions before the Provincial Grand Officers and other Brethren in the Counties of Kent and Essex. An edition of these sermons was published by Dr. George Oliver, in 1849, in the fourth volume of his Golden Remains. These sermons are written, to use the author's own expression, “in a language that is plain, homely, and searching”; but, in Masonic character, surpass the generality of sermons called Masonic, simply because they have been preached before the Craft. Doctor Oliver describes him as “an assiduous Mason, who permitted no opportunity to pass unimproved of storing his mind with useful knowledge, or of imparting instruction to those who needed it.”

IONIAN ISLANDS. A chain of islands along the western and southern shores of Greece. Freemasonry appears to have been founded at Corfu, by a Lodge, Loge de Saint Napoléon, under the Grand Orient of France, in 1809, with a second Lodge in 1810.

not much, our Sex has long ow'd yours this good

CARICATURE IN 1724 OF A PRETENDED EXPOSURE OF MASONIC RITUAL
A satire credited to Dean Swift whose name is on the roster of a London Lodge IONIC ORDER. One of the three Grecian Orders, and the one that takes the highest place in Masonic symbolism. Its distinguishing characteristic is the volute of its capital, and the shaft is cut into twenty flutes separated by fillets. It is more delicate and graceful than the Doric, and more simply majestic than the Corinthian. The judgment and skill displayed in its construction, as combining the strength of the former with the beauty of the latter, has caused it to be adopted in Freemasonry as the symbol of Wisdom, and being placed in the East of the Lodge it is referred to as represented by the Worshipful Master.

IOWA. On July 3, 1838, Congress passed a bill for the organization of the Territory of Iowa, and two years later the Brethren in the new State decided to form a Lodge. On November 12, 1840, a meeting was held at which were present Col. Hiram C. Bennett, Evan Evans, William Foye, David Hammer, Robert Martin, J. L. Lockwood, William Thompson, W. D. McCord, Thomas H. Curtis, Chauncey Swan, Theodore S. Parvin and Robert Lucas, Governor of the Territory. The petition for the new Lodge was drawn up and a Dispensation dated November 20, 1840, was received from the Deputy Grand Master of Missouri. Bennett, Thompson and Evans were named as Worshipful Master, Senior and Junior Wardens.

The Dispensation was granted to Burlington Lodge but after the Charter was issued the name was changed to Des Moines Lodge. The Grand Lodge of Iowa was formed by Des Moines Lodge, No. 1; Iowa Lodge, No. 2; Dubuque Lodge, No. 3, and Iowa City Lodge, No. 4, formerly Nos. 41, 42, 62, and 63 of Missouri. Brother Ansel Humphreys presided over the Convention held on January 2, 1844, and Brother John H. McKinney was Secretary. Brothers Oliver Cock and T. S. Parvin were elected Most Worshipful Grand Master and Grand Secretary.

The Deputy General Grand High Priest authorized by proxy the formation of Iowa Chapter at Burlington, by Dispensation dated August 24, 1843. A Charter was granted on September 11, 1844. A Convention of four Chapters, namely, Iowa Chapter, No. 1; Iowa City Chapter, No. 2; Dubuque Chapter, No. 3, and Washington Chapter, No. 4, met at Mount Pleasant on June 8, 1854, and established the Grand Chapter of Iowa. Some time later the Grand Chapter of Iowa opposed the authority of the General Grand Chapter by claiming the privilege of issuing Dispensations for the organization of Chapters wherever no other Grand Chapter was at work. On October 26, 1869, however, it annulled its act of secession passed nine years previously, and since 1871 has been represented in the General Grand Chapter.

When the General Grand Chapter gave up control over Council Degrees in 1855, Companion Theodore S. Parvin journeyed to Alton where, on February 9, 1865, he was empowered by Dispensation to organize Webb Council which was chartered by the Grand Council of Illinois, September 26, 1855. Webb Council, Excelsior Council and Dubuque Council held a Convention at Dubuque on January 2, 1857, and a Grand Council was organized. On October 15, 1857, the Grand Council adopted a plan of consolidation whereby the Degrees were to be conferred in a Royal Arch Chapter. On March 1, 1899, the Grand Council gave up this control of the Cryptic Degrees and therefore representatives from ten chartered Councils met at Des Moines, October 15, 1900, on the invitation of General Grand Master William H. Mayo, and organized a Grand Council.

The De Molay Commandery, No. 1, at Muscatine, was organized by Dispensation March 14, 1855, and chartered, September 10, 1856. Four Commanderies: De Molay, No. 1; Palestine, No. 2; Siloam, No. 3, and Des Moines, No. 4, took part in the organization of the Grand Commandery of Iowa on October 27, 1863, acting upon a Warrant issued by Sir B. B. French, Grand Master of the Grand Encampment.

The Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, Southern Jurisdiction, was first established in Iowa at Clinton. On May 12, 1869, a Lodge of Perfection, Iowa, No. 1, was opened; a Council of Kadosh, Hugh de Payens, No. 1, and a Chapter of Rose Croix, Delphie, No. 1, on July 21, 1870, and the De Molay Consistory, No. 1, on March 6, 1877.

IRELAND. The early history of Freemasonry in Ireland is involved in the deepest obscurity. It is vain to look in Anderson, in Preston, Smith, or any other English writer of the eighteenth century, for any account of the organization of Lodges in that kingdom anterior to the establishment of a Grand Lodge.

All the official records of the Grand Lodge of Ireland before the year 1760, and all the Minute Books prior to 1780, have been lost (see volume 6, page 52, History of the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Ireland, 1925, Brothers John Heron Lepper and Philip Crossle). Brother Wilhelm Begemann (Freimaurerei in Ireland, page 8) alludes to the remarkable circumstance that Old Constitutions have not been discovered or traced in Ireland although many copies were found in England and Scotland. The absence of such documents is singular.

Brothers Lepper and Crossle (History, page 36) refer to the year 1685 and to the existence of a Speculative Lodge at Trinity College, Dublin. Of this interesting institution, Brother W. J. Chetwode Crawley first submitted some particulars in the Preface to Brother Sadler's Masonic Reprints and Revelations. The following quotation is from the manuscript left by the author John Jones, a friend of the famous Dean Jonathan Swift:

It was lately ordered that for the honour and dignity of the University there should be introduced a society of freemasons, consisting of gentlemen, mechanics, porters (etc., etc.) who shall bind themselves by an oath never to reveal their mighty no-secret, and to relieve whatsoever strolling distressed brethren they meet with, after the example of the fraternity of freemasons in and about Trinity College, by whom a collection was lately made for, and the purse of charity well stuffed for, a reduced brother, who received their charity as follows.

Then come some academic jokes which in the course of centuries have lost the savour of their salt and finally the writer acknowledges he has offended his acquaintances ‘I have left myself no friends. . . . The Freemasons will banish me their Lodge, and bar me the happiness of kissing Long Lawrence’ (see The Differences between English and Irish Masonic Rituals, treated historically, by Brother J. Heron Lepper, 1920, Dublin).

Weighty as are the items collected by Brothers Lepper and Crossle none have greater romantic lure than those relating to the Lady Freemason, the Hon. Elizabeth Aldworth, about the only instance as the commentators suggest where the supposed initiation of a woman rests upon something more than mere tradition. Essays dealing with this curious ceremony are in Ars Quatuor Coronatorum, by Brothers Crawley and Conder, and there is also a pamphlet by Brother John Day of Cork, Ireland, Memoirs of the Lady Freemason, 1914. A significant point is that in a portrait of her a small trowel is worn suspended from the left shoulder. This emblem on her breast is still deemed in the United States the distinguishing Masonic jewel of the Craft and its prominence in the day of Mrs. Aldworth and more recently for a like purpose in Ireland is another tie between the Lodges of the two countries. For further information in this direction the reader may consult a paper, Irish Influence upon American Freemasonry, by Robert I. Clegg, read at a Belfast communication of the Lodge of Research, No. 202, Dublin.

Briefly as to the Lady Freemason, we may here say she was the only daughter of the first Viscount Doneraile. Born in 1693, married in 1713 to Richard Aldworth, she died in 1773, aged 80. The tradition first printed in 1811 is that as a young girl, before her marriage, she by accident witnessed the meeting of a Masonic Lodge, held at Doneraile House, where her father was Master, and on her discovery was initiated. She is credited with a life-long love of the Craft, her portrait shows her wearing a small trowel and a lambskin apron trimmed with blue silk—still preserved by her descendants, her name appears as a subscriber to Brother Fifield D’Aignay’s famous book, the Serious and Impartial Enquiry, 1744, and after her death the Freemasons in 1782 toasted the memory of “our Sister Aldworth of New-Market” (Ahiman Rezon, BeKast, 1782, page xx). The date of December 2, 1725, he found this item, “That of the Craft and its prominence in the day of Mrs. Aldworth and more recently for a like purpose in Ireland is another tie between the Lodges of the two countries. For further information in this direction the reader may consult a paper, Irish Influence upon American Freemasonry, by Robert I. Clegg, read at a Belfast communication of the Lodge of Research, No. 202, Dublin.

But Dr. W. J. Chetwode Crawley, former Grand Treasurer of Ireland and a brilliant student of the Craft has done much to lift the veil from the early Irish Freemasonry. A contemporary newspaper has been discovered, which gives an account of the installation of the Earl of Rosse as Grand Master of Ireland in June, 1725; and this account is so worded as to develop a complete organization of Grand Officers of the Grand Lodge of Ireland is plain more is heard of the Grand Lodge of Munster, and the further interesting item that Springett Penn was added to the above information by Brother Crawley.

Brother W. J. Chetwode Crawley (Caementaria Hibemica, Fasciculus ii) tells that in the year 1876 the Council-book of the Corporation of Cork was carefully transcribed and edited by Richard Caulfield, LL.D., Librarian of the Queen’s College at Cork, an antiquary of more than local repute, who brought to light two entries of Masonic importance. Under the date of December 2, 1725, he found this item, “That a Charter be granted for the Master Wardens and Society of Free Masons, according to their petition.” Two months later, on January 31, 1725-6, he described this entry: “The Charter of Freemasons being this day read in Council, it is ordered that further consideration of this Charter be referred to the next Council, and that Alderman Phillips, Mr. Croker, Pouls, Austin, and Mr. Com. Speaker, do inspect same.”

Brother Crawley found that beyond these two, no references are made, before or afterwards, to the Charter, or to Freemasons. He further states that the records of other Corporations in the South of Ireland have been published by the same diligent antiquary, but no similar entries have been found, “though we know the towns were thick-set with Freemasons.”

The Minute of the Grand Lodge of Ireland for December 27, 1726, with which the records of the Grand Lodge begin, is not the earliest entry, either in point of time or of position. The transactions of a subordinate Lodge, which evidently acted as a Mother Lodge for Cork, and internmixed, and systematically entered by the same hand, in many cases, on the same page as those of the Grand Lodge. An entry of this sort holds the first page, and shows us the subordinate Lodge in full working order. “With some little pride,” Brother Crawley continues, “we can point out that the first recorded transaction of Irish Freemasons is concerned with the relief of ‘a poor brother.’” He also points out that “The Minute of Grand Lodge plunges so boldly in medias res, that we cannot help harboring the suspicion that this was not its first meeting.” The wording of the item is as follows:

At an Assembly and Meeting of the Grand Lodge for the Province of Munster at the Lodge of Mr. Herbert Phaire in Corke on Saint John’s Daye being the 27th day of December ano Dni 1726. The Honble. James O’Brien Esqrs, by unanimous consent elected Grand Master for the ensuing year. Springett Penn Esqre. appointed by the Grand Master as his Deputy. Walter Goold Gent appointed Grand Wardens. Thomas Riggs Gent.

The Grand Master was the third son of William, Earl of Inchiquin, and represented Youghall in the Irish Parliament. The Deputy Grand Master, Springett Penn, or Penne, as he signed himself, was a great-grandson of Admiral Penn, the famous Commonwealth Admiral, and grandson of the still more famous Quaker. Born in 1703, he died in 1744. Brother W. Wonnacott, Grand Librarian of England added to the above information by Brother Crawley the further interesting item that Springett Penn was a Brother in 1723 of the Lodge at the Ship behind the Royal Exchange at London as recorded in the Grand Lodge Minute Book No. 1.

In 1731 Lord Kingston, who had been Grand Master of England in 1729, became Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Munster and also of the Grand Lodge of Ireland, in connection with what appears to have been a reorganization of the latter Body. No more is heard of the Grand Lodge of Munster, and from 1731 to the present date the succession of the Grand Officers of the Grand Lodge of Ireland is plain and distinct (Gould’s Concise History of Freemasonry, page 273). In the year 1730, The Constitutions of the IRELAND

Freemasons, containing the History, Charges, Regulations, etc., of that most Ancient and Right Worshipful Fraternity. For the use of the Lodges, was published at Dublin. A second edition was published in 1744, and a third, in 1751. In 1749, the Grand Master's Lodge was instituted, which still exists; a singular institution, possessing several unusual privileges, among which are that its members are members of the Grand Lodge without the payment of dues, that the Lodge takes precedence of all other Lodges, and that any candidates nominated by the Grand Master are to be initiated without ballot.

In 1772, the Grand Lodge of Ireland recognized the Grand Lodge of the Antients and entered into an alliance with it, which was also done in the same year by the Grand Lodge of Scotland. This does not appear to have given any offense to the regular Grand Lodge of England; for when that Body, in 1777, passed a vote of censure on the Lodges of Antient Freemasons, it specially excepted from the censure the Lodges of Ireland and Scotland.

In 1779, an application was made to the Mother Kilwinning Lodge of Scotland, by certain Brethren in Dublin, for a Charter empowering them to form a Lodge to be called the High Knights Templar, that they might confer the Templar Degree. The Kilwinning Lodge granted the petition for the three Craft Degrees only, but at a later period this Lodge became, says Findel, the source of the Grand Encampment of Ireland.

The Grand Lodge holds jurisdiction over all the Blue Lodges. The Mark Degree is worked under the Grand Royal Arch Chapter. Next comes the Royal Arch, which formerly consisted of these three Degrees, the Excellent, Super-Excellent, and Royal Arch—the first two being nothing more than passing the first two veils with each a separate obligation. But that system was abolished some years ago, and a new ritual framed something like the American, except that the King and not the High Priest is made the Presiding Officer. The next Degrees are the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth, which are under the jurisdiction of the Templar Grand Conclave, and are given to the candidate previous to his being created a Knight Templar. Next to the Templar Degree in the Irish system comes the Eighteenth or Rose Croix, which is under the jurisdiction of the Grand Chapter of Prince Masons or Council of Rites, composed of the first three officers of all the Rose Croix Chapters, the Supreme Council having some years ago surrendered its authority over the Degree. The Twenty-eighth Degree or Knight of the Sun is the next conferred, and then the Thirtieth or Kadosh in a Body over which the Supreme Council has no control except to grant Certificates to its members. The Supreme Council confers the Thirty-first, Thirty-second, and Thirty-third Degrees, there being no Grand Consistory.

The Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite for Ireland was established by a Patent from the Supreme Council of the United States, at Charleston, dated August 13, 1824, by which the Duke of Leinster, John Fowler, and Thomas McGill were constituted a Supreme Council for Ireland, and under that authority it continues to work. Whence the advanced Degrees came into Ireland is not clearly known. The Rose Croix and Kadosh Degrees existed in Ireland long before the establishment of the Supreme Council. In 1808 Doctor Dalcho's Orationes were published at Dublin, by "the Illustrious College of Knights of K. H., and the Original Chapter of Prince Masons of Ireland." It is probable that these Degrees were received from Bristol, England, where there are preserved the earliest English records of the Rose Croix.

IRELAND, Prince Masons of. See Prince Masons of Ireland.

IRISH CHAPITERS. These Chapters existed in Paris from the year 1730 to 1740, and were thence disseminated through France. They consisted of Degrees, such as Irish Master, Perfect Irish Master, and Sublime Irish Master, which, it is said, were invented by the adherents of the house of Stuart when they sought to make Freemasonry a political means of restoring the exiled family to the throne of England. The claim has been made but is disputed that Ramsay, when he assumed his theory of the establishment of Freemasonry in Scotland by the Templars, who had fled thither under d'Aumont, took possession of these Degrees (if he did not, as some suppose, invent them himself) and changed their name, in deference to his theory, from Irish to Scottish, calling, for instance, the Degree of Maitre Irlandais or Irish Master, the Maitre, Ecossais or Scottish Master.

IRISH COLLEGES. The Irish Chapters are also called by some writers Irish Colleges.

IRISH DEGREES. See Irish Chapters.

IRISH MASONIC GIRLS SCHOOL. A philanthropic and benevolent Masonic society for rendering assistance to the needy. In 1789 Chevalier Ruspini, State Dentist to George III, established a Royal Masonic Institution for Girls in England with thirty pupils. In 1790 several Irish Brethren met together and made themselves responsible for the school fees only—that is, they did not pay for the board or clothing—of the daughters of some deceased Brethren. From that inauspicious beginning has sprung the present Masonic Female Orphan School of Ireland. In 1792, a small house, affording accommodation for twenty girls, was taken where the pupils were boarded, clothed and educated until such time as they could earn their own living. In 1852, after several removals, Burlington House was opened. An appeal for funds was made to the Brethren and met with a steady response. Great interest was taken in the work by Augustus, third Duke of Leinster, who reigned as Grand Master of Ireland from 1813 to 1874. Such was the quality of the instruction given that the Education Committee was able to select its teachers from among the girls who had been educated in the school. The first annual grant of one hundred pounds by the Grand Lodge of Ireland was made in 1855, which has been continued ever since. Girls were admitted from six to ten years of age and retained until they reached the age of fifteen, unless they were then drafted on to the domestic staff. An extension of the building and equipment was made in 1860 and a further extension accomplished in 1870, when a public ball was held. Nine years later a more general enlargement became necessary and a more general appeal for funds was made.
In 1880 the foundation stone of the school at Ball’s Bridge, Dublin, was laid by James, first Duke of Abercorn, who was Grand Master of Ireland from 1875 to 1885. Practically the entire sum appropriated for this building was subscribed by the Brethren.

In 1853 twenty-one girls were residents of the school; in 1875 there were forty-five; in 1890, eighty; and in 1925 there were one hundred four, but, in addition, more than sixty others were receiving extra grants to assist in their maintenance and education and annual sums are expended for the purpose.

IRON TOOLS. The lectures teach us that at the building of King Solomon’s Temple there was not heard the sound of ax, hammer, or other metallic tool. But all the stones were hewn, squared, and numbered in the quarries; and the timbers felled and prepared in the forest of Lebanon, whence they were brought on floats by sea to Joppa, and thence carried by land to Jerusalem, where, on being put up, each part was found to fit with such exact nicety that the whole, when completed, seemed rather the handiwork of the Grand Architect of the Universe than of mere human hands. This can hardly be called a legend, because the same facts are substantially related in the First Book of Kings; but the circumstance has been appropriated in Freemasonry to symbolize the entire peace and harmony which should prevail among Freemasons when laboring on that spiritual temple of which the Solomonic Temple was the archetypal.

ISAAC AND ISHMAEL. The sons of Abraham by Sarah and Hagar. They are recognized, from the conditions of their mothers, as the free-born and the bondman. According to Brother Oliver, the fact that the inheritance which was bestowed upon Isaac, the son of his free-born wife, was refused to Ishmael, the son of a slave woman, gave rise to the Masonic theory that God designates the hewers who, with the Giblim, or stonecutters, and the Bonai, or builders, amounted to eighty thousand, all of whom he calls (in his second edition, page 11) “bright Fellow Crafts.” But he distinguishes them from the thirty thousand who cut wood on Mount Lebanon under Adoniram.

ISH CHOTZEB. צצוח שור. Literally meaning in Hebrew, men of hewing, that is, hewers. The phrase was originally used by Anderson in the first edition of the Constitutions (page 10), but is not found in the original Hebrew (First Kings v, 18) to which he refers, where it is said that Solomon had fourscore “hewers in the mountains,” Chotzeb Bohar. But Ish Chotzeb is properly constructed according to the Hebrew idiom, and is employed by Anderson to designate the hewers who, with the Giblim, or stonecutters, and the Bonai, or builders, amounted to eighty thousand, all of whom he calls (in his second edition, page 11) “bright Fellow Crafts.” But he distinguishes them from the thirty thousand who cut wood on Mount Lebanon under Adoniram.

ISH SABBAL. The Hebrew expression סבל שור, meaning, Men of burden. Anderson thus designates the 70,000 laborers who, in the original Hebrew (First Kings v, 18) are called Noshe Sabal, or bearers of burdens. Anderson says “they were of the remains of the old Canaanites, and, being bondmen, are not to be reckoned among Masons” (see Constitutions, 1738, page 11). But in Webb’s system they constitute the Apprentices at the building of the Temple.

ISH SODI. Corruptly, Ish Soudy. This expression is composed of the two Hebrew words, ו, Ish, and יד, Sod. The first of these words, Ish, means a man, and Sod signifies primarily a couch on which one reclines. Hence Ish Sodi would mean, first, a man of my couch, one who reclines with me on the same seat, an indication of great familiarity and confidence. Thence followed the secondary meaning given to Sod, of familiar intercourse, consultation, or intimacy. Job (xix, 19) applies it in this sense, when, using Matti, a word synonymous with Ish, he speaks of Mati Sodi in the passage which the common version has translated thus: “all my inward friends abhorred me,” but which the marginal interpretation has more correctly rendered, “all the men of my secret.” Ish Sodi, therefore, in this Degree, very clearly means a man of my intimate counsel, a man of my choice, one selected to share with me a secret task or labor. Such was the position of every Select Master to King Solomon, and in this view those are not wrong who have interpreted Ish Sodi as meaning a Select Master.

ISIAIC TABLE. Known also as the Tabula Isiaca, Mensa Isiaca, and Tabula Bembina. A monument often quoted by archeologists previous to the discovery and understanding of hieroglyphics. A flat rectangular bronze plate, inlaid with niello and silver, 56 by 36 inches in size. It consists of three compartments of figures of Egyptian deities and emblems; the central figure is Isis. It was sold by a soldier to a locksmith, bought by Cardinal Bembo in 1527, and is now in the Royal Museum in Turin.

ISIS. The sister and the wife of Osiris, and worshiped by the Egyptians as the great goddess of nature. Her mysteries constituted one of the Degrees of the ancient Egyptian initiation (see Egyptian Mysteries and Osiris).

ISIS-URANEA TEMPLE. This Body was formed in England of Hermetic students in 1887 to give instruction in the mediæval occult sciences. The Rituals were written in English from old Rosicrucian Manuscripts supplemented by independent literary researches. Several other Temples emerged from this one, namely: Osiris, Wester-super-Mare; and Horus, Bradford, in England; Amen Ra, Edinburgh, Scotland, and Ahatnoor, Paris, France. Following a resignation in 1897, the English Temples lapsed into abeyance.

ISRAEEL. In the Mohammedan faith, the name of the angel who, on the judgment morn, will sound the trumpet of resurrection.

ITALY. There is said to have been a Lodge in Italy at Naples as early as 1750 but there is no definite evidence to prove this statement. In 1767, however, according to the English “Constitutions,” Don Nicholas Manuzzi was appointed Provincial Grand Master for Italy.

A National Grand Lodge was founded by delegates from eight Lodges at a Convention held on February 27, 1764.

The year 1767 opened a period of hardship for the Craft in Italy. Ferdinand IV was hostile to the Brethren and though Queen Caroline, his wife, did all she could to aid them, the Lodges finally in 1785 gave up their activities. Many Lodges and Grand Bodies were formed only to be suppressed and the result was a great confusion.

The lectures teach us that at the building of King Solomon’s Temple there was not heard the sound of ax, hammer, or other metallic tool. But all the stones were hewn, squared, and numbered in the quarries; and the timbers felled and prepared in the forest of Lebanon, whence they were brought on floats by sea to Joppa, and thence carried by land to Jerusalem, where, on being put up, each part was found to fit with such exact nicety that the whole, when completed, seemed rather the handiwork of the Grand Architect of the Universe than of mere human hands. This can hardly be called a legend, because the same facts are substantially related in the First Book of Kings; but the circumstance has been appropriated in Freemasonry to symbolize the entire peace and harmony which should prevail among Freemasons when laboring on that spiritual temple of which the Solomonic Temple was the archetypal.
In 1867 there existed a Grand Orient at Florence, two Supreme Councils at Palermo and a Grand Council at Milan. Brother Garibaldi (see Garibaldi), who was Grand Master of a Supreme Council at Palermo, then called a meeting on June 21, 1867, of all the Lodges in Italy. The result was that several of the Grand Bodies united and then combined the functions of a Supreme Grand Council of the Thirty-third Degree, a Symbolic Grand Lodge, and a Supreme Council of the Rite of Memphis.

Brother Oliver Day Street, in his excellent report to the Grand Lodge of Alabama, 1922, quotes from a letter to the International Bureau for Masonic Affairs, Neuchatel, Switzerland, as follows:—"There are in Italy several Grand Lodges that are not recognized by any jurisdiction of other countries. There is a Grand Lodge in Florence, another at Naples; they are practising rites of a rather occultist and mixed character, borrowed of rituals fallen long ago into desuetude."

A Grand Lodge of the Italian Symbolic Rite and a Grand Orient of Italy have been organized separately distinct from each other and there is also independently at work a Supreme Council of Italy, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, founded in 1908. Under the dictatorship of Benito Mussohni, Premier of Italy, a leader of the Fascists, organized on November 12, 1920, at Naples, and succeeding in gaining Rome and controlling the Italian Government, the Freemasons have been persecuted, their property destroyed, and prominent Brethren exiled.

ITRATICS, ORDER OF. A society of adepts, engaged in the search for the Universal Medicine, an organization that is now extinct. Mentioned by Fustier. The name is from the Greek and means healers.

I.:V.:I.:O.:L.:—The initials of a Latin sentence Iveni Verbum in ore Leonis. Letters of significant words used in the Thirteenth Degree, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. They have reference to the recovery of the key of the Sacred Ark, which contains certain treasures. The Ark and its key having been lost in the forest during a battle which occurred when the Jews were journeying through the wilderness, the key was found in the mouth of a lion, who dropped it upon the ground on the approach of the Israelites. Much symbolic teaching is deduced from the historical myth.

IVORY KEY. The symbolic jewel of the Fourth Degree, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. On the wards of the key is the Hebrew letter zain or Z.

IZABUD. A corruption of Zabud, which see.

IZADS. The twenty-eight creations of the beneficent deity Ormudz, or Auramazda, in the Persian religious system.

IZRACHIAH. The Hebrew words י策יה, Latin orietur Dominus. A word connected with the Seventh Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

J. The tenth letter in the English alphabet. It is frequently and interchangeably used with I, and written in Hebrew as Yod, with the numerical value of 10, and having reference to the Supreme.

JAABOROU HAMMAAIM. The Hebrew words יבורי זمامא, aquae transibunt. A word of covered significance in the Fifteenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. It also has reference to the L. D. P. (see Liber).

JABESCHEH. The Hebrew word, יבש, Earth. Also written Jebesah (see I.:N.:R.:I.:).

JABULUM. A corrupted word used in two of the Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, the Thirteenth and Seventeenth. The true word and its meaning, however, are disclosed to the initiate.

JACHIN. יחי. Hence called by Dudley and some other writers, who reject the points, Ichin. It is the name of the right-hand pillar facing eastward, that is, on the south, that stood at the porch of King Solomon's Temple. It is derived from two Hebrew words, ייח, Jah, meaning God, and יחי, iachin, will establish. It signifies, therefore, God will establish, and is often called the Pillar of Establishment.

JACHINAI. A Gallic corruption of Shekinah, to be found only in the French notebooks or cahiers of the advanced Degrees.

JACHIN AND BOAZ. A publication known by this name was brought forth in 1762 and has been constantly reprinted to the present time, probably having had a larger public sale than any other book treating of the Masonic Fraternity. The name of the author is said to have been Goodall (see Goodall; also Expositions).

JACKSON, JOHN. Signing the name of Philanthropos, he wrote, An Answer to a certain Pamphlet lately published under the solemn title of "A Sermon, or Masonry the way to Hell," 1768. The pamphlet to which he refers is in the British Museum at London and has the title of Masonry the way to Hell; a Sermon wherein is clearly proved, both from Reason and Scripture, that all who profess the Mysteries are in a state of Damnation, published at London in 1768.

JACOBINS. A political sect that sprang up in the beginning of the French Revolution, and which have origin to the Jacobin clubs, so well known as having been the places where the leaders of the Revolution concocted their plans for the abolition of the monarchy and the aristocracy. Lieber says that it is a most surprising phenomenon that "so large a body of men could be found uniting rare energy with execrable vice, political madness, and outrageous cruelty, committed always in the name of virtue." Barruel, in his Histoire de Jacobinisme, and Robison, in his Proofs of a Conspiracy, both endeavor to prove that there was a coalition of the revolutionary conspirators with the Illuminati and the Freemasons.
which formed the Jacobin Clubs, those Bodies being, as they contend, only Masonic Lodges in disguise. The falsity of these charges will be evident to anyone who reads the history of French Freemasonry during the Revolution, and more especially during that part of the period known as the Reign of Terror, when the Jacobin Clubs were in most vigor. The Grand Orient, in 1788, declared that a politico-Masonic work, entitled Les Jesuites chasses de la Magonnerie et leur Poignard bris6 par les Maçons, meaning The Jesuits driven from Freemasonry and their weapon broken by the Freemasons, was the production of a perverse mind, prepared as a poison for the destruction of Freemasonry, and ordered it to be burned. During the Revolution, the Grand Orient suspended its labors, and the Lodges in France were dissolved; and in 1793, the Duke of Orleans, the head of the Jacobins, who was also, unfortunately, Grand Master of the French Freemasons, resigned the latter position, assigning as a reason that he did not believe that there should be any mystery nor any Secret Society in a Republic. It is evident that the Freemasons, as an Order, held themselves aloof from the political contests of that period.

JACOB’S LADDER. The introduction of Jacob’s ladder into the symbolism of Speculative Freemasonry is to be traced to the vision of Jacob, which is thus substantially recorded in the twenty-eighth chapter of the Book of Genesis: When Jacob, by the command of his father Isaac, was journeying toward Padanaram, while sleeping one night with the bare earth for his couch and a stone for his pillow, he beheld the vision of a ladder, whose foot rested on the earth and whose top reached to heaven. Angels were continually ascending and descending upon it, and promised him the blessing of a numerous and happy posterity. When Jacob awoke, he was filled with pious gratitude, and consecrated the spot as the house of God.

This ladder, so remarkable in the history of the Jewish people, finds its analogue in all the ancient initiations. Whether this is to be attributed simply to a coincidence—a theory which but few scholars would be willing to accept—or to the fact that these analogues were all derived from a common fountain of symbolism, or whether, as suggested by Brother Oliver, the origin of the symbol was lost among the ten Sephiroths, which, commencing from the bottom: Justice, Equity, Kindness, Good Faith, Labor, Patience, and Intelligence. The Masonic Ladder which is presented in the modern ritualism, does not seem to be perfect; but the arrangement of these steps, for which we are indebted to the ladder of seven steps. The names of some idea of this symbolic ladder may be obtained from the accompanying table.

In the Mysteries of Brahma we find the same reference to the ladder of seven steps. The names of these were not different, and there was the same allusion to the symbol of the universe. The seven steps were emblematical of the seven worlds which constituted the Indian universe. The lowest was the Earth; the second, the World of Pre-existence; the third, Heaven; the fourth, the Middle World, or intermediate region between the lower and upper worlds; the fifth, the World of Births, in which souls are again born; the sixth, the Mansion of the Blessed; and the seventh, or topmost round, the Sphere of Truth, and the abode of Brahma.

Doctor Oliver thinks that in the Scandinavian mysteries the tree Yggrasil was the representative of the mystical ladder. But although the ascent of the tree, like the ascent of the ladder, was a change from a lower to a higher sphere—from time to eternity, and from death to life—yet the unimaginative genius of the North seems to have shorn the symbolism of many of its more salient features.

Among the Cabalists, the ladder was represented by the ten Sephiroths, which, commencing from the bottom, were the Kingdom, Foundation, Splendor, Firmness, Beauty, Justice, Mercy, Intelligence, Wisdom, and the Crown, by which we arrive at the En Soph, or the Infinite.

In the advanced Freemasonry we find the Ladder of Kadosh, which consists of seven steps, thus commencing from the bottom: Justice, Equity, Kindness, Good Faith, Labor, Patience, and Intelligence. The arrangement of these steps, for which we are indebted to modern ritualism, does not seem to be perfect; but yet the idea of intellectual progress to perfection is carried out by making the topmost round represent Wisdom or Understanding.

The Masonic Ladder which is presented in the symbolism of the First Degree ought really to consist not of three but seven steps, which thus ascend: Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence, Justice, Faith, Hope, and Charity; but the earliest examples present it only with three, referring to the three theological virtues, whence it is called the theological ladder. It seems, therefore, to have been settled by general usage that the Masonic Ladder has but three steps.

As a symbol of progress, Jacob’s ladder was early recognized. Picus of Miranda, who wrote in the sixteenth century, in his oration, De Hominis Dignitate, says that Jacob’s ladder is a symbol of the progressive scale of intellectual communication between earth and heaven; and upon the ladder, as it were, step by step, man is permitted with the angels to ascend.
and descend until the mind finds blissful and complete repose in the bosom of divinity. The highest step he defines to be theology, or the study and contemplation of the Deity in His own abstract and exalted nature.

Other interpretations have, however, been given to it. The Jewish writers differ very much in their expositions of it. Thus, a writer of one of the Midrashes or Commentaries, finding that the Hebrew words for Ladder and Sinai have each the same numerical value, represented the sublime meditations of man. Maimonides supposed the ladder to symbolize nature in its operations; and, citing the authority of a Midrash which gives to it four steps, says that they represent the four elements; the two heavier, earth and water, descending by their specific gravity, and the two lighter, fire and air, ascending from the same cause. Abarbanel, assuming the Talmudic theory that Luz, where Jacob slept, was Mount Moriah, supposes that the ladder, resting on the spot which afterward became the holy of holies, was a prophetic symbol of the building of the Temple. And, lastly, Raphael interprets the ladder, and the ascent and the descent of the angels, as the prayers of man and the answering prayers of the angels, as the prayers of man and the answering prayers of the angels; and thus the ladder, the word of God, becomes the holy of holies, was a prophetic symbol of the building of the Temple. And, lastly, Raphael interprets the ladder, and the ascent and the descent of the angels, as the prayers of man and the answering prayers of the angels; and thus the ladder, the word of God, becomes the holy of holies, was a prophetic symbol of the building of the Temple.
truth. He carried his superstitious veneration for the Deity; and hence he attached great importance to initiation as the means of inculcating the mystical and symbolic character of the Masonic philosophy.

JAMES II AND III OF SCOTLAND. See Stuart Freemasonry.

JAMINIM OR IAMINIM. The Hebrew word, an’, Latin concedens. A sacred name connected with the Thirteenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

JAINA CROSS. Used by several Orders, and found in the abbeys of Great Britain and on the monuments of India. Its significations are many. This cross was adopted by the Jains, a heterodox sect of the Hindus, who dissent from Brahmanism and deny the Vedas, and whose adherents are found in every province of Upper Hindustan. They are wealthy and influential, and form an important division of the population of India. This symbol is also known as the Fylfot or Swoestco. It is a religious symbol mentioned by Weaver in his Funerar Monuments, by Dr. H. Schliemann as having been found in the presumed ruins of Troy, by De Rossi and others in the Catacombs of Christian Rome, and there termed the Cruc dissipulata, or concealed cross. It has been found on almost every enduring monument on the globe, of all ages, and in both hemispheres.

JAINAS. See Jaina Cross.

JAMAICA. Largest island in the British West Indies, forming part of the Greater Antilles. Freemasonry began in Jamaica in 1839 with the authorization by the "Modern" Grand Lodge of England of a Lodge at Kingston. The Athol Grand Lodge chartered its first Lodge here in 1763.

There was no Grand Lodge of Jamaica but the Grand Lodge of England and Scotland each established a Provincial Grand Lodge on the Island. The former controlled in 1924 thirteen Lodges and the latter five.

JAMBLICHUS. It is strange that the old Freemasons, when inventing their legend, which gave so prominent a place to Pythagoras as "an ancient friend and brother," should have entirely forgotten his biographer, Jamblichus, whose claims to their esteem and veneration are much greater than those of the Samian sage. Jamblichus was a Neoplatonic philosopher, who was born at Chalceis, in Calo, Syria, and flourished in the fourth century. He was a pupil of Porphyry, and was deeply versed in the philosophic systems of Plato and Pythagoras, and, like the latter, had studied the mystical theology of the Egyptians and Chaldeans whose divine origin and truth he attempts to vindicate. He maintained that man, through theurgic rites and ceremonies, might commune with the Deity; and hence he attached great importance to initiation as the means of inculcating truth. He carried his superstitious veneration for numbers and numerical formula to a far greater extent than did the school of Pythagoras; so that all the principles of his philosophy can be represented by numbers. Thus, he taught that one, or the monad; was the principle of all unity as well as diversity, the duad, or two, was the intellect; three, the soul; four, the principle of universal harmony; eight, the source of motion; nine, perfection; and ten, the result of all the emanations of the to en. It will thus be seen that Jamblichus, while adopting the general theory of numbers that distinguished the Pythagorean school, differed very materially in his explanations. He wrote many philosophical works on the basis of these principles, and was the author of a Life of Pythagoras, and a Treatise of the Mysteries. Of all the ancient philosophers, his system assimilates him most—if not in its details, at least in its spirit—to the mystical and symbolic character of the Masonic philosophy.

JAPANESE FAITH. See Kofiki; also Nihongi.

JAPHET. The Hebrew spelling is נַפְט. The eldest son of Noah. It is said that the first ark—the Ark of Safety, the archetype of the Tabernacle—was constructed by Shem, Ham, and Japhet under the superintendence of Noah. Hence these are significant words to the Royal Arch Mason.

JASHER, BOOK OF. The Hebrew is Sepher hanashar, The Book of the Upright. One of the lost books of the ancient Hebrews, which is quoted twice (Joshua x, 13; Second Samuel i, 18). A Hebrew minstrelsy, recording the warlike deeds of the national heroes, and singing the praises of eminent or celebrated men. An original is said to be in the library at Samarkand.

JASPER. The Hebrew is נָו. A precious stone of a dullish green color, which was the last of the twelve inserted in the High Priest's breast-plate, according to the authorized version; but the Vulgate translation more correctly makes it the third stone of the second row. It represented the Tribe of Zebulun.

JAVA. One of the larger islands of the Dutch East Indies in Asia, in that portion of the Malay Archipelago known as the Sunda Island. A Dutch Provincial, Grand Lodge, under the Grand Orient of the Netherlands, at Wiltevreden controlled in 1922 twenty Lodges of which fourteen were in Java itself, three in Sumatra and the rest at Kedivi, Makassar and Salatigo. or in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, or any other secret place.

This reference to the Valley of Jehoshaphat as the symbol of the Ground Floor of the Lodge was in the United States retained until a very recent period; and the expression alluding to it in the instructions of the Second Degree has only within a comparatively few years past been abandoned. Hutchinson referred to this symbolism, when he said that the Spiritual Lodge was placed in the Valley of Jehoshaphat to imply that the principles of Freemasonry are derived from the knowledge of God, and are established in the judgments of the Lord.

JEHOVASH. Jehovah is, of all the significant words in the English language, the most important. Reghellini very properly calls it "the basis of our dogma and of our mystic mysteries." In Hebrew it consists of four letters, ייה, and hence is called the Tetragrammaton, or Four-lettered Name; and because it was forbidden to a Jew, as it is to a Freemason, to pronounce it, it is also called the Ineffable or Unpronounceable Name. For its history we must refer to the sixth chapter of Exodus, verses 2, 3. When Moses returned discouraged from his first visit to Pharaoh, and complained to the Lord that the only result of his mission had been to incense the Egyptian King, and to excite him to the exaction of greater burdens from the oppressed Israelites, God encouraged the Patriarch by the promise of the great wonders which He would perform in behalf of His people, and confirmed the promise by imparting to him the sublime name by which He had not hitherto been known: "And God," says the sacred writer, "spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am Jehovah: and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob as El Shaddai, but by my name Jehovah was I not known unto them."

This Ineffable Name is derived from the substantive verb ייה, hayah, meaning to be; and combining, as it does, in its formation the present, past, and future significations of the verb, it is considered as designating God in His immutable and eternal existence. This idea is carried by the Rabbis to such an extent, that Menasseh Ben Israel says that its four letters may be so arranged by permutations as to form twelve words, every one of which is a modification of the verb to be, and hence it is called the Nomen substantiae vel essentiae, the name of his substance or existence.

The first thing that attracts our attention in the investigation of this name is the ancient regulation, still existing, by which it was made unlawful to pronounce it. This, perhaps, originally arose from a wish to conceal it from the surrounding heathen nations; so that they might not desecrate it by applying it to their idols. Whatever may have been the reason, the rule was imperative among the Jews. The Talmud, in one of its treatises, the Sanhedrim, which treats of the question, Who of the Israelites shall have future life and who shall not? says: "Even he who thinks the name of God with its true letters forfeits his future life." Abraham Ben David Halevi, when discussing the names of God, says: "But the name ייה we are not allowed to pronounce. In its original meaning it is conferred upon no other being, and therefore we abstain from giving any explanation of it." We learn from Jerome, Origen, and Eusebius that in their time the Jews wrote the name in their copies of the Bible in Samaritan instead of Hebrew letters, in order to veil it from the inspection of the profane. Capellus says that the rule that the holy name was not to be pronounced was derived from a tradition, based on a passage in Leviticus, xxiv, 16, which says that he who blasphemeth the name Jehovah shall be put to death; and he translates this passage, "whosoever shall pronounce the name Jehovah shall suffer death," because the word nokeb, here translated to blaspheme, means also to pronounce distinctly, to call by name. Another reason for the rule is to be found in a rabbinical misinterpretation of a passage in Exodus.

In the third chapter of that book, when Moses asks of God what is His name, He replies "I am that I am," and He said, "Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you," and He adds, "this is my name forever." Now, the Hebrew word ייה is ייה, Ehyeh. But as Mendelssohn has correctly observed, there is no essential difference between ייה, ייה, in the sixth chapter and ייה in the third, the former expressing the first person singular, and the latter the third person of the same verb, the future used in the present sense of the verb to be; and hence what was said of the name Ehyeh was applied by the Rabbis to the name Jehovah. But of Ehyeh God had said, "this is My name forever." Now the word forever is represented in the original by לול, l'olam; but the Rabbis, says Capellus, by the change of a single letter, made לול, forever, read as if it had been written l'olam, which means to be concealed, and hence the passage was translated "this is my name to be concealed," instead of "this is my name forever." And thus Josephus, in writing upon this subject, uses the following expressions: "Whereupon God declared to Moses His Holy name, which had never been discovered to men before; concerning which it is not lawful for me to say any more." In obedience to this law, whenever the word Jehovah occurs to a Jew in reading, he abstains from pronouncing it, and substitutes in its place the word ייה, Adonai. Thus, instead of saying "holiness to Jehovah," as it is in the original, he would say "holiness to Adonai." And this same reverential reticence has been preserved by our translators in the authorized version, who, wherever Jehovah occurs, have, with a few exceptions, translated it by the word Lord, the very passage just quoted, being rendered "Holiness to the Lord."

Maimonides tells us that the knowledge of this word was confined to the hachamim or wise men, who communicated its true pronunciation and the mysteries connected with it only on the Sabbath day, to such of their disciples as were found worthy; but how it was to be sounded, or with what vocal sounds its four letters were to be uttered, was utterly unknown to the people. Once a year, namely, on the Day of Atonement, the holy name was pronounced with the sound of its letters and with the utmost veneration by the High Priest in the Sanctuary. The last priest who pronounced it, says Rabbi Bechai, was Simeon the Just, and his successors used in blessing only the twelve-lettered name. After the destruction of the city and Temple by Vespasian, the pronunciation of it ceased, for it was not lawful to pronounce it anywhere except in the Temple at Jerusalem, and thus the true and genuine pronunciation of the name was entirely lost to the Jewish people. Nor is it now known how it was originally pronounced. The Greeks called it Jao; the Romans, Jova; the Samaritans always pronounced it Jahu.

The task is difficult to make one unacquainted with the peculiarities of the Hebrew language comprehend how the pronunciation of a word whose letters are preserved can be wholly lost. It may, however, be attempted. The Hebrew alphabet consists entirely of consonants. The vocal sounds were originally supplied by the reader while reading; he being previously made acquainted with the correct pronunciation of each word; and if he did not possess this knowledge, the letters before him could not supply it, and he was, of course, unable to pronounce the word. Every Hebrew, however, knew from practise the vocal sounds with which the consonants were pronounced in the different words, in the same manner as every English reader knows the different sounds of A in hat, hale, far, was, and that knt is pronounced knight. The words God save the Republic, written in the Hebrew method, would appear thus: Gd sv th Rpblc. Now, this incommunicable name of God consists of four letters, Yod, He, Vau, and He, equivalent in English to the combination J H V H. It is evident that these four letters cannot, in our language, be pronounced, unless at least two vowels be supplied. Neither can they in Hebrew. In other words, the vowels were known to the Jew, because he heard the words continually pronounced, just as we know that Mr. stands for Mister, because we continually hear this combination so pronounced. But the name of God, of which these four letters are symbols, was never pronounced, but another word, Adonai, substituted for it; and hence, as the letters themselves have no vocal power, the Jew, not knowing the implied vowels, was unable to supply them, and thus the pronunciation of the word was in time entirely lost.

Hence some of the most learned of the Jewish writers even doubt whether Jehovah is the true pronunciation, and say that the recovery of the name is one of the mysteries that will be revealed only at the coming of the Messiah. They attribute the loss to the fact that the Masoretic or vowel points belonging to another word were applied to the sacred name, whereby in time a confusion occurred in its vocalization.

In the Ineffable Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, there is a tradition that the pronunciation varied among the patriarchs in different ages. Methuselah, Lamech, and Noah pronounced it Jūka; Shem, Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Peleg pronounced it Jēw; Reu, Serug, Nahor, Terah, Abraham, Isaac, and Judah, called it Jōw; by Zeiram and Ram it was pronounced Jēw; by Aminadab and Nasshon, Jēvah; by Salmon, Boaz, and Obed, Jōbe; by Jesse and David, Jehovah. And they imply that none of these was the right pronunciation, which was only in the possession of Enoch, Jacob, and Moses, whose names are, therefore, not mentioned in this list. In all these words it must be noticed that the J is to be pronounced as Y, the a as in father, and the e as in fate. Thus, Je-ho-vah would be pronounced Yay-ho-vah.

The Jews of old believed that this holy name, which they held in the highest veneration, was possessed of unbounded power. "He who pronounces it," said they, "shakes heaven and earth, and inspires the very angels with astonishment and terror. There is a sovereign authority in this name: it governs the world by its power. The other names and surnames of the Deity are ranged about it like officers and soldiers about their sovereigns and generals: from this King-Name they receive their orders, and obey."

It was called the Shem hamphorash, the explanatory or declaratory name, because it alone, of all the Divine names, distinctly explains or declares what is the true essence of the Deity.

Among the Essenes, this sacred name, which was never uttered aloud, but always in a whisper, was one of the mysteries of their initiation, which candidates were bound by a solemn oath never to divulge.

It is reported to have been, under a modified form, a password in the Egyptian mysteries, and none, says Schiller, dare enter the temple of Serapis who did not bear on his breast or forehead the name, Jao or Je-ha-ho; a name almost equivalent in sound to that of Jehovah, and probably of identical import; and no name was uttered in Egypt with more reverence.

The Rabbis asserted that it was engraved on the rod of Moses, and enabled him to perform all his miracles. Indeed, the Talmud says that it was by the utterance of this awful name, and not by a club, that he slew the Egyptian; although it fails to tell us how he got at that time his knowledge of it.

That scurrilous book of the Jews of the Middle Ages, called the Toldoth Jeshu, attributes all the wonderful works of Jesus Christ to the potency of this incommunicable name, which He is said to have abstracted from the Temple, and worn about Him. But it would be tedious and unprofitable to relate all the superstitious myths that have been invented about this name.

And now as to the grammatical signification of this important word. Gesenius (Thesaurus ii, page 577), thinks—and many modern scholars agree with him—that the word is the future form of the Hiphil conjugation of the verb to be, pronounced Yāwah, and therefore that it denotes "He who made to exist, called into existence," that is, the Creator. The more generally accepted definition of the name is, that it expresses the eternal and unchangeable existence of God in respect to the past, the present, and the future. The word יהוה is derived from the substantive verb היה, meaning to be, and in its four letters combines those of the past, present and future of the verb. The letter י in the beginning, says Buxtorf (de Nomine v), is a characteristic of the future; the ה in the middle, of the participle or present time; and the ו at the end, of the past. Thus, from יוהא we get יוה, He was; יוה, He is; and יוהא, He will be. Hence, among other titles it received that of nomen essentiae, because it shows the essential nature of God's eternal existence. The other names of God define His power, wisdom, goodness, and other qualities; but this alone defines His existence.

It has been a controverted point whether this name was made known for the first time to Moses, or whether the patriarchs had been previously acquainted with it. The generally recognized opinion now is, and the records of Genesis and Exodus sustain it, that the name was known to the patriarchs, but not in its essential meaning, into which Moses was the first to be initiated. In the language of Aben Ezra, "Certainly the name was already known to the patriarchs, but only as an uncomprehended and unmeaning noun, not as a descriptive, appellative one, indicative of the attributes and qualities of the Deity." "It is manifest," says Kallisch (Commentary on Exodus), "that Moses, in being initiated into the holy and comprehensive name of the Deity, obtains a superiority over the patriarchs, who, although perhaps from the beginning more believing than the long-waving Moses, lived more in the sphere of innocent, childlike obedience than of manly, spiritual enlightenment." This, too, is the Masonic doctrine. In Freemasonry the Holy Name is the representative of the Word, which is itself the symbol of the nature of God. To know the Word is to know the true nature and essence of the Grand Architect.

When the pronunciation of the name was first interdicted to the people it is not with certainty known. Leusden says it was a rabbinical prohibition, and probably made at the second Temple. The statement of the Rabbi Bechai, already cited, that the word was pronounced for the last time by Simeon, before the spoliation by the Roman emperor Vespasian, would seem to indicate that it was known at the second Temple, although its utterance was forbidden, which would coincide with the Masonic tradition that it was discovered while the foundations of the second Temple were being laid. But the general opinion is, that the prohibition commenced in the time of Moses, the rabbinical writers tracing it to the law of Leviticus, already cited. This, too, is the theory of Freemasonry, which also preserves a tradition that the prohibition would have been removed at the first Temple, had not a well-known occurrence prevented it. But this is not to be viewed as a historic statement, but only as a medium of creating a symbol.

The Jews had four symbols by which they expressed this Ineffable Name of God: the first and most common was two יods, with a שewa and the point קמטツ underneath, thus, י' י' קמטツ; the second was three points in a radiated form like a diadem, thus, קמטツ י', to represent, in all probability, the sovereignty of God; the third was a יod within an equilateral triangle, which the Cabalists explained as a ray of light, whose luster was too transcendent to be contemplated by human eyes; and the fourth was the letter ז, which is the initial letter of שדדאא, meaning the Almighty, and was the symbol usually placed upon their phylacteries, the strips of parchment inscribed with passages of Scripture and enclosed in a case having thongs for binding it on the forehead or around the left arm. Buxtorf has a fifth method of three יods, with a קמטツ underneath י', enclosed in a circle.

In Freemasonry, the equilateral triangle, called the delta, with or without a יod in the center, the יod alone, and the letter G, are recognized as symbols of the sacred and Ineffable Name.

The history of the introduction of this word into the ritualism of Freemasonry would be highly interesting, were it not so obscure. Being in almost all respects an esoteric symbol, nearly all that we know of its Masonic relations is derived from tradition; and as to written records on the subject, we are compelled, in general, to depend on mere intimations or allusions, which are not always distinct in their meaning. In Freemasonry, as in the Hebrew mysteries, it was under the different appellations of the Word, the True Word, or the Lost Word, the symbol of the knowledge of Divine Truth, or the true nature of God.

That this name, in its mystical use, was not unknown to the medieval Freemasons there can be no doubt. Many of their architectural emblems show that they possessed this knowledge. Nor can there be any more doubt that through them it came to their successors, the Freemasons of the beginning of the eighteenth century. No one can read the Defence of Freemasonry, written in 1730, without being convinced that the author, probably Martin Clare, who see elsewhere in this work, was well acquainted with this name; although he is, of course, careful to make no very distinct reference to it, except in one instance. "The occasion," he says, "of the brethren searching so diligently for their Master was, it seems, to receive from him the secret Word of Masonry, which should be delivered down to their fraternity in after ages" (Constitutions, 1738, page 225).

It is now conceded, from indisputable evidence, that the holy name was, in the earlier years, and, up to the middle of the eighteenth century, attached to the Third Degree, and then called the Master's Word. On some early tracing boards of the Third Degree among the emblems displayed is a coffin, on which is inscribed, in capital letters, the word JEHOVAH. Hutchinson, who wrote in 1774, makes no reference whatever to the Royal Arch, although that system had, by that time, been partially established in England; but his lectures to Master Masons and on the Third Degree refers to "the mystic word, the Tetragrammaton" (see Lecture X, page 180). Brother Oliver tells us distinctly that it was the Master's word until Dunckerley took it out of the Degree and transferred it to the Royal Arch. That it was so on the Continent, we have the unmistakable testimony of Guillaume de Saint Victor, who says, in his Adonhàséite Masonry (page 90), that Solomon placed a medal on the tomb of Hiram, "on which was engraved Jehovah, the old Master's Word, which signifies the Supreme Being."
So far, then, these facts appear to be established: that this Ineffable Name was known to the Operative Freemasons of the Middle Ages; that it was derived from them by the Speculative Freemasons, who, in 1717, revived the Order in England; that they knew it as Master Masons; and that it continued to be the Master's Word until late in that century, when it was removed by Dunckerley into the Royal Arch.

Although there is, perhaps, no point in the esoteric system of Freemasonry more clearly established than that the Tetragrammaton is the true omnic word, yet innovations have been admitted, by which, in jurisdictions in the United States, that word has been changed into three others, which simply signify Divine names in other languages, but have none of the sublime symbolism that belongs to the true name of God. It is true that the General Grand Chapter of the United States adopted a regulation disapproving of the innovation of these explanatory words, and restoring the Tetragrammaton; but this declaration of what might almost be considered a truism in Freemasonry has been met with open opposition or reluctant obedience in some places.

The Grand Chapter of England has fallen into the same error, and abandoned the teachings of Dunckerley. The founder of the Royal Arch in that country, as some of the Grand Chapters in America did those of Webb, who was the founder of the system here. It is well, therefore, to inquire what was the Omnic Word when the Royal Arch system was first invented.

We have the authority of Brother Oliver, who had the best opportunity of any man in England of knowing the facts, for saying that Dunckerley established the Royal Arch for the modern Grand Lodge; that he wisely borrowed many things from Ramsay and Dermott; and that he boldly transplanted the word Jehovah from the Master's Degree and placed it in his new system. Brother Hawkins adds the following comment at this point to Brother Mackey's article: "But more recent authorities, such as Brother R. F. Gould, History of Freemasonry and Brother H. Sadler, Life of Dunckerley, have cast great doubt on these statements (see Dunckerley)."

Now, what was The Word of the Royal Arch, as understood by Dunckerley? We have no difficulty here, for he himself answers the question. To the first edition of the Laws and Regulations of the Royal Arch, published in 1732, there is prefixed an essay on Freemasonry, which is attributed to Dunckerley. In this he makes the following remarks:

It must be observed that the expression The Word is not to be understood as a watchword only, after the manner of those annexed to the several Degrees of the Craft; but also theologically, as a term, thereby to convey to the mind some idea of that Grand Being Who is the sole author of our existence; and to carry along with it the sublime symbolism that belongs to the true name of God. It is true that the General Grand Chapter of the United States adopted a regulation disapproving of the innovation of these explanatory words, and restoring the Tetragrammaton; but this declaration of what might almost be considered a truism in Freemasonry has been met with open opposition or reluctant obedience in some places.

The Grand Chapter of England has fallen into the same error, and abandoned the teachings of Dunckerley. Now, what was The Word of the Royal Arch, as understood by Dunckerley? We have no difficulty here, for he himself answers the question. To the first edition of the Laws and Regulations of the Royal Arch, published in 1732, there is prefixed an essay on Freemasonry, which is attributed to Dunckerley. In this he makes the following remarks:

It must be observed that the expression The Word is not to be understood as a watchword only, after the manner of those annexed to the several Degrees of the Craft; but also theologically, as a term, thereby to convey to the mind some idea of that Grand Being Who is the sole author of our existence; and to carry along with it the most solemn veneration of His sacred Name and Word, as well as the most clear and perfect elucidation of His power and attributes that the human mind is capable of receiving. And this is the light in which the Name and Word hath always been considered, from the remotest ages, amongst us Christians and the Jews.

And then, after giving the well-known history from Josephus of the word, which, to remove all doubt of what it is, he says is the Shem Hamphorash, or the Unutterable Name, he adds: "Philo, the learned Jew, tells us not only that the Word was lost, but to make an end of these unprofitable disputes among the learned, be it remembered that they all concur with the Royal Arch Masons in others much more essential: first, that the Name or Word is expressive of Self-Existence and Eternity; and, secondly, that it can be applicable only to that Great Being who was and is and will be. Notwithstanding this explicit and unmistakable declaration of the founder of the English Royal Arch, that the Tetragrammaton is the Omnic Word, the present system in England has rejected it, and substituted in its place three other words, the second of which is wholly unmeaning.

In the American system, as revised by Thomas Smith Webb, there can be no doubt that the Tetragrammaton was recognized as the Omnic Word. In the Freemasons Monitor, prepared by him for monitorial instruction, he has inserted, among the passages of Scripture to be read during an Exaltation, the following from Exodus, which is the last in order, and which anyone at all acquainted with the ritual will at once see is appropriated to the time of the Euresis or Discovery of the Word.

And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am the Lord, and I appeared unto Abraham, and unto Isaac, and unto Jacob by the name of God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them.

From this it will be evident that Webb recognized the word Jehovah, and not the three other words that have since been substituted for them by some Grand Chapters in America, and which it is probable were originally used by Webb as merely explanatory or declaratory of the Divine nature of the other and principal word. And this is in accordance with one of the traditions of the Degree, that they were placed on the Substitute Ark around the real word, as a key to explain its signification. To call anything else but this four-lettered name an Omnic Word—an all-creating and all-performing word—either in Freemasonry or in Hebrew symbolism, whence Freemasonry derived it, is to oppose all the doctrines of the Talmudists, the Cabalists, and the Gnostics, and to repudiate the teachings of every Hebrew scholar from Buxtorf to Gesenius. To fight the battle against such odds is to secure defeat. It shows more of boldness than of discretion. And hence the General Grand Chapter of the United States has very wisely restored the word Jehovah to its proper place. It is only in the York and in the American Rites that this error has ever existed. In every other Rite the Tetragrammaton is recognized as the True Word.

JEKSON

This word is found in the French handbooks of the advanced Degrees. It is undoubtedly a corruption of Jacquesson, and this a mongrel word compounded of the French Jacques and the English son, and means the son of James, that is, James II. It refers to Charles Edward the Pretender, who was the son of that abdicated and exiled monarch. It is a significant relic of the system attempted to be introduced by the adherents of the house of Stuart, and by which they expected to enlist Freemasonry as an instrument to effect the restoration of the Pretender to the throne of England. For this purpose they had altered the legend of the Third Degree, making it applicable to James II, who, being the son of Henrietta Maria, the widow of Charles I, was designated as the Widow's Son.
JENA, CONGRESS OF. Jena is a city of Saxe-Weimar, in Thuringia. A Masonic Congress was convoked there in 1763, by the Lodge of Strict Observance, under the presidency of Johnson, a Masonic charlatan or fraud, whose real name was Becker. In this Congress the doctrine was announced that the Freemasons were the successors of the Knights Templar, a dogma peculiarly characteristic of the Rite of Strict Observance. In the year 1764, a second Congress was convoked by Johnson or Leucht with the desire of authoritatively establishing his doctrine of the connection between Templarism and Freemasonry. The empirical character of Johnson was here discovered by the Baron Hund, and he was denounced, and subsequently punished at Magdeburg by the public authorities.

JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER. The First Degree in the American Order of the Eastern Star, or Adoptive Rite. It inculcates obedience. Color, blue (see Eastern Star, Order of the).

JERMYN, HENRY. Anderson says in the Constitutions (1738, page 101) that Henry Jermyn, Earl of St. Albans, was Grand Master and held a General Assembly on the 27th of December, 1663, at which six Regulations, which he quotes, were made. Roberts, in his edition of the Old Constitutions printed in 1722, the earliest printed Masonic book that we have, refers also to this General Assembly; the date of which he, however, makes the 8th of December. Roberts gives what he calls the Additional Orders and Constitutions. The Harleian Manuscript, in the British Museum, numbered 1942, which Brother Hughan supposes to have the date of 1670, and which he has published in his Old Charges of the British Freemasons (page 52, edition of 1872), contains also six new articles. The articles in Roberts's and the Harleian Manuscript are identical, but the wording is slightly altered by Anderson after his usual fashion. Of these new articles, one of the most important is that which prescribes that the society of Freemasons shall thereafter be governed by a Master and Wardens. Brother Hughan thinks that there is no evidence of the statement that a General Assembly was held in 1663. But it would seem that the concurring testimony of Roberts in 1722 and of Anderson in 1738, with the significant fact that the charges are found in a manuscript written seven years after, give some plausibility to the statement that a General Assembly was held at that time.

JERROLD, J. J. Wrote a song, Grey Head, sung by Brother Colyer in aid of the Home for Aged and Decayed Freemasons at London, 1838.

JERUSALEM. The capital of Judea, and memorable in Masonic history as the place where was erected the Temple of Solomon. It is early mentioned in Scripture, and is supposed to be the Saulen of which Melechizedek was King. At the time that the Israelites entered the Promised Land, the city was in possession of the Jebusites, from whom, after the death of Joshua, it was conquered, and afterward inhabited by the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. The Jebusites were not, however, driven out; and we learn that David purchased Mount Moriah from Ornan or Araunah the Jebusite as a site for the Temple. It is only in reference to this Temple that Jerusalem is connected with the legends of Ancient Craft Freemasonry. In the Degrees of Chivalry it is also important, because it was the city where the holy places were situated, and for the possession of which the Crusaders so long and so bravely contended. It was there, too, that the Templars and the Hospitalers were established as Orders of religious and military knighthood. Modern Speculative Freemasonry was introduced into Jerusalem by the establishment of a Lodge in 1872, the Warrant for which, on the application of Brother Rob Morris and others, was granted by the Grand Lodge of Canada. More recently a Lodge has been warranted in England to meet at Chester, but to be in due course removed to Jerusalem, named King Solomon's Temple, No. 3464. A Lodge was consecrated by English authority in Jerusalem in 1924. The Grand Orient of France has also established a Lodge there.

JERUSALEM, KNIGHT OF. See Knight of Jerusalem.

JERUSALEM, NEW. The symbolic name of the Christian Church (Revelations xxi, 2-21; iii, 12). The Apostle John (Revelations xxi), from the summit of a high mountain, beheld, in a pictorial symbol or scenic representation, a city resplendent with celestial brightness, which seemed to descend from the heavens to the earth. It was stated to be a square of about 400 miles, or 12,000 stadia, equal to about 16,000 miles in circumference—of course, a mystical number, denoting that the city was capable of holding almost countless myriads of inhabitants. The New Jerusalem was beheld, like Jacob's ladder, extending from earth to heaven. It plays an important part in the ceremony of the Nineteenth Degree, or Grand Pontiff of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, where the descent of the New Jerusalem is a symbol of the descent of the Empire of Light and Truth upon the earth.

JERUSALEM, PRINCE OF. See Prince of Jerusalem.

JERUSALEM WORD. In the Grand Mystery of the Freemasons Discovered of 1724 occurs the following demand and answer:

Give me the Jerusalem Word.

Giblin.

The origin of this phrase may perhaps be thus traced: The theory that after the completion of the Temple a portion of the workmen traveled abroad to seek employment, while another portion remained at Jerusalem, was well known to the Fraternity at the beginning of the eighteenth century. It is amply detailed in that old manuscript known as the York Manuscript, which is now lost, but was translated by Krause, and inserted in his Kunsturkunden. It may be supposed that this Jerusalem Word was the word which the Freemasons used at Jerusalem, while the Universal Word, which is given in the next question and answer, was the word common to the Craft everywhere. The Jerusalem Word, as such, is no longer in use, but the Universal Word is still connected with the First Degree.
Freemasonry. For once he is right. Like oil and water of the Roman Catholic religion. Almost a library of its efforts to regain the English throne, because they have been written on both sides of this subject in something to do with the invention of those Degrees, probably more properly Yeshua, meaning “Jehovah is salvation” or “He will save.” These latter Hebrew words are shortened forms of Jehoshua, pronounced as yeh-ho-shoo-ah, “Jehovah saves.” Christos, the Greek word for the anointed or consecrated is equivalent to Messiah and Messias from the Hebrew word Meshach, meaning to anoint with oil. The word Christos suggested in sound the somewhat similar term Chrestos, signifying benign qualities as in First Epistle of Peter (ii, 3), “If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is (chrestos) gracious.” This expression was applied by their enemies to Christians as being followers of Chrestos. An early Latin writer on the Church, Tertullian, 193 to 217 A.D., pointed out that this word given ignorantly in enmity was actually expressive of benevolence.

Jesus Christ, whose life and teachings form the foundation and structure of Christianity, was born at Bethlehem, about five miles south of Jerusalem, the chief city of Palestine. His birth chronologically is now generally assigned to a few years prior to the beginning of the modern era, or about 4-5 B.C., later estimates placing the time of the event differently to what was formerly accepted.

From the Bible we learn that Jesus was the son of Mary, a virgin of Nazareth, in the ancient province of Galilee. She was betrothed to Joseph, a carpenter, and during a visit made by them to Bethlehem for enrollment, Jesus was born in a stable and cradled in a manger because of the over-crowded condition of the local inn. Here came shepherds and the Magi, wise men from the East, and their publicly proclaimed reverence for the babe as the King of the Jews endangered the family with the reigning monarch and they fled to Egypt after the circumcision of the child. King Herod died and Joseph and Mary with Jesus returned to the home at Nazareth. From the record of the Scriptures we note that the boy listened to instruction at the Temple and that he “advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men.” That the trade of Joseph was adopted in due course is suggested by the visit to Nazareth during the public ministry of Jesus when the gossiping spectators said “Is not this the carpenter’s son?”

From the year 4 B.C. to 30 A.D. is estimated in the Stevens-Burton Harmony of the Gospels (Charles Scribner’s Sons, New York, 1912) as the period from birth to crucifixion with the actual ministry between three and four years. However, the length of ministry has also had other estimates based on the probable number of passovers in that period and accordingly as these were three or four the results figure out respectively as two and a half or three and a half years of public life. Baptized by John, as Luke tells us (iii, 23), “And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age.” Then followed forty days in the wilderness and later the public preaching to the people with the private instruction of the disciples, urging repentance and faith upon all. In public as well as religious affairs the new teaching was not acceptable to the officials, civil and ecclesiastic. The leaders, the priests and the Roman Governor, prepared to put Jesus on trial. Betrayed by Judas, taken before the high priest for examination and then to the Roman Governor, condemnation was speedy and crucifixion promptly followed. Resurrection after burial with appearances to the disciples and the ascension to heaven are told by the biblical narrative.

JESSE. A large candlestick, of metal, with many sconces, hanging from the ceiling, and symbolically referring to the Branch of Jesse. JESTERS. Usually so called, but more formally named the Royal Order of Jesters, an organization evolved out of the good fellowship of members of the Mystic Shrine during a voyage to Honolulu, February 15 to March 7, 1911. An offhand ceremony grew into a ritual, and to local Courts and a National Body, very much of its success due to the initiative of William S. Brown, many years the Treasurer of the Mystic Shrine; Lou B. Winsor, Past Imperial Potentate and Grand Secretary of Michigan, and others of their genial kind who organized and led the Body whose local units were limited to thirteen initiates yearly. Initiation, by invitation, and unanimous ballot, limited to members in good standing of the Mystic Shrine. The slogan, “Mirth is King,” expounded by Jester Brown, and the poem by Edmund Rowland Sill, “The Fool’s Prayer,” recited by Jester Winsor, have furnished inspiration. Officers, thirteen, bear the titles: Director, Tragedian, Property Man, Impresario, Treasurer, Soubrette, Light Comedian, Serio Comic, Heavy Man, Leading Lady, Judge, High Constable, Stage Manager; the national officers’ titles are the same but preceded by the word Royal.

JESUITS. In the eighteenth century the Jesuits were charged with having an intimate connection with Freemasonry, and the invention of the Degree of Kadosh was even attributed to those members of the Society who constituted the College of Clermont. This theory of a Jesuitical Freemasonry seems to have originated with the Illuminati, who were probably governed in its promulgation by a desire to depreciate the character of all other Masonic systems in comparison with their own, where no such priestly interference was permitted. Barruel soofs at the idea of such a connection, and calls it (Histoire de Jacobinisme iv, page 287) “la fable de la Françoise Magonnerie Ésotérique” meaning an invention of false or Jesuitical origin. A large candlestick, of metal, with many sconces, hanging from the ceiling, and symbolically referring to the Branch of Jesse. JESUS CHRIST. Jesus in Latin comes from the Hebrew Joshua or Jeshua or perhaps more properly Yeshua, meaning “Jehovah is salvation” or “He will save.” These latter Hebrew words are shortened forms of Jehoshua, pronounced as yeh-ho-shoo-ah, “Jehovah saves.” Christos, the Greek word for the anointed or consecrated is equivalent to Messiah and Messias from the Hebrew word Meshach, meaning to anoint with oil. The word Christos suggested in sound the somewhat similar term Chrestos, signifying benign qualities as in First Epistle of Peter (ii, 3), “If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is (chrestos) gracious.” This expression was applied by their enemies to Christians as being followers of Chrestos. An early Latin writer on the Church, Tertullian, 193 to 217 A.D., pointed out that this word given ignorantly in enmity was actually expressive of benevolence.

Jesus Christ, whose life and teachings form the foundation and structure of Christianity, was born at Bethlehem, about five miles south of Jerusalem, the chief city of Palestine. His birth chronologically is now generally assigned to a few years prior to the beginning of the modern era, or about 4-5 B.C., later estimates placing the time of the event differently to what was formerly accepted.

From the Bible we learn that Jesus was the son of Mary, a virgin of Nazareth, in the ancient province of Galilee. She was betrothed to Joseph, a carpenter, and during a visit made by them to Bethlehem for enrollment, Jesus was born in a stable and cradled in a manger because of the over-crowded condition of the local inn. Here came shepherds and the Magi, wise men from the East, and their publicly proclaimed reverence for the babe as the King of the Jews endangered the family with the reigning monarch and they fled to Egypt after the circumcision of the child. King Herod died and Joseph and Mary with Jesus returned to the home at Nazareth. From the record of the Scriptures we note that the boy listened to instruction at the Temple and that he “advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men.” That the trade of Joseph was adopted in due course is suggested by the visit to Nazareth during the public ministry of Jesus when the gossiping spectators said “Is not this the carpenter’s son?”

A popular Life of Christ, written by Dean F. W. Farrar, London, 1874, many following editions, is admirable for study, and there are excellent discussions upon allied topics in James Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, 1914), and in similar works. Ernest Renan's Life of Jesus, an English translation from the twenty-third edition (Little, Brown and Company, Boston, 1917), less orthodox than the work of Farrar, is scholarly and independent, while H. G. Emdow's Jewish View of Jesus, Macmillan, New York, 1920, presents a viewpoint of decided interest and importance.

The existence of the Essenes, a Jewish brotherhood of the time of Christ, not mentioned in the Bible but recorded by other authorities and having suggestive resemblance to features of Christianity, in fact the latter has been described as a popularized Essenism, brings up the oft-debated question of Jesus being an Essene. Brother Dudley Wright's book Was Jesus an Essene (Power-Book Company, London, 1908) submits concisely considerable information though many authors reject claims made for the membership of Jesus in the organization which came to an end in the second century. Essenes were tillers of the soil, esteemed ceremonial purity—bathing and white garments were featured, special food was prepared by priests and eaten solemnly together, marriage was forbidden and every sensual enjoyment deemed sinful, all property was held in common, and three years' preparation or probation was necessary before full initiation into this monastic order (see Essenes).

JETZIRAH, BOOK OF. See Jezirah.

JEWEL, MEMBER'S. In many Lodges, especially among the Germans, where it is called Mitglieder Zeichen, a jewel is provided for every member and presented to him on his initiation or affiliation. It is to be worn from the buttonhole, and generally contains the name of the Lodge and some Masonic device.

JEWEL OF AN ANCIENT GRAND MASTER. A Masonic tradition informs us that the jewel of an ancient Grand Master at the Temple was the square and compass with the letter G between. This was the jewel worn by Hiram Abif on the day which deprived the Craft of his invaluable services, and which was subsequently found upon him.

JEWELS, IMMOVABLE. See Jewels of a Lodge.

JEWELS, MOVABLE. See Jewels of a Lodge.

JEWELS OF A LODGE. Every Lodge is furnished with six jewels, three of which are movable and three immovable. They are termed jewels, says Brother Oliver, because they have a moral tendency which renders them jewels of inestimable value. The movable jewels, so called because they are not confined to any particular part of the Lodge, are the Rough Ashlar, the Perfect Ashlar, and the Trestle-Board. The Immovable Jewels are the Square, the Level, and the Plumb. They are termed Immovable, because they are appropriated to particular parts of the Lodge, where alone they should be found, namely, the Square to the East, the Level to the West, and the Plumb to the South. In the English system the division is the reverse of this. There, the Square, Level, and Plumb are called Movables, because they pass from the three officers who wear them to their successors.

JEWELS, OFFICIAL. Jewels are the emblems worn by Masonic officers as distinctive badges.

In Masonic Facts and Fictions (page 12), Brother Sadler is of the opinion that in the early days no jewels were worn, even by the Grand Master himself. He points to the portrait of Antony Sayer, the Grand Master, 1717, who is represented wearing a plain leather apron, but no jewel of any kind. The same may be said of Montgomery, the Grand Guarder. Brother Sadler also quotes a most important Minute of the Grand Lodge as follows: 24th June, 1727.

Resolved Nem. Con. that in all private Lodges and Quarterly Communications and general meetings Ma(s)te(r) and Wardens do wear the Jewells of Masonry hanging to a white ribbon (viz.) that the Ma(s)te(r) wear the Square, the Senr. Warden the Levell, the Junr. Warden the Plumb Rule.

Brother W. Harry Rylands says this points to the idea of wearing jewels instead of using them.

For the purpose of reference, the jewels worn in Symbolic Lodges, in Chapters, Councils, and Commanderies are here appended.

1. Symbolic Lodges.

- W.: Master, a square.
- Senior Warden, a level.
- Junior Warden, a plumb.
- Treasurer, crossed keys.
- Secretary, crossed pens.
- Senior Deacon, square and compass, sun in the center.
- Junior Deacon, square and compass, moon in the center.
- Steward, a cornucopia.
- Tiler, crossed swords.

The jewels are of silver in a subordinate Lodge, and of gold in a Grand Lodge. In English Lodges, the jewel of the Deacon is a dove and olive branch.

2. Royal Arch Chapters.

- High Priest, a mitre, a level surmounted by a crown.
- King, a plum-rule surmounted by a turban.
- Scribe, a triangular plate inscribed with a soldier.
- Captain of the Host, a triangular plate inscribed with a pilgrim.
- Principal Sojourner, a sword.
- Royal Arch Captain, a sword.
- Grand Master of the Veils, a trowel and level.

The other officers as in a Symbolic Lodge. All the jewels are of gold, and suspended within an equilateral triangle.

3. Royal and Select Councils.

- T. I. Grand Master, a trowel and square.
- I. Hiram of Tyre, a trowel and level.
- Principal Conductor of the Works, a trowel and plumb.
- Treasurer, a trowel and crossed keys.
- Recorder, a trowel and crossed pens.
- Captain of the Guards, a trowel and sword.
- Steward, a trowel and crossed swords.
- Marshal, a trowel and baton.

If a Conductor of the Council is used, he wears a trowel and baton, and then a scroll is added to the Marshal’s baton to distinguish the two officers. All the jewels are of silver, and are enclosed within an equilateral triangle.

4. Commanderies of Knights Templar.

- Em’t Commander, a cross surmounted by rays of light.
- Generalissimo, a square surmounted by a paschal lamb.
- Captain-General, a level surmounted by a rooster.
- Prelate, a triple triangle.
Creation. A Cabalistic work, which is claimed by the chief who slew the sons of Ali, the father-in-law of their hymns were addressed, without distinction, to Persia, which took its name from the founder, Jezeed, the interdict, and Judaism is there no longer a disqualification for initiation. But, unfortunately, these principles have not always been regarded, and from an early period the German Lodges, and especially the Prussian, were reluctant to accord admission to Jews. This action has given great excitement in favor of the rites of Judaism centered upon and pervaded the people of various nations during the early portion of the fourteenth century. The ceremonies grew and took fast hold upon the minds of the Romans, and, combining with their forms, spread to Constantinople and northwest to Germany and France. The Jewish rites, traditions, and legends thus entered the mystic schools. It was during this period that the legend of Hiram first became known, according to Brother George H. Fort, and Jehovah's name, the wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, their wives and children, were admitted. It had no connection with Freemasonry.

JEWELS, PRECIOUS. In the lectures of the Second and Third Degrees, allusion is made to certain moral qualities, which, as they are intended to elucidate and impress the most important moral principles of the Degree, are for their great value called the Precious Jewels of a Fellow Craft and the Precious Jewels of a Master Mason. There are three in each Degree, and they are referred to by the Alarm. Their explanation is esoteric.

JEWISH RITES AND CEREMONIES. A period of excitement in favor of the rites of Judaism centered upon and pervaded the people of various nations during the early portion of the fourteenth century. The ceremonies grew and took fast hold upon the minds of the Romans, and, combining with their forms, spread to Constantinople and northwest to Germany and France. The Jewish rites, traditions, and legends thus entered the mystic schools. It was during this period that the legend of Hiram first became known, according to Brother George H. Fort, and Jehovah's name, the wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, their wives and children, were admitted. It had no connection with Freemasonry.

JEZEEDS. A Mohammedan sect in Turkey and Persia, which took its name from the founder, Jezeed, a chief who slew the sons of Ali, the father-in-law of Mohammed. They were ignorant in the extreme, having faith in both the Hebrew Bible and Koran; their hymns were addressed, without distinction, to Moses, Christ, or Mohammed.

JEZIRAH or JETZIRAH, BOOK OF. The Hebrew spelling is יְזִירָה, meaning, Book of the Creation. A Cabalistic work, which is claimed by the Cabalists as their first and oldest code of doctrines, although it has no real affinity with the tenets of the Cabala. The authorship of it is attributed to the Patriarch Abraham; but the actual date of its first appearance is supposed to be about the ninth century. Stein Schneider says that it opens the literature of the Secret Doctrine. Its fundamental idea is, that in the ten digits and the twenty letters of the Hebrew alphabet we are to find the origin of all things. Landauer, a German Hebraist, thinks that the author of the Jetzirah borrowed his doctrine of numbers from the School of Pythagoras, which is very probable. The old Freemasons, it is probable, derived some of their mystical ideas of sacred numbers from this work. J. N. R. I. See I. N. R. I. Formally the first letter J was preferred.

JOBERT. This, according to the legends of the advanced Degrees, was the name of the chief favorite of Solomon, who incurred the displeasure of Hiram of Tyre on a certain occasion, but was subsequently pardoned, and, on account of the great attachment he had shown to the person of his master, was appointed the Secretary of Solomon and Hiram in their most intimate relations. He was afterward still further promoted by Solomon, and appointed with Tito and Adoniram a Provost and Judge. He distinguished himself in his successful efforts to bring certain traitors to condign punishment, and although by his rashness he at first excited the anger of the king, he was subsequently forgiven, and eventually received the highest reward that Solomon could bestow, by being made an Elect, Perfect, and Sublime Freemason. The name is evidently not Hebrew, or must at least have undergone much corruption, for in its present form it cannot be traced to a Hebrew root. Lenning says (Encyclopædia) that it is Johaben, or, more properly, Haaben, which he interprets the Son of God; but it would be difficult to find any such meaning according to the recognized rules of the Hebrew etymology.

JOACHIM, ORDER OF. A secret association instituted in Germany near the end of the eighteenth century. Its recipients swore that they believed in the Trinity, and would never waltz. None but nobles, their wives and children, were admitted. It had no connection with Freemasonry.

JOBEL. The Hebrew spelling is יְבֵל, Latin, Jubilans. A name of God used in the Thirteenth Degree, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

JOCHEBED. The Hebrew is יְחוֹבֶד, meaning God exalted. The wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Moses, and Aaron.

JOHABEN. Hebrew, יְהֹאֶבֶן, Latin, Filius Dei. A name of use in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and also mentioned in the Fourth and Fifth Degrees of the modern French Rite.

JOHANNIS TRANK. German for John's Drink, a loving cup used on Saint John's Day.

JOHANNITE MASONRY. A term introduced by Doctor Oliver to designate the system of Freemasonry, of which the two Saints John are recognized as the patrons, and to whom the Lodges are dedicated, in contradistinction to the more recent system of Doctor Hemming, in which the dedication is to Moses and Solomon. Brother Oliver was much opposed to the change, and wrote an interesting work on the subject.
Jesus Said, I Am the Door of the Sheep
JOHANNITES. A Masonic-religious sect established in Paris, in 1814, by Fabré-Paliprat, and attached to the Order of the Temple, of which he was the Grand Master (see Levitikon and Temple, Order of the).

JOHN'S BROTHERS. In the Charter of Cologne, it is said that before the year 1440 the society of Freemasons was known by no other name than that of John's Brothers—Joannaeorum fratrum; that they then began to be called at Valenciennes, Free and Accepted Masons; and that at that time, in some parts of Flanders, by the assistance and riches of the brotherhood, the first hospitals were erected for the relief of such as were afflicted with Saint Anthony's fire. In another part of the Charter it is said that the authors of the associations were called Brothers consecrated to John, or in Latin frateres Joanni Sacros, because "they followed the example and imitation of John the Baptist."

JOHNSON. Sometimes spelled Johnstone. An adventurer, and Masonic charlatan, whose real name was Leucht. He assumed Freemasonry as a disguise under which he could carry on his impositions. He appeared first at Jena, in the beginning of the year 1763, and proclaimed that he had been deputed by the Grand Lodge of the Three Globes, which then sustained that enthusiast. Many of the German Lodges succumbed to his pretensions, and, surrendering their Warrants, gave in their adhesion to Johnson. Von Hund himself was at first deceived by him; but in 1764, at Altenberg, having discovered that Johnson had been formerly, under the name of Becker, the Secretary of the Prince of Bernburg, his confidence he had betrayed; that during the seven years' war he had been wandering about, becoming, finally, the servant of a Freemason, whose papers he had stolen, and that by means of these papers he had been passing himself as that individual Brother von Hund denounced him as an impostor. Johnson fled, but was subsequently arrested at Magdeburg, and imprisoned in the fortress of Wartzb erg, where in 1773, he died suddenly.

JOHN THE BAPTIST. See Saint John the Baptist.

JOHN THE EVANGELIST. See Saint John the Evangelist.

JOINVILLE, CHAILLOU DE. See Chaillo de Joinville.

JOKSHAN. Hebrew, יְבֶנֶ֜שֶׁנֶן, meaning Fowler. The second son of Abraham and Keturah, whose sons appear to be the ancestors of the Seabanes and Dedanites, who inhabited part of Arabia Felix. Same as Jeksan.

JONATHAN AND DAVID, ORDER OF. A Dutch Roman Catholic Order organized about 1770, with statutes issued in 1773 at Amsterdam. The seven grades were: Osterius, Lector, Exorcist, Acoluthus, Subdiaconus, Diaconus, and Summus Superi or, or S. S., and the latter grade also known as Confederati, the head being a Vicarius Summus.
In 1778 he fought for France, appointed Commodore by the French Government, given command of five ships, and waged many victorious battles. France then entering war with Great Britain, John Paul Jones met with great popularity, was acclaimed by the entire French population, and was presented with a wax seal, at present in the Barnes Library of the Naval Historical Society, New York, by Marie Antoinette herself in 1779. Made a Chevalier by Louis XVI, the first foreigner to receive this decoration in the Order of the Knights of Saint Louis. During this period he was a frequent and welcome guest at the Court of Louis XVI and also an enthusiastic participant in French Freemasonry, affiliating himself with the famous Lodge of the Nine Sisters at Paris, whose membership included Benjamin Franklin, Houdon, Voltaire, D'Estaing and many other distinguished men. Robert Freke Gould, English Masonic Historian, remarks, “the notorious Paul Jones” was a regular visitor to the Lodge of the Nine Sisters. Early in 1781 this famous Freemason came back to the United States, and was chosen to represent the Government in France, to which country he returned in 1783. He was awarded a gold medal in 1787 by the Congress of the United States.

Jones in 1788 entered the service of the Russian Government in the war against the Turks, acting as Rear Admiral of the Russian Fleet. He returned to France in May, 1790. His death occurred in Paris, July 18, 1792, and he was buried in the Foreign Protestant Section of Saint Louis Cemetery in that city by his French friends and Brother Freemasons. General Horace Porter, American Ambassador to France and renowned naval officer during the Civil War, located the grave in June, 1899. The body of John Paul Jones was escorted to America in 1905 by American warships and is now in a crypt under the chapel at the United States Navy Academy at Annapolis.

JONES, STEPHEN. A miscellaneous writer and Masonic author of some celebrity. He was born at London in 1764, and educated at Saint Paul’s school. He was, on leaving school, placed under an eminent sculptor, but, on account of some difference, was removed and apprenticed to a printer. On the expiration of his articles, he was engaged as corrector of the press, by Strahan, the king’s printer. Four years afterward, he removed to the office of Thomas Wright, where he remained until 1797, when the death of his employer dissolved his immediate connection with the printing business. He then became the Editor of the Whitehall Evening Post, and, on the decline of that paper, of the General Evening Post, and afterward of the European Magazine. His contributions to literature were various. He supervised an edition of Reed’s Biographia Dramatica, an abridgment of Burke’s Reflections on the French Revolution, and also abridgments of many other popular works. But he is best known in general literature by his Pronouncing and Explanatory Dictionary of the English Language, published in 1798. This production, although following Walker’s far superior work, was very favorably received by the public.

In Freemasonry, Stephen Jones occupied a very high position. He was a Past Master of the Lodge of Antiquity, of which William Preston was a member, and of whom Jones was an intimate friend, and one of his executors. Preston had thoroughly instructed him in his system, and after the death of that distinguished Freemason, he was the first to fill the appointment of Prestonian Lecturer. In 1797 he published Masonic Miscellanies in Prose and Poetry, which went through many editions, the last being that of 1811. In a graceful dedication to Preston, he acknowledges his indebtedness to him for any insight that he may have acquired into the nature and design of Freemasonry. In 1816, he contributed the article Masonry or Freemasonry to the Encyclopedia Londinensis. In 1821, after the death of Preston, he published an edition of the Illustrations, with Additions and Corrections. Brother Matthew Cooke, London Freemasons’ Magazine, September, 1859, says of him: “In the Masonic Craft, Brother Jones was very deeply versed. He was a man of genial sympathies, and a great promoter of social gatherings.” John Britton the architect, who knew him well, says of him (Autobiography, page 302) that “he was a man of mild disposition, strict honesty, great industry, and unblemished character.” In his latter days he was in embarrassed circumstances, and derived pecuniary aid from the Literary Fund. He died, on December 20, 1828, of dyspops, in King Street, Holborn, London.

JOPPA. A town of Palestine and the seaport of Jerusalem, from which it is distant about forty miles in a westerly direction. It was here that the King of Tyre sent ships laden with timber and marble to be forwarded overland to Solomon for the construction of the Temple. Its shore is exceedingly rough, and much dreaded by navigators, who, on account of its exposure, and the perpendicularity of its banks, are compelled to be perpetually on their guard. The following extract from the narrative of the Baron Geramb, a Trappist, who visited the Holy Land in 1842, will be interesting to Mark Masters. “Yesterday morning at daybreak, boats put off and surrounded the vessel to take us to the town (of Joppa), the access to which is difficult on account of the numerous rocks that present to view their bare flanks. The walls were covered with spectators, attracted by curiosity. The boats being much lower than the bridge, upon which one is obliged to climb, and having no ladder, the landing is not effected without danger. More than once it has happened that passengers, in springing out, have broken their limbs; and we might have met with the like accident, if several persons had not hastened to our assistance” (Pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Mount Sinai, volume i, page 27). The place is now called Jaffa.

JORAM. Hebrew,  יְרָאָם; Latin, Excelsus, the eminent. One of three architects sent by Solomon to superintend the cutting and preparing of timber.

JORDAN. A river of Judea, on the banks of which occurred the slaughter of the Ephraimites, suggested by the Second Degree.

JORDAN, CHARLES STEPHEN. Secret Counselor of the King of Prussia, and Vice-President of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, was born in the year 1700, and died in the year 1745. In the year 1740, he founded, with the Baron von Bielfeld, the Lodge of Three Globes at Berlin, of which he was Secretary until the time of his death.

JORDAN, FORDS OF THE. The exact locality of these fords, or passages, as the Bible terms them, cannot now be designated, but most likely they were those nearly due east of Selcukt, and opposite Mizpah. At these fords, in summer time, the water is not more than three or four feet deep, the bottom being composed of a hard limestone rock. If, as some think, the fords thirty miles higher up are those referred to, the same description will apply. At either place, the Jordan is about eighty feet wide; its banks encumbered by a dense growth of tamarisks, cane, willows, thorn bushes, and other low vegetation of the shrubby and thorny sorts, which make it difficult even to approach the margin of the stream. The Arabs cross the river at the present day, at stages of low water, at a number of fords, from the one near the point where the Jordan leaves the sea of Galilee, down to the Pilgrims Ford, six miles above the Dead Sea (see Morris, Freemasonry in the Holy Land, page 316).

JOSEPH II. This Emperor of Germany, who succeeded his mother, Maria Theresa, and at one time encouraged the Freemasons in his dominions, notwithstanding the efforts of the priests to prevent it, issued a Decree in 1785, written, says Lenning, by his own hand, which permitted the meetings of Lodges under certain restrictions as to number. In this Decree he says:

In return for their compliance with this ordinance, the government accords to the Freemasons, welcome, protection, and liberty: leaving entirely to their own direction the control of their members and their constitutions. The government will not attempt to penetrate into their mysteries. Following these directions, the Order of Freemasons, in which body are comprised a great number of worthy men who are well-known to me, may become useful to the State.

But the Austrian Freemasons did not enjoy this tolerance long; the Emperor at length yielded to the counsels and the influence of the bigoted priesthood, and in 1789 the ordinance was rescinded, and the Lodges were forbidden to congregate under the severest penalties.

JOSEPHINE. Empress of France. Wife of Napoleon I; maiden name Marie Rose Josephine Tascher de la Pagerie; born June 23, 1763; died May 24, 1814. Born on the Island of Martinique, married the Vicomte de Beauharnais, military officer, and bore him two children, Eugene and Hortense. Beauharnais was executed in the Revolution. March 9, 1796, a civil marriage united Josephine and Napoleon Bonaparte. Josephine was most friendly to Freemasonry, being herself a member of Maçonnerie d’Adoption. She was present at a Loge d’Adoption at Strasburg, in 1805, when the Loge Des Francs Chevaliers, Orient de Paris, united with the Lodges at Strasburg for a fête. The Lodges, Saint Josephine, of Paris, and Josephine, of Milan, were named after the Empress (see Histoire de la Franc-Maconnerie Francaise, Albert Lantoine, 1925, page 381).

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS. A Jewish author who lived in the first century, and wrote in Greek, among other works, a History of the Jews, to which recourse has been had in some of the advanced Degrees, such as the Prince of Jerusalem, and Knight of the Red Cross, or Red Cross of Babylon, for details in framing their ceremonies.

JOSHPHAT, SON OF AHILUD. The name of the Orator in the Degree of Provost and Judge, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. or the balance. We do not quite agree with Mackey that Craftsmen and Journeymen became opposite terms, implying legal and illegal associates of the Lodge, for it is quite clear from Brother D. Murray Lyon's history, that so early as 1682, journeymen who pretended to convey the Degrees upon candidates weak enough to convey the Degrees, were found in the mountain regions of North and South Carolina and Georgia.

JUNIOR ENTERED APPRENTICE. According to the instructions of the early part of the eighteenth century, the Junior Entered Apprentice was placed in the North, and his duty was to keep out all cowans and eavesdroppers. There was also a Senior Entered Apprentice, and the two seem to have occupied, in some manner, the positions now occupied by the Senior and Junior Deacons (see Senior Entered Apprentice).

JUNIOR OVERSEER. The lowest officer in a Mark Lodge. When Royal Arch Chapters are opened in the Mark Degree, the duties of the Junior Overseer are performed by the Grand Master of the First Veil.

JUNIOR WARDEN. The third officer in a Symbolic Lodge. He presides over the Craft during the hours of refreshment, and, in the absence of the Master and Senior Warden, he performs the duty of presiding officer. Hence, if the Master and Senior Warden were to die or remove from the Jurisdiction, the Junior Warden would assume the chair for the remainder of the term. The jewel of the Junior Warden is a Plumb, emblematic of the rectitude of conduct which should distinguish the Brethren when, during the hours of refreshment, they are beyond the precincts of the Lodge. His seat is in the South, and he represents the Pillar of Beauty. He has placed before him, and carries in procession, a column, which is the representative of the left-hand pillar which stood at the porch of the Temple (see Wardens).

The sixth officer in a Commandery of Knights Templar is also styled Junior Warden. His duties, especially in the reception of candidates, are very important. His jewel of office is an Eagle holding a Flaming Sword.

JURISDICTION, EXCLUSIVE TERRITORIAL. See Territorial Jurisdiction.

JURISDICTION OF A GRAND LODGE. The Jurisdiction of a Grand Lodge extends over every Lodge working within its territorial limits, and over all places not already occupied by a Grand Lodge. The territorial limits of a Grand Lodge are determined in general by the political boundaries of the country in which it is placed. Thus the territorial limits of the Grand Lodge of New York are circumscribed within the settled boundaries of that State. Nor can its Jurisdiction extend beyond these limits into any of the neighboring States. The Grand Lodge of New York could not, therefore, without an infringement of Masonic usage, grant a Warrant of Constitution to any Lodge located in any State where there was already a Grand Lodge. It might, however, charter a Lodge in a Territory, where there is not in existence a Grand Lodge of that Territory. The Lodges of France held their allegiance to the Grand Lodge of England until the formation of a Grand Lodge of France, and therefore the Grand Lodges of England, Scotland, and France granted Warrants to various Lodges in America until after the Revolution, when the States began to organize Grand Lodges for themselves. For the purpose of avoiding collision and unfriendly feeling, it has become the settled usage, that when a Grand Lodge has been legally organized in a State, all the Lodges within its limits must surrender the Charters which they have received from foreign Bodies, and accept new ones from the newly established Grand Lodge. This is the settled and well-recognized law of American and English Freemasonry. But the continental Freemasons, and especially the Germans, have not so rigidly interpreted this law of unoccupied territory; and there have been in France, and in Germany, several Grand Lodges in the same Kingdom exercising co-ordinate powers (see Grand Lodge and Territorial Jurisdiction, Exclusive).

JURISDICTION OF A LODGE. The Jurisdiction of a Lodge is geographical or personal. The geographical jurisdiction of a Lodge is that which it exercises over the territory within which it is situated, and extends to all the Freemasons, affiliated and unaffiliated, who live within that territory. This jurisdiction extends to a point equally distant from the adjacent Lodge. Thus, if two Lodges are situated within twenty miles of each other, the geographical jurisdiction of each will extend ten miles from its seat in the direction of the other Lodge. But in this case both Lodges must be situated in the same State, and hold their Warrants from the same Grand Lodge; for it is a settled point in Masonic law that no Lodge can extend its geographical jurisdiction beyond the territorial limits of its own Grand Lodge.

The personal jurisdiction of a Lodge is that penal Jurisdiction which it exercises over its own members wherever they may be situated. No matter how far a Freemason may remove from the Lodge of which he is a member, his allegiance to that Lodge is indefeasible so long as he continues a member, and it may exercise penal jurisdiction over him.

K. Hebrew, כ. Kaph, signifying hollow or palm of the hand. This is the eleventh letter of the English alphabet, and in Hebrew has the numerical value of 20. In the Chaldaic or hieroglyphic it is represented by a hand, as in the illustration.

KAABA. The name of the holy temple of Mecca, which is to the Mohammedans what the Temple of Solomon was to the Jews. It is certainly older, as Gibbon admits, than the Christian era, and is supposed, by the tradition of the Arabsians, to have been erected in the nineteenth century before Christ, by Abraham, who was assisted by his son Ishmael. It derives its name of Kaaba from its cubical form, it being fifteen feet long, wide, and high. It has but one aperture for light, which is a door in the east end. In the northeast corner is a black stone, religiously venerated by the Mussulmans, called "the black stone of the Kaaba," around which cluster many traditions. One of these is that it came down from Paradise, and was originally as white as milk, but that the sins of mankind turned it black; another is, that it is a ruby which deprived it of its brilliancy, which would have illuminated the world from one end to the other. Syed Ahmed, who, for a Mussulman, has written a very rational History of the Holy Mecca (London, 1870), says that the black stone is really a piece of rock from the mountains in the vicinity of Mecca; that it owes its black color to the effects of fire; and that before the erection of the temple of the Kaaba, it was no other than one of the numerous altars erected in the valley of Mecca, which the Arabsians have called Necc, and the Jews, and may be shown in the illustration.

CHALDEAN K
erected for the worship of God, and was, together with other stones, laid in one of the corners of the temple at the time of its construction. It is, in fact, one of the relics of the ancient stone worship; yet it reminds us of the foundation-stone of the Solomonic Temple, to which building the temple of the Kaaba has other resemblances. Thus, Syed Ahmed, who, in opposition to most Christian writers, devoutly believes in its Abrahamic origin, says (on page 6) that "the temple of the Kaaba was built by Abraham in conformity with those religious practices according to which, after a lapse of time, the descendants of his second son built the Temple of Jerusalem."

KABBALA. See Cabala.

KADIRI, ORDER OF. A secret society existing in Arabia, which so much resembles Freemasonry in its object and forms, that Lieutenant R. F. Burton, who succeeded in obtaining initiation into it, called the members Oriental Freemasons. He gives a very interesting account of the Order in his Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Mecca.

KADOSH. The name of a very important Degree in many of the Masonic Rites. The word "kaph" is Hebrew, and signifies holy or consecrated, and is thus intended to denote the elevated character of the Degree and the sublimity of the truths which distinguish it and its possessors from the other Degrees. Pluche says that in the East, a person preferred to honors bore a scepter, and sometimes a plate of gold on the forehead, called a Kadosh, to apprise the people that the bearer of this mark or rod was a public person, who possessed the privilege of entering into hostile camps without the fear of losing his personal liberty.

The Degree of Kadosh, though found in many of the Rites and in various countries, seems, in all of them, to have been more or less connected with the Knights Templar. In some of the Rites it was placed at the head of the list, and was then dignified as the ne plus ultra, nothing further, of Freemasonry. It was sometimes given as a separate order or Rite within itself, and then it was divided into the three Degrees of Illustrious Knight of the Temple, Knight of the Black Eagle, and Grand Elect.

Brother Oliver enumerates five Degrees of Kadosh: the Knight Kadosh; Kadosh of the Chapter of Clermont; Philosophical Kadosh; Kadosh Prince of Death; and Kadosh of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

The French records speak of seven: Kadosh of the Hebrews; Kadosh of the first Christians; Kadosh of the Crusades; Kadosh of the Templars; Kadosh of Cromwell or the Puritans; Kadosh of the Jesuits; and the True Kadosh. But the correctness of this enumeration is doubtful, for it cannot be sustained by documentary evidence. In all of these Kadoshes the doctrine and the modes of recognition are substantially the same, though in most of them the ceremonies of initiation differ.

Ragon mentions a Kadosh which is said to have been established at Jerusalem in 1118; but here he undoubtedly refers to the Order of Knights Templar. He gives also in his Traitéur Général the nomenclature of no less than fourteen Kadosh Degrees.

The doctrine of the Kadosh system is that the persecutions of the Knights Templar by Philip the Fair of France, and Pope Clement V, however cruel and sanguinary in its results, did not extinguish the Order, but it continued to exist under the forms of Freemasonry. That the ancient Templars are the modern Kadoshes, and that the Builder at the Temple of Solomon is now replaced by James de Molay, the martyred Grand Master of the Templars, the assassins being represented by the King of France, the Pope, and Naffodei the informer against the Order; or, it is sometimes said, by the three informers, Squin de Florian, Naffodei, and the Prior of Montfaucon.

As to the history of the Kadosh Degrees, it is said to have been first invented at Lyons, in France, in 1743, where it appeared under the name of the Petit Élu, Minor Élu, as distinguished from Grand Élu. This Degree, which is said to have been based upon the Templar doctrine heretofore referred to, was afterward developed into the Kadosh, which we find in 1758, incorporated as the Grand Élu Kadosh into the system of the Council of Emperors of the East and West, which was that year formed at Paris, whence it was extended to the Scottish Rite Freemasons.

Of all the Kadoshes, two only are now important, namely, the Philosophic Kadosh, which has been adopted by the Grand Orient of France, and the Knight Kadosh, which constitutes the Thirtieth Degree of the Scottish Rite Freemasons.

KADOSH, called also the Holy Man. The French phrase is Kadosch ou l'Homme Saint. The Tenth and last Degree of the Rite of Martinism.

KADOSH, GRAND, ELECT KNIGHT. The Sixty-fifth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

KADOSH, KNIGHT. The Thirtieth Degree of the Scottish Rite (see Knight Kadosh).

KADOSH OF THE JESUITS. According to Thory (Acta Latomorum i, page 320) this Degree is said to have been invented by the Jesuits of the College of Clermont. The statement is not well supported. De Bonneville's Masonic Chapter of Clermont was probably, either with or without design, confounded with the Jesuitical College of Clermont (see Jesuits).

KADOSH, PHILOSOPHIC. A modification of the original Kadosh, for which it has been substituted and adopted by the Grand Orient of France. The military character of the Order is abandoned, and the Philosophic Kadosh wear no swords. Their only weapon is the Word.

KADOSH, PRINCE. A Degree of the collection of Pyron.

KADOSH PRINCE OF DEATH. The Twenty-seventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

KALAND'S BRUERER, DIE. German for The Brethren of the Calends. A religious brotherhood of the Middle Ages whose name was from the Calends, the first of each month, and whose traditions refer to Solomon's era.

KALB, JOHANN. Baron de Kalb. Born at Hüttendorf, Germany, June 29, 1721, and died August 19, 1780. A close friend of Lafayette, he entered the American service as a Major General in 1776, fought in several actions, became second in command at Camden, South Carolina, August 16, 1780, at which time he was wounded and died three days later. He was buried with both military and Masonic honors. It is not positively known where De Kalb received the Degrees of Freemasonry, though there is... reason to believe that it was in the Army Lodge No. 29, chartered April 27, 1780, by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania for the benefit of the Brethren of the Maryland Line. On a visit to South Carolina, La Fayette, under the auspices of Kershaw Lodge, laid the corner-stone of a monument to DeKalb, March 9, 1825, on the spot where he was wounded at the battle of Camden (see History of Freemasonry in Maryland, Edward T. Schults, volume 4, page 327, and volume 2, pages 477-8).

KAMEA. Hebrew, ובש, meaning an amulet. More particularly applied by the Cabalists to magic squares inscribed on paper or parchment, and tied around the neck as a safeguard against evil (see Magic Squares).

KANE, DOCTOR ELISHA KENT. American scientist and explorer, born at Philadelphia, February 20, 1822, and famous on account of two voyages to the Arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin, an English Freemason and explorer. Kane was an enthusiastic Freemason, a member of Franklin Lodge, No. 134, Philadelphia. He died on February 16, 1857. When Brother Kane reached Newfoundland on his way north in search of Brother Franklin, he was entertained at a reception held by Saint John's Lodge on June 17, 1853, and presented with a Masonic flag (see Doctor Mackey's History of Freemasonry, 1921, page 2178).

KANSAS. By Dispensation granted to John M. Chivington on August 4, 1854, Grove Lodge was opened in Wyandotte Territory at the house of Mathew R. Walker. A Convention was held on November 14, 1855, at Leavenworth, but as Wyandotte Lodge was not represented the meeting was adjourned until December 27. On that date representatives of Wyandotte Lodge were again absent, but it was decided not to delay the organization of a Grand Lodge further. The following were present at this meeting held in the office of A. and R. Rees: Brother John W. Smith, W. M. of Smithton Lodge, No. 140; Brother R. R. Rees, W. M. of Leavenworth Lodge, No. 150, and Brothers C. T. Harrison, L. J. Eastin, J. J. Clarkson, G. W. Purkins, I. B. Donaldson, and Simon Kohn, Master Masons. The Grand Lodge was then opened and it was decided to send a report to Wyandotte Lodge asking them to approve the proceedings. A completely representative meeting was held on March 17, 1856, when it was resolved that, as there was some doubt whether the proceedings of the previous Convention were entirely legal, owing to the absence of delegates from one chartered Lodge, the Grand Lodge of Kansas should be organized then and there. When this was done, Brother Richard R. Rees, elected Grand Master, was installed and he then installed the other Grand Officers in Leavenworth. The Grand Lodge was granted a Dispensation on January 24, 1857. Not until September 8, 1865, however, was its Charter issued. The first Chapter in Kansas to possess a Charter was Washington, No. 1, Dispensation granted May 18, 1859; Charter, September 14, 1859. Representatives of these two Chapters and of Fort Scott Chapter met in Convention by permission of the Grand Lodge of Kansas to possess a Charter was Washington, No. 1, Dispensation granted May 18, 1859; Charter, September 14, 1859. Representatives of these two Chapters and of Fort Scott Chapter met in Convention by permission of the Grand High Priest on January 27, 1866, and on February 26, the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of Kansas was duly organized and constituted.

The Grand Council of Missouri chartered three Councils of Royal and Select Masters in this State. On December 12, 1867, representatives of the three Councils organized a Grand Council which has since met annually except in 1880. A Commandery, Leavenworth, No. 1, was established by Dispensation issued February 10, 1864. Its Charter was granted September 6, 1865. This Commandery, with the others in the State, namely: Washington, No. 2; Hugh de Payens, No. 3, and De Molay, No. 4, met on December 29, 1868, by Warrant from Grand Master William Sewall Gardner, issued on December 2, 1868, and established a Grand Commandery.

The following Scottish Rite Bodies were established in Kansas: Salina, No. 2, Lodge of Perfection, September 13, 1876, at Salina; Unity, No. 1, Chapter of Rose Croix, February 17, 1881, at Topeka; William de la More, No. 1, Council of Kadosh, December 12, 1883, at Lawrence; Topeka, No. 1, Consistory, April 23, 1892, at Topeka. Those established at Fort Leavenworth, one in 1890 and three in 1909, in each case as Army, No. 1, came at first under the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction. At the session of 1909, the Supreme Council agreed to exercise concurrent jurisdiction, but in 1910 the Army Bodies at Fort Leavenworth were transferred to the authority of Kansas.

KARMATIANS. A Mohammedan sect that became notorious from its removal of the celebrated black stone of the Kaaba, and, after retaining it for twenty-two years, voluntarily surrendered it. Founded by Karmata at Irak in the ninth century.

KASIDÉANS. A Latinized spelling of Chasidim, which see.

KATHARSIS. Greek, καθαρσίς. The ceremony of purification in the Ancient Mysteries. Müller says that "one of the important parts of the Pythagorean worship was the ἑαυτόν, which was sung to the lyre in spring-time by a person sitting in the midst of a circle of listeners: this was called the katharsis or purification" (Dorians i, 384).

KATIPUNAN. Secret society in the Philippine Islands. See Philippine Islands.

KEEPER OF THE SEALS. An officer called Garde des Sceaux in Lodges of the French Rite. It is also the title of an officer in Consistories of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. The title sufficiently indicates the functions of the office.

KELLERMAN, MARSHAL. Duke de Valmy, born 1770, died 1835. Member of the Supreme Council and Grand Officer of Honor of the Grand Orient of France; elected 1814. Served in the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Waterloo.

KELLY, CHRISTOPHER. A Masonic plagiarist, who stole bodily the whole of the typical part of the celebrated work of Samuel Lee entitled Orbis Miraculorum, or The Temple of Solomon Pourtrayed by Scripture Light, and published it as his own under the title of Solomon's Temple spiritualized; setting forth the Divine Mysteries of the Temple, with an account of its Destruction. He prefaced the book with An Address to all Free and Accepted Masons. The first edition was published at Dublin in 1803, and on his removal to America he published a second in 1820, at Philadelphia. Kelly was, unfortunately, a Freemason, but not an honest one. Brother Woodford points out that all such works... organize them in September, 1827. The Anti-Masonic period affected the Craft in Kentucky to some considerable extent and the Grand Council only met once in 1841. From 1875 to 1881 the Degrees were included in the Chapter work but in 1881, after the organization of the General Grand Council, the Grand Council of Kentucky was reorganized. On October 14, 1912, it affiliated with the General Grand Council as a constituent member.

Webb, No. 1, at Lexington, was the first Commandery to begin work in Kentucky. It was authorized by Charter dated January 1, 1826, but this was probably a Charter of Recognition as there is in existence a copy of the original Proceedings of Webb Encampment, with a list of members as of January 1, 1819. A Dispensation was issued by John Snow on the following December 28, and a Charter on January 1, 1820. The Grand Commandery in Kentucky, authorized by Warrant from the Grand Encampment dated September 14, 1847, was constituted on October 5, at Frankfort. Its subordinate Commanderies were Webb, No. 1; Louisville, No. 2; Versailles, No. 3; Frankfort, No. 4, and Montgomery, No. 5.

On August 8, 1852, four Bodies of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, Southern Jurisdiction, were chartered at Louisville: Union Lodge of Perfection, No. 1; Pelican Chapter of Rose Croix, No. 1; Kilwinning Council of Kadosh, No. 1, and Grand Consistory, No. 1.

KENYA COLONY. British East Africa where the Grand Lodges of England and Scotland have each chartered a Lodge at Nairobi in this district.

KEY. "The Key," says Doctor Oliver (Landmarks i, page 180), "is one of the most important symbols of Freemasonry. It bears the appearance of a common metal instrument, confined to the performance of one simple act. But the well-instructed brother beholds in it the symbol which teaches him to keep a tongue of good report, and to abstain from the debasing vices of slander and defamation." Among the ancients the key was a symbol of silence and circumcision; and thus Sophocles alludes to it in the Oedipus Coloneus (line 105), where he makes the chorus speak of "the golden key which had come upon the tongue of the ministering Hierophant in the mysteries of Eleusis—συν καὶ χαλεψ κλατε γιγάντων θρίαμβοι προστάτων ευμορφίαν," Callimachus says that the Priestess of Ceres bore a key as the ensign of her mystic office. The key was in the Mysteries of Isis a hieroglyphic of the opening or disclosing of the heart and conscience, in the kingdom of death, for trial and judgment.

In the old instructions of Freemasonry the key was an important symbol, and Doctor Oliver regrets that it has been abandoned in the modern system. In the ceremonies of the First Degree, in the eighteenth century, allusion is made to a key by whose help the secrets of Freemasonry are to be obtained, which key "is said to hang and not to lie, because it is always to hang in a brother's defence and not to lie to his prejudice." It was said, too, to hang "by the thread of life at the entrance," and was closely connected with the heart, because the tongue "ought to utter nothing but what the heart dictates." And, finally, this key is described as being "composed of no metal, but a tongue of good report." In the ceremonies of the...
Master's Degree in the Adonhiramite Rite, we find knows only how to speak well of those of whom it speaks in their absence as in their presence.

In the heart.

Where do you conceal?
All the secrets which have been intrusted to me.

Where do you keep it?
In a box of coral which opens and shuts only with the heart, ivory teeth.

What do you conceal?
Of none. It is a tongue obedient to reason, which knows only how to speak well of those of whom it speaks in its absence as in its presence.

All of this shows that the key as a symbol was for¬ merly equivalent to the modern symbol of the “instruc¬ tive tongue,” which, however, with almost the same interpretation, has now been transferred to the Second or Fellow-Craft’s Degree. The key, however, is still preserved as a symbol of secrecy in the Royal Arch Degree; and it is also presented to us in the same sense in the ivory key of the Secret Master, or Fourth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

In many of the German Lodges an ivory key is made for the Masonic clothing of each Brother, to re¬ mind him that he should lock up or conceal the secrets of Freemasonry in his heart.

But among the ancients the key was also a symbol of power; and thus among the Greeks the title of key-bearer, or key-bearer, was bestowed upon one holding high office; and with the Romans, the keys are given to the bride on the day of marriage, as a token that the authority of the house was bestowed upon her; and if afterward divorced, they were taken from her, as a symbol of the deprivation of her office.

When the Hebrews the key was used in the same sense. “As the robe and the baldric,” says Lowth (Israel, part ii, section 4), “were the ensigns of power and authority, so likewise was the key the mark of office, either sacred or civil.” Thus in Isaiah (xxii, 22), it is said: “The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulders; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.”
Our Savior expressed a similar idea when he said to Saint Peter, “I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven.” It is in reference to this inter¬ pretation of the symbol, and not that of secrecy, that the key has been adopted as the official jewel of the Treasurer of a Lodge, because he has the purse, the source of power, under his command.

KEY OF MASONRY. See Knight of the Sun.

KEYSTONE. The stone placed in the center of an arch which preserves the others in their places, and secures firmness and stability to the arch. As it was formerly the custom of Operative Masons to place a peculiar mark on each stone of a building to designate the workman by whom it had been adjusted, so the Keystone was most likely to receive the most promi¬ nent mark, that of the Superintendent of the structure.

Such is related to have occurred to that Keystone which plays so important a part in the legend of the Royal Arch Degree.

The objection has sometimes been made, that the arch was unknown in the time of Solomon. But this objection has been completely laid at rest by the re¬ searches of antiquaries and travelers within a few years past. Wilkinson discovered arches with regular keystones in the doorways of the tombs of Thebes, the construction of which he traced to the year 1840
B.C., or 460 years before the building of the Temple of Solomon. And Doctor Clark asserts that the Cyclopean gallery of Tynús exhibits lanceet-shaped arches almost as old as the time of Abraham. In fact, in the Solomonic era, the construction of the arch must have been known to the Dionysian Arti¬ cers, of whom, it is a freely received theory, many were present at the building of the Temple.

As the city of York claims to be the birthplace of Freemasonry in England, the ob¬ scure little village of Kilwinning is entitled to the same honor with respect to the origin of the Order in the sister kingdom of Scotland. The claim to the honor, however, in each case, depends on the bare authority of a legend, the authenticity of which is now doubted by many Masonic historians. A place, which, in itself small and wholly indistinguishable in the political, the literary, or the commercial annals of its country, has become of great importance in the estimation of the Masonic antiquities from its intimate connection with the history of the Institution.

The Abbey of Kilwinning is situated in the baili¬ wick of Cunningham, about three miles north of the royal burgh of Irving, near the Irish Sea. The abbey was founded in the year 1140, by Hugh Morville, Constable of Scotland, and dedicated to Saint Win¬ ning, being intended for a company of monks of the Tyronean Order, who had been brought from Kelso.

The edifice must have been constructed at great ex¬ pense, and with much magnificence, since it is said to have occupied several acres of ground in its whole extent.

Lawrie (History of Freemasonry, page 46, 1859 edition) says that, by authentic documents as well as by other collateral arguments which amount almost to a demonstration, the existence of the Kilwinning Lodge has been traced back as far as the end of the fifteenth century. But we know that the body of of Traveling Freemasons, flourished at a much earlier period; and we learn, also, from Lawrie himself, that several of these Freemasons traveled into Scotland, about the beginning of the twelfth century. Hence, we have every reason to suppose that these men were the architects who constructed the Abbey at Kilwinning, and who first established the Institution of Freemasonry in Scotland. If such be the fact, we must place the origin of the first Lodge in that kingdom at an earlier date, by three centuries, than that claimed for it by Lawrie, which would bring it much nearer, in point of time, to the great Masonic Assembly, which is traditionally said to have been convened in the year 926, by Prince Edwin, at York, in England.

There is some collateral evidence to sustain the probability of this early commencement of Freemasonry in Scotland. It is very generally admitted that the Royal Order of Herodem was founded by King Robert Bruce, at Kilwinning. Thorly, in the Acta Latomorum, gives the following chronicle: "Robert Bruce, King of Scotland, under the title of Saint John, after the battle of Bannockburn, which was fought on the 24th of June, 1314. To this Order was afterwards united that of Herodem, for the sake of the Scotch Freemasons, who formed a part of the thirty thousand troops with whom he had fought an army of one hundred thousand Englishmen. King Robert reserved the title of Grand Master to himself and his successors forever, and founded the Royal Grand Lodge of Herodem at Kilwinning."

Doctor Oliver says that "the Royal Order of Herodem had formerly its chief seat at Kilwinning; and there is every reason to think that it and Saint John's Masonry were then governed by the same Grand Lodge."

In 1820, there was published at Paris a record which states that in 1286, James, Lord Stewart, received the title of Grand Master to himself and his successors forever, and founded the Royal Grand Lodge of Herodem at Kilwinning; which goes to prove that a Lodge was then existing and in active operation at that place.

The modern iconoclasts, however, who are leveling these old legends with unsparing hands, have here been at work. Brother D. Murray Lyon has attacked the Bruce legend, and in the London Freemasons Magazine (of 1868, page 14) says:

"Seeing that the Fraternity of Kilwinning never at any period practised or acknowledged other than Craft degrees, and have not preserved even a shadow of a tradition that can in the remotest degree be held to identify Robert Bruce with the holding of Masonic Courts, or the Institution of a Secret Order at Kilwinning, the Fraternity of the 'Herodim' must be attributed to another than the hero of Bannockburn, and a birthplace must be sought for it in a soil still more favorable to the growth of the high grades than Scotland has hitherto proved."

He intimates that the legend was the invention of the Chevalier Ramsay, whose birthplace was in the vicinity of Kilwinning.

Brother Mackey says, "I confess that I look upon the legend and the documents that contain it with some favor, as at least furnishing the evidence that there has been among the Fraternity a general belief of the antiquity of the Kilwinning Lodge." Those, however, whose faith is of a more hesitating character, will find the most satisfactory testimonies of the existence of that Lodge in the beginning of the fifteenth century. At that period, when James II was on the throne, the Barons of Roslin, as hereditary Patrons of Scotch Freemasonry, held their annual meetings at Kilwinning, and the Lodge at that place granted Warrants of Constitution for the formation of subordinate Lodges in other parts of the kingdom. The Lodges thus formed, in token of their respect for, and submission to, the mother Lodge whence they derived their existence, affixed the word Kilwinning to their own distinctive name; many instances of which are still to be found on the register of the Grand Lodge of Scotland—such as Canongate Kilwinning, Greenock Kilwinning, Cumberland Kilwinning, etc.

But, in process of time, this Grand Lodge at Kilwinning ceased to retain its supremacy, and finally its very existence. As in the case of the sister kingdom, where the Grand Lodge was removed from York, the birthplace of English Freemasonry, to London, so in Scotland, the supreme seat of the Order was at length transferred from Kilwinning to the metropolis; and, hence, in the doubtful document entitled the Charter of Cologne, which purports to have been written in 1542, we find, in a list of nineteen Grand Lodges in Europe, that that of Scotland is mentioned as sitting at Edinburgh, under the Grand Mastership of John Bruce. In 1736, when the Grand Lodge of Scotland was organized, the Kilwinning Lodge was one of its constituent Bodies, and continued in its obedience until 1743. In that year it petitioned to be recognized as the oldest Lodge in Scotland; but as the records of the original Lodge had been lost, the present Lodge could not prove, says Lawrie, that it was the identical Lodge which had first practised Freemasonry in Scotland. The petition was therefore rejected, and, in consequence, the Kilwinning Lodge seceded from the Grand Lodge and established itself as an independent Body. It organized Lodges in Scotland; and several instances are on record of its issuing Charters as Mother Kilwinning Lodge to Lodges in foreign countries. Thus, it granted one to a Lodge in Virginia in 1758, and another in 1779 to some Brethren in Ireland calling themselves the Lodge of High Knights Templar. But in 1807 the Mother Lodge of Kilwinning renounced all right of granting Charters, and came once more into the bosom of the Grand Lodge, bringing with her all her daughter Lodges.

Here terminates the connection of Kilwinning as a place of any special importance with the Freemasonry of Scotland. As for the Abbey, the stupendous fabric which was executed by the Freemasons who first migrated into Scotland, its history, like that of the Lodge which they founded, is one of decline and decay. In 1560, it was in a great measure demolished by Alexander, Earl of Glencairn, in obedience to an Order from the States of Scotland, in the exercise of their usurped authority during the imprisonment of Mary Stuart. A few years afterward, a part of the Abbey Chapel was repaired and converted into the parish church, and was used as such until about the year 1775, when, in consequence of its ruinous and dangerous state, it was pulled down and an elegant church erected in the modern style. In 1759, so much of the ancient Abbey remained as to enable Grose, the antiquary, to take a sketch of the ruins.

KILWINNING MANUSCRIPT. Also called the Edinburgh Kilwinning Manuscript. This manuscript derives its name from its being written in a small quarto book, belonging to the celebrated Mother Kilwinning Lodge of Scotland. For its publication, the Masonic Fraternity is indebted to Brother William James Hughan, who has inserted it in his Unpublished Records of the Craft, from a copy made for him from the original by Brother D. Murray Lyon, of Ayr, Scotland. Brother Lyon, "whilst glancing at the Minutes of the Lodge of Edinburgh from December 27, 1675, till March 12, 1678, was struck with the similarity which the handwriting bore to that in which the Kilwinning copy of the Narrative of the Founding of the Craft of Masonry is written, and upon closer examination he was convinced that in both cases the caligraphy is the same" (History of the Lodge of Edinburgh, page 107). It was probably written in 1665. The Anglican phraseology, and the fact that one of the Charges requires that Freemasons should be "liegedemen to the King of England," conclusively show that the manuscript was written in English and introduced into Scotland. It is so much like the text of the Grand Lodge Manuscript, published by Brother Hughan in his Old Charges of British Freemasons, that, to use the language of Brother Woodford, "it would pass as an indifferent copy of that document."

KILWINNING, MOTHER LODGE. For an account of this Body, which was for some time the rival of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, see Kilwinning.

KILWINNING SYSTEM. The Freemasonry practised in Scotland, so called because it is supposed to have been instituted at the Abbey of Kilwinning. Brother Oliver uses the term in his Mirror for the Johannite Masons (page 120, see also Saint John's Masonry).

KING. The second officer in a Royal Arch Chapter in the United States. He is the representative of Zerubbabel, Prince or Governor of Judah. When the Chapter meets as a Lodge of Mark, Past, or Most Excellent Masters, the King acts as Senior Warden. After the rebuilding of the second Temple, the government of the Jews was administered by the High Priests as the vicegerents of the Kings of Persia, to whom they paid tribute. This is the reason that the High Priest is the presiding officer in a Chapter, and the King only a subordinate. But in the Chapters of England and Ireland, the King is made the presiding officer. The jewel of the King is a level surmounted by a crown suspended within a triangle.

KING OF THE SANCTUARY. A side Degree formerly conferred in the presence of five Past Masters, now in disuse.

KING OF THE WORLD. A Degree in the system of the Philosophical Rite.

KINGS, THE FIVE. The sacred code of the older Chinese. The word king signifies web of cloth, or the warp that keeps the threads in position, or upon which we may weave the somber and golden colors that make up this life's pictured history. This great light in Chinese secret societies contains the best sayings of the best sages on the ethical-political duties of life. They cannot be traced to a period beyond the tenth century before Christ, although the religion is believed to be older.

Some of the superior classes of Chinese are believers in the great philosopher Lao-tse, and others in the doctrines of Confucius. The two religions appear to be twin in age, not strikingly dissimilar, and each has been given a personality in color in accordance with the character of ethics believed in by the two writers. Lao-tse and Confucius were the revivers of an older religion, the former of whom was born 604 B.C., and the latter fifty-four years subsequently.

The five kings are, the Yih-King, or Book of Changes; the Shi-King, or Book of Songs; the Shu-King, or Book of Annals; the Chu'un Ts'ju; or "Spring and Autumn"; and the Li-King, or Book of Rites. The fourth book was composed by Confucius himself, while the first three are supposed to have been compiled by him, and the fifth by his disciples from his teachings.

Doctor Legge, late Professor of Chinese at Oxford, England, and Doctor Medhurst assert that there are no authentic records in China earlier than 1100 B.C., and no alphabetical writing before 1500 B.C.

The grandeur of the utterances and brilliancy of the intellectual productions of Confucius and Mencius, as law-givers and expounders of the sacred code of the Chinese, called The Five Kings, are much to be admired, and are the Trestle-Board of many thousands of millions of the earth's population.

KIPLING, RUDYARD. Celebrated author and poet. Born in Bombay, India, December 30, 1865. His writings frequently give Masonic allusions peculiarly significant to the Craft. The story of The Man Who Would be King is a good specimen of the kind in question. His poems, the Mother Lodge, the Palace, and L'Envoi to Life's Handicap are splendidly typical. He was made an honorary member of Canon-gate Kilwinning Lodge at Edinburgh, a Masonic distinction of which he very properly has been not a little proud. The English Masonic Illustrated (London, July 1901, volume 1, number 10) says Brother Kipling was initiated in Freemasonry at the age of twenty and a half, by special dispensation obtained for the purpose, in the Hope and Perseverance Lodge, No. 782, Lahore. In 1888 joined the Independence and Philanthropy Lodge, No. 391, meeting at Allahabad, Bengal. In the issue of the London Times quoted in the Freemason, March 28, 1925, there is an interesting statement from Brother Kipling regarding his active service in his own Lodge in Lahore, Punjab, East Indies. He was Entered for membership by a Hindu, Passed by a Mohammedan, and Raised by an Englishman. The Tyler was an Indian Jew. This is what he writes: "I was Secretary for some years of the Lodge of Hope and Perseverance, No. 782, E.C., Lahore, English Constitution, which included Brethren of at least four creeds. I was entered by a member from Brahmo Somaj, a Hindu, passed by a Mohammedan, and Raised by an Englishman. Our Tyler was an Indian Jew. To this very remarkable experience of Brother Kipling is due the poem by him which follows and which by his permission is reprinted here from The Seven Seas, published by Doubleday Page and Company, Garden City, New York (page 177).
Bruder Kuss; the French, le Baiser Fraternal. It is the kiss given in the French and German Lodges by each Brother to his neighbor on the right and left hand when the labors of the Lodge are closed. It is not adopted in the English or American systems of Ancient Craft Freemasonry, although practised in some of the advanced Degrees.

KISS OF PEACE. In the reception of an Ancient Knight Templar, it was the practise for the one who received him to greet him with a kiss upon the mouth. This, which was called the Osculum Pads, or Kiss of Peace, was borrowed by the Templars from the religious orders, in all of which it was observed. It is not practised in the receptions of Masonic Templarism.

KITCHENER, VISCOUNT HORATIO BERN. Famous English soldier, Commander-in-Chief and High Commissioner in the Meditteranean, as well as a member of the Masonic Fraternity with years of active service to his credit. Born June 24, 1850, at Bally Longford, County Kerry, England, and died, 1916, in the World War. Son of Lieutenant-Colonel H. H. Kitchener. Entered the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, 1868, and in 1871 appointed Second Lieutenant, Royal Engineers. Sent to Palestine, thence to Egypt, being promoted to Captain in 1883. In 1884, serving in the expeditionary forces on the Nile, he was first Major and then Lieutenant-Colonel. Commandant at Suakin for three years, ending 1888, having received a dangerous wound. Served as Adjutant-General until 1892 when he succeeded Sir Francis Grenfell as Sirdar (Persian for Leader, equivalent in Egypt to Commander-in-Chief) of the Egyptian Army. Displayed great skill in administrative work with the expeditionary force and he advanced the frontier and railway to Dongola in the Sudan. In 1896 he was appointed British Major-General, succeeding so well that he was appointed to the peerage as Baron Kitchener of Khartoum, receiving a grant of thirty thousand pounds and the thanks of Parliament. He was shortly afterwards appointed Chief-of-Staff to Lord Roberts in the South African War and promoted to Lieutenant-General. He served in the field until 1900, when he was made Commander-in-Chief, Lord Roberts returning to England. The long, arduous and loyal work of Kitchener was rewarded by the title of Viscount when the war ended, a grant of fifty thousand pounds; the Order of Merit and the rank of General "for distinguished service."

For the following data as to Brother Kitchener's Masonic record we are indebted to his personal friend, Brother Lieutenant-Colonel E. C. Mugrue, Southsea, England: "His Mother Lodge, British Union, No. 114 was founded at Ipswich, England, in 1762. He was a founder member of the following: Drury Lane Lodge, No. 2127, founded in 1885; Khartoum Lodge, No. 2877, founded in 1901; Kitchener Lodge, No. 2998, founded at Simla, Punjab, in 1903. Brother Lord Kitchener was District Grand Master of Egypt and Sudan in 1899; District Grand Master of the Punjab in 1902; Junior Grand Warden of England in 1916. "Brother Kitchener possessed great talents as a linguist in Oriental languages which stood him in good stead in his Masonic work, and this, coupled with his strength of character and power and skill as a soldier, made him a man who was loved by all his men and by the entire English-speaking world and one of whom the Masonic Fraternity is justly proud" writes Brother Mugrue.
KLOSS

Brother Kitchener served for seven years in India, made many far-reaching reforms in the Government, entirely reorganized the British and native forces. In 1909 he was appointed to Field Marshall, virtual Grand Master. He resided at Frankfort-on-the-Main, where he enjoyed a high reputation as a physician. He was the possessor of an extensive Masonic library, and devoted himself to the study of the antiquities and true character of the Masonic institution, insomuch that he was styled the "Teacher of the German Freemasons." Kloss's theory was that the present Order of Freemasons found its origin in the stone-cutters and building corporations of the Middle Ages. He delivered, in the course of his life, many valuable historical discourses before the Lodge Zur Einigkeit, or Concord, several of which were printed and published: Annals of the Lodge Zur Einigkeit, Frankfurt, 1840; Freemasonry in its true meaning, from the ancient and genuine documents of the Stonemasons, Leipsic, 1846; A History of Freemasonry in England, Scotland, and Ireland, Leipsic, 1848; A History of the Freemason of France, from genuine documents, Darmstadt, 1852; and a Bibliography of Freemasonry, Frankfurt, 1844. This last is a most valuable contribution to Masonic literature. It contains a list of more than six thousand Masonic works in all languages, with critical remarks on many of them. Doctor Kloss died at Frankfort, February 10, 1854. Brother Meisinger, who delivered his funeral oration, said of him: "He had a rare amount of learning, and was a distinguished linguist; his reputation as a physician was deservedly great; and he added to these a friendly, tender, amiable disposition, with great simplicity and uprightness of character."

KNEELING. Bending the knees has, in all ages of the world, been considered as an act of reverence and humility, and hence Pliny, the Roman naturalist, observes, that "a certain degree of religious reverence is attributed to the knees of man." Solomon placed himself in this position when he prayed at the consecration of the Temple; and Freemasons use the same posture in some portions of their ceremonies, as a token of solemn reverence. In the act of prayer, Freemasons in the lower Degrees adopt the standing posture, which was the usage of the primitive Church, where it was symbolic of the resurrection; Freemasons in the advanced Degrees generally kneel on one knee.

KNIGHT-NEB-S. The Egyptian goddess personifying the West, facing the East.

KNIFE AND FORK DEGREE. Sometimes called the Fourth Degree. Those Freemasons who take more delight in the refreshments of the banquet than in the labors of the Lodge, and who admire Freemasonry only for its social aspect, are ironically said to be "Members of the Knife and Fork Degree." The sarcasm was first uttered by Dermott, when he said in his Ahiman Rezon (page 36), speaking of the Moderns, that "it was also thought expedient to abolish the old custom of studying geometry in the Lodge; and some of the young brethren made it appear that a good knife and fork in the hands of a dexterous brother, over proper materials, would give greater satisfaction and add more to the rotundity of the Lodge than the best scale and compass in Europe."

KNIGGE, ADOLPH FRANZ FRIEDERICH LUDWIG, BARON VON. He was at one time among the most distinguished Freemasons of Germany; for while Weishaupt was the ostensible inventor and leader of the system of Bavarian Illuminism, it was indebted for its real form and organization to the inventive genius of Knigge. He was born at Brendenbeck, near Hanover, October 16, 1752. He was initiated, January 20, 1772, in a Lodge of Strict Observance at Cassel, but does not appear at first to have been much impressed with the Institution, for, in a letter to Prince Charles of Hesse, he calls its ceremonies "absurd, juggling tricks."

Subsequently his views became changed, at least for a time. When, in 1780, the Marquis de Costanzo was despatched by Weishaupt to Northern Germany to propagate the Order of the Illuminati, he made the acquaintance of Knigge, and succeeded in gaining him as a disciple. Among the Illuminati Knigge was known by the name of Philo. Knigge afterward entered into a correspondence with Weishaupt, in consequence of which his enthusiasm was greatly increased. After some time, in reply to the earnest entreaties of Knigge for more light, Weishaupt confessed that the Order was as yet in an unfinished state, and actually existed only in his own brain; the lower classes alone having been organized. Recognizing Knigge's abilities, he invited him to Bavaria, and promised to surrender to him all the manuscript materials in his possession, that Knigge might out of them, assisted by his own invention, construct the advanced Degrees of the Rite. Knigge accordingly repaired to Bavaria in 1781, and when he met Weishaupt, the latter consented that Knigge should elaborate the whole system up to the highest mysteries. This task Knigge accomplished, and entered into correspondence with the Lodges, exerting all his talents, which were of no mean order, for the advancement of the Rite. He brought to its aid the invaluable labors of Bode, whom he prevailed upon to receive the Degrees.

After Knigge had fully elaborated the system, and secured for it the approval of the Areopagites, he introduced it into his district and began to labor with every prospect of success. But Weishaupt now interfered; and, notwithstanding his compact with Knigge, Chevalier Croisé. Thory says (Acta Latomorum i. page 303) that this is a chivalric Degree, which was communicated to him by a member of the Grand Lodge of Copenhagen. He gives no further account of its character.

KNIGHT ELECT OF FIFTEEN. 1. The Sixteenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, more commonly called Illustrious Elect of the Fifteen (see Elect of Fifteen). 2. The Tenth Degree of the Chapter of Emperors of the East and West. 3. The Eleventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

KNIGHT ELECT OF TWELVE, SUBLIME. The Eleventh Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, sometimes called Twelve Illustrious Knights. After vengeance had been taken upon the traitors mentioned in the Degrees of Elected Knights of Nine and Illustrious Elected of Fifteen, Solomon, to reward those who had exhibited their zeal and fidelity in inflicting the required punishment, as well as to make room for the exaltation of others to the Degree of Illustrious Elected of Fifteen, appointed twelve of these latter, chosen by ballot, to constitute a new Degree, on which he bestowed the name of Sublime Knights Elected, and gave them the command over the twelve tribes of Israel. The Sublime Knights rendered an account each day to Solomon of the work that was done in the Temple by their respective tribes, and received their pay. The Lodge is called a Chapter.

In the old ceremonies Solomon presides, with the title of Thrice Puissant, and instead of Wardens, there are a Grand Inspector and a Master of Ceremonies. In the more modern ceremonial of the Southern Jurisdiction, the Master and Wardens represent Solomon, Hiram of Tyre, and Adoniram, and the style of the Master and Senior Warden is Thrice Illustrious. The room is hung with black, sprinkled with white and red tears. The apron is white, lined and bordered with black, with black strings; on the flap, a flaming heart. The sash is black, with a flaming heart on the breast, suspended from the right shoulder to the left hip. The jewel is a sword of justice.

This is the last of three Elus which are found in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. In the French Rite they have been condensed into one, and make the Fourth Degree of that series, but not, as Ragon admits, with the happiest effect.

KNIGHTHOOD. The Saxon word enist, from which we get the English knight, signified at first a youth, and then a servant, or one who did domestic service, or a soldier who did military service, which might either be on foot or on horseback; but the French word Chevalier and the German Ritter both refer to his equestrian character. Although Tacitus says that the German Kings and Chiefs were attended in war and peace by a select body of faithful servants, and although the Anglo-Saxon Kings and Thanes had their military attendants, who served them with a personal fealty, the knight, in the modern acceptation of the word, did not appear until the establishment in France of the order of chivalry. Thence knighthood rapidly passed into the other countries of Christendom; for it always was a Christian institution. The stages through which a candidate passed until his full... investiture with the rank of knighthood were three: the Page, the Squire or Esquire, and the Knight.

1. The Page. The child who was destined to knighthood continued until he was seven years old in the charge of women, who gave him that care which his tender age required. He was then taken from them and placed in the hands of a governor, who prepared him by a robust and manly education for the labors and dangers of war. He was afterward put into the household of some noble, where he first assumed the title of a Page. His employments were to perform the service of a domestic about the person of his master and mistress; to attend them in the chase, on their journeys, their visits, and their walks; to carry their messages, or even to wait on them at table. The first lessons given to him were in the love of God and attachment to and respect for females. His religious education was not neglected, and he was taught a veneration for all sacred things. His instructions in respect to manners, conversation, and virtuous habits were all intended to prepare him for his future condition as a knight.

2. The Squire. The youth, on emerging from the employment of a Page, took on him that of Squire, called in French Ecuyer. This promotion was not unaccompanied by an appropriate ceremony. The Page who was to be made a Squire was presented to the altar by his father and mother, or by those who represented them, each holding a lighted taper in his hand. The officiating priest took from the altar a sword and belt, on which he bestowed several benedictions, and then placed them on the youth, who from that time constantly wore them. The Squires were divided into various classes, each of whose employment was different. To some, as to the chamberlains, was committed the care of the gold and silver of the household; others, as the constable, had the charge of the table utensils; others were carvers, and others butlers. But the most honorable and the only one connected immediately with chivalry was the Squire of Honor or the Body Squire. He was immediately attached to some knight, whose standard he carried. He helped to dress and undress him, and attended him morning and evening in his apartment. On a march, he led the war-horse of his master and carried his sword, his helmet, and his shield. In the hour of battle, the Squire, although he did not actually take a part in the combat, was not altogether an idle spectator of the contest. In the shock of battle, the two lines of knights, with their lances in rest, fell impetuously on each other; some, who were thrown from their horses, drew their swords or battle-axes to defend themselves and to make new attacks, while advantage was sought by their enemies over those who had been thrown. During all this time, the Squire was attentive to every motion of his master. In the one case, to give him new arms, or to supply him with another horse; to raise him up when he fell, and to ward off the strokes aimed at him; while in the other case, he seconded the knight by every means that his skill, his valor, and his zeal could suggest, always, however, within the strict bounds of the defensive, for the Squire was not permitted by the laws of chivalry to engage in offensive combat with a knight.

3. The Knight. These services merited and generally received from the knight the most grateful ac-knowledgment, and in time the high honor of the badge of knighthood bestowed by his own hand, for every knight possessed the prerogative of making other knights. The age of twenty-one was that in which the youthful Squire, after so many proofs of zeal, fidelity, and valor, might be admitted to the honor of knighthood. The rule as to age was not, however, always observed. Sometimes the Squire was not knighted until he was further advanced in years, and in the case of princes the time was often anticipated. There are instances of infants, the sons of kings, receiving the dignity of knighthood.

The creation of a knight was accompanied by solemn ceremonies, which some writers have been pleased to compare to those of the Church in the administration of its sacraments, and there was, if not a close resemblance, a manifest allusion in the one to the other. The white habit and the bath of the knight corresponded to the form of baptism; the stroke on the neck and the embrace given to the new knight were compared to the ceremony of confirmation; and as the godfather made a present to the child whom he held at the font, so the lord who conferred knighthood was expected to make a gift or grant some peculiar favor to the knight whom he had dubbed. The preliminary ceremonies which prepared the neophyte for the sword of chivalry were as follows: austere fasts; whole nights passed in prayers in a church or chapel; the sacraments of confession, penance, and the eucharist; bathtings, which prefigured purity of manners and life; a white habit as a symbol of the same purity, and in imitation of the custom with new converts on their admission into the Church, and a serious attention to sermons, were all duties of preparation to be devoutly performed by the Squire previous to his being armed with the weapons and decorated with the honors of knighthood.

An old French chronicler thus succinctly details the ceremony of creation and investiture. The neophyte bathes; after which, clothed in white apparel, he is to watch all night in the church, and remain there in prayer until after the celebration of High Mass. The communion being then received, the youth solemnly raises his joined hands and his eyes to heaven, when the priest who had administered the sacrament passes the sword over the neck of the youth and blesses it. The candidate then kneels at the feet of the lord or knight who is to arm him. The lord asks him with what intent he desires to enter into that sacred Order, and if his views tend only to the maintenance and honor of religion and of knighthood. The lord, having received from the candidate a satisfactory reply to these questions, administers the oath of reception, and gives him three strokes on the neck with the flat side of the sword, which he then girds upon him. This scene passes sometimes in a hall or in the court of a palace, or, in time of war, in the open field.

The girding on of the sword was accompanied with these or similar words: "In the name of God, of Saint Michael, and of Saint George, I make thee a Knight: be brave, be hardy, and be loyal." And then the kneeling candidate is struck upon the shoulder or back of the neck by him who confers the dignity, with the flat of the sword, and directed to rise in words like these: "Arise, Sir Damian"; a formula still followed by the sovereigns of England when they confer the honor of knighthood. And hence the word Sir, which is equivalent to the old French Sire, is accounted, says Ashmole, "parcel of their style."

Sir William Segar, in his treatise on Civil and Military Honor, gives the following account of the ceremonies used in England in the sixth century:

A stage was erected in some Cathedral, or spacious place near it, to which the gentleman was conducted to receive the honor of knighthood. Being seated on a chair decorated with green silk, it was demanded of him if he were of a good constitution, and able to undergo the fatigue required in a soldier; also whether he were a man of good morals, and what credible witnesses he could produce to affirm the same.

Then the Bishop or Chief Prelate of the Church administered the following oath:

"Sir, you that desire to receive the honor of knighthood, swear before God and this Holy Book that you will not fight against his Majesty, that you now bestow the order of knighthood upon you. You shall also swear to maintain and defend all Ladies, Gentlemen, Widows and Orphans; and you shall shun no adventure of your person in any war wherein you shall happen to be.

The oath taken, two Lords led him to the King, who drew his sword, and laid it upon his head, saying, "God and Saint George! (or what other saint the King pleased to name)." After which seven Ladies dressed in white came and girt a sword to his side and four knights put on his spurs.

These ceremonies being over, the Queen took him by the right hand, and a Duchess by the left, and leading him to a rich seat, placed him on an ascent, where they seated him, the King sitting on his right hand, and the Queen on his left. Then the Lords and Ladies also sat down upon three descents under the King; and being all thus seated, they were entertained with a delicate collation; and so the ceremony ended.

The manner of arming a newly made knight was first to put on the spurs, then the coat of mail, the cuirass, the brasset or casque, and the gauntlets. The lord or knight conferring the honor then girded on the sword, which last was considered as the most honorable badge of chivalry, and a symbol of the labor that the knight was in future to encounter. It was in fact a symbol of the labor of the Church, and to the protection of Widows, Orphans; and you shall shun no adventure of your person in any war wherein you shall happen to be.

not bestowed upon a squire: and while the wife of the former was called a Lady, that of the latter was only a Gentlewoman. The wife of a knight was sometimes called Militissa, or Female Knight. In their dresses and their harness, knights were entitled to wear gold and golden decorations, while the squires were confined to the use of silver. Knights alone had a right to wear, for the lining of their cloaks and mantles, ermine, sable, and menace, which were the most valuable furs; while those of a less costly kind were for the squires. The long and trailing mantle, of a scarlet color, and lined with ermine or other precious furs, which was called the Mantle of Honor, was especially reserved for the knight. Such a mantle was always presented by the Kings of France to knights whom they created. The mantle was considered the most august and noble decoration that a knight could wear, when he was not dressed in his armor. The official robes still worn by many magistrates in Europe are derived from the knighthly Mantle of Honor. It should be remarked that the Order of Knighthood, and the ceremonies accompanying the investiture of a knight, were of a symbolic character, and are well calculated to remind the Freemason of the symbolic character of his own Institution.

The sword which the knight received was called the Arms of Mercy, and he was told to conquer his enemies by mercy rather than by force of arms. Its blade was two-edged, to remind him that he must maintain chivalry and justice, and contend only for the support of these two chief pillars of the Temple of Honor. The lance represented Truth, because truth, like the lance, is straight. The coat of mail was the symbol of a Fortress erected against vice; for, as castles are surrounded by walls and ditches, the coat of mail is closed in all its parts, and defends the knight against treason, disloyalty, pride, and every other evil passion. The rowels of the spur were given to urge the possessor on to deeds of honor and virtue. The shield, which he places betwixt himself and his enemy, was to remind him that the knight is a shield interposed be¬ tween the prince and the people, to preserve peace and tranquility.

In a Latin manuscript of the thirteenth century, copied by Anstis (Historical Essay on the Knighthood of the Bath, Appendix, page 95), will be found the following symbolical explanation of the ceremonial of knighthood. The bath was a symbol of the washing away of sin by the sacrament of baptism. The bed into which the novice entered and reposed after the bath, was a symbol of the peace of mind which would be acquired by the virtue of chivalry. The white garments with which he was afterward clothed, were a symbol of the purity which a knight should main¬ tain. The scarlet robe put on the newly made knight was symbolic of the blood which he should be ready to shed for Christ and the Church. The dark boots are a sign of the earth, whence we all came, and to which we are all to return. The white belt is a symbol of chastity
The golden spur symbolizes promptitude of action.
The sword is a symbol of severity against the attacks of Satan; its two edges are to teach the knight that he is to defend the poor against the rich, and the weak against the powerful. The white fillet around the head is a symbol of good works. The alapa or blow was in memorial of him who made him a knight.

There was one usage of knighthood which is pec¬ uliarly worthy of attention. The love of glory, which was so inspiring to the knights of chivalry, is apt to produce a spirit of rivalry and emulation that might elsewhere prove the fruitful source of division and discord. But this was prevented by the fraternities of arms so common among the knights. Two knights who had, perhaps, been engaged in the same expedi¬ tions, and had conceived for each other a mutual esteem and confidence, would enter into a solemn compact by which they became and were called Brothers in Arms. Under this compact, they swore to share equally the labors and the glory, the dangers and the profits of all enterprises, and never, under any circumstances, to abandon each other. The brother in arms was to be the enemy of those who were the ene¬ mies of his brother, and the friend of those who were his friends; both of them were to divide their present and future wealth, and to employ that and their lives for the deliverance of each other if taken prisoner.
The claims of a brother in arms were paramount to all others, except those of the sovereign. If the services of a knight were demanded at the same time by a lady and by a brother in arms, the claim of the former gave way to that of the latter. But the duty which was owing to the prince or to the country was preferred to all others, and hence brothers in arms of different nations were only united together so long as their respective sovereigns were at peace, and a declaration of war between two princes dissolved all such confron¬ tations between the subjects of each. But except in this particular case, the bond of brotherhood was indissoluble, and a violation of the oath by which bound two brothers in arms was deemed an act of the greatest infamy. They could not challenge each other.

They even wore in battle the same habits and armor, as if they desired that the enemy should mistake one for the other, and thus that both might incur an equal risk of the dangers with which each was threatened.

Knights were divided into two ranks, namely,
Knights Bachelor and Knights Banneret.

The Knight Bachelor was of the lower rank, and de¬ erved his title most probably from the French bas chevalier. In the days of chivalry, as well as in later times, this dignity was conferred without any refer¬ ce to a qualification of property. Many Knights Bachelor were in fact mere adventurers, unconnected by feudal ties of any sort, who offered their services in war to any successful leader, and found in their sword a means of subsistence, not only by pay and plunder, but in the regularly established system of ransom, which every knight taken in action paid for his liberty. The Knight Bachelor bore instead of a square banner a pointed or triangular ensign, which was forked by being extended in two comets or points, and which was called a pennon. The triangular banner, not forked, was called a pennoncol, and was borne by a squire.

The Knight Banneret, a name derived from bannert, a little banner, was one who possessed many fiefs, landed estates held under feudal tenure, and who was obliged to serve in war with a large attendance of followers.

If a knight was rich and powerful enough to furnish the state or his sovereign with a certain number of armed men, and to entertain them at his own expense, permission was accorded to him to add to his simple designation of Knight or Knight Bachelor, the more noble and exalted title of Knight Banneret. This gave him the right to carry a square banner on the top of his lance. Knights Bachelor were sometimes made Bannerets on the field of battle, and as a reward of their prowess, by the simple ceremony of the sovereign cutting off with his sword the cornets or points of their pennons, thus transforming them into square banners. Clark, in his History of Knighthood (volume i, page 73), thus describes this ceremony in detail:

The King or his General, at the head of his army drawn up in order of battle after a victory, under the royal standard displayed, attended by all the officers and nobility present, receives the knight led between two knights carrying his pennon of arms in his hand, the heralds walking before him, who proclaim his valiant achievements for which he has deserved to be made a Knight Banneret, and to display his banner in the field; then the King or General says to him, Advances toy banneret, meaning Present thy banneret, and causes the point of his pennon to be rent off; then the new knight, having the trumpets before him sounding, the nobility and officers bearing him company, is sent back to his tent, where they are all entertained.

But generally the same ceremonial was used in times of peace at the making of a Knight Banneret as at the institution of barons, viscounts, earls, and the other orders of nobility, with whom they claimed an almost equality of rank.

Not long after the institution of knighthood as an offshoot of chivalry, we find, besides the individual Knights Bachelor and Knights Banneret, associations of knights banded together for some common purpose, of which there were two classes. First: Fraternities possessing property and rights of their own as independent bodies into which knights were admitted as monks were into religious foundations. Of this class may be mentioned, as examples, the three great religious Orders—the Templars, the Hospitalers, and the Teutonic Knights. The second class consisted of honorary associations established by sovereigns within their respective dominions, consisting of members whose only common tie is the possession of the same titular distinction. Such are most of the European Orders of Knighthood of prominence, as the Knights of the Garter in England, the Knights of Saint Andrew in Russia, and the Knights of the Golden Fleece in Spain. The institution of these titular orders of knighthood dates at a much more recent period than that of the Fraternities who constitute the first class, for them a common origin; but these parallels should rather be considered simply as coincidences. The theory first advanced by the Chevalier Ramsay, and adopted by Hund and the disciples of the Rite of Strict Observance, that all Freemasons are Templars, and that Freemasonry is a lineal successor of ancient knighthood, is now rejected as wholly untenable and unsupported by any authentic history. The only connection between knighthood and Freemasonry is that which was instituted after the martyrdom of James de Molay, when the Knights Templar sought concealment and security in the bosom of the Masonic Fraternity.

When one was made a knight, he was said to be dubbed. This is a word in constant use in the medieval manuscripts. In the old Patavian statutes, Miles adobatus, meaning a dubbed knight, is defined to be "one who, by the usual ceremonies, acquires the dignity and profession of chivalry." The Provencial writers constantly employ the term to dub, adouber, and designate a knight who has gone through the ceremony of investiture as un chevalier adobé, a dubbed knight. Thus, in the Romaut d'Auberi, the Lady d'Auberi says to the king:

Sire, dit elle, par Dieu de Paradis
Soit adouber mes frères Auberis.

That is, "Sire, said she, for the love of the God of Paradise, let my brothers of Auberis be dubbed." The meaning of the word then is plain: to dub, is to make or create a knight. But its derivation is not so easily settled amid the conflicting views of writers on the subject. The derivation by Menage from duplex is not worth consideration. Henschell's, from a Provencial word adobare, to equip, although better, is scarcely tenable. The derivation from the Anglo-Saxon dubban, to strike or give a blow, would be reasonable, were it not presumable that the Anglo-Saxons borrowed their word from the French and from the usages of chivalry. It is more likely that dubban came from adouer, than that adouer came from dubban. The Anglo-Saxons took their forms and technicalities of chivalry from the French. After all, the derivation proposed by Du Cange is the most plausible and the one most generally adopted, because it is supported by the best authorities. He says that it is derived from the Latin adoptare, to adopt, "quod qui aliquem arnis instruit ac Militem facit, eum quodammodo adoptat in filium," that is, "He who equips any one with arms, and makes him a knight, adopts him, as it were, as a son." To dub one as a knight is, then, to adopt him into the order of chivalry. The idea was evidently taken from the Roman law of adoptatio, or adoption, where, as in conferring knighthood, a blow on the cheek was given.

The word accolade is another term of chivalry about which there is much misunderstanding. It is now supposed to mean the blow of the sword, given by the knight conferring the dignity, on the neck or shoulder of him who received it. But this is most probably an error. The word is derived, says Brewer (Dictionary of Phrase and Fable), from the Latin ad colum, around the neck, and signifies the embrace "given by the Grand Master when he receives a neophyte or new convert." It was an early custom to confer an embrace and the kiss of peace upon the newly made knight, which ceremony, Ashmole thinks, was called the accolade. Thus, in his History of the Order of the Garter (page 15) he says: "The first Christian kings, at giving the belt, kissed the new knight on the left cheek, saying: In the honor of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, I make you a knight. It was called the osculum pacis, the kiss of favor or of brotherhood, more correctly the kiss of peace, and is presumed, to be the accolade or ceremony of embracing.
which Charles the Great used when he knighted his son Louis the Debonnaire." Johan de Vignay, writing in the fourteenth century, mentions this kiss of peace with the accolade: "Et le Seigneur doit donner une colée en signe de proeste et de hardement, et que il leur souwigne de celui noble homme qu il la fait chevalier. Et done les doit le Seigneur baishier en la bouche en signe de paix et d’amour"; that is "And the lord ought to give him (the newly-made knight) an accolade as a symbol of readiness and boldness, and in memory of the nobleman who has made him a knight; and then the lord ought to kiss him on the mouth as a sign of peace and love."

In an old manuscript in the Cottonian Library, entitled "The manner of makynge Knyghtes after the custome of Engelande," a copy of which is inserted in Anstis’s Historical Essay on the Knighthood of the Bath (Appendix, page 99), is this account of the embrace and kiss, accompanied with a blow on the neck: "Thanne shall the Squyer lift up his armes on high, and the Kyngse shall put his armes about the nekke of the Squyer, and lyftynge up his right hande he shall smyte the Squyer in the nekke, seyeng thus: Be ye a good Knynhte; kissing him." Anstis himself is quite confused in his description of the ceremonial, and enumerates "the blow upon the neck, the accolade, with the embracing and kiss of peace," as if they were distinct and separate ceremonies; but in another part of his book he calls the accolade "the laying hands upon the shoulders." I am inclined to believe, after much research, that both the blow on the neck and the embrace constituted properly the accolade. This blow was sometimes given with the hand, but sometimes with the sword. Anstis says that "the action which fully and finally impresses the character of knighthood is the blow given with the hand upon the neck or shoulder." But he admits (page 73) that there has been a controversy among writers whether the blow was heretofore given with a sword or by the bare hand upon the neck. The mystical signification which Caseneuve gives in his Etymologies (see reference to Accolle in, that book) is ingenious and appropriate, namely, that the blow was given on the neck to remind him who received it that he ought never, by flight from battle, to give an enemy the opportunity of striking him on the same place.

But there was another blow, which was given in the earliest times of chivalry, and which has by some writers been confounded with the accolade, which at length came to be substituted for it. This was the blow on the cheek, or, in common language, the box on the ear, which was given to a knight at his investiture. This blow is never called the accolade by the old writers, but generally the alapa, rarely the gautata. Du Cange says that this blow was sometimes given on the neck, and that then it was called the colaphus, or by the French colé, from col, the neck. Duchesne says the blow was always given with the hand, and not with the sword. Ashmole says:

"It was in the time of Charles the Great the way of knighting by the colaphum, or blow on the ear, used in sign of sustaining future hardships... after returned in Germany and France. Thus William, Earl of Holland, who was to be knighted before he could be emperor, at his being elected king of the Romans, received knighthood by the box of the ear, etc., from John, king of Bohemia, 1247 A.D."

Both the word alapa and the ceremony which it indicated were derived from the form of manumission among the Romans, where the slave on being freed received a blow called alapa on the cheek, characterized by Claudian as felix injuria, a happy injury, to remind him that it was the last blow he was compelled to submit to; for thenceforth he was to be a free man, capable of vindicating his honor from insult. The alapa, in conferring knighthood, was employed with a similar symbolism. Thus in an old Register of 1260, which gives an account of the knighting of Hildebrand by the Lord Ridolfonus, we find this passage, which we give in the original, for the sake of the one word gautata, which is unusual: "Postea Ridolfonus de more dedit illi gautatum et dixit illi. Tu es miles nobilis militiae equestris, et hoc gautata est in recordationem, illius qui te armavit militem, et hoc gautata debet esse ultima injuria, quam patiendae acceptebas." That is: "Afterwards Ridolfonus gave him in the customary way the blow, and said to him: Thou art a noble Knight of the Equestrian Order of Chivalry, and this blow is given in memory of him who hast armed thee as a knight, and it must be the last injury which thou shalt patiently endure." The first reason assigned for this blow refers to an old custom of cuffing the witnesses to a transaction, to impress it on their memory. Thus, by the riparian law, when there was a sale of land, some twelve witnesses were collected to see the transfer of property and the payment of the price, and each received a box on the ear, that he might thus the better remember the occurrence. So the knight received the blow to make him remember the time of his receiving his knighthood and the person who conferred it.

We may here insert a paragraph in Brother Mackey’s article to mention the connection with the blow given to the new made knight and the similar reminder given to the boys in the old and surviving custom in England of “beating the bounds,” a periodical ceremony of visiting parish landmarks when the boys are whipped and sometimes bumped on the head to make their recollections the more permanent.

For the commission of crime, more especially for disloyalty to his sovereign, a knight might be degraded from the Order; and this act of degradation was accompanied with many ceremonies, the chief of which was the hacking off his spurs. This was to be done for greater infamy, not by a knight, but by the master cook. Thus Stow says that, at the making of Knights of the Bath, the king’s master cook stood at the door of the chapel, and said to each knight as he entered, “Sir Knight, look that you be true and loyal to the King my Master, or else I must bese these spurs from your heel.” His shield too was reversed, and the heralds had certain marks called abatements, which they placed on it to indicate his dishonor.

Monsieur de Saint Palaye concludes his learned and exhaustive Mémoires sur l’ancienne Chevalerie with this truthful tribute to that spirit of chivalry in which ancient knighthood found its birth, and with it we may appropriately close this article:

"It is certain that chivalry, in its earliest period, tended to promote order and good morals; and although it was in some respects imperfect, yet it produced the most accomplished models of public valor and of those pacific and gentle virtues that are the ornaments of domestic life; and it is worthy of consideration, that in an age of..."
KNIGHT HOSPITALER. See Knight of Malta.

KNIGHT, ILLUSTRIOUS or ILLUSTRIOUS ELECT. The French names are Chevalier Illustré or Élu Illustré. The Thirteenth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

KNIGHT JUPITER. The French title is Le Chevalier Jupiter. The Seventy-eighth Degree of the collection of Peuvret.

KNIGHT KADOSH, formerly called Grand Elect Knight Kadosh, and in French, Grand Élu du Chevalier Kadosh. The Knight Kadosh is the Thirtieth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, called also Knight of the White and Black Eagle. While retaining the general Templar doctrine of the Kadosh system, it symbolizes and humanizes the old lesson of vengeance. It is the most popular of all the Kadoshes. In the Knight Kadosh of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, the meetings are called Councils. The principal officers are, according to the modern practise, a Commander, two Lieutenant Commanders, called also Prior and Preceptor; a Chancellor, Orator, Almoner, Recorder, and Treasurer. The jewel, as described in the instructions of the Southern Supreme Council, is a double-headed eagle, displayed resting on a Teutonic cross, the eagle silver, the cross gold enamelled red. The Northern Supreme Council has used instead of the eagle the letters J. B. M. The Kadoshes, as representatives of the Templars, adopt the Beausant as their standard. In this Degree, as in all the other Kadoshes, we find the mystical ladder of seven steps.

KNIGHT KADOSH OF CROMWELL. Ragon says of this (in his T’ulier, page 171), that it is a pretended Degree, of which he has four copies, and that it appears to be a monstrosity invented by an enemy of Masonic knighthood derived from the system of the Clerks of Strict Observance, called also Knight of Chivalry miles. In fact, although the English, German, French writers always called a Knight of Chivalry miles, Masonic ritualist, the titles would have been Eques Templarius and Eques Melitae. The word, or Masonic Knight, is therefore not, in the heraldic sense, a knight at all. The word is used simply to denote a position higher than that of a Master; a position calling, like the dension of knighthood, for the performance of special duties. As the word Prince in Masonic language, denotes not one of princely rank, but one invested with a share of Masonic sovereignty and command, so Knight denotes one who is expected to be distinguished with peculiar fidelity to the cause in which he has enlisted. It is simply, as has been said, a point of rank above that of the Master Mason. It is, therefore, confined to the higher Degrees.

KNIGHT OF ASIA, INITIATED. See Asia, Initiated Knights of.

KNIGHT OF ATHENS. The French name is Chevalier d’Athènes. 1. The Fifty-second Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. 2. A Degree in the nomenclature of Fustier. 3. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Rite in France.

KNIGHT OF BENEFFICE. The French expression is Chevalier de la Bienfaisance. The Fortyninth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France. It is also called Knight of Perfect Silence.

KNIGHT OF BRIGHTNESS. The French title is Chevalier de la Clarté. The Seventh and last Degree of the system of the Clerks of Strict Observance, called also Magus.

KNIGHT OF CHRIST. After the dissolution of the Templars in the fourteenth century, those knights who resided in Portugal retained the possessions of the Order in that country, and perpetuated it under the name of the Knights of Christ. Their badge is a red cross pattée, a cross with spreading ends, charged with a plain white cross (see Christ, Order of).

KNIGHT OF CONSTANTINOPLE. A side Degree; instituted, doubtless, by some lecturer; teaching, however, an excellent moral lesson of humility. Its history has no connection whatever with Freemasonry. The Degree is not very extensively diffused; but several Freemasons, especially in the Western States, in the days of Brother Mackey were, as he here says, in possession of it. The Degree has had some vogue in Europe. It may be conferred by any Master Mason on another; although the proper performance of the ceremonies requires the assistance of several. When the Degree is formally conferred, the Body is called a Council, and consists of the following officers: Illustrious Sovereign, Chief of the Artisans, Seneschal, Conductor, Prefect of the Palace, and Captain of the Guards.

KNIGHT OF HOPE. 1. A species of androgynous Freemasonry, formerly practised in France. The female members were called Dames or Ladies of Hope. 2. A synonym for Knight of the Morning Star, which see.
KNIGHT OF IRIS. The French name is Chevalier de l'Iris. The Fourth Degree of the Hermetic Rite of Montpellier.

KNIGHT OF JERUSALEM. The name in French is Chevalier de Jerusalem. The Sixty-fifth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

KNIGHT OF JUSTICE. Knights Hospitaller of Saint John of Jerusalem or Knights of Malta were called, in the technical language of the Order, Knights of Justice.

KNIGHT OF MALTA, MASONIC. The Degree of Knight of Malta is conferred in the United States as an Appendant Order in a Commandery of Knights Templar. There is a ceremonial attached to the Degree but in the time of Brother Mackey, the writer of this essay, very few were in possession of it, and it was generally communicated after the candidate has been created a Knight Templar; the ceremony consisting generally only in the reading of the passage of Scripture prescribed in the Monitors, and the communication of the modes of recognition.

How anything so anomalous in history as the commingling in one Body of Knights Templar and Knights of Malta, and making the same person a representative of both Orders, first arose, it is now difficult to determine. It was, most probably, a device of Brother Thomas Smith Webb, and was, it may be supposed, one of the results of a too great fondness for the accumulation of Degrees. Mitchell (History of Freemasonry ii, page 83) says: "The Degree, so called, of Malta, or Saint John of Jerusalem, crept in, we suppose, by means of a bungler, who, not knowing enough of the ritual to confer it properly, satisfied himself by simply adding a few words in the ceremony of dubbing; and thus, by the addition of a few signs and words but imperfectly understood, constituted a Knight Templar also a Knight of Malta, and so the matter stands to this day." Doctor Mackey was not generally inclined to place much confidence in Mitchell as a historian; yet he could not help thinking that in this instance his guess is not very far from the truth, although, as usual with him, in Brother Mackey's opinion, there is a tinge of exaggeration in his statement.

There is evidence that the Degree was introduced at a very early period into the Freemasonry of the United States. In the Constitution of the United States Grand Encampment, adopted in 1803, one section enumerates: "Encampments of Knights of Malta, Knights Templar, and Councils of Knights of the Red Cross," now Companions of the Red Cross. It will be observed that the Knight of Malta precedes the Knight Templar; whereas, in the more recent system, the former was made the ultimate Degree of the series. Yet, in this Constitution, no further notice is taken of the Degree; for while the fees for the Red Cross and the Templar Degrees are prescribed, there is no reference to any to be paid for that of Malta.

In the revised Constitution of 1816, the order of the series was changed to Red Cross, Templar, and Malta, which arrangement was long maintained. The Knights of Malta are designated as one of the Appendant Orders, a title and a subordinate position which the pride of the old Knights of Malta would hardly have permitted them to accept.

Doctor Mackey held that in 1856 the Knights Templar of the United States had become convinced that the incorporation of the Order of Malta with the Knights Templar, and making the same person the possessor of both Orders, was so absurd a violation of all historic truth, that at the session of the Grand Encampment of the United States in that year, at Hartford, Connecticut, on the suggestion of Doctor Mackey, the Degree was unanimously stricken from the Constitution; but at the session of 1862, in Columbus, Ohio, it was, as Doctor Mackey thought, without due consideration, restored, and was again communicated in the Commanderies of Knights Templar.

A few further comments, in addition to the above remarks by Doctor Mackey, may be inserted here regarding the status of the Knights of Malta at various times when the matter has come up for consideration by the Grand Encampment Knights Templar of the United States. Sir William S. Gardner, then Deputy Grand Master, reported to the seventeenth Triennial Convocation at St. Louis, Missouri, 1858, that several historical documents formerly belonging to Brother Thomas Smith Webb had come to light. These valuable papers were assigned to the archives of Saint John's Encampment at Providence, Rhode Island. Brother Gardner made copies of the original Constitution which was in the handwriting of Brother Webb and was careful to note the erasures and other changes. From these memoranda (Proceedings, 1856-85, Washington, 1891, pages 339-47) we may take the last sentence of Article 3, Of Subordinate Encampments, as it was first written:

"The order of succession shall be as follows, viz., after next to the Royal Arch shall be the Order of Knights of the Red Cross, then Knights Templar, and Knights of Malta."

Some parts were altered by Brother Webb in his own copy which then as amended by him became as follows:

"The rule of succession in the Order of Knighthood shall be as follows, viz., Knights of the Red Cross, Knights Templar, Knights of Malta."

At the Convocation of Columbus, Ohio, 1865, Grand Master B. B. French expressed his hope that the Constitution should read "Knight of the Red Cross, Knight of Malta, Templar," adding in his official report "For it has always been incomprehensible to me why the Order of the Temple should be placed so as to appear subordinate to that of Malta, when in fact it is not so" (page 241, Proceedings, 1891 edition). However, the Committee reported (page 254) at that Convocation:

"That they desire, if possible, to restore the Order of Malta to its original position, as appendant to the Order of the Temple, which it had always held prior to 1866. Prior to that time the Order was always recognized in the Constitution, and was conferred, in some form, on Sir Knights who had received the Order of the Temple. Your Committee believe that, should it be placed in the order of its conferring, after the Red Cross and before the Order of the Temple, we should thereby give new cause of offence to those Sir Knights who have been accustomed to practice after the old and familiar manner; and be the means of introducing new difficulties, and disturbing the harmony which should ever be cultivated in our asylums. Your Committee, therefore, recommend that Article II, Section 2, of General Regulations be amended, by adding after the words Knight Templar, the words and Knight of Malta."
This report was at once adopted by the Grand Encampment, and thus the phrasing then came back to Brother Webb's first version, the only difference being that the Committee's words were in the singular, Webb's in the plural, the meaning being identical for all practical purposes. Another Committee at the same session recommended that the third time in the rule of succession should be "Knights of Malta." On the following day the question again arose and the paragraph (Constitutions, page 94, 1862) under consideration was amended (Proceedings, page 263, 1891 edition) to read:

The rule of succession in conferring the Order of Knighthood shall be as follows:
1. Knight of the Red Cross; 2. Knight Templar and Knight of Malta.

However, in 1916 the rule of succession in conferring the Orders was so changed as to require the Order of Malta to be conferred before the Order of the Temple (Sidelights on Templar Law, Brother L. P. Newby, 1919, page 107).

Doctor Mackey continues from this point to develop his argument against the use of the Order of Malta with that of the Order of the Temple. There is no fact in history better known than that there existed from their very birth a rivalry between the two Orders of the Temple and of Saint John of Jerusalem, which sometimes burst forth into open hostility. Porter says (History of the Knights of Malta i, page 107), speaking of the dissensions of the two Orders, "instead of confining their rivalry to a friendly emulation, whilst combating against their common foe, they appeared more intent upon thwarting and frustrating each other, than in opposing the Saracen."

To such an extent had the quarrels of the two Orders proceeded, that Pope Alexander III, found it necessary to interfere; and in 1179 a hollow truce was signed by the rival houses of the Temple and the Hospital; the terms of which were, however, never strictly observed by either side. On the dissolution of the Templars so much of their possessions as were not confiscated to public use were given by the sovereigns of Europe to the Knights of Malta, who accepted the gift without compunction. And there is a tradition that the surviving Templars, indignant at the spoliation and at the mercenary act of their old rivals in willingly becoming a party to the robbery, solemnly registered a vow never thereafter to recognize them as friends. The attempt to make a modern Knight Templar accept initiation into a hated and antagonistic Order is in Doctor Mackey's opinion to display a lamentable ignorance of the facts of history.

Another reason urged by Doctor Mackey why the Degree of Knight of Malta should be rejected from the Masonic system is that the ancient Order never was a secret association. Its rites of reception were open and public, wholly unlike anything in Freemasonry. In fact, historians have believed that the favor shown to the Hospitallers, and the persecutions waged against the Templars, are to be attributed to the fact that the latter Order had a secret system of initiation which did not exist in the former. The ceremony of reception, the signs and words as modes of recognition now practised in the modern Masonic ceremonial, are all a mere invention of a very recent date. The old knights knew nothing of such a system.

A third, and perhaps the best reason, in the opinion of Doctor Mackey, for rejecting the Knights of Malta as a Masonic Degree is to be found in the fact that the Order still exists, although in a somewhat decayed condition; and that its members, claiming an uninterrupted descent from the Knights who, with Hompesch, left the island of Malta in 1797, and threw themselves under the protection of Paul of Russia, utterly disclaim any connection with the Freemasons, and almost contemptuously repudiate the so-called Masonic branch of the Order. In 1858, a manifesto was issued by the supreme authority of the Order, dated from "the Magisterial Palace of the Sacred Order" at Rome, which, after stating that the Order, as it then existed, consisted only of the Grand Priories in the Langues of Italy and Germany, the knights in Prussia, who trace descent from the Grand Bailiwick of Brandenburg, and a few other knights who had been legally received by the Mastership and Council, declares that:

Beyond and out of the above-mentioned Langues and Provinces, and excepting the knights created and constituted as aforesaid, all those who may so call or entitle themselves are legally ignored by our Sacred Order.

There is no room there provided for the so-called Masonic Knights of Malta. But a writer in Notes and Queries (Third Series iii, page 413), who professes to be in possession of the Degree, says, in reply to an inquiry, that the Masonic Degree "has nothing whatsoever to do with the Knights Hospitaler of Saint John of Jerusalem." This is most undoubtedly true in reference to the American Degree. Neither in its form, its ceremony, the objects it professes, its tradition, nor its historical relations, is it in the slightest degree assimilated to the ancient Order of Rhodes, and, finally, Knights of Malta. To claim, therefore, to be the modern representatives of that Order, to wear its dress, to adopt its insignia, to flaunt its banners, and to leave the world to believe that the one is but the uninterrupted continuation of the other, are acts which must be regarded as a very ridiculous assumption, if not actually entitled to a less courteous appellation. For all these reasons, Doctor Mackey thought that it is much to be regretted that the action of the Grand Encampment in repudiating the Degree in 1856 was reversed in 1862. The Degree in Doctor Mackey's estimation has no historical or traditional connection with Freemasonry; holds no proper place in a Commandery of Templars, and ought to be wiped out of the catalogue of Masonic Degrees.

Brother E. E. Cauthorne says of the above comments:

A different view is now generally held by Templars regarding the Knights of Malta, and a modified ritual has been adopted from the Canadian Work where the Malta is the principal degree of the Priories. The adoption of this ritual among the Commanderies of America is optional, but when once adopted must be conformed to in their work. This change was brought about by the visiting influence from Canada and also the reasons for the Malta being a degree of chivalry. For a similar reason the Knights of the Red Cross has been justly changed to Companion of the Red Cross, and properly never deserved a place in the degrees of chivalry, as the Ritual plainly shows.

But in the few years since Brother Cauthorne's remarks were written the Grand Encampment enacted that the Ritual cannot be altered, extended or Abridged except by the Grand Encampment, and no part of the Ritual can be omitted when conferring the Orders (see Proceedings 1913 and 1916, also Side-lights on Templar Law, Brother L. P. Newby, 1919, page 95). The Order of Malta may be conferred in full or short form (Constitution 1927, page 27).

KNIGHT OF MASONRY, TERRIBLE. The French name is Chevalier Terrible de la Maçonnerie. A Degree contained in the collection of Le Page.

KNIGHT OF PALESTINE. The French name is Chevalier de la Palestine. 1. The Sixty-third Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. 2. The Ninth Degree of the Reform of Saint Martin. 3. One of the series of Degrees formerly given in the Baldwyn Encampment of England, and said to have been introduced into Bristol in 1800, by some French refugees under the authority of the Grand Orient of France.

KNIGHT OF PATMOS. An apocalyptic Degree mentioned by Brother Oliver in his Landmarks. It refers, he says, to the banishment of Saint John (see Council of the Allied Masonic Degrees).

KNIGHT OF PERFUMES. The French title is Chevalier des Parfums. The Eighth Degree of the Rite of the East, Rite d'Orient, according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF PURE TRUTH. The name in French is Chevalier de la Pur Vérité. Thory mentions this as a secret society instituted by the scholars of the Jesuitical College at Tulle. It could scarcely have been Masonic in such an institution.

KNIGHT OF PURITY AND LIGHT. The German name is Ritter der Klärheit und des Licht. The Seventh and last Degree of the Rite of the Clerks of Strict Observance, which see.

KNIGHT OF RHODES. 1. One of the titles given to the Knights Hospitaller in consequence of their long residence on the island of Rhodes. 2. A Degree conferred in the Baldwyn Encampment at Bristol, England. It seems in some way to have been confounded with the Mediterranean Pass.

KNIGHT OF ROSE CROIX. See Rose Croix.

KNIGHT OF SAINT ANDREW, FREE. The French title is Chevalier libre de Saint-André. A Degree found in the collection of Pyron.

KNIGHT OF SAINT ANDREW, GRAND SCOT-TISH. In French the title is Grand Ecossais de Saint-André. Sometimes called Patriarch of the Crusades. The Twenty-ninth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Its instructions are founded on a legend, usually credited to the Chevalier Ramsay, to this effect: that the Freemasons were originally a society of knights founded in Palestine for the purpose of building Christian churches; that the Saracens, to prevent the execution of this design, sent emissaries among them, who disguised themselves as Christians, and were continually throwing obstacles in their way; that on discovering the existence of these spies, the knights instituted certain modes of recognition to serve as the means of detection; that they also adopted symbolic ceremonies for the purpose of instructing the proselytes who had entered the society in the forms and principles of their new religion; and finally, that the Saracens, having become too powerful for the knights any longer to contend with them, they had accepted the invitation of a King of England, and had removed into his dominions, where they thenceforth devoted themselves to the cultivation of architecture and the fine arts.

On this mythical legend, which in reality was only an application of Ramsay's theory of the origin of Freemasonry, the Baron de Tschoudy is said, about the middle of the eighteenth century, to have formed this Degree, which Ragon says (Orthodoxie Maçonique, page 138), at his death, in 1769, he bequeathed manuscript to the Council of Emperors of the East and West. On the subsequent extension of the twenty-five Degrees of the Rite of Perfection, instituted by that Body, to the thirty-three Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, this Degree was adopted as the twenty-ninth, and as an appropriate introduction to the Knights of Kadosh, which it immediately precedes. Hence the jewel, a Saint Andrew's cross, is said, by Ragon, to be only a concealed form of the Templar Cross. In allusion to the time of its supposed invention, it has been called Patriarch of the Crusades. On account of the Masonic instruction which it contains, it also sometimes receives the title of Grand Master of Light.

The Lodge is decorated with red hangings supported by white columns. There are eighty-one lights, arranged as follows: four in each corner before a Saint Andrew's cross, two before the altar, and sixty-three arranged by nines in seven different parts of the room. There are three officers, a Venerable Grand Master and two Wardens. The jewel is a Saint Andrew's Cross, appropriately decorated, and suspended from a green collar bordered with red. In the ceremonies of the Southern Jurisdiction, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, the leading idea of a communication between the Christian Knights and the Saracens has been preserved; but the ceremonies and the legend have been altered. The lesson intended to be taught is toleration of religion. This Degree also constitutes the sixty-third of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France; the fifth of the Rite of Clerks of Strict Observance; and the twenty-first of the Rite of Mizraim. It is also to be found in many other systems.

KNIGHT OF SAINT ANDREW OF THE THISTLE. In French the name is Chevalier Ecossais de Saint André du Chardon. The Seventy-fifth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

KNIGHT OF SAINT JOHN OF JERUSALEM. 1. The original title of the Knights of Malta, and derived from the church and monastery built at Jerusalem in 1048 by the founders of the Order, and dedicated to Saint John the Baptist (see Knight of Malta). 2. A mystical Degree divided into three sections, which is found in the collection of Le Manueau.

KNIGHT OF SAINT JOHN OF PALESTINE. The French name is Chevalier de Saint Jean de la Palestine. The Forty-eighth Degree of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

KNIGHT OF THE ALTAR. The French name is Chevalier de l'Autel. The Twelfth Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE AMERICAN EAGLE. An honorary Degree invented many years ago in Texas or some other of the Western States. It was founded on incidents of the American Revolution, and gave an absurd legend of Hiram Abif's boyhood. It is believed to be now obsolete.

KNIGHT OF THE ANCHOR. The French name is Chevalier de l'Ancre. 1. An androgynous, both sexes, Degree (see Anchor, Order of Knights and Ladies of the). 2. The Twenty-first Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

KNIGHT OF THE APE AND LION. Brother Giudicco says (Freimaurer-Lexikon) that this Order appeared about the year 1750, but that its existence was only made known by its extinction. It adopted the lion sleeping with open eyes as a symbol of watchfulness, and the ape as a symbol of those who imitate without due penetration. The members boasted that they possessed all the secrets of the ancient Templars, on which account they were persecuted by the modern Order. The lion and ape, as symbols of courage and address, are found in one of the Degrees described in the Franc-Macons Eerases, an anti-Masonic book published at Amsterdam, 1746, the title meaning in English Freemasons Crushed.

KNIGHT OF THE ARCH. The French name is Chevalier de l'Arche. A Degree found in the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE ARGONAUTS. The French name is Chevalier des Argonautes. The first point of the Sixth Degree, or Knight of the Golden Fleece of the Hermes Rite of Montpellier.

KNIGHT OF THE BANQUETING TABLE OF THE SEVEN SAGES. The French name is Chevalier de la Table du Banquet des Sept Sages. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

KNIGHT OF THE BLACK EAGLE. The French name is Chevalier de l'Aigle Noir. 1. The Seventy-sixth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France; called also Grand Inquisitor, Grand Inspector, Grand Elu or Elect, in the collection of Le Rouge. 2. The Thirty-eighth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

KNIGHT OF THE BRAZEN SERPENT. The French name is Chevalier du Serpent d'Airain. The Twenty-fifth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. The history of this Degree is founded upon the circumstances related in Numbers xxvi 6–9.

And the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died. Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned; for we have spoken against the Lord, and against thee: pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents which are bitting us. And Moses cried to the Lord, and he made a serpent, and put it upon a pole; and it shall come to pass, that every one that shall look upon it shall live. And the Lord said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that shall look upon it shall live. And he said unto Moses, If a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.

There is an old legend which says that this Degree was founded in the time of the Crusades, by John Ralph, who established the Order in the Holy Land as a military and monastic society, and gave it the name of the Brazen Serpent, because it was a part of their obligation to receive and gratuitously nurse sick travelers, to protect them against the attacks of the Saracens, and escort them safely to Palestine; thus alluding to the healing and saving virtues of the Brazen Serpent among the Israelites in the wilderness.

KNIGHT OF THE BURNING BUSH. The name in French is Chevalier du Buisson Ardent. A theosophic Degree of the collection of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

KNIGHT OF THE CABALA. The French name is Chevalier de la Cabale. The Eighth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

KNIGHT OF THE CHANUCA. In French the name is Chevalier de la Kanuka. The Sixty-ninth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. The τέσσαρος νῆσος, or Chanuka, is the Feast of the Dedication celebrated by the Jews in commemoration of the dedication of the Temple by Judas Maccabaeus after its pollution by the Syrians. In the instructions of the Degree, the Jewish lighting of seven lamps, one on each day, is imitated, and therefore the ceremony of initiation lasts for seven days.

KNIGHT OF THE CHRISTIAN MARK. Called also Guard of the Conclave. A Degree formerly conferred in the United States on Knights Templar in a Body called a Council of the Trinity. The legend of the Order is that it was organized by Pope Alexander for the defense of his person, and that its members were selected from the Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem. In the ceremonies there is a reference to the Tau Cross or mark on the forehead, spoken of by the prophet Ezekiel, and hence the name of the degree. The Latin motto of the Order is, "Christus regnat, vincit, triumphat; Rex regnantium, Dominus dominantium," meaning Christ reigns, conquers, and triumphs; King of kings and Lord of lords.

KNIGHT OF THE COLUMNS. The French name is Chevalier des Colonnes. The Seventh Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE COMET. The French name is Chevalier de la Comète. A Degree found in the collection of Hécart.

KNIGHT OF THE CORK. The French name is Chevalier du Bouchon. An androgynous, both sexes, secret society established in Italy after the Papal Bull excommunicating the Freemasons, and intended by its founders to take the place of the Masonic...

KNIGHT OF THE COURTS. The French title is Chevalier des Paris. The Third Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE CROWN. The French title is Chevalier de la Couronne. A Degree in the collection of Pyron.

KNIGHT OF THE DOOR. The French title is Chevalier de la Porte. The Fourth Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE DOVE. The Knights and Ladies of the Dove, the name in French is Chevaliers et Chevalieres de la Colombe, was an androgynous, both sexes, secret society framed on the model of Freemasonry, and instituted at Versailles in 1784. It had but an ephemeral existence.

KNIGHT OF THE EAST. The French title is Chevalier de la Couronne. A Degree in the collection of Pyron.

KNIGHT OF THE EAGLE. The name in French is Chevalier de l'Aigle. 1. The First Degree of the Chapter of Clermont. 2. The Third Degree of the Clerks of Strict Observance. 3. The Fifty-sixth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France. 4. It was also one of the Degrees of the Chapter of the Grand Lodge Royal York of Berlin. 5. The Thirty-seventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. Thory (Acta Latomorum i, page 291) says it was also one of the appellations of the Degree more commonly called Perfect Master in Architecture, which is the Fourteenth of the Primitive Scottish Rite, and is found also in some other systems.

KNIGHT OF THE EAST AND WEST. The French title is Chevalier d'Orient et d'Occident. 1. The Seventeenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. The oldest instructions of the Degree were very imperfect, and did not connect it with Freemasonry. They contained a legend that upon the return of the knights from the Holy Land, in the time of the Crusaders, they organized the Order, and that in the year 1118 the first knights, to the number of eleven, took their vows between the hands of Garinus, Patriarch. The allusion, here, is evidently to the Knights Templar; and this legend would most probably indicate that the Degree originated with the Templar system of Ramsay. This theory is further strengthened by the other legend, that the Knights of the East represented the Freemasons who remained in the East after the building of the first Temple, while the Knights of the East and West represented those who traveled West and disseminated the Order over Europe, but who returned during the Crusades and reunited with their ancient Brethren, whence we get the name. The modern instruction as used in the United States has been greatly enlarged. It still retains the apocalyptic character of the Degree which always attached to it, of ceremonies adopted by the Supreme Councils of the United States. The cordon of a Knight of the East is a broad green watered ribbon, worn as a baldric from left to right. The sash or girdle is of white watered silk, edged above, and fringed below with gold. On it is embroidered a bridge, with the letters L. D. P. (see Liberty of Passage) on the arch, and also on other parts of the girdle human heads, and mutilated limbs, and crowns, and swords. The apron is crimson, edged with green, a bleeding head and two swords crossed on the flap, and on the apron three triangles interlaced formed of triangular links of chains. The jewel is three triangles interlaced enclosing two naked swords. Scripture and the traditions of the Order furnish us with many interesting facts in relation to this Degree. The Knights of the East are said to derive their origin from the captivity of the Israelites in Babylon. After seventy-two years of servitude, they were restored to liberty by Cyrus, King of Persia, through the intercession of Zerubbabel, a Prince of the tribe of Judah, and Nehemias, a holy man of a distinguished family, and permitted to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the Temple.

2. It is the Sixth Degree of the French Rite. It is substantially the same as the preceding Degree.

3. The Sixth Degree of the old system of the Royal York Lodge of Berlin.

4. The Fifteenth Degree of the Chapter of the Emperors of the East and West, and this was most probably the original Degree.

5. The Fifty-second Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

6. The Forty-first Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

7. The Sixth Degree of the Rite of Philalethes.

8. The Eleventh Degree of the Adonhiramite Rite.

9. It is also substantially the Tenth Degree, or Knight of the Red Cross of the American Rite. Indeed, it is found in all the Rites and systems which refer to the second Temple.

Temple signified the three vows of the Knights; they interpreted the two pillars of the porch and their symbols of the former to the latter system. The Order professed the Rite and afterward adopted at Wilhelmsbad, whence it a profus field for the hautes grades, advanced Degrees, of the Lodge of Chevaliers Bienfaisants. The Sixth Degree of the Hermetic Rite of Montpellier. The French name is Chevalier de la Grande Arche. A Degree which Thory (Acta Latomorum i, page 295) says is contained in the Archives of the Lodge of Saint Louis des Amis Réunis in Calais. The Masonic legend that it was instituted by Saint Helena, the mother of Constantine, in 302, after she had visited Jerusalem and discovered the cross, and that, in 304, it was confirmed by Pope Marcellinus, is altogether apocryphal. The military Order of Knights of the Holy Sepulcher still exists; and Curzon, in his Visits to the Monasteries in the Levant, states that the Order is still conferred in Jerusalem, but only on Roman Catholics of noble birth, by the Reverendissimo or Superior of the Franciscans, and that the accolade, or blow of knighthood, is bestowed with the sword of Godfrey de Bouillon, which is preserved, with his spurs, in the sacristy of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher. Madame Pfeiffer, in her Travels in the Holy Land, confirms this account. Doctor Heylin says that the Order was instituted in 1099, when Jerusalem was regained from the Saracens by Philip of France. Faryn, in his Théâtre d'Honneur, gives a different account of the institution. He says that while the Saracens possessed the city they permitted certain canons regular of Saint Augustine to have the custody of the Holy Sepulcher. Afterward Baldwin, King of Jerusalem, made them Men-of-Arms and Knights of the Holy Sepulcher, and ordained that they should continue to wear their white habits, and on the breast his own arms, which were a red cross potent between four Jerusalem crosses. Their rule was confirmed by Pope Innocent III. The Grand Master was the Patriarch of Jerusalem. They engaged to fight against infidels, to protect pilgrims, to redeem Christian captives, hear Mass every day, recite the hours of the cross, and bear the five red crosses in memory of our Savior's wounds. On the loss of the Holy Land, they retired to Perugia, in Italy, where they retained their white habit, but assumed a double red cross. In 1484, they were incorporated with the Knights Hospitaler, who were then at Rhodes, but in 1496, Alexander VI assumed, for himself and the Popes his successors, the Grand Mastership, and empowered the Guardian of the Holy Sepulcher to bestow Knighthood of the Order upon pilgrims. Unsuccessful attempts were made by Philip II, of Spain, in 1558, and the Duke of Nevers, in 1625, to restore the Order. It is now found only in Jerusalem, where it is conferred, as has been already said, by the Superior of the Franciscans.

2. It is also the Fiftieth Degree of the Metropolitan Chapter of France. KNIGHT OF THE INTERIOR. In French the name is Chevalier de l'Intérieur. The Fifth Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.
KNIGHT OF THE LILIES OF THE VALLEY.
This was a Degree conferred by the Grand Orient of France as an appendage to Templarism. The Knights Templar who received it were constituted Knights Commanders.

KNIGHT OF THE LION. The French name is Chevalier du Léon. The Twentieth Degree of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

KNIGHT OF THE MEDITERRANEAN PASS.
An honorary Degree that was formerly conferred in Encampments of Knights Templar, but was later on disused. Its meetings were called Councils; and its ritual, which was very impressive, supplies the tradition that it was founded about the year 1367, in consequence of certain events which occurred to the knights when the bridge was attacked by a large body of Saracens, under the command of the renowned Amurat I. The Saracens had concealed themselves in ambush, and when the knights were on the middle of the bridge which spanned the river, they were attacked by a sudden charge of their enemies upon both extremities of the bridge. A long and sanguinary contest ensued; the knights fought with their usual valor, and were at length victorious. The Saracens were defeated with such immense slaughter that fifteen hundred of their dead bodies encumbered the bridge, and the river was literally stained with their blood. In commemoration of this event, and as a reward for their valor, the victorious knights had free permission to pass and repass in all the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea without danger of molestation, whence the name of the Degree is derived. As the latter part of this legend has not been verified by voyagers in the Mediterranean, the Degree, as a separate ceremony, has long been disused. Doctor Mackey says that he had a letter from Brother Webb (page 123, 1812 edition) that he understood nothing of its true symbolism.

KNIGHT OF THE NORTH.
The French title is Chevalier du Nord. A Degree in the Archives of the Royal Arch of the York and American Rites, its symbolic design is the same, for one common thought of a treasure lost and found pervades them all. Vassal, who is exceedingly flippant in much that he has written of Eccosism, says of this degree, that, "considered under its moral and religious aspects, it offers nothing either instructive or useful." It is evident that he understood nothing of its true symbolism.

KNIGHT OF THE PHENIX.
The French name is Chevalier du Phénix. The Fourth Degree of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

KNIGHT OF THE PRUSSIAN EAGLE.
The French name is Chevalier de l'Aigle Prussien. A Degree in the collection of Héwart.

KNIGHT OF THE PYRAMID.
The French name is Chevalier de la Pyramide. The Sixteenth Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE RAINBOW.
The French name is Chevalier de l'Arc-en-Ciel. The Sixty-eighth Degree of the Cabalistic Rite.

KNIGHT OF THE RED CROSS.
This Degree, whose legend dates it far anterior to the Christian era, and in the reign of Darius, has no analogy with the Chivalric Orders of Knighthood. It is purely Masonic, and intimately connected with the Royal Arch Degree, of which, in fact, it ought rightly to be considered as an appendage. It is, however, now always conferred in a Commandery of Knights Templar in the United States, and is given as a preliminary to reception in that Degree. Formerly, the Degree was sometimes conferred in an independent council, which Brother Webb (page 123, 1812 edition) defines to be "a Council that derives its authority immediately from the Grand Encampment unconnected with an Encampment of Knights Templar." The Embassy of Zerubbabel and four other Jewish chiefs to the court of Darius to obtain the protection around which is inscribed the following letters: R. S. R. S. T. P. S. R. I. A. Y. E. S., with the date Anno Enochii 2995. On the reverse is a blazing triangle with the Tetragrammaton in the center in Samaritan letters.

This Degree claims great importance in the history of Masonic ritualism. It is found, under various modifications, in almost all the Rites; and, indeed, without it, or something like it, the symbolism of Freemasonry cannot be considered as complete. Indeed, as Brother Mackey believed, for its origin to the inventive genius of the Chevalier Ramsay, it was adopted by the Council of the Emperors of the East and West, whence it passed into the Ancient and Accepted Rite. Though entirely different in its legend from the Royal Arch of the York and American Rites, its symbolic design is the same, for one common thought of a treasure lost and found pervades them all. Vassal, who is exceedingly flippant in much that he has written of Eccosism, says of this degree, that, "considered under its moral and religious aspects, it offers nothing either instructive or useful." It is evident that he understood nothing of its true symbolism.

of that monarch from the encroachments of the Samaritans, who interrupted the labors in the reconstruction of the Temple, constitutes the legend of the Red Cross Degree. The history of this Embassy is found in the eleventh book of the Antiquities of Josephus, whence the Masonic ritualists have undoubtedly taken it. The only authority of Josephus is the apocryphal record of Esdras, and the authenticity of the whole transaction is doubted or denied by modern historians. The legend is as follows: After the death of Cyrus, the Jews, who had been released by him from their captivity, and permitted to return to Jerusalem, for the purpose of rebuilding the Temple, found themselves obstructed in the undertaking by the neighboring nations, and especially by the Samaritans. Hereupon they sent an embassy, at the head of which was their prince, Zerubbabel, to Darius, the successor of Cyrus, to crave his interposition and protection. Zerubbabel, awaiting a favorable opportunity, succeeded not only in obtaining his request, but also in renewing the friendship which formerly existed between the king and himself. In commemoration of these events, Darius is said to have instituted a new order, and called it the Knights of the East. They afterward assumed their present name from the Red Cross borne in their banners. Webb, or whoever else introduced it into the American Templar system, undoubtedly took it from the Sixteenth Degree, or Prince of Jerusalem of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. It was carried into England, under the title of the Red Cross of Babylon. In New Brunswick, it has been connected with Cryptic Freemasonry. Doctor Mackey held that it is the apocryphal record of Esdras, and the authenticity of the whole transaction is doubted or denied.

KNIGHT OF THE RED EAGLE. The name in French is Chevalier de l’Aigle Rouge. The Thirty-ninth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. The red eagle forms a part of the arms of the House of Brandenburg, and the Order of Knights of the Red Eagle was instituted, in 1705, by George William, hereditary Prince of Bayreuth. In 1792, it was placed among the Prussian Orders. The Masonic Degree has no connection with the political order. The Mizraimites apparently appropriated all titles that they fancied.

KNIGHT OF THE ROSE. The name in French is Chevalier de la Rose. The Order of the Knights and Ladies of the Rose, the French phrase being Chevaliers et Chevalières de la Rose, was an order of adoptive or androgynous, both sexes, Freemasonry, invented in France toward the close of the eighteenth century. Monsieur de Chaumont, the Masonic Secretary of the Duc de Chartres, was its author. The principal seat of the Order was at Paris. The hall of meeting was called the Temple of Love. It was ornamented with garlands of flowers, and hung round with esculentons on which were painted various devices and emblems of gallantry. There were two presiding officers, a male and female, who were styled the Hierophant and the High Priestess. The former initiated men, and the latter, women. In the initiations, the Hierophant was assisted by a conductor or deacon called Sentiment, and the High Priestess by a Conductress or Deaconess called Discretion. The members received the title of Knights and Nymphs. The Knights wore a crown of myrtle, the Nymphs, a crown of roses. The Hierophant and High Priestess wore, in addition, a rose-colored scarf, on which were embroidered two doves within a wreath of myrtle. During initiation, the hall was lit with a single dull taper, but afterward it was brilliantly illuminated by numerous wax candles.

When a candidate was to be initiated, he or she was taken in charge, according to the sex, by the Conductor or Conductress, divested of all weapons, jewels, or money, hoodwinked, loaded with chains, and in this condition conducted to the door of the Temple of Love, where admission was demanded by two knocks. Brother Sentiment then introduced the candidate by order of the Hierophant or High Priestess, and he or she was asked his or her name, country, condition of life, and, lastly, what he or she was seeking. To this the answer was, “Happiness.” The next question proposed was, “What is your age?” The candidate, if a male, replied, “The age to love”; if a female, “The age to please and to love.” The candidates were then interrogated concerning their private opinions and conduct in relation to matters of gallantry. The chains were then taken from them, and they were invested with garlands of flowers which were called the Chains of Love. In this condition they were made to traverse the apartment from one extremity to another, and then back in a contrary direction, over a path inscribed with love-knots. The following obligation was then administered:

I promise and swear by the Grand Master of the Universe never to reveal the secrets of the Order of the Rose; and should I fail in my vow, may the mysteries I shall receive add nothing to my pleasures, and instead of the roses of happiness may I find nothing but the thorns of repentance.

The candidates were then conducted to the mysterious groves in the neighborhood of the Temple of Love, where the Knights received a crown of myrtle, and the Nymphs a simple rose. During this time a soft, melodious march was played by the orchestra. After this, the candidates were conducted to the altar of mystery, placed at the foot of the Hierophant’s throne, and there incense was offered up to Venus and her son. If it was a Knight who had been initiated, he now exchanged his crown of myrtle for the rose of the last initiated Nymph; and if a Nymph, she exchanged her rose for the myrtle crown of Brother Sentiment. The Hierophant now read a copy of verses in honor of the god of Mystery, and the bandage was at length taken from the eyes of the candidate. Delicious music and brilliant lights now added to the charms of this enchanting scene, in the midst of which the Hierophant communicated to the candidate the modes of recognition peculiar to the Order (see Clavel, Histoire Pittoresque, pages 115-7). The Order had but a brief existence. In 1784, F. B. von Grossing invented, in Germany, an Order bearing a similar name, but its duration was as ephemeral as that of the French one.

KNIGHT OF THE ROSE AND TRIPLE CROSS. The French name is Chevalier de la Rose et Triple Croix. A Degree in the Archives of the Lodge of Saint Louis des Amis Réunis, Saint Louis of the Reunited Friends, at Calais.

KNIGHT OF THE ROSY CROSS. See Royal Order of Scotland.
KNIGHT OF THE ROUND TABLE. The French name is Chevalier de la Table Ronde. A Degree in the Archives of the Lodge of Saint Louis des Amis Réunis, Saint Louis of the Reunited Friends, at Calais.

KNIGHT OF THE ROUND TABLE OF KING ARTHUR. The French name is Chevalier de la Table Ronde du Roi Arthur. Thoré (Acta Latomorum 1, page 341) says that this is a Degree of the Primitive Rite; but neither Doctor Mackey nor the Rev. A. F. A. Woodford (Kennings' Masonic Cyclopaedia) has been able to trace the Degree. Doctor Mackey says that he has seen the manuscript of a Degree of this name written many years ago, which was in the possession of Brother C. W. Moore, of Boston. It was an honorary Degree, and referred to the poetic legend of King Arthur and his knights.

KNIGHT OF THE ROYAL AX. The name in French is Chevalier de la Royale Hache. The Twenty-second Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, called also Prince of Libanus, or Lebanon. It was instituted to record the memorable services rendered to Freemasonry by the "mighty Cedars of Lebanon." The legend of the Degree informs us that the Sidonians were employed in cutting cedars on Mount Libanus or Lebanon for the construction of Noah's ark. Their descendants subsequently cut cedars from the same place for the Ark of the Covenant; and the descendants of these were again employed in the same offices, and in the same place, in obtaining materials for building Solomon's Temple. Lastly, Zerubbabel employed them in cutting the cedars of Lebanon for the use of the second Temple. This celebrated nation formed Colleges on Mount Lebanon, and in their labors always adored the Grand Architect of the Universe. No doubt this last sentence refers to the Druses, that secret sect of Theists who still reside upon Mount Lebanon and in the adjacent parts of Syria and Palestine, and whose mysterious ceremonies have attracted so much of the curiosity of Eastern travelers.

The apron of the Knights of the Royal Ax is white, lined and bordered with purple. On it is painted a round table, on which are laid several architectural plans. On the flaps is a three-headed serpent. The jewel is a golden ax, having on the handle and blade the initials of several personages illustrious in the history of Freemasonry. The places of meeting in this Degree are called Colleges. This Degree is especially interesting to the Masonic scholar in consequence of its evident reference to the mystical association of the Druses, whose connection with the Templars at the time of the Crusades forms a yet to be investigated episode in the history of Freemasonry.

KNIGHT OF THE SANCTUARY. The French title is Chevalier du Sanctuaire. The Eleventh Degree of the Rite of the East according to the collection of Fustier.

KNIGHT OF THE SEPULCHER. The Sixth Degree of the system of the Grand Lodge Royal York at Berlin.

KNIGHT OF THE SOUTH. The French title is Chevalier du Sud. The Eighth Degree of the Swedish Rite, better known as the Favorite of Saint John.

KNIGHT OF THE STAR. The French title is Chevalier de l'Etoile. A Degree in the collection of Pyron.

KNIGHT OF THE SUN. The French title is Chevalier du Soleil. The Twenty-eighth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, called also Prince of the Sun, Prince Admet, and Key of Freemasonry, or Chaos Disentangled. It is a Cabalistic and Hermetic Degree, and its instructions and symbols are full of the Cabala and Alchemy. Thus, one of its favorite words is Stibium, which, with the Hermetic Philosophers, meant the primal matter of all things. The principal officers are Father Adam and Brother Truth, allegorizing in the old rituals the search of Man after Truth. The other officers are named after the seven chief angels, and the Brethren are called Syphs, or, in the American instructions, Aralim or Heroes. The jewel is a golden sun, having on its reverse a hemisphere with the six northern signs of the zodiac. There is but one light in the Lodge, which shines through a globe of glass. This Degree is not confined to the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, but is found sometimes with a different name, but with the same Hermetic design, more or less developed in other Rites. Ragon, with whom Delaunay and Chemin-Dupont's concur, says that it is not, like many of the advanced Degrees, a mere modern invention, but that it is of the highest antiquity; and was, in fact, the last Degree of the ancient initiations teaching, under an Hermetic appearance, the doctrines of natural religion, which formed an essential part of the Mysteries. But Ragon must here evidently refer to the general, philosophic design rather than to the particular organization of the Degree. Thoré (Acta Latomorum i, page 339), with more plausibility, ascribes its invention as a Masonic Degree to Pernetty, the founder of the Hermetic Rite. Of all the high Degrees, it is, perhaps, the most important and the most interesting to the scholar who desires to investigate the true secret of the Order. Its old catechisms, now unfortunately too much neglected, are full of suggestive thoughts, and in its modern ceremony, and in which we are greatly indebted to the inventive genius of Brother Albert Pike, it is by far the most learned and philosophical of the Scottish Degrees.

KNIGHT OF THE SWORD. The French name is Chevalier de l'Epee. One of the titles of the Scottish Rite Degree of Knight of the East. So called in allusion to the legend that the Freemasons at the second Temple worked with the trowel in one hand and the sword in the other. Du Cange, on the authority of Arnoldus Lubeckius, describes an Order, in the Middle Ages, of Knights of the Sword, the Latin being Milites Gladii, who, having vowed to wield the sword for God's service, wore a sword embroidered on their mantles as a sign of their profession, whence they took their name. But so far as we have been able to ascertain it was not connected with the Masonic Degree known by the same name.

KNIGHT OF THE TABERNACLE. From the Minute Book of the Grand Lodge of all England, extracts from which are given by Brother Hughan in his Unpublished Records (page 146), we find the expression Knight of the Tabernacle, used in the year 1780, as synonymous with Knight Templar.

Knight of the Tabernacle of the Divine Truths. In French, Chevalier du Tabernacle des Vertèdes Divines. A Degree cited in the nomenclature of Fustier.

Knight of the Temple. In French, Chevalier du Temple. This Degree is common to all the systems of Freemasonry founded on the Templar doctrine.

1. It is a synonym of Knight Templar.
2. The Eighth Degree of the Rite of the Philaethes.
3. The Sixty-ninth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.
4. The Sixth Degree of the Clerks of Strict Observance.
5. The Ninth Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.
6. The Thirty-sixth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

Knight of the Three Kings. An American side Degree of but little importance in the time of Doctor Mackey and now almost forgotten. Its history connects it with the dedication of the first Temple, the conferrer of the Degree representing King Solomon. Its moral tendency appears to be the inculcation of reconciliation of grievances among Freemasons by friendly conference. It may be conferred by any Master Mason on another.

Knight of the Throne. In French, Chevalier du Trône. The Second Degree of the Rite of the East according to the nomenclature of Fustier.

Knight of the Triple Cross. In French, Chevalier de la Triple Croix. The Sixty-sixth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

Knight of the Triple Period. In French, Chevalier de la Triple Période. A Degree in the Archives of the Lodge of Saint Louis des Amis Réunis, Saint Louis of the Reunited Friends, at Calais.

Knight of the Triple Sword. In French, Chevalier de la Triple Épée. A Degree in the collection of Pyron.

Knight of the Two Crowned Eagles. The French title is Chevalier des teux Aigles Couronnées. The Twenty-second Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

Knight of the West. The French title is Chevalier d'Occident.

1. The Sixty-fourth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.
2. The Forty-seventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

Knight of the White and Black Eagle. In French, Chevalier de l'Aigle Blanc et Noir. One of the titles of the Thirtieth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, or Knight Kadosh. In the Rite of Perfection of the Emperors of the East and West, it constituted the Twenty-fourth Degree, under the title of Knight Commander of the White and Black Eagle. The white eagle was the emblem of the eastern empire, and the black of the western. Hence we have the Knights of the White Eagle in Russia, and the Knights of the Black Eagle in Prussia, as orders of chivalry. The two combined were, therefore, appropriately (so far as the title is concerned) adopted by the Council which assumed Masonic Jurisdiction over both empires.

Knight of the White Eagle. The Sixty-fourth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. As a political order, that of the Knights of the White Eagle was instituted by Wladistas, King of Poland, in 1325. It was conferred by the Czar of Russia.

Knight of Unction. The French title is Chevalier d'Onction. The Fifty-first Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

Knight, Perfect. The French title is Chevalier Parfait. A Degree of the Ancient Chapter of Clermont, found in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Rite.

Knight, Professed. See Eques Professus.

Knight, Russian. See Noachite. Also the Thirty-fifth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

Knight of Death. An old Degree given to members of the Craft and still found in the series of ceremonies collected by Kent Tabernacle in Newcastle, England. Brother R. I. Clegg has it in the list of concordant Degrees enumerated in his diploma of Knight Templar Priest. Often found associated with the Degree of Pillar Priest, the one Body working or communicating both ceremonies, Knight of Death and Pillar Priest, this latter being akin, if not the same, to Knight Templar Priest. These Degrees are practised, in England, Ireland, and Scotland.

Knights of Death. An old Degree given in the series of ceremonies collected by Kent Tabernacle in Newcastle, England. Referring to the Knights of Death, he says:

This Degree is conferred in Scotland in connection with the Early Grand Encampment of Knights Templar, the chief sect of which is in Ayrshire. Before one can be received as a Knight of Death, he must have been admitted into the Priestly Order, between which and the Knights of Death there are seven other Degrees, namely, Jacob's Wrestler, White Cross, Black Cross, Royal Mariner, Master Architect, the Mother World, and Knights of Patmos. The Degree in question can be given by one to another, and has words, grips and signs attached to it. 'B' can also be admitted into the "unrecognized Order of High Priesthood," through the Early Grand Encampment, which practises it under the name of the White Band, while Degree B can only be given in the presence of seven Knights Templar. It follows the Priestly Order of the Red Cross.
Another correspondent signing himself "Delta" writes:

"B" is informed that the Degree he mentions has from time immemorial been conferred in Lancashire, and is yet given at Rochdale, but mixed up with Degrees of which it is said to be a part. As they now require candidates to be Knights Templar and to take the Red Cross of Babylon along with the Priesthood Degree, one may observe that by the old Templar Rules the Knights Companion could not be a Priest or a Knight a Knignt, yet Grand Priories and Masters having the power of absolving, must have had both, so that one form of the Degree may have been the installation ceremony of E. C. A. Manchester Encampment is in possession of a Bible with the following inscription, "Fox Lodge, Manchester, No. 99," surrounded with Masonic emblems. On the fly-leaf, "the gift of Brother William Jennings to the Fox Lodge A.D. 1765." On the following page, "This Bible formerly belonged to the Lodge of Fortitude No. 87, and for the future is ordered that it shall belong to the Tabernacle of the Priestly Order, for the use of the same and the first pillar." A member of the Encampment some time ago promised the writer a copy of the certificate of the Degree, which if received should have been sent to "B." The other Degree inquired about will be one mentioned by Doctor Oliver as the Kadosh Prince of Death. In connection with Ancient Masonry it is unfortunate that in Lancashire no Minutes of the High Grades were ever kept. The Jewel of the Priestly Degree is said to be a Cross and Serpent.

Brother Joseph Greenwood, signing himself as Past High Priest, wrote as follows:

In answer to your correspondent, "B," by coming to that remote, out-of-the-way place, the Masonic Hall at Todmorden, he will be consecrated and made a Sir Knight Priest of the Holy Band of Brotherhood No. 3.

KNIGHTS OF MALTA. This Order, which at various times in the progress of its history received the names of Knights Hospitaler, Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem, Knights of Rhodes, and, lastly, Knights of Malta, was one of the most important of the religious and military orders of knighthood which sprung into existence during the Crusades which were instituted for the recovery of the Holy Land. It owes its origin to the Hospitalers of Jerusalem, which was established at Jerusalem, in 1048, by pious merchants of Amalfi for the succor of poor and distressed Latin pilgrims (see Hospitalers of Jerusalem). This society, established when Jerusalem was in possession of the Mohammedans, passed through many vicissitudes, but lived to see the Holy City conquered by the Christian knights. It then received many accessions from the Crusaders, who, laying aside their arms, devoted themselves to the pious avocation of attending the sick. It was then that Gerard, the Rector of the Hospital, induced the Brethren to take upon themselves the vows of poverty, obedience, and chastity, which they did at the hands of the Patriarch of Jerusalem. They were then known as the Knights of the Hospital, which had been fostered by Gerard, no longer suited the warlike genius of his successor. He therefore proposed a change in the character of the society, by which it should become a military Order, devoted to active labors in the field and the protection of Palestine from the encroachments of the infidels. This proposition was warmly approved by Baldwin II, King of Jerusalem, who, harassed by a continual warfare, gladly accepted this addition to his forces. The Order having thus been organized on a military basis, the members took a new oath, at the hands of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, by which they bound themselves to defend the cause of Christianity against the infidels in the Holy Land to the last drop of their blood, but on no account to bear arms for any other purpose. This act, done in 1118, is considered as the beginning of the establishment of the Order of Knights Hospitaler of Saint John, of which Raymond du Puy is, by all historians, deemed the first Grand Master.

By the rule established by Du Puy for the government of the Order, it was divided into three classes, namely, 1. Knights, who were called Knights of Justice; 2. Chaplains; and 3. Serving Brothers; all of whom took the three vows of chastity, obedience, and poverty. There was also attached to the institution a body of men called Donats, who, without assuming the vows of the Order, were employed in the different offices of the hospital, and who wore what was called the demi-cross, as a badge of their connection.

The history of the knights from this time until the middle of the sixteenth century is but a chronicle of continued warfare with the enemies of the Christian faith. When Jerusalem was captured by Saladin, in 1187, the Hospitalers retired to Margat, a town and fortress of Palestine which still acknowledged the Christian sway. In 1191, they made Acre, which in that year had been recaptured by the Christians, their principal place of residence. For just one hundred years the knights were engaged, with varying success, in sanguinary contests with the Saracens and other infidel hordes, until Acre, the last stronghold of the Christians in the Holy Land, having fallen beneath the blows of the victorious Moslems, Syria was abandoned by the Latin race, and the Hospitalers found refuge in the Island of Cyprus, where they established their convent.

The Order had been much attenuated by its frequent losses in the field, and its treasury had been impoverished. But commands were at once issued by John de Villiers, the Grand Master, to the various Grand Priories in Europe, and large reinforcements in men and money were soon received, so that the Fraternity were enabled again to open their hospital and to recommence the practise of their religious duties. No longer able to continue their military exploits on land, the knights betook themselves to their galleys, and, while they protected the pilgrims who still flocked in vast numbers to Palestine, gave security to the Christian commerce of the Mediterranean. On sea, as on land, the Hospitalers still showed that they were the inexorable and terrible foes of the infidels, whose captured vessels soon filled the harbor of Cyprus.

But in time a residence in Cyprus became unpleasant. The King, by heavy taxes and other rigorous exactions, had so disgusted them, that they determined to seek some other residence. The neighboring Island of Rhodes had long, under its independent princes, been the refuge of Turkish corsairs; a name equivalent to the more modern one of pirates. Fulik de Villaret, the Grand Master of the Hospital, having obtained the approval of Pope Clement and the assistance of several of the European States, made a descent upon the island, and after months of hard fighting, on the 15th of August, 1310, planted the standard of the Order on the walls of the city of Rhodes; and the island thenceforth became the home of the Hospitalers whence they were often called the Knights of Rhodes.

The Fraternity continued to reside at Rhodes for two hundred years, acting as the outpost and defense of Christendom from the encroachments of the Ottoman power. Of this long period, but few years were passed in peace, and the military reputation of the Order was still more firmly established by the prowess of the knights. These two centuries were marked by other events which had an important bearing on the fortunes of the institution. The rival brotherhood of the Templars was abolished by the machinations of a Pope and a King of France, and what of its revenues and possessions was saved from the spoliations of its enemies was transferred to the Hospitalers. There had always existed a bitter rivalry between the two Orders, marked by unhappy contentions, which on some occasions, while both were in Palestine, amounted to actual strife. Toward the Knights of Saint John the Templars had never felt nor expressed a very kindly feeling; and now this acceptance of an unjust appropriation of their goods in the hour of their disaster, keenly added to the sentiment of ill-will, and the unhappy children of De Molay, as they passed away from the theater of knighthood, left behind them the bitterest imprecations on the disciples of the Hospital.

The Order, during its residence at Rhodes, also underwent several changes in its organization, by which the simpler system observed during its infancy in the Holy Land was rendered more perfect and more complicated. The greatest of all these changes was in the character of the European Commanderies. During the period that the Order was occupied in the defense of the holy places, and losing large numbers of its warriors in its almost continual battles, these Commanderies served as nurseries for the preparation and education of young knights who might be sent to Palestine to reinforce the exhausted ranks of their Brothers. But now, secured in their island home, Jerusalem permanently in possession of the infidel, and the enthusiasm once inspired by Peter the Hermit forever dead, there was no longer need for new Crusaders. But the knights, engaged in strengthening and decorating their insular possession by erecting fortifications for defense, and palaces and convents for residence, now required large additions to their revenue to defray the expenses thus incurred. Hence the Commanderies were the sources whence this revenue was to be derived; and the Commanders, once the Principals, as it were, of military schools, became lords of the manor in their respective provinces. There, by a judicious and economical administration of the property which had been entrusted to them, by the cultivation of gardens and orchards, by the rent received from arable and meadow lands, of mills and fisheries appertaining to their estates, and even by the raising of stock, they were enabled to add greatly to their income. Of this one-fifth was claimed, under the name of responsums, as a tribute to be sent annually to Rhodes for the recuperation of the always diminishing revenue of the Order.

Another important change in the organization of the Order was made at a General Chapter held about 1320 at Montpellier, under the Grand Mastership of Villanova. The Order was there divided into languages, a division unknown during its existence in Palestine. These languages were at first seven in number, but afterward increased to eight, by the subdivision of that of Aragon. The principal dignities of the Order were at the same time divided among these languages, so that a particular dignity should be always enjoyed by the same language. These languages, and the dignities respectively attached to them, were as follows:

1. Provence: Grand Commander.
2. Auvergne: Grand Marshal.
3. France: Grand Hospitaler.
4. Italy: Grand Admiral.
5. Aragon: Grand Conservator.
7. Castile: Grand Chancellor.

But perhaps the greatest of all changes was that which took place in the personal character of the Knights. "The Order," says Taaffe (History of the Knights of Malta, book iv, page 234), "had been above two hundred years old before it managed a boat but was altogether equestrian during its two first, and perhaps most glorious, centuries." But on settling at Rhodes, the knights began to attack their old enemies by sea with the same prowess with which they had formerly met them on land, and the victorious contests of the galleys of Saint John with the Turkish corsairs, who were infesting the Mediterranean, proved them well entitled to the epithet of naval warriors. In the year 1480, Rhodes was unsuccessfully besieged by the Ottoman army of Mohammed II, under the command of Paleologus Pasha. After many contests, the Turks were repulsed with great slaughter. But the attack of the Sultan Solyman, forty-four years afterward, was attended with a different result, and Rhodes was surrendered to the Turkish forces on the 20th of December, 1522. The terms of the capitulation were liberal to the knights, who were permitted to retire with all their personal property; and thus, in the Grand Mastership of L’Isle Adam, Rhodes ceased forever to be the home of the Order, and six days afterward, on New Year’s Day, 1523, the fleet, containing the knights and four thousand of the inhabitants, sailed for the Island of Candia.

From Candia, where the Grand Master remained but a short time, he proceeded with his knights to Italy. Seven long years were passed in negotiations with the monarchs of Europe, and in the search for a home. At length, the Emperor Charles V, of Germany vested in the Order the complete and perpetual sovereignty of the islands of Malta and Gozo, and the city of Tripoli; and in 1530, the knights took formal possession of Malta, where, to borrow the language of Porter (History of the Knights of Malta ii, page 33), "for upwards of two centuries and a half, waved the banner of Saint John, an honor to Christianity and a terror to the infidel of the East." From this time the Order received the designation of Knights of Malta, a title often bestowed upon it, even in official documents, in the place of the original one of Knights Hospitaller of Saint John of Jerusalem.

For 268 years the Order retained possession of the Island of Malta. But in 1798 it was surrendered without a struggle by Louis de Hompesch, the feeble- minded and timid Grand Master, to the French army and fleet under Bonaparte; and this event may be considered as the commencement of the suppression of the Order as an active power. Hompesch, accompanied by a few knights, embarked in a few days for Trieste, and subsequently retired to Montpellier, where he resided in the strictest seclusion and poverty until May 12, 1805, when he died, leaving behind him not enough to remunerate the physicians who had attended him. The great body of the knights proceeded to Russia, where the Emperor Paul had a few years before been proclaimed the protector of the Order. On the 27th of October, 1798, a Chapter of such of the knights as were in St. Petersburg was held, and the Emperor Paul I was elected Grand Master. This election was made valid, so far as its irregularities would permit, by the abdication of Hompesch in July, 1799.

At the death of Paul in 1801, his successor on the throne, Alexander, appointed Count Soutikoff as Lieutenant of the Mastery, and directed him to convene a Council at St. Petersburg to deliberate on future action. This Assembly adopted a new statute for the election of the Grand Master, which provided that each Grand Priory should in a Provincial Chapter nominate a candidate, and that out of the persons so nominated the Pope should make a selection. Accordingly, in 1802, the Pope appointed John de Tommasi, who was the last knight that bore the title of Grand Master. On the death of Tommasi, the Pope declined to assume any longer the responsibility by nominating a Grand Master, and appointed the Bailiff Guevarr Luardo simply as Lieutenant of the Mastery, a title afterward held by his successors, Centelles, Busca, De Candita, and Collavedo. In 1826 and 1827, the first steps were taken for the revival of the English Language, and Sir Joshua Meredith, who had been made a knight in 1798 by Hompesch, being appointed Lieutenant Prior of England, admitted many English gentlemen into the Order. But the real history of the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem ends with the disgraceful capitulation at Malta in 1798. All that has since remained of it, all that now remains—however imposing may be the titles assumed—is but the dis- luted shadow of its former existence.

The organization of the Order in its days of prosperity was very complicated, partaking both of a monarchical and a republican character. Over all presided a Grand Master, who, although invested with extensive powers, was still controlled by the legislative action of the General Chapter. The Order was divided into eight Languages, over each of which presided one of the Grand dignitaries with the title of Conventual Bailiff. These dignitaries were the Grand Commander, the Grand Marshal, the Grand Hospita-ler, the Grand Conservator, the Grand Turcopolier, the Grand Bailiff, and the Grand Chancellor. Each of these dignitaries resided in the palace or inn at Malta which was appropriated to his Language. In every province there were one or more Grand Friories presided over by Grand Priors, and beneath these were the Commanderies, over each of which was a Commander. There were scattered through the several countries of Europe 22 Grand Priories and 596 Commanderies. Those who desired admission into the Order as members of the first class, or Knights of Justice, were required to produce proofs of noble descent. The ceremonies of initiation were public and exceedingly simple, consisting of little more than the taking of the necessary vow. In this Hospitals differed from the Templars, whose formula of admission was veiled in secrecy. Indeed, Porter (History of the Knights of Malta i, page 203) attributes the escape of the former Order from the accusations that were heaped upon the latter, and which led to its dissolution, to the fact that the knights "abjured all secrecy in their forms and ceremonies."

The Order was dissolved in England by Henry VIII, and, although temporarily restored by Mary, was finally abolished in France in 1792. By a Decree of Charles IV, of Spain, in 1802, the two Languages of Aragon and Castile became the Royal Spanish Order of Saint John, of which he declared himself the Grand Master. Then, only the Language of Germany and Italy remained. The Order is, therefore, in a state of abeyance, if not of disintegration, although it has maintained this limited vitality, and the functions of Grand Master have been exercised by a Lieutenant of the Magistry, who resided at Rome. Attempts have also been made, from time to time, to revive the Order in different places, sometimes with and sometimes without the legal sanction of the recognized Head of the Order. For instance, there were established in England two Bodies—one Catholic, under Sir George Bowyer, and the other Protestant, at the head of which was the Duke of Manchester; but each repudiated the other. But the relic of the old and valiant Order of Knights Hospitaler claims no connection with the branch of Freemasonry which bears the title of Knights of Malta, and hence the investigation of its present condition is no part of the province of this work.

KNIGHTS OF PALESTINE. See Marconis, also Memphis, Rite of.

KNIGHTS OF SAINT JOHN THE EVANGELIST OF ASIA IN EUROPE. Founded at Schleswig and Hamburg by Count of Ecker and Eckhoffen in 1786, out of his Order of the True Light, founded the previous year.

KNIGHTS OF THE EAST, COUNCIL OF. The French title is Conseil des Chevaliers d'Orient. A Chapter of advanced Degrees, under this name, was established at Paris, on July 22, 1762, by one Pirlet, a tailor, as the rival of the Council of Emperors of the East and West. Baron de Tschoudy became one of its members.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR. The piety or the superstition of the age had induced multitudes of pilgrims in the eleventh and twelfth centuries to visit Jerusalem for the purpose of offering their devotions at the sepulcher of the Lord and the other holy places in that city. Many of these religious wanderers were weak or aged, almost all of them unarmed, and thousands of them were subjected to insult, to pillage, and often to death, inflicted by the hordes of Arabs who, even after the capture of Jerusalem by the Christians, continued to infest the sea coast of Palestine and the roads to the capital.

To protect the pious pilgrims thus exposed to plunder and bodily outrage, nine French knights, the followers of Baldwyn, united, in the year 1118, in a military confederation or brotherhood in arms, and entered into a solemn compact to aid each other in clearing the roads, and in defending the pilgrims in their passage to the holy city. Two of these knights were Hugh de Payens and Godfrey de Saint Aldemar. Raynouard, in Les Templiers, says that the names of the other seven have not been preserved in history, but Wilke (Geschichte des Ordens der Tempelherren, History of the Templar Orders) gives them as Roral, Gundemar, Godfrey Bioal, Payens de Montidier, Archibald de Saint Aman, Andre de Montbar, and the Count of Provence. Unitting the monastic with the military character, they took, in the presence of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, the usual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and with great humility assumed the title of Poor Fellow Soldiers of Christ. Baldwyn, the King of Jerusalem, assigned for their residence a part of his palace which stood near the former site of the Temple; and the Abbot and Canons of the Temple gave them, as a place in which to store their arms and magazines, the street between the palace and the Temple, whence they derived the name of Templars; a title which they ever afterward retained.

Raynouard says that Baldwyn sent Hugh de Payens to Europe to solicit a new Crusade, and that while there he presented his companions to Pope Honorius II, from whom he craved permission to form a religious military Order in imitation of that of the Hospitalers. The Pontiff referred them to the Ecclesiastical Council which was then in session at Troyes, in Champagne. Thither De Payens repaired, and represented to the fathers the vocation of himself and his companions as defenders of the pilgrim; the enterprise was approved, and Saint Bernard was directed to the approval of the Church, returned to Jerusalem, carrying with him many recruits from among the noblest families of Europe.

The Templars soon became pre-eminently distinguished as warriors of the cross. Saint Bernard, who visited them in their Temple retreat, speaks in the warmest terms of their self-denial, their frugality, their modesty, their piety, and their bravery. "Their arms," he says, "are their only finery, and they use them with courage, without dreading either the number or the strength of the barbarians. All their confidence is in the Lord of Hosts, and in fighting for His cause they seek a sure victory or a Christian and honorable death." Their banner was the Beausaint, of divided white and black, indicative of peace to their friends, but destruction to their foes. At their reception each Templar swore never to turn his back on three enemies, but should he be alone, to fight them if they were infidels. It was their wont to say that a Templar ought either to vanquish or die, since he had nothing to give for his ransom but his girdle and his knife.

The Order of the Temple, at first exceedingly simple in its organization, became in a short time very complicated. In the twelfth century it was divided into three classes, which were Knights, Chaplains, and Serving Brethren.

1. Knights. It was required that whoever presented himself for admission into the Order must prove that he was sprung from a knightly family, and was born in lawful wedlock; that he had nothing to give for his ransom but his girdle and his knife. It was their wont to say that a Templar ought either to vanquish or die, since he had nothing to give for his ransom but his girdle and his knife.

The Order of the Temple, unlike that of the Hospitalers, consisted at first only of laymen. But the Bull of Pope Alexander III, issued in 1162, gave the Templars permission to receive into their houses spiritual persons who were not bound by previous vows, the technical name of whom was Chaplains. They were required to serve a novitiate of a year. The reception was, except in a few points not applicable to the clergy, the same as that of the knights, and they were required to take only the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Their duties were to perform all religious offices, and to officiate at all the ceremonies of the Order, such as the admission of members at installations, etc. Their privileges were, however, unimportant, and consisted principally in sitting next to the Master, and being first served at table.

3. Serving Brethren. The only qualification required of the serving Brethren, was, that they should be free born and not slaves; yet it is not to be supposed that all the persons of this class were of mean condition. Many men, not of noble birth, but of wealth and high position, were found among the serving Brethren. They fought in the field under the knights, and performed at home the menial offices of the household. At first there was but one class of them, but afterward they were divided into two—the Brethren-at-Arms and the Handcraft Brethren. The former were the soldiers of the Order. The latter who were the most esteemed, remained in the Pre-ceptories, and exercised their various trades, such as those of farriers, armourers, etc. The reception of the serving Brethren did not differ, except in some necessary particulars, from that of the knights. They were, however, by the accident of their birth, excluded from promotion out of their class.

Besides these three classes there was a fourth—not, however, living in the bosom of the Order—the members of which were called Affilii or the Affiliated. These were persons of various ranks and of both sexes, who were recognized by the Order, though not openly connected with it, as entitled to its protection, and admitted to a participation in some of its privileges, such as protection from the interdicts of the Church, which did not apply to the members of the Order.

There was also a class called Donates or Donats. These were either youths, whose parents desired for the service of the Order when they had attained the proper age, or adults who had bound themselves to aid and assist the Order so long as they lived, solely from their admiration of it, and a desire to share its honors.

Over these presided the Grand Master, more usually styled, in the early days of the Order, simply the Master of the Temple. In the Treaty of Peace executed in 1178, between the Templars and the Hospitallers, Odo de Saint Armand calls himself Humble Master of the Order of the Temple. But in after times this spirit of humility was lost sight of, and the title of Grand Master was generally accorded to him. His allowances were suitable to the distinguished rank he held, for in the best days of the Order the Grand Master was considered as the equal of a sovereign. The Grand Master resided originally at Jerusalem; afterward, when that city was lost, at Acre, and finally at Cyprus. His duty always required him to be in the Holy Land; he consequently never resided in Europe.

The Grand Master was elected for life from among the knights in the following manner: On the death of the Grand Master, a Grand Prior was chosen to administer the affairs of the Order until a successor could be elected. When the day which had been appointed for the election arrived, the Chapter usually assembled at the chief seat of the Order; three or more of the most esteemed knights were then proposed; the Grand Prior collected the votes, and he who had received the greatest number was nominated to be the Electing Prior. An Assistant was then associated with him, in the person of another knight. These two remained all night in the Chapel, engaged in prayer. In the morning, they chose two others, and these four, two more, and so on until the number of twelve, that of the apostles, had been selected. The twelve then selected a Chaplain. The thirteen then proceeded to vote for a Grand Master, who was elected by a majority of the votes. When the election was completed, it was announced to the assembled Brethren; and when all had promised obedience, the Prior, if the person was present, said to him, "In the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, we have chosen, and do choose thee, Brother N., to be our Master." Then, turning to the Brethren, he said, "Beloved Sirs and Brethren, give thanks unto God; behold here our Master." The Chaplains then chanted the Te Deum (an old hymn from the early Christian centuries, the name taken from the opening Latin words Te Deum laudamus, We praise thee, O God); and the Brethren, taking their new Master in their arms, carried him into the Chapel and placed him before the altar, where he continued kneeling, while the Brethren prayed, and the Chaplains repeated the Kyrie Eleison (the name being of Greek origin and meaning Lord, have mercy, often heard in church services in response, verse by verse, to the reading of the commandments), the Pater Noster (Latin for Our Father, the first words of the Lord's Prayer), and other devotional exercises.

Next in rank to the Grand Master was the Senechal, who was his representative and lieutenant. Then came the Marshal, who was the General of the Order. Next was the Treasurer, an office that was always united with that of Grand Preceptor of Jerusalem. He was the Admiral of the Order. The Draper, the next officer in rank, had charge of the clothing of the Order. He was a kind of Commissary General. The Turcopoliier was the Commander of the Light-Horse. There was also a class of officers called Visitors, whose duties, as their name imports, was to visit the different Provinces, and correct abuses. There were also some subordinate offices appropriated to the Serving Brethren, such as Sub-Marshall, Standard-Bearer, Farrier, etc. These officers, with the Grand Preceptors of the Provinces and the most distinguished knights who could attend, constituted the General Chapter of great legislative assembly of the Order, where all laws and regulations were made and great officers elected. This assembly was not often convened, and in the intervals its powers were exercised by the Chapter of Jerusalem.

The Order thus organized, as it increased in prosperity and augmented its possessions in the East and in Europe, was divided into Provinces, each of which was governed by a Grand Preceptor or Grand Prior; for the titles were indiscriminately used. That, however, of Preceptor was peculiar to the Templars, while that of Prior was common both to them and to the Knights Hospitaller of Saint John. These Provinces were fifteen in number, and were as follows: Jerusalem, Tripolis, Antioch, Cyprus, Portugal, Castile and Leon, Aragon, France and Auvergne, Normandy, Aquitaine, Provence, England, including Scotland and Ireland; Germany, Upper and Central Italy, and Apulia and Sicily. Hence it will be seen that there was no part of Europe, except the impoverished kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, where the Templars had not extended their possessions and their influence. In all the Provinces there were numerous Temple-Houses called Preceptories, presided over by a Preceptor. In each of the larger Preceptories there was a Chapter, in which local regulations were made and members were received into the Order.

The reception of a knight into the Order was a very solemn ceremonial. It was secret, none but members of the Order being permitted to be present. In this it differed from that of the Knights of Malta, whose form of reception was open and public; and it is to this difference, between a public reception and a secret initiation, that may, perhaps, be attributed a portion of the spirit of persecution exhibited by the Church to the Order in its latter days. Of this reception, the best and most authentic account in Doctor Mackey’s opinion is given by Münter in his Statutenbuch des Ordens der Tempelherren, Statute Book of the Templar Orders (pages 29–42), and on that he preferred in the main to rely. On the day of the reception, the Master and the knights being in the Chapter, the Master said:

Beloved Knights and Brethren, ye see that the majority are willing that this man shall be received as a brother. If there be among you any one who knows anything concerning him, whereby he cannot rightfully become a brother, let him speak, and the thing will be made known beforehand and after he has been brought before us.

All being silent, the candidate is conducted into an adjoining chamber. Two or three of the oldest knights are sent to him to warn him of the difficulties and hardships that he will have to encounter; or, as the Benedictine Rule says, all the hard and rough ways that lead to God, or in Latin, Omnia dura et aspera, per quae itur ad Deum.

They commenced by saying: “Brother, do you seek the Fellowship of the Order?” If he replied affirmatively, they warned him of the rigorous services which would be demanded of him. Should he reply that he was willing to endure all for the sake of God and to become the slave of the Order, they further asked him if he were married or betrothed; if he had ever entered any other Order; if he owed more than he could pay; if he was of sound body; and if he was of free condition. If his replies were satisfactory, his examiners returned to the Chapter room and made report; whereupon the Master again inquired if any one present knew anything against the candidate. All being silent, he asked: “Are you willing that he should be received in God’s name?” and all the knights answered: “Let him be received in God’s name.”

His examiners then returned to him and asked him if he still persisted in his intention. If he replied that he did, they gave him the necessary instructions how he should act, and led him to the door of the Chapter room. There entering he cast himself on his knees before the Master, with folded hands, and said: “Sir, I am come before God, before you and the Brethren, and pray and beseech you, for God and our dear Lady’s sake, to admit me into your Fellowship and to the good deeds of the Order, as one who will for all his life long be the servant and slave of the Order.” The Master replied:

Beloved Brother, you are desirous of a great matter. for you see nothing but the outward shell of our Order. It is only the outward shell when you see that we have fine armor, purple, girt with a small girdle; to attend Divine service punctually, and to begin our prayers at the set time; not to kiss a woman, even your mother, except when you receive any attendance from a woman without the permission of your superiors; not to hold this Order for stronger or weaker, for worse or for better, but with the permission of the Master or the Convent which has the authority, to hold it for stronger or weaker, for worse or for better, and to keep and labor in abundance.

The Chaplain then read the 133d Psalm and the Prayer of the Holy Ghost, Deus qui corda idolium, and the Brethren repeated the Lord’s Prayer. The Prior and the Chaplain gave the recipient the Frater in the name of Saint Peter of Rome, and our Father the Pope, and in the name of all the Brethren of the Temple, we receive you to all the good works of the Order which has been done from the beginning, and shall be done to the end, you, your father, your mother, and all your lineage, who are willing shall have a share therein. In like manner do you receive us into all the good works which you have done or shall do. We assure you bread and water, and the poor clothing of the Order, and toll and labor in abundance.

These duties may be thus summed up:

He was never to assault a Christian, nor swear, nor receive any attendance from a woman without the permission of his superiors; not to kiss a woman, even his mother or sister; to hold no child to the baptismal font; and to abstain from no manner of carnal intercourse with any other woman; and to be courteous to all. He was to sleep in a linen shirt, drawers and hose, and girded with a small girdle; to attend Divine service punctually, and to begin and end his meals with a prayer.

Such is the Formula of Reception, which has been collected by Münter from the most authentic sources. It is evident, however, that it is not complete. The secret parts of the ceremony are omitted, so that the formula is here something like what a Freemason would call the monitory part of the instruction. Münster does not even give the form of the oath taken by the candidate; although Raynouard says that it is preserved in the Archives of the Abbey of Alcobaza, in Aragon, and gives it in the following words, on the authority of Henriquez in his Regula, etc., Ordinis Cisterciensis:

I swear to consecrate my discourse, my arms, my faculties, and my life, to the defense of the sacred mysteries of the faith, and to that of the unity of God. I also promise to be submissive and obedient to the Grand Master of the Order. . . . At all times that it may be necessary, I will cross the seas to go to battle; I will contribute succor against infidel kings and princes; I will not turn my back on three foes; and even if I be alone, I will fight them if they are infidels.

The fact that the Templars had a secret initiation is now generally conceded, although a few writers have denied it. But the circumstantial evidence in its favor is too great to be overcome by anything except positive proof to the contrary, which has never been adduced. It is known that at these receptions none but members of the Order were admitted; a prohibition which would have been unnecessary if the ceremonies had not been secret. In the meetings of the General Chapter of the Order, even the Pope's Legate was refused admission. It would not be fair to quote the one hundred and twenty accusations preferred against the Templars by Clement, because they were undoubtedly malicious falsehoods invented by an unprincipled Pontiff pandering to the cupidity of an avaricious Monarch; but yet some of them are of such a nature as to indicate what was the general belief of men at the time. Thus, Article 32 says: "Quod receptiones istius clandestine faciebat"; meaning, that they were wont to have their receptions in secret. The 100th is in these words: Quod sic se includunt ad tenenda capitula ut omnes januas domus et ecclesiae in quibus tenent capitula ferment adeo de factis vel dictis eorum; meaning, that when they held their Chapters, they shut all the doors of the house or church in which they met so closely that no one could approach near enough to see or hear what they were doing and saying.

We may here note that the next article is more particular, for it states that, to secure themselves against eavesdroppers, they were accustomed to place a watch, as we should now say a Tiler, upon the roof of the house, "excubicum super tectum," who could give the necessary warning.

Of course it is impossible to obtain an accurate knowledge of all the details of this secret reception of the ancient Templars, since it must have been generally oral; but Doctor Mackey was always inclined to think, from allusions here and there scattered through the history of their customs, that many of its features have descended to us, and are to be found in the ceremony of initiation practised by the Masonic Knights Templar.

The dress of the Templars was prescribed for them by Saint Bernard, in the Rule which he composed for the government of the Order, and is thus described in Chapter XX.

To all the professed knights, both in winter and summer, we give, if they can be procured, white garments, that those who have cast behind them a dark life, may know that they are to commend themselves to their Creator by a pure and white life.

The white mantle was therefore the peculiar vestment of the Templars, as the black was of the Hospitals.

The general direction of Saint Bernard as to clothing was afterward expanded, so that the dress of a Templar consisted of a long, white tunic, nearly resembling that of a priest's in shape, with a red cross on the front and back, under this was his linen shirt clasped by a girdle. Over all was the white mantle with the red cross pattée. The head was covered by a cap or hood attached to the mantle. The arms were a sword, lance, mace, and shield. Although at first the Order adopted as a seal the representation of two knights riding on one horse, as a mark of their poverty, subsequently each knight was provided with three horses and an esquire selected usually from the class of Serving Brethren.

To write the history of the Templar Order for the two centuries of its existence would, says Addison, be to write, the Latin history of Palestine, and would occupy a volume. Its details would be accounts of glorious struggles with the infidel in defense of the Holy Land, and of Christian pilgrimage, sometimes successful and often disastrous, of arid sands well moistened with the blood of Christian and Saracen warriors; of disreputable contests with its rival of Saint John; of final forced departure from the places which its prowess had conquered, but which it had not strength to hold, and of a few years of luxurious, and it may be of licentious indolence, terminated by a cruel martyrdom and dissolution. The fall of Acre in 1292, under the vigorous assault of the Sultan Mansour, led at once to the evacuation of Palestine by the Christians. The Knights Hospitaller of Saint John of Jerusalem, afterward called Knights of Rhodes, and then of Malta, betook themselves to Rhodes, where the former, assuming a naval character, resumed the warfare in their galleys against the Mohammedans. The Templars, after a brief stay in the island of Cyprus, retired to their several Preceptories in Europe.

Porter (History, Knights of Malta i, page 174) has no panegyric or praise in general for these recreant knights. After eulogizing the Hospitalers for the persevering energy with which, from their island home of Rhodes, they continued the war with the infidels, he says:

The Templar, on the other hand, after a brief sojourn in Cyprus, instead of rendering the smallest assistance to his chivalrous and knightly brethren in their new undertaking, hurried with unseemly haste to his numerous wealthy European Preceptories, where the grossness of his licentiousness, the height of his luxury, and the arrogance of his pride, soon rendered him an object of the most invincible hatred among those who possessed ample power to accomplish his overthrow. During these last years of their existence little can be said in defense of the Order; and although the barbarous cruelty with which their extinction was accomplished has raised a feeling of compassion in their behalf, which bids fair to efface the memory of their crimes, still it cannot be denied that they had of late years so far deviated from the original purposes of their Institution as to render them highly unfit depositories of that wealth which had been bequeathed to them for purposes so widely different from those to which they had appropriated it.

The act of cruelty and of injustice by which the Templar Order was dissolved in the fourteenth century, has bequeathed an inglorious memory on the names of the infamous King, and no less infamous Pope, who accomplished it. In the beginning of the fourteenth century, the throne of France was filled by Philip the Fair, an ambitious, a vindictive, and an avaricious prince. In his celebrated controversy with Pope Boniface, the Templars had, as was usual with them, sided with the Pontiff and opposed the King; this act excited his hatred: the Order was enormously wealthy; this aroused his avarice; their power interfered with his designs of political aggrandizement; and this alarmed his ambition. He, therefore, secretly concerted with Pope Clement V a plan for their destruction, and the appropriation of their revenues. Clement, by his direction, wrote in June, 1306, to De Molay, the Grand Master, who was then at Cyprus, inviting him to come and consult with him on some matters of great importance to the Order. De Molay obeyed the summons, and arrived in the beginning of 1307 at Paris, with sixty knights and a large amount of treasure. He was immediately imprisoned, and, on the thirteenth of October following, every knight in France was, in consequence of the secret orders of the king, arrested on the pretended charge of idolatry, and other enormous crimes, of which Squin de Plessian, or Squino de Florian, or Esquino de Floreiac, as various writers give the name, a renegade and expelled Prior of the Order, was said to have confessed that the knights were guilty of. This alarmed the Grand Master's family, one of whom said to the knights who should be brought before them. This list is still in existence, and in it we find such charges as these:

They required those who were received into the Order to abjure Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and all the saints. They denied that Christ had suffered for man's redemption. They made their recipient spit upon the cross or the crucifix. They worshiped a cat in their assemblies. They did not believe in the eucharistic sacrifice. They said that the Grand Master had the power of absolution. They practised obscene ceremonies in their receptions. Their receptions were secret, a charge repeated in different forms. They had an idol, which was a head with one or three faces, and sometimes a human skull. They exercised magic arts.

On such preposterous charges as these the knights were tried, and of course, as a foregone conclusion, condemned. On the 12th of May, 1310, fifty-four of the principal dignitaries of the Order, suffered the same fate. They died faithfully asserting their innocence of all the crimes imputed to them. The Order was now, by the energy of the King of France, assisted by the spiritual authority of the Pope, suppressed throughout Europe. So much of its vast possessions as were not appropriated by the different sovereigns to their own use, or to that of their favorites, was bestowed upon the Order of the Knights of Malta, whose acceptance of the donation did not tend to diminish the ill feeling which had always existed between the members of the two Orders.

As to the story of the continuation of the Order, after the death of James de Molay, by Johannes Larmenius, under the authority of a Charter of Transmission given to him by De Molay a few days before his death, that subject is more appropriately treated in the history of the Order of the Temple, which claims, by virtue of this Charter, to be the regular successor of the ancient Order. From the establishment of the Order by Hugh de Payens, until its dissolution during the Mastership of De Molay, twenty-two Grand Masters presided over the Order, of whom the accompanying table is an accurate list of the names and dates of election, compiled on the authority of Addison. The roll of Grand Masters in the Rite of Strict Observance, and that in the Order of the Templar, differ in several names; but these rolls are destitute of authenticity (see Transactions Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume xx).

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR, MASONIC. The connection of the Knights Templar with the Freemasons may much more plausibly be traced than that of the Knights of Malta. Yet, unfortunately, the sources from which information is to be derived are for the most part traditionary; authentic dates and documents are wanting. Tradition has always been inclined to trace the connection to an early period, and to give to the Templar system of secret reception a Masonic character, derived from their association during the Crusades with the mystical Society of the Assassins in Syria. Lawrie (History, page 87), or Sir David Brewster, the real author of the work which bears Lawrie's name, embodies the tradition in this form:

Almost all the secret associations of the ancients either flourished or originated in Syria and the adjacent countries. It was here that the Dionysian artists, the Essenes and the Kassidians appeared. Furthermore, this country also came several members of that trading association of Masons which appeared in Europe during the dark ages; and we are assured, that, notwithstanding the unfavorable condition of that province, there exists at this day, on Mount improbable supposition that they received their Masonic knowledge from the Lodges in that quarter. But we are fortunately, in this case, not left to conjecture, for we are expressly informed by a foreign author, Adler (de Drusis), who was well acquainted with the history and customs of Syria, that the Knights Templar were actually members of the Syriac fraternities.

Even if this hypothesis were true, although it might probably suggest the origin of the secret reception of the Templars, it would not explain the connection of the modern Templars with the Freemasons, because there is no evidence that these Syriac fraternities were Masonic.

There are four sources from which the Masonic Templars are said to have derived their existence; making, therefore, as many different divisions of the Order:

1. The Templars who claim John Mark Larmenius as the successor of James de Molay. This Body of Templars designated themselves as the Order of the Temple. Its seat was in Paris. The Duke of Sussex received from it the Degree and the authority to establish a Grand Conclave in England. He did so; and convened that Body once, but only once. During the remaining years of his life, Templarism had no activity in England, as he disapproved all Christian and Chivalric Freemasonry (see Temple, Order of the).

2. Those who recognize Peter d'Aumont as the successor of De Molay. These who derive their Templarism from the Count Beaujeu, the nephew of De Molay.

3. Those who claim an independent origin, and repudiate alike the authority of Larmenius, of Aumont, and of Beaujeu.

From the first class spring the Templars of France, who professed to have continued the Order by authority of a Charter given by De Molay to Larmenius. This Body of Templars designated themselves as the Order of the Temple. Its seat was in Paris. The Duke of Sussex received from it the Degree and the authority to establish a Grand Conclave in England. He did so; and convened that Body once, but only once. During the remaining years of his life, Templarism had no activity in England, as he disapproved all Christian and Chivalric Freemasonry (see Temple, Order of the). The second division of Templars is that which is founded on the theory that Peter d'Aumont fled with several knights into Scotland, and there united with the Freemasons. This legend is intimately connected with Ramsay's tradition—that Freemasonry sprang from Templarism, and that all Freemasons are Knights Templar. The Chapter of Clermont adopted this theory; and in establishing their advanced Degrees asserted that they were derived from these Templars of Scotland. The Baron Hund carried the theory into Germany, and on it established his Rite of Strict Observance, which was a Templar system. Hence the Templars of Germany must be classed under the head of the followers of Aumont, and of Beaujeu. The third division is that which asserts that the Count Beaujeu, a nephew of the last Grand Master, De Molay, and a member of the Order of Knights of Christ—the name assumed by the Templars of Portugal—had received authority from that Order to disseminate the Degree. He is said to have carried the Degree and its ritual into Sweden, where he incorporated it with Freemasonry. The story is, too, that Beaujeu collected his uncle's ashes and interred them in Stockholm, where a monument was erected to his memory. Hence the Swedish Templar Freemasons claim their descent from Beaujeu, and the Swedish Rite is through this source a Templar system.
The government of Masonic Knights Templar in the United States is vested, first, in Commanderies, which confer the Red Cross and Templar Degrees and instruct in the secrets of Malta (see Knights of Malta). The usual expression, writes Brother Mackey, that a candidate after being made a Knight Templar is also a Knight of Malta, involves an absurdity. No man being a Knight Templar could, by the original Statutes, be a member of any other Order; and it is to be regretted that the wise provision of the Grand Encampment in 1856, which struck the Degree of Malta from the ritual of the Commanderies, should have been in 1862 unwisely repealed. The secrets in which the candidate is instructed are the modern inventions of the Masonic Knights of Malta. The original Order had no secrets.

Commanderies are under the control of Grand Commanderies in States in which those Bodies exist. Where they do not, the Warrants are derived directly from the Grand Encampment. The supreme authority of the Order is exercised by the Grand Encampment of the United States, which meets triennially. The presiding officer is a Grand Master.

The costume of the Knights Templar of the United States is of two kinds. First, the original uniform, which was in general use until the year 1859, and was continued by Commanderies which were in existence before that time. It is thus described:

The suit is black, with black gloves. A black velvet sash, trimmed with silver lace, crosses the body from the left shoulder to right hip, having at its end a cross-hilted dagger, a black rose on the left shoulder, and a Maltese cross at the end. Where the sash crosses the left breast, is a nine-pointed star in silver, with a cross and serpent of gold in the center, within a circle, around which are the Latin words, In hoc signo vinces, meaning By this sign, conquer. The apron is of black velvet, in triangular form, to represent the Delta, and edged with silver lace. On its front is placed a triangle of silver, perforated with twelve holes, with a cross and serpent in the center; on the center of the apron are a skull and crossbones, between three stars of seven points, having a red cross in the center of each. The belt is black, to which is attached a cross-belt, a black rose on the left shoulder, and a Maltese dagger, tliit, shoulder straps, gauntlets, and chapeau, with blact one inch on either side, a strip of navy lace bordered with blact one inch on either side, a strip of navy lace.

Sword. Thirty-four to forty inches, inclusive of scabbard; helmet head, cross handle, and metal scabbard.

Belts. Red enamelled or patent leather, two inches wide, fastened round the body with buckle or clasp.

From what has been said, it will appear that there have been two modes of dress or costume in use among the Templars of the United States—one, the old or black uniform, which was adopted at the first organization of the Order in this country, and which is still used by the old Commanderies which were in existence previous to the year 1859; and the new or white uniform, which was adopted by the Grand Encampment in that year, and which has been prescribed for all Commanderies chartered since that year.

This difference of costume has been the occasion of much discussion in the Order. In 1872, Sir J. Q. A. Fellows, the Grand Master, believing it was his duty to enforce a uniform dress in the Order, issued his decree requiring all the Commanderies in the United States which were then using the black uniform, to abandon it, and to adopt the white uniform, which had been originally ordered in 1859, and subsequently amended in 1862. Much opposition was manifested to this order in the Commanderies and Grand Commanderies where the black costume was in use. The Grand Master's interpretation of the Statute of the Grand Encampment was doubted or denied. The question assumed great importance in consequence of the feeling that was created, and is therefore worthy of discussion. Doctor Mackey's views were against the correctness of the Grand Master's interpretation of the law. It is, however, but fair to say that some distinguished Templars have been of a different opinion.

The following views advanced by Doctor Mackey in the National Freemason (December, 1872) express what he thought was the true condition of the question.

Previous to the year 1850 the costume of the Knights Templar of this country was determined only by a traditional rule, and consisted of a black dress, with the richly decorated baldric and apron; the latter intended to show the connection which existed between the Order and Ancient Craft Freemasonry. In 1856, at Hartford, a new Constitution was proposed and adopted, with the exception of the provisions that the Grand Master, from the Committee on the Constitution, made a report on the subject of dress, as a part of the Constitution; but the consideration of this report was postponed until the next triennial meeting. The changes in costume proposed by the Committee were not very great; the baldric and the essential apron were preserved, and a white tunic, not hitherto used, was recommended.

At the session of 1859, at Chicago, the subject of dress was alluded to by the Grand Master in his address; and his remarks, together with the report of the Committee made in 1856, were referred to a special Committee of seven, of which the Grand Masters of Knights Doyle, Pike, Simons, Mackey, Morris, and French were the members. This Committee reported a uniform which made material differences in the dress heretofore worn, and especially by the rejection of the apron and the introduction of a white tunic and a white Order, enclosing the Passion Cross, surrounded by the Latin motto, In hoc signo vinces; the star to be three and three-quarter inches in diameter. The scarf to be worn from the right shoulder to the left hip, with the ends extending six inches below the point of intersection.

Chapeau. The military chapeau, trimmed with black binding, one white and two black plumes, and appropriate cross on the left side.

Gloves. Of buff leather, the flap to extend four inches upward from the wrist, and to have the appropriate cross embroidered in gold, on the proper colored velvet, two inches in length.

In 1859 the Grand Encampment enacted a Statute providing that all Commanderies which might be thereafter chartered should provide a new costume of an entirely different kind, which should also be adopted by the old Commanderies whenever they should change their uniform. This new costume was further altered in 1862, and became of the following description, as detailed in the Statute:

Full Dress. Black frock coat, black pantaloons, scarf, sword, belt, shoulder straps, gauntlets, and chapeau, with appropriate trimmings.

Fatigue Dress. Same as full dress, except for chapeau a black cloth cap, navy form, with appropriate cross in front, and for gauntlets, white gloves.

Scarf. Five inches wide in the whole, of white, bordered with black one inch on either side, a strip of navy lace one-fourth of an inch wide, at the inner edge of the black. On the front center of the scarf a metal star of nine points, in allusion to the nine founders of the Temple Knights, of green, with the cross and serpent in gold, and the motto, In hoc signo vinces; the star to be three and three-quarter inches in diameter. The scarf to be worn from the right shoulder to the left hip, with the ends extending six inches below the point of intersection.

Chapeau. The military chapeau, trimmed with black binding, one white and two black plumes, and appropriate cross on the left side.
eloped these last were favorite notions of Grand Master Hubbard, and they were adopted by the Committee mainly in deference to his high authority. The point of view met at first with serious opposition, partly on account of the rejection of the apron, which many Templars then held, as they do now, to be an essential feature of Masonic Templarism, and a tangible relic of an era in Masonic history which, as they saw it, devolved on the old Commanderies, if they were required at once to throw aside their old dress and provide a new one. This opposition was only quelled by the agreement on a compromise, by which the old Commanderies were to be exempted from the operation of the law. The resolutions for the new Commanderies were referred to a Select Committee of Five. The report of the Committee says that the resolution adopted in the words of the following resolution, which was proposed by Sir Knight Thomas A. Doyle, who was one of the Committee, “Resolved, That the proper title of the Templar Order is Knights Templars, and not Knights Templar, as now commonly used under the sanction of the example of this Grand Encampment. Certainly, it is the duty of every body of men to inquire whether the documents issued under their name are in violation of these principles, and if so, to correct the error. If a layman puts a very low estimate on the character of the New Commandery has the authority to prescribe such an act of discourtesy, not to put too fine a point upon it,” and no one can find in the proceedings of the Grand Encampment any act which repeals the compromise resolution of 1859, and this has been the decision of all the Grand Masters who have wielded the baculus or staff of office, except the present one.

But, in the second place, the report of 1862 shows clearly that the object of the Committee was to recommend a change in the uniform that had been adopted for new Commanderies in 1859, and which had become objectionable on account of the tunic and cloak, and that they did not intend to refer at all to the old dress of the old Commanderies. In the report the Committee say: “The objections advanced to the costume adopted at the last Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment prevented such an act of discourtesy, not to put too fine a point upon it,” and no one can find in the proceedings of the Grand Encampment any act which repeals the compromise resolution of 1859, and this has been the decision of all the Grand Masters who have wielded the baculus or staff of office, except the present one.

1856, when it was changed to Knights Templar; and the Committee should have inquired by whose au¬ thority the change was made. But having failed to grapple with the question of good English, the Craft afterward took the subject up, and a long discussion ensued in the several Masonic journals, resulting at last in the expression, by the best scholars of the Order, of the opinion that Knights Templars was correct, because it was in accordance with the rules of good English, and in unexceptional agreement with the usage of all hterary men who have written on the subject.
Brother Stansbury, in an article on this question which he published in Mackey’s National Freemason (i, page 191), has almost exhausted the subject of authority and grammatical usage. He says:

other in the singular. The well-known rule of apposition, which prevails in almost, if not quite all, languages re¬ quires nouns under these circumstances to agree in number and case. This is, in fact, a principle of general grammar, founded in common sense.
The combination Knights Templar is therefore false in grammar, if the word Templar is a noun. But some may say that it is a noun used as an adjective—a qualifying noun—a very cominon usage in the English tongue. If this were so, the combination Knights Templar would still be entirely out of hannony with the usage of the language in regard to qualifying nouns, the invariable practise being to place the adjective noun before the noun which it qualifies.
A few familiar examples will show this. Take the follow¬ ing: mansion house, bird cage, sea fog, dog days, mouse trap, devil fish, ink stand, and beer cask. In every case the generic word follows the qualifying noun.
But if we even went to the length of admitting the word
Templar to be an adjective, the combination Knights Templar would still be contrary to the genius of the language, which, except in rare cases, places the adjective before the noun which it qualifies. In poetry, and in some technical terms of foreign origin, the opposite practise prevails.^ The analogy of the usage in reference to the designations of other Orders of knighthood, is also against the use of Knights Templar. We have Knights Com¬ manders, EZnights Bachelors, Knights Bannerets, Knights Baronets, and Knights Hospitalers.
Against all this, the only thing that can be pleaded is the usage of the Grand Encampment of the United States, and of some Commanderies which have followed in its wake. The propriety of this usage is the very ques¬ tion at issue; and it would be curious reasoning, indeed, that would cite the fact of the usage in proof of its pro¬ priety. If the Templars of today are the successors of De Molay and Hugh de Payens, the preservation and restoration of the correct title of the Order cannot be a matter of indifference to them.
In coming to the consideration of the question, it appears that it must be examined in two ways, gram¬ matically and traditionally: in other words, we must in¬ quire, first, which of these two expressions better accords with the rules of English grammar; and, secondly which of them has the support and authority of the best English writers.
1. If we examine the subject grammatically, we shall find that its proper decision depends simply on the ques¬ tion: Is Templar a noun or an adjective? If it is an adjective, then Knights Templar is correct, because ad¬ jectives in English have no plural form. It would, how¬ ever, be an awkward and unusual phraseology, because it is the almost invariable rule of the English language that the adjective should precede and not follow the sub¬ stantive which it qualifies. But if Templar is a substan¬ tive or noun, then, clearly, Knights Templar is an ungrammatical phrase, because Templar would then be in apposition with Knights, and should be in the same regi¬ men; that is to say, two nouns coming together, and re¬ ferring to the same person or thing, being thus said to be in apposition, must agree in number and case. Thus we say King George or Duke William, when King and George and Duke and William are in apposition and in the singular; but speaking of Thackeray’s “Four Georges,’’ and intending to designate who they were by an explanartory noun in apposition, we should put both nouns in the lural, and say “the four Georges, Kings of England.’’ o when we wish to designate a simple Knight, who is not only a Knight, but also belongs to that branch of the Order which is known as Templars, we should caU him a Knight Templar; and if there be two or more of these Templars, we should call them Knights Templars just as we say Knight Hospitaler and Knights Hospitalers. Now there is abundant evidence, in the best works on the sub¬ ject, of the use of the word Templar as a substantive, and none of its use as an adjective. It would be tedious to cite authorities, but a reference to our best English writers will show the constant employment of Templar as a substantive only. The analogy of the Latin and French languages supports this view, for Templarius is a noun in Latin as Templier is in French.
2. As to traditional authority, the usage of good writers which is the jus et rurrma loquendi, the law and rule of speech, is altogether in favor of Knights Templars, and not Knights Templar,

That it is an innovation in violation of historic truth is proved by reference to all historical authorities. I have made diligent researches in the Congressional Library, and have invoked the aid of all my friends who were likely to be able to assist me in such an investigation, and BO far from finding any conflict of authority on the ques¬ tion, I have never been able to discover a smgle historical authority in favor of any other title than Knights Tem¬ plars.
I refer to the following list of authorities: Encyclopedia Britannica, Encyclopedia Americana, Chambers’s Encyclo¬ pedia, London Encyclopedia, Encyclopedia Metropolitana, Penny Cyclopedia, Cottage Cyclopedia, Rees’s Cyclo¬
pedia, Wade’s British Chronology, Blair’s Chronological Tables, Chambers’s Miscellany (Crusades), Chambers’s Book of Days, Addison’s Knights Templars, Panatalogia, Boutelie’s Heraldry, Hallam’s Middle Ages, Lingard’s
History of England; Glossographia Anglicana Nova, 1707; Blackstone’s Commentaries (volume i, page 406), Apple¬ ton’s Cyclopedia of Biography (Molai); Townsend’s Calen¬ dar of Knights, London, 1828; Mosheim’s Ecclesiastical History (1832 edition, volume ii, page 481); Dugdale’s
Monasticon Anglicanum (volume vi, page 813); Hayden’s Dictionary of Dates; Beeton’s Dictionary of Universal In¬ formation; Burne’s Sketch of the History of the Knights Templars; Laurie’s History of Freemasonry; Taffe’s His¬ tory of Knights of Malta; London Freemasons Magazine; Sutherland’s Achievements of Knights of Malta; Clark’s History of Knighthood; Ashmole’s History of the Order of the Garter; Turner’s England in the Middle Ages; Brande’s Encyclopedia; Tanner’s Notitia Monastica, 1744 (pages 307-10).
These will, perhaps, suffice to show what, in the opinion of historical authorities, is the proper title of the Order.
In all of them, the term Knights Templars \b the only one employed. They might, perhaps, be sufficient also on the question of literary usage; but on that point I refer, in addition, to the following: London Qvtarterly Review, 1829 (page 608). Article: History of the Knights Templars.
Edinburgh Review, October, 1806 (page 196). Review of Monsieur Renouard’s work, Les Templiers. Eclectic Review, 1842 (page 189). Review of the History of the Knights Templars, the Temple Church, and the Temple, by Charles G. Addison. The running title is History of the Knights Templars. Retrospective Review, 1821 (volume ix, page 250). Review of the History of the Templars, by Nicholas Gaulterius, Amsterdam, 1703. The running title is His¬ tory of the Knights Templars. In Doctor Mackey’s various Masonic works both titles are occasionally used; but that fact is fully explained in the letter from that distin^ished Masonic authority, with which I conclude this article.
On the philological and grammatical question, it mainly turns on the inquiry whether the word Templar is a noun or an adjective. I think (writes Doctor Mackey) it may be safely asserted that every dictionary of the English language in which the word occurs, gives it as a noun, and as a noun only. This is certainly the fact as to Johnson’s Dictionary, Webster’s Dictionary, Cole’s Dictionary, Crabb’s Dictionary (Technological), Imperial Dictionary Craig’s Dictionary (Universal), and Worcester’s Dic¬ tionary. If, then, the word Templar is a noun, we have in the combination—Knights Templar—two nouns, referring to the same person, one of which is in the plural, and the


KNIGHTS

In addition to the very numerous authorities collected by Brother Stansbury from the shelves of the Congressional Library, Doctor Mackey collated all the authorities in his own library. All the English and American writers, Masonic and unmonastic, except some recent American ones, use the plural of Templar to designate more than one Knight. In a few instances Doctor Mackey found Knight Templars, but never Knights Templar. The very recent American use of this latter phrase is derived direct from the authority in controversy. The former Constitution used the phrase Knights Templars. "On the whole," Doctor Mackey concludes, "I am satisfied that the expression Knights Templar is a violation both of the grammatical laws of our language and of the usage of our best writers on both sides of the Atlantic, and it should therefore, I think, be abandoned."

However, the views of Brother Mackey as supported by the Standard Dictionary and other authorities for many years after his argument had been presented, do not prevail today in Knight Templar circles. The preference is given to Knights Templar. Brother L. P. Newby in his Side-Lights on Templar Law (pages 116 to 118), has clearly summed up for us the situation in regard to various expressions adopted officially by the Grand Encampment. These we will briefly quote.

Brother Newby says that:

For more than eight hundred years our Order has been known as the Order of the Temple and the Order of Christian Knighthood.

The honorary title of the Deputy Grand Master is Right Eminent and the official title, Grand Master.

The honorary title of the Deputy Grand Master is Right Eminent and the official title is Deputy Grand Master.

The honorary title of the other offices of the Grand Encampment is Right Eminent, as amended in 1916.

The honorary title of Grand Commander is Right Eminent and his official title, Grand Commander.

The honorary title of the Deputy Grand Commander is Very Eminent and the honorary title of the other offices of the Grand Commandery is Eminent.

The honorary title of the Commandery is Eminent and his official title is Commander.

A Knight Templar, if his name is known, may be addressed as Knight, or Brother Knight, Sir John or Sir John Smith, if that be his name. A group or an assembly of Knights Templar, may be addressed collectively as Brother Knights. These designations are covered by the enactments of the Grand Encampment up to and including the legislation of 1916.

Brother Newby quite properly says of these matters:

The question of Nomenclature has caused more friction during the existence of our Order than any other that has been before the Grand Encampment. Discretion being the better part of valor, I will act upon Pope's suggestion when he said, "Fools rush in where Angels fear to tread." I will not rush into the argument, but will confine myself with a statement of what the law is, as construed by the Grand Encampment and add that whatever is, is right. By our Constitution we are an Order of Knights Templar and the same can not be changed by a mere report of a Committee, especially one that is not charged with that duty. Whether the correct spelling is demit or dimit is immaterial. Whether our names or titles are what they are or were in England or Canada is of no consequence. Our laws are not controlled by history, tradition, orthography or what some one thinks is or is not good English. Whether our principles of right and justice as taught by Him who came to redeem the world. The question of nomenclature has been before the Grand Encampment. Discretion construed by the Grand Encampment and add that whatever is, is right. For me, I am willing to accept the law as it is, as made and construed by the Grand Encampment. If it sees fit to change it, I will willingly accept the change without murmur and without complaint, as it would be presumptuous to set up individual opinion against the combined opinion of the membership of the Grand Encampment.

KNIGHTSTEMPLAR WAR EMERGENCY FUND. Joseph K. Orr, Atlanta, Georgia, then Deputy Grand Master, in May, 1918, suggested by letter to Grand Master Lee Stewart Smith the adoption for two years of one hundred orphans of French soldiers at the rate of $73 each. The Grand Master ordered vouchers for this amount, $7,300, and also furnished names of one hundred Knights as Godfathers. He also contributed $20,000 to the Red Cross, and $20,000 to the Young Men's Christian Association. From the War Emergency Fund there was donated $5,000 to starving children in Central Europe, $1,000 to the Far East Committee, $1,000 to Russian children. Grand Master L. P. Newby personally visited Europe when American Templar Masonry assumed the support and education of five hundred war orphans of respectable parentage. As fast as any became self-supporting, others were taken from an eligible list, more than eight hundred orphans being reported by Grand Master Newby, 1925, as having been fitted for the activities of life (see Proceedings, Grand Encampment, United States, Philadelphia, 1919, page 190; New Orleans, 1922, page 12, and Seattle, 1925, page 31).

KNOWLEDGE. In the dualism of Freemasonry, knowledge is symbolized by light, as ignorance is by darkness. To be initiated, to receive light is to acquire knowledge; and the cry of the neophyte for light is the natural aspiration of the soul for knowledge.
existence of the words themselves. He says that in (Divine Legation 1, ii, page 4), but without giving his authority, that in the celebration of the Eleusinian Mysteries, “the Assembly was dismissed with these two barbarous words, ΚΟΣ ΟΜΠΑΚΣ”; and he thinks that this “shows the Mysteries not to have been originally Greek.” Le Clerc (Bibliographie Universel vi, page 86) thinks that the words seem to be only an incorrect pronunciation of kois and omphets, which, he says, signify in the Phenician language, “watch, and abstain from evil.” Potter also (Greek Anthologie, page 346) says that the words were used in the Eleusinian Mysteries.

The words occur in an old Greek lexicon, that of Hesychius, where they are thus defined:

Κόης ὁμπάκς. An acclamation used by those who have finished anything. It is also the sound of the judge’s ballot and of the clepsydra. The Athenians used the word ὅπα (see also Pococke’s India in Greece).

The words were always deemed inexplicable until 1797, when Captain Wilford offered, in the Asiatic Researches (volume v, page 300), the following explanation:

The real words are Candasa Om Paacha; that they are pure Sanskrit; and are used to this day by the Brahmins at the conclusion of their religious rites. Candasa signifies the object of our most ardent wishes. Om is the famous monosyllable used both at the beginning and conclusion of a prayer or religious rite, like our word Amen. Paacha exactly answers to the obsolete Latin word ex; it signifies change, course, stead, place, turn of work, duty, fortune, etc., and is particularly used in pouring water in honor of the gods.

Uuvaroff (Essai sur les Mysteres d’Eleusis) calls this “the most important of modern discoveries.” Creuzer, Schelling, and Münter also approve of it. Not so with Lobeck, who, in his Aglaophamus (page 775) denies not only that such words were used in the Eleusinian Mysteries, but the very existence of the words themselves. He says that in the title of the article in Hesychius there is a misprint. Instead of κοης δρηπάκς, it should be κοης όμ. πάξ, where όμ is the usual abbreviation of όμοιος, like or similar to; so that the true reading would be κοης όμοιος πάξ, or κονς, like paç; and he confirms this by referring to πάξ, to which Hesychius gives the same meaning as he does to κοης. This is too simple for Godfrey Higgins, who calls it (Anacalypsis i, page 253) “a pretended emendation.” It is nevertheless very ingenious, and is calculated to shake our belief that these words were ever used in the Eleusinian Rites, notwithstanding the learned authority of Meursius, Warburton, Lempriere, Creuzer, Uuvaroff, and others. Brother Bernard H. Springett says in Secret Seats of Syria (page 337), that in an ancient ritual still used in Great Britain, and to which an Egyptian origin is attributed, the meaning of these syllables, Khonx-om-paz, as he gives them, is Light in Extension.

KORAH. The son of Izhar, uncle of Moses, who was famed for beauty and wealth. It is related that he refused to give alms, as Moses had commanded, and brought a villainous charge against Moses, who complained thereof to God; the answer was that the earth would obey whatever command he should give; and Moses said, “O earth, swallow them up!”; then Korah and his confederates were sinking into the ground, when Korah pleaded for mercy, which Moses refused. Then God said, “Moses, thou hadst no mercy on Korah, though he asked pardon of thee four times; but I would have had compassion on him if he had asked pardon of me but once” (Al Beiddaw).

KORAN. The sacred book of the Mohammedans, and believed by them to contain a record of the revelations made by God to Mohammed, and afterward dictated by him to an amanuensis, since the prophet could neither read nor write. In a Lodge consisting wholly of Mohammedans, the Koran would be esteemed as the Book of the Law, and take the place on the altar which is occupied in Christian Lodges by the Bible. It would thus become the symbol to them of the Tracing-Board of the Divine Architect. But, unlike the Old and New Testaments, the Koran has no connection with, and gives no support to, any of the Masonic legends or symbols, except in those parts which were plagiarized by the prophet from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. Finch, however, in one of his apocryphal works, produced a system of Mohammedan Freemasonry, consisting of twelve Degrees, founded on the teachings of the Koran, and the Hadeses or traditions of the prophet. This system was a pure invention of Finch.

KOREA or COREA. A peninsula of Eastern Asia, now forming part of the Japanese Empire. The Grand Lodge of Scotland has instituted a Lodge in Korea, namely the Han Yang Lodge at Seoul.

KOSUTH, LAJOS, or LOUIS. Patriot, born in Monok, in Zemplin, Hungary, in 1802. After the study of law at the Protestant College of Sarospatak, he practised for a while, then he devoted practically his entire life to his country. In prison four years for publishing the debates of the National Assembly. From 1841 to 1844, editor of Pesti Hirlap in the interests of the National Party. Appointed, 1848, Minister of Finance and upon a dispute with Austria over the revolt of the Croats, he assumed charge and declared the independence of Hungary. After Gérei’s defeat at Villagos, 1849, he was forced to flee to Turkey. Imprisoned and later released, he then lived in England for several years, in constant touch with Mazzini, Italian Revolutionist. During this period he also visited the United States.

Charles A. Beard said, at a dinner given March 7, 1925, in honor of Count Michael Karolyi, in New York City:

In 1848 Europe was devastated by a wide-sweeping revolution. Champions of liberty in Hungary raised the banner of revolt and declared their independence. Russian despotism came to the aid of Austrian despotism. Reaction followed. The revolution was tramped out in blood. Kosuth fled for his life to Turkey, where he was lodged in prison. Did the Government of the United States wait for him to come and beg admission?
To the Worshipful Master, Wardens and Brethren of Cincinnati Lodge No. 139 of free and accepted Masons

The petition of the subscriber respectfully showeth that having long entertained a favorable opinion of your ancient institution, he is desirous of being admitted as member thereof if found worthy.

Being an exile for liberty's sake, he has no place of fixed residence; is now staying at Cincinnati; his age is 49½ years; his occupation is to restore his native land, Hungary, to its constitutional independence, and to achieve by common action with other nations, civil and religious liberty in Europe.

PETITION FOR MASONIC DEGREES SIGNED BY LOUIS KOSSUTH, FAMOUS HUNGARIAN PATRIOT
Did it haggle with him in a manner worthy of a street beggar? On the contrary, the Congress of the United States passed a resolution asking the President to put an American battlefield at Kossuth's disposal. The President of the United States designated Mississippi for him and brought him away from his prison. After a sojourn in England, Kossuth sailed on an American ship to this country. His enemies pursuaded him to return; he longed him of having stole money in his youth to pay a gambling debt. They charged him with arrogance, cowardice, and duplicity. Did America exclude him as an undesirable alien? On the contrary, the reception committee, attended the dinner, and in an impassioned speech boldly aligned himself on the side of Hungarian independence. The Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government looked on with unconcealed anger. Its Embassy in Washington lodged official protest. Ignoring Webster, it appealed directly to the President. And did the Government of the United States haul down its flag? Did the State Department take orders from a foreign government in a matter pertaining to civil liberty in America? It did not. It stood fast. The Imperial spokesman in Washington, Hülsemann, threw up his post and left the capital in a huff. The Government of the United States still lived.

This recital of the enthusiastic reception of Louis Kossuth in the United States explains the peculiarities of his initiation (see article Sight, Making a Mason at). His application for membership is somewhat unusual and is as follows:

Cincinnati, Ohio, February 18, 1852.

To the Worshipful Master, Wardens, and Brethren of Cincinnati Lodge No. 133, of Free and Accepted Masons:

The petition of the subscriber respectfully showeth that having long entertained a favorable opinion of your Ancient Institution, he is desirous of being admitted a member thereof, if found worthy.

Being an exile for liberty's sake, and having no place of fixed residence, is now staying at Cincinnati; his age is 49 years; his occupation is Orator and Advocate in Hungary, to its national independence, and to achieve by community of action with other nations, civil and religious liberty in Europe.

Louis Kossuth.

The Minutes of the Lodge tell us that on motion the petition was by unanimous vote made "a case of emergency," and forthwith referred to a Committee of Investigation. Several associates of Kossuth submitted their petitions at the same time, among whom were Colonel Count Gregory Bathlen, aged 38, member of the staff of Governor Kossuth; Peter A. Nagy, aged 37, Secretary; Paul Hajník, aged 44 years, Treasurer of the Hungarian Fund, and Dr. Julius Utosy Strasser, aged 42, physician to Kossuth. The petitioners were elected to receive the Entered Apprentice Degree, the Investigating Committee having made their report the same day the petitions were received. The Communication was adjourned to February 18, and at six o'clock in the afternoon the candidates were initiated. At the same hour, February 20, the candidates were balloted upon, elected to, and received the Fellow Craft Degree, and the Master Mason Degree being conferred upon Brother Kossuth. Another adjournment to February 21 was effected, when the other candidates received the Master's Degree. Each of the candidates deposited with the Lodge a fee of $20 and this was returned to the newly made Brethren at the time when Diplomas and Dimits were handed to them.

On February 28, 1852, Governor Kossuth attended a meeting of Center Lodge No. 23, Indianapolis, Indiana, along with several of his suite. An address was made by the distinguished Hungarian in regard to Freemasonry at this meeting, from which the following is quoted:

The Masonic brotherhood is one which tends to better the condition of mankind, and we are delighted to know it enlists the attention of so many Brethren around you as we find surrounding us here. Besides the great antiquity of the Order which should endear it to all good Masons, its excellent precepts and high moral teachings must induce all good members of the Order to appreciate its benevolent purposes and useful works. To one like myself, without a country or a home, dependent upon the hospitality of strangers for life and protection, a great substitute for all my privations is, I find, to be surrounded by Brethren of the Masonic Order.

On another occasion Brother Kossuth stated with emphasis: "If all men were Freemasons, oh, what a world-wide and glorious republic we should have!"

The two quotations given above are from the Western Freemason (volume iii, page 196). At a reception given Brother Kossuth by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts he expressed similar sentiments and opinions on Freemasonry. After the Austro-Hungarian reconciliation, in 1867, under Emperor Francis Joseph, Kossuth ceased any further efforts politically and his death occurred at Turin in 1894. For contributions to the above we are indebted to Leonard H. Freiberg, Secretary, Cincinnati Lodge No. 133, and to the late Newton R. Parvin, Grand Secretary of Iowa.

KRAUSE, CARL CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH.

One of the most learned and laborious Freemasons of Germany, and one who received the smallest reward and the largest persecution for his learning and his labors. The record of his life reflects but httle credit to Freemasonry. After the Austro-Hungarian reconciliation, in 1867, under Emperor Francis Joseph, Kossuth ceased any further efforts politically and his death occurred at Turin in 1894. For contributions to the above we are indebted to Leonard H. Freiberg, Secretary, Cincinnati Lodge No. 133, and to the late Newton R. Parvin, Grand Secretary of Iowa.
organizations, of State government, and of private, social aggregations, into one general confederation, which should labor, irrespective of political, ecclesiastic, or personal influences, for the universal and uniform culture of mankind. Of such a confederation he supposed that he could see the germ in the Order of Freemasonry, which, therefore, it was his object to elevate to that position.

He first submitted these views in a series of lectures delivered before the Lodge Zu den drei Schwertern, of the Three Swords, in Dresden, of which he had been appointed the Orator. They were received with much approbation, and were published in 1811 under the title of the Spiritualization of the Genuine Symbols of Freemasonry. In these lectures, Krause has not confined himself to the received rituals and accustomed interpretations, but has adopted a system of his own. This is the course that was pursued by him in his greater work, the Kunsturkunden; and it was this which partly gave so much offense to his Masonic, but not his intellectual, superiors. In 1810, he published, as the result of all his labors and researches, his greatest work, the one on which his reputation principally depends, and which, notwithstanding its errors, is perhaps one of the most learned works that ever issued from the Masonic press. This is Die drei ältesten Kunsturkunden der Freimaurerbrüderschaft, or the Three Oldest Professional Documents of the Brotherhood of Freemasons.

The announcement that this work was shortly to appear, produced the greatest excitement in the Masonic circles of Germany. The progressive members of the Craft looked with anxious expectation for the new discoveries which must result from the investigations of an enlightened mind. The antiquated and unprogressive Freemasons, who were opposed to all discussion of what they deemed esoteric subjects, dreaded the effects of such a work on the exclusiveness of the Order. Hence attempts were made by these latter to suppress the publication. So far were these efforts carried, that one of the German Grand Lodges offered the author a large amount of money for his book, which proposal was of course rejected.

After the publication, the Grand Masters of the three Grand Lodges sought every means of communicating Krause and Mossdorf, who had sustained him in his views. After much angry discussion, the Dresden Lodge, Zu den drei Schwertern, was prevailed upon to act as executioner of this ignorant spirit of fanaticism, and Krause and Mossdorf, two of the greatest lights that ever burst upon the horizon of Masonic literature, were excommunicated. Nor did the persecution here cease. Krause experienced its effects through all the remaining years of his life. He was prevented on frequent occasions, by the machinations of his Masonic enemies, from advancement in his literary and professional pursuits, and failed through their influence to obtain professorships to which, from his learning and services, he was justly entitled. Findel (page 629) has approvingly quoted Doctor Schaubergh as calling this “the darkest page in the history of German Freemasonry.”

In 1814 Krause removed to Berlin. In 1821 he traveled through Germany, Italy, and France, and in 1823 established himself at Göttingen, where he gave lectures on philosophy until 1830. He then removed to Munich, where he died September 27, 1832. Besides his contributions to Freemasonry, Krause was an extensive writer on philosophical subjects. His most important works are his Lectures on the System of Philosophy, 1828, and his Lectures on the Fundamental Truths of Science, 1829; both published at Göttingen.

His great work, however, to which he owes his Masonic fame, is his Kunsturkunden. He commences this work by a declaration of his design in writing it, which was twofold: first, to enlighten the brotherhood in reference to the three oldest documents in possession of the Craft, by a philological and philosophical examination of these records; and secondly, and with a higher purpose, to call their attention to a clear perception of the fundamental idea of a general union of mankind, to be accomplished by a reorganization of their own brotherhood. To the rituals of the present day he objected as wanting in scientific formula, and he thought that out of these old records they might well construct a better and more practical system.

But with all his learning, while his ideas of reform, if properly carried out, would undoubtedly advance and elevate the Masonic Institution, he committed grave errors in his estimation of the documents that he has made the groundwork of his system. The three documents which he has presented as the oldest and most authentic records of the Fraternity are: 1. The well-known Leiden Manuscript, a document of whose authenticity there are the gravest doubts; 2. The Entered Apprentice’s Lecture, a document published early in the eighteenth century, to which, in his second edition, he has added what he calls the New English Lecture; but it is now known that Krause’s Lecture is by no means the oldest catechism extant; and, 3. The York Constitution, which, claiming the date of 926, has been recently suspected to be not older than the early part of the eighteenth century.

Notwithstanding these assumptions of authenticity for documents not really authentic, the vast learning of the author is worthy of all admiration. His pages are filled with important facts and suggestive thoughts that cannot fail to exert an influence on all Masonic investigations. Krause cannot but be considered as one of the founders of a new Masonic literature, not for Germany alone, but for the whole world of Masonic students.

Brother Roscoe Pound, Philosophy of Freemasonry, 1915, discusses keenly and fraternally the contributions of several outstanding Masonic students. Among these was Krause and we attempt briefly to outline the author’s judicious conclusions (page 39). Krause held that:

Freemasonry’s ultimate aim was the perfection of humanity, its immediate purpose to organize the universal moral sentiments of mankind, to organize the sanction of human disapprobation.

That the relation of Freemasonry to human institutions, especially government, state and church, should be in harmony and even cooperation towards the great end of all of them. In this spirit Krause expounds our Masonic charges.

Freemasonry deals with the internal conditions of life governed by reason and its fundamental principles are measurement by reason and restraint by reason—and by teaching these to approach perfection.
KRAUSE

Brother K. R. H. Mackenzie, Royal Masonic Cyclo-pedia, says that Krause is supposed to be the original of Thomas Carlyle's Professor Teufelsdrockh in the peculiar book Sartor Resartus (the Tailor or Patcher Repatched), a curious philosophy of clothes.

KRAUSE MANUSCRIPT. A title sometimes given to the so-called York Constitutions, a German translation of which was published by Krause, in 1810, in his Kunsturkunden (see York Constitutions and Manuskripten, Aporcyphal).

KRISHNA or CHRISTNA. One of the Trimurti in the Hindu religious system. Trimurti is a Sanskrit compound word meaning three-shaped and is here applied to the trinity or triad of the Vedas, consisting of Brahma, the Creator; Vishnu, the Preserver, and Siva, the Destroyer. The myth proceeds to state that Devanaguy, upon the appearance of Vishnu, fell in a profound ecstasy, and having been overshadowed, to use the Sanskrit term, the spirit was incarnated, and upon the birth of a child, the Virgin and Son were conducted to a sheepfold belonging to Nanda, on the confines of the territory of Madura. The newly born was named Krishna, the Sanskrit for sacred. The Rajah of Madura had been informed in a dream that this son of Devanaguy should dethrone and chastise him for all his crimes; he therefore sought the certain destruction of the child, and ordained the massacre, in all his states, of all the children of the male sex born during the night of the birth of Krishna. A troop of soldiers reached the sheepfold of Nanda, the lord of a small village on the banks of the Ganges, and celebrated for his virtues. The servants were about to arm in defense, when the child, who was at his mother's breast, suddenly grew to the appearance and size of a child ten years of age, and running, amused himself amidst the flock of sheep. The exploits of this wonder child, his preaching the new or reformed doctrine of India, his disciples and loved companion Ardjouna, the parables, philosophic teaching, the myth of his transfiguration, his abductions in the Ganges before his death, and tragic end, together with the story of his revival after three days, and ascension, are graphically told by many authors, perhaps more brilliantly in La Bible dans l'Inde, as translated into English by Louis Jacolliot.

KULMA. The Hindustani Confession of Faith. KUM, KIVI. These two words, pronounced koom and keevy, are found as ceremonial words in the advanced Degrees. They are from the Hebrew, and are interpreted as meaning Arisel and Kneel! They are not significant words, having no symbolic allusion, and seem to have been introduced merely to mark the Jewish origin of the Degree in which they are employed. In the more recent instructions they are disused.

KUN. Arabic for Be, the Creative Fiat of God.

LABARUM. The monogram of the name of Christ, formed by the first two letters of that word, ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ, in Greek. It is the celebrated sign which the legend says appeared in the sky at noonday to the Emperor Constantine, and which was afterward placed by him upon his standard. Hence it is sometimes called the Cross of Constantine. It was adopted as a symbol by the early Christians, and frequent instances of it are to be found in the catacombs. According to Eusebius, the Labarum was surrounded by the motto εν τοτε ΝΙKH, or Conquer by this, which has been Latinized to In hoc signo vinces, the motto assumed by the Masonic Knights Templar (see In hoc signo vinces). In this Life of Constantine, (i, page 31), Eusebius describes the arrangement of the Labarum as on a long gilded spear having a crosspiece supporting a square purple cloth jewelled richly, at end of spear a gold wreath enclosing monogram. The derivation of the word Labarum is uncertain. The Greek word Labaron means a flag.

The Encyclopedia Britannica connects the name with the Basque Labarva, signifying standard.

LABOR. It is one of the most beautiful features of the Masonic Institution, that it teaches not only the necessity, but the nobility of labor. From the time of opening to that of closing, a Lodge is said to be at labor. This is but one of the numerous instances in which the terms of Operative Masonry are symbolically applied to Speculative; for, as the Operative Masons were engaged in the building of material edifices, so Free and Accepted Masons are supposed to be employed in the erection of a superstructure of virtue and morality upon the foundation of the Masonic principles which they were taught at their admission into the Order. When the Lodge is engaged in reading petitions, hearing reports, debating financial matters, etc., it is said to be occupied in business; but when it is engaged in the form and ceremony of initiation into any of the Degrees, it is said to be at work. Initiation is Masonic labor. This phraseology at once suggests the connection of our Speculative System with an Operative Art that pre-
LABOR IS WORSHIP
Labor is an important word in Freemasonry; indeed, we might say the most important. For this, and this alone, does a man become a Freemason. Every other object is secondary or, at least, it must conduce to his own internal satisfaction. We build neither a visible Solomon Temple nor an Egyptian pyramid; our industry must become visible in works that are imperishable, so that when we vanish from the eyes of mortals it may be said of us that our labor was well done.

As Freemasons, we labor in our Lodge to make ourselves a perfect building, without blemish, working hopefully for the consummation, when the house of our earthly tabernacle shall be finished, when the Lost Word of Divine Truth shall at last be discovered, and when we shall be found by our own efforts at perfection to have done God service.

Laborare est Orare. A Latin expression, meaning To labor is to pray; or, in other words, labor is worship. This was a saying of the medieval monks, which is well worth meditation. This doctrine, that labor is worship, has been advanced and maintained, from time immemorial, as a leading dogma of the Order of Freemasonry. There is no other human institution under the sun which has set forth this great principle in such bold relief. We hear constantly of Freemasonry as an institution that inculcates morality, that fosters the social feeling, that teaches brotherly love; and all this is well, because it is true; but we must never forget that from its foundation-stone to its pinnacle, all over its vast temple, is inscribed, in symbols of living light, the great truth that labor is worship.

A distinction may well be suggested here between the past and present uses of the word labor. It is somewhat suggestive character (see in this connection page 7, Encyclopedia Britannica, eleventh edition, volume 16). "The term labor means strictly any energetic work, though in general it implies hard work, but in modern parlance it is specially confined to industrial work of the kind done by the working classes." Labor to the Freemason is a term usually confined to energetic work, though in general it implies hard work, but in modern parlance it is specially confined to industrial work of the kind done by the working classes.

The place where experiments in chemistry, pharmacy, etc., are performed; the workrooms of the chemist and physicist. An important apartment in the conferring of the Degrees of the Society of Rosicrucians.

LABORERS, STATUTES OF. Toward the mid-century of the fourteenth century, a plague of excessive virulence, known in history as the Black Death, invaded Europe, and swept off fully one-half of the inhabitants. The death, it is said, so terrified the serfs that it had the effect of advancing the price of all kinds of labor to double the former rate. In England, the Parliament, in 1350, enacted a Statute, which was soon followed by others, the object of which was to regulate the rate of wages and the price of the necessaries of life. Against these enactments, which were called the Statutes of Laborers, the artisans of all kinds rebelled; but the most active opposition was found among the Masons, whose organization, Doctor Mackey asserts, being better regulated, was more effective (see Freemasonry). In 1360, Statutes were passed forbidding their "Congregations, Chapters, Regulations, and Oaths," which were from time to time repeated, until the third year of the reign of Henry VI, 1425 a.d., when the celebrated Statute entitled "Masons shall not confederate themselves in Chapters and Congregations," was enacted in the following words:

Whereas, by yearly Congregations and Confederacies, made by the Masons in their General Assemblies, the good course and effect of the Statutes for Laborers be openly violated and broken, in subversion of the law, and to the great damage of all the Commons, our said sovereign lord and King, willing in this case to provide a remedy, by the advice and assent aforesaid, and at the special request of the Commons, hath ordained and established that such chapters and congregations shall not be hereafter held; and if any such be made, they that cause such Chapters and Congregations to be assembled and held, if they thereof be convicted, shall be judged for felons, and that the other Masons that come to such Chapters and Congregations be punished by imprisonment of their bodies and make fine and ransom at the king's will.

Findel (History of Freemasonry, page 94), following Preston, says that this Statute was passed in the Parliament of Bats; but Brother Hawkins points out this is erroneous, for the Act forbidding Masons to meet in Chapters or Congregations was passed in 1425 by the Parliament at Westminster, while the Parliament of Bats met at Leicester in the following year (see Bats, Parliament of).

All the Statutes of Laborers were repealed in the fifth year of Elisabeth; and Lord Coke gave the opinion that this act of Henry VI became, in consequence, "of no force or effect"; a decision which led Anderson, very absurdly, says Brother Mackey, to suppose that "the most learned judge really belonged to the ancient Lodge and was a faithful Brother" (Constitutions, 1723, page 57); as if it required a judge to be a Freemason to give a just judgment concerning the interests of Freemasonry.

From the Latin. A lip or edge, as of a dish or font; having reference to the vase at the entrance of places of worship for preliminary lustration, the act of purifying.

The place full of puzzling intricacies, with winding passages, as the Egyptian, Samian, and Cretan Labyrinths. That of the Egyptians was near Lake Moeris, which contained twelve palaces under one roof, and was of polished stone, with many vaulted passages, and a court of 3,000 chambers, half under the earth and half above them. Pliny states it was 3,000 years old in his day. The labyrinth is symbolical of the vicissitudes and anxieties of life, and is thus metaphorically used in a number of the Degrees of various Rites. Sage of the Labyrinth is the eighteenth grade, Rite of Memphis, in the Order of 1860. Sage Sublime of Labyrinth is the fifty-fifth grade of the same organization (see Catacombs).

A French savant and naturalist, born in 1756, died 1825.
LADDER. A symbol of progressive advancement from a lower to a higher sphere, which is common to Freemasonry and to many, if not all of the Ancient Mysteries. In each, generally, as in Freemasonry, the number of steps was seven (see Jacob's Ladder).

LADDER, BAHMANICAL. The symbolic ladder used in the Mysteries of Brahma. It had seven steps, symbolic of the seven worlds of the Indian universe. The lowest was the Earth; the second, the World of Re-existence; the third, Heaven; the fourth, the Middle World, or intermediate region between the lower and the upper worlds; the fifth, the World of Births, in which souls are born again; the sixth, the Mansion of the Blessed; and the seventh, or topmost round, the Sphere of Truth, the abode of Brahma, who was himself a symbol of the sun.

LADDER, CABALISTIC. The ladder of the Cabalists consisted of the ten Sephiroths or Emanations of Deity. The steps were in an ascending series —the Kingdom, Foundation, Splendor, Firmness, Beauty, Justice, Mercy, Intelligence, Wisdom, and the Crown. This ladder formed the exception to the usual number of seven steps or rounds.

LADDER, MITHRAIC. The symbolic ladder used in the Persian Mysteries of Mithras. It had seven steps, symbolic of the seven planets and the seven metals. Thus, beginning at the bottom, we have Saturn represented by lead, Venus by tin, Jupiter by brass, Mercury by iron, Mars by a mixed metal, the Moon by silver, and the Sun by gold; the whole being a symbol of the sidereal progress of the sun through the universe.

LADDER OF KADOSH. This ladder, belonging to the advanced Degrees of Freemasonry, consists of the seven following steps, beginning at the bottom: Justice, Equity, Kindliness, Good Faith, Labor, Patience, and Intelligence or Wisdom. Its supports are love of God and love of our neighbor, and their totality constitute a symbolism of the devoir or duty of Knighthood and Freemasonry, the fulfilment of which is necessary to make a Perfect Knight and Perfect Freemason.

LADDER, ROSICRUCIAN. Among the symbols of the Rosicrucians is a ladder of seven steps standing on a globe of the earth, with an open Bible, Square, and Compasses resting on the top. Between each of the steps is one of the following letters, beginning from the bottom: I. N. R. I. F. S. C., being the initials of Jesus, Nazarenus, Rex, Iudaorum, Fides, Spes, Caritas. These words suggesting Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews; Faith, Hope, Charity. But a more redundant or hidden meaning is sometimes given to the first four letters.

LADDER, SCANDINAVIAN. The symbolic ladder used in the Gothic Mysteries. Doctor Oliver refers it to the Yggrassl, or sacred ash-tree. But the symbolism is either very abstruse or very doubtful. It retains, however, the idea of an ascent from a lower to a higher sphere, which was common to all the mystical ladder systems. At its root lies the dragon of death; at its top are the eagle and hawk, the symbols of life.

LADDER, THEOLOGICAL. The symbolic ladder of the Masonic Mysteries. It refers to the ladder seen by Jacob in his vision, and consists, like all symbolical ladders, of seven rounds, alluding to the four cardinal and the three theological virtues (see Jacob's Ladder).

LADRIAN. In the Sloane Manuscript 3848 and probably meant for Edwin.

LADY. In the androgynous, both sexes. Lodges of Adoption, where the male members are called Knights, the female members are called Ladies; as, the Knights and Ladies of the Rose. The French use the word Dame.

LAMAISM. The name of the religion prevalent in Tibet and Mongolia. The Tibetan word, lama, is pronounced lama, a chief or high priest. The faith is Buddhism, corrupted by Sivaism, an adoration of saints. At the summit of its hierarchy are two Lama Popes, having equal rank and authority in spiritual and temporal affairs.

LAMA SABACHTHANI. An expression used in the Masonic French Rite of Adoption. The words are from Matthew (xxvii, 46), “And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?”

LAMB. In Ancient Craft Masonry the Lamb is the symbol of innocence; thus in the instructions of the First Degree: “In all ages the Lamb has been deemed an emblem of innocence.” Hence it is required that a Freemason’s Apron should be made of lambskin. In the advanced Degrees, and in the Degrees of chivalry, as in Christian iconography, or illustration, the lamb is a symbol of Jesus Christ. The introduction of this Christian symbolism of the lamb comes from the expression of Saint John the Baptist, who exclaimed, on seeing Jesus, "Behold the Lamb of God"; which was undoubtedly derived from the prophetic writers, who compare the Messiah suffering on the cross to a lamb under the knife of a butcher. In the vision of Saint John, in the Apocalypse, Christ is seen, under the form of a lamb, wounded in the throat, and opening the book with the seven seals. Hence, in one of the Degrees of the Scottish Rite, the Seventeenth, or Knight of the East and West, the lamb lying on the book with the seven seals is a part of the jewel.

LAMBALLE, THE PRINCESS OF. Marie Thérèse Louise, born at Turin, 1749, devoted companion of Marie Antoinette, who appointed her Superintendent of the Royal Household. Imprisoned with the Queen at the Revolution, she refused to take the oath against the royalty and was on September 3, 1792, delivered to the populace for execution, her head on a spear being carried before the windows of the Queen's apartment. The Grand Mistress of the so-called Mother Lodge of La Maçonnerie d'Adoption.

LAMB OF GOD. See Lamb, Paschal.

LAMB, PASCHAL. The Paschal Lamb, sometimes called the Holy Lamb, was the lamb offered up by the Jews at the paschal feast, the Passover. This has been transferred to Christian symbolism, to Easter, and naturally to Chivalric Freemasonry; and hence we find it among the symbols of modern Templarism. The paschal lamb, as a Christian and Masonic symbol, called also the Agnus Dei, or Lamb of God, first appeared in Christian art after the sixth century. This is depicted as a lamb standing on the ground, holding by the left forefront a banner, on which a cross is inscribed. This paschal lamb, or Lamb of God, has been adopted as a symbol by the Knights Templar, being borne in one of the banners of the Order, and constituting, with the square which surmounts, the jewel of the Generalissimo of a Commandery. The lamb is a symbol of Christ; the cross, of His passion; and the banner, of His victory over death and hell. Barrington states (Archaeologia ix, page 134) that in a Deed of the English Knights Templar, granting lands in Cambridgeshire, the seal is a Holy Land, and the arms of the Master of the Temple at London were argent, a cross gules, and on the nombril point thereof a Holy Lamb, that is, a Paschal or Holy Lamb on the center of a red cross in a white field.

LAMBSKIN APRON. See Apron.

LAMP, KNIGHT OF THE INEXTINGUISHABLE. A Degree quoted in the nomenclature of Fus-tier (see Thoré, Acta Latomorum i, page 320).

LANCÉ. A weapon for thrusting at an enemy, usually adorned with a small flag, made of tough ash, weighted at one end to balance it in use, and pointed at the other.

LANDMARKS. In ancient times, it was the custom to mark the boundaries of lands by means of stone pillars, the removal of which, by malicious persons, would be the occasion of much confusion, men having no other guide than these pillars by which to distinguish the limits of their property. To remove them, therefore, was considered a heinous crime. "Thou shalt not," says the Jewish law, "remove thy neighbor's Landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance." Hence those peculiar marks of distinction by which we are separated from the profane world, and by which we are enabled to designate our inheritance as the Sons of Light, are called the Landmarks of the Order. The Universal Language and the Universal Laws of Freemasonry are Landmarks, but not so are the local ceremonies, laws, and usages, which vary in different countries. To attempt to alter or remove these sacred Landmarks, by which we examine and prove a brother's claims to share in our privileges, is one of the most heinous offenses that a Freemason can commit.

In the decision of the question what are and what are not the Landmarks of Freemasonry, there has been much diversity of opinion among writers. Doctor Oliver says (Dictionary of Symbolic Masonry) that "some restrict them to the O. B. signs, tokens, and words. Others include the ceremonies of initiation, passing, and raising; and the form, dimensions, and support; the ground, situation, and covering; the ornaments, furniture, and jewels of a Lodge, or their characteristic symbols. Some think that the Order has no Landmarks beyond its peculiar secrets." But all of these are loose and unsatisfactory definitions, excluding things that are essential, and admitting others that are unessential.

Perhaps the safest method is to restrict them to those ancient, and therefore universal, customs of the Order, which either gradually grew into operation as rules of action, or, if at once enacted by any competent authority, were enacted at a period so remote, that no account of their origin is to be found in the records of history. Both the enactors and the time of the enactment have passed away from the record, and the Landmarks are therefore "of higher antiquity than memory or history can reach." The first requisite, therefore, of a custom or rule of action to constitute it a Landmark, is, that it must have existed from "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Its antiquity is its essential element.

Were it possible for all the Masonic authorities at the present day to unite in a Universal Congress, and with the most perfect unanimity to adopt any new regulation, although such regulation would, so long as it remained unrepealed, be obligatory on the whole Craft, yet it would not be a Landmark. It would have the character of universality, it is true, but it would be wanting in that of antiquity. Another peculiarity of these Landmarks of Freemasonry is, that they are unrepealable. As the Congress to which we have just alluded would not have the power to enact a Landmark, so neither would it have the prerogative of abolishing one. The Landmarks of the Order, like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, can suffer no change. What they were centuries ago, they still remain, and must so continue in force until Freemasonry itself shall cease to exist.

Until the year 1858, no attempt had been made by any Masonic writer to distinctly enumerate the Landmarks of Freemasonry, and to give to them a comprehensible form. In October of that year, the author of this work published in the American Quarterly Review of Freemasonry (volume ii, page 230) an article on “The Foundations of Masonic Law,” which contained a distinct enumeration of the Landmarks, which was the first time that such a list had been presented to the Fraternity. This enumeration was subsequently incorporated by the author in his Text Book of Masonic Jurisprudence. It has since been very generally adopted by the Fraternity and repubhshed by many writers on Masonic law; sometimes without any acknowledgment. According to this recapitula¬ tion, the result of much labor and research, the Land¬ marks are twenty-five, and are as follows:

Landmark. He may grant in virtue of this, to a sufficient number of Freemasons, the privilege of meeting together and conferring Degrees. The Lodges thus established are called Lodges under Dispensation (see Lodges).
8. The prerogative of the Grand Master to make Free¬ masons at sight is a Landmark which is closely connected with the preceding one. There has been much misap¬ prehension in relation to this Landmark, which misap¬ prehension has sometimes led to a denial of its existence in Jurisdictions where the Grand Master was, perhaps, at the very time substantially exercising the prerogative, without the slightest remark or opposition (see Sight, Making Freemasons at).
9. The necessity for Freemasons to congregate in Lodges is another Landmark. It is not to be understood by this that any ancient Landmark has directed that permanent organization of subordinate Lodges which constitutes one of the features of the Masonic system as it now prevails. But the Landmarks of the Order always prescribed that Freemasons should, from time to time, congregate together for the purpose of either Operative or Speculative Labor, and that these Congregations should be called Lodges.
Formerly, these were extemporary ineetings called together for special purposes, and then dissolved, the Brethren departing to meet again at other times and other places, according to the necessity of cir¬ cumstances. But Warrants of Constitution, by-laws, permanent oflficers, and annual arrears are modern in¬ novations wholly outside the Landmarks, and dependent entirely on the special enactments of a comparatively re¬ cent period.
10. The government of the Craft, when so congre¬ gated in a Lodge, by a Master and two Wardens, is also a Landmark. A Congregation of Freemasons meeting to¬ gether under any other government, as that, for instance, of a president and vice-president, or a chairman and subchairman, would not be recognized as a Lodge. The presence of a Master and two Wardens is as essential to the valid organization of a Lodge as a Warrant of Con¬ stitution is at the present day. The names, of course, vary in different languages; but the officers, their number, prerogatives, and duties are everywhere identical.
11. The necessity that eveiy Lodge, when congregated, should be duly tiled, is an important Landmark of the Institution which is never neglected. The necessity of this law arises from the esoteric character of Freemasonry.
The duty of guarding the door, and keeping off cowans and eavesdroppers, is an ancient one, which therefore constitutes a Landmark.
12. The right of every Freemason to be represented in all general meetings of the Craft, and to instruct his rep¬ resentatives, is a twelfth Landmark. Formerly, these general meetings, which were usually held once a year, were called General Assemblies, and all the Fraternity, even to the youngest Entered Apprentice, were permitted to be present. Now they are called Grand Lodges, and only the Masters and Wardens of the subordinate Lodges are summoned. But this is simply as the representatives of their members. Originally, each Freemason repre¬ sented himself; now he is represented by his officers (see Representatives of Lodges).
13. The right of every Freemason to appeal from the decision of his Brethren, in Lodge convened, to the Grand Lodge or General Assembly of Freemasons, is a Landmark highly essential to the preservation of justice, and the prevention of oppression. A few modern Grand Lodges, in adopting a regulation that the decision of Subordinate Lodges, in cases of expulsion, cannot be wholly set aside upon an appeal, have violated this un¬ questioned Landmark, as well as the principles of just government.
14. The right of every Freemason to visit and sit in every regular Lodge is an unquestionable Landmark of the Order. This is called the Right of Visitation. This right of visitation has always been recognized as an in¬ herent right which inures to every Freemason as he travels through the world. And this is because Lodges are justly considered as only divisions for convenience of the uni¬ versal Masonic family. The right may, of course, be impaired or forfeited on special occasions by various circumstances; but when admission is refused to a Free¬ mason in good standing, who knocks at the door of a Lodge as a visitor, it Ls to be expected that some good and sufficient reason shall be furnished for this violation of

1. The modes of recognition are, of all the Landmarks, the most legitimate and unquestioned. They admit of no variation; and, if ever they have suffered alteration or addition, the evil of such a violation of the ancient law has always made itself subsequently manifest.
2. The division of Symbolic Freemasonry into three Degrees is a Landmark that has Ixjen better preserved than almost any other; although even here the mischie¬ vous spirit of innovation has left its traces, and, by the disruption of its concluding portion from the Third De¬ gree, a want of uniformity has been created in respect to the final teaching of the Master’s Order; and the Royal Arch of England, Scotland, Ireland, and America, and the “high degrees” of France and Germany, are all made to differ in the mode in which they lead the neophyte to the great consummation of all Symbolic Freemasonry.
In 1813, the Grand Lodge of England vindicated the ancient Landmark, by solemnly enacting that Ancient Craft Masonry consisted of the three Degrees of Entered Apprentice, Fellow-Craft, and Master Mason, including the Holy Royal Arch. But the disruption has never been healed, and the Landmark, although acknowledged in its integrity by all, still continues to be violated.
3. The Legend of the Third Degree is an important Landmark, the inte^ity of which has been well pre¬ served. There is no Rite of Freemasonry, practised in any country or language, in which the essential elements of this Legend are not taught. The Lectures may vary, and indeed are constantly changing, but the legend has ever remained substantially the same. And it is necessary that it should be so, for the legend of the Temple Builder constitutes the very essence and identity of Freemasonry.
Any Rite which should exclude it, or materially alter it, would at once, by that exclusion or alteration, cease to be a Masonic Rite.
4. The government of the Fraternity by a presiding officer called a Grand Master, who is elected from the body of the Craft, is a fourth Landmark of the Order. Many persons suppose that the election of the Grand Master is held in consequence of a law or regulation of the Grand Lodge. Such, however, is not the case. The office is in¬ debted for its existence to a Landmark of the Order.
Grand Masters, or persons performing the functions under a different but equivalent title, are to be found in the records of the Institution long before Grand Lodges were established; and if the present system of le^slative govern¬ ment by Grand Lodges were to be abolished, a Grand Master would still be necessary.
5. The prerogative of the Grand Master to preside over every Assembly of the Craft, wheresoever and when¬ soever held, is a fifth Landmark. It is in consequence of this law, derived from ancient usage, and not from any special enactment, that the Grand Master assumes the chair, or as it is called in England, the throne, at every Communication of the Grand Lodge; and that he is also entitled to preside at the communication of every subor¬ dinate Lodge, where he may happen to be present.
6. The prerogative of the Grand Master to ^ant Dispensations for conferring Degrees at irregular times, is another and a very important Landmark. The statu¬ tory law of Freemasonry requires a month, or other de¬ terminate period, to elapse between the presentation of a petition and the election of a candidate. But the_ Grand Master has the power to set aside or dispense with this jjrobation, and to allow a candidate to be initiated at once. This prerogative he possessed before the enact¬ ment of the law requiring a probation, and as no statute can impair hia prerogative, he still retains the power.
7. The prerogative of the Grand Master to^ give Dis¬ pensations for opening and holding Lodges is another what is, in general, a Masonic right, founded on the Landmarks of the Order.


15. It is a Landmark of the Order, that no visitor unkinowed to the Brethren present, or to some one of them as a Freemason, can enter a Lodge without first passing an examination according to ancient usage. If the visitor is known to any Brother present, or to the Secretary of the Lodge, he will vouch for his qualifications, the examination may be dispensed with, as the Landmark refers only to the cases of strangers, who are not to be recognized unless after strict trial, due examination, or lawful information. It is founded on the great principles of courtesy and fraternal kindness, which are at the very foundation of our Institution. It has been repeatedly recognized by subsequent statutory enactments of all Grand Lodges, and is one of the important Landmarks of the Order. It has always been admitted that a denial of the essential existence of a Supreme and Superintending Power is an absolute disqualification for initiation. The annals of the Order, however, never yet have furnished an instance in which an avowed Atheist or a freethinker could furnish an instance in which a visitor, even were the Landmark not standing before us as an insurmountable obstacle; because such change of its character would be social suicide, and the death of the Order. When the labors of the Lodge are over, and the Brethren have retired from their peaceful retreat, to mingle once more with the world, each will resume that social position, and enjoy the privileges of that rank, to which the customs of society entitle him.

16. No Lodge can interfere in the business of another Lodge, nor give Degrees to Brethren who are members of other Lodges. This is undoubtedly an ancient and essential Landmark of the Order. This equality, which is, in fact, in itself a Masonic offense, does not exempt a Freemason from Masonic Jurisdiction in which he resides, and this although he may not be a member of any Lodge. Nor is affiliation, which is, in fact, in itself a Masonic offense, does not exempt a Freemason from Masonic Jurisdiction.

18. Qualifications of candidates for initiation are derived from a Landmark of the Order. These qualifications greatly vary. They will be a man—unmutated, free-born, and of mature age. That is to say, a woman, a cripple, or a slave, or one born in slavery, is disqualified for initiation into the Rite of Freemasonry. So it is that he who thus confounded his belief and his skepticism, would cease to be a Freemason. Whatever objections may, therefore, be made to the Institution on account of its sectarians, and however much some unskilful Brethren have been willing in times of trial, for the sake of expediency, to divest it of its secret character, and to make it open, and to do so, everywhere, in every land, it not standing before us as an insurmountable obstacle; because such change of its character would be social suicide, and the death of the Order. When the labors of the Lodge are over, and the Brethren have retired from their peaceful retreat, to mingle once more with the world, each will resume that social position, and enjoy the privileges of that rank, to which the customs of society entitle him.

22. The equality of all Freemasons is another Landmark of the Order. This equality has no reference to any subversion of those gradations of rank which have been instituted by the usages of society. The equality is fundamental, or the gentleman is entitled to all the noblemans, and the gentleman is entitled to all the infinitely important Landmark of the Order. That no visitor unacquainted with the Brethren present, or to some one of them as a Freemason, can enter a Lodge without first passing an examination according to ancient usage. If the visitor is known to any Brother present, or to the Secretary of the Lodge, he will vouch for his qualifications, the examination may be dispensed with, as the Landmark refers only to the cases of strangers, who are not to be recognized unless after strict trial, due examination, or lawful information. It is founded on the great principles of courtesy and fraternal kindness, which are at the very foundation of our Institution. It has been repeatedly recognized by subsequent statutory enactments of all Grand Lodges, and is one of the important Landmarks of the Order. It has always been admitted that a denial of the essential existence of a Supreme and Superintending Power is an absolute disqualification for initiation. The annals of the Order, however, never yet have furnished an instance in which an avowed Atheist or a freethinker could furnish an instance in which a visitor, even were the Landmark not standing before us as an insurmountable obstacle; because such change of its character would be social suicide, and the death of the Order. When the labors of the Lodge are over, and the Brethren have retired from their peaceful retreat, to mingle once more with the world, each will resume that social position, and enjoy the privileges of that rank, to which the customs of society entitle him.

23. The secrecy of the Institution is another and most important Landmark. The form of secrecy is a form inherent in it, existing with it from its very foundation, and secured to it by its ancient Landmarks. If divested of its secret character, it would lose its identity, and would cease to be Freemasonry. Whatever objections may, therefore, be made to the Institution on account of its sectarians, and however much some unskilful Brethren have been willing in times of trial, for the sake of expediency, to divest it of its secret character, and to make it open, and to do so, everywhere, in every land, it not standing before us as an insurmountable obstacle; because such change of its character would be social suicide, and the death of the Order. When the labors of the Lodge are over, and the Brethren have retired from their peaceful retreat, to mingle once more with the world, each will resume that social position, and enjoy the privileges of that rank, to which the customs of society entitle him.

24. The foundation of a Speculative Science upon an Operative Art, and the symbolic use and explanation of the terms of that art, for the purposes of religious or moral teaching, constitute another Landmark of the Order. The Temple of Solomon was the symbolic cradle of the Institution, and, therefore, the institution to the Operative Masonry was constructed as a magnificent edifice, to the materials and implements which were employed in its construction, and to the artists who were engaged in the building, are all component and essential parts of the body of Freemasonry, which could not be subtracted from it without an entire destruction of the whole identity of the Order. Hence, all the comparatively modern rites of Freemasonry, however they may differ in other respects, religiously preserve this Temple history and these operative elements, as the substratum of all their modifications of the Masonic system.

25. The last and crowning Landmark of all is, that the Landmarks can never be changed. Nothing can be subtracted from them—nothing can be added to them—not the slightest modification can be made in them. By the most solemn obligations of duty to transmit them to our successors.

The above article by Doctor Mackey gives his latest conclusions upon a highly debatable subject. His list of Landmarks has been adopted by several Grand Lodges, than which no one could expect higher praise, while on the other hand many Brethren are convinced that the Landmarks enumerated by Doctor Mackey are too many, and others believe them too few. Of the latter class we have the late able and highly esteemed Grand Secretary, H. B. Grant, of Kentucky. He prepared a list of Landmarks for the Masonic Home Journal, 1889, and added to them for the consideration of the Masonic Congress of 1893. Since then they have been reprinted, the copy at hand dated 1910, and the number of Landmarks listed being fifty-four. The increase is due to the breadth of Brother Grant's definition. He held that "The Ancient Landmarks of Freemasonry are the immemorial usages and fundamental principles of the Craft, and are unchangeable" (see Book of Constitutions, Kentucky, 1910, page 209). The Masonic Con-gness, 1893, as reported by Brother Grant (page 210) was assured that "The Ancient Landmarks are those fundamental principles which characterize Masonry, as defined in the Charges of a Freemason, and without which the Institution can not be identified." Both the lists of Doctor Mackey and Brother Grant are examined on pages 183 to 199, Masonic Jurisprudence and Symbolism, Rev. John T. Lawrence, 1908, the author challenging the universality of some items enumerated by the above Brethren as Landmarks.

An important and significant example of a brief list of Landmarks is the one adopted on December 11, 1818, as a part of the revised Constitutions and Regulations of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. Sections 100 to 102 state:

The Common Law of Freemasonry is to be learned from the ancient usages of the Craft as developed and interpreted from and after A.D. 1721. It is the foundation of Masonic jurisprudence; and without the common law and the ancient and universal fundamental principles of the Craft which no Masonic authority can alter or repeal. This Grand Lodge recognizes the following Landmarks: Monotheism, the ancient forms of Freemasonry; belief in immortality, the ultimate lesson of Masonic philosophy; the Volume of the Sacred Law, an indispensable part of the furniture of a Lodge; the Legend of the Third Degree; Secrecy; the Symbolism of the Ancient and Accepted Art; a Mason must be a free born male adult. The above list of Landmarks is not declared to be exclusive.

With reference to the general acceptance by Masonic authorities in the United States, as in the foregoing list, that every Brother must be freeborn, note also the comment by Brother Lawrence on English practice (see Masonic Jurisprudence and Symbolism, 1908, pages 141 and 142).

That a Freemason should be a free man is axiomatic, but previous to 1847 it was necessary that he should be a free man born of a free woman. But by the Emancipation Act a good many persons became free men who yet were not born of free mothers, and on September 1, 1847, some of the Masons of the Grand Lodge decided to abolish the disqualification, and now the only reference to parentage is in Section 4 of the Constitution, the Grand Lodge having decided that he should be the legal age of manhood twenty-one years, and the Lectures have references to the "degrading habit of slavery." The older Constitutions retain, of course, in the candidate's declaration, "I, ... being a free man of the full age of the candidate, but simply required him to be of the proper age, and the Lectures have references to the "degrading habit of slavery." The older Constitutions did not specify the age of the candidate, but simply required him to be of majority. Article 187 of the Book of Constitutions of the Grand Lodge of England, now has the statement that they should emancipate thousands of fellow-creatures, and not afterwards allow them to participate in the benefits of Free Masonry. The Worshipful Brother then read portions of the letter, wherein it was contended that the term "free born" only referred to the customs of the eastern nations, and suggested that the words "free agent," if used instead, would counteract the evil. Acting on this feeling, he had never since that time initiated a man under the false "free-born" term, and he earnestly solicited the Brethren to give them the freedom of altering the word "free" at all times, and that the change be made forthwith. The Most Worshipful Grand Master consented that such answers should be transmitted.

Right Worshipful Brother Dobie then read the resolution, which proposed that the word "born" at the top of page 6 of the Book of Constitutions, in the 3rd Head of the Ancient Charges, be omitted, and that the Declaration to be signed by Candidates, as set forth in page 86, be altered, and made to commence as follows, viz.: "I, being a free man and of full age," etc.

The most direct alteration as to retaining the word "free" at all times ensued, at the termination of which the proposed alteration being put from the Chair, was agreed to unanimously.

Worshipful Brother Dobie wished to know if the Grand Secretary should send such answers to the letters which had been read as would allow the writers to act upon them immediately, and without waiting for the confirmation of the next Quarterly Communication.

The Most Worshipful Grand Master consented that such answers should be transmitted.

Section 186 of the Book of Constitutions of the Grand Lodge of England, now has the statement "every Candidate must be a free man, and at the time of initiation in reputable circumstances," and Section 187 requires the candidate to make the following declaration:

I, .................. being a free man, and of the full age of twenty-one years, do declare that, unbiased by the improper solicitation of friends, and uninfluenced by mercenary or other unworthy motive, I freely and voluntarily offer myself a candidate for the mysteries of Masonry; that I am prompted by a favourable opinion concerning the institution, and a desire of knowledge, and that I will cheerfully conform to all the antient usages and established customs of the Order. Witness my hand,

LANDMARKS

As to the permanent characteristics of Landmarks we may note XXXIX of the General Regulations compiled by Brother George Payne, Grand Master in 1720, approved by Grand Lodge, 1721, published by Dr. James Anderson, 1723, and which reads: "Every Annual Grand Lodge has an inherent power and Authority to make new Regulations, or to alter these, for the real Benefit of this Ancient Fraternity: provided always that the Old Land-Marks be carefully preserved." The extent to which a Grand Lodge may go in the making of laws depends upon its determination of what are or are not Landmarks, and as is seen at once by a study of the above particulars the Landmarks of the Fraternity do not find the same recognition and acceptance by all Grand Lodges. However, Doctor Mackey's list has found general favor, the attitude of the Craft being well outlined by the following comment in the Masonic Manual and Code, Grand Lodge of Georgia, 1917 (page 226).

No two authors agree in the enumeration of the Landmarks and no attempt to state all the Landmarks secretly has been universally accepted by the Craft. The Landmarks here stated are those published by the eminent Masonic author, Doctor Mackey, in his textbook on Masonic Jurisprudence, which the student will find a valuable commentary and explanation. The twenty-five Landmarks here given, however, have been very generally recognized in the Craft of all the States as correct.

Brother Hawkins, in his Concise Cyclopedia of Freemasonry (pages 138 and 139), describes the issuing of a Warrant on October 26, 1809, authorizing certain Brethren to hold a Special Lodge for "the purpose of ascertaining and promulgating the Ancient Land Marks of the Craft." This Lodge met frequently for some time and on October 19, 1810, it was "Resolved that it appears to this Lodge that the ceremony of Installation of Masters of Lodges is one of the two landmarks of the Craft, and ought to be observed." Brother Hawkins held that probably the other one was the modes of recognition of Entered Apprentices and Fellow Crafts. December 28, 1810, at a well-attended Communication of the Lodge "the Right Worshipful Master proceeded to point out the material parts in and between the several Degrees to which the attention of the Masters of Lodges would be requisite in preserving the Ancient Land Marks of the Order—such as the form of the Lodge, the number and situation of the Officers—their different distinctions in the different Degrees—the restoration of the proper words to each Degree, and the making of the pass-words between one Degree and another—instead of in the Degree." From these extracts Brother Hawkins inferred that according to the Lodge of Promotion the Landmarks are: The form of the Lodge, its officers and their duties, the words and passwords, and the Installation of the Master, "though," he continues, "it is a pity that in their resolution of October 19 they did not state precisely what the two Landmarks were."

Another conjecture would be that the word read as two might have been intended for true. As we understand Freemasonry today some difficulty would be occasioned for most Brethren in limiting the number of Landmarks to only two. But be they few or many we may well take the injunction of old to heart: "Remove not the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set" (Proverbs xxii, 28).

Dean Roscoe Pound in his Masonic Jurisprudence defines Landmarks as "certain universal, unalterable, and unrepealable fundamentals which have existed from time immemorial and are so thoroughly a part of Freemasonry that no Masonic authority may derogate from them or do ought but maintain them." Brother Melvin M. Johnson, Past Grand Master of Massachusetts, when discussing the determination of Masonic Landmarks, Builder, July, 1923 (page 195), says, "Probably all Masonic students will agree to this definition (by Brother Pound) and then proceed immediately to disagree upon the list of those fundamentals which are to be classified as 'universal, unalterable, and unrepealable.'" Brother Johnson points out that the key to the situation is to be found in the Ancient Charges to which every Installed Master consents and by which he agrees to be bound. At every Installation the Worshipful Master solemnly asserts it is not in the power of any man or body of men to make innovations in the Body of Freemasonry. The essentials of Freemasonry are the Landmarks, and these combined are the Body of Freemasonry. Brother Johnson therefore submitted the following for the consideration of the Craft: "The Landmarks are those essentials of Freemasonry without any one of which it would no longer be Freemasonry."

Brother W. J. Chetwood Crawley in his paper on The Craft and Its Orphans in the Eighteenth Century, Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge (xxiii, page 167) says:

The ancient Landmarks of Freemasonry, like all other Landmarks, material and symbolic, can only preserve their stability when they reach down to sure foundations. When the philosophic student unearths the underlying rock on which our ancient Landmarks rest, he finds our sure foundations in the triple dogma of the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and the life to come. All laws, customs and methods that obtain amongst us, and do not ultimately find footholds on this basis, are thereby earmarked as conventions and conveniences, in no way partaking of the nature of ancient Landmarks.

Brother Albert Pike contributed a discussion upon the Landmarks to the Proceedings, Masonic Veterans Association, District of Columbia, and this is reprinted in Research Pamphlet, No. 20, 1924 (page 147), an excellent compilation by Brother Silas H. Shepherd, published by the Wisconsin Grand Lodge Committee on Masonic Research. Brother Pike says:

The Ancient Charges show by what principles the relations of those of the Fellowship to each other were regulated; and these may not improperly be said to have been the "Landmarks" of the Craft... Perhaps no more can be said with certainty in regard to them than that they were those essential principles on which the old simple Freemasonry was built, and without which it would not have been Freemasonry: the organization of the Craft into Lodges, the requisites for admission into Fellowship, and the methods of government established at the beginning... There is no common agreement in regard to what are and what are not "Landmarks." That has never been definitely settled. Each writer makes out for himself the list or catalogue of them, according to his own fancy, some counting more of them and others less.

Brother Shepherd has in the following sentences from the Preface to his book attempted a brief statement of what is commonly understood by the Brethren as the Ancient Landmarks, as well as his experience in seeking official light upon the subject:
Orders.

Jewels, comprising an account of all the Lodges under Warrants, Lodge of Unanimity, No. 89, Dukinfield,"

On such a basis the Universal Language of Freemasonry is founded. It is not universal to the world, but it is to the Craft; and a Freemason of one country and language meeting a Freemason of another can understand and through which they could communicate their thoughts, has always been one of the dreams of certain philologists. In the seventeenth century, Dalgartho had written his Ars Signorum to prove the possibility of a universal character and a philosophical language. About the same time Bishop Wilkins published his Essay towards a Real Character and a Philosophical Language; and even the mathematical Leibnitz entertained the project of a universal language for all the world. It is not, therefore, surprising, that when the so-called Leland Manuscript stated that the Freemasons concealed a “Universelle Longaye,” John Locke, or whoever was the commentator on that document, should have been attracted by the statement. He says:

A universal language has been much desired by the learned of many ages. It is a thing rather to be wished than hoped for. But it seems the Masons pretend to have such a thing among them. If it be true, I guess it must be something like the language of the Pantomimes among the ancient Romans, who are said to be able, by signs only, to express and deliver any oration intelligibly to men of all nations and languages.

The guess of the commentator was near the truth. A universal language founded on words is utterly impracticable. Even if once inaugurated by common consent, a thing itself impossible, the lapse of but a few years, and the continual innovation of new phrases would soon destroy its universality. But there are signs and symbols which, by tacit consent, have always been recognized as the exponents of certain ideas, and these are everywhere understood. It is well known that such a system exists over the vast territory occupied by the North American savages, and that the Indians of two tribes, which totally differ in language, meeting on the prairie or in the forest, are enabled, by conventional signs of universal agreement, to hold long and intelligible intercourse.

On such a basis the Universal Language of Freemasonry is founded. It is not universal to the world, but it is to the Craft; and a Freemason of one country and language meeting a Freemason of another can make himself understood for all practical purposes of the Craft, simply because the system of signs and symbols has been so perfected that in every language they convey the same meaning and make the same impression. This, and this only, is the extent to which the universal language of Freemasonry reaches. It would be an error to suppose that it meets the expectations of Dalgartho or Wilkins, or any other dreamer, and that it is so perfect as to supersede the necessity of any other method of intercommunication.
Thus far Brother Mackey whose comments on Masonic universality are as applicable today as when his words were written, though his criticisms of the possibilities in universal languages are less successful in view of the work accomplished in that direction since his day and generation. However, we must admit that the same prejudice exists and is likely to persist and long continue. Part of this objection is due to misunderstanding, a belief that the projected language is intended to take the place of some national tongue. But this is an error; at best the attempts have been directed at an easily acquired auxiliary means of spoken and written communication, an agency especially promising of purpose in a world that is so readily misled by lack of correct knowledge concerning the peoples of the earth. Surely this is a task of importance to all Brethren of the Craft. As to the earlier attempts to which Brother Mackey alludes, they were failures, it is true. Dalgarno's Ars Signorum of 1661 and Wilkins' Real Character of 1668 failed because of insufficient foundation, the preliminary scientific labor had not then been done. But what was attempted was deserving of admiration and Wilkins in particular made a contribution to phonetics that is valuable among experts of modern times while his words were written, though his criticisms of the tongue. But this is an error; at best the attempts have been failures, it is true. Dalgarno's Ars Signorum of 1661 and Wilkins' Real Character of 1668 failed because of insufficient foundation, the preliminary scientific labor had not then been done. But what was attempted was deserving of admiration and Wilkins in particular made a contribution to phonetics that is valuable among experts of modern times while his classification of ideas was the acknowledged fore-runner of later efforts by Roget and Linnaeus. More recently we have had Volapük of 1880, Esperanto, 1887, and Idiom Neutral, 1902. Of these the second is admittedly the most reasonable and practical artificial language. Born as it was among the feuds of four races using different languages, its inventor, Dr. L. Zamenhof, believed that the evil could be remedied by a neutral speech. A Masonic Lodge using Esperanto was established at Paris, one has been planned for London, and an international group of Freemasons using Esperanto has also functioned (see Universala Framasona Ligo).

LANSDOWNE MANUSCRIPT. This version of the Old Charges is of very early date, about the middle or latter half of the sixteenth century, as these Free Masons Orders and Constitutions are believed to have been part of the collection made by Lord Burghley, Secretary of State in the time of Edward VI, who died 1598 a.d. Brother Gould, in his History (volume i, page 61), says: The Manuscript is contained on the inner side of three sheets and a half of stout paper, eleven by fifteen inches, making in all seven folios, many of the principal words being in large letters of an ornamental character. Sims, Manuscript Department of the British Museum, does not consider these "Orders" ever formed a roll, though there are indications of the sheets having been stitched together at the top, and paper or vellum was used for additional protection. It has evidently "seen service." It was published in Freemasons Magazine, February 24, 1858, and Hughan's Old Charges (page 31), and since in facsimile reproduction by the Quatuor Coronati Lodge. The catalogue of the Lansdowne Manuscripts—which consisted of twelve hundred and forty-five volumes, bought by the English Parliament, in 1807, for £4,925 (about $23,837)— has the following note on the contents of this document: "No. 45. A very foolish legendary account of the origin of the Order of Freemasonry"—in the handwriting, it is said, of Sir Henry Ellis.

LANTURELUS, ORDRE DES. Instituted, according to Clavel, in 1771, by the Marquis de Croismare. Its purposes or objects are not now understood.

LAPICIDA. A word sometimes used in Masonic documents to denote a Freemason. It is derived from lapis, the Latin meaning a stone, and caedo, to cut, and is employed by Varro and Livy to signify a Stone-Cutter. But in the Low Latin of the medieval age it took another meaning; and Du Cange defines it in his Glossarium as "Aedeficiorum structor; Gall. Maçon," that is, "A builder of edifices; in French, a Mason"; and he quotes two authorities of 1394 and 1392, where lapicidae evidently means builders. In the Vocabularium of Ugueto, Anno 1592, Lapicidius is defined as a Cutter of Stones. The Latin word was now more commonly used by Masonic writers for Freemason is Latomus; but Lapicida is purer Latin (see Latomus).

LARMENIUS, JOHANNES MARCUS. According to the tradition of the Order of the Temple—the credibility of which is, however, denied by most Masonic scholars—John Mark Larmenius was in 1314 appointed by James de Molay his successor as Grand Master of the Templars, which power was transmitted by Larmenius to his successors in a document known as the Charter of Transmission (see Temple, Order of the).

LARUDAN, ABBE. The author of a work entitled Les Franc-Magons ecrases. Suite du livre intitule l'Ordre des Franc-Magons trahi, traduit du Latin, meaning The Freemasons Crushed, a continuation of the book entitled the Order of Freemasons Betrayed, translated from the Latin. The first edition was published at Amsterdam in 1746. In calling it the sequel of L'Ordre des Franc-Magons trahi, by the Abbe Perau, Larudan has sought to attribute the authorship of his own libelle work to Perau, but without success, as the internal evidence of style and of tone sufficiently distinguishes the two works. Kloss says (Bibliographie, No. 1874) that this work is the armory from which all subsequent enemies of Freemasonry have derived their weapons. Larudan was the first to broach the theory that Oliver Cromwell was the inventor of Freemasonry.

LASALLE, TROUBAT DE. One of the founders of the Mother Lodge of the Rite Ecossais Philosophique.

LA-TENTE, EDOUARD. See International Bureau for Masonic Affairs.

LATERAN COUNCILS. They were five in number, regarded as Ecumenical, that is of world-wide importance, and were held in the Church of Saint John Lateran in Rome, in 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, and 1512.

LATIN LANGUAGE IN LODGES. Latin, the tongue of the ancient Roman Empire is still in the modern study of the sciences and the scholarly classics a language long favored by the universities. In the higher learning it holds tenaciously a prominent place and its international service now and formerly often finds it useful as a medium of understanding among scholars when other means of communication fail. Rob Roy MacGregor, in his tales of travel, tells of illness in a monastery in Palestine where the Latin of his boyhood was profitably refreshed while he sojourned with the monks who had with him none other common means of expression. In pharmacy it continues of everyday service and each medical prescription tells of its present usefulness. The Roman Catholic Church makes it practically a universal language employed everywhere she has a foothold. Freemasonry has also striking instances of the usefulness of Latin in the Lodge. The Roman Eagle Lodge, No. 160, chartered in 1785, Edinburgh, Scotland, was founded by Dr. John Brown, its first Right Worshipful Master, to use the Scottish expression for the Master of the Lodge. Dr. John Brown, born 1735, died 1788, studied at the University of Edinburgh and became famous as a Latin scholar as well as in founding a system of medical treatment of the sick that was called after him the Brunonian method. He published a Latin work in 1780, his Elementa Medicinae, Elements of Medicine, maintaining that most diseases often indicated weakness, not excessive strength or excitement, and that indiscriminate bleeding of the patient was a mistake, that frequently supporting treatment was required. His system was then radical, met with much opposition, but slowly prevailed. Some Brethren were students in his University classes and he encouraged the Lodge to keep the Minutes and perform other duties in Latin. The mother tongue became the medium of communication in later years.

With Brother A. M. Mackay we examined in Edinburgh the old records of Saint David’s Lodge, No. 36. This is the Lodge of which the noted novelist Sir Walter Scott was a member. Readers of his Ivanhoe may recall his use of a Masonic term in writing of the tourney where the field for jousters was laid out as an “oblong square.”

However, at an emergency meeting of Saint David’s Lodge, September 13, 1783, four persons were severally initiated and we read “the ceremony was performed by the R. R. Br. John Maclure, Grand Chaplain, & translated into Latin by Br. John Brown, M.D., as none of them (the candidates) understood English.” The initiates were in the service of the Polish Government, and temporarily in Scotland. On September 18, 1783, only five days later, the Master appears by the Minutes to have informed the Lodge, “That the four Polish Brethren had been extremely diligent in learning the apprentices’ part, and as their time in this Country was to be short, they were anxious to be promoted to the higher Degrees, and for that purpose he had ordered this Masters’ Lodge to be convened and hoped their request would be granted and their Entries having proved tedious, first giving it in English and then translating it into Latin, so the Most W. Charles Wm. Little Esq. Subt. G. M. of Scotland had voluntarily offered to assist Br. John Brown, M.D., and Br. Clark of Saint And’ws Lodge, and accordingly the Ceremony which took up above three hours was performed in very elegant Latin.”

The new Brethren applied for certificates showing that they had been “made Masons and Members” of the Lodge, and although “this request was new and contrary to the practise of the Lodge, and had been refused in former cases, yet there was a distinction in this case, the Brethren being Foreigners, who never were, nor probably wou’d ever be again in Scotland, and that giving such certificates might be a means not only of increasing Masonry, but also a possibility of extending the authority of the Grand Lodge” and therefore the suggestion was unanimously agreed upon, the certificates written upon vellum and furnished the departing Brethren who planned to set out for Poland in a few days (see our article in Builder, September, 1926).

Brother Little was Depute Master, Royal Lodge of Saint David’s, No. 36, 1784-6, and Right Worshipful Master, Roman Eagle Lodge, No. 160, 1787-9, and Right Worshipful Master, Lodge Edinburgh Saint Andrews, No. 48, in 1791. His great-great-grandson Brigadier-General R. G. Gilmore, writes Brother Mackay, is Past Grand Master Mason of Scotland; Grand Standard-Bearer, Supreme Council, Thirty-third Degree, and Past Grand Sword-Bearer, Grand Lodge, Royal Order of Scotland, a striking instance of prominent long-continued Masonic activity in one family.

LATOMIA. This word has sometimes been used in modern Masonic documents as the Latin translation of the word Lodge, with what correctness we will see. The Greek λατομοιο, latomeion (or λατομα), from the roots λαος, a stone, and temno, to cut, meant a place where stones were cut, a quarry. From this the Romans got their word latomiae, more usually spelled lautomiae, which also, in pure Latinity, meant a stone-quarry. But as slaves were confined and made to work in the quarries by way of punishment, the name was given to any prison excavated out of the living rock and below the surface of the earth, and was especially so applied to the prison excavated by Servius Tullius under the Capitoline hill at Rome, and to the state prison at Syracuse. Both λατομα and lautomiae are seldom used by ancient writers in their primary sense of a stone-quarry, but both are used in the secondary sense of a prison, and therefore Latomia cannot be considered a good equivalent for Lodge.

LATOMUS. By Masonic writers used as a translation of Freemason into Latin; thus, Thory entitles his valuable work, Acta Latomorum, meaning the Transactions of the Freemasons. This word was not used in classical Latinity. In the Low Latin of the Middle Ages it was used as equivalent to lapicida. Du Cange defines it, in the form of lathomus, as a cutter of stones, Caeser lapidum. He gives an example from one of the ecclesiastical Constitutions, where we find the expression “carpantarii ac Latomii,” which may mean Carpenters and Masons or Carpenters and Stone-Cutters. Du Cange also gives Latomus as one of the definitions of Magonet, which he derives from the French Maçon. But Magonetus and Latomus could not have had precisely the same meaning, for in one of the examples cited by Du Cange, we have “Joanne de Bareno, Magoneto, Latonio de Gratianopolis,” or in English, “John de Bareno, Mason and Stone-Cutter (?) of Grenoble.” Latomus is here evidently an addition to Magonetus, showing two different kinds of occupation. We have abundant evidence in medieval documents that a Magonetus was a builder, and a Latomus was most probably an inferior order, what the Masonic Constitutions call a Rough Mason. The propriety of applying it to a Freemason seems doubtful. The word is sometimes found as Lathomus and Latonius.
LATOUR D'AUVERNGE, LE PRINCE DE.

President of the Mother Lodge of the Rite Ecossais Philosophique in 1805, and member of the Grand Orient of France in 1814.

LATRES. This word has given much unnecessary trouble to the commentators on the old Records of Freemasonry. In the legend of the Craft contained in all the old Constitutions, we are informed that the children of Lamech "knew that God would take vengeance for sinne, either by fire or water, wherefore they did write these sciences that they had found in two pillars of stone, that they might be found after that God had taken vengeance; the one was of marble and would not burne, the other was Latres and would not drowne in water" (Harleian Manuscript, No. 1942). It is the Latin word later, a brick. The legend is derived from Josephus (Jewish Antiquities I, ii), where the same story is told. Whiston properly translates the passage, "they made two pillars; the one of brick, the other of stone." The original Greek is πάλινθος, which has the same meaning. The word is variously corrupted in the manuscripts. Thus the Harleian Manuscript has latres, which comes nearest to the correct Latin plural lateres; the Cooke has lacerus; the Dovaland, latems; the Lansdoume, latherne; and the Sloane, No. 3848, getting furthest from the truth, has letara. It is strange that Halliwell, Early History of Freemasonry in England (second edition, page 8), should have been ignorant of the true meaning and that Henry Phillips, Freemasons Quarterly Review, 1836 (page 289), in commenting on the Harleian Manuscript, should have supposed that it alluded "to some floating substance." The Latin word later and the passage in Josephus ought readily to have led to an explication.

LAUREL CROWN. A decoration used in some of the higher Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. The laurel is an emblem of victory; and the corona triumphalis, or crown of victory, of the Romans, which was given to generals who had gained a triumph by their conquests, was made of laurel leaves. The laurel crown in Freemasonry is given to him who has made a conquest over his passions.

LAURENS, J. L. A French Masonic writer, and the author of an Essai historique et critique sur la Franche-Maconnerie, meaning Historical and Critical Essay on Freemasonry, published at Paris in 1805. In this work he gives a critical examination of the principal works that have treated of the Institution. It contains also a refutation of the imputations of anti-Masonic writers. In 1808 he edited an edition of the Vocabulaire des Franc-Macons, the first edition of which had been issued in 1805. In 1825 was published a Histoire des Initiations de l'Ancienne Egypte with an essay by Laurens on the origin and aim of the Ancient Mysteries (Kloss, Bibliographie, No. 3871).

LAURIE. See Lawrie, Alexander.

LAVER, BRAZEN. A large brazen vessel for washing placed in the court of the Jewish tabernacle, where the officiating priest cleansed his hands and feet, and as well the entrails of victims. Constructed by command of Moses (Exodus xxxviii, 8). A similar vessel was symbolically used at the entrance, in the modern French and Scottish Rites, when conferring the Apprentice Degree. It has been used in many of the Degrees of the latter Rite.

LAWRENCE, SAMUEL CROCKER. Born at Medford, Massachusetts, November 22, 1832, and died there on September 24, 1911. A graduate of Harvard University, a member of the banking firm of Bigelow and Lawrence at Chicago, then in 1858 joined his father and brother in business at Medford until 1905. Active in many important business enterprises he was also Lieutenant, 1855; Captain, 1856; Major, 1859, and Colonel of the Fifth Regiment, Massachusetts Militia, 1861, and organized his regiment on a war footing even before the outbreak of Civil War hostilities and was severely wounded in the battle of Bull Run, 1861. First Mayor of Medford. Brought to light in Hiram Lodge at West Cambridge, New Arlington, October 28, 1854, a charter member of Mount Hermon Lodge, Medford, was Junior Warden, Senior Warden, and Master until 1865; in 1870 elected Grand Senior Warden, since 1869 a Director, and Grand Master of Massachusetts in 1881–3. Exalted, Saint Paul's Chapter, June 13, 1855, and a charter member and Past High Priest, Mystic Chapter at Medford. A Companion of Boston Council, and a Knight of De Molay Commandery, Boston, 1858; becoming Eminent Commander, he was Grand Commander in 1894. In the Scottish Rite he received the Degrees Fourth to Thirty-second in 1892, the Honorary in 1864, and became an Active on December 14, 1866. Grand Commander Barton Smith wrote of him (Proceedings, 1912, page 225): "It is to his diplomatic skill and wise and prudent judgment more than to that of any other one person, and probably more than to that of all persons, that the great Reunion of 1867 was due. When he succeeded in bringing about a friendly conference between William Sewall Gardner and Henry L. Palmer, the great seed was sown from which has grown our present Supreme Council." From May 17, 1867, to his resignation as Grand Commander at Detroit, through failing health, September 22, 1910, he loyally served as an officer of the Supreme Council, Northern Masonic Jurisdiction.

LAWRIE, ALEXANDER. He was originally a stocking-weaver, and afterward became a bookseller and stationer in Parliament Square, Edinburgh, and printer of the Edinburgh Gazette. He was appointed bookseller and stationer to the Grand Lodge of Scotland, and afterward Grand Secretary. In 1804 he published a book entitled The History of Freemasonry, drawn from authentic sources of information; with an Account of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, from its Institution in 1736 to the present time, compiled from the Records; and an Appendix of Original Papers. Of this valuable and interesting work, Lawrie was at one time deemed the author, notwithstanding that the learning exhibited in the first part, and the numerous references to Greek and Latin authorities, furnished abundant internal evidence of his incapacity, from previous education, to have written it. The doubt which naturally arises, whether he was really the author, derives great support from the testimony of
The history of this book is somewhat curious, and perhaps there are only two individuals now living by whom it could be divulged. The late Alexander Lawrie, "Grand Stationer," wished to recommend himself to the Fraternity by the publication of such a work. Through Doctor Anderson, he requested me to undertake its compilation, and offered a suitable remuneration. As I did not relish the task, he made a similar offer to my old acquaintance David Brewster, by whom it was readily undertaken, and I can say was executed to the entire satisfaction of his employers. The title-page does not exhibit the name of the author, but the dedication bears the signature of Alexander Lawrie, and the volume is commonly described as Lawrie's History of Freemasonry.

There can be no doubt of the truth of this statement. It has never been unusual for publishers to avail themselves of the labors of literary men and affix their own names to books which they have written by proxy. Besides, the familiarity with abstruse learning that this work exhibits, although totally irreconcilable with the attainments of the stocking-weaver, can readily be assigned to Sir David Brewster the philosopher (see Lyon's History of the Lodge of Edinburgh, page 55).

Lawrie had a son, William Alexander Laurie (he had thus, for some unknown reason, changed the spelling of his name), who was for many years the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, and died in office in 1870, highly esteemed. In 1859 he published a new edition of the History, with many additions, under the title of The History of Freemasonry and the Grand Lodge of Scotland, with chapters on the Knights Templar, Knights of Saint John, Mark Masonry, and the Royal Arch Degree.

LAW, SACRED. The Sacred Scriptures, the Holy Bible, the Great Light in Freemasonry (see also Sacred Law).

LAWS, GENERAL. See Laws of Freemasonry.

LAWS, LOCAL. See Laws of Freemasonry.

LAWS OF FREEMASONRY. The Laws of Freemasonry, or those rules of action by which the Institution is governed, are very properly divided into three classes: 1. Landmarks. 2. General Laws or Regulations. 3. Local Laws or Regulations.

1. Landmarks. These are the unwritten laws of the Order, derived from those ancient and universal customs which date at so remote a period that we have no record of their origin.

2. General Laws. These are all those Regulations that have been enacted by such Bodies as had at the time universal jurisdiction. They operate, therefore, over the Craft wheresoever dispersed; and as the paramount Bodies which enacted them have long ceased to exist, it would seem that they are unrepealable. It is generally agreed that these General or Universal Laws are to be found in the old Constitutions and Charges, so far as they were recognized and accepted by the Grand Lodge of England at the revival in 1717, and adopted previous to the year 1721.

3. Local Laws. These are the Regulations which, since 1721, have been and continue to be enacted by Grand Lodges. They are of force only in those Jurisdictions which have adopted them, and are repealable by the Bodies which have enacted them. They must, to be valid, be not repugnant to the Landmarks or the General Laws, which are of paramount authority.

LAWSUITS. In the Old Charges which were approved in 1722, and published in 1723, by Anderson, in the Book of Constitutions (page 56), the regulations as to lawsuits are thus laid down:

And if any of them do you injury, you must apply to your own or his Lodge, and from thence you may appeal to the Grand Lodge, at the Quarterly Communication, and from thence to the Annual Grand Lodge, as has been the ancient laudable conduct of our forefathers in every nation; never taking a legal course but when the case cannot be otherwise decided, and patiently listening to the honest and friendly advice of Master and Fellows, when they would prevent you going to law with strangers, or would excite you to put a speedy period to all lawsuits, that so you may mind the affair of Masonry with the more alacrity and success; but with respect to Brothers or Fellows at law, the Master and Brethren should kindly offer their mediation, which ought to be thankfully submitted to by the contending Brethren; and if that submission is impracticable, they must, however, carry on their process or lawsuit without wrath and rancor (not in the common way), saying or doing nothing which may hinder brotherly love and good offices to be renewed and continued; that all may see the benign influence of Masonry, as all true Masons have done from the beginning of the world, and will do to the end of time.

LAX OBSERVANCE. Observantia Lata is the Latin term. When the Rite of Strict Observance was instituted in Germany by von Hund, its disciples gave to all the other German Lodges which refused to submit to its obedience and adopt its innovations, but preferred to remain faithful to the English Rite, the title of Lodges of Lax Observance. Ragon, in his Orthodoxie Magonnique (page 236), has committed the unaccountable error of calling it a schism, established at Vienna in 1767; thus evidently confounding it with Starck’s Rite of the Clerks of Strict Observance.

LAY BROTHERS. A Society founded in the eleventh century, consisting of two classes, who were skilled in architecture; also recognized as a Degree in the Rite of Strict Observance.

LAYER. A term used in the old Records to designate a workman inferior to an Operative Freemason. Thus: "Alsoe that no Mason make moulds, square or rule to any rough layers" (Harleian Manuscript, No. 2054). In Doctor Murray’s new English Dictionary the word is said to mean “one who lays stones; a mason,” and is described as obsolete in this sense. A quotation is given from Wyclif’s Bible of 1382 (First Chronicles xxii, 15), “Many craftie men, masouns and layers.”

LAZARUS, ORDER OF. An Order instituted in Palestine, termed the “United Order of Saint Lazarus and of our Beloved Lady of Mount Carmel.” It was a Military Order engaged against the Saracens, by whom it was nearly destroyed. In 1150 the knights assumed the vows of Obedience, Poverty, and Chastity, in the presence of William the Patriarch. In 1572, Gregory XII united the Italian knights of the Order with that of Saint Maurices. Vincent de Paul, in 1817, founded a Religious Order, which was approved in
The forests of the Lebanon mountains only could supply the timber for the Temple. Such of these forests as lay nearest the sea were in the possession of the Phenicians, among whom timber was in such constant demand, that they had acquired great and acknowledged skill in the felling and transportation thereof; and hence it was of such importance that Hiram consented to employ large numbers of men in Lebanon to hew timber, as well as others to perform the service of bringing it down to the seaside, where it was to be taken along the coasts in floats to the port of Joppa, from which place it could be easily taken across the country to Jerusalem.

The Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite has dedicated to this mountain its Twenty-second Degree, or the Prince of Lebanon. The Druses inhabit Mount Lebanon was situated, furnished these trees for the building of the Temple of Solomon. In relation to Lebanon, Kitto, in his Biblical Cyclopedia, has these remarks:

"The Prince of Lebanon. The Druses inhabit Mount Lebanon, and preserve there a secret organization (see Druses)."

In the Entered Apprentice's Degree, the first section, like the first section of the Entered Apprentice, is merely a recapitulation of ceremonies, with a passing commentary on some of them. The second section introduces the neophyte for the first time to the differences between Operative and Speculative Freemasonry and to the Temple of King Solomon as a Masonic symbol, for a true explanation of most of the symbols peculiar to the Degree.

In the Fellow Craft's Degree, the first section, like the first section of the Entered Apprentice, is merely a recapitulation of ceremonies, with a passing commentary on some of them. The second section introduces the neophyte for the first time to the differences between Operative and Speculative Freemasonry and to the Temple of King Solomon as a Masonic symbol, while the candidate is ingeniously deputed as a seeker after knowledge.

In the Master's Degree the first section is again only a detail of ceremonies. The second section is the most important and impressive portion of all the lectures, for it contains the legend on which the whole symbolic character of the Institution is founded. The third section is an interpretation of the symbols of the Degree, and is, of all the sections, the one least creditable to the composer. In fact, it must be confessed that many of the interpretations given in these lectures are unsatisfactory to the cultivated mind, and seem to have been adopted on the principle of the old Egyptians, who made use of symbols to conceal rather than to express all their thoughts. Learned Freemasons have been, therefore, always disposed to go beyond the mere technicalities and stereotyped phrases of the lectures, and to look in the history and the philosophy of the ancient religions, and the organization of the ancient mysteries, for a true explanation of most of the symbols of Freemasonry, and there they have always been enabled to find this true interpretation. The lectures, however, serve as an introduction or preliminary essay, enabling the student, as he advances in his initiation, to become acquainted with the symbolic character of the Institution. But if he ever expects to become a learned Freemason, he must seek in other sources for the true development of Masonic symbolism. The lectures alone are but the Primer of the Science.

LECTURER, GRAND. An officer known only in the United States. He is appointed by the Grand Master or the Grand Lodge. His duty is to visit the subordinate Lodges, and instruct them in the Ritual of the Order as practised in his Jurisdiction, for which he receives compensation partly from the Grand Lodge and partly from the Lodges which he visits, or wholly from the Grand Lodge.

LECTURES, HISTORY OF THE. To each of the Degrees of Symbolic Freemasonry a catechetical instruction is appended, in which the ceremonies, traditions, and other esoteric instructions of the Degree are contained. A knowledge of these lectures—which must, of course, be communicated by oral teaching—constitutes a very important part of a Masonic education; and, until the great progress made within the present century in Masonic literature, many bright Masters, as they are technically styled, could claim no other foundation than such a knowledge for their high Masonic reputation. But some share of learning more difficult to attain, and more sublime in its character than anything to be found in these oral catechisms, is now considered necessary to form a Masonic scholar. Still, as the best commentary on the ritual observances is to be found in the lectures, and as they also furnish a large portion of that secret mode of recognition, or that universal instruction is appended, in which the ceremonies, traditions, and other esoteric instructions of the Degree are contained. A knowledge of these lectures—which must, of course, be communicated by oral teaching—constitutes a very important part of a Masonic education; and, until the great progress made within the present century in Masonic literature, many bright Masters, as they are technically styled, could claim no other foundation than such a knowledge for their high Masonic reputation. But some share of learning more difficult to attain, and more sublime in its character than anything to be found in these oral catechisms, is now considered necessary to form a Masonic scholar. Still, as the best commentary on the ritual observances is to be found in the lectures, and as they also furnish a large portion of that secret mode of recognition, or that universal language, which has always been the boast of the Institution, not only is a knowledge of them absolutely necessary to every practical Freemason, but a history of the changes which they have from time to time undergone constitutes an interesting part of the literature of the Order.

Comparatively speaking, comparatively in respect to the age of the Masonic Institution, the system of Lodge lectures is undoubtedly a modern invention. That is to say, we can find no traces of any forms of lectures like the present before the middle, or perhaps the close, of the seventeenth century. Examinations, however, of a technical nature, intended to test the claims of the person examined to the privileges of the Order, appear to have existed at an early period. Oliver very properly describes them as being "some¬thing like the conundrums of the present day—diffi¬cult of comprehension—admitting only of one answer, which appeared to have no direct correspondence with the question, and applicable only in conse¬quence with the mysteries and symbols of the In¬stitution" (On the Masonic Tests of the Eighteenth Century, Golden Remains, volume iv, page 16).

These tests were sometimes, at first, distinct from the lectures, and sometimes, at a later period, incor¬porated with them. A specimen is the answer to the question, "How blows the wind?" which was, "Due East and West."

The Examination of a German Stone-Mason, which is given by Findel in the appendix to his History, was most probably in use in the fourteenth century. Doctor Oliver was in possession of what purports to be a formula, which he supposes to have been used during the Grand Mastership of Archbishop Chicheley, in the reign of Henry VI, and from which (Revela¬tons of a Square, page 11) he makes the following extracts:

Question. Peace be here? Answer, I hope there is. Q. What o'clock is it? A. It is going to six, or going to twelve. Q. Are you very busy? A. No. Q. Will you give or take? A. Both; or which you please. Q. How go squares? A. Straight. Q. Are you rich or poor? A. Neither. Q. Change me that? A. I will. Q. In the name of the King and the Holy Church, are you a Mason? A. I am so taken to be. Q. What is a Mason? A. A man begot by a man, born of a woman, brother to a king. Q. What is a fellow? A. A companion of a prince, etc.

There are other questions and answers of a similar nature, conveying no instruction, and intended apparently to be used only as tests. Doctor Oliver attributes, it will be seen, the date of these questions to the beginning of the fifteenth century; but the correct¬ness of this assumption is doubtful. They have no internal evidence in style of having been the inven¬tion of so early a period of the English tongue.

The earliest form of catechism that we have on record is that contained in the Sloane Manuscript, No. 6239, now in the British Museum, which has been printed and published by the Rev. A. F. A. Woodford. One familiar with the catechisms of the eighteenth century will detect the origin of much that they contain in this early specimen. It is termed in the manuscript the Freemason's "private discourse by way of question and answer," and is in these words:

Q. Are you a Mason? A. Yes, I am a Freemason. Q. How shall I know that? A. By perfect signs and tok¬ens and the first points of my Entrance. Q. Which is the first signe or token, shew me the first and I will shew you the second. A. The first is heal and conceal or conceal and keep secret. Q. What is it less paine than cutting my tongue from my throat. Q. Where were you made a mason? A. In a just and perfect or just and lawfull lodge. Q. What is a just and perfect or just and lawfull lodge? A. A just and perfect lodge is two Interprintices, two fellow craftes and one Mast'r on the highest hill or lowest valley of the world without the crow of a cock or the bark of a dogg. Q. From whome do you derive your principal? A. From a great'r than you. Q. Who is that on earth that is great'r than a free¬mason? A. He y't was caryed to y'e highest pinnicall of the temple of Jerusalem. Q. Whith'st is your lodge shut or open? A. It is shut. Q. Where lyes the keys of the lodge doore? A. They ley in a bound case or under a three yard's or Inches, it reaches to heaven. Q. Who is that on earth that is great'r than a free¬mason? A. He y't was caryed to y'e highest pinnicall of the temple of Jerusalem.

ments. They were written in a catechetical form, which but he probably refers to the seven tests which conditions of some things, and additions of others, but they may be called—with those in use in America at the present time. In fact, some of the answers given in the year 1730 are, word for word, the same as those used in America at the present time. Previous to that time, brief extemporary addresses and charges in addition to these test catechisms were used by the Masters of Lodges, which, of course, varied in excellence with the varied attainments and talents of the presiding officer. We know, however, that a series of charges were in use about the middle and end of the seventeenth century, which were ordered “to be read at the making of a Freemason.” These Charges and Covenants, as they were called, contained no instructions on the symbolism and ceremonies of the Order, but were confined to an explanation of the duties of Freemasons to each other. They were altogether exoteric in their character, and have accordingly been repeatedly printed in the authorized publications of the Fraternity.

Doctor Oliver, who had ample opportunities than any other Masonic writer of investigating this subject, says that the earliest authorized lectures with which he has met were those of 1720. They were arranged by Doctors Anderson and Desaguliers, perhaps, at the same time that they were compiling the Charges and Regulations from the ancient Constitutions. They were written in a catechetical form, which form has ever since been retained in all subsequent Masonic lectures. Brother Oliver says that “the questions and answers are short and comprehensive, and contain a brief digest of the general principles of the Craft as it was understood at that period.” The “digest” must, indeed, have been brief, since the lecture of the Third Degree, or what was called “the Master’s Part,” contained only thirty-one questions, many of which are simply tests of recognition. Doctor Oliver says the number of questions was only seven; but he probably refers to the seven tests which conclude the lecture. There are, however, twenty-four other questions that precede these.

A comparison of these—the primitive lectures, as they may be called—with those in use in America at the present day, demonstrate that a great many changes have taken place. There are not only omissions of some things, and additions of others, but sometimes the explanations of the same points are entirely different in the two systems. Thus the Andersonian lectures describe the “furniture” of a Lodge as being the “Mosaic pavement, blazing star, and indented tassel,” emblems which are now, perhaps more properly, designated as “ornaments.” But the present furniture of a Lodge is also added to the pavement, star, and tassel, under the name of “other furniture.” The “greater lights” of Freemasonry are entirely omitted, or, if we are to suppose them to be meant by the expression “fixed lights,” then these are referred, differently from our system, to the three windows of the Lodge.

In the First Degree may be noticed, among others, the following points in the Andersonian lectures which are omitted in the American system: the place and duty of the Senior and Junior Entered Apprentices, the punishment of cowans, the bone box, and all that refers to it; the clothing of the Master, the age of an Apprentice, the uses of the day and night, and the direction of the wind. These latter, however, are, strictly speaking, what the Freemasons of that time denominated tests. In the same Degree, the following, besides many other important points in the present system, are altogether omitted in the old lectures of Anderson: the place where Freemasons ancienstly met, the theological ladder, and the lines parallel. Important changes have been made in several particulars; as, for instance, in the “points of entrance,” the ancient lecture giving an entirely different interpretation of the expression, and designating what are now called “points of entrance” by the term “principal signs”; the distinctions between Operative and Speculative Freemasonry, which are now referred to the Second Degree, are there given in the First; and the dedication of the Bible, Compass, and Square is differently explained.

In the Second Degree, the variations of the old from the modern lectures are still greater. The old lecture is, in the first place, very brief, and much instruction deemed important at the present day was then altogether omitted. There is no reference to the distinctions between Operative and Speculative Freemasonry, but this topic is adverted to in the former lecture; the approaches to the Middle Chamber are very differently arranged; and not a single word is said of the Fords of the River Jordan. It must be confessed that the ancient lecture of the Fellow Craft is immeasurably inferior to that contained in the modern system, and especially in that of Webb.

The Andersonian lecture of the Third Degree is brief, and therefore imperfect. The legend is, of course, referred to, and its explanation occupies nearly the whole of the lecture; but the details are meager, and many important facts are omitted, while there are in other points striking differences between the ancient and the present system.

But, after all, there is a general feature of similarity—a substratum of identity—pervading the two systems of lectures—the ancient and the modern—which shows that the one derives its parentage from the other. In fact, some of the answers given in the year 1730 are, word for word, the same as those used in America at the present time.

Here Doctor Hawkins says Martin Clare and Dunckerley, who lived elsewhere, are often credited with being revisers of the English ritual and lectures, but as there is no proof whatever that they had anything to do with such revision it does not seem worth while to repeat the well-worn tale here. Nothing can be said with any certainty about the lectures in England until the last quarter of the eighteenth century, when William Preston took the matter in hand and revised or more probably rewrote them entirely. Brother Mackey continues from this point, commenting on Preston.

Preston divided the lecture on the First Degree into six sections, the Second into four, and the Third into twelve. But of the twelve sections of the third lecture, seven only strictly appertain to the Master’s Degree, the remaining five referring to the ceremonies of the Order, which, in the American system, are contained in the Past Master’s lecture. Preston has recapitulated the subjects of these several lectures in his Illustrations of Masonry; and if the book were not now so readily accessible, it would be worth while to copy his remarks. It is sufficient, however, to say that he has presented us with a philosophical system of Freemasonry, which, coming immediately after the unscientific and scanty details which up to his time had been the subjects of Lodge instructions, must have been like the bursting forth of a sun from the midst of midnight darkness. There was no twilight or dawn to warn the unexpecting Fraternity of the light that was about to shine upon them. But at once, without preparation—without any gradual progress or growth from almost nothing to superfluity—the Prestonian lectures were given to the Order in all their fulness of illustration and richness of symbolism and science, as a substitute for the plain and almost unmeaning systems that had previously prevailed.

Not that Freemasonry had not always been a science, but that for all that time, and longer, her science had been dormant—had been in abeyance. From 1717 the Craft had been engaged in something less profitable, but more congenial than the cultivation of Masonic science. The pleasant suppers, the medallums of punch, the harmony of song, the miserable puns, which would have provoked the ire of Johnson beyond anything that Boswell has from which, by a little cultivation, we might bring forth a gorgeous blossom of symbolism. Hence, the Third Degree has always been the favorite of American Freemasons. But the lectures of the First and Second Degrees, the latter particularly, are meager and unsatisfactory. The explanations, for instance, of the Form and Extent of the Lodge, of its Covering, of the Theological Ladder, and especially of the Point within the Circle, will disappoint any intellectual student who is seeking, in a symbolical science, for some rational explanation of its symbols that promises to be worthy of his investigations (see Drop Lecture and Middle Chamber Lecture).

The lecture on the Third Degree is eminently Hutchinsonian in its character, and contains the bud of the Order in all their fulness of illustration and richness of symbolism and science, as a substitute for the plain and almost unmeaning systems that had previously prevailed.

These lectures continued for nearly half a century to be the authoritative text of the Order in England. But in 1813 the two Grand Lodges—the Moderns and the Antients, as they were called—after years of antagonism, were happily united, and then, as the first exercise of this newly combined authority, it was determined “to revise” the system of lectures.

This duty was entrusted to the Rev. Dr. Hemming, the Senior Grand Warden, and the result was the Union or Hemming Lectures, which are now the authoritative standard of English Freemasonry. In these lectures many alterations of the Prestonian system were made, and some of the most cherished symbols of the Fraternity were abandoned, as, for instance, the twelve grand points, the initiation of the free born, and the lines parallel (as to free born, in particular, see Landmarks). Preston’s lectures were rejected in consequence, it is said, of their Christian references; and Doctor Hemming, in attempting to avoid this error, fell into a greater one, of omitting in his new course some of the important ritualistic landmarks of the Order.

Brother E. L. Hawkins here observes that nothing definite can be stated about the lectures used in America until near the end of the eighteenth century, when a system of lectures was put forth by Thomas Smith Webb.

The lectures of Webb contained much, continues Doctor Mackey, that was almost a verbal copy of parts of Preston; but the whole system was briefer, and the paragraphs were framed with an evident view to facility in committing them to memory. It is an herculean task to acquire the whole system of Prestonian lectures, while that of Webb may be mastered in a comparatively short time, and by much inferior intellects. There have, in consequence, in former years, been many “bright Masons” and “skilful lecturers” whose brightness and skill consisted only in the easy repetition from memory of the set form of phrases established by Webb, and who were otherwise ignorant of all the science, the philosophy, and the history of Freemasonry. But in the later years, a perfect verbal knowledge of the lectures has not been esteemed so highly in America as in England, and the most erudite Freemasons have devoted themselves to the study of those illustrations and that symbolism of the Order which lie outside of the lectures. Book Freemasonry—that is, the study of the principles of the Institution as any other science is studied, by means of the various treatises which have been written on these subjects—has been, from year to year, getting more popular with the American Masonic public which is becoming emphatically a reading people.

The lecture on the Third Degree is eminently Hutchinsonian in its character, and contains the bud from which, by a little cultivation, we might bring forth a gorgeous blossom of symbolism. Hence, the Third Degree has always been the favorite of American Freemasons. But the lectures of the First and Second Degrees, the latter particularly, are meager and unsatisfactory. The explanations, for instance, of the Form and Extent of the Lodge, of its Covering, of the Theological Ladder, and especially of the Point within the Circle, will disappoint any intellectual student who is seeking, in a symbolical science, for some rational explanation of its symbols that promises to be worthy of his investigations (see Drop Lecture and Middle Chamber Lecture).
Conspiracy against the Catholic Religion and Rulers, a project conceived in France aims to spread over the whole World, 1792. In these scandalous books, and especially in the former, Lefranc has, to use the language of Thory (Acta Latomorum i, 192), “vomited the most undeserved abuse of the Order.” Of the Veil Lifted, the two great detractors of Freemasonry, Robison and Barruel, entertained different opinions. Robison made great use of it in his Proofs of a Conspiracy; but Barruel, while speaking highly of the Abbé’s virtues, doubts his accuracy and declines to trust to his authority.

Lefranc was slain in the massacre of September 2, at the Convent of the Carmelites, in Paris, with one hundred and ninety-one other priests. Thory (Acta Latomorum i, 192) says that M. Ledhui, a Freemason, who was present at the sanguinary scene, attempted to save the life of Lefranc, and nearly lost his own in the effort. The Abbé says that, on the death of a friend, who was a zealous Freemason and Master of a Lodge, he found among his papers a collection of Masonic writings containing the rituals of a great many Degrees, and from these he obtained the information on which he has based his attacks upon the Order. Some idea may be formed of his accuracy and credibility, from the fact that he asserts that Faustus Socinus, the Father of Modern Unitarianism, was the contriver and inventor of the Masonic system—a theory so absurd that even Robison and Barruel both reject it.

LEFT SIDE. In the symbolism of Freemasonry, the First Degree is represented by the left side, which is to indicate that as the left is the weaker part of the body, so is the Entered Apprentice’s Degree the weaker part of Freemasonry. This doctrine, that the left is the weaker side of the body, is very ancient. Plato says it arises from the fact that the right is more adapted to administering equity than the left, from its natural inertertis, and being endowed with no craft and no subtlety.”

LEFT HAND. Among the ancients the left hand was a symbol of equity and justice. Thus, Apuleius (Metamorphoses i, xi), when describing the procession in honor of Isis, says one of the ministers of the sacred rites “bore the symbol of equity, a left hand, fashioned with the palm extended; which seems to be more adapted to administering equity than the right, from its natural inertertis, and its being endowed with no craft and no subtlety.”

LEGALLY CONSTITUTED. See Constituted, Legally.

LEGATE. In the Middle Ages, a Legate, or legatus, was one who was, says Du Cange (Glossary or Glossarium), “in provincias à Principe ad exercendas judicidias mittebatur,” that is sent by Prince into the Provinces to exercise judicial functions. The word is now applied by the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite to designate certain persons who are sent into unoccupied territory to propagate the Rite. The word is, however, of comparatively recent origin, not having been used before 1866. A Legate should be in possession of at least the Thirty-second Degree.

LEGEND. Strictly speaking, a legend, from the Latin, legendus, meaning to be read, should be restricted to a story that has been committed to writing; but by good usage the word has been applied more extensively, and now properly means a narrative, whether true or false, that has been traditionally preserved from the time of its first oral communication. Such is the definition of a Masonic legend. The authors of the Conversations-Lexicon, referring to the monkish lives of the saints which originated in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, say that the title legend was given to all fictions which made pretensions to truth. Such a remark, however correct it may be in reference to these monkish narratives, which were often invented as ecclesiastical exercises, is by no means applicable to the legends of Freemasonry. These are not necessarily fictitious, but are either based on actual and historical facts which have been but slightly modified, or they are the offspring and expansion of some symbolic idea; in which latter respect they differ entirely from the monastic legends, which often have only the fertile imagination of some studious monk for their basis of their construction.

The instructions of Freemasonry are given to us in two modes; by the symbol and by the legend. The symbol is a material, and the legend a mental, representation of a truth. The sources of neither can be in every case authentically traced. Many of them come to us, undoubtedly, from the old Operative Freemasons of the Medieval Gilds. But whence they got them is a question that naturally arises, and which stills remains unanswered. Others have sprung from a far earlier source; perhaps, as Creuzer has suggested in his Symbolik, from an effort to engratify higher and purer knowledge on an imperfect religious idea. If so, then the myths of the Ancient Mysteries, and the legends or traditions of Freemasonry, would have the same remote and the same final cause. They would differ in construction, but they would agree in design. For instance, the myth of Adonis in the Syrian Mysteries, and the legend of Hiram Abif in the Third Degree, would differ very widely in their details; but the object of each would be the same, namely, to teach the doctrine of the restoration from death to eternal life.

The legends of Freemasonry constitute a considerable and a very important part of its ritual. Without them, its most valuable portions as a scientific system would cease to exist. It is, in fact, in the traditions and legends of Freemasonry, more, even, than in its material symbols, that we are to find the deep religious instructions which the Institution is intended to inculcate. It must be remembered that Freemasonry has been defined to be “a system of morality, veiled in allegory and illustrated by symbols.” Symbols, then, alone, do not constitute the whole of the system: allegory comes in for its share; and this allegory, which veils the Divine truths of Freemasonry, is presented to the neophyte in the various legends which have been traditionally preserved in the Order.

They may be divided into three classes: 1. The Mythical Legend. 2. The Philosophical Legend. 3. The Historical Legend.

These three classes may be defined as follows:

1. The myth may be engaged in the transmission of a narrative of early deeds and events having a foundation in truth, which truth, however, has been greatly distorted and perverted by the omission or introduction of circumstances and personages, and then it constitutes the mythical legend.

2. Or it may have been invented and adopted as the medium of enunciating a particular thought, or of inculcrating a certain doctrine, when it becomes a philosophical legend.

3. Or, finally, the truthful elements of actual history may greatly predominate over the fictitious and invented materials of the myth; and the narrative may be, in the main, made up of facts, with a slight coloring of imagination, when it forms a historical legend.

Thus far Doctor Mackey, but we can add further comments to advantage here. The very phrase, Historical Legends, may seem to some a contradiction in terms. Let us look further into the matter. Speaking generally, legend and tradition are any knowledge handed down from one generation to another by word of mouth. Much of what we know of Freemasonry, and especially that which pertains directly to our ceremonies, comes down through the centuries exactly in that way. Arriving as it does, we may naturally expect that in its progress something may have been lost—a change here or there may have been made in the story that reaches our hands—but, as we know, the old Lectures of the Craft have a flavor of the past and it is not at all unlikely that many of the circumstances that we frankly deal with as legends may have nevertheless sound historical foundation for their existence. It is interesting, of course, to note in this connection how a legend may continue even in our own day and generation.

There is available an example of the difficulty of preserving truth and discarding error, popular belief being so easily apt to retain something of both in the same statement. We do not always have as good an example as the one which is here submitted and which illustrates how in the course of time the description of a circumstance has been subjected to alteration and yet has preserved to a very large extent the original facts. An inquiry came to us from a Brother in Michigan which in part read as follows:

I have on file an article relative to a Masonic event in the history of the City of Paris in the year 1871, when France was at war with Germany. It is to the effect that the City of Paris was surrounded by German cannon ready for bombardment. The Germans sent an ultimatum to the Parisian Officials which required action within twelve hours, otherwise the city would be bombarded.
Someone or other, the proper officials did not take the necessary and immediate steps; the consequences were that the Masonic Lodges of Paris met, prepared an answer to the ultimatum, went to the outskirts of the city, raised certain Masonic ensigns which the Germans recognized, with the result that there was no bombardment.

No better means seemed available than to communicate with that well-informed Brother, Oswald Wirth, at Paris. The Editor of Le Symbolisme replied under date of March 20, 1925, thus:

If you receive L’Acacia, a French Masonic journal, you will have found there, in the February issue (page 304) an article which answers your question. The legend which is circulating in the United States ought to be corrected as follows:

On April 29, 1871, the Freemasons of Paris willingly attempted to stop the shedding of blood between the French themselves. Paris was then bombarded, not by the Germans, but by the troops under orders from the Government which sat at Versailles. Paris was insurgent against that Government on the eighteenth of March, 1871, but would have submitted forthwith if the authorities of Versailles had wished to show a little of the spirit of conciliation. There was a supreme offer of conciliation to which nearly ten thousand persons had publicly given themselves on that April 29, 1871. Numerous Lodges were represented by their banners, and a delegation was permitted in the name of a legend in the neighborhood of furnishing you this information, of which you will de-

There is, as Brother Wirth points out, just enough flavor of the fact to give this freely circulated story some foothold amongst us as it originally appeared.
The whole truth seldom has so hearty and permanent a reception. Certainly the facts deserve publicity because the Germans were not at Paris in May, 1871.
They had then evacuated the city and such bloodshed as is spoken of by Brother Wirth was caused by Frenchmen. However, the circumstances are easily misunderstood and an event which for a time delayed warfare in the streets of Paris so nearly took place after the departure of the German forces that the facts must be carefully ascertained in order to avoid a confusion of two distinctly different events.

The Living Age, March 28, 1925, mentions an instance from the Nordisk Tidsskrift of Stockholm where a Swedish writer, Wilhelm Cederschiold, relates an interesting story which seems to show that an isolated historical fact may be preserved in the popular memory for thousands of years. This is the tale:

Near Loheide, in Sleevig, there stands a great burial-mound, which the country people call the Queen’s Barrow. Here, according to the legend, lies a prince whom LEGEND OF THE CRAFT

Before Noyes flood there was a man called Lameche as it is written in the Byble, in the fifth chapter of Genesis; and this Lameche had two wives, and the one he called Ada and the other Tuball; by his first wife Ada he got two sons, and that one Jaheb, and another Tuball. And by that other wife Sella he got a son and a daughter. And these four children found the beginning of the sciences in them; and Ada found the science of Geometric, and brother Tuball Cain found smither cut of gold, silver, copper, iron, and steel; and the daughter found the craft of Weaving. And these children say, that God would take vengeance for sin, either by fire or by water; wherefore they writ their science that they had found in two pillars of stone, that they might be found after Noyes flood. And that one stone was marble, for that would not burn with fire; and that other stone was cleaved interno, and would not drown in no water.

Our intent is to tell you trulie how and in what manner these stones were found, that thse sciences were written in the great Hermetes, that was in the famous Tower of Babel. And when the Tower of Babel was destroyed, and all the erected buildings came down to the ground, immediately Black Margaret swong her sword and cut off the Prince's head. But did Queen Margaret murder the man who lies in the Queen's Barrow? There is no difficulty in clearing her memory on that score. Mrs. Margaret Adams found the record of overzealous Brethren was deplored by Brother Hughan. This history has been called by Masonic writers the Assembly of June 24, 1720, "This Year, at some..."
and not by servant, nor his naye, nor none other foule name. And that they should deserve their paiie of the lord, or of the master that they seruved that they should ordain them to the woorke of them to be master of the woorke; and neither for love nor great lynage, ne riches ne for noe favouer to lett another that hath little conninge for to be master of the lord's woorke, wherevethrough the lord should be undone. And other wise they should saye to them that they should call their governors of the woorke, Master, in the time that they woorke with him. And other and many more charges that longe to tell. And to all these charges he made a chartour for them, and he werke them unto that time; and ordained them for reasonable wages, that they might live honestly by. And also that they should come and seme together every yeares one, how they might woorke, and be behaved and well behaued in their owne worke, and to correct within themselves him that had trespassed against the science. And thus was the science grounded there; and that worthy Mr. Ewelde gav it the name of Geometry. And now it is called through all this land Masonrye.

Sythen longe after, when the Children of Israel were coming into the Land of Beheast, that is now called amongst us the Country of Jhrlm, King David began the Temple that they called Tempulm D'ni and it is named with us the Temple of Jerusalem. And the same King David loved Masons well and cherished them much, and gave them good paie. And he gave the charges and the manners of the makinge of divers lands; and other charges moe that ye shall heare afterwaerts. And after the decease of Kings David, Salamon, that was David's sonn, performed out the Temple that his father begonne; and he called divers Masons of divers lands; and gathered them together, so that he had four-score thousand workers of stone, and were all named Masons. And he chose out of them three thousand that he called Masons, and he made them his ministers and governors on his worke. And furthermore, there was a Kinge of another region that men called Iram, and he loved well Kinge Solomon, and he gave him tymber to his worke. And he had a son named Aynon, and he was a Master of all his gravings and carvinge, and of all other manner of Masonrye that longed to the Temple; and this is witnessed by the Bible in libro Regum the third chapter. And this Solomon confirmed both charges and the manners that his father had given to Masons. And thus was that worthy science of Masonrye confirmed in the country of Jerusalem, and in many other kingdoms.

Curious craftmen walked about full wide into divers countries, some because of learnings more craft and cunninge, and some to teach them that had but little conninge. And see it befell that there was one curious Mason that drew him much to talke and to commune with Masons, and to learne of them science; and afterward, for love of divers regiones, some because of learninge more craft and cunninge, and some to teach them that had but little conninge.
from an earlier period, in pretty much the same form everywhere. One great difficulty appears to present itself.

If the legendary history was composed for the purposes of the Old Charges, as we now have them, we must either represent the Return made by one Gild of Masons, or all the Gilds must have possessed almost exactly the same legend; unless it was agreed to be a collected body from legenprobably far years. Of course, the easiest way to decide the question is to accept the statement that the history was collected by Edwin: but this solution of the difficulty does not lend itself to another solution. If the Old Charges do really represent the Return made in 1388 by one of most important Gild of Masons in England, it is not very difficult to understand how, during the long period of years when copies were entirely wanting, the theory was spread by the Priesthood, and the Masons themselves, so that it was at least generally adopted in almost its present form. It must be understood that in making these suggestions I do not overlook the possibility or probability of the Gild of Masons having possessed a short legendary history at any earlier date: but if such were the case, it would stand alone among all other trades.

The various legends pertaining to the Craft are discussed at length in Doctor Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry.

LEGEND OF THE GILD. A title by which the Legend of the Craft is sometimes designated is in reference to the Gild of Operative Masons, or to the Grand Lodge of Free Masters Masons. The story of the three weary sojourners in the Gild of Masons has now to be considered. The Euresis, or the Discovery, is identical; that of the Irish is very different as to the fate of Hiram Abif, commonly called, "by way of excellence," the Legend of the Third Degree. The most important and significant of the legendary symbols of Freemasonry is, undoubtedly, that which relates to the fate of Hiram Abif, commonly called, "by way of excellence," the Legend of the Third Degree. The first written record that Doctor Mackey had been unable to find of this legend is contained in the second edition of Anderson's Constitutions, published in 1738 (page 14), and is in these words:

When the capestone was celebrated by the Fraternity with great joy. But their joy was soon interrupted by the sudden death of their dear master, Hiram Abif, whom they decently interred in the Lodge near the Temple, according to ancient usage. In the next edition of the same work, published in 1756 (page 24), a few additional circumstances are related, such as the participation of King Solomon in the general grief, and the fact that the King of Israel "ordered his obsequies to be performed with great solemnity and decency." With these exceptions, and the citations of the same passages, made by subsequent authors, the narrative has always remained unchallenged, and descended, from age to age, through the means of oral tradition. The legend has been considered of such much importance that it has been preserved in the symbolism of every Masonic rite. No matter what modifications or alterations the general system may have undergone—no matter how much the allegory may be modified or altered, the meaning of the words of the founder of rites may have perverted or corrupted other symbols, abolishing the old and substituting new ones—the legend of the Temple Builder has ever been left untouched, to present itself in all the integrity of its ancient mythical form.

What, then, is the significance of this symbol so important and so extensively diffused? What interpretation can we give to it that will account for its universal adoption? How is it that it has thus become so intimately interwoven with Freemasonry as to, make, to all appearances, a part of its very essence, and to have been always deemed inseparable from it? To answer these questions satisfactorily, it is necessary to trace, in a brief investigation, the remote origin of the Institution of Freemasonry and its connection with the ancient systems of initiation.

It was, then, the object of all the rites and mysteries of antiquity to teach the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. This dogma, shining as an almost solitary beacon-light in the surrounding gloom of Pagan darkness, had undoubtedly been received from that ancient people or priesthood, among whom it probably existed only in the form of a symbol of a future life. In the more elaborate systems of the Pagan philosophers and mystics, the idea, when presented to the initiates in their mysteries, was always conveyed in the form of a scenic representation. The influence, too, of the early Sabian worship of the sun and heavenly bodies, in which the solar orb was adored on its resurrection, each morning, from the apparent death of the evening setting, caused this rising sun to be adopted in the more ancient mysteries as a symbol of the regeneration of the soul. Thus, in the Egyptian Mysteries we find a representation of the death and subsequent regeneration of Osiris; in the Phenician, of Adonis; in the Syrian, of Dionysus; in all of which the scenic apparatus of initiation was intended to indoctrinate the candidates into the dogma of a future life.

It will be sufficient here to refer to the theory of Oliver, that through the instrumentality of the Tyrian workmen at the Temple of King Solomon, what he calls the spurious and pure branches of the Masonic system were united at Jerusalem, and that the same method of scenic representation was adopted by the latter from the former, and the narrative of the Temple Builder substituted for that of Dionysus, which was the myth peculiar to the mysteries practised by the Tyrian workmen. The idea, therefore, proposed to be communicated in the myth of the ancient mysteries was the same as that which is now conveyed in the Masonic Legend of the Third Degree.

Hence, then, Hiram Abif is, in the Masonic system, the symbol of human nature, as developed in the life here and the life to come; and so, while the Temple was the visible symbol of the world, its Builder became the mythical symbol of man, the dweller and worker in that world. Man, setting forth on the voyage of life, with faculties and powers fitting him for the due exercise of the high duties to whose performance he has been called, holds, if he be “a curious and cunning workman,” skilled in all moral and intellectual purposes (and it is only of such men that the Temple Builder can be the symbol), within the grasp of his attainment, the knowledge of all that Divine truth imparted to him as the heirloom of his race—that race to whom it has been granted to look, with exalted countenance, on high; which Divine Truth is symbolized by the word. Thus provided with the word of life, he occupies his time in the construction of a spiritual temple, and travels onward in the faithful discharge of all his duties, laying down his designs upon the Trestle-Board of the future, and invoking the assistance and direction of God.

But is his path always over flowery meads and through pleasant groves? Is there no hidden foe to obstruct his progress? Is all before him clear and calm, with joyous sunshine and refreshing zephyrs? Alas! not so. “Man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward.” At every “gate of life”—as the Orientalists have beautifully called the different ages—he is beset by peril. Temptations allure his youth; misfortunes beset him in his manhood, and his old age is encumbered with infirmity and disease. But clothed in the armor of virtue he may resist the temptation; he may cast misfortunes aside and rise triumphantly above them; but to the last—the direst, the most inexorable foe of his race—he must eventually yield, and, stricken down by death, he sinks prostrate into the grave, and is buried in the rubbish of his sin and human frailty. Here then, in Freemasonry, is what was called the Aphanism, concealment or disappearance in the Ancient Mysteries. The bitter, but necessary lesson of death has been imparted. The living soul, with the lifeless body, which encased it, has disappeared, and can nowhere be found. All is darkness—confusion—despair. Divine truth—the Word—for a time is lost, and the Master Mason may now say, in the language of Hutchinson, “I prepare my sepulchre. I make my grave in the pollution of the earth. I am under the shadow of death.”

But if the mythic symbolism ended here, with this lesson of death, then were the lesson incomplete. That teaching would be vain and idle—nay more, it would be corrupt and pernicious—which should stop short of the conscious and innate instinct for another existence. And hence the succeeding portions of the legend are intended to convey the sublime symbolism of a resurrection from the grave and a new birth into a future life. The discovery of the body, which, in the initiations of the ancient mysteries, was called the Eureka; and its removal, from the polluted grave into which it had been cast, to an honored and sacred place within the precincts of the temple, are all profoundly and beautifully symbolic of that great truth, the discovery of which was the object of all the ancient initiations, as it is almost the whole design of Freemasonry, namely, that when man shall have passed the gates of life and have yielded to the inexorable fiat of death, he shall then (not in the pictured ritual of an earthly Lodge, but in the realities of that eternal one, of which the former is but an antitype) be raised, at the omnific word of the Grand Master of the Universe, from time to eternity—from the tomb of corruption to the chambers of hope—from the darkness of death to the celestial beams of life—and that his disembodied spirit shall be conveyed as near to the holy of holies of the Divine Presence as humanity can ever approach to deity. Such, Doctor Mackey conceived, to be the true interpretation of the symbolism of the Legend of the Third Degree.

I have said, continued Doctor Mackey, that this mythical history of the Temple Builder was universal in all nations and all Rites, and that in no place and at no time had it, by alteration, diminution, or addition, acquired any essentially new or different form: the myth has always remained the same. But it is not so with its interpretation. That which I have just given, and which I conceive to be the correct one has been very generally adopted by the Freemasons of America. But elsewhere, and by various writers, other interpretations have been made, very different in their character, although always agreeing in retaining the general idea of a resurrection or regeneration, or a restoration of something from an inferior to a higher sphere or function.

Thus, some of the earlier continental writers have supposed the myth to have been a symbol of the destruction of the Order of the Templars, looking upon its restoration to its original wealth and dignities as being prophetically symbolized.

In some of the high philosophical Degrees it is taught that the whole legend refers to the sufferings and death, with the subsequent resurrection of Christ.

Hutchinson, who has the honor of being the earliest philosophical writer on Freemasonry in England, supposes it to have been intended to embody the idea of the decadence of the Jewish religion and the substitution of the Christian in its place and on its ruins.

Doctor Oliver thinks that it is typical of the murder of Abel and Cain, and that it symbolically refers to the universal death of our race through Adam and its restoration to life in the Redeemer, according to the expression of the Apostle, “as in Adam we all died, so in Christ we all live.”

Ragon makes Hiram a symbol of the sun shorn of its vivifying rays and fructifying power by the three winter months, and its restoration to prolific heat by the season of spring.

And, finally, Des Etangs, adopting, in part, the interpretation of Ragon, adds to it another which he calls the moral symbolism of the legend, and supposes that Hiram is no other than eternal reason, whose enemies are the vices that deprave and destroy humanity.

To each of these interpretations it seems to me, says Doctor Mackey that there are important objections, though perhaps to some less so than to others. As to those who seek for an astronomical interpretation of the legend, in which the annual changes of the sun are symbolized, while the ingenuity with which they press their argument cannot but be admired, it is evident that, by such interpretation, they yield all that Freemasonry has gained of religious development in past ages, and fall back upon that corruption and perversion of Cabalism from which it was the object, even of the Spurious Freemasonry of antiquity, to rescue its disciples.

The Templar interpretation of the myth must at once be discarded if we would avoid the difficulties of anachronism, unless we deny that the legend existed before the abolition of the Order of Knights Templar, and such denial would be fatal to the Antiquity of Freemasonry.

And so to the adoption of the Christian reference, Hutchinson and, after him, Oliver, profoundly philosophical as are the Masonic speculations of both, have, Doctor Mackey was constrained to believe, fallen into a great error in calling the Master Mason's Degree a Christian Institution. It is true that it embraces within its scheme the great truths of Christianity upon the subject of the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body; but this was to be presumed, because Freemasonry is truth, and Christianity is truth, and all truth must be identical. But the origin of each is different; their histories are dissimilar. The creed of Freemasonry is the primitive one of Noah and his immediate descendants. If Freemasonry were simply a Christian institution, the Jew and the Moslem, the Brahman and the Buddhist, could not conscientiously partake of its illumination; but its universality is its boast. In its language, citizens of every nation may converse; at its altar men of all religions may kneel; to its creed, disciples of every faith may subscribe.

But the true ancient interpretation of the legend—the universal, Masonic one—for all countries and all ages, undoubtedly, was that the fate of the Temple Builder is but figurative of the pilgrimage of man on earth, through trials and temptations, through sin and sorrow, until his eventual fall beneath the blow of death and his final and glorious resurrection to another and an eternal life. And now, in conclusion, a word of historical criticism may not be misplaced. It is not at all essential to the value of the symbolism that the legend shall be proved to be historical. Whether considered as a truthful narrative of an event that actually transpired during the building of the Temple, or simply as a myth embodying the utterance of a religious sentiment, the symbolic lesson of life and death and immortality is still contained in its teachings, and commands our earnest attention.

LEGISLATION. On the subject of that crying sin of the Order—over-legislation by Grand Lodges—Governor Thomas Brown, formerly Grand Master of Florida, has wisely said:

Too much legislation is the vice of the present day, as well in Masonic as in civil government. The same thirst for change and innovation which has prompted tyros and demagogues to legislate upon constitutional law, and write expositions of the common law, has prompted uninformed and unscrupulous Masons to legislate upon the Landmarks of Masonry.

LEHRLING. German for an Entered Apprentice.

LELAND, JOHN. An eminent English antiquary, the Chaplain of King Henry VIII, who appointed him King's Antiquary, a title which he was the first and last to bear. The King also directed him to search after the antiquities of England, "and peruse the libraries of all cathedrals, abbeys, priories, colleges, etc., as also all the places wherein records, writings, and secrets of antiquity were deposited." Leland, accordingly, traveled over England for several years and made many collections of manuscripts, which were afterward deposited in the Bodleian Library.

He was a man of great learning and industry. He was born in England in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the exact year is uncertain, and died on the 18th of April, 1552. Anthony Wood says that he was by far the most eminent historian and antiquary ever born in England. His connection with Freemasonry arises from the manuscript containing the questions of King Henry VI, which he is said to have copied from the original (see Leland Manuscript).

LELAND MANUSCRIPT. There is no one of the old Records of Freemasonry, except, perhaps, the Charter of Cologne, that has given rise to more controversy among the critics than the one generally known as the Leland Manuscript. It derives this name from the statement made in its title, which is: "Certayne questyonys with awnsweres to the same, concernyng the mystery of maçonrye; wryttene by the hande of Kynge Henry the Sixthe of the name, and faithfullye copied by me, Johan Leylande Antiquarius, by the commaunde of His Highnesse." It first appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1753 (page 417), where it purports to be a reprint of a pamphlet published five years before at Frankfort. The title of the paper in the Gentleman's Magazine is: "Copy of a small pamphlet, consisting of twelve pages in octavo, printed in Germany in 1748, entitled Ein Brief von dem berühmten Heren Johann Locke betreffend die Frey-Maurerein. So auf einem Schreib-Tisch eines verstorbren Bruders ist gefunden worden. That is, A Letter of the famous Mr. John Locke relating to Freemasonry. As found in the writing-desk of a deceased brother."

Hearne copied it in his Life of Leland (page 67), prefacing it with the remark that:

It also appears that an ancient manuscript of Leland's has long remained in the Bodleian Library, unnoticed in any account of our author yet published. . . . The original is said to be in the handwriting of King Henry VI, and copied by Leland by order of His Highness (King Henry VIII). If the authenticity of this ancient monument of literature remains unquestioned, it demands particular notice in the present publication, on account of the singularity of the subject, and no less from a due regard to the royal writer, and our author, his transcriber, indefatigable in every part of literature: it will also be admitted, acknowledgment is due to the learned Mr. Locke, who, amidst the closest studies and the most strict attention to human understanding, could unbind his mind in search of this ancient treatise, which he first brought from obscurity in the year 1696.
The Manuscript purports to be a series of questions proposed by Henry VI and answers given by the Freemasons. It is accompanied by an introductory letter and a commentary by Locke, together with a glossary of the archaic words. The best account of the Manuscript is contained in the letter of Locke to a nobleman, said to be the Earl of Pembroke, dated May 6, 1696, in which, after stating that he had procured a copy of it from the Bodleian Library, he adds:

The Manuscript of which this is a copy appears to be about one hundred and sixty years old; yet, as your Lordship will observe by the title, it is itself a copy of one yet more ancient by about one hundred years. For the original is said to have been in the handwriting of King Henry the VI. Where that prince had it is an uncertainty; but it seems to me to be an examination, taken, perhaps, before the King, of some one of the Brotherhood of Masons, among whom he entered himself, as 'tis said, when he came out of his minority, and thenceforth put a stop to a persecution that had been raised against them.

After its appearance in the Gentleman's Magazine, which first introduced the knowledge of it to the world, and in W. Huddesford's Lives of Eminent Antiquaries, John Leland, etc., 1772, who evidently copied it from the Magazine, it next appeared in 1764, in the Pocket Companion, and in 1769 in Calcott's Candid Disquisition. In 1775, Hutchinson introduced it into his Spirit of Masonry. Dermott published it in his Ahiman Reson, and Preston in his Illustrations. Norrathouck, in 1784, embodied it in his edition of the Constitutions; and it has since been repeatedly published in England and America, so that the Craft have had every opportunity of becoming familiar with its contents. Translations of it have also been given in French by Thory, in his Acta Latomorum; in German by Lenning, in his Enzyklopädie; by Krause, in his Kunsturkunden, and also by Fessler and several other French and German writers.

This document—so important, if true, as a record of the condition of Freemasonry in the beginning of the fifteenth century—has been from an early period attacked and defended with equal vehemence by those who have denied and those who have maintained its authenticity. As early as 1787, the Baron de Chefdeben, in a discourse on Recherches Macroniques à l'usage des Frères du Régime primitif de Narbonne, making Masonic Studies on the Customs of the Brothers of the Primitive Rite of Narbonne, read before the Congress of the Philalethes, attacked the authenticity of the document. Thory also, although acknowledging that he wished that the Manuscript was true, presented his objections to its authenticity in a memoir read in 1806 before the Tribunal of the Philosophic Rite. His objections are eight in number, and are to this effect: 1. That it was not published in any of the early editions of the works of Locke. 2. That it was printed for the first time at Frankfort, in 1748. 3. That it was not known in England until 1753. 4. That Anderson makes no mention of it. 5. That it is not in any of the editions of Leland's works printed before 1772. 6. That Doctor Plot contends that Henry VI was never made a Freemason. 7. That the Manuscript says that Freemasonry was brought from the East by the Venetians. 8. That the troubles in the reign of Henry VI and his incapacity, render it improbable that he would have occupied his mind with the subject of Freemasonry.

The sixth and eighth of these objections merely beg the question; and the seventh is puerile, founded on ignorance of the meaning of the word Venetian. But the other objections have much weight. Sloane, in his New Curiosities of Literature (1849, volume ii, page 80), attacks the document with the bitterness which he usually displays wherever Freemasonry is concerned.

Halliwell Philips, in his Early History of Freemasonry in England (page 40), has advanced the following arguments against its authenticity:

It is singular that the circumstances attending its publication should have led no one to suspect its authenticity. I was at the pains of making a long search in the Bodleian Library last summer, in the hopes of finding the original, but without success. In fact, there can be but little doubt that this celebrated and well-known document is a forgery! In the first place, why should such a document have been printed abroad? Was it likely that it should have found its way to Frankfort, nearly half a century afterwards, and been published without any explanation of the source whence it was obtained? Again the orthography is most grotesque, and too gross ever to have been penned either by Henry VI or Leland, or both combined. For instance, we have Peter Gower, a Grecian, explained in a note by the fabricator—for who else could have solved it?—to be Pythagoras! As a whole, it is but a clumsy attempt at deception, and is quite a parallel to the recently discovered one of the first English Eureuca.

Among the German opponents of the Manuscript are Lessing, Keller, and Findel; and more recently, the iconoclasts of England, who have been attacking so many of the ancient records of the Craft, have not left this one unspared. On the other hand, it has ranked among its advocates some of the most learned Freemasons of England, Germany, and France, of whom may be named Krause, Fessler, Lenning, Reghellini, Preston, Hutchinson, Calcott, the last three, perhaps, without critical examination, and Oliver. Of these the language of the last may be cited as a specimen of the arguments adduced in its favor. Doctor Oliver says (Freemasons Quarterly Review, 1840, page 10):

This famous Manuscript, possesses the reputation of having converted the learned Locke, who was initiated after carefully perusing and analyzing it. Doctor Burney can place on this invaluable document, it will be necessary to say a word respecting its authenticity. I admit that there is some degree of mystery about it, and doubts have been entertained whether it be not a forgery. We have the strongest presumptive proofs that it was in existence about the middle of the last century, because the utmost publicity was given to it; and as at that time Freemasonry was beginning to excite a considerable share of public attention, the deception, had it been such, would have been publicly exposed by its opponents, who appear to have used the lash of ridicule very freely, as witness Hogarth's picture of Night, where the prince is finding his brethren, some Brethren, decorated with aprons and jewels, returning from the Lodge in a state of intoxication; the broad sheet of the Scald Miserables, and other prints and publications in which Freemasonry is burlesqued. But no attempt was ever made to invalidate its claim to be a genuine document.

After enumerating the several books in which it had been published, he resumes his argument, as follows:

Being thus universally diffused, had it been a suspected document, its exposure would certainly have been attempted; particularly about the close of the last century, when the progress of Masonry was sensibly checked by the publication of works which charged it with being the depository of principles fatal equally to the peace and religion of civil society; and if a forgery, it would have been unable to have endured the test of a critical examination. But no such attempt was made; and the presumption therefore is that the document is authentic. I should be inclined to accept it, from internal evidence only, that the Letter and Annotations were written by Locke; but there are corroborating facts which appear conclusive; for this great philosopher was actually residing at Oates, the country-seat of Sir Francis Masham, at the time when the paper is dated; and shortly afterwards he went up to town, where he was initiated into Masonry. These facts are fully proved by Locke’s Letters to Mr. Molyneux, dated March 30 and July 2, 1696. For these reasons I entertain no doubt of the genuineness and authenticity of this valuable Manuscript.

If my own opinion is worth giving on this subject, says Doctor Mackey, I should say with much reluctance, and against my own wishes, that there is neither internal nor external evidence of the authenticity of this document to make it a sufficient foundation for historical evidence.

Brother Mackey’s opinion in the above essay was candid and conservative, in the main well supported by later investigation. Brother Robert F. Gould, in his History of Freemasonry (volume i, page 489), says of this document “which all authorities, except Fort, on the credulity of the Freemasons.” But this memoir of Ashmole, given in the Biographia Britannica, 1747, may have suggested the idea of practising on the credulity of the Freemasons.” But this verdict of the eighties was considerably modified by Brother Gould after he had read the argument of Brother George Fleming Moore in the New Age, 1890 (see also pages 384 and 385, Doctor Mackey’s revised History of Freemasonry). In his Collected Essays, 1913 (page 265), Brother Gould admitted that “The Editor of the New Age has in my opinion, presented some very cogent reasons for a rehearing of the case.”

The Leland Manuscript has been the subject of so much criticism, friendly and otherwise, that the text ought to be submitted with the arguments. The copy here given with notes (see inserted figures in text) and glossary of the more unusual words is from the twelfth edition of William Preston’s Illustrations of Masonry (pages 110-18):

A Letter from the learned Mr. John Locke, to the Right Hon. Thomas Earl of Pembroke, with an old Manuscript on the subject of Free Masonry.

My Lord,

I have at length, by the help of Mr. Collins, procured a copy of that manuscript in the Bodleian library, which you were so curious to see: and, in obedience to your lordship’s commands, I herewith send it to you. Most of the notes annexed to it, are what I made yesterday for the reading of my lady Masham, who is become so fond of Masonry, and that text which she then with delight, I should add that I have upon your lordship; but for my own part I cannot deny that it has so much raised my curiosity, as to induce me to enter myself into the Fraternity, which I am determined to do, if I may be admitted, the next time I go to London, and that will be shortly, I am, My Lord,

Yours Lordship’s most obedient, and most humble servant,

John Locke.

1. John Leyland was appointed by Henry VIII at the dissolution of monasteries, to search for, and have such books and records as were valuable among them. He was a man of great labor and industry.

2. Meaning the said King Henry VIII. Our kings had had a direct meaning in the ironical sense. Thus Duns Scotus, a man famed for the subtilty and acuteness of his mind, might be useful, and that they conceal such only as would be hurtful either to the world or themselves. What these secrets are, we see afterwards.

3. That is, what may this mystery of Masonry be? The answer imports, That it consists in natural, mathematical, and mechanical knowledge. Some part of which, as appears by what follows, the Masons pretend to have taught the rest of mankind, and some part they still conceal.

4 and 5. It should seem by this, that Masons believe there were men in the east before Adam, who is called the “ffyrste manne of the weste;” and that arts and sciences began in the east. Some authors of great note for learning have been of the same opinion; and it is certain that Europe and Africa, which, in respect to Asia, may be called western countries, were wild and savage, long after arts and politeness of manners were in great perfection in China and the Indies.

5. It is no wonder that the Phenicians should be mistaken for the Venetians.

6. In the times of monkish ignorance it is no wonder they brought from the east with other arts.

7. The answer imports, That it consists in natural, mathematical, and mechanical knowledge. Some part of which, as appears by what follows, the Masons pretend to have taught the rest of mankind, and some part they still conceal.

8. A part of Italy formerly so called, in which the Greeks had settled a large colony.

9. This word at present signifies simpleton, but formerly had a quite contrary meaning. Wiseacre in the old Saxon is philosopher, wiseman, or wizard, and having been frequently used ironically, at length came to have the direct meaning in the ironical sense.

10. Wunderwerckynge, working miracles

11. It seems the Masons have great regard to the help of which, new rules of arithmetic are, and may conceivably be hurtful either to the world or themselves. What these secrets are, we see afterwards.

12. This paragraph hath something remarkable in it. It contains a justification of the secrecy so much boasted of by Masons, and so much blamed by others; asserting that they have in all ages discovered such things as might be useful, and that they conceal such only as would be hurtful either to the world or themselves. What these secrets are, we see afterwards.

13. That is, what may this mystery of Masonry be? The answer imports, That it consists in natural, mathematical, and mechanical knowledge. Some part of which, as appears by what follows, the Masons pretend to have taught the rest of mankind, and some part they still conceal.

14. The art of inventing arts, must certainly be a most useful art. My lord Bacon’s Novum Organum is an attempt towards somewhat of the same kind. But I much doubt, that if the Masons had it, they have now lost it; since so few new arts have been lately invented, and so many are wanted. The idea I have of such an art, is, that it must be something proper to be employed in all the sciences generally, as algebra in numbers, by the help of which, new rules of arithmetic are, and may be found.

15. It seems the Masons have great regard to the reputation as well as the profit of their order; since they make it one reason for not divulging an art in common, that it may do honore to the possessors of it. I think in this particular they shew too much regard for their own authority and society, and too little for the rest of mankind.

16. What kind of art this is, I can by no means imagine. But certainly such an art they must have: For though, as some people suppose, they should have no secret at all, even that must be a secret, which being discovered, would expose them to the highest ridicule; and therefore it requires the utmost caution to conceal it.

17. I know not what this means, unless it be the transmutation of metals.

18. Here I am utterly in the dark.

19. In the times of monkish ignorance it is no wonder that the Phenicians should be mistaken for the Venetians.
tend to have such a thing among them. If it be true, I guess it must be something like the language of the Pantometria among the ancient Romans, who are said to have been able to spell words and deliver them, not in a language intelligibly to men of all nations and languages. A man who has all these arts and advantages, is certainly in a condition to be envied. But we are told that the Fraternity of Masons, by the usage of their ancients, is still in possession of these arts among them, and all have a right and an opportunity to know them, yet some want capacity, and others industry, to acquire them. However, of all these arts and sciences, that which they most desire to know is "The skill of becomemynge guede and parfyghte": and I wish it were communicated to all mankind, since there is nothing more true than the beautiful sentence contained in the last answer, "That the better men are, the more they love one another." Virtue having in itself something so amiable as to charm the hearts of all that behold it.

A careful reading of the above manuscript will disclose not only typical old English words but several that are as peculiarly foreign to that language, but as it came in the eighteenth century from the Continent for publication in England with the understanding that it was a copy of an old document there is nothing unusual in finding words in it of other than British origin. Europe and its languages have been subject to change and the curious combination of English, French and German influence is seen in the above manuscript, commodytyle, confrerie, façonnynge, freres, occasyonne, are as suggestively French, as Odher, recht, Soenderlyche, werck, woned, wunderwerckynge, are of German. Brother Preston (page 118) asserts that:

The conjecture of the learned annotator concerning its being an examination taken before King Henry of one of the Fraternity of Masons, is accurate. The severe edict passed at that time against the society, and the discouragement given to the Masons by the bishop of Winchester and his party, induced that prince, in his riper years, to make a strict scrutiny into the nature of the Masonic institution; which was attended with the happy circumstance of gaining his favour, and his patronage. Had not the civil commotions in the kingdom during his reign attracted the notice of government, the happy circumstance of gaining his favour, and his patronage, Brother Mackey might have been likely to occur if the manuscript had been originally the work of an Englishman and written in the English language.

We may not go so far as this with Brother Preston in our study of the manuscript, but we can agree with him that it deserves a serious and studious examination.

The phrasing and choice of words has drawn attention, comment being made by Brother Mackey on the probability that there was a French original of the document which had been translated into English. He points out that there are many peculiar French turns and twists in the manuscript and therefore held that none of these idiomatic expressions would have been likely to occur if the manuscript had been originally the work of an Englishman and written in the English language.

We must not forget that the manuscript first appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine, September, 1753, and that there we are told that it had previously been printed at Frankfort in Germany in 1748. These circumstances give the language of the essay a peculiarly international flavor. However, there is one singular feature which perhaps has not hitherto received the attention it deserved. This is mentioned in Miscellanea Latomorum (pages 40 and 41, volume 3), which is taken from the Bodleian Quarterly Record (iii, page 27), and reads as follows:

The forger of literary and historical documents has many pitfalls in his path, but his fall is often long delayed. A forger which for many years has found supporters is a Masonic treatise entitled Certayne Questions Concernynge Masonry; wryttenne by . . . Ryngpe. Certayne Questions. The Sixteene Questions of the Seventeenth Century, published in 1748—Frankfort, 1748—where it is said that the original manuscript is in the Bodleian Library. No such manuscript, however, has ever come to light, and Mr. Madan, in his Summary, Catalogue, refers to it as mythical. A student of Masonry recently appointed with a special visitation, some years ago, in search for the treatise, because, as he said, "Masonically this is by no means as universally regarded as spurious as it was some thirty or so years ago." Needless to say, he did not succeed where Mr. Madan had failed, but the authenticity of the text was still undetermined. It occurred to a member of the Staff to ask Mr. Onions, one of the editors of the New English Dictionary, whether the word kymistrye could possibly have been written as early as 1460. Mr. Onions kindly examined the text, and immediately denounced it as spurious on account of the occurrence of the word kymistray—chemistry—which is not found in English until about the year 1600 and which did not become current until the middle of the seventeenth century. By such slips is the forger betrayed.

However, the subject here seemed worthy of further examination. Brother Charles E. Funk, of the New Standard Dictionary, Funk and Wagnalls Company, writes to us:

It is possible but not probable that the word chemistry, with the variant spelling kymistrye, may have been used as early as the middle of the sixteenth century, but from such records as we have, the earliest use was apparently at the beginning of the seventeenth century, some fifty or more years later. Previous to that time the word employed was alchemy, and from that there were such forms as alchemic, alchemical, alchemically, alchemist, alchemistic, and alchemic. The use, of course, was a Moorish prefix and could have been dropped at any time after the introduction of the base word into English. As far as the spelling kymistrye is concerned, we find no record of this particular form in the available reference books. There is no reason why that spelling might not have been used, for it was by no means uncommon for the hard ch to be written k, and in fact some of the old spellings as we have in church, is Scotland kirk. Numerous other words coming from the Greek, thence to Latin, and from thence to English lost the original ch of the Greek into the hard c or k of modern English. Previous to the eighteenth century every one spelled more or less according to the dictates of his conscience and if any individual preferred to spell chymist—a form that appeared as early as the middle of the sixteenth century, as kymist, that was his privilege. The fact that the spelling chymist is recorded in Bulley's Book of Surnames, published in 1502, is the only thing that tends the air of probability to the use of the word kymistrye, which was written in a date as is credited to the Leland Manuscript. I think it is probable, as you infer, that the word was inserted into the manuscript at some later date than that to which it is credited. The fact that the word chymist did not come into English until fifty years after the alleged date of the manuscript is supporting testimony to that effect, but by no means conclusive. Alchemy was introduced into England prior to the time of Chaucer and many of the important sciences of the period of King Henry VI should certainly contain the subject alchemy.

The fact that the manuscript has evidently been copied into at least two different continental languages more or less, French and German, and brought... back into the language in which it was probably first written, English, has, we dare say, carried with it some expressions, not to say some spellings, that were in all probability not in the original. Even now there are unmistakable French and German spellings of words easy to be seen, as we have pointed out, and therefore we do not think it at all unreasonable to suppose that each copyist was inclined to introduce such words as seem to him most expressive. Curious as it may seem that the word alchemy is not in the manuscript where we would expect to find it, yet this rather indicates to us that kymistrye has been substituted for it.

Sir John A. Cockburn, Past Grand Deacon of England, contributed a discussion of the manuscript which appeared in the December issue, 1920, of the Builder, in which he maintained that the arguments illiterate Craftsman might make of the French word evidence of its truth irresistible, that Freemasonry depend on oral tradition cannot in all cases expect direct documentary proof. As to errors in the text, he believed them witnesses of its truth, Peter Gower for Pythagoras was just such a blunder as an illiterate Craftsman might make of the French word Pythagore, that confounding the ancient Phenicians with the modern Venetians was probable enough during the grandeur of Venice, that in fact the most plausible of the adverse criticism was in the uncouth spelling, but this corresponding to no particular period of English orthography and of little disqualifying cogency when we find in Lodge Minute Books, within the last century, such monstrosities as Shuper exclant Masons, and Sertifiket of a Resectobel Order. Sir John concluded that the document supported by so many contemporary and credible allusions was inconceivable as a forgery. Further, he asserted that in any case it deserved to be rescued from oblivion if only for its sublime truths, its statement that Freemasonry enables men to be virtuous without hope of reward or fear of punishment, that the pursuit of virtue for its own sake differentiates Freemasonry from dogmatic religions, and that Brotherly Love, Relief and Truth bring their own recompense.

LEMANCEAU. A zealous French Freemason, and the possessor of a fine collection of Degrees, the nomenclature of which is preserved by Thory in his Acta Latomorum. The most important are referred to in the present work.

LEMIERRE, A. M. Born in 1733, died in 1793. A writer of merit who belonged to the Lodge of the Neuf Soeurs, the Nine Sisters, or the Muses, the classic patrons of arts and sciences, and was present at the reception of Voltaire.

LENGTH OF THE LODGE. See Extent of the Lodge.

LENNING, C. The assumed name of a learned German Freemason, who resided at Paris in 1817, where Krause speaks of him as an estimable man and well-informed Craftsman. Woodford (Kenning's Cyclopaedia) says his real name was Hesse, and that he was a bookseller. He was the first projector of the Encyclopaedie der Freimaurerei, which Findel justly calls "one of the most learned and remarkable works in Masonic literature." The manuscript coming into the possession of the Leipsic bookseller, Brockhaus, he engaged Friedrich Mossdorf to edit it. He added so much to the original, revising and amplifying all the most important articles and adding many new ones, that Kloss catalogues it in his Bibliographie as the work of Mossdorf. The Encyclopaedie is in three volumes, of which the first was published in 1822, the second in 1824, and the third in 1828, all at Leipsic. A second edition, under the title of Handbuch der Freimaurerei, was published under the editorship of Schletter and Zille. The first three volumes of this second and revised edition were issued in fifteen parts, 1861–7; the fourth volume or supplement of 1879 being edited by O. Henne-Am-Rhym. A third edition in two volumes was published in 1900, the first volume only, the second following in 1901.

LENOIR, ALEXANDRE. A celebrated archeologist, who was born at Paris in 1761. Having studied at the Mazarin College, he entered the studio of Doyeu, and successfully cultivated painting. In 1790, the National Assembly having decreed that the treasures of art in the suppressed churches and convents should be collected at the Petits-Augustins, he was appointed the Conservator of the dépôt, which was subsequently called the Museum, of which he was then made the Director. He there collected more than five hundred monuments rescued from destruction, and classified them with great care. On the conversion of the Garden of Mosseaux into a Museum of Monuments, he was appointed one of the administrators, and subsequently the administrator of the monuments of the Church of Saint Denis. In all these appointments, Lenoir exhibited his taste and judgment as an archeologist. He was a member of the Society of Antiquaries of France, to whose Transactions he contributed several memoirs. The Metropolitan Chapter of France had, from the year 1777, annually held philosophical conventions, at which lectures on Masonic subjects were delivered by such men as Court de Gebelin. In 1789 these conventions were discontinued in consequence of the political troubles of the times, but they were renewed in 1812 by M. Lenoir, who delivered before the Chapter a course of eight lectures on the relations which exist between the ancient mysteries of the Egyptians and the Greeks and those of Freemasonry. In 1814, he published the substance of these lectures in a work entitled La Franche-Maçonnerie rendue à sa véritable origine, ou L’Antiquité de la Franche-Maçonnerie prouvée par l’Explication des Mystères Anciens et Modernes, Freemasonry brought back to its true origin, or the Antiquity of Freemasonry proven by an Explanation of the Mysteries, Ancient and Modern, Paris, quarto, 304 pages. The theory of the author being that the mysteries of Freemasonry are only a repetition of those of antiquity, he attempts to support it by investigations into the ancient initiations that are marked with profound learning, although the work was severely criticised in the Journal de Debats. He had previously published, in 1809, a work in three volumes, entitled Nouvelle Explication des Hiéroglyphes ou Anciennes Allegories sacrées des Egyptiens, New Explanation of the Mystical Characters, or Ancient Allegories revered by the Egyptians. He died at Paris, June 12, 1839.

LEONTICA. Ancient sacrificial festivals in honor of the sun; the officiating priests being termed Leontes.
LEO XII, POPE. Born in 1760, died in 1829. On the 13th of March, 1825, he issued the well-remembered Bull, beginning “Quo graviora maia,” against the Freemasons. The first few Latin words of a Papal Bull, it is also well to recall, are used as a name for the document.

LEPAGE. One of those French Freemasons who in the latter part of the eighteenth century occupied themselves in the accumulation of cahiers or rituals of Masonic Degrees. Most of the Degrees in his collection, which is said to have been a valuable one, are referred to by Thory in the nomenclature contained in his Acta Latomorum.

LEROUGE, ANDRE JOSEPH ETIENNE. A man of letters and zealous Freemason of Paris, born at Commercy, April 25, 1766. He made a large and valuable collection of manuscript and printed Degrees.

He died in 1834, and on the 7th of January, 1835, his collection was sold at public auction. Thory has made use of it in his Nomenclature des Grades. Lerouge was the author of several didactic writings on Masonic subjects, all of which, however, have had but an ephemeral existence. He was one of the editors of the French Masonic journal Hermes, published in 1819, and of the Mélanges de Philosophie, d'Histoire et de Littérature Magonymique, Mélanges being the French word for mixtures or blends. He was a man of much learning, and is said to have supplied several of his Masonic contemporaries with assistance in the preparation of their works.

LESSER LIGHTS. In the lecture of the First Degree we are told that a Lodge has three symbolic Lesser Lights; one of these is in the East, one in the West, and one in the South. There is no light in the North, because King Solomon’s Temple, of which every Lodge is a representation, was placed so far north of the ecliptic that the sun and moon, at their meridian height, could dart no rays into the northern part thereof. The North we therefore Masonically call a place of darkness. This symbolic use of the three lesser lights is very old, being found in the earliest lectures of the eighteenth century. The three lights, like the three principal officers and the three principal supports, refer, undoubtedly, to the three stations of the sun—its Rising in the East, its Meridian in the South, and its Setting in the West; and thus the symbolism of the Lodge, as typical of the world, continues to be preserved. The use of lights in all religious ceremonies is an ancient custom. There was a seven-branched candlestick in the tabernacle, and in the Temple “were the golden candlesticks, five on the right hand and five on the left.” They were always typical of moral, spiritual, or intellectual light. The custom prevalent in some localities, of placing the burning tapers, or three symbolic lesser lights, East, West, and South, near the altar, is sometimes changed so that these respective lights are burning on or beside the pedestals of the Master and his two Wardens at their several stations. In the old Teutonic mythology, and in accordance with Medieval court usage, flaming lights or fires burned before each column, similarly situated, on which rested the images of Odin, Thor, and Frey. These columns are further represented as Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty, sustaining the “Starry-decked Heaven,” roof or ceiling colored blue, with stars.

LESSING, GOTTFRIED EPHRAIM. A learned littérateur of Germany, who was born at Kaufmitz, in the Neiderlausetz, January 22, 1729, and died on the 15th of February, 1781, at Woefenbutal, where he was librarian to the Duke of Brunswick. Lessing was initiated in a Lodge at Hamburg, and took great interest in the Institution. His theory, that it sprang out of a secret association of Templars which had long existed in London, and was reestablished in form by Sir Christopher Wren, has long been rejected, if it was ever admitted by any; but in his two works Ernst und Falk and Nathan der Weise, he has given profound and comprehensive views on the genius and spirit of Freemasonry. Lessing was the most eminent littérateur of his age and has been styled “the man who was the forerunner of the philosophers, and whose criticisms supplied the place of poetry” (see Ernst and Falk).

Brother Lessing’s dramatic poem, Nathan the Wise, is vigorously Masonic. The author was convinced that the stage would prove as useful in circulating the good doctrine as the pulpit and he strove in this play to preach universal brotherhood. He discusses class prejudice and teaches the force of that truth which underlies religious creeds. The effort was an outgrowth of the well-known Goeze controversy and was written in 1778 to 1779 in reply to some of the criticisms of the Hamburg pastor. First acted at Berlin in 1783, it met with little success, until in 1801 it was put on the stage at Weimar by Schiller and Goethe.

The principal characters include the Sultan Saladin, a follower of Mohammed, Nathan, a wealthy Jew, Recha, his adopted daughter, Daja, a Christian woman companion of the daughter, and a young Knight Templar. The plot is briefly as follows: Nathan finds that his daughter has been saved from death by the Knight Templar who, in turn, is captured by the Sultan, who spares his life because the young man resembles the late brother of Saladin. The young people fall in love with each other though the Templar avoids the girl because she is presumably a Jewess. Saladin, in need of money, appoints Nathan his Treasurer and at an interview questions him about his preference for the Jewish faith. Nathan replies by telling him the story of the Three Rings quoted below:

In days of yore, there dwelt in Eastern lands
A man, who from a valued hand received
A ring of priceless worth. An opal stone Shot from within an ever-changing hue,
And held its virtue in its form concealed,
To render him of God and man beloved.

Who wore it in this fixed unchanging faith.
No wonder that its Eastern owner ne’er
Withdrew it from his finger, and resolved
That to his house the ring should be secured.

Therefore he thus bequeathed it: first to him
Who was the most beloved of his sons.

Ordaining then that he should leave the ring
To the most dear among his children; then
That without heeding birth, the fairest son,
In virtue of the ring alone, should still Be lord of all the house. From son to son,
The ring at length descended to a sire
Who had three sons, alike obedient to him,
And whom he loved with just and equal love.

The first, the second, and the third, in turn,
According as they each apart received
The overflowings of his heart, appeared

Lessing 585
Most worthy as his heir, to take the ring,
Which, with good-natured weakness, he in turn Had promised privately to each; and thus Things lasted awhile. But when they approached,
The father now embarrassed, could not bear
To disappoint two sons, who trusted him.
What's to be done? In secret he commands
The jeweller to come, that from the form
Of the true ring, he may bespeak two more.
Nor cost, nor pains are to be spared, to make The rings alike—quite like the true one. This
The artist managed. When the rings were brought
The father's eye could not distinguish which Had been the model. Overjoyed, he calls
His sons, takes leave of each apart—bestows
His blessing and his ring on each—and dies.
All that follows next
May well be guessed. Scarce is the father dead,
When with his ring, each separate son appears,
And claims to be the lord of all the house.
Question arises, tumult and debate—
But all in vain—the true ring could no more
Be then distinguished than the true faith now.

SAILADIN

Is that your answer to my question?

NATHAN

No! But it may serve as my apology.
I cannot venture to decide between Rings which the father had expressly made,
To baffle those who would distinguish them.

SAILADIN

Rings, Nathan! Come, a truce to this! The creeds
Which I have named have broad, distinctive marks, Differing in raiment, food, and drink!

NATHAN

'Tis true! But then they differ not in their foundation.
Are not all built on history alike,
Traditional or written? History
Must be received on trust. Is it not so?
In whom are we most likely to put trust?
In our own people? in those very men Whose blood we are? who, from our earliest youth
Have proved their love for us, have ne'er deceived,
Except in cases where 'twere better so?
Why should I credit my forefathers less Than you do yours? or can I ask of you To charge your ancestors with falsehood, that
The praise of truth may be bestowed on mine,
And so of Christians.

SAILADIN

By our Prophet's faith,
The man is right. I have no more to say.

NATHAN

Now let us to our rings once more return.
We said the sons complained; each to the judge
Sware from his father's hand immediately
To have received the ring—a view of the case—
In virtue of a promise, that he should
One day enjoy the ring's prerogative.
In this they spoke the truth. Then each maintained
It was not possible that to him alone
His father had been false. Each could not think His father guilty of an act so base.
Rather than that, reluctant as he was
To judge his Brethren, he must yet declare
Some treach'rous act of falsehood had been done.
The judge said: If the father is not brought Before my seat, I cannot judge the case.
Am I to judge enigmas? Do you think That the true ring will here unseal his lips?
But, hold! You tell me that the real ring Enjoys the secret power to make the man
Who wears it, both by God and man, beloved.
Let that decide. Who of the three is loved Best by his Brethren? Is there no reply?
What! do these love-exciting rings alone
Act inwardly? Have they no outward charm?
Does each one love himself alone? You're all Deceived deceivers. All your rings are false.
The real ring, perchance, has disappeared;
And so your father, to supply the loss,
Has caused three rings to fill the place of one.
And,—the judge continued:—
If you insist on judgment, and refuse
My counsel, be it so. I recommend That you consider how the matter stands.
Each from his father has received a ring;
Let each then think the real ring his own.
Your father, possibly desired to free
His power from one ring's tyrannous control.
He loved you all with an impartial love,
And equally, and had no inward wish
To prove the measure of his love for one
By pressing heavily upon the rest.
Therefore, let each one imitate this love;
So, free from prejudice, let each one aim
To emulate his Brethren in the strife
To prove the virtues of his several ring,
By offices of kindness and of love,
And trust in God. And if, in years to come,
The virtues of the ring shall reappear
Amongst your children's children, then, once more Come to this judgment-seat. A greater far Than I shall sit upon it, and decide.
So spake the modest judge.

This parable so impressed the Sultan that he bids the Jew depart in peace, but Nathan insists upon loaning Saladin the desired money and in this way secures his gratitude. Meanwhile, the Templar meets the daughter and then, at an interview with the Jew, sees his consent to the marriage. Nathan neither consents nor refuses and this angers the Templar, but he is later told that the girl is not Nathan's daughter and was born a Christian yet was brought up as a Jewess.
The Templar then visits the Patriarch at the Convent and states the case but withholds the names of those concerned. He is informed that it is the law for a Jew converting a Christian to die by fire and demands are made for the name of the criminal. The Templar refuses to betray Nathan and seeks Saladin. The climax of the play shows that the young people are the children of the brother of the Sultan and, therefore, his own nephew and niece. Lessing has strongly emphasized an enlightened tolerance in its relation to the several creeds which are of leading importance in the poem. In fact, this aspect of the drama is by far the most important in it and well deserves critical study.
The name, Three Rings, applied to Lodges and to at least one Masonic Journal, is a brotherly tribute to Lessing's genius.

stroy all distinctions of rank and position, and beget

LEVIT, ELIPHAS. The pseudonym of Louis Alphonse Constance, born, 1810; died, 1875, a prolific writer on Magical Freemasonry, or of works in which he seeks to connect the symbols of Freemasonry with the dogmas of the High Magic. His principal works, which abound in philosophical speculations, are Doctrine of Transcendental Magic, 1855; Ritual of Transcendental Magic, 1856; History of Magic, 1860; Key of the Grand Mysteries, 1861; Fables and Symbols, 1864; Sorcerer of Meudon, 1865, and Science of Souls, 1865. Brother Mackenzie (Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia) says that Eliphas Levi, at the time of his death, had prepared for publication Le Livre de Mystere, the Book of Mystery, and L'Anneau de Salomon, Solomon's Ring. At one time an active member of the Roman Catholic Church, trained at the Academy of Saint Sulpice for the priesthood, he arrived at the position of Deacon, and is frequently given the title of Abbe, Father, though his independent views were soon found even in his period of priestly instruction to be unacceptable to the authorities of the Roman Church. A pamphlet of his on the Gospel of Liberty, 1839, of radical expressions on politics, also brought him into conflict with the civil powers and he was imprisoned for six months. He renounced celibacy, and married, but the union was broken by divorce, and his attention now seems to have turned toward the occult philosophy. Here he attained a position of prominence and has been called “the last of the Magi.” Lewis Spence (Dictionary of Occultism) sums up his philosophical equipment thus: “Levi's knowledge of the occult sciences was much more imaginative than circumstantial, and in perusing his works the reader needs to be on his guard against the adoption of hasty generalisations and hypotheses.”

LEVIT, DER. The Levite was the fourth grade of the Order of the Knights of the True Light.

LEVITE, KNIGHT. The Knight Levite was the fourth section of the Seventh Degree of the Rite of Clerks of Strict Observance.

LEVITE OF THE EXTERNAL GUARD. The lowest of the nine Orders of the Priesthood, or highest of the Masonic Degrees in the Order of the Temple as modified by Fabre-Palaprat. It was equivalent to Kadosh.

LEVITES. Those descendants of Levi who were employed in the lowest ministerial duties of the Temple, and were thus subordinate to the priests, who were the lineal descendants of Aaron. They are represented in some of the advanced Degrees.

LEVITE, SACRIFICER. A Degree in the collection of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

LEVITIKON. There is a spurious Gospel of Saint John, supposed to have been forged in the fifteenth century, which contradicts the accepted Gospel in many particulars. It contains an Introduction and a Commentary, said to have been written by Nicephorus, a Greek monk of Athens. This Commentary is called the Levitikon. Out of this Gospel and its Commentary, Fabre-Palaprat, about the year 1814, composed a Liturgy for the sect of Johannites, which he had established and attached to the Order of the Temple at Paris.

LEVY. A collection of men or money raised for a particular purpose. The lectures tell us that the timbers for building the Temple at Jerusalem were felled in the forests of Lebanon, where a levy of thirty thousand men of Jerusalem were employed by monthly courses of ten thousand. Adoniram was placed over this levy. The facts are derived from the statement in First Kings v, 13, 14: “And King Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty thousand men. And he sent them to Lebanon ten thousand a month by courses; a month they were in Lebanon and two months at home: and Adoniram was over the levy.” These wood-cutters were not Tyrians, but all Israelites.

LEWIS. This technical word has several explanations. 1. An instrument in Operative Masonry. It is an iron cramp or clamp which is inserted in a cavity prepared for that purpose in any large stone, so as to give attachment to a pulley and hook whereby the stone may be conveniently raised to any height and deposited in its proper position. It is well described by Gibson, in the British Archologia (volume x, page 127), but he is in error in attributing its invention to a French architect in the time of Louis XIV and its name to that monarch. The contrivance was known to the Romans, and several taken from old ruins are now in the Vatican. In the ruins of Whitby Abbey, in England, which was founded by Osyry, King of Northumberland, in 658, large stones were discovered, with the necessary excavation for the insertion of a lewis. The word is most probably derived from the old French léris, any contrivance for lifting. The modern French call the instrument a levée. 2. In the English system, the Lewis is found on the Tracing-Board of the Entered Apprentice, where it is used as a Symbol of Strength, because, by its assistance, the Operative Mason is enabled to lift the heaviest stones with a comparatively trifling exertion of physical power. It has not been adopted as a symbol by the American Freemasons, except in Pennsylvania, where, of course, it received the English interpretation.
3. The son of a Freemason is, in England, called a Lewis, because it is his duty to support the sinking powers and aid the failing strength of his father; or, as Oliver has expressed it, “to bear the burden in the heat of the day and help them in time of need, which, by reason of their great age, they ought to be exempted from, so as to render the close of their days happy and comfortable.”

It is sometimes stated that a Lewis may be initiated before he has reached the age of twenty-one; but this, it still survives in the familiar name Leveson which, we all know, is pronounced Lewson. The place named appears to come through some digressions, for in the Charter of Ethelbert dated 862 the above place is spelled Lews'am, was spelt Leof-Su, which was from Leof-Suma, literally dear son.

No such right is recognized in America, where the symbolism of the Lewis is commonly unheeded, though it has been suggested, not without some probability, that the initiation of Washington when he was only twenty years and eight months old, may be explained by a reference to this supposed privilege of the Lewis.

We may add to Brother Hawkins’s remarks another interesting note. Volume xi, eighth series, Notes and Queries, refers to the derivations of Lewisham by two interesting notes. phonetically as Lusam, and eventually it became through change of etymology Lewis. In Masonic language we have also another Lewis to account for; namely, the combination of pieces of metal which form a dovetail; now if the urchin who assisted his father was called Lewis, it is possible that this comparatively small piece of mechanism, in comparison to the weight it is capable of sustaining, as a saving of labor, may have in trade vocabulary been called a lewis—dear one.

LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION. Authorized by Congress on President Jefferson's initiative, 1803, to explore Northwestern United States to the headwaters of the Missouri River and thence to the Pacific Ocean. Explorers traveled some four thousand miles northwesterly, through various Indian tribes never before seen by white men, and were first to reach the Pacific, north of Mexico, making valuable researches. From St. Louis, May 14, 1804, to the return there, September 23, 1806, the journey was conceded to be unique in romantic interest and was celebrated by the Centennial Exposition at Portland, Oregon, 1905. Meriwether Lewis, born in Virginia, August 18, 1774, was, as reported to Past Grand Master Charles H. Callahan by Secretary E. E. Dinwiddie, a member of Widow's Son's Lodge No. 60 at Charlottesville in that State, became first Master of St. Louis Lodge No. 111, under Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, and died, October 11, 1809. Lieut. William Clark, an army comrade of Lewis, born August 1, 1770, was Initiated, Passed and Raised in St. Louis Lodge No. 111, as shown by his diploma given in Territorial Masonry, Brother Ray V. Denslow, 1925 (page 181). Brother Clark, Territorial Governor, Missouri, 1813–20, and then Superintendent, Indian Affairs, died September 1, 1838, and received Masonic burial.

LEWIS, DOCTOR PHIL. Initiated in Canongate Kilwinning Lodge, Edinburgh, Scotland, and Masonically active later in Austria and Hungary. Was a professor of modern languages at Pesth and in 1861, at Vienna, published a Geschichte der Freimaurerei in Oesterreich, or History of Austrian Freemasonry.

LEXINGTON, CONGRESS OF. This Congress was convoked in 1853, at Lexington, Kentucky, for the purpose of attempting to form a General Grand Lodge (see General Grand Lodge). A plan of constitution was proposed, but a sufficient number of Grand Lodges did not accede to the proposition to give it efficacy.

LIBANUS. The Latin name of Lebanon, which see.

LIBATION. Among the Greeks and Romans the libation was a religious ceremony, consisting of the pouring of wine or other liquid upon the ground, or, in a sacrifice, upon the head of the victim after it had been first tasted by the Priest and by those who stood next to him. The libations were usually of unmixed wine, but were sometimes of mingled wine and water. Libations are used in some of the chivalric and the advanced Degrees of Freemasonry.

LIBAVIUS, ANDREAS. A learned German physician, who was born at Halle, in Saxony, and died at Coburg, where he was Rector of the Gymnasium in 1616. He was a vehement opponent of Paracelsus and of the Rosicrucians. In 1613 he published at Frankfort his Syntagma selectorum alchimia arcanorum, a collection of the secrets of alchemy, in two folio volumes, and two years after, an Appendix, in which he attacks the Society of the Rosicrucians, and analyzes the Confessio of Valentine Andrea. De Quincey has used the works of Libavius in his article on Secret Societies (see Fame and Confession of the Fraternity of R. C. Commonly, of the Rosic Cross).

LIBER. Latin for free, Liberty, of which the Eagle, in the Rose Croix Degree, is symbolical. Liberty of thought, speech, and action, within the bounds of civil, political, and conscientious law, without license. A book, and hence the word library, or collection of books. It was also one of the names of the God Bacchus. The freedom which knowledge confers. Liber, the bark, or inner rind of a tree, on which books were originally written; hence, leaves of a book and leaves of a tree; or, similarly in Latin, folio of a book, the foliage of a tree. Thus, the “tree of knowledge” becomes the “book of wisdom”; the “tree of life” becomes the “book of life” (see Lakaak Deror Pessah and Libertas). The Bridge mentioned in the Sixteenth Degree, Scottitah Rite, has the initials of Liberty of Passage over its arches (see also Liberty of Passage).

LIBERAL ARTS AND SCIENCES. We are chiefly indebted to the scholastic philosophers of the Middle Ages for the nomenclature by which they distinguished the seven sciences then best known to them. With the metaphorical spirit of the age in which they lived, they called the two classes into which they divided them the trivium, or meeting of three roads, and the quadrivium, or meeting of four roads; calling grammar, logic, and rhetoric the trivium, and arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy the quadrivium. These they styled the Seven Liberal Arts and Sciences, to separate them from the mechanical arts which were practised by the handicraftsmen. The Liberal Man, Liberalis Homo, meant, in the Middle Ages, the man who was his own master—free, independent, and often a nobleman. Mosheim, speaking of the state of literature in the eleventh century, uses the following language:

The Seven Liberal Arts, as they were now styled, were taught in the greatest part of the schools that were erected in this century for the education of youth. The first stage of these sciences was grammar, which was followed successively by rhetoric and logic. When the disciple, having learned these branches, which were generally known by the name of trivium, extended his ambition further, and was desirous of new improvement in the sciences, he was conducted slowly through the quadrivium, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy, to the very summit of literary fame.

The Freemasons of the Middle Ages, always anxious to elevate their profession above the position of a mere operative art, readily assumed these liberal arts and sciences as a part of their course of knowledge, thus seeking to assimilate themselves rather to the scholars who were above them than to the workmen who were below them. Brother E. E. Cauthorne here informs us that the claim has been made that Charlemagne, in his castle at Aix-la-Chapelle, set apart a separate place where the Seven Liberal Arts and Sciences were taught.

Brother Mackey continues: Hence in all the Old Constitutions we find these liberal arts and sciences introduced at the beginning as forming an essential part of the Body of Freemasonry. Thus, in the Lansdowne Manuscript, whose date is about 1560, and it may be taken as a fair specimen of all the others, these sciences are thus referred to in lines 557-563:

Wee minde to shew you the charge that belongs to every trew Mason to keep, for in good and ffaith if you take good heed it is well worthy to be kept for A worthy Apprentice's Degree, that being the most important as the sixth.

And then the writer proceeds to define them in the order which they still retain. It is noteworthy, however, that that order must have been changed; for in what is probably the earliest of the manuscripts—the Regius Manuscript—geometry appears as the first, instead of the fifth of the sciences, and arithmetic as the sixth.

It is not therefore surprising that, on the Revival of Freemasonry in 1717, these seven liberal arts and sciences were made a part of the system of instruction. At first, of course, they were placed in the Entered Apprentice's Degree, that being the most important Degree of the period, and they were made to refer to the seven Freemasons who composed a Lodge. Afterwards, on the more methodical division of the Degrees, they were transferred to the Fellow Craft, because that was the Degree symbolic of science, and were made to refer to seven of the steps of the winding stairs, that being itself, when properly interpreted, a symbol of the progress of knowledge. And there they still remain (see Lectures, also Dew Drop Lecture and Middle Chamber Lecture).

The Seven Liberal Arts and Sciences are of direct importance to the Freemason. Their study is impressed upon him, and every reference that has come down to us from the past is cherished by the Brethren because of this heritage through the years. Rabanus Maurus, who is believed to have been born about 754 and to have died in 806 A.D., was a pupil of Alcuin at Tours, and afterwards became Scholasticus of the Monastery at Fulda in 818. He was Abbot there from 822 to 842, and in 847 was made Archbishop of Mainz. He was a devoted student of the Seven Liberal Arts and of Classical and Biblical literatures. His work treating upon the education of the clergy contains a most valuable reference to the liberal arts as they were esteemed in his day. This treatise of his was written in 819 and translated by F. V. N. Painter from the German text of Schultz, Gansen, and Keller, in his Great Pedagogical Essays, as published by the American Book Company of New York in 1905, and reproduced here by permission.

The first of the liberal arts is Grammar, the second Rhetoric, the third Dialectic, the fourth Arithmetic, the fifth Geometry, the sixth Music, and the seventh Astronomy.

Grammar. Grammar takes its name from the written character, as the derivation of the word indicates. The definition of grammar is this: Grammar is the science which teaches us to explain the poets and historians; it is the art which qualifies us to write and speak correctly. Grammar is the source and foundation of the liberal arts. It should be taught in every Christian school, since the art of writing and speaking correctly is attained through it. How could one understand the sense of the spoken word or the meaning of letters and syllables, if one had not learned this before from grammar? How could one know about metrical feet, accent, and verses, if grammar had not given one knowledge of them? How should one learn to know the articulation of discourse, the subtleties of language, to have a good formation, and the correct forms of words, if one had not familiarized himself with the art of grammar? All the forms of speech, of which secular science makes use in its writings, are founded upon grammar. It was introduced at the beginning as forming an essential part of the Body of Freemasonry, whose date is about 1560, and it may be taken as a fair specimen of all the others.

Dialectic. Dialectic is the science of the understanding, which fits us for investigations and definitions, for explanations, and for distinguishing the truly true from the false. It is the science of sciences. It teaches us how to think; how to present the truth briefly, clearly, and with the semblance of truth, and that, on the contrary, whoever thoroughly learns it and acquires the ability to proclaim God's word, performs a true work. Through rhetoric anything is proved true or false. Who would have the courage to maintain that the defenders of truth should stand in the presence of falsehood, so that those, who dare to represent false, should know how by their discourse to win the favor and sympathy of the hearers, and that, on the other hand, the friends of truth should not be able to do this; that those should know how to present the truth briefly, clearly, and with the semblance of truth, and that the latter, on the contrary, should clothe the truth in such exposition, that listening would become a burden, apprehension of the truth a weariness, and faith in the truth an impossibility?

Rhetoric. Rhetoric is the art of using secular discourse effectively in the circumstances of daily life. From this definition rhetoric seems indeed to have reference merely to secular wisdom. Yet it is not foreign to ecclesiastical instruction. Whatever the Church has taught in its writings, are found repeatedly employed in the Holy Scriptures. Hence this art, though it may be secular, has nothing unworthy in itself; it should rather be learned as thoroughly as possible.

The Seven Liberal Arts and Sciences are of direct importance to the Freemason. Their study is pressed upon him, and every reference that has come down to us from the past is cherished by the Brethren because of this heritage through the years. Rabanus Maurus, who is believed to have been born about 754 and to have died in 806 A.D., was a pupil of Alcuin at Tours, and afterwards became Scholasticus of the Monastery at Fulda in 818. excellent art and constantly reflect upon its laws, in order that they may be able keenly to pierce the craftiness of errorists, and to refute their fatal fallacies.

Arithmetic. Arithmetic is the science of pure extension determinable by numbers; it is the science of numbers. We determine the details of a similar magnitude, as defined by geometry, to the first place, because it does not presuppose any of the other departments. Music, geometry, and astronomy, on the contrary, need the help of arithmetic; while arithmetic is independent of it. And penetrating magnitude is extensively developed from these germatae the other sciences. The holy fathers were right in advising those eager for knowledge to cultivate arithmetic, because in large measure it turns the mind from fleshly desires, and furthermore awakens the wish to comprehend what with God's help we can merely receive with the heart. Therefore the significance of number is not to be underestimated. Its very great value for an interpretation of many passages of Holy Scripture is manifest to all who exhibit zeal in their investigations. Not without good reason is it said in praise of God, "Thou hast ordained all things by measure, number, and weight" (Book of Wisdom XI, 21). But every number, through its peculiar qualities, is so definite that none of the others can be like it. They are all unequal and different. The single numbers are different; the single number, through its each number, is so that the knowledge of God. He teaches that God, the Almighty Creator, this assumption may perhaps come near the truth. If this statement seems precise what they themselves draw in the sands of the earth. When this in a proper manner is transferred to the rhythm of music united with the excellence of harmony; for music is the science which teaches us agreeably to change tones in duration and pitch. When we employ ourselves with good pursuits in life, we show ourselves thereby disciples of this art; so long as we do what is wrong, we do not feel ourselves drawn to music. Even heaven and earth, as everything that happens here through the arrangement of the Most High, is nothing but a music, nothing but an art which is created by music and can be ruled by it. Even with the Christian religion music is most intimately united; thus it is possible that to him, who does not know even a little music, mankind cannot come near the mind, then it fills us, as the ancients said, with great love for it. For what will it not signify, that we soar in spirit to the sky, that with penetration of mind we analyze that sublime structure, that we, in part at least, with the keenness of our logical faculties what mighty space has enveloped in mystery! The world itself, according to the assumption of some, is said to have the shape of a sphere, in order that in its circumference it may be able to contain the different forms of things. Thus, Seneca, in agreement with the philosophers of ancient times, composed a work under the title, The Shape of the Earth. As an explanation of number, it speaks, teaches the laws of the stellar world. The stars can trace their place or carry out their motion only in the manner established by the Creator, unless by the will of the Creator a miraculous change takes place. Thus we read that in the days of King Josiah the sun went backward ten degrees, and that at the death of the Lord the sun was darkened for three hours. We call such occurrences miracles, because they contradict the usual course of things, and therefore excite wonder. That part of astronomy, which is built up on the investigation of natural phenomena in order to determine the course of the sun, moon, and stars, and to effect a proper reckoning of time, the Christian clergy should seek to learn with the utmost diligence, in order through the knowledge of laws brought to light and through the valid and convincing proof of the given phenomena to place themselves in a position, not only to determine the course of past years according to truth and reality, but also for further times to draw confident conclusions, and to fix the time of Easter and all other festivals and Holy days and to announce to the congregation the proper celebration of them.

The seven liberal arts of the philosophers, which Christians should learn, are Arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy, Arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy. What does it mean when you say: "According to harmonious moderation?"

That is to say, as correct and elevated sounds when harmoniously united make perfect music, so discordant elements appropriate to concord make a perfect world. Wonderful! Tell how can discords be brought into harmony or how concord discord.

Because you bring together out of similar things that which, it seems, unite in proper proportions and of which the nature and substance have been separated.

What is music? Music is the science of sound as correct and elevated sounds when harmoniously united make perfect music, so discordant elements appropriate to concord make a perfect world.

A study, one of the philosophy in the Quadrivium. What is it that you call Quadrivium? Arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy.
An early reference to the several liberal arts is by Maximus Tyrius whose name, the Great Tyrian, has an additional interest because of its allusion to the Phenician city famous among Freemasons for skilled Craftsmen and navigators. This philosophical writer lived in the latter half of the second century and in his Dissertation, xxi, translated by Thomas Taylor, we find the following:

Come, then, let philosophy approach after the manner of a lawyer, adorning the disorderly and wandering soul as if it were the people in a city. Let her also call as her condutors other arts; not such as are sordid, by Jupiter! nor such as require manual operation, nor such as contribute to procure us things little and vile; but let one of these be that art which prepares the body to be subservient, as a prompt and robust vehicle, to the mandates of the soul, and which is denominated gymnastic. Let another art be that which is the angel of the conceptions of the soul, and which is called rhetoric; another, that which is the nurse and tutor of the juvenile mind, and which is denominated poetry; another that which is the leader of the nature of numbers, and which is called arithmetic; and another that which is the teacher of computation, and is called logistic. Let geometry, also, and music follow, who are the associates of philosophy and conscious of her arcana, and to each of which she distributes a portion of her labor.

LIBERIA. Oriental Lodge at Monrovia, founded early in the nineteenth century, with two others, Saint Paul's and Saint John's, formed a Grand Lodge of Liberia in 1807. This Body has its own Temple and has been recognized by many of the Grand Lodges of the world. Liberia is a negro republic on the west coast of Africa, founded in 1820 by freed slaves under the American Colonization Society and recognized as an independent State in 1847.

LIBERTAS. Latin word, meaning Liberty. A significant word in the Red Cross Degree. It refers to the “Liberty of Passage” gained by the returning Jews over their opponents at the river Euphrates, as described in the Scottish Rite Degree of Knight of the East, where the old French instructions have “Liberté du Passer” (see Liberty).

LIBERTE, ORDRE DE LA. French name for Order of Liberty. A French androgyn, both sexes, Order existing in Paris in 1740, and the precursor of La Maçonnerie d’Adoption (Thory, Acta Latomorum i, page 320).

LIBERTINE. The Charges of 1722 commence by saying that “a Mason is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law; and if he rightly understands the art, he will never be a stupid Atheist, nor an irreligious libertine” (Constitutions, 1723, page 50). The word libertine there used conveyed a meaning different from that which it now bears. In the present usage of language it signifies a profligate and licentious person, but originally it meant a Freethinker, or Deist. Derived from the Latin libertinus, a man that was once a bondsman but who has been made free, it was metaphorically used to designate one who had been released, or who had released himself from the bonds of religious belief, and become in matters of faith a doubter or a denier.

Here “a stupid Atheist” denoted, to use the language of the Psalmist, “the fool who has said in his heart there is no God,” while an “irreligious libertine” designated the man who, with a degree less of unbelief, denies the distinctive doctrines of revealed religion. And this meaning of the expression connects itself very appropriately with the succeeding paragraph of the Charge. “But though in ancient times, Masons were charged in every country to be of the religion of that country or nation, whatever it was, yet ‘tis now thought more expedient only to oblige them to that religion in which all men agree, leaving their particular opinions to themselves.”

The expression “irreligious libertine,” alluding, as it does, to a scoffer at religious truths, is eminently suggestive of the religious character of our Institution, which, founded as it is on the great doctrines of religion, cannot be properly appreciated by anyone who doubts or denies their truth.

“A Libertine in earlier use, was a speculative free-thinker in matters of religion and in the theory of morals. But as by a process which is seldom missed free-thinking does and will end in free-acting, so a Libertine came in two or three generations to signify a profligate,” one morally bankrupt (On the Study of Words, Trench, lecture iii, page 90).

LIBERTY, EQUALITY, FRATERNITY. The motto of the French Freemasons.

LIBERTY OF PASSAGE. A significant phrase in the advanced Degrees (see Libertas). The French rituals designate it by the letters L·D·P· as the initials of Liberte de Passer, or Liberty of Passage. But Brother Pike proposes to interpret these letters as Liberte de Penser, Liberty of Thought; the prerogative of a Freeman and a Freemason.

LIBRARY. It is the duty as well as the interest of Lodges to facilitate the efforts of the members in the acquisition of Masonic knowledge, and no method is more appropriate than the formation of Masonic Libraries. The establishment of a Grand Lodge Library is of course not objectionable, but it is in Doctor Mackey’s opinion of far less value and importance than a Lodge Library. The original outlay of a few dollars in the beginning for its establishment, and of a few more annually for its maintenance and increase, would secure to every Lodge in the land a rich treasury of Masonic reading for the information and improvement of its members. The very fact that Masonic books were within their reach, showing themselves on the well-filled shelves at every meeting, and ready at their hands for the mere asking or the trouble of taking them down, would induce many Brethren to read who never yet have read a page or even a line upon the subject of Masonic history and science.

Considering the immense number of books that have been published on the subject of Speculative Freemasonry, many of which would be rendered accessible to every one by the establishment of Lodge Libraries, the Freemason who would then be ignorant of the true genius of his art would be worthy of all shame and reproach. As thoughtful municipalities place public fountains in their parks and at the corners of streets, that the famished wayfarer may allay his thirst and receive physical refreshment, so should Masonic Lodges place such intellectual fountains in reach of their members, that they might enjoy mental refreshment. Such fountains are libraries; and the Lodge which spends fifty dollars, more or less, upon a banquet, and yet does without a Library, commits a grave Masonic offense; for it refuses, or at least neglects, to diffuse that light among its children which its obligation requires it to do.
Of two Lodges—the one without and the other with a Library—the difference is this, that the one will have more ignorance in it than the other. If a Lodge takes delight in an ignorant membership, let it forego a Library. If it thinks there is honor and reputation and pleasure in having its members well informed, it will give them means of instruction. But let us not mistake the collecting of books for the study of them. Book buying and book reading are not necessarily the same. Many a book of knowledge goes unread by the owners and many a Library is an unworked mine of information. In fact, cases have been known where a Library within reach at the Lodge has been urged as a sufficient excuse for members to possess no books of their own and further inquiry soon determined that the Library was rarely used. A Library is never intended as an idle possession. The Library of many volumes always has the problem before it to get its treasures known and used. Our leading libraries are doing this by circulation of works by mail and providing systematic courses of instruction for classes in profitable Masonic reading. But the Brother who has some reliable, thorough books of his own for reference can take these from the shelves at pleasure, dip deeply or moderately as opportunity may serve, and browse happily and profitably with the Masonic authorities, settling for himself those queries and problems that his own experience or the questions of his Brethren suggest for investigation. In this way the Library of the individual Brother is a splendid possession fortified and supplemented by the larger institutions appealing to the bibliophile and student with their great collections of books. within itself a far more abstruse allusion to the very essence of Speculative Freemasonry, and embraces within its capacious signification all the other symbols of the Order. Freemasons are emphatically called the Sons of Light, because they are, or at least are entitled to be, in possession of the true meaning of the symbol; while the profane or uninitiated who have not received this knowledge are, by a parity of expression, said to be in darkness.

The connection of material light with this emblematic and mental illumination, was prominently exhibited in all the ancient systems of religion and esoteric mysteries. Among the Egyptians, the hare was the hieroglyphic of eyes that are open, because that animal was supposed to have his eyes always open. The priests afterward adopted the hare as the symbol of the moral illumination revealed to the neophytes in the contemplation of the Divine Truth, and hence, according to Champollion, it was also the symbol of Osiris, their principal divinity, and the chief object of their mystic rites—thus showing the intimate connection that they maintained in their symbolic language between the process of initiation and the contemplation of divinity. On this subject a remarkable coincidence has been pointed out by Baron Portal (Les Symboles des Egyptiens, 69) in the Hebrew language. There the word for hare is arnebet, which seems to be compounded of awr, light, and nabat, to see; so that the word which among the Egyptians was used to designate an initiation, among the Hebrews meant to see the light.

If we proceed to an examination of the other systems of religion which were practised by the nations of antiquity, we shall find that light always constituted a principal object of adoration, as the primordial source of knowledge and goodness, and that darkness was with them synonymous with ignorance and evil. Doctor Beard (Encyclopedia of Biblical Literature), attributes this view of the Divine origin of light among the Eastern nations, to the fact that:

Light in the East has a clearness and brilliancy, is accompanied by an intensity of heat, and is followed in its influence by a largeness of good, of which the inhabitants of less genial climates have no conception. Its influence by a largeness of good, of which the in¬

LIRE.

The first stone in the third row of the High Priest's breastplate. Commentators have been divided in opinion as to the nature of this stone; but in the time of Doctor Mackey was supposed by the best authorities to have been the rubellite, which is a red variety of the tourmaline. Leshem, the Hebrew word, referring to Lire, has had many explanations as to the meaning and derivation, the latter being usually traced to the Greek Lymbourion, meaning a gem. Some connect the word with amber from its source, by the Greeks, Liguria, in northern Italy. Petrie identifies Lire with yellow agate, others with jacinth, etc., usually with some yellow gem. The figure in the Breastplate was referred to the Tribe of Dan.

LILIS or LILITH. In the popular belief of the Hebrews, a female specter, in elegant attire, who secretly destroys children. The fabled wife of Adam, before he married Eve, by whom he began devils.

LILY. The plant so frequently mentioned in the Old Testament under the name of lily, as an emblem of purity and peace, was the lotus lily of Egypt and India. It occupies a conspicuous place among the ornaments of the Temple furniture. The brim of the molten sea was wrought with flowers of the lotus; and the tops of the pillars themselves, were adorned with the same plant. Sir Robert Ker Porter, describing a piece of sculpture which he found at Persepolis, says:

Almost every one in this procession holds in his hand a figure like the loto. This flower was full of meaning among the ancients, and occurs all over the East. Egypt, Persia, Palestine, and India present it everywhere over their architecture, in the hands and on the heads of their sculptured figures, whether in statue or in bas-relief. We also find it in the sacred vestments and architecture of the tabernacle and Temple of the Israelites. The lily which is mentioned by our Savior, as an image of peculiar beauty and glory, when comparing the works of nature with the decorations of art, was a different flower; probably a species of Lilium. This is also represented in all pictures of the salutation of Gabriel to the Virgin Mary; and, in fact, has been held in mysterious veneration by people of all nations and times. "It is the symbol of divinity, of purity, and abundance, and of a lovemore complete in perfection, charity, and beneficence; as in Holy Scripture, that mirror of purity, Susannah is defined Susa, which signified the lily flower, the chief city of the Persians, bearing that name for excellency. Hence, the lily's three leaves in the arms of France meameth Piety, Justice, and Charity." So far, the general impression of a peculiar regard to this beautiful and fragrant flower; but the early Persians attached to it a peculiar sanctity.

We must not, however, forget the difference between the loto of the Old Testament and the lily of the New. The former is a Masonic plant; the latter is scarcely referred to. Nevertheless, through the ignorance of the early translators as to sacred plants, the lotus is constantly used for the lily; and hence the same error has crept into the Masonic instructions (see Lotus).

LILY-OF-THE-VALLEY. A side Degree in the Templar system of France.

LILY WORK. The lily work which is described as a part of the ornamentation of the two pillars in the porch of Solomon's Temple is said to be, from the whiteness of the plant, symbolic of purity and peace. Properly, it is lotus work (see Lily, Lotus, and Pillars of the Porch).

LINDBERGH, CHARLES A., and other Pioneer Masonic Aviators. Famous air-mail pilot whose non-stop flight from the United States to France, May 20-1, 1927, followed a trip by air from San Diego, California, to St. Louis, Missouri, thence to the Atlantic seaboard, and these excursions were continued with journeys to the countries southward in the Western Hemisphere, returning to his home city of St. Louis by way of Havana, Cuba, all daring exploits modestly done. Born on February 4, 1902, Colonel Lindbergh was initiated in Keystone Lodge No. 243, St. Louis, on July 9, 1926; Passed, October 20, and Raised, December 15, and became a member of St. Louis Chapter No. 22. Other notable air-men of the period included Commander Richard E. Byrd, who also made, on June 29-July 1, 1927, a non-stop trip to France, and had similarly journeyed to the North Pole, May 9, 1926, was Raised, March 9, 1921, in Federal Lodge No. 1 at Washington, District of Columbia; Lieutenants Albert F. Hegenberger and Lester J. Maitland, the first to make a successful flight by air to the United States, were both Freemasons, Brother Hegenberger a member of Stillwater Lodge No. 616, Dayton, Ohio, Brother Maitland a member of Kenwood Lodge No. 303, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Raised July 19, 1921; Edward S. Evans, Master in 1927 of Palestine Lodge No. 357, Detroit, Michigan, circled the globe in 28 days, 14 hours, and 36 minutes, spending 16 days on ocean, 5 on trains, 8 on planes; traveling 8,000 miles by boat, 4,000 by train, the remainder by plane—about 18,700 miles in all. A courageous attempt to break this record by use of the sole plane only was made by another Palatiner, Brother Edward F. Schlee, who traveled eastward from Detroit as far as Japan when the trip was abandoned. Clarence D. Chamberlain and Charles A. Levine, the latter a member of Fortitude Lodge No. 19, Brooklyn, New York, made the journey in a plane from New York to Germany, June 4-6, 1927. Major Frederick L. Martin, United States Army, commanded the first world flight in 1924; he, a member since 1919 of Myron M. Parker Lodge No. 27, Washington, District of Columbia, and Lieutenant Leslie P. Arnold, another world flier, and Major Herbert A. Darque, appointed commander air expedition to circle South American continent, 1926, are Freemasons. Paul Redfern, lost on a monoplane 4,600-mile trip, Georgia to Rio de Janeiro, leaving August 25, petitioned Richland Lodge No. 39, Columbia, South Carolina, August 8, 1927, and at request of Richland Lodge was initiated by Atlantic Lodge No. 82, Brunswick, Georgia. Lieutenant Bernt Balchin, mechanic of Commander Byrd's airplane flight to France, since initiated in Norsemen Lodge No. 878, Brooklyn, New York (see Grand Lodge Bulletin, Iowa, September, 1927; American Tyler Keystone, November, 1927; Masonic Outlook, August, 1927).

LION OF THE TRIBE OF JUDAH. The expression is bor¬ rowed from the Apocalypse (v, 5): "Behold, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath pre¬ vailed to open the Book, and to loose the Seven Seals thereof."

The lion was also a Medieval symbol of the resur¬ rection, the idea being founded on a legend. The poets of that age were fond of referring to this legen¬ dary symbol in connection with the Scriptural idea of the Tribe of Judah. Thus Adam de Saint Victor, in his poem De Resurrectione Domini, says:

At the loud-sounding voice of the Father.

The Lion was the symbol of strength and sover¬ eignty, in the human-headed figures of the Nimrod Gateway, and in other Babylonish remains. In Egypt, it was worshiped at the City of Leontopolis as typical of Dom, the Egyptian Hereules. Plutarch says that the Egyptians ornamented their Temples with gaping lions' mouths, because the Nile began to rise when the sun was in the Constellation Leo. Among the Tal¬ mudists there was a tradition of the lion, which has been introduced into the higher Degrees of Free¬ masonry.

But in the symbolism of Ancient Craft Masonry, where the lion is introduced, as in the Third Degree, in connection with the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, he becomes simply a symbol of the resurrection; thus restoring the symbology of the Medieval Ages, which was founded on a legend that the lion's whelp was born dead, and only brought to life by the roaring of its sire. Philip de Thaun, in his Bestiary, written in the twelfth century, gives the legend, which has thus been translated by Wright from the original old Norman French: "Know that the lioness, if she bring forth a dead cub, she holds her cub and the lion arrives; he goes about and cries, till it revives on the third day. . . . Know that the lioness signifies Saint Mary, and the lion Christ, who gave Himself to death for the people; three days He lay in the earth to gain our souls. . . . By the cry of the lion they understand the power of God, by which Christ was restored to life and robbed hell."

The phrase, "Lion of the Tribe of Judah," therefore, when used in the Masonic instructions, referred in its original interpretation to Christ, Him who "brought life and immortality to light."

LION'S PAW. A mode of recognition so called because of the rude resemblance made by the hand and fingers to a lion's paw. It refers to the Lion of the Tribe of Judah. This expression is found in Revela¬ tions v, 5. The "paw of the lion" is mentioned in First Samuel xvii, 37.

LION'S PAW CLUB. Brother William G. Sibley a newspaper editor in Gallipolis, Ohio, and an active member of the Masonic Bodies there, as well as of Cincinnati Consistory, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, was frequently invited to address Masonic audiences and prepared an essay for that purpose which soon ran far beyond the limits of a talk for such occasions and, meeting the favor of the local Brethren, a group of a few members of the Fraternity arranged in 1904 for the publication of the work, Story of Free¬ masonry, the brethren using the name Lion's Paw Club as that of the original publisher. The book is published now by The Masonic History Company.

The use of a distinctive livery for members of the Gilds is seen in the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, Pilgrims, about 1350, where the poet, Chaucer, says:

Tapiser, in the above, has reference to the trade of Broderer, a member of the Gild of that name; the embroiderers being so chartered in 1561.

LODGE. There are three definitions which, in the technical language of Freemasonry, apply to the word Lodge.

1. It is a place in which Freemasons meet. In this sense the word more generally used is Lodge-room, which see.

2. It is the assembly or organized Body of Freemasons duly congregated for labor or for business. These two distinctions are precisely the same as those to be found in the word Church, which is expressive both of the building in which a congregation meets to worship and the congregation of worshipers themselves. This second definition is what distinguishes a meeting of Symbolic Freemasons, who constitute a Lodge, from one of Royal Arch Masons, whose meeting would be called a Chapter, or of Cryptic Masons, whose assembly would be a Council.

The word appears in French as loge; German, loge; Spanish, logía; Portuguese, loja; and Italian, loggia. This is irrefragable evidence that the word was, with the Institution, derived by the Continent of Europe from England. The derivation of the word is, I think, says Doctor Mackey, plain. Ragon says that it comes from the Sanskrit loga, signifying the world. There would, at first sight, seem to be a connection between this etymology and the symbolic meaning of a Lodge, which represents the world; but yet it is evidently far-fetched, since we have a much simpler root immediately at hand. Hope says, speaking of the Freemasons of the Middle Ages, and Wren had previously said the same thing, that wherever they were engaged to work, they “set themselves to building temporary huts, for their habitation, around the spot where the work was to be carried on.” These huts the German Freemasons called hutten; the English, lodges, which is from the Anglo-Saxon, logian, to dwell. Lodge, therefore, meant the dwelling-place or lodging of the Freemasons; and this is undoubtedly the origin of the modern use of the word.
To corroborate this, we find Du Cange (Glossarium) defining the Medieval Latin, logia or logium, as "a house or habitation." He refers to the Italian, loggia, and quotes Lambertus Ardenas as saying that "logia is a place next to the house, where persons were accustomed to hold pleasant conversation." Hence Lambertus thinks that it comes from the Greek, logos, a discourse. Du Cange asserts that there is no doubt that in the Middle Ages logia or logium was commonly used for an apartment or dwelling connected with the main building. Thus, the smallest apartments occupied by the Cardinals when meeting in Conclave were called logiae or Lodges. All of which sustains the idea that the Lodges of the old Operative Masons were small dwellings attached, or at least contiguous, to the main edifice on which they were at work.

In the Old Charges, the word is not generally met. The meeting of the Craft is there usually called the Assembly. But there are instances of its employment in those documents. The Regius Manuscript of 1390 forbids the apprenticing of a bondman because he might be fetched out of the Lodge, or logge, as line 133 of the famous poem spells it. Thus also in the Lodge of Antiquity Manuscript whose date is 1686, the word occurs several times. There is also abundant documentary evidence to show that the word Lodge was long before the eighteenth century, applied to their meeting by the Freemasons of England and Scotland. Before the restoration of the Grand Lodge of England in 1717, Brother Preston tells us that any number of Brethren might assemble at any place for the performance of work, and, when so assembled, were authorized to receive into the Order Brothers and Fellows, and to practise the Rites of Freemasonry. The ancient charges were the only standard for the regulation of their conduct. The Master of the Lodge was elected pro tempore, for the time being, and his authority terminated with the dissolution of the meeting over which he had presided, unless the Lodge was permanently established as a Lodge, and as one of the constituents of the Grand Lodge.

The power of granting Warrants of Constitution is vested in the Grand Lodges of Scotland, Ireland, Germany, and France, as it is in America; but in England the rule is different, and there the prerogative is vested in the Grand Master. A Lodge thus constituted consists, in the American system, of the following officers: Worshipful Master, Senior and Junior Wardens, Treasurer, Secretary, Senior and Junior Deacons, two or more Stewards, and a Tiler. Under the English Constitution the officers are, in addition to these, a Director of Ceremonies, a Chaplain, an Inner Guard, an Organist, and an Almoner.

In a Lodge of the French Rite, the officers are still more numerous. They are Le Venerable or Worshipful Master, Premier and Second Surveillants or Senior and Junior Wardens, Orator, Treasurer, Secretary, Hospitator or Collector of Alms, the Expert, combining the duties of the Senior Deacon and an Examining Committee, Master of Ceremonies, Architect, who attends to the decoration of the Lodge, and superintends the financial department, Archivist or Librarian, Keeper of the Seal, Master of the Banquets or Steward, and Guardian of the Temple or Tiler.

The officers in a Lodge of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite are a Master, two Wardens, Orator, Treasurer, Secretary, Almoner, Expert, Assistant Expert, Master of Ceremonies, Almoner, Steward, Tiler, and sometimes a few others as Pursuivant, and Keeper of the Seals.

In other Rites and countries the officers vary to a slight extent, but everywhere there are four officers who always are found, and who may therefore be considered as indispensable, namely, the Master, two Wardens, and Tiler. A Lodge thus constituted is a Lodge of Master Masons. Strictly and legally speaking, such a Body as a Lodge of Entered Apprentices or of Fellow Crafts is not known under the present Masonic system. No Warrant is ever granted for an Apprentices' or Fellow Crafts' Lodge, and without a Warrant a Lodge cannot exist. The Warrant granted is always for a Master's Lodge, and the members composing it are all Master Masons. The Lodges mentioned by Wren and Hope, to which allusion has been made, and which were congregated, in the Middle Ages, around the edifices which the Freemasons were constructing, were properly Fellow Crafts Lodge, because all the members were Fellow Crafts; even the toast, and sentiment went merrily round, and it was not until the Brethren were tolerably satiated, that the Lodge was resumed, and the routine business transacted before closing.

The mode of bringing a Lodge into existence under the present system in the United States of America is as follows: Seven Master Masons, being desirous of establishing a Lodge, apply by petition to the Grand Master, who will, if he thinks proper, issue his Dispensation authorizing them to congregate as Freemasons in a Lodge, and therein to confer the three Degrees of Ancient Craft Masonry. This instrument is of force during the pleasure of the Grand Master. At the next meeting of the Grand Lodge it expires, and is surrendered to the Grand Lodge, which, if there be no objection, will issue a Charter, technically called a Warrant of Constitution, whereby the Body is permanently established as a Lodge, and as one of the constituents of the Grand Lodge.
Master being merely a gradation of rank, not a degree of knowledge. So at the Revival of Freemasonry in 1717, the Lodges were Entered Apprentices Lodges, because in them nothing but the First Degree was conferred, and nearly all the members were Entered Apprentices. But when the Grand Lodge, where only at first the Fellow Craft and Master's Degree were conferred, permitted themselves to be conferred in the subordinate Lodges, then the Degree of Master Mason was sought for by all the Craft, and became the object of every Freemason's ambition. From that time the Craft became Master Freemasons, and the First and Second Degrees were considered only as preliminary steps. So it has remained to this day; and all modern Lodges, wherever Freemasonry has extended, are Masters' Lodges, and nothing less.

Sometimes Secretaries will record in their Minutes that "the Lodge of Master Masons was closed and a Lodge of Entered Apprentices was opened." Neither written nor unwritten law sanctions any such phraseology. If the Lodge of Master Masons is closed, there is an end of the Masonic Congregation. Where is the Warrant under which a Lodge of Entered Apprentices is opened, and how can a Lodge, in which there is not, probably, a single Apprentice, but where all the officers and all the members are Master Masons, be called a Lodge of Apprentices? The instruction has wisely provided for the avoidance of such an anomaly, and, seeing that the Warrant provides that the Lodge of Master Masons is empowered to make Apprentices and Fellow Crafts, it says, "the Lodge was opened on the First Degree." That is to say, the Lodge of Masters still retaining its character as a Master's Lodge, without which it would lose its legality, and not venturing to open a kind of Lodge for which its members had no Warrant nor authority, simply placed itself on the points of a Degree in which it was about to give instruction.

Some of the instructions speak, it is true, of Lodges composed in ancient times of Masters and Fellow Crafts or Masters and Apprentices; and the Webb Lectures tell us that at the Temple of Solomon the Lodges of Entered Apprentices consisted of one Master and six Apprentices, and the Lodges of Fellow Crafts of two Masters and three Fellow-Crafts. But all this is purely symbolic, and has no real existence in the practical working of the Order. No one in these days has seen a Lodge of one Master Mason and six Apprentices. The Freemasons working in the First Degree are as much Master Masons as the same Freemasons when they are working in the Third. The Lodge legally is the same, though it may vary the subjects of its instruction so as to have them in the First, Second, or Third Degree.

So important a feature in Freemasonry as a Lodge, the congregations of Freemasons for work or worship, cannot be without its appropriate symbolism. Hence a Lodge, when duly opened becomes a symbol of the world. Its covering is like the world's, a sky or Clouded Canopy, to reach which, as the abode of those who do the will of the Grand Architect, it is furnished with the theological ladder, which reaches from earth to heaven; and it is illuminated as is the world, by the refugent rays of the sun, symbolically represented in his rising in the East, his meridian height in the South, and his setting in the West; and lastly, its very form, a long quadrangle or oblong square, is in reference to the early tradition that such was the shape of the inhabited world.

The Lodge, technically speaking, is a piece of furniture made in imitation of the Ark of the Covenant, which was constructed by Bezaleel (Exodus xxxvii, 1), according to the form prescribed by God Himself, and which, after the erection of the Temple, was kept in the Holy of Holies. As that contained the Tables of the Laws, the Lodge contains the Book of Constitutions and the Warrant of Constitution granted by the Grand Lodge. It is used only in certain ceremonies, such as the Constitution and Consecration of new Lodges, but its use is obsolete in England.

We may here add to Doctor Mackey's comments, that the old ceremonies recorded by Brother Preston mention the Lodge as a piece of furniture. For example, in the Appendix, Illustrations of Masonry (first edition, 1772, pages 219, 220), Ceremony of Consecration, we read:

The Grand Master, attended by his Officers, and some dignified Clergyman, form themselves in order about a Lodge in the Temple, and, after the necessary preparations are made, the preparatory prayer is rehearsed, all devoutly kneeling; and the response is made, Glory to God on High. Incense is scattered over the lodge and the grand honors of Masonry are given.

These two references to the Lodge as a piece of furniture are supplemented by a similar but more extended account in later instances, as in Brother Preston's Illustrations of Masonry (twelfth edition, 1812, page 70), where the first reference to the Lodge reads:

The Lodge being covered with white satin, the ceremony of Consecration commences. All devoutly kneel, and the preparatory prayer is rehearsed. The chaplain or orator produces his authority, the Constitution Roll, and being properly assisted, proceeds to consecrate. Solemn music strikes up, and the necessary preparations are made. The consecration prayer is rehearsed, all devoutly kneeling; and the response is made, Glory to God on High. Incense is scattered over the lodge and the grand honors of Masonry are given.

The reader will note the distinction made in the above ceremony between the Lodge being an organized Masonic Body of authorized Brethren consecrated around a Lodge, this latter being a part of the furniture required for that ceremonial.

On page 95 of the above work (edition of 1812), we find that at the Dedication of Masons Halls the procession includes "Four Tylers carrying the Lodge covered with white satin, its centre, as before, accompanied with the honours. An anthem is then sung, and the Brethren of the new Lodge having advanced according to rank, and offered homage to the Grand Master, the ceremony of consecration ends.

The reader will note the distinction made in the above ceremony between the Lodge being an organized Masonic Body of authorized Brethren consecrated around a Lodge, this latter being a part of the furniture required for that ceremonial.
but here the reference is assuredly to the whole assembly. Then "the Lodge being uncovered" we have a procession around. Later comes the Chaplain who "strews corn over the Lodge." Subsequently wine is sprinkled on it, and oil, and finally "the Lodge being covered, the Grand Master retires to his chair, and the business of Masonry is adjourned."

Page 289 records a similar procession at the consecration of a Lodge at Madras in 1787, "The Lodge, covered with white satin, carried by four Tylers."

Thus we have the Lodge as an Ark, and Brother Woodford suggests that it is not the Ark of the Covenant but the Ark of Noah. However, it is the designated place and may be of various forms provided the requisite associations are preserved. Brother Mackenzie defines it as "a piece of furniture containing the Archives and important documents connected with the ceremonies of Masonry, and is only used on grand occasions." But other forms are favored, as for instance the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania provides in Constituting a Lodge that in the preparations "The Lodge or floor cloth is to be placed near the center of the Lodge room, with the three vessels thereon, containing the elements of consecration, Corn, Wine, and Oil, and is to be covered." A like arrangement is seen for the Dedication of a Masonic Hall in that Jurisdiction (see pages 93 and 121, Ahiman Rezon, Pennsylvania, 5915).

The distinction between a church as a building and as a congregation is a case in point. The Bible speaks of "the church that is in their house" (Romans xvi, 5), and the Masonic Ark or the Floor Cloth is the place of consecration, a lodging place around which the Brethren form into a Lodge of Freemasons.

For the Masonic Festival of June 24, 1926, Brother J. C. Stewart, Poet-Laureate of Lodge Canongate Kilwinning, No. 2, Edinburgh, Scotland, wrote a fine tribute to the permanency of the Lodge:

THE LODGE LIVES ON (Stat Fortuna Domus)
Our generations fleet and pass:
Earth's strongest scion bows the head
And withers, like to summer grass,
And joins the innumerable dead:
But when the sons of Time are gone,
The Lodge lives on, the Lodge lives on!
Time's ravages doth Time repair,
Time's deepest wounds are healed of Time:
The Master passes from the Chair,
The Warden to the Chair doth climb:
Master and Warden soon are gone,
The Lodge lives on, the Lodge lives on!
The bard who sang in other days,
And woke a nation's heart to fire,
Is dead, and wears immortal bays;
And feeble hands must strike his lyre:
The voice of Robert Burns is gone,
The Lodge lives on, the Lodge lives on!
No Temple is so stoutly barred
But it can entered be by Death:
Keep he the closest watch and ward
The trustiest Tyler yields his breath: Outer and Inner Guard are gone,
The Lodge lives on, the Lodge lives on!
The torch of fight is handed down
The ages that so swiftly flee:
Out of our frailty comes renown
And life from our mortality:
The pomps of yesteryear are gone,
The Lodge lives on, the Lodge lives on.

As a matter of general interest regarding Lodge hours we find in the Fabric Rolls of York Minster, 1355, orders were issued for the guidance of the Operative Masons. In summer they were to begin work immediately after sunrise, until the ringing of the bell of the Virgin Mary; then to breakfast in the Fabric Lodge; then one of the Masters shall knock upon the door of the Lodge, and forthwith all are to return to work until noon. Between April and August, after dinner, they shall sleep in the Lodge; then work until the first bell for vespers; then sit to drink to the end of the third bell, and return to work so long as they can see by daylight. It was usual for this Church to find tunics, aprons, gloves and clogs—wooden-soled shoes—and to give occasional "drinks," and remuneration for extra work (see Fabric Rolls of York Minster, Surtees Society, volume 35, 1858; also Hole Craft and Fellowship of Masons, Edward Conder, Jr., page 38).

LODGE, LATIN. In the year 1785, the Grand Lodge of Scotland granted a Warrant for the establishment of Roman Eagle Lodge at Edinburgh; the whole of whose work was conducted in the Latin language. Of this Lodge, the celebrated and learned Dr. John Brown was the founder and Master. He had himself translated the ritual into the classical language of Rome, and the Minutes were written in Latin (see Lyon's History of the Lodge of Edinburgh, page 257). The Lodge is No. 160 on the Scotch Roll, but ceased to work in Latin in 1794.

An article in the Builder, September, 1926 (page 275), by Brother Robert I. Clegg, mentions a peculiar use of Latin in a Lodge. An extract was copied for him by Brother A. H. Mackey from the records of Lodge Saint David, No. 36, at Edinburgh, Scotland. The famous novelist, Sir Walter Scott, was a member of this Lodge. The item from the Minutes of an emergency meeting on September 13, 1783, is as follows:

The Lodge being convened on an Emergency and the Right Worshipful being in the Country, Brother W. Ferguson took the chair and represented, That Fabian Gordon, Esqr., Colonel of Horse; Carrolus Gordon, Esqr., Major of Foot; Stefanus Dziembowskie, Esqr., Captain of Foot, all in his Polish Majesty's Service, and Joseph Bukaty, Esqr., Secretary to the Polish Embassy at London, had applied to him to be made Masons and Members of this Lodge, and as he is particularly acquainted with them all, he recommends to his Brethren to grant their request, which being unanimously agreed to, they were introduced in the order above mentioned, when the ceremony was performed by the Right Reverend Brother John Macclare, Grand Chaplain, and translated into Latin by Brother John Brown, M.D., as none of them understood English. The Brethren were entertained in the most elegant manner by vocal and instrumental music, particularly by the whole band of the 21st regiment, with French horns, cor-de-chasse trumpets, hautboys and bassoons.

At a later meeting, September 18, 1783, a Masters' Lodge was convened and the minutes read:

That the four Polish brethren had been extremely diligent in learning the apprentices' part, and as their time in this country was to be short, they were anxious to be promoted to the higher degrees, and for that purpose he had ordered this Masters' Lodge to be convened and hoped their request would be granted and their entries having proved tedious, first giving it in English and then translating it into Latin, so the most worshipful charles Wm. Little esq. substitute grand master of Scotland had voluntarily offered to assist brother John Brown, M.D., and brother Clark, of Saint Andrews Lodge, and accordingly the ceremony which took up above three hours was performed in very elegant Latin.

LODGE MASTER, ENGLISH. The French expression is maître de lodge anglais. A degree in the nomenclature of thorby, inserted on the authority of Lemanceau.

LODGE MASTER, FRENCH. In French the title is maître de lodge français. The twenty-sixth degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

LODGE, OCCASIONAL. See occasional lodge.

LODGE OF INSTRUCTION. These are assemblies of brethren congregated without a warrant of constitutions, under the direction of a lecturer or skilful brother, for the purpose of improvement in freemasonry, which is accomplished by the frequent rehearsal of the work and lectures of each degree.

The bodies should consist entirely of master masons; and though they possess no masonic power, it is evident to every freemason that they are extremely useful as schools of preparation for the duties that are afterward to be performed in the regular lodge. In England, these lodges of instruction are attached to regularly warranted lodges, or are specially licensed by the grand master. But they have an independent set of officers, who are elected at no stated periods—sometimes for a year, sometimes for six or three months, and sometimes changed at every night of meeting. They of course have no power of initiation, but simply meet for purposes of practice in the ritual. They are, however, bound to keep a record of their transactions, subject to the inspection of the superior powers.

LODGE OF SAINT JOHN. The Masonic tradition is that the primitive or mother lodge was held at Jerusalem, and dedicated to Saint John, first the baptist, then the evangelist, and finally to both. Hence this Lodge was called "the Lodge of the Holy Saint John of Jerusalem." From this Lodge all other lodges are supposed figurative to descend, and they therefore receive the same general name, accompanied by another local and distinctive one. In all Masonic documents the words run formerly as follows: "From the Lodge of the Holy Saint John of Jerusalem, under the distinctive appellation of Solomon's Lodge, No. 1," or whatever might be the local name. In this style foreign documents still run; and it is but a few years since it has been at all disused in the United States of America. Hence we say that every freemason hails from such a lodge, that is to say, from a just and legally constituted lodge. In the earliest catechisms of the eighteenth century we find this formula: "Q. what lodge are you of? A. the lodge of Saint John." And another question is, "how many angles in Saint John's Lodge?" In one of the ad-

AN ARRANGEMENT OF LODGE-ROOM IN THE UNITED STATES

Years since it has been at all disused in the United States of America. Hence we say that every freemason hails from such a lodge, that is to say, from a just and legally constituted lodge. be erected. No such regulation exists among the Fraternity of the United States of America or of Great Britain. Still, the usages of the Craft, and the objects of convenience in the administration of our Rites, require that certain general rules should be followed in the construction of a Lodge-room. These rules, as generally observed in the United States of America, are as follows:

A Lodge-room should always, if possible, be situated due East and West. This position is not absolutely necessary; and yet it is so far as to demand that some sacrifice should be made, if possible, to obtain so desirable a position. It should also be isolated, where it is practicable, from all surrounding buildings, and should always be placed in an upper story. No Lodge should ever be held on the ground floor. The form of a Lodge-room should be that of a parallelogram or Oblong Square, at least one-third larger from East to West than it is from North to South. The ceiling should be lofty, to give dignity to the appearance of the hall, as well as for the purposes of health, by compensating, in some degree, for the inconvenience of closed windows, which necessarily will deteriorate the quality of the air in a very short time in a low room. The approaches to the Lodge-room from without should be angular, for, as Brother Oliver says, “A straight entrance is unmasonic, and cannot be tolerated.”

There should be two entrances to the room, which should be situated in the West, and on each side of the Senior Warden's Station. The one on his right hand is for the introduction of visitors and members and leading from the Tiler’s room, is called the Tiler's, or the outer door; the other, on his left, leading from the preparation room, is known as the inner door, and sometimes called the northwest door. The situation of these two doors, as well as the rooms with which they are connected, and which are essentially necessary in a well-constructed Lodge-room, may be seen from the diagram, which also exhibits the seats of the officers and the arrangement of the Altar and Lights. We have already mentioned that the arrangement of the room as here described is a common one but is by no means universal. This should be kept in mind. For further observations, see Hall, Masonic.

Lodge, Sacred. See Sacred Lodge.

Lodge, Stewards’. See Stewards’ Lodge; also Grand Stewards’ Lodge.

Lodge, Symbol of the. The modern symbol or hieroglyphic of the word Lodge is a rectangle having unequal pairs of sides, the figure [ ], which undoubtedly refers to the form of the Lodge as an Oblong Square. But in the old rituals of the early part of the eighteenth century we find this symbol: The cross here, as Krause (Kunsturkunden i, page 37) suggests, refers to the “four angles” of the Lodge, as in the question: “How many angles in Saint John’s Lodge? A. Four, bordering on squares”; and the Delta, or equilateral triangle, is the Pythagorean symbol of Divine Providence watching over the Lodge. This symbol has long since become obsolete. Another suggestion comes from the Swastica or Fylfot, elsewhere discussed, and the symbol may then be seen as in the accompanying illustration.

LOGE. The French word for Lodge.

LOGE ANGLAISE. An English Lodge, No 204, organized in the south of France, 1730, and still active. Some merchant captains in the course of their trade put into Bordeaux and founded this Lodge, Sunday, April 27, 1732, under the Grand Lodge of England. In those days three Master Masons assembled for the express purpose could constitute a Lodge without Grand Lodge Warrant. The Minutes of the first meeting show Martin Kelly, Master, and Nicolas Staunton and Jonathan Robinson the Wardens. Two candidates were present, one being James Bradshaw. The Lodge met on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday of the same week and at the latter meeting Nicolas Staunton was elected Master. Brother Kelly had Initiated five and Raised four to the Third Degree. Brother Staunton was installed May 2 and by May 6 he Initiated two and Raised two others. On May 6 James Bradshaw was elected Master. During the first year seventeen members were enrolled, only one French. English was used in the Minutes the first eleven years. From September 8, 1743, onward, French became the language of the Lodge and, except for short periods during its first few years and fifteen months during the Reign of Terror, the Lodge has met regularly. With the approval of the Grand Lodge of England the early Lodge granted Constitutions to various Lodges in France and abroad. Of interest is a record in the Minutes of August 2, 1746, that admittance was refused three initiates on the ground that they were “players of instruments in the theatre.” February 11, 1749, they decided that “no Jew shall ever be admitted a member in this Lodge.” On March 25, 1781, Brother La Pauze, a Roman Catholic priest and Curé of the Parish of Saint Pierre, is recorded as Master of the Lodge. In April, 1766, the Lodge received a Warrant from the Grand Lodge of England specifically confirming the proceedings from the time of its inception in 1732. In 1768 the Grand Lodge of France issued an edict stating that all Lodges in France not accepting its Jurisdiction would be irregular. At the intercession of the Grand Lodge of England in behalf of the Loge Anglaise an exception was made in its case. In 1767 the Loge Anglaise appears as No. 363 on the List of Lodges of the Grand Lodge of England but is omitted from the list of 1774 and therefore negotiations began with the Grand Orient for a formal Warrant, of December 12, 1780, the Lodge giving up its right to found other Lodges in France but retaining friendly relations with England. The Grand Orient issued a Warrant, January 6, 1783, to seventeen Brethren who had resigned, forming the new La Vraie Anglaise, the True English, and the Loge Anglaise had itself restored on the list of the Grand Lodge of England as No. 240.

Authorized by the Grand Lodge of England upon the suggestion of the Grand Master, December 4, 1907, as a means of conferring Masonic honors upon members of those Lodges which were held within a radius of ten miles of Freemasons Hall, London, and which are known as London Lodges, they not coming under any Provincial or District organization and thus being unable to obtain any distinction but that of Grand Lodge Office. As a result of this condition, much discussion was had regarding the dividing of the London Lodges into Provinces, thereby multiplying the honors within their reach, but at this time the Grand Master was authorized to confer the right to wear a distinctive jewel, collar, and apron with the designation London Rank, this honor to be conferred upon Past Masters of London Lodges, one for each such Lodge for 1908 and up to the number of 150 each year thereafter, a certain fee being paid for the distinction. This Rank is the equivalent of Provincial or District Rank and is bestowed on the Brethren for long and meritorious service to the Craft.

LOST WORD. The mythical history of Freemasonry informs us that there once existed a Word of surpassing value, and claiming a profound veneration; that this Word was known to but few; that it was at length lost; and that a temporary substitute for it was adopted. But as the very philosophy of Freemasonry teaches us that there can be no death without a resurrection—no decay without a subsequent restoration—on the same principle it follows that the loss of the Word must suppose its eventual recovery. Now, this it is, precisely, that constitutes the myth of the Lost Word and the search for it. No matter what was the Word, no matter how it was lost, nor why a substitute was provided, nor when nor where it was recovered. These are all points of subsidiary importance, necessary, it is true, for knowing the legendary history, but not necessary for understanding the symbolism. The only term of the myth that is to be regarded in the study of its interpretation, is the abstract idea of a word lost and afterward recovered. The Word, therefore, may be conceived to be the symbol of Divine Truth; and all its modifications—the loss, the substitution, and the recovery—are but component parts of the mythical symbol which represents a search after truth. In a general sense, the Word itself being then the symbol of Divine Truth, the narrative of its loss and the search for its recovery becomes a mythical symbol of the decay and loss of the true religion among the ancient nations, at and after the dispersion on the Plains of Shinar, and of the attempts of the wise men, the philosophers, and priests, to find and retain it in their secret mysteries and initia-

in 1785. August 31, 1790, this Lodge with four other French Lodges agreed to no longer recognize the authority of the Grand Orient of France. In 1793 the name was changed to Lodge No. 240—dite 'Egalité (called Equality) but the old title was resumed in 1795. In 1892 a renumbering of Lodges under the Grand Lodge of England put the Loge Anglaise as No. 204 on the Register. The Loge Anglaise agreeably to the Grand Orient of France, September 27, 1803, and the Grand Lodge of England, with three other Lodges formed a Provincial Grand Lodge, February 21, 1804. New by-laws, June 27, 1816, specified that the Lodge was under "Joint protection of the Grand Orient of England and France." May 16, 1818, the Grand Secretary of England wrote the Loge Anglaise that all connection with the Grand Lodge had ceased since 1876. The Lodge protested and remained independent. Brother John Lane says in Masonic Records that the Lodge was on the English Register until 1813. After considerable time the Lodge again associated with the Grand Orient of France, maintaining always the custom of toasting the Grand Lodge of England at banquets. In 1869 an amendment to Article 1, Constitution of the Grand Orient, came up for decision. This Article stated that "The principles on which Freemasonry is founded are the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the solidarity of the human race." An amendment was defeated thanks to the effort made by the Loge Anglaise, but the matter again came up, 1876, and the Lodge was helpless to prevent the adoption of the amendment by the General Assembly and relations were severed. January 7, 1913, the Lodge passed a vote of disapproval of the Grand Orient, and with the Lodge Centre des Amis undertook to form the new Grand Loge Nationale pour la France (see Loge Anglaise, by Edmund Heisch, London, 1917; also Transac-

The Old Charges define logic to be the art "that teacheth to discern truth from falsehood."

Lombardy. At the close of the dark ages, Lombardy and the adjacent Italian States were the first which awakened to industry. New cities arose, and the kings, lords, and municipalities began to encourage the artificers of different professions. Among the arts exercised and improved in Lombardy, the art of building held a pre-eminent rank, and from that kingdom, as from a center, the Comacine Masters were dispersed over all Europe (see Traveling Freemasons; also Comacine).

London. With the city of London, the modern history of Freemasonry is intimately connected. A Congress of Freemasons, as it may properly be called was convened there by the Four Old Lodges, at the Apple-Tree Tavern, in 1717. Its results were the formation of the Grand Lodge of England, and a modification of the Masonic system, whence the Freemasonry of the present day has descended. Anderson, in his second edition of the Book of Constitutions, 1738, gives the account of this, as it is now called, Revival of Freemasonry, which see.

London RANK. Authorized by the Grand Lodge of England upon the suggestion of the Grand Master, December 4, 1907, as a means of conferring Masonic honors upon members of those Lodges which were held within a radius of ten miles of Freemasons Hall, London, and which are known as London Lodges, they not coming under any Provincial or District organization and thus being unable to obtain any distinction but that of Grand Lodge Office. As a result of this condition, much discussion was had regarding the dividing of the London Lodges into Provinces, thereby multiplying the honors within their reach, but at this time the Grand Master was authorized to confer the right to wear a distinctive jewel, collar, and apron with the designation London Rank, this honor to be conferred upon Past Masters of London Lodges, one for each such Lodge for 1908 and up to the number of 150 each year thereafter, a certain fee being paid for the distinction. This Rank is the equivalent of Provincial or District Rank and is bestowed on the Brethren for long and meritorious service to the Craft.

The Word, therefore, may be conceived to be the symbol of Divine Truth; and all its modifications— the loss, the substitution, and the recovery—are but component parts of the mythical symbol which represents a search after truth. In a general sense, the Word itself being then the symbol of Divine Truth, the narrative of its loss and the search for its recovery becomes a mythical symbol of the decay and loss of the true religion among the ancient nations, at and after the dispersion on the Plains of Shinar, and of the attempts of the wise men, the philosophers, and priests, to find and retain it in their secret mysteries and initiations, which have hence been designated as the Spurious Freemasonry of Antiquity.

But there is a special or individual, as well as a general interpretation, and in this special or individual interpretation the Word, with its accompanying myth of a loss, a substitute, and a recovery, becomes a symbol of the personal progress of a candidate from his first initiation to the completion of his course, when he receives a full development of the mysteries.

LOTUS. The lotus plant, so celebrated in the religions of Egypt and Asia, is a species of Nymphæa, or water-lily, which grows abundantly on the banks of streams in warm climates. Although more familiarly known as the Lotus of the Nile, it was not indigenous to Egypt, but was probably introduced into that country from the East, among whose people it was everywhere consecrated as a sacred symbol. The Brahmanical deities were almost always represented as either decorated with its flowers, or holding it as a scepter, or seated on it as a throne. Coleman says (Mythology of the Hindus, page 388) that to the Hindu poets the lotus was what the rose was to the Persians. Floating on the water it is the emblem of the world, and the type also of the Mountain of Meru, the residence of the gods. Among the Egyptians, the lotus was the symbol of Osiris and Isis. It was esteemed a sacred ornament by the priests, and was placed as a coronet upon the heads of many of the gods. It was also much used in the sacred architecture of the Egyptians, being placed as an entablature upon the columns of their temples. Thence it was introduced by Solomon into Jewish architecture, being found, under the name of lily work, as a part of the ornaments of the two pillars at the porch of the Temple.

The word of almost the same sound in Arabic as in Hebrew includes many of the allied flowers and it is now generally accepted that the various biblical references to lilies (as in First Kings vii, 19; Second Chronicles iv, 5; Canticles ii, 1; Hosea xiv, 5; Matthew vi, 28, and elsewhere) mean more than that one flower (see Lily and Pillars of the Porch).

LOUISIANA. Freemasonry was brought to San Domingo by Charter from the Grand Orient and the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania at a time when it was peopled chiefly by the French and their negro slaves. The negro insurrection of 1791 caused an influx of refugees from the East, among whose people it was widely known as an interested Freemason.

It was announced at a Quarterly Communication, held March 27, 1813, that a Grand Royal Arch Chapter had been organized and attached to the Grand Lodge of Louisiana. In 1829 a representative was admitted to the General Grand Chapter. After 1831, however, no meeting took place and the subordinate Chapters, with the exception of Holland, No. 9, ceased to exist. In 1841, the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Louisiana called a meeting and a Grand Chapter of Louisiana was organized. Holland Chapter was not represented at the Convention and refused to recognize the authority of the new Grand Chapter. In 1847 the General Grand Chapter denied that it had any legal existence. The following year, on May 1, representatives of the four Chapters in Louisiana chartered by the General Grand Chapter, Holland, No. 1; New Era, No. 2; Red River, No. 3, and East Feliciana, No. 4, met at New Orleans and duly established a Grand Chapter for Louisiana.

The first Council in the State was Holland, No. 1, probably organized by John Barker in 1827. In the official reports of the Grand Chapter of Louisiana in 1829 and 1830 a Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters is mentioned. This seems to have died out but was revived about 1848 to 1850 when Holland, No. 1; Louisiana, No. 15, and Orleans, No. 36, were represented at a Convention to organize a Grand Council.

A Charter was granted on May 4, 1816, for the formation of an Encampment which was enrolled under the Grand Encampment of the United States on September 15, 1844, as Indivisible Friends Encampment, No. 1. This Commandery with Jacques de Molay, No. 2, and Orleans, No. 3, assembled on February 12, 1864, and formed the Grand Commandery of Louisiana.

On June 19, 1813, Charters were granted to Albert Pike Lodge of Perfection, No. 1, and Eagle Council of Kadosh, No. 6, at New Orleans. Grand Consistory, No. 1, was chartered at New Orleans on August 8, 1852, and a Chapter of Rose Croix, Cervantes, No. 4, was opened during the year 1887.

LOUIS NAPOLEON. Second Adjutant of the Grand Master of the Grand Orient of France. Nominated, in 1806, King of Holland. Louis, Napoleon III, was widely known as an interested Freemason.

LOUVELEAU. See Lewis.

LOWEN. In the Lansdowne Manuscript we meet with this charge: "that a Master or fellow make not a moulded stone square, nor rule to no Lowen, nor sett no Lowen worke within the Lodge." Brother Hawkins observes this has been said to be an error for Cowen, but in his opinion it is more probably intended for Layet, which is the word used in the parallel passage in other Manuscripts (see Loyer).

LOW TWELVE. In Masonic language midnight is so called. The reference is to the sun, which is then below the earth. Low Twelve in Masonic symbolism is an unpropitious hour.

LOYALTY. Notwithstanding the calumnies of Barruel, Robison, and a host of other anti-Masonic writers who assert that Freemasonry is ever engaged in efforts to uproot the governments within which it may exist, there is nothing more evident than that Freemasonry is a loyal institution, and that it inculcates, in all its public instructions, obedience to government. Thus, in the Prestonian Charge given in the eighteenth century to the Entered Apprentice, and continued to this day in the same words in English Lodges, we find the following words:

In the State, you are to be a quiet and peaceable subject, true to your sovereign, and just to your country; you are not to countenance disloyalty or rebellion, but patiently submit to legal authority, and conform with cheerfulness to the government under which you live, yielding obedience to the laws which afford you protection, but never forgetting the attachment you owe to the place of your nativity, or the allegiance due to the sovereign or protectors of that spot.

The Charge given in American Lodges is of the same import, and varies but slightly in its language.

In the State, you are to be a quiet and peaceful subject, true to your government, and just to your country; you are not to countenance disloyalty or rebellion, but patiently submit to legal authority, and conform with cheerfulness to the government of the country in which you live.

The Charge given in French Lodges, though somewhat differing in form from both of these, has the same spirit and the same lesson. It is to this effect:

Obedience to the laws and submission to the authorities are among the most imperious duties of the Freemason, and he is forbidden at all times from engaging in plots and conspiracies.

Hence it is evident that the true Freemason must be a true patriot.

LUCHET, JEAN PIERRE LOUIS, MARQUIS DE. A French historical writer, who was born at Saintes in 1740, and died in 1791. He was the writer of many works of but little reputation, but is principally distinguished in Masonic literature as the author of an attack upon Illuminism under the title of Essai sur la Secte des Illuminés. It first appeared anonymously in 1789. Four editions of it were published.

The third and fourth with augmentations and revisions, which were attributed to Mirabeau, were printed with the outer title of Histoire secrète de la Cour de Berlin, par Mirabeau. This work was published, it is known, without his consent, and was burned by the common executioner in consequence of its libelous character. Luchet's essay has become very rare than for its intrinsic excellence.

LUDEWIG, H. E. An energetic Freemason, born in 1810, in Germany; died in 1856, in America. By “powers from home” this ardent Brother attempted to set up an independent authority to the existing Grand Lodge system in the United States; but, like many such attempts, it flashed brilliantly for a season, but proved of ephemeral nature.

LUFTON. One of the French terms for Louveteau, or Lewis, which see.

LULLY, RAYMOND. A celebrated chemist and philosopher, the Seneschal of Majorca, surnamed le docteur illuminate, the enlightened doctor. His discoveries are most noted, such as the mode of rectifying spirits, the refining of silver, etc. He was born about 1234. In 1276 he founded a college of Franciscans at Palma, for instruction in Eastern lore, and especially the study of the Arabic language, for which purpose he instituted several colleges between the years 1293 and 1311. He died in 1314. He is known as an eminent Rosicrucian, and many fables as to his longevity are related.

The foregoing account has long been generally acceptable though there is some uncertainty as to the dates of Lully's birth and death, and investigators have not agreed as to his scientific knowledge nor the authorship of certain works attributed by others to him. The alchemical works bearing his name are all apocryphal, spurious, according to J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly (Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1911), but Lewis Spence (Dictionary of Occultism, 1920) not only accepts him as an author and alchemist of ability but quotes a German historian of chemistry, Gruelin, who asserts Lully to be a scientist of exceptional skill. However, it is clear that he was a devoted missionary to the infidels, a progressive student and teacher of languages, venerated as saint and poet. Some of his views were in advance of the Church he served and in 1376 they were condemned in a Papal Bull at the behest of the Inquisition, but this was annulled by Pope Martin V in 1578. At eighty Lully was of unabated enthusiasm, preaching the Gospel, journeying far afield in Europe, crossing into Africa, where he was stoned to death by the people.

LUMIERE, LA VRAIE. French for The True Light, or Perfect Mason. A Degree in the Chapter of the Grand Lodge of Royal York of Berlin (Thory, Acta Latomorum i, page 321).

LUMINARIES. The first five officers in a French Lodge, namely, the Master, two Wardens, Orator, and Secretary, are called Luminaires or Luminaries, sources of light, because it is by them that light is dispensed to the Lodge.

LUNUS. An Egyptian deity, known as Khons-Lunus, and represented as hawk-headed, surmounted by the crescent and disk. When appearing with the head of an ibis, he is called Thoth-Lunus. His worship was very extensive through ancient Egypt, where he was known as Aah, who presides over rejuvenation and resurrection. Champollion mentions in his Pansion a Lunus-Bifrons.

LUSTRATION. From a Latin word meaning both washing and atonement. A religious rite practised by the ancients, and performed before any act of devotion. It consisted in washing the hands, and sometimes the body, in lustral or consecrated water. It was intended as a symbol of the internal purification of the heart. It was a ceremony preparatory to initiation in all the Ancient Mysteries. The ceremony is practised with the same symbolic import in some of the advanced Degrees of Freemasonry. So strong was the idea of a connection between lustral and initiation, that in the low Latin of the Middle Ages lustrare meant to initiate. Thus Du Cange (Glossarium) cites the expression "lustrare religione Christianorum" as signifying "to initiate into the Christian religion."

LUX. Latin for Light, which see. Freemasonry annually received, among other names, that of Lux, because it is that sublime doctrine of truth by which the pathway of him who has attained it is to be illumined in the pilgrimage of life. Among the Rosicrucians, light was the knowledge of the philosopher's stone; and Mosheim says that in chemical language the cross was an emblem of light, because it contains within its figure the forms of the three figures of which LVX, or Light, is composed.
LUXEMBURG. An independent Grand Duchy of Europe situated to the southeast of Belgium. In 1774 a Grand Orient with the reigning Duke as Protector was at work in Bouillon, a town which, though now in Belgium, was formerly part of Luxemburg. In 1812 this Grand Body had ceased to exist.

The Lodge, Les Enfants de la Concorde, meaning in French The Children of Good Understanding, was chartered in 1803 by the Grand Orient of France though it is possible that it was at work some years before that date.

The Grand Duchy became independent in 1839 and a few years later the Lodge became independent also. It is the smallest self-governing Masonic Body in the world.

LUX E TENEBRIS. Latin, meaning Light out of darkness. A motto very commonly used in the caption of Masonic documents as expressive of the object of Freemasonry, and what the true Freemason supposes himself to have attained. It has a recondite meaning. In the primeval ages and in the early mythology, darkness preceded light. "In the thought," says Cox, "of these early ages, the sun was the child of night or darkness" (Aryan Mythology i, page 43).

So lux being Truth or Freemasonry, and tenebrae, or darkness, the symbol of initiation, lux e tenebris is Masonic truth proceeding from initiation. A Lodge at London comprising Brethren devoted especially to the welfare of blind persons has been given this appropriate name.

LUX FIAT ET LUX FIT. Latin, meaning Let there be light, and there was light. A motto sometimes prefixed to Masonic documents (see True Light).

LUZ. An ever-living power, according to the old Jewish Rabbis, residing in a small joint-bone existing at the base of the spinal column. To this undying principle, watered by the dew of heaven, is ascribed the immortality in man.

Rabbi Joshua Ben Hananiah replied to Hadrian, as to how man revived in the world to come, "From Luz, in the back-bone." When asked to demonstrate this, he took Luz, a little bone out of the back-bone, and put it in water, and it was not steeped; he put it in the fire, and it was not burned; he brought it to the mill, and that could not grind it; he laid it on the anvil, and knocked it with a hammer, but the anvil was dented, and the hammer broken.

LYONS. L. V. C. Letters engraved on the rings of profession worn by the Knights of Baron von Hund's Templar system. They are the initials of the words in the Latin sentence Labor Viris Convenit, meaning Labor is suitable for men. It was also engraved on their seals.

LYON, DAVID MURRAY. This well-known writer and historian of Freemasonry in Scotland was initiated in 1856 in Lodge Ayr Saint Paul, No. 204, on the roll of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. He was a printer by trade and was at one time employed by the Ayrshire Express Company. In 1877 he was appointed Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Scotland and held the post until 1900. He died on January 30, 1903. He was, without doubt, says Brother Hawkins, who prepared this article, the foremost Masonic student in Scotland, either of this or any other period; and the results of his continuous and arduous researches are to be found in all the books and periodicals of the Craft for twenty years, both at home and abroad. It is simply impossible to furnish anything like an accurate and complete list of his many valuable contributions to Masonic magazines. His chief works have been the History of the Mother Lodge Kilwinning, Scotland, the History of the old Lodge at Thornhill, and, finally, the History of the Ancient Lodge at Edinburgh, Mary's Chapel, from the sixteenth century. This grand work, which was published in 1873, has placed its author in the front rank of Masonic authors.

LYONS, CONGRESS OF. A Masonic Congress was convoked in 1778, at the City of Lyons, France, by the Lodge of Chevaliers Bienfaisants, or Benevolent Knights. It was opened on the 26th of November, and continued in session until the 27th of December, under the presidency of M. Villermoz. Its ostensible object was to procure a reformation in Freemasonry by the abjuration of the Templar theory; but it wasted its time in the correction of rituals and in Masonic intrigues, and does not appear to have been either sagacious in its methods, or successful in its results. Even its abjuration of the Strict Observance doctrine that Templarism was the true origin of Freemasonry, is said to have been insincere, and forced upon it by the injunctions of the political authorities, who were opposed to the propagation of any system which might tend to restore the Order of Knights Templar.

macha, to smite.

MAACHA. In the Tenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite we are instructed that certain traitors fled to “Maacha, King of Cheth,” by whom they were delivered up to King Solomon on his sending for them. In First Kings ii, 39, we find it recorded that two of the servants of Shimei fled from Jerusalem to “Achish, son of Maachah king of Gath.”
There can be little doubt that the carelessness of the early copyists of the Ritual led to the double error of putting Cheth for Gath and of supposing that Maacha was its king instead of its king’s father. The manuscripts of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, too often copied by unlearned persons, show many such corruptions of Hebrew names, which modern researches must eventually correct. Delaunay, in his Thuileur, 1813, makes him King of Tyre, calls him Mahakah,םמאכה, and adds a Latin word, Compressus, as further explanation, the meaning evidently being to bring together.

MAC. Masonic writers have generally given to this word the meaning of “is smitten,” deriving it probably from the Hebrew verb הבדא, bechath, to smite.
Others, again, think it is the word בז, mak, rottenness, and suppose that it means “he is rotten.” Both derivations are, in Brother Mackey’s opinion, incorrect.
Mac is a constituent part of the word macbenac, which is the substitute Master’s Word in the French Rite, and which is interpreted by the French ritualists as meaning “he lives in the son.” But such a derivation finds no support in any known Hebrew root. Another interpretation must be sought. Doctor Mackey believed there is evidence, circumstantial at least, to show that the word was, if not an invention of the Antient or Dermott Freemasons, at least adopted by them in distinction from the one used by the Moderns, which latter is the word now in use in the United States of America. Brother Mackey was disposed to attribute the introduction of the word into Freemasonry to the adherents of the House of Stuart, who sought in every way to make the Institution of Freemasonry a political instrument in their schemes for the restoration of their exiled monarch. Thus the old phrase, “the Widow’s Son,” was applied by them to James II, who was the son of Henrietta Maria, the widow of Charles I. So, instead of the old Master’s word which had hitherto been used, they invented macbenac out of the Gaelic, which to them was, on account of their Highland supporters, almost a sacred language in the place of Hebrew. Now, in Gaelic, Mac is son, and benach is blessed, from the active verb beannaich, to bless. The latest dictionary published by the Highland Society gives this example: “Benach

MACBENAC. This word is capable of at least two interpretations.
1. A significant word in the Third Degree according to the French Rite and some other Rituals (see Mac).
2. In the Order of the Beneficent Knights of the Holy City, the Recipiendary, or Novice, is called Macbenac.

MACCABEES. A heroic family, whose patriotism and valor form bright pictures in the Jewish annals.
The name is generally supposed to be derived from the letters מכ, כ, ב, י—that is, Bless the King of Scotland, Alexander, son of Alexender, etc. Therefore we find, without any of those distortions to which etymologists so often recur, that macbenac means in Gaelic the blessed son. This word the Stuart Freemasons applied to their idol, the Frentender, the son of Charles I.

MACCALLA, CLIFFORD P. Initiated in Concordia Lodge No. 67 at Philadelphia, 1889; was Worshipful Master in 1874; accepted position of Secretary in 1876 and served twelve years. Brother MacCalla was elected Junior Grand Warden of Pennsylvania in 1882, Senior Grand Warden in 1884, Deputy Grand Master in 1886 and Grand Master in 1888. For many years he was Editor of the Keystone, a Masonic journal. He wrote a historical sketch of Concordia Lodge in Philadelphia, a Life of Daniel Coxe and many essays on Freemasonry in America.
He discovered the Secretary’s ledger of Saint John’s Lodge dating from June 24, 1731, to June, 1738 (see Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume iii, page 134).

MACERIO. Du Cange (in his Glossarium) gives this as one of the Middle Age Latin words for mason, deriving it from maceria, a wall. The word is now never employed.

MACHIO. See Macio.

MACIO. Du Cange, Glossarium, defines Macio, Mattio, or Machio, on the authority of Isidore, as Macon, latomus, a mason, a constructor of walls, from machina, the machines on which they stood to work on account of the height of the walls. He gives Mago also.

MACKENZIE, KENNETH R. H. His favorite pen name was Cryptonymus, a Latin word meaning One whose name is hidden. Editor of The Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia of History, Rites, Symbolism, and Biography, published in London in 1877, by Brother John Hogg, Paternoster Row. He was one of the founders of the Rosicrucian Society in England (see Rosicrucianism).
MACKEY, ALBERT GALLATIN. The American Masonic historian. He was born at Charleston, South Carolina, March 12, 1807. This scholarly Brother lived to the age of seventy-four years. He died at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, June 20, 1881, and was buried at Washington, District of Columbia, Sunday, June 26, with all the solemnity of the Masonic Rites wherein he had long been an active leader. From 1834, when he was graduated with honors at the Charleston Medical College, until 1854 he gave attention to the practise of his profession, but from that time on literary and Masonic labors engrossed his efforts. Doctor Mackey was a Union adherent during the Civil War and in July, 1865, President Johnson appointed him Collector of the Port. In a contest for senatorial honors Brother Mackey was defeated by Senator Sawyer. Doctor Mackey removed to Washington, District of Columbia, in 1870.

Doctor Mackey was Initiated, Passed and Raised in Saint Andrews Lodge No. 10, Charleston, South Carolina, in 1841. Shortly thereafter he affiliated with Solomon's Lodge No. 1, also of Charleston, and was elected Worshipful Master in December, 1842. From 1842 until 1867 he held the office of Grand Secretary and during this period prepared all the reports of the Foreign Correspondence Committee of the Grand Lodge. In 1851 he was a founder member of Landmark Lodge No. 76. During the winter of 1841–2 he was advanced and exalted in Capitular Freemasonry; elected High Priest in December, 1844; and also elected Deputy Grand High Priest in 1848 and successively re-elected until 1855. From 1855 to 1867 he was each year elected as Grand High Priest of his State. Elected in 1859 to the office of General Grand High Priest, he continued in that position until 1868. Created a Knight Templar in South Carolina Commandery No. 76. The announcement of his death has carried a genuine sentiment of sorrow wherever Freemasonry is known and widely respected and beloved by the Masonic world. While this Grand Lodge shares in the common sorrow of the Craft everywhere at this irreparable loss, she can properly lay claim to a more intimate and peculiar knowledge and counsel. In testimony of our affectionate respect for his memory the Grand Lodge jewels, and to the honor of his name. We extend to his family the assurance of our sincere and respectful sympathy, and direct that an attested copy of this Minute be transmitted to them.

In the eulogy over Doctor Mackey, delivered by Past Grand Master Henry Buist, of Georgia, before the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction, he said of the Doctor:
He was a fearless and gifted speaker; his language was courteous and manner dignified; and occasionally, in his earnestness to maintain what he conceived to be right, he became animated and eloquent. Positive in his convictions, he was bold in their advocacy. His course of action once determined on, supported by an approving conscience, no fear or disfavor or discomfiture could swerve him from his fixed purpose. Whatever was the emergency, he was always equal to it. Where others doubted, he was confident; where others faltered, he was immovable; where others queried, he affirmed. He was faithful to every public and Masonic duty. Treachery found no place in his character. He never betrayed a trust. He was eminently sincere and loyal to his friends, and those who were most intimately associated with him learned to appreciate him the most. He was generous and frank in his impulses, and cherished malice toward none, and charity for all. His monument is in the hearts of those who knew him longest and best. He is no longer of this earth. His work among men is ended; his earthly record is complete.

MACO. See Macio.

MACON. The following is substantially from Kenning's Cyclopedia of Freemasonry:

The Norman-French word for mason—as the Operative Mason in early days was called—"le maçon," and this was corrupted into maçonnet, masonnet, positive in his commercial, maçonsson, and even maçon. The word seems to come from maçonner, which had both its operative meaning and derivative meaning of conspiring, in 1288, and which again came from maesto, a word of classic use. The word maçon, as it appears to us, is clear evidence of man-French artificers of the Conquest, who carried the Masonry of the Secret. The sixth grade of the reformed Masonic Clubs, somewhat like unto the English Lodges of Instruction, with more, perhaps, of the character of a Club. Kenning's Cyclopedia says "there were about nineteen of these associations in the principal towns of Holland in 1866."

MACOY'S CYCLOPEDIA. "A General History, Cyclopaedia, and Dictionary of Freemasonry," containing some 300 engravings, by Robert Macoy, 33, published in New York, which has passed through a number of editions. It was originally founded on A Dictionary of Symbolical Masonry, by Dr. George Oliver. Brother Macoy has occupied the prominent position of Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of New York, and that of Grand Recorder of the State Grand Commandery of the Order of the Temple, Knights Templar.

MACROGOSM. Greek, μάγος κόσμον, the great world. The visible system of worlds; the outer world or universe. It is opposed to Microcosm, the little world, as in man. It has been used as the Macric soul in opposition to the Micric animal life, and as the soul of the universe as opposed to the soul of a single world or being. A subject of much note to the Rosicrucians in the study of the Mysterium Magnum.

MACZO. Latin of the Middle Ages for a maçon.

Du Cange quotes a Computum of the year 1324, in which it is said that the work was done "per manum Petri, macononis de Lagnici," meaning "by the hand of Peter, a master of Lagnica."

MADAGASCAR. L'Action Républicaine Lodge, from June 25, 1913, at Diego Suarez, and La France Australe, from July 20, 1903, at Tananarivo, are subject both to the Grand Orient of France. Three others, La Fraternité Universale, from 1917, at Ambositra, Imerina, from 1903, at Tananarivo and Les Trois Frères, The Three Brothers, at Majungo, are controlled by the Grand Lodge of France. Madagascar is an island, under the French Government, is 975 miles long, with some three million inhabitants, and is in the Indian Ocean, 230 miles from the east coast of Africa.

MADE. A technical word signifying initiated into Freemasonry (see Make).

MADMAN. Madmen are specially designated in the oral law as disqualified for initiation (see Qualifications).

MADRAS. A presidency of British India. The first Lodge in Southern India was established at Madras. Others were opened in 1765 and in the following year Captain Edmond Pascal was appointed Provincial Grand Master for Madras and its Dependencies. A Provincial Grand Lodge was established in 1781 by the Athol Grand Lodge of England but after about seven years the state of warfare round about Madras caused its decline. Unity among the Brethren in Southern India was finally achieved by the appointment of Brigadier-General Horn as Provincial Grand Master for the Coast of Coromandel, the Presidency of Madras and parts adjacent. The older Lodges had all ceased work when in 1786 the Carnatic Military Lodge was established at Arcot. The early attempts of the French to plant Freemasonry in Madras were even less successful than those of the English. The first Lodge, La Fraternité Cosmopolite, meaning in French World-wide Fraternity, was chartered in 1786, but after lying dormant for some time finally ceased to exist. The Grand Lodge of Scotland has chartered many surviving and successful developments.
the French writers, especially to Ragon, who gives many pages of his Masonic Orthodoxy to the subject of Masonic magic; and still more to Alphonse Louis Constant, who has written three large volumes on the History of Magic, on the Ritual and Dogma of the Higher Magic, and on the Key of the Grand Mysteries, in all of which he seeks to trace an intimate connection between the Masonic mysteries and the science of magic (see Levi, Eliphas). Ragon designates this sort of Freemasonry by the name of Occult Freemasonry. But he loosely confounds magic with the magism of the ancient Persians, the medieval philosophy and modern magnetism, all of which, as identical sciences, were engaged in the investigation of the nature of man, the mechanism of his thoughts, the faculties of his soul, his power over nature, and the essence of the occult virtues of all things. Magism, he says, is to be found in the Sentences of Zoroaster, in the Hymns of Orpheus, in the Invocations of the Hierophants, and in the Symbols of Pythagoras; it is reproduced in the Philosophy of Agrippa and of Cardan, and is recognized under the name of Magic in the marvelous results of magnetism. Cagliostro, it is well known, mingled with his Spurious Freemasonry the Superstitions of Magic and the Operations of Animal Magnetism. But the writers who have sought to establish a scheme of Magical Freemasonry refer almost altogether to the supposed power of mystical names or words, which they say is common to both Freemasonry and magic. It is certain that onomatology, or the science of names, forms a very interesting part of the investigations of the higher Freemasonry, and it is only in this way that any connection can be created between the two sciences. Much light, it must be confessed, is thrown on many of the mystical names in the advanced Degrees by the dogmas of magic; and hence magic furnishes a curious and interesting study for the Freemason (see Magic Squares and Alchemy).

MAGIAN SOCIETY. Founded in New York City on September 29, 1913, by Brother Frank C. Higgins, for the study of Masonic symbolism! (see American Freemason, November, 1913, and Miscellanea Latomorum, volume i, pages 63 and 128, new series).

MAGICIANS, SOCIETY OF THE. A society founded at Florence, which became a division of the Brothers of Rose Croix. They were in their Chapters the habit of members of the Inquisition. This must not be confused with a society of the same name but not claiming to be exclusively Masonic in the United States.

MAGIC SQUARES. A magic square is a series of numbers arranged in an equal number of cells constituting a square figure, the enumeration of all of whose columns, vertically, horizontally and diagonally, will give the same sum. The Oriental philosophers, and especially the Jewish Talmudists, have indulged in many fanciful speculations in reference to these magic squares, many of which were considered as talismans. The accompanying figure of nine squares containing the nine digits so arranged as to make fifteen when counted in every way, was of peculiar import.

There was no talisman more sacred than this among the Orientalists, when arranged as in Figure 2.
Thus designed, they called it by the name of the Planet Saturn, ZaHaL, because the sum of the 9 digits in the square was equal to 45 (1+2+3+4+5+6+7+8+9) which is the numerical value of the letters in the word ZaHaL, in the Arabic alphabet. The talmudists also esteemed it as a sacred talisman because 15 is the numerical value of the letters of the word IT, JaH, which is one of the forms of the Tetragrammaton.

The Hermetic Philosophers called these magic squares Tables of the Planets, and attributed to them many occult virtues. The Table of Saturn consisted of 9 squares, and has just been given. The Table of Jupiter consisted of 16 squares of numbers, whose total value is 136, and the sum of them added, horizontally, perpendicularly, and diagonally, in rows, is always 34; as in Figure 3.

So the Table of Mars consists of 25 squares, of the Sun of 36, of Venus of 49, of Mercury of 64, and of the Moon of 81. These magic squares and their values have been used in the symbolism of numbers in some of the advanced Degrees of Freemasonry.

This subject should not be dismissed as a purely imaginative study. The matter has for many years engaged the attention of mathematicians of the highest quality. The Magic Square has been worn as an emblem or talisman insuring good luck to the possessor and evidently it formed an essential part in the early symbolism connected with the Craft. That singular picture by Albrecht Durer of the sixteenth century, Malancolia, shows a Magic Square with many other symbols easily recognized by members of the Masonic institution. The history of the Magic Square goes back hundreds of years and there has been undoubtedly through this period a superstitious, as well as a scientific, esteem for this device. They have not been worked out to their present perfection in any other than by systematic methods. The earliest known writer on the subject was a Greek, Emanuel Moscopulus, who flourished in the fourth or fifth century. Since that time there have been many laborers upon this work.

One of the very interesting of these Magic Squares is referred to above by Doctor Mackey. This occurs in a book by Agrippa (De Occulta Philosophie, 1510) and is quoted on page 279 of George Falkener’s Games Ancient and Modern. By first arrangement the numerals from 1 to 16 in four rows as in Figure 4 it will be seen that by leaving the numerals unchanged at each corner of the large square, namely 1, 4, 16, and 13, and also at the inner square of 6, 7, 10, and 11, and substituting the other pairs of numerals, reversing them at the time, we have in Figure 5, this remarkable Magic Square reversed, which Brother Mackey has called the Table of Jupiter. The combinations of this figure are surprising, amounting to fifty-six arrangements, each totaling thirty-four. The four horizontals, as 1+15+14+1=34, 12+6+7+9=34, etc.; and the four perpendicular columns, as 1+12+8+13=34, and 15+6+10+3=34, etc.; the diagonals, 1+6+11+16=34, and 4+7+10+13=34; the diamonds, 1+7+11+16=34, and 4+11+13+6=34; the squares, 1+4+16+13=34, and 6+7+11+10=34; the oblongs, 15+14+2+3=34, 12+9+5+8=34, and the romboids, 1+15+16+2=34, and 4+9+13+8=34, etc.

The method of working out a Magic Square with an uneven number of cells was suggested by De la Loubère. The several steps may be considered as follows: In assigning consecutive numbers, proceed in an oblique direction up and to the right as 4, 5, 6, as in Figure 6. When this would carry a number out of the Magic Square, write that number in the cell at the opposite end of the column or row, as shown by the numbers in the margin of Figure 6. When the application of the first of these rules in the present paragraph would place a number in a cell already occupied, write the new number in the cell beneath the one last filled. For instance, the cell above and to the right of 3 being occupied, 4 is written under 3. Treat the marginal square at the upper right-hand corner marked x as an occupied cell and apply the rule given... in the last sentence. Begin by putting 1 in the top cell of the middle column. A comparison of Figure 6 will show that it is a reflection of Figure 1 given by Doctor Mackey.

One of the most successful of all students of the subject unquestionably was Brother Benjamin Franklin. Two of his efforts, an 8x8 and a 16x16, are today unsurpassed as purely remarkably successful attempts at recollect that any one Englishman had done anything of the kind remarkable. I said it was perhaps a mark of the good sense of our mathematicians that they would not spend their time in things that were merely difficiles nugae, incapable of any useful application. He answered that many of the arithmetical or mathematical questions publicly proposed in England were equally trifling and useless. Perhaps the considering and answering such questions, I replied, may not be altogether useless if it produces by practice an habitual readiness and exactness in mathematical disquisitions, which readiness may, on many occasions, be of real use. In the same way, says he, may the making of these squares be of use. I then confessed to him that in my younger days, having once some leisure (which I still think I might have employed more usefully) I had amused myself in making this kind of Magic Squares, and, at length had acquired such a knack at it, that I could fill the cells of any magic square of reasonable size with a series of numbers as fast as I could write them, disposed in such a manner that the sums of every row, horizontal, perpendicular, or diagonal, should be equal; but not being satisfied with these, which I looked on as common and easy things, I had imposed on myself more difficult tasks, and succeeded in making other magic squares with a variety of properties, and much more curious. He then showed me several in the same book of an uncommon and more curious kind; but as I thought none of them equal to some I remembered to have made, he desired me to let him see them; and accordingly the next time I visited him, I carried him a square of 8 which I found among my old papers, and which I will now give you with an account of its properties (see Figure 7). The properties are:

1. That every straight row, horizontal or vertical, of 8 numbers added together, make 260, and half of each row, half of 260.

2. That the bent row of 8 numbers ascending and descending diagonally, viz., from 16 ascending to 10 and from 23 descending to 17 and every one of its parallel bent rows of 8 numbers make 260, etc., etc. And lastly the four corner numbers with the four middle numbers make 260. So this magical square seems perfect in its kind, but these are not all its properties, there are five other curious ones which at some time I will explain to you.

This Magic Square by Franklin is given here as Figure 7.

Brother Paul Carus has investigated the means by which Brother Franklin may have worked out his system of Magic Squares but it is really somewhat a question even now with all the later studies that have been given to the subject whether any one has perfected an ability capable of preparing a means of producing these designs with the facility that Brother Franklin mentions. Those who wish to examine the subject further will find it discussed in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, in Magic Squares and Cubes, by W. S. Andrews, containing chapters by Brother Paul Carus and others, and in a Scrap Book of Elementary Mathematics by William F. White, as well as in Mathematical Recreations by Professor W. W. R. Ball.

This subject is somewhat allied as a mathematical curiosity with two other figures which come down to us through the Middle Ages, the Magic Pentagon or the Five Pointed Star, as a symbol of the School of Pythagoras, as in Figure 8, and the Magic Hexagram, Figure 9, commonly called the Shield of David and frequently used on synagogues, as Brother Carus points out. These two designs, Figures 8 and 9, have a peculiarity of that is not perhaps noticed at the first glance. They can be drawn by one stroke of the pencil, beginning at any point. If they be compared in this respect with any square having two diagonals the difference can soon be tested as the square is not capable of being drawn as a complete figure, including the two diagonals, with one stroke. In order to better illustrate the operation of drawing Figures 8 and 9, numerals have been attached to illustrate the movement of the pencil in tracing them out. Of course, they can be begun at any place in any one of the lines composing the figures.

MAGISTER CAEMENTARIORUM. A title applied in the Middle Ages to one who presided over the building of edifices, and means Master of the Masons.

MAGISTER HOSPITALIS. See Master of the Hospital.

MAGISTER LAPIDUM. Du Cange (Glossarium) defines this as Master Mason; and he cites the statutes of Marseilles as saying: "Tres Magistros Lapidis bonos et legales," that is, three good and lawful Masons "shall be selected to decide on all questions about water in the city."

MAGISTER MILITIAE CHRISTI. Latin, meaning Master of the Chivalry or Knight of Christ which see under this title.

MAGISTER PERRERIUS. A name given in the Middle Ages to a Mason; literally, a Master of Stones, from the French pierre, a stone.

MAGISTER TEMPLI. See Master of the Temple.

MAGISTRI COMACINI. See Comacine Masters; also Como.

MAGNA EST VERITAS ET PRAEVALEBIT. Latin, meaning The Truth is mighty, and will prevail. The motto of the Red Cross Degree, or Knights of the Red Cross.

MAGNAN, B. P. A

MAHER-SIIALAL-HASH-BAZ. The renowned disciple of Buddha Sakyamuni, who arranged the metaphysical portion of the sacred writings called Abhidharma.

MAHABHARATA. A Sanskrit poem, recounting the rivalries of the descendants of King Bharata, and occupying a place among the Shasters of the Hindus. It contains many thousand verses, written at various unknown periods since the completion of the Ramayana.

MAHAKASYAPA. The renowned disciple of Buddha Sakyamuni, who arranged the metaphysical portion of the sacred writings called Abhidharma.

MAHABER-SHALAL-HASH-BEIZ. Hebrew, as in יהוה הושלח משלח. Four Hebrew words which the prophet Isaiah was ordered to write upon a tablet, and which were afterward to be the name of his son. They signify, "make haste to the prey, fall upon the spoil," and were prognostic of the sudden attack of the Assyrians. They may be said, in their Masonic use, to be symbolic of the readiness for action which should distinguish a warrior, and are therefore of significant service in the system of Masonic Templarism.

MAIER, MICHAEL. A celebrated Rosicrucian and interpreter and defender of Rosicrucianism. He was born at Resinsburg, in Holstein, in 1568, and died at Magdeburg in 1620, Spence says 1622 (Encyclopaedia of Occultism, 1920) though the former figure is usually given. He is said to have been the first to introduce Rosicrucianism into England. He wrote many works on the system, among which the most noted are Atlanta Fugiens, 1618; Septimana Philosophica, 1620; De Fratemitate Rosae Crucis, 1618; and Lusus Serius, 1617. Some of his contemporaries having denied the existence of the Rosicrucian Order, Maier in his writings has refuted the calumnies and warmly defended the Society, of which, in one of his works, he speaks thus: "Like the Pythagoreans and Egyptians, the Rosicrucians exact vows of silence and secrecy. Ignorant men have treated the whole as a fiction; but this has arisen from the five years probation to which they subject even well-qualified novices before they are admitted to the higher mysteries, and within this period they are to learn how to govern their own tongues.

MAINE. Jeremy Gridley, Provincial Grand Master for Massachusetts, granted authority to Alexander Ross to constitute the first Lodge in Maine at Falmouth, afterwards Portland. Ross died November 24, 1768, and a petition signed by eleven Brethren was sent to John Rowe who succeeded Gridley. On March 30, 1769, he granted a new Charter, deputizing William Tyng to act as Master. In 1772 this Lodge resolved, as there was some dispute about the matter, to use the Ancient and Modern Rituals on alternate evenings. Maine was admitted into the Union of the States in 1819, at which time there were thirty-one Lodges in the new State. Twenty-nine of these at a meeting called by Simon Greenleaf agreed to constitute a Grand Lodge. On June 1, 1820, twenty-four Bodies were represented and chose their Grand Officers. William King, Governor of the State, was elected the first Grand Master. The disappearance of Morgan in 1826 and the consequent anti-Masonic feeling caused a great number of the Lodges in Maine as in New York and Pennsylvania to cease work for a considerable period. In 1870, however, the Craft had grown so strong again that there were one hundred and fifty-four Lodges at work in the State.

The Grand Chapter of Massachusetts granted a Warrant to organize a Chapter in Portland, February 12, 1805, as Mount Vernon Chapter. Montgomery, New Jerusalem, Jerusalem and Mount Vernon Chapters met in Convention at Portland on February 7, 1821, and adopted provisionally the Constitution of the Grand Chapter of Massachusetts. Companion Charles Fox of Portland was elected Grand High Priest and Companion James Lorin Child of Augusta, Grand Secretary. The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of Maine, thus constituted, was incorporated by special Act of the State Legislature, approved by the Governor, January 22, 1822. In the early days of Select Freemasonry in Maine a Council was organized, and worked under the General Grand Chapter. Later, when the General Grand Chapter gave up control of the Degrees, the Brethren organized three Councils—King Solomon, Mount Vernon and Jerusalem—all chartered by the Grand Council of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Three representatives of each of these Councils with twenty other Companions met in Convention at Portland, May 3, 1855, to organize a Grand Council. Companion Robert P. Dunlap of Brunswick was chosen chairman and elected Grand Puissant.

The date of Maine Commandery, No. 1, at Gardiner, is recorded in the Proceedings of 1856 as March 17, 1827, but in the Proceedings of 1916 it appears as May 14, 1821. Maine, No. 1; Portland, No. 2, and Saint John's, No. 3, met in Convention and constituted on May 5, 1852, the Grand Commandery of Maine.

Portland saw the first introduction of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite to the State. On May 14, 1857, were chartered the Yates Lodge of Perfection, the Portland Council of Princes of Jerusalem, and the Dunlap Chapter of Rose Croix. The Maine Consistory, Portland, was chartered May 22, 1862.
MALTA

It teaches us to correct the irregularities of temper, and, like enlightened reason, to curb the aspirations of unbridled ambition, to depress the malignity of envy, and to moderate the ebullition of anger. It removes from the mind all the excrescences of vice, and fits it, as a well-wrought stone, for that exalted station in the great temple of nature to which, as an emanation of the Deity, it is entitled.

The Mallet or Setting Maul is also an emblem of the Third Degree, and is said to have been the implement by which the stones were set up at the Temple. It is often improperly confounded with the Common Gavel.

The French Freemasons, to whom the word Gavel is unknown, uniformly use maillet, or mallet, in its stead, and confound its symbolic use, as the implement of the presiding officer, with the mallet of the English and American Mark Master.

MALTA. Anciently known as Melita (see Acts xxviii, 1). A small island in the Mediterranean Sea, which, although occupying only about 91 square miles, possessed for several centuries a greater degree of celebrity than was attached to any other territory of so little extent. It is now a possession of the British Government, but was occupied from 1530 to 1798 by the Knights Hospitalers, then called Knights of Malta, upon whom it was conferred in the former year by Charles V.

The Saint John's Lodge of Secrecy and Harmony is claimed to have assembled as a Lodge since 30 June 1788' (see Lane's Masonic Record, page 220).

On July 2, 1788, Secrecy and Harmony Lodge was reopened and on March 30 the following year it was warranted as No. 590 by the Grand Lodge of England. In 1815 Brother Waller R. Wright was appointed Provincial Grand Master.

Gibraltar was at one time part of the Malta Masonic territory and in 1914 there were five English Lodges located there.

Tunis became part of the Malta District in 1869.

MAN. Among the several significances of this word are the following:

1. Man has been called the Microcosm, or little world, in contradistinction to the Macrocosm, or great world, by some fanciful writers on metaphysics, by reason of a supposed correspondence between the different parts and qualities of his nature and those of the universe. But in Masonic symbolism the idea is borrowed from Christ and the Apostles, who repeatedly refer to man as a symbol of the Temple.

2. A man was inscribed on the standard of the Tribe of Reuben, and is borne on the Royal Arch banners as appropriate to the Grand Master of the Second Veil. It was also the charge in the third quarter of the arms of the Atholl Grand Lodge.

3. Der Mann, or the man, is the Second Degree of the German Union.

4. To be a man, not a woman, is one of the qualifications for Masonic initiation. It is the first, and therefore the most important, qualification mentioned in the ritual.

MAN or PERFECTED CREATION. The symbol representing perfected creation, which is "very common on ancient Hindu monuments in China," embraces so many of the Masonic emblems, and so directly refers to several of the elementary principles taught in philosophic Freemasonry, that it is here introduced with its explanations. Forlong, in his Faiths of Man, gives this arrangement:

A—is the Earth, or foundation on which all build.
Wa—Water, as in an egg, or as condensed fire and ether.
Ra—Fire, or the elements in motion.
Ka—Air, or wind—Juno, or Jo ni; a condensed element.
Cha—Ether, or Heaven, the cosmical Former.

The accompanying illustration shows a design that is frequently found in India.

MAN'S PERFECTED CREATION

As these symbols are readily interpretable by those conversant with Masonic hieroglyphs, it may be seen that the elements, in their ascending scale, show the perfected creation. Forlong remarks that:

As it was difficult to show the All-pervading Ether, Egypt for this purpose, surrounded her figures with a powder of stars instead of flame, which on Indra's garments were Yonis. This figure gradually developed, becoming in time a very concrete man, standing on two legs instead of a square base—the horns of the crescent, Air, being outstretched, formed the arms, and the refugent Flame, the head, which, with the Greeks and Romans, represented the Sun, or Fire, and gives Light to all. To this being, it was claimed, there were given seven senses; and thus, perfect and erect, stood Man, rising above the animal state.

A discussion of the subject is to be found in Chinese Thought, by Brother Paul Carus, a treatise of decided interest.

The seven senses were seeing, hearing, tasting, feeling, smelling, understanding, and speech (see Ecclesiasticus, in the Apocrypha xviii, 1-5):

"The Lord created man," and "They received the use of the five operations of the Lord; and in the sixth place he imparted (to) them understanding, and in the seventh speech, an interpreter of the cogitations thereof."

The words "seven senses" also occur in the poem of Taliasin, called Y Bid Mawr, or the Macrocosm (British Magazine, volume xxx, page 30). See further the Mysterium Magnum of Jacob Boehmen, which teaches "how the soul of man, or his inward holy body," was compounded of the seven properties under the influence of the seven planets:

I will adore my Father,
My God, my Supporter,
Who placed, throughout my head,
MANDATE. From the Latin, meaning That which is commanded. The Benedictine editors of Du Cange define vendatun as “Breve aut Edictum Regium,” that is, a Royal Brief or Edict, and mandamentum as “literae quibus magistratus aliquid mandat,” meaning, letters in which a magistrate commands anything. Hence the orders and decrees of a Grand Master or a Grand Lodge are called Mandates, and implicit obedience to them is a Masonic obligation. There is an appeal, yet not a suspensive one, from the Mandate of a Grand Master to the Grand Lodge, but there is none from the latter.

MANGO. The branches of this tree are a prominent feature in all Eastern religious ceremonies. The mango is the apple-tree of India, with which man, in Indian tale, tempted Eve.

MANGOURIT, MICHEL ANGE BERNARD DE. A distinguished member of the Grand Orient of France. He founded in 1776, at Rennes, the Rite of Sublimes Elus de la Vérité, or Sublime Elects of Truth, and of Dames of Mount Thabor. He also created the Masonic Literary Society of Free Thinkers, which existed for three years. He delivered lectures which were subsequently published under the title of Cour de Philosophie Maçonique, in 500 pages, quarto. He also delivered a great many lectures and discourses before various Lodges, several of which were published. He died, after a long and severe illness, February 17, 1829.

MANICHAEANS. Also termed Gnostics. A sect taking its rise in the middle of the third century, whose belief was in two eternal principles of good and evil. They derived their name from Manes, a philosopher of Persian birth, sometimes called Manicheaus. From the two principles of Ormuzd, and Ahriman was the author of the good, while Ahriman was the master spirit of evil. The two classes of neophytes were, the true, si reddi kan; the listeners, *sam*a. un.

MANICHEENS, LES FRERES. A secret Italian Society, founded, according to Thory (Acta Latomorum i, 325), and Clavel (Histoire Pittoresque, page 407) in the eighteenth century, at which the doctrines of Manes were set forth in several grades.

MANITOBA. Northern Light Lodge was granted a Dispensation in 1864 by Brother A. T. Pierson, then Grand Master in Minnesota. The new Lodge was organized at Fort Garry (Winnipeg) with Brother Dr. John Schultz as Worshipful Master but it ceased to exist after a few years’ work. When Red River Settlement, as it was then called, became the Province of Manitoba the Grand Lodge of Canada assumed Jurisdiction and chartered Prince Rupert’s Lodge, Winnipeg, in December, 1870. Prince Rupert, Lisgar, and Ancient Landmark Lodges held a Convention on May 12, 1875, and formed the Grand Lodge of Manitoba with the Rev. Dr. W. C. Clarke as Grand Master. Until the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were established and created Grand Lodges of their own the Grand Lodge of Manitoba controlled the Craft in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory as well as in Manitoba.

MANN, DER. German, meaning the Man, the second grade of the Deutsche Union.

MANNA, POT OF. Among the articles laid up in the Ark of the Covenant by Aaron was a Pot of Manna. In the Substitute Ark, commemorated in the Royal Arch Degree, there was, of course, a representation of it. Manna has been considered as a symbol of life; not the transitory, but the enduring one of a future world. Hence the Pot of Manna, Aaron’s Rod that budded anew, and the Book of the Law, which teaches Divine Truth, all found together, are appropriately considered as the symbols of that eternal life which it is the design of the Royal Arch Degree to teach.

MANNINGHAM, THOMAS. Dr. Thomas Manningham was a physician, of London, of much repute in the eighteenth century. He took an active interest in the concerns of Freemasonry, being Deputv Grand Master of England, 1852-6. According to Oliver (Revelations of a Square, page 86), he was thoroughly conversant with the prayer now so well known to the Fraternity, which was presented by him to the Grand Lodge, and adopted as a form of prayer to be used at the initiation of a candidate. Before that period, no prayer was used on such occasions, and the one composed by Manningham, Oliver says with the assistance of Anderson, which is doubtful, as Anderson died in 1739, is here given as a document of the time. It will be seen that in our day it has been somewhat modified, Preston making the first change; and that, originally used as one prayer, it has since been divided, in this country at least, into two, the first part being used as a prayer at the opening of a Lodge, and the latter at the initiation of a candidate.

Most Holy and Glorious Lord God, thou Architect of Heaven and Earth, who art the Giver of all good Gifts and Graces; and hast promised that where two or three are gathered together in thy Name, thou wilt be in the midst of them; in thy Name we assemble and meet together, most humbly beseeching thee to bless us in all our Undertakings: to give us thy Holy Spirit, to enlighten our minds with Wisdom and Understanding; that we may know and serve thee aight, that all our Doings may tend to thy Glory and the Salvation of our Souls. And we beseech thee, O Lord God, to bless this our present Undertaking, and to grant that this our Brother may dedicate his Life to thy Service, and be a true and faithful Brother amongst us. Encline him with Divine Wisdom, that he may, with the secrets of Masonry, be able to unfold the Mysteries of Godliness and Christianity. This we humbly beg, in the Name and for the Sake of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, Amen.

Doctor Manningham rendered other important services to Freemasonry by his advocacy of healthy reforms and his determined opposition to the schismatic efforts of the Antient Freemasons. He died February 3, 1794. The third edition of the Book of Constitutions (1756, page 258) speaks of him in exalted terms as “a diligent and active officer.” Two interesting letters written by Doctor Manningham are given at length in Gould’s Concise History of Free-
P. 617

MASONRY (pages 328-34); one dated December 3, 1756, and addressed to what was then the Provincial Grand Lodge of Holland, refusing leave for the holding of Scotch Lodges and pointing out that Freemasonry is the same in all parts of the world; and another dated July 12, 1757, also dealing with the so-called Scotch Freemasonry, and explaining that its orders of Knighthood were unknown in England, where the only Orders known are those of Masters, Fellow Crafts, and Apprentices.

We may add to the above article, written by Brother Hawkins, regarding the prayer, a further comment upon its age. With the addition of the word new preceding Brother it is found in the edition of the Constitutions, printed at Dublin, 1730, and reprinted by Brother Richard Spencer, 1870. This seems to antedate the activity of Doctor Manningham.

MANTEL. A dress placed over all the others. It is of very ancient date, being a part of the costume of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. Among the Anglo-Saxons it was the decisive mark of military rank, being confined to the cavalry. In the medieval ages, and on the institution of chivalry, the long, trailing mantle was especially reserved as one of the insignia of knighthood, and was worn by the knight as the most august and noble decoration that he could have, when he was not dressed in his armor. The general color of the mantle, in imitation of that of the Roman soldiers, was scarlet, which was lined with ermine or other precious furs. But some of the Orders wore mantles of other colors. Thus the Knights Templar were clothed with a white mantle having a red cross on the breast, and the Knights Hospitaler a black mantle with a white cross. The mantle is still worn in England and other countries of Europe as a mark of rank on state occasions by peers, and by some magistrates as a token of official rank.

MANTELS OF HONOR. The mantle worn by a knight was called the Mantle of Honor. This mantle was presented to a knight whenever he was made by a knight.

MANUSCRIPTS. Anderson tells us, in the second edition of his Constitutions, that in the year 1717 Grand Master Payne "desired any Brethren to bring to the Grand Lodge any old writings and records concerning Masons and Masonry, in order to show the usages of ancient times, and several old copies of the Gothic Constitutions were produced and collated" (Constitutions, 1738, page 110); but in consequence of a jealous supposition that it would be wrong to com-mit anything to print which related to Freemasonry, an act of Masonic vandalism was perpetrated. For Anderson further informs us (page 111), that in 1720, "at some private Lodges, several very valuable manuscripts, for they had nothing yet in print, concerning the Fraternity, their Lodges, Regulations, Charges, Secrets, and Usages, particularly one written by Mr. Nicholas Stone, the Warden of Inigo Jones, were too hastily burnt by some scrupulous Brothers, that those papers might not fall into strange hands." The recent labors of Masonic scholars in England, among whom the late William James Hughan deserves especial notice, have succeeded in rescuing many of the old Masonic manuscripts from oblivion, and we are now actually in possession of more of these heretofore unpublished treasures of the Craft than were probably accessible to Anderson and his contemporaries (see Records, Old, and Manuscripts, Old).

MANUSCRIPTS, APOCRYPHAL. There are certain documents that at various times have been accepted as genuine, but which are now rejected, and considered to be fabrications, by most, if not by all, critical Masonic writers. The question of their authenticity has been thoroughly gone into by Brother R. F. Gould (History of Freemasonry, chapter xi), and he places them all "within the category of Apocryphal Manuscripts."

The first is the Leland-Locke Manuscript (see Leland Manuscript).

The second is the Steinmetz Catechism, given by Krause as one of the three oldest documents belonging to the Craft, but of which Gould says, "there appears to me nothing in the preceding 'examination' (or catechism) that is capable of sustaining the claims to antiquity which have been advanced on its behalf."

The third is the Malcolm Canmore Charter, which came to light in 1806, consequent upon the "claim of the Glasgow Freemens Operative Saint John's Lodge to take precedence of the other Lodges in the Masonic procession, at the laying of the foundation-stone of Nelson's Monument on Glasgow Green, although at that time it was an independent organization."

According to the Charter, the Glasgow Saint John's Lodge was given priority over all the other Lodges in Scotland by Malcolm III, King of Scots, in 1051. The controversy as to the document was lively, but finally it was pronounced to be a manufactured parchment, and the Grand Lodge of Scotland declined to recognize it of value.

The fourth is that of Krause, known as Prince Edwin's Constitution of 926. Upon this unquestioned reliance had for decades been placed, then it came to be doubted, and is now little credited by inquiring Freemasons. Brother Gould closes with the remark:

The original document, as commonly happens in forgeries of this description, is missing; and how, under all the circumstances of the case Krause could have constituted himself the champion of its authenticity, it is difficult to conjecture. Possibly, however, the explanation may be, that in impostures of this character, credulity, on the one part, is a strong temptation to deceit on the other, especially to deceit of which no personal injury is the consequence, and which flatters the student of old documents with his own ingenuity.

These remarks, says Brother Hawkins, who prepared this article, are specially quoted as relating to almost all apocryphal documents.
The fifth is the Charter of Cologne, a document in cipher, bearing the date June 24, 1535, as to which see Cologne, Charter of.

The sixth is the Larmenius Charter, or The Charter of Transmission, upon which rests the claims of the French Order of the Temple to being the lineal successors of the historic Knights Templar, for which see Temple, Order of the.

MANUSCRIPTS, OLD. The following is a list, arranged as far as possible in sequence of age, of the old Masonic Manuscripts, now usually known as the Old Charges. They generally consist of three parts—

5. Lansadowne. about 1600. British Museum. In Freemasons' Quarterly Review, 1848; in Freemasons' Magazine, 1885; in Hughan's Old Charges, 1872; by the Quatuor Coronati Lodge in 1890.

MARCHESHVAN. מָרְכֵּהָשֶׁבָן. The second month of the Jewish civil year. It begins with the new moon in November, and corresponds, therefore, to a part of that month and of December.

MARCONIS, GABRIEL MATHIEU, more frequently known as De Negre, from his dark complexion, was the founder and first Grand Master and Grand Hierophant of the Rite of Memphis, brought by Sam'l Honis, a native of Cairo, from Egypt, in 1814, who with Baron Dumas and the Marquis de la Rogne, founded a Lodge of the Rite at Montauban, France, on April 30, 1815, which was closed March 7, 1816. In a work entitled The Sanctuary of Memphis, by Jacques Etienne Marconis, the author—presumptively the son of G. M. Marconis—who styles himself the founder of the Rite of Memphis, thus briefly gives an account of its origin: “The Rite of Memphis, or Oriental Rite, was introduced into Europe by Ormus, a seraphic priest of Alexandria and Egyptian sage, who had been converted by Saint Mark, and reformed the doctrines of the Egyptians in accordance with the principles of Christianity. The disciples of Ormus continued until 1118 to be the sole guardians of ancient Egyptian wisdom, as purified by Christianity and Solomonian science. This science they communicated to the Templars. They were then known by the title of Knights of Palestine, or Brethren Rose Croix of the East. In them the Rite of Memphis recognizes its immediate founders.”

The above, coming from the Grand Hierophant and founder, should satisfy the most scrupulous as to the conversion of Ormus by Saint Mark, and his then introducing the Memphis Rite. But Marconis continues as to the main object and the underlying intention of his Rite:

The Masonic Rite of Memphis is a combination of the ancient mysteries; it taught the first men to render homage to the Deity. Its dogmas are based on the principles of humanity; its mission is the study of that wisdom which serves to discern truth; it is the beneficent dawn of the development of reason and intelligence; it is the worship of the qualities of the human heart and the impression of its virtues; in fine, it is the echo of religious toleration, the union of all belief, the bond between all men, the symbol of sweet illusions of hope, preaching the faith in God that saves, and the charity that blesses.

We are further told by the Hierophant founder that:

The Rite of Memphis is the sole depository of High Masonry, the true Primitive Rite, the Rite par excellence, which has come down to us without any alteration, and is consequently the only Rite that can justify its origin. It is the worship of the qualities of the human heart and the impression of its virtues; in fine, it is the echo of religious toleration, the union of all belief, the bond between all men, the symbol of sweet illusions of hope, preaching the faith in God that saves, and the charity that blesses.

The above is enough to reveal the character of the father and reputed son for truth, as also of the institution founded by them, which, like the firefly, is seen now here, now there, but with no steady beneficial light (see Memphis, Rite of).

MARCONIS, JACQUES ETIENNE. Born at Montauban, January 3, 1795; died at Paris, November 21, 1868 (see the preceding article, also Memphis, Rite of).

MARDUK. A victorious warrior-god, described on one of the Assyrian clay tablets of the British Museum, who was said to have engaged the monster Tiamat in a cosmogonic struggle. He was armed with a namzar, grappling-hook; ariktu, lance; shibbu, lasso; qashtu, bow; zizpau, club; and kabab, shield, together with a dirk in each hand.

MARIA ORDER. A Norwegian secret society exclusively for women. The avowed purpose is to bind the members in a strong faithful body, to improve the consciousness of self, and to use familiar symbols for the furtherance of common ideals. The Freemasonry of Norway has had a friendly attitude toward this organization which was started officially in January, 1917, when the first Lodge was consecrated in Christiania; the second was dedicated in Bergen in April, 1922, and the third in Stavenger, in October, 1924. Above translated from the Norwegian, for Palmer Templegram, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, May, 1925.

MARIA THERESA. Empress of Austria, who showed great hostility to Freemasonry, presumably from religious leanings and advisers. Her husband was Francis I, elected Emperor of Germany in 1745. He was a zealous Freemason, and had been initiated at The Hague in 1731, at a Special Lodge, at which Lord Chesterfield and Doctor Desaguliers were present. He was raised at Houghton Hall, the same year, while on a visit to England. He assisted to found the Lodge Drei Kanonen, at Vienna, constituted in 1742. During the forty years' reign of Maria Theresa, Freemasonry was tolerated in Vienna doubtless through the intercession of the Emperor. It is stated in the Pocket Companion of 1754, one hundred grenadiers were sent to break up the Lodge, taking twelve prisoners, the Emperor escaping by a back staircase. He answered for and freed the twelve prisoners. His son, Emperor Joseph, inherited good-will to Freemasonry. He was Grand Master of the Viennese Freemasons at the time of his death.

MARK. The appropriate jewel of a Mark Master. It is made of gold or silver, usually of the former metal, and must be in the form of a keystone. On the obverse or front surface, the device or Mark selected by the owner must be engraved within a circle composed of the following letters: H. T. W. S. T. K. S. On the reverse or posterior surface, the name of the owner, the name of his Chapter, and the date of his advancement, may be inscribed, although this is not absolutely necessary. The Mark consists of the device and surrounding inscription on the obverse.

The Mark jewel, as prescribed by the Supreme Grand Chapter of Scotland, is of mother-of-pearl. The circle on one side is inscribed with the Hebrew letters תודרין, and the circle on the other side with letters containing the same meaning in the vernacular tongue of the country in which the Chapter is situated, and the weaver's mark in the center. The Hebrew letters are the initials of a Hebrew sentence equivalent to the English one familiar to Mark Masons. It is but a translation into Hebrew of the English mystical sentence.

It is not requisite that the device or Mark should be of a strictly Masonic character, although Masonic emblems are frequently selected in preference to other subjects. As soon as adopted it should be drawn or described in a book kept by the Chapter for that purpose, and it is then said to be "recorded in the Mark Book or Book of Marks," after which time it can never be changed by the possessor for any other, or altered in the slightest degree, but remains as his Mark to the day of his death.

This Mark is not a mere ornamental appendage of the Degree, but is a sacred token of the rites of friendship and brotherly love, and its presentation at any time by the owner to another Mark Master, would claim, from the latter, certain acts of friendship which are of solemn obligation among the Fraternity. A Mark thus presented, for the purpose of obtaining a favor, is said to be pledged; though remaining in the possession of the owner, it ceases, for any actual purposes of advantage, to be his property; nor can it be again used by him until, either by the return of the favor, or with the consent of the benefactor, it has been redeemed; for it is a positive law of the Order, that no Mark Master shall "pledge his Mark a second time until he has redeemed it from its previous pledge."

By this wise provision, the unworthy are prevented from making an improper use of this valuable token, or from levying contributions on their hospitable Brethren.

Marks or pledges of this kind were of frequent use among the ancients, under the name of tessera hospitalis and arrhabo. The nature of the tessera hospitalis, or, as the Greeks called it, στίβωσις, cannot be better described than in the words of the Scholiast on the Medea of Euripides (v 613), where Jason promises Medea, on her parting from him, to send her the... symbols of hospitality which should procure her a kind reception in foreign countries. It was the custom, says the Scholiast, when a guest had been entertained, to break a die in two parts, one of which parts was retained by the guest, so that if, at any future period he required assistance, on exhibiting the broken pieces of the die to each other, the friendship was renewed.

Plautus, about two hundred years before Christ, in one of his comedies, gives us an exemplification of the manner in which these tesserae or pledges of friendship were used at Rome, whence it appears that the privileges of this friendship were extended to the descendants of the contracting parties. Poenulus is introduced, inquiring for Agorastocles, with whose family he had formerly exchanged the tessera.

Ag. Squidem Antidimarchi quaceris adoptatitium.

Ego sum ipse quem tu quocis.

Poen. Hem! quid ego audio?

Ag. Antidamae me gnatum esse.

Poen. Si eis eat, tesseraem

Conferre si vis hospitalem, eecam, attuli,

Ag. Agedum huc ostende; est par probe; nam habeo domum.

Poen. O mi hospes, salve multurn; nam mihi tuus date.

*Pater tuus ergo hospes, Antidamas fuit:

Haee mihi hospita tessera cum illo fuit. —Poenul., act. v, sc. 2, ver. 85.

Ag. Antidimarcus' adopted son,

If you do seek, I am the very man.

Poen. Ah! Do I hear aright?

Ag. I am the son

Of old Antidamus.

Poen. If so, I pray you

Compare with me the hospitable die

I've brought this with me.

Ag. Pruthe, let me see it.

It is, indeed, the very counterpart

Of mine at home.

Poen. All hail, my welcome guest,

Your father was my honored guest, Antidamus.

Your father was my honored guest, and then

This hospitable die with me he parted.

These tesserae, thus used, like the Mark Master's Mark for the purposes of perpetuating friendship and rendering its union more sacred, were constructed in the following manner: they took a small piece of bone, ivory, or stone, generally of a square or cubical form, and dividing it into equal parts, each wrote his own name, or some other inscription, upon one of the pieces; then they made a mutual exchange, and, lest falling into other hands it should give occasion to imposture, the pledge was preserved with the greatest sacred, and one knew the name inscribed upon it except the possessor.

The primitive Christians seem to have adopted a similar practise, and the tessera was carried by them in their travels, as a means of introduction to their 同胞s. A favorite inscription with them was the letters Π, T, Α, Π, being the initials of Πατὴρ, Τάτα, Αγέρα, or Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.
The use of these tesserae, in the place of written certificates, continued, says Doctor Harris (Dissertations on the Tesserae Hospitalis), until the eleventh century, at which time they are mentioned by Burchardus, Archbishop of Worms, in a visitation charge.

The arrhabo was a similar keepsake, formed by breaking a piece of money in two. The etymology of this word shows distinctly that the Romans borrowed the custom of these pledges from the ancient Israelites, for it is derived from the Hebrew ἄρραβον, meaning a pledge.

With this detail of the customs of the ancients before us, we can easily explain the well-known passage in Revelation ii, 17: "To him that overcometh will I give a white stone, and in it a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."
That is, to borrow the interpretation of Harris, "To him that overcometh will I give a pledge of my af-fecion, which shall constitute him my friend, and title him to privileges and honors of which none else can know the value or the extent." The White Stone of Revelation ii, 17, has been understood as perhaps referring to the Tessera Gladiatrix given to the victor in the arena.

MARKHAM, EDWIN. Poet, born at Oregon City, Oregon, April 23, 1852, initiated, passed and raised in Acacia Lodge, No. 92, at Coloma, California, was in 1924 nominated in the Grand Lodge of Oregon for the position of Poet Laureate of the United States.
Brother Markham has been farmer, sheep-herder, blacksmith, and superintendent of public schools.
His splendid poem, The Man with the Hoe, made him internationally famous in 1899 though he already had written verses for years and has published books of poetry, essays, and other works.

MARK MAN. According to Masonic tradition, the Mark Men were the Wardens, as the Mark Masters were the Masters of the Fellow Craft Lodges, at the building of the Temple. They distributed the marks to the workmen, and made the first inspection of the work, which was afterward to be approved by the overseers. As a Degree, the Mark Man is not recognized in the United States. In England it is sometimes, but not generally, worked as preparatory to the Degree of Mark Master. In Scotland, in 1778, it was given to Fellow Crafts, while the Mark Master was restricted to Master Masons. It was not recognized in the regulations of the Supreme Grand Chapter of Scotland. Much of the esoteric ritual of the Mark Man has been incorporated into the Mark Master of the American System.

MARK MASTER. The Fourth Degree of the American Rite. The traditions of the Degree make it of great historical importance, since by them we are informed that by its influence each Operative Mason at the building of the Temple was known and distinguished, and the disorder and confusion which might otherwise have attended so immense an undertaking was completely prevented. Not less useful is it in its symbolic significion. As illustrative of the Fellow Craft, the Fourth Degree is particularly directed to the inculcation of order, regularity, and discipline. It teaches us that we should discharge all the duties of our several stations with precision and punctuality; that the work of our hands and the thoughts of our hearts should be good and true—not unfinished and imperfect, not sinful and defective—but such as the Great Overseer and Judge of heaven and earth will see fit to approve as a worthy oblation from his creatures.

If the Fellow Craft's Degree is devoted to the inculcation of learning, that of the Mark Master is intended to instruct us how that learning can most usefully and judiciously be employed for our own honor and the profit of others. And it holds forth to the desponding the encouraging thought that although our motives may sometimes be misinterpreted by our erring fellow mortals, our attainments be underrated, and our reputations be traduced by the envious and our honour there is one, at least, that the eyes of man, but may yet make that stone which the builders rejected, the head of the corner. The intimate connection then, between the Second and Fourth Degrees of Freemasonry, is this, that while one inculcates the necessary exercise of all the duties of life, the other teaches the importance of performing them with systematic regularity. The true Mark Master is a type of that man mentioned in the sacred parable, “Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord” (Matthew xxv, 21).

In America, the Mark Master’s is the first Degree given in a Royal Arch Chapter. Its officers are a Right Worshipful Master, Senior and Junior Wardens, Secretary, Treasurer, Senior and Junior Deacons, Master, Senior and Junior Overseers. The Degree cannot be conferred when less than six are present, who, in that case, must be the first and last three officers above named. The working tools are the Mallet and Indenting Chisel, which see. The symbolic color is purple. The Mark Master’s Degree is now given in England under the authority of the Grand Lodge of Mark Masters, which was established in June, 1856 and is a Jurisdiction independent of the Grand Lodge. The officers are the same as in America, with the addition of a Chaplain, Director of Ceremonies, Assistant Director, Registrar of Marks, Inner Glaister, or King, Keeper, and two Stewards. Master Masons are eligible for initiation. Brother Hughan says that the Degree is virtually the same in England, Scotland, and Ireland. It differs, however, in some respects from the American Degree.

In a letter to the Masonic Home Journal, Louisville, Kentucky (see Proceedings, Grand Chapter, Royal Arch Masons, Michigan, 1920), Companion Alfred A. A. Murray offers the following note to correct an error relating to the Mark Degree in Scotland:

As regards the Mark Degree itself it was not worked in the Fellow Craft Lodges, but there were really two Degrees, namely, that of Mark Man, which was given to a Fellow Craft, and that of Mark Master, which was given to a Master Mason. The Degree of Mark Man was worked down to within fifty years ago by various Craft Lodges, and given to Fellow Crafts. The Degree of Mark Master was conferred as a separate Degree in the same way as the Royal Arch, and was expressly cut off by the Grand Lodge of Scotland, about 1800, in the same way that the Royal Arch and the Temple were cut off. Before the date of the above mentioned by an inner circle of the Lodge as a sort of side issue not under the Grand Lodge of Scotland at all. The Royal Arch and the Temple were, after 1800, organized as governing Bodies, and then the Mark Master Degree was taken under the sole control of the Supreme Grand Chapter, and continued so ’til, as I say, about fifty years ago, when an agreement was made between the Grand Lodge and the Temple for the union of both. Prior to that time, when a Fellow Craft became a Master Mason and Mark Master were to be amalgamated, and were to be conferred under the authority of either Body, but only upon Master Masons. It is wise to get a clear statement made upon this point, because I observe a very large amount of mistaken information is being printed from time to time, which is derived from confusion of thought and want of knowledge, and results sometimes in mistaken action.

During the centuries which immediately preceded the establishment of the premier Grand Lodge of England and the World, the Mark Degree was dispensed with. The head of the corner, this fact that differentiates the Mark Degree from all other ceremonies additional to the first three, and justified the formation of the Mark Grand Lodge, nearly fifty years ago, so as to have under its wing those Lodges which worked with interesting and suggestive ceremony, the English Craft agreement excluding it from the formally recognized series, according to the Articles of Union of A.D. 1513-4.

The antiquity of Mark Masonry cannot be doubted. Operatively considered and even speculatively, it has enjoyed special prominence for centuries; records of the curiously selected name of Brother Hughan (Trestle Board, California, volume xxii, No. 4, October, 1919) wrote:

MARK MASTER'S WAGES. Companion George W. Warvelle commented thus upon the long-established custom of a penny a day paid as the wages of a Mark Master:

This ridiculously low wage scale seems to have been characteristic of the early American ritualists. In my possession two old English rituals, of Mark Man and Mark Mason, in both of which there is a specification of wages. In the former the rate was ‘nine shillings, equal to one pound, two shillings, six pence of our money,’ and in the latter it was ‘two shillings, six pence of our money.’ What the present rate may be in England I am unable to say, but no Englishman would work for the beggarly stipend paid in the American Mark Lodges. However, I declined to believe, however, that our English Brethren have fixed these abnormally high prices to make up for the actual wages formerly paid in England to the Operative Craft. As late as the year 1689 the wages of Freemasons were prescribed by law at one shilling and four pence a day. To demand more subjected them to severe penalties. In fact, it was really the passing of restrictive laws commencing about 1561 that led to the present speculative institution, and Masonic scholars of eminence assign the year 1424 as the cessation of English Freemasonry as a strictly operative association (from Tyler Keystone, Michigan, December, 1914).

MARK OF THE CRAFT, REGULAR. In the Mark Degree there is a certain stone which is said, in the instructions, not to have upon it the regular mark of the Craft. This expression is derived from the following tradition of the Degree. At the building of the Temple, each workman placed his own mark upon his own materials, so that the workmanship of every Freemason might be readily distinguished, and praise or blame be justly awarded. These marks, according to the lectures, consisted of mathematical figures, squares, angles, lines, and perpendiculars, and hence it should have been the same as that which was struck in the practice of the Operative Craft. No system there are no Mason's Marks on any known historic and ancient Jewish building, or at least if so I am not aware of it. Indeed, a single Mason's Mark has ever been found. Indeed, the Marks do not express any other necessary purposes. While the actual wording of the instructions do not express this, it is this is commonly understood to be implied. The old ritual of Chapter Esk, No. 42, however, expressly says, "straight or curved lines." There may be others giving the same reading. Among the old Masonic Masters of the sixteenth centuries genuine curved Marks are by no means unknown, but are very few. For instance, at Fortrose Cathedral out of 265 Marks there is only one with curved lines—representing a vessel. A heart is also an emblem not uncommon. But, on the whole, out of the many thousand specimens from the thirteenth century downwards, it is almost unusual to find a Mark with curved lines. The Symmetry of Masons are linear and the descendants of the Operative Craft, though not the only branch, and theoretically they are subject to the same rules of work and interpretation as the Body from the branch.

The first question which arises is as to the regulation about the number of points. This regulation may hold with the present speculative systems, but it has nothing what so ever to do with the Mark Degree. The former has no foundation in fact, except that the fee was "one mark, Is 1/2d., neither more nor less. The theory held by some is that the Mark was, and still supposed to be, made by the workman with the edge of a chisel, not by its corner point, so that each stroke will make nothing but a straight line. There should of course apply to the Mark of a Fellow or Master Mason, but I should rather think the Mark cut on a stone would be made by a pointed chisel, and therefore that so far it would be conveniently possible to form a curved figure. As the Mark was made to strike a stone, it should have been the same as that which was struck on the blade of the Mason's own tools to identify them in the boxes, or when returned from sharpening, or for any other necessary purposes. While the actual wording of the instructions do not expressly say straight lines, this is still supposed to be, made by the workman with the edge of a chisel, not by its corner point, so that each stroke therefore will make nothing but a straight line. The Grand Lodge of Scotland has never, so far as can be ascertained, laid down any rule whatever, and does not claim any responsibility for any ritual on the subject. The way, therefore, appears to be quite open to this Committee to suggest a definite ruling for themselves, and not let others formulate their own instructions as they stand at present substantially consist of a direction that any Mark adopted by a candidate and member must consist of any number of odd points connected by lines, with the exception of one special figure containing three points, such as a triangle. The Grand Lodge of England, on 14th December, 1864, the regulation confining Speculative Masons' Marks to any specified number of points was abrogated. But straight lines are imperative.

In America, so far as can be ascertained, there is no rule specifying what should be selected as a Mark, this being left entirely to the candidate himself to determine. The Grand Lodge of Scotland has never, so far as can be ascertained, laid down any rule whatever, and does not claim any responsibility for any ritual on the subject. The way, therefore, appears to be quite open to this Committee to suggest a definite ruling for themselves, and not let others formulate their own instructions as they stand at present substantially consist of a direction that any Mark adopted by a candidate and member must consist of any number of odd points connected by lines, with the exception of one special figure containing three points. The Grand Lodge of England, on 14th December, 1864, the regulation confining Speculative Masons' Marks to any specified number of points was abrogated. But straight lines are imperative.
sented his own Mark. It is absurd to suppose that he suffered because he used the triangle instead of his proper Mark. The American ritual I have seen solves this difficulty by making the Mark Master present and withdraw his hand in a different way to that of his workman.

Assuming, however, that the rule according to the ritual is to be observed, a difficulty arises as to what precisely is meant by a point. One answer is given on which the Warrant to Lodge Canongate Kilwinning was granted, nine out of the twelve petitioners append the Mark and in no part of it in the middle. The instruction is that the Mark must have a certain number of odd points connected by straight lines. Now every straight line consists of an innumerable number of odd points connected by a straight line and implies that every point in a straight line is not to be counted solely because it is in that line. Any point to be counted must be selected for some other reason. Now, according to this definition, a point on the end of a straight line must be and are intended to be counted because they are the points which are connected by a straight line. It is therefore beyond question that any point which is the beginning, or ending, of one or more straight lines must be a point to be counted according to the rules of the Degree.

The difficulty arises as to the counting when two straight lines intersect, or rather when they not merely intersect but one another. In the first Minute-Book of the Roman Eagle Lodge, when the Mark Degree was introduced in 1755, a large number of the transgressing Marks ceases for several decades. As in the case of the Sacred Law, an irradiated star, and a laurel branch, etc., all drawn illustratively. There are also instances of, say, a shield with a triangle or a cross, or some entirely separate figure within it. The instruction is that the Mark must have a certain simplicity of the rule is greatly in its favour. It would involve, however, that the ritual should be subject to a slight correction to bring it into conformity with the rules. Further information will be found in Doctor Mackey's revised History of Freemasonry, some sixty-five items being indexed. Many valuable references to the subject are in the Appendix to the Proceedings (Grand Chapter, Royal Arch Masons, Michigan, 1920), contributed by Companion Charles A. Conover, General Grand Secretary. Additional references are in a paper read by Professor George Godwin, Royal Institute of British Architects, 1868; four articles by John E. Dove, Builder, London, April 4 and 18, June 6, and July 11, 1863, also a paper on Masonry and Masons' Marks, Brother T. Hayter Lewis, Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge (volume iii, 1890).

MARK TWAIN. The pen name of Samuel Langhorne Clemens, famous American humorist, born November 30, 1835, at Florida, Missouri. He petitioned Polar Star Lodge No. 79 of St. Louis under date of December 26, 1860, as follows: The subscriber, residing in Saint Louis, of lawful age and by occupation a printer, begs leave to state that he is not biased by friends and uninfluenced by mercenary motives he freely and voluntarily offers himself as a candidate for the mysteries of Masonry and that he is prompted to solicit this privilege by a favorable opinion conceived of the Institution, a desire of knowledge and sincere wish of being serviceable to his fellow creatures. Should his petition be granted he will cheerfully conform to all the ancient established usages and customs of the Fraternity. Recommended by John M. Leavenworth, Tom Moore. Committee: H. T. Taylor, Drezit, Wannall.

(Signed) Sam L. Clemens.

The petition was received on the same day and the Committee made a favorable report February 18, 1861. He was Initiated May 22, 1861, Passed, June 12, 1861, and Raised July 10, 1861. On June 12, he paid the Lodge $20 cash and made a further payment of $10 on July 10. During a trip that he made to Palestine he sent his Lodge at St. Louis a mallet accompanied by the following memorandum:

This Mallet is of Cedar cut in the Forest of Lebanon, whence Solomon obtained the Timbers for the Temple. The handle was cut by Brother Clemens himself from a cedar planted just outside the walls of Jerusalem by Brother Godfrey DeBoullion, the first Christian Conqueror of that City, nineteenth of July, 1099. This gavel in its present form was made at Alexandria, Egypt, by order of Brother Clemens.

In 1869 he asked for a dimut but this is not known to have ever been presented to any Lodge.

MARKS OF THE CRAFTSMEN

Mark Twain has many racy books of travel and adventure, as well as a number of humorous autobiographical novels to his credit. He received the degree of Doctor of Literature from Oxford. For many years he was considered the most outstanding and popular American personality in the world of letters. During the later years of his life he was able to amass a considerable fortune although most of his life was harassed by a constant struggle against poverty. He died at Redding, Connecticut, on April 21, 1910.

MARKS OF THE CRAFT. In former times, Operative Masons, the Steinmetzen, or Stone Cutters, of Germany, were accustomed to place some mark or sign of their own invention, which, like the monogram of Germany, were accustomed to place some mark or life was harassed by a constant struggle against poverty. He died at Redding, Connecticut, on April 21, 1910.

In the ancient buildings of England and France, these marks are to be found in great abundance. In a communication, on this subject, to the London Society of Antiquaries, Professor George Godwin states that, “in my opinion, these marks, if collected and compared might assist in connecting the various bands of operatives, who, under the protection of the Craft—mystically united—spread themselves over Europe during the Middle Ages, and are known as Freemasons.” Professor Godwin describes these marks as varying in length from two to seven inches, and as formed by a single line, slightly indented, consisting chiefly of crosses, well-known Masonic symbols, emblems of the Trinity and of eternity, the double triangle, trowel, square, etc. The same writer observes that, in a conversation, in September, 1844, with a mason at work on the Canterbury Cathedral, he “found that many Masons, all who were Freemasons, had their mystic marks handed down from generation to generation; this man had his mark from his father, and he received it from his grandfather.”

They’re traced in lines on the Parthenon, Inscribed by the subtle Greek:
And Roman legions have carved them on Walls, roads and arch antique:
Long ere the Goth, with vandal hand,
Gave scope to his envy dark,
The Mason Craft in many a land
Has graven its Mason Mark.
The obelisk old and the pyramids,
Around which a mystery clings—
The hieroglyphs on the coffin lids
Of weird Egyptian kings,—
Syria, Carthage and Pompeii,
Burdied and strewned stark and stark,
Have marble records that will not die,
Their primitive Mason Mark.
Upon column and frieze and capital,
In the eye of the chaste volute,—
On Scotia's curve, or in astroagal,
Or in triglyph's channel acute,—
Cut somewhere on the entablature,
And oft, like a sudden spark,
Flashing a light on a date obscure,
Shines many a Mason Mark.
These Craftsmen old had a genial whim,
That nothing could e'er destroy,
With a love of their art that naught could dim,
They toiled with a chronic joy;
Nothing was too complex to essay,
In aught they dashed to embark;
They triumphed on many an Appian Way,
Where they'd left their Mason Mark.
Crossing the Alps like Hannibal,
Or skirting the Pyranees,
On peak and plain, in crypt and cell,
On foot or on bandaged knees;—
From Tiber to Danube, from Rhine to Seine,
They needed no 'letters of marque';
Their art was their passport in France and Spain,
And in Britain their Mason Mark.
The monolith gray and Druid chair,
The pillars and towers of Giel,
In Ogham occult their age they bear,
That time can only reveal.
Live on, old monuments of the past,
Our beacons through ages dark!
In primal majesty still you'll last,
Endeared by each Mason Mark. —Anonymous.

MARROW IN THE BONE. An absurd corruption of a Jewish word, and still more absurdly said to be its translation. It has no appropriate signification in the place to which it is applied, but was once religiously believed in by many Freemasons, who, being ignorant of the Hebrew language, accepted it as a true interpretation. It is now universally rejected by the intelligent circle of the Craft.

MARSEILLES, MOTHER LODGE OF. A Lodge was established in 1748, at Marseilles, in France, by the name of Saint Jean de Ecosse. It afterward assumed the name of Mother Lodge of Marseillees, and still later the name of Scottish Mother Lodge of France. It granted Warrants of its own authority for Lodges in France and in the Colonies.

MARSHAL. An officer common to several Masonic Bodies, whose duty it is to regulate processions and other public solemnities. In Grand Bodies he is called a Grand Marshal. In the American Royal Arch System, the Captain of the Host acts on public occasions as the Marshal. The Marshal's ensign of office is a baton or short rod. The office of Marshal in State affairs is very ancient. It was found in the court of the Byzantine emperors, and was introduced into England from France at the period of the conquest. His badge of office was at first a rod or verge, which was afterward changed to the baton, for, as an old writer has observed, Thimne, "the verge or rod was the ensign of him who had authority to reform evil in warre and in peace, and to see quiet and order observed among the people."

MARSHALL, JOHN. Born in Virginia, September 24, 1755; died July 6, 1835. Secretary of State, 1800, then first Chief Justice of the United States, serving for thirty-four years, and had been an officer, lieutenant and then captain, in the American Revolution. He was a famous Freemason, a member of Lodge No. 13 at Richmond and instrumental with Edmund Randolph, Governor of Virginia, 1786, and also Grand Master, in establishing the two Lodges, Richmond No. 10, and Richmond-Randolph No. 19, the latter Lodge performing the Masonic rites at Brother Marshall's funeral. He served as Deputy Grand Master of Virginia and from October 28, 1793, was Grand Master for two terms during which nine Communications were held (see Washington, the Man and the Mason, Charles H. Callahan, 1913, pages 261–2, and New Age, July, 1924).

MARTEL. Charles Martel, or Charles the Hammer, born in 688, died in 741, although not actually King, was the ruler and reigned over France under the title of Mayor of the Palace. He was a notable soldier, defeating the Saracens at Poitiers in 732, and again in 737 driving them from Languedoc. Rebold (History, page 69) says that "at the request of the Anglo-Saxon kings, he sent workmen and Masters into England." The Operative Masons of the Middle Ages considered him as one of their patrons, and give the following account of him in their Legend of the Craft (see Grand Lodge Manuscript No. 1, Quatuor Coronati Lodge Reprints, volume iv).

Curious Craftes men walked about full wyde in Dry's Countries soome to learn more Craffe and conning & some to teache them that had but little conning and so yt befell that their was on' Curious Masson that height Naymus grecus that had byn at the making of Sallomons Temple & he came into fraince and there he taught the Science of massonrey to men of fraince And there was one of the Regall lyne of fraince that height Charles Martell. And he was A man that Loved well suche A Craffe and Drew a to this Naymus grecus and Learned of him the Craffe And to vppon him the Chardges & ye man's. And afterward by the grace of god he was elect to be Kyng of fraince. And when he was in his Estate he tooke Massons and did healpe to make men Massons yt were none & gaven them. MARTHA. The Fourth Degree of the Eastern Star; a Rite of American Adoptive Freemasonry.

MARTINISM. The Rite of Martinism, called also the Rectified Rite, was instituted at Lyons, by the Marquis de Saint Martin, a disciple of Martinez Paschalis, of whose Rite it was pretended to be a reform. Martinism was divided into two classes, called Temples, in which were the following Degrees:

The Degrees of Martinism abounded in the reveries of the Mystics (see Saint Martin).
Crowned Martyrs.

Most of the Lodges in Maryland, but the first known elected and the meeting was adjourned until December 18, 1783. The next meeting was not until nearly three years later but the subordinate Lodges maintained their allegiance and were not represented at any other Grand Lodge.

Royal Arch Chapters were probably attached to most of the Lodges in Maryland, but the first known was Washington Chapter instituted in 1787 by Warranty of Lodge No. 7, at Chestertown, and attached to Lodge No. 15, afterwards Washington, No. 3. The first Independent Grand Chapter in the United States was organized on June 24, 1897. It became inactive in 1803, but was revived in 1807, when a Convention was held in the City of Washington on January 21 of representatives of Washington, Concordia, Saint John’s, Federal, Washington Naval and Potomac Chapters. It was resolved unanimously to organize a Grand Chapter for the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia, and this was opened in Ample Form. On May 9, 1814, Chapters Nos. 1, 2, and 3 met at Baltimore, adopted a Constitution and elected Grand Officers. On August 30, 1822, by the authority of the General Grand Chapter, the Chapters in the District of Columbia, with the exception of Potomac, No. 8, at Georgetown, withdrew from the Jurisdiction of Maryland. For the next twenty years those Columbia Chapters had no grand authority. From 1841 until May 7, 1867, they were put under the control of the Grand Chapter of Maryland. On that date the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia was duly constituted.

Until 1872 the Select Degrees were conferred by Chapters, but in that year the Grand Chapter made this illegal and independent Councils were formed. Six of these Councils, Concordia, Jerusalem, Adoniram, Salem, Tadmor, and Druid were represented at a Convention which met on May 12, 1874, at Baltimore to organize a Grand Council.

The first Commandery was Maryland, No. 1, at Baltimore, to which a Charter of Recognition was issued on May 2, 1814, admitting the year 1790 to be the date of the complete organization of the Encampment. It was resolved on July 12, 1870, to organize a Grand Commandery for the State. Delegates from Maryland, No. 1; Baltimore, No. 2, and Monumental, No. 3, met in Baltimore, Maryland, on December 12, 1870, for this purpose. A Warrant was issued by the Grand Master dated January 3, 1871, and on January 23, the Grand Commandery was dedicated in Ancient Form to Saint John the Almoner.

A Lodge of Perfection was established at Baltimore in 1792 by Henry Wilmans, Master of Concordia Lodge in 1793. On December 9, 1882, the Meredith Chapter of Rose Croix, No. 1, and the Maryland Council of Kadosh, No. 1, were constituted, and on May 15, 1885, the Chesapeake Consistory, No. 1, was opened under the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction.

MASON CROWNED. The French expression is Mason Couronné. A Degree in the nomenclature of Masonry, the search for the etymology or derivation of the word Mason has given rise to numerous theories, some of them ingenious, but many of them very absurd. Thus, a writer in the European Magazine for February, 1792, who signs his name as “George Drake,” Lieutenant of Marines, attempts to trace the Masons to the Druids, and derives Mason from May’s on, May’s being in reference to May-day, the great festival of the Druids, and on meaning men, as in the French on dit, for homme dit. According to this, May’s on therefore means the Men of May. This idea is not original with Drake, since the same derivation was urged in 1766 by Cleland, in his essays on The Way to Things in Words, and on The Real Secret of Freemasons.

Hutchinson, in his search for a derivation, seems to have been perplexed with the variety of roots that presented themselves, and, being inclined to believe that the name of Mason “has its derivation from a language in which it implies some strong indication or distinction of the nature of the society, and that it has no relation to architects,” looks for the root in the Greek tongue. Thus he thinks that Mason may come from Μασωρας, Μασωραςον, “I am in the midst of heaven”; or from Μασωρας, Mysteres, “an initiative”; and that Masonry is only a corruption of Μασωραςκε, Mesourano, “I am the real secret of Freemasons.”

Lessing says, in his Ernst und Folk, that Mason in the Anglo-Saxon signifies a table, and that Masonry, consequently, is a society of the table.

Nicolai thinks he finds the root in the Low Latin word of the Middle Ages Massonya, or Masonia, which signifies an exclusive society or club, such as that of the Round Table.

Coming down to later times, we find Brother C. W. Moore, in his Boston Magazine, of May, 1844, deriving Mason from Αθιγονος, Lithotomos, a Stone Cutter. But although fully aware of the elasticity of etymological rules, it surpasses our ingenuity to get Mason etymologically out of Lithotomos.

Brother Giles F. Yates sought for the derivation of Mason in the Greek word Μασωρος, Masonges, a festival of Dionysus, and he thought that this was another proof of the lineal descent of the Masonic Order from the Dionysian Artificers.

Brother William S. Rockwell, who was accustomed to read all his Freemasonry in the Egyptian Mysteries and who was a thorough student of the Egyptian hieroglyphic system, derives the word Mason from a combination of two phonetic signs, the one being Mai, and signifying to love, and the other being Son, which means a brother. Hence, he says, “this combination, Maison, expresses exactly in sound our word Mason, and signifies literally loving brother, that is, philadelphus, brother of an association, and thus corresponds also in sense.”

But all of these fanciful etymologies, which would have terrified Bopp, Grimm, or Müller, or any other student of linguistic relations, forcibly remind us of the French epigrammatist, who admitted that alphina came from equus, but that, in so coming, it had very considerably changed its route.

What, then, is the true derivation of the word Mason? Let us see what the orthoepists, who had no Masonic theories, have said upon the subject.

Webster, seeing that in Spanish masa means mortar, is inclined to derive Mason, as denoting one that works in mortar, from the root of massa, which of course gave birth to the Spanish word.

In Low or Medieval Latin, Mason was machio or maeio, and this Du Cange derives from the Latin maceria, a long wall. Others find a derivation in machinoe, because the builders stood upon machines to raise their walls. But Richardson takes a commonsense view of the subject. He says, “It appears to be obviously the same word as maison, a house or mansion, applied to the person who builds, instead of the thing built. The French Maisonier is to build houses; Masonner, to build of stone. The word Mason is applied by usage to a builder in stone, and Masonry to work in stone.”

Carpenter gives Massom, used 1225, for a building of stone, and Massonus, used 1304, for a Mason; and the Benedictine editors of Du Cange define Massoneria “a building, the French Maçonnerie, and Massonerius,” as Latomus or a Mason, both words in manuscripts of 1385.

Doctor Murray, in the New English Dictionary, says of the word Mason: “the ultor etymology is obscure, possibly the word is from the root of Latin maceria, a wall.

As a practical question, we are compelled to reject all those fanciful derivations which connect the Freemasons etymologically and historically with the Greeks, the Egyptians, or the Druids, and to take the word Mason in its ordinary significations of a worker in stone, and thus indicate the origin of the Order from a society of practical and operative builders. We need no better root than the old French and Latin Maçonner, to build, or Maçonnetus, a builder (see Freemason and Maçon).

MASONIC ARCHEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE. This was the title of a Society founded in England about 1871. Brother Walter Besant was the Secretary though he was not an original member of the Society which was probably founded by Brother William Smith, C. E., once Editor of the Freemason or Freemasons Magazine. The objects of the Society were the advancement of those branches of archeological knowledge and research which either directly or indirectly bear upon Freemasonry. Besides the study of Freemasonry proper, the Institute was to have papers read and discuss subjects connected with mysticism and allegorical teachings in literature and philosophy; symbolism in religion and art; the development and progress of architecture; the history of secret sects, associations and brotherhoods; and similar subjects. It was understood that no papers would be published whose subjects rendered them unsuitable for the reading of those who were not Freemasons. Later on Brother Besant became Treasurer and R. G. Haliburton the Secretary. The latter was a Freemason of Saint John’s Lodge, Nova Scotia, and was the son of Judge Haliburton, author of Sam Slick. The Society was not of long life but is particularly noteworthy because several of its early members were connected with the founding of Quatuor Coronati Lodge.

MASONIC CIPHER MESSAGE. At Cawnpore, India, in July, 1857, occurred the massacre of hundreds of men, women and children. Of this butchery there is a pathetic record in the message of a Masonic character that was written on the wall of the Chamber of Blood. This inscription appearing in a recent issue of the Controlling Officers’ Journal, was reprinted in the Transactions, Leicester Lodge of Research, 1912–3 (page 107) and as the Masonic cipher was not understood an invitation was extended the Craft to submit a clue to its meaning (see Cipher Writing). Brother W. John Songhurst offered in reply the comment that the reproduction corresponded fairly with a photograph in his possession. But there were one or two small differences proving that they were not taken direct from the same original. For instance, the photograph shows that a blot had been erased at the word hands, and that an alteration had been made at the word Post which looks as though it had been first written Past. It is headed “The writing on the Wall in Sir H. Wheeler’s Room.” Brother Songhurst had been able to trace other copies, all having many features in common, but none corresponding exactly, and with some the differences are important. He proceeded in Transactions, 1913–4 (pages 76–83) to discuss the circumstances thus:

At the outbreak of the Mutiny in May, 1857, Major General Sir Hugh Wheeler was in command of the Cawnpore division of the Indian Army. He at once ordered entrenchments to be constructed, and by the 21st of May these were occupied by the women and non-combatants. It is stated that there were about one thousand Europeans in the town, of whom more than half were women and children. In a letter written by General Wheeler on 1st June, he says, "I have left my house, and am residing day and night in my tent." On the 6th of June the siege commenced, and the defenders gallantly held out for three weeks. The attack was led by the adopted son of the former chief of the Mahrattas, known in history as Nana Sahib, whose claims to succession the British Government had refused to recognize. General Wheeler had with him his wife, who was of mixed blood, his son and two daughters. The son, Lieutenant Wheeler, was his Aide-de-Camp, and being severely wounded during the siege, he was carried to a hospital in the barracks. Here, in the presence of the whole family—father, mother and sisters—he was killed by a cannon-ball, which, entering the building, took off his head.

About one hundred and twenty-five women and children were carried back to Cawnpore, including the general's youngest daughter, who was taken by one of the enemy's hands in the theatre, the assembly-rooms and the Masonic Lodge. The General's wife is in this corner.

The General's wife is in this corner. This is the place where two soldiers (unintelligible) Remember the innocent.

The writing in cipher was first brought to Masonic notice in May, 1862, by a copy in the Indian Masonic Register, the correspondent asking if any reader could furnish an explanation. This brought a letter signed "Tatnai," dated from Lucknow, 27th July, in which it is said, that the inscription is "in many parts a string of characters devoid of significance." This fact "Tatnai" attributes to errors made by the original writer, to errors made by the copyist, and to chips of whitewash having fallen from the wall, before the writing as it had appeared in the Journal, and adds a suggested restoration. The letter mentions "the few lines signed by J. W. Roche, just above R. A. B. Johnston, written in plain English, and says that these include the words "nasty wound," which a critic, possibly "Tatnai" himself, writes: "Colonel Seppings, Mrs. Ditto, 3 children, Mrs. Wainwright, Ditto infant, Mrs. Cripps, Mrs. Halliday." Shephard's inscription in the Thatched Barrack was: "Should this meet the eyes of any who were acquainted with us, and in case we are all destroyed, be it known to them that we occupied this room for eight days under circumstances so distressing as have no precedent. The destruction of Jerusalem could not have been attended with disaster so severe as we have experienced at this time. W. J. Shepherd (wounded in the back), his wife and two children, Rebecca and her infant, Emelina, Martha, old Mrs. Frost, Mrs. Osborne, Daniel, The Khoorranee, Conductor Bethell, his wife and daughter, together with other friends. 11th June, 1857."

Lady Wheeler and her two daughters were brought down to the Ghaut on an elephant. One of the daughters was carried away by a Sowar. The remark "unintelligible"... must refer to the spot where the two laid Lieutenant Wheeler down. Mr. Shepherd says that the two daughters occupied the adjoining room when he saw the General on the 24th June, 1857. I have mentioned that MacCrea's printed leaflet is dated July, 1857. It purports to have been "by W. J. Shepherd in July, 1857," and it contains the following which I have not found elsewhere, though in part it is referred to as "Tatnai": "T. W. Roach wounded in right foot, shin bone fractured by shell, knee cap fractured, musket shot behind, nasty wound, musket shot in right breast. 17th June, 1857. "Adjutant Halliday, 56th N. I., killed by a round shot, 9th June, 1857."

Only three lines of cipher are given, and these with all else which could not be printed in type, are inserted with pen and ink. Some notes are added, but they are not reliable, as they contain, for instance, the statement that the translation by Colonel Money appeared in the Masonic Herald for 1858, while as a matter of fact that periodical was not in existence until about 1870, and as I cannot say that the translation was printed in the Freemason's Friend in 1862. While I cannot say that I am satisfied with Colonel Money's translation, I am not able to supply another. The absence of the original writing, of course, renders an attempt at deciphering practically impossible. We do not even know for certain where it was written. If, as seems most likely, it was on a wall in the Thatched Barrack, we must refer to General Wheeler and his family, and we know that this building was burned during the siege; while the Masonry Barrack in which General Wheeler had his quarters, was destroyed sometime in the centre of the copies, may be taken as probably having been described as R.W.M. The interference of "daughter" there is just a possibility that this may refer to by "Tatnai": "Tatnai," writing within five years of the massacre, says that the building was not yet in existence, and his suggestion is that the writer had concealed something in a certain place, and hoped that after his death some Brother might be able to recover it.

There were two English Lodges at Cawnpore at the time—Sincerity, constituted in 1819 and ceased in 1858; and Harmony, constituted in 1836, which still exists as No. 438. It seems likely that Johnston may have been the Master of Sincerity, but unfortunately no names were registered at Grand Lodge after 1845. Shepherd mentions a Mr. A. R. Johnston, of the E. I. Railway, who saw the General on the 24th June, 1857. "Adjutant Halliday, 56th N. I., killed by a round shot, 9th June, 1857."

A Club of Masons, tried and true, beneath a kindly sky of blue.
A Club of Masons, pledged to good, an everlasting brotherhood.
A Club of Masons, triple-bound to God and Man; where could be found
A happier place for mirth and play or sweeter rest at close of day?
Where could friendship firmer grow or life a rarer influence know?

The National League of Masonic Clubs is a brotherhood of clubs which consists exclusively of Master Masons in good standing in Lodges under the Jurisdiction of regular Grand Lodges. In March, 1905, Brother S. R. Clute, Secretary of the Masonic Club of Syracuse, New York, with the consent and cooperation of his club, decided to send out a call to the Masonic Clubs then in existence in New York State asking them to appoint representatives to a meeting in Syracuse to consider the advisability of working out a plan to provide for the interchange of courtesies to visiting members of Masonic Clubs in the State. Pursuant to this call there assembled at Syracuse, April 20, 1905, in the rooms of the Masonic Temple Club, representatives from several clubs as follows: Brother E. M. Brown, President, and S. R. Clute, Masonic Temple Club, Syracuse; Worshipful Brother George W. Arnold, Secretary, Masonic Club, New York; Worshipful Master Judson Bridenbecker and Brother A. T. Smith of Herkimer Lodge No. 423, Herkimer; Brother Andrew Ludolph, Secretary, Masonic Club of Auburn; Right Worshipful Fred M. Hart, President, and Brother F. D. Clark, Secretary of the Oswego Masonic Club, Oswego. Brother Clute called the Brethren to order and stated the object of the meeting, namely: To discuss and agree upon general measures for increasing good fellowship among the various Masonic Clubs of the State and particularly to adopt a traveling card to enable its possessor to secure Masonic Club privileges not only his own Club, but throughout the State. Brother Clute was chosen temporary President and Brother Clark temporary Secretary. The following resolutions were adopted:

That we, the representatives of the Masonic Clubs of Syracuse, New York City, Rochester, Oswego, Herkimer and Auburn, hereby constitute an organization to be known as The League of Masonic Clubs, with headquarters at Syracuse, and that we meet annually on the third Thursday in April, with the Masonic Temple Club of Syracuse.

That the purpose of this League shall be the promotion of fraternal relations between the Masonic Clubs comprising it and to facilitate the interchange of courtesies to visiting members.

That it is the sense of this organization that the several clubs forming this League may issue, to members in good standing, traveling cards signed by the Secretaries of the Clubs and countersigned by the members to whom they are issued, and entitling said members to the courtesies of the Clubs comprising the League for a period not to exceed six months from the date of issue—the foregoing, however, subject to ratification by the Clubs forming the League.

Brother S. R. Clute was elected President and Brother F. D. Clark, Secretary and Treasurer. The First Annual Convention was held at The Masonic Temple Club, Syracuse, New York, April 19, 1906. Representatives were present from many clubs in the State. It was at this Convention that the name of the organization was changed to The National League

MASONIC CLUBS, NATIONAL LEAGUE OF.
Brother Edgar A. Guest, 33°, says of the club ideal:

A Club of Masons, tried and true, beneath a kindly sky of blue.
A Club of Masons, pledged to good, an everlasting brotherhood.
A Club of Masons, triple-bound to God and Man; where could be found
A happier place for mirth and play or sweeter rest at close of day?
Where could friendship firmer grow or life a rarer influence know?
of Masonic Clubs, that the League may include clubs other than those in New York State.

MASONIC COLORS. The colors appropriated by the Fraternity are many, and even shades of the same color. The principal ones are blue, to the Craft Degrees; purple and scarlet, to the Royal Arch; white and black, to the Order of the Temple; while all colors are used in the respective Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite: notably, the nine-colored girdle, intertwined with a tenth, worn in the Fourteenth Degree of the last-named system (see Colors, Symbolism).

MASONIC GRAND COUNCIL. On March 24, 1925, the Grand Lodge of Michigan officially approved the creation of a Masonic Grand Council in every city in that State where there were two or more Constituent Bodies. These new organizations were to be fashioned after the Masonic Grand Council of Michigan, created at Grand Rapids on July 18, 1924, by the respective presiding officers of the Grand Lodge, Grand Chapter, Grand Commandery and the Council of Deliberation, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of the State of Michigan, and to be subservient to it.

The purpose and function of the Masonic Grand Council was to encourage the co-ordination of interests in all the Masonic Bodies, and in every way to further their welfare. It was not to legislate, prescribe or designate the procedure of any local or Grand Body within its Jurisdiction. It assumed no judicial or administrative duties beyond that of mutual counsel. It was planned to be essentially an Advisory Board of Directors for the Masonic Bodies of each of the several cities where such a Body should be established and act only in such matters as involve the active interests of Freemasonry as a progressive Institution. The definite activities in which these Councils can assist were outlined in the Palestiner, May, 1925, as follows:

1. The dissemination of educational matter, information and data now unavailable to Freemasons. The publication of Masonic activities and exchange of views between the various Bodies and rites.
2. To outline greater activities for the Masonic Home at Alma, and such other institutions as exist or may come into being bearing Masonic identification.
3. To plan and put into effect more efficient methods of handling Masonic charities, eliminating the possibility of oversight, delay and duplications.
4. To promote greater interest and support of the DeMolay movement for boys.
5. To promulgate and practice Masonic ideals and universally to appeal for law observance and enforcement by Freemasons.

MASONIC GRAND SECRETARIES GUILD. Brother Henry B. Grant, Grand Secretary of Kentucky, requested Brother Theodore S. Parvin to ask all the Grand Secretaries who were in attendance at the General Grand Chapter at Minneapolis, Minnesota, in 1891, to meet for consultation. Accordingly, on the evening of Wednesday, July 22, there were in attendance the following Grand Secretaries: Theodore S. Parvin of Iowa, John H. Brown of Kansas, William R. Bowen of Nebraska, Gilbert W. Barnard of Illinois, Richard Lambert of Louisiana, William H. Mayo of Missouri, James A. Henry of Arkansas, Andrew M. Wohlin of Georgia, Thomas Montgomery of Minnesota, Thomas J. Wilder of North Dakota, Henry W. Mordhurst of the General Grand Council, and others, with these writers of reports on Foreign Correspondence: Edward T. Schultz of Maryland, James S. Staton of Kentucky, John Haigh of Massachusetts, S. Stacke Williams of Ohio, and others, who proceeded to form an Association for mutual improvement in Freemasonry. Brother John H. Brown, of Kansas, was chosen President and Brother William R. Bowen, of Nebraska, Secretary.

Sundry matters were considered at this first meeting resulting in conclusions that duties should merely state facts without commendatory clause; that a dismissed Freemason should be denied all rights and benefits except the right to petition a Lodge for membership; that as a general rule the conferring of Degrees should make the candidate a member of the Lodge; that signing the By-laws is not essential to membership in the Lodge; that reports of Grand Officers and of Committees on Foreign Correspondence should be printed in advance of the sessions of Grand Bodies and separate from their journals; that we join in petitioning for the restoration of a certain old worker in Freemasonry; that this organization be permanent, with meetings at each Triennial of the General Grand Chapter and the Grand Encampment.

A circular sent out from the Secretary's office at Omaha, September 4, 1891, giving these particulars is headed Secretaries Guild of Freemasonry for North America.

A call was sent out by the President, July 20, 1892, for a meeting to be held on Tuesday, August 9, of that year when there were present in the Masonic Temple at Denver, Colorado, President John H. Brown, Secretary William R. Bowen, and Brothers John J. Mason of Ontario, Loyal L. Munn of Illinois, John H. Miller of Maryland, Charles E. Meyer of Pennsylvania, S. Stacke Williams of Ohio, Yancey C. Blalock of Washington, Edward C. Parmeelee of Colorado, Warren G. Reynolds of Vermont, Charles Bechtel of New York, William H. Mayo of Missouri, William P. Innes of Michigan, and others.

This organization did not live long and Brother Grant again took the initiative by requesting the Grand Secretaries and Grand Recorders who were in attendance upon the General Grand Chapter at Cincinnati in 1901 to meet there when the Masonic Grand Secretaries' Guild was organized.

The objects of the Guild, as stated in the Regulations, are "to become personally acquainted; to agree, if possible, upon the best forms and methods, and in general, to consult touching specific and other interests of Grand Secretaries offices and duties."

MASONIC HERO. Brother J. E. S. Tuckett contributes to the Transactions of Quatuor Coronati Lodge, 1913 (volume xxvi, page 299), the following information:

In 1810 there was published by T. Hookham, Jr., and E. T. Hookham, an interesting little work, A Picture of Verdun, or the English Detained in France. The following appears at page 101 of the first volume:

Lieutenant Barker being confined by a severe illness to his apartment, the windows of which look upon the river, saw a little child fall into the water. Notwithstanding his ill state of health, he doff'd his coat, ran down stairs, sprang into the stream, swim after the infant and saved its life. The whole town and neighborhood, both French and English, had not ceased to talk of this gallant achievement, when, some months afterwards, he saw a Gendarme fall into the Meuse, and stilling the antipathy which every free-born Briton must feel at the sight of one of these base minions of oppression, he only saw a fellow creature in danger; he sprang after him and saved him also. The noise that this second feat occasioned was excessive. The Lodge of Freemasons invited Mr. Barker to a fraternal banquet at which their Orator thanked him in the name of humanity; the Prefect of the Department, who usually resides at Bar, when he came to Verdun, paid him a visit of ceremony, to honor him if he could of any use to him; and the papers not only of the neighboring Departments but of the capital, did him justice in the highest panegyrics. Yet Lieutenant Barker was, during three years, unable to procure his exchange; and last year, when the death of his father required his presence in England, he was refused the permission of returning home for three months on parole. It is with infinite regret that we add to the above, that this gallant officer has, according to the latest accounts from Verdun, fallen in a duel since the beginning of 1810.

Brother Tuckett comments as follows:

This worthy Brother Barker was a Lieutenant in the Royal Navy. He was President of the most exclusive of the many clubs organized by the English prisoners at the Depot of Verdun—the Cafe Caron Club. He got into trouble with the Governor, General Wirion, in 1807, the charge being treason based upon the possession of the Club of an English-French dictionary with the following as an English equivalent of the word "Spoliateur—Despoiler, one who despoils and lays waste to everything, a Buona parte." It is gratifying to know that the gallant officer was acquitted. It is known that Masonic Lodges were held by the prisoners at Verdun, but the Lodge mentioned above was presumably a French one for a Brother Orator was not a recognized officer in an English Lodge.

MASONIC HOMES OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA. The reader in this connection may look over the allied items dealing with Charity, Orphans, Masonic Relief Association of the United States and Canada, Children's Exchange Bureau, Shriner Hospitals for Crippled Children, each of which will contribute some information as to the Masonic urge to provide systematic loving care for the dependent. The Masonic Home and its adjuncts, as the Infirmary in Nebraska and the Sanitarium in Iowa, hold an honored place in Masonic activities. Their beneficiaries are guests of the Fraternity and the several branches of the organization have given generously toward the success of this worthy object. Brotherly love is the proper expression of the attitude of the Brethren to the occupants of Masonic Homes, and this term is preferable to the word Charity with the meaning often associated with it. Obviously the treatment of Masonic Homes must be conditioned for such a purpose as ours. Only the leading facts can be included and these must lag behind the actual attainments as, every month in the year, some one or more Grand Lodges are receiving annual reports on Masonic Homes and enlarging their service. Brother Frank S. Moses, Past Grand Master of Iowa, prepared in 1923 a report of the activities in Masonic Homes, Brother Jesse M. Whited in his Correspondence Report of the Grand Lodge of California has also summarized the situation, and these general surveys of the field have been supplemented by numerous local articles at various times. These items have been checked with the cooperation of the various officials throughout the country.

Alabama. Alabama has men, women, boys and girls as guests at a Masonic Home and School near Montgomery. The Grand Lodge has here 275 acres of land, 40 of which are in a beautiful grove, 100 in pasture and the balance devoted to the raising of food crops and carried on at a profit. The property includes a library, auditorium, a main building, cottages for the guests, hospital building, operating room, dental parlor, nurses' quarters, school building, a separate infirmary for old men and many other structures representing an investment of $450,000 and a large sum has been invested in beautifying the grounds, driveways, etc. The Grand Lodge dues annually are $1 for each Master Mason in good standing, 90 cents of which goes to the Home and 10 cents is applied to maintaining old Freemasons and their wives and widows on the monthly pension system administered by the Local Lodges. Three dollars is also obtained for the maintenance or normal income of the Home for each Fellow Craft passed during the year; the Grand Chapter donates annually $25 per capita for every Royal Arch Mason; the Grand Commandery usually gives $2,000 a year. The Lodges also take up a voluntary contribution just before each annual meeting. The total income of the Home is about $75,000 a year and expenses have averaged $6,000 per month. Alabama has also inaugurated an Endowment Fund amounting to about $10,000 to be materially increased each year.

Arizona. Arizona assesses $10 from every initiate and affiliate for the Masonic Home Endowment Fund, and 50 cents every year is collected and paid into the Masonic Home General Fund for each Brother on the roll of membership on December 31. The combined funds were $202,624; $114,372 being in the Masonic Home Endowment Fund, and $88,252 in the Masonic Home General Fund. There is a Sanitarium for the care of tubercular patients at Oracle, a summer resort village in the foothills of the Santa Catalina Mountains, forty miles from Tucson. The site of sixty acres and the house with sixteen rooms are valued at $60,000. Grand Lodge Committee spent a further $8,000 erecting three four-room cottages and improving the main building. This Home has had no facilities, however, for giving medical or nursing care or for handling bedridden patients, only those being able to care for themselves being received as guests.

Arkansas. Arkansas maintains an Orphans Home and also a Relief and Pension Fund for Widows. It has had guests at the Home at an annual expense of $425 each. It derives funds from $1 per member, $11 fee and interest on investments of $200,000. The Orphans Home received 50 cents per member and $8 for fees of the Three Degrees out of the above, aggregating approximately $40,000 per annum. Pension and Relief Fund is made up by a $7,000 appropriation by Grand Lodge and approximately $5,000 voluntary contributions by Lodges annually.

California. California maintains two Masonic Homes, one at Decoto, Alameda County, which was dedicated in 1898, and is a Home for Aged Freemasons and their adult dependents, and the other located at Covina, Los Angeles County, for Dependent Children of Freemasons. By 1910 their Permanent Improvement Fund had risen to $17,000 and the previous year, 1909, Jacob Hart Nebb died, leaving the residue of his estate, amounting to $12,683 to the Decoto Home. The balance in the Permanent Improvement Fund was added to this, the two being called a Permanent Endowment Fund, which has now gone over the $480,000 mark. The capital is not touched, only the interest on investments being used. These Homes include hospital units and guests have been maintained at these Homes for $500 each yearly. The hospital may accommodate 70 patients, largely those that are helpless from the infirmities of age. The cost of maintaining children in the Home at Covina has been $600 per year each. The two Institutions represent an investment of some $1,621,689. Funds are raised from a $20 fee for each initiate or affiliate and 25 cents each year from each member.

Colorado. The Colorado Masons Benevolent Fund Association is practically a Committee of the Grand Lodge and has been in existence since 1902 and has accumulated in twenty-three years approximately $86,000. Lodges pay as dues to the Grand Lodge $1 annually for every member under sixty years of age and 10 per cent of that amount goes to the Benevolent Fund. The Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of Colorado annually contributes to this fund 5 cents for every Royal Arch Mason. Only the income from the fund may be used for relief work. Grand Lodge created another fund of $40,000 for the relief of Freemasons who were in the military or naval service of the United States or for their relatives, and such relief is extended upon the recommendation of the Master of the Lodge where the Brother held membership. There is also a Grand Lodge Committee which cares for Freemasons in the two Government Hospitals in the State. One of these, near Denver, is for tubercular cases and has patients from all over the country. The other is at Las Animas. The funds necessary for this Committee are provided by the Grand Lodge, Grand Chapter and Grand Commandery to the amount of $5,000 yearly. Members of the Committee visit these Brethren in hospitals every Sunday with flowers and they furnish entertainment every week. Their families are assisted with advice and money when necessary and much valuable work has been done by the Committee assisting Brethren in these institutions with regard to their compensation from the Government and in similar matters. This Soldiers and Sailors Welfare Committee consists of nine members appointed by the Grand Master to extend relief and comfort to Freemasons who were employed in the military or naval service during the World War and the wives, children and dependents of these Brethren. The Grand Lodge has also planned a fund of $15,000 for establishing scholarships for the sons and daughters of Freemasons in institutions of higher learning.

Connecticut. Connecticut has long supported an incorporated Masonic Charity Foundation. It has a Home and Hospital at Wallingford, valued at $600,000, the Hospital Unit having facilities for the care of 100 patients. This unit was largely paid for by special assessment of $5 for each Brother and the Eastern Star of Connecticut levied a tax of $1 per member to furnish and equip it. It has an Endowment Fund of $100,000. Here at the Home in Wallingford are adult guests, of whom one-third may be classed as permanently helpless infirmary cases. They have been maintained at an average cost of $460 for each guest per year. The Grand Lodge also assists other needy cases in outside locations. Connecticut Freemasons pay $2.15 per annum for charity and $10 is collected from each initiate or affiliate.

Delaware. Delaware has a Home at Wilmington for the aged and indigent, each Lodge contributing annually for its maintenance $2 per capita, $10 for every affiliation during the year and $10 for every candidate initiated. There is an investment in real estate and equipment of $29,480. The auditor's report of 1924 showed a total investment of $178,000. Delaware also has arranged for the distribution of four scholarships each year of $125 each in memory of their first Grand Master, Gunning Bedford, Jr. These may be used in any school or college grade, but the Committee having charge of the awards prefer the University of Delaware. If the student makes progress in his studies the scholarship will be continued for four years. Contributions to this will also be received from the subordinate Lodges in proportion to their membership, the fund being gradually increased each year.

District of Columbia. District of Columbia Freemasons established a Home and Infirmary about 1914, valued at $150,000, which shelters adults and children. Its maintenance expense has been annually about $520 for each guest. An Endowment Fund of $107,000 has been accumulated. Each District Freemason contributes 75 cents annually for this charity, and each initiate $5.

Florida. Florida has a Masonic Home on a ten-acre site at St. Petersburg which, with the improvements there, represents an investment of $103,000. This property was purchased at a Sheriff's Sale and has since then attracted an offer for it of $250,000. The assessment upon the Brethren for the support of the Home is $1 per capita and for emergency relief 25 cents. There is a $5 assessment upon every initiate for the Masonic Home Building Fund, which is not applied to maintenance but restricted to new work for bettering the Home facilities. There are two Relief Committees. The Emergency Committee comprises three members, appointed by the Grand Master, to handle all relief for members of Lodges in the State and the Fund for that purpose is obtained by the per capita tax plus a special appropriation turned over to the Committee at the close of each Grand Communication. If this amount is not sufficient the Committee has authority to supply deficiencies from the Masonic Home Fund. Relief is furnished on the request of Lodges, where the applicant is worthy and the Lodge unable to furnish the required relief and on the approval of the Committee the relief is granted, a small monthly allowance being considered better when enabling applicants to remain at their residences rather than at the Masonic Home. The Masonic Relief Committee, as in Jacksonville, comprises one member from each of the five local Lodges and is supplied with funds by them on request of the Committee and then an appropriation of 25 cents per member is turned over to the fund, which is used exclusively for sojourning Brethren and not for Florida Freemasons. Each local Lodge has its own Special Committee for the relief of its members.

Georgia. The Masonic Orphan's Home is four miles from the City of Macon on the hills overlooking the valley of the Ocmulgee River where there is a farm of 152 acres under a competent agriculturist to instruct the boys. There is also a print-shop with linotype machines, presses and other equipment and with an instructor to teach ten of the boys at a time. The Home is for children only, none being accepted under five nor over fifteen years. The endowment in 1925 was $175,000. The Grand Lodge dues are $1 per capita yearly and 45 cents goes to the maintenance of the Home. Widows, as well as elderly or decrepit members, are supported in their own home communities from a fund of $12,000 appropriated annually by the Grand Lodge. This fund is administered by a Committee of Relief, which as a rule pays the individual applicant an amount equal to that given by the local or interested Lodge.

Idaho. At the session of 1869, Idaho Freemasonry, with seven Lodges and a combined membership of 279, established the Orphan’s Fund by an annual assessment of $1 per member for “the support and education of the orphans of deceased members or the children of indigent Freemasons whom the Grand Lodge might deem worthy of assistance.” The principal must remain intact forever and the fund was placed in the control of a Board of Trustees consisting of the Grand Master and the Grand Wardens, but in 1896 provision was made for a Board of three members elected annually by the Grand Lodge. The annual assessment was reduced to 50 cents in 1895. An amendment was adopted in 1885 whereby the benefits of the fund were also applied to “the support and clothing of poor and indigent Freemasons.” Since that time the proper title for the fund has been “The Grand Lodge Orphan and Indigent Fund.” Another amendment was passed in 1909 providing for the support and clothing of indigent widows of deceased Freemasons. The fund grew from $294 in 1870 to $117,089 in 1923. There was expended for relief in 1890, $289 and in 1923, $4,875. The Trustees do not deal with individual cases or applications except through the Lodges. Applications are made through the Lodge Officers and when preparations are made, the check is sent to the Worshipful Master and he is responsible for spending the appropriation in his best judgment. There may be expenses not falling within the laws providing for the expenditure of this fund such, for example, as funeral expenses, but the Trustees do not consider these as coming within their jurisdiction and they must be taken care of by the Lodge or from some other source.

Illinois. Illinois has a Masonic Home and Hospital at Sullivan on a fine farm donated to the Grand Lodge for that purpose. Adult guests are fraternally cared for there. The Masonic Home for Children is at La Grange, a suburb of Chicago, and trains children for useful citizenship. The realty value and investment in these institutions approximates $1,000,000, and the operating expenses have been $200,000 annually or a little over $400 per annum per guest. The Freemasons of Illinois contribute 62½ cents per capita annually and the appropriations and donations from other Masonic Bodies and interested Brethren amply support these worthy establishments.

Indiana. Indiana has a splendid Home at Franklin, on an estate of 270 acres. The land and buildings are valued at approximately $1,250,000. The Order of the Eastern Star, Knights Templar and Scottish Rite have been very liberal in contributing toward the erection of the necessary buildings and the support of the Home and Hospital. Here are entertained adults and children at an annual operating cost of $347 per guest. An Endowment Fund of $200,000 has been accumulated. The Grand Lodge per capita for the Home is $1 and $5 is charged for each Initiate, the latter being placed in the Endowment Fund.

Iowa. Since 1894 Iowa has disbursed its benevolence through a Grand Charity Fund administered by a Board of three Trustees. This fund was started with an allotment of 10 cents per capita and used to supplement the benevolence of constituent Lodges as required. This per capita allotment has been increased several times and special appropriations have been made from the general funds. This plan is most satisfactory in that it permits approved beneficiaries to live in familiar or chosen environment under the fraternal supervision of a local Trustee to whom the funds for each case have been remitted. Excess of receipts in this fund accruing through balances, donations and special appropriations have been converted into a permanent Grand Charity Fund, which amounted to $400,000 in 1925. In 1923 the Grand Lodge authorized an increase of $1 per capita in Grand Lodge dues for the establishment and operation of a Sanitarium; in 1925 the purchase of a piece of property for this purpose was approved and the institution is for the care of elderly and feeble dependents, with facilities for approximately one hundred guests. The rules of admission to the Sanitarium are that “only those persons who are in need of daily nurse care shall be admitted to the Sanitarium or permitted to remain therein. No person shall be admitted to the Sanitarium who can be suitably cared for by allowances from the Grand Charity Fund; nor shall anyone be admitted against his will so long as he can be properly cared for elsewhere at a cost not to exceed the per capita cost of maintenance at the Sanitarium.” The investment is about $200,000, including equipment, etc. Grand Lodge also derives income from a $10 fee for each initiate.

Kansas. Kansas has a Home at Wichita for Freemasons, their wives, widows and orphans, valued at $350,000, and an Endowment Fund of $140,000. The Home entertains adult guests and children and has operated at an annual expense of $306 for each guest. The Home became overcrowded and additions were ordered in 1924, a $2 assessment being levied on each of its members. The regular per capita tax for charity is 50 cents and $5 is collected for each Brother personally when raised to the Sublime Degree of a Master Mason.

Kentucky. Kentucky was a pioneer in providing for its indigent Freemasons and their dependent wives, widows and orphans. It has a Widows and Orphans Home at Louisville, with a valuation of $875,000. This Home contains adults and children and has operated at a yearly expense of $182 for each guest. Kentucky also maintains an Old Masons Home at Shelbyville where guests busy themselves on a small farm valued at $120,000. An Educational Endowment of $100,000 has been accumulated. The total accumulation of its Endowment Funds is $1,000,000; its per capita tax is $1.75 which includes the price of a Home Journal at 50 cents which is published by the Grand Lodge, and an Amendment provides for a fee of $10 from each Master Mason to apply to the Endowment Fund. In addition to these splendid achievements in the name of charity, it appointed a Committee to raise $1,600,000 by subscriptions payable over a term of years, to provide enlarged and modern facilities for the Home and Hospital.

Louisiana. Louisiana has disbursed relief from a permanent fund of $100,000 at the disposition of the Grand Master. A Home for Orphans was opened in 1925 at Alexandria and represented an investment of $250,000. The support of this institution has been from $1 per capita and $1 for each Degree conferred. Provision has also been made for a Home for the Aged.

Maine. The Grand Lodge of Maine distributes the income from a Charity Fund to beneficiaries directly through the Lodges. This invested fund of $85,000 is safely guarded by a constitutional provision that only the income can be used and no part of the principal expended. From 1864 the Grand Lodge operated this plan on an annual per capita tax of 20 cents and increased the Charity Fund from about $65,000 to the above amount. In 1924 the per capita tax was increased to 50 cents. The Lodges make application for their dependent members on blanks of prescribed form. These are submitted to the Committee on Distribution of Funds of the Board of Trustees. The total amount of money available is divided into units and the Committee votes to give the respective beneficiaries one, two or more of these units as the individual need requires. A check for the total sum appropriated is sent to the Worshipful Master of the Lodge of which the beneficiary is a member and he pays it out in installments as they are required. A typical case is that of an old lady who died at eighty-five and who had been dependent upon the Masonic Bodies for over twenty years. The Grand Lodge allowed her $150 a year with a like amount coming from the Grand Chapter, the local Lodge donating yearly from $75 to $100, with other gifts from the Chapter, Council and Commandery. This amount maintained a home for this lady among her old friends.

Massachusetts. Massachusetts established a Home at Charlton in 1911, on a farm of 300 acres. The value of the Home is approximately $200,000 and it has cared for adult guests at an operating expense of $614 per year. It has a Special Endowment of $363,000. This venerable Jurisdiction has maintained many charities. The Brethren have a General Charity Fund, a Rainy Day Fund, a War Relief Fund, and finance a Masonic Employment Bureau. The total funds grouped under the head of Masonic Home and Educational Trust comprise several distinct funds and aggregate $1,389,000. $5 is collected from each initiate for the Grand Charity Fund. The charity work is provided for by the income of the funds and such appropriation from the current funds of the Grand Lodge as may be needed.

Michigan. Michigan established a Home and Hospital at Alma in 1911, valued at some $300,000, including hospital facilities of 30 beds. The average expense has been about $850 per annum. It is interesting to note also that the average age of the guests is nearly 75 years. Michigan also disburses relief from a separate Charity Fund, and builds up a Reserve Maintenance Fund and a Building Fund for its Home and Hospital. Fifty cents per member goes to these purposes annually. In 1924 the Grand Lodge decided to devote an additional $1 for each member to a Fund to be used for another Home to be operated on the Cottage Plan.

Minnesota. Minnesota has had for years a Masonic Home managed by a separately incorporated Body and supported by individual subscriptions and appropriations from the Grand Lodge. The Grand Lodge took steps to assume the practical control of the Institution and greatly extended its usefulness by the construction, equipment and maintenance of an adequate Home and Hospital. A $500,000 fund for this purpose was subscribed. Another $100,000 was pledged for an endowment of this project. Minnesota has long had a Relief Fund from which disbursements have been made to all worthy beneficiaries according to their necessities, having a balance of $112,472 in the fund in 1925. Revenue for the Masonic Home will be derived from $1 per capita of its membership and $5 from each initiate.

Mississippi. Mississippi maintains two Homes, one at Meridian, valued at $175,000, which cares for children, with all necessary equipment, including a well-managed hospital. The other Home, valued at $100,000, is located at Columbus. The operating expense of the Meridian Home has been reported at $28,734.67 per year, and the Columbus Home at $22,192.87. A farm was acquired by donation, covering 343 acres where the boys of the Homes reside and receive splendid vocational education and training as farmers. The charitable revenue is derived from $1 per capita tax and $10 from those taking the Degrees. Grand Lodge authorized the creation of a fund of $20,000 for the erection of a hospital building at the State Sanatorium for tubercular patients and during 1924 Grand Lodge gave a supplement of $5,000 for this purpose. The Hospital Unit was completed in 1925 and named the Masonic Unit. The Masonic Home Maintenance Fund also contributes each year a large sum of money to persons outside of the Home upon the recommendation of the Finance Committee. The Grand Lodge of Mississippi had a total Endowment Fund of $270,825, its Murphy-Martin Educational Endowment Fund alone amounting to $104,739.

Missouri. Missouri has a beautiful Masonic Home at St. Louis, established in 1889, which houses both adults and children. A splendid Hospital was added to the plant in 1915; adult guests and children have been cared for by the Missouri Brethren at a cost of about $450 each per year. The total valuation of the assets in 1925 was $1,380,000, including an Endowment Fund of $508,690. Charitable revenue is derived from a per capita tax of $1.50 and a $10 fee for the Degrees.

Montana. Montana opened its Masonic Home near Helena for Aged, Infirm and Destitute Masons and their widows in 1909. The original buildings cost $103,500 and were erected out of the proceeds of a per capita annual tax of $1 per member, and in addition thereto was purchased the site containing 590 acres, costing $10,000, a part of which price was contributed. It has an Endowment Fund consisting of $24,328 cash and 13,000 acres of land given by the will of the late David Auchard, a wealthy cattle man and land owner of Lewis and Clark County, who died in 1902; sundry bequests from others amounting to $7,000 and $25,000 from the late William A. Clark, Past Grand Master and former United States Senator from Montana. The net worth of the Home is over $300,000. Guests have been maintained here at a per capita cost of $410 per year. The Home is supported by $1 per capita annual assessment on all the Freemasons in the State, in addition to receipts from its Endowment Fund. Grand Lodge in 1923 placed a $10 initiation fee upon all candidates for the Entered Apprentice Degree, which goes to the Permanent Building Fund of the Home. In 1922 request was made of each Montana Freemason to make a voluntary offering of $10 for the purpose of erecting new buildings, this covering a period of five years. From that has been realized $21,907, which has been used to defray the cost of a new heating plant. A hospital unit has also been added.

Nebraska. There are Masonic Homes at Plattsmouth and Fremont. The Nebraska Masonic Home at Plattsmouth is a corporation, the Grand Lodge owning a large majority of the stock. The building, grounds and furniture cost $125,000 with an Infirmary valued at $140,000. The Grand Lodge appropriated $100,000 for the Infirmary, the Grand Chapter and the Grand Commandery $10,000 each, and the Nebraska Masonic Home paid the balance. The Home had a fund of $170,000 in bonds and mortgages in 1925. The War Relief Fund then amounted to $31,600 and the Orphan’s Educational Fund $125,677. The Grand Lodge yearly dues are $2,75 cents going to the Nebraska Masonic Home, 75 cents to the General Fund and 50 cents to the Building and Improvement Fund. $10 are collected from each initiation, $5 going to the General Fund and $5 to the Building and Improvement Fund. A fee of $10 for affiliation is collected on those whose demits are more than one year old. The Trustees of the Home pay annuities to dependent members or their families at their own homes or other institutions. The Home for Children at Fremont has building, grounds and furniture valued at $140,000 and this is managed by the Lodge and the appropriation is paid monthly through the Lodges. The constituent Lodge affords all possible assistance before applying to the Grand Lodge Relief Fund. At any time that the Grand Lodge Masonic Relief Fund is insufficient to cover necessary disbursements, the Grand Master directs that additional sums be transferred from the General Fund. $6,100 has been expended in one year from this Relief Fund. New Mexico has a particularly difficult problem, due to the large number of Brethren afflicted with tuberculosis who come from all parts of the United States. The Grand Lodge Masonic Tubercular Sanatorium Committee, has “expressed the hope that our Sister Jurisdictions of Arizona and Texas would see their way clear to assist in furthering a national movement.” The Committee on Grand Master’s Address recommended that “we seek the co-operation in perfecting the necessary organization of the Grand Jurisdictions of Arizona, Texas and Oklahoma, and take all necessary steps to develop this important undertaking.” At the United States Veterans Hospital No. 55, located at Fort Bayard, there is a Masonic Club known as the Sojourners’ Club, to which the Grand Lodge, Grand Chapter and Grand Commandery of New Mexico, as well as Ballut Abyad Temple, Albuquerque, and constituent Lodges, Chapters, Commanderies and individual Brethren have contributed materially to its Building, Furnishing and Relief Funds. From the time of the inception of the Sojourners’ Club, the Grand Lodge of New Mexico has annually contributed $1,200, this amount having been increased in 1925 to $1,500 per annum. This is in addition to other donations from time to time to the Club. The Club Building was furnished early in 1923, and Leon M. Abbott, of the Sovereign Grand Commander, Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite for the Northern Masonic Jurisdiction, contributed $26,000. Among the additional larger donors were: The Grand Lodge of California, $1,000; Grand Lodge of New York, $2,500; Grand Lodge of Texas, $1,000; Grand Lodge of Pennsyllarge percentage of the children are non-Masonic, rendering it impossible to make an adequate review of the activities of the Grand Lodge, enabling worthy young men and women to pursue their studies in accredited Universities by loans advanced by the Student Loan Fund Committee. Each year $2,000 is placed in this Fund from the Grand Lodge General Fund. The source of income for relief purposes comes from a $2 per capita tax for each Master Mason returned annually, $1 of which goes to the Masonic Home Fund, 50 cents to the Masonic Relief Fund and 50 cents to the Student Loan Fund. Plans were carried through energetically for the building of the Masonic Home and School.

New York. New York has a splendid Home and Hospital at Utica. It takes care for adults and children, with every necessary provision for their comfort and education. A splendid Memorial Hospital, with a capacity of 225 beds, has been dedicated. The annual operating expense of this Home and Hospital amounted to $400,000. The valuation of this property approximates $1,750,000. The Grand Lodge has accumulated a substantial endowment for charitable purposes from all sources approximates $400,000 a year. The Grand Lodge of New York further distributes annually some $30,000 to beneficiaries outside of the Home. Many of the Lodges and districts provide for institutional care of their own members. The charitable revenue is derived from a per capita tax of 50 cents to meet current expense, and initiation fees of $3.50. The independent activities carried on in various cities and districts render it impossible to make an adequate review of the total of Masonic charity in this Jurisdiction. One of the early contributions to the Home was made by Edwin Thomas Booth, the famous American tragedian, who bestowed $5,000 upon the Home at Utica.

North Carolina. North Carolina maintains a Home for Children at Oxford, with a farm and dairy herd in connection with the Home, the entire property being valued at about $750,000. The project includes such departments as a Printing Plant, Electrical Department, a Shoe Shop, Laundry and Sewing Rooms and also has an accredited High School. A large percentage of the children are non-Masonic, the institution never having been limited to any one class of orphans. This Home has always had the hearty support of all the people of the State, owing to the reputation it has ever maintained for the generous care and liberal education of its guests. Its annual income has amounted to $161,331, derived from Local Lodges, individual contributions, appropriations from Grand Lodge and from the State of North Carolina, as well as proceeds from Departments of the Home such as the Singing Class, the Printing Office and Electric Shop. Children have been maintained here at a cost of $309 for each guest per year, exclusive of profits from activities in Departments before mentioned, or $270 each per year, taking into consideration these proceeds. Another Masonic Home is operated at Greensboro by the Freemasons in conjunction with the Eastern Star and for Old People, being valued at $100,000, and where adult guests have been cared for at $775 per each per year. The Grand Lodge of North Carolina levies a tax of $10 on each initiate, which goes into the Charity Fund, and from which appropriations are made for charitable purposes, but there is no direct tax levied for either of the Homes by the Grand Lodge.

North Dakota. North Dakota disburses relief from a fund to which every Master Mason raised during the year pays $5 and the Grand Lodge has also made provision for a contribution to this purpose of 15 cents per capita from its General Fund, the original plan contemplating the accumulation of about $5,000 annually to ultimately permit the erection of a Masonic Home. This fund, at the beginning of 1925, for example, was $38,690; the amount expended during the previous year for relief was $4,424. The individual Lodges assume their share of the burden, the intent being for the Grand Lodge Relief Fund to assist them in this benevolence.

Ohio. Ohio has a Masonic Home and Hospital on 400 acres near the city of Springfield. It has cared for adults and children at an operating expense of $605 each annually. It is under the control of the Grand Lodge, but is also substantially supported by the other Masonic Bodies of Ohio. The valuation of the Institution approximates $1,000,000, its splendid buildings and equipment largely financed by donations and bequests from Brethren interested in Masonic benevolence. The Grand Lodge collects $1 from each of its members for charity. Included in the grounds of the Home above mentioned are 37 acres with a beautiful building, barn, garage and chicken houses, known as the W. B. Hillman Memorial for boys, so named by the Grand Chapter in honor of Brother Hillman, who, in 1887, was one of the early advocates of the institution, at which time he was Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter of Ohio. Like the rest of the Home, the support of this institution comes from the annual per capita tax.

Oklahoma. Oklahoma has erected a new group of buildings at Guthrie to accommodate all of its wards, and give the children better school facilities than were obtained at Darlington. They care for adults and children at an operating expense of $328 per guest. Valuable property acquired at an early date enables them to expend $500,000 on this project and establish a healthy reserve fund. Their charity revenue is derived from $1.50 per capita and $1 for each Degree conferred. Other adult beneficiaries are provided for at their own homes.

Oregon. Oregon has a Masonic Home, $350,000 having been raised for that purpose by voluntary contributions from the Craft, including $50,000 contributed by the Order of the Eastern Star. The Home has a value of $420,000. Yearly dues for the Home are $1 per member, $5 for each Entered Apprentice Degree conferred and $5 on each affiliate from outside the State for the Maintenance Fund; $5 on each Entered Apprentice Degree conferred and $5 on each affiliate from outside the State for the Building Fund. There is an Educational Fund with an irreducible principal of $220,000, the income from which is used to assist in the education of 100 children yearly in the grammar and high schools. There is a revolving Student Loan Fund of $6,000 which is loaned to students in colleges and universities in amounts not to exceed $300, repayable at 4% interest.

Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania, about the beginning of this century, took up the establishment of Masonic Homes and secured a tract of 1,000 acres at Elizabethtown, between Lancaster and Harrisburg, including some forty-nine farms. Guests were received and housed in one of the farm buildings about 1910. Children were first admitted in 1913, though the Boys Home was not opened until June 1, 1914, and the Girls Home in January, 1915. All these buildings have since been abandoned. Grand Lodge Hall, valued at over $400,000, was occupied by adult guests in August, 1913. In 1914 the Boys were housed in a temporary building, and the Girls in another farm house in 1915. A gift from Brother W. Harry Brown and Mrs. Brown has since been used to build the Brown Home for Boys, costing $95,000. The John Smith Home for Boys was opened in June, 1925, costing $250,000, with an Endowment of $200,000 executed by an agreement. The boys, upon reaching a certain age and attaining a certain grade in school, are transferred to the Thomas Ranken Patton Masonic Institution for Boys, built upon a farm adjoining the Homes tract. This was provided for under the will of Brother Patton, for many years the Grand Treasurer of the Grand Lodge. December 3, 1924, the Trustees reported a balance in hand of $1,545,105. Various branches of manual training are taught, the boys also continuing studying in the public schools. The girls are now housed in the Louis H. Eisenlohr Home for Girls, valued at $140,000. Louis Eisenlohr's brother, Charles J., and his sister Mary Eisenlohr, contributed $10,000 for furnishing this Home. Sick guests of the Pennsylvania Homes are cared for in the Philadelphia Freemasons' Memorial Hospital, costing $320,000 completely furnished; capacity, 110 beds. After its three units were finished the Philadelphia Brethren handed Grand Lodge the balance of the fund to provide increased hospital accommodations as needed, amounting to $91,945, December 3, 1924. Since 1913, when Grand Lodge Hall was opened, there have been erected: John Henry Daman Memorial Cottage costing $41,000, Brother Daman having bequeathed his entire estate to Grand Lodge; Paul L. Levis Memorial Cottage costing $33,000; Gustavus Groetzinger Memorial, a completely equipped laundry, $12,000; Berks County Memorial, $33,000; Blair County Memorial, $7,000; Dauphin County Memorial, $50,000; Cumberland Valley Memorial, $8,000; Allegheny County Memorial, $336,000; and Lancaster County Memorial, $111,000. Illustrating the generosity of the Brethren, it may be noted that the per capita giving of those of Dauphin County was about $35 and of Lancaster County about $43. $10,000 was provided by the mother of Brother George M. McCandless from the estate, the income of which is used for the comfort of women guests in the Hospital. Grand Lodge has several legacies, amounting to nearly $150,000, with which to build as future needs require. Mrs. Kate E. Sell, widow of Brother John S. Sell, has given $100,000 for a chapel as a memorial to Brother Sell and agreed to give $25,000 more for organ, chimes, etc. Numerous gifts have been made by living donors and by the wills of others in aid of the work. On December 3, 1924, Grand Lodge had the following sums coming to it under bequests from the following estates:

- Brother Henry Krug ........................................ $132,062
- Brother John W. Wilbraham .................................. 95,434

The brother and sisters of Past Grand Master William L. Gorgas of Pennsylvania, January, 1924, presented to Grand Lodge securities of the par value of $50,000, to be known as the William Luther Gorgas Memorial Fund, the income to go to the maintenance of the Homes, the Committee on Homes being given power to use part of the income for the relief of minor children of deceased Pennsylvania Freemasons. Numerous wills have been probated which will pay to Grand Lodge in the near future or at the termination of life estates the following amounts:

- Brother Thomas J. Stewart .................................. $5,000

Many small legacies have also been received by Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania since the Homes were opened. It also manages by Trustees various Funds for charitable purposes including the Stephen Taylor Bequest of $15,800 and the Charles Jackson McClary Memorial Fund of $30,000, the income from each of which is turned over to the Homes for maintenance. The expenditures at Elizabethtown have amounted to about $2,500,000, augmented by large sums spent there by individuals and groups of Lodges. The Brethren whose counties have erected buildings have established Endowment Funds for their care, to which Funds additions are being made from time to time. The Philadelphia Freemasons Memorial Hospital Fund amounted to $28,023; the Allegheny County Fund, $6,250; the Berks County Fund, $1,000; and the Homes Endowment Fund to $200,000; these figures given as of December 3, 1924. The Homes Committee has at its disposal the income of $50,000, deposited by an anonymous Brother with a Trust Company, to provide higher education for a son or daughter of a Pennsylvania Freemason in or out of the Homes. Brother Samuel Davis left his entire estate for accumulation until it amounted to $100,000; thereafter three-fourths of the income to be used for the relief of the children of deceased Master Masons of the State, and to be applied to keeping up the home life where a Brother dies leaving a widow and children. The Lodge of which the Brother was a member applies for a blank petition to be filled up by the mother and then the Lodge determines the amount to be allotted and agrees to pay one-half. Payments are made through the Lodge and every half year a report is made by it to the Committee on Homes showing its receipts, the payments and the standing of the orphans in school, the home conditions and whether the aid continues necessary. The Masonic Homes of Pennsylvania are maintained by direct appropriations by Grand Lodge and income on the estates and funds referred to herein. Every initiate pays, in addition to the fee fixed by the By-Laws of the Lodge, the sum of $40 which goes into the treasury of Grand Lodge marked as Masonic Homes Fees, which have been more than sufficient to run the Homes, the surplus having been put into a Masonic Homes Reserve Fund amounting to over $250,000.

Rhode Island. The Grand Lodge of Rhode Island in 1912 inaugurated a movement to establish a fund for the erection of a Masonic Home, at the same time appropriating $2,000 as a nucleus, to be augmented each year by a 10 cents per capita tax. Lodges and individual members are encouraged to donate such sums as they are able. In 1923 Grand Lodge voted to direct the Lodges to collect an additional fee of $5 from each candidate for the Entered Apprentice Degree to be added to the Masonic Home Fund and which in 1925 amounted to over $40,000. A Board of five Trustees invest and re-invest this Fund and may use the income only thereof, with the approval of the Grand Master, for the relief of, and for charitable, educational and welfare work among Freemasons, their families or widows and orphans. The individual Lodges of Rhode Island make every effort to handle this benevolent work among their own members, appealing to the Grand Lodge only when necessity demands. There is also an Educational Fund, established in 1923, which is created and maintained by an assessment of $1 per annum levied on each Master Mason within the Jurisdiction, and which enables a number of young men and women to continue their studies by providing College Scholarships to them. A Masonic Service Board also serves the Brethren by relieving distress in many ways such as obtaining employment for those in need and otherwise rendering aid and assistance.

South Carolina. The Grand Lodge of South Carolina instituted a Fund in 1907 for the erection of a Masonic Home and Orphanage, to which Fund were assigned all the surplus revenues of Grand Lodge. When this Fund should reach $100,000 the question of building was to be entertained. Meanwhile, such cases of present need were to be relieved by the Trustees of the Fund. By the time this Fund had actually reached the figure set, the Brethren had decided that it would be a much better policy to care for aged and indigent Freemasons and their wives or widows in their own homes or among their friends and to care for orphans the same way, by arranging for their support and maintenance at their own homes with their widowed mother, if they had one, and, if not, by having them cared for in the various orphanages already established in the State.

In 1924, in lieu of the former method of adding to the Fund, an amendment to the Constitution was adopted which provided for an assessment annually of $1 per member of each Lodge. In 1925 the Fund amounted to $135,000, the interest on which, added to the $1 per capita tax, increases the Fund by about $30,000 each year, which is about the amount paid out each year. There are five Trustees to the Fund, none of whom receive any compensation.

South Dakota. The Grand Lodge of South Dakota receives 50 cents from each member of the Fraternity, taken out from the Grand Lodge dues for benevolent purposes. A Fund amounting to $118,025 is handled through a Board of Trustees, the interest only being used for charitable distribution among the needy. Conditions in South Dakota have not warranted the maintenance of a Masonic Home, it having been found preferable to distribute the funds where needed in the manner suggested above.

Tennessee. Tennessee established a Widows and Orphans Home at Nashville in 1892 and has provided an Old Masons Home and special building for infirmary. The properties represent an investment of $353,773, but the Board of Control in 1925 recommended that a cash fund be set up to meet the loss by depreciation of buildings and equipment, this being prorated as 3 per cent on brick structures, 2½ per cent on stone, and 10 per cent on equipment and furnishings. On farm implements and trucks there is assigned a depreciation of 25 per cent. The Endowment Fund was $200,000. Hospital attendance is furnished. Homes operate on a budget system approved by the Ways and Means Committee of the Grand Lodge, which furnishes the funds. It was recommended that a voluntary offering of at least $1 per year for five years be pledged for permanent improvements, and after one year, was changed to a special tax of $1 per year for two years for each member of the subordinate Lodges and the result is a new fireproof, three-story dormitory for widows and their children. A new auditorium adjoining the school building is due to the generosity of the Order of the Eastern Star.

Texas. Texas has two Masonic Homes, one at Fort Worth which combines a Home, School and Hospital for Orphan Children and is on 210 acres of land, with a total valuation of $1,600,000. There is a Home for the Aged Masons, established in 1911 at Arlington, where widows are also maintained from the Masonic Home and School Funds. The Grand Chapter controls and manages the Home for Aged Masons and furnishes hospital care for about one-fourth of them. The Grand Lodge charitable revenue is derived from $1.25 dues with $10 raising fee, which goes to the Endowment Fund. A special building donation of $5 per capita was invited in 1922 and was paid. Among the Masonic institutions of Texas, including the Home and the School, Aged Masons Home, are the Templar Hospital, Home for Aged Members of the Eastern Star, Girl's Dormitory at the State University at Austin, the Dallas Children's Hospital, the Children's Clinic, Welfare Center for Tuberculosis Soldiers at Kerrville, Student Loan Funds, Tuberculosis Sanitoria Commission and Masonic Employment Bureau.

Utah. Utah has a Charity Fund which is being added to each year by 10 per cent of the gross receipts of their Grand Lodge and further supplemented by the interest accruing on the capital already invested. A small portion of this fund is used for relief work, although the individual local Lodges, combined with the Board of Relief, handle most of the needy cases from Lodge and contributed funds.

Vermont. In Vermont each individual Lodge cares for its own needy and deserving cases. The amount expended by each Lodge is reported with the annual returns. If it is found that any Lodge has expended more than $1 per member, the excess is repaid to the Lodge. If less than $1 has been used per member, nothing is repaid. This money is drawn from the General Fund of the Grand Lodge of Vermont, which is maintained by annual dues. They have on hand in a Permanent Charity Fund about $50,000, the income from which is to be available for benevolent purposes.

Virginia. Virginia established a Masonic Orphanage near Richmond in 1890 on a tract of 65 acres. The plant has been valued at $250,000 and has cared for children at an operating expense of $335 for each guest. Charitable revenue is derived from $1 dues and a special tax of $1.

Washington. Washington opened a Masonic and Eastern Star Home at Puyallup in 1914, with property valued at $100,000 and it enjoys an Endowment from bequests of $150,000. It has cared for adult guests at a net operating expense of $413 for each guest. It has permanent Relief Funds at $25,000. $150,000 additional was appropriated in 1923 by the Grand Lodge for the purchase and equipment of a site for a new Home and the furnishings of same. A site was purchased in 1924 at a cost of $75,625 near Zenith and the balance of the appropriation is to be used for expenses in connection with this project.

West Virginia. West Virginia has built a new Home for Masons, their Widows and Orphans at Parkersburg. The investment is approximately $275,000 and an Endowment Fund of $200,000 has been accumulated. It has a Permanent Relief Fund of $28,000. Revenues are derived from 50 cents per capita tax, $10 initiation fee and a $2 special building tax.

Wisconsin. Wisconsin has taken over the Masonic Home at Dousman, formerly in charge of the Wisconsin Consistory. This is a splendid tract of 319 acres, with practical farm buildings, and has been used as a Home for a limited number of adults. The new Home represents an investment of more than $250,000. The generosity of Brother W. A. Van Brunt provides the Home with an Endowment Fund of $200,000. Ample resources for its future are assured. The Order of the Eastern Star has started a Hospital in connection with this Home. Grand Lodge dues for Home and Building Funds are $1.50 per capita of the membership.

Wyoming. Wyoming appointed a Board of Trustees for a Masonic Home Fund in 1913, starting with $10,000, which amount in 1924 had increased to $48,000. Two funds have been provided, one known as the Temporary Fund, the other as the Permanent Fund. From the latter nothing can be drawn without an action of the Grand Lodge. This is all placed at interest under the direction of the Board. All receipts such as interest, per capita tax, and returns from other sources pertaining to these Funds are placed in the Temporary Fund during the entire Masonic year. At the close of the year, all sums in excess of the appropriations plus $500 retained in the Temporary Fund, are transferred to the Permanent Fund. Emergency cases requiring either temporary or continuous relief are handled from the Temporary Fund. Wherever possible the local Lodges are expected to provide for their needy members and where this is impracticable the Board of Trustees of the Masonic Home Fund appropriates the funds necessary. In many instances the local Lodges agree to provide a certain portion of the total amount, the Grand Lodge supplementing this with further contributions. Income for charitable purposes is derived from a 50 cents per capita tax and from the interest of funds on hand, from which returns additions are made to the Permanent Fund each year from sums set aside from the Temporary Fund.

CANADA

Alberta. Alberta has established a Benevolent Fund of about $100,000, the interest on which, together with a per capita tax of 50 cents per member, amounts to approximately $11,000 and which amount is annually expended for benevolent purposes. Monthly grants are made to needy Brethren and those depending upon them. The capital Benevolent Fund is augmented each year by a 50 cents per capita tax on the Grand Lodge membership and also by special contributions from Lodges and individuals.

British Columbia. British Columbia has a Grand Lodge Benevolent Fund amounting to approximately $150,000, the revenue being devoted to the relief of aged and Infirm Freemasons, their widows and orphans, generally by means of monthly payments. This Fund is maintained by voluntary subscriptions by the members, by a fee of $4 for each initiation in the Lodges, by ten per cent annually of the gross revenue of the Grand Lodge, and by any surplus which remains in the General Fund of the Grand Lodge after the year's business is wound up.

Manitoba. The Grand Lodge of Manitoba has no Masonic Home or Hospital. It has a Benevolent Fund of $185,000, the interest of which is devoted solely to charity.

Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia had an experience with joint management, a Home for Aged Men being established at Halifax. A Committee, of which Brother C. E. Puttner was Chairman, in 1904 solicited the support of every Lodge in the Jurisdiction that provision might be made for needy Freemasons. At the Grand Lodge Communication of the year, $900 was placed in the hands of Trustees named by the Grand Master. But the plan did not work well and the Grand Lodge withdrew. Another attempt by Brother Puttnir in 1905 was more successful, the assembled representatives of Lodges planning a Masonic Fair for the Armouries, Halifax, from September 25 to October 3, 1906, the net receipts being $17,406. In 1908 the Grand Lodge bought and improved the Freemasons Home at Windsor, adding twenty rooms, and another wing to the Infirmary is under way. The Home is maintained by a per capita tax of $1 per member and $5 for each candidate initiated. They also have an Endowment Fund of about $43,000.

Princess Edward Island. The Grand Lodge of Prince Edward Island has the smallest Jurisdiction in the world and maintains its Benevolent Fund from a per capita tax of 25 cents. The interest only from this Fund is used in dispensing relief to their needy Brethren and their widows and children, which more than amply covers necessary expenditures for this purpose. After investigation of a reported case the method of handling is very simple—the Grand Lodge merely issuing a check for the amount necessary to meet the needs of the case.

Ontario. Grand Lodge of Canada in the Province of Ontario makes allowances for relief directly from the General Fund or others of its resources and also provides assistance jointly with Lodges through local boards. Amounts disbursed by Grand Lodge in 1924, for example, were reported as $106,888; grants made by the Lodges were $60,000 in addition to this sum. This amount was far below the sum contributed by the constituent Lodges as they have not been compelled to report their benevolent grants to Grand Lodge. There is a Benevolent Emergency Fund of $2,000. The above report mentions that two beneficiaries are cared for in Roman Catholic Institutions, at the expense of Grand Lodge.

Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan has a Grand Lodge Benevolent Fund with an invested capital that in 1925, for example, amounted to $182,000, the interest only being used for relief. The Government has a Home in the Province for the aged and infirm and the Grand Lodge Benevolent Fund has defrayed the charge of any of the Brethren or their widows whom it has been necessary to send there.

Masonic International association. The Grand Lodge Alpina of Switzerland sent out an invitation in July, 1921, for an International Masonic Congress to be held in Geneva on October 19, 1921. The following Masonic Powers were represented at that Convention: Grand Lodge of New York, Grand Lodge Alpina, Grand Orient of France, Grand Lodge of France, Grand Orient of the Netherlands, Grand Orient of Belgium, Grand Orient of Italy, United Grand Orient of Lusitania of Portugal, Grand Lodge of Luxemburg, Grand Orient of Vienna of Austria, Grand Lodge of Bulgaria, and the Grand Orient of Turkey. An International Masonic Association was formed, and a Constitution and By-laws were adopted. Brother Edouard La-Tente was chosen Chancellor, or Secretary, taking charge on January 1, 1922, with headquarters at Geneva. Participating Masonic Powers were to share the expenses of the Association by annual contributions fixed according to the membership of the respective Jurisdictions.

Grand Lodges with membership from one to two thousand, $20; to five thousand, $100; ten thousand, $150; to twenty-five thousand, $200; to fifty thousand, $250; to one hundred thousand, $500; to two hundred thousand, $750; and over two hundred thousand, $1,000. These figures were based on the pre-war exchange status of the American dollar.

Brother Arthur S. Tompkins, then Deputy Grand Master of New York, and Brother Townsend Scudder, Past Grand Master of that State, in a report presented to the Grand Lodge of New York, 1922, point out the following six noteworthy accomplishments of the Geneva Conference:

1. The Conference established an agency through which all Grand Lodges are enabled to deal with one another in their efforts to get at the truth concerning each other, thus facilitating their getting the facts upon which to base their several judgments of each other, instead of having to rely and act largely upon hearsay, as has been the case in the past.

2. Contact between Jurisdictions is afforded without their being in diplomatic relations with one another, through their joint membership in the Association. Recognition and diplomatic relations will begin only with consensurable to those concerned.

3. The Membership of Grand Lodges belonging to the Association must be composed of men exclusively. This woman Masonry, as a part of the Order, is disposed of.

4. Members of the Association respect the territorial integrity and jurisdiction of each other member. Foreign Lodges within our territory—chartered by legitimate Grand Lodges acting, however, in hostility to our claims of exclusive jurisdiction, will be eliminated.

5. Grand Lodges maintain each its entire sovereign independence.

6. The Association has no concern with matters other than those of its own organization and functioning.

Masonic newspaper. A quarto or small folio weekly commenced in New York City, September 28, 1878, William T. Hardenbrook, Editor. Volume i contains fifty-two numbers, and the first thirty-one numbers contain four pages each, the others eight pages each. Volume ii commenced October 4, 1879, and ran to twenty-six numbers of eight pages each, and then it was discontinued. With No. 25 of the first volume the name of William T. Hardenbrook disappears as Editor. A file of this publication, bound in one volume, is at the Iowa Masonic Library, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Masonic Presidents of the United States of America. The following list is arranged alphabetically for ready reference and briefly gives the available facts concerning the presidents claimed to be Freemasons.

Adams, John Quincy, sixth president and son of John Adams, second president; born July 11, 1767; president, 1825; died February 23, 1848. A native of Massachusetts, his name has often been mistaken for that of another resident of Boston. Brother John C, Hurll, Acting Secretary, Grand Lodge, Boston, August 25, 1919, answering an inquiry of ours, copied the Lodge record of December 5, 1826, thus: "'Brother John Quincy Adams, a regular candidate for membership, was inquired for and being well recommended, was voted to be balloted for, and on balloting was unanimously admitted a member of Saint John's Lodge.' It would seem from this that he did not receive the Degrees in this Lodge, but what Lodge he was raised in is not stated. There is no reference to the presidency and I think he was another Adams." Certainly the president was not then at Boston. The Second Session of the Nineteenth Congress opened at Washington the previous day and President Adams himself records that from December 4 to 6, from early morn to late afternoon he had no leisure for reflection or writing. However, there is on record his own emphatic denial of membership (page 345, volume vii, Memoirs, Lippincott), on October 25, 1825, in reply to the plain question, he writes: "I told Watkins he might answer Tracy that I am not, and never was, a Freemason." BUCHANAN, JAMES, fifteenth president; born April 23, 1791; president, 1857; died, June 1, 1868; received Masonic burial from his Brethren of Lodge No. 43, in his native state, Pennsylvania, on June 4, 1868. Brother J. Fred Fisher, Secretary of Lodge No. 43, furnished on August 16, 1919, the following Masonic record of Brother James Buchanan: "He was made a Mason in Lodge No. 43 on December 11, 1816. Entered by W. M. Brother John Reynolds, and was Passed and Raised by W. M. Brother George Whitaker, January 24, 1817. He was elected Junior Warden, December 13, 1820, and Worshipful Master, December 23, 1822. At the expiration of his term of office, he was appointed the first District Deputy Grand Master of this District. He was elected an honorary member of Lodge No. 43, March 10, 1858. He died on June 1, 1868. He was also a member of Royal Arch Chapter No. 43, F. and A. M., but the only record we have is that he was Exalted on May 20, 1826." FILLMORE, MILLARD, thirteenth president; born February 7, 1800; elected vice-president, 1848, and on death of President Taylor succeeded him July 9, 1850, and died March 8, 1874. Said to have received the Degrees but afterwards recanted during the Anti-Masonic era in which he was active against the Craft (see page 548, Annual Report American Historical Association, volume i, 1902). No evidence of his Masonic affiliation obtained. In his official capacity as president he attended the laying of the corner-stone of the Capitol extension by the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia, July 4, 1851 (see History, Federal Lodge No. 1, Washington). GARFIELD, JAMES ABRAM, twentieth president; born November 19, 1831; president, 1881; died September 19, 1881. Masonic Eclectic, September, 1881 (pages 430–1), published the following: "Initiated, November 22, 1851; Passed, December 3, 1861, in Magnolia Lodge No. 20, Columbus, Ohio, and Raised in Columbus Lodge No. 30, by request of Magnolia Lodge, November 22, 1864. Affiliated with Garrettsville Lodge No. 246, October 10, 1866, remaining a member until 1870, and was Chaplain in the years 1868–9. United with Pentalpha Lodge No. 28, Washington, District of Columbia, as a charter member, May 4, 1869, and so remained until death. By special dispensation was admitted to Columbia Royal Arch Chapter No. 1, in Washington, District of Columbia, April 4, 1866, and exalted to the Royal Arch Degree, April 18, 1866; received the Red Cross and Templar Order in Columbia Commandery No. 2 at Washington, May 18, 1866 (this Commandery acting as escort from Washington to Cleveland with the remains after Brother Garfield's death). Received the Select and Most Excellent Architect's Degrees, February 2, 1871; received the Fourth and Fifth Degrees, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, in Mithras Lodge of Perfection No. 2, at Washington, May 2, 1871, and the intermediate Degrees to the Thirteenth included during the year (Brother W. L. Boyden, Librarian of the Supreme Council records these were communicated by General Albert Pike) and the Fourteenth Degree, January 2, 1872, with four other Brethren, three of whom died before him, namely: Francello G. Daniels, Robert M. Johnson, ex-Senator from Arkansas, and Henry Harrison Bradly, the only survivor of the five being Wm. Pierce Bell, Esq., lawyer, Washington City." Under date of September 2, 1919, Brother W. S. Lanfersiek, Secretary, Magnolia Lodge No. 20, by letter, confirmed the above Lodge references and Past Grand Master Campbell M. Voorhees of Ohio, November 11, 1921, also wrote explaining the division of the Degrees between the two Craft Bodies in his city, "During the Civil War times Columbus Lodge and Magnolia Lodge frequently exchanged courtesies in the conferring of Degrees upon soldiers in the service, and this was done in the conferring of the Degrees upon General Garfield. He received his First and Second Degrees in Magnolia Lodge and his Third Degree was conferred by Columbus Lodge for Magnolia." GRANT, ULYSSES SIMPSON, eighteenth president; born April 27, 1822; president, 1869; died July 23, 1885. A letter in the Blue and Gray, from Major Bryant S. Parker of South Carolina, was freely copied in other journals and conveyed the impression that General Grant was a Freemason. Major Parker told of being taken to headquarters as a prisoner of war, that General Grant asked him if he was a Freemason and that the prisoner soon convinced him of it and thereupon was promptly freed. General John Corson Smith attacked this story in the Rough Ashlar, a Masonic journal of Richmond, Virginia, and his essay was reprinted, November, 1895, in the Masonic Tidings, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and other magazines. Briefly, Brother Smith's finding, as in Proceedings, Grand Commandery of Illinois, 1908 (page 165) is that the General was too much of a soldier and not at all a Freemason for any such affair. Jesse R. Grant, Simpson S. Grant, and Orville S. Grant, father and brothers of the General, were all three Freemasons; Simpson a member of Galena Lodge No. 17, with Brother John Corson Smith, where the father, Jesse, visited on his trips from Covington, Kentucky; and Orville was initiated in Miners' Lodge No. 273, Galena, Illinois. General, or Captain Grant as he was then known, came to Galena in 1850 and moved his family there in 1860. The father told General Smith that he knew his son would like to be a Freemason and the subject was discussed between them on an excursion to Dubuque, Iowa, and on other occasions. General Grant was at home when Galena Commandery No. 49, Knights Templar, was instituted in 1871, with Brother Smith as Eminent Commander. In the evening President Grant received the Brethren for a pleasant hour of conversation and then the visitors returned to the Asylum. At that reception the president's favorable opinion of Freemasonry was expressed and it was agreed that at the first opportunity he would sign a petition to Miner's Lodge No. 273 of which Brother Smith was then Master. During the political campaign of 1872–3 General Grant was again home and Grand Master James A. Hawley agreed to make the president a Freemason "at sight" but affairs of state recalled him unexpectedly to Washington and the subsequent ill-health and removal from Galena of Brother Smith brought the plans unsuccessfully to an end. The matter does not appear to have ever been revived.

HARDING, WARREN GAMALIEL, twenty-ninth president; born November 5, 1855; president, 1921; died August 2, 1923. From a letter written by the late Grand Secretary, J. H. Bromwell, and from the announcement sent out by the Grand Master, Harry S. Johnson, of Ohio, on August 8, 1923, these details are obtained: Brother Harding, was initiated in Marion Lodge No. 70, at Marion, Ohio, on June 28, 1901; Passed, August 13, 1920; Raised, August 27, 1920. In Marion Chapter No. 62, Royal Arch Masons, at Marion, Ohio, he received the Mark Master, Past and Most Excellent Master's Degrees on January 11, 1921, and the Exaltation of the Royal Arch Degree on January 13, 1921. In Marion Commandery No. 86, Knights Templar, at Marion, Ohio, he received the Order of the Red Cross, and the Orders of Knight of Malta and Knight Templar, March 1, 1921. In Scioto Consistory, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, he (the only candidate at that time) received all the grades from Fourth to Thirty-second inclusive, on January 5, 1921. He became a member of Aladdin Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, at Columbus, Ohio, on January 7, 1921. By special dispensation the Order of Veiled Prophet was conferred upon him at the White House, Washington, May 11, 1921, by E. W. Libbey, E. S. Schmid, C. P. Boss, and W. W. Jermane, of Kallipolis Grotto. Brother Harding had been elected to receive the Degrees in Marion Council No. 22, Royal and Select Masters, at Marion, Ohio, as Deputy General Grand High Priest at the institution and then the visitors returned to the Asylum.

JACKSON, ANDREW, seventh president; born March 29, 1767; president, 1829; died June 8, 1845. He was elected Grand Master of Tennessee on October 7, 1822, and re-elected on October 6, 1823, but his Lodge was not named and in the Proceedings, Grand Lodge of Tennessee, 1845, when his Masonic services were affectionately acknowledged (pages 552–5, 570–1, 578–80 of Reprint) there is no more information than in the obituary notice prepared by Grand Chaplain Philip P. Neeley, who says (page 578), "We have not received information as to the Lodge where he was made a Mason, but learn that he was for some time, during the early part of his life, in connection with one that met at Clover Bottom, held under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky."

Philanthropic Lodge No. 12 was granted a Charter from Kentucky on September 18, 1805 (see Doings of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, 1800–1900, page 25, by H. B. Grant, Grand Secretary). However, the practise prevailed of Lodges reporting their members in full to the Grand Lodge of Kentucky and careful search made for us by the late Grand Secretary Dave Jackson failed to find the name of Andrew Jackson. Philanthropic Lodge No. 12 ceased to be on the Kentucky roll in 1812. But Jackson was present as a Freemason at the opening of the Lodge at Greenville September 5, 1801, under a Dispensation from the Grand Lodge of North Carolina which possesses the original transcript of the Minutes showing that the Senior Warden named in the Dispensation being absent Andrew Jackson served as "S. W.—Pro Tem" of this first meeting of Greenville Lodge No. 43, afterwards No. 3 of the Grand Lodge of Tennessee. Brother Jackson made the motion for the appointment of a Committee on By-laws at this meeting under Dispensation but two others were assigned to that duty and the probability is that he was only a visitor on that occasion. Another Lodge, at Nashville, chartered on December 17, 1796, No. 29 of North Carolina, Saint Tammany, afterwards Harmony Lodge No. 1 of Tennessee, following the division into the two Grand Lodges, shows that Jackson was a member but the records being incomplete do not determine the date of his initiation but he became a resident of Nashville in 1788 and Brother William L. Boyd, Librarian of the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, finds Andrew Jackson a member as early as 1800 because he was present on March 24 of that year at the first meeting of Tennessee Lodge No. 2, formerly No. 41 under North Carolina, held in Knoxville and was then credited as a member of Harmony Lodge No. 1. Past Grand Master Charles Comstock of Tennessee believed him to be a member of Harmony Lodge No. 1. Past Grand Master Charles Comstock of Tennessee believed him to have received the Royal Arch Degree under authority of a Craft Lodge Warrant and probably did not affiliate with any Chapter though he officiated as Deputy General Grand High Priest at the institution of the Grand Chapter of Tennessee on April 4, 1826, and is recorded later as present in Cumberland Chapter No. 1 at Nashville, assisting at installation of officers. Andrew Jackson took part in several Masonic functions and at Nashville on May 4, 1825, introduced General Lafayette to the Grand Lodge of Tennessee. The Charter of Harmony Lodge No. 1 was arrested on December 9, 1808, and this would leave General Jackson a non-affiliate which may account for the appearance of his name in the minutes as a Past Master without mention of any Lodge connection. For much interesting information here summarized we are indebted to Past Grand Master A. B. Andrews, North Carolina; Past Grand High Priest C. H. Smart, and Past Grand Master Charles Comstock, Tennessee; W. L. Boyd, Librarian, Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite; Dave Jackson, late Grand Secretary, Kentucky. An article by Brother Andrews on Andrew Jackson the Freemason appeared in the New Age, Washington, January, 1921.

JEFFERSON, THOMAS, third president; born April 13, 1743; president, 1801; died July 4, 1826, on the fifteenth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, of which he was the author. While the assertion has frequently been made that Jefferson was a Freemason and that he attended the Lodge of the Nine Sisters (the Muses) at Paris no further details are given and a letter from the Grand Orient of France under date of September 9, 1919, assures us that there is no evidence in existence of any visit to that Lodge by Jefferson, nor does our own search through the history of that Lodge—Une Loge Maçonique d’Avant 1789, by Louis Amiable—discover any such allusion. Examination by Brother Julius F. Sachse and W. J. Paterson of the “Tableaux” of this Lodge, the “Règlements” of 1779 and 1806, and the “Annuaire” of 1883, preserved in the Library of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, disclose no mention of Thomas Jefferson as a member. His letter to Madison on secret societies makes no allusion suggesting any personal acquaintance of Freemasonry.

Dr. Joseph W. Eggleston, Past Grand Master of Virginia, was most positive that Jefferson was not a Freemason. From correspondence between Charles H. Callahan, also a Past Grand Master of Virginia, and Brother E. E. Dinwiddie, Secretary, Widow’s Son’s Lodge No. 60, Charlottesville, we find the latter examined carefully the records of his Lodge, but found no evidence of Jefferson’s membership. He also ascertained that when General Lafayette visited Jefferson at Monticello in 1824, the Freemasons of Charlottesville, only four miles away, entertained him at an elaborate social function and banquet. At the Lodge meeting held before the banquet, the Marquis was elected an honorary member. Jefferson was then at home but was not present among the Freemasons with his guest but he did attend and participate in the public function of the citizens. Grand Secretary Charles A. Nesbitt of Virginia wrote us, October 4, 1919, “To the best of my knowledge Thomas Jefferson was not a Mason. According to the records of our Grand Lodge he was not connected with the Craft in this State.”

JOHNSON, ANDREW, seventeenth president; born December 29, 1808; as vice-president he became president on the death of Lincoln in 1865; died July 31, 1875. Initiated, Passed and Raised in Greeneville Lodge No. 119, now No. 3, Greeneville, Tennessee, sometime in May, 1851. The records of Greeneville Lodge were destroyed during the Civil War. The Grand Lodge files were also partly burned up when the Masonic Temple was gutted by fire in 1856. Past Grand Master Charles Comstock who saw the name on the Lodge roster in the sixties, also added: “I am not sure about the Chapter membership but think he (Johnson) may have been exalted in Washington Chapter No. 21 at Jonesboro. In that event he was probably a charter member of Greeneville Chapter No. 82, chartered October 1, 1868.” We note his name on the roster of Nashville Commandery No. 1, the “Date of Knighting” being July 26, 1859 (see Proceedings, first State Conclave, Nashville, 1859, page 27). This book contains a list with Andrew Johnson’s name as of Nashville Commandery No. 1 and among the names of those present at the formation of the Grand Commandery of Tennessee is recorded Andrew J. Johnston. Each name is not in both lists and one might assume that these two names refer to the same Brother, the names being slightly misspelled. However, Brother Comstock quotes Knight Templar Registry by Brother James D. Richardson, 1883, to show that Johnston was a farmer from Franklin. Scottish Rite Degrees including Prince of the Royal Secret were communicated to the president, June 20, 1867, at White House, Washington, by Brothers B. B. French and A. T. C. Pierson of the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction. Johnson took part publicly in several Masonic functions, laying of corner-stones, etc., and at his funeral Deputy Grand Master G. C. Conner officiated, Coeur de Lion Commandery No. 9, Knoxville, also giving Templar ceremony.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM, sixteenth president; born February 12, 1809; president, 1861; died April 15, 1865. Brother Edouard Quartier-la-Tente, Past Grand Master, Swiss Grand Lodge “Alpina,” in the Annuaire, International Masonic Association, listed Lincoln among illustrious Freemasons (see, for example, page 44, 1913, and page 59, 1923). William H. Grimshaw of the Library of Congress also in History of Freemasonry, 1903 (page 365), lists Lincoln as a Freemason. In a letter to us, April 5, 1917, this author says: “So far as my book is concerned I quoted M. Edouard Quartier-la-Tente, P. G. M., Grand Lodge ‘Alpina.’ I will further state that Mr. J. H. Brooks, who was Mr. Lincoln’s messenger, informed me that Mr. Lincoln was a Mason. The degrees were conferred in an Army Lodge attached to Gen. Grant’s army in front of Richmond. I wrote Robert T. Lincoln as to the matter, and he informed me that so far as he could find, there were no papers or other record among his father’s papers to indicate that he was a Mason.” Nothing further to support the claim credited to Brooks has been discovered by us. In the memorial volume published by the Government at Washington, 1866, there are found the tributes of forty-four foreign Masonic Bodies, most of these plainly referring to Lincoln as a Brother. An inquiry made by R. W. Robert D. Holmes, Deputy Grand Master, New York; was answered by Brother B. B. French from the Washington office of the Grand Master, Knights Templar, April 21, 1865. “Yours of the 19th is just received. President Lincoln was not a Mason. He once told me in the presence of Most Worshipful Brother J. W. Simons that he had at one time made up his mind to apply for admission to our Fraternity but that he feared he was too lazy to attend to his duty as a Mason, as he should like to do, and that he had not carried out his intentions. I told him it was not too late now. ‘Well,’ said he, ‘as likely as not I shall apply to you to the president, June 20, 1867, at White House, Washington, by Brothers B. B. French and A. T. C. Pierson of the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction. Johnson took part publicly in several Masonic functions, laying of corner-stones, etc., and at his funeral Deputy Grand Master G. C. a Freemason whose framed petition, written in his own hand entirely, hangs on the wall of the Masonic Temple at Springfield, Illinois. For this information and other particulars we are indebted to Brother Hal C. McLeod of Springfield.

MADISON, JAMES, fourth president; born March 16, 1751; president, 1809; died June 28, 1836. Mentioned in connection with the Craft but no proof offered. Brother Boyden found in the history of Richmond Lodge No. 10, Richmond, Virginia, where Brother Walthall records that on July 25, 1836, this Lodge with Nos. 14 and 19 took part in a general tribute of respect to the memory of the ex-president. But this offers no evidence of Masonic affiliation. A letter, not indicative of Masonic membership, purporting to be from Madison to a friend on January 24, 1832, is given in the Anti-Masonic Publications (page 22, volume ii, 1834-79), by Joseph Ritner.

McKINLEY, WILLIAM, twenty-fifth president; born January 29, 1843; president, 1897; died September 14, 1901. A native of Niles, Ohio, he took his first degrees at Winchester, Virginia, in Winchester Hiram Lodge No. 21, Secretary C. Vernon Eddy kindly supplying us the dates, as Entered Apprentice, May 1, 1865; Fellow Craft, May 2, 1865; Master Mason, May 3, 1865. This occurred during the Civil War while Major McKinley was stationed there with the Northern Army. Observing the Masonic brotherhood prominent under the afflictions of war a number of Northern soldiers petitioned the local Lodge and received the degrees. McKinley affiliated with Canton (Ohio) Lodge No. 60, August 21, 1867; then became a Charter Member of Eagle Lodge No. 43, also at Canton, a Lodge afterwards named after him. He received the Mark, Past and Most Excellent Master Degrees in Canton Chapter No. 84, December 27, 1883, and the Royal Arch Degree, December 28, that year. The Red Cross was conferred upon him December 18, 1884, in Canton Commandery No. 38, and the Malta and the Order of the Temple, December 23, 1884. A gold card presented to him by California Commandery No. 1 of San Francisco for his reception there on May 22, 1901, came by gift after McKinley’s death into the possession of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania through the kindness of Brother John Wannamaker, former Postmaster-General.

MORO, JAMES, fifth president; born April 28, 1788; president, 1817; died July 4, 1831. Brother W. L. Boyden finds from the original records that Monroe was on November 6, 1775, recommended to be admitted a member of Williamsburg Lodge No. 6, at Williamsburg, Virginia, and that on November 9, 1775, Monroe was “prefer’d, received and ballots for, passed, accepted and entered an apprentice.” Where his other degrees were given is not clear but as there is an old tradition oft repeated of him taking degrees in an Army Lodge that may account for them. Brother J. G. Hankins, Richmond, Virginia, mentioned in a letter his correspondence with the president of Williams and Mary College at Williamsburg, Virginia, that Dr. Lyon G. Tyler wrote a history of the Lodge from the records, that this was published in the William and Mary Quarterly, 1892, volume i, number 1, lists the name of James Monroe, afterwards President of the United States. Dalcho Consistory Bulletin at Richmond, Virginia, March-April, 1915, tells of Richmond Randolph Lodge No. 19, taking part in a memorial meeting in honor of James Monroe. A much more conclusive instance is the one given by Brother Boyden that the records of Cumberland Lodge No. 8, of Tennessee, June 8, 1819, show a reception to Monroe as “a Brother of the Craft,” that the Worshipful Master W. Tannehill, afterwards Grand Master, headed the procession meeting the president, and that he was given a “Private Reception by the Masons.” Admiral George W. Baird, Past Grand Master, Credita Monroe, on page 125, Masonry in the formation of Our Government, by Philip A. Roth, with also being a member of Kilwinning Cross Lodge No. 2 at Port Royal, Virginia (see also Quarterly Bulletin, Iowa Masonic Library, October, 1923, pages 121-3).

POLK, JAMES KNOX, eleventh president; born November 2, 1795; president, 1845; died June 15, 1849. Initiated June 5, 1820; Passed, August 7, 1820; Raised, September 4, 1820; chosen Junior Deacon October 2, 1820, Junior Warden December 3, 1821, all in Columbia Lodge No. 31, Columbia, Tennessee. LaFayette Chapter No. 4, Columbia, Tennessee, gave him the Royal Arch April 14, 1825.

ROOSEVELT, THEODORE, twenty-sixth president; born October 27, 1858; as vice-president he succeeded the assassinated President McKinley, 1901; died January 6, 1919. A member of Matinecock Lodge No. 806, Oyster Bay, New York, he was initiated January 2, 1901; Passed, March 27, 1901, and Raised, April 24, 1901. His Masonic interests were keen, loyal, and constant, and his intercourse with Brethren abroad and at home most enjoyable. He participated whole-heartedly in a number of public Masonic functions.

TAFT, WILLIAM HOWARD, twenty-seventh president; born September 15, 1857; president, 1909. Brother F. Wm. Harte, Secretary, Kilwinning Lodge No. 356, Cincinnati, Ohio, wrote us as follows: “William Howard Taft was made a Mason at sight on the afternoon of February 18, 1909, by Worshipful Brother Charles S. Hoskinson, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Ohio. In the evening of the same day Brother Taft witnessed the conferring of the Master Mason Degree in full form on one candidate, the work being done by Kilwinning Lodge No. 356. All of the above took place in the Scottish Rite Cathedral, 417 Broadway, Cincinnati, Ohio. He was given a demit from the Grand Lodge of Ohio and presented same to Kilwinning Lodge No. 356, F. & A. M., on February 18, 1909, and he was elected a member of said Lodge on April 14, 1909. "At sight" in this case meant that the Grand Master convened a Lodge of such assisting Brethren as he deemed necessary and the three Degrees were given concisely on the one occasion.

TAYLOR, ZACHARY, twelfth president; born September 24, 1784; president, 1849; died July 9, 1850. Brother Boyden suggests that the story of Taylor being a Freemason arose from resolutions passed by Santa Rosa Lodge No. 16, Milton, Florida, on the death of "Brother Taylor," and from his presence when the Grand Lodge of Virginia laid a cornerstone at Richmond, February 22, 1850. But nothing conclusive has arisen to establish his Masonic affiliation.

TYLER, JOHN, tenth president; born March 29, 1790; president, 1841, as vice-president succeeding President Harrison on the latter's death; died January 18, 1862. No support of consequence has appeared for the claim that he was a Freemason. The Virginia Masonic Journal, September, 1919, published the following: "In a public address before a body of Masons at a corner-stone laying a few years before his death, John Tyler used these words "It is not my good fortune to belong to your (Masonic) society, or to any of a kindred character."" (see also Bulletin, Dalco Consistory, Richmond, Virginia, March-April, 1915, quoted in above).

WASHINGTON, GEORGE, first president; born February 11, 1731/2 (Old Style, owing to reform of the calendar date now celebrated is February 22, 1732); president, 1789; died December 14, 1799. Initiated, November 4, 1752; Passed, March 3, 1753; Raised, August 4, 1753, in Fredericksburg Lodge No. 4, Fredericksburg, Virginia. Charter Master of Alexandria Lodge No. 22, Alexandria, Virginia, April 28, 1788, and re-elected December 20, 1788. This Lodge formerly No. 39 under Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, became No. 22 under the Grand Lodge of Virginia, and after the death of Washington was in 1805 named Alexandria-Washington Lodge (see article on Washington for additional details).

A thorough-going treatise on Masonic Presidents, Vice-Presidents and Signers (of the Declaration of Independence), Washington, is published by Brother William L. Boyden, Librarian of the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and in the New Age, August, 1920, Brother Boyden also deals with the subject. His list of Masonic Vice-Presidents includes John C. Breckinridge, Aaron Burr, Schuyler Colfax, George M. Dallas, Charles W. Fairbanks, Garret A. Hobart, Andrew Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, William R. King, Thomas R. Marshall, Theodore Roosevelt, Adlai E. Stevenson, Daniel D. Tompkins, all of whom are given the obtainable details of their respective memberships. Lists have also appeared in Masonic journals, notably the Quarterly Bulletin, Iowa Masonic Library, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, January, 1917, and October, 1923.
Association of the various local Masonic Boards of Relief in North America and functions as a protective mutual agency against impostors and as a clearing house for better methods of administering Masonic relief and charity. Among the important suggestions of the Association are the following relative to matters that should be recorded when an application is made for relief: The full name of the applicant, in case it is a woman or minor boy, the full name of the person on whom the Masonic claim is based, the name, number and location of the Lodge, the occupation, home address, place of birth, height, weight and general characteristics that may be necessary or useful in identifying the applicant at some future time, an examination of a recently published List of Regular Lodges to see if the lodge claimed is regular, an examination of the documentary evidence that the applicant may be able to produce, a specimen of the applicant's handwriting including the signature. A record should be kept descriptive of the documents produced by the applicant. If applicant claims that documents were lost or stolen, a record should be made of them as the applicant describes them. It is advisable to keep some record of the applicant's story, especially that part that relates to the cause of application, whether from sickness, loss, theft or enforced idleness.

MASONIC SERVICE ASSOCIATION. The United States entered the World War, April 6, 1917, and the Grand Lodge of New York in annual communication on the first Tuesday of May, 1917, addressed by Judge Riddell, Theodore Roosevelt, and others, voted support and confidence. In the following June, Judge Townsend Scudder arranged for Brother W. C. Prime to go abroad and survey the situation and advise upon the course New York should pursue toward the many Brethren in the service. The Grand Master Thomas Penny then appointed Townsend Scudder, E. C. Knight, W. C. Prime, Rougier Thorne, Committee on Plan and Scope of Masonic Service, and on September 10, 1917, the Grand Lodge met for further action (see Proceedings, 1918). In October, 1917, Grand Master Penny addressed the other United States Grand Jurisdictions regarding a conference upon war problems (see Proceedings, 1918, pages 445-96) and such meeting was called for May 9, 1918, Judge William S. Farmer then Grand Master, and Jurisdictions represented being Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Michigan, Oklahoma, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, New York. The New York Overseas Masonic Commission headed by Judge Scudder after energetic but unsuccessful efforts to secure favorable Governmental co-operation went to France in uniform of the Young Men's Christian Association. Four Sea and Field Lodges were organized and the Mission established contacts, extending relief, hospital visitations, and financial help, to some sixty Masonic Clubs in the American Army; a Trowel and Triangle Club of about 12,000 Freemasons in Young Men's Christian Association service acted as the principal agency in this work and Brother Sidney Morse of New York was Recording Secretary of the Trowel and Triangle Club and a liaison officer between Club, Mission, and Young Men's Christian Association. Other minds were meanwhile active and Grand Master George L. Schoonover of Iowa, October 3, 1918, invited the other Jurisdictions to a conference at Cedar Rapids, November 26-8, 1918, when the following Jurisdictions were represented: Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Washington. The conference resulted in the formation of the Masonic Service Association.

MASONIC SIGNS AND TOKENS. The author who was afterwards Sir Richard Steele, describing the class of men called Pretty Fellows, printed this item in the Tatler (June 9, 1709), "You see these accost each other with effeminate airs; they have their signs and tokens like Freemasons."

MASONIC SONGS. See Poetry of Freemasonry and Songs of Freemasonry.

MASON, ILLUSTRIOUS AND SUBLIME GRAND MASTER. The French expression is Maçon Illustre et Sublime Grand Maître. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MASON OF THE SECRET. The French expression is Maçon du Secret. This name is found as that of two Degrees.
1. The Sixth Degree of the Rite of Tschoudy.
2. The Seventh Degree of the Rite of Saint Martin.

MASON, OPERATIVE. See Operative Masons.

MASON, PERFECT. In French, Maçon Parfait. The Twenty-seventh Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.
Freemasonry. is corrected by the quotation from the original grant of Masonry (pages 91-7) the field as far back as 1677. Edward Conder, Jr., in The Hole Craft and Fellowship of Masons, describes in the Cheveron a Cumpas of Blak.

In some old books, as is pointed out by Brother Conder gives in full on pages 12. At their Hall in Basinghall Street, Ashmole says to be confounded with the Fraternity of Freemasons, but originally there was some connection between the two. At their Hall in Basinghall Street, Ashmole says that, in my opinion, the Company of Masons of the City of London, in its early days, practised, and was acquainted with, all the traditions and moral teachings of the Fraternity, and that when the monastic gilds fell into chaos, the London Company of Masons preserved the ancient traditions of the Gild, and amongst its documents a copy of those manuscripts. Traditions, with the object of keeping the old order of things alive; and thus assisted in handing them down to the seventeenth century. From an inventory of the contents of the chest of the Worshipful Company of Masons and hundred years, does not owe its origin to the Masons' Hall Lodge.

Having headed this Introduction, "Masonry or Freemasonry," I cannot conclude without saying emphatically that, in my opinion, the Company of Masons of the City of London, in its early days, practised, and was acquainted with, all the traditions and moral teachings of the Fraternity, and that when the monastic gilds fell into chaos, the London Company of Masons preserved the ancient traditions of the Gild, and amongst its documents a copy of those manuscripts. citizens of London, it appears not long since to have contained a book written on parchment, bound or stitched in parchment, containing 113 annals of the antiquity, rise, and progress of the art and mystery of Masonry. But this document is not now to be found. But here I leave it. The one thing certain is that, up to about 1700, the Company and the Society were hand in hand,

But after that date the connexion appears to have ended, and there is nothing to show that Speculative Masonry had a place in the thoughts of the members of the Company.

MAISON, SCOTTISH MASTER. In French, Maçon Écosais Maître. Also called Perfect Elect, Elu parfait. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

MAISON, EMPEROR OF THE. The French is Maçons, Empereur de tous les. A Degree cited in the nomenclature of Fustier.

MAISON, SPECULATIVE. See Speculative Freemasonry.

MAISON, STONE. See Stone Masons.

MAISON SUBLIME. In French, Mâçon sublime. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MAISON, SUBLIME OPERATIVE. The French name is Mâçon Sublime Pratique. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MAISON’S WIFE AND DAUGHTER. A Degree frequently confered in the United States on the wives, daughters, sisters, and mothers of Freemasons, to secure to them, by investing them with a peculiar mode of recognition, the aid and assistance of the Fraternity. It may be conferred by any Mason Mason, and the requirement is that the recipient shall be the wife, unmarried daughter, unmarried sister, or widowed mother of a Master Mason. It is sometimes called the Holy Virgin, and has been by some deemed of so much importance that a Manual of it, with the title of The Ladies’ Masonry, or Hieroglyphic Monitor, was published at Louisville, Kentucky, in 1851, by Past Grand Master William Leigh, of Alabama.

MAISON, TRUE. The French is Maçon Vrai. A Degree composed by Pernett. It is the only one of the advanced Hermetic Degrees of the Rite of Avignon, and it became the First Degree of the same system after it was transplanted to Montpellier (see Academy of True Masons).

MASONORA. A Hebrew work on the Bible, intended to secure it from any alterations or innovations. Those who composed it were termed Masorites, who taught from tradition, and who invented the Hebrew points. They were also known as Melchites.

MASONETIC POINTS. The Hebrew alphabet is without vowels, which were traditionally supplied by the reader from oral instruction, hence the true ancient sounds of the words have been lost. But about the eighth or ninth century a school of Rabbis, called Masorites, invented vowel points, to be placed above or below the consonants, so as to give them a determined pronunciation. These Masonetic Points are never used by the Jews in their Rolls of the Law, and in all investigations into the derivation and meaning of Hebrew names, Masonic scholars and other etymologists always reject them.

MASSACHUSETTS. The Reverend Brother Montague, of Massachusetts, is said to have received in 1825 or 1826 a document proving that the first regular Lodge in America was held in King’s Chapel, Boston, by virtue of a Dispensation from the Grand Lodge of England, about the year 1720. This claim was published by Brother Charles W. Moore, Masonic Mirror, and his standing lends weight to it although further proof is lacking. In 1733, Henry Price was appointed Provincial Grand Master of New England by Lord Viscount Montague, Grand Master of Masons in England. The Brethren assembled on July 30, and a Grand Lodge was formed under the title of Saint John’s Grand Lodge. The following Grand Officers were installed: Andrew Belcher, Deputy Grand Master; Thomas Kennelly, Senior Grand Warden; John Quann, Junior Grand Warden pro tempore. Orders were received from the Grand Lodge in England to establish Freemasonry in all North America. In consequence, the Saint John’s Grand Lodge was ardent in the work and even established District Grand Lodges in Chile and China. Saint Andrew’s Lodge, however, was not recognized by them until the Brethren were all united under one Grand Lodge on March 5, 1792.

Saint Andrew’s Chapter was formed by ten members, four of whom, if not more, belonged to Army Lodges, and held its first meeting on August 18, 1769. Until July 26, 1792, it was called the Royal Arch Lodge of Boston. At that time it was mentioned as Chapter but not until May 11, 1797, was it called Saint Andrew’s Chapter. James Brown was elected Master and Charles Chambers, Senior Warden. When the connection of the Army Brethren with the Chapter was severed, there was some question of its right to continue work, but the use of its own Charter was granted by Saint Andrew’s Lodge until the Grand Chapter was established. Delegates from Saint Andrew’s, King Cyrus, Providence, Solomon, Franklin, No. 4; Franklin, No. 6, and Hudson Chapters assembled in Hartford, Connecticut, on January 24, 1797, and formed the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the Northern States of America. It was decided that there should be a Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons established in each State. Massachusetts Deputy Grand Royal Arch Chapter held its first meeting on March 13, 1797. The word Deputy was dropped from the title after April, 1799. At the annual meeting in Newburyport, September 17, 1799, it was fully established.

In 1817 Boston Council was organized by nine Royal Arch Masons who had received the Degree of Royal Master. It undoubtedly received written authority from Columbian Council, No. 1, of New York. At a Convention held on February 8, 1825, at Brimfield, for the purpose of establishing a Grand Council, six Councils were represented by seventeen delegates, and on June 15, 1826, the Grand Council was fully constituted at Boston.

Newburyport Encampment conferred Degrees as early as 1795. It ceased work during the Anti-Masonic movement but was revived in 1855 when its Charter was restored. A Convention of Knights Templar held at Providence, Rhode Island, on May 13, 1805, adopted a Constitution for the Grand Encampment of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. According to the authorities in Massachusetts, this was the first Grand Encampment to be established in the United States, though that honor is also claimed by Philadelphia.
The introduction of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite was as follows: Boston Lafayette Lodge of Perfection, chartered January 21, 1842; Lowell Council of Princes of Jerusalem, May 28, 1858; Mount Calvary Chapter of Rose Croix, May 16, 1860; Massachusetts Consistory, May 15, 1861.

MASSENA, ANDRE. Duke of Rivoli, Prince of Essling, and a Marshal of France, born at Nice in 1758. Early in the French Revolution he joined a battalion of volunteers, and soon rose to high military rank. He was a prominent Grand Officer of the French Grand Orient. He was designated by Napoleon, his master, as the Robber, in consequence of his being so extortionate.

MASSONUS. Used in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, according to Carpenter (Glossary), for Mason.

MASTER, ABSOLUTE SOVEREIGN GRAND. The French name is Souverain Grand Maître absolu, the title of the Ninetieth and last Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

MASTER AD VITAM. In the French Freemasonry of the earlier part of the eighteenth century, the Masters of Lodges were not elected annually, but held their office for life. Hence they were called Masters ad Vitam, or Masters for Life.

MASTER, ANCIENT. The French name is Maître Ancien. The Fourth Degree of the Rite of Martinism. This would more properly be translated Past Master, for it has the same position in the régime or Rite of Saint Martin that the Past Master has in the English system.

MASTER ARCHITECT, GRAND. See Grand Master Architect.

MASTER ARCHITECT, PERFECT. The French title is Maître Architecte Parfait. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite, and in some other collections.

MASTER ARCHITECT, PRUSSIAN. Maître Architecte Prussien. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

MASTER, BLUE. A name sometimes given, in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, to Master Masons of the Third Degree, in contradistinction to some of the advanced Degrees, and in reference to the color of their collars.

MASTER BUILDER. Taking the word master in the sense of one possessed of the highest degree of skill and knowledge, the epithet “Master Builder” is sometimes used by Freemasons as a name of the Grand Architect of the Universe. Urquhart (Pillars of Hercules ii, 67) derives it from the ancient Hebrews, who, he says, “used Algabil, the Master Builder, as an epithet of God.”

MASTER, CABALISTIC. In French the name is Maître Cabalistique. A Degree in the collection of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

MASTER, COHEN. The French expression is Maître Coënn. A Degree in the collection of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

MASTER, CROWNED. In French, Maître Couronné. A Degree in the collection of the Lodge of Saint Louis des Amis-Réunis, of the reunited friends, at Calais.

MASTER, EGYPTIAN. The French name is Maître Égyptien. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

MASTER, ELECT. See Elect Master.

MASTER, ENGLISH. In French, Maître Anglais. The Eighth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

MASTER, ENGLISH PERFECT. The French name is Maître Parfait Anglais. A Degree in the collection of Le Rouge.

MASTER, FOUR TIMES VENERABLE. In French, Maître quatre fois Vénérable. A Degree introduced into Berlin by the Marquis de Bernez. See Grand Master.

MASTER, HERMETIC. The French title is Maître Hermétique. A Degree in the collection of Lemanceau.

MASTER, ILLUSTRIOUS. In French the name is Maître Illustré. A Degree in the collection of Lemanceau.

MASTER, ILLUSTRIOUS SYMBOLIC. The French name is Maître Symbolique Illustré. A Degree in the nomenclature of Fustier.

MASTER IN ISRAEL. See Intendant of the Building.

MASTER IN PERFECT ARCHITECTURE. The French name is Maître en la Parfaite Architecture. A Degree in the nomenclature of Fustier.

MASTER IN THE CHAIR. The German name is Meister im Stuhl. The name given in Germany to the presiding officer of a Lodge. It is the same as the Worshipful Master in English.

MASTER, IRISH. The French name is Maître Irlandais. The Seventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim. Ramsay gave this name at first to the Degree which he subsequently called Maître Écosais or Scottish Master. It is still the Seventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

MASTER, LITTLE ELECT. The French name is Petit Maître Élu. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge of the Philosophic Scottish Rite.

MASTER MASON. In all the Rites of Freemasonry, no matter how variant may be their organization in the advanced Degrees, the Master Mason constitutes the Third Degree. In form this Degree is also everywhere substantially the same, because its legend is an essential part of it; and, as on that legend the Degree must be founded, there can nowhere be any important variation, because the tradition has at all times been the same.

The Master Mason’s Degree was originally called the summit of Ancient Craft Masonry; and so it must have been before the disavowal from it of the Royal Arch, by which is meant not the ritual, but the symbolism of Arch Masonry. But under its present organization the Degree is actually incomplete, because it needs a complement that is only to be supplied in a higher one. Hence its symbolism is necessarily restricted, in its mutilated form, to the first Temple and the present life, although it gives the assurance of a future one.

As the whole system of Craft Masonry is intended to present the symbolic idea of man passing through the pilgrimage of life, each Degree is appropriated to a certain portion of that pilgrimage. If, then, the First Degree is a representation of youth, the time to learn, and the Second of manhood or the time to work, the Third is symbolic of old age, with its trials, its sufferings, and its final termination in death. The time for toiling is now over—the opportunity to learn has passed.
whether the Master Mason's Degree, as a Degree, was is none that it did not. All the old manuscripts speak of a negative character. There is none that the Degree goes no farther back than the early part of the last eighteenth century, or whether we owe it to the building of the Temple of Jerusalem the Craft were settling the question as to the time of the invention says that "so far the evidence respecting its history is not the Revivalists of 1717. This is still the great design of the Third Degree of Freemasonry. This is the scope and aim of its ritual. The Master Mason represents man, when youth, properly directed, leads us to honorable and virtuous maturity, and that the life of man, regulated by morality, faith, and justice, will be rewarded at is, that youth, properly directed, leads us to honorable and virtuous maturity, and that the life of man, regulated by morality, faith, and justice, will be rewarded at its closing hour, by the prospect of eternal bliss. The first positive historical evidence that we have of the existence of a Master's Degree is to be found in the General Regulations compiled by Payne in 1720. It is there declared that Apprentices must be admitted Masters and Fellow Crafts only in the Grand Lodge. The Degree was then in existence. But this record would not militate against the theory advanced by some that Desaguliers was its author in 1717. Dermott asserts that the Degree, as we now have it, was the work of Desaguliers and seven others, who, being Fellow Crafts, but not knowing the Master's part, boldly invented it, that they might organize a Grand Lodge. He intimates that the true Master's Degree existed before that time, and was in possession of the Antients. But in Doctor Mackey's opinion Dermott's testimony is absolutely worth nothing, because he was a violent partisan, and because his statements are irreconcilable with other facts. If the Antients were in possession of the Degree which had existed before 1717, and the Moderns were not, where did the former get it?

Documentary evidence is yet wanting to settle the precise time of the composition of the Third Degree as we now have it. But it would not be prudent to oppose too positively the theory that it must be traced to the second decade of the eighteenth century. The proofs, as they arise day by day, from the resurrection of old manuscripts, seem to incline that way.

But the legend, perhaps, is of much older date. It may have made a part of the general initiation; but there is no doubt that, like the similar one of the Compagnons de la Tour in France, it existed among the Operative Gilds of the Middle Ages as an esoteric narrative. Such a legend all the histories of the Ancient Mysteries prove to us belong to the spirit of initiation. There would have been no initiation worth preservation without it.

An instructive paper by Brother J. E. S. Tuckett, read before the Somerset Masters Lodge, No. 3746 (October 31, 1921) on the Hiramic Legend, says:

Formerly it was believed that the Bodleian possesses an Arabic Manuscript in Hebrew characters, containing proof that the story of Hiram's fate is at least as old as the fifteenth century. But it is now felt that Professor Marks was mistaken, and that the evident value of his find is in reality nil (see Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume v, page 25, v. 228; xxvii 34).

But in 1892, Brother Rev. C. J. Ball, of world-wide reputation as an authority on Semitic and Oriental languages and writings, produced a notable paper, Proper Names of Masonic Tradition: A Philological Study (see Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume v, page 136, see also volume xi, page 39) and his conclusions have met with general approval. So that if the present writer assumes that the Legend—simply as a Legend, and not necessarily Masonic—is older than 1717, he does so on the authority of Brother Ball. The object of this paper is to show how reasonable is the view that the Hiramic Legend is a 'Casual Sign' already a part of Masonry before—but without any attempt to decide how long before—the creation of Grand Lodge.

There is one point upon which all Masonic students seem to be in accord, and that is that in the days before the Grand Lodge period Freemasonry was unprovided with anything elaborate in the way of Ceremonial, however abundant may have been its store of Legend and Symbolism. The beginning of the new Grand Lodge “The Third Degree” appears in place as to facts, and in spite of oft-repeated statements to the contrary, it is easy to see that each Masonic Lodging, such Lectures and others of the kind, have at any time received the official stamp of the Master to the Brethren in rotation somewhat in the manner which is highly significant, avoiding mention of the Book of Masonry. Brother F. W. Golby, A Century of Stability (page 14), has made the following striking suggestion: “But leaving what must not, and that is implied thereby, was from the first amongst these things which might not be committed to writing, and for Reasons not here to be mention’d.” But one might equally well say that the total silence of the Old Charges concerning H. A. B. in a manner which is highly significant, avoiding mention of his name and generally substituting Anon, Aymon, or some similar name signifies the fact. The following are some examples, with the date or approximate date of the Manuscript:

- Grand Lodge, No. 1, 1538, Aymon; Lansdown, 1600 Amon; York, No. 1, 1600 Amon; Thorn, 1629, Amon; Slone, No. 300, 1659, Anon; Grand Lodge, No. 2, 1650, Anon; Buchanan, 1650-1700, Aymon; Hope, 1675-1700, Amon; York, No. 4, 1690, Amon; Strachan, 1700, Anon, Alnwick, 1701, Amon; York, No. 2, 1704, Aymon, and Roberts, 1722, Anon. The name Hiriam only occurs in the Inigo Jones, which bears a date 1607, but was really written after 1723, and in later versions such as the Spencer, 1726, and Dumfries, No. 4, and Cama, Brother Vibe, Story of the Craft (page 70), remarks, “This suggests that the name itself is a password.”

- The Hiramic Legend, with its Inner Meaning and all that is implied from the first, was at some time passed on from Master to Master, and existed side by side with their Operative Secrets, which later it has survived. It must be remembered that nowhere except in Freemasonry, nor in the kindred Companonnage, is there any trace of the Hiramic Legend.

In his book Constitutions (page 12), Doctor Anderson’s account of the building of the Temple contains the significant expression, “But leaving what must not, and indeed cannot, be communicated in Writing.” Now in the year 1707, John Pennell issued his Dublin Book of Constitutions, founded on Anderson’s, and the Book of Constitutions, founded on Anderson’s, gives an account of Hiram (pages 7 and 8) which ends thus, “Much more might be said to a Brother, which must not be committed to Writing, and for Reasons not here to be mention’d.” But one must not be deceived by the statement, which first appeared in the Book of Constitutions, founded on Anderson’s, in the year 1707, as to the age of the Masonic Legend under the new system, where the Master to the Brethren in rotation somewhat in the manner which is highly significant, avoiding mention of the Book of Masonry.

This, although aimed at “High” Degrees, is a strong testimony that the Story of Hiram was part of the pre-1717 “Master’s Part” and not a later growth.

Dr., later Sir, Richard Manningham, initiated in about 1707, was a member with Payne, Desaguliers and Anderson, of the Horn Tavern Lodge, one of the Four which created the new Grand Lodge. Dr., later Sir, Richard Manningham, who, as Deputy Grand Master, virtually ruled the Moderns for several years from 1752 onwards, in a letter, dated July 12th, 1757 (see Transactions, Grand Lodge), wrote: “...one old Brother of Ninety... was made a Mason in his youth, and has constantly frequented Lodges... and never heard or knew any Ceremonies or Words, than those used in general amongst us; such Forms were deliver’d to him, & those He has retained.”

But there are some who will have it that, even if Hiram’s name did in some form enter into pre-1717 Masonry, the Story of his Death did not make its way in the 1723-9 Grand Lodge, and was regarded as the most probable one. They say, and quite rightly, that the note at page 11 of the 1723 Constitutions, which explains the name Abiff, proves nothing as to his Death, neither does the statement, which first appeared in the 1723 Book of Constitutions, founded on Anderson’s, “But leaving what must not, and indeed cannot, be communicated in Writing.” But have we seen that Anderson in 1723, and Pennell in 1730, make use of expressions:

- “Leaving what must not, indeed cannot, be communicated in Writing.”
- “More might be said to a Brother, which must not be committed to Writing, and for Reasons not here to be mention’d.”

which are strongly suggestive of the Story as we know it now.

The effort will now be made to show that A Mason’s Examen of 1723 contains references to the Death of H. A. B. If we turn to Masonry Disserted—1730—we find:

Q. How was Hiram raised?
A. As all other Masons are when they receive the Master’s Word.

Q. How is that?
A. By the Five Points of Fellowship.

Thus in 1730 we find the F. P. of F. definitely associated with the act of “Raising” and... So that “Points of Fellowship” imply a certain attitude and jointly make up one of those “Casual signs” which, tradition says, were passed on upon a certain memorable occasion, and when “Points of Fellowship” are met with it may safely be understood that there is allusion to the Death of the Master Builder. The Grand Mystery 1724—has Five “proper points” of fellowship with the Death of the Master Builder.
But it is the earliest exposure, A Mason’s Examination, which appeared April 11–13, 1723, within a few weeks of the publication of the first Book of Constitutions, which is the most important in our enquiry. After a sort of defence of Masonry, the writer gives a brief account of the “entering” of a candidate and his immediate promotion to the Superior Degree, the two parts of which are represented as taking place at the same meeting, which seems to have been the usual 17th Century custom. As to the second part we read:—

“Then a Warden leads him to the Master and Fellow; to each of whom he is to say:—

I join a Fellow-Mason be,
As all your Worships may plainly see.

After this, he swears to reveal no Secrets. . . . Then he is hooded, and the ceremony of . . .

After this the word Maughbin is whispered by the younger Mason to the next, and so on, till it comes to the Master, who whispers it to the entered Mason, who must have his face in due order to receive it. Then the entered Mason says:

An enter’d Mason I have been,
Booz and Jachin I have seen;
A Fellow I was sworn most rare.

Admitting freely that the demonstration is not absolute, it is nevertheless claimed that there is the strongest possible reason, short of actual documentary proof, for believing that not only the Hiram Legend but also its Masonic Application belong to the pre-Grand Lodge of our Order.

The subject is examined at some length in Doctor Mackey’s revised History of Freemasonry, and note particularly the conclusions on page 1072. We may well compare the Third Degree with the symbolism of the Corner-stone. Consider the purpose, the planning, the workmanship, and the laying of it, the records deposited within it, the sacrifices offered upon it, the service given unto it and the service it should render, and so on, and we may also in this connection think of the time when the Gilds gave their aid publicly to the Church in the dramatic rendering of the story of the resurrection, the victory over death and the grave, and of the traditions coming down to us from the past, of builder’s ceremonies, of human offerings and tragedies at the foundation rites of buildings, and when their dedication took place. The Bible describes the builder’s ceremonies impressively marked by the death of two sons (First Kings xvi, 34). This is not a solitary instance (see also Hastings’ Dictionary of the Bible, Speth’s Builder’s Rites and Ceremonies, Trumbull’s Threshold Covenant, Burdick’s Foundation Rites, with some Kindred Ceremonies, a Contribution to the study of Beliefs, Customs and Legends, connected with Buildings, Locations, and Landmarks, and in this Encyclopaedia, note Degrees, also Mysteries, Ancient).

MASTER, MOST HIGH AND PUISSANT. The French expression is Maître très haut et très puissant. The Sixty-second Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

MASTER, MOST WISE. The title of a presiding officer of a Chapter of Rose Croix, usually abbreviated as Most Wise.

MASTER, MYSTIC. In French, Maitre Mystique. A degree in the collection of Pyron.

MASTER OF ALL SYMBOLIC LODGES, GRAND. See Grand Master of all Symbolic Lodges.

MASTER OF A LODGE. See Worshipful.

MASTER OF CAVALRY. An Officer in a Council of Companions of the Red Cross, whose duties are in some respects, similar to those of a Junior Deacon in a Symbolic Lodge. The two offices of Master of Cavalry and Master of Infantry were first appointed by Constantine the Great.

MASTER OF CEREMONIES. An Officer found in many American Lodges and at one time in the Lodges of England and the Continent. In English Lodges the office is almost a nominal one, without any duties, but in the Continental Lodges he acts as the conductor of the candidate. Oliver says that the title should be, properly, Director of Ceremonies, and he objects to Master of Ceremonies as unmasonic. In the Constitutions of the Grand Lodge of England, issued in 1884, the title is changed to Director of Ceremonies.

MASTER OF DISPATCHES. The Secretary of a Council of Companions of the Red Cross. The Magister Epistolarum was the officer under the Empire who conducted the correspondence of the Emperor.

MASTER OF FINANCES. The Treasurer of a Council of Companions of the Red Cross.

MASTER OF HAMBURG, PERFECT. The Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Germany.

MASTER OF INFANTRY. The Treasurer of a Council of Companions of the Red Cross (see Master of Cavalry).

MASTER OF LODGES. The name in French is Maître des Loges. The Sixty-first Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

MASTER OF MASTERS, GRAND. In French, Grand Maître des Maîtres. The Fifty-ninth Degree of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

MASTER OF PARACELSUS. The French name is Maître de Paracelse. A Degree in the collection of Pyron.
MASTER

MASTER OF SAINT ANDREW. The Fifth Degree of the Swedish Rite; the same as the Grand Ecu Ecossais of the Clermont system.

MASTER OF SECRETS, PERFECT. The French for this is Maitre parfait des Secrets. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MASTER OF THE CHIVALRY OF CHRIST. So Saint Bernard addresses Hugh de Payens, Grand Master of the Templars. Hugoni Militi Christi et Magistro Militiae Christi, Bernardus Clercevallus, etc.

MASTER OF THE HERMETIC SECRETS, GRAND. In French this is Maitre des Secrets Hermétiques, Grand. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MASTER OF THE HOSPITAL. The Latin expression Sacri Domus Hospitalis Sancto Joannis Hierosolymitani Magister, or Master of the Sacred House of the Hospital of Saint John of Jerusalem, was the official title of the chief of the Order of Knights of Malta; more briefly, Magister Hospitalis, or Master of the Hospital. Late in their history, the more imposing title of Magnus Magister, or Grand Master, was sometimes assumed; but the humbler designation was still maintained. On the tomb of Zacosta, who died in 1467, we find Magnus Magister; but twenty-three years after, D'Aubusson signs himself Magister Hospitalis Hierosolymitani.

MASTER OF THE KEY TO MASONRY, GRAND. The French title is Grand Maître de la Clé de la Maçonnerie. The Twenty-first Degree of the Chapter of the Emperors of the East and West.

MASTER OF THE LEGITIMATE LODGES, GRAND. The French is Maître des Loges légitimes. A Degree in the Archives of the Mother Lodge on the Eclectic Philosophic Rite.

MASTER OF THE PALACE. An Officer in a Council of Companions of the Red Cross, whose duties are peculiar to the Degree.

MASTER OF THE SAGES. The Fourth Degree of the Initiated Knights and Brothers of Asia.

MASTER OF THE SEVEN CABALISTIC SECRETS, ILLUSTRIOS. In French, Maître Illustre des sept Secrets Cabalistiques. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MASTER OF THE TEMPLE. Originally the official title of the Grand Master of the Templars. After the dissolution of the Order in England, the same title was incorrectly given to the Custos or guardian of the Temple Church at London, and the error is continued to the present day.

MASTER OF THE WORK. The chief builder or architect of a cathedral or other important edifice in the Middle Ages was called the Master of the Work; thus, Jost Dotzinger was, in the fifteenth century, called the Master of the Work at the Cathedral of Strasburg. In the Middle Ages the Magister Operis was one to whom the public works was entrusted. Such an officer existed in the monasteries. He was also called Operarius and Magister Operarum. Du Cange says that kings had their Operarii, Magistri Operarum or Masters of the Works. It is these Masters of the Works whom Anderson has constantly called Grand Masters. Thus, when he says (Constitutions, 1738, page 69) that "King John made Peter de Cole-Church Grand Master of the Masons in rebuilding London bridge," he should have said that he was appointed Operarius or Master of the Works. The use of the correct title would have made Anderson's history more valuable.

MASTER, PAST. See Past Master.

MASTER, PERFECT. See Perfect Master.

MASTER, PERFECT ARCHITECT. The Twenty-seventh Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.

MASTER, PERFECT IRISH. See Perfect Irish Master.

MASTER PHILOSOPHER BY THE NUMBER THREE. In French, Maitre philosophe par le Nombre Trois. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MASTER PHILOSOPHER HERMETIC. In French, Maitre philosophe Hermétique. A Degree in the collection of Peuvret.

MASTER PHILOSOPHER HERMETIC. In French, Maitre philosophe Hermétique. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

MASTER PRIVOYSE AND JUDGE. In French, Maître Prévôt et Juge. The Eighth Degree of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

MASTER, PYTHAGOREAN. In French, Maître Pythagoricien. Thory says that this is the Third and last Degree of the Masonic system instituted according to the doctrine of Pythagoras.

MASTER, ROYAL. See Royal Master.

MASTER, SECRET. See Secret Master.

MASTER, SELECT. See Select Master.

MASTER'S EMBLEM. The Masters and Past Masters of Masonic Lodges in England wear upon their aprons "perpendicular lines upon horizontal lines, thereby forming three several sets of two right angles," this having been specified in the Constitutions of 1815 and still in force. This emblem has the appearance of two squares set side by side and these are sometimes erroneously referred to as Levels.

MASTER'S LIGHT. In English Lodges represents the Master who is always present, while the Lodge is open, either in person or by representative. As the Lodge cannot be open without his presence so his light may not be extinguished until after the Lodge is closed, nor may it be obscured or shaded in any manner. This rule was adopted by a Special Grand Lodge meeting on May 20, 1816.

MASTERS LODGES. Rawlinson's list of Lodges of 1733 refers to a Masters' Lodge or to Master Masons' Lodges, giving the following entries:

115 Devil Tavern, Temple Bar, the Scotch Masons' Lodge.
116 Bear and Harrow, in the Butcher Row, a Master Masons' Lodge.

Pine also gives two others in his engraved list of 1734 as well as the above. One, numbered 120, appears as follows:

120 Oates's Coffee House, Masters' Lodge, Great Wild Street. 1st and 3d Sunday.

It is interesting to note that these early Masters' Lodges held their meetings on Sunday, although there is nothing to indicate that Masonic Lodges in England generally held Sunday meetings. It is probable that ordinary Lodge business was not transacted in the Masters' Lodges, these being small and exclusive and seemingly held for the purpose of conferring the Third or Master Masons' Degree. Later on the members of the Royal Arch unquestionably frequently had their meetings on Sundays.

Masters of Como. Charles Kingsley in the Roman and Teuton (Lecture 10, page 253, edition of 1891), says:

Then follows some curious laws in favor of the Masters of Como, who seem to have been a gild of architects, perhaps the original germ of the great Society of Freemasons belonging, no doubt, to the Roman population who were settled about the Lake of Como and were hired on contract, as the laws themselves express it, to build for the Lombards, who, of course, had no skill to make anything beyond a skin tent or a log hall.

For an extended account of the famous guild see the article of Comacine Masters.

Master Supreme Elect. In French, Maître suprême Elu. A Degree in the Archives of the Philosop'hic Scottish Rite.

Master Theosophist. In French, Maître Théosop'hié. The Third Degree of the Rite of Swedenborg.

Master Through Curiosity. In French, Maître par Curiosité.

1. The Sixth Degree of the Rite of Mizraim.
2. The Sixth Degree of the collection of the Metropolitan Chapter of France.

The Degree is a modification of the Intimate Society of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

Master to the Number Fifteen. The French title is Maître au nombre Quinze. A Degree in the manuscript collection of Peuvret.

Master, True. The French title is Vrai Maître. A Degree of the Chapter of Clermont.

Master, Worshipful. See Worshipful.

Materials of the Temple. Masonic tradition tells us that the trees out of which the timbers were made for the Temple were felled and prepared in the forest of Lebanon, and that the stones were hewn, cut, and squared in the quarries of Tyre. But both the Book of Kings and Josephus concur in the statement that Hiram of Tyre furnished only cedar and fir trees for the Temple. The stones were most probably gathered around Jerusalem. The tradition, therefore, which we find the word maters: “Hit is seyd in y^ art of Masonry y^ no man scholde make ende so well of worke begonne bi another to y^ profile of his lorde as he began hit for to end hit bi his maters or to whom he scheweth his maters,” where evidently, maters is a corruption of the Latin matrix, a mold; this latter being the word used in all the other Old Constitutions in the same connection (see Mold).

Maton.* The Hebrew word מַטָּה meaning amiability, sweetness. The name of the Third Step of the Mystic Ladder of the Kadosh of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

Matriculation Book. In the Rite of Strict Observance, the Register which contained the lists of the Provinces, Lodges, and members of the Rite was called the Matriculation Book. The term was borrowed from the usage of the Middle Ages, where matricula meant a catalogue. It was applied by the ecclesiastical writers of that period to lists of the clergy, and also of the poor, who were to be provided for by the churches, whence we have matricula clerorum and matricula pauperum.

Matter. A subject deemed of important study to the alchemical and hermetical devotee. It holds a valued position for instruction in the Society of the Rosicrucians, who hold that matter is subject to change, transformation, and apparent dissolution; but, in obedience to God's great laws of economy, nothing is lost, but is simply transferred.

Mattio. See Macio.

Mature Age. The Charges of 1722 prescribe that a candidate for initiation must be of “mature and discreet age”; but the usage of the Craft has differed in various countries as to the time when maturity of age is supposed to have arrived.

In the Regulations of 1663, it is set down at twenty-one years (Constitutions, 1738, page 102); and this continues to be the construction of maturity in all English Lodges both in Great Britain and the United States of America. France and Switzerland have adopted the same period. At Frankfort-on-the-Main it is fixed at twenty, and in Prussia and Hanover at twenty-five. The Grand Lodge of Hamburg has decreed that the age of Masonic maturity shall be that which is determined by the laws of the land to be the age of legal majority.

Under the Scotch Constitution the age was eighteen until 1891, when it was raised to twenty-one; and under the Irish Constitution it was twenty-one until 1741, when it was raised to twenty-five and so remained until 1817, when it was again lowered to twenty-one.

Maual or Setting Maual. See Mallet.

Maundy-Thursday. The Thursday before Easter. Maundy is derived from the Latin word mandatum (meaning commandment), the first word of a religious chant sung by pilgrims on that day at the time of the washing of feet. It also refers to Christ's words after he had washed the feet of the disciples at the Last Supper (John xiii, 34), “A new commandment I give unto you.” Maundy-Thursday is sometimes called Shear Thursday, alluding evidently to the shearing of beards and heads in preparation for Easter. Foot washing before Easter was part of the rites of the Roman Catholic Church from about the fourth century, and the act itself was performed by Pope, prelates, priests and nobles. Doles or alms were then given the poor and these gifts were called maunds. In England the King washed the feet of as many poor men as he himself was years old. Wolsey made “his maund in Our Lady's Chapel, having cast of red herrings and three white herrings.” This was in 1530 at Peterborough Abbey. Paupers' feet were washed by the yeomen of the laundry of Queen Elizabeth and she distributed doles. The last English monarch to do this was James II. From then to the eighteenth century this ceremony was by the King's Almoner. Since then the rite of washing the feet by the King's Almoner has been abandoned although the giving of the Maundy Pennies persists. These Maundy Pennies, in the time of Charles II, were especially prepared and came directly from the Mint with the edges of the coins unmilled. The present-day ceremony occurs at Westminster Abbey, London, where a procession is headed by the Lord High Almoner and the clergy and yeomen of the guard come next carrying small purses colored white and red containing the doles. The Roman Catholic Archbishop also goes through with the entire ritual in England and on the Continent. This formerly was done by the Austrian Emperor, and also practised in the Greek Church of Russia. From the fourth century in Spain, Italy and other Latin countries, washing of the feet was commonly performed towards the end of Lent and before baptism. Maundy-Thursday is given more than ordinary observance by Scottish Rite Free-masons. The Chapter of Rose Croix, or Eighteenth Degree, provides for the extinguishing of lights from Maundy-Thursday until Easter Sunday, on which day the Chapter is reassembled. The Supreme Council of the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, has a regulation commanding every member within hall of one of its Chapters to appear at these meetings or to present his excuses to the Body in case of inability to attend.

MAURER. German for Mason, as Maurerei is for Masonry, and Freimaurer for Freemason.

MAUER, GRUSS. A German Masonic Operative expression, divided by some into Gruss Maurer, Wort Maurer, Schrift Maurer, and Briefträger—that is, those who claimed aid and recognition through written signs and proving, and those who carried written documents.

MAURITIUS. Freemasonry was introduced in this island, a British possession, formerly the Ile de France, in the Indian Ocean, as early as 1816 when a Lodge, Truth and Loyalty, was chartered by the Grand Lodge of England at Port Louis. Its Warrant was cancelled, however, twelve years after. Later there were English, Scotch, and Irish Lodges at work here.

MAVT. The consort of the god Amon, usually crowned with a pendent or double diadem, emblem of the sovereignty of the two regions. Sometimes a vulture, the symbol of maternity, of heaven, and knowledge of the future, shows its head on the forehead of the goddess, its wings forming the head-dress. Horapollo says the vulture designates maternal love because it feeds its young with its own blood; and, according to Pliny, it represents heaven because no one can reach its nest, built on the highest rocks, and, therefore, that it is begotten of the winds. Maut is clothed in a long, close-fitting robe, and holds in her hand the sacred Anch, or Sign of Life.

MAXIMILIAN, JOSEPH I. King of Bavaria, who, becoming incensed against the Fraternity, issued Edicts against Freemasons in 1799 and 1804, which he renewed in 1814.

MAXIMUS OF TYRE (Cassius Maximus Tyrius). Greek rhetorician and philosopher in the time of Antonines and Commodus (second century A.D.). He travelled extensively, delivering lectures. There are still extant by him forty-one essays. With him God is the Supreme Being, one and indivisible though called by many names, accessible to reason alone. The soul in many ways bears a great resemblance to the divinity; it is partly mortal, partly immortal, and when freed from the fetters of the body, becomes an intermediary on the confines of heaven and earth. Life is the sleep of the soul, from which it awakes at death. Maximus of Tyre must be distinguished from the Stoic Maximus, tutor of Marcus Aurelius. Thomas Taylor translated from the Greek and published in London, 1804, The Dissertations of Maximus Tyrius, and in the preface Taylor says:

Of Maximus, the author of the following Dissertations, nothing more is known, than that he was a Tyrian; that he lived under the Antonines and Commodus; that he for some time resided in Rome, but probably, for the most part in Greece; that he cultivated philosophy, and particularly that of Plato; and that he was among the sophists who, like Dio Chrysostom, united philosophy with the study of rhetoric, and combined sublimity and depth of conception with magnificence and elegance of diction.

There is a curious statement by the Tyrian, in the above translation (volume ii, pages 2, 3), having in part a resemblance to the familiar Masonic monitorial instruction to Fellow Crafts:

What then do you say, O Attic Guest? Is good so narrow, groveling, difficult to be obtained, immanent, and separate with molten, that we cannot obtain it without sinning, redrawing geometrical lines, and consuming our time in these, as if it were our intention to become something else, and not to be good men? Though divine virtue, indeed, according to its use, is sublime and great, and near to every one, but according to its position, is not difficult to him who but once wishes to be obedient to be beautiful in conduct, and to oppose whatever is base. The Athenian guest, however, will answer, that this, which is called the law of the city, without the obedience of those that use it, is promulgated in vain, and that it is necessary the people should submit to it voluntarily; but the people in the soul—desires, senses, imagination, opinions—are numerous and foolish who, nevertheless, when they once yield their assent to the law, and follow where it commands, produce the most excellent polity in the soul, which makes the people of the soul. Let another art be that which is the teacher of computation, and is called gymnastic. Let another art be that which is the angel of the conceptions of the soul, and which is called rhetoric; another, that which is the nurse of the divinity; it is partly mortal, partly immortal, and to which she distributes a portion of her arcana, the associates of philosophy and conscious of her arcana, and to each of which she distributes a portion of her labor.

MAZZINI, GIUSEPPE. Italian liberator, born June 22, 1805; died March 10, 1872. He was Grand Master of Freemasons of Italy (see New Age, June, 1924).

MECKLENBURG. Freemasonry was introduced here in 1754, but not firmly rooted until 1799. There were in due time two Provincial Grand Lodges.
MEDAL

MEDAL FOR DISTINGUISHED SERVICE TO FREEMASONRY. See Price, Henry.

MEDALS. A medal is defined to be a piece of metal in the shape of a coin, bearing figures or devices and mottoes, struck and distributed in memory of some person or event. When Freemasonry was in its operative stage, no medals were issued. The medals of the Operative Masons were the monuments which they erected in the form of massive buildings, adorned with all the beauties of architectural art. But it was not long after its transformation into a Speculative Order before it began to issue medals. Medals are now struck every year by Lodges to commemorate some distinguished member or some remarkable event in the annals of the Lodge. Many Lodges in Europe have cabinets of medals, of which the Lodge Minerva of the Three Palms at Leipsic is especially valuable. In America such a collection has been made by Pythagoras Lodge at New York.

No Masonic medal appears to have been found earlier than that of 1733, commemorative of a Lodge being established at Florence, by Lord Charles Sackville. The Lodge appears not to have been founded by regular authority; but, however that may be, the event was commemorated by a medal, a copy of which exists in the collection in possession of the Lodge Minerva of the Three Palms, at Leipsic. The obverse contains a bust representation of Lord Sackville, with the inscription—"Carolvs Sackville, Magister, FI." The reverse represents Harpocrates in the attitude of silence, leaning upon a broken column, and holding in his left arm the cornucopia filled with rich fruits, also the implements of Freemasonry, with a thyrsus, staff, and serpent, resting upon the fore and back ground. The thyrsus, by the way, being a staff wreathed in ivy or vine leaves and crowned with a pine cone or a bunch of ivy leaves, the Bacchic wand or rod, borne by the Bacchants, priests or votaries of the Rites of Bacchus.

The minimum of charity found among Mark Masters is the Roman penny, the denarius, weighing 60 grains silver, worth fifteen cents (see Mark Master's Wages). The coin shown in Figure 1 was struck at Rome, under Tiberius, 18 a.d. The portrait is Tiberius; the reverse the Goddess Clemency. The Latin inscription reads in English: "Tiberius Caesar Augustus, the son of the Deified Augustus, the High Priest."

Two medals, weighing 120 grains each, of silver, about thirty cents, were struck off at Jerusalem, under Simon Maccabee, the Jewish ruler, 138, 139 B.C. They are the oldest money coined by the Jews. The devices are the brazen laver that stood before the Temple, and three lilies springing from one stem. The inscriptions, translated from the Hebrew of the oldest style, say, "Half-shekel; Jerusalem the Holy."

MEHEN

Brother Rob Morris and Brother Coleman, in their Calendar, furnish much valuable information on this subject.

The earliest work on Masonic Medals is by Ernest Zacharias, entitled Numotheca Numismatica Latomorum. It was issued at Dresden in parts, the first appearing on September 13, 1840, the eighth and last on January 29, 1846. It gave 48 medals in all. Then came Die Denkmänner der Freimaurerbruderschaft, by Dr. J. F. L. Theodor Merzdorf, published at Oldenburg in 1851, and describing 334 medals.

A standard work on the subject is The Medals of the Masonic Fraternity, by W. T. R. Marvin, privately printed at Boston in 1880, in which over 700 medals are described.

MEDITERRANEAN PASS. A side Degree sometimes conferred in the United States on Royal Arch Masons. It has no lecture or legend, and should not be confounded, as it sometimes is, with the very different Degree of Knight of the Mediterranean Pass. It is, however, now nearly obsolete.

MEDITERRANEAN PASS, KNIGHT OF. See Knight of the Mediterranean Pass, also Babylonish Pass.

MEETING OF A CHAPTER. See Convocation.

MEETING OF A LODGE. See Communication.

MEET ON THE LEVEL. In the Prestonian Lectures as practised in the beginning of the eighteenth century, it was said that Masons met on the Square and hoped to part on the Level. In the American system of Webb a change was made, and we were instructed that they meet on the Level and part on the Square. And in 1843 the Baltimore Convention made a still further change, by adding that they act by the Plumb; and this formula is now, although quite modern, generally adopted by the Lodges in the United States of America.

MEGACOSM. An intermediate world, great, but not equal to the Macrocosm, the universe, and yet greater than the Microcosm, or little world, man.

MEHEN. An Egyptian mythological serpent, the winding of whose body represented the tortuous course of the sun in the nocturnal regions. The serpentine course taken when traveling through darkness. The direction metaphorically represented by the initiate in his first symbolic journey as Practicus in the Society of the Rosicrucians.

MEHOUR. Space, the name given to the feminine principle of the Deity by the Egyptians.

MEISTER. German for Master; in French, Maître; in Dutch, Meester; in Swedish, Mäster; in Italian, Maestro; in Portuguese, Mestre. The old French word appears to have been Meistrier. In old French Operative Laws, Le Mestre was frequently used.

MEISTER IM STUHL. Meaning Master in the Chair. The Germans so call the Master of a Lodge.

MELANCHTHON, PHILIP. The name of this celebrated reformer is signed to the Charter of Cologne as the representative of Dantzic. The evidence of his connection with Freemasonry depends entirely on the authenticity of that document.

MELCHIZEDECK. King of Salem, and a Priest of the Most High God, of whom all that we know is to be found in the passages of Scripture read at the conferring of the Degree of High Priesthood. Some theologians have supposed him to have been Shem, the son of Noah. The sacrifice of offering bread and wine is first attributed to Melchizedek; and hence, looking to the similar Mithraic sacrifice, Godfrey Higgins is inclined to believe that he professed the religion of Mithras. He abandoned the sacrifice of slaughtered animals, and, to quote the words of Saint Jerome, “offered bread and wine as a type of Christ.” Hence, in the New Testament, Christ is represented as a Priest after the Order of Melchizedek. In Freemasonry, Melchizedek is connected with the Order or Degree of High Priesthood, and some of the advanced Degrees (see High Priesthood, Order of).

MELCHIZEDEK, DEGREE OF. The Sixth Degree of the Order of Brothers of Asia.

MELECH. Properly, Malach, a messenger, and hence an angel, because the angels were supposed to be the messengers of God. In the ritual of one of the advanced Degrees we meet with the sentence hamelech Gebalin, which has been variously translated. The French ritualists handle Hebrew words with but little attention to Hebrew grammar, and hence they translate this sentence as Jabulum est un bon Maçon. The former American ritualists gave it as meaning “Guibulum is a good man.” Guibulum is undoubtedly used as a proper name, and is a corrupt derivation from the Hebrew Masonic Giblim, which means stonemasons or masons, and melach for malach means a messenger, one sent to accomplish a certain task. Brothers Pike and Rockwell make the first word hamalek, the king or chief. If the words were reversed, we should have the Hebrew vocative, “O! Gibulum the messenger.” As it is, Brother Pike makes it vocative, and interprets it, “Oh! thou glory of the Builders.” Probably, however, the inventor of the Degree meant simply to say that Gibulum was a messenger, or one who had been sent to make a discovery, but that he did not perfectly express the idea according to the Hebrew idiom, or that his expression has since been corrupted by the copyists.

MELESINO, RITE OF. This is a Rite scarcely of the Order of Brothers of Asia. It consisted of seven Degrees, namely, 1. Apprentice; 2. Fellow Craft; 3. Master Mason; 4. The Mystic Arch; 5. Scottish Master and Knight; 6. The Philosopher; 7. The Priest or High Priest of the Templars. The four higher Degrees abounded in novel traditions and myths unknown to any of the other Rites, and undoubtedly invented by the founder. The whole Rite was a mixture of Cabalism, magic, Gnosticism, and the Hermetic philosophy mixed in almost inextricable confusion. The Seventh or final Degree was distinctly Rosicrucian, and the religion of the Rite was Christian, recognizing and teaching the belief in the Messiah and the dogma of the Trinity.

MEMBERSHIP, RIGHT OF. The first right which a Freemason acquires, after the reception of the Third Degree, is that of claiming membership in the Lodge in which he has been initiated. The very fact of his having received that Degree makes him at once an inchoate member of the Lodge—that is to say, no further application is necessary, and no new ballot is required; but the candidate, having now become a Master Mason, upon signing his submission to the Regulations of the Society by affixing his signature to the book of by-laws, is constituted, by virtue of that act, a full member of the Lodge, and entitled to all the rights and prerogatives accruing to that position. Under the English Constitution (Rule 191) initiation is sufficient for membership.

MEMPHIS. For many generations Memphis was the royal city of Egypt and here also were gathered the fraternity of priests and the great school of the wisdom and the mysteries of the Egyptians. The name has therefore had a lively interest to various founders of Degree systems (see Memphis, Rite of, and Marconis, Gabriel Mathieu, and Marconis, Jacques Etienne).

MEMPHIS, RITE OF. In 1839, two French Freemasons, named respectively Marconis and Moulet, of whom the former was undoubtedly the leader, instituted, first at Paris, then at Marseilles, and afterward at Brussels, a new Rite which they called the Rite of Memphis, and which consisted of ninety-one Degrees. Subsequently, another Degree was added to this already too long list. The Rite, however, has repeatedly undergone modifications. The Rite of Memphis was undoubtedly founded on the extinct Rite of Mizraim; for, as Ragon says, the Egyptian Rite seems to have inspired Marconis and Moulet in the organization of their new Rite. It is said by Ragon, who has written copiously on the Rite, that the first series of Degrees, extending to the Thirty-fifth Degree, is an assumption of the thirty-three Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, with scarcely a change of name. The remaining Degrees of the Rite are borrowed, according to the same authority, from other well-known systems, and some, perhaps, the invention of their founders. The Rite of Memphis was not at first recognized by the Grand Orient of France, and consequently formed no part of legal French Freemasonry. So about 1852 its Lodges were closed by the civil authority, and the Rite, to use a French Masonic phrase, "went to sleep."

A Lodge was operating in 1859 as of the Reformed Masonic Order of Memphis, or Rite of the Grand Lodge of Philadelphia, in England, and issuing certificates of membership. The Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of England therefore sent out a circular warning members of the English Lodges against spurious Lodges claiming to be Masonic.

In the year 1862, Marconis, still faithful to the system which he had invented, applied to the Grand Master of France to give to it a new life. The Grand College of Rites was consulted on the subject, and the Council of the Order having made a favorable decree, the Rite of Memphis was admitted, in November, 1862, among those Masonic systems which acknowledge obedience to the Grand Orient of France, and perform their functions within its bosom. To obtain this position, however, the only one which, in France, preserves a Masonic system from the reputation of being clandestine, it was necessary that Marconis, who was then the Grand Hierophant, should, as a step preliminary to any favorable action on the part of the Grand Orient, take an obligation by which he forever after divested himself of all authority, of any kind whatsoever, over the Rite. It passed entirely out of his hands, and, going into obedience to the Grand Orient, that Body has taken complete and undivided possession of it, and laid its advanced Degrees upon the shelf, as Masonic curiosities, since the Grand Orient only recognizes, in practice, the thirty-three degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

This, then, became the position of the Rite of Memphis in France. Its original possessors have disclaimed all further control or direction of it. It has been admitted by the Grand Orient among the eight systems of Rites which are placed under its obedience; that is to say, it admits its existence, but it does not suffer it to be worked. Like all Masonic Rites that are from the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rites, they are gradually being assimilated to the regulations of the Grand Orient; and consequently, their organization, membership, and functions, are gradually being changed to conform to those of the Grand Orient, the highest Masonic body in the world.
MEMPHIS

1862, had at several subsequent times, namely, in September, 1863, March, 1864, September, 1865, and March, 1866, been renewed. As a matter of clemency, the Council determined not, for the present at least, to prefer charges against Marconis and Carence before the Grand Orient, but to warn them of the error they committed in making a traffic of Masonic Degrees. It also ordered the report to be published and widely diffused, so that the Fraternity might be apprised that there was no power outside of the Grand Orient which could confer the high Degrees of any Rite.

An attempt having been made, in 1872, to establish the Rite in England, Brother Montague, the Secretary-General of the Supreme Council, wrote to Brother Thevenot, the Grand Secretary of the Grand Orient of France, for information as to its validity. From him he received a letter containing the following statements, from which official authority we gather the fact that the Rite of Memphis is a dead Rite, and that no one has authority in any country to propagate it:

"Neither in 1866, nor at any other period, has the Grand Orient of France recognized "the Ancient and Primitive Rite of Masonry," concerning which you inquire, and which has been recently introduced in Lancashire. At a particular time, and with the intention of causing the plurality of Rites to disappear, the Grand Orient of France annexed and absorbed the Rite of Memphis, under the express condition that the Lodges of that Rite, which were received under its jurisdiction, should confer only the three Symbolic Degrees, and that its confidence has never been deceived, the Grand Orient broke off all connection with this power, and personally with Brother Harry J. Seymour, nor to any other person, powers to constitute a Lodge, or to create a Rite, or to make Masons. Brother Harry J. Seymour may perfectly well have the signatures of the Grand Master and of the Chief of the Secretary's office of the Grand Orient of France on a Diploma, as a fraternal visé; but certainly he has neither a Charter nor a Power. I also beg you to make every effort to obtain the textual copy of the documents of which Brother Harry J. Seymour takes advantage. It is by the inspection of this document it will be necessary to judge the question, and I await new communications on this subject from your fraternal kindness" (see Marconis, also Yarker and Seymour).

MENATZCHIM. In Second Chronicles ii, 18, it is said that at the building of the Temple there were "three thousand and six hundred overseers to set the people a work." The word translated "overseers" is, in the original, מנהיגים, Menatztchim. Doctor Anderson, in his catalogue of workmen at the Temple, calls these Menatzchim "expert Master Masons," saying they were "Overseers and Comforters of the People in Working, that were expert Master Masons;" and so they have been considered in all subsequent lectures.

MENTAL QUALIFICATIONS. See Qualifications.

MENTAL RESERVATION. When the secret intention wilfully disagrees with the spoken promise, we call that sort of dishonesty, an equivocation, or mental reservation. To purposely mislead by one's deceitful statement is to equivocate; to withhold one's inner consent from what he outwardly says is a mental reservation, a disagreement between a person's purpose and pledge. Such a difference between the will and the word, an unspoken qualification partially or wholly altering a statement so as to lead the hearer astray is mental reservation.

For the causes and reasons behind such deceptive actions there is much scope for speculation. A doctor may temper an explanation of the facts according to his knowledge of the hearer's ability to listen helpfully. In the face of danger, fear suggests dodging. The historian James A. Froude tells in the Divorce of Catherine (page 326), that:

The Abbots and Priors had sworn to the Supremacy (of King over Pope), but had sworn reluctantly, with secret reservations to save their consciences.
Here is the report, as Froude saw it, of a case where allegiance to a foreign power was mentally approved but openly denied. The moral danger of the practise is evident and Blaise Pascal in his Provincial Letters has exposed its possibilities with wit and vigor in discussing the Jesuits within his Church. In the ninth letter, July 3, 1656, we find the following dialogue beginning with the explanation by a monk of the Jesuitical use of equivocations, words and sentences of intentional deceitfulness, and then passing to the use of mental reservations:

"I would now say a little about the facilities we have invented for avoiding sin in worldly conversations and intrigues. One of the occasional usages of these is how to avoid telling lies, particularly when one is anxious to induce a belief in what is false. In such cases, our doctrine of equivocations has been found of admirable service, according to which, as Sanchez has invented for avoiding sin in worldly conversations and games, it is permitted to use ambiguous terms, leading people to understand them in another sense from that which they have such an intention to give to them, it, 'it is permitted to use ambiguous terms, leading people to understand them in another sense from that in which we understand them ourselves.'

"I know that already, father," said I. "This is something new, sir; I mean the doctrine of mental reservations. In the same passage, Sanchez says, 'It is permitted to use ambiguous terms, that he never did such a thing (though he actually did it), meaning within himself that he did not do so on a certain day, or before he was born, or understanding any such circumstance, while the words which he employs have no such sense as would discover his meaning. And this is very convenient in many cases, and quite innocent, when necessary or conducive to avoiding sin."

"Indeed, father! that is not a lie, and perjury to boot?"

"No, father."

"I thought as much," said the Jesuit; "this is something new, sir; I mean the doctrine of mental reservations. In the same passage, Sanchez says, 'It is permitted to use ambiguous terms, that he never did such a thing (though he actually did it), meaning within himself that he did not do so on a certain day, or before he was born, or understanding any such circumstance, while the words which he employs have no such sense as would discover his meaning. And this is very convenient in many cases, and quite innocent, when necessary or conducive to avoiding sin.'"

"I grant it," said I; "it might possibly, however, be found to be telling the truth in a low key, and falsehood in a loud. And besides, I should be afraid that many people might not have sufficient presence of mind to avail themselves of these methods."

"Our doctors," replied the Jesuit, "have taught, in the same passage, for the benefit of such as might not be expert in the use of these reservations, that no one is required of them, to avoid lying, than simply to say that they have not done what they have done, provided they have, in general, the intention of giving to their language the sense which an able man would give to it."

"I know, father, " said the Jesuit; "it is the intention that determines the quality of the action."

"Yes, that is so; but you must understand that, in such cases, the words which he employs have no such sense as would discover his meaning. And this is very convenient in many cases, and quite innocent, when necessary or conducive to avoiding sin."
MESHIA, MESHIANE. Corresponding to Adam and Eve, in accordance with Persian cosmogony.

MESMER, FRIEDERICH ANTON. A German physician who was born in Suabia, in 1734, and, after a long life, a part of which was passed in notoriety and the closing years in obscurity, died in 1815. He was the founder of the doctrine of animal magnetism, called after him Mesmerism. He visited Paris, and became there in some degree intermixed with the Masonic activities of Cagliostro, who used the magnetic operations of Mesmer's new science in his initiations (see Mesmeric Freemasonry).

MESOPOLYTE. The Fourth Degree of the German Union of XXII.

MESOURANEO. A Greek word, μεσούρανεο, signifying, I am in the center of heaven. Hutchinson fancifully derives from it the word Masonry, which he says is a corruption of the Greek, and refers to the constellation Magaroth mentioned by Job; but he fails to give a satisfactory reason for his etymology. Nevertheless, Oliver favors it.

METALS. In the divestiture of metals as a preliminary to initiation, we are symbolically taught that Freemasonry regards no man on account of his wealth, nor prayers: the stones must be all squared, and fitted here for that place of blessedness. There is no repentance, tears, nor prayers: the stones must be all squared, and fitted here for their place in the New Jerusalem; and, being living stones, must be built up a holy temple for the habitation of God.

METROPOLITAN CHAPTER OF FRANCE. There existed in France, toward the end of the last century, a Body calling itself the Grand Chapter General of France. It was formed out of the débris of the Council of Emperors of the East and West, and the Council of Knights of the East, which had been founded by Pirirot. In 1786, it united with the schismatic Grand Orient, and then received the title of the Metropolitan Chapter of France. It possessed in its archives a large collection of manuscript cahiers of Degrees, most of them being mere Masonic curiosities.

METUSAEI. The name given to the Hebrew quarryman, who is represented in some legends as one of the assassins, Fanor and Amru being the other two.

MEXICO. The first recorded Masonic Lodge in Mexico was probably Arquitectura Moral which met in Mexico City as early as 1806. The Scottish Rite was introduced about four years later and in 1813 a Grand Lodge was established with Don Felipe Martinez Aragon as Grand Master.

About 1824 the York Rite was brought into the territory by the American Ambassador, Brother Joel R. Poinsett, who procured a Charter for a Lodge through the Grand Lodge of New York. Brother Mackey states that three Lodges were opened in the year 1825 and that they established a Grand Lodge of the York Rite. The two systems existing side by side were the cause of much bitterness and political strife and in 1830 some of the leading Brethren of both Rites planned to bring about more peaceful conditions by forming a third Rite, consisting of nine Degrees and composed of both York and Scottish Rite Freemasons. A Grand Orient was formed with a National Grand Lodge attached. From 1833 to 1865 Freemasonry, at any rate as far as the activities of the Grand Bodies were concerned, was dormant. In 1859 Brother Leron de Ladebat had been sent by authority of Brother Albert Pike to organize Freemasonry in Mexico but instead of opening a Grand Lodge of Symbolic Freemasonry as expected he constituted a Supreme Council.

In 1858 the Supreme Councils were fused with the National Grand Lodge. In 1872 dissension again arose. Grand Lodges were probably organized at the time by Lodges under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Council. A Central Grand Lodge was formed at Vera Cruz but the Supreme Council did not give up its authority.

There were seven Grand Lodges in Mexico when the Grand Lodge of Colon, regarding Mexico as unoccupied territory, proceeded to form three Lodges which in January, 1883, established at Vera Cruz the Mexican Grand Lodge.

On June 25, the same year, twelve Lodges met and established a Grand Lodge of the Federal District of Mexico.

According to Brother Oliver Day Street's Report on Correspondence made in 1922 to the Grand Lodge of Alabama, in 1882 "all Masonry of the Craft, Symbolic or Blue degrees except possibly a few Lodges of the old Mexican National Rite had fallen under the control of Scottish Rite bodies of which there were at least three contending with each other for supremacy."

In February, 1890, was established the Gran Dieta Simbolica which was to be a central governing Body for the entire republic. It started well and had at one time seventeen of the State Grand Lodges under its control. In April, 1901, it was disbanded and the Grand Lodges became independent. Brother Street remarks: "Our information is that at present there are, or recently were, four Grand Lodges in the Federal District, each claiming to be sovereign and independent, and each exercising jurisdiction not only in the district but in several states."

MEZUZA. The third fundamental principle of Judaism, or the Sign upon the Door-post. The precept is founded upon the command, "And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates" (Deuteronomy vi, 4-9; xi, 13-21). The door-posts must be those of a dwelling; synagogues are excluded. The Karaite Jews affix Mezuzas to synagogues, and not to private houses. The Mezuza is constructed as follows: the two above-mentioned portions of Scripture are written on ruled vellum prepared according to Rabbinical rules, then rolled and fitted into a metallic tube. The word Shaddai, meaning the Almighty, is written on the outside of the roll, and can be read, when in the tube, through a slot. The Mezuza is then nailed at each end on the right-hand door-post, while the following prayer is being said: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God! King of the Universe, who hast sanctified us with His laws, and commanded us to fix the Mezuza." Under the word Shaddai some Jews write the three angelic names Coozu, Bemuchsaz, Coozu. To these some pray for success in business. The Talmud estimates the virtue of the Talith, the Phylacteries, and the Mezuza in the following terms: "Whosoever has the phylacteries bound to his head and arm, and the fringes thrown over his garments, and the Mezuza fixed on his door-post, is safe from sin; for the angels are excellent memorials, and the angels secure him from sin; as it is written, "The angel of the Lord encamped round about them that fear Him, and deliveredeth them." (Psalm xxxiv, 7).

MICHAEL. The Hebrew word מַשְׁמַע, meaning Who is like unto God. The chief of the seven archangels. He is the leader of the celestial host, as Lucifer is of the infernal spirits, and the especial protector of Israel. He is prominently referred to in the Twenty-eighth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, or Knight of the Sun.

MICHIGAN. Zion Lodge was established by Warrant, dated April 27, 1764, from Provincial Grand Master George Harrison of New York. It was numbered 448 on the Register of England and No. 1 of Detroit. On September 3, 1806, this Lodge was reorganized and the original Warrant of 1764 was surrendered to the Grand Lodge of New York. The Installation took place on July 6, 1807. Having forfeited its Charter during the War with England, it was granted a new one as No. 62 on March 14, 1816, but by a rearrangement of numbers in 1819 it became Lodge No. 3. A Convention met on June 24, 1826, to organize a Grand Lodge. Representatives of Zion, No. 3; Detroit, No. 337; Minomanie, No. 374, and Monroe, No. 375, were present and Oakland, No. 343, joined later. On June 28 a Constitution was adopted and on July 31 Grand Officers were elected and installed. During the Anti-Masonic agitation the Craft in this district almost died out. In 1837, however, Michigan became a State and the increase of population caused a revival of Freemasonry. The Grand Lodge of Michigan was again constituted on September 17, 1844, and Grand Officers were duly elected. The members of Zion Lodge formed a Chapter called Monroe Chapter, No. 1, at Detroit which was granted a Dispensation by the General Grand High Priest, DeWitt Clinton, on December 3, 1818. The Chapters in Michigan were authorized in January, 1848, by the General Grand Scribe to meet and organize a Grand Chapter for the State. Representatives of Monroe Chapter, No. 1; St. Joseph Valley, No. 2, and Jackson Chapter, No. 3, were present at a Convention held on March 9, 1848, and Grand Officers were elected and installed.

Monroe Council was formed by the members of Monroe Chapter, No. 1, at Detroit. On May 13, 1856, at the annual assembly of the Grand Council of Connecticut, it was reported that a Dispensation had been granted to Monroe Council, No. 23, at Detroit. A meeting of the Council was held on May 19, 1856, to receive the Dispensation and a Code of By-Laws was adopted. Representatives from Monroe, St. Clair and Pontiac Councils, all of which possessed Charters dated May 12, 1857, met on January 13, 1858, at Detroit and formed a Grand Council.

Detroit, No. 1, at Detroit was the first Commandery to be organized in Michigan. Its Dispensation was issued November 1, 1850, and its Charter, September 19, 1853. Six Commanderies sent representatives to Detroit on January 18, 1857, and, by Warrant issued February 12, 1857, instituted the Grand Commandery of Michigan. The Grand Master of the General Grand Encampment was present and installed the Grand Officers on January 11, 1858.

The beginning of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite in Michigan was at Detroit. On May 26, 1861, the Carson Council of Princes of Jerusalem was chartered. On May 22, 1862, the Detroit-Carson Lodge of Perfection, the Mount Olivet Chapter of Rose Croix, and the Michigan Consistory were established.

MIDDLE AGES. These are supposed by the best historians to extend from the time Theodoric liberated Rome, 493, to the end of the fifteenth century, the important events being the fall of Constantinople in 1453, the discovery of America in 1492, and the doubling of the Cape of Good Hope in 1497. This period of ten centuries is one of great importance to the Masonic student, because it embraces within itself the whole of the history of the Order, such as the diffusion throughout Europe of the Roman Colleges of Artificers, the establishment of the arch architectural school of Como, the rise of the Guilds, the organization of the Building Corporations of Germany, and the Company of Freemasons of England, as well as many customs and usages which have descended with more or less modification to the modern Institution.

MIDDLE CHAMBER. There were three stories of side chambers built around the Temple on three sides; what, therefore, is called in the Authorized Version a middle chamber was really the middle story of those three. The Hebrew word is יָדְי, yatsang. They are thus described in First Kings vi, 5, 6, 8:

And against the wall of the house he built chambers round about, against the walls of the house round about, both of the temple and of the oracle; and he made chambers round about. The nether chamber was five cubits broad, and the middle was six cubits broad, and the third was seven cubits broad: for without in the wall of the house he made narrowest rows round about, that the house might stand without injury. The door for the middle chamber was in the right side of the house; and they went up with winding stairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third.

These chambers, after the Temple was completed, served for the accommodation of the priests when upon duty; in them they deposited their vestments and the sacred vessels. But the knowledge of the purpose to which the middle chamber was appropriated while the Temple was in the course of construction, is only preserved in Masonic tradition. This tradition is, however, altogether mythical and symbolic in its character, and belongs to the symbolism of the Winding Stairs, which see.

MIDDLE CHAMBER LECTURE. Preston's Illustrations of Freemasonry refers with an excellent illustration to the Middle Chamber as a symbol of the perfecting of the soul. It illustrates this chapter of Masonry as Brother Preston tells us, contemplate with admiration the wonderful works of the Creator. This composition (found on pages 51 to 60 of the 1812 edition) has been restated in a most practical form by Brother Charles C. Hunt, Grand Secretary, Iowa Masonic Library, Cedar Rapids, Iowa. His essay runs as follows:

This journey to the Middle Chamber, like many of the ceremonies of Freemasonry, is based upon one of the legends connected with the building of King Solomon's Temple. It is said that there were 80,000 Fellow Crafts who laboured on the Temple, and that once a week the Warden of the Middle Chamber was their duty to prepare materials to be used in the erection of the Temple. At this task they worked six days and then received their wages. On the evening of the sixth day those who had proved themselves worthy by a strict attention to their duties, were entrusted with certain mysterious words, signs, and grips, by means of which they were enabled to work their way to the Middle Chamber of the Temple to receive their wages. At the same time King Solomon, accompanied by his confidential officers, repaired to the Middle Chamber to meet them. His secretary he placed near his person, the Junior Warden at the outer door, and the Senior Warden at the inner door, with strict instructions to suffer none to enter who were not in possession of the words, signs and grips previously established, so that when they gained admission he knew they had been faithful workmen and ordered their names enrolled as such, entitled them to wages. He then admonished them of the reverence due the great and sacred name of Deity, and in your continued progress through the ceremonies of a Fellow Craft, the symbols of those deep seated characteristics called character. The pass and token can never be assumed. They are outward manifestations only; but the grip and word, are the inner secret of the soul and cannot be imitated or assumed by those who do not actually have them. The word is the knowledge of God. In the legend of King Solomon's Temple, the unfaithful workman sometimes ascended to the inner door, but as he did not actually have in operation and as he was not a faithful craftsman, he could not enter the place of wages. So you, though you have entered our mystic circle and may mount to all the grades of honor we can bestow, may not acquire those celestial signs and tokens by falchion alone you can pass the inner door of the Spiritual Temple where the wages of the soul are received by the worthy craftsmen. In this journey to the Middle Chamber we will impart to you a fund of valuable information and in your continued progress through the ceremonies of our Order we will instruct you in many Masonic secrets which will enable you to pass our outer door, the door of the material lodge; but the signs and tokens which will take you through the inner door of the Middle Chamber of nourishment, refreshment and joy can only be acquired by daily putting into practice the principles which we here teach. If you fail to be faithful you cannot obtain admission, I have no doubt we will alike be received and rewarded, as were the faithful brethren.

We work as Speculative Masons only, but our ancient Brethren worked in Operative as well as in Speculative Masonry. By Operative Masonry we allude to a proper application of the useful rules of architecture, whence a structure derives figure, strength and beauty. By it we learn to subdue our passions, act upon the materials with which he builds. We use the same tools and implements as did our ancient Brethren, but to us the gauge, gavel, square, level and plum are not only the glories of works of creation and rdevore their great Creator. We, also, my Brother, follow our usual vocations six days of the week and rest upon the seventh. We have now symbolically been working for six days, have been found faithful, and are in possession of the same mysterious words, signs and grips as were our ancient brethren. We are therefore about to endeavor to work our way to the place representing the Middle Chamber of King Solomon's Temple where, if we succeed in gaining admission, I have no doubt we will be allowed and rewarded, as were they.

This, my Brother, is a symbol of our life on earth. As Fellow Crafts, we are laboring in the quarries of the world, preparing ourselves as living stones for that Temple which we hope to reach in after-life in the heavens. The signs, words, and grips with which we are entrusted symbolize the means by which we are known as faithful workmen. They are tokens of that noble character which can only be acquired by faith alone you can pass the inner door of the Spiritual Temple where the wages of the soul are received by the worthy craftsmen. In this journey to the Middle Chamber we will impart to you a fund of valuable information and in your continued progress through the ceremonies of our Order we will instruct you in many Masonic secrets which will enable you to pass our outer door, the door of the material lodge; but the signs and tokens which will take you through the inner door of the Middle Chamber of nourishment, refreshment and joy can only be acquired by daily putting into practice the principles which we here teach. If you fail to be faithful you cannot obtain admission, I have no doubt we will alike be received and rewarded, as were the faithful brethren.
All are architects of fate,
Working in these walls of time,
Some with massive deeds and great,
Some with ornaments of rhyme.

And the structure that we raise,
Time is with materials filled;
Our to-days and yesterdays
Are the blocks with which we build.
Build to-day, then, strong and sure,
With a firm and ample base;
And ascending and secure
Shall to-morrow find its place.

The chapters were further adorned with globes on their tops, representing the terrestrial and celestial spheres, and teach us to so regulate our lives that when we pass from earth, the terrestrial, it may be to that other and better world, the celestial. Thus the globes are two artificial spherical bodies and denote the universality of Masonry.

Between the pillars we see a path, representing the path of life. This path is paved with checkered blocks of alternate white and black to indicate the nature of this life, checkered with light and darkness, prosperity and adversity, calm and storm, good and evil. Taking this path we find the pillars that stand on the right and left to represent the means by nature to that higher life in the Temple of our God. As you stand here, my Brother, you represent a man just starting out on the journey of life, with its great and mighty powers and possibilities awaiting you. If you are faithful in this task you will receive the reward of the noble upright character, as designed by the Great Architect of the Universe upon your moral, spiritual and Masonic trestle-board. You will notice that this flight of winding stairs has three divisions of respectively three, five and seven steps, representing life under three aspects, each higher, nobler and greater than the preceding.

The first division, consisting of three steps, alludes to the three symbolic Degrees of Masonry, E. A., F. C. and M. M. and also the three principal stages of human life, infancy, manhood, and age, the period assigned to us for the completion of our spiritual Temple. As such it is a constant reminder that we should employ our hearts unto wisdom, "was the promise of a man that he should live long in the land, and that his days should be full of prosperity."

This brings us to the second division consisting of five steps and alludes to the five senses and to the five orders of architecture. The five senses may be defined as man's faculty of receiving impressions and are the means by which he receives his knowledge of the material world and the moral world, the material, the world to the realm of the unseen and eternal, the spiritual realities. The Temple pillars are said to have been cast by the architect of the Temple, H. A. on the banks of the Jordan when the Children of Israel passed through the porch to the Journey to the Middle Chamber to remind us that we have been forgotten. When ruin triumphs and when nature dies,

The winding stairway as a symbol of progress and instruction teaching you the lesson of life which Masonry would teach you. The three steps represent the period of our life on earth, divided into three stages of infancy, manhood and age. The five steps our human faculties applied to the construction of material edifices symbolized by the five orders of architecture, while the seven steps symbolize the complete circle of human learning and the full development of man's soul. The winding stairway as a symbol of progress and instruction teaching you that as a Mason you must not remain in the ignorance of irrational childhood, if you would be worthy of your vocation, but that your destiny as an immortal being requires you to ascend step by step, until you reach the summit, where the completed treasures of truth await you. The stairs are winding to represent the circuitous way by which we must go to investigate the many sides of truth. Masonry points the way, but you must travel the road yourself. Our symbolic stairway was easy for you to ascend, but the heights which you must climb in actual life will be hard to reach and the task is great; yet remember the reward will be magnificent; your wages will well repay the effort.

MILES. This word has two references of interest to us.

1. In pure Latin, miles means a soldier; but in Medieval Latin the word was used to designate the military knights whose institution began at that period. Thus a Knight Templar was called Miles Templarius, and a Knight Banneret, Miles Banneretus. The pure Latin word milites, which signifies a knight in Rome, was never used in that sense in the Middle Ages (see Knighthood).

2. The Seventh Degree of the Rite of African Architects.

MILITARY LODGES. Lodges established in an army. They are of an early date, having long existed in the British army. The earliest Warrant creating a Traveling or Movable Lodge was issued in 1732 by the Grand Lodge of Ireland to the then First Foot, now the Royal Scots. The Grand Lodge of Scotland in 1743 established a Military Lodge in the Fifty-Fifth Foot and the first English Military Lodge was set up or erected in 1750 and attached to the Thirty-First Foot. The Grand Lodge of the Antients was particularly active in such work and at the close of 1789 this Body had granted forty-nine army Warrants. The Grand Lodge of Ireland has always had more such Lodges than the English or Scotch. In 1813 there were one hundred and twenty-three under the Irish Jurisdiction. At that time the moderns had fifteen, the Antients sixty-two and Scotland eighteen. These numbers have been greatly reduced and Brother Hawkins in 1908 pointed out there were then only two on the Register of the United Grand Lodge of England, seven under the Grand Lodge of Ireland and none under Scotland.

In the United States of America, the first Lodge of this kind of which we have any record was the Warrant for which was granted by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, in 1738, to Abraham Savage, to be used in the expedition against Canada. A similar one was granted by the same authority, in 1756, to Richard Gridley, for the expedition against Crown Point. In both of these instances the Warrants were of a general character, and might rather be considered as Deputations, as they authorized Savage and Gridley to congregate Freemasons into one or more Lodges.

In 1779, the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania granted a Warrant to Colonel Proctor, of the artillery, to open a Military Lodge, which in the Warrant is called a Movable Lodge. In the Civil War in the United States between 1861 and 1865, many Military Lodges were established on both sides; but it is questionable whether they had a good effect. They met, certainly with much official aid and patronage in many Jurisdictions. In the Spanish War and in the World War, Lodges were empowered to work the armies.

In England, the system of Military Lodges is regulated by special provisions of the Grand Lodge Constitution. They are strictly limited to the purposes for which the Warrants were granted, and no new Lodge can be established in a regiment without the concurrence of the commanding officer. If the military Body to which a Lodge is attached be disbanded or reduced, the Warrant must be given up, or exchanged for a Warrant for a Civil Lodge. They cannot make Freemasons of any civilian nor any military person below the rank of Corporal, except as Serving Brethren, or by Dispensation; and they are strictly enjoined not to interfere with the Masonic Jurisdiction of any country in which they may be stationed.

Military Lodges also exist on the Continent of Europe. We find one at Berlin, in Prussia, as far back as 1775, under the name of the Military Lodge of the Blazing Star, of which Wadzeck, the Masonic writer, was the orator.

J. H. Manners Bowe contributed to the Graphic (December 11, 1909, see also Transactions, Leeds Installed Masters Association, volume vi, page 229) the following paper on Fighting Freemasons, the Influence of the Brotherhood in War:

The annals of Military Freemasonry may be described as a veritable romance of "goodwill upon earth." This is not to deny to the civil records of the Craft the possession of an abundant fund of varied interest, but to recognize the same excellent lines both in their archaeological and historical aspects. But, after all, the warrior members of the Brotherhood are those who have always carried its influence into what are still the most strenuous paths of romance—those of military adventure.

The earliest recorded names of English Freemasons, which date from the first half of the seventeenth century, are those of two soldiers. One of these was Captain Elias Ashmole, of Warrington, in Lancashire, who belonged to Lord Ashley's Regiment in the King's Service; the other being Colonel Henry Mainwaring, a soldier of the Parliament, whose name frequently appears in the annals of the Civil War. In Scotland, where Masonic records go back to an older time, there are many earlier names of warrior members among chief and clansman alike. Moreover, on the rolls of the Lodge of Edinburgh, there is an interesting record curiously testifying to the dili-
The lively interest taken by the Craft from of old in the Brethren whose welfare may be involved in the fortunes of war is clearly shown in a few paragraphs mentioned by the Book of Constitutions, 1767, page 282, referring to the Seven Years War, 1756 to 1763. These particulars are as follows:

Grand Lodge, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, in the Strand, was held on the 24th of Jan. 1760. . . .

A Motion was made and seconded, that the Sum of Fifty Pounds be sent to Germany, to be distributed amongst the Soldiers that are Masons in Prince Ferdinand's Army, whether English, Hanoverian, or Hessian.

The Deputy Grand Master acquainted the Brethren that Major-General Kingsley, now in Prince Ferdinand's Army, was a Mason, and that if it was agreeable he would write to him, and desire he would distribute the aforesaid Sum amongst the Masons; which passed unanimously.

Ordered, that the Treasurer do pay the Sum of Fifty Pounds into the Hand of the Deputy Grand Master, to remit to General Kingsley for the aforesaid Purpose.

Gregory Lodge, at the Devil's Tavern, Temple-Bar, 14th of May 1760 in due Form. . . .

The Deputy Grand Master produced a Letter from Major-General Kingsley, with a List of the Masons in Prince Ferdinand's Army, also a Receipt for the Bill of Exchange, for the Five Hundred Pounds to be sent to Germany at the last Quarterly Communication.

MILITIA. In Medieval Latin, this word signifies Chivalry or the Body of Knighthood. Hence Militia Templi, a title sometimes given to Knights Templar, does not signify, as it has sometimes been improperly translated, the Army of the Temple, but the Chivalry of the Temple.

MINILL DE GRAND MAISON, A. L. Born, 1759; died, 1818. Founder of the Magasin Encyclopédique. He was a Freemason under the Rite Ecossais, and also belonged to the Mère Ligue, or Mother Lodge, of the Rite Ecossais Philosophique.

MINERVAL. The Third Degree of the Illuminati of Bavaria.

MINISTER OF STATE. An officer in the Supreme Councils, Grand Consistories, and some of the advanced degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

MINNESOTA. A petition to the Grand Master of Ohio for authority to open a Lodge was signed on July 16, 1849, by several Brethren in St. Paul. On August 8, a Dispensation was forwarded to them. The Lodge was instituted on September 8, and the Grand Lodge of Ohio granted a Charter dated October 22, 1852. It was constituted as Saint Paul Lodge No. 223, on February 7, 1853. Representatives from Saint John's Lodge, No. 39, of Wisconsin; Cataract Lodge, No. 121, of Illinois, and Saint Paul Lodge, No. 223, of Ohio, met on February 23, 1853, in the hall of Saint Paul Lodge. On the following day Brother A. E. Anderson was elected Grand Master and the Grand Lodge of Minnesota was duly constituted.

A Chapter at St. Paul was organized in July, 1853, by Royal Arch Masons who met in the office of Companion G. L. Becker. A petition was carried by Companion Pierson 400 miles to the nearest Chapter at Dubuque, Iowa, for the necessary approval and a Charter was granted at the Triennial Convention of the General Grand Chapter on September 11, 1856. Two other Chapters were chartered in Minnesota before the Grand Chapter was constituted, namely, Saint Paul Council, No. 11, was chartered at St. Paul October 21, 1869, by the Grand Council of Iowa; which also granted Charters to two others in the following year. These three Councils met on December 12, 1870, and formed a Grand Council for Minnesota.

The first Commandery in the State was Damascus, No. 1, at St. Paul, organized by Dispensation July 8, 1856, and chartered September 10, 1856. A Grand Commandery was constituted on October 23, 1865, with four subordinate Commanderies, namely, Damascus, No. 1; Zion, No. 2; Coeur de Lion, No. 3, and Mankato, No. 4.

The Carmel Lodge of Perfection, No. 1, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, was chartered on April 21, 1873; the Saint Paul Chapter of Rose Croix, No. 1, on July 3, 1869; the De Molay Council of Kadosh, No. 1, in April, 1875, and the Minnesota Consistory, No. 1, on April 23, 1873.

MINOR. The Fifth Degree of the German Rose Croix.

MINOR ILLUMINATE. The Latin title is Illuminatus Minor. The Fourth Degree of the Illuminati of Bavaria.

MINUTE-BOOK. The records of a Lodge are kept by the Secretary in a journal, which is called the Minute-Book. The French call it Planche tracée, and the Minutes a Moreau d’Architecture.

MINUTES. The records of a Lodge are called its Minutes. The Minutes of the proceedings of the Lodge should always be read just before closing, that any alterations or amendments may be proposed by the Brethren; and again immediately after opening at the next Communication, that they may be confirmed. But the Minutes of a Regular Communication are not to be read at a succeeding extra one, because, as the proceedings of a Regular Communication cannot be discussed at an extra, it would be unnecessary to read them, for, if incorrect they could not be amended until the next Regular Communication.

MISCHCHAN, MISCHAFHERETH, MISCH-TAI. Hebrew words, מים וטומן, Tent of Testimony; מים וראם, Tent of Festival (see Twenty-fourth Degree of the Scottish Rite). The word טומן has reference to the Thirtieth Degree.

MISCONDUCT. The Constitution of the Grand Lodge of England provides that “if any Brother behave in such a manner as to disturb the harmony of the Lodge, he shall be thrice formally admonished by the Master; and if he persist in his irregular conduct, he shall be punished according to the by-laws of that particular Lodge, or the case may be reported to higher Masonic authority.” A similar rule prevails wherever Freemasonry exists. Every Lodge may exercise instant discipline over any member or visitor who violates the rules of order and propriety, or disturbs the harmony of the Lodge, by extrusion from the room.

MISERABLE SCALD MASONs. See Scald Miserables.

MISHNA. See Talmud.

MISSISSIPPI. Harmony Lodge, No. 7, was chartered at Natchez, October 16, 1801, by the Grand Lodge of Kentucky. On August 30, 1814, it surrendered its Charter but received a new Dispensation August 30, 1815. During the following year it was chartered as No. 33. The first Worshipful Master was Seth Lewis, Chief Justice of Mississippi Territory in 1800. A Convention consisting of Masters, Wardens and Past Masters of Harmony Lodge, No. 33; Andrew Jackson Lodge, No. 15, and Washington Lodge, No. 17, was held at Natchez on July 27, 1815, and organized a Grand Lodge.

A Chapter of Royal Arch Masons was instituted at Natchez in 1816, attached to Harmony Lodge and working under its Warrant. It was called the Natchez Royal Arch Chapter. Other Chapters, namely, Clinton, Vicksburg, Columbus, Jackson, Wilson, Carrollton, No. 7, and Yazoo, No. 8, were soon formed. On March 12, 1846, the Deputy General Grand High Priest gave permission to form a Grand Chapter for Mississippi, which was duly organized on May 18, 1846.

On one of his journeys, Companion Jeremy L. Cross conferred the Select Degree at Natchez and sent a Council Charter on March 15, 1817, but there is no proof that this Council was ever organized. In the same place, John Barker established a Grand Council of Princes of Jerusalem in 1829, which assumed control of the Royal and Select Masters Degrees. Seven Councils were then organized and met and formed a Grand Council on January 19, 1836. Several Councils had surrendered their Charters and others had ceased work when the Grand Council adopted a system in 1877 called the Mississippi Plan, by which each Royal Arch Chapter was to open a Council of Royal and Select Masters to work under its Charter. The Grand Council was then dissolved. On September 16, 1853, the General Grand Chapter resolved that it had no jurisdiction over the Degrees of Royal and Select Master. In February, 1885, the Grand Council of Mississippi met again and decided that it was illegal for Chapters to work the Degrees. Six Councils were represented at this session and it included six of the officers elected in 1877.

The Mississippi Commandery, No. 1, was organized at Jackson by Dispensation issued July 5, 1844, and was granted a Charter September 12, 1844. When the Grand Commandery of Mississippi was formed, the subordinate Commanderies were Mississippi, No. 1; Magnolia, No. 2, and Lexington, No. 3.

The Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite was first established at Meridian on October 20, 1897, when the following four bodies were established: Meridian, No. 1, Lodge of Perfection; Mississippi, No. 1, Chapter of Rose Croix; Mississippi, No. 1, Council of Kadosh; Mississippi, No. 1, Consistory.

MISSOURI. Through the kind co-operation of Brothers Ray V. Denslow, Dr. William F. Kuhn, and Dr. J. E. Burnet Buckenham (see also page 25, Proceedings, 1922, Grand Lodge of Missouri), a number of important changes have been made in the details given in the Introduction to the Reprint of lists Potosi Lodge No. 39, as chartered in 1816 by the Grand Lodge of Missouri, in 1908 by Brothers A. M. Hough, W. F. Johnson, and A. S. Houston. From latest information we find that the first Masonic Lodge established in what is now the State of Missouri, came into existence in the Town of St. Genevieve, Territory of Louisiana, by authority of a "Warrant for holding a Lodge" granted on July 17, 1807, by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania to Brother Dr. Aaron Elliot (Elliott), Worshipful Master; Brother Andrew Henry, Senior Warden, and Brother George Bullitt, Junior Warden. Brother James Edgar, Worshipful Master, Western Star Lodge No. 107, at Kaskaskia, Indian Territory, was suggested by the petitioners to constitute the new Lodge, Louisiana, No. 12, and this was done on November 14, 1807 (see pages 285 and 350, vol. ii, Reprint of Minutes, Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania). A petition for a Warrant to hold Lodge at St. Louis came before the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania on September 15, 1808, and this Lodge, No. 11, was constituted on November 8, 1808 (see pages 354 and 390, vol. ii, Reprint of Minutes, Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania). This Lodge was constituted by Judge Otho Shrader, the principal officers being General Meriwether Lewis, Worshipful Master, Governor of the Territory of Louisiana and famous for his participation in the Lewis and Clark Expedition (which see); Brother Thomas F. Riddick, Senior Warden, Missouri's first Grand Master, and Brother Rufus Easton, the first Postmaster of Missouri. From the historical report of November 26, 1908, to the Grand Lodge of Missouri, we learn that the Grand Lodge of Tennessee granted Charters to the following Lodges in the Territory: Missouri Lodge No. 12, St. Louis, October 8, 1816; Elkton Lodge No. 24, Elkton, October 3, 1819; Joachim Lodge No. 25, Herculaneum, October 5, 1819, and St. Charles, October 5, 1819. Brother Denslow (page 247, Territorial Masonry) lists Potosi Lodge No. 39, as chartered in 1816 by the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, and Unity Lodge as holding a warrant to hold Lodge at St. Louis, No. 11, a Chapter of Rose Croix of the same name, a Council of Kadosh and a Consistory, both as Missouri, No. 1, were respectively opened as St. Louis, No. 1, a Chapter of Rose Croix of the same name, a Council of Kadosh and a Consistory, both as Missouri, No. 1, were respectively granted Charters on April 23, 1811; June 30, 1832; May 24, 1884, and October 24, 1884, under the Supreme Council, Southern Jurisdiction.

MISTLETOE. The Latin term is Viscum Album. A sacred plant among the Druids. It was to them a symbol of immortality, and hence an analogue of the Masonic Acacia. "The mistletoe," says Vallancey, in his Grammar of the Irish Language, "was sacred to the Druids, because not only its berries but its leaves also grow in clusters of three united to one stock. The Christian Irish hold the shamrock—clover, trefoil—sacred, in like manner, because of the three leaves united to one stalk." In Scandinavian countries it is called Mistel. It is a parasitic evergreen plant bearing a glutinous fruit. It was from a fragment of this plant that the dart was made which cost the life of Balder, according to the Scandinavian Mysteries (see Balder). The Mistletoe is the representative of the number three. The berries and leaves of the plant or vine grow in clusters of three united to one stalk. In what is now the State of Missouri, came into existence in 1800. He was initiated into Freemasonry in Owen Lodge, at Port William, now Carrollton, Kentucky, in the year 1821. He subsequently removed to the State of Missouri, where he took a prominent position in the Masonic Fraternity, and held the offices of Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter, and Grand Commander of the Grand Commandery of Knights Tem-plar. In 1848 he established, in the City of St. Louis, a monthly journal entitled the Masonic Signet and Literary Mirror, which he removed to Montgomery, Alabama, in 1852, where it lasted for a short time, and then was discontinued for want of patronage. In 1858 he published The History of Freemasonry and Masonic Digest, in two volumes, octavo. Brother Mitchell was a warm-hearted and devoted Freemason, but, unfortunately for his reputation as an author, not an accomplished scholar, hence his style is deficient, not only in elegance, but even in grammatical purity. His natural capacity, however, was good, and his arguments as a controversialist were always trenchant, if the language was not polished. As a Masonic jurist his decisions have been considered generally, but by no means universally, correct. His opinions were sometimes eccentric, and his History possesses much less value than such a work should have, in consequence of its numerous inaccuracies, and the adoption by its author of all the extravagant views of earlier writers on the origin of Freemasonry. He died at Griffin, Georgia, November 12, 1873, having been for many years a great sufferer from illness.

METER. The head-covering of the High Priest of the Jews was called נֶפֶט, metnephet, which, coming from the verb נָפָת, to roll around, signified something rolled around the head, a turban; and this was really the form of the Jewish miter. It is described by Leusden, in his Philologus Hebreo-Mixtus, as being made of dark linen twisted in many folds around the head. Many writers contend that the miter was peculiar to the high priest; but Josephus and the Mishna assert that it was worn by all the priests, that of the High Priest being distinguished from the rest by the golden band, or holy crown, which was attached to its lower rim and fastened around the forehead, and on which was inscribed the words מִדְשׁ לֵיהוֹוָה, Holiness to Jehovah, or, as it is commonly translated, Holiness to the Lord. The miter is worn by the High Priest of a Royal Arch Chapter, who is supposed to be initiated into the mysteries of Mithras unless he had rigorous proofs of fortitude and courage. Nonnus, the Greek poet, says in his Diomysiacs that these proofs were eighty in number, gradually increasing in severity. No one, says Gregory Nazianzen, could be initiated into the mysteries of Mithras unless he had passed through all the trials, and proved himself passionless and pure.

The aspirant at first underwent the purifications by water, by fire, and by fasting; after which he was introduced into a cavern representing the world, on whose walls and roof were inscribed the celestial signs. Here he submitted to a species of baptism, and received a mark on his forehead. He was presented with a crown on the point of a sword, which he was to receive, declaring at the same time, "Mithras alone is my crown." He was prepared, by anointing him with oil, crowning him with olive, and clothing him in enchanted armor, for the seven stages of initiation through which he was about to pass. These commenced in the following manner: In the first cavern he heard the howling of wild beasts, and was enveloped in total darkness, except when the cave was illuminated by the fitful glare of terrific flashes of lightning. He was hurried to the spot whence the sounds proceeded, and was suddenly thrust by his silent guide through a door into a den of wild beasts, where he was attacked by the initiated in the disguise of lions, tigers, hyenas, and other ravenous beasts. Hurried through this the creation, already recited, formed a part. The sacred words.

Here they flourished, with various success, until the year 378, when they were proscribed by a decree of the Senate, and the sacred cave, in which they had been administered, and he was made acquainted with the sacred words.

He received also the appropriate investiture, which says Maurice (Indian Antiquities v, chapter i), consisted of the Kara or conical cap, and candys or loose tunic of Mithras, on which was depicted the celestial constellations, the zone, or belt, containing a representation of the figures of the zodiac, the pastoral staff or crozier, alluding to the influence of the sun in the labors of agriculture, and the golden serpent which was placed in his bosom as an emblem of his having been regenerated and made a disciple of Mithras, because the serpent, by casting its skin annually, was considered in these mysteries as a symbol of regeneration. He was instructed in the secret doctrines of the Rites of Mithras, of which the history of the creation, already recited, formed a part. The Mysteries of Mithras passed from Persia into Europe and were introduced into Rome in the time of Pompey. In the seventh cavern of Sacellum, the darkness was changed to light, and the candidate was introduced into the presence of the Archimagus, or Chief Priest, seated on a splendid throne, and surrounded by the assistant dispensers of the mysteries. Here the obligation of secrecy was administered, and he was made acquainted with the sacred words.

The Mithraic monuments that are still extant in the museums of Europe evidently show that the immortality of the soul was one of the doctrines taught in the Mithraic initiation. The candidate was at one time made to personate a corpse, whose restoration to life dramatically represented the resurrection. Figures of this corpse are found in several of the monuments and talismans. There is circumstantial evidence that there was a Mithraic death in the initiation, just as there was a Carbiric death in the mysteries of Samothrace, a Dionysiac in those of Eleusis. Commodus, the Roman emperor, had been initiated into the Mithraic mysteries at Rome, and is said to have taken great pleasure in the ceremonies. Lampirius, in his Lives of the Emperors, records, as one of the mad freaks of Commodus, the Roman emperor, had been initiated into the Mithraic ceremonies, where "a certain thing was to be done for the sake of inspiring terror, he polluted the rites by a real murder," an expression which evidently shows that a scenic representation of a fictitious murder formed a part of the ceremony of initiation. The dog swallowing the blood of the bull was also considered as a symbol of the resurrection.

It is in the still existing talismans and gems that the most interesting memorials of the old Mithraic initiation. One of these is thus described by C. W. King, in his valuable work on the Gnostics and their Remains (London, 1864):

There is a talisman which, from its frequent repetition, would seem to be a badge of some particular degree amongst the initiated, perhaps of the first admission. A shield, embossed, with hands tied behind its back, is bound to a pillar, on which stands a griffin holding a wheel; the latter a most ancient emblem of the sun. Probably it was in this manner that the candidate was tested by the appearance of imminent death when the bandage was suddenly removed from his eyes.

As Mithras was considered as synonymous with the sun, a great deal of solar symbolism clustered around his name, his doctrines, and his initiation. Thus, MEI0PA2 was found, by the numerical value of the letters in the Greek alphabet, to be equal to 365, the number of days in a solar year; and the decrease of the solar influence in the winter, and its revival in the summer, was made a symbol of the resurrection from death to life (see Encyclopaedia Britannica, also Textes et Monuments figurés relatifs aux Mystères de Mithra, Franz Cumont, 1896, 1899).

MIZRAIM. Often by Masonic writers improperly spelled Misraim. It is the ancient Hebrew name of Egypt, and was adopted as the name of a Rite to indicate the hypothesis that it was derived from the old Egyptian initiation.

MIZRAIM, RITE OF. This Rite originated, says Clavel, at Milan, in the year 1805, in consequence of several Brethren having been refused admission into the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, which had just been established in that city. One Lechangeur has the credit of organizing the Rite and selecting the Statutes by which it was to be governed. It consisted at first of only eighty-seven Degrees, to which three others were subsequently added. Sixty-six of the ninety Degrees thus formed are said to have been taken from the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, while the remaining twenty-four were either borrowed from other systems or were the invention of Lechangeur and his colleagues, Joly and Bedarride. The system of Mizraim spread over Italy, and in 1814 was introduced into France. Dissensions in the Rite soon took place, and an attempt was unsuccessfully made to obtain the recognition of the Grand Orient of France. This having been refused, the Supreme Council was dissolved in 1817; but the Lodges of the Rite still continued to confer the Degrees although, according to the constitution of French Freemasonry, their non-recognition by the Grand Orient had the effect of making them illegal. But eventually the Rite re-formed altogether to exist as an active and independent system, and its place in Masonic history seems only to be preserved by two massive volumes on the subject, written by Mark Bedarride, the most intelligent and indefatigable of its founders, who published at Paris, in 1835, a history of the Rite, under the title of De l'Oirde de Misraim. The Rite of Mizraim consisted of 90 Degrees, divided into four series and seventeen classes.

Some of these Degrees are entirely original, but many of them are borrowed from the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. For the gratification of the curious, the following list of these Degrees is subjoined. The titles are translated as literally as possible from the French:
days of Lamech, whose son Jubal, under the name of Hario-Jubal-Abi, is reported to have been slain by three traitors, Hagava, Hakina, and Herenda. Lenning calls the Rite of Mizraim "one of the latest of the monstrous visionary schemes introduced into Freemasonry"; and Ragon characterizes it as a "fantastical connection of various rites and degrees" (see Bedarride, The Brothers).

MOABITE STONE. A relic of black basalt, rounded at the top, two by four feet, across it being an inscription of thirty-four lines in the letters of the Hebrew-Phoenician alphabet, discovered in the ruins of ancient Dibon, by Doctor Klein, a German missionary, in 1809, and now preserved in Paris at the Louvre. A record of Mesha, King of Moab, who (Second Kings iii, 5) after Ahab's death, "rebelled against the King of Israel." Chemosh was the national god of the Moabites. The covenant name of the God of Israel occurs in the inscription, showing that the name was not then unpronounceable, or unknown to the neighboring nations. The described wars date in the tenth century before Christ.

MOABON. The Hebrew word מָצוֹב. He whom the Junior Wardens represents in the Fourteenth Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, as the tried and trusty friend of Hiram the Builder (see Genesis xix, 36). This word is in some of the advanced Degrees according to the French Ritual, where it is explained as expressing "Praised be God that the crime and the criminal are punished" (Les plus secrets des hauts grades, etc., page 33).

MOCK MASONs. A name given, says Noorthouck, to the unfaithful Brethren and profanes who, in 1747, got up a procession in ridicule of that made at the Grand Feast (Constitutions, 1784, page 252; see also Scald Miserables).

MODERN RITE. The French title is Rite Moderne (see French Rite).

MODERNS. The Irish Freemasons who formed a rival Grand Lodge in London in 1751, called the supporters of the original Grand Lodge established in 1717 Moderns, while for themselves they assumed the title of Antients (see Antients).

MOHAMMED. See Koran.

MOHRIMS. Initiates, pilgrims, those entering upon an important undertaking.

MOIRA, FRANCIS RAWDON, BARON. Born 1754, died 1826. A distinguished statesman and Freemason. He was Acting Grand Master of England from 1790 to 1812. Also Grand Master of Scotland in 1806. As a Freemason he was always energetic. Doctor Oliver says, "To no person had Freemasonry for many years been more indebted than to the Earl of Moira, now Marquess Hastings." He died while Governor of Malta.

MOLART, WILLIAM. Anderson (Constitutions, 1738, page 74) writes: "Nay, even during this King's—Henry VI—Minority, there was a good Lodge under Grand Master Chicheley held at Canterbury, as appears from the Latin Register of William Molart, entitled Liberatio generalis Domini Gulielmi Prioris Ecclesiae Christi Cantuariensis erga Festum Natalis Domini 1329, Prior of Canterbury, in Manuscript, in which are named Thomas Stapylton the Master, and John Morris Custos de la Lodge Lathomorum or Warden of the Lodge of Masons, with fifteen Fellow Casts, and three Entered Prentices all named there."

Of this interesting person, Prior of Christ Church, Canterbury, England, William Preston also tells us in his Illustrations of Masonry (London, 1812, 12th edition, page 163) that the Latin Register of William Molart, Prior of Canterbury, page 88, in manuscript, entitled Liberatio generalis Domini Guilelmii "Prioris Ecclesiae Christi Cantuariensis, erga Festum Natalis Domini, 1429," says that during the minority of this prince, in 1429, a Lodge was held under the patronage of Henry Chicheley, the Archbishop, at Canterbury. There were present Thomas Stapylton, the Master; John Morris, Warden; fifteen Fellow Crafts and thirty Entered Apprentices, each of whom is named. This name, Molart, is sometimes given as Molash. Brother E. L. Hawkins comments as follows upon these claims: What appears to be the Register alluded to by Anderson is among the Tanner Manuscripts (165) in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and proves to be merely a list kept by William Molash or Molesh, the name occurs in both forms, but not as Molart, the Prior, of persons connected with the Priory and receiving liverty from it. On page 133 there is a list of persons for 1429, which contains "Magr Thom Mapylton Mgr Lathamorum, Morys custos de la logyge Lathamorum" and an list headed "Latham" with sixteen names including Maplyton and below "Aprentici idem" followed by three names. Similar lists are given for subsequent years, and thus it is plain that there was an organized Body of Operative Masons attached to the Priory at that time.

MOLAY, JACQUES OR JAMES DE. The twenty-second and last Grand Master of the Templars at the destruction of the Order in the fourteenth century. He was born about the year 1240, at Bessançon, in Burgundy, being descended from a noble family. He was received into the Order of Knights Templar in 1265, by Imbert de Peraudo, Preceptor of France, in the Chapel of the Temple at Beauson. He immediately proceeded to Palestine, and greatly distinguished himself in the wars against the infidels, under the Grand Mastership of William de Beaujeu. In 1298, while absent from the Holy Land, he was unanimously elected Grand Master upon the death of Theobald Gaudinius. In 1305, he was summoned to London, England, to settle a dispute between the Templars and the Hospitalers. He was selected by him as the godfather of one of his children. In April, 1307, he repaired, accompanied by three of his knights, to Poitiers, where the Pope was then residing, and as he supposed satisfactorily exculpated his knights, to Poitiers, where the Pope was then residing, and as he supposed satisfactorily exculpated the Order from the charges which had been preferred against it. But both Pope and King were guilty of the most infamous deceit. On September 12, 1307, the order was issued for the arrest of the Templars, and De Molay endured an imprisonment for five years and a half, during which period he was subjected to the utmost indignities and sufferings for the purpose of extorting from him a confession of the guilt of his Order. But he was firm and loyal, and on March 11, 1314, he was publicly burnt in front of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, in Paris. When about to die, he solemnly affirmed the innocence of the Order, and, it is said, summoned Pope Clement to appear before the judgment-seat of God in forty days and the King of France within a year, and both, it is well known, died within the periods specified (see Transactions, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume xx).

than English ones, but that the French and German manuals are more communicative than either. Of the English and American manuals published for monitorial instruction, the first was by Preston, in 1772. This has been succeeded by the works of the following authors: Webb, 1797; Daleho, 1807; Cole, 1817; Hardie, 1818; Cross, 1819; Tannenhill, 1824; Parmele, 1825; Charles W. MONONTICA. The Freemasons in Montana held no formal meeting until, at William H. Bell's dying request, a Masonic funeral was arranged. The meeting was held at Brother C. J. Miller's cabin in Yankee Flat. A Dispensation for a Lodge at Bannock City, then in Idaho Territory, was issued by the Grand Master of Nebraska, but the Lodge never met as the Brethren had dispersed when the Dispensation arrived. On November 17, 1863, a Dispensation was issued by the Grand Master of Nebraska to Idaho Lodge at Nevada City. The first meeting was on January 9, 1864, and the first Freemason to be initiated within the precincts of the Lodge. The Dispensation of the first Chapter in Montana, dated July 14, 1866, was issued to Virginia City, No. 1. A Charter was granted on December 18, 1868. On June 25, 1891, the Grand Chapter of Montana was organized. A Convention was called for that purpose by authority of a Warrant issued by the General Grand High Priest, Commander David F. Day. The subordinate Chapters were nine, namely, Virginia City, Helena, Deer Lodge, Valley, Yellow Stone, Billings, Livingstone, Dillon, and Great Falls, numbered 1 to 9 respectively.

Helena Council, No. 1, was organized under a Dispensation, dated April 4, 1868, from the Grand Council of California. It was numbered 9 in the jurisdiction of that State and the Charter was dated October 21, 1868. This Council joined with two others, Butte, No. 2, and Tyrean, No. 3, to organize on March 29, 1910, the Grand Council of Montana as a constituent member of the General Grand Council.

A Dispensation was issued on August 27, 1866, to Virginia City Commandery, No. 1, at Virginia City, and it was granted a Charter on September 23, 1868. The Grand Commandery of Montana was organized on May 14, 1888, with four Constituent Commanderies, namely, Virginia City, No. 1; Helena, No. 2; Montana, No. 3, and Damascencus, No. 4.

The Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, Southern Jurisdiction, was first introduced at Livingston where Khurum Lodge of Perfection, No. 2, was chartered February 11, 1889; Livingston Chapter of Rose Croix, No. 1, November 10, 1889; Livingston Council of Kadosh, No. 1, May 1, 1890, and Eastern Montana Consistory, No. 1, July 8, 1890.

MONTFAUCON, PRIOR OF. One of the two traitors on whose false accusations was based the persecution of the Templars (see Squin de Flexian, also Molay).

MONTFORT, COLONEL JOSEPH. Member of Royal White Hart Lodge, Halifax, North Carolina, where he died, March 26, 1776, aged fifty-two. Treasurer of the upper half of the Province of North Carolina, a donor to the fund of the Masonic Hall at London (see Minutes of the Grand Lodge, “held at the Crown and Anchor in the Strand,” February 6, 1771) he received, by a patent dated January 14, 1771, an appointment from the Grand Lodge of England that has aroused some speculation. The words “Provincial Grand Master of and for America” occurs as late as 1775 in Charters issued under Montfort's authority. But the belief is expressed that in his original patent the phrase making his Jurisdiction for the whole of the country was a mistake of the scribe extended to “America” instead of reading “North Carolina.” The Minutes of the Grand Lodge of England for February 6, 1771, show that Joseph Montfort paid ten pounds ten shillings or ten guineas for his deputation, diploma, as “F. G. M. for No. Ca.” This reference is relied upon to further support the surmise that the words “Provincial Grand Master of and for America” were so written in error. But they appear to have been understood literally, word for word, and in Charters issued by Montfort and his Deputy they are repeated. That they were clearly understood precisely as they read is seen by the Minutes of Royal White Hart Lodge at Halifax, March 13, 1772, recording that Brother Joseph Montfort visited there on that date and produced the deputation which “appointed him Provincial Grand Master of America.”

In further testimony Brother James M. Clift, Grand Secretary, also advises that there are similarly written documents possessed by the Grand Lodge of Virginia, alluding to Montfort as “Provincial Grand Master of and for America” and in fact his Deputy, Cornelius Hartnett, attaches his official initials to Charters still in existence as “D. G. M. A.” which appear to mean “Deputy Grand Master, America.” Brother Montfort’s Deputy was Cornelius Hartnett, a member of the Continental Congress at Philadelphia which adopted the Articles of Confederation on July 9, 1778 (see Formation of the Union, 1927, page 37). Past Grand Master A. B. Andrews in a letter to us alludes to the Masonic Lodges as foci or centers of patriotism prior to the American Revolution and that as the citizenry of Cabin Point in Surrey County, Virginia, were largely Tories, Cornelius Hartnett may have thought a Masonic Lodge among their membership would advance the cause of the patriots and therefore the establishment of the Lodge would appeal to him in a double way. At any rate a Charter to Cabin Point Royal Arch Lodge was issued by him on April 13, 1775 and bears the names of Joseph Montfort and Cornelius Harnett with their official titles, the former in full as “of and for America.”

Royal White Hart Lodge No. 2, Halifax, North Carolina, has met in an old frame building erected in 1769 and since used exclusively and continuously for Lodge purposes. On the wall is a chart of 1772, the Master’s chair has three steps built in it, the Bible and Minute Book of the olden time are preserved, the ballotbox and candlesticks are very old, the Secretary’s desk has two crude contrivances to hold candles, and in the yard an old bell on a tall post continues to be used for assembling the Craft. In that yard is buried Joseph Montfort. On the slab covering the grave is this inscription “The Right Worshipful Joseph Montfort, born in England, A.D. 1724, died at Halifax, N. C., March 25, A.D. 1776. Appointed Provincial Grand Master of and for America on January 14, A.L. 5771, A.D. 1771, by the Duke of Beaufort, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of England, A. F. & A. M. First Clerk of Court of Halifax County, Treasurer of the Province of North Carolina, Colonel of Colonial Troops, Member of Provincial Congress, Orator, Statesman, Patriot, Soldier, the highest Masonic official ever reigning on this continent, the First, the Last, the Only Grand Master of America” (see New Age, John H. Cowles, May, 1928, page 307).

MONTHS, HEBREW. Freemasons of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite use in their documents the Hebrew months of the civil year. Hebrew months commence with the full moon; and as the civil year began about the time of the autumnal equinox, the first Hebrew month must have begun with the new moon in September, which is also used by Freemasons of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite as the beginning of their year. Annexed is a table of the Hebrew months, and their correspondence with our own calendar.

As the Jews computed time by the appearance of the moon, it is evident that there soon would be a confusion as to the keeping of these feasts, if some method had not been taken to correct it; since the lunar year is only 354 days, 8 hours, and 48 minutes, and the solar year is 365 days, 6 hours, 15 minutes, and 20 seconds. Accordingly, they intercalated a month after their twelfth month, Adar, whenever they found that the 15th day of the following month, Adib, would fall before the vernal equinox. This intercalated month was named יָדִיב, Ve-adar, or the second Adar, and was inserted every second or third year, as they saw occasion; so that the difference between the lunar and solar year could never, in this way, be more than a month.

MONTHS, MASONIC. In the French Rite the old calendar is retained, and the year begins with the month of March, the months being designated numerically and not by their usual names. Thus we find in French Masonic documents such dates as this: Le 10ème jour du 3ème mois Maçonique, that is, the tenth day of the third Masonic month, or the tenth of May.

MONTPELLIER, HERMETIC RITE OF. The Hermetic Rite of Pernetty, which had been established at Avignon in 1770, was in 1778 transported to Montpellier, in France, by a Past Master, and some of the members of the Lodge of Persecuted Virtue in the former place, who laid the foundations of the Academy of True Masons, which see. Hence the Degrees given in that Academy constituted what is known as the Hermetic Rite of Montpellier.

MONUMENT. It is impossible to say exactly at what period the idea of a monument in the Third Degree was first introduced into the symbolism of Freemasonry. The early expositions of the eighteenth century, although they refer to a funeral, make no allusion to a monument. The monument adopted in the American system, consists of a weeping virgin, holding in one hand a sprig of acacia and in the other an urn; before her is a broken column, on which rests an urn; in the center of which the Tetragrammaton is engraved.
On the top of the obelisk is sometimes seen an urn pierced by a sword.

In the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite an entire Degree has been consecrated to the subject of the Hiramic monument.

Altogether, the monument is simply the symbolic expression of the idea that veneration should always be paid to the memory of departed worth.

This emblem has usually been considered as an invention of Brother Jeremy L. Cross and doubtless he is largely responsible for its present form in our standard work. Brother Robert B. Folger (in the Masonic Newspaper, New York City, May 10, 1879, see also Steller Theology, Robert H. Brown, page 65) giving Cross's account of its introduction into the work says:

The causes which led him first to devise the plan of such work were as follows: He was passionately fond of Masonry, studied under Thomas Smith Webb, Gleason, and others, became perfect under the signs of the letters and words, and started through the country as a lecturer in the year 1810. He was a man of excellent appearance in early life, very fluent in language, and, withal, a very fine singer. As a matter of course, he became very popular as a lecturer. The flow of lecture-writing was very fast, and he had as much to engage his mind in that line as he could well attend to. Wishing to take advantage of all the business that offered, he found the work slow of accomplishment by reason of delays caused by imperfect memories. He wanted something of an objective kind, which would have the effect of bringing to mind the various subjects of his lectures, and so fixing the details in the sets of objects presented to the sight, the lectures in detail would be complete.

There was at that time no guide for Lodges except the so-called Master's Carpet and the works of Preston and Webb. The Master's Carpet was deficient, being without many of the most important emblems, and those which it displayed were very much "mixed up." The work of Preston did not agree with the "adopted work." That of Webb agreed perfectly, but still was wanting in its most important part, namely, the hieroglyphics, by which the work is plainly and uniformly presented to the learner, rendering it easy of acquirement, and imprinting it upon the mind in such a manner that it cannot easily be forgotten.

He considered the matter for many months, and finally attempted to draw various plans, taking Webb's Monitor for a guide. Part of the work he accomplished satisfactory to himself. His First and Second Degrees, and although there was but little really original in the emblems which he produced, yet the classification and arrangement were his own. He went on with the Third Degree very well, as far as the Monitor of Webb goes, when he came to a pause.

There was a deficiency in the Third Degree which had to be filled in order to effect his purposes, and he became weary in thinking over the subject. He finally consulted a Brother, formerly a Mayor of New Haven, who at the time was one of his most intimate friends, and they, after working together for a week or more, could not hit upon any symbol which would be sufficiently useful in the Third Degree to the memory of the deceased. It was a large marble pillar, broken off. The part broken off was taken away, but they had left the capital lying at the base. He would have that pillar for the purpose of the new emblem, but would bring the other part of the pillar in, leaving it standing to be the base. Then one could know what it all meant. The other part of the pillar should be there. This was assented to, but more was wanted. They needed some inscription descriptive of the death of the deceased, and the beautiful virgin, who should weep over the memory of the deceased while she read of his heroic deeds.

It would be proper to state that the monument erected to the memory of Commodore Lawrence was put up in the southwest corner of Trinity Churchyard, in the year 1813, after the battle between the frigates Chesapeake and Shannon, in which battle Lawrence fell. It was a beautiful marble pillar, broken off, and a part of the capital laid at its base. The monument remained there until 1844–5, at which time Trinity Church had been taken down and rebuilt as it now stands. When finished, all the old debris of the churchyards was removed, and the grounds trimmed and fancifully decorated, and the corporation of the church took away the old and dilapidated monument of Lawrence from that spot and erected a new one of a different form, placing it in the front of the church, where it now stands. Brother Cross and myself visited the new monument together, and he expressed great disappointment at the change, saying "it was not half as good as the one they had taken away!"

The claim of Cross to having originated the emblem is, however, disputed. Oliver speaks of the monument but does not assign to it an American origin and the idea itself is very old. In the Barney ritual of 1817, formerly in the possession of Samuel Willson of Vermont, which was the work adopted by the Grand Lodge of Iowa in 1860, there is the marble column, the beautiful virgin weeping, the open book, the Sprig of Acacia, the urn, and Time standing behind. The only part lacking is the Broken Column and the words referring to this were added later. Samuel Willson says: "Previous to 1826, but the date or circumstances of their getting in I cannot recall." Thus it would seem that everything in the present emblem except the reference to the Broken Column was in use prior to the publication of Cross's work and in fact the emblem in somewhat different form is frequently found in ancient symbolism (see Quarterly Bulletin, Iowa Masonic Library, July, 1921, page 82, C. C. Hunt, to whom we are greatly indebted for information on this subject).

The monument to Captain James Lawrence was formerly in the rear of the churchyard but in December 1846, the Vestry directed that it be moved from the old site to a place near to and southeast of the south porch, left of the entrance, of Trinity Church on Broadway, New York City. There the monument stood for many years, and in 1895 it was removed to a site near theBeautiful monument to the memory of a great man who fell in battle, saying "it was not half as good as the one they had taken away!"
rate the heroic patriotism of Captain James Lawrence, killed on June 1, 1813, in action between the frigates Chesapeake and Shannon, and whose dying words were, "Don't give us the ship." For data regarding the first monument and its dedication we are indebted to Robert H. Kelby, New York Historical Society, and to W. F. L. Aigeltinger, Corporation of Trinity Church.

With the Jews the column symbolized the princes, rulers or nobles, and a broken column denoted that a pillar of the state had fallen. In Egyptian mythology Isis is sometimes pictured weeping over the broken column which conceals the body of her husband, Osiris, while behind her stands Horus or Time pouring ambrosia on her hair. In Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, Isis is said to be sometimes represented standing. In her right hand is a sistrum, in her left a small ewer and on her forehead is a lotus, emblem of resurrection. In the Dionysiac Mysteries, Dionysius is represented as slain; Rhea goes in search of the body. She finds it and causes it to be buried in due form. She is sometimes represented as standing by a column holding in her hand a sprig of wheat, emblem of immortality, since though it be placed in the ground and die it springs up again into newness of life. She was the wife of Koronus or Time, who may fittingly be represented as standing behind her.

In the Grand Lodge Library at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, there is a book entitled A Brief History of Freemasonry by Thomas Johnson, who at the time of writing the book was Grand Tyler of the Grand Lodge of England, and Janitor to the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of England. He states that the book is published by permission of the officers of the Grand Lodge of England, who have honored it by their subscriptions. This book, we understand, was first published in 1782.

The copy in the Library is the second edition, published in 1784. In his introduction he states:

I have also taken the Liberty to introduce a Design for a Monument, in Honour of a Great Artist; and although I am well aware that we have no account of any such having been erected over his Grave, yet we have many precedents both Ancient and Modern of such having been reared to preserve in Memory of three Things, when attentively considered, will be recollected by every good Mason, who is Master of his Profession; not only whom they represent, but likewise why they are so depicted in so seemingly disgraceful a situation: as to all Strangers I would advise them

To take due warning how they vauntingly,
Deer ye the mystic powers of Masonry;
Nor seek to learn by any other Rules,
Than those propound'd in just Masonick Schools;
There from Foundation to the Top, you'll raise,
Yet fail in Words, to speak a Mason's praise.

The monument shows an urn on the top and above the urn is a square and compass. Below the urn is the Holy Bible, square and compass, intertwined with a laurel branch. On the urn is a letter G. On one side of the monument is a sun, on the other a moon. The general sale of the Masonic Chart published by Cross seems to have fixed this form, so that there has been no change since. While, therefore, it may be true that Cross gave to the emblem its present form, it cannot be said that he gave expression to an entirely new idea. The greater part of it is an adaptation rather than an invention, an old idea prompted anew in a receptive mind by the memorial to Lawrence.

The Cape-stone was finished with great Joy; which, however, was soon interrupted by the sudden Death of the Great Artist and worthy Tyrian Deputy Grand Master under King Solomon. After some time being allowed the Craft to vent their sorrow, he was buried with great Solemnity near the Temple: whose Memory an elegant Monument is designed to perpetuate.

His description of the Monument is as follows:

The Father of the Man, whose memory this Tomb is designed to perpetuate, dying, he was left to the care of his Mother; his Name, Profession, the manner of his Death, and many other circumstances concerning him, are well known to all good Masons.

Who o'er besides would this grand Secret trace, Must seek it only in its proper place.

The Holy Bible, Square and Compasses, are figurative of the three greatest moral Blessings, which Man can be endowed with in his warfare through this World. They are entwined with a Laurel Branch, as an Emblem of Honour to all those, who by applying them to their proper uses, will certainly attain the end for which they were designed.

Their weapons prove, which if you rightly wield,
Will greater Victories gain, than Sword or Shield;
Vanquish your foes, restrain all dissipation,
And bless the Day when you became a Mason!

The Insignia, on the Top of the Urn emblematically point out where the Deceased was when living; which, together with the Sun and Moon, are likewise typical of three Things,

Which, tho' of lesser Note than those before,
A Mason you must be, if you'd know more.

The three Figures in Chains, when attentively considered, will be recollected by every good Mason, who is Master of his Profession; not only whom they represent, but likewise why they are so depicted in so seemingly disgraceful a situation: as to all Strangers I would advise them

Especially the well-known Letter G, Which plainly pointeth out—"What Mote Ytt Be?"

As part of the history connected with the Monument, he says:

The adoption of the moon in the Masonic system as a symbol is analogous to, but could hardly be derived from, the employment of the same symbol in the Ancient religions. In Egypt, Osiris was the sun, and Isis the moon; in Syria, Adonis was the sun, and Asthoroth the moon; the Greeks adored her as Diana, and Hecate; in the mysteries of Ceres, while the hierophant or chief priest represented the Creator, and the torch-bearer the sun, the εἰςβασιζήσα, or officer nearest the altar, represented the moon. In short, moon-worship was as widely disseminated as sun-worship.

Freemasons retain her image in their Rites, because the Lodge is a representation of the universe, where, as the sun rules over the day, the moon presides over the night; as the one regulates the year, so does the other the months, and as the former is the king of the starry hosts of heaven, so is the latter their queen; but both deriving their heat, and light, and power from Him, who, as the Greatest Light, the Master of heaven and earth, controls them both.

MOORE, CHARLES WHITLOCK. A distinguished Masonic journalist, born in Boston, Massachusetts, March 29, 1801. His own account of his initiation into Freemasonry is in the following words:

In February, 1822, I was proposed for the Degrees of Freemasonry in Massachusetts Lodge, then, as now, one of the three oldest in Boston, and but for the intervention of business engagements, I should have been received into Freemasonry on the evening of my coming of age. Before that evening arrived, however, I was called temporarily to the State of Maine, where, in May following, I was admitted into Kennebec Lodge, at Hallowell, with the consent and approbation of the Lodge in which I had been originally proposed. I received the Third Degree on the evening of the 12th of June.

On October 10, 1822, he affiliated with the Lodge of Saint Andrew. In October, 1872, that Lodge celebrated his semicentennial membership by a Festival. In 1825 he took the Capitular Degrees in Saint Andrew’s Chapter, and was elected High Priest in 1840, and subsequently Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter. He was made a Knight Templar in Boston Encampment about the year 1830, and was Eminent Commander in 1837. In 1841 he was elected Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, which office he held for three years. In 1832 he received the Royal and Select Degrees in 1840, and subsequently Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter.

In Masonic authorship, Brother Moore is principally distinguished for The Freemasons Monthly Magazine, which he published for thirty-three years; in fact, until his death. In 1828 and 1829 he published the Amaranth, or Masonic Garland, and in 1843 the Masonic Trestle-Board. Brother Moore died at Boston, Massachusetts, of pneumonia, on December 12, 1873.

MOORE, CORNELIUS. Born November 23, 1806, in Hunterdon County, New Jersey. From his sixteenth to twenty-first year he continued his school studies so diligently that, although working all this time at the blacksmith trade, he became a most proficient teacher. Moving to Zanesville, Ohio, in 1832 he studied law and was admitted to the bar. In 1846, at Cincinnati, Ohio, he began the publication of the Masonic Review, which he continued to edit until 1876. Brother Moore was initiated in Lafayette Lodge, No. 79, Zanesville, Ohio, in March, 1836. He served his Lodge four years as Master and in 1838 he received the Capitular Degrees in Zanesville Royal Arch Chapter, No. 9. He received the Cryptic Degrees in 1840 and was admitted to the Orders of Knighthood in Reed Commandery No. 6, Dayton, Ohio, the same year. Subsequently passing through all the grades of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite including the Thirty-second. Brother Moore published several Masonic books in addition to his exceedingly fine and helpful journal but he was unfortunately reduced to very straitened circumstances during the war, 1861-5. While Brother Moore was abroad touring the Continent, Ireland, Scotland and England, the Miami University at Oxford, Ohio, conferred upon him the honorary degree of Master of Arts in 1859.

It was patronized by the most illustrious persons of Germany, and many Princes of the Empire were its Grand Masters; the Duke of Bavaria especially took it under his protection. Moral Law. "A Mason," say the old Charges of 1722, "is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law." Now, this moral law is not to be considered as confined to the Decalogue of Moses, the ten commandments, within which narrow limits the ecclesiastical writers technically restrain it, but rather as alluding to what is called the lex naturae, or the law of nature. This law of nature has been defined, by an able but not recent writer on this subject, to be "the will of God, relating to human actions, grounded on the moral differences of things; and because discoverable by natural light, obligatory upon all mankind" (Grove, System of Moral Philosophy, volume ii, page 122, London, 1749). This is the "moral law," to which the old Charge already cited refers, and which it declares to be the law of Freemasonry. And this was wisely done, for it is evident that no law less universal could have been appropriately selected for the government of an Institution whose prominent characteristic is its universality.

Morality. In the American system it is one of the three precious jewels of a Master Mason.

Morality of Freemasonry. No one who reads our ancient Charges can fail to see that Freemasonry is a strictly moral Institution, and that the principles which it inculcates inevitably tend to make the Brother who obeys their dictates a more virtuous man. Hence the English Lecture very properly define Freemasonry to be "a system of morality."

Moral Law. "A Mason," say the old Charges of 1722, "is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law." Now, this moral law is not to be considered as confined to the Decalogue of Moses, the ten commandments, within which narrow limits the ecclesiastical writers technically restrain it, but rather as alluding to what is called the lex naturae, or the law of nature. Morana. The Bohemian goddess of winter and death, Maryana of Scandinavia.

Moravian Brethren. The religious sect of Moravian Brethren, which was founded in Upper Lusatia, about 1722, by Count Zinzendorf, is said at one time to have formed a society of religious Freemasons. For an account of which, see Mustard Seed, Order of.

Moray, Sir Robert. First recorded initiate in England, the details are in the Minutes of the Lodge of Edinburgh, Mary's Chapel. Brother Moray was Quarter Master General in 1641 of the "Armie of Scotland" occupying Newcastle-on-Tyne, in the North of England. Some members of the Lodge of Edinburgh also serving in the army, initiated him there on May 20, 1641. When the army returned to Scotland, the record was written in the Minutes of the Lodge and signed by Brothers A. Hamilton, James Hamilton, John Myller, and R. Moray, the latter's mark is a Pentalpha, five straight lines forming a five-pointed star.

Morgan, William. Born, August 7, 1774, in Virginia, Culpeper County, U. S. A. Lived at Lexington, Kentucky, and Richmond, Virginia, working as a stonemason, going to Canada in 1821 and employed near Toronto, but in 1823 was at Rochester, New York, taking up his residence in Batavia, New York, in 1826. He had visited Lodges before coming to Batavia though there is no evidence to show whether Morgan was ever initiated. He was denied admission to the local Lodge and Chapter at Batavia and there is usually some good reason for this refusal. But he is credited with receiving the Royal Arch Degree at Le Roy, New York, on May 31, 1825. When a new Chapter was proposed in his own town, Batavia, his name was upon the petition, but objection was made and a new one was prepared without his signature. Resenting this action Morgan became bitter and sought revenge. A local newspaper, The Republican Advocate, was conducted by David C. Miller, who is said to have received the Entered Apprentice Degree at Albany, New York. The two vindictive men concocted a scheme to publish a malicious book on Freemasonry. This purpose on discovery aroused great resentment in the village. Miller's printshop was visited, fire was set to the building, but no serious damage was done. Miller, himself, was arrested on an insignificant charge and as a result of this sort of hotheadedness four Freemasons were indicted for "riot, assault, and false imprisonment," and three others were sent to the County Jail. The contract between Morgan and Miller was made in March, 1826. Morgan was arrested in July for a debt and again, on August 19, he had a similar experience. This was undoubtedly done to separate Miller and Morgan, but the former gave bail and the latter was released two days later. However, on September 11, 1826, Morgan was arrested for petit larceny at Batavia and put into jail at Canandaigua. This was for stealing a shirt and as to what then happened there are two different stories. One is that Morgan was forcibly seized and compelled to enter a coach and was then driven across the country to the mouth of the Niagara River and into Canada. But the other story is that he went voluntarily and that he there received $500 for leaving Miller. This was refused and he was again sent to jail. The next day a man named Lotos Lawson came to the jail and asked for Morgan's release. During the day the amount of the execution was paid and Morgan set free. As to what then happened there are two different stories. One is that Morgan was forcibly seized and compelled to enter a coach and was then driven across the country to the mouth of the Niagara River and into Canada. But the other story is that he went voluntarily and that he there received $500 for leaving Miller. This was paid and he left his guides, and went into Canada. There was a stay at Fort Niagara until the arrangements were completed and then the known movements of Morgan come to an end. But the theory that Morgan was taken away by force and given a violent death by drowning gave rise to the Anti-Masonic Party in the United States. As early as 1832 there were 141 Anti-Masonic newspapers in the United States. The election of 1828 gave Solomon Southwick, the Anti-Masonic candidate for Governor of New York, 33,335 votes. Martin Van Buren, a Freemason, had 136,783 votes, but in 1830 the Anti-Masonic candidate ran behind the leader by only 8,531 votes, 120,361 against 128,892. On the abduction charge alone several persons were tried. Cheseboro, Master of the Lodge at the County City was sentenced to imprisonment for one year, Lawson two years, Bruce, Sheriff of Niagara County, two years and four months, Sheldon three months, and Sawyer, one month. body was, on October 7, 1827, found on the beach 40 miles from Fort Niagara. This at once excited suspicions that the body might be that of Morgan. The remains were claimed as those of him but on later enquiry identification was made by a Mrs. Monroe that they were those of her husband and were, therefore, turned over to her. This was done on October 29, 1827. But the foes of Freemasonry did not believe that fact, nor do they believe it now. Then there were the curious persons subject to mental disorders and who asserted conflicting stories of guilt. Of these were Hill, Valance, and Whitney, though there is a serious doubt whether the latter has been accurately reported. We need not go into the stories of those who claim to have seen Morgan in other lands. The subject has been discussed freely by Brothers E. T. Schultz and Ben Perley Poore.

The Grand Lodge of New York in 1826 had 500 Lodges, but in 1846 there were only 65 Lodges. Of the number of Lodges represented in the Annual Grand Lodge Communications in 1827, there were 223; in 1828, 130; in 1829, 87; in 1830, 77; 1831, 71; 1832, 52, 1833, 56; 1834, 53; and in 1835, 49. The decline and recovery in membership was as follows: 1820, 295 Lodges and 15,000 members; 1825, 480 Lodges and 20,000 members; 1830, 82 Lodges and 3,000 members; 1840, 70 Lodges and 5,000 members; 1850, 172 Lodges and 12,000 members; 1860, 432 Lodges and 25,000 members. From that time the returning pace was rapid, the growth permanent. Other states had similar experiences.

While the Order promptly disavowed any sympathy with those who within its own rank might be disposed to punish Morgan for wrong doing, yet those various resolutions by responsible Masonic Bodies did little for the time to check the enmity against the Fraternity. Charters were stolen and Lodge-rooms and equipment defiled. Publicly and privately the resentment grew, separating families, disrupting churches, and poisoning all these sources of fellowship in the community. Father was arrayed against son, brother against his own flesh and blood—both in politics and business, home and market place, the community. President Lincoln, Thory, Ragon, Clavel, and Lenning say, by the Grand Lodge he received the power to establish a Symbolic Lodge, and assign it as the place where what are called the three grand offerings were made.

MORIN, J. P. H. VON. Grand Master of Haiti, 1863.

MORIN, STEPHEN. The founder of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite in America. On the 27th of August, 1761, the “Deputies General of the Royal Art, Grand Wardens, and officers of the Grand Sovereign Lodge of Saint John of Jerusalem established at Paris,” so reads the document itself, granted a Patent to Stephen Morin, by which he was empowered “to multiply the Sublime Degrees of High Perfection, and to create Inspectors in all places where the Sublime Degrees are not established.” This Patent was granted, Thory, Ragon, Clavel, and Lenning say, by the Grand Council of Emperors of the East and West. Others say by the Grand Lodge. Dalcho says by the Grand Consistory of Princes of the Royal Secret at Paris. Brother Albert Pike, who has very elaborately investigated the question, says that the authority of Morin was “a joint authority” of the two then contending Grand Lodges of France and the Grand Council, which is, Brother Mackey supposed, what Dalcho and the Supreme Council of Charleston called the Grand Consistory. From the Grand Lodge he received the power to establish a Symbolic Lodge, and from the Grand Council or Consistory the power to confer the advanced Degrees. Not long after receiving these powers, Morin sailed for America, and established Bodies of the Scottish Rite in Santo Domingo and Jamaica. He also appointed M. M. Hayes a Deputy Inspector-General for North America. Hayes, subsequently, appointed Isaac da Costa a Deputy for South Carolina, and through him the Sublime Degrees were disseminated among the Freemasons of the United States (see Scottish Rite). After appointing several Deputies and establishing some Bodies in the West India Islands, Morin is lost sight of. We know not anything of his subsequent history, or of the time or place of his death. Ragon, Thory, and Clavel say that Morin was a Jew; but as these writers have Judaised all the founders of the Ancient and Accepted Freemasonry, volume vii, History of Freemasonry; Brother G. W. Sibley; Freemasonry at Batavia, Brother David Seaver; History of Freemasonry in the State of New York, Brother Ossian Lang; History of Freemasonry in Canada, Brother John Ross Robertson, chapter vii, volume ii; An American Masonic Crisis, Brother J. H. Tatsch; Transactions, volume xxxiv, page 196, Quatuor Coronati Lodge, No. 2076, London; Builder, St. Louis, Missouri, has had several articles, notably The Morgan Affair, September, 1828, by Brothers J. H. Tatsch and E. M. Eriksson, the latter also contributing papers of similar type to the Grand Lodge Bulletin, Iowa, 1926; History of Freemasonry in Maryland, Brother E. T. Schultz, 1887, volume iii, pages 5-38; William Morgan, or Political Anti-Masonry, Brother Rob Morris, 1883; Masonic Light, Brother P. C. These last two works contain many additional references to articles of interest.
Scottish Rite in America, we have no right to place any confidence in their statements. The name of Morin has been borne by many French Christians of literary reputation, from Peter Morin, a learned ecclesiastical writer of the sixteenth century, to Stephen Morin, an antiquary and Protestant clergymen, who died in 1700, and his son Henry, who became a Catholic, and died in 1728. The above surmise by Doctor Mackey has more recently had the support of Brother Cyrus Field Willard who, in the Builder, September, 1925, and in correspondence with us, gave his reasons for believing Morin to have been of a French Huguenot family in New York, the name Stephen also occurring in eighteenth-century church records in that city at a date favorable to the known movements of the noted Freemason. Brother Willard notes the boyhood of Morin coincides in the same city with that of Brother Moses M. Hayes, another pioneer of prominence in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. Another claim unearthed by Brother Willard is that Morin was a sea captain captured by the British in 1777 but an attempt by us to have this verified by Government records at London has been unsuccessful.

MORISON, CHARLES. Soldier and surgeon, born in 1780, at Greenfield, Scotland. He was the owner of a valuable Masonic library which, after his death in 1848, was given by his widow to the Grand Lodge of Scotland.

MORITZ, CARL PHILIPP. A Privy Councillor, Professor, and Member of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, was born at Hameln on the 15th of September, 1757, and died the 26th of June, 1793. Gädicke says that he was one of the most celebrated authors of his age, and distinguished by his works on the German language. He was the author of several Masonic works, among which are his Contributions to the Philosophy of Life and the Diary of a Freemason (Berlin, 1793) and a Book of Masonic Songs.

MORMON FAITH. See Book of Mormon.

MOROCCO. This country is at the northwest extremity of Africa with an area of about 300,000 square miles and since the World War has been under a protectorate of the French Republic. Five Lodges have been put at work in Morocco under the Grand Orient of France. These were warranted as follows: Nouvelle Volubilis (this latter being the French name for a plant, the NewConvolvulus, or Bindweed), Tangier, June 8, 1891; Le Phare (the Beacon) de la Chaouia, Casablanca, May 4, 1910; Le Réveil du Moghreb (The Awakening of the Extreme West), Rabat, February 10, 1920; La Nouvelle Tagmusiga, Mogador, August 18, 1921. Under the Grand Lodge of France there are five Lodges as follows: Woodrow Wilson, No. 479, Mogador; Aula Lumière, No. 480, Casablanca; Tit, No. 490, Mazagan; Les deux Soeurs (The Two Sisters), No. 497, Rabat-Sali; Asfy, No. 498, Safi. The Grand Orient of Italy warranted Concordia Lodge at Tangiers, and the Grand Orient of Spain chartered the following: Morayta, Tangier; Abel-el-Asiz, Tangier; Casablanca, No. 247, Casablanca; Felicidad, Lavache.

MORPHEY. The name of one of the twelve Inspectors in the Eleventh Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. This name, like the others in the same catalogue, bids defiance to any Hebraic derivation. They are all either French corruptions, worse even than Jakainai for Shekinah, or they have some allusion to names or events connected with the political intrigues of the exiled house of Stuart, which had, it is known, a connection with some of the advanced Degrees which sprang up at Arras, and other places where Freemasonry is said to have been patronized by the Pretender. This word Morphey may, for instance, be a corruption of Murray. James Murray, the second son of Lord Stormont, escaped to the Court of the Stuarts in 1715. He was a devoted adherent of the exiled family, and became the governor of the young prince and the chief minister of his father, who conferred upon him the empty title of Earl of Dunbar. He died at Avignon in 1770. But almost every etymology of this kind must be entirely conjectural.

MORRIS, ROB. Born August 31, 1818. Was first brought to Masonic light March 5, 1846, in Oxford Lodge, at a place of the same name in Mississippi. The life of Brother Morris was so active and untiring for the benefit of the Institution of Freemasonry, that he had the opportunity of filling very many positions in all the departments of Freemasonry, and was Grand Master of Freemasons of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky in 1858-9. His service to the Order of the Eastern Star was devoted and valuable. He was also an organizer of the Conservators, Brethren who aroused much interest and some resentment over proposed changes and standardization of Masonic ceremonies. His writings cover Masonic jurisprudence, rituals and handbooks, Masonic belles-lettres, history and biography, travels and contributions to the Review, Keystone, Advocate, New York Dispatch, and other papers and periodicals. His Masonic songs and poetic effusions stand out prominently. He was the author of We Meet upon the Level, which is sufficient to render his name immortal. A complete biography of Brother Rob Morris would fill volumes. He died in 1888.

THE LEVEL, PLUMB AND SQUARE

We meet upon the Level, and we part upon the Square: What words sublimely beautiful those words Masonic are! They fall like strains of melody upon the listening ears, As they've sounded hallelujahs to the world, three thousand years.

We meet upon the Level, though from every station brought, The Monarch from his palace and the Laborer from his cot; For the King must drop his dignity when knocking at our door And the Laborer is his equal as he walks the checkered floor.

We act upon the Plumb,—'tis our Master's great command, We stand upright in virtue's way and lean to neither hand; The All-Seeing Eye that reads the heart will bear us witness true, That we do always honor God and give each man his due.

We part upon the Square,—for the world must have its due, We mingle in the ranks of men, but keep the Secret true, And the influence of our gatherings in memory is green, And we long, upon the Level, to renew the happy scene.

There's a world where all are equal,—we are hurrying toward it fast, We shall meet upon the Level there when the gates of death are past; We shall stand before the Orient and our Master will be there.
MORRIS

Our works to try, our lives to prove by His unerring Square.
We shall meet upon the Level there, but never thence depart.
There's a mansion bright and glorious, set for the pure in heart;
And an everlasting welcome from the Host rejoicing there,
Who in this world of sloth and sin, did part upon the Square.
Let us meet upon the Level, then, while laboring patient here,
Let us meet and let us labor, tho' the labor be severe;
Already the Western Sky the signs bid us prepare,
To gather up our Working Tools and part upon the Square.

Let us meet upon the Level, then, while laboring patient here,
Let us meet and let us labor, tho' the labor be severe;
Already the Western Sky the signs bid us prepare,
To gather up our Working Tools and part upon the Square.

Hands round, ye royal Craftsmen in the bright, fraternal chain!
We part upon the Square below to meet in Heaven again;
Each tie that has been broken here shall be cemented there,
And none be lost around the Throne who parted on the Square.

MORRIS, ROBERT. A signer of the Declaration of Independence and a Freemason who devoted his entire personal fortune to the furthering of the cause of the Colonists, as well as borrowing large sums of the Colonists. He was born in Liverpool, England, January 20, 1734, and died May 8, 1806. He patriotically sacrificed all his worldly possessions. Said to have been a member of an old Pennsylvania Masonic Lodge (see New Age, May, 1925, and Brother Peters' Masons as Makers of America, page 58, but not so asserted by Brother Boyden, Masonic Presidents, Vice-Presidents and Signers; and Brother Roth, Masonry in the Formation of Our Government, page 83, says no definite proofs have been found of Morris as a Freemason).

MORTALITY, SYMBOL OF. The ancient Egyptians introduced a skeleton at their feasts, to impress the idea of the evanescence of all earthly enjoyments; but the skeletons or deaths' heads did not denote that the deceased person is the last of his family. The Freemasons have adopted the same symbol, and in all the Degrees where it is necessary to impress the idea of mortality, a skull, or a skull and crossed bones, are used for that purpose.

MORTAR, UNTEMPERED. See Untempered Mortar.

MOSAIC PAVEMENT. Mosaic work consists properly of many little stones of different colors united together in patterns to imitate a painting. It was much practised among the Romans, who called it musivum, whence the Italians get their mosaico, the French their mosaique, and we our mosaic. The idea that the work is derived from the fact that Moses used a pavement of colored stones in the tabernacle has been long since exploded by etymologists. The Ma- sonic tradition is that the floor of the Temple of Solomon was decorated with a mosaic pavement of black and white stones. There is no historical evidence to substantiate this statement. Samuel Lee, however, in his diagram of the Temple, represents not only the floors of the building, but of all the outer courts, as covered with such a pavement. The Masonic idea was perhaps first suggested by this passage in the Gospel of Saint John xix, 13, “When Pilate, therefore, heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment-seat in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha.” The word here translated Pavement is in the original Lithostroton, the very word used by Pliny to denote a mosaic pavement. The Greek word, as well as its Latin equivalent, is used to denote a pavement formed of ornamental stones of various colors, precisely what is meant by a Mosaic Pavement. There was, therefore, a part of the Temple which was decorated with a mosaic pavement. The Talmud informs us that there was such a pavement in the Conclave where the Grand Sanhedrin held its sessions. By a little torsion of historical accuracy, the Freemasons have asserted that the ground floor of the Temple was a mosaic pavement, and hence as the Lodge is a representation of the Temple, that the floor of the Lodge should also be of the same pattern. The mosaic pavement is an old symbol of the Order. It is met with in the earliest Rituals of the eighteenth century. It is classed among the ornaments of the Lodge in combination with the indented tessel and the blazing star. Its parti-colored stones of black and white have been readily and appropriately interpreted as symbols of the evil and good of human life.

MOsAIC SYmBoLISM. In the religion of Moses, more than in any other which preceded or followed it, is symbolism the predominating idea. From the tabernacle, which may be considered as the central point of the whole system, down to the vestments which clothed the servants at the altar, there will be found an underlying principle of symbolism. Long before the days of Pythagoras the mystical nature of numbers had been inculcated by the Jewish lawgiver, and the very name of God was constructed in a symbolic form, to indicate His eternal nature. Much of the Jewish ritual of worship, delineated in the Pentateuch with so much precision as to its minutest details would almost seem puerile were it not for the symbolic idea that is conveyed. So the fringes of the garments are patiently described, not as decorations, but that by them the people, in looking upon the fringe, might “remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them.” Well, therefore, has a modern writer remarked, that in the symbolism of the Masonic worship it is only ignorance, that can find the details trifling or the prescriptions minute; for if we recognize the worth and beauty of symbolism, we shall in vain seek in the Masonic symbols for one superfluous enactment or one superstitious idea.

To the Freemason the Masonic symbolism is very significant, because from it Freemasonry has derived and transmitted for its own uses many of the most precious treasures of its own symbolical art. Indeed, except in some of the higher, and therefore more modern Degrees, the symbolism of Freemasonry is almost entirely deduced from the symbolism of Mosaic. Thus the symbol of the Temple, which per-consistently pervades the whole of the ancient Masonic system, comes to us directly from the symbolism of the Jewish tabernacle. If Solomon is revered by the Freemasons as their traditional Grand Master, it is because the Temple constructed by him was the symbol of the Divine life to be cultivated in every heart. And this symbol was borrowed from the Mosaic tabernacle; and the Jewish thought, that every Hebrew was to be a tabernacle of the Lord, has been transmitted to the Masonic system, which teaches that every Freemason is to be a temple of the Great Architect. The Papal Church, from which we get all ecclesiastical symbolism, borrowed its symbolism from the ancient Romans. Hence most of the advanced Degrees of Freemasonry which partake of a Christian character are marked by Roman symbolism transmitted into Christian. But Craft Masonry, more ancient and more universal, finds its symbolic teachings almost exclusively in the Mosaic symbolism instituted in the wilderness.

If we inquire whence the Jewish lawgiver derived the symbolic system which he introduced into his religion, the history of his life will readily answer the question. Philo-Judaicus says that “Moses was instructed by the Egyptian priests in the philosophy of symbols and hieroglyphics as well as in the mysteries of the sacred animals.” The sacred historian tells us that he was “learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians”; and Manetho and other traditionary writers tell us that he was educated at Heliopolis as a priest, under his Egyptian name of Osarsiph, and that there he was taught the whole range of literature and science, which it was customary to impart to the priesthood of Egypt. When, then, at the head of his people, he passed away from the servitude of Egyptian taskmasters, and began in the wilderness to establish his new religion, it is not strange that he should have given a holy use to the symbols whose meaning he had learned in his ecclesiastical education on the banks of the Nile.

Thus it is that we find in the Mosaic symbolism so many identities with the Egyptian Ritual. Thus the Ark of the Covenant, the Breastplate of the High Priest, the Miter, and many other of the Jewish symbols, will find their analogies in the ritualistic ceremonies of the Egyptians. Reghellini, who has written an elaborate work on Masonry considered as the result of the Egyptian, Jewish, and Christian Religions, says on the subject: “Moses, in his mysteries, and after him Solomon, adopted a great part of the Egyptian symbols, which, after them, we Masons have preserved in our own” (see Doctor Mackey’s revised Symbolism of Freemasonry).

MOSES. The Hebrew word מֹזֵס, which means drawn out; but the true derivation is from two Egyptian words, μσ, ῆσ, and οὐκε, ouakes, signifying saved from the water. The lawgiver of the Jews, and referred to in some of the higher Degrees, especially in the Twenty-fifth Degree, or Knight of the Brazen Serpent in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, where he is represented as the presiding officer. He plays also an important part in the Royal Arch of the York and American Rites, all of whose Ritual is framed on the Mosaic symbolism.

MOSSDORF, FRIEDRICH. An eminent German Freemason, who was born March 2, 1757, at Eckartsberge, and died about 1830. He resided in Dresden, and took an active part in the affairs of Freemasonry. He was a warm supporter of Fessler’s Masonic reforms, and made several contributions to the Freyberg Freimaurerischen Taschenbuche in defense of Fessler’s system. He became intimately connected with the learned Krause, the author of The Three Most Ancient Records of the Masonic Fraternity, and wrote and published in 1809 a critical review of the work, in consequence of which the Grand Lodge commanded him to absent himself for an indefinite period from the Lodges. Mossdorf then withdrew from any further connection with the Fraternity. His most valuable contributions to Masonic literature are his additions and emendations to Jenning’s Encyclopädie der Freimaurerei. He is the author also of several other works of great value.

MOST EXCELLENT. The title given to a Royal Arch Chapter, and to its presiding officer, the High Priest; also to the presiding officer of a Lodge of Most Excellent Masters.

MOST EXCELLENT MASTER. The Sixth Degree in the York or American Rite. Its history refers to the dedication of the Temple by King Solomon, who is represented by its presiding officer under the title of Most Excellent. Its officers are the same as those in a Symbolic Lodge. There are, however, some Rituals in which the Junior Warden is omitted. This Degree is peculiarly American, it being practised in no other country. It was the invention of Webb, who organized the Capitular System of Freemasonry as it exists in the United States of America, and established the system of lectures which is the foundation of all subsequent systems taught there.

MOST PUISSANT. The title of the presiding officer of a Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters.

MOST WORSHIPFUL. The title usually given to a Grand Lodge and to its presiding officer, the Grand Master. However, the title of Grand Master of Pennsylvania is Right Worshipful.

MOT DE SEMESTRE. A French expression, meaning Half yearly word. Every six months the Grand Orient of France sends to each of the Lodges of its obedience a password, to be used by its members as an additional means of gaining admission into a Lodge. Each Freemason obtains this word only from the Venerable or Worshipful Master of his own Lodge. It was instituted October 28, 1773, when the Duke of Chartres was elected Grand Master.

MOTE. From an old Anglo-Saxon word, motan, meaning “to be allowed,” as in the phrase So mote it be, meaning So may it be.

MOTHER COUNCIL OF THE WORLD. The Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America, which was organized in 1801, at Charleston, is called the Mother Council of the World, because from it have issued directly or indirectly all the other Supreme Councils of the Rite which are now in existence, or have existed since its organization.

MOTHER LODGE. In the eighteenth century certain Lodges in France and Germany assumed an independent position, and issued Charters for the constitution of Daughter Lodges, claiming the prerogatives of Grand Lodges. Thus we find the Mother Lodge of Marseilles, in France, which constituted
MOTION

Many Lodges. In Scotland the Lodge of Kilwinning took the title of Mother Lodge, and issued Charters until it was merged in the Grand Lodge of Scotland. The system is altogether irregular, and has no sanction in the laws of the Fraternity.

Perfect Sincerity Lodge, of Marseilles, France, was of English descent organized in 1767 as a Subordinate Lodge of the Grand Lodge of France and was a subordinate of the Grand Orient of France since the consolidation in 1806. Perfect Sincerity Lodge granted a Charter to Polar Star Lodge of New Orleans in 1796 and reported this action to the Grand Orient of France, which latter Body approved the course that had been taken and healed the work of Polar Star Lodge from the time they commenced working up to 1804, at which time the Grand Orient granted them a Charter. As Polar Star Lodge No. 4263, working under the Grand Orient of France, they continued to so operate until the organization of the Grand Lodge of Louisiana. These facts were obtained through a search caused by Post Office Inspector M. G. Price and given on page 248, Thomson Masonic Fraud. This Lodge and the one usually called the Mother Lodge of Marseilles or Mother Scotch Lodge of France, are sometimes confused. They are distinctly independent Bodies (see also Thory, Acta Latomorum, page 63; Ragon, Orthodoxie Maconnique, page 120, and Outline of the Rise and Progress of Freemasonry in Louisiana, James B. Scott. The particulars are to be found in the account of the Craft in Louisiana, Mackey’s revised History of Freemasonry, pages 1554–9).

MOTION. A motion when made by a member cannot be brought before the Lodge for deliberation unless it is seconded by another member. Motions are of two kinds, principal and subsidiary; a principal motion is one that presents an independent proposition for discussion. Subsidiary motions are those which are intended to affect the principal motion—such as to amend it, to lay it on the table, to postpone definitely or indefinitely, or to reconsider it, all of which tend to affect the principal motion—such as to which the motto belongs. Thus, in Ancient Craft Masonry, we have as mottoes the sentences, Ordo ab Chao, and Luz e tenebris; in Capitular Masonry, Holiness to the Lord; in Templar Masonry, In hoc signo vinces; in Scottish Masonry, Ne plus ultra is the motto of the Thirty-second; while the Thirty-third has for its motto Deus meumque Jus. All of these will be found with their signification and origin in their appropriate places in this work.

MOTTO. In imitation of the sentences appended to the Coats of Arms and seals of the Gilds and other societies, the Freemasons have for the different branches of their Order mottoes, which are placed on their banners or put at the head of their documents, which are expressive of the character and design, either of the whole Order or of the particular branch to which the motto belongs. Thus, in Ancient Craft Masonry, we have as mottoes the sentences, Ordo ab Chao, and Luz e tenebris; in Capitular Masonry, Holiness to the Lord; in Templar Masonry, In hoc signo vinces; in Scottish Masonry, Ne plus ultra is the motto of the Thirty-second; while the Thirty-third has for its motto Deus meumque Jus. All of these will be found with their signification and origin in their appropriate places in this work.

MOUND BUILDERS. Early inhabitants in the valleys of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers who seem to have had a civilization more enlightened than that of the aborigines first met by the white settlers. The mounds built by these people are scattered over the territory extending from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico and from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic Ocean. Many of these are in Ohio—some circular, others four and six-sided. Sometimes there are combinations of these and certain structures are known as altar mounds, small rounded heaps of earth having at the center a hollowed mass of hard clay showing the effects of fire and containing ashes and charcoal. The hollowed parts are from three to four feet in diameter. In Adams County, Ohio, between two branches of the Licking River, is a remarkable mound lying upon a narrow ridge and is in the form of a serpent, the jaws being wide open and measuring across some seventy-five feet. The body is about five feet high and behind the head about thirty feet across. The whole length is 1,348 feet and it covers an area of about four square miles and, following the curves of the body, the tail is arranged in a triple coil. In front of the head is an egg-shaped enclosure with a pile of stones at the center, and beyond this a somewhat indistinct form thought to represent an animal. There are other mounds representing birds, reptiles, and so on in Wisconsin, and the suggestion has been offered that these were of a totemic character and served as objects of worship and perhaps were regarded as the guardians of the villages. The conclusion of various authorities is that the Mound-Builders lived in the stone-age and had no knowledge of smelting, though they made many articles in beaten metals and from other materials. A study of the skulls indicates that they were not of one race.

MOUNT CAF. In the Mohammedan mythology, a fabulous mountain which encircles the earth. The home of the giants and fairies, and rests upon the sacred stone Sakhral, of which a single grain gives miraculous powers. It is of an emerald color, and its reflected light is the cause of the tints of the sky.

MOUNT CALVARY. See Calvary.

MOUNT MORIAH. See Moriah.

MOUNT SINAI. See Sinai.

MOURNING. The mourning color has been various in different times and countries. Thus, the Chinese mourn in white; the Turks in blue or in violet; the Egyptians in yellow; the Ethiopians in gray. In all the Degrees and Rites of Freemasonry, with a single exception black is the symbol of grief, and therefore the mourning color. But in the highest Degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite the mourning color, like that used by the former kings of France, is violet.

MOUTH TO EAR. The Freemason is taught by an expressive symbol, to whisper good counsel in his Brother’s ear, and to warn him of approaching danger. “It is a rare thing,” says Bacon, “except it be from a perfect and entire friend, to have counsel given that is not bowed and crooked to some ends which he hath that giveth it.” And hence, it is an admirable lesson, which Freemasonry here teaches us, to use the lips and the tongue only in the service of a Brother.

MOVABLE JEWELS. See Jewels of a Lodge.

MOZART, JOHANN CHRISTOSTOMUS WOLFGANG AMADEUS. A celebrated German composer and musician, born January 27, 1756, in Salzburg, and died December 5, 1791, in Vienna. Mozart’s father, Leopold, was a violinist of repute and gave his son early and splendid training. So much so, in fact, that at the age of five the young Mozart wrote an extremely difficult concerto for the harpsichord. At six he made his musical debut in Vienna; published his first sonatas for the harpsichord at seven years of age in Paris and at eight performed before the Court of England difficult compositions of Bach and Handel. In 1767 he received his first commission from the Emperor Joseph II at Vienna to write the music of a comic opera. This was written, but unfortunately was suppressed and never performed owing to the opposition of the court musicians. In 1769 Mozart went to Milan—then fourteen years of age—with the idea of finishing his education. Here he heard the Misericordia (usually meaning Psalm 51, but sometimes any penitential chant) once at Sistine Chapel and then wrote it down from memory, note for note. At that time even the singers were forbidden to transcribe the music of the Misericordia on pain of excommunication by the Pope, so this feat created a sensation and was so mighty an accomplishment that the Pope, on the return of Mozart to Rome, invested him with the Order of the Golden Spur, which honor had also been conferred upon Gluck not many years before. Mozart's first opera was written during his twentieth year, called Midrardites, and performed more than twenty times in succession. Following this he was appointed Composer to the Court. At the age of twenty-five he married Constance Weber.

All through Mozart's life he was harassed and handicapped by extreme poverty and his hardships and difficulties were greatly increased by Hieronymus, Count of Colloredo, a Roman Catholic Archbishop of Salzburg, to which office he was appointed at the death of a previous Archbishop who had rendered the young Mozart much assistance in the way of interest and help to Mozart's father during the earlier years of his training of his son. When Mozart was sixteen years old, Hieronymus summoned him and kept him in Salzburg without funds, refusing him permission to leave on a concert tour for the purpose of gaining some income to relieve the extreme financial stress which Mozart was suffering. This in spite of the fact that the position he held with Hieronymus was a purely honorary one without income. At twenty-one Mozart again sued for permission to resign this appointment, for which action he was insulted by the Archbishop "in terms too vulgar for translation." Mozart was buried in a pauper's grave. Van Swieten, Sussmayer and only three other friends planned to accompany him to the cemetery but even these turned back "because it rained." Sussmayer it was who finished the last composition written in part while on Mozart's death-bed, the Requiem, it being probable that he did so at Mozart's specific request.

Brother Herbert Bradley, Transactions, of Quatuor Coronati Lodge, volume xxvi, 1913, states that Mozart is said to have been initiated in Lodge Zur Wohltätigkeit, meaning Charity, in the autumn of 1754 and that other authorities state that he was initiated in the Lodge Zur Hoffnung or a Lodge Zur Gekronten Hoffnung, meaning Crowned Hope. As a matter of fact all these statements are in a measure true. Under the decree of the Emperor, of December 1, 1785, these Lodges were united into one Lodge. The words of Mozart's opening ode for the Lodge clearly illustrate these changes.

Opening Ode, Opus 483

Sing vestal lays to heav'n ascending, Fraterial voices blending
Sing our Protector's praise.
For in our brethren's hearts a triple fire he found.
And all our hope anew is crown'd.

Chorus:
Then loud let our chorus be swelling,
His praises forever forthtelling.
Who knitted more closely our band,
For merit this honor bestowed,
Has crown'd us with generous hand.

These, two, we praise, who watching o'er us,
Hold virtue'storch before us,
To heed them by bold emulation,
For in our brethren's hearts a triple fire he found.
So hush'd be the strains of our chorus till called to refreshment again.
Our thanks are yours for ever,
Who are the badge of office wearing,
Who are the badge of office wearing,
Upon the wings of truth ascending,
To wisdom's throne we may aspire.
So everyone will joy in bearing
To build with a will.

Closing Ode, Opus 484

Our thanks are yours for ever,
Who are the badge of office wearing,
Let virtue be your sole endeavor;
So everyone will joy in bearing
The chains that bind such brothers true,
Sweetening the cup of life anew.

Chorus:
And this obligation
We swear to fulfill,
Upon your foundation
To build with a will.
Then raise us ever higher
Upon the wings of truth ascending,
To wisdom's throne we may aspire.
That so our weary labors ending,
We may be worthy of her crown,
And rest where envy is unknown.

Chorus:
And this obligation
We swear to fulfill,
Upon your foundation
To build with a will.

The above translation is by Brother Orton Bradley, Transactions, of Quatuor Coronati Lodge (page 241 and page 263, volume xxvi, 1913).

Richard Koch in his treatise on Brother Mozart, Freimaurer und Illuminaten, 1911, says that Mozart's Mother Lodge had a library of 1,900 volumes, that it was a legally constituted Lodge, and that it had a laboratory in which lectures were given. The list of 1788 shows that the members of the united Lodge Zur Neugekronten Hoffnung consisted of one Ruling Prince, thirty-six Counts, one Marquis, fourteen Barons and forty-two Nobles, officers, Ambassadors Chamberlains, Prebendaries, Officials, etc.

Brother Bradley gives the following as the principal Masonic compositions of Brother Mozart:

Mozart

Die Gesellenreise, Opus 468, a Masonic song, composed March 26, 1785.

The Opening and Closing of the Lodge. Opus 483 and 484. These were probably composed for the first meetings of the Lodge of Neugekronten Hoffnung.

A short Cantata, Maurerfreude, Opus 471, for tenor and chorus, dated April 20, 1785, performed on the 24th of April, in honor of the metallurgist Von Born, at a spee which was probably written by Schikaneder, for two tenors and a bass, with orchestral accompaniment, Opus 623. This was written for the consecration of a Masonic Temple on November 15, 1791. It was the last finished composition of which Mozart conducted the performance. This contains as an appendix, a Hymn for closing of the Lodge, which was probably written by Schikaneder, at the consecration ceremony: "Today we consecrate this habitation for our temple, for the first time we gather within this new seat of knowledge and of virtue, and consecrate the works in chronological order, and the list of Masonic music should follow this plan, and run one, four, seven, two and three, six, eight, five. Three other works are supposed to have been intended for Masonic use; they are, an Adagio, in Canon form, for wind instruments, KV 411; and Adagio, also for wind instruments, KV 412, and a short Cantata, a hymn to the sun, Die Seele des Weltalls, KV 429. Libretto was by Schikaneder.

Brother Herbert Bradley on page 252 of the above Transactions of Quatuor Coronati Lodge says "It is impossible to describe the numbers of Mozart's works as Opus numbers. Mozart did not number his compositions, the numbers refer to the catalog compiled by Köchel and should be indicated K, KV, or Kochel, thus Die Zauberflöte, KV 620. Köchel endeavored to enumerate these works in chronological order, and the list of Masonic music should follow this plan, and run one, four, seven, two and three, six, eight, five. Three other works are supposed to have been intended for Masonic use; they are, an Adagio, in Canon form, for wind instruments, KV 411; and Adagio, also for wind instruments, KV 412, and a short Cantata, a hymn to the sun, Die Seele des Weltalls, KV 429. Libretto was by Schikaneder.

Brother Herbert W. Hunt on page 252 of the above Transactions of Quatuor Coronati Lodge says "The plot of the Magic Flute is now generally believed to be a book published in 1731 by the Abbé Terrasson named Sethos, described as a history of life drawn from the monuments of ancient Egypt. It contains a description of the initiation of Sethos, an Egyptian priest, into the mysteries of Egypt."

Brother Hubert W. Hunt on page 267 says in part, "A Masonic friend of Mozart of whom more might have been said is Franz Joseph Haydn, 1732 to 1809 the composer of the Creation, and of over one hundred and fifty symphonies and the father of the stringed quartet." The setting of the words "And there was light" in the opening chorus is worthy of remark. The Creation was composed 1796 to 1798.

Brother Bradley quotes the following translation from the oration made at the Lodge of Mourning held by the Freemasons in honor of Mozart. This oration was published in 1792 and sold for the benefit of Mozart's family—

*It has pleased the everlasting Master Builder to tear our beloved Brother from the chain of our brotherhood. Who did not know him? Who did not value him? Who did not love him, our worthy Brother, Mozart? Only a few weeks ago he stood in our midst, and with the magic tones added much beauty to the dedication of our Masonic Temple. Mozart's death brings irreparable loss to his art; his talents which were apparent in his earliest youth made him even then the greatest marvel of his time. Half Europe valued him. The great called him their favorite, Liebling, and we called him Brother. But while we must of necessity recall his powers in Art we must not forget the praise due to his great heart. He was a most enthusiastic follower of our Order. Love for his Brethren, sociability, enthusiasm for the good cause, charity, the true and deep feeling of pleasure when he was able by means of his talents to help one of his Brethren, were the chief features of his character. He was husband, father, friend to his friends, Brother to his Brethren. Only the wherewithal was wanted to hinder him from making hundreds happy, as his heart bade him." What more could be said of any Freemason?"

Mudge, R. C. Wrote Masonic poems and songs, 1819.

MueLLER, FRIEDERICh VON. German poet; friend of Brother Goethe; and member of Lodge Amalia, at Weimar, where he was initiated in 1809, becoming its Orator and Deputy Master. He composed some poetry and delivered the oration in honor of Wieland in 1813, and when the Lodge held its festival for the fifty years, Jubilee of the Grand Duke Charles Augustus of Saxe Weimar, 1825, he delivered the address. To the memory of Goethe shortly after, he made another address. Several of the selections are by him in the song book of the Lodge Amalia.

MuENTER, FRIEDERICh. Born in 1761, and died in 1830. He was Professor of Theology in the University of Copenhagen, and afterward Bishop of Seeland. He was the author of a treatise On the Symbols and Art Representations of the Early Christians. In 1794 he published his Statute Book of the Order of Knights Templar, the German title being Statutenbuch des Ordens der Tempelherren; a work which is one of the most valuable contributions that we have to the history of Templarism.

Multa Paucis Latin for much but few, a concise history of Freemasonry brought down to 1763 and published in England, probably in 1764, but without date or author's name with the title of The Complete Freemason or Multa Paucis for Lovers of Secrets. This book differs slightly from Doctor Anderson's history, one point of interest being the assertion that the Grand Lodge of England was organized in 1717 by six Lodges, not four.

MURAT, JOACHIM. Born in 1771, executed in 1815. The great cavalry general of Napoleon, and titular King of Naples. In 1803, he was appointed Senior Grand Warden in the Grand Orient of France. When the fifth Supreme Council of the World was established at Naples, on June 11, 1809, by the Supreme Council at Milan, a Concordat became necessary, and was executed May 3, 1811, between the Grand Orient, which was created June 24, 1809, and the Supreme Council of Naples, whereby the latter should have sole control over the Degrees beyond the eighteenth, in like manner as signified in the Concordat of France. King Joachim Murat accepted the supreme command of both Bodies. The change in his political surroundings allowed him no permanent rest.

MURAT, JOACHIM, PRINCE. Son of the King of Naples. Was appointed Grand Master of the Grand Orient of France, and initiated February 26, 1825. He resigned the office in 1861.

MURR, CHRISTOPH GOTTLIEB VON. A distinguished historical and archeological writer, who was born at Nuremberg, in 1733, and died April 8, 1811. In 1760 he published an Essay on the History of the Greek Tragic Poets, in 1777-82, six volumes of Antiquities of Herculaneum, and several other historical works. In 1803 he published an essay On the True Origin of the Orders of Rosicrucianism and Freemasonry, with an Appendix on the History of the Order of Templars. In this work, Murr attempts to trace Freemasonry to the times of Oliver Cromwell, and produces, or the Harmonic Triad. From the ruins of Nineveh we have countless representations of the harp, with strings varying from ten to twenty-six; the lyre, identical in structure with that of the Greeks; a harp-shaped instrument held horizontally, and the six to ten strings struck with a plectrum, which has been termed the Asor, from its resemblance to the Hebrew instrument of that name. There is also the guitar-shaped instrument, and a double pipe with a single mouthpiece and finger-holes on each pipe. The Assyrians used musical bells, trumpets, flutes, drums, cymbals, and tambourines. The Abyssinians call their lyre the Kissar the Greek name being, kithara. There is also the flute, called Monaulus, which is of great antiquity, and named by the Egyptians Pho- tins, or curved flute. The crooked horn or trumpet, called Bucicina, and the Cithara, held sacred in consequence of its shape being that of the Greek letter delta.

MUSCUS DOMUS. In the early lectures of the eighteenth century, the tradition is given, that certain Fellow Crafts, while pursuing their search, discovered a grave covered with green moss and turf, when they exclaimed, Muscus Domus, Deo gratias. Then a Freemason's grave came to be called Muscus Domus. But both the tradition and its application have become obsolete in the modern instructions.

MUSIC. One of the seven liberal arts and sciences, whose beauties are inculcated in the Fellow Craft's Degree. Music is recommended to the attention of Freemasons, because as the “concord of sweet sounds” elevates the generous sentiments of the soul, so should the concord of good feeling reign among the Brethren, that by the union of friendship and brotherly love the boisterous passions may be lulled and harmony exist throughout the Craft.
MYSTAGOGUE. The one who presided at the Ancient Mysteries, and explained the sacred things to the candidate. He was also called the hierophant. The word, which is Greek, signifies literally one who makes or conducts an initiate.

MYSTERIES, ANCIENT. Each of the Pagan gods, says Warburton (Divine Legation I, ii, 4), had, besides the public and open, a secret worship paid to him, to which none were admitted but those who had been selected by preparatory ceremonies called Initiation. This secret worship was termed the Mysteries. And this is supported by Strabo (book x, chapter 3) who says that it was common, both to the Greeks and the Barbarians, to perform their religious ceremonies with the observance of a festival, and that they are sometimes celebrated publicly, and sometimes in mysterious privacy.

As to their origin, Warburton is probably not wrong in his statement that the first of which we have any account are those of Isis and Osiris in Egypt; for although those of Mithras came into Europe from Persia, they were, it is supposed, carried from Egypt by Zoroaster. The most important of these Mysteries were the Osiric in Egypt, the Mithraic in Persia, the Cabiric in Thrace, the Adonisian in Syria, the Dionysiac and Eleusinian in Greece, the Scandinavian among the Gothic nations, and the Druidical among the Celts.

In all these Mysteries we find a singular unity of design, clearly indicating a common origin, and a purity of doctrine as evidently proving that this common origin was not to be sought for in the popular theology of the Pagan world. The ceremonies of initiation were all funeral in their character. They celebrated the death and the resurrection of some cherished being, either the object of esteem as a hero, or of devotion as a god. Subordination of Degrees was instituted, and the candidate was subjected to probation varying in their character and severity; the rites were practised in the darkness of night, and often amid the gloom of impenetrable forests or subterranean caverns; and the full fruition of knowledge, for which so much labor was endured, and so much danger incurred, was not attained until the aspirant, well tried and thoroughly purified, had reached the place of wisdom and of light.

These Mysteries undoubtedly owed their origin to the desire to establish esoteric philosophy, in which should be withheld from popular approach those sublime truths which it was supposed could only be entrusted to those who had been previously prepared for their reception. Whence these doctrines were originally derived it would be impossible to say; but Doctor Mackey was disposed to accept Creuzer's hypothesis of an ancient and highly instructed body of priests, having their origin either in Egypt or in the East, from whom was derived religious, physical, and historical knowledge, under the veil of symbols.

By this confinement of these doctrines to a system of secret knowledge, guarded by the most rigid rites, could they only expect to preserve them from the superstitions, innovations, and corruptions of the world as it then existed. "The distinguished few," says Brother Oliver (History of Initiation, page 2), "who retained their fidelity, uncontaminated by the contagion of evil example, would soon be able to estimate the superior benefits of an isolated institution, which afforded the advantage of a select society, and kept at an unapproachable distance the profane scoffer, whose presence might pollute their pure devotions and social converse, by contumelious language or unholy mirth." And doubtless the prevention of this intrusion, and the preservation of these sublime truths, was the original object of the institution of the ceremonies of initiation, and the adoption of other means by which the initiated could be recognized, and the uninstructed excluded. Such was the opinion of Warburton, who says that "the Mysteries were at first the retreats of sense and virtue, till time corrupted them."

The Abbé Robin in a learned work on this subject entitled Recherches sur les Initiations Anciennes et Modernes (Paris, 1870), places the origin of the initiations at that remote period when crimes first began to appear upon earth. The vicious, he remarks, were urged by the terror of guilt to seek among the virtuous intercessors with the Deity. The latter, retiring into solitude to avoid the contagion of growing corruption, devoted themselves to a life of contemplation and the cultivation of several of the useful sciences. The periodical return of the seasons, the revolution of the stars, the productions of the earth, and the various phenomena of nature, studied with attention, rendered them useful guides to men, both in their pursuits of industry and in their social duties. These recusant students invented certain signs to recall to the remembrance of the people the times of their festivals and of their rural labors, and hence the origin of the symbols and hieroglyphs that were in use among the priests of all nations. Having now become guides and leaders of the people, these sages, in order to select as associates of their learned labors and sacred functions only such as had sufficient merit and capacity, appointed strict courses of trial and examination, and this, our author thinks, must have been the source of the initiations of antiquity. The Magi, Brahmins, Gymnosophists, Druids, and priests of Egypt, lived thus in sequestered habitations and subterranean caves, and obtained great reputation by their discoveries in astronomy, chemistry, and mechanics, by their purity of morals, and by their knowledge of the science of legislation. It was in these schools, says M. Robin, that the first sages and legislators of antiquity were formed, and in them he supposes the doctrines taught to have been the unity of God and the immortality of the soul; and it was from these Mysteries, and their symbols and hieroglyphs, that the exuberant fancy of the Greeks drew much of their mythology.

Warburton deduces from the ancient writers—from Cicero and Porphyry, from Origen and Celsus, and from others—what was the true object of the Mysteries. They taught the dogma of the unity of God in opposition to the polytheistic notions of the people, and in connection with this the doctrine of a future life, and that the initiated should be happier in that state than all other mortals; that while the souls of the profane, at their leaving the body, stuck fast in mire and filth and remained in darkness, the souls of the initiated winged their flight directly to the happy islands and the habitations of the gods.

"Thrice happy they," says Sophocles, "who descended to the shades below after having beheld these Rites; for they alone have life in Hades, while all others suffer there every kind of evil." And Isocrates declares that "those who have been initiated in the Mysteries, entertain better hopes both as to the end of life and the whole of futurity."

Others of the ancients have given us the same testimony as to their esoteric character. "All the Mysteries," says Plutarch, "refer to a future life and to the state of the soul after death." In another place, addressing his wife, he says, "We have been instructed in the religious Rites of Dionysius, that the soul is immortal, and that there is a future state of existence."

Cicero tells us that, in the Mysteries of Ceres at Eleusis, the initiated were taught to live happily and to die in the hope of a blessed futurity. And, finally, Plato informs us that the hymns of Musaeus, which were sung in the Mysteries, celebrated the rewards and pleasures of the virtuous in another life, and the punishments which awaited the wicked. These sentiments, so different from the debased polytheism which prevailed among the uninitiated, are the most certain evidence that the mysteries arose from a purer source than that which gave birth to the religion of the vulgar.

We must not pass unnoticed Faber's notion of their arkite origin. Finding, as he did, a prototype for every ancient cultus in the ark of Noah, it is not surprising that he should apply his theory to the Mysteries. Faber says (Origin of Pagan Idolatry II, iv, 5):

The initiations into the mysteries scenically represented the mystic descent into Hades and the return from thence to the light of day, by which was meant the entrance into the ark and the subsequent liberation from its dark enclosure. They all equally related to the allegorical disappearance, or death, or descent of the great father, at their commencement; and his invention, or revival, or return from Hades, at their conclusion.

Dollinger (Gentile and Jew i, 126) says, speaking of the Mysteries:

The whole was a drama, the prelude to which consisted in purifications, sacrifices, and injunctions with regard to the behavior to be observed. The adventures of certain deities, their sufferings and joys, their appearance on earth, and relations to mankind, their death, or descent to the nether world, their return, or their rising again—all these, as symbolizing the life of nature, were represented in the most splendid and connected series of theatrical scenes. These representations, tacked on to a nocturnal solemnity, brilliantly got up, particularly at Athens, with all the resources of art and sensual beauty, and accompanied with dancing and song, were eminently calculated to take a powerful hold on the imagination and the heart, and to excite in the spectators alternately conflicting sentiments of terror, and calm, sorrow, and fear, and hope. They worked upon them, now by agitating, now by soothing, and meanwhile had a strong bearing upon susceptibilities and capacities of individuals, according as their several dispositions inclined them more to reflection and observation, or to a resigned credulity.

Bunsen (God in History II, book iv, chapter 6), gives the most recent and the most philosophic idea of the character of the Mysteries:

They did indeed exhibit to the initiated coarse physical symbols of the generative powers of Nature, and of the universal Nature herself, eternally, self-sustaining through all transformations; but the religious element of the Mysteries consisted in the relations of the universe to the soul, more especially after death. Thus, even without philosophic proof, we are justified in assuming that the Mysteries served by the most powerful sanctions. An oath of secrecy was administered in the most solemn form to the initiate, and to violate it was considered a sacrilegious crime, the prescribed punishment for which was immediate death, and we have at least one instance in Livy of the infliction of the penalty. The ancient writers were, therefore, extremely reluctant to approach the subject, and Lobbeck gives, in his Aglaophamus (volume i, appendix 131, 151; ii, 12, 87), several examples of the cautious manner in which they shrank from divulging or discussing any explanation of a symbol which had been interpreted to them in the course of initiation. I would forbid, says Horace (Epistles iii, Odes 2, 26), that man who would divulge the sacred Rites of mysterious Ceres from being under the same roof with me, or from setting sail with me in the same precarious bark.

On the subject of their relation to the Rites of Freemasonry, to which they bear in many respects so remarkable a resemblance, that some connection seems necessarily implied, there are five principal theories.

The first is that embraced and taught by Doctor Oliver, namely, that they are but deviations from that common source, both of them and of Freemasonry, the patriarchal mode of worship established by God himself. With this pure system of truth, he supposes the science of Freemasonry to have been coeval and identified. But the truths thus revealed by divinity came at length to be doubted or rejected through the imperfection of human reason, and though the visible symbols were retained in the Mysteries of the Pagan world, their true interpretation was lost.

There is a second theory which, leaving the origin of the Mysteries to be sought in the patriarchal doctrines, where Brother Oliver has placed it, finds the connection between them and Freemasonry commencing at the building of King Solomon's Temple. Over the construction of this building, Hiram, the Architect of Tyre, presided. At Tyre the Mysteries of Bacchus had been introduced by the Dionysian Artificers, and into their fraternity Hiram, in all probability, had, it is necessarily suggested, been admitted. Freemasonry, whose tenets had always existed in purity among the immediate descendants of the patriarchs, added now to its doctrines the guard of secrecy, which, as Doctor Oliver himself remarks, was necessary to preserve them from perversion or pollution.

A third theory has been advanced by the Abbé Robin, in which he connects Freemasonry indirectly with the Mysteries, through the intervention of the Crusaders. In the work already cited, he attempts to deduce, from the ancient initiations, the orders of chivalry, whose branches, he says, produced the Institution of Freemasonry.

A fourth theory, and this has been advanced by the Rev. C. W. King in his treatise On the Gnostics, is that as some of them, especially those of Mithras, were extended beyond the advent of Christianity, and even to the very commencement of the Middle Ages, they were seized upon by the secret societies of that period as a model for their organization, and that through these latter they are to be traced to Freemasonry.

But perhaps, after all, the truest theory is that which would discard all successive links in a supposed chain of descent from the Mysteries to Freemasonry, and would attribute their close resemblance to a natural coincidence of human thought. The legend of the Third Degree, and the legends of the Eleusinian, the Càbric, the Dionysian, the Adonic, and all the other Mysteries, are identical in their object to teach the reality of a future life; and this lesson is taught in all by the use of the same symbolism, and, substantially, the same scenic representation. And this is not because the Masonic Rites are a lineal succession from the Ancient Mysteries, but because there has been at all times an aptness of the human heart to nourish this belief in a future life, and the promeness of the human mind to clothe this belief in a symbolic dress. And if there is any other more direct connection between them it must be sought for in the Roman Colleges of Artificers, who did, most probably, exercise some influence over the rising Freemasons of the early ages, and who, as the contemporaries of the Mysteries, were, we may well suppose, imbued with something of their organization. We conclude with a notice of their ultimate fate. They continued to flourish until long after the Christian era; but they at length degenerated. In the fourth century, Christianity had begun to triumph. The Pagans, desirous of making converts, threw open the hitherto inaccessible portals of their mysterious rites. The strict scrutiny of the candidate’s past life, and the demand for proofs of irrefragable conduct, were no longer deemed indispensable. The vile and the vicious were indiscriminately admitted to participate in privileges which were once granted only to the noble and the virtuous. The sun of Paganism was setting, and its rites had become contemptible and corrupt. Their character was entirely changed, and the initiations were indiscriminately sold by peddling priests, who wandered through the country, to every applicant who was willing to pay a trifling fee for that which had once been refused to the candidates of a monarch. At length these abominations attracted the attention of the emperors, and Constantinople and Gratian forbade their celebration by night, excepting, however, from these edicts, these initiations at Eleusis. But finally Theodosius, by a general edict of proscription, ordered the whole of the Pagan Mysteries to be abolished, in the four hundred and thirty-eighth year of the Christian era, and eighteen hundred years after their first establishment in Greece.

Clavel, however, says that they did not entirely cease until the era of the restoration of learning, and that during a part of the Middle Ages the Mysteries of Diana, under the name of the Courses of Diana, and those of Pan under that of the Sabbats, were practised in country places. But these were really only certain superstitious rites connected with the belief in witchcraft. The Mysteries of Mithras, which, continually attacked by the Fathers of the Church, lived until the beginning of the fifth century, were the last of the old mysteries which had once exercised so much influence over the Pagan world and the Pagan religions. Doctor Mackey’s conclusions in the preceding article have not been materially weakened by later writers. Some additions may be made to support his position and briefly increase the amount of information he has submitted. The word Mystery must here be strictly reserved for these ancient religious rites of the Greeks and Romans, the name coming from two Greek words, the one meaning an initiate, and the other to close the mouth. There is another word Mystery, or Mysteria, meaning a trade, and in the opinion of Professor Skeat applied to the medieval plays because they were performed by the Craftsman (see Mystery).

So far as the Mysteries of antiquity have especial interest to us in the relation of their ceremonies to those of Freemasonry, we are compelled to obtain our knowledge rather by inference, more or less remote, than otherwise. What we know of the initiations and of the ritualistic instructions is limited by the very same concealment that in these modern times reserves such information from the profane, those without the fold. Yet here and there we catch a glint and a glow of the inner light that radiated from these centers of such wisdom as in that day and era was at the service of the candidates. There were peculiar resemblances to prove anew to us that profound initiation moves on parallel lines in all the ages. Only those specially prepared might join in the solemn rites, only then after probation and purification, in charge of a guide and instructor who led the candidate on to further light. There was more than prayer and sacrifice, there was communication, some explanation, a revelation, an investiture probably as spiritual as it was a material one, and at least something stronger than a suggestion appears to us that the whole ceremonial included a dramatic conception of a sacred play.

We readily see from the writers of the time how glowing was the poetic ritual. From certain hints we can get an inkling of the ceremonies, in fact there is a trace of two Degrees, one preliminary to the other. There is also an intimation of a rebirth, holy objects and scenes were shown, the brotherhood breaking of bread together, a common partaking of food, the illuminating use of symbolism here and there, the instruction to be remembered for a life of contemplation and a hereafter of happiness, these were in all probability impressed as we can reasonably infer by splendor.
of stagecraft, regal raiment, stately action, the solemn solace of holy sacraments. That there were Mysteries less creditable than others from our modern standpoint is doubtless true, just as all secret societies are not the same today in merit. Secrecy then and now does not always mean sufficiency. Nevertheless, we may well glean and study such fragments of worth as are thus available from the scanty records of these our forerunners of Freemasonry. For further information consult Brother Golbert d’Alviella’s Eleusis; Andrew Lang’s Myth, Ritual and Religion, Doctor Jevons’ Introduction to the Study of Religion, Franz Cumont’s Mysteries of Mithra, Dudley Wright’s Eleusinian Mysteries, and the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Passages from classical literature relative to the Mysteries are found in C. A. Lobeck’s Aglaophamus, and L. R. Farnell’s Cults of the Greek States.

MYSTERIES, MEXICAN. Instituted among the Mexicans, Aztecs, and were of a sacred nature. The adherents adopted the worship of some special deity, Quetzalcoati, the Mexican Saviour, under secret rites, and rendered themseles seclusive. A similar Order was that called Tlamacazajotl, also the Order known as Telpochitizli. It is understood that under the sway of the Aztecs, the Mexican Mysteries had some Masonic affinities (see Aztec Writings).

MYSTERY. From the Greek μυστήριον, compound word meaning an initiate and a secret, something to be concealed. The Gilds or Companies of the Middle Ages, out of which we trace the Masonic organization, were called mysteries, because they had trade-secrets, the preservation of which was a primary ordination of these fraternities. “Mystery” and “Craft” came thus to be synonymous words. In this secondary sense we speak of the “Mystery of the Stone-Masons” as equivalent to the “Craft of the Stone-Masons.”

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations (volume i, page 126), refers to the old stipulation that unless he had served an apprenticeship to it of seven years, “it was enacted, that no person should for the future exercise any trade, craft, or mystery.” But the Mystery of Freemasonry refers rather to the primary meaning of the word as immediately derived from the Greek (see Mysteries).

MYSTES. From the Greek μυστής, to shut the eyes. One who had been initiated into the Lesser Mysteries of Paganism. He was now blind; but when he was initiated into the Greater Mysteries, he was called an Epopt, or one who saw. The Mystes was permitted to proceed no farther than the vestibule or porch of the temple. To the Epopts only was accorded the privilege of admission to the adytum or sanctuary. A female initiate was called a Mystis.

MYSTICAL. A word applied to any language, symbol, or ritual which is understood only by the initiated. The word was first used by the priests to describe their mysterious rites, and then borrowed by the philosophers to be applied to the inner, esoteric doctrines of their schools. In this sense we speak of the mystical doctrines of Speculative Freemasonry. Suidas derives the word from the Greek μυστής, to close, and especially to close the lips. Hence the mystical is that about which the mouth should be closed.

MYSTIC CROWN, KNIGHTS AND COMPANIONS OF THE. A Society formed by the adherents of Mesmer, in August, 1787, of a beneficent, nonpolitical, and nonsectarian nature, to which Master Masons only were admitted.

MYSTICISM. A word applied in religious phraseology to any views or tendencies which aspire to more direct communication between God and man by the inward perception of the mind than can be obtained through revelation. “Mysticism,” says Vaughan (Hours with the Mystics i, 19), “presents itself in all its phases as more or less the religion of internal as opposed to external revelation—of heated feeling, sickly sentiment, or lawless imagination, as opposed to that reasonable belief in which the intellect and the heart, the inward witness and the outward, are alike engaged.” The Pantheism of some of the ancient philosophers and of the modern Spinozists, the Speculations of the Neoplatonists, the Anabaptism of Munster, the system of Jacob Behmen, the Quietism of Madame Guyon, the doctrines of the Bavarian Illuminati, and the reveries of Swedenborg, all partake more or less of the spirit of mysticism. The Germans have two words, mystik and mysticismus—the former of which they use in a favorable, the latter in an unfavorable sense. Mysticism is with them only another word for Pantheism, between which and Atheism there is but little difference. Hence a belief in mysticism is with the German Freemasons a disqualification for initiation into the Masonic rites. Thus the second article of the Statutes of the Grand Lodge of Hanover prescribes that “ein Freimaurer muss vom Mysticismus und Atheismus gleich weit entfernt stehen,” that is, “a Freemason must be equally distant from Mysticism and Atheism.” Gädicke, Freimaurer-Lexicon, thus expresses the German sentiment: “Etwas mystisches sollte wohl jeder Mensch seyn, aber man hüte sich vor groben Mysticismus,” that is, “Every man ought to be somewhat mystical, but should guard against coarse mysticism.”

MYSTIC ORDER VEILED PROPHETS OF THE ENCHANTED REALM. See Grotto.

MYSTIC TIE. That sacred and inviolable bond which unites men of the most discordant opinions into one band of brothers, which gives but one language to men of all nations and one altar to men of all religions, is properly, from the mysterious influence it exerts, denominted the mystic tie, and Freemasons, because they alone are under its influence, or enjoy its benefits, are called “Brethren of the Mystic Tie.”

The expression was used by Brother Robert Burns in his farewell to the Brethren of Saint James Lodge, Tarbolton, Scotland, Adieu! a heart-warm, fond adieu!

Drear Brothers of the mystic tie!
Ye favored, ye enlightened few,
Companions of my social joy!

Brother A. Glass, Ayr Operative Lodge, No. 138, has also in the Freemason (August 5, 1871), later used the expression effectively thus in allusion to Brother Burns himself:

His was the keen prophetic eye,
Could see afar the glorious birth
Of that great power, whose mystic tie,
Shall make “One Lodge” of all the earth.

MYTH. The word myth, from the Greek μῦθος, a story, in its original acceptation, signified simply a statement or narrative of an event, without any necessary implication of truth or falsehood; but, as the word is now used, it conveys the idea of a personal narrative of remote date, which, although not necessarily untrue, is certified only by the internal evidence of the tradition itself. This definition, which is substantially derived from George Grote (History of Greece, volume i, page 295), may be applied without modification to the myths of Freemasonry, although intended by the author only for the myths of the ancient Greek religion.

The myth, then, is a narrative of remote date, not necessarily true or false, but whose truth can only be certified by internal evidence. The word was first applied to those fables of the Pagan gods which have descended from the remotest antiquity, and in all of which there prevails a symbolic idea, not always, however, capable of a positive interpretation. As applied to Freemasonry, the words myth and legend are synonymous. From this definition it will appear that the myth is really only the interpretation of an idea. But how we are to read these myths will best appear from these noble words of Max Muller (Science of Language, second series, page 578), “Everything is true, natural, significant, if we enter with a reverent spirit into the meaning of ancient art and ancient language. Everything becomes false, miraculous, and unmeaning, if we interpret the deep and mighty words of the seers of old in the shallow and feeble sense of modern chroniclers.”

A fertile source of instruction in Freemasonry is to be found in its traditions and mythical legends; not only those which are incorporated into its ritual and are exemplified in its ceremonies, but those also which, although forming no part of the Lodge Lectures, have been orally transmitted as portions of its history, and which, only within a comparatively recent period, have been committed to writing. But for the proper appreciation of these traditions some preparatory knowledge of the general character of Masonic myths is necessary. If all the details of these traditions be considered as asserted historical facts, seeking to convey nothing more nor less than historical information, then the improbabilities and anachronisms, and other violations of historical truth which distinguish many of them, must cause them to be rejected by the scholar as absurd impostures. But there is another and a more advantageous view in which these traditions are to be considered. Freemasonry is a symbolic institution—everything in and about it is symbolic—and nothing more eminently so than its traditions.

Although some of them—as, for instance, the Legend of the Third Degree—have in all probability a deep substratum of truth lying beneath, over this there is superposed a beautiful structure of symbolism. History has, perhaps, first suggested the tradition; but then the legend, like the myths of the ancient poets, becomes a symbol, which is to enunciate some sublime philosophical or religious truth. Read in this way, and in this way only, the myths and legends of Freemasonry will become interesting and instructive (see Legend).

MYTH, HISTORICAL. A historical myth is a myth that has a known and recognized foundation in historical truth, but with the admixture of a preponderating amount of fiction in the introduction of personages and circumstances. Between the historical myth and the mythical history, the distinction cannot always be preserved, because we are not always able to determine whether there is a preponderance of truth or of fiction in the legend or narrative under examination.

MYTHICAL HISTORY. A myth or legend, in which the historical and truthful greatly preponderate over the inventions of fiction, may be called a mythical history. Certain portions of the Legend of the Third Degree have such a foundation in fact that they constitute a mythical history, while other portions, added evidently for the purposes of symbolism, are simply a historical myth.

MYTHOLOGY. Literally, this word means the science of myths; and this is a very appropriate definition, for mythology is the science which treats of the religion of the ancient Pagans, which was almost altogether founded on myths or popular traditions and legendary tales; and hence Keightly (Mythology of Ancient Greece and Italy, page 2), says that “mythology may be regarded as the repository of the early religion of the people.” Its interest to a Masonic student arises from the constant antagonism that existed between its doctrines and those of the Primitive Freemasonry of antiquity and the light that the mythological mysteries throw upon the ancient organization of Speculative Freemasonry.

MYTH, PHILOSOPHICAL. This is a myth or legend that is almost wholly unhistorical, and which has been invented only for the purpose of enunciating and illustrating a particular thought or dogma. The Legend of Euclid in the manuscripts of our ancient Craft is clearly a philosophical myth.
NAAMAH. The daughter of Lamech and sister of Tubal-cain (see Genesis iv, 18-24, and 29, which have been read as meaning two different persons but now usually understood as of the same list). To her the Legend of the Craft attributes the invention of the art of weaving, and she is united with her three brothers, by the same legend, in the task of inscribing the several sciences on two pillars, that the knowledge of them might be preserved after the Flood.

NAHARDA, BROTHERHOOD OF. After the destruction of the Solomonial Temple, the captives formed an association while slaves at Naharda, on the Euphrates, and are there said to have preserved the secret mysteries.

Naked. In Scriptural symbology, nakedness denoted sin, and clothing, protection. But the symbolism of Freemasonry on this subject is different. There, to be “neither naked nor clothed” is to make no claim through worldly wealth or honors to pre- ferment in Freemasonry, where nothing but internal merit, which is unaffected by the outward appearance of the body, is a recommendation for admission.

NAME OF GOD. A reverential allusion to the name of God, in some especial and peculiar form, is to be found in the doctrines and ceremonies of almost all nations. This ineffable or unutterable name was respected by the Jews under the sacred form of the word Jehovah. Among the Druids, the three letters I. O. W. constituted the name of Deity. They were never pronounced, says Giralinus Cambrensis, but another and less sacred name was substituted for them. Each letter was a name in itself. The first is the Word, at the utterance of which in the beginning the world burst into existence; the second is the Word, whose sound still continues, and by which all things remain forever approaching to the immediate presence of the Deity. The analogy between this and the past, present and future significations contained in the Jewish Tetragrammaton will be evident.

Among the Mohammedans there is a science called Ism Allah, or the science of the name of God. "They pretend," says Niebuhr, "that God is the lock of this science, and Mohammed the key; that, consequently, none but Mohammedans can attain it; that it discovers what passes in different countries; that it familiarizes the possessors with the genii, who are at the command of the initiated, and who instruct them; that it places the winds and the seasons at their disposal, and heals the bites of serpents, the lame, the maimed, and the blind."

In the chapter of the Koran entitled Aræaf, it is written: "God has many excellent names. Invoke him by these names, and separate yourselves from them who give him false names." The Mohammedans believe that God has ninety-nine names, which, with that of Allah, makes one hundred; and, therefore, their chaplets or rosaries are composed of one hundred beads, at each of which they invoke one of these names; and there is a tradition, that whoever frequently makes this invocation will find the gates of Paradise open to him. With them Allah is the Ism al adhem, the Great Name, and they bestow upon it all the miraculous virtues which the Jews give to the Tetragrammaton. This, they say, is the name that was engraven on the stone which Japheth gave to his children to bring down rain from heaven; and it was by virtue of this name that Noah made the ark float on the waters, and governed it at will, without the aid of oars or rudder.

Among the Hindus there was the same veneration of the name of God, as is evinced in their treatment of the mystical name Aum. The "Institutes of Menu" continually refer to the peculiar efficacy of this word, of which it is said, "All rites ordained in the Veda, oblations to fire, and solemn sacrifices pass away; but that which passes not away is the syllable Aum, thence called aisbara, since it is a symbol of God, the Lord of created beings."

There was in every ancient nation a sacred name given to the highest god of its religious faith, besides the epithets of the other and subordinate deities. The old Aryans, the founders of our race, called their chief god Dyaus, and in the Vedas we have the invocation to Dyaus Pitar, which is the same as the Greek Zev πατηρ, and the Latin, Jupiter, all meaning the Heaven-Father, and at once reminding us of the Christian invocation to "Our Father which art in heaven."

There is one incident in the Hindu mythology which shows how much the old Indian heart yearned after this expression of the nature of Deity by a name. There was a nameless god, to whom, as the "source of golden light," there was a worship. This is expressed in one of the Veda hymns, where the invocation in every stanza closes with the exclamation, "Who is the god to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?" Now, says Bunsen (God in History i, 302), "the Brahmanic expositors must needs find in every hymn the name of a god who is invoked in it, and so, in this case, they have actually invented a grammatical divinity, the god Who." What more pregnant testimony could we have of the tendency of man to seek a knowledge of the Divine nature in the expression of a name?

The Assyrians worshiped Assur, or Asarac, as their chief god. On an obelisk, taken from the palace of Nimrod, we find the inscription, "to Asarac, the Great Lord, the King of all the great gods."

Of the veneration of the Egyptians for the name of their supreme god, we have a striking evidence in the writings of Herodotus, the Father of History, as he has been called, who, during a visit to Egypt, was initiated into the Osirian mysteries. Speaking of these initiations, he says (book ii, chapter 171), "the Egyptians represent by night his sufferings, whose name I refrain from mentioning." It was no more lawful among the Egyptians than it was among the Jews, to give utterance aloud to that Holy Name.

At Byblos the Phenicians worshiped Eliun, the Most High God. From him was descended El, whom Philo identifies with Saturn, and to whom he traces the Hebrew Elohim. Of this El, Max Muller says that there was undeniably a primitive religion of the whole Semitic race, and that the Strong One in Heaven was invoked under this name by the ancestors of the Semitic races, before there were Babylonians in Babylonia, Phenicians in Sidon and Tyre, or Jews in Mesopotamia and Jerusalem. If so, then the Mosaic adoption of Jehovah, with its more precise teaching of the Divine essence, was a step in the progress to the knowledge of the Divine Truth.

In China there is an infinite variety of names of elemental powers, and even of ancestral spirits, who are worshiped as subordinate deities; but the ineffable name is Tien, compounded of the two signs for great and one, and which, the Imperial Dictionary tells us, signifies "The Great One—He that dwells on high, and regulates all below."

Drummond (Origines) claimed that Abaur was the name of the Supreme Deity among the ancient Chaldeans. It is evidently the Hebrew התantor, and signifies "The Father of Light."

The Scandinavians had twelve subordinate gods, but their chief or supreme deity was Al-Fathr, or the All Father.

Even among the Red Men of America we find the idea of an invisible deity, whose name was to be venerated. Garcilasso de la Vega tells us that while the Peruvians paid public worship to the sun, it was but as a symbol of the Supreme Being, whom they called, Pachacarmac, a word meaning the soul of the world, and which was so sacred that it was spoken only with extreme dread.

The Jews had, besides the Tetragrammaton or four-lettered name, two others: one consisting of twelve and the other of forty-two letters. But Maimonides, in his More Nevochim (part i, cxiii), remarks that it is impossible to suppose that either of these constituted a single name, but that each must have been composed of several words, which must, however, have been significant in making man approximate to a knowledge of the true essence of God. The Cabalistical book called the Sohar confirms this when it tells us that there are ten names of God mentioned in the Bible, and that when these ten names are combined into one word, the number of the letters amounts to forty-two. But the Talmudists, although they did not throw around the forty-two-lettered name the sanctity of the Tetragrammaton, prescribed that it should be communicated only to men of middle age and of virtuous habits, and that its knowledge would confirm them as heirs of the future as well as the present life. The twelve-lettered name, although once common, became afterward occult; and when, on the death of Simon I, the priests ceased to use the Tetragrammaton, they were accustomed to bless the people with the name of twelve letters. Maimonides very wisely rejects the idea that any power was derived from these letters or their pronunciation, and claims that the only virtue of the names consisted in the holy ideas expressed by the words of which they were composed.

Lanzi extends his list of names to twenty-six, which, with their signification, are as follows:

At. Aleph and Tau, that is, Alpha and Omega. A name figurative of the Tetragrammaton.

Thoh. Eternal, absolute principle of creation.

Hoh. Destruction, the male and female principle, the author and regulator of time and motion.

Jah. Lord and remunerator.

Nel. The Most Sublime.

Like the Mohammedan Ism Allah, Freemasonry presents us as its most important feature with this science of the names of God. But here it elevates itself above Talmudical and Rabbinical reveries, and becomes a symbol of Divine Truth. The names of God were undoubtedly intended originally to be a means of communicating the knowledge of God himself. The name was, from its construction and its literal powers, used to give some idea, however scanty, in early times, of the true nature and essence of the Deity. The Ineffable Name was the symbol of the unutterable sublimity and perfection of truth which emanate from the Supreme God, while the subordinate names were symbols of the subordinate manifestations of truth. Freemasonry has availed itself of this system, and, in its reverence for the Divine Name, indicates its desire to attain to that truth as the ultimate object of all its labor. The significant words of the Masonic system, which describe the names of God wherever they are found, are not intended merely as words of recognition, but as indices, pointing—like the Symbolic Ladder of Jacob of the First Degree, or the Winding Stairs of the Second, or the Three Gates of the Third—the way of progress from darkness to light, from ignorance to knowledge, from the lowest to the highest conceptions of Divine Truth. And this is, after all, the real object of all Masonic science.

NAMES OF LODGES. The precedence of Lodges does not depend on their names, but on their numbers.
The rule declaring that "the precedency of Lodges is grounded on the seniority of their Constitution" was adopted on the 27th of December, 1727 (Constitutions, 1738, page 154). The number of the Lodge, therefore, by which its precedency is established, is always to be given by the Grand Lodge. In England, Lodges do not appear to have received distinctive names before the latter part of the eighteenth century. Up to that period the Lodges were distinguished simply by their numbers. Thus, in the first edition of the Book of Constitutions, published in 1723, we find a list of twenty Lodges, registered by their numbers, from No. 1 to No. 20, inclusive. Subsequently, they were further designated by the name of the tavern at which they held their meetings. Thus, in the second edition of the same work, published in 1738, we meet with a list of one hundred and six Lodges, designated sometimes, singularly enough, as Lodge No. 6, at the Rummer Tavern, in Queen Street; No. 84, at the Black Dog, in Castle Street; or No. 98, at the Bacchus Tavern, in Little Bush Lane. With such names and localities, we are not to wonder that the "three small glasses of punch," of which Doctor Oliver so feelingly speaks in his Book of the Lodge, were duly appreciated; nor, as he admits, that "there were some Brethren who displayed an anxiety to have the allowance increased." In 1766 we read of four Lodges that were erased from the Register, under the similar designations of the Globe, Fleet Street; the Red Cross Inn, Southwark; No. 85, at the George, Ironmongers' Lane and the Mercers Arms, Mercers Street. To only one of these, it will be perceived, was a number annexed. The name and locality of the tavern was presumed to be a sufficient distinction. It was not until about the close of the eighteenth century, as has been already observed, that we find distinctive names beginning to be given to the Lodges; and hence we have, in 1734, Saint John's Lodge, at Boston; a Solomon's Lodge, in 1735, at both Charleston and Savannah; and a Union Kilwinning, in 1764, at the former place.

This brief historical digression will serve as an examination of the rules which should govern all founders in the choice of Lodge names. The first and most important rule is that the name of a Lodge should be technically significant; that is, it must allude to some Masonic fact or characteristic; in other words, there must be something Masonic about it. Under this rule, all names derived from obscure or unmasonic localities should be rejected as unmeaning and inappropriate. Doctor Oliver, it is true, thinks otherwise, and says that "the name of a hundred, or waphpentake, in which the Lodge is situated, or of a navigable river, which confers wealth and dignity on the town, are proper titles for a Lodge." But a name should always convey an idea, and there can be conceived no idea worth treasuring in a Freemason's mind to be deduced from bestowing such names as New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, on a Lodge. The selection of such a name shows but little originality in the choosers; and, besides, if there be two Lodges in a town, each is equally entitled to the appellation; and if there be but one, the appropriation of it would seem to indicate an intention to have no competition in the future.

Yet, barren of Masonic meaning as are such geographical names, the adoption of them is one of the most common faults in American Masonic nomenclature. The examination of a very few old Registers, taken at random, will readily evince this fact. Thus, eighty-eight, out of one hundred and sixty Lodges in Wisconsin, were named after towns or counties; of four hundred and thirty-seven Lodges in Indiana, two hundred and fifty-one have names derived from the same source; geographical names were found in one hundred and eighty-one out of four hundred and three Lodges in Ohio, and in twenty out of thirty-eight in Maine. But, to compensate for this, we had seventy-one Lodges in New Hampshire, and only two local geographical appellations in the list.

There are, however, some geographical names which are admissible, and, indeed, are highly appropriate. These are the names of places celebrated in Masonic history. Such titles for Lodges as Jerusalem, Tyre, Lebanon, and Joppa are unexceptionable. Patmos, which is the name of a Lodge in Maryland, seems, as the long residence of one of the Patrons of the Order, to be unobjectionable. So, too, Bethel, because it signifies the House of God; Mount Moriah, the site of the ancient Temple; Calvary, the small hill on which the sprig of a cacia was found; Mount Ararat, where the ark of our father Noah rested; Ophir, whence Solomon brought the gold and precious stones with which he adorned the Temple; Tadmor, because it was a city built by King Solomon; and Salem and Jebus, because they are synonyms of Jerusalem, and because the latter is especially concerned with Ornan the Jebusite, on whose threshing-floor the Temple was subsequently built—the scene of the subsequent captivity of our ancient Brethren; Jericho, because it was under a curse; and Misgab and Tophet, because they were places of idol worship. In short, it may be adopted as a rule, that no name should be adopted whose antecedents are in opposition to the principles of Freemasonry.

The ancient patrons and worthies of Freemasonry furnish a very fertile source of Masonic nomenclature, and have been very liberally used in the selection of names of Lodges. Among the most important may be mentioned Saint John, Solomon, Hiram, King David, Adoniram, Enoch, Archimedes, and Pythagoras. The Widow's Son Lodge, of which there are several instances in the United States, is an affecting and significant title, which can hardly be too often used.

Recourse is also to be had to the names of modern distinguished men who have honored the Institution by their adherence to it, or who, by their learning in Freemasonry, and by their services to the Order, have merited some marks of approbation. And hence we meet, in England, as the names of Lodges, with Sussex, Moira, Frederick, Zealand, and Robert Burns; and in the United States with Washington, Lafayette, Clinton, Franklin, and Clay. Care must, however, be taken that no name be selected except of one who was both a Freemason and had distinguished himself, either by services to his country, to the world, or to the Order. Brother Oliver says that "the most appropriate titles are those which are assumed from the name of some ancient benefactor or meritorious individual who was a native of the place where the Lodge is held; as, in a city, the builder of the cathedral church." In the United States we are, it is true, precluded from a selection from such a source; but there are to be found some of those old benefactors of Freemasonry, who, like Shakespeare and Milton, or Homer and Virgil, have ceased to belong to any particular country, and have now become the common property of the world-wide Craft. There are, for instance Carausius, the first Royal Patron of Freemasonry in England; and Saint Alban, the first Grand Master: and Athelstan and Prince Edwin, both active encouragers of the art in the same kingdom. There are Wykeham, Gundulphe, Giffard, Langham, Yevele (called, in the old records, the King's Freemason), and Chicheley, Jermyn, and Wren, all long celebrated as illustrious Grand Masters of England, each of whom would be well entitled to the honor of giving name to a Lodge, and any one of whom would be better, more euphonious, and more spirit-stirring than the unmeaning, and oftentimes crabbed, name of some obscure village or post-office, from which too many of our Lodges derive their titles.

And, then, again, among the great benefactors to Masonic literature and laborers in Masonic science there are such names as Anderson, Dunckerley, Preston, Hutchinson, Town, Webb, and a host of others, who, though dead, still live by their writings in our memories.

The virtues and tenets—the inculcation and practise of which constitute an important part of the Masonic system—form very excellent and appropriate names for Lodges, and have always been popular among correct Masonic nomenclators. Thus we everywhere find such names as Charity, Concord, Equality, Faith, Fellowship, Harmony, Hope, Humility, Mystic Tie, Relief, Truth, Union, and Virtue. Frequently, by a transposition of the word Lodge and the distinctive appellation, with the interposition of the preposition of, a more sonorous and emphatic name is given by our English and European Brethren, although the custom is but rarely followed in the United States. There have by this method the Lodge of Regularity, the Lodge of Fidelity, the Lodge of Industry, and the Lodge of Prudent Brethren, in England; and in France, the Lodge of Benevolent Friends, the Lodge of Perfect Union, the Lodge of the Friends of Peace, and the celebrated Lodge of the Nine Sisters.

As the names of illustrious men will sometimes stimulate the members of the Lodges which bear them to an emulation of their characters, so the names of the Masonic virtues may serve to incite the Brethren to their practise, lest the inconsistency of their names and their conduct should excite the ridicule of the world.

Another fertile and appropriate source of names for Lodges is to be found in the symbols and implements of the Order. Hence, we frequently meet with such titles as Level, Trowel, Rising Star, Rising Sun, Olive Branch, Evergreen, Doric, Corinthian, Delta, and Corner-Stone Lodges. Acacia is one of the most common, and at the same time one of the most beautiful, of these symbolic names; but unfortunately, through gross ignorance, it is often corrupted into Cassia—an insignificant plant, which has no Masonic or symbolic meaning.

An important rule in the nomenclature of Lodges, and one which must at once recommend itself to every person of taste, is that the name should be euphonious, agreeable sounding. This principle of euphony has been too little attended to in the selection of even geographical names in the United States, where names with impracticable sounds, or with ludicrous associations, are often affixed to our towns and rivers. Speaking of a certain island, with the unpronounceable name of Skh, Lieber says, "If Homer himself were born on such an island, it could not become immortal, for the best-disposed scholar would be unable to remember the name"; and he thinks that it was no trifling obstacle to the fame of many Polish heroes in the Revolution of that country, that they had names which left upon the mind of foreigners no effect but that of utter confusion. An error like this must be avoided in bestowing a name upon a Lodge.
The word selected should be soft, vocal—not too long nor too short—and, above all, be accompanied in its sound or meaning by no low, indecorous, or ludicrous association. For this reason such names of Lodges should be selected as Sheboygan and Oconomowoc from the Registry of Wisconsin, because of the uncouthness of the sound; and Rough and Ready and Indian Diggins from that of California, on account of the ludicrous associations which these names convey. Again, Pythagoras Lodge is preferable to Pythagorean, and Archimedes is better than Archimedean, because the noun is more euphonious and more easily pronounced than the adjective. But this rule is difficult to illustrate or enforce; for, after all, this thing of euphony is a mere matter of taste, and we all know the adage, "De gustibus non est disputandum," there is no disputing about tastes.

A few negative rules, which are, however, easily deduced from the affirmative ones already given, will complete the topic. No name of a Lodge should be adopted which is not, in some reputable way, connected with Freemasonry. Everybody will acknowledge that Morgan Lodge would be an anomaly, and that Cowan Lodge, would, if possible, be worse. But there are some names which, although not quite as bad as these, are on principle equally as objectionable. Why should any of our Lodges, for instance, assume, as many of them have, the names of Madison, Jefferson, or Taylor, since none of these distinguished men were Freemasons or Patrons of the Craft.

The indiscriminate use of the names of saints unconnected with Freemasonry is for a similar reason objectionable. Beside our Patrons, Saint John the Baptist and Saint John the Evangelist, but three other saints can lay any claims to Masonic honors, and these are Saint Alban, who introduced, or is said to have introduced, the Order into England, and has been liberally complimented in the nomenclature of Lodges; and Saint Swithin, who was at the head of the Craft in the reign of Ethelwulf; and Saint Benedict, who was the founder of the Masonic Fraternity of Bridge Builders. But Saint Mark, Saint Luke, Saint Andrew all of whom have given names to numerous Lodges, can have no pretensions to assist as sponsors in these Masonic baptisms, since they were not at all connected with the Craft.

To the Indian names of Lodges there is a radical objection. It is true that their names are often very euphonious and always significant, for the Red Men of the American Continent are tasteful and ingenious protestors or covering between the wings of the cherubim, exteriorly, while the gods of Egypt were reputed as hidden in the interior of the Naos of the sacred barks, behind hermetically closed doors (see Cherubim).

NAPHTALI. The territory of the tribe of Naphtali adjoined, on its western border, to Phenicia, and there must, therefore, have been frequent and easy communication between the Phenicians and the Naphtalites, resulting sometimes in intermarriage. This will explain the fact that Hiram the Builder was the son of a widow of Naphtali and a man of Tyre.

NAPLES. Freemasonry must have been practised in Naples before 1751, for in that year King Charles issued an Edict forbidding it in his dominions. The author of Anti-Saint Nicaise says that there was a Grand Lodge at Naples, in 1756, which was in correspondence with the Lodges of Germany. But its meetings were suspended by a royal Edict in September, 1775. In 1777 this Edict was repealed at the instigation of the Queen, and Freemasonry was again tolerated. This toleration lasted, however, only for a brief period. In 1781 Ferdinand IV renewed the Edict of Suppression, and from that time until the end of the century Freemasonry was subjected in Italy to the combined persecutions of the Church and State, and the Freemasons of Naples met only in secret. In 1793, after the French Revolution, many Lodges were openly organized. A Supreme Council of the NAPOLeON I. It has been claimed, and with much just reason, as shown in his course of life, that Napoleon the Great was a member of the Brotherhood. Brother J. E. S. Tuckett, Transactions of Quatuor Coronati Lodge (volume xxvii, pages 96 to 114, 1914), arrives at the following conclusions:

The evidence in favor of a Masonic initiation previous to Napoleon's assumption of the imperial title is overwhelming;

The initiation took place in the body of an Army Philadelphic Lodge of the—Ecossais—Primitive Rite of Nartere, the third initiation of the "Note Communike" being an advancement in that Rite;

These initiations took place between 1795 and 1798.

Brother David E. W. Williamson sends us a reference of value here: In his Notes pour servir à l'histoire de la Franc-Magonnerie à Nancy jusqu'en 1805, M. Charles Bernardin, P. M. of the Lodge at Nancy, writing about 1910, says "Se Décembre (1797) on place la visite du général Bonaparte à la loge de Nancy." If this visit by him as a Freemason is a fact we can limit to a narrow range the probable time when Bonaparte was initiated and thus support the claim of Brother Tuckett.

Brother Tuckett's evidence is summed up thus:

In 1801, that is, fully two years before Napoleon became Emperor, a prominent Ecosse, Brother Eque, chief of the Philadelphes, claims Napoleon as "Brother of our Rite." Rite referred to is one of the Masonic systems. The Masonic evidence in favor of a Masonic initiation previous to Napoleon's assumption of the imperial title is overwhelming.

Several authors have written of the Masonic order "as proud to number Emperor, a prominent Ecossais, Brother Abraham, more probably of the Army Branch, as one of its members." The official report of a similar Festival at Montauban eleven days later describes the Degrees up to the Eighteenth, and the former of those from the Eighteenth to the Thirty-third. In October, 1812, King Joachim accepted the presidency of the Supreme Council as its Grand Commander. Both Bodies became extinct in 1815, on the accession of the Bourbons.

Louis Napoleon III was a member of the Supreme Council, of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of France.

NAPOLEONIC FREEMASONRY. An Order under this name, called also the French Order of Noachts, was established at Paris, in 1816, by some of the adherents of the Emperor Napoleon. It was divided into three Degrees: 1. Knight; 2. Commander; 3. Grand Elect. The last Degree was subdivided into three points: i. Secret Judge; ii. Perfect Initiate; iii. Knight of the Crown of Oak. The mystical ladder in this Rite consisted of eight steps or stages, whose names were Adam, Eve, Noah, Lamech, Naamah, Peleg, Oubal, and Orient. The initials of these words, properly transposed, compose the word Napoleon, and this is enough to show the character of the system. General Bertrand was elected Grand Master, but, as he was then in the Island of Saint Helena, the Order was directed by a Supreme Commander and two Lieutenants. It was Masonic in form only, and lasted but for a few years.

NATIONAL GRAND LODGE. The Royal Mother Lodge of the Three Globes, which had been established at Berlin in 1740, and recognized as a Grand Lodge by Frederick the Great in 1744, renounced the Rite of Strict Observance in 1771, and, declaring itself free and independent, assumed the title of the Grand National Mother Lodge of the Three Globes, by which appellation it is still known.

The Grand Orient of France, among its first acts, established, as an integral part of itself, a National Grand Lodge of France, which was to take the place of the old Grand Lodge, which, it declared, had ceased to exist. But the year after, in 1773, the National Grand Lodge was suppressed by the power which had given it birth; and no such power was recognized in French Freemasonry (see Grand Lodge and General Grand Lodge).
